No one can condone the brutal annexation of Kuwait by Saddam Hussein. I think I speak for all members to say that dictators like Hussein must never be allowed to oppress other nations. We made the mistake in the Second World War, and I think all nations were very concerned that we do not make that mistake again. That is why the 28-member coalition of the United Nations moved to turn back that aggression. That is why the international embargo against trade with Iraq was implemented. That is why the United Nations served notice that Hussein must withdraw from Kuwait. That is why the economic blockade was implemented.

This brings me to a critical point, the economic blockade. The economic blockade against Iraq was in fact beginning to bite and beginning to bite hard. Striking evidence was given back in December by the United States Director of the Central Intelligence Agency, Mr. William Webster, that the Iraqi exports had in fact at that time been slashed by some 97 per cent. That was even greater than the cuts that were made to the imports to Iraq, which were at that time slashed by some 90 per cent.

U.S. Defence Secretary, Dick Cheney, a few months ago said that the sanctions and the embargo were beginning to have an impact. It was back a couple of months ago. He admitted that the UN trade embargo had clearly been effective, and I quote, "in closing off the spare parts in military supplies".

The Baghdad regime was inexorably running out. It was running out of the commodity which it so desperately required, the commodity of money. Its oil reserves are the drip-feed of Baghdad's life support system. Without them, without the ability to sell its oil and use that cash to purchase armaments and supplies, I submit that the dictatorship would have ultimately perished.

It begs the question which has been asked time and time again in this House also why the decision was made to draw an arbitrary line in the sands of time on January 15 and say that at that date negotiations would cease and the trigger would be pulled. Why was that deadline imposed? Why was President Bush not prepared to allow time for the sanctions to bite harder?

There have been many arguments presented in the House with regard to that critical point. Some members have stated that it would take too long for the embargo to take hold. Others have said that it would be unlikely that the coalition of nations could have held together for that long. It would begin to disintegrate and therefore it would be emasculated. It has been said elsewhere that it would be too costly to maintain that embargo, but how costly is the price of war? How costly is the price of human life?

There have been other arguments, I submit valid arguments, that given time would also have allowed Hussein to muster the forces, to reinforce the troops, and to dig in even deeper. I am not a military strategist and I do not know the answers to these questions. It may be correct; it may not be. I am not in a position in terms of a military strategy to argue the truth of these points.

The fact remains that sufficient time was not given for those sanctions to take hold.

I heard an argument earlier this evening from one of the members on the government side that the economic blockade was in fact hurting the poor, the lower income earners, and the women and children of Iraq. Is bombing them more humanitarian and more humane? I submit that it is not.

The critical point that I want to make—and it has been made by other members of my caucus and it has been made by members of the Liberal opposition—is that insufficient time was given to exhaust all possible diplomatic and economic actions before that final tragic decision had to be made. Time was not given to squeeze Hussein until he finally realized he had to leave.

The war which now engulfs the Middle East may well have been inevitable. Perhaps waiting longer may have made it worse, but we will never know the answer to that question. I cannot help but feel that we may have moved in too fast. For the love of God, we should have waited longer. The price of human life is simply too precious to sacrifice. This war was premature and this war is also incompatible with the long-term interests for the area of the Middle East. It is incompatible with the restoration of peace in the area.

Canada's involvement with the economic blockade is very much justified and its continued involvement unfortunately now jeopardizes its traditional and historical role as a peacekeeping nation. It has tarnished our reputation. It has bloodied Canadian hands.

Having said that, I want to say: Don't get me wrong on this. No one can condone the actions of Saddam Hussein. No one can condone the atrocities that were perpetrated upon Kuwait. No one can justify the military annexation of another country. No one can tolerate the pillaging that took place, the plundering of villages, and the raping of women and children. No one can tolerate that kind of inhumane action. Hussein had to be stopped. That is, indeed, the bottom line.

Let us also remember that the apocalyptic scenario of modern warfare, with the chemical and biological weaponry, and the potential for nuclear retaliation, serves as a potent reminder that diplomacy has always been and will always be the best possible solution.

The economic sanctions were working. Given time, we could have ground Hussein into an abject and bloodless surrender, but the decision was made to discontinue the diplomatic path, to pull the trigger.

I want to submit to the House that it is really ironic when we look at it. It was the Americans themselves who armed Iraq, who trained Iraqi soldiers, who assisted Iraq in its fight with Iran, and who taught it the technology of modern warfare. Now we see the sleek missiles supplied by the Americans are in fact being launched against them. I think that fact alone speaks volumes about the ultimate consequences of the international arms trade.

We should keep in mind that the enemy is not the Iraqi people. The enemy is a dictatorial tyrant by the name of Saddam Hussein. I fear for the Iraqi people tonight for they are the ones who are to be the most devastated in this tragedy.

It is ironic that the technological wizardry of modern warfare has made it ever more deadly and pin-point accurate. Surgical is a word that has been used—and the same technology that has brought about modern warfare brings it right into our living rooms. We can turn it off. We can watch commercials. As we are having dinner, we can see the surgical strikes. It is in fact sanitized. It is a sanitized war. People have been clustered about their televisions watching commanders explaining surgical strikes and neutralizing targets, kicking ass, high-tech style.

It has eliminated the human element of war, the human tragedy of war. While it is very crucial we have the information through the media, at the same time I fear that it has desensitized this nation and will desensitize us further. It makes it easier to accept war the next time.

I want to put it into context with a passage written by Mr. Christopher Black, a Toronto lawyer and freelance writer. He writes of war, saying: "This country, for reasons still veiled behind platitudes of freedom and standing up to aggression, has begun the journey into a world of unimaginable terror, a world of disciplined and sanctioned murder, of gaping wounds and blackened burned flesh, of young men screaming in agony, of the inferno of flame-throwers, napalm, disintegrating planes and tanks blazing in the desert night, a world of spilled intestines and swollen, stinking death". That is the reality. That is the human element of war and that is why all war is wrong.

This war need not have been, at least not yet. It was premature. It was unnecessary, but now that the trigger has been pulled it is no longer our choice. We are involved. I want to make it perfectly clear that in that context Canada, as a member of the United Nations has agreed to abide by these decisions.

Now that push has come to shove, it is my personal perspective that Canada should continue to play an active role within that United Nations alliance. But what should our role be? Should it in fact be an offensive role, a role of attack and destroy? I submit that it should not. Apart from the F-18s, Canada really does not have the kind of military muscle and the technological acumen to participate in offensive action.

Canada has a moral obligation as a nation known for its peacekeeping abilities to work within the alliance in a very positive way to seek an end to the tragedy of warfare. It can, and it should, play a vital role in the provision of medical and humanitarian aid. It can, and it should, continue to provide defensive cover for the ships in the gulf.

There is a role for Canada in this theatre of war. We simply cannot cut and run. But our role should be a role of humanitarian medical aid and defensive cover. It should not be offensive. It should reflect our continued resolve to right what has become a terrible wrong.

I have no doubt the resolution of this crisis will prove crucial to the collective future of the United Nations and in fact crucial to the future of world democracy.

As I close, I want to state again that dictators such as Saddam Hussein have to be stopped. That is the bottom line. That is the final option.

• (2350)

In addition to that comment, I can only say that it is tragically unfortunate that to do so the world community had to exercise that final option and enter the theatre of war. I hope and pray that we do not have to do so in the future.

[Translation]

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): I want to congratulate my hon. colleague on his excellent speech. I must remind him, however, of the efforts, unprecedented in the history of Canadian diplomacy, that were made to prevent this war in the Persian Gulf.

The fact is that, in the 16 weeks before the Gulf war started, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, had over 50 bilateral talks with various key players. If we ou add to that the other 50 or so multilateral meetings he attended, as well as the Prime Minister's many meetings and efforts, this certainly is the largest diplomatic move ever undertaken by Canada. It may even be larger than that undertaken during WWII or when Canada provided assistance to the UN in the Korean war.

Canada did make these efforts, but it would seem that members on his side of the House do not recognize the incredible efforts Canada made so that this tragedy could be avoided. I wish my colleague would at least recognize these facts and praise the government for these unprecedented efforts.

[English]

Mr. MacWilliam: Mr. Speaker, I certainly recognize the member's comments in terms of the historical action that Canada has played in both world wars and the Korean conflict. We did play a very proud role. Many Canadians never returned to their homeland as a result of sacrificing their lives in the cause of world freedom. There is no question about that. We all recognize that and do so every year when we attend Remembrance Day ceremonies throughout this land.

At the same time I would submit to my colleague opposite that the world is entering a new arena, where the active participation in warfare will someday no longer be required. Canada has to provide a leading role. As a traditional peacekeeping nation, as a nation that has sought to find the diplomatic option at all costs, Canada has to continue to provide that role in whichever way it can, even when other nations are in active war. We are in this war. Let us recognize it. We do have a role to play, but I do not think our role is necessarily an offensive military role.

Let us face it, we are not a superpower nation. Admittedly, we do not have the technological acumen and the training for offensive action that the U.S. troops and the troops of Great Britain have. Traditionally we have played a different role in modern times. I think that we have to continue to do that.

Particularly in light of the conflict that is facing us in the Persian Gulf, we have to recognize that there is going to be great need for medical assistance. We are setting up a field hospital a few short kilometres from what could be described as the front line. We fully support that. The provision of medical aid is going to be a critical necessity if the war ends up being a protracted war. There is going to be a great need for humanitarian aid. With Jordan opening its borders to refugees, there is going to be a flood of refugees out of the Middle East. Canada must play a vital role in providing assistance for those refugees.

I recognize the fact that we had to seek the military option in previous years, but that does not mean that it commits us to an offensive military option in modern times.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie): As I rise to speak in this debate, Mr. Speaker, Canada is at war and the prevailing sentiment is deep concern.

Those who were for war are wondering how long it will last, how many lives will be lost, and what will happen after that. Those who were against are wondering whether there is anything that can be done against that war. Should they give up and passively let the current carry them? And, like the others, they also wonder how many lives will be lost. Just where can this war lead us? Was it worth it, particularly when we see and hear since the beginning that an attack against Israel might very well trigger retaliation, and Israel would have every reason indeed to defend herself and protect her people against an attack?

That, however, would completely alter the course, the scope, and the intensity of the war. What would happen in Jordan, Syria, Tunisia, Morocco and Algeria under pressure from their people? Would they side with Saddam Hussein? And Mauritania and Turkey, are they not making Saddam Hussein the hero of the Arab world? Did the world, our planet, deserve to be drawn into such a risky endeavour, on the eve of the year 2000, in year one after the cold war?

Many hopes have been lost now, particularly among younger people. Polls show that Canadians are against war and want peace. I am glad to see these thousands of people throughout the world, even in the United States; I think about the 300,000 men and women demonstrated in Germany, and the many Canadians who took to the street in Quebec and Montreal marched for peace.

Right now that is the most encouraging indication for the future. That feeling of peace must now become the foundation of the new international order where state-to-state relations will be governed by right rather than might, something which, as early as the 18th century, Emmanuel Kant kept hoping for and called the universal republic. In this morning's Le Droit, Adrien Cantin wrote that we must prepare for post-war times right now.

It aptly sums up what I feel and what I think today. I did not rise to while time away, for as an elected member I believe that in such circumstances we do have a role to play. We have every indication that the people of Quebec and other Canadians want peace. Since the past is oftentimes our garantee for the future, it would be appropriate to examine our conscience. Questions have to be addressed to the government right here in the House. Why are we at war? How come we have reached this point?

We all know that the United States, Japan and the European Economic Community had domestic policy priorities with respect to this war, particularly their oil supplies. We all know as well that the United States play the role of policeman in the world, and is always closely linked to ever stiffer international competition to find and maintain new markets.

But does Canada have such domestic policy priorities? Oil? I doubt it, considering that Canada is an oil producing country. For example, Quebec gets only 1.2 per cent of its oil supplies from the Middle East, from Saudi Arabia. It could not be argued that this is an absolute strategic requirement. We also know that Canada has never used strong-arm tactics to secure a place on international markets, which explains our country's excellent reputation.

This is certainly why, when trying to justify our Armed Forces' involvement in this war, the Mulroney government never put forward any other argument then Canada's good name.

Again, there are more questions than answers. In what have Canada's best interests been better served since August 2, than since January 16, when the war started. Finally, has Canada a policy for the Middle East and, if so, what is it? How could the Canadian government drag us so deeply in to this war without being politically and morally responsible for the men, women and children who will die? How could it fail to explain to us, without being asked, what situation is likely to develop after the war?

Has Canada a policy for the Middle East? Has Canada recognized the need to call a peace conference for the Middle East, on the basis of all and I emphasize the word all—UN resolutions concerning that area? What is its opinion about the political stability of that area? Has it many proposals to make?

How does it think it will be possible, should the allied forces prevail, to ensure Kuwait's security? Does it know how long our Armed Forces will remain there? Does it feel that Canada's good name in the world has been enhanced by this diplomacy which does not reflect in any way our country's strategic interests and resemble much too closely, for instance that of the United States?

If Canada had actively pursued a new diplomatic approach for the Middle East, an approach based on the need for an international peace conference in that area, which would recognize the absolute necessity, definitely solve the Palestinian issue, to create a Palestinian state, I sincerely believe that Canada would have been better served, that its reputation would have been enhanced and that peace could have been maintained.

When I arrived here, my position was this: Denounce Iraq's aggression against Kuwait and demand the withdrawal of Iraqi forces; maintain the economic sanctions against Iraq with the participation of our military forces; oppose all active involvement of our Armed Forces in actual combat; and finally support as much as possible all diplomatic efforts which might result in an international conference on the Middle East situation.

This conference should deal with the problems of Kuwait, Lebanon, Cyprus, Palestine, as well as the whole issue of the relations between Israel and its Arabs neighbors. If we really want to see the light at the end of the tunnel in that region, taking into account the need to protect the strategic interest, of western countries and above all, the need to recognize the legitimate aspirations of these people, this international conference should address the following issues: first, the immediate withdrawal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait; second, the participation of all Middle East countries and nations, including the PLO; third, the PLO's recognition of Israel's basic right to exist as a state; fourth, Israel's recognition of a Palestinian State.

I wish to emphasize that all these conditions are contained in resolutions already adopted by the United Nations, an organization which would be called upon to play a vital role as the chairman of this conference. If we want to have a fighting chance at achieving our purpose, we should avoid at all costs the temptation of trying to identify the good and the bad. Refusing all absolutism, we should refrain from trying to interpret reality in black and white.

Saddam Hussein is neither the champion of the Palestinian cause, nor the saviour of the Third World, nor a martyr to the cause of Islam. He is a dictator who for a long time enjoyed the support of Western powers, including the United States. For that matter, George Bush is not a peace and justice loving man who is adverse to all forms of aggression. He has quite a track record, from Grenada to Panama in his support of a great many dictators, including precisely Saddam Hussein.

On the other hand, we should not overlook the fact that the U.S.S.R., an important member of the Security Council, took advantage of the Middle East crisis to crush violently the legitimate aspirations of the Baltic States. It is not by resorting to such analyses, therefore, that we will be able to grasp the full meaning of reality. The only possible understanding should be based on the recognition that all men and women have the right to live their lives to the fullest, that all people have the right to express themselves, and that all countries have the right to exist. These are high ideals, but they are the only ones on which to base a true international order which would guarantee the greatest possible social justice for all.

We should not overlook the fact that in the Middle East context such Israeli leaders as Menahem Begin and Yitzhak Shamir were once terrorists themselves and that, more recently, that it was only on the express order of the supreme court of that country that the Israeli government reluctantly agreed to give out gas masks to Palestinians in the occupied territories, and only one per family at that.

As we must prepare for the after war period, Canada should position itself now on that basis, for this war will not eliminate the causes of the current conflict. I came here feeling that I could not support this war not because I am in principle against all wars, but because, in my heart of hearts, I felt that this war would not change anything in the gulf crisis, and the outbreak of the war has not made me change my mind.

Of course, my heart is with the men and women of Quebec and the rest of Canada who are directly involved in the war and who have been risking their lives every moment since last Wednesday. I fully support them and I sincerely hope that this war will soon be over for them. The Mulroney Government has never had and will never have my support for his action since last August 2.

We should not fail to see the forest for the trees. There are circumstances when people should not act against their principles, especially when these principles, rather than war harbour true and viable solutions for the future.

For these reasons, I will not support the government's proposal.

[English]

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, I have a quick comment to make and a question to ask.

I was quite impressed by the member's speech and discourse. I was impressed by the emotion with which he spoke about Canada. Would the hon. member be good enough to speak briefly on what he thinks Canada's role should be in this war, rather than the one suggested by the government?

[Translation]

Mr. Duceppe: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the government would be well advised now to step up its diplomatic effort, for it is wrong to support that diplomacy ends in time of war. As a matter of fact, it becomes actually more intense, although it might not necessarily be visible for all to see.

Moreover, I suggest that the government should put pressure on the Americans who are definitely the true force behind the United Nations' resolution. They are in charge. Again, I suggest that the government should put pressure on the Americans and remind them that the intended objective, at least judging from the UN resolutions, is not to crush Iraq, but to ensure that the Iraqi forces leave Kuwait. Otherwise, not only would they not respect the spirit and the letter of the UN resolutions, but they would completely destabilize that area, and cause a ground swell of hatred against both the United States and the whole Western world. Canada should guard against that. I suggest that this is the type of action Canada should take at this time.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for asking a question, because after 12 hours in the House, I want to be right next to the member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie. It's pretty hard to run to your seat to ask a question, so I appreciate the hon. member's initiative. I don't want the kids to think there is more than one of us when they see us first in one corner of the House and then somewhere else.

This is the first time I have heard the hon. member, a colleague from Quebec, speak to a matter of such importance. I am always disappointed that members generally show so little interest in international affairs. I am disappointed because I always said that one of the main reasons I was attracted to Ottawa, in addition to defending Quebec and my own identity, was my abiding interest in international affairs, and I think that as federal members our focus should be international as well as national. We don't belong at this level of government if we have no thoughts on the matter to offer our fellow Canadians.

My point is that I was pleasantly surprised by what the hon. member said. I was of course delighted, but not just because we seem to share the same views. After all, I have always respected colleagues who do not share my views, when they express them with a great deal of eloquence, intelligence and vigour. In the circumstances, some of the good speeches I have heard in the House so far included two by Bloc québécois members. The hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean made a remarkable speech, and in fact, in caucus I and several other members recommended that our colleagues read it very carefully. And this is certainly not someone who shares our political philosophy.

In the same vein, the hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie provides a fresh and new outlook on this very dramatic situation. Another great speech we heard this afternoon was by the hon. member for Esquimalt—Jean de Fuca from British Columbia. I say, because it is getting late, and I wish people—I am not referring to members of my own party but to members of other parties—would read it. There is a man who must feel incredibly torn. He said himself: "I am a Jew." In any case, I felt I had to draw your attention to his speech, one of the great speeches like the one I just heard.

I do not really have any questions, except that I would like the hon. member to expand for a few minutes on the international conference which has never materialized. What does the hon. member think this conference would do for problems in the Middle East, since he referred to it in his speech?

Mr. Duceppe: I think that if the UN has a role to play, and people are talking about a new world order, there is a role here for an international organization. I think that role should be played by the UN. It should be made possible for Mr. Perez de Cuellar to hold such a conference.

Furthermore, as I pointed out this conference would include the PLO, provided it deletes from its Charter the statement that it does not recognize Israel's right to be a sovereign state. That is imperative. Similarly, I think Israel has an important role to play. What if Israel were to say: "We agree to having a peace conference and to having the PLO at the conference, we agree to a Palestinian State as provided in the resolutions passed long ago at the UN, provided the PLO recognizes Israel"? It is impossible to negotiate when one party is against the continued existence of the other party. I think that is obvious.

I think that is where we should look for a solution to these problems. Until there is a conference—today, there is a problem with Iraq. In 1967, it was Egypt, and again in 1973. There were problems in 1948. In 1956 it was Suez, and I forgot Cyprus and Lebanon—until there is a conference it is like a puzzle with a piece missing. At least at a conference, people will talk to each other.

The UN will be able to provide for ways to enforce its decisions, and I am thinking of economic sanctions, properly supported and applied by all countries, based on the legitimate status of the UN. I think that is how we must see international relations in the future, and not the way Foglia described this morning in La Presse, where he said he had the impression the Americans were high-tech to their fingertips but with as much brains as King Kong. That kind of approach is dangerous. It is very dangerous to let intellingence be thrust aside by technology. I am not blaming the American people. I respect them just the same. None of us is better than the next person, but we must let diplomacy take precedence over the tools of destruction. I think that is essential.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ferland): I want to thank the hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie. The hon. member for Mississauga East.

[English]

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, the lives of hundreds of Canadian men and women in the Persian Gulf may be snuffed out by the decisions made by this government. Politicians sitting in relative comfort and safety will again decide the fate of the soldiers on the front lines.

Cicero stated with moral authority that one should never cease to advocate for peace, for even peace—unjust as it may be—is better than the most just war. History has taught us that war involves such a train of unexpected and unlikely circumstances that no one can predict its conclusion or its consequences.

The aggression of Saddam Hussein most certainly merits the condemnation that he has drawn from Canada and the international community. We have been told of the atrocities committed against the people of Kuwait but there is no greater atrocity than war itself. Many of the same Kuwaitis whom we hope to free may not even survive their liberation. Iraqi civilians have already died and just hours ago Israeli civilians, who are far removed from the conflict in Kuwait, were struck by Iraqi missiles.

Our Prime Minister has said there was no other way. He could not wait any longer. He could not give peaceful measures any more time. The Prime Minister has told us that Canada must abandon its traditional peacekeeping role and join the assault on Iraq. Unlike the Americans, the Canadian Parliament is not voting on a clear resolution taking our country into war.

For the past five and a half months this government has been creeping closer to war while denying at every step that it was going in this direction. It is the leaders of this government who are waging war, but it is the Canadian people who will suffer, particularly those in the Armed Forces and their families.

The United States Congress debated fully the arguments for war and the arguments for peace. By only a handful of votes, the United States Senate chose to press their nation into battle. Our own government, unfortunately, is not honest enough to debate the real issue at an appropriate and useful time. It was not until the day before the bombs started falling that the Prime Minister allowed debate on his government's decision to go to war. We are here tonight debating whether the UN should have given its permission for war to be waged when we know that war is already well under way.

The ministers of this government never told the Canadian public in a direct and honest way that they were dragging the nation into its first war since Korea. Once again, this government has looked south of the border for instruction. Once again the Canadian public has been bushwhacked.

The Prime Minister has said that the question before the House is a simple one. It may be simple for the government, but for the families of the Canadian men and women who will needlessly die or be maimed this question is not so simple. They will have to pay the real price of this war, not the Prime Minister.

The only noble war is the one that is never fought, that is prevented by leaders whose prime interest is the protection of human lives and who have an absolute commitment to the avoidance of unnecessary conflict. No such commitment has been shown in the Persian Gulf.

The experience in Southeast Asia taught us that, like pawns on a chess board, soldiers will be sacrificed. But the real players will shake hands and move on to the next game.

Barely 17 years ago, U.S. troops pulled out of Vietnam. Nearly 60,000 Americans had been killed and thousands more left maimed, paralysed, or psychologically dysfunctional. When the wounded returned home, they found themselves in veterans' hospitals that can only be described as slums. They faced a public that had already come to realize that the war they fought was immoral and wrong. Many of the same veterans sit in wheelchairs today and remember the role they played in the conflict that left one million Vietnamese dead and a landscape petrified by napalm and years of constant bombardment.

Vietnam was called a noble war, but there is little that is noble in killing hundreds of thousands of desperately poor people, people with few assets and no foreign interests. Today a new generation of soldiers, too young to remember the futility of Vietnam and inspired by Rambo and Schwartzneggar, are being sent to the new killing fields.

American forces are again fighting to restore a division of people imposed by another western nation decades before. Once again the enemy is a population that is overwhelmingly poor, people who will benefit the least from any spoils of war. These are the people who will be shot by American and British soldier, and bombed by allied, perhaps Canadian, planes.

The Prime Minister continues to cite human rights abuses by Iraq as a motivation to commit the greatest abuse of human rights possible, the atrocity of war. The Prime Minister allowed Canada to import $250,000 of oil each day before August 2, knowing full well that Saddam Hussein had used chemicals weapons against his own civilian population.

It is hypocritical for this government now to claim to be overcome by an attack of principle, when events no more horrendous took place in Kuwait. The decision taken by the U.S. to go to war over Kuwait is particularly unfortunate in view of the success that sanctions were having in punishing Iraq.

The problem with sanctions was that there was no guarantee Hussein would be out of Kuwait before the U.S. presidential campaign gets under way next year. All political leaders remember well how Margaret Thatcher used the Falklands war to propel herself to a second electoral victory.

Repeatedly, the Secretary of State for External Affairs asked if there was any evidence that sanctions were working. Surely he knows that the director of the CIA reported in December that continued sanctions would have an increasingly damaging effect on the Iraqi military: the virtual depletion of Iraq's foreign exchange reserves by spring, the shut down of nearly all but energy related and military industries by the summer, a decrease in the Iraqi air forces's ability to fly regular missions after three to six months, and a deterioration of Iraq's ground and air forces after just nine months.

Contrary to what the Prime Minister told us, waiting for sanctions to work could have only made Iraq weaker and poorer, thereby saving Allied lives if military force were ever genuinely necessary. The war option is the most damaging of all possibilities for the region and the allies.

Let us not be fooled about the duration or the human cost of war. So far, 45,000 body bags have been sent to the region. The U.S. military must believe 45,000 could die there. The tragedy is that western culture has glorified war, the leaders who led their nations into battle, and especially those who died in combat. I wish we could attach as much reverence to those who manage to avoid conflict.

Today our nation has seen the results of the first two days of war. The first day, many thought that a U.S. victory would be an easy one. We saw an attack that looked and sounded like a scene from Star Wars. We did not see the carnage on the ground, the 150,000 people who at least one source said, were killed. Now Israel has been hit, once again fearing the use of poison gas against its people and their families. Saudi Arabia has been attacked. Turkey has visions of claiming the oilfields in northern Iraq. Both Syria and Iran are wondering what opportunities a crippled Iraq will offer them. A lasting peace seems less likely than ever.

The government has accepted responsibility for those Canadians killed and those killed by Canadians. For that is all that war involves, killing and being killed. There has never been a good war or a bad peace. Our nation, like a sailor tossed overboard by a captain intoxicated by the glories of war, has no option but to swim to shore, to see the war to its conclusion.

Our brave men and women in the gulf will do our fighting for us and deserve all the respect and assistance we can offer.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I have just a couple of comments and possibly a question. I take exception to a couple of things said by the hon. member and would like to clear the record.

At the beginning of her speech, the hon. member mentioned that the decision by the Canadian government to become involved in war would cost hundreds of thousands of lives. I just want some clarification on that, because I think the member knows full well that it was a collective action taken by the United Nations and not by Canada alone. In other words, Canada did not make the decision to start a war.

Also, I would like the member to comment on some remarks made by her former leader—in fact the leader under whom she ran under as a candidate in the last election. He dismissed the relationship that the member attempts to make between the Vietnam war and the Persian Gulf War. I want her to comment on the issue because he spoke very well on that and dismissed any connection or parallel between those two wars.

The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra told us that he dismissed totally the accusation that this is simply a U.S. war and that the U.S. has, in a sense, drawn every other country into it. He dismissed that totally. He told us that it is very much a UN sanctioned war in a sense. It is not a U.S. war, not an American war. He is very, very strong on that. I will quote his speech at page 17133 of Hansard of January 16, 1991:

> Nobody pushes the United Nations around, not even the United States. Not one nation, especially not the United States, is able to impose marching orders on that institution.

He goes on to say:

> No, this is not an American adventure. It is an United Nations action in collective security, one of the greatest historic developments of our time, certainly in my lifetime—

Perhaps the hon. member could comment on that.

Ms. Guarnieri: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his question. I believe I said hundreds of Canadian men and women. I note that the member asks me about hundreds of thousands of Canadian men and women who will lose their lives. Whether it is 100 or 100,000 lives, 100 are just as important as hundred of thousands Canadian men and women who might lose their lives. So I think we are quibbling about numbers.

• (0030)

I put an equal value or weight on a hundred lives as I do a on hundreds of thousands of lives. But as I mentioned in my speech, I do not see how the hon. member can say with such certainty the exact number of Canadians lives that will be sacrificed to a war which Canadians were not even aware was creeping up on them.

The hon. member asks me about my difference of opinion with the former leader of the Liberal Party. Obviously the former leader has his opinion and I have mine.

In return, I would like to ask the hon. member if he would be good enough to answer a question about a statement that the defence minister made on November 16, when I understand he was visiting the armed forces in the gulf. He told reporters that Canadians might consider participating in an attack on Iraq even without the sanctions of the UN. I quote: "Our preference is that if force is needed there would be a resolution endorsed by the United Nations, but we have not ruled out Canada's support of force outside the United Nations".

That is quite a cheeky comment to make, I would suggest to the minister.

I would like to ask a second question, if the Speaker would allow me to. What was the big rush to get Canada involved in this war? Where is Canada's national interest? Why did the Prime Minister, in an interview on December 28, say: "We are not getting ready for war," he kept insisting, "we are trying to secure peace. Should that change, we are going to know long in advance".

Subsequently he said: "I will go to the House of Commons and explain it and examine with them certain alternatives for Canada".

What alternatives did the government examine before launching Canada into the war?

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker. I would like to reflect upon an interesting observation. I wonder if the member might care to comment on it.

One thing that I have noticed just prior and subsequent to the war being called is that many, students in my riding of Okanagan—Shuswap have gathered together and have spoken very strongly with a united voice that Canada and the nations of the UN, the allied nations, should do whatever they can to find a peaceful resolution to this conflict, to give more time for the economic sanctions to work.

I just want to reflect on a letter that was written to me. Unfortunately it was the very day that the war was called that it arrived. It says: "Your constituents in the Okanagan—Shuswap gathered at the cenotaph in Salmon Arm on Wednesday in a silent prayer for peace. We would like you to send the attached message to the Government of Canada". It says: "A message to the Government of Canada via our MP Lyle MacWilliam: Hold off on military action. War as a solution is unacceptable to us. Give us sanctions, negotiations, and give peace a chance".

These are many residents in the Okanagan—Shuswap area. There has been a number of petitions from high schools throughout my area. Obviously the students, the young people in Canada, are becoming very concerned about the whole aspect of Canada's involvement in military action. I view it as a very positive sign that our young people are becoming involved and interested in these affairs and speaking out with a very strong voice. They are saying: "give peace a chance, utilize whatever efforts you can to find peaceful resolutions before exercising that final tragic option". I wonder if the member is finding the same thing in her constituency and if she has any comments she would like to make.

Ms. Guarnieri: I thank the hon. member for his question and his commentary. I think it is quite safe to say that we are kindred souls in this regard.

During the Christmas holidays I had the occasion to visit many of the schools in my riding. The number one topic was the Persian Gulf and the number one concern among the young ones was conscription. All of them, unequivocally, even at that time said that this government was bent on sending them to war. They were astute enough to realize that at that early date. Their number one concern was that they feared they would be drafted.

I would very much like to seek the assurance of this House that this government has no such intent on drafting young individuals who have never had explained to them the merits of this war, why we went to war, or what the national interest of this war is. Many of these young ones should be listened to. I also believe that this government has turned a total deaf ear to what Canadians are thinking.

My office is continuously inundated with calls from people who fear that we have been misguided and have stumbled into a war that we should never have been into in the first place. I can say with great certainly that had we been the government, we would never have found ourselves in this situation to begin with.

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I will try to make my speech although I have a severe cold. Still I hope I will be able to deliver all the remarks I have prepared. I want to join the debate because it has to do with an important issue.

The wide variety of opinions expressed in this debate is testimony to the democratic character of our parliamentary system where each of us is a living link. In these democratic precincts I want to make my contribution as a member, as a Canadian from Quebec. I am proud of the reputation our country has gained the world over as peacekeeper. Canada did achieve notable success by participating in the United Nations peacekeeping operations and peacefully settling various conflicts through diplomatic channels. This important factor must be kept in mind during the debate.

Unfortunately, diplomacy has been silenced and what we hear now is the roar of cannons or, more properly, missiles. Being Jewish, I will not hide the fact that the threats hanging over Israel tonight, right now if the news is correct, are present in my mind.

[English]

As a Jew, I have a deep and abiding concern for the welfare of Israel. Of course, this does not make me oblivious to the aspirations of others. I consider myself first and foremost a citizen of the world. Rabbi Harry Stern of Temple Emmanuel in Montreal used to say that there is only one race, the human race. I also know that Israelis yearn for peace with their Arab neighbours and with the Palestinians.

After hearing of last night's attack on Israel, my first thoughts were for friends in Israel. I hoped that they and other Israelis had not been hurt. We now know, of course, that innocent civilians died and our hearts go out to them and their families. We hope that Israel and Israelis will be spared further attacks.

This unprovoked aggression reminds us of the tremendous price Israel pays simply to exist. I am sure that everyone in this House supports Israel's absolute right to defend itself.

The Liberal Party opposed going to war on January 15.

That does not mean that we would always oppose war. Our leader said clearly in his speech to this House that we opposed going to war at that time. We believed that sanctions ought to be given more time.

I am not a pacifist. It cannot be said that the Liberal Party is pacifist in the sense that we believe that it is possible to do away with war under all circumstances. Unfortunately, that is probably not something that the human condition will ever attain.

Our position does not mean that we are opposed to the collective security provisions of the UN Charter. It does not mean either that, as some have suggested in this House, we are prepared to condone Saddam Hussein's aggression. Quite the contrary. We supported a wide variety of measures to make him pay for his aggression. The question is when to use the ultimate recourse of war, when to exercise the security provisions of the charter.

Last week, 47 members of the United States Senate and a good number of congressmen—I forget the exact number—voted against the use of force at that time. Our position is no different from those members of the U.S. Congress. War, the ultimate recourse, should only be used after carefully weighing a whole host of competing factors. Were the conditions right on January 15 or 16? Historians and political scientists will debate this question for years.

In debate in this House, we have heard arguments on both sides of the issue. On the one hand, the Prime Minister, when he spoke in the House, argued that with time and wealth Saddam Hussein would strengthen his arsenal. While sanctions had affected Iraq's exports and living conditions, Saddam would ensure that his armed forces received top priority. I do not think anybody in this House doubts that.

The Prime Minister also mentioned that Saddam Hussein had demonstrated limitless tolerance for the suffering of his people and there was no evidence that sanctions had caused a groundswell of discontent.

On the other side of the argument, the leader of my party observed that in September and October, President Bush, Secretary of State Baker and the Director of the CIA, Mr. William Webster, had all said that sanctions were working. I am sure that we have heard these figures many times in this debate. More than 90 per cent of Iraq's imports and 97 per cent of its exports had been stopped. Industrial production had declined by 40 per cent. The flow of spare parts and military supplies from the Soviet Union and France had stopped. My leader said that the United Nations Security Council should report on the effectiveness of sanctions. He argued that the use of force should be the last resort after all other avenues had been completely exhausted, sanctions and diplomacy included.

To try to gain some perspective on these questions, I spoke some weeks ago to a reputed national affairs analyst. She told me that she was not optimistic that sanctions would work within three or four years. Sanctions are premised on the assumption that the target population will rise up and overthrow its leader. Iraq was an ideal case from an economic standpoint, but perhaps the worst case in the sense that it has a ruthless leader with a powerful security apparatus.

Further, Saddam Hussein has shown his ability to build down his economy or, in other words, to reduce the standard of living of Iraqis. That was done during the eight or nine year war with Iran.

This analyst believed that there were really only two choices: one was to leave Saddam Hussein in Kuwait for three or four years; the other was the option that we are faced with now, namely war. These are both terrible choices.

The best thing you can say about leaving Saddam Hussein in Kuwait is that the status quo would have been preserved. In the view of the analyst I spoke to, Hussein would have had difficulty building his military capability. He would not have had great capacity to do further damage in the region.

Then there is the option of war.

No one can say where war may lead, how long it will last, how many lives will be lost or how many countries will be involved. Apart from the human costs, many agree that the political consequences will be equally terrible. War will bring with it political destabilization. Many questions must be asked about the peace that will follow. Here are just a couple: Will Iraq survive as an independent country or will it be divided between Syria and Iran? Will war lead to a Shiite government?

We have not begun to address these and countless other questions.

What I am saying is that war will bring with it human devastation and political consequences that may be worse than a prolonged occupation of Kuwait would have brought. That is, as I said earlier, a terrible conclusion to come to when we think of the devastation of Kuwait and its people. But again, we are weighing two terrible choices.

I would ask, had the opposite case been made, was war necessary to avoid even greater death and destruction that will result from war? Was Saddam Hussein in a position to do further damage?

With Operation Desert Shield, with several hundred thousand allied troops in Saudi Arabia, would Saddam Hussein have risked attacking Saudi Arabia or any other neighbour?

The argument has been made that war was necessary to stop Saddam Hussein from going nuclear. If we had evidence that Iraq was close to possessing a deliverable nuclear weapon, my view and that of our party would clearly have been different.

In November, The New York Times published a report in which it cited intelligence estimates that Iraq would require two to ten years to develop a nuclear arsenal. In an editorial, The New York Times offered the opinion that the Iraqi nuclear threat did not itself justify a military strike at this time. The editorial continued:

> The only long-term solution, short of unending military occupation, must be diplomatic. In the final resolution of the gulf crisis, the nuclear issue must be high on the agenda. All shipments of bomb-making material to Iraq should be embargoed, international inspections should become far more aggressive, and Iraq should be pressed to forgo building facilities that could be rapidly converted to bomb production.

Some may say that this is the view of a newspaper, The New York Times, albeit a fairly authoritative newspaper. It may or may not be right. However, before going to war, I believe that we require persuasive evidence, which I do not believe was presented to this Parliament, to the U.S. Congress or to the United Nations.

There is another aspect of the strategy of the last few months that I would like to deal with at this time. It became apparent to me in the weeks leading up to January 15 that somewhat paradoxically the prospect of war gave undeserved importance to Saddam Hussein. Because we were all so fearful of the consequences of war, some were prepared to offer him all kinds of things in order to avoid a war.

If the UN had not set a deadline of January 15, if we were prepared to see sanctions through, then Saddam Hussein could have been ignored. There would have been no question of linkage to other matters. Saddam Hussein is a pariah. Without the threat of war, he would have played no part in international affairs until he began to conduct himself in a civilized fashion.

The events of the last few days in the Soviet Union also remind us that we must bring a sense of perspective to international affairs. While acting against Iraq to ensure that it does not benefit from its brutal aggression, we have to weigh this situation. I am not of course suggesting that what is happening in the Soviet Union is any parallel to what happened in Iraq, but there are many other incidents, many other tragedies that have taken place in the world in recent years which have to be kept in perspective.

Another point I would like to make is that no country is closer to the United States than Canada. I would suggest therefore that we not only owe the United States our friendship, but we owe it our judgment. The United States makes mistakes.

Prior to August 2 the United States, through its ambassador to Iraq, conducted itself in a rather astonishing fashion. I am referring to a discussion that took place between April Glaspie, the American ambassador to Iraq, and Saddam Hussein on July 25, just six or seven or eight days prior to the invasion of Kuwait.

After Saddam Hussein explained his dispute with Kuwait to the American ambassador, Ambassador Glaspie responded: "We have no opinion on the Arab–Arab conflicts like your border disagreement with Kuwait. I was in the American Embassy in Kuwait in the late 1960s. The instruction we had during this period was that we should express no opinion on this issue and that the issue is not associated with America."

The United States sent the wrong signal to Saddam Hussein, practically inviting him to go ahead and invade Kuwait. Since August 2, the world has paid dearly for this terrible mistake. Indeed, if we look at the history of American policy in that region over a period of the past 10 years there was a review on one of the American networks about a week or so ago, we cannot help but feel that American policy was sorely deficient in many respects, to put it mildly.

The debate that we are having here this evening may sound somewhat academic at this stage. That may be so, but the war will end and it will be necessary to revisit these questions if we wish to build the new world order that everyone is talking about these days.

I referred to the mistake the Americans made just prior to August 2 in their dealings with Saddam Hussein. Let us not forget also that it was the Americans, the French, the West Germans, the Soviets and a number of other nationalities that helped build Saddam Hussein's war machine. We have to avoid repeating that mistake in Iraq and in other countries. We can only pray that the war will end quickly and that loss of life will be kept to a minimum. Our thoughts are with the Canadian men and women serving in the gulf. We wish them Godspeed, Mr. Speaker.

I have heard some members during this debate speak of efforts in their constituencies to bring Muslims, Jews and Christians, people of other religions together. I would hope this war will lead to more of these efforts and that civilized, good relationships will prevail among all Canadians. If this war proves anything, it is that we have a lot of bridge building to do.

[Translation]

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I did appreciate the comments of my colleague. However I wish he would tell me whether he agrees with the position of his party when he talks about sanctions. Some of the sanctions that should be or should have been applied instead of declaring war would include, among other things advocated by his party, cutting off the Iraqi's water supply at dam sites located more to the north in Turkey or again cutting off the food supply line, a tactic which in either case would have victimized the civilian population, not the military. As a Canadian, does he believe that this position would be acceptable to the people of this country?

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member wants to know whether I agree with the position of our party concerning the economic sanctions. These sanctions did not originate from my party, of course. They were imposed through a number of United Nations resolutions. These measures were endorsed by all UN member countries, certainly by those that had approved the sanctions, those that sat on the Security Council. Perhaps the economic sanctions could have been made stiffer.

With respect to the specific issue raised by my colleague, as I said a moment ago in my remarks, the purpose of economic sanctions is to convince people that the dictator must be overthrown.

By imposing still harsher economic sanctions, it might have been possible to prompt the Iraqis to get rid of Saddam Hussein but, as I pointed out in my remarks the analyst to whom I spoke was not overly enthusiastic because Saddam Hussein rules his people with such an iron fist that they would have a hard time getting rid of him. Unless I am mistaken, the economic sanctions did leave room for providing Iraq with medical supplies. I am not an expert in such matters but I think that basically the hon. member wanted to know whether I endorsed the economic sanctions, and the answer is yes indeed.

[English]

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, on the question of sanctions, it is ironic that the Conservative member would talk about cutting off the Tigris and the Euphrates River and the water supply to Iraq, and, indeed the food supply as sanctions. What the Conservative Party has chosen is a different form of sanctions.

• (0100)

The world is sanctioning Iraq. The Conservative Party would rather sanction the Iraqi people—the poor and the children of Iraq—out of a B-52 bomber with tens of thousands of bombs falling on civilian areas. That is indeed a sanction, a very strict sanction, and there is a suggestion by the Conservatives that ever-tightening economic sanctions are not appropriate.

A lot of my friends at CFB Comox, who have thought this out very carefully, do not want to be involved in this. They do not want to be killing Arabs because of the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and the Conservative Party. That is not why they joined the Armed Forces.

Clearly, the sanctions that the Conservatives want are dropping bombs out of a B-52 on women, children, and civilians in Iraq. The hon. member's attempt to discredit the Liberal member and the Liberal Party on the basis of ever-increasing economic sanctions is unbelievably callous. I would urge that member, rather than attempting to take that tact, to contact the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs and telling them to stop the war.

Mr. Ferland: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

I think my colleague from North Island—Powell River is mistaken. Apparently he is trying to tack the Liberal Party positions on me. Mr. Speaker, I for one do not consider that cutting off water and food supplies can properly be described as being economic sanctions.

[English]

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, it is an ironic manner of obtaining the floor.

I certainly do not have any problem with offering the Iraqis a choice with economic sanctions, be they military equipment and supplies or materials to run their society, and then gradually increasing sanctions to things like water and food supplies. The Conservatives have—

Mr. Thompson: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is the gentleman speaking on debate or in reply to questions and comments of the previous speaker? My point is simply this. He has rattled on in a most ridiculous way and has thrown accusations all around the place and I just think at this time—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt you, but you know as well as I do that this is not a point of order, but rather a matter of opinion. Hon. members may have different views. We are at the questions and comments stage, and the hon. member is expressing a view which can be argued by other members. Right now he may indeed state his opinion, then the previous speaker might respond.

Again I recognize the hon. member for North Island—Powell River for a brief comment.

[English]

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I would just like to say that the two Liberal members who have spoken have made very thoughtful speeches. I would think the attempt to discredit them a little thoughtless and—

Mr. Thompson: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. That is, again, exaggeration. The members were not trying to discredit members. It was a most thoughtful debate and we understand that. I think that it is totally ridiculous to suggest that.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): This is simply a discussion. The point is that his speech was very thoughtful, as was that of the member for Portneuf.

But one cannot effectively sanction women and children and civilians out of a B-52 bomber, as the Conservatives are endorsing. That is not acceptable.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, again it is—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The time for questions or comments is over.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker. I rise this morning to engage in a debate that I never expected I would be participating in. Certainly, it is a debate that I never thought I would see the Parliament of Canada undertake. In fact, until the word came down on Wednesday night that we were in a situation of war and that missiles were actually flying toward Iraq, I never believed it. I never believed that Canada would actually go to war.

I believe that is a position many members of the House had. In the hours following that first announcement, while wandering the halls of Centre Block, I ran into many members who were dumbfounded, who were awestruck, who could not believe that this had actually happened.

Over the last two days, I have had time to think about it and I have been asking myself what is Canada's role in this regard. Why is Canada at war? Why are we going to war? What justification can there possibly be for that war? I have to come to the conclusion that there is no justification for Canada to be involved in a war at this time.

President George Bush has said,—and the Prime Minister has also acknowledged and indicated—, that economic sanctions simply were not working and we had to go to war. The economic sanctions that were being imposed have been the most comprehensive economic sanctions in the history of the world.

Last week there was a very eloquent debate taking place in the United States in which speaker after speaker, mostly Democrats, rose to point out the evidence that in fact economic sanctions were taking hold and that they were having an effect. There was evidence such as the report from the CIA which said that the war machine of Saddam Hussein was beginning to break down and, if economic sanctions continued for a few more months, they would begin the cannibalization of Saddam Hussein's war machine as the Iraqis would take parts from equipment to put on other equipment to keep it going. This is very sophisticated equipment and, without parts that were not coming in, the machinery would break down. The Gross National Product, as we have heard many times, was being strangled. It was a country that was having severe economic problems. Yet, we have gone to war. What has been the result of that war?

I was listening to a briefing from the Pentagon today as I was watching television. The general who was giving the briefing indicated that the war was going as expected. He said that in the 45.5 hours since they commenced the hostilities, they had conducted over 1,000 sorties per day. They had conducted 2,000 missions in the 45.5-hour period. He indicated that it was like two consecutive D-day operations. On D-day there were air raids of astounding proportions and he said they had two consecutive D-days. Presumably, there will be another one tonight, another one tomorrow night, and for the next few days.

The American pilots who are interviewed on television coming back from these missions have indicated that they have found virtually no resistance or very little resistance. In fact, they have made their raids and come back. We have heard rumours—unconfirmed, of course—that, besides knocking out strategic points, anywhere from 150,000 to 350,000 Iraqis have been killed, annihilated. They have ceased to exist. That is something that has to hit every Canadian right in the pit the stomach. In 45 hours, we have wiped out perhaps 350,000 people. Mr. Speaker, that is astounding.

What has been Iraq's response? The so-called coalition has lost perhaps eight planes. They are not sure if they have been shot down, if they have run out of gas, or what happened to them, and a few missiles have been lobbed into Israel. Granted, their response of lobbing missiles at Israel is not justified, but the response of Iraq has been extremely minimal compared to the impact that the American coalition has had on Iraq.

It leads me to believe, especially when they say it is going as expected, that in fact members of American intelligence knew what to expect. They knew full well that the Iraqi war machine, such that it is, was not a threat. They knew what the response was going to be. They did not know whether they were going to lose 8, 12, or 15 planes, but they knew they were going to have a devastating impact on Iraq. And yet they went ahead.

They went ahead despite the fact that economic sanctions were working. They went ahead despite the fact they knew that they were going to blow the hell out of hundreds of thousands of people in Iraq.

What was the reason for this? It was not a war intended to solve problems in the Middle East. The resort to war was not the last resort. It was not a war that was necessary to get rid of Saddam Hussein. This is a war that I believe was chosen by George Bush not to get rid of a madman—which certainly Saddam Hussein is—but rather to help George Bush get elected in the next election. Some crass politics, I am afraid to say, that are taking place.

A few years ago there was the situation of Margaret Thatcher who won a political victory as a result of her military victory in the Falkland Islands. George Bush is trying to repeat it here.

An hon. member: And so is Brian Mulroney.

Mr. Laporte: I am afraid to say that my colleagues are right. The Prime Minister is using the same sort of political belief and the same sort of mentality that George Bush is proceeding with.

Despite the rhetoric that has been taking place, the U.S. has to take responsibility for a lot of the situation that exists in the Middle East right now. The U.S. has to take responsibility for Saddam Hussein. He is in many ways a creature of the United States, much as Noriega was in Panama.

We have heard a lot of talk about an international peace conference for years. To a large extent—not totally, but to a large extent— it is because that peace conference has never taken place. For George Bush to stand up now and say that he has to get rid of this madman, in a self-righteous fashion, to save the world. There is a lot of talk coming out of both sides of his mouth.

What has been the Canadian role in this? We have this 28-nation coalition that exists. Canadians have fourth-largest contingency, behind the British and the French. Of some 500,000 allied troops, the Americans have 450,000. Canada has about 1,700. We have about three World War II-class ships and 25 planes, and that is our role. The role of Canada in this war effort is minuscule. If the Canadian troops and the Canadian planes are not there, there would be virtually no effect on the outcome of this war. Yet, why are we there? Certainly, we are not going to win the war or lose the war. That is for certain.

If one wants some crass politics—and I am sorry I have to tell my hon. friend opposite this, but this is the only thing that makes sense of why we are in this war— it is that the Prime Minister is getting something out of this. He is getting Canada a seat at the Mexico-U.S. free trade talks. Also, he is at 12 per cent in the polls and he is hoping to take advantage of the Margaret Thatcher-Falklands episode and gain some political points. He has nothing to lose. My friends opposite have nothing to lose at 12 per cent in the polls. They are trying to wrap themselves in the Canadian flag in order to gain something out of this.

What makes me very sad is that, although the Prime Minister has not resorted to the rhetoric of George Bush, where George Bush is going to go "kick ass", he has come very close. He is now talking of escalation. Last night, after the attack on Israel, the Prime Minister commented that perhaps Canada will have to escalate its forces.

If the rumours of sending 5,000 troops are true, how is that going to help the situation? They are certainly not going to knock out the Scud missiles going into Israel. They certainly are not going to have any effect in knocking out Saddam Hussein. It can only be for political advantage. When a government, a Prime Minister, or a President uses political advantage and uses crass politics and plays politics with the lives of human beings, that is about as low as one can go in politics.

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Laporte: I am afraid that that is where this government has dropped to.

The New Democrats have been very clear on this situation. Our troops should not be there. They should have pulled out at the first indication that George Bush was going to enter into war. And make no mistake, it is not a United Nations war. It is an American war under the guise of the United Nations. It is not a coalition. Some people like the term "allies" because it brings up patriotic feelings. It is not an ally. It is an American-led attack with a few extra people along. That is what this war is. Let's make no mistake about it.

At the first word of any military action by George Bush, the New Democrats would have advised Mr. Bush that at the first bullet fired Canadian troops are pulling out of the region. We agreed with the economic sanctions and we are willing to take part in that. We think that Saddam Hussein has to be removed, but not through blowing the hell out of Iraqis. At the first indication of any shot, we would have indicated to George Bush that we are out of the region.

We should be taking a different role. We should be there as peacekeepers.

After the bombs stop, there is going to be a tremendous need for the reconstruction of people's lives in that region. Of the 350,000 people—or whatever the figure might be—some are soldiers, but many are families. They are children, women, men, and families just trying to survive in an area where, through no fault of their own, the world gone mad.

Canadians should be there to help in reconstruction. We should be taking our traditional role. There will be buildings collapsing after the bombs stop falling. There will be contaminated water. There will be bombs that hit the ground and did not explode blowing up. There are going to be all sorts of ongoing problems. There will be people who have been maimed for life through losing arms and legs and their sight.

Canadians should be taking a traditional role of peacekeeper. We should be willing to that. We should be sending in engineers and medical teams and have them ready to take on the role that Canada can best do.

We have no business being in this war. We will have no effect on the final outcome of the war. We can play a role as peacekeepers. We have destroyed our reputation as peacekeepers by taking part in this war and for that I am personally truly sorry.

Before I finish, I want to say that although we did not support it, the reality is that there are Canadian troops in the gulf. My thoughts go out to those troops and their loved ones. I know that all of us hope that those people come home. We certainly hope that there will be no more Canadian personnel sent over to the region.

I want to close by saying that when historians write their accounts years from now they are going to conclude that this war was a grievous error. When they look at Canada's role in it, I believe that it will be seen as a very large blemish in the history of our nation.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I find that the member's comments were certainly laced with cynicism and repugnant at the very best. I find that totally unacceptable at this hour of the morning. I think that he could find something a little more positive to talk about. He mentioned everything from the conspiracy theory to whatever. I am not sure about what he has been dreaming in the last couple of evenings, but I do not think it offered a whole lot to this debate.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I just wonder if the hon. member intends to keep disrupting the House with partisan comments. Would it be possible for you to ask him if this is his intention for the evening. Is that his assignment for the evening?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. It is time for questions or comments. The hon. member has the right to express his perception.

I again recognize the hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, one of the points that I wanted to make—

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You said you believed that the House would give him the right to expound on his perceptions, and I am asking if it is possible to put that to a vote of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I do not understand the comment of the hon. member. It is time for the question or comment period.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I know it is quite an ordeal putting up with some of these characters at this time in the morning.

One thing that I would like to point out to the hon. member, in all fairness, is that our Prime Minister just a matter of a few days ago wrote to the Secretary-General of the UN, Perez de Cuellar. He outlined some of the things that he would like to see happen based on consultations with many individuals, including some individuals in the House and certainly the Secretary of State for External Affairs, as to what we can do and what we would like to see happen on an international scale when this ordeal in Iraq, this nightmare, is over. I think that is a very positive contribution.

I hope that the hon. member can tone down the flavour of his comments and just reflect very seriously on the positive role that Canada can play when this thing is over.

Mr. Laporte: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I know he is very sincere.

I think one issue Canada is really going to have to look at is what affect the war is going to have on the Middle East. The Middle East is a very volatile area at the best of times and has been for many decades. The real danger that is happening now with this war is the possibility of escalation. If it does happen, we could have a catastrophe even worse than we have now.

I am speaking sincerely, but I cannot help being cynical because, if the government were sincere with diplomacy and really had the concerns of the world community at heart, it would not have supported this war. I do not know of any earthly reason, other than crass politics, why we would send over three ships and 25 planes, with a force of some 500,000 and hundreds of other planes, into that area. If there is a concern for diplomacy, I cannot understand why the government would not have taken other actions.

It is fine for the government to write letters. It is fine for the Prime Minister, but the actions of the government have not seemed to bear out its desire for real diplomatic action as opposed to some other crass politics that exist. I hope the hon. member is correct that the government's intentions are truly honourable. I have my doubts about that.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member. In light of the comments from the government side of the House, it seems to me that many of us have been waiting for many months for any positive contribution from the government to the resolution of this crisis and to hear the traditional voice of Canada for peace and rational solutions.

I find what the government member has just said rather ironic. I would appreciate the hon. member's comments on it, when even now the Secretary-General of the United Nations is having to come to Canada to ask us what contribution we will make to reconstruction after the damage we will have wrought over the next days, weeks, or months, hopefully not years. What comment would he have on the total absence of a positive voice from Canada up until now?

Mr. Laporte: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her question. I do believe that the hon. member opposite is sincere in his belief. I just think that unfortunately he is misguided, because it is very hard to effect diplomacy out of the guns of a CF-18 fighter. The diplomacy that the government is pursuing is going to cause potentially untold problems in the Middle East.

There has been a lack of leadership from the government. It is clear in many areas. It is clear that the diplomacy that the government has attempted to portray is non-existent. There is some verbalization from the government, but the government's actions have not demonstrated its words. The type of diplomacy that it has used is CF-18 diplomacy. That is not the kind of diplomacy that is good for the Middle East. It is not good for this country and it is not good for the world.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, when I turned on my television in the early hours of Wednesday evening and saw that my world was at war and realized that very soon my country would be at war, I was filled with a sense of despair. I really could not believe that at this time in our history, as what we call civilized people, we still thought that the way to solve world problems was to bomb, to destroy, and to kill.

I had to phone my children one by one to say: "I am sorry. I am sorry we have failed. We have failed all of you and there is nothing I can do about it."

Like all their generation, my children are wonderful young people. They are healers, they are builders, they are innovators, raised and educated to live in a world that values healing and building and using the mind to solve problems. They grew up believing that their country, as perhaps no other, stood for a new era, an era when the resolution of human conflict would be achieved to the greatest extent possible by the application of human ingenuity, determination, and compassion.

I do not know which I consider the greatest tragedy: that Canadian men and women and those of other nations with all the potential they hold are in danger of dying far from home, or that they are being called upon to kill others. Either is a tragedy. But they have been ordered to do so not by a vote of this Parliament, but by fiat, by a handful of men and women who sit safely here in Ottawa and put the lives of others at risk.

Our thoughts and our prayers are with them. I say to each and every one of them the Irish prayer: "May God hold you in the palm of his hand", and may you return safely to the family and friends you left behind. We admire and respect you and know you will give the utmost in skills and talent to the difficult job you have been assigned.

I pray too for the men and women of Israel and for the children who faced the last two nights and will face the nights to come with fear. We hear tonight that five more bombs have been dropped on Tel Aviv with even more destruction and even more fear. I express my deepest admiration for the handful of Israeli leaders who have resisted the natural urge to retaliate for the damage and devastation being done to their people. Instead of reacting with weapons, they have reacted with restraint, with courage and with wisdom. I agonize for those in the Jewish community in Canada who fear for their loved ones and their friends.

While I feel despair and a sense of tragedy, I also feel utter disdain for this government which has felt that the potential for destruction and death it was prepared to unleash was so inconsequential that the right of Canadians to speak out on this crucial situation through their elected members in Parliament could be ignored and shunted aside. As the world moved inexorably toward a war deadline, our Prime Minister silenced my right and the right of all members of this House to speak on behalf of those who sent us here. Barely 12 hours before the clock struck midnight on Tuesday, we were allowed to come back to do what it is our sworn and sacred duty to do.

What could be more crucial than to speak for our constituents on the issue of war and peace? Yet the Prime Minister waited until it was too late for more than a handful of us to speak before that horrible deadline. Why? Why did he wait? Why did he delay? Why did he deny the voice of Canadians when democratic assemblies around the world were meeting and debating?

The train of events is clear. He waited for the American Congress to meet. He waited for the American Congress to have its debate. He waited for the American Congress to hand the American President his mandate for war and he waited while the emissary from the American President came and got him on side. He waited until after the commitment of Canadian lives had been made to war before he came to this Parliament.

Parliament was locked out while he waited and the voices of Canadians were not heard. Only when the decision was already made and communicated to the United States were the voices of Canadians through their elected members of Parliament allowed to be heard.

Even then the Prime Minister would not let this House debate the real issue. In his contempt for Parliament, he refused to put his intentions clearly before House. He refused to say that the question before the country is: Shall Canada go to war? In the aftermath, who can doubt that was and is the question? He continued to dissemble, to divert, to duck, to dodge and to deceive with some vague, abstract pretension that we were somehow, in principle, endorsing the United Nations. It was left to the Official Opposition to put the question squarely before Canadians, to state clearly our belief that Canada should do everything possible to enforce the removal of Saddam Hussein from Kuwait by economic sanctions, that if hostilities broke out in the Middle East, our troops should be brought home and Canada should prepare for its role as peacemaker and peacekeeper.

We believed and we still believe that the time had not yet arrived when war was the only possible means to force Saddam Hussein from Kuwait.

Even now, with bombs flying and people dying, with the lives of Canadians, Iraqis, Kuwaitis, Israelis, Saudis, Jordanians and those of numerous other nations at stake, the government refuses to be honest about its purpose.

On Thursday at noon, defence department officials provided us with a briefing. They were asked specifically what mission was the base for the strategic and tactical decisions they were participating in. Was it to get Saddam Hussein out of Kuwait, or was it to destroy the war machinery of Iraq?

We were told by those responsible for Canada's war effort that the mission was in line with the United Nations' resolution to get Hussein out of Kuwait. And yet this afternoon the Prime Minister said in this House that "We are engaged in a campaign to make sure that his, (Hussein')s, war machine can never again be used". And then tonight again, on radio, I hear the Minister of National Defence saying in response to the same question, that our mission is to get Saddam Hussein out of Kuwait. What is the honest story for the people of Canada? Is it not time we heard it? The Prime Minister, should tell Canadians the truth.

Tonight I heard the spokesperson for the Soviet Union regretting that missiles made in the U.S.S.R were used against Israel last night. The missiles may have been stamped "Made in the U.S.S.R.", but what is the country of origin of the droplets of nerve gas that may strangle the children? What is the country of origin of the biological warfare that the Secretary of State for External Affairs says may be unleashed against allied forces and innocent civilians?

From whence come the nuclear technology and the components of nuclear bombs that threaten the chain reaction that can destroy the world for human habitation? Who are the nations that for over a decade have armed the madmen of the world? Who are the governments that have based their economies on weapons and technologies of destruction and death, where every year their economies prosper on a new toy and markets have to be found for last year's models? Where are the nations who put international trade above the safety of the world and refuse to control the movement of arms?

Who are the merchants of death who do not care where their products end up as long as their dividends are up, who put profits above the sanctity of human life?

Let there be no mistake, about my intentions. The men and women who stretch the frontiers of science and technology deserve nothing but our greatest admiration. Their talent and their creativity are essential to the maintenance of mutual deterrence and the delicate balance that can preserve peace in our world. Their contribution to the advancement of human health and safety is incalculable. They are not the ones who have shirked the responsibility to stop the spread of the products of their labour getting into the hands of those who would use them in the mad pursuit of power. It is others. It is all of us, the lawmakers, who bear the responsibility for killing thousands of blameless bystanders to destroy the monsters we have created and armed.

And at what costs? What risks do we take when we decide not simply to remove Hussein from Kuwait but to obliterate his nuclear production facilities? Whose lives do we jeopardize when we bomb the plants that produce chemical weapons?

How do we destroy the capacity to produce deadly biological weapons without releasing untold agents of harm on unsuspecting people who want nothing more than to wake up tomorrow, to toil for a meagre living, to feed and clothe their children, and hope for a better world for the next generation? To what extent has it been in the interests of the superpowers for well over a decade to maintain the tensions in the Middle East, to ignore the plight of Palestinian people without a home, and to refuse to work for the kind of climate in that territory that would lead the nations of that region to be able to sit down and resolve their differences?

Saddam Hussein is a blip in the history of Baghdad. Countries, provinces, states and kingdoms come and go but cities endure. The centres of population for people endure. Baghdad goes back 10,000 years to the dawn of civilization, yet we in our arrogance have assumed the right in our brief stay on this earth to blast it to smithereens.

Does the 24-hour TV docudrama we have witnessed since Wednesday show us any of this reality? Have we seen one dead child? Have we seen one drop of blood? Do we know how many people have died? Have we been allowed to see the reality of this war? No.

What we have seen is sanitized science fiction, Star Trek with bright lights flashing off into the universe. The Enterprise goes off into the darkness, sparkling explosions fill the sky, with patterns of lights pretty as the stars, but obscuring the reality of thousands of living beings, breathing in a living city. People quiver in fear. The flight deck of the Enterprise is now the CNN newsroom where people risk their lives to satisfy our insatiable armchair curiosity to catch one more siren or the colours of one more blast out the window.

It has been said that Canada has lost its innocence. I know I have lost some of mine this week. In my newly honed cynicism I have listened to the Secretary of State for External Affairs admit that the cordon of sanctions is more like a sieve, with the resources of oppression continuing to pour through to Saddam Hussein. I ask myself: how far the potential for war in their hands since November has weakened the determination and the organization of the United States and its allies to tighten the cord of sanctions, to pull the strings so tight that Saddam Hussein would strangle to death?

I have listened to the excuse that the embargo wreaks hardships on the Iraqui and Kuwaiti people but not on the military. I ask myself: What greater hardship there could be than being dead tomorrow morning? I ask myself: How many wars do we need to end wars? We say it with every war we have.

I watched and listened to the verbiage about the United Nations and I ask myself: Why Canada's commitment to enforce the embargo and our commitment of forces was made to the U.S. weeks before the UN announced an embargo? Why did the Prime Minister's announcement of CF-18s going to the gulf follow within hours on the heels of the announcement by a senior American air force officer that they would destroy Baghdad with bombs? Why is it not the United Nations which has made the crucial determination that sanctions could not work and that the time had come for force?

I have listened in vain for months for one single independent Canadian position, for one single Canadian initiative to reach a peaceful solution. I have listened for Canada to call for the final decision to be made not in Washington but in New York by the United Nations, for this action against Hussein to be under the clear and unequivocal direction of the Security Council of the United Nations. I have listened for the voice of Canada to be the voice of strength, restraint and peaceful resolution. I have not once heard anything but the echo of President Bush.

We have lost more than our innocence. We have lost our stature and the respect the world has had for us as peacemakers and peacekeepers. The world has lost an independent honest broker for sanity and a better way for the future.

This week has been a betrayal of the new hope for the next century which we all felt at the beginning of the last year. It has been a betrayal of the gains made for democracy and freedom by those brave individuals who stood up to oppression by the tens of thousands in eastern Europe, many of them at the risk of and at the loss of their lives. It has been a betrayal of the hope we all had that the billions of dollars that had been going into the weapons of destruction could now be diverted to saving children, saving our environment, building a better world. Yet here we are again, with one nation spending half a billion dollars a day killing, maiming, destroying, not building.

I make no apology tonight for choosing passion over dispassionate analysis. It is a time for passion. It is a time for reason when the lives of thousands are at stake. The possibility of a world without conflict and oppression deserves our passion.

I make no apology for saying the voices of women are needed in our legislatures. I make no apology for saying it is time to put away the centuries of thinking that reason only defines us as human beings when we know that reason and passion make us human. I make no apology for reporting to this House that when the Gallup poll recorded that 59 per cent of Canadians were against war, by a ratio of nearly two to one, 59 per cent were women rather than men.

I make no apology for personalizing the horrendous situation that faces Canada and the world, for saying that what I want for my own children I owe to every child of the world, the right to grow up safe, healthy, secure and free, to develop their talents and contribute to a better world in the third millennium. We have done irreparable damage to that right this week.

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I would very much like to congratulate the previous speaker on a magnificent speech. In my observations of the debate in this House, some of the finest speeches that have been made in favour of peace, and the endurance of human values, have been made by women. It certainly speaks very strongly for more women legislators in this place.

I have just a couple of comments. It is apparent to me that this House cannot resolve the desire of the majority of Canadians to find a peaceful route for Canadian involvement in this issue. I am just wondering whether it is not time for the women in this House to join together and to set a different course. Although it is only one drop of water, it tends to gather speed and greater mass as time goes by. There is an extremely strong desire in this country for peace. The majority of people do not want us there killing Iraqis. They see a much more positive and constructive role.

The first question I would put to the hon. member is this. Does she see that the government is fixed and all of its members cannot leave the direction the Prime Minister has established? Maybe it is time for the women in the opposition to gather together and with a unified voice put together the individual voices that they have so strongly put before this House and see if they cannot gather more and more people in the cause of peace. Perhaps they could focus on the rest of the legislators here, lead them, gather other citizens behind them and try to overpower what has happened to us on this side of the House.

The second thing is your mention of the creation of madmen. I have been here for more than a decade now and I have heard this side of the House speak constantly against the creation and the use of the madmen in the world by the nation to the south of us. Eighty thousand people have been murdered in El Salvador and they have been murdered by U.S. dollars and U.S. advisers. Nobody ever talks of invading that country. They talk about continuing it. It certainly depends who is killed.

Maybe when this is over and all the preaching about atrocities from the other side of the House is finished, we can reflect this back to them and say: Now what do we do about those? Obviously the United States will never let us see a military overthrow of that.

The third thing the hon. member mentioned that was so effective is: Once this is over, what do we do about the dirty hands of all the nations in this business? I have been here for more than a decade and I have heard this side of the House rail against the West Germans selling chemical plants to manufacture nerve case, about the French selling reactors from which fissionable material is extracted to build nuclear weapons. It is time that we reflected this back to the government and say that many nations, including our own, have, very dirty hands in selling arms and selling the wherewithal to kill people.

I thought that was a tremendous speech. I certainly think that those three items show the capacity of the opposition to come together. We have been motivated in our desire to see Canada move in a peaceful direction. Maybe the women on this side of the House can begin the process of pulling us together and pulling the rest of the people together to achieve what she has articulated. She mentioned dirty hands. Our hands are as dirty as those of other nations in building this monster and others. Let us get rid of the El Salvadors and the insanity that has gone there.

Mrs. Catterall: The members questions and comments would require another 20 minutes to answer, but I will not impose on the House. I think he cannot beg off that easily. He cannot leave it to the handful of us in this House who happen to have the power to create life and therefore perhaps value it more highly. It is time for the men in this House to start saying that the fate of the world matters to them and the fate of the world's children and the fate of every single human being on this earth matters to them, more than money and more than power and more than property.

That is what we need, for you to start listening to us. We are doing our bit to change the values on which we make decisions, but frankly I do not have a lot hope for my country when I see it under this government slipping more and more into a value system based on might and power. Those who have will have more. Those who haven't will have less. Those who are strong will survive and thrive at the expense of those who are weak, and the weakest of all are our children.

I do not have a lot of hope when I see resources being taken from those who most need to be heard in our democratic society. I do not have a lot of hope when there is not enough money to clean up our rivers and lakes, but there is enough money overnight to destroy. I do think that Canada has lost immeasurably in this situation and in the last few years in our ability to be seen to be forging a different way for the world, to be turning our technological and communications expertise into productive and positive environmental technologies, which by the way are just as economically profitable as destructive technologies. I do see us as having lost a great deal of ability to contribute positively and independently in this world and I regret it.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, thank you for doing me the kindness of allowing me to briefly to echo the words of the hon. member from Vancouver. My only regret is that it is so late. It is now two o'clock Saturday morning, and we have been debating since ten o'clock Friday morning. Personally, never in my life will I regret not leaving this House earlier, because the speeches are getting better by the hour. What an incredible collection of well thought out, informative and non partisan pieces of work. I did not know what the hon. member was going to say at this time, nor how she would vote. This is what true debate is all about.

[English]

It is a true House of Commons debate. It is not to be told, bang, one side will vote this way because all of the other side will vote the other way so argument is totally irrelevant. I regret there are not more people here. I am not talking about the people in this House because, by tradition, I cannot mention how many people there are, but it is regrettable. The importance of the speech and the argument put forward by the hon. member for Ottawa West is something to reflect upon. I would hope the debate will not end. Members may say, "how come the debate is not finished" and "who spoke", and then they will read the comments. In any case, I will make sure in my own speech that her comments will not be forgotten.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, this is my first speech since my return to the House of Commons from the recent by-election in York North. I never believed, however, that upon my return to the House of Commons I would be debating, in my first speech, war, indeed Canada at war.

Throughout that period I always held a deep belief and faith that governments throughout the world, including Canada, would be able to reach a peaceful settlement to the serious gulf crisis, a crisis that has shocked, saddened and profoundly affected Canadians. I continued to believe that we, as a democratic nation, could, through principled diplomacy and through the pursuit of every possible avenue, arrive at a resolution to this international crisis.

This morning it is obvious that my dreams as a young Canadian for a peaceful resolution to the crisis have been shattered. War measures have taken precedence over a peaceful resolution. Canada is at war in the Persian Gulf. This is a serious time and a serious issue with serious repercussions and unimaginable implications for international peace, order and security.

Like all Canadians, I condemned the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait and its illegal annexation. I believed it was wrong, unjustified and completely contradicted the emerging new spirit of co-operation among the nations of the world.

I believe that the imposition of mandatory economic sanctions against Iraq, if given more time, might have been the peaceful resolution to the crisis. As a parliamentarian, I would have liked to have participated, to have been given the opportunity to participate and hear the highest forum of the land on this very important issue, and to have participated in the debate long before the present reality of war. I think that our contribution in that case might have been more meaningful.

This morning, as I speak, however, I realize that the hypothetical questions of the past do not address the reality of the present. The post-mortem of the war may answer some of these questions.

What is important tonight is to come to grips with our role in the gulf as young Canadian men and women offer their lives for democratic principles that have been the cornerstone of Canada's involvement in international affairs. We must offer our unequivocal support to them, as they, through their efforts, must achieve the goal shared by every one of us in this House, and indeed everyone across this nation to bring peace and order to the Middle East and to the world.

I can perhaps spend hours describing the failures of this government in dealing with this crisis, but I think that perhaps we can underline the most basic evidence of their failure and that is the fact that we are at war.

War is failure. The political leadership of this nation, like many others, has failed to arrive at a peaceful resolution. From this morning on we will be judged on how we move toward the attainment of peace. I might suggest that this morning in the House of Commons we meet at a crossroads, not a point of arrival but a point of departure. Where do we go from here?

I would like to take this opportunity to call upon this government, all members of Parliament and all governments throughout the world to move quickly in seeking the ultimate goal of peace. We must actively pursue peace talks. Peace talks must replace bullets and bombs. We cannot afford to lose human lives because of our inability as political leaders to find a solution. We are elected to seek solutions and we must find them.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member spoke for only five minutes; I understand that he will split his time with another colleague.

Mr. Bevilacqua: Yes, that is correct, the member for Hamilton Mountain.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, all my life I have admired people who, at all political levels, have served their fellow Canadians. I have always had a very special attachment to the House of Commons and the democratic process.

Two years ago I was privileged to be elected to this House by the citizens of Hamilton Mountain. I have dedicated all my time and energies since then to serving them and I have enjoyed every minute of it. Every time I have addressed this House, I have felt proud. I never expected that circumstances would be such that I could not say it is a pleasure to participate in this debate, but this is not the case today.

Indeed, it is not with pleasure but with a broken heart that I rise to talk not about peace, but about war. Up to the very last moment I had hoped that our call for peace and patience would be heard, but this government chose not to listen.

I have always felt that the responsibility of a political leader is to solve problems, to negotiate solutions, to work out compromises. We have to recognize today that we have failed in these responsibilities.

Canada has had an extensive and honourable history of working toward peace on the international stage. The role that this government has orchestrated for Canada in the events taking shape in the Middle East over the last months deeply compromises this tradition. Rather than providing a much needed voice of reason and support for negotiations, this government has abdicated the Canadian tradition of peacemaking to follow the path of violence.

To what end? Will the world be a better place? Is this region of the world going to be more democratic, more peaceful?

There are no winners in war, only losers. War is not a solution to human conflict, but a stark example of human failure. I strongly feel that the Canadian government should have given sanctions more time to work. As a Canadian, I deeply regret that we have abandoned the peaceful and proud legacy of Lester B. Pearson.

The scale of human suffering that will result from this confrontation is horrible to contemplate. We have not seen any of it yet, but soon the horrors of war will be on our television for everyone to see. Analysts in the United States were speculating today that there might already be thousands of deaths after only 50 hours of war. Let us hope that they are wrong.

As I anxiously watch the events unfolding in the Persian Gulf, the faces of Canadian servicemen and women keep flashing through my mind. We hear politicians and military advisers discussing the grand strategies involved in Operation Desert Storm, as they call it. We must remember that the bottom line in war is always human suffering.

Political choices have been made. They are not mine. However, I strongly support the courageous efforts of our servicemen and women and I pray for their safe return from the Persian Gulf. For those with loved ones in the gulf, my thoughts are with you, as we hope for a quick return to peace in the region.

I also hope for the safety of those residing in the gulf region who have found themselves caught in the middle of this conflict.

I want to repeat that it was with a sad heart that I saw diplomacy and negotiations give way to bullets and bombs. With the end of the cold war, I had hoped that we would find peaceful solutions to the world problems. I truly hope that this does not represent the new world order that so many international leaders have spoken of over the past few months.

While everyone feels a sense of attachment to their country, we are all ultimately citizens of the world. I take no pleasure in watching reports of the successful bombing missions inflicted on the people of Iraq. The devastation and human suffering caused by the gulf war will be enormous.

Canada must take a leadership role in searching for the restoration of peace and in looking for ways to deal with the horrendous consequences of war. A lasting peace must be achieved. I pray that in the days to come peace will be restored in the gulf region and that all Canadian servicemen and women will safely return to their families at home. Then, with a sense of both sadness and a renewed mission, we can begin again to search for a lasting peace and a new world order.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, naturally all Canadians are still in a state of shock at the reality that we are at war. I think most of us still find it unbelievable. A country that has for so long prided itself on being recognized globally as peacekeepers finds itself now involved in a horrible battleground in and around the Persian Gulf. Bombers are flying, people are dying, and the sad part of it, of course, is the message that we just received from the Canadian Physicians for the Prevention of Nuclear War and the United States Centre for Defence Information predicting that at least 200,000 people will die and another 500,000 people will be seriously injured. The sad point of all of this is that 80 per cent will be civilians and the largest group of civilians will be children.

Let me be perfectly clear at the outset of my remarks. We all recognize that the perpetuator of this process, Saddam Hussein, is indeed a brutal dictator, a barbaric aggressor, first into Kuwait and more recently into the state of Israel. Some people have referred to him as a psychotic personality, a madman, someone who has violated human rights as have few other countries, and has killed off his own people by the thousands in a form of a unmitigated savagery. We deplore the atrocities, of course, that have occurred time and time again in that country as a result of his decisions.

We also must recognize that while we are dealing with Saddam Hussein, there are millions of children and the parents and grandparents of those children who, like us, have no interest in involving themselves in this horrible war.

I speak tonight as a father of two sons, both of draft age. I must say it certainly focuses one's attention. We are discussing here whether or not we ought to be involved. To think that certain decisions may in fact result in their participation. I cannot for the life of me feel comfortable with that as a father of two young boys.

I want to say that when we look at this war the sad part is that we have to admit we have all failed. This is a symbol of defeat, a symbol of failure. It is a mistake. It is wrong. It is unjustified. I think we have simply admitted that we as a species have failed when we find ourselves involved in such a horrible situation, such a brutal and barbaric situation. To think that as we speak here in the House of Commons, hundreds and hundreds of flights are occurring over Iraq and thousands and thousands of tonnes of bombs are being dropped, and thousands of people are being killed or maimed.

One can only wonder as one looks around the House and you notice that most of us are at an age that has never known war. Our parents and our grandparents have, but to most, war is something that we have only read about or seen on television screens or in movie theatres. We have to wonder if in fact, as historians have reminded us, it appears that every generation must repeat the errors of the previous one. Here we are involved in the unthinkable. I think we are still in shock by the reality that we are involved in a horrible war.

We all, as we speak today, recognize that the men and women in our forces are serving in the gulf region, we pray for them and we hope for a quick return to their homes, their families, and their friends, and of course a return in good health.

I have been almost shocked at the tremendous response by constituents from 1 out of 295 ridings in the country, the riding of Kamloops, with a host of phone calls, letters, telegrams, faxes, delegations, almost universally condemning our participation in this war. I have in my hands petitions from Cariboo University College, Kamloops Secondary School, Logan Lake Secondary School, Westsyde Secondary School, North Kamloops Secondary School, Clearwater Secondary School, Barriere Secondary School, Chase Secondary School, a large number of junior secondary schools and a number of elementary schools. Petitions as well have come from the communities of Chase, Penetan Lake, Paul Lake, Raleigh, Heffley Creek, Barriere, Clearwater, Deadman's Creek, Savona, Little Fort, North Thompson Indian Band, Logan Lake, Kamloops, Dallas, Barnhart vale, Brockelhurst, Westwold and a whole host of other communities, as well as a number of churches and many community organizations. They all say that Canada should not be involved in this conflict.

I believe very strongly that getting involved as our government has committed us was a serious error. To have the United States lead an attack on Iraq was in fact an error. Before any country involves itself in these kinds of hostilities, surely to goodness it would explore all other avenues before it initiated the kind of slaughter and horror that we are seeing now hour after hour.

I must say I felt badly as a Canadian to see our government responding so quickly to the American initiative in terms of involvement militarily in the area of the Persian Gulf. I feel our own foreign policy it is no different from that of the state of Montana. We are essentially now an extension of American foreign policy because immediately, when the United States said that it was becoming involved in an aggressive way in the Persian Gulf, our Prime Minister within seconds said: Aye, aye, sir, we are there with you.

There were no discussions with the people of Canada, no debates in Parliament. The oddity of it all is that today we are debating the issue of our involvement in the Persian Gulf when we have nearly 2,000 troops already in the Persian Gulf and when we have aircraft committed to the Persian Gulf and ships committed to the Persian Gulf. It is a little after the fact. The horse is out of the barn. I say that this has been a very sad moment for Canadians, seeing our foreign policy, particularly when it involves this type of aggression, essentially being led by President Bush of the United States. When we look at whether or not we had exhausted all peaceful possibilities to encourage the brutal Saddam Hussein to get out of Kuwait, we can only say that we did not.

We failed. Look at diplomatic efforts that could have been initiated sometime ago. Granted there was a flurry in the last few hours leading up to the January 15 deadline. We can well admit that much more could have been done. What we did do and we are proud of the fact was we committed to involve ourselves with a sanctions initiative in the Persian Gulf, an attempt to strangle the economy of Iraq sufficiently to require Saddam Hussein to remove his troops and back off from the occupation of Kuwait. But, did we give sanctions a chance to prove themselves? We did not.

Look at the evidence that we have in terms of the successes that were there. I have to simply quote a few people that I think we would all recognize. They are certainly respected, knowledgeable people who understand the role of sanctions. I can quote people like William Webster of the United States Central Intelligence Agency. He said before the United States Congress less than two months ago that 90 per cent of Iraq's imports and 97 per cent of its exports had been stopped.

James Schlesinger, former Secretary of Defence for the United States, said that we needed approximately one year for the trade sanctions to work. We allowed them, as we recall, only four or five months.

The Canadian Secretary of State for External Affairs, in a letter dated December 28 of last year stated that these were the most effective and comprehensive sanctions ever applied by an international community. Of course, sanctions is not a new technique to encourage countries to do certain things. There are 115 cases of sanctions that have been applied around the world. We know that it takes at least one to two years before they can be effective in terms of strangling the life out of an economy sufficiently to require the government of that country to make what we believe are the appropriate decisions.

Let us go on. General Schwarzkopf, Commander of the United States forces in the Persian Gulf, issued a statement in support of continued economic sanctions.

A study of over 100 cases of sanctions that have been applied around the world, indicated that these sanctions will bite, and bite deeply, and bite soon. This is most encouraging. I could go on and quote others. I will just quote two more because I think it is important Canadians recognize that the sanctions were working.

Admiral William Crowe, former Chairman of the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff, appearing before a Committee of the United States Congress said: "The embargo is biting heavily. In my judgment, given the standard of living Iraq is used to and the increasing sophistication of Iraqi society, it is dead wrong to say that Iraq is not being hurt. It is being damaged severely and also I believe that goes for the Iraqi military which depends on outside support".

General David Jones, former Chairman of the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff, said: "The risk is that the problems inherent in maintaining the offensive military option would create are too problematic." He points out that Saddam Hussein is losing $20 billion to $30 billion in hard currency every year. This, of course also suggests that he is not receiving military supplies. We recognize that the only goods coming into the country were being largely smuggled in. Of course smugglers depend on hard currency. At this rate, currency was simply drying up in terms of foreign exchange.

I have a long list of all sorts of people who have pointed out that the economy was being devastated by these sanctions. The statistics that the American Congress provided the world were to point out that the Gross National Product of Iraq in only four months had been crushed by 48 per cent. If that is not an effective sanction at work, to see the GNP drop by 48 per cent in just a few weeks, I do not know what other information would be required.

The short and the long of all this is that, yes, the sanctions were working. They were very effective and, had they been given time, we can only conclude that they would have driven Saddam Hussein from Kuwait. But we saw that the United States was not prepared to wait. I say the United States because I think we can all recognize that there almost seemed to be an enthusiasm that the American administration had made a decision, for whatever set of reasons—and we all heard them—not the least of which is the reliance of the American military industrial complex either to be preparing for war or in a war.

Someone succinctly pointed out the other day that the best way to get rid of inventory was to blow it up. We see that that is indeed one of the ways that the American economy is driven. It was decided for a whole set of reasons. If Kuwait was a country of palm trees, date palms and bananas, would American forces by the tens of thousands be involved in reinstating a sheikh, with his family, once again to lead a country, an undemocratic nation, a family that had abandoned a Parliament in that country? I doubt it.

Another aspect of this process has concerned many of us. Someone the other day mentioned that the first casualty of war is truth. We recognize that what we are receiving now day by day on our television screens and through newspapers is propaganda. The American led forces have admitted that the news is being laundered, that everything has to move through military censors. If in fact this was a just war, as some of our government members have indicated, surely then we would not be afraid to expose it. With the fact that the American administration does not allow reporters into the various areas, we can only assume that they are hiding something, that they are covering up something, that they are embarrassed and so on.

Think of what else is happening as we watch television to get the propagandized results of the hour-by-hour goings on in the Middle East.

The other day someone suggested a return to play-by-play action. This is what you say about a Superbowl. This is how you describe a football game. Of course, their play-by-play action was the hundreds of sorties of bombers heading out either to carpet bomb the Iraqi forces dug in, in southern Iraq, or the surgical strikes in the city of Baghdad. Surgical strikes, it almost sounds good, a medical term.

Of course, what surgical strikes means is huge concentrations of bombs or cruise missiles into a single restricted area, resulting in countless deaths and maiming. Think of the wordsmiths, Mr. Speaker, who have crafted terms to sanitize our reaction, to make it more acceptable to accept the fact that our forces, our country, along with some others, are engaged in a military combat with Iraqi forces.

For example, they talk about liberating Kuwait. They mean attacking the armies of Saddam Hussein in that area. They talk about body counts. Well, body counts are dead people. These are people who have been killed. They talk about protecting our assets. Our assets are the young men and women who are there in our Armed Forces. These are not assets; these are young men and women. These are human beings that we are talking about. These are people. They talk about Baghdad looking like a Christmas tree. The Christmas tree was the massive bombing that was destroying huge parts of the city.

This is a language that has been crafted to sanitize, as my hon. colleague from Okanagan—Shuswap so adequately described it earlier today, to make us more acceptable of a horrible, bloody and brutal war.

I want to say simply that we are at war. Twenty-eight countries are involved in the United States' coalition, but only a few are there offensively. That is why we are arguing that Canada should not be there in an offensive mode. Other countries are there with coast guard ships, bringing various sorts and types of expertise to the theatre of war. We suggest too that Canada is there with a role to play and that our forces should be redeployed, providing military support for humanitarian initiatives to assist and protect the growing numbers of refugees in the Persian Gulf region, hundreds and thousands of people who are going to require support and protection as they flee Iraq. Escort humanitarian shipping in the area and provide assistance, if you like, to refugees, food ships, shelter, medical supplies. Another role is Canada's involvement with the field hospital and other forms of medical support. Those are the roles that Canada should be playing, not an offensive one. I join with countries like Argentina, Czechoslovakia, Denmark and Norway and others there, but not in a combat role.

In conclusion, I simply want to say that we find ourselves involved in a war that ought not to have occurred, that we believe need not have occurred. It has really set back the role of Canada as a peacekeeper, has probably jeopardized and hindered our future role as a meaningful peacekeeper certainly in that part of the world, if not other parts, and has set back the United Nations. We had hoped that with the collapse of the cold war the United Nations might be able to carry on in a new style, with new institutions and new approaches, where we could solve these international geopolitical problems in some more creative, modern, humanistic way than simply sending in troops to engage in combat.

Unfortunately, as a world, as a country, we fail. The fact that we are involved in such a horrible, brutal, bloody war is an indication of our inadequacies.

Let us now, rise to the challenge and not rest until we find ways and means of bringing peace to the Middle East.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the hon. member and to other hon. members who have stood up and have spoken in the House.

We as members of Parliament cannot end this war. Our government has decided that we will not only participate in the war in a supportive measure, but it has now decided that we will become offensively involved and through our efforts, we will kill Iraqis.

The absolute majority of people who sit on this side of the House is opposed to it. We have fought it every step of the way. We do not believe that this is a significant, meaningful or useful role for Canadians. I do not personally believe that we have failed.

Our government has failed us. Our Prime Minister has failed us and taken us into a war that we and the majority of Canadians want no part of.

I would put to the hon. member a question. Is it not significant that this Prime Minister and this government enjoy the support of only 12 per cent of Canadians, that 88 per cent of Canadians have absolutely no confidence in this government, that a week ago more than 55 per cent of Canadians and that is a growing percentage wanted absolutely no role in this war that would see the killing Arabs or Iraqis? They felt that Canada did not belong there.

It has indeed been the failure of the Prime Minister to recognize the wishes of the majority of Canadians and to win their confidence. It has been a failure of this government, member after member standing up saying we must support the United States in invading Iraq. The interesting thing that the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs both said is if the UN does not, although we would prefer to go in with the UN, we will go with the U.S. and go it alone. That is a colossal failure. The government does not enjoy the confidence of 88 per cent of the people of Canada. It does not enjoy the confidence of a single member on this side of the House.

We have failed to convince the government of anything. We have failed to convince the government to see reason, to exercise humanity and common sense. That indeed is a failing, but it was an impossible task.

Would the hon. member agree that we in fact have not failed? We have tried to put the case in an honest and forthright manner and it has turned a deaf ear. To 88 per cent of Canadians this government has turned a deaf ear. Maybe now is the time for members in the opposition to begin to organize a committee of legislators for peace and to end the war, and to join with other Canadians who want to do this. We can no longer count on our government and we certainly cannot count on the madman to the south of us, George Bush.

Will the hon. member agree that we really have not yet failed, that the only thing we have truly failed in is to convince the government it has already lost?

Mr. Riis: As usual, my colleague presents a thoughtful argument and raises some very pertinent questions that I suspect most Canadians are asking themselves.

Our government has committed us to this involvement, knowing that 88 per cent of the people of Canada do not support our Prime Minister, knowing that a large majority of Canadians are opposed to our involvement in this war. I remember, as New Democrats were calling for the recall of Parliament before any commitments were made in terms of our participation, that we have a debate in Parliament, hoping that for once the Prime Minister would be sensitive to the views of the people he represents, that just for once he would listen to what Canadians were saying.

Of course, we know from all the polls and all the intelligence that we have received from our own country that overwhelming numbers of Canadians oppose our participation in this war. We even said that when it came to a vote, that it be a free vote to unleash Members of Parliament from the whip, from the lash of the Conservative Party, to represent their constituents on whether or not Canada should be going to war.

I cannot think of a more important decision that this House has taken in the last 50 years than to decide whether or not we should commit ourselves, our country, to a state of war. The Conservative Party did not allow its members to vote on behalf of their constituents. They simply were required to support the Prime Minister in his haste to join his friend, President Bush, in involving ourselves alongside America and American troops. It is a very sad moment for the country.

I want to conclude this statement by simply reading from Hansard of September 8, 1939, a comment made by Mr. Woodsworth, the founder of the CCF, the predecessor of the New Democratic Party. He said:

> While we are urged to fight for freedom and democracy, it should be remembered that war is the very negation of both. The victor may win, but if he does it is by adopting the selfsame tactics which he condemns in his enemy.

I think those words are as relevant today as they were back in September 1939.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): I certainly acknowledge the very thoughtful response of the member for Kamloops. I would put another question that follows up on this serious disservice that the media is currently doing to the people of North America.

I recall watching virtually all night last Christmas the American Broadcasting Corporation as described the assault on Panama by the madman to the south of us. We have to remember that the Americans created Noriega. It was not drug interdiction that bothered them as much as his newly adopted position on the Panama Canal. At the moment the Central American dictator began to threaten their ownership of the Panama Canal, it no longer became tolerable to keep him. All other human rights abuses, all other drug trafficking, all other abuses were forgiven until he began to demand control of the Panama Canal.

The American Broadcasting Corporation obviously acted as an agency of the U.S. army, glorifying the activity, glorifying the decision of the President of the United States and indeed distorting the information given to the American people and the way it was picked up by many agencies in Canada. My serious concern is that our media is being roped into that enormous distortion, that denial of information that people need to make rational judgments about this activity.

Part of that strategy is the cutting of the budget to a public broadcasting corporation, one that has a credible record of investigative journalism, absolute responsibility in providing information to the people of this country in a fair and balanced way. This war that George Bush has inflicted and dragged us into by a dog's leash in the Middle East is now being distorted in an even worse manner. I compliment the hon. member on bringing out this enormous disservice about critical broadcasting of American military briefings, and the plot to keep the population in ignorance.

When George Bush said, "we will not enter this war with one arm tied behind us", he was referring in one respect to the absolute denial of any information through a free media about what is going on, the devastation and the information that the population needs to make a reasonable judgment about this war.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, as a member of this House, I can honestly say that I deeply regret having to debate this motion, for it is a debate concerning war.

No reasonable individual in Canada or throughout the entire world wanted to see a war in the Persian Gulf or anywhere else, yet tragically since January 17 such a war has occurred and the fragile stability of the Middle East is once again on the line.

For Canada, this tragedy is closer to home this time. The men and women who are representing our country whether on land, at sea or in the air, are carrying out their duties in a very professional and exemplary manner. Our country and our people can be proud of them. We wish each and every one of them a safe and quick return to their loved ones. I know that every member of this House and all Canadians share this wish.

In my riding of Stormont—Dundas, I have received several petitions from constituents who are very concerned about the war in the Persian Gulf. One hundred young students from Newington Public School and 280 St. Lawrence High School students in Cornwall particularly impressed upon me that a generation which has never experienced war does not want to today.

Mr. Brian Ferguson of Cornwall also collected some 500 signatures in the past two days, signatures for peace. I believe these people mirror the views of a majority of Canadians. The people who sign these petitions want an end to the deployment of Canadian Armed Forces personnel in the Persian Gulf. They wish to remind the Government of Canada that Canada has a reputation as peacekeeper and ask that we do not jeopardize this great treasure which Canadians hold so dearly.

We know that Canada has a tradition of being there when needed to help keep the peace. Canadian peacekeeping forces have for some time now been carrying out peacekeeping duties in Cyprus and on the Golan Heights. I hope that should it come about in the days ahead that to achieve a cessation of hostilities, a United Nations peacekeeping force is required, Canada will again be prepared to step forward and offer to participate.

The recent missile attack upon the state of Israel has shocked the world. Many felt that Saddam Hussein's threat to launch such an attack on Israel was just that, a threat. Sadly, this was not the case. Nonetheless, we recognize the considerable restraint exercised by Israel not to retaliate.

The world is now wondering and fearing what will happen if Scud missiles with chemical warheads land in Israel. What will happen to the coalition forces against Iraq if Israel counters with a retaliatory strike either by plane or by Jericho missiles? The real potential exists for collapse of the coalition and an escalation to the conflict. The world can only speculate as to what will occur and the ramifications posed by such events. Certainly the Iraqi leadership would relish dividing the coalition by bringing Israel into the war.

Whatever events take place in this war, we can be sure of Canada's resolve to attain peace. Canadians will maintain their commitment to peace. As one of my constituents said in a letter to me and I quote: "peace is the only reasonable alternative to war and that while it is attainable peace can be a difficult goal to achieve."

I believe the United Nations was trying to do the utmost to prevent a war. As well, I think a strong case could be made that this war may well have been avoidable. If the sanctions imposed upon Iraq by the United Nations had been given more time, perhaps this war would never have occurred. Some have argued that Saddam would not have left Kuwait under any circumstances. Perhaps this is true, but war has started. As the leader of our party has said on several occasions, it is easy to start a war but it is very difficult to stop one.

It is the duty of Canadians and all the peoples of the world to work toward ending this war and avoiding any of the catastrophic consequences which this war has the capability of producing. This war, like some have suggested, is not about oil. It is not a result of the United States wanting to attack Iraq. I also believe that there is no wish by the Iraqi people to fight American, British, French, Saudi, Syrian, Egyptian, Canadian or any other nation which is a part of the United Nations coalition in the Persian Gulf.

The coalition is there to remove Iraq from Kuwait since that country was invaded by Iraq. The invasion was condemned by the world community and the decision was made to stand up to this aggression.

It is a mistake to assume that it was absolutely necessary to attack Iraq after the January 15 deadline. Unfortunately, the decision was made and the war was begun.

[Translation]

The Liberal Party's position has been clear throughout this debate. We urged the government to give diplomacy and sanctions time to work. The government did not listen. Although there is no need for war at this point in time, the Liberals are prepared to support our troops, these Canadian men and women who are fighting in the Persian Gulf. We are not going to let them down.

[English]

The Liberal Party supports Canada's military effort in the Persian Gulf. This position, however, does not preclude our party from continuing in its efforts to advocate a peaceful and expedient solution to the conflict. Efforts we would seek to end this conflict deserve the full support of Canada.

If the Iraqi leadership is not prepared to comply with the resolutions of the United Nations to end this war, then all the effort and support required to bring about a swift conclusion must be made.

Canadians do not want a prolonged conflict in which the possibility of escalation increases along with the price to be paid in terms of human lives.

One hopes that the Canadian government will do everything within its means to go on the offensive for peace, as much as it is prepared to go on the offensive for war. Canada's respected position in the world must be utilized at every opportunity to lobby for peace.

We have numerous contacts within the western and developing world and we are viewed throughout the Middle East with trust. At the United Nations, Canada has always acted independently and consistently in accordance with the principles and objectives of this international body.

I am sure that all Canadians expect our government to be pro-active in peace efforts. Canada must not ignore the responsibility that is placed upon all nations to take up the cause for peace when war occurs. Every opportunity presented must be followed through in the hope that it brings about peace. The search to bring about peace will indeed be a difficult assignment, but the difficulty of the task in no measure outweighs the rewards of success.

Eventually, this war will come to an end. An assessment will be made on the role this country and others played in this tragic conflict. When it comes to Canada, I hope that we will all be comfortable that our government did take up the cause for peace. If this is not the case, the harm caused to Canada's previous commitment to peace and the security of the world will be among the casualties of this war.

In conclusion, as representatives of the people throughout this country, we have a duty and an obligation to work together outside the sphere partisanship to assist in the efforts to establish peace and bring our Armed Forces safely home. To our soldiers, airmen and sailors in the Persian Gulf go our prayers and our thoughts. They have our steadfast support and that of every Canadian. Let us all hope that before long we will see signs of peace in the Persian Gulf.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member spoke for 10 minutes. I understand that his time is split with another colleague.

Mr. Kilger: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Ten-minute question or comment period.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. colleague who stayed this late to express his views on this very sensitive issue. I wonder if he could elaborate on a point that was already discussed, namely the role Canada could now be assuming: Bearing in mind the possibility of an international conference on peace in the Middle East, what role would he see Canada playing now and in the future? In view of this war unfolding under our eyes, doesn't Canada have a role to play right now on both the military and diplomatic fronts? Canada's military involvement was decided by this government. Could the government not decide that we should also do what Canada is renowned for, namely playing a diplomatic role? Can he briefly express his views on this?

Mr. Kilger: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Saint-Denis for his comments and his question. Certainly, I hope to see Canada take a proactive approach to peace, because it is our duty, as parliamentarians—and I encourage all Canadians to propose solutions to this problem facing us now.

On the subject of the international conference on the Middle-East situation, I certainly am for it. As Canadians who value peace and wish that everybody else in the world: could live in peace all as we do, the least we can do—and we try to as often as possible—would be to get together around a table and recognize respectfully that, while we do have differences, we also share some values such as peace. I would find an initiative along that line very comforting. After all, the idea has been around for years in the UN but, for some reason, it was always postponed. Now that the cold war is over, if the UN could get to play a greater role and take its place in the world, this initiative—finding a peace solution for the Middle East—would be among the first it should undertake.

[English]

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, I have been deeply concerned about what has happened these past few days, what has happened the past few weeks and months, as we have seen develop within the world a conflict that is really troubling to many nations. It is a conflict that is not easily resolved and one that has caused a tremendous split in this House and a split in many countries, because decisions have to be made about what should or should not be done when we come into difficult situations.

I have very much had to struggle with what I think is probably the most difficult decision I have ever had to face. That decision affects the lives of many other fellows on this planet, other human beings who are foisted into a conflict which many of us believe should not be.

None of us support what Saddam Hussein has done and we were all horrified when we saw troops go into Kuwait. We saw the atrocities that occurred in that country. We realized what challenges were laid to the democratic world and what challenges were laid to Canada, the United States, Europe and all other countries. I thought to myself, with this conflict coming on in the last few days, we, the Canadian people, have joined a war. What do you say to your constituents? What should we be saying to the Canadian people? What are they concerned about?

It is my opinion that the first message should be given is that we support the troops in this country. We support the families who are very concerned about their loved ones. We pray for a very quick end to this conflict. We hope above hope that all diplomatic means will be brought about by our country and by our government to resolve the crisis, not add to the conflict.

I think that this Liberal view is shared by many. We do not have to go very far to quote some of those who have spoken up in the last couple of days. Reverend Walter Farquharson, leader of the United Church, stated: "We reject the claim of our leaders that there was no alternative". Archbishop Michael Peers, leader of the Anglican Church of Canada, stated: "We reject the notion that war in the gulf is justified". Toronto's Roman Catholic Archbishop stated he was profoundly saddened and would celebrate a special mass for peace on Monday. The Canadian Council of Churches has strongly voiced opposition to this matter.

Why are these people, leaders of the churches in Canada, united on the issue that war could have been avoided? This conflict should not have been as it is.

One only has to think about what the alternative is when war begins. What devastation is caused? What does war cost? Certainly the price of war is very, very high morally, physically and economically. Tens of thousands of lives have a potential of being sacrificed when we hear such terms as carpet bombing.

When I was flying into Ottawa tonight, I flew over several major cities: Windsor, Detroit, London, Toronto, and Ottawa. As I was looking down and seeing the lights of the great metropolitan areas, I thought to myself. "If I were in a bomber flying over here in a B-52 and dropping ammunition and bombs like is going on in Iraq right now, whose life would be hurt?" Fortunately in Canada those bombs are not falling today, but we are authorizing those bombs to fall on other countries. We are authorizing our own troops to take action which will damage, maim and result in very extreme hardships in Iraq.

Certainly I do not support what Saddam Hussein has done, but I think the action we have taken against him should not have been supported either. Billions of dollars will be spent on our war initiatives. Environmental concerns respecting the use of chemical weapons must be addressed. There is great concern over the bombing in Israel which has just taken place. We all are very much concerned that it is not just going to end with a quick few nights' bombing. The potential of drawing Israel into this conflict and ending up with an Arab war against the western world is there.

We know that escalation could very well happen, and no one should put aside the possibilities of what may happen in the future once action has started. Chemical weapons, if used by Iraq, could cause unlimited damage to citizens living in the Middle East if, as the reports we hear from the gulf suggest, oil is spilled in the Persian Gulf from huge tankers or oil wells and set afire. The environmental damage that could result from that will not be cleaned up for centuries. It would be catastrophic globally. This is on top of the devastation that is now being created by conventional weapons.

There is no question why many world church leaders took a position against war. What other alternatives did we have? We had sanctions in place. We were taking positive measures to hurt Saddam Hussein, not physically with bombs but economically with sanctions, hurt him to the point where his economy had slowed down considerably, hurt him by less violent means, means by which the same end could have been achieved.

It seems to me when we talk about how we handle problems that a society must look at the end results, the long-range results not the short-range ones. There is absolutely no question the war that is going on now will create scars and concerns, one nation against another, not just for a few days or a few years; the scars will be for centuries. I have a concern about the divisions that we are creating by a war of this nature. I strongly believe we are creating divisions among races in this world by this type of action.

When I read an article by Carole Goar in The Toronto Sun I started to think about the kinds of information we have been given by the Prime Minister and the government. It makes one stop and consider whether we have been told clearly and honestly what the situation has been as it has developed over these past months.

On August 10, the Prime Minister had three ships refitted. The government absolutely had no mandate. They were refitted and sent to the gulf. When asked by reporters and members of Parliament what actions were being taken at that time, he said: "We have no mandate". Two weeks later, on August 25, the UN Security Council announced sanctions against Iraq. Certainly the Prime Minister knew when he talked to the press on August 10 that there were mandates for those ships. However, the Canadian public was not told that, nor was the Parliament of Canada. These ships arrived in Italy on September 11 and they were kept there three days. By September 14 we received another announcement that CF-18s were to be sent to the gulf and the ships were on active duty. It is interesting to note why that September 14 date came about, because it is the responsibility of the Prime Minister to bring back Parliament within 10 days when ships are being sent into an area of possible war or conflict.

In not sending the ships in on September 11 when they arrived, but holding them to September 14, obviously the Prime Minister was trying not to call back Parliament immediately and thereby let the people of Canada know. He waited until September 24 to bring Parliament back.

On November 16, our Minister of National Defence announced that we had not ruled out Canada's support for force outside the UN. He more or less suggested that if the UN did not condone physical support, Canada was considering it anyway. He clearly sent a message that Canada would act independently outside the United Nations and that was the avenue it was taking.

On December 28, the Prime Minister promised that Canadians would have plenty of warning if troops were sent on the offensive. On January 8, the Prime Minister said there is no need to recall Parliament. However, on January 15 Parliament was recalled. The bombs started to fall on January 16. The UN deadline date was up.

Did the Prime Minister fulfil his promise of recalling Parliament and telling Canadians well in advance of Canadian offensive actions? I do not think so. I really believe the Prime Minister went in another direction. He talked with James Baker. He talked with President Bush, and I think he had a clear indication of what hostilities would occur and at approximately what time. He called Parliament back to debate this issue after he had made the decision.

I find it very ironic to stand here today and debate a motion that we voted on on November 29. We are redebating it and we are going to revote on that motion after the action has been taken. I find that wrong. I find it wrong because, if the Prime Minister were going to take action, if he were going to commit the troops, and he knows the Liberal Party of Canada and the New Democratic Party of Canada both voted against the same motion, he should have explained it to the House. Yet, he put it on the floor after the bombs flew to have us vote on it again.

I think it was done for a specific reason. The Prime Minister, in putting forth the motion, may well have been trying to gain partisan ends. I find that wrong. The Prime Minister of Canada and the Parliament of Canada should not be aiming at partisan ends in this particular case. We should be looking at what is right and what is wrong. I do not feel that is the course we are on.

I honestly feel that in each major issue we have dealt with in the last couple of years, the guideline has been to divide and confuse the Canadian public. Free trade is a very dividing issue in this country. Meech Lake is a very dividing issue in the country. The Oka situation, same thing. The propositions he put forth to solve our economic problems, same thing again. With this situation, he has put forth an issue which he knew on November 29 was going to divide this House.

I think the Prime Minister and his cabinet should have put a motion forward which would have stated: We support our troops; we will work toward a democratic end; we will do everything we can to bring a quick end to the war. But no, he puts a motion to support the actions of the government which I think, and he well knows, is only a further division of the country. If any person in this country has a reverse Midas touch, it is our Prime Minister. Everything falls apart when he touches it.

Some strong questions have come forward about the role of the United Nations and whether this Parliament supports the actions of the United Nations. I firmly believe this Parliament has supported the role of the United Nations. All three parties supported the sanctions and voted for them in this House. It came down to a question of whether or not we go to war.

I think everyone here must realize—and it is very evident to many international experts on that the mandate of the Security Council resolution 678 does not fully give power to the United Nations. It says that any independent country can attempt to bring Kuwait back to a status of freedom. In other words it authorized the United States to act independently. It authorized Canada to act independently. It authorized every other country to act independently.

From the questions we have had in this House, it has been clearly stated that Canada is not acting under the UN flag. Canada is acting as an independent nation under the flag of Canada. I believe that Canada is acting as an independent nation. It is not acting for or against, or in any other direction with regard to the United Nations. It is following an option that was left by a resolution in the United Nations.

I guess when I look at it more carefully, and I try to determine what the difference is, it really is clear that each nation involved in this conflict has made independent decisions and that the decision for conflict was not made by the United Nations.

The Secretary-General of the United Nations, when interviewed the night the war began, said he was not aware of the conflict beginning. When the Secretary-General of the United Nations is not aware, it is very clear it was not a United Nations action: It was an action of independent nations through a motion from the United Nations.

Canada still supports the United Nations, and all the parties here support the actions of the United Nations. We just do not agree that Canada should be in a conflict where many of us feel Canada's interest is not. I do not know what our international interest in the Middle East is besides peace and fair treatment to all who are there.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member on a very thoughtful and clearly articulated analysis of the situation. I want to support, as everyone else has, his comments about supporting our Canadian Armed Forces and their families, probably the Canadians most critically involved and under the highest anxiety in this entire country. The support that we can lend their families and to the degree that we can support them, I laud his remarks and identify with them fully.

I would ask how this suggestion sits with him, given his analysis. Anything that is said any longer in this House falls on deaf ears. The government and the Prime Minister have made up their mind on that course of action. I am torn. I heard the comments of the hon. member for Saint-Denis about the value of people on this side of the House thinking through their positions and thoughtfully articulating those honest positions.

We are rapidly coming to the end, I think, of the usefulness of that process. I for one have decided that I am going to get on the telephone tomorrow and spend my time phoning every clergy person, every labour leader, every business community leader, in fact as many people as I can, and asking them in the area in which we live in North Island—Powell River to start forming a committee to end the war. As legislators in this place, we can no longer convince the people who hold the levers of decision-making to end this war.

I am going to ask that committee if it would consider doing that. It was effective over a long period of time in the United States and I think it is important today. I am going to phone the Reform Party leader in that area, the Christian Heritage Party, the Liberal Party, the Conservative Party and ask them to join with us in a non-partisan way in representing the majority of Canadians and indeed the majority of people. The thinking people on this side of the House must begin the process of attempting to end the war.

The first step would be to have this government end the involvement of the Canadian Armed Forces in aggressive attacks on Iraq. The greatest support that we can give to our men and women in the Armed Forces is to pull them back before one of them is killed in this unjust war. That is the greatest thing we could do for their families.

The second thing I am going to ask that committee to consider is to have the Prime Minister of Canada end Canada's involvement in this war. The most constructive thing our Prime Minister could do is end the international political support to the United States for continuing the war.

We then must move forward and convince other smaller and middle sized nations to convince the United States that this war is wrong. We should work together with all other people in this world not only to end this war, but to make sure it does not start again, nor does another start again.

That is probably the most constructive thing that I can do tomorrow morning. I think every other member of this House should do the same. We can no longer convince the Conservative government of the justice of ending the war and ending the international political support for the United States. This is not a United Nations war; this is an American war.

In the United States, the thing that stopped the Vietnamese war was a general committee across the United States to end the war. We have an obligation to do that in Canada and make it work as quickly as possible. The greatest support we can give to our armed forces and to their families is to make sure that we get them out before one of them is killed.

Mr. Pickard: I would like to thank my colleague for his comments and his positive recommendations, because I think that when we look at situations we must come up with alternative means to reach goals where we cannot reach them traditionally.

It does appear that our abilities to reach the Prime Minister, the cabinet and those in power in this government have been stifled on almost every issue. It does not matter about the outcry of the people in the country. It does not seem to matter about many things.

I believe that some areas could be very important. The hon. member touched upon talking with people who are very concerned about stopping the war. I would hope that those people would take the time to write every one of the Conservative members of Parliament as well as other members of Parliament and to do some lobbying within their own area.

I am not one to say just carry a placard and forget about it, but I try to bring forward some logic, some concern, the feelings of the grassroots people in every constituency. Perhaps members will start listening to the people. I think that is really the only way we will defeat a blockade at this time.

I really feel we are in a blockade with the government at this point in time. We are unable to get our thoughts through. We are unable to convince the government of what the general population is saying. When 85 per cent of the people oppose many of the policies and still it goes on as though things were normal, when its popularity is so far down that it only represents a very minimum number of people in this country, I have to think that we should be very concerned about the direction we are going, very concerned about the next couple of years.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for your patience.

[English]

I would like to ask my colleague if he would an elaborate on something that is very important to us in our party, and I am sure in the New Democratic Party. It is an idea that has been floating around for so many years. It has been betrayed for so long, betrayed, yes, betrayed by those who only pay lip service to probably one of the most important points. It was a hope un espoir: the international conference on peace in the Middle East. Would he kindly elaborate on this idea and the kind of role that Canada should have played, and could still play?

Mr. Pickard: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague again for the question. In this particular situation it is very clear that over the years Canada has had a very clear role, a role of diplomacy, a role of trying to seek solutions, a role of peacekeeping and attempting to avoid conflict, not at any cost but to avoid conflict because of the hurt that it causes other nations when these situations give way to war.

Canada has been a nation extremely well respected because of our ability to negotiate, to be diplomatic, to rise above the issue and look at it from a perspective of how we can resolve the problem. I do not think for one minute that Canada's role should change. However, I do believe at this present time that is not the predominant role Canada is playing. We have formed a very strong coalition with the country to the south. We have followed along on every turn, not only in economics but also in war.

Rather than resolve and look for solutions and be very positive about how we deal with the Middle East, we have done just the opposite. We have joined with a country that has a very strong vested interest. That vested interest is the economics of the Middle East. The vested interest of the economics of the Middle East is an interest to the world. However, because of that we do not take out a baseball bat and try to win the problem by taking very crude actions, whether they be carpet bombing or whatever. We are supporting aggression rather than diplomacy. That is wrong.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, the government has cheapened everything it has touched since it came to power.

I was a bit hesitant about whether I should refer to free trade and what it has done to the nation. I was a bit hesitant about whether I should refer to the changes to the unemployment insurance provisions in this country and what it has done to the nation. But having heard some previous speakers refer to them, I have now done so as well. I would suggest that it is most appropriate to do so, if for no other reason than to give other examples of what the government has done. Handling the Middle East is no different when it comes to handling the situation in a way that cheapens the coin of the realm. The government sped Canadian forces off before Parliament was consulted. It sped Canadian forces off before the United Nations had made its determination as to what should be done but not before the United States had determined what it thought should be done. It has cheapened the House too and, along with it they have cheapened democracy. This is the first major issue before the House in the last two years where debate has not been terminated by closure.

I rather suspect that at this juncture in the debate the government is only too hopeful that it would in some way be able to do just that. Its actions in denigrating everything it touches has also denigrated politicians and, in the eyes of the public, fouled the reputation of those who have put themselves in the service of this country.

One would have thought a new low had been reached in putting forth the motion because the motion itself is something which is blatantly biased. It goes a long way toward putting almost the final nail in the coffin of the cheapening of this country.

The motion "that this House reaffirms its support of the United Nations in ending the aggression by Iraq against Kuwait" is obviously a well-crafted motion. The government would have known, as has already been referred to it as something which the Liberals and the New Democrats would oppose. That there would probably be a final vote on it would be forcing the opposition in Parliament to vote against the United Nations. We have heard references in the debate from the other side of the House that that is precisely what they are up to. They have made that accusation already.

But a new low was reached for this government when the Secretary of State for External Affairs joyfully held up the report of Amnesty International to verify the atrocities that had occurred in Iraq and then had the temerity to table the report. There are three crimes in the use of this information. The first is the use of an Amnesty International report. The taking of one quote in context to prove a point as he was doing is a scurrilous way to use information. Second, it cheapens the reputation of perhaps the most exemplary organization in the world because the reference was made to only one country. Third, it cheapens the whole debate because it refers to only one country while there are references in the reports of Amnesty International to other countries as well.

To hold up that one report as an example of how life is being threatened in one country and only one country, is to cheapen human life altogether. It quantifies the value of life and I will tell the House why. There are other entries in other reports, if not this one, of Amnesty International and I will cite one. "Sixteen executions, 2,300 under sentence of death. A supreme court decision allows offenders as young as 16 and the mentally retarded to be executed." That reference is not to some Third World country. That reference is not to some country which we usually consider to be undemocratic or backward. That reference is to the United States of America.

I refuse to be trapped into a numbers game on the value of human life. What Saddam Hussein did, and does, is indescribably vile. But a life in Des Moines or a life in San Francisco is as precious as that in Iraq. Barbarism is to be universally condemned. That was my hope when we entered what has often been referred to in the House lately as the new order. My hope was that the kind of barbarism which is described as coming out of Iraq, or which I have just described as taking place in the United States as well, would have been something that would have brought the world to unite in eradicating, as well as it ought to be. Instead of that we have war.

I do not necessarily mean to just condemn the United States or Iraq because of those references. Almost every country in the world is mentioned in those Amnesty International reports and there is a rather an interesting exclusion from the 1989 Amnesty International report. What if things continue to go much further downhill in this country as I expect they might be? It is this country which I am referring to. Canada is not included in the last report of Amnesty International. That may possibly be a result of our history and some of the things that this country has stood for. It is something to be very proud of, but something also to be very highly guarded and regarded.

Turning to the new order, how hopeful we were a year ago when the Berlin Wall came down. We hoped and saw, as I have indicated, that some of the barbarism which had occurred behind the Iron Curtain and all over the world would somehow or other be put to a halt. We had hoped that the east, the west, the north, and the south would be able to unite as the human race and be able to eradicate this kind of thing.

Instead of that we get arguments from the other side of the House, and what are they saying? They are saying we are in a new order; this is a wonderful time. We had trouble before in this world in bringing nations to justice, the argument being because the cold war prevented the United Nations from carrying out its mandate. That statement is innocuous enough but not when translated into action. We would hope that some of the words the party on the other side of the House uses would be turned into action, but unfortunately they are not.

These words were turned into action and what did it translate into? It translates into them saying: "Now that we did not have to worry about taking action against someone who is an ally of someone on the other side of the Berlin Wall, we could all unite. No one has to worry about taking action against some other country and having someone on the other side of the Berlin Wall would take it out on them".

Instead of having a world in which we are able at least potentially to be able to conquer this barbarism, we now have a world where barbarism is let loose because we live in a new world order. That is the message I have been receiving from the other side of the House as an interpretation that we live in a new world order.

Can we imagine anyone saying that the cold war prevented the United Nations from carrying out its mandate? God help us if that really does get translated into the mandate of the United Nations being war, and that certainly is the first manifestation that we have seen as a result of the concerted action by the world community after the tearing down of the Berlin Wall.

A lot of interesting quotes seem to have come out of the debate over the last two or three days. I would have to go back in Hansard to see who said it, but someone said that a blind passion for peace led to World War II.

I know who said that and hon. members know who said that, don't they? The Prime Minister said that, at least he quoted someone who said that. I do not know who originally said it, but I do know that the Prime Minister quoted that. He said that a blind passion for peace led to World War II. Someone on the other side of the House then asked, in reference to a similar quote: "Would sanctions have worked against Mussolini, or would they have worked against Hitler?" How on earth is anyone to know whether they would have worked? They were not tried. There have been references on this side of the House to people involved on Mussolini's side of that conflict who said that if sanctions had been applied, "you are doggone right they would have worked, and worked quickly."

There was no intention of ever applying sanctions at the beginning of World War II. The industrial business complex of the world on both sides profited from what was happening in the build-up of arms on both sides of the conflict.

As a matter of fact, a late friend of mine worked in Bermuda during World War II as a censor. Every piece of mail that went back and forth between North America and Europe went through the hands of censors. He said to me, still maintaining his oath of secrecy: "Ron, you would be appalled if you knew what the business leaders of this nation had really been up to during World War II".

I do not really know whether or not sanctions would have worked at the beginning of World War II. I do know that they certainly were not tried.

I would like to make a reference to World War II which I have not heard anyone refer to yet. Others here have said they are not really historians. I do not claim to be an historian, but it seems to me that in the last two world wars, it was the United States who followed Canada into war. To put it another way, certainly the United States got into these conflicts after Canada did. I wonder what has happened in the meantime to put the United States into such a state of haste.

God help us, had the United States followed Canada into this war. We like to pride ourselves as being a "kinder and gentler" nation, although I rather suspect that under the leadership of the present government the probability is that it was pretty much a mutual decision to go into this war. I would suggest that under the leadership of a philosophically different government this nation would have been one which would not have led and would not have followed the United States into war.

When we get into the matter of sanctions, I think the concept of the world order is something which is relevant. As a matter of fact, I may have been a bit unkind when I referred to the glee with which the government marched into the new world order by saying that the whole thrust of the United Nations had been thwarted by the cold war.

The imposition of sanctions was evidence, without a doubt, that that new order had some potential. Under the new order, with almost every nation on earth agreeing that Saddam Hussein was a barbarian and ought to be curtailed in his actions, the countries of Iraq and Kuwait—which he had occupied, admittedly, with no justification whatsoever—were surrounded.

I really have not been in all that many situations where I have been surrounded and wanted to get out, but I do speak the English language. I understand what "surrounded" means and the kind of concerted action that was arrayed against Saddam Hussein. I stand here with full acknowledgement that my party was fully behind the imposition of sanctions against that dictator and madman, Saddam Hussein. If somehow or other, with the whole idea of the new world order, come to a point peacefully where a madman surrounded, incapable of being able to carry on much longer, is immobilized, he then would most certainly not have been able to succeed for very much longer.

I see that my time is running short, but I would like to say that this whole idea of sanctions having been given a chance is absolute rot. I do not want to over-emphasize it, but if we can give the Government of South Africa 30 years of voluntary sanctions which eventually proved to work, we can certainly impose sanctions against Saddam Hussein which can last much longer than five months. That was an artificial deadline anyway.

There are many more things which could be said, but I would like to close with the thought that comes from a quote from Anthony Star, since we seem to be so fond of making quotations in the House.

Anthony Star says: "With the exception of certain rodents, no other vertebrate habitually destroys the members of its own species." War can only be viewed as the definitive expression of the disposition of the human race. I pray that before long the government comes to its senses and does everything it can to reverse what it has gotten into and what this world has got into.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member on an excellent and insightful speech and solid recommendations to this House. I know he agrees with me that those recommendations, like all those proceeding from this side of the House, have fallen on deaf ears. In fact the Prime Minister of Canada and each and every Conservative member have made up their minds that Canada will become involved in this war, and that we will commit our Armed Forces, with the United States and a limited number of other nations, to attack Iraq.

Would the hon. member be interested tomorrow in beginning the process of joining together with other like-minded legislators and citizens into attempting a different route, possibly creating committees to stop the war? Such committees would be made up of any willing citizen in each of our local areas: people in the clergy, members of organized labour, the business community, local legions, veterans groups, and women's organizations—a broad coalition of people without partisan consideration with a single objective to have this government stop Canadian involvement in the war.

Possibly, we could encourage the peace community in Ottawa to come into our offices, to act as volunteers, to use the telephone services, the mail services and any other services that a member's office could provide, and to help organize these committees in ridings that we possibly do not hold.

Personally I would like to see a committee to stop the war in the riding of every cabinet minister in the government, in the riding of the Prime Minister but ultimately attempt to establish across Canada in the strongest possible fashion to convince the government of the wrong-headed approach that it has taken. It has placed Canada in jeopardy in the world. It has placed the Armed Forces and the members of their families in jeopardy.

Such a committee could act to end Canada's involvement and its Armed Forces in the war. It could end the international political support for George Bush by the Prime Minister and his government. It could convince other smaller nations that have no interest in the kind of butchery that will proceed from the action from this day forth. It could work together with people to stop this war, to end Canada's involvement, and then move to working with like-minded individuals and groups in the United States to stop American involvement in this war.

Such committees could take up the issues that have been dealt with in the House. Canada's nation is a nation with dirty hands in selling arms, nuclear reactors, and the tools of war. It could take up the issue of stopping the assassins that have been put in place, in many cases by the United States, in El Salvador, Central America, Latin America, and southeast Asia.

It could work on a number of issues that we, on this side of the House, have complained about. But it is now almost time to end this debate. There is no point having a vote. It will never convince the government. It will never have an impact on it.

What will have an impact is if the 88 per cent of Canadians who oppose the Prime Minister, the government, and this war band together in an enormous national effort to get us out of the war, and then work to get the Americans out of the war. That is all we can do, I would think.

Would the member not agree, and would he be willing to participate in such an activity?

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for making that suggestion and, indeed, for asking that question. The answer is an unqualified yes.

There are other numbers we can give, but there is a telephone out here in the lobby behind me. The area code is 613-995-9557. It is 3.50 a.m. Eastern Standard Time. We sometimes think that people do not watch, but I think we would probably be surprised. We will try to get the other telephone numbers. This is only for our own Opposition Whips, but there is a general telephone number with a lot of telephone lines on it. We will get those.

There are six minutes of my time left. Maybe, before I am finished, we will be able to give out other numbers. The number, again, is 613-995-9557.

Mr. Walker: How about your home number?

Mr. Fisher: I come from Saskatoon. Of course, the number there is 306-382-3361. It is in the phone book, and everyone knows it.

The answer to the question is, yes, I would become involved in that.

There was an excellent advertisement in the Star Phoenix just last weekend. The fax numbers of the Prime Minister's and Secretary of State for External Affairs were supplied. I would certainly encourage people to do that.

I think we should emphasize that we are not saying that Canada should pull out of the situation altogether. No Canadians would disagree with Canada's involvement in the imposition of sanctions, which we had been involved with before. As the New Democratic Party, we have proposed that there be a pause in the hostilities.

We have been apprised by previous speakers that the news which we have been receiving has been distorted and laundered by the military. So, I suppose that the reports that the Iraqi capability to retaliate and to function has been almost destroyed is probably wrong.

Nonetheless, there is no point in annihilating a nation. It is Saddam Hussein and his army which we are trying to bring to a halt. To continue beyond what is militarily necessary to accomplish that, to continue with an annihilation of the civilian population, and to continue with just an annihilation of even the geographical entity which is Kuwait and Iraq is insanity of the highest order.

There seems to be a tremendous amount of logic to having a pause in hostilities and saying to this madman: "It is time you laid off what you are doing. We, as humanity, are willing to give you an opportunity to be able to back off from what you are doing and to come to your senses." At the same time, the sanctions would be heavily imposed upon him.

I have another number here, Mr. Speaker. The area code again is 613-996-7441.

I am not sure if that answers the question entirely, but it is an excellent idea, something which has to be fostered and continued, and hopefully it will bring this nation to its senses and, perhaps, put Canada back into the leadership where it would be able to bring the world to its senses as well.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before I begin my remarks, I would just like to extend my own personal thanks to you for seeing this debate. I know it has been a very long evening for you and, through you, Mr. Speaker, I would thank the employees of the House of Commons and the people at the table for their perseverance through this very long but very important debate.

As I prepared myself for this debate, I decided I would spend the day back in Winnipeg, inasmuch as it is an issue that concerns the people of my city very much. As I flew back, I was struck by how divided people were.

I went to the Westminster United Church and met with the peace groups and heard views about what this country was all about. If I would talk to my friends at the work-out class around the corner, they would give me other ideas. Yet, if I went to the legion, the first legion in the country, Legion No. 1 on Sargent Avenue, its members would have a different point of view, as do the members of the Sir General Sam Steele Legion in the north end.

This diversity of views, while at many times is a healthy reflection of a democratic society, is also a reflection of the very divided society that we have right now. When one enters a war theatre in wartime with such divisions, one has to reflect on why that is.

I was saying to myself when I prepared that it is a very odd debate to have. The motion was crafted, thought about, and presented to the House in a time of peace, on the edge of war, but still in a time of peace. Yet, we are winding up the debate today in the middle of a war. In some respects it is hard to believe that it has only been 60 hours since the first guns were fired and the first planes took off and headed into Iraq. It seems like a lifetime ago that we have a chance to save ourselves from war and now we are right in the middle of a very difficult struggle.

Many of us spend our time while we are not debating in the House watching this theatre on television. In some respects, this is the first war that we have been forced into the scene by watching the devastation caused by bomb after bomb. Heavens knows what will happen when the troop movement will begin. However, we are also very removed from it. We cannot reach out to the TV and turn it off. We cannot stop those bullets or bombings. Our democratic societies feel helpless because we do not want to see these actions wished upon anyone. Yet, it is beyond our control. At the very moment we are more involved in a real way through international television, we are made to feel not part of it, but removed and helpless by it.

We have to think of how one contributes thoughtfully to debate such as this one. We are all peace loving, but we have very different strategies for producing peace and making sure that we have a society that continues in peace.

Again, I was struck by the fact that one of the major emotions we have is the emotion of anger. How many times in the House have we had an opportunity to show consensus on the one hand, but on the other were presented with motions and opportunities that would only create division.

For example, there have been many individual remarks—and I would like to add my own to them—about how thankful we are for the troops and the members of the Armed Forced who are obeying the government and presenting themselves in very difficult situations by going out on the limb and putting their families in fear for their futures and all that goes with war. The House was never presented with a motion to thank these people. What would have been more simple for the government to call for the unanimity of the House to thank those who had volunteered for war? I am sure there would not have been one member from any of party, or from among the Independents, who would have said no to that motion. But were we given to show unanimity as to what this House feels? No. Instead, the government has sought ways to divide us.

When one begins to talk about a situation as difficult as the Middle East, one has to reflect on history. I was reviewing the speeches of my colleagues from the last few days and was amazed by the number of people who have turned to history and found examples to support their cases. What would have Prime Minister Pearson done? What would Prime Minister King have done? What would President Roosevelt have done? Among all three parties there has been support from these famous people for their position. In fact, the Prime Minister managed to find words of Stanley Knowles which buttressed his case. I am sure that the NDP were surprised to find Mr. Knowles on the side of our Prime Minister.

They have each had their own crises and contradictions to deal with. Mr. King had to deal with a depression, the Second World War, the lost generation and the failure of the League of Nations. Mr. St. Laurent had to deal with the recreation of North America and, more important Europe, and a cold war. They had to deal with the beginning of the developing nations and the first of the colonies breaking away from the European powers.

In the sixties, we had the beginning of Vietnam and the threat of nuclear war. In the seventies, we had the oil crisis and the second of the serious battles in the Middle East. In the eighties, we had the beginning of the end of the eastern European bloc. Each one of these decades has created circumstances that should cause us to turn back to these people not as heroes necessarily because they solved problems and they had very difficult times, but to cause ourselves to be reflective on the situation that we find ourselves in.

Often, one approaches the problem by thinking how it began, before beginning to solve it. For example, think of Canada and the trouble we are into.

When you enter a constitutional debate, your answer is largely determined by how you conceive the country: is it two founding nations, is it a country that is 130 years old, is it a country that is older than that and, if so, how much older, is it 10 provinces which have made a deal that they can all then recreate the deal, or is it a series of regions?

That might look like an academic and sort of obtuse question when I am discussing the Middle East, but think of the price that Canada has paid by not thinking through that problem. We now have a constitutional crisis because we did not take the aboriginal people seriously. We thought our history began somewhere between 100 to 200 years ago. The aboriginal leaders said no, that this country began 1,000 years ago; you had better begin to think of how to conceptualize that. We refused to acknowledge that at the bargaining table and what happened? We failed to reach an agreement. If we had thought four or five years ago that the real basis of this country included our original peoples, we would now be in a different situation. So we turn ourselves to the Middle East and say to ourselves: "Where do these battles begin?"

Canada has now entered a front for the first time as a member of a war force. No matter how we want to say it, we are working very closely with our allies, but this is the first time we have really intruded in that region, unless one wants to consider Cyprus, which is part of that region but not as directly concerned. What do we think of that crisis? Do we think it began last August with the invasion of Kuwait? Do we think it began with the oil embargo? Do we think it began with the division of Palestine after the Second World War? Do we think of the divisions after the Great War by the European powers? Is its origins in different religions that go back for centuries? It is ethnicity? What is the basis of that conflict?

When you enter into a crisis situation, you better have it pretty clear in your mind what you think the problem might be because you want to come out with a solution. Our party was very reluctant, as this House knows, to see us get involved in this conflict. We saw it as one of a series of problems. Although force has been exercised many times before in the Middle East, and never once has it produced the so-called end solution, the agreement that has solved all problems, the agreement among all agreements, that has never worked. For some reason we have decided that this particular time it is going to work.

In posing this question and opposing what has been taking place, this party has been very careful not to position itself among those people who are simply anti-American or pacifist by definition. There are times when wars have to be fought. Many Canadians have in their families people who have fought in wars for good reasons and have paid the price. We in the Liberal Party respect that and have participated in that and supported that.

There is a very good article by a British journalist, Hugo Young, writing in the Manchester Guardian, last week. He argued that Saddam alone is to blame. What he did in this article is very interesting and is something which I think every politician has to do, and that is to read something which tears apart every one of your arguments so that you are sure of yourself. I thought in preparing for today that this person had read my speech before I began and had an argument against every one of my positions.

The Liberal Party has been very thoughtful behind the scenes in its deliberations and its research. It was able to conceive a position which was consistent with its historical commitment to the United Nations but, at the same time thought that certain steps should be taken before we entered the arena. Since we have done that step, it is very important that we take those mistakes made by this government and try to understand how we should be approaching the problem in the future.

I think one of the most important aspects of this debate this week which has to be put on the table by every parliamentarian who is honest with what he or she has seen in their constituencies is the anger of Canadians that we are in this position. It does not matter whether or not they agree that we should be at war or disagree, they are angry. The reason they are angry is that they became confused after Christmas as to exactly why January 15 was the date on which war had to be begun. Why had Canada found itself so closely allied to a position which Canadians themselves were not sold on?

We go back and we say that the government has failed to communicate with Canadians and that the price that is being paid is that we enter into the war without a consensus in this country that this war is going to be a benefit. The government failed to identify the interest of Canada in the Middle East. There are very real interests and ones that we should be fighting for. It failed to open up the debate to Parliament during the summer. It failed to have ongoing debate on this issue. It failed in Question Period to answer these debates openly. It failed to provide briefings to Canadians who were interested. It refused to go out and discuss the issues honestly with peace groups. It refused to consult widely. It ended up with this bull-headed attitude that they knew what was right, cabinet knew what was right, the senior civil servants knew what was right, and they were going to get Canada in there no matter what.

Now history is being recreated. Those of you who like to watch media spins and the media spin doctors, as they are called in the trade now, will recognize that since the decision was made, in fact beginning last Thursday before the decision was made to commence the offence against Iraq, all of a sudden we got news that this government had been out seeking peace constantly. For six months they said nothing but "we have to stick by that deadline, we have to push, push, push." Then all of a sudden we find out they are whispering: "No, no, no. We really, really were trying to do something much different. We were really trying to be on the side of peacemakers here. We just said those other things because that is what is expected of us".

How do you end up expecting people to believe that they have to be there on the war front when in fact the government says that it tried everything so that it would not have to be there on the war front. For the last six months government members were saying they had to be there in the war front by January 15. And you ask why Canadians are confused. It is because the situation presented to them was confusing and totally manipulative.

That has to be part of the public record because we cannot generation after generation disappoint people who think that the base of this country should be peaceful. As they enter into a situation which frustrates them and they feel manipulated, they get locked out, and that includes particularly younger people and university students, church groups, people who are not normally high profile in the political community. They look around and say: "We do not understand why this is happening. Why do we have to be there?"

There is a good argument to be made, and one that I personally accept, that in a legitimate process involving the United Nations, and in more specific ways with the NATO countries that we are allied with, Canada has a duty, a responsibility, to participate in collective action that preserves our security and preserves world peace. That has been a principle that Canada has adhered to since the original meetings to form the UN in San Francisco. It is a tradition we are proud of. It is a tradition for which we have gone out on the limb in one crisis after another, that people before me have spoken about, many Prime Ministers have faced, and faced with an equal perspective. That is the direction we go in.

However, when you begin to cut corners, you fail to tell people that the UN motion really is not a UN flag type of motion. It really is anybody who wants to get involved can get involved. We are not really going to say it that way. We like you all to help out, but if you do not want to, you do not have to. If that is the way you want to go, that is fine. But be honest. Do not tell Canadians that it is a UN flag operation when they find out too late that we are all there under our own flags and there is a co-ordinator, we think, although we have not really been told this by the Minister of National Defence. We think there is a co-ordinator. We think he might be someone else who is not a Canadian, but we are not too sure of who it is, but we are told it cannot be the UN because co-ordination under the UN will not work. But you say to yourself: "Come on, guys, treat us with some honesty; tell us why we are there under this organization, why you think it is going to work, how we should contribute, and if you think things have to be stepped up to protect our troops and to protect our interests in the Middle East". Obviously things are going to have to be stepped up now—"do not tell us this week, as if you did not think about it last week or the week before, that you are making this decision just now".

Today I heard that we were going to have to move troops into the Middle East. Why are we moving troops into the Middle East? To protect our hospital. Look at the logic.

We are bringing in a hospital to look after the wounded and to protect the wounded. We are bringing in troops instead of honestly saying that we think we should have troops there as part of the allied force. If we want to have troops there as part of the allied force, stand up and say to Canadians that we now have to expand our base, we are going to move in troops. Then we can deal with the issue honestly. We can ask questions in Question Period, we can present motions. We can call the committee together and we can talk about it. But to do it backward, how can any parliamentarian argue against having troops there to protect a hospital? Nobody can. This is the deceit that must drive our Armed Forces crazy, because they have an honest role to play. Canadians respect the Armed Forces. They are committed to seeing Canada play an honourable role. They are proud of the tradition in this country of having an independent foreign policy, one which they feel is formulated in our Canadian Parliament and is developed by the cabinet. There is a set of democratic institutions here second to none in the world, but when ideas and strategies are presented in a convoluted way Canadians pull back.

The government now has the spectre of entering a war with more and more Canadians opposing it. How can you develop a country feeling pride in itself? We are a country with a government that has made it bankrupt. We are in the middle of a recession. We have a constitutional crisis. We have had a crisis of aboriginal people. Now we head into war, and they turn around and they do not know why the country is demoralized. If they went back to their constituencies they would know why people are demoralized. Because they have not seen one thing go right for them for such a long time, they forget what it is like to feel good about themselves. They are not going to feel good about themselves by being in a war they do not understand.

There are some real responsibilities here which I think have been abrogated by this government and I think we are going to pay the price. As we go through this stage, and although I do not share the optimism of some of the commentators that this will be a short war, I think that one thing we have done in the western world, whether we have been involved with the fronts in Asia or whether we have been involved with the fronts in the Middle East, or South America or Central America, we have constantly analysed incorrectly the strength of people who are fighting nationalist fights or fights which they feel strongly about. For religious or historical or fights they have had with others in the region, these battles, have always continued much longer and with much more devastation than we can imagine.

As we commit ourselves to this long battle, we must remember that we not only want to win the battle but we want to win the war. To use a cliché, we want the war's victory to be peace and we want to see peace settled throughout the Middle East. We want to preserve the integrity of many nations there. I know I share with other members, and I am sure they share with me the fear that we have that Israel will be drawn into the battle that it has neither asked for, nor provoked. Every member sitting there watching the television and understanding just how volatile the area immediately around Israel is with long-standing grievances can only hope that it is not drawn into this unfairly.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order please. The hon. member's time has expired. He may only continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker. There is a responsibility among parliamentarians, however, to put on the table ideas to help a government to develop better foreign policy. May I suggest that, first, we take steps starting now to initiate public discussions for a more peaceful world by getting people to understand what is going on in the Middle East. Second, we should try to revitalize any added nations. Third, we should use those components of the NATO agreements to begin to work out political and social plans to involve Eastern Europe before that explodes on us. Fourth, we should develop a military policy which has as its basis the development of a peacemaking function in terms of acquisitions of equipment.

We are in this case right now where we can not respond with peacemaking because we have CF-18s and they do not have a peacemaking role. It does not matter where you are. Fifth, we should establish human rights as a part of our foreign policy. Sixth, we should develop regional plans for peace so that this does not happen again in places like Cambodia, the Philippines and Central America. Seventh, we should have a white paper for peace. Eighth, we should have a parliamentary committee talking to Canadians about these issues. Ninth, perhaps most important, we should publicly recognize that war is a failure. To enter war is a failure of everything we stand for as a country. We should turn this around, take this failure and make it into a positive benefit by recommitting our country to a peaceful future.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, there are a number of things the member touched on that I just want to make a point or two on and possibly follow up with a question.

I was pleased to hear the member touch on collective action and the responsibilities of Canada under the charter of the United Nations to act collectively with the rest of the world. I am pleased that he recognizes that, and I am pleased that he recognizes the need for collective security in the world. I do not believe that we are too far apart on that sense of responsibility on behalf of Canada. I think I have quoted the member accurately on that.

One of the things I do want some clarification on, if possible, is this. He mentioned that we do have interests in the Middle East. Noting that he understands what those interests are, I noted that the member said that those interests are worth fighting for.

We have been told in a sense by the government, but I was hoping that he could tell us this morning what those interests are in his own terms and sense of what they might be.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, I think Canadian interests in this case are tied into the development of a long term, peaceful plan for the Middle East. It is the one area of the world that, I guess since I was a student some 23 years ago, I have always worried about. It is the area that could blow up the world because of the combination of economic, historical and national and religious interests coming to converge in a very small area with an intensity that I think we in Canada do not appreciate.

The one principal organization we set up to work on that is the United Nations. One of the major tasks that the United Nations has to undertake is a more honest dealing with Middle East issues. There have been—some members in the House follow this very closely—several

With our alliance stretching into Turkey through NATO, we have the commitment through its agreement to stabilize and protect that particular country.

There are other interests that I think are developing. There are economic interests. We have several private and public corporations very active in that region. There are trade interests at stake for us.

There is also a country in which symbolic importance much exceeds its physical size. There is the maintenance and the integrity of Israel and the resolution of the problems surrounding that state.

Those are the issues that I always think as being paramount to the interests of Canada, and I think it is through our international organizations and our commitment to the United Nations in particular that we can extend it. As a peacekeeping middle level power, we can show the world what some of those solutions might be.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, once again we see the importance of this debate. I would like to thank the hon. member. It is 4.20 a.m., and even at this early hour, members who are willing to think and reflect intelligently can make any kind of suggestions.

At the end of his speech which lasted no more than five minutes, the hon. member for Winnipeg-North-Centre, Mr. Walker—I would rather call people by their name—made a series of suggestions.

[English]

Yes, they have suggestions but that is what debate is all about. I will never live long enough now because of that debate. This is probably the third most important debate in my life here in Parliament over 27 years. It is serious. I do not want deal too long with the first one. That was the War Measures Act for which I voted with the very little information that I had. I say it in English, and I will say it in French. With the little information that I was given, I voted for it.

Of course, there was the constitutional debate. That is probably the reason why I am a Canadian and I am here, a Canadien français. What is my place here, what is my role? If it has not been for the question of war, I would have loved so much, I would have had so much better feeling as a Canadian, I would be a prouder Canadian being here these last two days. I do not think I missed one minute of the debate. I do not understand it. I was here at ten o'clock this morning. The Speaker was here. It is now the day after, at four o'clock, and there has not been any filibuster. I have listened to all kinds of unbelievable ideas, fresh ideas.

I do not want to assassinate people intellectually but I heard the same tones, as they say en français, sur le même ton.

[Translation]

It is the same expression they support on the other side, while on this side we reflect the hesitations of Canadians.

[English]

I have heard friends, and I call them friends. They will stay my friends in the party that they proudly represent. They say: "Look, they are divided in the opposition". We are not divided. We are simply, emotionally, intellectually reflecting what is going on in the country, the hesitation of the people who are stuck between emotion, support for our Canadians. I will talk about that if I speak in this debate.

But I want to thank the hon. member. He was in Winnipeg all day. I could not believe it when I was told that he would fly back late tonight, Friday night, from Winnipeg. He asked permission to speak before me, if I do so, because he said "I want two hours of sleep" before returning to Winnipeg this morning.

This is personalizing a debate but I think Canadians should know that members of Parliament care. I do not mean to say by that that only this side now cares. I want Canadians to know we are human beings. We care. Those who are here care a hell of a lot. That does not mean that those who are not do not. But the debate is so important. It is Canada, Mon Canada. I will say that later, I hope.

That is why I am here, to listen to people like Mr. Walker.

[English]

I need to hear debate like that of Mr. Barrett this afternoon. Rarely do I have tears in my eyes, but when he said "I am a Jew, and here is what I think", it was difficult.

My colleague from Westmount has never been the kind of fine friend that I would think of when talking about the Middle East over the years. I could not believe his speech. I hope Canadians will read it. I will say that in French.

[Translation]

I hope Quebecers, men and women, will read Mr. Berger's speech. I do not want to flatter him, but such a speech must have been difficult to make.

[English]

It must have been very difficult for him to speak as he did. He is probably sleeping now, so he will have quite a shock tomorrow to hear what I said. But I mean it. I do, do mean it. That is what debate is all about on such an important issue, such an unbelievable issue.

We are not weak. We are not afraid on this side. We do not run away when we see a gun. Try to take me out of the House when there is a false alarm and you will see that I do not get weak too easily. I was in the provost corps, the Military Police, in Shilo, when I was very young.

We are not showing weakness by debating an issue of war and by defending peace groups. No, we are talking about human life. I thank the hon. member for coming back because,in a few minutes those who will read it will say: "Maybe half of it should be Canadian policy". I hope my colleague from the majority party will read all of the good proposals, keep some, reflect on others and reject out of hand those that are total dreams because later on I will talk to you about a dream that I had.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I must admit, along with some of the others in this debate, that I have had a little bit of difficulty in getting up to become involved in this debate. I feel a sense of frustration that in fact the decisions have already been made. Of course, the war has already been launched. What we are discussing here is almost after the fact. To some extent it makes parliamentarians look a bit foolish that everything that had to be decided in order to proceed with the war has been decided.

But I think in the last little while, as the member for Saint-Denis has said, that there has been some interesting information come out, information perhaps that will not help Parliament to make a decision that has already been made but information that, hopefully, will lead to some discussion about Canada's role in the future and perhaps some analysis of what went into the decisions leading up to Canada's involvement with the United States and with the United Nations in the current war.

One of the things that excites me a little bit is the fact that the member from Saskatoon, after his speech and in response to a question and comment from the member for North Island—Powell River, indicated that there was a number in the members' lobby which citizens who are watching this debate all across the country could call and actually tell members who are present in the House tonight precisely what their feelings are. That number is 613-996-7446.

There have been numerous calls coming into the opposition lobby from citizens who have been watching this debate and, for the first time in my experience of 18 years as an elected member in the British Columbia legislature and in the House of Commons in Ottawa, I have almost got the feeling that there is a possibility that this could be an interactive Parliament, that the people of Canada who are watching us debate can actually give us information that will be helpful in the debate. I think, even at four o'clock in the morning, which is only one o'clock in the morning British Columbia time, these people can actually, in watching the debate, help us with information, give us their feelings and have an exchange of feelings with those people across Canada who are so interested in what is happening in the Middle East and in this Parliament that they are actually switching from the news channels to watch the debate here in the House of Commons because now they have an opportunity to interact with members and to tell members what they feel.

I received a call, just a few minutes ago, from Parksville, British Columbia, in my riding, from somebody who has a son on the Athabaskan in the war zone and who is absolutely opposed to the war and would like to see the Canadians out of the war zone. I want to say, for that person who called all the way from Parksville, that I really appreciate that call. I must admit, in coming into this debate, I felt that the decision had already been made and that I, as a member of the House of Commons, was absolutely powerless. In fact, it makes you feel a bit foolish when the decision has already been made and all you have to do is simply ventilate a little bit about the position that is taken by the government.

In fact, I suppose I was one of thousands or millions of Canadians who watched the debate take place in the Senate and the House of Representatives in the United States knowing that those people speaking on the floor of the U.S. Congress had the power to decide whether their nation was to go to war in support of the Bush administration or whether their nation would not go to war. That power gives members of the House of Representatives and senators in the United States a greater feeling that they are playing an important role on behalf of their constituents in expressing their conscience and beliefs than we have here. It could have been done here. It was not necessary that the government come into this House of Commons with its mind already made up and simply allow members to ventilate, without listening to or respecting, their positions. To some extent, the government attempted to make fools of the members of the opposition. I think it was the wrong tact taken by the government in this case.

I have read a little bit of history in my time. I know that during periods of war, often the government will contact the opposition parties and attempt to establish a union cabinet or a union approach because of the need to pull the country together and to establish national unity at the time of war. As part of that comprehensive approach to unity, it approaches trade unions for example, that will become involved in the war production effort. They contact municipalities, banks, businesses and financial institutions, the efforts of which it is going to need in order to mobilize the country to prosecute a war.

In this case, as is traditional with this government, it did not even bother to contact the opposition to develop the question that we were going to be debating in this House. I looked at the question that was presented to us by the government as a fait accompli and the question says this: "That this House re-affirms its support of the United Nations in ending the aggression by Iraq against Kuwait." Nobody in this House could have any difference of opinion with a question like that. We want to support the United Nations. We want to support the principles of the United Nations as set out in its charter. We are committed as a party and a country to do it. How can we possibly oppose a resolution like this? We are also committed to ending the aggression by Iraq against the country of Kuwait. How could anybody in this House possibly be opposed to that? That is not the reason that this question was placed on the floor of the House of Commons by the hon. Prime Minister.

The reason this was placed on the floor was for a political trap. Basically, this resolution will be interpreted by the government as opposition support for its efforts in the war against Iraq. I do not support the government's efforts in the war against Iraq. It was a wrong-headed decision made on the basis of wrong reasoning when other alternatives had not been exhausted. It is unfair for a Prime Minister to come into a House to present a resolution like this knowing that it is a resolution designed to entrap politically opposition members in this House into voting in a way they do not want to vote. It is manipulation and the kind of manipulation that we have seen far too often by this Prime Minister. It is the kind of manipulation that he himself boasted about when he was talking about delaying the First Ministers' Conference on the Meech Lake Accord until the last possible minute so that the First Ministers of this country would feel compelled by the passage of time to vote quickly to pass the Meech Lake Accord. I think the country rejected that kind of political manipulation. We certainly do not like to see, in an important situation like this, the opposition in this Parliament manipulated into voting for a resolution that is essentially a political trap.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Hear! hear!

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Now, I support those members who have stood up, including the leader of our political party. For example, the member for Fraser Valley West I think made an excellent presentation in this House, a compassionate, committed presentation, committed to peaceful resolution of disputes, both in the Middle East and around the world. But the problem is, that when you are presented with a question, and all of the parties in the House of Commons have not had an opportunity through a consultation process to develop, it is almost impossible to allow members on that basis to have a free vote. If you vote yes for this resolution, then the government is going to say you support the war. If you vote no for this resolution, the government is going to say: "you are in favour of the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait" or "you are opposed to supporting the men and women of our military forces overseas." And that is not true, but that is the option the government has in presenting this kind of a resolution to the House. I think it is demeaning to this Parliament, demeaning to the government, and unfortunately characteristic of this Prime Minister to present that kind of a resolution, as he did in the debate around the Meech Lake Accord.

I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, exactly what position I intend to take on this question, a question that to me, does not make any sense at all. If it comes to a vote I am still not sure how I am going to vote on it because the government can interpret my vote in any way it chooses. That is why we have this kind of a resolution.

But I want to tell you that I am absolutely opposed to Canada's participation in this war against Iraq. I do not think it is necessary. I think it is pursuing a United States' foreign policy, and I do not think that Canada should be involved in it. I am absolutely opposed to the use of Canadian forces in an offensive way against the Government of Iraq. That is not to say that I do not want Iraq out of Kuwait or that I support Iraq's aggression in Kuwait. What I am saying is that there were alternatives that we should have used and that we should have exhausted before we resorted to war.

I think that those alternatives would have been successful had they been given the opportunity. But other people—and I am thinking of George Bush and the U.S. administration—were motivated otherwise, and I think that has dictated how Canada has become involved in the war in Kuwait.

I agree with my leader that I think Canada's forces should be in the Middle East, but they should be in the Middle East serving ends other than the violent ends being pursued by the United States. I think we should be using our forces to contain the war zone so that the war does not expand. I think we should be assisting in the blockade of war material and other support going to Iraq through the Middle East so that Iraq is ultimately denied the ability to maintain its troops in Kuwait and to maintain a war against the allies there. I also believe that our troops and Canadian personnel should be used for humanitarian purposes; to provide health, medical and refugee support to those civilians and others who are either injured or become casualties as a result of the war, or who become displaced from their homes as result of the destruction due to this war.

Canada has a tremendous and respected role to play in providing those kinds of humanitarian and support services to those who are injured, become casualties or refugees as a result of this war.

I think that represents the kind of traditional role Canada has played recently in wars around the world. I think that has generated for us a great deal of respect.

I had the opportunity to visit the United Nations as a parliamentary observer just a few months ago. This was an opportunity that I never thought of, growing up as a young child in New Westminster, British Columbia in a very poor family. I never believed that I would be sitting on the floor of the United Nations with delegations from all around the world discussing issues of world importance.

I was almost overwhelmed by the opportunity that was given to me as a member of this Parliament. I have a great deal of personal respect and lend a great deal of support to the United Nations.

For the government to come into the House and tell me as a member of the opposition that if I do not support its resolution, then for some reason I am opposed to the United Nations. I absolutely resent that kind of entrapment and gamesmanship with this resolution. It is absolutely false. I can speak not only for myself by that statement, but also for. . . whole of our caucus.

This caucus has supported the United Nations throughout the history of this political party and throughout the history of the United Nations.

That has not always been the case with some of our allies in the current war effort. For example, I want to talk about an incident that happened recently before the World Court. The Speaker will be aware of what is called the Contra scandal which brought to light the fact that the United States was providing, both legally under American law at times and under its own law at times, weapons, money, material and humanitarian aid to a group called the Contras that would not really exist without the support of the United States government or its surrogates.

The World Court, back in 1986, heard a case advanced by Nicaragua that the United States was violating international law by supporting the Contras by printing booklets calling for psychological warfare and terrorism against Nicaraguan communities by providing the Contras with weapons with which to kill Nicaraguan civilians, and in fact in instruction manuals on psychological warfare and terrorism actually advocating the murder of non-combatant Nicaraguan citizens. The United States was violating the charter of the United Nations and was engaged in an act of aggression against Nicaragua.

The World Court ruled that by mining the harbours of the Atlantic coast of Nicaragua the United States again was not only violating the treaties it had with Nicaragua but was also in violation of the Geneva articles of war and the charter of the United Nations.

The United States has not been known in recent years, as recent as 1986, to be a supporter of the United Nations. Here, the government is telling us that we should side with the United Nations, and the United States in telling us how we should be giving great respect for the United Nations. I want to know where the Government of Canada was when those violations were taking place, when the United States was hauled before the World Court and found guilty of violating the United Nations charter and international law and participating in an act of aggression.

It is a country of 220 million that was engaged in an act of aggression against a country of 3.5 million people. Why was Canada not standing up on its hind feet? Why was it not seeking allies in the United Nations to prevent this kind of active aggression going on in Nicaragua, which had been identified and condemned by the World Court, an international body which Canada claims to support. Where was our support for the United Nations then?

One of the reasons why I feel almost ashamed as a legislator to be here at 4.45 in the morning talking about a resolution that is virtually redundant is that Canada has already gone to war along with the United States. We really do not have any power on behalf of our citizens.

I have had letters from my citizens all over my constituency saying that they absolutely oppose this war. I represent my citizens and yet can do absolutely nothing because the government has come into this House with its mind made up and members of this Parliament can do absolutely nothing to change its mind.

As I speak, there are two members of the government in the House, cabinet is asleep, and nobody is really listening to Canadians. That makes people like me frustrated.

But there is an opportunity for people to get in touch with this Parliament at this very hour. I would suggest that they call 613-996-7446 and they will reach the opposition lobby.

Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the member on a very effective speech, one that I know will be read and considered. I do not say that lightly or with humour. It raised some factual evidence about the performance of the United States in this world that certainly does no credit to its record and no credit to its support.

One of the things that the previous speaker mentioned was an alternate role for the Canadian Armed Forces. When the Americans finish bombing Iraq back to the stone age, and that the country lays in ruins, its government, administration, and infrastructure destroyed, there will be an enormous number of casualties, absolutely enormous.

But the day the bombing stops, the deaths will accelerate. They will accelerate from gastro-intestinal diseases. People will die from injuries suffered during the war. They will suffer from starvation, famine, disease and exposure. Their water systems will be gone. Their sewer systems will be gone. There will be toxic chemicals and hazardous wastes everywhere. Transportation systems will be destroyed. Throughout their cities there will be dangerous buildings damaged by war. What we need to do is to think seriously about the use of the Canadian Armed Forces who have tremendous expertise, medical corps who can offer treatment to civilian and military casualties. They can treat famine and disease through some of the public health techniques that they have. They can deliver community health care. Women are still going to be pregnant and have babies, people are still going to be suffering from diseases and will need the distribution of antibiotics, medicines and surgery.

We could put a corps of engineers in there to destroy the dangerous and damaged buildings. We could restore transportation systems so that the sick, the injured and the destitute can be brought to medical treatment and to places for shelter and food. We could restore electricity, so that pumps could be run to remove sewage and provide water. We could look into damaged sewer systems, water systems, communications so that the population can gradually be reorganized to protect and provide for itself.

Transportation units out of Trenton, Comox or Cold Lake could provide stores that we already have in place of medicines, food, fuel, shelter and clothing. Many of the people will die of exposure. We think of it as always a hot country, but it is not so.

Our Canadian Armed Forces have stores available and the opportunity to prevent starvation, to prevent death from the simplest diseases of infants and young children, to provide just basic antibiotics that will save more lives than probably anything else. They are ready and competent to deliver those stores, but unfortunately this government has not for one moment considered that.

What lies ahead when this wreckage is finished is the possibility of even more deaths from simple matters of disease and lack of attention, food, clothing, shelter and medicine. Our Armed Forces are far better equipped to deliver that than to make war. Yet in the briefing the other day the two individuals who came forward to give our caucus information said our Armed Forces are not giving consideration to that.

If we are not in there the day the bombs stop dropping, people will begin to die at an accelerating rate. It is going to take money, resources and planning to get in place. I would ask why the Prime Minister, why the Minister of National Health and Welfare and why the Minister of National Defence are not giving this House information about what responsibility we intend to take the day the bombing stops and when the money and resources are going to be put aside.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for posing those alternatives. It is something that this caucus is concerned about and that the opposition is concerned about. Even as World War II drew to a close, and other previous wars drew to a close, the allies, before and during the war, had some ideas meetings to determine exactly what was going to happen when peace was ultimately restored; who was going to have responsibility for rebuilding the destruction that had been done who was going to have the responsibility for the medical reparations that were going to be required because of the injuries and the losses in particular populations what kind of economic reconstruction was going to take place, who was going to deal with restoring the populations to the economic health that it had before.

I think those discussions have not commenced by the participants in this war and they should certainly commence. I congratulate the member for some of the suggestions he has made so far.

Along the same lines, we should be looking at the future role of Canada's Armed Forces and Canada's military power because I think many Canadians, having seen what has happened in the Middle East, never want to see Canada's military play this kind of role again.

There has been a number of peaceful roles suggested, the role that we traditionally follow in the United Nations as peacekeepers to separate combatants and to restore a peaceful existence between conflicting nations.

I think the Canadian Armed Forces could be used for other purposes. They are already used to some extent off the west coast to watch for oil spills and that kind of thing, and to become involved in the protection of the environment which will be a major concern for the next 10 years. I think our Armed Forces could be allocated, for example, to help Africa with its elephant poaching problem. That species is under the threat of extinction because those who are going after that species are better armed than the wardens in the national parks in Africa.

Why are our Armed Forces not offered to that country to beef up the park warden system so that they can protect a declining species? If action is not taken quickly, that species will be wiped out. Why are they not offered to protect the kind of damage that is being done in the rain forests in southeast Asia and in central South America? I think our Armed Forces could be used internally in some countries as police to assist in the maintaining of the natural environment. If we do not protect those elements of the natural environment, then all life on earth could be threatened.

If the Speaker will give me one final moment, I can recall reading a statement by Physicians for Social Responsibility that said there is something like 10 million cases of malaria in the world today, 1 million new cases are developed each year and 1 million people die of malaria each year. We could cure malaria. The cure is now available if we allocated what we spend on arms around the world in the space of two weeks. I think that the Government of Canada should make a commitment to stop spending on military purposes for two weeks and contribute that to an international pool because more people now are now dying of malaria than are dying in wars. They are the true victims of the next war. If we set aside that money and dedicated it to a cure for such diseases as malaria, I think we could save more lives than any other thing we could possibly do. I think Canada should commit itself to that kind of action world-wide which I think will be valuable to people of this generation and to future generations.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): It is a pleasure on behalf of the New Democratic Party Caucus to rise in this House to contribute to the debate. I would like to remind citizens of this country who are concerned about what this has done that there is a telephone number in the lobby here so that they can convey their thoughts to a member of Parliament. I urge them to call 613-996-7446. There are things that citizens must do in order to offset what the government has done so please call.

There are four short questions that I would like to deal with tonight and they are questions that Canadians are asking. How did we get into this mess? How do we get out of the mess? How do we prevent this situation in the future? What should be Canada's role in the future? How did we get into this mess? Without dwelling too long, this government has basically found it necessary to obligate itself completely to the United States.

A great deal of time has been spent by the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and members of the Conservative caucus on how great the Americans are as a trading partner with Canada. Many of us have relatives in the United States and very friendly ties with the people of the United States. Very often over this century the United States has taken a tactic in its foreign affairs that is completely abhorrent to what most Canadians believe to be correct.

But the Prime Minister, for whatever reasons, has decided not only to work with the United States, but to obligate himself in a very unhealthy and unwholesome way. That is the reason we are into war. There are those of us who believe that this special relationship must be paid for. Canada has a trade agreement with the United States and whether you agree with it or not, this government was absolutely committed to it. To maintain it I am sure that James Baker told the Prime Minister the night he arrived that: "if you wish to maintain that you will not only back us politically in the international attack on Iraq but you will in fact get blood on your hands." That was the price. It may have been even more. The fact that we can join the United States and Mexico at the table talking about an agreement may in fact be the price. There may be more that will be announced later. But unfortunately, this Prime Minister and this government have attempted to place Canada in a very subservient obligated role to the United States in this very disastrous act.

The Prime Minister and the government do not enjoy the confidence of Canadians. Eighty-eight per cent of Canadians continuously express disfavour with this government, no confidence. Fifty-five per cent of Canadians on the January 7 wanted no action for Canadians in a war against Iraq. That number is growing. The feeling is stronger and stronger. I am sure, now that Canadian Armed Forces have been committed to attacks on the Iraqi population, that number will grow astronomically. There will be no glory for this government, no glory for this Prime Minister or this country in the acts that are done. Canadian citizens will not support it. There has been a lot of talk about the Canadian Armed Forces. We, on this side of the House, feel that the Canadian Armed Forces need to be supported. They have been placed in an extremely precarious position. Many of us feel that that position is not morally right and that in fact we feel the best kind of support for them and for their families is to withdraw immediately. This is not our war. This is not our kind of action. Our Armed Forces have a far better role to play.

How do we get out of this war? Many Canadians are asking that question on the phones tonight. The government has to attempted to rationalize to the people of Canada in as strong a voice as it can—every member of cabinet, the Prime Minister, and every other member who has spoken in this House—why we need to join with the United States and attack Iraq, why we have to commit our Armed Forces in an offensive way to kill Iraqis. The rationale is extremely weak.

There are probably now close to two billion people, with the assets of almost all of the developed world aimed at a nation of 17 million people. The sanctions would have stifled them. The price of rice is $42 a kilogram and rising. It has gone up 90 times. Soon Iraqis will not be able to eat if those conditions continue. Certainly, their armed forces could not continue. The production of oil and the obtaining foreign currency would be virtually impossible.

How do we get out of it? We simply ask the Prime Minister to end Canadian involvement in the war, to withdraw the troops from actively attacking Iraqis.

My colleague from Comox—Alberni made a very reasoned suggestion that the government could use the troops that are there for containment. Why allow an attack outside the borders of Iraq? Why not contain the theatre of war? That is a reasonable suggestion and a reasonable role. We have effective, well trained members.

I am very upset that this government and our Armed Forces have not begun planning for the mission to take place as soon as the bombs stop and the guns go silent. What about our involvement in rescue and reconstruction? More people could likely die in the aftermath of the war with the chaos, the disease, the lack of sustenance, and the exposure that could happen. We have the talent, the capability, and the resources within our Armed Forces to deliver enormous aid. Down the road, Iraqis may in fact see us as friends again and trust us if we were to play that role. We may be individuals who are welcomed as citizens of the world in that part of the world if we offer a helping hand.

That is not going on right now. That has been confirmed by the Armed Forces. I would honestly like to hear the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and the Minister of National Defence saying that they have heard messages from the opposition and have plans in place for rescue and reconstruction the minute the bombs stop. We will join with Japan and other nations committed to that route as their contribution in this very unfortunate conflict.

What do we do to prevent this situation? How do we get out of the war? I am more and more convinced that we cannot do anything more in this House of Commons. The motion, as has been pointed out, is now irrelevant. The debate has largely been members thinking on their feet of what can be done.

Many people in this House have come to some conclusions. There is no point in having a vote. There is no point in continuing the debate much longer. The government has made up its mind and the opposition has made up its mind. The citizens of Canada can find a vehicle. Peace groups, church groups, labour and business organizations, and community support groups can join together in a committee to stop the war at a local level, at regional level, and at the national level. Such a committee representing the entire community can approach the government and the Prime Minister and place enormous political pressure asking the government to end Canadian involvement but not stop there. Ending Canadian involvement means becoming reinvolved in the traditional way that Canadians have been involved before and reorganizing the approach of the Armed Forces to rescue, rehabilitation and construction. We can also become involved in containment, the blockade, and the sanctions as a continuing measure until a peace treaty and co-operation can be developed. Many roles can be played, other than an offensive attack on the Iraqi people.

Such a committee to end the war in Canada can then extend its efforts to assist committees in the United States to stop George Bush and stop the American armed forces from bombing this country back into the stone age and from the enormous casualties that will accrue from a land war in that country. A committee to stop the war can spread out to smaller countries or other medium sized countries such as the Nordic countries. They are not in this combat, killing Iraqis. They are looking at offering far more constructive ideas than Canada. It could discuss joining with those nations and asking them to co-operate in stopping the war.

This could happen on a much broader scale. If and when that war stops, when Canada makes a nobler contribution than we make today, the committee could become involved in attempting to motivate politically whoever forms this government and the next government that follows to prevent Canada from having dirty hands in this business. We are a substantial seller of arms and equipment in the world, which sustains armed forces of governments that are absolutely abhorrent to our way of life.

What is going on in Central America is completely disgusting. We should be influencing the United States to try to clean its hands of the blood it has gathered there over the years. El Salvador involved 80,000 people. In Guatemala, in Honduras, and throughout Latin America the CIA has operated for years, supporting dictators, supporting torture, supporting death squads. There has been enormous devastation. Very rarely do we hear a critical word on the government side of the House concerning that issue.

Canada's committee should stop this war and look at stopping future wars. Canada should not have dirty hands. We should never again get involved in attacking somebody. Down the road, we should look at how we can enhance our contribution to making this a safer and a more humanitarian world in which to live. That would be the image and the face that Canada should present to the world.

On the issue of sanctions and collective security, it strikes me that Canada has become an expert in the area of peacekeeping. Canadian Armed Forces members have placed themselves in a dangerous position between belligerents. Over the years, they have become experts in monitoring the flow of arms and in winning the confidence of both sides so both sides would accept the peacekeeping responsibility.

Maybe we will have to move into a new generation of contribution to the world community. I think we have the talent, the commitment, the courage, and the expertise to do that. In the business of sanctions, an interesting role for Canada would be to develop, through our diplomatic channels and the use of our Canadian Armed Forces, mechanisms to enhance the use of sanctions. When we have a peacekeeping situation, we cannot get in between belligerents in a hot war, but once they decide they want to stop shooting and they need a neutral force to stabilize the area, possibly an unarmed force to stabilize the area, Canadians are able to execute those diplomatically, maintain the diplomatic context in which that must happen, separate the belligerents, stop arms flow, and generally contribute in a very positive way.

If we were to do the same thing with sanctions, we should encourage nations around the boundary of a country that has had sanctions imposed on it to co-operate in support of the world community. With our diplomatic initiatives, if we are trusted and we are seen as a nation that can be trusted, we may in fact be able to win the co-operation which the United States, Israel or other nations with blood on their hands cannot do. We may be able to do that.

We can develop the expertise for monitoring the flow of goods on which there is an attempted interdiction. We could develop those techniques and develop expertise in making sanctions work so that nations do not have to resort to armed forces. Outlaw nations could be brought to the table before there is a resort to massive bloodshed.

The role that Canadians could play, not only in peacekeeping, could be a very forward looking one in which Canadians could become experts at operating sanctions. Canada is a trusted nation, a nation without blood on its hands and without an axe to grind but with a major history of contribution to the world community behind it. Canada has a willingness to foster peace and the friendship of nations through means other than resorting to violence.

Perhaps I would like to apologize to the hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte for the disruptions I caused in the points of order at the beginning of the evening. I think it was an expression of the kinds of frustrations that have developed here. I regret that. Over the course of the evening I have appreciated the contributions of all colleagues who have spoken. The thinking on their feet by everyone here has left us with a fresh crop of constructive ideas to use in going forward. We felt frustration over the difficulty of this government in giving credence to the opposition in any way, shape, or form. Certainly it has had a great deal of difficulty in terms of any modification of its position.

I accept that it has taken the decision to attack Iraq. It is going to defend it to the end of its caucus, and that is fine. It is over. There is no point in a debate continuing on this motion or a vote. I think we in the opposition have to move forward together, bind Canadians together, and pressure the government to politically change its position.

It has been a very useful exercise and one that will lead to something very positive.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I came into this House somewhat despondent, depressed, saddened, and sickened by what was happening in the world today.

Over the last half hour or so, since the member for Saskatoon—Dundurn gave out the phone number of the opposition lobby, I have been involved finally in participatory democracy. I have been thrilled to be able to talk to people from all across Canada who are phoning in, on their dime, to tell us as parliamentarians what they think.

I would like to give them a voice right now in the House of Commons before I start into my remarks. I spoke to a gentleman from Calgary, Alberta who said he was still up and thrilled to watch the debates in the House of Commons, especially the members of the opposition. He was disappointed in the government's position, but he said that because of what he had heard from the members of the opposition he had confidence in Canada. He thought members of the opposition were showing a good deal of leadership in this debate.

I took a call from a woman from Victoria who said there were three in her family who were totally disheartened. She said it was a damned shame that Canada was in this war.

A gentleman from Tillsonburg, Ontario, said that he was frustrated members of Parliament were forced to toe party lines. He wished people in Canada could have a say. I am pleased to give him that opportunity today to have his say in the House of Commons.

Further, I took a call from a gentleman in Montreal who said he was disheartened by the government's approach to the Middle East situation and that he was sickened by the whole thing. I share that with him.

Before I go on to the next person, I would like to give that number out again. It is 613-996-7446. We have members of Parliament waiting on the lines to take calls.

Another person from Vancouver phoned and said that his position was that we should remain as non-aggressive, that we had to stay in the area and remain in a role of aiding, not in a role of attacking.

A woman from Toronto said that she was opposed to the Canadians being in the gulf and getting involved in the war. She felt and wished that they were peacemakers.

A woman just phoned me prior to my coming into the House from Calgary, Alberta. She said that she had not been able to sleep since this war started. She is worried about Canada being in the war. She said tonight that before her grandchildren went to bed they lit candles for peace. She would like us to reach that peace, a lasting peace.

Those are some of the comments of people from across Canada. That number again is 613-996-7446. We appreciate the calls from across Canada.

The motion before the House should be set out in my remarks. Once again, it is:

> That this House reaffirms its support of the United Nations in ending the aggression by Iraq against Kuwait.

Let us not make any mistake about what we are in fact debating in this House of Commons right now. We are debating whether Canada should be involved in the war in the Middle East. We are debating whether Canada should be taking an aggressive role in that war. That is what we are debating.

There is no doubt about it. Every member in this House of Commons and people across Canada have always supported the United Nations in its peacekeeping role. Over the last 45 years we in Canada have been proud of our Canadian forces and their role in the United Nations and in the world as peacekeepers and peacemakers. That has changed now, as of a couple of days ago, with Canada's role in the Middle East.

That is very disappointing to me. I was born just prior to the end of the Second World War and I have watched Canada build that reputation. I remember being in the United Nations Club when I was in high school and hearing guest speakers talk about the sleeping giant on the world scene. That was prior to the days, or around the time, I suppose, when Lester Pearson won his Nobel Peace Prize for his initiatives in the Middle East, in the Suez Canal crisis. I thought, as a young Canadian, that I could be proud of my country taking that position. This was a position that all Canadians could be proud of. All of our military and service people could be proud of their part in the world or global scene.

I was greatly saddened when I heard the sabre-rattling of the Bush administration and within hours I heard the sabre-rattling of our own government. That was not the Canada that I knew. That was not the Canada that I had become proud to be a part of. That was not a Canada that the people in my riding were telling me that they were proud of. Taking such an aggressive role in a military situation was totally foreign to me as a person born and raised in Canada. I was unused to that role. I still feel very uncomfortable with the role of Canada as an attacking nation. It is a role that I feel is untenable to all of us as Canadians.

Just prior to Christmas I visited a number of classrooms throughout the riding of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, in Penticton, Oliver, Osoyoos, from grade 5 right up to grade 12. At that stage I was being asked questions such as the following ones. Why are we doing this? Are we going to be drafted? Is this going to lead to a third world war? What will be left of the world? Will they use the atomic bomb?

We have been told that we are fear-mongers for even talking about this, but these implements of war are present in the world. We would be ostriches with our heads in the sand if we did not approach and answer the questions. I wish I had the answers. I wish I could assure these children that there would not be a major conflagration, that this is a very localized war. I wish I believed that myself, but I fear greatly for all the world when I see the type of weaponry involved in this conflict and watch what has happened in Iraq and in Israel over the last couple of days.

The fire power is there to destroy the world we know. I cannot make light of that. I do not want to have a part in that. I want to go back to a world in which I can feel comfortable raising my two daughters. When I leave home to return to Ottawa and have a 12-year old ask me if there is some other way than flying, it touches me in a small way, but that small way is substantially smaller than how it is touching the people who are actually present in the conflict in the Middle East. Can we imagine what it is like being in Baghdad right now or Tel Aviv or Jerusalem, not knowing what is going to happen, not knowing whether in fact there is going to be chemicals and chemical warfare? My heart goes out to the people who are involved in this conflict.

I am not the only one who is concerned. Prior to the recent situation I received a number of letters and a number of calls. By far the majority of them, as with the calls I have earlier read into my remarks, is against a position of aggression by Canada.

The resolution sent to the Prime Minister by the city of Grand Forks, in the boundary country in my riding, says a lot of how the people in my riding think. I will read it into the record:

> The council for the city of Grand Forks unanimously pass the following resolution:
> Bearing in mind Canada's traditional policy of supporting the United Nations and cognizant of Canada's international reputation as a peacekeeper and aware of our responsibilities regarding the welfare and security of our citizenry as municipal legislators, the Council of the Corporation of the City of Grand Forks in open meeting assembled beseeches the government of the Prime Minister Brian Mulroney to exercise patience and restraint with respect to the commitment of Canadian forces to the current conflict in the Persian Gulf and urges the Government of Canada to spare no effort to effect a peaceful resolution of the present crisis and to establish, within the framework of the United Nations, lasting peace, justice and security in the region.

On behalf of the citizens of Grand Forks, their mayor takes the opportunity to urge the Prime Minister and the Government of Canada to consider this community's position regarding the role of the Canadian forces in the Persian Gulf. Some of the remarks and the resolution of the city of Grand Forks are reflected in some of the letters I have received. A letter from North Vancouver reads:

> Please consider, before committing Canada to war, every other possible censure and weapon against Hussein. So far, my impression of the international military response is that this is some form of military party, that no wants wants to miss.

He goes on in another paragraph and says:

> Don't let the majority of Parliament rubber stamp the decision without honest debate; our Parliament has been (almost unanimously) tragically wrong in the past. On February 25, 1941, Angus MacInnis was the only MP to speak out against repressive measures against the Japanese. And we all know how wrong that decision was.

A woman from Summerland, British Columbia in my riding, writes:

> I am an old woman and have lived through two terrible world wars, but realize that they were very small as compared with what will happen if we keep on this ridiculous way of dealing with the present situation.

A letter to the Secretary of State for External Affairs from Kaleden, British Columbia in my riding, reads:

> It is time our leaders realized that Canada is in a position to be a peace negotiator. We do not always have to follow the lead of the United States. We can be the country that leads towards finding creative, non-destructive methods to solve our differences. We can be the country that finds a peaceful end to this crisis.

I echo the words spoken by this couple in Kaleden, British Columbia. I agree that we can be that catalyst which brings about peace if we have the will.

In further remarks from a woman in Penticton, she states:

> Rather than be pushed by the United States to the brink of war, cannot we take the lead in striving for a peaceful solution? Canada has always gained world-wide respect as a peace seeking nation.

In the final paragraph she says:

> There must be a solution to solving world crises other than by going to war, resulting in the death of thousands of innocent people and leaving to mourn countless parents, widows and fatherless children.

Finally, the Penticton United Church of Canada has written a letter to the Prime Minister. I would like to read part of it. It indicates:

> Should war take place, the innocent civilian population, from infants to elders, will be subjected to mass slaughter. Those who survive will live through miseries we can barely imagine, in a land laid waste. Are we willing to deal with the increasing flood of refugees, physically or mentally maimed, that would result? If we support war, we must also take responsibility for the results of war. We do not believe our government has considered this.
> When we watch or listen to the media, we realize that a "war fever" has been building. The almost hysterical reaction of many is not only terrifying, but shows we have learned little from the past. Painting war in glorious colours has not yet been replaced by sober consideration. What would we be defending here? Certainly not democracy. And no nation should risk a bloody altercation over the availability of oil and gasoline.
> Because of modern weaponry, including chemical and nuclear attack, war, no matter how limited to start with, has terrifying potential to engulf all nations and perhaps the planet itself. War has become obsolete as an acceptable method of settling international disputes.

He beseeches the Prime Minister and urges that the government reconsider its strategy and press for peace by all possible alternative action.

These remarks of various people throughout the province of British Columbia, mainly within my riding, are ones that I could not have written better. That is why I have chosen to give those people a voice within Parliament tonight, as I have tried to give to the people who have phoned in a voice. I will tell the people who have been trying to phone in to keep up their calls. If there is no answer when they call, we ask them to keep calling. The number again is 613-996-7446.

To Shirly McKee from Penticton, I appreciate your call of support earlier this evening. We do appreciate those calls from all of you letting us know what your thoughts are on this most important matter and to give you, the people of Canada, a voice in the House of Commons through us, the members of the New Democratic Party. So keep the calls coming.

I would just like to wind up with a couple of extra comments that bring home to me why Canada should pursue, together with the United Nations, some common solutions to this conflict through international diplomatic co-operation. The Government of Canada must take the necessary steps to promote an international peace conference on the Middle East to start achieving common security. Without that common security we have little hope for the security of our children into the future. Most of all, that is what I want. I want to leave Parliament at the end of my term knowing that I have not failed as a politician, that I have not been part of leading this country into a conflagration. I want to be able to say that I have had a part in creating world-wide peace.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, at 5.30 in the morning, Eastern Standard Time, I had managed to catch a few winks during the night while the other eye was switching between the parliamentary channel and the news channel in an attempt to keep track of the events unfolding in the wee small hours of the morning.

Certainly, the news from the last few hours has been more than a little distressing. I could not help but think what is taking place is not really surprising, because once the genie is out of the bottle, then no one is in control. The politicians are not in control. The generals are not in control. The people are not in control. No one is in control; everything is out of control.

Once Saddam Hussein let the genie out of the bottle in August last year and once George Bush and the coalition made the decision to open active hostilities a few days ago and commence their action, the genie was released once again. So now we have two genies floating around and the situation is doubly out of control.

With the second launching of missiles towards the State of Israel, we are all waiting with bated breath. There is little we can do but wait to see if the remarkable restraint shown by that state last night can be repeated. I think the preponderance of opinion is that it is not likely to be able to show that same degree of restraint again for a multitude of reasons.

If that should happen, the hostilities that now exist between the partners of the coalition on one side and the State of Iraq on the other may well be twisted, turned, and broadened so that some of the allies become opponents and a set of factors move and take on their own momentum, which may result in a conflagration covering the entire Middle East area of a nature that all of us, throughout the world, must surely shudder to consider. That is what happens once the genie is out of the bottle.

In the debate that has taken place over the last few days and certainly in the hours of last night and this morning, a few thoughts struck me. One is that we cannot pretend that what has happened has not happened. Whatever our recollection and interpretation of history, we cannot rewrite it and we cannot change it. We have to start from where we are; we cannot go back and try again, as much as we would like to. So while we may wish to recall certain events to see what we can learn from our mistakes, in order to try not to repeat them in the future, we cannot change them. We are still making mistakes but maybe it is not too late to correct some of them.

It is said by some that Saddam Hussein is a madman, a lunatic. That has been repeated many times in this House. Maybe he is, but, unfortunately, his is not a unique kind of lunacy. I am sure that a number of members will recall the lunatic theory espoused by Henry Kissinger and Richard Nixon in Mr. Kissinger's book on Vietnam and Cambodia. The theory was, and I will just try to paraphrase it briefly, that if you persuade your enemy that you are a lunatic or will act in a lunatic manner without regard to consequences, then your opponent may fail to put you to the test out of fear of an irrational or lunatic response and then you win. Was Henry Kissinger a lunatic? Was Richard Nixon a lunatic? Is Saddam Hussein a lunatic?

It is like the allegorical story that was repeated on television a few weeks ago by David Suzuki, the story of two drivers playing chicken. If you really want to win, the story went, you throw away your steering wheel and destroy your brakes. The theory is, when the other guy knows you cannot turn away, he will chicken out and you will win the game. The catch is, what happens if your opponent does not know or does not believe or, even worse, he has thrown away his steering wheel as well. We know what will happen and it just did. It happened on August 2, 1990 and it happened again this January. There are no winners and depending on what happens in the next few hours, we may all be losers and very serious losers.

I listened with a great deal of interest to some of the debate tonight, and one of the lines I wanted to pursue was pursued in a great deal of depth by a colleague not of my own party, the member of Parliament for Ottawa South. It was a very well developed argument on the changing nature of power structures in the world today and the lessons that we, perhaps, ought to draw from them. I am not going to go on at length. I would recommend to anybody in the nation that his remarks were very much worth reading.

One of the phrases he used concerning the current situation and the current action undertaken a few days ago was, and I think I am quoting him correctly: "The wrong action at the wrong time by the wrong force." That was at 10.15 last evening Eastern Standard Time. One of the things that concerns me, because of the way things were done a few days ago, is that we have wasted an opportunity to do things right. We could have set up a United Nations operation and command in a way and a manner that would pave the way for effective and acceptable peacekeeping and peacemaking in the post cold war world. The checks and balances of the balance of terror are gone. While it makes many of us very uncomfortable I am also glad that they are gone.

I am sure many Canadians will recall the days in 1962 when those of us who were leaving work on a particular evening when the threats of the Cuba missile crisis were heavy, said goodbye to each other in a different way than we usually do because none of us knew if we were going to be coming back the next morning. The buses home after work that day were very silent. The difference is that most of us in most of the world are reasonably assured that whatever happens, most of us will be seeing each other the next day and that is refreshing. There are no longer two people in the world with their fingers on the big button. That, in itself, presents new and very real dangers.

We must begin to construct new mechanisms, hopefully through the United Nations, which can deal with matters of aggression and major violations of human rights and national rights. The world is dominated by a single superpower which has not demonstrated that it is the most responsible force on the face of this earth. This is little if any more acceptable or welcome than the regime of the balance of terror from which we are now emerging.

A lot of silly things has been said in this debate on both sides of the House. I hope I will not add to their number. The present conflict did not start in January of this year. It started last August. There are members on both sides of the House who appear to sound so virtuous and self-righteous that all they do is enrage others and increase the level of mutual intolerance of which there is enough already, both here in Canada and throughout the world.

The motion before us reads:

> That this House reaffirms its support of the United Nations in ending the aggression by Iraq against Kuwait.

The New Democratic Party asks that this be a free vote for very good and valid reasons. The government said no but it is free for us. The government and its spokesperson have made it clear that it would interpret a yes vote as support for their policy and that I cannot support, and it is not a cop-out. But neither can I vote against a motion that says what this motion actually says. That only leaves me one other option and that is to abstain. That is not something I care to do. But because of what I regard as the mischievous attempt to manipulate this House of Commons by this kind of phraseology and this kind of interpretation, it leaves me no other course.

However imperfect the design of the current United Nations sanctioned policy is, the only hope for the future lies in a subsequent formation, perhaps for later conflicts, of a permanent UN command that can act reasonably quickly in later phases of this conflict or, more likely, in future actual or potential conflicts. That is the only hope for freedom, justice and peace in the single superpower world in which we are now located for better or worse.

I do not kid myself that a single superpower will agree to be bound by the same rules that apply to the rest of us any more than these rules applied to two superpowers. That is not the way superpowers behave. We have to work slowly and methodically to expand the application and acceptance of this kind of genuine international action because international action must be governed and managed. It must not be merely international in name or it will never be accepted and will never be effective over the long haul. That is the only hope for the future and we have to start now.

The conflict in which we have been engaged since last August and since early this week is a tragedy. We can only hope that it will be brought to a conclusion soon without a wider war and with a minimum loss of life on the part of all concerned. We must move soon to bring the nations of the Middle East to the peace conference table and work to construct stable and secure nations and stable and secure boundaries in that area.

Any of us who lived through the period of the last 40 or 50 years recognize that the Jewish people in the State of Israel had to have a homeland. But because of the duplicity of the British war office and the British foreign office in the early part of this century when the same lands were promised to two different peoples, we have had a continuing problem that is a running sore which threatens the peace not only of that region, but of the world.

Any of us who witnessed the events prior to and during World War II will know that we in Canada as well as the rest of the world are guilty. When Jewish people from Germany and Europe were attempting to find a place to go, we all shut our doors. Their desire and necessity for a homeland was understandable.

No matter how evil the State of Israel has acted on many occasions in recent years—and it has, despite some of their origins and despite some of the earlier beliefs, they have adopted many of the same ethics and practices that their oppressors practised during World War II upon them. We still have to understand what made them what they are. We must also find some way that the Palestinians can be secure in a homeland of their own, while allowing some secure and stable boundaries of at least the original State of Israel. We must begin to build a Middle East that has something of lasting value. We must have some hope that that region will not tear itself apart to the detriment of all of us. As there often are in the world there are two rights and two wrongs. We must take the opportunity that surely will come when this immediate conflict concludes to assist in drawing all the parties together and provide whatever assistance and assurances we can to try to build some long-term security for all of the peoples of the Middle East.

We heard the remarks of the member for Saint-Denis earlier today. They were passionate, serious and deserved an audience. I trust that when he makes his major address he will repeat some of them. I also listened to the former premier of British Columbia, the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca. Like the member for Saint-Denis, I was impressed by the obvious feeling and the knowledge of that member as he attempted to describe some of the events that had taken place and some of his hopes and his fears for that region and for the world.

This is not a simple issue and I have never pretended to have all the answers. I hope I know some of the right questions. But I am sure the people of this country are committed to attempting to build an international world order and international mechanisms that can be trusted and can be respected. I only hope that the actions which this government has been a party to over the period of the last few weeks and months will not prevent us and the rest of the world from constructing such a mechanism. That is my hope and my prayer. I am sure that the majority of the people of my own area and I hope the majority of the people of Canada will agree with me on it.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, it is approaching six o'clock in the morning. Some of us have been here since ten o'clock yesterday morning. I feel more vigorous than if I just got up.

I have been here 27 years. I do not consider this a Conservative issue. It is not an NDP issue. It is not a Liberal issue. I will say in English and French it is not a Quebec issue. I am Catholic, a strong believer, but this is not a Catholic issue. This is a moral issue. I never believed that after 27 years in this House people would start to understand. I really liked what the hon. member has just said. It prompts me to make a short comment. At long last we are addressing the real issue. We are going back to the causes of the problem of today.

I will repeat again, even to the point of maybe embarrassing my friend and colleague from British Columbia, the member for Epquimalt—Jean de Fuca. He is not in my party. He does not speak my language. He is not from my religion. Yet he made an unbelievably moving speech. He asks what is wrong. It was a very ordinary speech. It was not because it was important, a deeply felt speech.

When we want to solve a problem, it is not enough to govern.

[Translation]

You have to anticipate. You have to have vision. You cannot push people around. You cannot humiliate them. You cannot torture them and expect them to take it forever. However, it would be so easy.

[English]

That is what the member is prompting me to say. It would be so easy. I do not understand. People see it as so difficult, and I see it as so easy. I must be at fault. I must be totally wrong. I see it as an easy way. It is a question of respecting people regardless of skin colour, religion, rich and poor, black or anything. Just as long as you breath.

We are all the sons and daughters of the same God, because there is a God. That God today is looking at us and saying: "They are my children. Are they not intelligent enough to make peace with each other instead of killing each other? Are we so deprived of grey matter that we are totally unable to find solutions?

I want to thank the member because I do not feel alone any more when I talk about the Palestinians, and peace between Israel and the Palestinians. I have given 26 years of my life to conferences. In my party, I have been pushed and pressured. The pressure is still going on at this late hour this morning to ask us to vote in favour of this motion.

The pressure is by powerful people I respect, but I do not give in easily and I will not. I hope my colleagues will reflect. We will listen to the other speeches, but I really am so full of energy suddenly because I see so many people who realize that yes, maybe we should have paid more attention to that part of the world.

It could be exploding. The news is not good. It will not be a macho Stallone style of war where we go in, clean up and that is it. No. The hate is profound. I do not want Canada to be hated. We have no reason to be hated, because people love us. They think of us in ways that even we do not know ourselves. We should kiss the floor everywhere we go in this country of ours.

Everybody likes Canada. Sometimes I really wonder if we deserve it.

Mr. Kristiansen: Mr. Speaker, again I find myself for about the third or fourth time in the last 15 hours touched by the comments of the member.

It is not necessarily germane to this particular debate that we have tonight, but I just want to say that it does renew one's faith in this business in which we are engaged to see someone who has been involved for as many years—I say that in a respectful way—as the hon. member for Saint—Denis. He still has that degree of enthusiasm, commitment and belief that something can be done. It is a business that sometimes increases the level of cynicism—it is almost certain to—but to maintain that degree of passion and commitment is something welcome to behold.

Leaving that aside, the one further comment I would like to add to what I have already said is that there are many things I did not say because my colleagues and other members touched on them, particularly the reputation of that great superpower to our south. I do not feel comfortable in that kind of single superpower world any more than I did in the two superpower world that preceded it.

Even though I am uncomfortable with that, the evil that was done by one nation to another last August, the occupation of Kuwait, and what happened in Kuwait since that invasion and that transgression, the catalogue of infamy that took place in Kuwait, as recorded by Amnesty International and other observers, almost made the record of the Nazi invasion and occupation of Denmark—a history with which I am somewhat acquainted—pale in significance. That was a civilized invasion and occupation compared to what happened there. I cannot forgive that, but neither can I forgive an action that threatens to blow up that whole area and cause it to move back into the dark ages and remove perhaps any chance we have to reconstruct a stable, secure, and just order in that portion of the world. That is the fear I have and that is why we have to find some way to get those two genies back in the bottle.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, before I begin my remarks, I want to commend our brave young people in the armed service who are currently carrying out the policy of the government of the day in the Persian Gulf. This debate is not about them directly. It is about the decision by the government to commit them to war.

I would like to make my position very clear today. I am opposed to Canadian offensive participation in the gulf war for three reasons. First, I would prefer to see Canada play a significant humanitarian and diplomatic role, rather than a symbolic offensive military role that may restrain our future ability to play an active role to bring about peace in the Middle East.

Throughout the night as this debate is taking place, we are receiving phone calls from across Canada. We are urging people to phone in with their concerns to area code 613-996-7446, to express their concerns. I know there are many people out there who feel as devastated as I do by what is taking place.

I believe that other avenues at least had the potential to bring Saddam Hussein to his knees. I will not commit my vote to a war until I, as a member of Parliament, am convinced that no other options exist. I would like to remind the House that the New Democratic Party did not support the headlong rush into war represented by and I Security Council resolution 678.

As we debated that resolution, we talked about our concerns about a deadline and how it would be seen and would be effective. Throughout that debate, the government kept insisting that that was only a date and that we could continue sanctions. It did not mean that war would break out at that date. Less than 14 hours after that date came about, Canada was at war.

I want to say how devastated I was when I heard that, after hearing the comments from the Prime Minister and from the Secretary of State for External Affairs every day as we questioned them in the House with regard to sanctions and asked them for proof that they were not working. Not one single time did the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Prime Minister put forward any concrete evidence to the House that these sanctions were not working. They kept telling us that the sanctions would continue and that it did not necessarily mean that we would be going to war.

We voted against that resolution. I had hoped and prayed that I would not have to come into the House and say what I am going to say at this moment and that is, we told you so. The Prime Minister, the Secretary of State, and the members of the government who voted for that resolution have now got the conscience 14 hours after the deadline of putting Canada at war.

There is a fundamental question that all members of the House have to ask. . . as they formulate their position. We are all appalled by the brutality of the Iraq invasion and the occupation and the suffering of the people of Kuwait. But what is the trade-off? Would seven or ten more months of sanctions, sanctions that many experts felt had a good possibility of working, be a fair trade-off for what may be the loss of hundreds of thousands of lives? The answer I could arrive at is yes. The risk of sanctions not working was preferable to the risks of war. The uncertainty of sanctions working is no less than the uncertainty of where this war could take the world.

What is the most appropriate role for Canada? I would like to take the opportunity to expand on each of my three points. There are many countries that strongly oppose Iraq which are not playing an offensive military role in the gulf. There are many countries that have contributed to all the military build-up in the gulf which strongly oppose Saddam Hussein and have abided by that UN sponsored programs and sanctions. It is very important to consider the question of why some countries support the United Nations have chosen to become involved in this war in an offensive manner and why some have hesitated. It is fair to assume that each country's decision is based on an evaluation of tradition, capability, history, and its perception of what the best course of action is.

Our government has decided that the act of military engagement is the best and most appropriate of action. I fundamentally disagree with it. I believe that Canada has a tradition: a view of war as the last possible resort. I must say that this is a tradition that differs from that of our neighbours' to the south.

There has a been a lot said about the role played by Lester Pearson in developing this tradition. This precedent has served us so well and I, too, would like to acknowledge his enormous contribution.

I too, would like to acknowledge the vital role played by John Diefenbaker during the Cuban missile crisis, because I believe it is important to point out the non-partisan history of our Canadian experience. Mr. Diefenbaker could have enthusiastically backed the military effort of the U.S., but he insisted that Canada would make military decisions on its own and only as a last resort. Mr. Diefenbaker could have committed Canada to participating in the U.S. sponsored trade embargo against Cuba, but he did not.

Through his actions, Mr. Diefenbaker said forcefully and courageously that Canada, although it agreed about the threat posed by missiles in Cuba, would make its own military decisions.

Canada has a tradition of military caution and of looking for non-military solutions to conflict. I believe this current government has broken with this tradition.

The next question, and one I think all members who opposed the government's decision have a responsibility to answer is: What should Canada's role be?

I suggest the number of actions that should be considered, including the use of our military personnel for what could be best described as humanitarian roles, such as medical personnel, refugee and relief operations, and the preparation for possible peacekeeping operations following the war.

Canada should also be pursuing a very resolute and non-combatant diplomatic effort, as we did in Vietnam.

I must say that I do recognize the efforts made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs prior to the start of the hostilities. I do appreciate the fact that he has allowed Iraq diplomatic representation to remain in Canada. But what happens if Jordan, Syria, Iran, or Yemen join the battle against our allies? Who is going to be in a position to negotiate? Who will be able to lead a diplomatic initiative if the whole region goes to war?

I believe that an active military role by Canada will end any chance of Canada filling this essential role and, frankly, I fear it will reduce our options to simply increasing our military commitment to fight other enemies.

In returning to my second point, the abandoning of sanctions, I would like to point to the experts who have offered the opinion that sanctions are working. Senator George Mitchell, Senator Wellstone, former Chairman of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff Admiral William Crow, Georgetown economist and sanctions expert, Dr. Gary Hufbauer, and the list goes on and on. These people say that sanctions had—and I use the past tense—a reasonable chance to achieve their objectives.

Many of my colleagues from the Liberal and Conservative parties have said that this issue is now irrelevant, that sanctions are dead. It is clear there is some twisted logic at work when people, who three days ago said that we must stay the course with sanctions, now say that they support offensive actions in a war they did not support.

It was a mistake by the allies to go to war three days ago. It was a mistake by our government to support the January 15 deadline. It was a mistake to give up on sanctions and the policies that all agreed were hurting Iraq. It is an horrendous mistake to argue that because war has started it is now right to support an offensive role by Canada.

It is obvious that we will not know the casualty totals for some time, but no one would argue that if this war goes on the death total could reach into the hundreds of thousands. That is what war really is, death and destruction.

What is the cost of 100,000 lives? One month? Two months? Three months? I cannot pretend to know that answer. But I can say this, it is more than five months and that is all that we gave sanctions time to work.

I will not—I cannot—vote to commit our brave young people to fighting a war that our politicians have not taken the time to resolve. This is the most important decision I have ever had to take in six years in the House. I will not vote for Canada's offensive participation in a war just because it has already started.

In finishing, I would like to restate the fact that the New Democratic Party warned against supporting the deadline because of the fear that the exact scene we are seeing today, an unnecessary early war, would happen. That is what we are faced with. The fact that the worst has happened is not enough to force me to vote for war.

Before I conclude, I would like to read into the record a few letters and petitions that I have received from my riding regarding this very sad and dreadful decision we have made.

This first letter is addressed to me, with copies to the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It was dated January 16 and is from constituents in Fernie, British Columbia. It states:

> Dear Mr. Parker,
> The only heartening thing within the events of the last days has been the strong, sane position of the New Democratic Party and Audrey McLaughlin's forceful statements of that position. The failure of the United Nations to find a peaceful solution is an enormous setback to the establishment of lasting world peace. Canada should not back the United Nations in their erroneous decision. We are extremely angry at our elected government committing our country, our friends, and our family to war. We can only hope that all Canadian young people will understand the insanity and immorality of war.

I have another letter from a constituent in Grasmere, British Columbia addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Leader of the Opposition, the Leader of the NDP, the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway, and myself. It states:

> Dear Sirs,
> With all of my mind and being, I object to Canada's involvement in the gulf situation to further maximize profits for multinational corporations. An economy based on an arms race and war is an unforgivable failure of our government's foresight and leadership.

Truth and non-violence are timeless. One can never cease to be amazed that so many continue to passively accept the anxieties and crumbs handed down from an affluent society to gamble off lives in applying the ultimate sacrifice in unbearable pain and suffering.

• (0620)

I also have a petition from 65 residents of Cranbrook, British Columbia dated January 16, and I am not going to read off all the names. It states:

Dear Mr. Parker,

We are a group of concerned citizens in your constituency who strongly and proudly support your stand and your efforts for peace at this very crucial time.

We feel Canada's role in the world should be one of leadership in making and keeping peace. We, as Canadians, do not support aggressive military action as a way to stop, mend, or prevent aggressive actions of others.

We hope that you will continue to be adamant in this view and that Canada will accept and follow this view so that we will not be engaged in offensive action in the Middle East.

Before I sit down, I plead with the government, government members, and all members of the House of Commons to find a resolution to this deadly war and to bring about peace as quickly as possible so that there will be less suffering and less damage throughout the world.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Madam Speaker, I would like to point out that there have been numerous phone calls to parliamentarians tonight with people expressing their opinions on this, and I would urge those calls to continue to 613-996-7446.

The opinions of Canadians who have been flowing in here tonight have been incredible. The number of people who are awake and have said they cannot sleep since this thing has started, the suggestions that have come in over the phone, and the absolute commitment are enormous.

The one thing I want to raise with the hon. member and every other hon. member is the problem with the action of the Prime Minister—an individual who enjoys the antipathy of 88 per cent of Canadians and the hostility of the majority of Canadians—and his cabinet declaring a state of war with Iraq.

It has been said that nobody, individually or collectively in a small group, should be allowed to make war on behalf of Canadians. The suggestion has been that there should be a division of power and some checks and balances in this matter. A vote of this House should be the only authority to declare a state of war to exist with another nation and to authorize the use of armed forces aggressively against them.

Would the hon. member support the concept that we members who support the idea that a Prime Minister and cabinet cannot make a decision to attack another nation offensively and to declare a state of war to exist, should go forward and put together a private member's Bill and seek to have every member of the House endorse it? It would see the power to declare a state of war removed from cabinet and the Prime Minister, and the only authority that could declare war on behalf of this country would be this House by a full vote of every member.

Would the hon. member support that proposition so that that we could move forward and this decision could not be made by a Prime Minister obligated to the United States, or a small group of Canadians called the cabinet could not make that decision?

We are not talking about defensive action. We are talking about aggressive action in a state of war. That would be decided by a full vote of the House. We should put together a private member's bill and attempt to sell that bill to every member of the House so that we never have to face an entrapment motion such as the one that has been placed before us in this situation.

Mr. Parker: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for the question. It is an excellent opportunity. This is one of the things I noted in the House as we started to debate this, as the tragedies unfolded, and as we were watching television. I heard and saw the devastation of each member on all sides of the House at the destruction and capabilities for it taking place out there.

I heard many of them talking to one another saying that decisions were being made by a half of the House.

Many of the people across Canada who voted for the government and for these positions gave their support to this side of the House. When a decision of this magnitude is made, that is the type of debate and those are the kinds of policies that should come forward so that when that decision is made, the total commitment of the Canadian people has been debated in a non-partisan way and in a very active way without any commitments of any kind to any other promises that may be made or deals that could be cut with other groups and so on. I am not taking about members of Parliament. I am talking about the kinds of discussions that take place between other countries and other groups in which we are not involved at any time.

I agree with the suggestion that was put forward. I would hope many politicians and many members will get together to try to bring about that kind of policy.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, first I have a comment.

The member from Powell River has given out a phone number, 613-996-7446. I want to tell the House that those of us who have been participating in this participatory democracy are thrilled at what has been happening. We have been taking calls from coast to coast. So far, to my knowledge, we have had none from Yukon or the Northwest Territories.

I would like to share with the House a comment from a woman in Edmonton who said that this is the first time in all her life—she was quite sincere about this—that she could say something that she felt would be heard. I have assured her that her voice would be heard in the House. She wondered how we had changed our role from one of a peacekeeper to one of a warmaker, and whether we were not simply now, through the government, being the echo of the Bush administration.

I would like to ask the member for Kootenay East the question that she posed to me. In the past and through the years, Canadians have been proud to hold their heads up high when they travelled internationally. They have always gone abroad and have been well respected in the Middle East, the east, and central European countries. Everywhere they have gone, they have worn the maple leaf with pride. Will we, through this, lose our respect in the international community? Would the hon. member respond to that woman from Edmonton?

I remind people that the number is 613-996-7446. Keep the calls coming.

Mr. Parker: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for the question.

It is a remarkable thing that here we are at 6.30 a.m. after a long debate throughout the night. Phone calls are coming in from across Canada expressing Canadians' concerns and desires for Canada to maintain a peaceful role and not an offensive role.

I believe we have lost our tradition. If we continue in this aggressive role, we are going to lose that tradition. But what is even more severe is the fact that, when this war is over and if we have participated in an offensive way, we will also lose the respect, dignity, and trust that we have had for many years as a country that is peaceful and does everything possible to find the avenues of peace.

Not only will we lose our trust as individuals, but as a country. We have worked so hard for that—and I am not going to be political here—not only under Liberal administrations, but also under Mr. Diefenbaker's administration. As I have stated in my speech, not only under the Liberal administration, but also under Diefenbaker's administration New Democrats for years have been known to be striving for peace and ways to maintain peace. I want to say that yes, our tradition as a peaceful nation and one that is respected world-wide is at stake. I would urge the government to reconsider its offensive role to get back to the role of peacemaking and find a solution so that we can get out of this horrible mess.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Madam Speaker, a number of us have referred to the resolution. I would like to do the same thing so that we will know just exactly what we are supposed to be discussing. It is very short:

> That this House reaffirms its support of the United Nations in ending the aggression by Iraq against Kuwait.

It has been said that it is a resolution that should give the New Democrats any difficulty because we have always been strong supporters and proponents of the United Nations. Had that been the end of the story, there is no doubt that we would have been supporting the resolution.

But, Madam Speaker, you and I were in the House. We heard the Secretary of State for External Affairs say on one occasion in response to a question that the government is not going to be bound by Security Council resolutions because they might make the wrong decision.

It was only after the Security Council passed the resolution that we are talking about that the government then said: "Well, that is our policy", because it reserved the right to go in Bush's direction if the Security Council was not prepared to go in that direction.

That is why we have trouble supporting this resolution. It is not really the United Nations, position. It is a position that was drafted by President Bush and his advisers. Again, Madam Speaker, you and I have had an opportunity to read the reports of how the President and his people were travelling around the world, calling in all the markers they had, to make sure that every one of the Security Council members supported their resolution. They pulled out all the stops and they got the support. That is not a decision freely arrived at by the Security Council as we see it.

To get to the discussion that we have had, I am not sure how many hours. We are now into the fourth day of it. One loses track of time. I heard someone say in one of the phone calls that they were having trouble sleeping. Some of us might be wondering just what that is. It is half an hour past my usual time of getting up. Like the hon. member for Saint-Denis, I feel more wide awake now than I did some 12 hours ago, so we will see how things go.

I have heard members on the government side of the House say we have to stop Hussein. They describe him with a 22-year record of brutality and terrorism in his own country, a person who has used chemical warfare against his own people, the enemy the people of Iraq have lived under for 22 years. If our motivation is truly one of concern for the people under Hussein's control, if we could wait for 22 years to pay any attention to it, why could we not have waited a few more months or even one more year, if that is what it would take for sanctions to work?

How many children in Baghdad or Tel Aviv or how many adults in or out of the armed services do we have to butcher or maim before we dare agree that it might have been better to have waited and given sanctions an opportunity to work. All the reports I heard were to the effect that the sanctions were working.

Even those who questioned them said that it was just a matter of time, that it could take as much as a year for them to work. We had already invested four and a half months in the sanctions, why not another of seven and a half months if it took that much, and let sanctions do the job that we are now trying to do by killing?

Some two hours after the news first broke I think it was at seven o'clock on January 16, a poem that I had memorized some 50 years ago and have not looked at, since, forgotten I suppose, came to mind. I attributed it in error to Mr. A.E. Houseman, when in fact it was written by Thomas Hardy. The third verse, as I recall it, goes something to this effect:

> Quaint and curious war is.
> You shoot a fellow down.
> You treat, if met when any bar is,
> Or help to half a crown.

War is quaint and curious. War must be mankind's greatest folly. War settle no problems. They exacerbate old ones and create new ones. They settle no problems. Wars are easy to start, but sometimes can be very difficult to stop.

This resolution states that we are working through the United Nations. This is a United Nations effort but, again, you know and I know that when President Bush talks about the war effort and when the Prime Minister of our country talks about the war effort, they talk about the allies. They talk about the coalition. They never talks about the United Nations force because it is not a United Nations Force. It has the backing of resolutions, yes, but it is an American force that is almost totally supported by a few of the allies or coalition.

Canada's role as a peacemaker was universally accepted and highly regarded until it started to weaken in 1984, the occasion of the present Prime Minister's election to that position. From then on our role as one separate, either economically, internationally, politically or culturally, has been so merged with the United States that we are now recognized more and more as nothing but a vassal of the present Bush administration, or a poor 51st state in the Union of the United States.

No one would doubt, no one would question, whether or not it is Bush who is calling all the shots and that we are following them—trying to anticipate them perhaps, but certainly following them. We have abandoned our role as a peacekeeper. That is a loss to us but it is also a loss to the world as a whole.

It is easy for politicians sitting in comfortable places far removed from any place of danger to vote in favour of war. We get to vote. The young people who go to the front lines have no vote. That should make us a bit more responsible in voting in favour of war, and yet we seem to do it so easily, so lightly, and not even because it serves our own interests best, but rather because it serves the interests of the American president.

"War is the ultimate human folly. This is something I collected some time ago but it is still valid. The money required to provide adequate food, water, education, health and housing for everyone in the world has been estimated at $17 billion a year. That is a huge sum of money, Madam Speaker. Just about as much as the whole world spends on arms every week of the year, to put it into perspective. One week's spending on arms would be enough to accomplish all those things".

I am going to read another quotation.

> Every gun that is made, every warship launched, every rocket fired, signifies in the final scene a theft from those who hunger, and are not fed, those who are cold and are not clothed. This world in arms is not spending money alone. It is spending the sweat of its labourers, the genius of its scientists, the house of its children. . . This is not a way of life. Under the cloud of war, it is humanity hanging on a cross of iron.

This is signed by Dwight D. Eisenhower.

Currently Canada spends some $13 billion a year. That is before we got involved in this campaign of invasion into Iraq, $13 billion a year to be prepared for war. Not fighting, but simply to be prepared for war; to be ready to kill, should the occasion rise. We are spending some $3 billion a year to try to help developing nations help themselves, not to give them relief but to try to help them to pick themselves up by their own bootstraps.

Canadians have fought in two world wars and have handled themselves very well, each of them a war that was designed, intended and described as a war that was going to end all wars. Canadians participated well and still are participating in many areas of the world in peacekeeping forces. Today, for perhaps the first time in our history, we are participating in a war as one of the aggressors again, supposedly in the interest of peace.

Canada has failed as has the rest of the world; we joined in the failure. What we have been doing has not worked. We have been fighting wars, wars of defence and, currently, a war of aggression to preserve the peace and none of it has worked. Certainly out of this war, if peace comes it may be 1,000 years down the road. There has to be a better way and I suggest that there is.

I am not a pacifist. I spent five years in the air force during the war and that was a war that had to be fought; the mistakes were made long before war started, there is no question about it. I am not saying that this one is much different. The mistakes, again, were made over a 22-year period. But there has to be a better way and we have to start before we get into war, not after.

When I was in high school, I was impressed by a teacher who, years later, became a columnist for The Ottawa Citizen and is retired here in Ottawa now, Ronald Grantham. He won an international prize for writing a letter or paper on unilateral disarmament.

What I am proposing now as the better way, the only way that can work, because what we have done up till now has certainly failed humanity totally, is for Canada to disarm totally and unilaterally its armed services, do away with our defence spending and concentrate on using that money to help those nations that need it to help themselves. Let us use our money to build peace rather than to arm to fight wars because fighting wars never has and never will produce peace. There may be a cessation of hostilities but we never get peace by fighting wars. Let us disarm and show that there is a better way.

I am not proposing this to the world as a whole. That, I hope, will come, but I am saying that there is one country in the world which can do it alone. There is one country in the world that is big enough. If we abandoned our defence spending, the amount of money and the effort that we could put into a program for peace would be large enough that it would be noticed around the world. We can do it because, although we are very large, very rich in resources, a very productive people with a very strong economy, there is no possibility of our defending our borders against either an aggressor from the south or one from the north. It is totally impossible for a nation of some 30 million people to defend some 10,000 or 15,000 miles of border; it is just not possible.

We could abandon our defence spending. We are not going to defend ourselves. The amount of money that we are spending on defence, some $13 billion a year right now, of money that is being spent, is but a pittance out of the total amount internationally, of over $1,000 billion a year. Our $13 billion is such a small portion in comparison to the total, it would not be noticed in the total world pool of defence spending. But the contribution that we could make to international aid and development would be noticed. And hopefully, working through the auspices of the United Nations—and as I said before we have always supported the United Nations and would love to be doing it in this case if we thought it was a decision freely arrived at—and selecting countries that would benefit from this kind of assistance, countries that were prepared to forswear spending their scarce resources on national defence as well, on the condition that they had a guarantee from the United Nations organization that their borders would remain intact, perhaps we could widen the circle of nations that would be prepared to leave security of their borders to collective security, as provided by the United Nations.

Canada is unique. We can give up defence since we cannot even pretend to be able to defend our own country. The experience we have had with our armed services this year has been such that we know they are exceptionally good at organization. They could well be used to do the kind of work throughout the world that I feel would be building for peace as opposed to fighting wars and killing people, and hoping that we can kill enough so that the next war will be a little further delayed than it might have been otherwise. Canada is one country that is unique enough in that it cannot defend itself so it might as well give it up. Yet, it is important enough economically that it can make a significant contribution to the kind of program that I have been describing.

We are now participating as an aggressor. We have abandoned our peacekeeping operation. We no longer have that kind of a reputation. Let's take another look at it and go at it from a different direction. Let us make an effort through economic development, using our exceptionally capable armed services to do the organizing so that we can make a tremendous impression upon the world and show there is a way for human beings to live together. If we go on the way we have been going for centuries and even for thousands of years, if we do not soon learn to live together, we are going to give up living altogether as a species on this planet.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, with your indulgence I would like to make a comment and then ask the member a question.

My comment is to thank the people across Canada once again for their participation in this debate throughout the night. It has been most heartening to see that the people of Canada do watch the parliamentary channel, whether it is in British Columbia or St. John's, Newfoundland, regardless of the time of night. We have had calls over the last couple of hours from all across Canada.

Just recently I took calls from about 14 people from Ottawa, a couple of people from St. John's, Newfoundland, and from Dartmouth, Nova Scotia. All these people speak with one voice in saying they do not want Canada in an aggressive role in the Middle East. I want to express my appreciation to all these people who have phoned in. We have made note of all they have had to say and hope that we have been able to use some of that in our speeches this evening.

I would like to go on with another comment and question with respect to a call that I took from Penticton, British Columbia, a couple of days ago. This person worked for 28 years in the military. His position was that the Iraqi war machine should be crushed because of the build-up of arms. We discussed over a period of time what that build-up of arms was and the difficulties that we were going to have as a nation if we moved, as he said, from a war machine led by a madman and wondered who defines the war machine that should be crushed and who defines the madman. Do we go through all of the countries that have built up arms and who is going to be the policeman in this?

My question to the hon. member is this. Is there some way that he sees to cut off the supply of arms to some of the nations that are building up, such as Iraq, which have built up their arms as a result of imports from places like France, Germany, the Soviet Union and the United States? Can he, in his wisdom and with his experience of World War II and his experience since as a legislator, see any way of tightening up the control so that we get to the root of the problem in this arms build-up and the greed of the arms builders. Can he make a comment on that for me please?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I would like to advise the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan that his colleague has left him a minute and a half.

Mr. Stupich: Madam Speaker, the answer has to be through the United Nations organization and I mentioned that during my speech. If that organization becomes influential enough, and people agree that it will have the power to resolve disputes and to guarantee borders, then those nations will not have any need for the kind of armaments they are buying now and paying hard dollars for in many cases and bankrupting their countries to do it. They will not have any use for equipment like that. They will not need it to protect themselves and they will not be able to use it to attack anyone else, so there would be no point to it any more.

The answer lies in strengthening the United Nations. I discussed during my speech and suggested how that could be accomplished.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I rise to do something I thought I would never have to do, and that is speak not in the theoretical, but in the real fact that we are a country at war. It is not formally declared, but nevertheless one we are into.

Let me say at the outset that perhaps in some way I am a contradiction in terms of my very existence. I exist because of a war. My father met my mother in Scotland when he visited relatives of his brother-in-law, when he was sent there as a member of the Queen's Own Cameron Highlanders out of Winnipeg. He met my mother. They married and then he was shipped off to Dieppe where he was captured and spent most of the remainder of World War II in a Nazi prison camp in Poland, Stalag 8-B. He was released at the end of the war and came back to Canada and I became their first child.

I say a contradiction because when I was 13 he died of the ramifications of his incarceration. So I have mixed feelings about war, recognizing that sometimes we have no choice, recognizing that sometimes major blunders occur in the decisions of war and the decisions to go to war.

I had the honour three years ago to retravel the path my father took as a member of this House, along with the then Minister of Veterans Affairs, the Hon. George Hees, to attend the 45th anniversary of the landing at Dieppe. In a lot of ways that solidified growing feelings in me about war and the stupidity of such means to resolve conflicts between nations.

Not only was it in seeing the reality of Dieppe, a place that should never have been invaded, because it was impossible to attack and win, but also seeing the reality of the tombstones in England and France and thinking back to comments from my parent's generation of newsreels about when the boys came back home. The ages on those tombstones were 18, 19, 20, 21. They were boys. They had to grow up in a hell of a hurry, but they were still boys who died on those battlefields.

At the same time as more and more information about the Second World War was becoming evident because of the release of confidential documents, to paraphrase the words of George Hees at that time when we held an evening remembrance service at the cemetery at Dieppe, was his comment on the generals and the stupidity of the decision by the generals about going into Dieppe.

We made a mistake in Dieppe and as a nation we made a mistake, as a world we made a mistake in going to war before sanctions against Iraq had time to truly work. There is no question in my mind about that. This is a dumb war. This is an unnecessary war. It is also a war where Canada has undermined 20, 30, whatever years as a nation of peacekeepers, of men and women who have been out there around the world keeping combatants apart, whether it is Cyprus or Israel. I visited UN camps in Israel on the Golan Heights.

Men and women along with other nations such as Finland and India, to name just two, have worked very hard to keep combatants and warring nations apart. That is Canada's role. That is what Canada's military is equipped to do. We do not have the equipment, the force in terms of personnel to be an offensive nation, and thank God that we do not. At the same time, I am scared about what will happen to our men and women who are already deployed in the Persian Gulf and those who may soon be deployed.

It is now a few minutes before seven o'clock in the morning. Technically, according to the House of Commons, this is still Thursday. Some of us believe it really should be Wednesday. But in the last hours of this debate, I will be the last speaker for my party and my friend the member for Saint Denis will be the last for his. We have been receiving phone calls from across Canada. It has been truly remarkable.

In the time remaining, I would like to try to report to the House about the exchange we have had. As someone who has been staffing the phones in the lobby, I have been talking to people whom I have never met, not one person have I ever met in my life. A lot of the calls were from British Columbia primarily because of the time zone reality. I want to say that I took calls from people in Ontario and Quebec who have not been able to sleep. They have been up all night concerned about what Canada got itself into, worried sick, and they are watching the debate in the House of Commons.

One of the messages they passed on to me is that the reason they are watching the House of Commons channel as opposed to the multitude of news channels is that finally they are hearing something about peace, that they are hearing from members of this House who are saying that this war is insane, this war has: "to stop, we have to find a better way, and they are saying: Thank you, keep up the good work".

A lot of times members of Parliament feel pretty lonely. Certainly, at a time like this when my party has differed with the party positions of the rest of the House and, perhaps, for the short period of time with the position of a lot of Canadians, it gets pretty lonely.

I will tell you, Madam Speaker, the calls we have been receiving have really helped us because we know that we are not alone. We are speaking for hundreds of thousands of Canadians.

Let me give some of the thoughts from these Canadians. A citizen from Burnaby is opposed to the war. He says it is a catastrophic blunder and he is now looking at diverting his tax dollars to the peace tax fund.

Another said: "Totally wreckless", A gentleman from B.C called. He is an immigrant from Yugoslavia who has been here for 20 years. He says that this war is totally wrong, that it is an atrocity.

Another talked about the innocent children, women and old people of Kuwait and Iraq. They did not cause this war. They are going to get hurt and killed. Others made comments about the government. They are so sick of this government. Others said that this is a very interesting debate. They appreciate it happening, and we do not support the war. One physician from Ottawa called about 5 a.m. She just got off night shift at one of the hospitals. A member of Physicians for Nuclear Responsibility called in to express her support.

There is great agreement with what the NDP has been saying. This next comment was quite interesting because a lot of us have been watching the news channels and the scenes. Certainly, the one scene from Iraq, the first pictures to come out of the bombardment with the anti-aircraft weapon response, looked like Star Wars. It looked like something out of a movie.

One individual said: "People think this is just one big Nintendo game." Then he pointed out and said: "These are live players. These are human beings in that Nintendo game. It is not an artificial thing that gets eradicated. It is live flesh and blood".

Others pointed out that we should not fool ourselves, that this is really not a United Nations force. This is an American force with a few other countries participating.

A gentleman from Oshawa called with clear disapproval of the Canadian involvement in the gulf. A gentleman from Downsview said: "This war sickens me." A lady in Vancouver called and said that she had been at a meeting last night organized by the COPE aldermen and 500 young people walked 30 miles from Maple Ridge to Vancouver to the meeting chanting: "We don't want war. We want peace." That is the next generation. It is also the cannon fodder. Let us not forget that.

Others said: "Bring our forces back." One said: "We are ashamed of our country in terms of what it has done." Others reflected what we all know, that this is an emotional roller coaster. They have said that Iraq should not be occupying Kuwait, but they are also ashamed that the Prime Minister chose to give Canada an aggressive role rather than a peacekeeping role under the direct auspices of the United Nations.

A person from Nanaimo said: "I wish there was some way to stop this war". Another said: "Because of what I have heard tonight, knowing that there are people in Parliament who are expressing what I have been thinking, I can sleep a little better tonight and thank you".

One asked for a wiser approach to how we deal with these kinds of disputes. A person from Toronto wanted to add their voice to a desire to end Canadian involvement in the war and proud of the NDP for the position that we have taken, and would love a peacekeeping role.

One lady I talked to, who is a former citizen of South Africa, talked at length about the sanctions and how they really were not applied as effectively as they could have been in South Africa. Yet look at what we are seeing happening, where apartheid is ending. She also said that no one can rejoice at the destruction of the human beings in the Middle East.

Another one pointed out that the real soldiers, not in a derogatory way in terms of our forces in the Middle East, were the members of that peace camp, including one Canadian doctor, who positioned themselves without weapons between the coalition forces and the Iraqi forces. Another one just said that it is very emotional, and appreciated what we were doing.

A woman from Sarnia said that we had no right to be there. She pointed out that she was 76 years old, so she has been through a couple of wars already. She said: "We did not accomplish anything in the last one. What is this one going to accomplish? It is just going to lead to yet another war at another point in time". Another interesting phrase that came out is that we can fight for peace. As a political movement, we can fight for peace.

There was great support for the suggestion by my colleague for a non-partisan coalition against the war. One was very angry—in fact two in terms of the calls—with what has been happening in Question Period, that members of the government are laughing at suggestions for peace.

They are also appalled at the media coverage. They did not identify the media, but we have all been watching. It seems to be that the language is a military language and the focus is on the military weapons. We have not seen any pictures of the dead in Iraq or in Kuwait. We have seen pictures of the damage in Israel and we regret that. We think it was insane for Hussein to attack Israel, unwarranted, unnecessary, unconnected with this war, and, God, I hope that Israel is able to keep its act together and not feel bound to retaliate because that will only escalate.

Again, as our speakers have pointed out time and time again, that was one of our fears about going to war in the Middle East. It has always been one of our fears that it will not be a nuclear war started between the U.S.S.R. and the United States; it will be an accident in the Middle East or a similar country.

I know that the time for my remarks is nearing an end. It has been impossible to put in 20 minutes all the thoughts that I have, plus all the comments and thoughts that have been passed on to me this evening. I just want to make two final points, particularly to those people who will be watching the reruns of these debates that when they call there may not be anyone answering the phones. We are going to try to staff the phones in the opposition lobby for the time, if we can predict, when the repeat will be on for the last three or four hours of the debate because we do want to hear from them. I would encourage people out there to call their local member of Parliament and let him or her know where they stand on Canada's involvement.

• (0710)

As I said at the beginning, I never thought, I never expected, I never planned to be in this House to be debating the fact that Canada was at war. As a Canadian who gets deeply emotional when the phrase "we stand on guard for thee" is sung as part of our national anthem, having seen what standing on guard for thee has done, I do not want any more heroes. I do not want any more heroes on the battlefield. I am quite happy to remember the heroes who fought for Canada in World War I, World War II and the Korean war. Please, let us end this war now; let us put our forces back to a peacekeeping role to do what they have done for Canada for years, and made us proud. Thank you, Madam Speaker, and thank you, ladies and gentlemen for watching this debate and letting us know how you feel.

[Translation]

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Madam Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan for his excellent speech on a subject which, I agree is not easy. I would like to remind Canadian people, of one thing if I may. There is great concern today, and rightly so, about the risks the men and women of the Canadian Armed Forces are presently facing in the Gulf. We too often forget the tens of thousands of policemen and women who risk there lives daily to enforce the law in Canada. It is sad, but when one of them gets killed it is not cause for a debate in this House. My point is, Madam Speaker, that the role Canada is playing is that of restoring peace. Peace has to be restored before we can maintain it.

One man has led his people without telling them a thing, and they are truly the first victims of what is happening out there. I am talking about the Iraqi people who blindly followed a man with no conscience.

The international law, the international government we call the United Nations, and all its member nations unanimously denounced the aggression on one of their own, and Kuwait called upon its sister nations within the UN to come and free it. Canada, with a 45-year tradition of peacekeeping and defending rights and freedoms, did not depart from the mission it always gave itself by accepting the risks and sacrifices required to bring about a new world order.

I do not like it, when the hon. member and his colleagues claim that we, on this side of the House, are people looking for violence and for war. Quite the contrary; never in the history of Canadian diplomacy was there so much effort to prevent a war.

Over the last 112 days, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, has had 50 bilateral meetings and at least another 50 multilateral meetings, while our Prime Minister was attending numerous meetings and having numerous phone conversations, to try to find a peaceful solution to the conflict before we got to this point.

Madam Speaker, Canada has been a leader in the world for the past 45 years. I think Canadian people can be proud of the work their country and their government have done. Of course the present situation, and I will close on that, is the doing of a man who did not recognize the law, the international law and that of the United Nations, which state that every nation on this earth has the right to live freely in its country and to call its neighbours and friends to its assistance after an invasion such as the one Kuwait sustained.

[English]

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, I thank the member opposite for his compliment at the beginning of his statement and question. I also thank him for his question.

It is no surprise that there are fundamental differences in this House in terms of how one achieves peace. The Government of Canada has chosen at this point in time to use military force as a means to attempt to achieve peace.

We have been consistently saying that the time was not there to do that, that sanctions take a while to work. The five-month arbitrary deadline was set at the request of the United States. The coalition forces in the gulf are not wearing the blue helmets of the United Nations, the tradition of any UN force. When the government likes to wrap itself in the UN flag, it is a see-through flag and what we are seeing is the American Stars and Stripes.

A lot has been said about this party in particular being anti-American. It is not true. We just got a call from a Will Williamson from Deforest, Wisconsin. He is a veteran of the Vietnam War, 100 per cent disabled. He is totally disillusioned by what his country has done. He has been watching all night. He phoned to congratulate us on our phone-in set-up. He says it is the single largest advance in democracy he has ever seen.

I also want to remind the House that my leader met with senior American members of the Democratic Party, members of Congress and Senate who oppose the war as much as we do. We are not anti-American. We are anti-Bush administration. We are anti-administration of the Conservative Party of Canada. We are pro-Canada. We are pro-peacekeeping in our traditional role of not beating up the bully but of isolating the bully, cutting off the resources that are needed for the bully to function.

I might add that right now we have a Middle East version of the Hatfields and the McCoys. We have two families fighting over turf, not caring about their people, fighting over lines drawn by Great Britain at the end of World War I. The boundaries have no reference to the people who live there.

• (0720)

People who have called me tonight have implored the Government of Canada to rethink what it is doing. The time is not too late. We can revert to our traditional role, not by bringing our men and women back home, but by using them to help the victims, the refugees, the injured, and the families left without parents and homes. That is the role for Canada. That is what we should have been doing all along.

At the same time we should be working through the UN to find a diplomatic solution so that the war and carnage can end before many more people are killed, regardless of race.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, government involves making decisions. It involves planning and it involves choices. I have chosen to be against this war in which my country, Canada, is involved.

One of the happiest moments of my life was on February 10, 1964, when I was elected for the first time as the member for the riding of Saint-Denis in Montreal.

One of the promises I was allowed to make by Mr. Pearson to my constituents was that even if we were a minority government we would have a distinctively Canadian flag before the next election. First there was a very vigorous debate in the House, but we got our flag.

[English]

We got our Canadian flag after a long debate, my first debate in 1964. That was the pride of my day. It has been the pride of my life ever since.

Yes, I come from Quebec. Yes, I am Canadien français. Yes, I am from Montreal. Yes, I said the same thing in French.

[Translation]

I see Canada's flag as an image, a dream, a symbol for a world in disarray that is seeking, somewhere on this planet, a relatively peaceful land, a generous land, with open-minded people who may have their minor prejudices, but nevertheless, a land where people can live in peace and understanding.

[English]

That is what Canada is all about. It is a hope for the world. What the world has always seen in Canada is the hope of a different place on earth or, as my Indian friend says in English, mother earth. Indians always talk about mother earth. Canada is that. Canada is looked on by the world as a compromise between all kinds of regions, emotions and people who could always provide, not a solution but proposals when there is trouble in the world.

The government of the day has chosen to join with the United States and with many other countries to teach Saddam Hussein a lesson once and for all. The leader of the government—and I will say it in English—is a personal friend of mine.

[Translation]

And I say in French without shame, that he is a personal friend. On Wednesday, October 11, when this Prime Minister, my friend, received His Majesty King Hussein Bin Talal of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, he addressed him in the following terms, very politely of course: "We also celebrate here today the landmark first address to the Canadian Parliament of the leader of an Arab country. Your autobiography and the testimony of many respected world leaders record your dedication, sir, to the cause of peace in the Middle East. In fact, few, if any, have shown greater determination in this cause nor pursued it with greater resolve. As Prime Minister Thatcher has said so aptly of you, Your Majesty, your human qualities, above all your courage and clear-sightedness, have earned you both respect and admiration world-wide".

He said a few other things that might be a bit embarrassing, but the point is that the little king, as they call him, warned the world of the tragedy that is now taking place under our very eyes. The Middle East is far more complex than we think.

[English]

You could study it for 25 years, as I have done, and still feel humble because you have a lot more to learn. I said in my speech in October that when you go to the Middle East you know how you get in, but you do not know when you will get out and how you will get out. We are in.

It was was not the mission of Canada to be there that way. That country was representing a hope for humanity. It did not respect a big power. La France and Great Britain, I call them my in-laws. It is always pleasant for a person like me and like my three colleagues from Quebec, members of the Conservative Party, friends, to say we would double colonialize, la France and Great Britain.

We are Americanized. We love it, but we are not American. That is what almost half of the world sees in us. Here is a country that was colonized by the French, taking the land away of course from the Indian and the Eskimo, and then colonized again by the British and looked at with envy by the United States. That is why we have our entry everywhere in the world.

The government has chosen. It is not our choice. I am not going to yell. It is 7.30 p.m. Saturday morning. Most of us have been here since ten o'clock Friday morning. As I said earlier, I never felt more full of energy having stayed during every minute of the debate. The outcome is so unbelievable that it gives me a kind of lasting energy to try to convince governments that it may not be too late. Do not look at us and say: "The Liberals seem to be divided". I hope the NDP will vote against this motion. The Gallup poll may be saying something today but a great Roman thinker said: "Reason must prevail over public opinion when it is volatile". I will remember, all my life, the time when the War Measures Act was in force, when 86 per cent of the people were endorsing us. As I said earlier, I voted for it. I still claim I was lied to. I did have the information so I had to do my duty. But I know one thing: 1970 is something that I remember, clearly. The government has chosen. Public opinion, volatile as it is, not having seen yet the massacre taking place, says it is right, Okay.

On this question, as I said earlier, I make it a moral issue not a Gallup or a poll issue. I remember also, in 1972, the same people who were supporting us at 86 per cent almost defeated us, less than 18 months after, so one does not go by polls, polls, and polls. I would like, at this time, to say that I, Marcel Prud'homme, feel—I hope that is a good expression in English—so much for our young Canadians who are, at the moment, right in the middle of accomplishing their duty because they signed, they are military. They are proud and they obey. The government of the day says: "You are going to do that" and they are doing it.

In this sense, I am positive we will not deprive them of all the essentials so that they come back to this country safely. That is one issue. But the true issue is: why did we not go on? Why did we not convince the United States to be patient in that region of the world? What was predictable is happening. This is Saturday morning at 7.30. Look at what is going on in Jordan. Look at the masses in Algeria, a country with a population of 30 million, 70 per cent of whom are young people. Look at what is going on in my dear Lebanon; there are demonstrations. Poor Lebanon that was just about to get back on its feet, after 16 years of abandonment by the west, the big power. In Jordan, a neighbour of Israel, there are demonstrations. The cabinet is meeting and the Parliament is meeting at this moment while I am talking. What will happen? Do we not know the Arab mind? Do we not have scholars who will tell us that over there they do not function as they do in Europe, they do not feel as they do in Europe. They have been pushed around, insulted and betrayed.

—They had every reason in the world to be suspicious. And this evening, all that seems to have come to a head throughout the Middle East.

Those who thought they could go to the Middle East, do a clean-up operation and get out quickly are mistaken. I am putting my reputation on the line. If I am wrong, I will get down on my knees and thank God. But I doubt it. I think I am going to be right. And I regret that. But couldn't we predict something that was so obvious?

I talked about our Canadian forces. Of course I also want to talk about Israel.

[English]

I am a member of the International Parliamentary Union. I spoke to Arafat personally: "Recognize the State of Israel and its right to live in peace", multiple times, while I had Canadian parliamentarians who forced us to vote, if we were going to listen to Arafat, not to be in agreement with him; just to listen to him. Arafat was at the United Nations in November 1974. He came and asked, begged: "Please don't let me down". We did not listen. Every leader in the Middle East asks for justice, peace and understanding.

When you do not produce results, you end up with tougher, more fanatical leaders: Hussein today, Khomeini yesterday, Assad from Syria tomorrow. Why is it that the west always ends up with the Marcos and the Duvaliers? I never understood, or I understand too well: interest, honour, favour, money. We always end up with the rotten.

Of course Saddam Hussein will lose. Of course, the alliance will win, but at what price? I am not a pacifist. He was cornered. He did not have any right to go into Kuwait. He had no right to make the people of Israel scared, hoping they would retaliate. He has no right. We all know that. We all agree. But he was cornered.

What is the matter with us politicians? Are we too proud to be wrong? Are heads of State too proud to admit they are not always right? What about history? Eisenhower, a great U.S President, warned that the greatest threat to U.S. peace was the United States defence establishment.—He could have substituted the West for United States— the arms manufacturers that are making a profit by corrupting developing countries.

Today, my dear colleague and Quebecer to the hilt, young Canadians and Quebecers may be killed with weapons manufactured in this country. Does that make sense? Can we accept that? When is the world going to wake up? When will we understand that all nations are seeking the same thing: dignity?

[English]

Should I spell it in English, dignity? As powerful as people think they are, they have no more right to dignity than the humble of this earth, the people who have been tortured and humiliated, all that is unacceptable. And anyone who knows anything about human psychology, as you do, Madam Speaker, knows that someday things are going to explode. Perhaps not today, but surely tomorrow. So we are indeed in a pretty pickle. I can see hon. members who are about to say it is shocking that some of those Liberals and New Democrats are not only against war but against our soldiers over there. It would be monstrous to think we feel that way.

• (0740)

The government has made a decision as it is entitled to do. We do not agree with that decision. However, we believe that everything must be done to give these young Canadians and Quebecers—

[English]

Mr. Whittaker: Madam Speaker, given the fact that the speaker is the last speaker of the evening and the last speaker in the debate, and given his long time service to this country, could we extend his time to speak in appreciation of the people who are watching this debate and of the calls that I got on the hotline?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I would like to see what the point of order is, if the hon. gentleman would come to it.

Mr. Whittaker: Madam Speaker, I am asking for the unanimous consent of the House to extend the time of the member's speech.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure members of the House were quite prepared to extend, for a reasonable time, the time allowed to the hon. member for Saint-Denis. I realize that what has prompted the hon. member to rise was that I did signal, as was my duty, in trying to make things easier for the hon. gentleman. I thank everyone for their co-operation.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Saint-Denis may wish to conclude his speech in a few minutes.

The hon. member for Saint-Denis has the floor, and I apologize for the interruption.

Mr. Prud'homme: Madam Speaker, you were doing your job, and I respect that fact as I respect this institution.

[English]

I will not abuse this but I can feel Canadian feeling quickly. I was in the lobby. To be frank, I will give you one. He is waiting for me to mention his name. It is Todd and he is from Regina. He is in agreement with the government and I have to be honest and say it.

People are watching us on satellite from Wisconsin and Saginaw, Michigan. Nine people phoned while I was in the lobby. I have listened. The NDP was too busy so I did. I was trying to catch the eye of some of my colleagues. I say to the members from Thunder Bay-Atikokan. I can read and I can listen. They are from Don Valley West, from British Columbia, a Rose Marie. Within a few minutes there were others from New Westminster, British Columbia, John from Stoney Creek and another a Rose Marie. Suddenly people are having an interest in world affairs. They are saying: "Wait a minute, I did not know what was going on. Who made that decision? How was this decision made and why?"

The Prime Minister will come back on Monday and we will be here. What kind of diplomatic gesture is he going to offer? Right now you can be at war and be part of it. It will be more difficult but at the same time you can carry the Canadian flag again, the flag of pride, offer some solution. Are we totally finished here? Do we have nothing to offer to the world that is begging parliamentarians, statesmen, and church leaders? They are all saying: "Do something. It makes no sense".

I do not like to be partisan. Hon. members know that. I am not partisan, but I say: "Mr. Prime Minister, Mr. Secretary of State for External Affairs, work night and day."

It was unbelievable over Christmas when all the foreign ministers of the world were trying initiatives there. But, when one makes initiatives, one has to have a soul, a soul that understands others. There is no master servant on earth in foreign affairs.

If you treat people with contempt because they are Arabs well, Arabs are like Mr. Plourde or Marcel Prud'homme or Mrs. Champagne. They are human beings who want to be treated fairly and with respect. They expect that, and they always hoped that is what they would get from Canada.

I am sorry, but I think we failed miserably in this respect. I have a pile of notes here. I have been following this debate for days. I have been collecting facts for years, and when I get up to speak, I am afraid I get disconcerted from time to time.

[English]

I am not well-disciplined. Over the years I have accumulated what I would like. I have tried every angle to convince colleagues to take an interest and to make government understand. When I travel around the world, I talk about peace in the Middle East because it will blow up some day. But now that we are in it, there is still a possibility to recuperate our tradition as Canadians.

My last word, Madam Speaker, would be to thank you and my colleagues for your patience. It is a call to Canadians in both French and English.

[Translation]

Let me tell you what I saw last night and this morning, my Lebanese taxi driver—

[English]

This is not Canada. This is not my Canada. This is not my Toronto, my Ottawa, or my Montreal.

I hope Canadians who will have a difficult time discussing this issue will not start by being paranoid as soon as they see dark-skinned people, as if immigration officers.

Being from Iraq, Palestine, or any other part of that world does not mean you are not a loyal Canadian. There are laws in this country. People know how far they can go and how much they can do. If they do not behave as good Canadians or as good future Canadians, they know the law is there.

Let us not start insulting these people in a disgusting way, as some are now starting to do. It is too dangerous. Let us understand each other.

We must be very careful. Later on, I will get back to this new economic order, this new world order everyone is talking about. If the new world order exists, what are we waiting for? We could tell our new ally, who has always been a friend, the President of Turkey: "Now listen, there a new economic order and there is a new world order. Couldn't you get out of Cyprus?"

[English]

Why do they not get out of Cyprus? There is a new order now in the world. What are they doing occupying north Cyprus?

My colleague from Scarborough—Agincourt said that, well, of course, there is no oil there so that will become a preoccupation of the United Nations very late.

Suddenly, the United Nations is becoming so important that the United States government, which forgot to pay its dues to the United Nations for many years, now finds it important again. Can it give the $500 million it owes to the United Nations? Suddenly, the United Nations has become important again.

I rejoice, but I do not want anybody to use the United Nations for his or her own purposes. The United Nations is there to find solutions to world problems.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, I don't know whether I managed to convince my colleagues, but I can assure you that Canadians who are listening are going to ask questions. The Quebecois and Quebecoises—and I am not discriminating but I happen to like the word,—are going to ask questions. I don't care about being popular. I don't care about the polls. When we come back in a month or two we will see what Canadians and Quebecers think about this debate, a debate that started far too late because it should have been held before or around August 2, not today. The deed is done, so we will try to do the best we can, but it won't be easy. You know as well as I do it will not be easy.

• (0750)

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Madam Speaker, I would like to comment very briefly. First of all, I would like to say that I admire and envy the talent and experience of the hon. member for Saint-Denis, especially in the House, and the depth of emotion in his speeches. When I have spent as many years in the House as the hon. member—if my constituents are willing—I may be able to speak with some of that same eloquence and emotion. The hon. member made a number of points which I think are fundamental.

Not so long ago, I was able to go over there and see what it is like in an Arab State, to see the proud bearing of these people, their pride in what they are. However, what I felt was a certain fear that someday someone would want to take over, with total disregard for their sovereignty. Their system may not be perfect. I agree some political systems are not exactly the way we would like them to be, but there is something in the hon. member's speech that bothers me.

People say that the Americans do this and the Americans do that— All I can say is that I was really impressed when a few months ago, Mr. Gorbachev told Mr. Bush and the world: The cold war was over. The cold war between the two blocs is over and done with. Let us consider all the problems. Hon. member will agree that all the problems in the Middle East were due to the fact that to all intents and purposes, we had two enemies who were both trying to take advantage of the situation in that area and finally, what happened? The result is the shambles we have now. I think the hon. member will agree on that point. However, we had hope, at least I did. I may be naive, and I agree that I am a political novice. I may have been naive to hope that finally, now the cold war was over, all countries large and small, whether they were in the Soviet bloc or in the U.S. bloc—in any case those blocs no longer exist at least would finally without exception, be able to express their views.

In any case, I would appreciate it if the hon. member would answer this question. Would he agree that by attacking Kuwait, Mr. Hussein created an explosive situation and tried to destroy what the whole world was starting to build in an attempt to do something worth while in this area and to give these people, whom I also admire a great deal even if I do not know them as well as the member does dignity by giving them the means to develop their region?

Mr. Prud'homme: Madam Speaker, of course I said that Saddam Hussein's invasion of Kuwait was unacceptable. In French this is very strong: inacceptable. There are rules. We disagree on how to deal with a situation that is unacceptable. According to the statements by the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops, by all the religious communities, all the pacifists movements—and I urge them to keep up the good work and keep us all on our toes—there are other ways of doing what we are doing now. That is where we disagree. This is unacceptable. Yes, I say this with a great deal of emotion.

[English]

Yes, God dammit, I have emotion. I am talking about the planet, human relationships, human emotions and people who are going to die and are dying. Of course I am emotional, but I am cool.

[Translation]

I can see a few reporters who have been chasing me for quite while saying: "In a long emotional speech—". Well, let them, but I wish they would come and see me after my speech and realize that I am—rational I might get upset, but emotional, I don't mind a bit. In Quebec we are not a distinct but a different society. We think differently, and we act differently. We have different emotions. We are good Canadians just the same, although we are different and we express ourselves in a different way.

This is my way, and I do not intend to change. It takes a lot of physical stamina but the debate is over.

[English]

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add my congratulations to the hon. member. He has been in this House for 27 years. He has sat on the external affairs committee and chaired it longer than I have probably been here. Tonight, he has demonstrated the reason this House has had such great confidence in him.

As a summary in the last speech in this House, he has done a tremendous job. He has given a very stern warning that we have enormous responsibilities for the people of Canada and, indeed, for the people of the world. He has been an articulate spokesperson for the Muslim communities of this world, especially the Palestinian community, for justice, recognition and dignity.

I must say how much I truly respect the contribution that he has made.

The second thing, as a great many people in here have said, is that there has been a failure on the part of this place. Indeed, I have changed my mind tonight. This has not been a failure. People who are here have gone through an agonizing process clarifying their own thinking on it. There have been some very constructive presentations.

Some of the women in this House have made some of the finest speeches that I have ever heard in the 12 years that I have been here. They have made the strongest appeals. I think when we leave here today that all of us will leave with a clearer notion of where we are going with this issue.

Unfortunately, it strikes me there is a division down the middle of this House. It cannot be reconciled. The government feels that it has taken the correct choice, that it is the necessary support for the United Nations. This side feels it is the most inappropriate thing that could have been done.

I think we as legislators do represent constituencies and millions of Canadians and that it is time to move it into the hands of the people. I think that, from our side, organizations across this country that have committees to stop this war are an absolute must. On the government side, they must plead their case to Canadians. God help them.

Mr. Prud'homme: Madam Speaker, as graciously as possible, I would like to thank the hon. member for his kindness. I would like to make just a slight correction.

Yes, I am a defender of the Palestinians. I will not talk about that, because you will be here for the next 10 hours. I will feel like a Palestinian until the day they, like me, have a passport. Then I will feel like another one who is suffering.

The hon. member mentioned Muslims and Palestinians. I also have great place in my heart for people of the Jewish faith. To me, what we should be working for is getting these three peoples together. Remember that 25 per cent of the Palestinians share our majority faith: Christian, Catholic. If we could only dream.

I said I had a dream. That will be my last dream. If we could only have the reality of putting the leaders of these three great faiths together, who have their Holy Land in places no bigger than 10 times the size of this Parliament. This miracle can take place, but you need people to push people. You need to have initiative.

• (0800)

I call on my colleague to push the government. That is all we can do.

[Translation]

It is physically exhausting, but we have the responsibility. We have had a long debate. We are at war, I agree. I don't challenge that any more, but we have to take steps immediately, and that is where hon. members with whom I have more in common have a great role to play. From now on, night and day, we must keep working, wake up the nation, keep moving, let ourselves be moved by the peace groups. I like these groups because they prick my conscience, they are like gadflies, and that is why I like them. Young people complain there is a lack of imagination in this Parliament. Women, the majority of women in Canada, say: "We don't want war but what can we do?" So it is up to you, my dear colleagues; you are the government!

[English]

The hon. member is part of the government. Push on the government, not only on the war effort. Saddam Hussein will be taken care of. But push other initiatives to stop that monstrosity taking place in front of our eyes.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, it looks as if Thursday is finally drawing to a close.

I would like to take this opportunity on behalf of all members of the House to thank all employees of the House of Commons who have assisted us in this very lengthy debate: the translators, clerks and their associates, the console operators, the senior pages, broadcasting, security people, the Sergeant-at-Arms, bus drivers, Hansard staff, cafeteria staff and our own staff from each political party.

I also want to thank the members who stayed through the night and those who have come back in the wee hours of the morning, like you, Madam Speaker. We all appreciate that. It has been a very exciting debate. It is probably one of the finest hours this Parliament has seen in a long time.

May I also add my compliments to my good friend who was the final speaker for his excellent remarks. I think it is something we should all contemplate. Madam Speaker, thank you to all.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I thank my hon. friend, the Whip of the New Democratic Party for bringing to the attention of the House our appreciation for all of those who serve this institution and allow us to go on at great length, as we have done in this case. I am sure no one at home would understand that this is still January 17. I am sure, if I told most of them, they would say:. "Yes, you are a member of Parliament; I would believe that". On behalf of the government members, I want to indicate that we too appreciate all the help we have received.

I want to compliment the House on the debate. It had tremendous emotion, tremendous tension, tremendous divergence of viewpoints. The House has risen to the occasion and members have participated in a debate that I hope a few of those Canadians across the country did tune in to and did enjoy.

POINT OF ORDER

STANDING COMMITTEE ON EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND INTERNATIONAL TRADE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have just a very short point of order, because we are anxious to get on to the private member's debate on an important issue.

Last week, the House was going to consider having television coverage of the special meeting of the external affairs standing committee with the Secretary of State for External Affairs. That committee is meeting this afternoon, I think, at 3.30. I am just seeking clarification, particularly from my friend, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader, that it is still appropriate that television cameras cover that important committee meeting.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member from the NDP knows, there are some discussions going on. I have been waiting for one of my confrères to come in and give us a chance to have a quick discussion. I would be prepared to return to the House at that time, but I do want to have those discussions before proceeding with the motions.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 30(6), the House will now proceed to consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—MOTIONS

[English]

AGRICULTURE

ESTABLISHMENT OF CO-OPERATIVE EXTENSION SERVICE

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings) moved:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should support the creation of a co-operative extension service, financed by Agriculture Canada, universities and provincial governments, for research and for the continuing education of farmers and extension personnel.

He said: Mr. Speaker, before I make some comments on this motion before the House in Private Members' Hour today, I would like to say, not that this is not an important subject, but I think there are other things that perhaps we could be discussing today. I want to point out to those who are watching the proceedings of the House today that this is part of the order of business of the House of Commons and so we will proceed with it.

It is a pleasure to rise to speak on the motion that I have before the House today. I will just read the motion again:

> That, in the opinion of the House, the government should support the creation of a co-operative extension service, financed by Agriculture Canada, universities and provincial governments, for research and for the continuing education of farmers and extension personnel.

I want to speak for a just few minutes on this and to plead with the government to recognize the importance of the agriculture and the agrifood business in Canada. Since the election of this Parliament a little over two years ago, the Mulroney government has seemed to be going full speed ahead on deboning agricultural programs and taking away from primary producers and the agrifood industry many of the management tools and many of the programs that have been available to them in the past.

I recognize that agriculture is a joint jurisdiction between the federal government and the provincial governments, but I want to point out to them—and hopefully they will listen and recognize to a greater extent than they have indicated so far—the importance of the agrifood industry in this country. It is a $43 billion dollar industry. It employs one out of every five Canadians and, unless we take greater steps to replace or to change the programs that we have had taken away from the industry in the recent past, we are not going to be what we have to be; that is, competitive. That is the name of the game, whether in the agrifood industry or whatever other industry or business we are in. We must be competitive.

It is a false economy, a false view, and a false thinking if we do not give more emphasis to research and development in all industries, not only agriculture, and to continuing education for those not only at the primary producer level, but, as the motion reads, for extension service personnel level who work with primary producers and with agrifood industry people, on through the system.

The agricultural industry in this country, in the last couple of years more than ever, has come under a tremendous amount of pressure. It is not only the pressure that has been created by the free trade agreement. I maintained throughout that debate that the agrifood industry was going to be hit the hardest and the earliest of all industries that were going to be affected by the free trade agreement.

We can see what is happening there. We can see the rationalization taking place in our food processing industry. The cost to this country is that it is not making us as competitive as we should be because of the change in the rules that the free trade agreement put in place against the wishes and the advice of many of us who have a pretty good knowledge of how that industry operates, can operate, and should operate. In spite of all those recommendations, those rules were put in place and now we are paying the fiddler for the tune that was called and dictated to them.

I will cite an example that is very close. It is in my own riding. Just 10 days ago, another food processor announced that it was going to cease the growing and processing of vegetables. That is going to affect the farm-gate return of 25 producers in my riding to the tune of $1.3 million per year. As well, it is going to eliminate over 150 seasonal jobs from the early part of February until the early part of November.

We cannot blame the people who are doing it. The bottom righthand corner in their balance sheet obviously dictates that they have to do that, but it is a rationalization. Now that the rules are changed, they are having to play with different rules, to deal with different tariff levels, et cetera.

This has been dictated by not only the free trade agreement, but other changes, as well. The rate of interest. The government will stand up and say: "The interest rate is not as high as it was a few years ago." I admit it is not as high as it was a few years ago, but the spread in the real interest rate between Canada and the United States is much higher than it was a few years ago.

In the last round of high interest rates, we were looking at around 2 per cent spread between Canada and the United States. Our businesses were far more competitive in that line than they are now. Now, as we all know, it is 4 or 5 per cent. It matters, yes, what the interest rate is, but what matters even more is the difference between Canada and the United States.

The high dollar. The dollar is being held up, and that puts it at an unreasonably high level. It makes the export capabilities of the whole agrifood industry much more difficult. We know what that is doing.

The other uncertainty that our industry is faced with at the present time is the uncertainty of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, the GATT talks which to date have not been successful.

As I have stated many times, I have very grave concerns that because of the way the GATT situation is going, not enough will be done in the agrifood industry and in trade and agricultural commodities throughout the world to do the job. If we are not able to get a successful conclusion there, I will feel very sorry for many, if not all, of our primary producers in the agrifood industry. That will certainly filter all the way up. What we have to remember and what the government has to remember is that if we do not have a healthy primary producer level, we will not have the production for the rest of the agrifood industry to work from and to work with.

It is very easy to say, as some people say, yes it is cheaper to buy food some place else in the world at the present time, and I agree. In the short run, it would be. But what we have to consider and what I plead with the government to consider is to put those programs in place, put the dollars in place, and put the assistance in place in co-operation to a greater extent with the provinces. This will enable us to provide in the long run the food requirements and a sound agricultural and agrifood industry for Canadians.

In the short run, with many things in our lives we might gain, but we have to think further down the road than the present government is apparently thinking.

Not only does the agrifood industry supply to Canadians a source of food, it also supplies to Canadians the safest source of food of any population in the world. The agrifood industry not only provides that food source but reaches a lot of other goals and purposes in Canada. I do not feel that the present government has recognized that and is recognizing that to the extent that it should. Not only as I say does it provide a source of food, it provides a source of quality food. How better can we provide to Canadians and guarantee to Canadians that we are going to have a safe source of food for our children and our grandchildren down the road than to have that food produced under our own eyes in Canada as much as possible? We cannot produce all the commodities we wish, we know that. We do not have the climate. But we have to produce that under our own eyes, with our own rules, in our own yard, in our own country. It has to take place.

That will not take place unless there is economic sustainability. We talk about sustainable agriculture, we talk about the sustainable environment and I agree 100 per cent with all of those. What we have to realize is that unless financially the bottom right-hand corner of the balance sheet of an individual operation, an agrifood operation, or a processing operation, whatever it is, is in the black it cannot happen, and it will not happen as much as we all may believe within our hearts that it should happen and it is the right thing to do. It has to make financial sense.

If that is the case, I think that the priority of the importance of the agrifood industry should be higher than it is and should be realized by Canadians. Not only does it provide a safe, sound source of quality food, it also provides and plays a role in the environment. Agriculture producers know better than anyone else, especially the primary producers, the role that they can play in the production of different crops, in soil conservation, water conservation, and wind erosion. That is another important role that we must realize the agrifood business plays.

It also plays a very major role in the balance of trade of this nation. It also plays a very major role in employment. One in five Canadians is employed in the agrifood industry. We do not need those people any place else. If we needed them some place else, I guess one could flippantly say: "Well, we'll take one out of those or we will take 20 per cent of them because we need them some place else in our economy. We do not need them." Heaven knows this government has created a situation and we have enough unemployment now.

There is another role that one might say is an intangible role that the agrifood industry plays and that is in the social fabric or fibre of this country. I had an opportunity this summer to take a couple of trips through the prairies. My 20-year old son was with me and he could not believe it. He said: "Dad, look what is happening to these towns". We have all seen the movies where they are boarding up the windows. And they were, Mr. Speaker. There are towns in western Canada where 4 four by eight sheets of plywood are put over 40 per cent, 50 per cent, or 60 per cent of the businesses in the town.

I do not really think the direction that we want to send the rural people in this country is to the bigger urban centres. Yes, the big urban centres can play a role, and do play a role, but I do not think that we need to chase people there any further.

They are being forced to go there in order to find another source of income so that they can continue to farm and in their view, and in the view of many of us, to provide Canadians with cheap food. I have nothing against cheap food, but we cannot produce cheap food on the backs of a big percentage of our population. It just cannot be done that way.

I am just warning Canadians and this government that if they continue along this line they are going to create a bad situation down the road. We have rightfully become concerned about our environment for our children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren. We want them to have clean air and clean water.

What I am saying is we are going to have to put more programs in place in order to provide for our children, our grandchildren and our great-grandchildren. We must provide safe, quality, wholesome food that is produced here by a big sector of our economy.

We must remember that there are only four creators of wealth in the world, no matter what we look at, see, touch or use. Those four are fishing, mining, forestry and agriculture. This government is allowing many of these to falter.

We do not have to take time here to talk about the condition of our mining, lumbering and fishing. We know that they are in a deplorable economic situation. As well, it is creating social situations in Canada that are far from what we would like to have and have grown accustomed to. Agriculture is one of those.

As I have said, and many others have said, as goes agriculture, so goes the economy of any country. We could use as an example what has happened to Mr. Gorbachev. For a number of years he thought the war machine would fuel his economy. He has found out recently that the war machine does not fuel the economy because he has now has many millions of people who have empty stomachs, no food on the shelves and no place to get it.

What fuels a healthy, productive, efficient economy is full stomachs. Then people will be able to work and be able to produce for the good of all. We know that in the U.S.S.R. right now many people do not know how they are going to get through to the spring and through the next year. There is just not any food in the pantry, shelves or in the stomachs.

I want to remind the government of some of its own figures. The total receipts at the primary producer level for farm income in Canada is predicted in 1991 to be 4 per cent less than it was in 1990. That is 7 per cent less than it was in 1989. I remind this House, Canadians and the government that no industry can continue when the receipts are going down.

We all know what it costs to do business and what it costs to live on an individual or business basis. The expenses are going up. The receipts are going down in an industry that has never been all that healthy. We just cannot allow that to go on. If we allow that to go on in the short run, we are going to pay very dearly as Canadians in the long run.

There is a lot of stress and a lot of uncertainty in the agriculture community today because of some of the things that are happening, as I have said.

What I am encouraging the government to do is to work with some groups that are out there that are asking through the provincial governments and directly to the federal government for some financial assistance and, in some cases, the continuation of financial assistance.

The government has not assured these organizations that it will provide for yet another year, in order to put the extension personnel in the field to deal with the management and production stress that is there. In many farm families where the husband and wife are having to work off the farm, or at least one of them has to work off the farm, in a rural community it is not easy to get babysitters or whatever for child care.

I remind the government of a couple of programs that I would recommend it consider highly. There are two examples from Ontario. I feel that these examples throughout the country can serve a very useful purpose. One is the Advanced Agricultural Leadership Program that I am proud to say I was a part of getting established in Ontario a number of years ago. This program was one where farm, agrifood and extension people worked together on a two-year program in order to train people to meet the challenge for future leaders in dealing with provincial, national and international affairs, and to familiarize themselves of the needs of society and able to change rural Canada—and most of these are from Ontario—with a broad perspective. I recommend that the federal government do something through some department There have been applications to different ones and they have been turned down every time.

The other program is the Ontario Agricultural Training Institute. That is a program that is carried out by non-profit sectors. It is funded by 25 per cent of the individuals who participate in it and it is has helped put in place self-help training initiatives devoted to farmers and managing change. The major funding from this has been from employment and immigration. Unless it has happened in the last day or two, the federal government has refused, to this day, to approve funding for that program for another year.

I hope when my hon. colleagues reply today that they can give this House some good news in that they will announce that that funding is going to be put in place for next year because those are the types of co-operative programs that we need to continue.

In closing, I would like to remind the government of the importance and necessity of these types of programs so that we can strengthen our agrifood industry in this country so that we do not go behind at the rate we are going behind right now. I encourage and plead with the government to do so.

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to join in this debate.

As a former researcher who was heavily involved in extension and technology transfer, I know first-hand the importance of this issue to the agricultural industry. I am going to take a completely different approach in addressing this motion than the previous speaker has taken.

It is true that we are in a recession. It is true that it is having a significant effect on the agricultural industry. Apart from the approach taken by the previous speaker where he was wringing his hands about the future of the whole agricultural industry in Canada, certainly the future here looks as bright as in any country around the world.

He said that the government was de-boning agricultural policy and funding here in Canada. Any quick analysis of the expansion of funding since 1984 will clearly indicate that that simply is not true. With the recent announcements of the two new programs, GRIP and NISA, the government has committed itself to long-term programs in Canada which are certainly the most significant ever created in this country and are being very favourably received in the agricultural community.

When we look around the agricultural industry and the effects that current rationalization is having in that industry, it does cause some immediate concern.

When we look at what is happening on a world-wide scale, we see the world moving rapidly to freer trade everywhere, and very clearly consumers want that. The Canadian industry cannot survive with inefficient plants.

Instead of listening to and reading the negative headlines in the media and the newspapers every day, if we look at the business plans of Canadian industry in agriculture, particularly in agrifood processing, we will find that the number of new investments, expansions, and new plants in the food processing area in Canada are increasing very significantly. At last count, from January 1, 1989 to November 30, 1990 there were 30 new investments, 17 mergers, 39 plant closures, 50 new plants created, and 54 plant expansions. Every time there is a closure there are big headlines. Any time there is a new investment we have to look on page 43 of the business section to find it. Very clearly, the trend is to a much stronger and expanded food processing sector in Canada.

Everyone who happened to watch Venture on CBC a week ago Sunday night will have heard a number of food processing executives talking about the rationalization of Canada and the very positive future that particular industry has here.

Looking into the future and not wringing our hands about the immediate situation, although I do not want to minimize that because it is quite important and the agricultural sector needs help to get past it, how do we position farmers and the whole agricultural sector, which is so important to our economy? How do we position that to take advantage of the opportunities that will clearly exist in the next few years?

The government set up as part of the agrifood policy review last year the farm finance and management task force. All facets of the agrifood industry, including producers, worked with both levels of government to determine a long-term path to an economically stable farm community. The importance of improving farm profitability and performance through improved management research and extension efforts was central to the focus of that task force.

In its June report to the federal and provincial ministers of agriculture, the task force recommended the development of a national program in farm management training services and information. This would involve industry, both levels of government, and post-secondary schools of all types.

At their August meeting in Moncton, the ministers accepted the recommendation for the development of a national program. Going one step further, they set up a government/industry working group to draft proposals for implementing such a program. A final report is expected at the end of April.

In an increasingly competitive global market, it is important that farmers have access to the up-to-date technology information they need to manage their farms effectively. The task force pointed out that governments alone were not capable of ensuring a complete flow of information to producers. That is why it is strongly suggested co-operation between members involved in the whole food chain, to make this whole approach quite efficient, wide-ranging, and to get all the information services out there to all parts of the agrifood industry.

The task force suggested the establishment of a long-term program for farm management. Federal and provincial governments and industry would co-operate and co-ordinate the program on a national basis so it could be delivered regionally to ensure individual needs are met. Regional delivery is quite important because of the various crops, climates, soil types, and so on across this country.

Specifically the task force proposed that the farm management program offer three levels of service to producers, the first being training and development services. This would include the development of modular training packages, curriculum, and so on. The second is to offer management services, which of course are very important to producers. Third, the program would offer information services and improvement over what is already offered among the extension services in existence already in Canada, which by the way are quite good.

This is a wide-ranging program involving both levels of government, colleges, universities, farm organizations, private sector lenders, and consultants all working together to co-operate and finance this organization.

We believe that changes in existing structures will handle the challenges in the future, that we do not need a completely new extension service. We just need to adapt the old one, which has developed as the needs of Canada have affected its development. We need just a bit more fine tuning and co-operation so that we can get the information out to our industry and position it very favourably to meet the challenges of the future.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to participate in this debate today, although, like the mover of the motion, the member for Prince Edward—Hastings said, it is perhaps unusual for us to be debating a motion like this in times of national crisis. It is true also that life continues and other issues are still there for us to deal with.

Certainly one of those issues is the crisis which faces rural Canada today, in particular the agricultural community. It would be a mistake to let that focus be forgotten. Therefore, I am happy that this private member's motion is before us today.

There is no question that we are at a turning point when it comes to the future of agriculture and rural communities in our country. The process of centralization, the process of decline, has gone on for long enough. It has become incremental, in that it is operating at an accelerating pace. The percentage of farmers leaving is rapidly increasing. The percentage of farmers in trouble and that impact on the rural community is increasing at an incremental rate.

Therefore it becomes more and more urgent that action be taken. We can no longer feel that we have the time to deal with this matters on a gradual basis or on a long-term basis. Many of these issues need to be addressed now.

Certainly I accept the fact, as the member pointed out, that we are dealing with a primary industry in this country which employs 20 per cent of Canadians. One in five is dependent on the agricultural industry. We are dealing with food, the most basic of human needs which the world cannot do without. We also have to consider that one-third of Canadians, in spite of what has happened to rural Canada, still lives in rural Canada. Their future, the future of their children, and the future of their community depend very much on the direction in which we head.

The pressures we are under are quite self-evident. We have pressures that flow from the free trade deal. It opens up our way of handling our agricultural industry and our processing industry to harmonization with the approach of Americans. The American market is much larger. There are much larger economies of scale. I think there is much less emphasis on farm based institutions and much less emphasis on support for the family farm. This is placing our agricultural industry, our farmers, under increasing pressure as this process becomes more advanced.

There is the whole international situation which was clearly focused in the GATT where there are real international differences on how we should approach this matter. On the one hand, the Europeans feel, because of their history and their geography and the fact that they starved during the war and because they have a very small area and do not want their cities any more crowded, that it is worth their while to keep as many farmers on the land as possible. They are prepared to pay the price to do so.

On the other hand, the United States feels, with its treasury and with its huge economies of scale, that it can blast anybody it wants to out of the market and is prepared to do so, using public moneys. Often forgotten is the fact that throughout the Third World the majority of people are still engaged in agriculture. While this whole trade war is affecting us in many dire ways, it is even more devastating to the farmers in the Third World who already live very marginal lives and have very marginal enterprises. They are being devastated by the whole situation.

A third pressure comes from the evolving awareness of what we are doing to our environment and the whole movement toward sustainable agriculture. This is going to force upon the farm community, if the farm community does not itself willingly adopt some of these perspectives, a whole new way of looking at agriculture, a whole new way of managing its affairs, with things like what kind of chemicals we use, how we handle our livestock, pesticides, herbicides, and so on. These matters will all be affected very much by the way this environmental debate unfolds in this country. It is going to create another whole set of factors to which the farm community will have to adapt in the years to come. If the rural community is not itself actively engaged in this debate, that debate is going to be forced upon it.

We have the centralizing forces, which are perhaps part of the larger scheme of things and very much either a conscious or a subconscious part of government policy. I think this is outlined very well in the recent book by the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast wherein he outlines very convincingly that both Liberal and Conservative governments in this country over the last 20 to 25 years have poured immense resources and developmental energies into the urban centres, very much to the neglect of the outlying regions or outer Canada, as he describes it. Inner Canada has had all the attention, all the resources, and all the investment, while outer Canada where one-third of Canadians live has been very much on the short end of the stick. Historical trends have been exacerbated even more by deliberate policy decisions of government through the years.

This has certainly led us to our current crisis. As the member for Prince Edward—Hastings said in his remarks, national cash income is expected to fall 4 per cent in Canada. It is 9 per cent in Saskatchewan this year. This means a 37 per cent drop in net income in Canada and a 60 per cent drop in net income in Saskatchewan. If we look at Saskatchewan's net income, there was already only a $5,000 a year income from farming sources for Saskatchewan farm families. If we take away 60 per cent of $5,000, we are left with a $2,000 income per farm family from farming operations. Surely that is a total disaster. It needs to be dealt with, not at some time in the future, not even as soon as our new safety net programs are expected to kick in, but on a very immediate basis.

It is also incumbent on us to present some alternatives.

That is why I am happy the proposal has been made. I was at Michigan State University, which is a land grant university in the United States, where the whole concept of co-operative education was pioneered. There it is understood that the partnership is among industry, the state, the local levels of government and the university. The universities essentially run the program.

I was very intrigued by that, because in Canada it is quite different. Here it is government which runs extension services. Originally, when I observed it, I felt that it was perhaps more appropriate to keep it running out of government agencies. Since then, I have noted a few things. One is the politicization of agriculture services in my home province of Saskatchewan by the Devine government where his support very much depends on his rural base. He uses the agriculture extension services to underpin that base.

Second, the massive need for change which has come upon the farm community over the last 10 years tells me it is very important that we develop the kind of co-operative model which the member is talking about.

I support the proposal. As well, I support a movement toward safety net programs which are geared to the cost of production formulas. These should be the centrepiece of farm support programs.

We also have to deal with the question of farm debt. We cannot leave that to the free market. We need to deal with farm debt on an urgent basis. The way we are doing it now is leaving this generation, future generations and in fact past generations of farmers sinking under the weight of their debt load.

We need to deal with the infrastructure and rural development on a wider basis. We have to support farmer institutions which have allowed Canada to develop a unique role in agriculture that supports family farmers and their institutions like the Wheat Board, the wheat pools and marketing boards.

In closing, I might also refer to the platform of another party that only has one member in this House and therefore little opportunity to put views on the record. The Reform Party of Canada, by contrast, calls for a shift from government domination to an industry shaped by market forces. It pushes for an extension of free trade agreements with the United States to include common internal export subsidy arrangements.

It calls for the removal of the Crow rate through a one-time non-taxable bridge payment. It calls for the anti-eastern feed freight assistance and a re-orientation of the Farm Credit Corporation on a commercial basis, for future privatization and for the reduction of farm marketing boards as a cost-saving measure.

I am pleased to be able to put my views on the record to support the proposal of the hon. member. Rural Canada has been in retreat long enough. It is time to move forward. I would urge all members of Parliament to look for every way they can to assist the farm community in facing the challenges of the future.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to address this motion that has been put forward by the hon. member opposite from Prince Edward—Hastings. The motion states:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should support the creation of a co-operative extension service, financed by Agriculture Canada, universities and provincial governments, for research and for the continuing education of farmers and extension personnel.

This certainly sounds all very correct, something that everyone should be supporting.

I would like to put on the record some of the things that are taking place. There can be no doubt as to the need for continuing research and education in our rapidly changing world. Farmers are not immune to changes, and their information needs continue to grow as well. The critical step is the efficient delivery of information to those who need it, and in a manner which can be readily put to use.

The motion before us today appears to imply that we need to completely overhaul an already existing structure, the authority for which lies within provincial jurisdiction. Before we jump into this unknown area, perhaps we should review our current situation.

If the member is implying that we should duplicate the system in place in the United States, there are several factors that need to be clarified. As hon. members may know, the U.S. system is a joint federal-state-university service.

• (1350)

First, what will be the cost? No doubt it would be rather substantial, particularly during the transition period to a new system.

Second, what would be the impact on Canadians who are currently involved in research and extension service delivery?

Third, is such a system relevant to today's reality? While it has been successful in the past, many of the more educated American farmers are questioning whether such a system best serves their needs.

This government favours an alternate approach that would encourage a more co-operative, responsible and effective extensive service which builds upon the institutional structures already in place across Canada.

As hon. members know, under our federal system, responsibility and authority for various aspects of Canadian agriculture are shared between the federal and provincial levels of government. This sharing of responsibility and authority is based not just on the Constitution Act but also on historical and traditional practices that have evolved over time.

Today, the federal government carries the principal responsibility for agrifood related research. Some provinces also support active research programs which have helped broaden our knowledge base. In my own riding, at the research station at Agassiz, which has been there for over 100 years, there is co-operation between industry and the research station. The industries put several thousands of dollars every year into the agriculture base so that research can take place next door to where the industry is operating. That is mainly concerning some of the supply managed commodities. This also applies to the horticulture areas. They are experimenting with various crops that can be grown in the Fraser Valley. These things are ongoing and in place at present.

In recent years, there has been a move toward greater private sector involvement in agriculture food research. The result has been an increase in federal-provincial-private sector co-operation and in research activities. This is ongoing and I applaud it.

The provincial governments have the primary responsibility for extension services but the federal government has been involved in a limited and measured way. Examples of this involvement include federal-provincial development agreements, direct technology transfers through Agriculture Canada's research branch and the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Administration—which was better known when I grew up as the PFRA—and farm finance and management services through the Farm Credit Corporation and farm management specialists and agricultural economists.

Universities and colleges in Canada undertake a variety of agricultural research and extension activities. The level of effort varies substantially across institutions and provinces depending most often on the importance of agriculture to the regional and local economy.

This is one of the fundamental strengths of the current separation of responsibility as exists in Canada. While a national program may, at first glance, seem like the best way to go, more often than not, it is the local and regional interests that are in the best position to determine local needs.

Recognizing this regional diversity and growing importance of a more self-reliant, market responsive and environmentally sustainable agrifood industry in Canada, the Minister of Agriculture launched a comprehensive review of Canada's agrifood policy in December of 1989.

Since that time, 11 task forces and committees have been examining a range of agrifood issues and have provided advice on possible future actions. The minister and his provincial colleagues have met to discuss these recommendations on two occasions, and a third meeting is anticipated soon.

One of the 11 committees has been examining research and technology transfer issues. In fact, in conjunction with the Canadian Agriculture Research Council, a national conference on research and technology transfer priorities will be held in June of this year. Stakeholders from across the whole spectrum of the agrifood sector will be involved.

To highlight the co-operation that is being reinforced by the policy review, the provinces have agreed that Agriculture Canada will focus on the delivery of technology and information to provincial specialists who, in turn, will pass it along to producers.

Agriculture Canada, through the recently established Industry Relations Office, is also working closing with the private sector on the commercialization of technologies developed by the department. The task force on competitiveness confirmed the importance of effective technology transfer for a healthy and competitive agri-food industry. At their meeting in Winnipeg last November, agriculture ministers agreed to participate in the creation of an industry-led agrifood competitiveness council that will serve as a catalyst in turning task force recommendations into action.

Another task force has looked at farm finance and farm management issues. This past August in Moncton, federal and provincial agriculture ministers accepted the four recommendations of the task force. Those recommendations include the need to develop a national farm policy; to establish a clearly defined role for the Farm Credit Corporation; to extend the mandate of the farm debt review boards; and to establish a national program for farm management training services and information.

Now that the task force reports are in, the next few months will be dedicated to putting concrete measures into place that will meet the policy needs of Canadian farmers.

So you see, Mr. Speaker, the government is well aware of the need to provide effective extension services to Canadian farmers, whether it be in the research technology transfer or farm management training.

As has been the practice of this government since 1984, we are moving forward by consulting with our provincial colleagues, industry and producers.

The intended results of our efforts is not to substantially change the existing institutions or to build new ones simply to provide an illusion of action. The intended result is a more co-operative, responsive and effective extension service for Canadian farmers.

In closing, I would like to say that the various programs that I see first hand at the Agassiz Research Station and the field days that they conduct and the involvement of the farm community is just another example of the co-operation that goes on between the industry and the research stations in agriculture in Canada.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have an opportunity, if only for a couple of moments, to speak to the motion of the hon. member for Prince Edward—Hastings this afternoon because it deals with the whole range of government support programs, extension, research and so on.

I had the opportunity in 1987 or 1988 to visit most of the research facilities across Canada and to see how important they are to Canadian farm producers and in many cases how the co-operation between the federal and provincial governments provides these services, especially in Kentville, Nova Scotia, Lethbridge, Alberta and many other places across the country.

In the couple of moments that we have available to us, I would like to point out how devastating the figures are which the government released just last week. They show that in 1991 net farm income will be reduced by some 54.5 per cent from 1990, and 1990 was not a particularly good year in itself. Obviously, net farm income was twice as high as it will be in 1991.

Much of this reduction in net farm income—we hear that the Manitoba farm income will plummet by 51 per cent and other provinces likewise is due to the government's incessant reduction in government support programs since the 1988 general election. From 1988 to 1989 the reduction was over $100 million; in 1989 to 1990 some $1.3 billion; and in 1991 it is projected to be reduced another $400 million. We face a dramatic and plummeting reduction in government support programs which likewise is reducing net farm income, as I said, in 1991 by some 54 per cent, from $4.3 billion to $1.9 billion.

This motion deals with the matter of research and development. In the government's support programs for agriculture research in 1986 to 1990 in constant dollars there is a reduction of some $4 million in operating budgets. Capital budgets have been slashed by $15 million, transfer payments by some $500 million, and the total reduction is almost $20 million.

Thus, in the budget of 1989, the government really started to lower the boom on Canadian agriculture producers and has been doing so ever since. This is a time when world grain prices are the lowest in history. The demand and marketing is at the lowest in history. It is simply unconscionable.

Mr. Speaker: The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, last Friday night during the debate on the war against Iraq, over 200 people phoned the opposition lobby to talk to members of Parliament involved in that debate.

Only three of these callers supported the government position of using Canadian fighter aircraft against Iraq. The other 200 callers completely and vigorously opposed the government's position in this war. Many of the callers said they could not sleep. In fact, they had not been able to sleep since the war began.

I would like to place some of the comments on the record and share them with you. One of the callers said: "This war is a tremendous error." Another said: "It is totally reckless." Another caller said: "Bring our forces back. They have no business in that war." Another caller said: "We are ashamed of our government in terms of what it has done."

One of the most poignant calls was from Will Williams, a 100 per cent disabled Vietnam veteran from DeForest, Wisconsin. He was sickened by what George Bush has done and by the Congress for supporting him. He urged us to continue fighting against this war, a war created by George Bush.

Other colleagues will place more of these comments on the record today.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

BALTIC STATES

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, while the world's concern has been focused on the war in the gulf, attention has been diverted from the tragic events in the Baltic states. The recent attacks by the Soviet army on the people of the Baltic republics of Lithuania and Latvia are clearly as unacceptable as the aggressive acts of Saddam Hussein.

The unfolding of events in the Baltics and the gulf are frighteningly similar to those in 1956, when the Soviet army invaded Hungary while the world was occupied with the Suez crisis. With that in mind, the Soviet Union must immediately take concrete steps to ensure that aggression such as we have seen in Lithuania last week and Latvia on the weekend is not repeated.

Canada must condemn the actions of the Soviet army by petitioning the United Nations to address these obvious violations of basic human rights and to support the right to self-determination. Canada should also seriously reconsider its aid to the Soviet Union in light of recent events.

It is tragically ironic that, as a signatory of the UN resolutions condemning Iraq, the Soviet Union must now seek to repair its own violations of the UN charter.

NATIVE PROGRAMS FUNDING

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, once again the government has violated international law in its treatment of Canada's aboriginal people.

The Canadian Centre of International Pen, in co-operation with the Faculty of Law at the University of Toronto, undertook a study of Canada's obligations to native people under international law in response to the 1990-1991 federal budget cuts to native communication programs.

The government's treatment of aboriginal people will now be discussed by the United Nations Commission on Human Rights in Geneva.

I commend the Pen organization and the University of Toronto for their initiative and their interest. As the PEN president, John Ralston Saul, stated this morning: "This budget cut isn't a large one, just a small surgically-precise incision, enough to cut out the voice box of the native people."

The federal government wants to deny native people the very fundamental right of the freedom of speech.

AMNESTY INTERNATIONAL

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, last Friday I read for the first time Amnesty International's detailed report of human rights violations committed in Kuwait before the war.

Amnesty International asked the Iraqi government, after it had released several hundred western nationals, to end the imprisonment, torture and killings of several thousand people in Kuwait. We were shocked and horrified by the torture methods used by the Iraqi forces.

The team of investigators listed the names of about 1,000 people who had been arrested but believes the exact number is much higher. Thousands of people, including 13 year olds, are still being held in Iraqi and Kuwaiti prisons, detention centres and private homes. Others were killed shortly after their arrest at police stations or at their homes, or were gunned down.

Mr. Speaker, we all join Amnesty International in asking for a stop to the torture and killing in Kuwait by the Iraqis.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, in his comments on the Persian Gulf war, the Prime Minister has enjoyed quoting past Prime Ministers in similar situations. I would like to take this opportunity to quote some of the comments of average Canadians who called the House of Commons during the all-night debate early Saturday morning, January 19, 1991.

A Burnaby caller asked: "How do we change our role from peacekeepers to war-makers?"

A Newfoundland caller stated that "innocent women, children, and old people in Kuwait and Iraq did not cause this war, yet they are going to get hurt and killed".

Another caller told us that "people think this is one big Nintendo game. These are live players. It is not an artificial thing that gets eradicated. It is live flesh and blood."

From New Brunswick came: "Please continue to oppose this resolution. No one with 14 per cent public support has the mandate to take a country to war."

A Toronto caller said: "I came to Canada because I thought it was a safe haven. The actions of this government have destroyed that."

Another caller told us: "It is never too late to make a change to Canada's policy and turn Canada into a peacekeeper."

The Prime Minister should be more concerned with the opinions of ordinary Canadians, rather than quoting past politicians.

FISHERIES

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to talk about the total failure of federal fisheries policies in southwest Nova Scotia.

The minister has made much of the Hâché task force as a basis of his groundfish management program. But I attended those meetings and hearings and none of the inshore fishermen I met there backed the department's new ideas. In fact, there has been a lack of agreement.

We now have the individual transferable quota system which gives experienced fishermen ridiculously low quotas. Some fishermen are so angry at the new system that they are taking the Department of Fisheries and Oceans to court to solve it.

Because of the enterprise allocation to the offshore, National Sea Products is now renting these inshore boats to fish quota that used to go to these inshore communities.

Since December 18, 1990, I have been asking the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans for a meeting to discuss the situation, with no reply. I call on the minister to meet with me and, if not me, at least local fishermen to seek a reasonable solution quickly before things get out of hand.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Mr. Speaker, on August 2 the world watched with dismay as Iraq declared war and invaded Kuwait. The United Nations was quick to state its opposition to dictator Saddam Hussein's aggression. Canada actively participated in UN sanctions against Iraq. While months went by, many diplomatic solutions were sought. Saddam Hussein continued to say no to all peace initiatives.

On January 15, the allied forces, some 30 nations strong, moved to free Kuwait.

I call on all political parties to support Canada and the United Nations war effort, and on all Canadians to unite in our support of the men and women in the Canadian Armed Forces. We pray for their safety.

The nations of the world must find a lasting peace in the Middle East and throughout the world.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, hundreds of Canadians phoned the House of Commons opposition lobby early Saturday morning to let NDP MPs know how they feel about Canada's participation in the gulf war. Here are some of their comments.

A World War II veteran sarcastically complimented the Prime Minister for getting us into this mess. Another, a veteran of both World War II and the Korean War and a member of my father's regiment—the Queen's Own Cameron Highlanders of Winnipeg—said that the only common sense being heard in the House of Commons is from those who oppose the war.

A current member of the Canadian forces called to say that Canada's forces are ill-equipped to do what they are attempting to do, but that Canada is perfectly equipped for a peacekeeping role.

• (1410)

A woman from Nanaimo pointed out that she had lived in Britain through World War II and is against this war. "We should not bomb other people," she said.

Finally, a comment that sums up the feelings of many who called: "Please continue to oppose the resolution. No one with 14 per cent public support has the mandate to take the country to war."

At least one party is prepared to listen to the voices of reason from one end of this country to the other. I am proud to be a New Democrat.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, Iraq has not only rejected outright countless peace initiatives, but used the pause for peace to consolidate its grip over a sovereign nation taken by force and held under terror.

It is evident to all the world that the aggressor has no interest in discussion, negotiation or diplomacy. History has shown that appeasement does not work. Regrettably the world community had no alternative but to take the steps necessary to preserve world order and to safeguard the effectiveness and indeed the very future of the United Nations. Peace has a price. Canada now, as in the past, is prepared to meet that price.

I pay tribute to the men and women of the Canadian Armed Forces on duty in the gulf. They serve Canada in furtherance of UN resolution 678, not in a world as we would wish it to be, but in the real world. They are facing the grim reality of war and doing so with honour and courage. These brave Canadians are defending the values and interests of Canada.

Our thoughts and prayers are with them and their families. They have our respect and gratitude.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, regardless of our views on the decision to engage our forces in battle, we must unite as Canadians in support of the men and women of our Armed Forces. They are bravely putting their lives at risk in the hope that this conflict will be resolved quickly and peace restored.

Nobody wants to see Canadian forces engaged in battle. We would have preferred a peaceful solution to this conflict. However, we are now in a state of war and we must be careful to ensure that the actions we take and the speeches that we make in the House do not in any way adversely affect the morale of our Armed Forces.

War is always a time of pain, trauma, and hardship. It is also a time for our country to pull together. In speaking with my constituents on this matter, I recognize that there exists some diverse views as to what our role in the Persian Gulf should be. But most would agree that our thoughts, prayers, and support must go out to the men and women of our Armed Forces.

Let us hope that their efforts are accomplished with a minimal loss of life and that they are soon on their way back home.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, no Canadian seeks war, but we have a responsibility to protect the peace. The United Nations was founded to protect the world from unprovoked aggression. Canadians are willing to accept their responsibility to uphold the principles and mandate of the United Nations.

The son of the late Prime Minister Pearson, Geoffrey Pearson, was quoted this weekend as having said: "My father was no pacifist. His policy was based above all on the United Nations' importance as a peacekeeper. But once war broke out, he felt that UN member countries should use military intervention to oppose the aggressor."

He went on to say: "So, aside from a few slight differences, I think Mr. Clark is following Canada's diplomatic tradition."

Our nation is not a nation of pacifists. We are a nation of peacemakers. Today our forces are helping to establish peace in the Persian Gulf. Canadians did not want this war, but we are willing to accept our responsibility to uphold the principles and mandate of the United Nations.

SADDAM HUSSEIN

Mr. Bob Hicks (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, I think it is incumbent upon all of us to raise the morale any way possible for our troops in the multinational force.

It has long been a tradition to paint names and messages on the fronts of missiles to be launched, but I would like to suggest that our multinational forces no longer print Saddam on any missiles. No, Mr. Speaker, I would rather have them print Saddam in reverse, because Saddam spelled backwards is M–A–D–D A–S.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, despite intensive diplomatic effort prior to January 15, war has broken out and Canadians are trying to come to grips with it.

Violence is not an effective means of resolving disputes and we all wish it had not come to this.

We know it is difficult to imagine an end to this war but it will end one day and the issue will not be who wins or who loses, because, clearly, we all lose in situations like this. One of my constituents said: "Our world, poised on the brink of environmental collapse, crying out for the most basic reforms to bring some justice, food, and hope to the Third World, just cannot afford this waste of resources and lives."

Once this crisis is over, Canada and the United Nations will face a very important challenge and that is to find a long–lasting solution to the problems in the Middle East. To this end, it is my hope that the day will come when words like "war", "violence", and "destruction" will be removed from the dictionary of humanity and replaced by "dialogue", "diplomacy", and "peace".

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, war is one of the least acceptable human behaviours but even less acceptable is not standing up for your beliefs when all possible diplomatic alternatives have been attempted and rejected.

On Friday, some 200 students gathered at the University of Calgary to express their support for the United Nations forces, including the Canadian Armed Forces, seeking lasting peace in the Persian Gulf region. In a statement that speaks for many in southern Alberta, a home–made sign was hung over Memorial Drive in Calgary. It said simply, and I quote: "Canadians with life experience support you, Brian. The peace we enjoy costs something".

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we would like the Prime Minister to inform the House about the international situation.

This weekend, the press reported a statement by the Prime Minister that the conflict in the Persian Gulf would be a long and difficult war. I therefore want to ask him, since he expects a long and difficult war, whether he still stands by his commitment never to send land based troops to the Persian Gulf, as he said last week.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, from the outset, the government has always believed that this was a war that might last for an extended period.

We never thought this was a conflict that could be settled on a weekend. That being said, I think the government remains very confident with respect to the war being done by our armed forces and the forces of our allies which will deal with the problem definitively on the battle field.

As far as our commitment is concerned, this is something I mentioned before, which was also mentioned by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and it is an integral part of our Canadian policy.

BALTIC STATES

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister on another very serious international situation. As the Prime Minister knows, this past weekend, Soviet troops attacked the Latvian Department of the Interior, and at least five people were killed, some of whom were civilians and some of whom were press people. This crackdown came just one week after Soviet troops moved into Lithuania, killing 14 people. Will the government call in the ambassador of the U.S.S.R. and express to him the outrage of the people of Canada at this use of force?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have already called in the Soviet ambassador again today to make precisely that point, that Canada strongly condemns the brutal and unwarranted military force used against the people in the democratically-elected government of Latvia. I will have the opportunity later today to meet in my parliamentary capacity with Vice-President Ivans of Latvia who is coming to Ottawa to communicate directly the concerns and preoccupations of his people and his government.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, after the crackdown in Lithuania last week, the Prime Minister issued a press release in which he said: "Further escalation will have serious consequences for Canada-U.S.S.R. relations."

I would like to ask the Prime Minister: Given that we have seen "further escalation", what will the government do to pressure the Soviet Union into abandoning the use of deadly force in dealing with the people of the Baltic republics?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we are looking at action in three broad areas.

One, of course, is in our bilateral relations with the Soviet Union. We have indicated to them already that the line of credit and other emergency assistance that had been discussed by our government is under review.

The Leader of the Opposition will know that, even within the Canadian community of Baltic origins, there is some question as to whether or not we should be involved in actions that have to do with the delivery of foodstuffs to the Soviet Union. That is a matter that is being considered.

We are also looking at other actions on a bilateral basis that made it abundantly clear that this action by the Soviet Union will adversely affect relations between our two countries.

Second, we are looking at actions that can be taken internationally. There was a question raised by my colleague from Winnipeg and again by the member for Calgary the other day, and we are examining whether it is possible to raise these matters through the CSCE or through the United Nations. There is a problem of a Soviet de facto veto in both cases.

Finally, Canada is looking at concrete ways in which we can support the Baltic states through increased contacts and direct assistance. I hope to have the opportunity to discuss some of those in detail in my meeting later today.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, my questions are to the same minister.

As we know, one week ago, the world witnessed the bloody crackdown against Lithuania. Today, the Canadian Latvian community is outraged by the senseless tragedy of the Soviet black berets killing and maiming innocent civilians and journalists in Riga over the weekend.

I would like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs: In light of the critical events happening in the Baltic states, would he, which he can do pursuant to Standing Order 53, call for an emergency debate on this very critical issue?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would certainly favour an emergency debate by this House on that matter.

I believe that there may be the opportunity for that issue to be discussed among House leaders. Indeed, it may already be under consideration by House leaders, and I would not want to intrude upon their decisions.

I think it would be helpful following the unanimous resolution that was passed here if there were a short, clear debate by this Parliament allowing representative members of Parliament of all parts of the House to express their views clearly and unequivocally to the Soviet people and, indeed, to the people of the Baltic republics.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, to the same minister.

This Saturday, January 19, my colleague from Scarborough Centre and I attended a meeting with close to 500 Canadians of Baltic descent to discuss this current crisis in the Baltic states.

Among other demands, Baltic Canadians want the Government of Canada to call on the United Nations to send observers to the region and to recognize the councils of the republics in Canada. I want to ask the minister: Will he consider these two requests from the Baltic Canadians? Can we expect some action on these two recommendations as soon as possible?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Scarborough Centre, as is her custom on these matters, brought the contents of this discussion immediately to my attention this morning.

We had an opportunity to discuss it in detail. I am not yet in a position to respond to the question put in the House by my hon. friend and put to me earlier by the hon. member for Scarborough Centre, but we hope to be able to respond in—excuse me?

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): What is the U.S. doing?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): The hon. member speaking from her seat asks what the United States is doing.

She would be interested to know that, among the communications to the Soviet Union by western leaders, no one spoke more strongly, no position was more emphatically stated than that by the Prime Minister of Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, indeed, without commenting upon her question or upon the reaction of other countries, I can say without any fear of contradiction that the statement by the Prime Minister of Canada was the strongest issued by any leader of a western government and we intend to follow in that course.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, on July 25 of last year, one week before Saddam Hussein attacked Kuwait, the U.S. ambassador told him that she had been instructed by James Baker to say: "We have no opinion on the Arab–Arab conflicts like your border disagreement with Kuwait. The issue is not associated with America."

Given this history and given western and U.S.S.R. arms sales to Iraq, can the Prime Minister indicate whether Canada agreed with these early U.S. signals and with these arms sales to Iraq, and what concrete diplomatic efforts Canada is making, both at the United Nations and in direct dialogue, hopefully with Iraq and through the Arab league, to bring this mad war to an immediate end?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have had extensive conversations with foreign ministers in the region and with Secretary–General Perez de Cuellar with regard to means by which this matter can be ended peacefully. I believe the hon. member knows that.

He will also know that Mr. Perez de Cuellar has expressed his view that there has to be a response by Saddam Hussein to the actions of the United Nations before there can be serious talk of a pause, a withdrawal or other actions of this kind. We agree with the Secretary–General of the United Nations on that matter.

I certainly did not know at the time what conversations ensued between the ambassador of another country and Iraqi authorities in July. Certainly it is our view that the questions raised by the invasion of Kuwait, that direct challenge to international law, and the refusal by Saddam Hussein to respect or respond to the wishes of the world united, is a matter which raises direct Canadian interests and requires a Canadian response.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, of course, the minister has not dealt with the very important question of arms sales into that region in the period leading up to the invasion.

My supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister knows that with the massive carpet bombing now under way in Iraq the objectives of this war are not, if they ever were, to solely remove Iraq from Kuwait in compliance with UN resolutions, but clearly to destroy Iraq militarily, economically and socially. In short, this is not a UN authorized war but a U.S. led war.

Will the Prime Minister now tell Canadians how many men, women and children have died in this war, both civilian and military, including the republican guard, since censorship denies us this fundamental information? Will the Prime Minister now recognize that Canadian troops should not be involved in this tragic war but instead, Canada should be playing a humanitarian, medical role and ultimately, a peacekeeping role, to help reduce the terrible toll that this war will take in human, economic and ecological terms?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think most of us in this House believe that the most humanitarian action that can be taken is to end this conflict quickly, to end it finally and to end it in a way that respects not only the integrity of Kuwait, but also the effectiveness of the United Nations. That is what we are trying to do. I have no idea what the hon. member is trying to do.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister will know that an all-party delegation has just returned from the Horn of Africa which currently faces a famine of biblical portions. The gulf war is likely to seriously complicate the delivery of emergency relief through the Red Sea and the Gulf of Aden to the Sudan and Eritrean ports.

• (1430)

Would the Prime Minister therefore undertake to inform the United Nations and other relief agencies that Canada, if asked to do so, is prepared to redeploy our air and naval forces already in the gulf to provide escort services for the delivery of humanitarian aid to the Horn of Africa?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, all the implications of that question will of course have to be looked at with some care.

My colleague, the Minister for International Trade, will be meeting with the all-party delegation which has just returned from the Horn of Africa. We are very concerned about the situation there and want to take practical steps to be of help to it.

The hon. member, inadvertently perhaps, underlines that when Saddam Hussein attacked Kuwait, when he started this war, he had effects not only upon the people of Kuwait, but he had effects upon suffering people everywhere in the world: in the Horn of Africa, in Zimbabwe, in Senegal, and in Bangladesh.

That is why this has to be stopped, and that is why it has to be stopped within the authority of the United Nations.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Today and tomorrow in Ottawa, the Department of External Affairs is meeting with various NGOs in the preparation of the upcoming 47th session of the UN Commission on Human Rights. The cruel and unwarranted human rights violation against the people of the Baltic states should be a top priority at this session.

Would the minister outline what steps Canada will take at this session on human rights to help bring an end to these atrocities in the Baltic states?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the consultations with non-governmental organizations interested in human rights is precisely to ensure that we have the best advice from the non-governmental sector as to how we can advance legitimate Canadian interests most effectively through United Nations agencies.

There are people who are speaking on behalf of the Baltic peoples participating in those meetings. We will certainly take their advice seriously. If there are ways in which those interests can be advanced through the United Nations, we will advance them.

I make the point that we must also act on other fronts. That is why we are looking, in addition to the United Nations, to the CSCE; why the Prime Minister sent a very strong letter to Mr. Gorbachev; and why we are looking at other ways in which we can offer symbolic and substantial help to the Baltic peoples.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): My supplementary question is directed to the same minister, Mr. Speaker.

These outrageous atrocities are happening today. They happened yesterday and they happened last week. Still I hear that we plan to keep moving at a slow pace.

Would the minister please assure me and the people on this side of the House that he has instructed these people who are meeting with the NGOs to try to attempt to bring an end to these gross violations of human rights? Would the minister please assure me that he has asked these people to make that representation?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is very important that this House be heard. It is very important that individual members, like the hon. member who has spoken, stand and express their concerns as evocatively as they can. But, at the end of the day, these kinds of expressions of opinion by parliamentarians in Canada will be effective only if we can find resolute ways that persuade Soviet authorities.

That is why the Prime Minister of Canada deliberately sent the strongest message sent by any western leader to Mr. Gorbachev insisting that he desist. That is why we have made it clear that the nature of relations between Canada and the Soviet Union will be very much affected by his response to that position. That is why we are looking at ways that have not been developed before and that may not be acceptable to other countries by which we can establish symbolic and substantial help to the Baltic peoples.

The members words are welcome. If she has suggestions as to particular actions that will work, that will be effective, that will have a resonance beyond this House, I would welcome hearing from her.

BALTIC STATES

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Considering the tragic events in the Baltic states and the involvement of the Soviet army, will the minister stop the deportation of refugees from those countries, especially those who do not want to be drafted into the Soviet army?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we have a deportation policy that is very sensitive to the situation in countries that are part of the Soviet Union. Similarly, people from the Soviet Union who are in this country may apply for a visa extension in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my colleagues and I have been informed this weekend that some refugees from the Baltic states presently in Canada are being deported. They believe that once they are in the Soviet Union they will be drafted by the army.

Will the minister make sure there is no deportation into the Baltic states?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we have been very sensitive to the situation in the Baltic states. Of course the people from these states carry Soviet passports, so it is up to them to identify themselves as being from a Baltic state.

However, our practices will continue to be very sensitive to the situation there.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It also pertains to the situation in Latvia and Lithuania and, for all we know, any day now in Estonia with respect to the use of violence against civilians and the imposition of Soviet control over the democratically elected governments of these Baltic republics.

I am asking the Secretary of State for External Affairs, not quarrelling with his analysis of the strength of the Prime Minister's statement but recognizing the urgency of the situation there that some action be taken: What can Canada do today at the United Nations to bring this issue into the international arena where it belongs?

I suggest to the Secretary of State for External Affairs that he not let the Soviet veto get in the way. If the Soviets want to veto some suggestion by Canada, so be it, but Canada should be making concrete suggestions as to how this can be dealt with at the UN.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I accept that and I agree with that. There is of course an extension between making a case and having a direct effect. I accept the hon. member's case that despite the veto there may well be things we should be doing at the UN and indeed in the CSCE.

I think the most practical thing I could do today is to accept the opportunity as a parliamentarian to meet the vice-president of Latvia who is here, and I have changed my schedule to do that.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I am sure everyone welcomes the willingness of the minister to meet with these groups, but in the end he will have to act on behalf of the government and not as a parliamentarian. What we are trying to suggest are ways and things that the government can do.

Therefore, I have a supplementary question having to do with the direct assistance option of which the minister spoke. I am in receipt of information which the government may already have of the various medical needs of the republic of Lithuania and certainly now of the republic of Latvia as a result of the actions taken by the Soviet troops.

I wonder whether the government is now making plans to deliver that kind of medical aid, equipment, et cetera, drugs and various other things that are needed in those republics as a result of Soviet action.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the short answer to that question is yes.

Indeed we have had discussions with some provincial governments which have indicated a willingness to make some contributions to medical aid. We are looking at other ways in which we can both assemble the aid and ensure that it reaches its destination. The latter problem may prove more difficult than the former, but I have some confidence that that can be accomplished. I would appreciate, naturally, the help of members of the House in identifying sources of medical aid that may be helpful to Canada and helpful to the people of the Baltic republics in this circumstance.

PRISONERS OF WAR

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and it concerns the treatment of prisoners of war.

In light of the parading of the coalition prisoners of war on Iraqi television over the weekend which gives cause for concern for their treatment, I wonder if the Secretary of State for External Affairs could tell the House what assurances Canada has sought to ensure that prisoners of war are treated by the Iraqis according to the 1949 Geneva Convention on the treatment of prisoners of war.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have today called in the ambassador of Iraq to Canada to demand precisely those undertakings. That is Iraq's clear obligation under international law, and Canada expects it to adhere absolutely to those obligations.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): I thank the minister for his direct answer. I am sure he is doing all within his power to talk with Iraq.

Those of us in the House who have looked at some of the things they have done, even before the war, would have great cause and indeed wonder if they would honour these commitments.

I would ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs to give us perhaps his assurance or response to the proposal that we may have to go outside the Iraqi ambassador and indeed seek assurances from international organizations directly, like, for example, the International Red Cross.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly prepared to do that.

I would remind the hon. member that when there was an agreement by the world, indeed an agreement that had been initiated by Canada with regard to trying to get food and medical supplies to people in particular need in Iraq by way of the International Red Cross, it was Saddam Hussein who said no, just as he has said no throughout this piece.

It would be extremely unwise for anyone to assume that, until he is forced to, Saddam Hussein is going to change a position which has consistently, day after day, using all the time that we have given him, put the world more and more at risk.

FREEDOM OF THE PRESS

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, the government continues to state that Canadian forces in the gulf are under Canadian command.

Can the Prime Minister reassure Canadian journalists that our traditional freedom of the press will co-exist with security in a war zone for the duration of this conflict?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, indeed the Canadian forces are under Canadian command. Any journalists who are there will obviously be given full freedom of the press, subject of course to all necessary requirements stipulated by military authorities in a war zone.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, but the question is: Whose authority? The Canadian Association of Journalists complains that our reporters are subject to U.S. censorship.

Can the Minister of National Defence assure this House that Canadian reporters will be able to tell the full story of our forces and the job they are doing to the Canadian people?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as of last Friday, I signed a letter to the president of Canadian Press, which represents the media located in the Persian Gulf area. I outlined exactly the attitude and the opportunities available for the Canadian media to be briefed and to be brought up to date without harming the operational capability of the Canadian forces.

I cannot guarantee for other nations or I cannot guarantee that Canadian media located in other countries where Canadian military authorities are not functioning can have the same access. I am sure people will recognize the consistency with which we have dealt with the media, and that will continue.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

One of the factors which has made the public skeptical of the war in the gulf, in particular the motives of western governments, has been the role of western governments over the past 10 years in the sale of arms to Iraq, against which this government is sending our forces. I raised this issue in the House last November. Has the government investigated the role of Canadian government departments and Canadian companies in the sale of arms to Iraq and if so, what can the government report to the House?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we have looked at that. The hon. member will know that there were some unsubstantiated allegations by a Canadian journalist with regard to a particular transaction. We have asked for any evidence that journalist might have. He has provided us with none. All of the evidence we have indicates that his alleged facts are wrong.

The hon. member will also know that I have tightened the export control restrictions generally with respect to export of goods to that region which might be used as arms. I believe there have been no Canadian shipments. Again, if the hon. member has any hard evidence, not unsubstantiated allegations, not allegations in the air, I would like to look at them.

Finally, it is going to be very important for the world to seize the opportunity when this war is over to have a more effective regime. I have spoken about that. Among the steps that our diplomats are taking now, as we look to what Canada might do, what initiative we might take after the crisis is over, is an identification of the practical measures that might be taken to stop the trade of arms, not only into Iraq but into that volatile region.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have information that Iraq now has in place artillery capable of firing shells with high explosive or chemical warheads at extended ranges, shells which were tested by a private Belgian company in 1987-88 at the Department of National Defence Research Centre at Suffield, Alberta.

If the Department of National Defence did not know this, and I am advised that it could have known it by simple inquiries, that the shells were destined for Iraq, can the minister tell us whether the government was aware of this? Will the minister agree that an immediate, independent, public investigation be launched into Canadian involvement in all arms sales to Iraq?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am still not aware of anything other than the allegation which has just been made by the hon. member. If he is serious, he will provide us right now—lay it upon the table of the House, or deliver it to me directly—all of the information that he has that we should be pursuing.

On the basis of the information I have, there has been no Canadian involvement in that trade. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I am pleased that the hon. member now understands that Saddam Hussein does possess this deadly capacity and if we had given him the time, which the hon. member and his party asked us to give him, he would have made more deadly use of that potential.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It concerns the very serious human rights violations in Latvia and the other Baltic countries.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs is aware that the third round of the CSCE conference on the human dimension, the human rights conference, is being held in Moscow later this summer with the U.S.S.R as host. Surely we should be thinking about bringing some pressure to perhaps relocate that meeting to another country or withdrawing from it.

I think it would be a tragedy, if the U.S.S.R. does not change their approach, for us to attend a human rights conference in Moscow.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, when the decision was taken to have the conference of the CSCE in Moscow, I believe Canada was the last country of the CSCE to agree to that location. We did so with some reluctance, precisely because we wanted to have some guarantees as to the commitment of the Soviet Union to human rights matters.

It was the judgment of the Government of Canada at that time that it was very important to have a conference on that topic in the atmosphere of perestroika and glasnost within the Soviet Union. We have secured guarantees with respect to access of journalists, the position of non-governmental organizations and the like.

I agree with the hon. member that the events in the Baltic republics raise questions that must be considered with regard to that meeting. I think he would agree with me that it would be well for the Government of Canada and others to respond, prudently and carefully, to that proposal, so what I will do is note a proposal that has been made by a member of the House.

INTERNATIONAL ENERGY AGREEMENT

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Under the free trade agreement, Canada is required to proportionately share its oil and gas with the United States. Is the minister preparing to honour this agreement when the U.S. suffers a shortage as a result of what the Prime Minister has predicted to be a long and difficult war in the Persian Gulf?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, first of all, with respect to the free trade agreement, I point out to the hon. member that chapter 9, the energy chapter, commits both signatories to all the obligations that they had taken before that, principally, the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

As well, I remind the hon. member that in 1974 the then Liberal government joined Canada—and I agree with that—in the International Energy Agency, whereby Canada obligated itself for sharing of any shortfalls. It is that obligations which Canada is following and not the free trade agreement.

[Translation]

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the same minister. Could he confirm that the government has prepared a gas rationing plan for consumers and that ration coupons are about to be printed, in fact, are being printed at this very moment in Cornwall?

[English]

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada, along with the provinces and the industry, has developed an oil and gas industry in which our reserves have, in fact, increased since the days of the latter seventies and the early eighties.

Second, I point out to her that we are in a position where we are a net exporter of oil and gas.

Third, it is for these reasons that this government has spent a lot of money in encouraging new projects, both in the west and off the east coast, so that we can increase our supply.

Last, under the International Energy Agreement, there are three stages, one of public information, the second a co-ordinated emergency response mechanism which we triggered after the invasion and, third, if there should be rationing, as part of the IEA— which we do not believe will happen—we have not printed coupons. If we were to ever come to that point, it was the Liberal government of 1974 that committed Canada to that approach.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. On Friday, the Leader of the Opposition asked the government if it would provide humanitarian aid to the people of Israel, in light of the unprovoked attack upon it by Saddam Hussein and in light of our sympathy and solidarity with that country and the Prime Minister said that such aid had been offered. I ask the Prime Minister if he can provide the House with the details of this humanitarian aid at this time.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as my colleague and I pointed out in the House, not on Friday but on Tuesday, we believed that the ultimate ambition of Saddam Hussein was to launch an attack against Israel. This is one of the reasons why Canada has taken such a firm stand in defending the United Nations and its principles because that was consistent with the avoidance of the kind of attacks we have seen against Israel.

When the attacks took place, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and I immediately conveyed to the Prime Minister of Israel and his government our expressions of solidarity and support, together with our intention to be of assistance in respect of any humanitarian requirements that might arise.

We have been keeping in touch both with the government of Israel and with leaders of the Jewish community across Canada. We have not yet received a specific demand, but the Government of Israel has expressed great appreciation for the understanding, support and solidarity manifested by the government and the people of Canada.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, in light of all these contacts, I again ask the Prime Minister if he can tell us more about this aid which will be welcomed by all concerned, and in particular if he can tell us exactly what this aid will consist of.

When will it be sent? Will it help repair the damage caused by the missiles? Also, will it help provide housing for the hundreds of thousands of refugees crowding into Israel because of conditions in the Soviet Union?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member at the end of his question raises another matter which has to do with housing and refugees.

When I was in Israel in November, there were discussions with regard to Canadian assistance for housing. We said that we would be prepared to have Canada involved in that kind of assistance provided it did not have to do with housing in the occupied territories.

With regard to the humanitarian assistance, it would come from CIDA. Sources have been identified. The government of Israel has, very recently, not only indicated its appreciation of the help that was offered but suggested that at this stage it was an offer which, while appreciated, would not be taken up at this stage.

We have also made a similar offer to the government of Jordan. The Jordanians also indicated that because the reports had been exaggerated of the impact of missiles falling on their territory they would not respond at this stage.

I should take the opportunity, since it relates to humanitarian assistance to Jordan, to say that I have discussed with Jordanian officials help that Canada might provide to Jordan in dealing with refugees who might come into that country as a result of their decision, taken at the urging of the world, to open their border to refugees from Iraq or elsewhere.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

We are hearing reports in generalization of carpet bombing of Iraq day after day and night after night, but because of military censorship we are not getting any of the facts about casualties which, judging by World War II experience, potentially can be very devastating.

Will the minister give us some estimate from his sources of how many people—men, women and children—military or civilian, have been killed in this carpet bombing?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the only estimate I can give him is that which Saddam Hussein put forward from Iraq. The fatalities are less than 100.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

King Hussein of Jordan recently called for a temporary ceasefire to give dialogue and diplomacy a chance to avert a tragic disaster. Will the Secretary of State for External Affairs comment as to what is Canada's response to King Hussein's call?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The Government of Canada has maintained the most active possible contact with King Hussein and with his government.

We thought that was particularly necessary because other governments involved in the coalition were not maintaining that contact. That is the reason I visited Jordan in November, and that is the reason why the Prime Minister has been in regular communication with the King. That is why I phoned Mr. Masri, the foreign minister two days ago. We are maintaining close contact with him.

Our ambassador, Percy Sherwood, was called in by King Hussein two nights ago. King Hussein expressed to him his deep appreciation of the leadership that Canada has shown in keeping lines open between members of the coalition and Jordan.

• (1500)

With respect to the particular proposal that King Hussein has put forward, that is one with which we disagree. We think it would be inappropriate for there to be a pause or a cease-fire until Saddam Hussein has used the channels that are open to him to indicate clearly that he is prepared to accept Security Council resolutions that were duly passed, and that he had an opportunity to accept in conditions of peace and they now are being enforced by the world.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

PENITENTIARY ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston) moved that Bill S-119, an act to amend the Penitentiary Act to reinstate the statutory visitation privileges of members of Parliament, be now read a first time.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Routine Proceedings

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND INTERNATIONAL TRADE STANDING COMMITTEE

AUTHORIZATION TO BROADCAST PROCEEDINGS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions on all sides of the House and I believe that you will find the necessary consent for the following motion:

That this House authorize the broadcasting, pursuant to the principles and practices governing the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons, by the electronic media as represented through the House of Commons Press Gallery, of the meeting of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade, Monday, January 21 at 3.30 p.m.;

That such broadcasting be at the discretion of the chairman of the committee; and

That the decorum of the meeting be preserved.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is there agreement?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of residents of Ontario who are concerned about the Young Offenders Act.

The petitioners are asking for more severe penalties for those convicted of violent offences, mandatory psychiatric treatment for young offenders ordered by the courts to receive it, the release of names of young offenders convicted of murder and sex crimes and violent assaults, and the automatic transfer to adult court of those young offenders charged with sex crimes and murder.

BALTIC STATES

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, I present this petition from concerned citizens of Canada who presented me with this petition this weekend which is in response to the crisis in the Baltic states.

The House knows that Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia have been on the forefront of economic reform and real democratization.

The petitioners state that President Gorbachev has begun to use force to impose his rule in place of the democratically elected government of Lithuania. They also state that the Soviet Union is not adhering to its obligations under the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe and is refusing to negotiate solutions based on the principles of the Helsinki Final Act.

The petitioners are calling upon the Parliament of Canada to recognize immediately the legitimate democratically elected government of the Republic of Lithuania. They demand that the Soviet Union withdraw all military forces from Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania and that unconditional international aid to the Soviet Union in the form of credits and feed grains be conditional upon the withdrawal of Soviet troops in the Baltic states and resolution of the Baltic crisis.

POST OFFICE CLOSURE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by several hundred constituents in the community of Algoma Mills.

The petitioners point out in their petition that a federally operated post office has been an integral part of that village since 1882 and ask that it not be replaced by a privatized postal outlet.

The petitioners point out that it is important to the community and call upon Parliament to urge the government to cancel any plans to close or privatize the said post office.

NATIVE PROGRAM FUNDING

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by 113 people in communities across Canada, which calls for reinstatement of funding to the native communications program and the aboriginal broadcasting programs.

As the House will know, International Pen, a writers' organization which draws world attention to violations of the right of freedom of speech, has criticized cutbacks in the funding of aboriginal broadcasting and communications because it was motivated, not by budgetary reasons, but by an attempt on the part of the Secretary of State to silence aboriginal communities and to suppress their cultural and political rights which are guaranteed by international conventions to which Canada is a signatory.

The petitioners ask the government to respect its obligations under international law, stop suppressing freedom of speech for aboriginal organizations, and restore funding to the aboriginal communications program.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, with yet another petition of almost 100 names from residents of Mission—Coquitlam who have called on the government to consider their petition and their position that Canada, which has a solid reputation as a dependable advocate and supporter of the United Nations and is recognized world-wide as a peacekeeping nation, would have found that economic sanctions were a non-violent and effective means of applying pressure and influencing countries and their leaders.

The petitioners urge the government to resist war in the Middle East and to allow time to put pressure on Saddam Hussein to withdraw his troops from Kuwait.

POSTAL SERVICES

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table 78 pages of petitions, which have been certified correct as to form and content pursuant to Standing Order 36, from Prince Rupert.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to request that the minister responsible for the Canada Post Corporation instruct Canada Post to keep full wicket service open at the Prince Rupert post office; that further wicket positions be opened at the Prince Rupert post office; and that Canada Post Corporation be instructed to operate longer hours, expand revenue-generating services, expand letter carrier delivery, and stop privatizing.

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHT TESTING

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and pleasure, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to introduce a petition from 108 people living in Innisfail, Calgary, Lethbridge, Monarch, Edmonton, and Bassano, members of the Anglican Church of the Diocese of Calgary, who point to the health threats of the low-level flight tests at Nitassinan, Labrador-Quebec against the Innu and Inuit people, and also the position of the General Synod of the Anglican Church of Canada calling on the federal government to stop the NATO low-level flight testing there.

The petitioners, therefore, request the government to halt all low-level flight testing and related training over lands inhabited and claimed by the Innu and Inuit people, to withdraw Canada's invitation to NATO to establish a permanent NATO tactical weapons base there, and to take steps to protect the livelihood of Canadians who would be adversely affected economically by the cessation of fighter bomber training.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present petitions, pursuant to Standing Order 36, certified correct as to form and content, from a number of people all over my riding showing that Canada's role as a peacekeeping nation with the UN has been effective and that role should be maintained in the present gulf crisis and that negotiations should be allowed to continue in the search for a peaceful solution in the Persian Gulf.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to keep the reputation of Canada as a peacekeeping nation to act in the best interests of all Canadians.

POSTAL SERVICES

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I, too, have the honour to table two different petitions on the subject of postal services. The government has a habit of taking away mailboxes and cutting services without consulting the constituents.

In the first petition, the petitioners call upon the government to relocate the mailbox which was located at 223 Roncesvale Avenue in Toronto, so that the people can use that box and not have to go long distances to post a letter.

The second one is with regard to Postal Station M which has been moved. The petitioners request that the government provide Priority Post, registered mail, the sale of stamps and related items, lock boxes, et cetera, in the new location, as was provided in Postal Station M.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

BALTIC STATES

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I move, pursuant to Standing Order 52, seconded by the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard, for leave to adjourn the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely the turmoil in the Baltic states.

Although the House of Commons recently passed a resolution on the situation, I strongly feel that events over the weekend in Latvia and the increase in military activity in all three states warrant serious discussion on the future of Canada's relations with the Soviet Union.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the motion of the House of January 15 condemning the Soviet Union on its policy in the Baltic states, I request under Standing Order 52 leave to have an emergency debate on the aggression against the Baltic nations by uncontrolled special forces of the Soviet Union.

A genuine emergency has arisen due to the fact that the duly elected governments of Latvia, Estonia, and Lithuania are under siege by an aggressor. We cannot reward aggression, that precedent being established by the coalition against Iraq.

I am calling for an immediate debate, as well, because international law has been broken by a foreign power, the U.S.S.R., as Canada has never recognized the forceful annexation of those Baltic states.

As Your Honour is aware of the new developments in the Baltic states since the motion of the House on January 15, the debate being of urgency should take priority over the day-to-day business of the House.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on the same issue?

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but the hon. member did not give the Chair notice as required under Standing Order 52.

[English]

I have received two applications under Standing Order 52 for an emergency debate with respect to the issue in the Baltic states. The first is from the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park, and the second from the hon. member for Calgary Northeast.

The House of course is aware, as has been mentioned by both hon. members, that a joint resolution of the House was passed a few days ago and since then there has been continual discussion, at least in Question Period, on the subject.

However, I am conscious, as I must be as your Speaker, of comments made during exchanges today in Question Period. It has been made very clear to the House, through the right hon. Secretary of State of External Affairs, that some discussion is going on at the moment among House Leaders and others in the House with respect to a possible debate. Until I have heard further in that regard, I am going to reserve my decision. I thank the hon. members for raising the matter.

EUROPEAN BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT AGREEMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Wednesday, December 19, 1990, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-88, an act to provide for the membership of Canada in the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development, be read the third time and passed.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in third reading of this bill. We can view with some gratification, indeed some anticipation, the likely outcome of the initiative which is embodied in this piece of legislation.

No one in this House or indeed anyone in the western world can do other than welcome the extraordinary events in eastern Europe over the past year or 18 months which have led to the proposal now before us to create a European Bank for Reconstruction and Development. It is not very many years ago when the concept of a bank embracing both the countries of eastern and western Europe, and indeed countries outside Europe, in a common effort to bring about the more rapid economic development of the now united continent of Europe would have been virtually unthinkable.

Yet here we are today with a bill before the House for third reading which will bring about Canada's participation in the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development. It will enable Canada to contribute to the resources of the bank and make Canada one of its founding members.

We on this side of the House welcome the development of the idea first broached by President Mitterrand in the summer of 1989. We welcome Canada's participation and we look forward to the early date when the bank will play a major role in giving further substance to the unification that we have seen in Europe.

This is primarily a bank with the purpose of channelling funds into the now market-oriented economies of central and eastern Europe. It is a bank which will be committed to providing funds for those nations in central and eastern Europe which demonstrate the principles of multi-party democracy, of pluralism, and market economics.

Canada's participation in the bank will be substantial. We shall hold 3.4 per cent of the shares in the bank. We shall over a period of five years contribute some $150 million toward the capital of the bank. That is a contribution and a participation that ranks Canada among the more active members of the bank.

In passing I would ask of the government whether in terms of participation in the bank what has become of the fact that the original terms under which the bank was proposed envisaged a role for the German Democratic Republic. Should we now assume that those shares will be picked up by the Federal Republic of Germany, the now united Germany, and, if so, will that make Germany the largest single participant in the bank?

If one assumes that the German Democratic Republic and the Federal Republic shares are to be merged into the shares of the now united Germany, it would indeed make Germany the largest participant in the bank, with a few shares more than that of the United States, which in the original planning was to have been the largest single participant.

I would ask the government, before we finish our brief discussion of this bill, whether it might respond to that particular question.

As I have noted, the legislation before us makes it clear, as does the bank's articles of constitution, that the principal purpose of the new bank will be to channel funds to private enterprise, the market-oriented economies of central and eastern Europe. Throughout eastern Europe, there is a great need to promote private and individual initiatives.

All of us, I am sure, on every side of this House, look toward such an initiative as a major way of underpinning the developments of the last 18 months in eastern Europe. It can help to give substance to the desire on the part of the eastern European countries to move away from the communist regimes which have marked their post-war history to the open market economies that have contributed so substantially to the contrasting prosperity in western Europe.

In addition, we on this side of the House, and I am sure all members, welcome the fact that some major part of the funds of the bank will be directed toward the necessary restructuring of the public goods and services of eastern Europe. I speak principally of questions pertaining to the environment which have been sadly neglected in eastern Europe in the post-war years. In addition, funds will be directed to the public works which are in most eastern European countries in need of refurbishment or of replacement.

We shall see, I think, a major demand on the bank's resources in the time ahead will be to contribute to the environmental clean-up, the infrastructure and perhaps, most important, the reform of state-owned corporations. But the principal purpose, and I think we should not lose sight of that, is that the bank will promote the development of market-oriented economies through eastern Europe, a type of economy to which the countries of eastern Europe have clearly and consistently in the past months committed themselves.

In conclusion, one comment that has been raised in regard to the creation of the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development, which is to be situated in London, is that somehow it conflicts with the machinery and the potential of the World Bank, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, to channel funds to eastern Europe. For my part, I would not accept that the existence of the IBRD is a valid argument against the creation of the European Bank. Of course, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund will have a continuing role to play in the growth and renewal of the economies of eastern Europe. The fact remains, however, that within the United Nations system, the regional banks have been recognized as playing a substantial role in providing capital for the particular needs of the major regions of the world. Obviously, the Asian Development Bank has had considerable success in channelling funds into development projects in Asia, as has the Inter-American Development Bank in Latin America and the African Development Bank in that continent.

It is both consistent and natural that in the particular circumstances facing the countries of eastern Europe today, a special regional bank for Europe should also be created. Such a bank will be the best place to identify and to develop the projects that this common effort on the part of countries, not only in Europe but outside Europe, can hope to offer. It is for that reason and indeed for a variety of other reasons that we welcome this legislation pledging Canadian participation in the creation of the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to thank my colleague for his remarks with regard to this bill that we are discussing, Bill C-88.

He did ask a question with regard to the unity of the two Germanys and the amount of control that they may have. There was a document circulated I believe, last October, that referred to this. Germany, as a G-7 member, will have approximately 8 per cent. This leaves the United States still taking the lead role with 10 per cent and Canada with 3.4 per cent. I hope that this may answer my colleague's question that he put forth.

Mr. MacLaren: Mr. Speaker, perhaps it is a little unusual in the House for one question to beget another question to beget another question. In fact, the hon. member's information does not meet the point I was attempting to raise. That is, does the allocation to the then-German Democratic Republic, which was 15,500 shares, disappear on the occasion of the merger of the German Democratic Republic with the Federal Republic or is it being absorbed by the Federal Republic? If it has been absorbed, that would bring the total shareholding of the Federal Republic of Germany to slightly over 100,000 shares which is marginally ahead of those of the United States.

However, it is not my intention to take more time of the House on this point. I am sure the hon. member could provide me with that information in another way if she so wishes.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I will begin my comments on this bill by saying that there is a certain irony in the fact that we are debating this bill today at the same time that we are contemplating an emergency debate this evening on the situation in the Baltic republics.

One of the things that people have been discussing is what actions might be taken with respect to our relationship with the Soviet Union because of events in the Baltic.

Yet, here we are this afternoon sort of uncritically debating the establishment of a bank. I am not saying this in a critical way. I am just pointing out the irony of it. This bank is designed to relate not only to the countries of eastern and central Europe but also the Soviet Union.

Certainly this is part of the new relationship with the Soviet Union that has come about as a result of glasnost and perestroika. If in fact those movements within the Soviet Union are now being called into question as a result of the violence against civilians in Lithuania and just the other day in Riga, Latvia, then it is difficult to talk about this new bank being set up to further that new relationship, when we are in some doubt about the nature of that relationship as a result of the events in the Baltic.

Having said that, I think it is probably useful to go on because there is a deadline, as I understand it, to meet for the international agreement that would set up this bank, although that deadline is March 31, 1991. We are talking about some time.

I want to make it clear that I am not suggesting that we make any premature judgment about whether or not this bank is still a good idea. I think it is a good idea, but the fact that the Soviet Union is included in its ambit is perhaps something that is at least ironic, given events in the last few weeks in the Baltics.

We are all concerned about what is happening there. I had the occasion on Friday to visit with the Soviet ambassador to Canada, along with the hon. member for Scarborough and the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park, to express on behalf of the Canadian parliamentary group for the Baltic peoples our concern at what was happening in the Baltic states.

I may have more to say about that later this evening, if we get an emergency debate. Just in case, I wanted to say that that had happened and to say that we do not accept the official Soviet position put forward by the ambassador that all that is needed to solve the situation in the Baltic republics is for the Baltic republics to follow the newly established constitutional procedures for separation.

As you may know, Mr. Speaker, these procedures call for a five-year procedure by which republics would separate themselves from the Soviet Union. This is often cited by official Soviet spokespersons as the procedure which the Baltic republics should follow.

It goes unsaid in this kind of analysis, first of all, that the governments of the Baltic republics do not want to separate by virtue of a constitutional process because they continue to maintain they were illegally annexed into the Soviet Union. Therefore, for them to seek sovereignty through the established constitutional process of the Soviet Union would be for them to admit in a way they are unprepared to admit that they are in fact a part of the Soviet Union.

They wish to have a special negotiation with the Soviet Union, which recognizes the fact that a great part of the world, including themselves, never recognized their annexation by the Soviet Union. This is a position supported by the Canadian government and by the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade which had opportunity to go to the Soviet Union in April to meet with a variety of people, including representatives from Lithuania, about the Baltic situation.

The committee recommended that the special case of the Baltics be recognized, as it already has been by the Canadian government, by the Soviet Union. The committee recommended that the Soviet Union recognize the special status of the Baltic republics and hoped that the Soviet government and President Gorbachev might see their way through to being able to accept this special status of the Baltics and at the same time recognize that this did not necessarily set precedents for other republics which came into the Soviet Union in a different way. It was not as a result of the Molotov–Ribbentrop Pact of 1938.

There were plenty of grounds within the thinking of the international community for the Soviet Union to seize upon the special status of the Baltics and to have entered into meaningful negotiation with the newly elected governments of the Baltic republics, all of which were elected in 1990 as a result of the first real elections in those republics since before 1940.

I had the privilege of being there for one of those elections, the election in Lithuania in February 1990, with other members of this House, and saw first hand the authenticity and the civility with which the election in Lithuania was held. It strikes me as even more tragic the violence which is being visited upon the people of Lithuania and Latvia knowing, as I do, first hand the tremendous spirit of peaceful change through which these events happened and continue to happen in Lithuania.

All that is required, it seems to me, is for the leadership in the Soviet Union to determine first of all that the democratically elected governments of these republics not be overthrown by violence, not be overthrown at all but particularly not be overthrown by violence in the way some people have suggested is imminent. If Moscow, President Gorbachev or whoever the powers that be are now in Moscow were to allow that to happen, this would certainly mean a fundamental change in our attitude toward what is going on in the Soviet Union.

Let those governments continue to exist. Call back the black berets and others who are involved in these military actions against police loyal to their democratically elected governments and negotiate. It is okay for Moscow to negotiate toughly. It is okay for it to take a hard line with respect to what sovereignty might mean. It is okay for it to have its own position. I think it has a lot of legitimate concerns with respect to Baltic sovereignty, from security concerns to various economic concerns, to concerns about minorities within the Baltic republics and how they might be treated by the ethnic majorities in those Baltic republics.

There are plenty of things to be worked out and worked out over a long period of time in all likelihood, but worked out; not resolved by the swinging barrel of a Soviet tank, by automatic gunfire or by the ways in which we have seen the problem approached in the last few weeks in Lithuania and in Latvia.

In this respect I want to say that I think the rebuilding of eastern and central Europe often characterized, particularly with the coming down of the Berlin wall, the end of the Second World War, the last legacy of the Second World War. We need to realize that until the status of the Baltic republics is dealt with, the Second World War really has not come to an end in the way in which many now speak of the situation in Europe.

The Berlin wall was not the last legacy of the Second World War. The fact that the Baltic states are a part of the Soviet Union and not able to assert their independence is the last legacy of the Second World War. Until that issue is wrapped up in the appropriate way, perhaps we should refrain from suggesting that all the consequences of the Second World War have come to an end. Certainly they are where they are as a result of an agreement between Adolf Hitler and Joseph Stalin. I do not think that can be separated from the history of the Second World War. That is why I say we should perhaps refrain from language which suggests that all the consequences of the Second World War have now been dealt with. They have not been.

One thing that needs to be dealt with, as a result of the democratically expressed will of all the countries of eastern and central Europe to be integrated into the global economy in a way in which they were not previously integrated, is how that is done. This bank is one of the measures contemplated, recommended, and is now in the process of being formed to help eastern and central Europe become integrated into that world economy.

I have a lot of problems with the economy into which they are being integrated. They will find that the streets will not be paved with gold as they enter into this new globalized capitalist economy. They will be entering that globalized capitalist economy at the worst possible time. Even if they had chosen to enter—and I am sure they would have done it in a more step-by-step way—or tried to integrate themselves more into the global economy back in 1968 when Alexander Dubcek first contemplated changing the nature of communism in Czechoslovakia, they would have had an easier time. At that time the kinds of mixed economies which might have made a transition period less difficult were more tolerated by the global economy.

Now it seems to me that these eastern and central European economies will have to go full circle and become full market capitalist economies, cold turkey so to speak, without any of the instruments at their disposal by which many western economies over the years shielded themselves, and appropriately so, from some of the tougher realities that enter in when one gets into a kind of truly global dog-eat-dog economy.

I am very pessimistic about what some of the consequences might be if this transition turns out to be too difficult. If people find, in the absence of the old system, that the new system is not yet able to deliver certain basic realities and needs like food, we may yet see a considerable political instability and unrest in those countries.

It behoves the west to put its money where its mouth has been for 45 years. We ought not to find ourselves in the position where it might be said of us that we shed all these crocodile tears for 45 years about the poor suffering people of eastern and central Europe, and for that matter the Soviet Union, because they were suffering under this particular system and yet, when they finally take the decision to break out of that system and say to us that they need our assistance in doing so to ensure that the transition is a transition which preserves democracy and which does not lead to political unrest and instability, we simply say: "Well, we have problems of our own now and you look after yourself".

If we have learned anything from recent events, it is that there is no such thing as an isolated event. If the reforms in the Soviet Union, in particular but also eastern and central Europe, were to come crashing down as a result of economic failure, it would have repercussions for everyone concerned.

It is not just a matter of saying, "Well, you know, it is a tough world out there. It is a global marketplace. Welcome to the global marketplace. The race goes to the swiftest and the strongest. If you are not able to cut the mustard, well, too bad". I am sorry. It is not going to work like that.

If certain countries are not able to integrate themselves into the globalized economy in a way that is acceptable to their populations, then we will continue to have very serious problems in Europe, not the least of which, Mr. Speaker, might be the reality of millions of economic refugees, tens of millions of people simply packing their bags and moving west.

Many people are concerned about this in Germany, France and other parts of Europe, that if the new expectations in eastern and central Europe are not met, the so-called western Europe will be faced with a flood of refugees. So there is no small measure of self-interest in making sure that the economic expectations raised by the dismantling of the command economies in formerly communist countries succeed, that those expectations are met.

In the long term, Mr. Speaker, we look forward to the day when these countries of eastern and central Europe will be fully integrated into the European community. I think that is the long-term expectation of those countries. Many of those countries, and certainly member countries now in the European Community someday will be looking at a fully integrated Europe, in which sovereignty, particularly economic sovereignty, will be ceded at a certain level to a supranational body, in this case, the European Community headquartered in Brussels.

Hopefully, within that larger supranational framework, we might see a time when a lot of the national, ethnic and regional rivalries might find ways of expressing themselves, not in outmoded 19th century nationalist feelings, but in appropriate regional and ethnic autonomies that find their place within this larger supranational reality.

The sovereignty of the nation state is eroded in two ways, downwards in a devolving sort of way towards forms of regional and ethnic autonomy, that might, for instance, meet the needs of the Croats in Yugoslavia or for that matter the Scots in Great Britain, and eroding upwards towards a larger regional reality in which economic sovereignty has been ceded to that greater authority.

What is also happening in Europe, and what I think is hopeful, is people are realizing that if there is to be that kind of integrated market economy, there also needs to be a basic agreement about social standards, income security, pensions, welfare policy and various other things.

If you are going to have this kind of competitive level playing field integrated economy on a regional basis, you also have to have agreements about what the floor is in terms of social justice so that one country is not able to play its workers off against workers in another country. That has implications for analysis of the free trade agreement between Canada and the United States, all of which I do not have time to go into because I understand that my time is running out, but I hope that my comments have been helpful.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, just a few words concerning this bill before the House. The bill really puts $120 million—that is not Canadian dollars, but American dollars—forward by Canada. When we go to the schedule of the bill, we find that the agreement establishing the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development, states:

> Considering the importance of close and co-ordinated co-operation in order to promote the economic progress of Central and Eastern European countries to help their economies become more internationally competitive and assist them in their reconstruction and development and thus to reduce, where appropriate, any risks related to the financing of their economies";

When I read those words I immediately thought about the fact that the German Democratic Republic, Poland, Bulgaria, U.S.S.R. are more competitive, more able to compete with eastern Canada for our great fishing resource than we are.

Let me mention some of the the allocations given by the Government of Canada for this year, 1991. The allocation for Bulgaria is 750 tonnes of redfish. Next to them is Cuba, but it has allocations everywhere. Then there is the German Democratic Republic, which really does not exist because everybody knows what happened to the German Democratic Republic. However, it is part of the EEC. It has a quota for 1991 in zone 3L and 3N on Canada's coast of 476 metric tons of redfish. The Government of Canada has not said it yet but I suppose the allocation to the German Democratic Republic for 1991 will be folded into the EEC because there is no other way to have it. The German Democratic Republic does not exist except under the EEC as it relates to these agreements which have been signed with the Government of Canada.

Then there is Poland. They have a new allocation for this coming year of 500 metric tons of cod in zone 3M off the east coast of Canada. That zone is known internationally as the Flemish Cap, a massive spawning area for fish off the east coast of Canada. It is a shallow area in the Atlantic Ocean about 230 nautical miles east northeast of St. John's, Newfoundland.

Traditionally there has never been any fishing there. In other words, all the countries of the world got together with their scientists and they said that the entire world should respect that area and not fish it because because it is a spawning ground for a great many of our flatfish in the world, but it is also a nursery area for some of our midwater fish.

We agreed no more fishing. But this year that area has been reopened and Poland has an allocation of 500 metric tons, and Canada has an allocation of 100 metric tonnes.

We come then to the U.S.S.R. They have an allocation of 1,270 tonnes. Canada has an allocation of 100 tonnes. That is only a tiny bit of the story. Mr. Speaker, if you want to know the entire story, you would be shocked because this is only one way that eastern European countries get quotas of fish along our coastline in Canada.

As I have just noted, one of the new zones opened now sees Canada with even less allocation than the eastern European countries. One way they get quotas is through what we call NAFO, the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization. There is a similar organization off Europe.

However, we have an organization here that allows foreign nations to fish inside our zone. That is one way. The second way they get allocations is when Canada says that it is going to give out part of its own allocation.

What did we have in the month of December, around Christmas? We had Poland with special licences for mackerel in 4VWX. That is along the east coast of Nova Scotia, in 4VN, which is up around Cape Breton Island, and 5ZE, which is down further off New Brunswick.

Bulgaria has mackerel and silver hake licences in 4VN. The Soviet Union had at least 40 factory ships that had licences at that time. It must be kept in mind that these vessels are there because they can compete with Canadian vessels. The reason for it is quite simple.

Today in Canada we have five large companies that actually hire vessels from eastern Europe to catch their own quotas along the coastline of Canada.

Fisheries Products International is the biggest fish company we have. On January 4, U.S.S.R. vessels were unloading turbot at their fish plants to keep their fish plants going. Imagine, the Soviet Union unloading fish at FPI. It is a new phenomenon in Canada, and it just came about this past year. Never before have we ever had foreign nations whose vessels were used to catch fish in Canadian waters on licences owned by Canadian companies.

The question asked is: why? Canadian fishermen are the best fishermen in the world. They are more competitive, one would say, than any other fishermen in the world. They know how to catch fish better than any other fishermen in the world. They are the best in the world.

Why is it that for the past year or so these Canadian companies have received permission from the Government of Canada to employ vessels from eastern Europe, from the very countries we are talking about here today under this bill that will establish a bank that will see Canadian input to help these eastern European countries? The answer is quite simple.

A lot of these companies from eastern Europe and the governments from eastern Europe do not really mind if they lose money. They do not mind if they are out for 10 months fishing on the Atlantic Ocean or the Pacific Ocean, and they do not catch anything. So, they are more competitive than a Canadian vessel would be.

My intervention in this debate today is to make a simple suggestion to the Government of Canada. That is, if we are truly going to follow through on the intent of this legislation, it should not be a question of subsidizing a company or a country to be more competitive. It should be a question of making everything a level playing field.

The first thing the Government of Canada should do is to cancel every licence in Canadian waters held by foreign nations for fish which are under quotas to Canadian fishermen. That is the first thing the Government of Canada should do. That is my suggestion to the Government of Canada in passing this legislation.

We are the ones who are not competitive in the fishing industry, simply because we do not have the financial muscle that some of these governments put into their fishing vessels. I suggest to the Government of Canada, cancel the licences and give Canadians a chance in the fishing industry in eastern Canada.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I want to pose a question, because we do not have too many members in the House who have the kind of expertise in the fishing industry as this hon. member.

I think he will agree with me that Canada would like to help some of the central east European countries, as is the purpose of this bill. Yes, we have to protect the interests of our own fishermen and our fishing economy. Would the hon. member have any suggestions as to how Canada still could help many of the east European countries with the fishing industry, but at the same time, not harm the whole fishing industry for Canadians?

Mr. Baker: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I certainly do. First, we could assist many of these countries in showing them that certain types of machinery used on a massive scale can destroy an environment. In other words, the term "sustainable development", that the Liberal Party of Canada uses quite a bit in formulating policy, should be the first and foremost thing that we should promote with these nations.

The types of gear that are used by some of these vessels is very destructive. It is unbelievable to imagine that you could be sitting in a control room on a vessel and, through computers, be able to control the nets and so on that go over the bottom of the ocean. That is what happens in many of these vessels.

Also, this gear makes no distinction between the age of fish, none at all. It does not make any distinction between dragging over a nursery ground or a spawning ground, or dragging up the food of the very fish of which we have so few in our country.

We could give these countries the scientific knowledge that we have in Canada today and institute the same measures that we have in Canada for our resources. That is, we have a policy in Canada that says the Speaker of the House of Commons is not allowed to go commercial fishing in Canada. A member of Parliament is not allowed to go fishing if he wants. An unemployed man down the road is not allowed to go fishing, because we have completely controlled entry in the fishery. We have strict management, heavy fines, and good environmental protection that these countries do not have. That is one contribution we can make.

Another contribution we can make is to suggest to some of these nations other ways of obtaining fish. I refer, of course, to the economy of growing fish. That is one area in which we could make a great contribution to the eastern European countries, the area of growing fish, but certainly not in the area of using massive large vessels to travel all the way across the Atlantic Ocean to catch fish that nobody over here is allowed to catch and, in the bargain, to destroy some of our resources, as resources have been destroyed right around the world.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon members on the government side are calling for the question, but I believe the bill is too important to let it go by without some further debate.

It was not long ago that the countries named in Annex A of this bill rejoiced because President Gorbachev brought in glasnost and perestroika. How the world rejoiced when finally a leader of the Soviet Union took off the shackles and yokes from the people and said: "Fine, tell us what you want. Tell us what kind of governments you want and what kind of commerce you want." The world cheered President Gorbachev. It even presented him with a Nobel Peace Price.

Thanks to the leadership of President Gorbachev and the western world, the cold war finally came to an end. I was with the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade in East Berlin on May 1 when thousands upon thousands of people crossed from East Berlin to West Berlin and back without even having to show a passport or a visa.

Twenty years ago, I lived in an east European country for a full year. One does not get to know a country by going through the country as a tourist, but I lived in Poland for a full year. From Poland I travelled to Czechoslovakia, Hungary, and all of the countries listed in Annex A—Romania, Yugoslavia and Bulgaria. The only countries we could not visit at that time were the Soviet Union and Albania. I mention this because I think it highlights how far we have come from 1970–71 to 1990–91. Now we are free to travel through most of the Soviet Union republics and even through Albania.

Many of these countries that I have mentioned have had free elections. We remember how many lives were lost in achieving free democratic parliaments.

Some people forget when the Solidarity movement really started. When I lived in Poland in 1970–71, there were the first food riots where 56 people were killed. From that to today, we have come a long, long way.

These countries have now shed communism and elected democratic forms of government. I was in Lithuania when it had its free elections on February 24.

I must say, Mr. Speaker, that Lithuania, followed by Latvia and Estonia, did follow the secret ballot elections. Anyone who wanted to represent a party or run as an independent could run. Their names were on the ballot and people voted. Through secret ballot votes, we now have all these democratic parliaments.

But what has the West done to help these countries with their economic and political reforms? Yes, we have all sorts of programs. For example, the government has assigned $72 million to help Hungary and Poland. We have seen good evidence of farmers coming from there to learn our expertise and techniques in farming. We have had programs in management. We have had programs in teaching English to many of the people in eastern Europe. But I do not think the West has seriously addressed the problems of how these countries can move to a private enterprise economy.

Under Bill C–88, this bank for the restructuring and the development of the central eastern Europe economies is one major way of showing the world that the West is ready to come to their aid.

I have heard even today that maybe we should reconsider passing Bill C–88. When it was at first and second reading, there was no cold war. There was excellent co–operation between the Soviet Union and Canada. That co–operation, sadly, ended a little over a week ago when the Red Army moved in to Vilnius. I was there. I recognized the streets and the buildings that are being attacked by the Black Berets and the tanks, overnight destroying what has taken so long to build.

This weekend, we saw five more innocent people, civilians and journalists, killed. Why? For what reason? The hon. member for Scarborough Centre and I met with about 500 people just this Saturday. There were Canadian representatives from the three Baltic groups and representatives from the countries. There were young people from Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania. They gave us firsthand accounts of what is happening there. I will save that for the emergency debate that I hope we will have later this day in the House.

I do not share the view that we should not pass this bill. Let us hope that President Gorbachev will get some sense into his head and remove any trace of Soviet armies in the Baltic states so that we can get back to the kind of dialogue we have had.

Was it not nice when President Gorbachev could visit Canada, when our Prime Minister could visit the Soviet Union, and when we could sign all sorts of agreements and co–operate? How beautiful. The world rejoiced. Now, in just two weekends, we have ruined all of this.

I hope that the leaders and the people of the world know that we are all one family on this planet and that somehow we will resolve our differences, work together, and, maybe through a structure such as the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development, we can provide much stronger help to eastern European countries who want to get on their feet again.

There are four million Canadians who are directly tied with central and eastern Europe, so we have a vested interest in helping these countries. I want to thank the government for accepting our amendment stressing the environmental issues, that when the bank does give a loan the first thing it will look at is this project in keeping with sustainable development. All three parties agreed to that and it is now in the bill, strengthening the bill, again demonstrating to the public how if we all work together we come up with something better. With the three parties working here together, we have come up with a better bill.

We on this side will not stall. We just want to put our comments on the record and support this bill wholeheartedly with a caution to President Gorbachev if he wants this bill to work because the Soviet Union is a donor and can be as well a recipient of this bank. It will be up to him whether he really and truly believes in democracy or going back to Stalinistic types of rule.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I appreciated the speech made by the hon. member. He touched on a lot of fundamental issues regarding this bank. I congratulate him particularly on the amendment touching on the environment.

I had the occasion to go to eastern Europe recently, particularly Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina. I saw some of the devastation that has been created by pollution. I was in the city of Zenica which has a huge steel works and coal mines. It is situated about 100 kilometres north of Sarajevo. It has the highest pollution of SO2 in the world. Stalin at that time built this factory for the Yugoslavians and they had no concept of what pollution could do to the environment.

I see how important it is for this new bank and new way of financing having attached a caveat respecting pollution.

I am glad the Liberal Party with the co-operation of the others brought in an amendment which was accepted.

I would like to ask the member a question. As we know, it is the Solidarity movement in Poland that started the ball rolling on a new spirit of freedom in eastern Europe. Because of that I think we have to pay tribute to the Solidarity movement in Poland.

There are still Soviet troops in Germany, Poland, Hungary and Czechoslovakia. If the hardliners in Moscow take over, does the hon. member think that the forums we have been witnessing might be in danger?

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the question from the hon. member from Calgary because I know how much he has done to bring closer co-operation and relationship between Canada and some of the east European countries. I know he gets a lot of delegations from the Ukraine and other parts of eastern Europe. He is kind enough to always introduce them to me so that we can get a first-hand report on what is happening there.

Yes, the scary part is with the Soviet troops. I understand there are still 130,000 sitting in Poland and, as we have seen, they are moving into the Baltic states. Is there a hidden agenda? I hope not.

I put at least that much trust in President Gorbachev, that that is not his hidden agenda. The question that arises is whether President Gorbachev is losing control of the army. If he is losing control, and the hardliners are starting to take over and starting to dictate through the army, and the army becomes the ruler, then I have a great fear. That is why this is something we should be monitoring very closely.

On the other side of the coin we see the Soviet Union supporting the United States and the west in the war, trying to get Hussein out of Kuwait. Isn't it great that for the first time in the history of the world since the cold war ended that here is an opportunity for the United Nations to resolve a dispute. It should have been resolved without arms but as we are seeing, it will not be. The allied countries have had to resort to arms. If the United Nations can prove that it can solve problems like this, hopefully allied countries around the world would come together. Even though these Soviet forces are there, by the allied countries all working together, that will not be a threat. That is our hope and I appreciate the question.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I would like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the debate is still on Canada's membership in the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development. The Chair is very patient and very open, but I would appreciate it if hon. members would co-operate by keeping their remarks relevant to the subject of this debate.

Further questions or comments? Resuming debate. The hon. member for Willowdale.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to be able to say a few words in this debate.

Mr. Milliken: The pleasure is ours!

Mr. Peterson: First of all, I want to say that we as a party support the government's proposal to establish a bank for the reconstruction of Europe, of central and eastern Europe.

[English]

Let us dwell on the background that has given rise to this development. We have seen extraordinary things coming out of Europe, largely at the instigation of a new policy and a new direction from the U.S.S.R. Perestroika and glasnost have led to the breaking up of the Iron Curtain. The Soviet Union has given up its hegemony over its Iron Curtain countries.

We have seen something which I never expected would take place in my lifetime. It was East Germany being given its freedom. Within a very short time the Berlin wall came crumbling down, and Germany has now been unified. These political events, I am sure, surpassed the greatest expectations that we could have had about the liberalization of policies in eastern Europe.

We are now asked in terms of this bill, Bill C-88, to establish the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development. We see a bill whereby the European community has come to us, the western European community is going to the world and saying: "Do we not have an obligation to help the eastern European and central European countries make the transition from controlled economics and centrally-planned economies to market economies so that they can take their place in the new global community?"

I can unhesitatingly say yes, we do have that obligation.

For years after the Second World War, we have seen how the reconstruction took place. Bretton Woods was an example of how the world community came together and established the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund.

But that was not enough, because a devastated Europe was regarded by the Americans as a drawback to the flourishing of the economies of all of us. It was under the generous Marshall plan and the even more generous act of the United States in establishing funding for our allies in Europe to re-establish themselves that we were able to see them start to prosper and as a result we, in North America and other parts of the world, benefited too from the expanding trade and prosperity that was won.

That was really the start of the global economic village where we realized that there is no country that can be continually prosperous unless the world is prosperous as a whole.

But we have failed miserably following the Second World War in terms of bringing along the countries of the south, the Third World countries. We did not have plans addressed to assist them in the same way we dealt with our former allies. As a result, many Third World countries, countries of the south, have gone backward in terms of their per capita income and their standards of living.

We are seeing now a devastation in terms of drought, hunger, famine and death. In the Sudan alone, up to eight million people in the south are now facing the threat of starvation. When our collective efforts have been directed, they have worked. The shame is that we have not taken these collective efforts to all people on our continually diminishing globe.

Let us return now to the situation in central Europe. As my colleague from Parkdale—High Park and as many other speakers have pointed out, we do have an obligation to work with these new economies to help them become viable. It is in their interest and it is in our long-term interest not only in terms of the politics of the moment, but in terms of building strong economies so that we all will prosper, as the Marshall plan indicated we would, by helping out our former allies.

Through Mr. Gorbachev's enlightened policies, he has made their emergence as countries possible. He does not have the economic means to ensure their prosperity. As a matter of fact, we are now seeing a falling back in the Soviet Union itself of Mr. Gorbachev's progressive policies as hardliners say to him: "Perestroika is not working. We must return to the old ways."

This is the dilemma we face, because the western world wants to see the Soviet Union and its former Iron Curtain allies turn the corner economically. We are faced with a problem, and I faced this problem—the world did—a couple of years ago with the People's Republic of China. We wanted to see the one billion people in the PRC come out of the dark ages and develop their economy in such a way that it would be constructive, and its people could prosper and enjoy better standards of living.

Then, we were faced with the terrible political realities of Tiananmen Square which have set back western efforts to invest, to deal with and to support a regime which is so repressive.

What we have seen as well in the Baltic states gives us great cause for concern. The repression of the free expression of the people in the Baltic states of their political rights of self-expression and self-determination has been met by armed aggression. This gladdens the hearts of none of us because we had hoped that perestroika would be an ongoing process in which we could participate through an institution such as the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

Now we find ourselves torn. We have to send a message to the Soviet Union that its actions are not acceptable to Canada, that human rights must prevail, that force is not the way to deal with the free expression of ideals by the people in the Baltic states. How do we send that message to the Soviet Union and at the same time vote for Bill C-88, which does have as part of its objects aid to and the participation of the U.S.S.R.?

That is the dilemma we face on all sides of the House. This is not a political issue. My feeling is that it would be retrogressive at this time to say we will not support the construction of this bank because, after all, it is to aid many countries: Poland, Yugoslavia, Hungary, and Bulgaria. East Germany, which is now part of Germany, will probably be looked after on a bilateral basis now by Germany itself. We have an obligation to help these countries to develop their own self-sufficiency in their new market economies.

I believe in good conscience we can do so. We can pass this bill. Let us at the same time send a very strong message to the leadership of the U.S.S.R. that its actions in the Baltic states are not condoned. If we were not to support this bill just because of the actions of one of the members of this bank, I believe we would be setting back the cause of progress in many other countries which are so important to us.

While it is with a heavy heart we recognize that perestroika is not working in the way we had hoped, let us support this bill because it is the way of the future. Let us learn from Bill C-88, the bill to establish the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development, that our efforts do not lie with central and eastern Europe alone.

Let us take from this further effort and incentive to enhance the efforts of other development banks: the African Development Bank, the Asian Development Bank, and the institutions in Latin America. Let us ensure that we play our full role in the industrialization and development of the countries of this world where we must be ashamed of the level of life we accept as being normal for them.

Let us use this as an example to re-examine the fundamental hypocrisy of each of us as parliamentarians on all sides of this House and, yes, of all Canadians when we say that life is sacred, that we are aroused beyond all belief when we see people being killed by armed aggression—and we should be—but the number of people who die in this world daily from starvation, malnutrition, lack of medicine and lack of the very basics of life is far greater than those who die in a year through armed aggression.

Let us, in supporting this bill, recommit our faith to the collective obligation of all of us who are privileged to help those who are not. We are not only helping them. We are helping to build a better world order which will help us. Let us recommit our dedication to helping all people in this world.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, sitting next to my colleague, I cannot help but learn about his keen, keen interest in fighting human rights violations around the world. I know the member has demonstrated that, whether those human rights violations are in the Middle East, somewhere in Asia, eastern Europe, or right at home. I was pleased that, even with this passion for fighting human rights violations, he is still supporting this bill.

Canadians are becoming concerned that we are making donations and grants to other parts of the world and maybe we should be looking after the state of our own economy at home. Knowing his expertise on the finance committee, would he mind sharing with this House how he sees the investment that Canada is going to make to this bank? Does he see it as a hand out, as a grant, or does he see it as an investment which might benefit Canadians in the future?

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question from my hon. colleague from Parkdale—High Park.

This bank is being capitalized with $12 billion. Some 51 per cent of the contribution and the control is going to the European Community itself. This was the creation of the government of François Mitterrand. Then the European Community put it on its agenda at Brussels a year ago last December. Canada's contribution could be up to a total of $460 million. I do not think we will ever be called upon to put in that amount of money, as our initial commitment is $5 million.

The bank is going to use its equity base, contributed by all of its member countries, to go out and borrow on the market. It is going to try to enhance free enterprise in central and eastern Europe by making loans available to private enterprise. Its primary objective is to devote 60 per cent of its funds, the equity that is contributed, and, on top of that, the funds it is able to borrow in world financial markets to promote industries that have a chance of making it.

We have seen a vast enhancement of the ability of these formerly communistic centrally controlled economies to absorb foreign investments. In 1988 there were only 165 industrial joint ventures in these countries. Within one year, under glasnost and perestroika, the interest in investing had increased so that there were 2,100 joint ventures.

I think a joint venture is an ideal way to go into a newly emerging economy where they do not have the history of a free market and private enterprise which may exist in other areas, but where they do have a strong record of state control and co-ordination. Then there is the transition of the state working with private entrepreneurs, to bring to change what has always been 100 per cent state control toward what in other parts of the world has been 100 per cent free enterprise. One can bring together the best ingredients of both to create the transition and to make these enterprises work. This is why I feel, in terms of the 60 per cent that is to go to investments in the private sector, we have a good chance of using joint ventures to help make the transition.

It is expected as well, in response to my hon. friend from Parkdale—High Park, that 40 per cent of these funds will have to go to build up state infrastructure. After all, we cannot have viable enterprises and industries in the global economic community unless we have an infrastructure: communications, transportation, et cetera. We have to build up the institutions that service industries, financial institutions as well.

I believe they have set what is probably a realistic target in terms of what we will have to invest in the basic infrastructure of these countries in order to produce the economic viability necessary to develop in these new economies.

As I see these investments going ahead, I see Canadians with their expertise in construction, communications, and transportation playing a major role in going in there, in investing, in providing expertise, and in creating jobs in Canada to build the necessary products to help them develop.

This is not just a giveaway. This is an investment in other countries, but this is also an investment in Canadian entrepreneurs. Over the long term it is truly an investment in a more prosperous global economy from which we will all be the ultimate beneficiaries.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I want to say at the outset that I have listened with interest to the comments of my hon. colleague from Willowdale and others, including the hon. member from Winnipeg Transcona. I must say the tone of the debate, the points being raised, indicates a considerable amount of enlightenment on behalf of members of all caucuses in terms of the potential role Canada can play. I want to congratulate my hon. friend on a number of proposals and suggestions he has just made. I must say, if I heard correctly, I pretty well agree with everything he said. I would like to take it a little further than that, but again my compliments go out to all previous speakers.

We first heard of this proposal back in 1989 by François Mitterrand, the President of France. He said, at a session of the European Parliament, that something had to be done in terms of industrial nations to assist countries which were being dramatically changed in central and eastern Europe as a result of perestroika in the Soviet Union and the spin-off into the eastern European countries.

I can remember—and I remember you too, Mr. Speaker, sharing that delight—the coming down of the Berlin wall, the announcements flowing daily from President Gorbachev in terms of his view of the changing world, the move to democratization, the movement from some state enterprises toward a free market system, the recognition of the value of a mixed economy, and that the reception that received in the western world, particularly in western industrialized nations, was most positive.

Immediately we thought: How can we help? I remember thoughtful discussions with my colleagues as to ways and means that Canada could participate in assisting the countries of central Europe as they changed their economies and moved through this very difficult transition period, not only economically but, as someone like yourself would appreciate, Mr. Speaker, the social, cultural, and political implications of these dramatic changes. We are pleased.

We are not so pleased with the lack of progress in terms of economic reforms, particularly in the Soviet Union. But recognizing that there are conservative forces in the system there rallying against these dramatic changes and trying to cling to the old ways, the status quo in the Soviet Union, we abhor that position and look for more liberal approaches in terms of liberalizing the economy and the life of the average Soviet citizen. This whole debate on Bill C-88 is put in a peculiar context with the developments in the last number of hours in the Baltic states. We have witnessed the oppressive initiatives taken by Soviet troops, both in Lithuania and Latvia and recognize the growing democracy and the call for self-determination of the Baltic states. It was with heavy hearts that we watched on television the activities of the Soviet troops against the citizens of those two Baltic states.

I must say that it brings up this question: are we enthusiastic now about using Canadian taxpayers' dollars as a result of our participation in this European Bank for Reconstruction and Development, knowing that these funds will go to the Soviet Union at the same time when this abuse of human rights is occurring, not only in these two states, but elsewhere. But I am referring particularly to the coverage that we have received in the last number of hours of very sad activities going on in the Baltic states.

I suppose they pale in comparison to the brutality and the unbelievable horrors of war that are unfolding in the Persian Gulf, but I will let that stand aside for now. It will be an ongoing debate, of course, the next little while. We all hope and pray that that horror show will be short and peace will come soon.

The bank, as I indicated, comes from the initiative proposed by the French President, François Mitterrand, during the 1989 November session of the European Parliament. Its headquarters will be located in London, and the first president of the bank will be Jacques Attali from France. This agreement that we are discussing today from a Canadian perspective will be ratified by the end of this fiscal year, meaning March 31. We should also recognize that Canada is, I would not say a relatively small player, as we will be contributing $479 million of the bank's capital—which of course, Mr. Speaker as you know, will ensure us a seat on the board of directors, which is appropriate—in a total bank fund of $15 billion Canadian. That will come to, as the statistics indicate, something like 3.4 per cent of the bank's capital.

Again, Canada will not be a major player but an important player. Speaking on behalf of the New Democratic Party, we feel that, yes, we ought to be involved; yes, Canada has much to offer. That is not to say we do not have some concerns.

We registered our concerns in committee, particularly about Article 11 which sets out the methods of operation. I think because of this important aspect I want to read a few of the points from the legislation into the record. Before I do that, let me indicate my concern that this tremendous shift from an economy based on Stalinist bureaucracies into something that more closely resembles the reality found in other social democratic countries, other socialist countries, other capitalist countries, is something that I think we all support enthusiastically. We recognize that the transition is long overdue and we want to be behind it. However, let us not get caught up so enthusiastically that we end up hindering the transition towards a mixed economy in the eastern European countries and in the Soviet Union.

When we look at the methods of operation we wonder if in fact we are not tying one arm behind the back, so to speak, of these countries as they move through this difficult economic and social transition period. I have noticed with considerable interest the various reports coming out of some of the descriptions of the IMF and World Bank funding of certain projects throughout the world and how that may in fact be almost ideologically restrictive and putting ideological blinders in terms of how those funds may be invested. I certainly do not want to see us being part of that restricting of funding. I want to read a couple of points. Article 11, under Methods of Operation, of Bill C–88 reads:

> That the Bank shall carry out its operations in furtherance of its purpose and functions as set out in Articles 1 and 2 of this Agreement in any or all of the following ways:

I am sure I do not have to go through Articles 1 and 2; all of us are more than familiar with those aspects of the legislation. Article 11 goes on to state:

> (i) by making, or cofinancing together with multilateral institutions, commercial banks or other interested sources, or participating in, loans to private sector enterprises, loans to any state–owned enterprise operating competitively and moving to participation in the market–oriented economy, and loans to any state–owned enterprise to facilitate its transition to private ownership and control; in particular to facilitate or enhance the participation of private and/or foreign capital in such enterprises;

It is perfectly clear, in terms of what we are asking of this legislation. I look with interest at my hon. friend, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, who is nodding that if there is one thing that is clear, it is obviously this particular paragraph.

However, I have a concern, Mr. Speaker. When the bill indicates that by making, or cofinancing together with multilateral institutions, commercial banks or other interested sources, or participating in loans to private sector enterprises, loans to any state–owned enterprise operating competitively, the question is that we have an appreciation of the operation, competitively, when it comes to determining whether a firm is able to apply and be a recipient of financing. Our view of operating competitively during this transition period, in terms of state owned enterprises, may be somewhat different from their own.

I submit that we ought to be as open as possible during this time to encourage, yes, a move to profitability when it makes sense, in terms of some of the state–owned enterprises but, again, to also recognize that the period may be somewhat lengthy, that the transition may be somewhat longer than what we would tolerate in our own market–oriented economy and, that we must be willing to be flexible in terms of providing that kind of support.

Article 11 goes on, and I quote:

> (ii)(a) by investment in the equity capital of private sector enterprises;
> (b) by investment in the equity capital of any state–owned enterprise operating competitively—

And, again, Mr. Speaker, just in parenthesis, I want to add, once again, let us be open to the definition of competitiveness, particularly during this very difficult transition period in the central and eastern European countries and, particularly, the Soviet Union. I see, Mr. Speaker, you have a puzzled look on your face.

During this time when Mikhail Gorbachev is under a great deal of pressure, in terms of the successes or lack of successes of his initiative to perestroika, I think that anything we can do to facilitate the successful development of the Soviet economy, to provide assistance and to encourage power not to shift into the more conservative, military–aligned power base in the Soviet Union, would be not only an investment in our future as a western country but, indeed, in terms of the world itself, to do whatever we can to stand behind those progressive initiatives that, in very difficult times, he is attempting to introduce. I simply set that aside again from the comments on competitiveness of state–owned enterprises.

I want to go on because I believe it is important. We are talking about investment in the equity capital of any state–owned enterprise operating competitively and moving to participation in the market–oriented economy, the investment in the equity capital of any state–owned enterprise to facilitate its transition to private ownership and control, in particular, to facilitate or enhance the participation of private and/or foreign capital in such enterprises. And to go on, Mr. Speaker, the bill reads:

> (c) by underwriting, where other means of financing are not appropriate, the equity issue of securities by both private sector enterprises and such state–owned enterprises referred to above.

It is referring particularly to the state–owned enterprises operating competitively. This obviously is a critical part of Bill C–88. I was going to refer to other sections of the legislation. The continuation of Article 2, when it talks again of the purposes of this article, that state-owned enterprise shall not be regarded as operating competitively unless it operates autonomously in a competitive market environment, and unless it is subject to bankruptcy laws.

Again, it makes the point that during this difficult transition period when state-owned enterprises must operate competitively by operating autonomously and in a competitive market environment, that transition is not going to be an easy one. Therefore, it is in our best interest to assume these definitions very loosely.

I see this as an excellent opportunity for Canada to play a role in supporting and developing the eastern economies during this difficult transitional period.

There is much more, of course, that Canada could be doing. I do not have to tell members of Parliament that our aid and our support is required, not only in this part of the globe but, of course, in many other parts. I refer particularly to places such as Ethiopia, Sudan and areas of that part of Africa that are experiencing famine conditions where we ought to be doing, in my estimation, significantly more in not only alleviating the immediate concern in terms of hunger, but, of course, in terms of aid that will really assist those countries which would have to have us move away from some of the tied aid that we are involved with presently in not only that part of the world, but almost all parts.

In conclusion, I want to say that we support the general thrust of this bill with a number of very serious reservations. I do hope that the reservations of those who spoke before me, both in committee as well as in this debate, are considered by the government as we move to play our role in the hope of making it a most meaningful role in the economic reconstruction of eastern Europe, including the Soviet Union.

I would be remiss if I did not say that there are so many other ways that we can also be helpful, other than simply participating in this reconstruction bank. I look forward in the future to participating in those debates and in those committee discussions where in fact there will be wide ranging discussion of the future role of Canada in developing the economies of these countries.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, there have been what can only be described as extensive discussions on all sides of the House. I believe you will find consent for the following motion.

I should indicate to the Chair that I have another motion to follow this one. This is the first motion:

> That, upon disposition of Government Business No. 27 respecting the Persian Gulf Crisis on Tuesday, January 22, 1991, at 6.00 p.m., the House shall stand adjourned to the call of the Chair;
> That, during such adjournment, combined meeting of the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs and the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade may be held five days per week to provide briefings on the latest situation in the Persian Gulf. These meetings being open to all Members of Parliament, accredited members of the press gallery and the general public, subject to House of Commons security requirements; and that at any time this said committees request the Speaker to recall the House, it shall be called back into session as soon as practicable; and
> That the usual provisions of Standing Order 28(3) shall also apply during such adjournment, except that the House may be called back into session with at least a 12 hour notice and the usual requirement for a 48 hour for motions shall be waived to allow the House to begin debate on any government motion pertaining to external affairs and defence, provided that at any time the Speaker may recall the House for the sole purpose of granting Royal Assent to any Bill or Bills, after which the House shall stand adjourned in accordance with this Order.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that there have been negotiations among the parties. I have two questions I want to put to the parliamentary secretary to clarify the proposal.

First, I take it that when the motion says that these meetings would be open to all members of Parliament, accredited members of the Press Gallery—and I want that assurance—that means television could be part of those deliberations and that the availability of that signal to broadcast those proceedings will be available to those wanting to pick it up, but under the usual rules of the House of Commons.

My second question to him is this. I know the nuance between calling back the House in 12 hours and Standing Order 28(3), which gives us 48 hours' notice. I want to make it clear that the only reason for the 12 hours' notice provision is to give the government a chance to call back the House to discuss any issue dealing with defence and external affairs, but nothing else. On any other occasion, the government would have to use the regular Standing Order 28(3) which would require 48 hours' notice. Can he confirm that for me?

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, may I indicate to my hon. friend that, yes, by accredited we do mean that to include the television or electronic media people and the television cameras. Our goal, I might add, is that all members of the House— independents, and members of the Official Opposition, the opposition and the government side—have an opportunity to participate in this committee and to satisfy themselves that they are fully briefed.

Of course, the 12-hour provision is because of the situation with which all of us are faced. We, as parliamentarians, are watching very closely. We want to make sure that that 12 hours means that we can call the House back quickly in the event that there is some sort of an emergency or crisis arise. It just allows us to come back very rapidly, rather than the usual 24 hours.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader has indicated that full media coverage will be available on a daily basis, that all members of Parliament will have an opportunity to sit in on those meetings, and that the parties will have an opportunity to ask the appropriate questions.

It seems to me that the 12-hour recall in a sense puts us on an almost immediate recall, that is, if anything happens of significance in terms of the Persian Gulf war that the House would be recalled. I am sure that means at the request of the committee, as well.

With regard to the question of the eventual recall of the House, I am assuming that the government still plans to introduce its budget and throne speech before the end of February. I also understand that the leaders will have an opportunity to make some comments prior to the six o'clock vote tomorrow. Could the parliamentary secretary confirm that, please?

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, yes. First, the televising of the committees should be under the usual rules of the House of Commons. All of us understand that.

Second, in terms of the budget, the throne speech, and that sort of thing, the last I heard was that the Minister of Finance still intended to have a budget this year. I am sure that will be the case. Obviously, I cannot give the hon. member the dates, but our intention would probably be sometime in the latter part of February. Of course, I have to have confirmation of that from the Minister of Finance. I would not want to pre-empt him in any way.

In terms of the hon. member's question regarding the participation of representatives of the three parties, that would be the second motion that I am prepared to deal with in a matter of moments, as soon as we have agreed to this one.

[Translation]

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Calgary Northeast, on a point of order.

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, I wish to confirm that the parliamentary secretary has consulted the independent members. We are prepared to co-operate, and this motion has our consent.

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I think the provision that the standing joint committee sits is an appropriate one.

I simply want to get some assurance from my hon. colleague that, for the daily sessions, whenever possible—we recognize the limitations on the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Defence—either of these two individuals, or at least some senior cabinet minister, would make every effort at least to be in attendance during the committee sessions.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in my earlier remarks, the intention that we, as a House, have with this committee is to make sure that all members of the House and the public in general have every opportunity to be fully briefed.

It is our intention—I use the words "whenever possible"—to have senior cabinet people and senior officials available. I think the House will understand that, from time to time, with the situation in which we find ourselves, it is difficult to predict ministers' schedules or particular officials' schedules.

I want a signal in the strongest possible terms that it is our intention to make sure at every opportunity that we can provide the best and fullest briefings possible.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

MOTION TO ADJOURN PURSUANT TO S. O. 52

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, just before proceeding with this second motion, I want to indicate that there have been discussions among the various representatives of the parties in the House of Commons.

There is a willingness on the completion of this motion that there will be an emergency debate, from the hours of seven o'clock to ten o'clock p.m., regarding the situation in the Baltic states. We have had those discussions and, if that were to meet with the satisfaction of the Speaker, we would certainly be more than willing to co-operate on that.

The motion is as follows:

> That, upon completion of the emergency debate on the situation in the Baltic States, the House shall adjourn until Tuesday, January 22, 1991, at 5:00 p.m., at which time one representative from each party shall address the House on Government Business No. 27, respecting the Persian Gulf crisis, for a period of not longer than 15 minutes each, after which there shall be a 15 minute bell followed immediately by a division on Government Business No. 27.

I should indicate that those addresses by the three party representatives would be for a maximum of 15 minutes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Gauthier: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In the interest of good order in the House, would the Parliamentary Secretary to the Leader of the Government be in agreement with me that after Bill C-88, there being no further speakers on that bill and that bill having been adopted, that he would comply with the usual practice of allowing members to prepare for their speeches tonight and suspend the House until seven o'clock?

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I would like to indicate that, in fact, yes, if Bill C-88 were to be passed on division now, then we would be quite happy to suspend the House until seven o'clock for the emergency debate.

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-88, an act to provide for the membership of Canada in the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois) I declare the motion carried on division.

Bill read the third time and passed.

SITTING SUSPENDED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to suspend the proceedings until seven o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The proceedings are therefore suspended until seven o'clock.

At 5.08 p.m., the sitting of the House was suspended.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 7 p.m.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

[English]

BALTIC STATES

ACTIONS OF U.S.S.R. GOVERNMENT

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 52, the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park has obtained leave to move a motion for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the situation in the Baltic states.

[Translation]

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park) seconded by Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast) moved:

That this House do now adjourn.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I may add that under the provisions of Standing Order 52, each member has the floor for a maximum of 20 minutes and there is no period for questions and comments.

The hon. member for Parkdale—High Park.

[English]

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, first, I congratulate you for having the wisdom to grant the House leave to debate this important crisis in one part of our world. I thank all parties and Independent members for agreeing to such an emergency debate on the crisis in the Baltic states.

Everyone thought that World War II ended on September 2 when the Japanese surrendered. Well, it didn't, because World War II continued. First, Hitler and Stalin occupied three countries under the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact. With a stroke of a pen, they occupied three countries.

How does that differ from another country, such as Iraq, invading Kuwait? This one was done by military might, the other one was done by the stroke of a pen. In both cases, sovereign countries got their independence taken away. World War II continued, in a way, because the Baltic states did not accept that. Most of the western countries did not accept that annexation.

There were partisan military actions by Lithuanians and the others, hiding in the bushes, disrupting communications for the Soviet Union, and making life miserable for the Soviet army. But it did not stop there. It stopped for a period and then, of course, we saw the demonstrations. We actually saw 50 years of continuations of some aspects of World War II.

Then came the bloody crackdown a week ago in Vilnius, for no apparent reason. The reason, according to some sources, is because the young men refused to be conscripted into the army. Most of those men, I am sure, would welcome joining the army to defend their country, but not joining the Soviet Union to defend another country. If the Soviet Union Army orders these young men from the Baltic states to invade any of the Baltic states, they would be shooting at their own parents. They would be shooting at their own brothers and sisters. So I cannot blame the young men who are refusing to join the Soviet Army. They are very willing to join the Estonian, the Latvian, and the Lithuanian armies, but not the Soviet Army. This was not the real cause. I think, President Gorbachev or whoever gave the order to move in the tanks found that as an excuse.

What was the reaction around the world when Gorbachev decided to move tanks and troops into Vilnius, the capital of Lithuania? The reaction was swift and the reaction was strong from around the world.

At a meeting that the hon. member for Scarborough Centre and I had with about 500 Baltic Canadians on Saturday, they praised the Canadian government for acting so quickly. Canada was one of the first parliaments to bring in an all-party resolution condemning the actions of the Soviet Union in this crack-down.

But there was immediate reaction from the United States. The New York Times quotes President Bush as saying:

> We condemn these acts which could not help but affect our relationship—I ask the Soviet leaders to refrain from further acts that might lead to more violence and loss of life. I urge the Soviet Government to return to a peaceful course of negotiations and dialogue with legitimate governments of the Baltic states.

Then, of course, this question came up: Should the summit between President Bush and President Gorbachev take place? I hope it is not cancelled, but postponed or suspended until such time as the Soviet Army is withdrawn from the Baltic states.

What was the reaction of the European Economic Community? The New York Times states:

The European Economic Community condemned Moscow's violent crackdown, warned that the $1 billion in economic aid promised to the Soviet Union might be suspended, and demanded an explanation from Moscow indicating which authorities ordered the troops to fire on unarmed civilians.

Then, country by country, they expressed their condemnation, but I will not have time to quote the condemnation of each country.

In eastern Europe, Czechoslovakia called for consultations with Poland and Hungary and stated that it foresaw the discussion of joint action, including withdrawal from the Warsaw Pact.

Just this weekend, I learned that the Government of Poland has accepted Lithuania's government, should it have to go into exile. Poland knows what it is like to achieve its independence. Lithuania, an independent country, should not have to fight for its independence. If, as a last resort, the Landsbergis government has to operate from outside of Lithuania, that government has been assured that there is spot for the government in exile in Warsaw. This is the kind of co-operation and reaction we are seeing from around the world.

Getting back to Canada's reaction, on January 9 I wrote a letter to the Secretary of State for External Affairs also asking that he condemn this action and that he call in the Soviet ambassador. I want to thank him now—I see him sitting here—that he did call in the ambassador to explain the actions of the Soviet Union.

The Prime Minister sent a letter to President Gorbachev warning President Gorbachev that unless such action stops, this may harm future relationships between our two countries. We all received press releases about that letter.

Of course, in the House we passed the all-party resolution. I must say that, when the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast, the hon. member for Scarborough East, and myself paid a visit to the Soviet ambassador, what seemed to irritate him the most was this all-party resolution.

The ambassador accused us of not being objective and fair, but we assured him that we were very objective and very fair, and that we will not stop our pressure and our actions until such time that the troops are withdrawn and until such time that the Soviet Union sits down and starts talking to the Baltic states.

We asked the ambassador, what is the bottom line? How can we get Lithuania, Estonia, and Latvia talking to the leadership of the Soviet Union? I was a little shocked to hear the ambassador go back almost to square one. His response was that they had a new constitution, so the first thing the Baltic states must do is hold a referendum. After the referendum, there will be a five-year waiting period with negotiations, et cetera. After five years, they might then might achieve their independence.

I throw in the word "might", because after five years there is still no guarantee that the Baltic states would actually achieve their independence.

When our external affairs committee was visiting the Soviet Union, the officials from the Soviet Union were trying to tell us that the Baltic states, if they want to secede, must pay back everything that the Soviet Union invested in the Baltic states, such as the infrastructure, et cetera.

I would say that the Baltic states are probably very willing to pay back anything the Soviet Union invested in the Baltic states, but, first, I think the Baltic states should present a bill to the Soviet Union and insist that the Soviet Union pay back everything that it raked from those three countries. Let them pay back the families that they sent to Siberia. Let them pay back for the families who did not return from Siberia. Let them pay back for the properties they stole from the Baltic people. I am sure they would find that they owe more to the Baltic states than the Baltic states owe the Soviet Union. To me, that is an argument.

During any talks that we have had with representatives from the Baltic states, including President Landsbergis,

President Godmanis, and all the representatives who were here from Estonia, they said: "We want nothing more than to sit down with the Soviet Union representatives to negotiate a peaceful settlement."

Being in Lithuania for the free elections on February 24, I do not think we could find a more peaceful people, with peace as their whole attitude, than the people of the Baltic states. They do not want war. They want to settle this peacefully, but no one is talking to them because they keep going back to the line: We have a constitution. They must secede following the constitution. The elections of February 24 were held prior to the constitution being adopted.

On the referendum issue, the Baltic states are asking why they should have to hold a referendum asking people whether they want independence. They have been independent countries all along. By agreeing to a referendum, they would be telling the Soviet Union and the world that they are not independent. This is like asking Canadians to have a referendum on whether we are a sovereign, independent nation.

This is where the two sides seem to be hung up. Maybe this is where Canada can play a vital role in trying to get the two sides together to try to break this stalemate. The Soviet Union will not talk until the Baltic states hold their referendums. The Baltic states say recognize us as independent countries and let us negotiate. There is a big role here, perhaps, for Canada to play.

I am trying to explain why the stalemate. Anyone we talked to, whether it was in the Soviet Union, with the external affairs committee or representatives coming here, the message we got was that the governments of the Baltic states want to negotiate.

The other thing of which I might just remind President Gorbachev is that I did not see the elections in Estonia and Latvia but I witnessed the election in Lithuania. Is that not a referendum, when people elect their own Parliaments, when every party, and every independent candidate can run in the election? The people have spoken. They have elected their own democratic Parliaments. How can the Soviet Union now try to take those freely elected Parliaments away from them? This is what it is trying to do in Lithuania and, this weekend, in Latvia and next weekend, I hope it is not Estonia. But because the world is speaking up, let us hope the Soviet Union will not attempt the same scenario in Estonia. The way it is going, it seems that that is its strategy, next weekend Estonia, two weekends from now back to Lithuania and Latvia and repeat the whole cycle. I hope that is not its strategy.

In meeting with the Baltic community, our parliamentary group on the Baltic states, has been getting very clear messages as to what the Baltic Canadian communities want. I am not saying this, Mr. Speaker, this is from the Lithuanian–Canadian community which asks the Canadian government to take the following actions in the wake of the brutal crackdown in Vilnius by the Soviet army: (1) impose sanctions on the U.S.S.R. until it withdraws its tanks and paratroopers from Vilnius and enters into negotiations with the legitimate Government of Lithuania; (2) immediately accord diplomatic recognition to the democratically–elected Government of the Republic of Lithuania, led by President Vytautus Landsbergis; (3) introduce a Canadian resolution in the United Nations condemning the Soviet aggression and to push for an emergency meeting of the UN Security Council in order to debate the Baltic crisis; and, (4) call a special meeting of the Conference on Security and Co–operation in Europe to condemn the assault on Lithuania as a threat to the peace of Europe. That came from the Lithuanian community.

And this weekend, in the meeting we had, the Latvian community put forward four proposals that it would like our Parliament to address. It calls upon the Canadian government to: (1) immediately cease all assistance to the Soviet Union and impose trade and economic sanctions; (2) call an emergency debate in the House of Commons. We met that request, that is what we are doing tonight. The third proposal was: to call on the United Nations to send observers to the Baltic states. I would like to enlarge upon that one. The Baltic Canadians were saying that they wanted the United Nations to send observers but they were saying that they would also like this Parliament to send Canadian observers. They had the experience of having Canadian observers over there before and they are requesting that our government send Canadian observers to observe what is going on now. Their feeling is that if there are international observers now Gorbachev will think twice before flying in the Black Beret paratroopers. Fourth, continue to raise the Baltic issue at the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe by stressing that Soviet actions will continue to threaten the peace of Europe until democracy is restored.

The Estonian community makes the same requests. If you look at the requests from the Lithuanian and Latvian community, the Estonian community requests would be quite similar.

Thank you again, Mr. Speaker, for allowing us to have this emergency debate. I said this before and I will say it again in this House: there are two crises facing us, one is the Iraqi crisis, the other is the Baltic crisis. The world rejoiced when the cold war came to an end. Let us remember how much money was wasted on arms because of the cold war. Now we can save that money and put it toward feeding the poor, providing better housing for our people. If this crisis is not settled, we are going to go back to another cold war period where east and west are going to be building up arms, east and west will stop trading with each other and stop talking with each other.

Mr. Speaker, no one in this Parliament, or in any parliament around the world would want this.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the Chair for having allowed this debate to take place. As well I would like to thank the member for Parkdale—High Park and the member for Winnipeg Transcona for raising this important issue in this House. I think it is an all-party issue.

The Prime Minister of Canada on January 13 sent a strong message to Mr. Gorbachev to live up to his promise of opening the Soviet society, and opening the Soviet society to the world.

I would like first to quote what was written about the tough line of Mr. Gorbachev on republic sovereignty in The Globe and Mail of December 10. I quote:

> Was it only coincidence that Soviet authorities chose to crush the 1956 Hungarian uprising while the Western world was preoccupied with the Suez crisis; or that Stalin sent his tanks into the Baltic states the day the Nazis marched into Paris?

He doesn't think so. Nor does he believe it is a mere coincidence that while the rest of the world focuses on the potential war in the Persian Gulf, Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev appears to be preparing to crush the independent movement in the Baltic and other Soviet republics.

I think what is happening today is a tragedy. This is the anxiety that Canadians and people elsewhere in the world have today. If you look at the development in the Persian Gulf, the American Armed Forces have over 450,000 people there. They have withdrawn armed forces from Europe and from elsewhere to send to the Persian Gulf. During that period the Soviet Union is cracking down on the Soviet republics in the Baltics.

I have been to the Soviet Union on five occasions. When I was there in the fall of 1989, I could see that changes were beginning to occur. The Soviet Union was opening up. They were debating the market economy, having democratic elections and so on and so forth.

What is happening now? It seems that the hardliners are slowly taking over in the Soviet Union. Mr. Gorbachev seems to be acting on somebody else's behalf.

Coming back to 1989, when I was returning from the Soviet Union, while stopped in Vienna, I picked up a German newspaper. In that paper I read that the Archbishop of Austria was telling the Austrians and the world to pray for Mr. Gorbachev because he was the man who was opening the Soviet society to the world. They had acknowledged the atrocities that had been committed by Stalin during the 1930s against the Baltic nations. That archbishop was telling the world to pray for Mr. Gorbachev.

We saw during the period that followed the opening of the Soviet Union to the world. The Soviet Union allowed the unification of West Germany with East Germany. They allowed a democratic process in Czechoslovakia and Hungary. There was a spill-over effect into Yugoslavia where they were having free elections in Croatia, in Bosnia-Herzogovina and other parts of Yugoslavia.

We saw what happened to the regime in Romania. All this was as a consequence of Mr. Gorbachev's actions.

I went back to the Soviet Union just last year, again in the fall. I was amazed by the openness that was prevailing, especially in the Ukraine and Baltic states. They had had democratic elections. People were talking about the market economy. I had the pleasure and honour to speak to a regional parliament in the Ukraine. It was like here, everybody was able to express themselves. At the same time, other phenomena were occurring. There were shortages of food and other commodities in the Soviet Union and in the Baltic states.

My understanding is that the conservative forces, conservative in the sense of those who wanted to maintain the old regime, were sabotaging the reforms of the progressive people who were surrounding Mr. Gorbachev. You could almost feel that if help was not forthcoming from the west, the conservative forces in the Soviet Union, the communist forces, would take over. I am afraid that this is what is slowly happening. The intentions were excellent. We have to pay tribute to Mr. Gorbachev to have wanted something to happen but, at the same time, people like Mr. Yeltsin are already saying other forces are at work.

I would like to quote from The Ottawa Citizen of today. An address from Mr. Yeltsin was read to 300,000 people in Moscow who were supporting the democratic process. Mr. Boris Yeltsin warned of dictatorship unfolding in Russia. When he talks about Russia, he talks about the Soviet imperialist powers. He is not talking about Russia itself, because Mr. Yeltsin is the President of Russia. He is not the President of the Soviet Union and he was elected with a huge majority. He warns of the dictatorship unfolding in Russia, if the public does not rise against growing signs that the Kremlin is in the grip of conservative communists.

Economic reforms have been blocked, democracy betrayed, and glasnost trampled upon. This is about what Mr. Yeltsin is warning the world. Mr. Shevardnadze has done the same. He has resigned because he felt dictatorship is coming back to the Soviet Union.

As we watch the happenings in the Middle East, as we watch how people are being destroyed in this war on both sides, and as all our attention is focused on the Middle East, as I said at the beginning, very profound changes are happening in the Soviet Union.

We could ask ourselves the question: Why did the Soviet Union co-operate with the United Nations? Normally it would have vetoed any action by the United States and other countries in the Persian Gulf, but it wants the world's attention to focus on the Middle East as the armed forces of the United States are involved in a long and difficult war. It is in a sense that those conservative forces in the Soviet Union, the old time communists, are probably happy with what is happening in the Middle East because they can take over.

What is happening right now in Lithuania, Estonia, and Latvia is a tragedy because those countries were given away, as the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park said, by signatures on a piece of paper by Hitler and Stalin. It was a deal.

I hope that there was no deal between the United States and the Soviet Union in the Middle East, what we call the new world order: your sphere of influence is going to be the Middle East and our sphere of influence is going to be eastern Europe. I am sure Mr. Gorbachev had very good intentions, but he is no longer in control of what is happening in the Soviet Union.

I would like to mention that this crackdown is not only taking place in the Baltic states. In the Ukraine as well, members of Parliament are being arrested in the Parliament Buildings. One of those is Mr. Khmara. I would like to read a short letter that I wrote to the Prime Minister on December 13. This message was delivered in Toronto to a gathering of people who were fighting for Mr. Khmara's liberation from jail:

> I wish to join those present here today to express our concern about what is happening in the Ukraine.
> As we know, Mr. Khmara is a member of the Ukrainian Parliament, a leading human rights advocate, a former prisoner of conscience, and founding member of the Helsinki Human Rights Movement. He has been arrested on drummed-up charges by the secret police of the central government.

That is the Kremlin. It continues:

> I hope that this is not a change in policy by Moscow.
> Recently, we have seen serious clouds develop on the horizon of glasnost. The appointment of Mr. Boris Pugo, a hardline KGB major-general from Latvia, as Interior Minister of the Soviet Socialist Republics, indicates that there is a move towards a hardline position and away from democratization of Soviet society.
> I ask the Prime Minister to tell Mr. Gorbachev that Canadians will not support flagrant human rights violations, as in the case of Mr. Khmara.
> We should never abandon the fight for human rights, wherever they occur.

Those changes that are taking place in the Soviet Union are more dramatic in the Baltic states. I support the request by the Lithuanian Canadian community that sent a letter to most members of Parliament. One of the actions that the Secretary of State of External Affairs and the Prime Minister should take immediately is to accord diplomatic recognition to the democratically elected government of the Republic of Lithuania, led by President Landsbergis, and those of Latvia and Estonia as well. I think this is the minimum that the Canadian government can do.

I would like to thank all members who want to participate in the debate. I feel that changes in the Soviet Union were certainly very positive until lately. Now we have to remind the leaders in the Kremlin that the world cannot watch the process of glasnost stop.

• (1940)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is not very often unanimity in this House, even on questions of international policy, but I think that this is one of those occasions in which the House of Commons of Canada speaks, if not with one voice, then certainly with one purpose and one conviction, and that is to send the clearest possible signal to the leadership of the Soviet Union and to the Baltic peoples that Canada, each and every one of us, each and every Canadian, opposes absolutely the crackdown that has begun to develop in the Soviet Union against aspirations and governments which have a legitimacy in the Baltic states.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): The hard question for us, and one that I think we cannot answer tonight, is what exactly and practically the people and Government of Canada can do to reverse these developments. We are all determined to seek the reversal and to find ways that are available to us within the limits we face as a government with obligations and restrictions in the family of nations.

Everyone, every Canadian, I believe, is shocked by the brutal and unwarranted use of military force against the people and democratically elected governments of the Baltic states last week in Lithuania and yesterday in Riga, Latvia. We condemn such appalling and reprehensible behaviour, and we call upon Soviet President Gorbachev to do the same.

No one can remain unmoved by the vigilant and peaceful struggle of the peoples of the Baltic states to regain their independence. Their future is bound up in that of the new international order we are trying to create, whether that is in Europe or in the gulf.

For that reason this debate is important. It is important also to make it clear to the leaders of the Soviet Union that whatever our preoccupations with a war in which Canadian lives are at stake in the gulf, those preoccupations will not allow anyone to get away with a crackdown of the kind that is beginning, that is all too evident now in the Baltic states.

I want to commend the excellent work of the member for Scarborough Centre who presides over an ad hoc committee of members of Parliament on the Baltic states. They have been concerned, committed, and tireless in their efforts on behalf of the Canadian Baltic communities and the people who come from there.

Canada's support for the Baltic states has been unwavering. We recognize their de jure independence. We have never accepted their forcible annexation. We support the right of their peoples to determine their own future. The question for us is what practical help can we offer now.

I have just had the great privilege of meeting, in my capacity as a parliamentarian, with Vice-President Ivans of Latvia who came up particularly to see me tonight and is going now for meetings later this evening or early tomorrow morning with the Secretary of State of the United States. We talked about three areas in which the help of Canada can be offered: one is material, one is moral and political, and the third is diplomatic.

Regarding material help, there may well be in Latvia, as there sadly is in Lithuania, a need for some medical supplies. I asked Vice-President Ivans, on behalf of the government and people of Canada, to prepare a list of the things that might be needed by the Latvian people, things that we might be in a position to provide, and we would then look at ways—and they could be difficult—by which those might be delivered to people in need.

I would encourage groups in Canada who might have materials, medical supplies, perhaps other things, that would be necessary to consider ways by which those might be gathered and made available for transmission to people in the Baltic states.

In terms of moral and political support, two or three matters were raised by the Vice–President of Latvia. One of them I think must be considered carefully by this House. It holds some risks, including personal risks and including a risk of being counterproductive, and that is the possibility of a delegation of parliamentarians of this House going to Latvia.

As Secretary of State for External Affairs I would not at the moment make a recommendation on that matter. I think that is simply because this debate comes so quickly after the proposal was made.

There are some positive things that could be gained from a gesture of that kind. But there are dangers, some of them personal in the circumstances, and also the danger that that kind of action by parliamentarians from this House would invite exactly the opposite response from what we seek from the Soviet Union.

The Baltic countries have established a Baltic centre in Stockholm. That is something the Government of Sweden has determined to be acceptable by its interpretation of international law and practice. Certainly I think it is important and useful for us to consider whether a similar arrangement might be applied here.

There are things that we have to consider doing on the diplomatic front, as was discussed in this House in answer to questions from my friend for Winnipeg Transcona. There has to be consideration as to what we can do in the context of the United Nations, probably most likely in its committees dealing with human rights. We are already trying to define some ways in which we can make progress through the Conference on Security and Co–operation in Europe. I want to return to that theme a little bit later tonight.

As the two speakers preceding me have indicated, what is happening in Latvia and Lithuania is inseparable from the broader situation in the Soviet Union, a situation which becomes more troubling every day, particularly for those of us who were so encouraged by the movement towards glasnost and perestroika and so determined to do what we can to help those reforms succeed.

None of us wants the Soviet Union to crumble. All of us want reform in that society to succeed. We were encouraged, among other things, by the attitudes that had been shown generally earlier with respect to the status of the Baltic states. We are discouraged now, deeply discouraged, by actions that have become more violent and more dramatic in recent days.

There are things we must consider doing to support the Baltic people, but we must try to do them in the context of encouraging the reform and the cohesion of the Soviet Union. That is a particularly difficult challenge for all of us, but it is, I think, Mr. Speaker, in everybody's interest, including the interest of the people in the Baltic states and the people of Baltic origin in Canada, that we seek a way that accomplishes or encourages together the reform that was started by Mr. Gorbachev in the Soviet Union and some movement towards the independence of the Baltic states.

There is no clear way, at least not clear to me, in which we can accomplish that goal tonight. But the Soviet Union, as it considers what it is doing now, and as it considers the importance to it of the support of a people and a government like ours, must understand that Canadians not only have commitments to human rights that are so much a part of our society, but also have a population that was formed in such large part by people who came from eastern and central Europe and from communities in what is now the Soviet Union.

Canadians cannot help but be profoundly affected by what is occurring in the Soviet Union now, and that if those actions do not stop, they are bound to have an effect for the worse upon the relations between Canada and the Soviet Union in a formal sense, but also, and perhaps in a much more important way, they are bound to dim and then to reverse the enthusiasm for reform that had been building among our own people, most particularly among people who had roots behind what used to be the Iron Curtain.

Canada's support for the Baltic states has been unwavering. We recognize their independence by right. We never accepted their annexation by force. We argue in favour of the right of these peoples to determine their future.

Last spring, the three republics held fair and free elections. Federal representatives, including the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park, the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona and the hon. member for Scarborough Centre, and a representative from Ontario, Premier Rae, went to Lithuania during the election as observers.

At the initiative of Lithuania, on March 11, these democratically-elected governments declared their independence from the U.S.S.R. They tried to negotiate with Moscow, as provided under the existing constitution. Instead they were subjected to political and economic pressure.

• (1950)

After five years of a steadily deteriorating standard of living, perestroika has now reached a critical phase. The Soviet economy is crumbling. Pressure from independence movements is rising and public opinion is becoming increasingly negative. Mr. Gorbachev must choose: advance or retreat.

Gorbachev's supporters claim that law and order are the only weapons against anarchy. His opponents say that a policy of oppression will make him the hostage of reactionary forces. Polarization quickly leads to instability.

This winter, the U.S.S.R. asked Canada and other Western countries for assistance. We decided to support reforms by reducing the cost of transition. After my conversations with the former minister of foreign affairs, Mr. Shevardnadze, the Prime Minister of Canada offered specific types of assistance at the last CSCE summit in Paris. All of this is now at risk.

[English]

That things were getting worse in the Soviet Union was evident when Mr. Shevardnadze resigned in mid-December, warning that dictatorship could be on the way. The tragic events in Vilnius the night of January 12-13, with 14 dead, 163 wounded and 57 missing, made Mr. Shevardnadze, unhappily, a prophet. Mr. Gorbachev has taken the position that the events in Vilnius were regrettable but inevitable. He has not condemned the violence; he has not expressed sympathy for the victims or repudiated those who ordered it. His ultimatum to the Baltic states gave the military a green light, though he is disclaiming any personal knowledge of the consequences.

All three Baltic states believe that military-enforced, direct presidential rule is imminent. They are directing urgent appeals to Canada and to other western states, making an explicit linkage to the gulf crisis. The three have sent out representatives empowered to establish governments in exile if required. And, as the House knows and as I have said, I met earlier this evening with the Vice-President of Latvia.

Making any assessment difficult is the lack of coherence in Moscow among the various constituencies vying for power. Russian Republic President Yeltsin has joined the Baltic states in opposing the centre. Tens of thousands of people demonstrated in Moscow yesterday, calling for Mr. Gorbachev's resignation and the restoration of democracy. Meanwhile, the situation in other republics is increasingly tense, in Georgia, in Armenia, in Moldavia and in Ukraine. Mr. Gorbachev and the military have threatened them with similar treatment if they do not knuckle under. Many believe that the Baltic states are the dress rehearsal.

Last spring, Canada welcomed the free elections in the Baltic states, stressing our support for the right of their peoples to determine their own future. We protested the Soviet resort to intimidation. In my parliamentary capacity, I met with the then Prime Minister of Lithuania, Madam Prunskiene. Canada moved quickly to express its concern about the dangerous situation currently developing in the Baltic states. In December, the Prime Minister and I, in our parliamentary capacities, met with Lithuanian President Landsbergis, Latvian Prime Minister Godmanis and Foreign Minister Jurkans. I wrote to former foreign minister Shevardnadze on December 13 seeking confirmation of explicit assurances that were given to me and to the Prime Minister a year ago that there would be no crackdown in the Baltic states. On January 8 and January 11, the Soviet ambassador was called in.

I, on behalf of the Government of Canada, issued tough statements. Canada's reaction to the tragic events in Vilnius was among the strongest to come from any democracy in the western world.

The Prime Minister wrote immediately to President Gorbachev. He issued a strong condemnation, calling on the Soviet President to show restraint and to negotiate settlements based on the Helsinki Final Act and the Charter of Paris. He reminded him that at this time of heightened international tension, Canadians were watching events in the U.S.S.R. just as we were watching events in the gulf.

At the same time, the Prime Minister announced that Canada was reviewing its offer of technical assistance and the new $150 million line of credit. That is not food aid, but a commercial sale. We have drawn a direct linkage between Canadian assistance and the continuation of Soviet reform. I announced earlier that we were reviewing actions under those programs. I want to advise the House that we have now suspended any action under those programs that had not taken place before the actions in Lithuania.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): On January 15, this House passed a unanimous resolution condemning the brutal violence used against the people and democratically elected Government of Lithuania.

Saturday I received a communication from the Soviet Ambassador giving the official explanation for the tragic events in Lithuania. The note rejected Moscow's responsibility for what happened, blaming instead the Lithuanian leaders who were claimed to have held extremist positions. That, however, was before the equally tragic events in Riga yesterday.

No one knows if Mr. Gorbachev is still in charge or, more worrying, whether he remains committed to the reforms that began in his name. In his letter of January 13, the Prime Minister warned the Soviet President against the consequences of his present course. That letter remains unanswered, and tonight I would like to quote it and lay it on the table of Parliament.

The Prime Minister wrote:

Dear Mr. President,

I am writing to express the shock and abhorrence felt by all Canadians at the unwarranted violence used against the people and democratically elected government of Lithuania.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs raised Canada's concerns with the Soviet Ambassador, January 11. Since then, Soviet military forces have been used against the institutions and citizens of Lithuania with resulting serious injuries and loss of life.

I deeply regret that these actions have taken place. They are contrary to the assurances Mr. Clark had received from Foreign Minister Shevardnadze and which you had explicitly repeated to me that there would be no crackdown in the Baltic states. I cannot stress to you strongly enough the importance of quickly and unequivocally condemning such behaviour.

You have accomplished a great deal in bringing new hope to your nation and the world. I appeal to you not to undermine this achievement but to show restraint in this increasingly dangerous situation so that further bloodshed can be averted. I urge you to seek negotiated solutions consistent with the Helsinki Final Act, the Charter of Paris and the legitimate aspirations of Lithuania and the other Baltic States. Democracy cannot exist without respect for fundamental human rights and freedoms.

As of now, Canada is reviewing its offers of technical assistance and new lines of credit for the purchase of foodstuffs. Developments in the Baltic States will also have an impact on the agreements reached during Mr. Clark's visit to Moscow and in our discussions at the CSCE Paris Summit.

I must stress that further escalation will have serious consequences for our relations. As Mr. Clark advised the Soviet Ambassador, at this time of heightened international tension, we are watching events not only in the Gulf, but in the USSR as well. In circumstances such as these, you should not underestimate the force of Canadian and world opinion.

That was the Prime Minister's letter to Mr. Gorbatchev, and I am prepared to lay it on the Table of the House.

[English]

I understand that I am close to the end of my allotted time. I wonder if I might have two or three minutes.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Flis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, we definitely would like to hear a little longer from the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but in his three minutes I wonder if he could clarify this point. He keeps saying that he met with the vice-president in his parliamentary capacity. I was under the impression he was meeting these people as Secretary of State for External Affairs.

• (2000)

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member understands, as others in the House do, the constraints that are upon us as a country. I have made it very clear that the circumstances under which I could meet elected leaders, other parliamentarians who hold government office from the Baltic states, was in my capacity as a parliamentarian. That has been understood by all of them and I think clearly understood by members of the Baltic community in Canada. It was certainly in that capacity that I met the parliamentarian who is vice-president of Latvia today.

Do I understand that one of the independent members has denied me—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order please. Do I have unanimous consent for extending the speaking time of the Secretary of State for External Affairs?

Mr. Plamondon: I agree, provided that the minister's extra time is added to our total speaking time, so that those who wish to speak will be able to do so. For instance, I will hardly have any time at all, but if the minister takes more time, I will have to skip my turn altogether. I am prepared to let the minister continue, but if the minister takes an extra 15 or 10 minutes, I suggest that instead of finishing at 10 p.m., we finish at a quarter or ten past, as the case may be. I agree on that condition.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): If I understand correctly, there is no unanimous consent for extending the debate, because I am bound by an order of the House, unless the House decides to rescind its order adopted before dinner.

Does the House agree to extend debate beyond 10 p.m., to the extent that the speaking time of the Secretary of State for External Affairs is extended?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, officials of the Departments of External Affairs and International Trade are in continuous contact with representatives of the Baltic communities and concerned individuals.

For example, we are continuing to facilitate the shipment of medical supplies to Lithuania and to other Baltic states.

In Moscow, our embassy has been repeating Canada's message, the message of the House of Commons and our government, to the Soviets through the ministry of foreign affairs there, including a conversation today between Ambassador Michael Bell of Canada and the new Foreign Minister Bessmertnykh of the Soviet Union.

An embassy officer is on the ground in Vilnius providing consular services to Canadians in the region and acting as a channel of communication. He is in direct contact with President Landsbergis.

Another embassy officer is leaving for Riga shortly.

We are looking at ways of including the Baltic States in the CSCE process. Canada is making strong statements at the CSCE conference in Valetta, the meeting on the peaceful resolution of disputes, and will do the same at ongoing meetings in Vienna.

Canada and others will be invoking the human dimension mechanism of the CSCE, which we think may provide us more influence than we had heretofore seeking explanations formally from Soviet authorities about what is happening in the Baltic states.

As the House knows, the member from Markham raised a proposal in the House today of which I have taken note regarding the conference under the CSCE process on human rights.

We are discussing the situation with our allies in NATO and are considering the means by which it might be raised effectively in the United Nations, especially in the Commission on Human Rights meeting in Geneva later this month. Members of Parliament have made the point to me that, while they understand the effect of the veto on matters that might be raised in the Security Council, the presence of that veto should not in and of itself preclude us from raising the matter either there or in the General Assembly. We are looking at ways effect can be given to that view.

Bilaterally, we are looking at concrete ways that Canada can support the Baltic states through increased contacts and direct assistance. We are also exploring with the Baltic communities in Canada the possibilities of opening a Baltic information office here in Canada.

I am prepared to look at any other ways that are practical. There are limits upon what we can do, given our obligations in the family of nations and given the importance of our continuing relations with the Soviet Union, given the importance indeed of our capacity to influence that country and that government, not simply in matters it considers internal but also in other international matters.

I can say that, while I am aware of those limits, it is my intention and the personal commitment of the Prime Minister to push those limits as far as is humanly possible. I will need not simply the support of the House in that, but also the advice of the House as to means that might be followed that can accomplish that purpose. Any proposals that are put forward in this debate or later will be seriously considered.

The purpose of this debate, I believe, is to make one message clear to the Baltic peoples, and most particularly to the leadership in the Soviet Union, and that is that the violence and repression that we have seen in recent days is completely unacceptable to Canada, unacceptable to this Parliament, and poses a grave risk to relations that we want to pursue and to reforms that we want to encourage in the Soviet Union.

There is a crisis in the gulf that preoccupies us all. If leaders of the Soviet Union thought that would deflect the attention of Canadians, this Parliament, or this government away from the situation of the Baltic peoples, then they were wrong. We are committed to support principles that have been important to Canadians for years and to support peoples whose bravery and determination have won the admiration of all of us.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Since the Secretary of State for External Affairs has gone six minutes beyond his speaking time of 20 minutes, the debate this evening will finish at 10.06 p.m.

The hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway.

[English]

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, this is on question and comments, I trust.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There are no questions or comments in the debate. Does the hon. member wish to speak?

Mr. Robinson: No.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I thank the right hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs for his speech, and also the two co-sponsors of the motion to bring on this emergency debate, the existence of which I think sends an important signal, particularly to the Soviet Union, about the seriousness with which the Canadian Parliament takes recent events in Latvia and Lithuania. Also, it sends a signal to the Baltic community within Canada as to how serious the Canadian Parliament takes events in Lithuania and Latvia, and the concern which the Baltic community in Canada rightly has about their countries of origin.

I was going to say, while I have the secretary of state's attention, that I will send over to him a fax which I received indirectly over the weekend from the Minister of Health in Lithuania, Mr. Juozaz Oleksas. I stayed in his home for 10 days when I was in Lithuania observing the elections. It is a rather detailed piece of information about the nature of the violence, the wounds that people received, causes of death, et cetera, and an extensive list of the kinds of medical supplies which are in short supply. I send that over to him now. It may be in the file at External Affairs, but just in case he does not have it already, he will have it now.

With respect to the emergency debate, it is one of a number of steps that have already been taken by this Parliament with respect to the situation in Lithuania and Latvia, going all the way back to March of last year when we passed a resolution recognizing the right—

• (2010)

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I say I would rather not talk over the voices of people on the other side. This is an emergency debate. There is an emergency in Latvia and Lithuania and, if members are going to be in the Chamber, they can at least pay attention to what is going on or have their conversations somewhere else.

With respect to what the Canadian Parliament has done so far, I was taking you back, Mr. Speaker, to the passage of the resolution in March, 1990 by which we recognized, collectively, the right of the Baltic states to declare their independence and the resolution of January 15, 1991 in which we called upon the Soviet Union, given what had already happened in Lithuania on the previous weekend, to stop the violence which was being visited upon civilians. Now, of course, there is the situation in Latvia where, again, people have been killed by the military, the so-called Black Berets.

I am very pleased to be part of this collective effort on the part of Canadian parliamentarians, an effort which owes its existence to a consensus about the situation in the Baltic, but also I think to the actions of the group known as the Canadian Parliamentary Group for the Baltic Peoples. That group has its origin in the visit of Canadian parliamentarians to Lithuania in February 1990 in order to observe the elections there which brought to power, so to speak, the Sajudis Party. Sajudis is an umbrella movement which contains within it various ideological factions from Greens to social democrats, communists, Christian democrats, and a variety of people who were united in one thing and that was to see the day when Lithuania would regain the independence that it once enjoyed as a sovereign state.

I remember only too well the experience that I had there. We were of course in Vilnius for most of the time we were there, but one evening—I believe it was on a Friday night—I went to a small town near the Baltic Sea called Siluté in which I was able to attend a town hall meeting where there were a variety of candidates. I think there were six candidates in all running in that particular riding. They had a town hall meeting at which the candidates spoke and there was a question and answer period after. Of course, because I was a guest, I got to say why I was there. I was also invited to say a word at the end of the meeting.

One of the things that I had to say was that it was the most polite, most civil, and most profound town hall meeting I had ever been at. It made all the town hall meeting that I had experienced as a Canadian politician look rather inferior. Perhaps because people realized the stakes, I think, of what they were arguing about and what they were debating, they were very generous with each other.

I reflected at that time that perhaps we take democracy too much for granted in this country and abuse, in many respects, our freedom of speech by being unkind to each other in ways that are not called for. These people knew the value of what they were experiencing for the first time in 50 years and treated it with a great deal of care.

Of course, the other side of that coin is that their politics have not yet come to be trivialized in the way that our politics has come to be trivialized by the media, the sound bite, negative advertising, and all the other things that afflict the body politic in western democracies.

Having said that, it is one of the things—the experience of that night and other experiences that I had there—that continues to motivate me in keeping what is happening in the Baltic states on the agenda of Parliament and on the international agenda, to the extent that any one member of Parliament can effect these things. I saw there, and I think we continue to see, a determination on the part of Lithuanians—although they are willing to defend themselves if pushed—to do what they have done so far in a very peaceful and democratic way, and in a very courageous way I might add.

We say to the Soviet Union, I hope, by everything we do and say here today, that we want the existence of those democratically elected governments of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania to be preserved, to be preserved not just all holed up in the parliament buildings somewhere, under siege, but to be preserved as a legitimate instrument by which the eventual independence or new relationship, whatever it comes to be with Moscow, can be negotiated. Let Moscow or the centralized authority in the Soviet Union negotiate as toughly as it wishes in a democratic way about the consequences of independence in the same way that any other country would want to negotiate toughly and realistically with parts of it that wanted to seek sovereignty. I do not need to make any obvious comparisons.

Those governments have been elected in fair and democratic elections. For me, that is the bottom line of continuing goodwill toward the Soviet Union, that those democratically elected governments not be overthrown or replaced with non-elected governments. There are plenty of difficult issues to be sorted out between those elected governments and Moscow. There are plenty of difficult questions regarding security, respect for ethnic minorities in the Baltic republics and questions having to do with what the terms of separation would be and so on. These are things that will take time.

To that extent, it is incumbent upon the leadership in the various Baltic republics to understand the over-all difficulty of the situation in the Soviet Union and to proceed in a way that is tactically wise and that takes into account those realities. I am not in a position to judge whether they have done that or not, but we are all in a position to say that that is something they need to take into account.

I met with the Soviet ambassador on Friday before I returned to my riding and received what we have received before in terms of an official explanation from the Soviet Union. That is the explanation that the external affairs committee got when we were in Moscow in April 1990, that there is a provision for the separation of republics from the Soviet Union. It is a five-year process and it is something that they ask the Baltic republics to respect.

The problem is twofold: One, for the Baltic republics to accept that constitutionalized process for separation is for them to accept the Soviet constitution. They are not willing to do this because they maintain that they have a special status, recognized by a significant part of the international community which never recognized their annexation by the Soviet Union. For them to seek separation purely and only within this established constitutional process is to concede the point on which they base their entire political self-understanding.

The second thing which is never highlighted by Soviet spokespersons, unless you ask them, is that at the end of this five-year process, any separation, even if it is ratified by referendum—and I think I am correct in this understanding—still has to be approved by Moscow. There is a sort of a trump card at the end which the Lithuanians and others suspect would be used against them. There are problems there.

What is needed is for the Baltic leadership to recognize the difficulty which the Soviet Union finds itself in, at the same time as Moscow recognizes the special case of the Baltics. This special case is established in the report by the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade in our report on our visit there. It is not a new thought but one which I think still has to be fully absorbed by the Soviet Union, the extent to which the special case of the Baltics is something that it would be wise for a variety of ways for the Soviet Union to accept and not only because it would permit it to negotiate with the leadership in the Baltic republics at this point.

If they were able to establish a different relationship with the Baltic republics and permit a transition to a market economy, for instance, in the Baltics quicker than they are obviously able to do it elsewhere, they might in a way have sort of a pilot project for perestroika. Things might be able to happen more quickly, more easily and provide the basis for the kind of change that needs to take place in other parts of the Soviet Union.

Obviously, this is an argument that has not been accepted by the Soviet leadership, but I think it is something that does recommend itself. I am very sorry that those arguments have not been heard or, at least, have not been accepted in Moscow or at the Kremlin. I do not disagree with the decision that the minister has announced to suspend various things that were in train with respect to the Soviet Union, but I regret very much that it has come to that as I am sure the minister of external affairs does.

I think this new relationship with the Soviet Union that was and still is developing is not only important for Canada because the Soviet Union happens to be one of our largest neighbours in every respect but also because the new relationship that the whole world was entering into with the Soviet Union is very important to the future of the planet for obvious reasons.

The point of the Secretary of State for External Affairs is well taken when he says that we have to judge how we respond to these events in light of the whole context of our relationship with the Soviet Union. That involves some very difficult decisions, because it is quite understandable that the community here in Canada has a list of the things that it would like the government to do.

I think we should be able, even though we share these concerns, to disagree with each other on a tactical level as to what will achieve the desired result and what may have to be held back at this point in order to preserve larger possibilities within which the possibility for an independent Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia is contained.

I believe that if the Soviet Union were to crumble—to use the minister's words—or were seen to be crumbling, that this would provide the opportunity for the army in the Soviet Union, at least in the short term, to take over, to exert more influence and to perpetrate more of the kind of violence that we have seen in Latvia and Lithuania.

I think there are some very difficult judgments to be made there and I hope that we all, as politicians, have the understanding of the various communities when we try to be as serious as we can about this and not just simply agree with people for the sake of achieving political points.

With respect to the gulf, I am not sure. I have a suspicious enough mind growing out of my life in politics to believe that all kinds of things are not coincidence, but I think it is fair to say that the gulf war does distract attention from the events in the Baltics. Whether this was deliberate or not is really almost beside the point.

I think things would have come to a head there anyway in the absence of any willingness on the part of Moscow to accept the special case of the Baltics. Whether we were dealing with this now or later, we probably would have been dealing with it at some time. But it does raise some interesting questions vis-à-vis the gulf because here we are all agreeing, and yet over the gulf we cannot seem to agree.

It would be useful it seems to me to try to find what it is in the government's position with respect to the gulf that might permit it new freedom of action with respect to Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia; that is, this new emphasis on the United Nations which the government—I believe sincerely even though I disagree—sees as the underpinning of its action with respect to the gulf.

I think here is another opportunity for the UN to exercise itself on a situation which is entirely new, in the sense that it is not even a year since we have had these new democratically elected governments. It is entirely new in the sense that this is the post-1989 post-cold war world that we are dealing with.

I do not agree with the way in which this post-cold war United Nations has dealt with the gulf, but I think that this is another situation which asks of this new United Nations, which asks of this new post-cold war order, how shall we deal with this?

In that sense, new thinking has to be applied to that situation as well. Nothing in the way that we have dealt with these questions before is a truly reliable guidepost for us. I think some of the new thinking that has gone into the United Nations by the Soviet Union in some of the speeches by the now resigned foreign minister Eduard Shevardnadze need to be examined for ways in which the Soviet Union can be taken at its own word on how to deal with the situation in the Baltic republics.

I would commend that analytical task, if you like, to the minister and to the department because it may be that in things which have been said over the last little while by the Soviet Union you may find the hook by which to persuade them that they have an obligation, consistent with their own rhetoric to allow the Baltic situation to be debated at the UN; or considered by the Security Council; or whatever the case may be.

The object of all these things is to get the issue of the Baltic states into the international arena where it properly belongs, as a result of the longstanding contention by the international community, that the annexation of the Baltic states is only a de facto reality and not the the de jure reality that would enable the Soviet Union to claim that this was purely an internal matter, which raises, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member's time has expired. Does the House agree to extend the speech time of the hon. member?

An hon. member: Agreed.

Mr. Blaikie: I was talking about the UN, Mr. Speaker. Just one final point.

The point we need to look at—after the gulf war is over—hopefully soon—is how do we so reform the United Nations to enable it to legitimately concern itself with what nations regard as their internal affairs?

We can no longer go on like this permitting government after government, whether it is Canada with respect to native rights; the Soviet Union with respect to Lithuania; to Iraq, with respect to the Kurds; or whoever it happens to be, to claim that this is purely an internal matter. I think that is an agenda for reform that the government should turn its attention to.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I wonder, following consultations in the House whether I might be permitted to address a brief question to my colleague at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the House agree to allow the hon. member to put a question to the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: No.

[Translation]

Mr. Plamondon: I agree, Mr. Speaker, provided we add the time as we did earlier.

[English]

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief. I want to first of all congratulate my colleague for his very insightful analysis of the situation in the Baltic republics. I know that he has travelled to that area himself, specifically to the Baltic republics, and last year he was in the Soviet Union as well. Certainly he has been one of the leaders in this House on this very important question.

As the spokesperson for my party on external affairs, I want to make this very clear, as my colleague has done.

First of all, we have had a long-standing position of non-recognition of the annexation of the Baltic republics. That position remains. We fully support the importance of a dialogue, a constructive dialogue between the Baltic republics and the Soviet Union with respect to the facilitating of their desire to obtain sovereignty and self-determination.

Obviously this House and I join in condemning the violence that took place in Lithuania, the death of some 14 Lithuanians eight days ago, the violence and death in Latvia. Tragically, earlier today, we learned that there have been two explosions of undetermined origins in Estonia at a building in the Tallinn Shipyards and a centre for worker collectives. Fortunately there were no injuries, but we recall that similar explosions in Riga in early January preceded the recent events in Latvia.

I want to take this opportunity to indicate that we certainly, in general terms, support the position that the government has taken in response to this very difficult question. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has outlined that response. We welcome, particularly, his assurance that within the context of the United Nations this matter will be given high priority, whether it be in Geneva at the United Nations Human Rights Commission or at the Security Council. I would hope that we would be prepared, although not a member of the Security Council, to seek to have this matter raised there or in other fora including the CSCE.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs knows that I have communicated with him in respect of the question of observer status for the Baltic republics at CSCE meetings. I understand the consensus process at CSCE meetings, but I would hope that Canada would take a position now of support for observer status at the CSCE.

As well, my colleague referred to the fact that the eyes of the world have been so focused and so riveted on the situation in the gulf that not enough attention has been paid to the situation in the Baltic republics: in Lithuania, in Latvia, and hopefully not but possibly in Estonia.

I wanted to note as well that in the same context—and I will be brief—the eyes of the world have not been focused on another very serious violation of human rights. I am speaking here of the trials which are taking place in China of the Tiananmen Square dissidents. I have the same concern with respect to the lack of attention. Indeed a young Chinese citizen, Mao Jiye, Secretary-General of the Federation of Chinese Students and Scholars in Canada, attempted to visit China and was denied. I hope that the Secretary of State for External Affairs will express his concern on this matter, as eloquently and as forcefully as he has done with respect to the Baltic republics.

In conclusion, I want to reinforce our full support for the measures that have been taken in this context and to urge that the United Nations, the community of nations, very forcefully make it clear to Mikhail Gorbachev, who has done so much over the past six years to give the world hope of a new beginning with glasnost and perestroika, will not abandon that very important course and will in fact ensure that the Baltic republics are no longer the scene of violence and death.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Since the hon. member spoke five minutes, this evening's debate will continue until 10.11 p.m.

The hon. member for Scarborough Centre.

[English]

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, let me begin by saying that I will be sharing my time on this side of the House with my colleagues.

I want to express appreciation to members of the House of Commons for agreeing to have this debate. Particularly I want to thank the Secretary of State for External Affairs for his excellent and thoughtful remarks tonight. The Secretary of State for External Affairs can be applauded for his commitment and indeed for his excellent work in the matters relating to the Baltic states.

Just one year ago, I had the opportunity, along with colleagues in this House of Commons, to visit Vilnius, Lithuania. At the invitation of Sajudis, the freedom movement in Lithuania, we witnessed the democratic election that gave an overwhelming victory to the principles of independence and self-government. The Baltic states of Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia, after 50 years of domination by the Soviet Union, were set on a path for freedom and democracy.

To have been in Vilnius last year living with a Lithuanian family, speaking at meetings on behalf of freedom candidates, meeting students at the University of Vilnius, chatting with people in restaurants, stores and on the street, the determination and discipline of the people was clear. They wanted political and economic independence.

Upon returning to Canada, my colleagues and I set to work to establish the Canadian Parliamentary Group for the Baltic Peoples, a non-partisan group of MPs from all sides of the House, to work together with those Canadians with Baltic heritage or Baltic roots in order to advance in a concerted way our assistance, as well as to encourage our government's support and assistance for the realization of independence for Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia.

I want to thank the leaders of the Baltic community in Canada for their tremendous work. Particularly I want to mention Laas Levitt, President of the Estonian Central Council in Canada; Doctor Gurtis Silins, President of the Latvian National Federation in Canada; and Al Pacecuinis, Past President of the Lithuanian Canadian community. The work that they provide within the communities and the information support they give to parliamentarians are very much appreciated. All the members of the communities in the Baltic states are to be applauded for their good work.

The election in Lithuania was a one-issue election. It was independence, and it was an overwhelming victory. Now, just a few short months later with freedom and independence within reach, the oppressive Soviet regime, in spite of its words of glasnost, perestroika, openness and freedom, has hit these Baltic nations with the full force of the military.

The Soviets first responded to the calls of independence with an economic blockade of vital necessities. It was attempting to strangle the people into submission. When the blockade failed, the Soviets appeared to hold out the promise of negotiation. It is clear now that never was its intent. Now presidential rule has been threatened and the Soviet tanks have rolled in bringing back memories of previous atrocities.

Just this weekend, I heard the testimonial accounts of eyewitnesses from the three Baltic communities of the massacre, as well as the persecutions suffered by the men forced to conscript to an army not representative of their values, their beliefs or their ideals. I was moved to horror at the atrocities inflicted.

This issue is an international issue. It cannot rest untouched in the affairs of the Soviet Union. We have witnessed a side of Mikhail Gorbachev which is contrary to all the progress and reform made in that nation. We cannot ignore it. This is why it is so fundamentally important that we debate this crisis in the House of Commons tonight.

We stand resolute in support of the people of Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia for their independence, to ensure freedom, democratic and human rights, and justice. Through the United Nations, the Human Rights Commission or the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe, every possible effort must be made to set our position squarely on the agenda, that we accept nothing less than the independence of these nations.

I encourage parliamentary representation within our delegations. I urge our government to support the striking of a United Nations task force on the Baltic states to observe the events as they occur and report back to the international community.

I applaud the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I am pleased that Canada has suspended the earlier commitment to the Soviet Union to assist in its reforms.

Indeed, how could we continue to assist a country, the values of which obviously run contrary to our own. How could we provide assistance to a country, the president of which has gone back on his very assurances to our government that force would not be used in the Baltic states. I was also pleased to hear the Secretary of State for External Affairs talk about the medical aid which would be sent directly to the Baltic states.

I want to speak about the information centre. The Secretary of State for External Affairs stated in his remarks that the establishment of an information centre was under review. I applaud that. I believe this to be an excellent initiative: to establish an information centre in order to make available all relevant information concerning events, as well as the safety of families in the Baltic states. I understand that a similar information centre has already been established in Stockholm.

I also urge our government to make every means available to those persons who wish to leave the Baltic states and come to Canada, especially those who are the victims of criminal acts and persecution.

Our parliamentary group has met with representatives of the Baltic communities in Canada. I am pleased to report to the House of Commons the appreciation extended to right hon. Prime Minister for his forthright and quick response by communicating with President Gorbachev, expressing the abhorrence of all Canadians of the unwarranted violence used against the people in the democratically elected Government of Lithuania.

In closing, we must continue as parliamentarians and as individuals committed to democracy to support the aspirations and the goals of the Baltic peoples in their struggle and the realization of their independence.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, it is with an enormous sense of disappointment and foreboding for the future that I participate in this debate.

Over the past two or three years the relationship between the Soviet Union and the rest of the world has been characterized by one word: hope, hope of a new era in the history of the world.

Hope for independence and freedom, and with them a new meaning of reality not only in relations between nations but also in the spirit of the human soul.

[English]

Even as we have witnessed the difficulties and increasing dangers accompanying change in the Soviet Union, we have hoped that the leadership and the citizens of that vast land would find the will and the ways to continue their march toward the future. Today we must question that march and we must question its direction: to the future with confidence, or back to the past with fear and terror?

There can be no question of Canada's concern at events in the Baltic. We condemn, without reservation, the unwarranted and brutal violence with which democratically elected governments in Lithuania and Latvia and their institutions have been attacked.

[Translation]

We are not naive. We know and we understand the enormous pressure brought to bear on the Soviet Union president, but we also know—and we thought he knew—that there is no room for coercion and intimidation in the society he was defending and which was his aim, at least that is what we thought.

[English]

We still hope Mikhail Gorbachev stands for the free development and growth of democracy and for the self-determination which such democracy demands. We believe democracy offers to the Soviet Union, its peoples and its neighbours greater security and greater prosperity than they have witnessed under the old regime.

Where does the Soviet Union stand at this hour? Where is Mikhail Gorbachev? Where is glasnost at this hour of decision? Every one of us participating in this debate tonight knows full well the facts of history which brought the free and independent Baltic states of Latvia, Lithuania and Estonia under Stalin's rule 50-some years ago.

We know the brutal repression with which all opposition was eliminated. We know the enforced Russification with which the cultures of these peoples were suppressed. But we also know that that oppression failed.

We know here, in our own country, and in many others, how courageously and passionately the former citizens of these countries and their descendants kept alive their hopes and their dreams of free homelands through so many dark years.

With the changes President Gorbachev brought to the Soviet Union, we saw that the citizens living in those Baltic countries had kept alive those same hopes, those same dreams, no less brightly.

There are many things tanks and armoured vehicles can crush, but they cannot crush the idea of liberty once planted. That is the lesson of history we thought the new Soviet Union understood. The universal declaration of human rights, the Helsinki Accord, these, we thought and we had hoped, would be the pillars of any new relationship to form between constituent parts of this huge union. If they were to be called republics, we here in Canada looked for them to be republics in more than name only.

[Translation]

That is the evolution in which we have put our confidence and in which the Balkan states and their citizens have faith. When they were given the opportunity to cast their ballots, they did not hesitate. These are nascent democracies, as we can call them, but through their conviction and understanding they have shown wisdom and maturity beyond their years.

[English]

Are these brave hopes now to be ended in bloodshed and destruction? Is the Charter of Paris, signed only a few weeks ago, to become as worthless as so many other pieces of paper in history have become?

I know that all Canadians join me in urging President Gorbachev to stand with the believers in democracy and openness at this time and to demonstrate that courageous leadership for which he has been applauded by the whole world.

In the past year so many of the symbols of tyranny have been swept away, across Europe and in the Soviet Union itself. The walls have come down. The secret police organizations have been disbanded or recalled to barracks. The presses and broadcast towers of a free and uncensored media have begun to take their place.

The world has applauded this transformation and those who have made it possible. We have rejoiced that millions have found new purpose and new hope. What possible purpose can there be to end such progress?

Security? Can anyone seriously believe a return to the cold war can lead to greater security?

Prosperity? What prosperity is there in a new arms race, in the collapse of economic development that will follow new repression?

Tranquillity? Tranquillity in the streets of Vilnius and Riga will come with the sounds of citizens rejoicing in their freedom and in the things free citizens do, not in the sound of tanks and machine guns.

Canada has never recognized the annexation of the Baltic states by the Soviet Union and we will not. What we will recognize is whether the Soviet Union desires to continue or to withdraw from its new relationship with the world and with its own people.

We want for the Soviet Union every opportunity for peace, friendship and freedom and all that they can bring. But President Gorbachev must also know that Canadians will watch closely how he acts at this time.

We urge him to act with courage and with wisdom, for democracy, for freedom.

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, like all Canadians and like all freedom loving people around this world, I was absolutely shocked and disgusted by the events that have been taking place in Lithuania and more recently in Latvia in the last few days. It is even more shocking when one considers the fact that this is coming so hard on the heels of the events that have been taking place in the Persian Gulf.

I, like most members of this House, have a great many constituents and personal friends whose place of origin is the Baltic states. I have a Latvian Canadian Cultural Centre in my riding. I have a good many friends and constituents who are very close to that centre. The Estonia House is just on the border of my riding. Again, a good many constituents and friends are associated with Estonia House. Just a few short months ago, I had the opportunity of being at the Lithuanian Community House in Toronto to celebrate with some of the other members of this House the free and independent elections which had taken place in Lithuania for the first time since the end of the Second World War.

• (2050)

All members of this House and all Canadians are well aware of the very troubled existence that the Baltic states have had over the years. We are aware that they were independent in the 13th century. We are aware that they were dominated by their larger neighbours up until the end of the First World War. They became independent for a very brief period of time again between World War I and World War II and that independence was snuffed out by the Soviet Union in breach of non-aggression pacts signed with each of those three nations.

We are aware, as well, that the Baltic states were fought over by the Nazis and by the armies of the Soviet Union. Ultimately, they came to be dominated, after the Second World War as a result of the Yalta conference and the dividing up of spheres of influence throughout Europe, by the Soviet Union.

We know as well, however, that Canada has never recognized the illegal annexation or occupation of the Baltic states. We have always considered that legally they remain independent.

Now, just as they seemed about to gain their independence in fact as well as in law, that independence has been struck at again by the Soviet army. What can we do, and what should we do? We have heard that the Prime Minister has already condemned these actions. He has written to Mr. Gorbachev condemning these actions.

We know that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has gone further, first of all, in indicating that we were reconsidering our aid to the Soviet Union and now, has indicated that we are suspending that aid. Many of my own constituents have pointed out other ways that we can act as well.

They suggested an emergency debate such as the one we are having tonight. They suggested that Canadian observers be sent to the Baltic states such as the Norwegians have sent. They suggested that we, again, insist that the U.S.S.R. stop the illegal and horrific actions that are taking place there. They suggested that UN Security Council can try to impose sanctions even though we know that the Soviet Union holds that veto power.

They have suggested UN observers, and they have suggested again that the UN impose sanctions. These are things that we might do unilaterally, but there are things that we should be doing through the United Nations as well, it seems to me, because we failed to bring about an effective and peaceful conclusion in the Persian Gulf.

What we must do now is try to find an effective and peaceful means of solving this problem with the Baltic states. At the same time, we must find it in a way which will guarantee once and for all the freedom, the democracy and the independence of Latvia, Estonia and Lithuania.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle–Émard): Mr. Speaker, this evening I wish to describe the terrible conditions under which people in the Baltic countries are living. The situation in these republics is very serious. The attacks against these peoples will have dramatic consequences.

In this part of the world, where political foundations are so fragile, people are fighting for survival. The gulf war must not let us forget them. The tragic events of the last few days have shocked us all. They show us how vulnerable efforts to obtain more open and transparent government are. They also show that people cannot be repressed indefinitely. The desire for self-determination cannot be muffled forever. The history of the Baltic republics is written in blood. Devastated by war, abused by dictatorial regimes, the Baltic people have nevertheless survived. Perestroika had given these people hope. Unfortunately, interests with dictatorial tendencies want to snuff out this spark of freedom.

We now know there is no government that can extinguish the flame of the Baltic countries. The movement is irresistible. It points the way to a world where force will no longer be relevant.

[English]

The valiant efforts of the Baltic states have taught us much. They have taught us that moral principles, that principles of justice are the principles of nationhood.

Free elections were held in the Baltic states. In February, for instance, my colleague, the member for Parkdale—High Park, who is one of Canada's leading experts on eastern Europe, was a witness to the election in Lithuania. He told me, as he has said to this House tonight, that those elections were fairly held. He has said that they observed the principles of democracy. He has said that their legislatures were democratically elected. Under these circumstances how can anybody now justify sending in troops to take away from the people of the Baltic countries their duly elected Parliament?

First Lithuania, then Latvia, how much longer before Estonia? The world must now speak with one unequivocal voice. What must the world do? First, it must recognize that the simple niceties of diplomatic language will not deter those who would take away a people's freedom by force. It must recognize that vague protests and economic aid possibly withheld are simply not enough. What must the world do?

First, it must put real weight into the economic levers that the world has at its disposal. To that end, I would congratulate the Secretary of State for External Affairs for the announcement that he made tonight.

Second, the world must introduce a resolution in the United Nations Security Council condemning Soviet aggression. The motion may well be defeated but the point must be made. It will not go unnoticed.

There are other measures that we must take as well. In Canada, we must pay more than lip service to the very real fact, which is the absolute independence of the Baltic states. We must say that de jure recognition is no longer sufficient, that the Baltic states are entitled to real recognition. A people who have held free elections, a people who have fought for their independence, are entitled to full diplomatic accreditation.

Again I refer to the question of my colleague from Parkdale—High Park when he asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs why he did not meet the leaders of the Baltic states, not in his simple capacity as a parliamentarian, but in his full capacity as the representative of this country, the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

There are other things. We must call a special meeting of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe to condemn the very real menace that the threat to the Baltic states poses to the peace of Europe and the world.

Finally, because my time is limited, Mr. Speaker, we must accept as refugees those from the Baltic countries who find their way here. That the government of the Soviet Union is considering deporting young men whose only crime is that they refuse to report to an army whose ultimate purpose may well be to shoot their own people is simply unthinkable.

Freedom is not the cause of destabilization. What are the objections to doing that which is right? Well, there are those who say that we must not destabilize Mikhail Gorbachev. There are those who say we must not destabilize the Soviet Union. I would argue the opposite.

The world owes a great deal to Mikhail Gorbachev, but he is now in a battle with conservative forces who would undo him and would undo everything that he has done. Those forces must understand that the free world will not stand for any backsliding. They must be told that Mikhail Gorbachev was right to begin with, and that he is wrong now. We must make it clear to the Soviet president that we will stand behind those who speak for freedom. Destabilization in the U.S.S.R. will not come from giving freedom to the Baltic states, it will come from refusing that freedom.

The Baltic states represent no threat. The threat comes, as it did indeed on the weekend, from the 300,000 people who demonstrated in Moscow, from the countless thousands who demonstrated throughout the Soviet Union against the great brutality that was demonstrated in Vilnius and in Riga. The Russian people, too, want their freedom. They know that it is linked to freedom elsewhere.

In conclusion, the Soviet Union is in the grip of terrible economic chaos. Its leadership must understand that economic progress without political freedom is simply impossible. The Soviet Union must understand that we are on the threshold of a new world order and that the Baltic states are a symbol of that order.

The Soviet Union must understand that all our fates, all around the world and indeed in this Chamber, are tied to the battle that three small but very, very courageous countries are waging.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

S. O. 52

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, in my limited time, I would first like to compliment my colleague, the hon. member for La-Salle-Émard, who has been working closely with my colleague, the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park, in organizing, with all members of this House today, an emergency debate on this issue.

I want to read into the record a letter I received from a gentleman representing members of the business community, Mr. Peteris Kusmanis, from my riding. I think he summarized the situation well. He writes:

> As a member of the Business Community, I am concerned with what is happening in the Soviet Union, particularly with the use of force to crush the democratically elected governments of Latvia, Lithuania and Estonia. We cannot have mutually beneficial economic relations with the Soviet Union until the Soviet Union demonstrates that it is truly committed to democracy and free enterprise, and that it is worthy of our trust. The Soviet Union was apparently headed in the right direction—perestroika, glasnost, democratic elections—but the events of the last months have proven that perestroika and glasnost are a farce. I appeal to you to support or introduce a call for an all-party resolution today to condemn the Soviet attack yesterday on the democratically elected government of Latvia. The House of Commons should hold an IMMEDIATE emergency debate on the Baltic situation. Sanctions must be taken against the U.S.S.R. Canada must urge its partners in NATO, the CSCE and the United Nations to do the same; the U.S. is key in this matter and Brian Mulroney should be on the phone to George Bush to urge the U.S. to take strong action immediately.
> Until freedom is restored to the Baltic States, and until the Soviet Union proves that it is committed to a free market system, there should be no thought of economic aid to the Soviet Union. This situation demands immediate action—

Many of my constituents are reflecting Mr. Kusmanis' point of view and I want to go back to the hon. member from Edmonton and his thoughts when he talked about being in the Soviet Union last year right around this time. I, too, was there speaking at an environmental conference where there was so much hope and so much feeling that we were all heading in the right direction.

Here we are tonight in this emergency debate, frustrated, hopes shattered. It is only by all members of the House uniting and sending a strong message to the Soviet Union that we can keep a flicker of hope that maybe some action will be taken. We hope Mr. Gorbachev will take a stand and for starters crush the action that is going on in the Baltic States so that we might regain the hope that we had a year ago that he was going in the right direction.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley): Mr. Speaker, for the past 18 months the world, especially the western world, has witnessed a roller-coaster of hopes and expectations. It was 18 months ago when we began hearing the faint stirrings, the ever-growing stirrings, of hope for freedom in those countries which we used to call the east bloc countries in the days of the Iron Curtain.

We witnessed events almost beyond belief in the ensuing weeks which culminated in the tearing down of the Berlin wall.

It was not peace that was breaking out. These nations had experienced 40 years of a kind of peace all over eastern Europe. It is not the kind of peace we cherish, but it was a kind of peace, and it was not peace that was breaking out, it was freedom that broke out at that time.

But the forerunner to that experience was a statement by the Soviet Union, an admission on the part of the Soviet Union that the Molotov-von Ribbentrop agreement of 1939-1940 was in fact an illegal transaction.

This is what three generations of Estonians, Latvians, and Lithuanians had been waiting for. Those people had been raped and pillaged by two European countries under an illegal agreement. Now a confession from the Soviet Union declared that to be illegal.

Therefore, it is now incumbent on the Soviet Union, since it has admitted its guilt, to undo the wrong of that treaty. That is what the debate is about tonight. Peace has been there, but now freedom is breaking out as witnessed, as several of our colleagues have spoken tonight, in the elections of the past year. Freedom is breaking out, but this presents President Gorbachev with an enormous problem.

In the ensuing 40 years, those countries have experienced interlocking populations, interlocking cultures, ideologies, goals, economies, all interwoven. How do you unscramble that egg? That is the difficulty facing President Gorbachev. When 50 per cent of the population of one of those countries are actually Russians, or citizens of the Soviet Union, that is a problem. It needs to be solved. We should not retreat from it, but we must acknowledge that that problem exists.

We should also acknowledge that the problems will not become smaller. They will become greater as the years go by as long as that is ignored by the Soviet Union.

It is important to remember that these people have now tasted and experienced freedom as they never had known it before. They will not be satisfied until it is theirs permanently. They will not be denied. Suppression of that hunger for freedom will simply lead to greater explosions in the future.

• (2110)

It is important to notice that the Baltic people are trying to do it right. They are not trying to thumb their noses at the Soviet Union. They are trying to do it peacefully and by negotiations, and they are acting in good faith. Up to this point, they have not been rewarded for their good faith and for trying to do it right.

Canada has several responsibilities. First, we must sound the alarm that something is going drastically wrong in those countries. We must sound the alarm to the world. We cannot sit by, simply clucking our tongues and pretending it will go away.

We must learn from the mistake that we have experienced in the Middle East. Witness the eight-year war between Iraq and Iran when one million people were killed. The world stood by and said: "Isn't that terrible?" When Saddam Hussein was willing to sacrifice 50,000 lives just to capture one town, we stood by and we clucked our tongues as he gassed his own citizens, the Kurds. We did not say very much. Then, he moved into Kuwait, and we realized we had to do something and do it now. We need to learn from the experience of the Middle East that we cannot allow a repetition of that kind of pattern in the Baltic states.

Just four weeks ago, I met with a young man from my constituency. He is a professor of international economics and finance at UBC on leave studying in Finland the events of the Baltic states. He told me then, just before New Years that what the leaders in the Baltic states feared the most was that the heightening of the activity in the Middle East was going to give an opportunity to the conservative reactionary forces of the Soviet Union to move into the Baltic states. While everybody was distracted in the Middle East, it could move into the Baltic states. Their prophesies have become true and we must sound the alarm.

The second thing we must do is stand by the Baltic people. We must let them know that we encourage them, that we stand with them, that we cherish their freedom with them, and that we want them to experience it the way we experience it.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Friesen: We must let them know that we are not simply mouthing words, but we want them to cherish our freedoms. Therefore, we welcome the announcement by the secretary of state tonight that he has already suspended some of the present negotiations and initiatives that have taken place between Canada and the Soviet Union. They have been suspended.

Second, he is now initiating new ways of working with the Baltic people. We must meet with them. We must spend time with them. We must walk along side of them. We must take these new initiatives, some of which the secretary of state has announced tonight.

We must sound the alarm and we must encourage. We cannot allow the mistakes of the Middle East to be repeated in the Baltic states.

I welcome the debate tonight, and the only point I would make regarding my friend, the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard, is this. He said that it is worth the risk, destabilizing the Soviet Union and maybe allowing President Gorbachev to be set aside. It sounds very attractive if Mr. Gorbachev does not bring the reforms necessary—

An hon. member: He did not say that.

Mr. Friesen: Yes, he did. He said that it is worth the risk.

I would simply ask him: Who has he got to replace him? If he could tell us who it was, I could agree with him because it sounds very attractive.

We stand with the Baltic people tonight. We will stand with them in the future, and we will demonstrate to them that we cherish their freedom with them.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the Canadian House of Commons tonight to join with colleagues on all sides of this House to condemn and to lament the armed suppression of the peoples in the Baltic republics and the curtailment of their freedoms.

Just recently I was browsing through one of the recent biographies about Mikhail Gorbachev. There were grouped on some pages a series of photographs. One seemed almost inexplicable. It was a full-page photograph of President Gorbachev by himself in a park, crouched down, feeding a squirrel. What was written underneath that was the statement: "The tragedy of Mikhail Gorbachev is that he will be unable to finish his own revolution". Why that picture, why that prophecy is hard to say, but certainly what we are seeing here is something that we often see with revolutionary change, that there is a period of retrenchment.

Just as George Bernard Shaw taught us that paradoxes are the only truths, we see a profound paradox in this situation, for the Gorbachev revolution as epitomized by perestroika and glasnost was accompanied also by a clear movement toward democracy and a clear suppression of the old instinct of totalitarian states to call out the army at the moment of crisis.

It was not the first time in the past few years that in the countries such as Poland, Czechoslovakia and Hungary we saw efforts to overthrow the regime that had been imposed since 1945. It had happened in 1956 in Budapest for Hungary. It had happened in 1968 in Prague for Czechoslovakia.

The difference this time was that the Red Army remained in the barracks and it remained there because Mikhail Gorbachev instructed that it should be so. So the paradox that we face tonight is that it is under this same regime, the same leader, that in fact military suppression has become the sad signature in already two of the Baltic republics, Lithuania and now Latvia.

At issue now is the future make-up of the Soviet Union. Mr. Gorbachev, it appears, is bent on maintaining control of a slightly decentralized federation of Soviet republics. The democratization that he once promoted stops short it seems of democratic self-determination for individual republics.

The Baltic peoples, on the other hand, took the Soviet leader's ideas seriously, drawing from glasnost and perestroika the logical conclusions that all republics would be free to administer their own political and economic programs. The differences have now become very clear. While Mikhail Gorbachev preaches reform, the Baltic peoples practise it.

Tonight at six o'clock, I met with the Vice-President of Latvia, here in the East Block, in the company of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. What impressed me most particularly about his many messages to us was his statement that the people of Latvia have been making a journey in the past months, and they do not now want to go back. There is a palpable feeling of new power of democratic realization in many of the republics, including Ukraine which I visited last October, Kazakhstan, and elsewhere, Georgia, Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, and the Russian republic itself. So, now is a time when we must not send the wrong signal.

Two years ago on March 4 when I addressed the annual congress of the Baltic veterans in Canada, I quoted from books where on earlier occasions the freedom fighters in those republics had prepared to seek to overthrow the existing authorities and re-establish a free and democratic society. They had based part of their initiative on statements made by leaders in the west and their assumption that those words would be translated into material support at the time of their uprising. Tragically, that support was not there when they moved and when they expected it.

Now we come to the need, as many members have said, to match our words with actions. That is why I fully endorse and gladly support everything that was contained in the outstanding speech this evening here in the House by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I am sure he and members of the government did not come lightly to announcing to us tonight the suspension of the $150 million line of credit and all the other initiatives that he referred to that are now in a state of suspension. The member from Winnipeg also referred to the sense of hope that we had seen in all of these recent developments, so tonight is not a happy night when we see the necessity of taking these steps.

We cannot have this debate in the House and be unmindful that our country is again at war in the Persian Gulf. For the fifth time in this century our country is at war and we are once again, as Canadian poet Robert W. Service said, staring into the aching womb of night. There is nothing about this war that we relish or welcome. We are there because of a commitment and support of the United Nations.

We are considering tonight the situation of Latvia and Lithuania, countries that also were invaded, occupied and annexed by a neighbouring power. So we have many parallels here which cannot be lost on any of us tonight who are grappling with the difficult legal dilemma that the Soviet Union, as a member of the United Nations, considers to be an internal matter and not something subject to the purview of the United Nations.

In conclusion, I want to say that last October when I was in the Soviet Union, I saw many things that would encourage all of us, the kinds of changes for which we called for years and years now actually happening. I also saw a country that in so many respects was simply one level above chaos. So many people were determined to throw over the old order, a system that for 70 years had preached success but had produced shortages, failure, repression and extermination of millions of freedom loving people.

As I left, the only question in my mind as I felt that palpable sense of freedom, that rising surge of reform and democracy was the question of who controls the Red Army, because as Lenin had once said, the communist party is the glue that holds the Soviet Union together. The communist party today has atrophied and withered away and is no longer any such glue. We are, I am afraid, seeing that in these last remnant hours of this 20th century's last empire, the only force that is available is the force of arms. Let us all hope that the measures taken here and the voices expressed here can in time, and I mean now, cause this to be reversed.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): In his wisdom, the Speaker of the House has permitted this important emergency debate to take place and on behalf of the Canadians of Baltic origins in my riding of Hamilton West, I thank you, Sir. I thank my colleague, the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park for his tireless effort as co-chair of the Canadian Parliamentary Group for the Baltic Peoples, that all-party, all-member group of which I am so proud to be a member.

Members of the Society of East Central European Nations at Hamilton, Ontario, remember all too well what Gromyko said when he was succeeded by Gorbachev. He said: "Behind his nice smile he has iron teeth". It is a cruel quote to be restated here tonight, especially in light of all the good that Gorbachev has presided over as of late. It is a cruel statement maybe, but not for the Lithuanians, not for the Latvians and hopefully not for the Estonians.

Just yesterday in downtown Hamilton, which was the first municipality in the country to draw up a resolution in support of democracy for Lithuania, appealing to the federal government to take a strong position in support of Lithuania, it was a bitter wind that swirled around the hundreds of protesters who gathered outside Hamilton City Hall, the members of the Lithuanian, Latvian, Estonian and Ukrainian communities who agreed that the struggle in the Baltic states is no less serious a threat to world peace than the war in the Persian Gulf and that if it is forgotten, we will all pay a heavy price.

Showing their support for the Baltic states, some demonstrators carried their national flag. Others waved placards which read: "Peace not bloodshed". Another said: "Gorbachev, Nobel Peace Prize Winner", except the word "peace" was scratched out and the word "war" was inserted so the sign read: "Gorbachev Nobel War Prize Winner". Still another picket sign read: "Talks not tanks". A very touching moment was when a group of school-aged children took their black bows as symbols and placed them on a symbolic tree, an evergreen tree.

Yes, I and many members of this House feel again the fear and the frustrations of those valiant people whose homelands face the bonds of tyranny. Tension in the Baltics is high. In fact, there is growing fear that the unwarranted military crackdown used against the people and democratically elected government in Lithuania, which killed 13 people, injured 165, and 65 people are missing and the attack by Soviet troops on a Latvian police headquarters resulting in the deaths of five, will soon spread to Estonia because there in Estonia concrete barriers have been erected around the Parliament Buildings where the people wait and watch hour to hour.

My fear is that the world attention and much of the resources of the news media have been diverted from the troop movements and bloodshed in the Baltics to the Persian Gulf war. If allowed to continue, Gorbachev may succeed through the back door that which he could not possibly accomplish walking in through the front door.

• (2130)

Many words have been written by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. He strongly protests, in fact condemns, the brutal and unacceptable Soviet crackdowns in Lithuania and Latvia. Many words have been spoken in protests and demonstrations in my riding of Hamilton West, in the riding of Parkdale—High Park and other ridings of this House, and in demonstrations around the world. Many words will be spoken in this emergency debate tonight.

However, it is concrete action which I urge the government to implement continually in order to impress upon the Soviet Union the urgency of this grave situation. "What action", one may ask. We promote constructive dialogue between the Soviet Union and the Baltic states, the aim of which is the peaceful resolution of the crisis. In the words of one of my constituents—and I will use only her initials to respect her privacy—E.G. on Emerson Street, writes:

> As you are no doubt aware, the Baltic countries lost their independence when the Soviet army illegally occupied them in 1940. Although Canada steadily maintains a policy of non-recognition de jure of this occupation, for which I and my fellow exiles are grateful, in actual fact Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania with their western European outlook and work ethic continue to function as colonies of the Soviet empire.
> Recent political activities of the popular fronts in these countries and their supporters have forcefully shown the world their abiding desire for the restoration of freedom and dignity in their lives.
> They need Canada's help.

Can Canada help? I congratulate the Secretary of State for External Affairs for meeting with the Soviet ambassador today and for the announcements that he has made here tonight. Canada can play a vital role by hearing the desires of the Baltic Canadian communities.

The Lithuanian Canadian community asks the Canadian government to take the following actions in the wake of the brutal crackdown in Vilnius by the Soviet army:

First, to impose sanctions on the U.S.S.R. until it withdraws its tanks and paratroopers from Vilnius and enters into negotiations with the legitimate government of Lithuania.

Second, to accord diplomatic recognition immediately to the democratically elected Government of the Republic of Lithuania, led by President Landsbergis.

Third, to introduce a Canadian resolution in the United Nations condemning the Soviet aggression to push for an emergency debate of the UN Security Council in order to debate the Baltic crisis.

Fourth, to call a special meeting of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe to condemn the assault on Lithuania as a threat to the peace of Europe.

Then we hear from the Latvian community which says clearly that this warning had no effect on Soviets. The Canadian Latvian community is outraged by the senseless tragedy of Soviet black berets killing and maiming innocent civilians and journalists in Riga. It calls on the Canadian government to cease all assistance to the Soviet Union immediately; to impose trade and economic sanctions, which we are glad to hear have begun tonight; to call an emergency debate in the House of Commons, in which we are participating here tonight; to call on the United Nations to send observers to the Baltic states; and to continue to raise the Baltic issue at the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe by stressing that Soviet actions will continue to threaten the peace of Europe until democracy is restored.

My Baltic constituents say they look forward to learning that members of Parliament, privileged to serve, have helped the Baltic nations in their struggle for the restoration of their economic and cultural sovereignty.

On their behalf, I implore the Secretary of State for External Affairs to use every practical, peaceful tool at his disposal, such as the one he announced here tonight, to pressure the Soviet Union into negotiating the terms of independence which we pray will resolve the legitimate concerns of the Baltic states.

[Translation]

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in the debate this evening on the situation in the Baltic states.

[English]

It is very difficult when the focus of attention in the world is on another part of the world, on the Persian Gulf, to draw the attention of many people to the concerns that many of us have for the people of the Baltic republics: Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia.

However, it is of great importance for the world community, as an international community, to draw its attention to each and every sector of the world where concerns such as those we have all been expressing tonight need to be brought to bear. It is particularly important when so many in this country and elsewhere question the actions of the international community in the Persian Gulf, because they perceive there to be a double standard at practice in the world.

If the world community, through gaining experience in co-operative action and collective security, is to achieve a lasting world peace on the basis of those principles, it will be necessary to establish a standard that can be applied in many situations, not just in those where specific and important economic interests prevail.

All of us feel a very great disappointment at what has transpired in the Soviet Union and in the Baltic states, very great disappointment made that much greater by the amount of hope we all felt for this regime led by a new man, a man who looked affable, competent and, as Margaret Thatcher once said, "like a man with whom we could do business". Now, having awarded him the Nobel Peace Prize, we find that in his nation troops are firing guns and driving tanks over people who are speaking on behalf of democratic reforms in their own country.

It is important for Canadians to remember that the history of the Baltic republics is one which in this century has included the subjugation by the Soviet Union as a result of the pact between Nazi Germany and Stalin which led to their being acquired in 1940. To this day, Canada has not recognized that subjugation of the Baltic states.

We still had so much hope. Of course, they did not immediately permit their independence, but when we think back over the years of the cold war we think of what happened in Hungary in 1956 and in Czechoslovakia in 1968, the building of the Berlin wall in 1961, the enormous change that occurred, and the years and years of arms reduction talks which went on and on and seemed to go nowhere.

Suddenly, with this new leader in the Kremlin, the world seemed to take on a different face. Freedom seemed to spring up in the Soviet Union: the right of dissent, with people marching in the streets protesting what their government was saying; Soviet politicians and journalists coming to Canada and telling us what was happening; and the freedom of expression, the freedom of opinion, in the journals of the Soviet Union. Suddenly the door seems to be slamming shut. Of course we are disappointed.

This is important, in light of some of the comments that President Gorbachev made. This is not a question of law and order in Lithuania, in particular. This is not a question of law and order. This is a question of military force being applied against the democratically elected government of the state of Lithuania. Those elections were not held by some outside power. They were authorized and legitimized, even by the government of the Soviet Union. They were held under international supervision in Lithuania, the result of which was to elect the government that last March 11 voted, not by a narrow majority but unanimously, to declare the independence of Lithuania from the Soviet Union.

What an exciting event that was. I have a report from the Washington Post dated March 12, 1990, indicating the excitement felt by the people who witnessed that occasion. Tears streamed down their faces as they realized that their country again had the prospect of becoming independent. Then a few months later, 10 months later, that hope seems to be dying in the face of Soviet tanks.

There should be no questions where Canada stands on this issue. Canada has never recognized the occupation of the Baltic republics by the Soviet Union. That position has remained consistent, no matter what party has been in government.

I would like to read from a letter dated April 29, 1983 from the then Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Hon. Allan J. MacEachen, who wrote at that time:

> Canada does not recognize de jure the incorporation of Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania into the Soviet Union. The Soviet Government is well aware of our position which has been firmly maintained over the last forty years. In following this policy the Canadian Government expresses its continuing disapproval of the forcible incorporation of the Baltic states.

In the face of that statement—and I have no reason to believe the current government has changed its position on it—I fail to understand why the Secretary of State for External Affairs must meet with Lithuanian and Latvian representatives in his parliamentary capacity and not in his ministerial capacity. He should be ashamed to refuse to do that.

It is important for the Soviet Union to understand that the national ideal in the Baltic republics is integrated with the democratic ideals. Mr. Gorbachev must be brought to understand by representations—and I understand that they have been clear and strong from our government—from our government and other western governments indicating that the concept of democratic reform incorporates into it the right to self-determination of peoples, particularly in republics such as the Baltics where national ideals are long held and national traditions clearly exist.

Just as it is impossible to stop the wind, leaders of countries throughout the world must understand it is impossible to stop the winds of freedom which are blowing. We felt their sensation in China. We have seen them blow down the Berlin wall. We have seen them blow away governments in eastern Europe. We feel their gentle breezes in other parts of the world. The winds of freedom and democracy are blowing in the Soviet Union.

The choice is clear. That government can either harness the wind or it can attempt to resist it. The benefits of harnessing the wind are a people, proud of their land and able to dedicate themselves to making it better, to building a strong economy, to building a land based on compassion and the principles of democracy. To resist is to build anger and frustration, to build sadness and despair, and to ensure that economic reforms will not succeed. I think the choice is an obvious one.

I applaud our government for the actions that the minister has announced tonight. I would hope that actions such as those and others duplicating them around the world will assist Mr. Gorbachev in making his case in his country that he can either succeed in his negotiations with the west, build the new world order and a stronger, healthier Soviet economy, or he can go back to the old ways, face the enormous resistance that western countries will bring to bear on him and find that nothing will dig his country out of the economic pit into which it has fallen.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for giving me five minutes and thanks also to the "bloc conservateur" for giving me five minutes of their speaking time. As a member of the Bloc quebecois, I also wish to condemn the Soviet Union's actions against democracy and the Baltic peoples. Quebecers understand what it must feel like because they had the same experience in 1970. They too saw Canadian tanks roll in to repress a growing democracy. If we compare what is happening in Lithuania and in other countries throughout the world with what happened in Quebec during the October Crisis, we see many similarities. We remember that Canadian tanks entered Quebec and that the Canadian government suspended the rights of individuals as is happening today in Lithuania. They sent soldiers and tanks, like today in Lithuania. They arrested people without cause. More than 400 Quebecers were detained in prison, although they had no connection whatsoever with the October Crisis and had not been in involved in anti-social or other activities. These people were kept in prison and denied the right to call a lawyer. They were tortured. They were threatened as people are being threatened today in Lithuania, in the Baltic States. After those arrests, people lost their jobs forever and their reputations were smeared forever as well.

Mr. Speaker, no country in the world is immune from such abuse, such attacks on democracy. We must not turn a blind eye to our own actions that were also attacks on democracy.

Not long ago, Mr. Speaker, in 1989, China used tanks to subjugate democracy, and the House of Commons condemned that decision. In 1990, the House of Commons condemned the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq. In 1991, it condemns the invasion of Lithuania by Soviet tanks. But I may remind the House that in 1970, it remained silent when Canadian tanks entered Quebec to subjugate democracy.

However, after listening to speeches by hon. members this evening, I found their resolve to defend all parts of the world that are seeking democracy and sovereignty very reassuring. I am therefore very confident that in the future, Quebec will be a democratic and sovereign country and that members of this House will rise to defend it with as much zeal as they did this evening in defending Lithuania.

[English]

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to be part of this debate. I am really saddened by the developments. We have seen profound and regrettable acts by the U.S.S.R. against the Baltic states.

I have had the opportunity to visit the Soviet Union on three occasions, the most recent last June. There really were some signs of progress, progress in moving down the road towards democracy. But one only had to be there a few hours to know how fragile that progress was. Perhaps the many people in the Soviet Union and the Baltic states might have had their expectations too high because that road to democracy is going to take quite some time.

I want to commend the patience and the resolve of the people in the Baltic states. I want to commend the patience, as well, of the Canadians whose origins are Lithuanian, Latvian and Estonian. This year they will be organizing the 19th Baltic dinner, which they organized on the Hill to speak to parliamentarians and leaders about their important cause.

I would like to recount some of the statements, commitments and actions of the last two weeks. On January 8, this statement came from the Secretary of State for External Affairs:

> —Joe Clark, today expressed concern about the announced movement of military forces into the Baltic states, Ukraine and several other republics of the Soviet Union.
> "Our concerns have been forcefully conveyed today to the Soviet Ambassador," stated Mr. Clark. "We are urging restraint on all sides in this potentially dangerous situation".
> Mr. Clark called on Soviet authorities to refrain from further intimidation and the use of force, expressing the hope that solutions to the outstanding differences between the republics and Moscow can be negotiated.
> Mr. Clark recalled that Soviet Foreign Minister Shevardnadze had assured him several times that there would be no crackdown in the Baltic States, and that President Gorbachev had reaffirmed this to Prime Minister Mulroney.

On January 9, a letter was sent from the Canadian Parliamentary Group for the Baltic Peoples, signed by the chair, the hon. member for Scarborough Centre and the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park and, of course, the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona was involved in this. It was sent to the Soviet ambassador in Canada, Mr. Richard Ovinnikov, and it states:

> On behalf of the Canadian Parliamentary Group for the Baltic Peoples, we wish to register our strong protest at the recent movement of Soviet troops into the Baltic states.
> This action is totally unacceptable and is contrary to previous statements made by your government. It was our expectation that negotiations would proceed in order to resolve the differences which exist between your government and the Baltic States.

Two days later, on January 11, this press release was issued, on behalf of Mr. Clark, and it stated, in part:

> "We deplore the use of force against the democratically elected government and the people of Lithuania," Mr. Clark stated. "Such actions are contrary to the assurances given to me by Foreign Minister Shevardnadze and repeated to Prime Minister Mulroney by President Gorbachev, that there would be no crackdown in the Baltics."
> Mr. Clark urged restraint in this dangerous situation and called on the Soviet authorities to refrain from further violence. He emphasized that the Soviet Union must adhere to its obligations under the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe (CSCE) and negotiate solutions based on the principles of the Helsinki Final Act.

Two days after that, January 13, a news release from the Prime Minister's office included these remarks:

> The Prime Minister deeply regrets that these actions have taken place, contrary to explicit assurances given to Canada by Mr. Gorbachev. The Prime Minister stressed the need for Mr. Gorbachev to quickly and unequivocally condemn such behaviour.
> The Prime Minister appealed for Mr. Gorbachev to show restraint and avoid further bloodshed. He urged the Soviet President to seek solutions consistent with the Helsinki Final Act, the Charter of Paris and the legitimate aspirations of Lithuania and the other Baltic states. Democracy cannot exist without respect for fundamental human rights and freedoms.
> The Prime Minister advised that Canada was reviewing its offer of technical assistance and new lines of credit for the purchase of foodstuffs.
> The Secretary of State for External Affairs said tonight that program has been suspended.

On January 15, two days after that, the special motion which was agreed to by all members was put to the House, and it reads:

> Be it resolved
> That this House condemns the brutal and unacceptable Soviet crackdown in Lithuania, and calls upon President Gorbachev and the U.S.S.R. authorities to refrain from using further violence against the people and democratically elected governments of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia.

On top of all that, just last evening we saw on television and heard the news that the Soviet Black Berets attacked and assaulted a building in Riga, Latvia. It is reported that four people were killed and at least 10 were injured. This is another regrettable backward step, a sad step, that is repugnant in the eyes of most people.

Canadians with roots in the Baltic countries are very concerned. They have been worried and frustrated for years but they had their hopes picked up in the last year or two. Now they have been dashed again by these developments.

I received a letter from Mr. and Mrs. A. P. Stanènas in Thornhill and I would like to read a bit of that, Mr. Speaker. It is addressed to me and it says:

> In view of the ongoing Soviet atrocities against the people and the government of Lithuania we urge you—
> (2) That you urge the Prime Minister of Canada to call for a meeting of the United Nations Security Council and to sponsor a resolution condemning the use of acts of bloodied aggression against the people of Lithuania and ordering the withdrawal of Soviet military forces out of the Republic of Lithuania.

Also, a few hours ago Mr. Voldemars Berkis, a Canadian from Latvia telephoned me very concerned and worried. He had several questions and I will just state two or three. Basically what he wanted to know was why the double standard, why do some infractions, why do some human rights violations seem to be dealt with more quickly than the problems in the Baltic states. Why not have this debated at the United Nations was another question.

He had many other concerns about the decades of talk without concrete action. What do you say to a man like that, Mr. Speaker, other than that all members on all sides of this House will try to stand together this time and really move toward concrete action.

Earlier today I asked the right hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs a question in the House. The gist of it was that the third round of the CSCE, which is emphasizing the human dimension, is being held in Moscow later this summer. The U.S.S.R. is hosting it so I asked the minister if we would give some thought to reconsidering being a participant and if some of these violations are not dealt with very quickly maybe we should withdraw from that conference. It sounds harsh but it is time for harsh action on behalf of the people of the Baltic states.

In closing, I want to assure all Canadians of Baltic origin that all members of this House are going to do every practical thing possible in the coming weeks and months to help them achieve that dream of theirs, that dream of independence, that dream of freedom, that somehow it will be reached and these atrocities and setbacks that have happened far too many times will be history.

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to have this opportunity to speak on this topic tonight, the special debate on the Baltic issue.

I want to thank the members of this House who have been so active in keeping this issue alive and being a driving force to make this debate happen tonight, the members for Scarborough Centre, Parkdale—High Park, and Winnipeg Transcona. Without their driving energy, quite possibly this debate would not have come tonight, even though I know all of us in this House have received phone calls from all over Canada asking that this House come together to consider this most important issue.

• (2200)

I want to thank the people in my riding of London—Middlesex whose origin and family ties are back to the Baltics. This community of several hundred families in London and southwestern Ontario has done a great deal to enrich the culture and the life of our community. It has been a great addition for all of us. The knowledge they have passed on to their fellow Canadians about their roots and their part of the world has helped all of us to a better understanding.

The lesson that we have learned from these people is one that I guess is not a big surprise to most Canadians, that these three countries were independent countries. They had self-determination.

Self-determination is really the point of my speech tonight, because clearly self-determination is on everyone's mind at the present time in the Persian Gulf, whether one is a Kuwaiti, a Palestinian, an Arab of another descent, or a Canadian who is fighting for the freedom of self-determination of those countries. We are all very interested in self-determination and, as parliamentarians, this is the thing that we are pushing for the most.

The U.S.S.R.'s persistence in keeping self-determination from these three countries came as quite a surprise to us. Even though Gorbachev opened up the Soviet, and opened up this part of the world so that it looked like self-determination was possible with free elections for the first time, which some of my colleagues had the good fortune of witnessing, we are now finding out that in fact his intentions were not real. In the last few days, with brutal reality, the Black Berets have moved in and trampled the rights and trampled the growth of self-determination. These people and Canadians are indignant, and rightly so, to this action.

We have heard tonight from the Secretary of State for External Affairs that Canada has taken, through the actions of our Prime Minister and through his own department, some very dramatic and hopefully helpful gestures. One is freezing the $150 million help to the Soviet Union effective today, which I think was a very good move. But more than this is in order. As a group of parliamentarians committed to self-determination and to the rights of the Baltic people, we have to go further than this.

There has been talk tonight about acting on the recommendations all of us receive from our communities. I have met with the Baltic communities in London and London—Middlesex and found that their concerns were echoed here tonight in the House.

I hope that actions will be taken in the United Nations at the Security Council. We look forward to that. We have already talked about the government's action, which I hope will be a help.

Tonight, I see some of my colleagues in the House who are members of the executive of the Canada-Europe Parliamentary Association. That group has representation of all the parties in the House. Under the aegis of yourself, Sir, I think it can provide a very useful service to the newly elected governments of the three countries, as we have done with fledgling governments in Hungary, Czechoslovakia, and Poland.

The association has been very active and would like to be active in the Baltic countries in terms of helping them with their role as parliamentarians and helping them, through the eyes of other countries, to see their legitimate practice as they work towards maintaining their right of self-determination. Also, to put the backbone on that, these countries, these governments, and these parliamentarians need help in developing an economic infrastructure.

The Canada-Europe Parliamentary Association has worked very hard indeed with the parliaments of the other eastern European countries. In fact, over a period of a year, it has had some very significant results in terms of helping with their economic strengths.

As the economic strengths come together, so does the rigor of the people. When some citizens take it upon themselves to usurp the control of the government, as clearly is the case in Lithuania and certainly yesterday and today in Riga, where some members are saying that they see the elected government as being out of step with the realities of that particular country. Its goals are in effect going back to the U.S.S.R., using the Black Berets to come in and trample the rights of the elected governments which are in fact carrying almost the self-determination of the people of those states.

Clearly, they need to be strengthened as parliamentarians. They need all the help they can get from equivalent countries around the world and this Parliament. I think I can speak for all members in the House that we will definitely commit ourselves to this endeavour. Through the Canada-Europe Parliamentary Association, we want the communities in Canada from the three Baltic countries to know that all members are committed to working with the newly elected governments in those three countries.

We will find ways to work together so this base of parliamentarians which, as I said at the opening of my remarks, began with three of our colleagues who have taken this case up and have worked with Baltic Canadians in a very positive way to bring the issue in front of all Canadians. Thus all 26 million know now that it is not just in the Persian Gulf where self-determination is at risk, but, in fact, it is in northeast Europe where three countries, whom Canada has always recognized with the right to self determination, are very much finding their rights lost.

We want those people in Canada, as well in those three countries to know that this Parliament is strongly behind them. There is one association under your direction, Sir, which is going to make every effort to speed up this process and to help them through the hurdles, so that that freshness of democracy can blow through.

Mr. Flis: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This has been such an excellent debate tonight. We have had such excellent co-operation from everyone that I seek unanimous consent from the House to not see the clock for no later than 10.30. We have only two speakers left who need about five to seven minutes each.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the House have unanimous consent to extend the sitting time for 10 to 15 minutes?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Ten to 20 minutes?

Mr. Boyer: Why don't you give five minutes each.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Five minutes each.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, as has already been said by others, it is indeed an honour to rise tonight to speak to this emergency resolution. This motion has come about as a result of the events that have taken place over the last number of days in the Baltic states and the increase in military activity in all of these areas. I feel strongly tonight that Canada's relationship with the Soviet Union must be revised.

• (2210)

As my colleague from Parkdale—High Park said earlier in the day, and I quote: "The Government of Canada must call on the United Nations to send observers to the region and recognize the consuls of the Baltic republics in Canada."

What is happening here is clear. As the world's attention remains focused on the Persian Gulf crisis, the communist government is beating and killing people in the Baltic states. The violence and death is escalating day by day.

Military action is occurring all over this area without any shame from the communist state of Mr. Gorbachev.

I would like to quote from a January 13, 1991 press release from the Prime Minister which states: "Canada was reviewing its offers of technical assistance and new lines of credit for the purchase of foodstuffs. Further escalation would have serious consequences for Canada–U.S.S.R. relations". I believe that we should stop immediately all offers of help to the U.S.S.R.

What I have heard this last week is not of reform, not of help, and not of understanding, but rather of violence. Sending 30,000 to 40,000 additional troops to the Baltic states within the span of two or three days is totally unjustified. It will and it has already incited civil unrest.

This man has received the Nobel Peace Prize, was voted man of the year by Time magazine, and has made so much change occur in the world in six or seven years. We have seen the democratization of so many places as a result of him. He has been upstaging western politicians and leaders for many, many years. He was the man who grabbed all the attention. It is almost unbelievable that this could happen, that this man would let this happen. It is hard to believe this after we saw the Berlin wall come down, and after we saw democracy returned to areas that had not seen it for 40 and 50 years. We have seen great changes occur in his own country.

Now, in light of all this, we see the beginning of the end. Was this truly this man? Is this really this man speaking, or is it something else that I fear to even suggest could be happening?

In closing, I would like to reiterate the Liberal policy position with regard to the Baltic states. First, we never did recognize the incorporation of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania into the Union of the Soviet Socialists Republic. Second, we categorically disapprove of the forcible incorporation of the Baltic states into the U.S.S.R.

The self-determination of the people of the Baltic states must be respected by Mr. Gorbachev. Furthermore, the Soviet Union is in violation of principles seven and eight of the Helsinki Final Act. The Soviet Union must come to understand that self-determination and respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms is a new world order. This has to be brought home. Mr. Gorbachev must be made to believe this. It is hard for me to believe that after all that has happened in the last number of years that this could come about.

I want to commend all the speakers who have taken part in this debate. I want to say thank you and give the floor to my hon. colleague.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, I thank the House for allowing me this opportunity to talk on a very important matter.

Let me first say how proud I am of the House when it can come together unanimously, as it should more often, in terms of this issue. Unanimously we have condemned the actions of the Soviet Union in its aggression towards these three Baltic states, and parliamentarians have been able to come together in a very non-partisan way and be supportive of these three independent states. I think that is commendable.

I also want to take this opportunity to thank and congratulate the government and the Prime Minister for moving quickly to indicate to Mikhail Gorbachev that what he has done is unacceptable.

I was impressed by the speech of the right hon. secretary of state who indicated that at least Canada is moving quickly and forcefully, perhaps not as forcefully as we would like, but I will get to that in a moment, to demonstrate our willingness and our political will to ensure that the Soviet Union understands clearly a very clear message again from Canada that we will not stand for this aggression toward these three independent states.

The government can do more, along with Parliament, to ensure that the message is not lost while the world's attention is directed to a very other important region of the world, the Middle East.

I also want to thank the members from Parkdale—High Park, Scarborough Centre, and Winnipeg Transcona, the chairpeople of the committee that seized this issue some time ago and made sure that parliamentarians were well aware of what the situation was.

I want to highlight a few points: The atrocity toward these three Baltic nations of Estonia, Lithuania and Latvia started 50 years ago. Fifty years ago that atrocity began by the U.S.S.R. when in fact it invaded, maybe not by the force that it is using today, but by the stroke of a pen it took away the independence of those three states. To this very day, those three Baltic states have been looking to the world and to Canada to essentially stand up and say that illegal annexation by the Soviet Union of those three independent republics should not have happened, cannot happen, and we cannot remain silent anymore.

I shared the joys—as many of you did—one year ago when in fact the democratic governments were elected. We shared their joys. I was in the church basement of the Lithuanian community in London, Ontario. One could see the tears of joy from the people as they heard the votes coming in to re-establish their independence, to rededicate their independence, and we shared that joy with them.

This past Sunday I shared their horror and their anguish at what was happening again to their countries when, in fact, the Soviet Union moved in to Lithuania and Latvia, essentially killing and brutalizing those people and those countries again.

It is absolutely necessary that we collectively indicate and show our political willingness that we are serious about this matter, that the world is serious, that Mikhail Gorbachev cannot hope to hide behind the veil of what is happening in the Persian Gulf to try to go in the back door and re-establish that illegal authority in those three Baltic states.

We, as parliamentarians, supporting those people and their free and democratic spirit and their willingness to exist in peaceful coalition, hopefully with the U.S.S.R., take this opportunity of demanding that the UN take this issue seriously and that the CSCE also look at this matter in a very serious manner. Also, that we, and our government, tell the Soviet Union and the new world order that the atrocities now perpetrated on these three Baltic states again cannot be tolerated any more.

If this government really wanted to demonstrate its true commitment to the three Baltic states, it would finally recognize these three Baltic states as truly independent states. While we have never recognized the illegal annexation of these three Baltic states by the U.S.S.R., I think it is most appropriate today or tomorrow for this government, along with Parliament, to re-establish or re-dedicate themselves to recognizing and giving full diplomatic recognition to those three Baltic republics. That would show our political will in coming to grips with this crisis.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 10.20 p.m., pursuant to order made earlier this day, I declare the motion carried.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

SUPPORT FOR UNITED NATIONS

The House resumed from January 17 consideration of the motion of Mr. Clark (Yellowhead):

That this House reaffirms its support of the United Nations in ending the aggression by Iraq against Kuwait.

And of the motion of Mrs. Collins:

That this question be now put.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to the order adopted on Monday, January 21, 1991,—

[English]

—the House will now hear from one representative of each party on government business, No. 27—

—regarding the Persian Gulf crisis for a period not to exceed 15 minutes each.

The Right hon. Prime minister now has the floor.

[English]

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to ask all members of the House to support Canada's efforts, as a member of the United Nations coalition, to expel Saddam Hussein from Kuwait.

I do so on the basis that sometimes, regrettably, war is necessary to secure peace. This is one such moment.

The war in the Persian Gulf did not begin on January 15 but, rather, on August 2 when Saddam Hussein invaded and occupied Kuwait brutally and entirely without provocation. Saddam Hussein's action threatened the entire region. It gave the world community the choice either to do nothing, as it had done so often in the past and acquiesce in the occupation by Iraq of a country one-tenth its size, or to respond—and the world responded.

The world decided to act within the framework established 46 years earlier in San Francisco, a framework Canadians helped build, namely, the all-important United Nations.

The world did not use force immediately to reverse Saddam Hussein's aggression. Rather, the response was both measured and prudent, giving diplomacy a chance to secure the peace.

From the beginning of August to the end of November, 12 resolutions were passed by the United Nations Security Council ordering Saddam Hussein out of Kuwait. Almost all of these resolutions were passed unanimously and many of them were drafted and, in some cases, co-sponsored by Canada which was then a member of the Security Council.

• (1710)

This unity of purpose in perspective reflected the totally unacceptable nature of Saddam Hussein's assault on the very important principle of peace and security. It reflected the new spirit of co-operation which had given new life and new hope to the United Nations when tensions between east and west ceased.

Twenty-eight nations sent forces to the gulf to enforce the sanctions. The last five months of 1990 and the first weeks of 1991 witnessed the most intense diplomacy in modern history.

At meetings of the United Nations, the Arab League, the European Community, the non-aligned movement, and among members of the Commonwealth—

[Translation]

—and among the most important members of the "Francophonie"—

[English]

—and in literally hundreds of contacts between leaders the world over—north and south, east and west, Muslim and non-Muslim, Arab and non-Arab—all avenues to peace were explored.

[Translation]

I am satisfied, Mr Speaker, that throughout these months Canada did all it could do diplomatically in the cause of peace. At this point, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may pay tribute to the Secretary of State for External Affairs who did a remarkable job in difficult circumstances.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: But all avenues led only to the dead-end of Saddam Hussein's intransigence.

And so, on January 15th, after a final, 47—day pause for peace, coalition nations followed through with the use of force authorized by the United Nations.

Canada joined in that effort. We were determined to see the United Nations act as it said it would act if Saddam Hussein did not respond to the will of the international community, which had been clearly expressed on many occasions. We were determined to help secure the withdrawal of Saddam Hussein's forces from Kuwait and to help restore peace and security to the region, absolutely and entirely, as called for in UN Security Council resolution 678, whose passage was co-sponsored by Canada.

[English]

And so, we asked Canadian men and women to serve their country again, this time in the Persian Gulf, accepting the great personal risks that this entails.

These courageous men and women deserve our full support. We owe it to them, to their families, and to history to make our positions clear, to declare where we stand as representatives of the Canadian people. I can tell you where I stand as Prime Minister of Canada on behalf of the Government of Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: Wishful thinking that evil will go away if we want it to badly enough has no place in serious decision making.

The question was asked, where do Canada's interests lie? How can Canada have interests, legitimate and immediate interests, in a serious conflict thousands of miles away?

The first interest that Canada has at stake is simple morality. A terrible wrong has been perpetrated in Kuwait by Saddam Hussein. The world community has a moral obligation to step in and to stop it.

The second interest we have in this conflict is the construction and maintenance of a system of international peace and security that has the capacity to deter aggression and, where necessary, to proceed with other nations to stop it.

For decades Canada has sought an effective system of international law and order based on the principle of collective security.

With the exception of Korea, we have been stymied in that effort by ideological confrontation—in fact, by the cold war—which paralysed the UN Security Council and which made collective security impossible. Collective security is not an alien objective. It is very much in the best of Canadian traditions.

Geoffrey Pearson, one of Canada's distinguished ambassadors, most recently our ambassador to the Soviet Union, spoke recently of the urgent crisis in the context of Canadian traditions how they have evolved over decades and over generations. Speaking last Sunday of his own family's very distinguished involvement in the building of those traditions, Geoffrey Pearson said:

> My father was not a pacifist. His policy was based above all on the UN's importance to preserving peace. But once war broke out, he felt that UN member countries should use military intervention to oppose an aggressor.

That, Mr. Speaker, is a Canadian article of faith, learned at the cost of countless lives, many of them Canadian, in two World Wars and in Korea.

But some Canadians, and some members of this House, I think quite legitimately and no doubt very sincerely, have asked: "Why now? And why here?". Some argue that because the United Nations did not always suppress aggression in the past that it should not not be called upon to do so now.

But when action was not taken in the past, when nations walked away from the United Nations and from their responsibility to uphold the United Nations, the organization was undermined. It's security role atrophied and conflict followed conflict. That is not an argument, Mr. Speaker. It is simply a statement of history.

To say that because the United Nations did not work in the past that it should not be used in the present is to condemn the United Nations to perpetual irrelevance. Given Canada's vital interests in the preservation of multilateral order, we will never condemn an institution so vital to our national interests as the United Nations. We will never condemn that organization to irrelevance. On the contrary, we will work and work unrelentingly to bring it to life and to make it work for the common peace.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: If on January 15 the United Nations coalition had fragmented, or had indeed abdicated its responsibilities, I do not think it is inaccurate, Mr. Speaker, to say that the United Nations would have been discredited for decades to come and quite possibly forever. So it is a vital national Canadian interest.

The best hope we have for a safer world is to give the United Nations the indispensable help that it needs to work and in the process of it working, making peace work for all mankind.

The most serious—indeed troubling—question for many members in this debate has been as much about timing as about principle. Why could the world not wait and give sanctions and diplomacy more time?

It is the view of this governement—and the view of virtually every other U.N. coalition member—that the risks and costs of waiting had become too great to tolerate. If sanctions alone had continued, the plunder of Kuwait would also have continued. When this House debated this issue in September and again in November, Amnesty International had not yet documented the terrible reality of Iraqi brutality—the unplugging of the incubators of Kuwaiti babies, the assaults on Kuwaiti women, the execution of young Kuwaiti men before the eyes of their parents and their brothers and sisters.

We know now. We know as well that over half of Kuwait's population has fled in terror. What would have been left of Kuwait if the world had waited another 6 months, or 16 months or 60 months, or however long it would have taken sanctions to affect Iraq's military capacity, if they ever did? We know now that Saddam Hussein used the pause for peace not for diplomacy but to lay plans for terrorism and to build his defences.

• (1720)

He did not prepare for peace. He did not even explore the path to peace but instead prepared to launch missiles at innocent civilians in Israel and Saudi Arabia.

[English]

Those criminal terrorist acts continued this afternoon.

One week ago today, in my address to this House, I said:

> The argument is made by some that Canada should hold itself back now in order to play a peacekeeping role later. Were Saddam Hussein to succeed in his annexation of Kuwait, he would be in a position to threaten the entire Middle East, and he is the process of threatening individual nations as we speak.

That was one week ago.

I went on with:

> With the time and the wealth he would gain and acquire, he would add further weapons of mass destruction to his arsenal, including in all probability nuclear weapons. In what position would this put his neighbours? After Iran and Kuwait, what would be his next target? Saudi Arabia? Jordan? Would we hold ourselves back again, waiting for the latest atrocities to end so that Canada might then be invited in as part of a peacekeeping force?
> Saddam Hussein has threatened directly to attack Israel with weapons of mass destruction. In the face of extraordinary provocation from Iraq, as evidenced by Foreign Minister Aziz' deplorably aggressive threat from Geneva last week directly to mount an assault on Israel, Israel has demonstrated remarkable restraint.
> Should Saddam Hussein move against Israel, would we still hold ourselves back in the hope that we would be called in later to help keep what is left of the peace in what is left of the Middle East?
> This course is a prescription for neither wisdom nor responsibility and it is not a course that Canada should follow.

Those were my thoughts last week, and most leaders around the world shared the view that I conveyed to the House.

Just hours ago, Saddam Hussein unleashed another unprovoked attack on innocent civilians in Israel. Men, women and children in Israel have become targets in the lethal shelling of that nation by Scud missiles fired from Iraq. Among the reasons that this government stood firm last week when the critical hour came and will continue that policy of firmness until peace has been secured was that we had resolved never to remain silent and indifferent while Israel was threatened with mass destruction and that same philosophy applies to the coalition of nations which fight for freedom in the region today.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, this war is about fundamental principle and the kind of world we must create. There is no evidence that sanctions were achieving their objective, the withdrawal of Saddam Hussein's forces from Iraq. In fact, our experience with sanctions over the last five and a half months, while having noted some progress which I will allude to momentarily, was far from encouraging. There is no doubt that the Iraqi economy was being affected.

[Translation]

Imports and exports were heavily affected. Rationing had become more widespread. Prices for some goods had increased dramatically. Some factories were closed. But we also know that some foodstuffs and commodities were getting through the embargo.

And that during the period when Saddam Hussein was reducing rations to his own people, he was increasing the rations for his army.

Would the world have persevered with sanctions and would the coalition have held if Iraqi and Kuwaiti citizens strayed while Iraqi forces sat tight in Kuwait?

This is a man who inflicted the ultimate sanction on his own people—perhaps a half-million casualties in an eight-year war with Iran that he, himself, started.

This is a man who used gas in war and who turned it on his own citizens.

This is a man who took tens of thousands of people hostage. This is a man who is using rockets to attack civilian population centres, not military installations. This is a man who violated the Geneva convention abusing prisoners of war and threatening to use them as human shields to protect his weapons.

Since we last debated the gulf crisis in November, we have all been able to make a better assessment of this man.

Knowing what we know now, there cannot be many of us who still think that sanctions alone would have stopped him. It might have been possible to believe that when we first debated this crisis in September or even in November. But there cannot be many of us who are confident of that judgment now.

None of us in this House wants war. But sometimes it is necessary to fight for peace. And this is one of those times.

[English]

I believe as a nation we must bear our burden in doing by force what diplomacy and sanctions could not do. We must secure Saddam Hussein's withdrawal from Kuwait as 12 United Nations Security Council resolutions demand. We must maintain solidarity with our coalition partners within the region and outside it, many of whom are bearing a far larger burden than we. What would the world think of us if we withdrew our forces when the going got tough—

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if I could just remind the right hon. Prime Minister that we are bound by 15 minutes in the address. I am sure the House would indulge the right hon. Prime Minister and, of course, the same should be expected in the other speeches.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Mulroney: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and my thanks to the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the New Democratic Party.

What would the world think of us if we withdrew our forces when the going got tough and we retired to the sidelines? More important, what would we as Canadians think of ourselves? Canada will do its share.

[Translation]

I can tell Canadians that we have the full capacity now to meet the obligations we have assumed and that all of our obligations can be met without the introduction of a policy of conscription.

[English]

All members of this House want to see this conflict end. Of that, there can be absolutely no doubt. Some members argue that we should have a pause in the conflict now.

In our view, such a pause would be counterproductive. Resolution 678—the resolution that Canada co-sponsored—has already provided a pause. The government sees no point in pausing again. The proper response to Saddam Hussein's intransigence and brutality is not to reward him with a respite from the war he started. It is in no one's interest to make it any easier for him to position more missiles to attack the cities of Israel and Saudi Arabia. And we are not going to take a chance at letting him regroup, rebuild his damaged infrastucture, and deepen his defences.

The first order of business is to win the war. The second order of business is to win the peace.

Saddam Hussein has exploited the fissures and fractures of the most volatile region in the world.

[English]

This is a region where weapons of mass destruction exist. This is a region that has made arms merchants rich. It is a region where many are poor and politics are notoriously unstable. The history of this region is that one war has simply set the stage for the next war and, in the process of doing that, many of the legitimate claims of peoples in the area have been unaddressed, unresolved, and persist to this very day.

• (1730)

While the battles continue and Kuwait is being freed, while the United Nations resolutions are being implemented, Canadian diplomats have begun to consider what to do afterward to bring peace and security to this turbulent region. The military victory we seek will be short and bitter, if we do not build a just and a durable peace. We will spare no effort in seeking solutions to these problems.

Seeking solutions to these problems starts and ends with the United Nations because, if the United Nations is not strengthened in the course of these debates and these actions, there will not be the viable instrument required by the entire world to shape a durable peace in the Middle East when hostilities are over. And that goes to the very heart of why Canada is in the Middle East today with our troops. We are there to defend the fundamental interests of the United Nations because, when we are defending the United Nations, Canada is defending the cause of a future peace.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: So, if we succeed in maintaining our unity of purpose now, the problems of this region can be addressed by a United Nations that has successfully stood the test of an important crisis. If we do not succeed in maintaining our unity of purpose, those problems will fester in the face of a discredited United Nations.

Throughout this crisis the government has taken a clear and a consistent position. We have opposed aggression, we have supported the United Nations, and we have determined that Canada will carry its share of the burden in the defence of freedom. There has been no shift of position, and no one can be in doubt where the government has stood from the very beginning.

Last November, in the second of three debates that this House has had on the gulf crisis, the government outlined Canadian interests, stated our intention to support the will of the UN, and set out what action might be necessary if Saddam Hussein continued to defy the world. These issues were debated fully at the time, and since January 15 we have debated whether or not to continue to support the United Nations and its resolutions.

Since August 2, this House has debated Canadian policy toward the gulf crisis for over 75 hours. The debate has been much more extensive here than in the United Kingdom, Australia, France, the United States or other democracies around the world. It is very much a tribute to all parliamentarians that they insisted and obtained a debate of these dimensions on such a vital problem affecting world peace.

Parliament has had many opportunities to express itself on the principles that have been defended here, as it should, and the government has assumed responsibility for its decisions, as it must. We are confident that we have followed both the letter of the law and the spirit of the law. I call on all members, including those members who may have reasons they have eloquently explained on the floor of this House in different circumstances, to support the motion before the House today to reaffirm Canada's support for the United Nations.

No Canadian wanted this war. Every Canadian wanted peace. The choice that Saddam Hussein was given was one between war and peace, and he unfortunately chose war. Given his deliberate choice, Canada has followed a resolute and unswerving course. We have chosen to stand with the United Nations, we have chosen to stand against aggression, and we have chosen to stand up and be counted when freedom and world peace were under serious challenge.

On December 11, 1957, Lester Pearson—

Some hon. members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I am in some difficulty. I would ask the right hon. Prime Minister to close his remarks as soon as possible.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I regret going somewhat overtime. I apologize to members of the House. I will be happy to conclude in a moment and I will be happy to reciprocate, as I have indicated, by extending to my hon. friends, the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the New Democratic Party, all the time that they need to make their points of view known on a very important question.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to conclude; it will take a moment. If my hon. friends will give me the moment to conclude, I will be happy to do so. I know that we will accord the same courtesy to all members of the House. I simply wanted to conclude by quoting Mr. Pearson when he accepted the Nobel peace prize. He said:

> There can be no enduring and creative peace if people are unfree. The instinct for personal and national freedom cannot be destroyed, and the attempt to do so by totalitarian and despotic government will ultimately make not only for internal trouble but for international conflict.

Let us decide together, today, Mr. Speaker, to support the United Nations in its deeds as well as its words.

Let us help to free Kuwait. And let us work together to restore peace and security in that important region, confident that, having done the right thing today, we can look forward to a more peaceful world tomorrow.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to speak before a nation at war.

We are appalled by the brutal treatment Iraq gives its prisoners of war and by its cynical attacks on Israel. Less than a week after the war began, many have lost their lives, and material destruction is increasing hour by hour. That is the tragedy of war, Mr. Speaker.

As a member of this House, for the greater part of my life I have done my best to serve the Canadian people. During those years—in Parliament, in cabinet and in the opposition—I learned a lot about Canada and Canadians. I learned among other things that Canada is a peace-loving country. Internationally, we have built a reputation as peacekeepers, not policemen. We must thank the Pearsons and the Trudeaus who gave us a legacy of which we are so proud today.

I said before that we did not give peace a chance in the Persian Gulf.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: And I still say so.

During the past few days, I have spoken to Canadians from coast to coast. I also consulted with my colleagues in caucus. This war is not an easy matter to discuss for any member of this House.

We all agree on the objectives: to get the Iraqis out of Kuwait. We all agree that Saddam Hussein is a tyrant. He proved that when he invaded and occupied Kuwait last August. By attacking Israel last week and again today, without provocation, he gave us further proof. By mistreating hostages and prisoners, he completed the case against him.

When the Security Council voted in favour of economic sanctions against Iraq on August 6, the Liberals supported that decision. When on August 25, the Security Council authorized the use of military force to enforce sanctions, the Liberals again supported its decision.

• (1740)

When the government tabled in the House a resolution condemning Saddam Hussein and expanding the UN role, the Liberals supported this motion as well. In November, however, when the government tabled another motion, this time allowing the use of force, the Liberals said: No, not now. We told the House and we told Canadians a war could still be averted. The embargo and the sanctions had been in place for only a few weeks and could not have made an impact.

[English]

Diplomatic initiatives needed more time. We had feared that the imposition of an early deadline was merely an ultimatum that would inevitably lead to a war. Unfortunately we were right.

We made the argument that if the new world order is to succeed, it cannot begin by attempting to legitimize the hasty use of force. We believe the primary goal of the United Nations must be the rule of law, not the use of force. And, if the United Nations is to be effective, it must advocate the use of force only as a last resort and then only under the UN flag.

Last week, on January 14, before the war began, we again urged Parliament to give sanctions and diplomacy more time and to hold off on the early use of force.

Some may fault us for our caution, but I make no apologies. When the lives of human beings are at stake, when the ecology of the planet is at stake, when the future stability of the Middle East is at stake, we will always exercise caution.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: For its part, the New Democratic Party told us that force should never be used. We reject that view.

The government, on the other hand, was prepared to rush us into war. By rejecting our amendment last week, the government gave the green light to the early use of force.

Now it is too late. We will never know whether diplomacy, embargoes, and sanctions would have worked, never. They have given way to bullets and bombs. And war, contrary to what some may think, is not like a chess game. In war, sometimes the pieces fall off the board.

Nevertheless, whatever our views as to the wisdom of an early war, last Wednesday the government rejected our amendment to maintain sanctions. That same evening, war came to the Persian Gulf. The next night Iraq attacked Israel, a non-combatant state.

Today, therefore, we are faced with a new set of circumstances. The situation has changed since last Tuesday. The tragedy of war is with us once again. We must now work to ensure that it is as brief as possible. We must make every effort to create a long-lasting, stable, post-war peace throughout the Middle East.

And we deplore the fact that it may be more difficult for Canada to act as a peacekeeper after this war has come to an end. But we can still help to make a lasting peace. To do so, we must be vigilant and take every opportunity to bring the war to a speedy conclusion, and bring an enduring peace to the Middle East.

Liberals want to respond to the concerns of Canadians. Today, I have announced that we will establish a task force on peace in the Middle East. This task force will be made up of members—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: This task force will be made of members of the Liberal caucus and concerned Canadians. Liberals want to help find peace for this troubled region.

Today, after war has begun, we are being called upon to vote on a resolution. It reads:

> That this House reaffirms its support of the United Nations in ending the aggression by Iraq against Kuwait.

We on this side of the House believe that this resolution should have been brought to a vote before January 15, as was done in the U.S. Congress. Then, such a resolution would have been relevant. Today, it is not relevant. War has started. The government has committed our troops.

We are very concerned about the Canadian men and women who are now at war. They are putting their lives at risk, and they must know that Canadians are solidly behind them.

We believe that the resolution we are voting on tonight should have been written accordingly. It should simply have stated that this House of Commons affirms its support for our troops in the gulf; the government was not interested in conveying that clear message.

Yesterday, I approached the Prime Minister. I urged him to accept a new resolution instead of the one we are debating now. I urge him to accept a new resolution stating:

> Given that hostilities have broken out in the Persian Gulf, and given that Canada is a participant in the coalition, this House reaffirms its support of Canadian forces in the Persian Gulf.

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister refused. In the circumstances, we on this side of the House recognized that many would try to interpret a vote tonight against the government's resolution as a vote against our troops and a vote for Saddam Hussein.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, we firmly believe that we must do nothing that could be twisted and used to demoralize our troops. For this reason, because we stand squarely behind our Canadian forces in the gulf, we will vote in favour of the motion.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: However, our vote does not mean that we approve of the government's actions. This vote does not approve of the Conservatives' management of this crisis before the war broke out. Nor is this a vote to approve all the government's actions since the war broke out or its future actions.

[English]

I repeat, we feel very strongly that we must not do anything that could be distorted and used to demoralize our troops.

• (1750)

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: For that reason—because we support our Canadian forces in the gulf—we will vote for the resolution. Our vote shall not be interpreted, however, as support for the way in which the government has handled this matter. It is not a vote for the government's handling of this crisis before the war began. Nor is it a vote which condones all the government's actions since the war began, or in the days ahead.

The choice we make today, Mr. Speaker, is to offer our support to our sons and daughters who are serving their country in the Persian Gulf.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: It is for this reason, now that we are in war, as I said last Wednesday night we have to be behind our troops who are fighting there.

We pray to God they will be coming back to Canada as soon as possible.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, a great deal has occurred since we began debating this motion last week. Last week war was a possibility; today it is a reality.

It is reality too that we are all shocked by the faces of the prisoners of war, the unprovoked bombing of Israel and with the loss of many lives, although we do not have details, except for those provided by some of the American reports and others. I think most of us know that there must be a much greater loss of life than we are aware of. These are the real images of war.

Because so much has happened since last week, I think it is important to reiterate what it is we are debating today. We are not debating whether or not our Canadian military is made up of brave men and women. We are not debating the United Nations. We are debating whether Canada should have participated in the war.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: We have consistently opposed Canada's participation in this war because we do not believe that economic sanctions and diplomatic measures were given a full chance. We do believe that the January 15 deadline was an artificial one; one that give a momentum towards war, instead of a real pause for peace.

We believe, Mr. Speaker, that the United Nations should not be authorizing member countries to go to war. Let us remember that these are not forces which are under the United Nations flag.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: This resolution authorized the use of force by any of the signing countries.

Finally, common sense tells us that Canada can make a contribution, but that Canada can make a more valuable contribution than simply as a participant in the military force.

In dealing with this issue, Mr. Speaker, we are confronted with three options: the options of supporting and the strengthening of economic sanctions; of renewing and continuing diplomatic efforts; or with war. Every option contained risks. The options of sanctions and diplomacy have the risks that come with time. The option of war contains the risk of loss of human life as well as economic, political and environmental disaster. One set of risks must be weighed against the other set of risks when making these decisions. We weighed these options and we decided that the tragic consequences of war were too high not to give diplomacy and economic sanctions a chance.

[Translation]

A week ago, Mr. Speaker, I stood in the House to explain that my party is against this war, that my party is against Canada's offensive participation.

Mr. Speaker, again I rise today to tell you that my party's position remains unchanged.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: We stand firm: our commitment to peace is irreversible. This is why we are going to vote against this resolution.

[English]

Everyone in this House cares deeply about the young men and women serving in the gulf. We pray for their safe return and we share the anguish of their families. At the same time, we remind the government why our troops were sent to the Persian Gulf. They were sent to enforce economic sanctions, an action which they accomplished with pride.

As this debate is drawing to a close, Mr. Speaker, I should like to talk about what this war means to the United Nations and about the role Canada might play to promote peace.

The Prime Minister suggests that failure to support this war is tantamount to betraying the United Nations and its objectives. I totally disagree. Mr. Speaker, only 28 of the 150 UN member countries have joined the coalition, and less than half of these 28 countries are taking part in the military offensive manoeuvres.

Is the government suggesting that these countries—in excess of 100, a majority which is not involved in this offensive war—could not care less about the United Nations or do not believe in the future of the organization? I say no, that is not the case! Does it suggest that these countries are less intent on calling for Saddam Hussein's withdrawal from Kuwait? I say no.

[English]

We may stand alone today in this House in opposing this war, but we do not stand alone among Canadians. The former Canadian ambassador to the United Nations Stephen Lewis, and the former ambassador to the United Nations on peace and disarmament, Douglas Roche oppose the war. To oppose this war is not to oppose the United Nations, it is to oppose a militaristic vision of the United Nations.

The Prime Minister said quite rightly that wishful thinking will not make evil go away. No one here is talking about wishful thinking. What we are talking about today is the meaningful role that Canada might play and the future that the United Nations must adopt if we are to find that vision of a new world order when conciliation replaces threats, where justice replaces vengeance, where dialogue replaces destruction and where collective international action is based on protecting lives instead of on waging war.

• (1800)

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, that is my party's vision and that is why we will not support the government's motion. We are not voting against the United Nations, we are voting against this war.

But, Mr. Speaker, we are at war, a war which may be long and difficult, and which will cost dearly in terms of human lives, economic repercussions, environmental impact, and the future prospects of that region.

In less than a week censored television reports have made us witnesses to massive bombing raids over Baghdad and other cities in Israel. We watched with horror some of the videos on prisoners of war. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, it did not come as a surprise because that is precisely what people had predicted.

[English]

That is why we said the risk of war does not need to be taken at this time. We must pursue to the end the other alternatives, before we make that decision.

There is no one in my party, no one in the House, and no one in Canada who is not appalled by what we have seen in the images of war. The question now is: What should Canada do? What meaningful role can Canada best play in contributing to the end of this war, the removal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait, which we all agree is the objective, and the establishment of a lasting and just peace in the Middle East?

The government clearly believes that an offensive military role is the role that Canada should play. The Liberal Party is in agreement with it. But my party disagrees.

To play a meaningful role, we can provide other services equally needed by deploying our military services to continue to provide medical assistance. We can undertake a number of initiatives, such as using the Canadian forces to assist the hundreds of thousands of refugees that this war is creating, using Canadian vessels to escort ships carrying desperately needed aid in the Horn of Africa, and increasing funding and support for the International Red Cross.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: Canada can be boldly pursuing with vigour diplomatic initiatives at the United Nations which show promise of a negotiated resolution to a war.

One of the greatest tragedies in this, when we talk about the meaningful role for Canada, and where we can be most effective, struck me this morning as I read an article in The Toronto Star by a reporter in Jordan. He had been threatened with beatings. He wrote: "Once welcomed as peacekeepers and honest brokers throughout the Arab world, we join the enemies' ranks in the eyes of many Jordanians."

That was the risk. As well as being involved in the offensive aspect of this war, we have lost so much of our credibility to participate and provide an effective role in the mediation and peacekeeping aspects.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: Throughout this debate, I and my colleagues have attempted to put forward our view, but also to put forward our alternatives. I have forwarded some of these alternatives to the Secretary of State for External Affairs as he requested me to do last week.

In these ways, we believe Canada can play a useful and constructive role. We will not be a participant in the war, but a true maker of peace.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: I want to close today on a more personal note. I, like many others in the House, have travelled in my riding and in others areas in the past couple of days. We can all appreciate what a difficult time this is for Canadians. On the one hand, everyone agrees that aggressors like Saddam Hussein must be stopped. Yet, on the other hand, there is a great reluctance to see Canada involved in a war.

The government says war is the only way. My party says there is another way, a peaceful way. Our position is clear, the position of my party is clear. We have listened to all sides of the debate, but this war, and the devastation and death it brings with it, is not the solution in our opinion. It is not the way to begin a new world order.

Just one year ago, there was so much promise. There seemed to be real hope for a more just world. War is a betrayal of that hope. War represents the same old way of doing things. War is madness. The option of killing people to resolve disputes must disappear in a new world order.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: Finally, I realize that a change in government policy would require courage and strength: courage to tell a close friend that you might disagree; strength to play the role of peacemaker when others are intent on war.

[Translation]

This war will indeed cause the death of hundreds of thousands of innocent people. They are paying the price of this war. Families are suffering as a result of decisions made by politicians.

Canada must seek to put an end to this war, put an end to it for the families of Canadian men and women in the gulf, put an end to it for Israeli families, put an end to it for families everywhere.

[English]

We say let the voice of Canada be a voice for peace, a strong and clear voice of hope for a true new world order, a new way of doing things which will provide hope for all Canadians and for everyone throughout the world.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to order made on Monday, January 21, 1991, the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division on the motion of Mrs.

Collins to the previous question on Government Business No. 27, concerning the Persian Gulf crisis.

The hon. member for Calgary West, on a point of order.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, there have been consultations and the motion does require you to ring what is called a 15-minute bell. I think there is a predisposition in the House to let the bell ring for perhaps one or two minutes and we will come down the aisle. You can have that expectation that the House will be ready for the vote in somewhat less than the 15 minutes.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary West has given the House a suggestion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The first question is on the motion of Mrs. Collins. Call in the members.

And the division bells having rung:

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please rise.

Some hon. members: On division.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed to on division.

The next question is on the main motion.

Is the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Shall I dispense with the ringing of the bells?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

The hon. member on a point of order.

Mr. Corbett: I simply want to express to the House, Mr. Speaker, that due to a problem in communications within my own office, I was not aware that the vote was being taken when it was being taken. Had it been apparent to me that the vote was taking place, I would have voted with the government. I believe very strongly that we have taken the proper position this evening.

Mr. Speaker: It being 6.30 p.m., pursuant to order made Monday, January 21, 1991, this House stands adjourned to the call of the Chair.

The House adjourned at 6.28 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, February 1, 1991

The House met at 12.35 p.m.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I wish to inform the House that, in accordance with the order made Monday, January 21, 1991, I have recalled the House this day for the sole purpose of granting Royal Assent to certain bills.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have the honour to inform the House that messages have been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate have passed the following bills, without amendment: Bill C-37, an act to establish the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute; Bill C-63, an act to establish the Canadian Race Relations Foundation; Bill C-260, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan (spousal agreement); Bill C-69, an act to amend certain statutes to enable the restraint of government expenditures; Bill C-84, an act respecting privatization of the national petroleum company of Canada; Bill C-40, an act respecting broadcasting and to amend certain acts in relation thereto and in relation to radiocommunication; Bill C-223, an act respecting a Day of Mourning for Persons Killed or Injured in the Workplace; Bill C-88, an act to provide for the membership of Canada in the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development; and Bill C-81, an act to implement the United Nations Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have the honour to inform the House that a communication has been received which is as follows:

Government House
Ottawa

February 1st, 1991

Mr. Speaker,

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Honourable Antonio Lamer, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Government General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 1st day of February, 1991, at 12.20 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

Yours sincerely,
Judith A. LaRocque
Secretary to the Governor General

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Right Honourable Deputy to the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski) with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have the honour to inform the House that when the House went up to the Senate chamber the Right Honourable the Deputy to the Governor General was pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following bills:

Bill C-72, an act to establish the Canadian Polar Commission and to amend certain acts in consequence thereof—Chapter No. 6.

Bill C-37, an act to establish the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute—Chapter 7.

Bill C-63, an act to establish the Canadian Race Relations Foundation—Chapter 8.

Bill C-69, an act to amend certain statutes to enable restraint of government expenditures—Chapter 9.

Bill C-84, an act respecting the privatization of the national petroleum company of Canada—Chapter 10.

Bill C-40, an act respecting broadcasting and to amend certain acts in relation thereto and in relation to radiocommunication—Chapter 11.

Bill C-88, an act to provide for the membership of Canada in the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development—Chapter 12.

The Royal Assent

Bill C-81, an act to implement the United Nations Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods—Chapter 13.

Bill C-260, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan (spousal agreement)—Chapter 14.

Bill C-223, an act respecting a day of mourning for persons killed or injured in the workplace—Chapter 15.

Pursuant to Order made Monday, January 21, 1991, this House stands further adjourned to the call of the Chair.

The House adjourned at 12.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, February 25, 1991

The House met at 2 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CALLING BACK OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Speaker: I wish to inform the House that pursuant to the order of the House adopted on Monday, January 21, 1991, and the provisions of Standing Order 28(3), I sent a notice calling the House to meet this day, and I now lay this notice on the Table.

In addition, on Thursday, February 21, 1991, I sent each member a message by electronic mail explaining the reasons for calling back the House.

[English]

I also wish to inform the House that in accordance with the representation made by the government under the provisions of Standing Order 55(1), I have caused to be published a special Order Paper giving notices of a government motion and of a government bill.

[Translation]

I also wish to lay on the Table a letter from the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, dated Wednesday, February 20, 1991.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

THE LATE CLAYTON D'ENTREMONT

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, on February 14 the inshore ground fishery in southwestern Nova Scotia lost a pillar and a tireless advocate in the fisheries when Clayton d'Entremont of Meteghan and West Pubnico was killed in a car accident at the age of 38.

I knew Clayton well, Mr. Speaker, and I was always impressed with the depth of his commitment to the cause of independent fishermen and processors. During a time when a strong voice was needed for the inshore, Clayton was always there making the best case he could on countless fishery advisory committees.

People of the quality of Clayton are rare these days, Mr. Speaker. That we should lose someone like him now, when our country faces so many challenges at home and abroad, is sadder still. The consistency of his commitment to a cause should be an example to us all.

To his wife, Roberta, his daughter, Lauren, and his family, I extend my sincerest condolences. It was an honour to have worked with Clayton for so many years. The fishing community of southwestern Nova Scotia will miss him.

GOVERNMENT OF NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, the reins of government in Nova Scotia are about to be transferred from one farmer to another farmer. Premier Roger Bacon will step down after serving six months as premier of the province and although the position as premier was an interim position, Mr. Bacon did far more than an interim job. By the time that his term was up he had impressed the people of Nova Scotia and the people of all the Atlantic provinces with his ability. Roger Bacon did an outstanding job in a very difficult situation.

Soon another dairy farmer takes over. The Hon. Donald Cameron will become the first native of Pictou County to become premier of our province. Mr. Cameron brings with him a reputation of honesty and integrity as well as 16 years as an MLA and minister in the Nova Scotia legislature.

Nova Scotians look forward to his frank leadership style and are optimistic about the future under his government which will be sworn in tomorrow, February 26.

Congratulations and good luck to Mr. Cameron and his government.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, Saskatchewan's plans to harmonize its retail sales tax with the federal government's GST is just one more example of cheerleadering and Premier Grant Devine's dancing to the Prime Minister's tune.

For our premier, who once said he opposed the GST, to agree not only to collect this harmful and regressive tax, but also to try to take $200 million annually out of the Saskatchewan economy for his own purposes is shameful. Less than four months ago, after much thought, he said, the premier announced the GST would be introduced "side by side" with the provincial tax and Saskatchewan businesses prepared their records and equipment to accommodate this.

Now, with the demand for a federal agriculture payment looming, Devine changes his mind and all that business planning and expense have gone for naught. The people of Saskatchewan know there is a provincial election coming. I remind the Saskatchewan voter that we wanted to say no to the federal GST; we will soon get a chance to say no to Devine's GST.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the Quebec mining association strenuously objects to the proposed amendments to the Financial Administration Act regarding cost recovery in the marine and air freight sectors.

These additional expenses and costs, especially in the marine sector, will have a disastrous impact on the economy of certain regions, especially in the mining industry. Cost recovery will mean additional expenditures which companies will be unable to recover from the customer, who can find other suppliers on the international market.

Instead of opting for additional charges, the federal government should consider implementing recent recommendations by the Auditor General of Canada, which suggested cutting costs and privatizing certain services to save money, instead of putting an additional burden on Canadians.

PUBLIC SERVICE 2000

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, reform of the Public Service of Canada is supposedly proceeding under the program known as Public Service 2000. Announced in December 1989, the stated objective of Public Service 2000 "is to enable the Public Service to provide the best possible service to Canadians into the 21st century".

But so far, Public Service 2000 has succeeded mainly in alienating thousands of public servants. Public Service 2000 has forsaken employee consultation. There has been no parliamentary or public debate on this issue, despite repeated requests from Liberal MPS and Public Service unions in general. The 24,000-member Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada boycotted a National Joint Council meeting last fall as a form of protest because of this cavalier attitude.

If thousands of public servants are not being consulted, and their concerns not considered, how can the government expect this reform to succeed? The Conservative government is missing the opportunity for meaningful consultation with public servants, Parliament and the Canadian public.

I deplore the lack of sensitivity of this government in matters of the Public Service of Canada.

FOREIGN AID

Ms. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, I just came back from a short trip to Haiti as a member of the Canadian delegation to the swearing-in of Father Jean Bertrand Aristide.

The election held on December 16 in that country has given people hope for the future and helped them break with a past history of dictatorship, violence and corruption. They can now aspire to democracy and progress.

The Haitian people, so rich in history—their country became the first independent black State in 1804—but poor in economic resources, need Canada's development aid. This aid should be substantially increased, considering the ties between our two countries. More than 60,000 Haitians live in Canada, mostly in Quebec, and Haiti is a member of the international francophone community.

I am convinced that my government will respond to this appeal from a country that has so much to offer and does so with pride and dignity.

WORLD FOOD PROGRAM

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, the World Food Program predicts that in 1991, 25 African countries will face a food shortage of 4 million tonnes, affecting 30 million people. The gulf war is endangering humanitarian aid to these African countries by diverting world attention and emergency funding away from this famine.

What are Canada's priorities relative to the gulf war and the need to help feed the world's starving people? Canada should not be more supportive of offensive military action in the gulf than it is to saving lives in Africa and throughout the developing world.

Tomorrow's federal budget will be Canada's opportunity to clearly state its priorities. Will we increase our commitment to emergency aid and development assistance now, when it is needed most and while the world's attention is focused elsewhere? If we do, we will be showing that Canadians believe that the saving of lives is a priority over all else.

CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, more and more Canadians every day are expressing interest and concern about the future of our country. Many are taking advantage of the citizens' forum and its process to get involved in planning the future of Canada. I would like to bring to the attention of the House and the government the recent initiative of the Lunenburg Board of Trade, which has established a committee to respond to the challenge of the forum.

• (1410)

In a recent letter to me, which I would be pleased to share with all members of the House, the committee totally rejected the notion that Atlantic Canada should be cut off from the rest of Canada. They urge all Canadians, particularly the separatists of Quebec, not to assume that separation would mean the geographic isolation of Atlantic Canada.

They further, and quite properly, urge all Canadians to give pro-active consideration to the basis upon which we can build a new confederation, one which preserves the strengths of Canada today while responding to the legitimate cultural and regional interests as well.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, all Canadians have been affected by this government's slashing of the CBC, but none as severely as Atlantic Canadians. The recent cuts are responsible for the cancellation of the highest rated series produced by the CBC in this country, Land and Sea.

Land and Sea is a maritime tradition. It is distinctive to the Atlantic region. No other program covers the cares and concerns of this area better than Land and Sea. All Atlantic Canadians believe it is crucial to have some understanding of what drives the region economically, of the traditions and values that make us unique. It is, therefore, crucial that we have an opportunity to appreciate the beauty of our region and the importance of our resources and have this interpreted on our public television system.

We are not asking for something new and we are not placing an unfair burden on government. Atlantic Canadians only want to see Land and Sea back on the screen.

I know that this government must stay at arms length from programming decisions, however, the elimination of Land and Sea should be of concern to any government. A recommendation from this government or an acknowledgement of how vital this program is to the Atlantic region might maintain our 20 year old tradition.

On behalf of Atlantic Canadians, I ask this government to speak out for Land and Sea.

GULF WAR

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, after Manchuria in 1931, Abyssinia in 1935 and World War II where 40 million people died brutally, the UN was created with the intention and power to stop bullies when they attacked other countries and killed innocent people. Unfortunately, for 40 years the cold war blocked collective action.

In the case of Saddam Hussein's attack on Kuwait, the UN acted unitedly and with great courage for sanctions and then action. Canada was part of that collective and courageous decision. The Liberals and NDP were opposed.

A few days ago Saddam Hussein made an offer to withdraw which had so many conditions that he would still have an aggressive capacity and intention. The Liberals and NDP wanted to accept his very first offer. The government and the UN coalition properly rejected this offer.

The bottom line is that neither the Liberal Party nor the New Democratic Party are worthy to govern Canada with our proud tradition of supporting the UN and its many agencies.

ALGOMA STEEL

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, with the exception of this government, everyone agrees that high interest rates and the high Canadian dollar are decimating Canadian manufacturing industry. If you want a concrete example, try Algoma Steel.

What we require now are assurances, a guarantee that the Americans will not construe a loan guarantee as a subsidy and slap us with a countervail duty. It is not enough to speak to Canadian legal counsel. We must go directly to our American counterparts in steel, trade and the government.

The Minister of Industry, Science and Technology assured me that he would be a part of a task force to study the long-term viability of Algoma. In an ensuing press conference, he indicated that there was no way that the federal government would involve itself in the long-term restructuring of Algoma.

The government is part of the problem and it must be part of the solution. The minister must be an active participant, not a spectator in the task force.

MARK TEWKSBURY

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, it was quite a week for Calgary swimmer Mark Tewksbury. Capacity crowds at the Lindsay Park Sports Centre cheered Mark on to three world records. The University of Calgary Swim Club sprinter set the new world records in the 50, 100 and 200 metres backstroke.

Canadians will be watching proudly as Mark takes on the world's best at the World Cup in Europe next month. He is now the one to beat.

Congratulations, Mark, and good luck.

HEALTH

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, over the past few weeks I have received calls, letters and petitions from seniors throughout the province of Manitoba and especially from my own constituency, the federal constituency of St. Boniface.

I have received more than 400 such statements from one centre, the St. Vital Senior Centre, asking that I, with my Liberal colleagues, do everything in our power to restore Canada's universal health care program, which the government is systematically dismantling through legislation such as Bill C-69. Collectively we must stop and we will stop the government's attempts to eliminate the federal role in health care. These actions, such as Bill C-69, could lead to eventual privatization of our excellent health care system which exists for all Canadians and could become the preserve of the rich only.

Canada's health care act assures no user fees, no extra billing by doctors and universality.

[Translation]

If the government decides to tackle the health program tomorrow, if it keeps on attacking our seniors, I can assure you it will have a fight on its hands!

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I know that all members of this House will join me in wishing the Leader of the Opposition a speedy recovery.

[Translation]

Our thoughts and prayers are with the Chrétien family.

[English]

My question is for the Prime Minister. After six and a half years of Conservative government, our country has never been in worse shape, economically or constitutionally. After an election campaign promising jobs, jobs, jobs, will the Prime Minister explain why 1.3 million Canadians have no jobs, why 186,000 Canadian children line up at food banks every month, why 54,000 Canadian bankruptcies were declared last year and why our competitive position vis-à-vis the United States is the worst that it has been in 40 years.

Did the Prime Minister deliberately cause a national recession, or did he just mismanage the economy into one?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised at the comparisons that the hon. member has drawn. She says that the economy has never been in worse shape since the 1930s. She has a very short memory because it was in awful lot worse shape in the 1981-1982 recession—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): —and that no one would disagree with.

The hon. member talks about the level of bankruptcies. If she would care to look behind the bankruptcy figures—which no one is happy about—she would see that, according to The Financial Post today, there are 160,000 business formations per year. The small business association, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, say it is as high as 340,000 new businesses that are created. I think that is the important factor.

We on this side of the House are not happy about the fact that the economy is in a recession and we are doing everything we can to get the economy out of recession, and I will have more to say about that tomorrow in my budget.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, we on this side remember what the minister said. He said you have to die before you go to heaven, and right now there are 1.3 million Canadians dying for some new jobs.

As a result of the GST, 80,000 Canadian men and women lost their jobs in the service sector in the month of January alone. As a result of the government's policies, 300,000 Canadians lost their jobs in the manufacturing sector during the past two years.

What specific policies will the minister announce tomorrow that will give a measure of hope to those thousands and thousands of unemployed workers who are waiting for answers from the government?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would wait until tomorrow, she could have a good answer to that question.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the Conservative government has mismanaged trade, mismanaged the dollar, mismanaged interest rates, mismanaged taxes, and mismanaged the national debt which this minister in his predictions of 1984 predicted would be at $18 billion in 1991.

Despite seven years of incredible world-wide growth, Canada is in the grips of a vicious recession.

Does the Prime Minister realize that his agenda of favouring the rich, hammering the middle class, and ignoring the poor is killing Canada's economy?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend persists in talking about 1981-82. In 1981-82 we had interest rates that were 22 per cent and 23 per cent. Interest rates today are in the 9 per cent to 10 per cent range.

She talks about unemployment. Unemployment then was 14 per cent, the peak of unemployment. We have an unemployment rate that is just short of 10 per cent today. The level of inflation hit 13 per cent. Today we have an underlying inflation rate that is around 4 per cent.

• (1420)

My hon. friend is falling into a major trap. She should not be trying to use these tactics of comparing today with one of the blackest moments in our economic history of 1981–1982 and expect to come out unscathed.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, for the more than 1,300,000 Canadians who are out of work because of this government's deliberate economic policies, this is the blackest day in history; not some distant period. It is today.

My question is for the Minister of Finance. Today, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs reported that this January alone, 5,991 more Canadians went bankrupt, an increase of 69 per cent over the same period last year.

When speaking of these numbers, the Superintendent of Bankruptcy said: "You have to look at the emotional toll it is having. There are some really tragic stories".

Why does the minister have an economic plan that is forcing these thousands of Canadians into bankruptcy? Why does he pursue policies that are creating these tragedies all across this country? Why will he not make a commitment today to end these tragedies and get us out of this recession without further delay? Why will he not do that?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I ask my hon. friend to look at not just the numbers which are a tragedy. I agree with him on that. However, the point the hon. member misses is that the percentage of bankruptcies in relation to the size of the economy, the number of businesses in the economy, today is .8 per cent. Back when he was on this side of the House in 1982, it was 1.28 per cent.

I am not saying that the picture we have today is a good picture, but I ask him to put things in perspective and to look in the mirror himself at the mess he was responsible for back in 1981–1982.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, this minister has been in his place for the past six years and he has to take responsibility for his mess and answer for that mess.

My supplementary question is also for the Minister of Finance and is about his policies. Last week, the Minister of National Revenue admitted what Canadians have suspected all along, and that is that this government is looking forward to having a multi-billion dollar revenue windfall from its infamous GST.

Why did the minister tell Canadians that the GST would be revenue neutral, when the Minister of National Revenue has admitted that it would bring about a multi-billion dollar tax grab for the government?

Was the government misleading Canadians about this, or is it simply saying that it does not know what it is doing? Which is it? I ask the minister to tell us which is it. Canadians want to know the truth.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, last week I repeated what we had been saying all along, and that is that we do not expect any additional revenue from the GST at this time and that all factors have in fact been taken into account.

I did go on to say, upon questioning, what both the Minister of Finance and others have said in the past, that in the future if circumstances change, if we come out of the recession and so on, that there is a possibility of additional revenues taking place.

If the hon. member is interested in the facts, he will listen to this. I concluded by saying: "In any event, as we sit here now, we are talking about a hypothetical situation because we do not know for sure at this point in time if there is going to be excess revenue or not".

GULF WAR

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, may I first take this opportunity to express on behalf of my party best wishes for a very speedy recovery by the Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister will be well aware of my party's views on the gulf war. We opposed its start because we felt that economic sanctions and diplomacy should have a chance to work. We oppose its continued escalation because we believe that what will result is certainly more martyrdom to support Saddam Hussein. We want to see Saddam Hussein out of Kuwait as much as anyone does.

What we see is what President Bush is prepared to do and what action he is prepared to take. I want to ask the Prime Minister what his views are on behalf of Canada in terms of what the Canadian government's objectives are in this war. Will the Prime Minister ensure and demand at the United Nations that the United Nations make an assessment of when the mandate of the resolution has been adequately fulfilled and not simply allow the United States to make that judgment?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I of course join the distinguished House leader of the Official Opposition and the Leader of the New Democratic Party in conveying our very best wishes to the hon. member for Beauséjour. We look forward to welcoming him back to the floor of the House of Commons in good health at a very early moment.

The Leader of the New Democratic Party asks what the objectives of the government are in regard to the prosecution of the war. They are the fulfilment of the resolutions of the UN Security Council. That is precisely what the government has done, precisely what the 30-odd members of the coalition are in the process of doing.

My hon. friend says that the NDP wants to see Saddam Hussein out of Kuwait as much as anyone. Well, you do not do it by wishing; you do it by taking action to defend principles.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister.

It is not very useful to the young Canadian men and women and others who are in the Middle East, and indeed to those hundreds of thousands of people in the Middle East who are suffering and are innocent victims of this war, to talk now about whose principles should reign.

The Prime Minister and I have different views about what would have ended Saddam Hussein's aggression. However, I am sure there is one thing we can agree on, and that is that we all wish our troops home safely.

We know what the Prime Minister is doing to participate in the escalation of the war. What is he and his government doing to participate in bringing about a quick end to this war and about proposing peace proposals that will work or supporting other diplomatic initiatives that will bring this war to an end? I would like to ask the Prime Minister specifically what he himself has been doing to initiate or support other diplomatic initiatives to bring this war to an end?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend says that she knows what could have ended Saddam Hussein's aggression. So do we all. Saddam Hussein could have said and should have said: "I have taken illegal action against a neighbouring state. I am going to withdraw pursuant to the demands of the United Nations Security Council". When he refused to do that, it was no longer appropriate to accept the view that we will do nothing. Canada chose to join with the nations of the world and do something to liberate Kuwait and to drive him out of that country.

My hon. friend asks whether Canada has been playing an active role in regard to post-war hostilities toward the ending of the conflict. I think it is probably fair to say, and perhaps on behalf of all members of the House, it is widely known that the Secretary of State for External Affairs of Canada has been playing a leading role here, in Europe and elsewhere around the world in looking for effective means that would bring this war to an end. On behalf of all members of the House, I congratulate him on his tireless efforts to bring about a peaceful solution to the war.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: It is widely known what could end the war. There are various opportunities now for a productive post-hostilities peace and reconstruction. In all these efforts Canada has played and will continue to play what we hope and believe is a helpful and constructive role.

• (1430)

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

I regret that the Prime Minister could not give us specific details. If indeed the minister responsible for external affairs is making these diplomatic initiatives, surely it would be in Canadians' interests and Canadians would be interested in knowing exactly what they were.

I have another matter.

—the Prime Minister said yesterday that Canada may increase its participation in the gulf war. Right now, that particular region needs humanitarian aid for refugees, for innocent people who are homeless and without food.

On February 5, the Secretary of State for External Affairs told me in a letter that the government was prepared to increase its financial contribution for humanitarian aid if the need arose. Obviously, the need has arisen. Instead of increasing our participation in the war effort, why doesn't the government act on commitments made by the Secretary of State and increase humanitarian aid?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I answered a question from a reporter who said—

[English]

"Prime Minister, do you see at any point in this ground war that we might commit further resources to the war? Answer: We may have to, yes. In what capacity? I do not know". You asked me a hypothetical question. It is possible, but I cannot tell you in what area. It could be in one of a number of areas, I suspect.

The government responds to requests from our leading military advisors. All this indicated was that should a further request come forward, we would consider it and respond, as we have from the very beginning.

[Translation]

The hon. member inquired about the contributions mentioned by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The fact is that for the past few weeks, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has appeared two or three times a week before the House committee. He has given very specific details on his own and the Canadian government's initiatives in a variety of areas, including the search for a peaceful settlement of this conflict. He was elaborated on the various types of initiatives the Canadian government has taken and intends to take with respect to humanitarian aid. He described how the Canadian government intends to play a peace-keeping role, if asked to do so, following the current military intervention in the gulf. He also mentioned that with a contribution of over $75 million, Canada was, on a per capita basis, one of the biggest donors in the western world with respect to humanitarian aid in the region.

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I too have some questions for the Prime Minister.

Speaking after the war cabinet yesterday, the Prime Minister made statements that appeared to go substantially beyond the mandate of the UN set out in the resolutions as passed by that body. The Prime Minister spoke of dozens of reasons why sanctions should be maintained against Iraq after the war is over and it has been expelled from Kuwait.

I wonder if the Prime Minister could tell us what are these dozens of reasons why he believes that economic sanctions should be enforced after the war is over and after the expulsion takes place.

Is it purely to force an arms embargo, or are there other objectives that the Prime Minister is now setting for the conduct of the war that have not yet been spelled out yet to the Canadian people?

Is the Prime Minister setting a new set of war aims of this case? In fact, are the statements yesterday not really contradicting in a very fundamental way the spirit set out in the speech he made three weeks ago announcing a peace plan for the Middle East?

Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the version of my comments yesterday given by the member would lead to that conclusion, yes, but the statements he attributes to me are not borne out by any analysis of the transcript.

The question was: "What about the possibility of economic sanctions continuing once the war is over? Is that possible? And if they were to continue, why would that be done? Answer: I think that would be for the UN Security Council to consider. I can think, quite frankly, of a dozen different reasons why it might be helpful that they be maintained in total or in part for a period of time".

One of the reasons that I gave—if my hon. friend wishes, I can give others—would be that the Security Council would surely decide that it would be imprudent, given the destruction of Kuwait, which is ongoing as we speak, the attempted invasion in respect of Saudi Arabia, and the Scud missiles launched against Israel, a non-combatant member in that region, to permit Saddam Hussein after hostilities ceased to rebuild a military machine that would give him access to the same kind of violence against innocent states such as Israel and Saudi Arabia.

It was in this light that I would invite the Security Council, after hostilities, to review the situation and to proceed with the greatest of prudence to make sure that these kinds of Scud missile attacks are never launched against Israel or any other country in the region.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

Relating back to the United Nations, on the weekend the Secretary-General made the statement that the UN resolutions against Iraq could be upheld while still addressing the moral imperative of preventing further destruction.

We know this appeal of the Secretary-General was not successful this past weekend, but can the Prime Minister tell us if there are efforts now under way to maintain and continue the role of the United Nations in determining the outcome of the war?

Specifically, with respect to the answer he just gave, is the Prime Minister now saying that Canada is going to take the Security Council proposals for new resolutions that would extend sanctions after the war?

In other words, is Canada now taking the initiative to broaden or to change the objectives? In fact, what is the role of the Security Council going to be in the management of the war and, in particular, in trying to manage the peace itself? Can he explain what the Canadian position and role will be in light of the answer he just gave?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is one thing for the member for Winnipeg South Centre to take liberties with statements that the Prime Minister makes or that I make.

I think it would serve the interests of us all if he did not take liberties with the statements of the Secretary-General. If he recalls, I had to call him to order on it in committee.

This is not the first time that he has taken one phrase from a statement by the Secretary-General and then attributed to the Secretary-General a meaning quite different from what the Secretary-General of the United Nations had indicated.

That is not a very helpful process for anyone who is interested in conducting an honest foreign policy in this country or indeed in his party.

An hon. member: Order.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I think one of his colleagues has had enough.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

This past weekend and indeed yesterday, the Prime Minister indicated that further Canadian troops and equipment might be sent to the gulf. This morning on television the Minister of National Defence indicated that those might be further CF-18s.

I want to ask the Prime Minister if any decision has been taken or if any decision is contemplated to send further Canadian personnel and equipment to the gulf and what they might be.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): I think the answer, Mr. Speaker, is one that I gave in response to a question from his colleague.

The transcript is very clear. It indicates that the question was: "Do you see at any point in this ground war that we might commit further resources?" The answer was: "We may have to, yes". That is depending on the recommendations that we receive from General de Chastelain and his colleagues of the senior military.

We have not yet received such requests but, if we do, we will consider them very carefully and respond in the national interest.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of National Defence.

Last month, the minister was quoted as saying that military costs could rise fourfold if the war continued to escalate. Now that the war has escalated, what is his estimation of our cost to the war effort at this time including any contemplated personnel or equipment we might send in the future?

• (1440)

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the quotation to which the hon. member refers was in the very context of the question he has asked. Someone asked a hypothetical question and I said I was not going to get into something that would say it was forefold because I do not have that knowledge. For the same reason, I cannot answer the hypothetical part of his question.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): It sounds like a lot of buffalo to me.

Mr. McKnight: The member for Winnipeg South Centre is talking. I cannot hear what the hon. member is saying now.

An hon. member: The cost.

Mr. McKnight: The cost, as I have enunciated, is approximately $60 million a month in incremental costs. There is $30 million associated with ongoing costs.

The hon. member would be aware, I know, that the more hours, the more duty, the more time which are placed upon the CF-18s in fulfilling their missions, there will be additional costs. We have not been involved in the additional role of air-to-ground for a long enough period of time to estimate what that additional costs may be.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Unemployment, I say to the minister, is way up. There are thousands more Canadians who are having to go on to welfare. We just learned that bankruptcies have jumped by 69 per cent from last year.

All of us have seen these human tragedies in our communities during this break, men and women whose lives quite literally have been torn apart by this recession.

Is the minister prepared to tell us today that he is going to change direction in his budget tomorrow, stop listening just to big business groups and start to put these people who are being so badly hurt first in his considerations.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think there are two things that the hon. member neglected to mention. One is that we have been responding to the weakness in the economy by bringing down interest rates. They have come down by over 400 basis points, 4 percentage points since the peak last spring.

In addition, I should point out to the hon. member there has been a substantial net increase of businesses in this country even during this year of recession. There is a net increase of 130,000 businesses and that means there are a good deal more new businesses being created.

As I said in response to a previous question, one commentator from the Faculty of Management, University of Toronto says 160,000 new businesses have been created. Those are incorporated businesses. The Canadian Federation of Independent Business says that the figure is over 300,000 so there is a good deal of additional potential employment being created by these new businesses.

We on this side of the House want to bring down interest rates to ensure that those new businesses are given a lease on life so that they can create new jobs, new opportunities and grow to the benefit of the whole country.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): In fact, Mr. Speaker, 327,000 Canadians lost their jobs last year not according to the Minister of Finance, but according to Statistics Canada. Three hundred and twenty-seven thousand Canadians lost their jobs permanently.

[Translation]

A Tory spokesman, the hon. member for Halton—Peel, said in referring to the Budget:

[English]

I think we are at a point where, and I hate to say this, but to some extent fairness is a luxury.

[Translation]

Does the Minister of Finance also think social justice is a luxury he cannot afford to include in the Budget tomorrow?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think that the record of this government is an outstanding record in bringing about social justice in a number of ways. In the things that I have read about the budget that I will be bringing down tomorrow he is suggesting that we should be increasing spending and ignore things like the deficit.

If the hon. member is saying, "do something for the economy", the best thing we can do is continue to bring interest rates down. If we follow the approach that the hon. member is suggesting we follow, we will have the direct opposite effect on the economy. That would hurt people who are seeking new jobs. It will hurt the people who he is worried about who have lost their jobs. It will hurt those companies who are struggling to stay in business. If the hon. member considers what he has just said about social justice, he would look very closely at the policies that I am going to be announcing tomorrow and applaud them.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

P.E.I. seed producers are very angry and confused. P.E.I.'s major export industry has been devastated, first by an American ban and now today by a Canadian ban on our seed potato exports.

Farmers feel that this government has completely mismanaged the virus problem and has lost control of the entire situation.

Mr. Speaker, potato producers want to know exactly when Ag Canada knew of the presence of the PVYN virus, why no action was taken until it was too late and it turned into an economic disaster.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I certainly share the hon. member's concern with respect to the PVYN virus. It is not a trade issue but rather an issue that falls within the Plant Protection Act.

Steps have been taken to remove the restrictions that have been put in place. We believe there is still room for removing further restrictions from the province of Prince Edward Island, as much as the importation of the seed potato is only provided for in areas five and six of the Island, and that is not of the Atlantic variety, we are continuing to work at that.

Mr. Speaker, I have to tell the hon. member that there has been very close co-operation and consultation with the provincial governments, both of P.E.I. and New Brunswick and with the producers. It was through this that we were able to convince the Americans that for PVYN, which is a virus that is named under their plant quarantine act, we had the certification process and the various steps in place to eradicate the disease. Our challenge now is to eradicate the disease as quickly as we possibly can and to work out whatever compensation program may be necessary to save the producers from the devastation of this. That is what we are doing right now and discussions will be continuing in Washington tomorrow.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I think the potato producers in P.E.I. had the impression, and I agree, that Senator George Mitchell and Senator Jesse Helms are calling the tune here, that it has gone far beyond a biological issue into trade and into the political arena.

My supplementary question is for the same minister. The minister's department is responsible for disease control and eradication. Why in the case of the virus PVYN did Ag Canada not take immediate action and destroy the affected crops? Will every seed producer receive compensation under the act because now every producer is in the same boat whether or not he has the virus?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, when it was first discerned that the virus was in existence, we took steps immediately with the provinces and with the growers to try to work toward the necessary eradication process.

As a matter of fact, we raised it with the United States, advised them of the situation and assured them that we were taking all possible steps to eradicate the disease so that normal trade would be continued.

As I said before, it is a disease issue, it is not a trade issue. Under the Plant Protection Act we have certain rules and regulations that have to be complied with, and we must comply with our trading partners in a similar fashion.

The United States is imposing a restriction on the entry of these potatoes, which is no different than we would propose if the shoe were on the other foot, and I think the hon. member should recognize that.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, this government's high interest rates and high dollar policies have brought the Canadian economy to its knees. In addition, the GST has exacerbated the cost of living for millions of Canadians who are just struggling to make ends meet. That is what the Liberal task force heard from 35 communities across this country.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance if his budget will deal with the recession ordinary Canadians are feeling, or will it just be of benefit to those Canadians the minister has consulted with, his Bay Street buddies.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I don't think that I am going to take precisely the word that the Liberal task force has come up with because I am sure they have been very careful to put in front of the microphones a number of people who are going to spout the Liberal approach to things.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Hon. members express surprise that I might draw that conclusion. I would ask them to get serious.

The hon. member asks if we are listening to average Canadians. Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are. We have had broad consultations with a wide range of groups, not just business groups. We have listened to labour organizations, social policy organizations, senior citizens and cultural organizations as well. We have taken all of this into account.

I would say to my hon. friend that when we dropped interest rates 400 basis points over the course of the last eight months that has had the effect of helping Canadians from coast-to-coast, in every nook and cranny of the country. That is the best way we can accomplish a strong recovery from the recession we are in now.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Minister of Finance did not want to insult the Chambers of Commerce, municipal leaders, labour leaders and ordinary Canadians who appeared before the task force. At least we had the guts to talk to Canadians. At least we had the guts to go to Reality Avenue instead of Bay Street.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance if he would explain to the 1.3 million Canadians who are out of work and the half million Canadians who are going to food banks each and every year in this country, how his over-valued dollar, how his high interest rate policy and how is over-all economic policies have benefited the Canadian economy and them.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend will acknowledge that we have seen interests rates drop on treasury bills from close to 14 per cent to last week's tender of around 9.75 per cent. We have seen mortgage rates drop from 14.5 or 14.75 per cent, I believe it was, down to the current level of around 11 per cent. That is ensuring that many thousands more Canadians can buy a house today which they could not buy about a year ago.

The hon. member is laughing. He ought to speak to some of those people on Main Street who he purports to have talked to and ask them whether they are pleased that they can now have a mortgage at 11 per cent.

I will say to the hon. member that the people on Main Street are very, very happy that they can get an 11 per cent mortgage. That is an awful lot less than they got in 1981-1982 when mortgage rates had skyrocketed.

VIDEOS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, this morning Canadians struggling with the recession and the GST and who are bracing themselves for another Conservative government budget, were astounded, they absolutely could not believe their ears when they heard that the federal government had spent more than $40 million making videos about sand modules. There was a video about the minister of defence from wartime Saskatchewan. There was one, I think, about the Prime Minister's office, called: "My Happy Days in Hell".

While this sounds odd, the point is that the Prime Minister is calling upon Canadians to tighten their belts, to share in the burden of these difficult times. Will he explain why he and his government are spending tens of millions of taxpayers dollars in such frivolous, indeed, stupid ways.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a moment, if I could, because the hon. member referred to myself and my department. There was a video made for $14,000 which brought to the attention of Canadians—

An hon. member: How much was the make-up?

Mr. McKnight: —in the communities, the leaders in the communities and community groups which complimented them on their efforts on behalf of the Cadet League of Canada which I think we all, in this House, understand.

I should also say to the hon. member that there was another video made which put forward, complimented and paid recognition to some of the peacekeepers of Canada, present and past, involved in the Canadian forces who received a peacekeeping award from the United Nations.

I also draw to his attention that the government put forward a video which won a Juno. It was put forward by the Department of National Health and Welfare which involved the threat—

An hon. member: Listen to this.

Mr. McKnight: —of AIDS to young men and women in this country. Does he say that that is not worth while?

I say to the hon. member that the use of videos for education, for training and, in my department, for recruitment is a good use of dollars to inform, recruit and train Canadians in the Canadian Armed Forces.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I want to raise with the Prime Minister another example of government waste and stupidity.

The Prime Minister will know that the Minister of Communications, who is here in the House just back from Europe, has announced an expenditure of $45 million for the Canadian Institute of Research and Cultural Enterprises, exceeding even his record for boondoggles. This is at the same time the CBC is struggling to survive.

Will the Prime Minister intervene in this wasteful, unnecessary, frivolous and scandalous expenditure and put the money where it is needed, to help people in these tough, economic times?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I may remind the hon. member that the cultural sector in Canada—more specifically, our cultural industries or enterprises—generates 250,000 jobs and $16 billion worth of economic activity. This is an area where we must be aware of the economic contribution of creative artists and enterprises, especially at a time when our borders are open to international exchange of cultural goods and technology, Mr. Speaker.

CANADA POST

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for Canada Post.

With the separation of our military families because of the gulf war, I wanted to bring to the minister's attention that many of our friends' forces in the coalition fight and struggle against Saddam Hussein have set up special provisions to communicate with their families.

I wonder if we, as Canadians, have done the same thing. What special provisions do we have? Has the minister met with the Minister of National Defence to facilitate the movement of mail to our families?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, yes. Early on when Canadian troops were sent to the Middle East, Canada Post did make provisions wherein the brave Canadians serving in the gulf area were able to send to relatives and loved ones, free of charge, their letters and communications for them. It is a policy that was put in place early on, of which we are proud and on which Canada Post and the Canadian Armed Forces are co-operating. It works to the benefit of our troops in that region.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications.

Last December, the minister justified closing down CBC stations in Matane, Rimouski and Sept-Îles, because of the economic situation. Last September, the same minister told artists he had no money to increase the budget of the Canada Council. How did the Minister of Communications manage to find $45 million for a Canadian institute for research on cultural enterprises, when he had no money for the CBC or for the Canada Council?

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, cultural policy covers more than just one area.

And to add to the response given by our colleague a little earlier, in most activity sectors in this country we have research institutes that work in close partnership with various sectors such as pulp and paper, metallurgy, clinical research, space or earth sciences, and in fact every possible sector, Mr. Speaker.

The government is actively involved because it is aware of the economic importance of these sectors. The cultural sector is vital to our economy, and that is why the government wants to ensure, working in partnership with our cultural enterprises, that it is a strong sector, able to isseminate our creative output and cultural properties in this country.

[English]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the same minister. Talking about culture, Radio-Canada is very important to culture and communications in Canada.

I would like the minister to justify to Canadians how we can spend $45 million on a cultural institute when he closes stations in Calgary, Saskatoon, Windsor, Corner Brook, Sydney, Goose Bay and all the regions of Canada? How can he talk about culture when he is closing Radio-Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, there are a number of factors affecting the cultural sector in this country. One area where we must provide for a very strong presence is our cultural industries. One of the problems facing the cultural sector in Canada is the low market share of our cultural industries within Canada.

That is why it is important, both for our creative artists as well as from the job creation point of view, to work with our enterprises to give Canada a decent market share in the cultural sphere, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: There have been some discussions and the Chair feels it is appropriate that our friend and colleague, the Hon. Eugene Forsey, receive the proper comments from this House. I would call to begin the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier.

THE LATE DR. EUGENE ALFRED FORSEY

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, all Canadians, particularly this House and this Parliament, suffered a loss last week with the passing of Dr. Eugene Forsey.

Dr. Forsey would never have been one to make this claim, since we knew him to be a man who never saw himself in terms of importance. He was a great Canadian.

I got to know Dr. Forsey during the years I spent in Parliament. Many a time, he gave me advice, a good argument, and many a time, some very good consultations.

Only a few weeks ago in a television interview, he said that he himself had never really accomplished much, although he admitted that he may have had some effect on one or two individuals. In fact, over a life of more than 86 years, he had a profound effect on many individuals and in that he accomplished a great deal.

Born in Newfoundland, raised in Ottawa, educated in Montreal and Oxford, all of this shone in his personality. He was a brilliant scholar, a remorseless critic, a committed social reformer, a staunch federalist and a great Canadian patriot.

His thoughts were always framed in terms of a broad philosophy, but he was always demanding and always a stickler for detail. He brought remarkable energy and a distinctive turn of phrase to every endeavour he touched.

Eugene Forsey, that eminent politician, was raised in a conservative environment, later became one of the founders of the CCF—a socialist party, the ancestor of the NDP—and even ran for that party, and then, like any intelligent creature, reserved the right to change his mind and finally became a Liberal senator, thus moving from right to left to centre.

Later in life, he was reluctant to support a particular political party, preferring to pursue his objectives with the same vigour he had shown in defending his ideas, eschewing any form of partisanship.

[English]

The most remarkable thing that Dr. Forsey accomplished was his lack of pretence. He spoke in the same tones to young students as to Prime Ministers, took the same pains in expressing his views to many of us. We disagreed sometimes, but most of the time we agreed that it came from a very respected Canadian.

His memoirs speak of his life on the fringe of great events. History will show that frequently he was a constructive influence in the centre of this country.

We will miss Dr. Eugene Forsey.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare) : Mr. Speaker, if we had attempted only a week ago to say a few kind words about Dr. Forsey in the House of Commons, we would have expected within 24 hours to receive a letter from him correcting our grammar, correcting our interpretation of history, or simply upbraiding us for having wasted the time of Parliament on something so unimportant as Eugene Forsey.

Sadly, none of us will receive such a letter from him now because last week, at the age of 86, Eugene Alfred Forsey died.

Those of us who were privileged to work with him in this Parliament knew him as a scholar, as a statesman, as a passionate Canadian, and above all as a friend.

I first was privileged to meet Dr. Forsey over a decade ago when I served with him on the Joint Committee on the Constitution. He demonstrated both a formidable knowledge of Canada's Constitution and a fierce independence of mind and principle that caused him over the years to clash with the constitutional views of each one of Canada's political parties.

Knowing him in that capacity and as the distinguished co-chair of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments, when he fought to protect the rights of Parliament and the rights of our ordinary citizens, I developed a deep regard for his intellect, for his courage, and for his passion for Canada.

We frequently did not find ourselves on the same side of issues, but opposing the views of people who felt privileged to know him as a friend was not an uncommon experience for a man who entitled his memoirs A Life on the Fringe. One might disagree with the policies he was proposing at any one time, but there was never any doubt whatsoever about his intellectual rigour, his courage, his love of Canada, or his willingness to fight fiercely for what he believed in.

We are fortunate that last year Eugene Forsey was finally persuaded to publish his memoirs, a witty, modest, and wonderfully readable account of his life and of Canada, from the time that he was born in Grand Bank, Newfoundland, in 1904.

In the preface to his memoirs he explains why he resisted for so long the request that he publish his autobiography. In his words: "I replied that I'd sooner be sentenced to penal servitude. The thing wasn't worth doing; it would mean an appalling amount of work and I could not endure the thought of yet another editor determined to correct my English."

We can all be grateful that he was prevailed upon to commit to print his recollections of such a wonderful life.

• (1510)

We can be even more grateful for that life itself, which was dedicated to the service of this country. It is truly the case, as the Prime Minister said last week, that Canada has lost one of its most eminent sons with the passing of Eugene Forsey.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to follow the member for Ottawa—Vanier and the Minister of Health and on behalf of the New Democratic Party to pay tribute to a great Canadian, Eugene Forsey.

In the past week, much has been written and spoken, all graciously and positively, about the late Eugene Forsey. I think the former senator would be surprised and I hope delighted considering what he said, and especially what he wrote in his long and illustrious career, about the same politicians, political parties and commentators.

The Globe and Mail said that he was the best read and best known constitutional expert. The Prime Minister has called him, as the Minister of Health has just pointed out, one of Canada's most eminent sons. I can imagine what the former senator's reply would be to that one, probably in a letter to The Globe and Mail.

I want to note Eugene Forsey's involvement with the labour movement. From 1942 to 1966, which is for some people a lifetime's contribution, for Eugene Forsey it was only part of a lifetime's contribution. In 1941, I am told he won a Guggenheim fellowship and he went to the United States to study.

In 1942, he came back and was offered a job at the Canadian Congress of Labour which in 1955 became the Canadian Labour Congress.

He was research director, and as such he wrote countless briefs. He spoke everywhere. He advocated issues, especially old age security, and was eminently successful there. He did it in English and French.

Claude Jodoin the distinguished first President of the Canadian Labour Congress used to compliment Dr. Forsey on what Monsieur Jodoin called his "beautiful French".

Dr. Forsey's intellectual labour, his precision and crispness helped build organized labour in Canada. I believe we and the country have all benefited from that.

He ran unsuccessfully, I guess I have to point out, as CCF candidate in two federal elections and in one provincial election; the provincial election against George Drew, the premier of Ontario.

If I might say on a personal note, he told me just a few weeks ago of that debacle and that election. Also, he told me about his associations with the likes of Stephen Leacock, Frank Scott, Norman Bethune, not to mention Mr. King, as he would call him, Arthur Meighen or John Diefenbaker.

To my generation of parliamentarians, he made history come alive. We sometimes met him for dinner at the Parliamentary Restaurant on a cold winter night. You could go there, and there was Eugene Forsey. He would talk to you, not patronizingly but wisely and intellectually about the great personages of Canadian history and the great issues. If we did not like that, we would discuss Meech Lake for dessert.

He was lucid right up to his death. Many people were surprised to see in last weekend's paper his criticism of the Allaire report, a more critical and analytical work than was done by any Canadian politician or journalist. That is an amazing tribute, and for this we will miss him a great deal, especially now. All members of the House know what I am speaking about.

I think our best tribute, as parliamentarians, would be to live up to his standard. He was precise, committed and visionary. He did it with wit and respect for those who did not share his views. I can see that smile now. I see the twinkle in his eyes and think of his recitation of all the figures in Canadian history.

He was not a man of malice. He was not an idealogue, but he was a man of principle. Yes, he was a bit of a maverick. He joined three political parties of this House of Commons and he quit them, too. This is probably a lesson that you can achieve a lot outside the political system as well. He had a consistent view, a consistent vision of Canada which some people disagreed with and others happened to agree with very much. However, whatever you felt on his positions you knew it was done with vigour, wit, intelligence, precision and it was well held in principle.

Canada is going to miss him. You cannot replace people like this.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I too want to pay homage to Eugene Forsey, who I believe was a great Canadian. I first met Eugene Forsey at a World University Service seminar in India in 1953 where he was a professor and I was a student. Since that time over many, many years I benefited from his advice and counsel. I must say, as others have said, he was a man of great wit. He was a great mimic. He used to regale us with his stories and he had many, many stories about every sort of incident that you can imagine in Canadian history.

Members have referred to his letter writing, to his letters in the magazines and newspapers of Canada. He always had something interesting to say. We will surely miss him. But I have a feeling that his ghost will still permeate these premises and we will hear him laughing at us, kidding us and inspiring us with stories forever and ever.

PRIVILEGE

STATEMENTS RESPECTING THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I believe my privilege arises from statements of more than one member of this House and constitutes a misleading of the House. This privilege involves the present minister of industry, the present Minister of the Environment and the previous Minister of the Environment, the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean.

I believe a prima facie case of privilege exists and I am prepared to put the appropriate motion to the House on this matter. The privilege and future environmental damage arises from public statements of government policy from February 1, 1991, by the federal minister of industry in Montreal. This directly contradicts published government policy and two other ministers, one in the House and one before the Standing Committee on Environment. The issue was also touched upon just before Christmas by Canada's Auditor General.

The pulp and paper industry is the largest manufacturing sector in Canada and it is also the most serious and largest source of marine pollution in the country. New regulations have been in the works for some time. The former Minister of the Environment, the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean, promised them to be fully in force by June 1991 and certainly no later than June 1992. In December 1990 the government published the green plan and the present Minister of the Environment and the green plan promised that the regulations would be in full force by January 1, 1994.

However, on February 1 of this year in Montreal before the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association the minister of industry suggested January 1996, somewhere between a four and five year delay in promulgation and enforcement of the regulations.

I have five very short quotations to substantiate this question of privilege.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: Just a minute. The hon. member has raised a matter which amounts to this: that certain statements have been made with respect to government policy and that later on a press report of something that a minister said seems to contradict what may have been said earlier.

What I do not think I have to do in this case is try to weigh the differences between all statements. I have to point out that I think it would be stretching the question of privilege to ask the Chair to say that there is a prima facie case of privilege that should be put to the House.

The government may want to reply, but I have to indicate to my colleagues on the government side that I do not think it is necessary. While there may very well be a matter to be raised in Question Period or in debate, I cannot take the complaint of the hon. member which he makes as amounting to a question of privilege.

I thank the hon. member for giving me notice.

THE ENERGY CONSERVATION STANDARDS ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–347, an act respecting energy conservation standards for energy using products imported into Canada or sent or conveyed from one province to another.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise in the House today to introduce for first reading an act respecting energy conservation standards for energy using products imported into Canada or sent or conveyed from one province to another.

The purpose of this bill is to reduce the use of energy in Canada by providing for the establishment of national energy conservation standards. These standards are then applied to the energy using products that will make them more energy efficient.

As we know, Canada has one of the worst records in the world for energy consumption. We need strong national standards with forceful national leadership to reverse that trend. The bill is modelled after the Ontario Energy Act passed by the former Liberal government there.

Federally, the Governor in Council may make regulations respecting the use of national energy conservation marks. Any product meeting the rules will have that mark on their product for sale.

Test procedures will be developed. As well, no products may be imported into Canada without meeting the national energy marks.

The list of products is to include central air conditioners, freezers, furnaces, televisions, dishwashers and water heaters, to name a few.

I am confident that all members will see fit to support this bill respecting the Energy Conservation Standards Act because in so doing they are supporting strong, national leadership on the environment, an issue of great importance to Canadians.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

FOOD LABELLING

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present two petitions. The first one is signed by many of my constituents from Ontario riding, as well as others from the greater Toronto area, who are concerned that restaurant and food packages are not required to disclose all food contents.

Therefore they call upon Parliament to enact legislation amending food and drug regulations in order to require manufacturers to list specific food ingredients and additives used in pre–packaged foods in place of the general classifications now permitted and, further, to require restaurants and food retailers to provide on demand to customers a list of all food ingredients and additives in prepared foods.

SENATE OF CANADA

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is from many of my constituents in the Ontario riding.

It relates to the Senate of Canada and states that the undersigned know the Senate to have been established in 1867 for the purposes of representation of the regions of Canada and providing a medium for sober second thought. The Senate now performs no useful function. It is completely partisan and has proven after many efforts to be impossible to reform.

They call upon the government and the Parliament of Canada to abolish the Senate outright.

CANADA POST

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table two petitions containing 325 signatures from constituents in Port Alberni, British Columbia, criticizing Canada Post for cutting back services in that community and for transferring mail sorting outside the community, resulting in further delays in mail delivery.

In addition, Canada Post has now announced the shutdown of two rural post offices in my constituency at Coombs and Royston, British Columbia. Specifically, my constituents call on the Parliament of Canada to request that Canada Post Corporation be instructed to keep existing outlets, operate longer hours, expand revenue-generating services, stop privatizing and start increasing services to raise revenues.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I particularly want to endorse my friend's petition abolishing the Senate. I think it is a good idea.

It is my privilege to present a petition on behalf of a number of the residents of Kamloops, British Columbia, who I admit are a little bit late in this point but still trying to make it.

They point out their deep and forlorn concern regarding the GST. They ask the government to rethink what it is doing to the people of Canada and to withdraw this tax.

PARLIAMENT HILL

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I present a petition from citizens of Vassan, Val-d'Or, Maniwaki and La Motte in Quebec who request that the Government of Canada shelve the project described as the Parliament Hill sector which, at the estimated cost of $68 million, provides for a parking garage and a shopping mall under Canada's Parliament Hill. They urge the government to acknowledge the need to preserve the environment and the historical character of the buildings and the site of Parliament Hill in Ottawa.

FOOD BANKS

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present to the House a petition collected by young Canadians in my riding of York West around Christmastime while they collected food for the local food bank, the North York Harvest Food Bank, which speaks, unfortunately, too eloquently to the problem at hand. Over 1.4 million Canadians now avail themselves of food banks across the country and close to 40 per cent of those recipients are under the age of 18.

Therefore, this petition calls on the government to end the economic policies that have contributed to this record number of food banks and begin to become somewhat more sensitive to a very embarrassing situation in a country that should not see a great use of food banks by families.

GOLF CLUB MEMBERSHIPS

Question No. 411—Mr. Boudria:

For the last four fiscal years, has Canada Post paid for any golf club memberships for its employees and, if so, (a) how many (b) for whom (c) at which golf club (d) at what cost?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Canada Post Corporation offers to all its employees compensation and benefit entitlements that are competitive with other comparative corporations with whom it competes in the market place for human resources.

As to the specific value of any entitlement, that information is only shared with the employee and the Corporation.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES

Question No. 412—Mr. Caccia:

Were the Supplementary Estimates (B) 1990–91 and the accompanying statement by the President of the Treasury Board of November 23, 1990, subjected to an environmental assessment prior to their approval by Cabinet, and if so, in each case, (a) who conducted the assessment (b) when will the public statements on the environmental implications be released?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Supplementary and Main Estimates are not, in and of themselves, subject to the environmental assessment process. They represent aggregate statements to Parliament of the expenditure authorities which the government will request for the conduct of its various programs and activities, as well as notification of the expected financial requirements to fulfil existing statutory expenditures already approved by Parliament. Under the provisions of Bill C–78, The Canadian Environmental Assessment Act, an Annual Report will be tabled in Parliament which includes a statistical summary of all environmental assessments conducted and completed under the authority of this Act.

In exercising the spending authority requested from Parliament through these Estimates, individual Ministers are responsible for complying with the legal and policy framework established by Parliament and the Government, including carrying out environmental assessments with respect to their department's activities. Some of the individual items in these Supplementary Estimates may have been subject to assessment, either as new policies or programs under the Government's commitment announced when Bill C–78 was tabled or as projects under the Environmental Assessment and Review Process Guidelines Order.

PUBLIC DEBT PROGRAM

Question No. 413—Mr. Karygiannis:

What is the breakdown between interest and other costs for the $2.5 billion increase in expenditures on the Public Debt Program from the original Finance Department estimate of $41.5 billion to the total projected expenditure of $43.65 billion?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): The following table shows the breakdown between interest and other costs for the $2.5 billion increase in expenditures on the 1990–91 Public Debt Program:

	Main Estimates	Current Estimate	Supplementary Estimates (B)
		($ Million)
Interest Costs
Domestic Marketable Bonds	14,818	14,662	481
Treasury Bills	13,568	15,037	1,469
Canada Savings Bonds	4,750	5,091	341
Superannuation & Other Interest	8,357	8,566	209
Total Interest	40,856	43,356	2,500
Servicing & Issuing Costs	294	294	0
Total Public Debt Charges	41,150	43,650	2,500

RENOVATION WORK PERFORMED RELATING TO ASBESTOS REMOVAL OR CONTAINMENT IN EAST BLOCK, CENTRE BLOCK AND LANGEVIN BUILDING

Question No. 416—Mr. Boudria:

For the (a) East Block (b) Centre Block (c) Langevin Building, has there been any renovation work performed relating to asbestos removal or containment and if so, were the workers made aware of the nature of the work and, if so, in what manner?

Hon. Elmer MacIntosh MacKay (Minister of Public Works and Minister for the purposes of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency Act):

CENTRE BLOCK

Asbestos is present in the Centre Block as insulating material on pipes and some of the duct work.

During the summer of 1989, a specialist contractor was engaged to carry out remedial work on some of the pipes where, by reason of incident or unusual wear, the casing had been opened and asbestos material exposed. The purpose of the work was to ensure that all asbestos was properly encapsulated. Loose material was cleaned up, and properly disposed of.

This work had been thoroughly reviewed with the contractor, prior to its implementation, to ensure that appropriate equipment and approved protective wear would be used during the containment/repair process.

Similarly, last November 1990, additional remedial work, including clean up was completed. In all cases, the contractor was informed of the special measure necessary to ensure the safety of the workers and Building occupants.

EAST BLOCK

Asbestos is known to be present in the 1910 Wing of the East Block on mechanical pipes and most of the plaster walls and ceilings. The 1910 Wing is presently in a state of disrepair because little is being expended for maintenance in view of the upcoming major renovations proposed for this area of the building.

During the spring of 1990, it was decided that containment work should be carried out to ensure asbestos in deteriorated plaster walls or mechanical pipes was properly sealed and encapsulated and did not contaminate the environment. This remedial work was completed during the week-end of March 31, 1990 to April 1, 1990 and generally included the following:

—repairs of minor cracks in plaster walls;

—encapsulation of exposed asbestos material on mechanical pipes;

—clean up of loose material, as necessary, and proper disposal of materials;

—installation of plastic barricades to cover major cracks in deteriorated walls to ensure the material is properly sealed.

The scope of this work has been reviewed, on site, with the contractor prior to issuing the work order. The contractor was made fully aware of the nature of the work involving remedial work in an asbestos environment in order that he may have the required equipment and protective work wear available.

In November 1990, another contractor was hired to carry out similar remedial work. The contractor was informed of the circumstances under which the remedial work would have to be performed.

LANGEVIN BUILDING

OLD AGE SECURITY—DIRECT DEPOSIT

Question No. 420—Mr. Milliken:

With respect to a recent mailing sent out by the Department of National Health and Welfare informing recipients of Old Age Security cheques that they could receive their O.A.S. cheques through direct deposit did the Ministry put in place a mechanism to ensure that those people already receiving their O.A.S. cheques through direct deposit were not sent a copy of this letter and (a) if so, what mechanism was in place (b) if no, why were no mechanisms in place?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No such mechanism was required, as there were no Old Age Security clients receiving payments by electronic direct deposit at the time of the mailout. The mailout was in fact the first offer of direct deposit by Health and Welfare Canada, in its phased approach to enrolment.

CONSUMER PRICE INDEX

Question No. 427—Mr. Malone:

In relation to the weight attached to tobacco products in the Consumer Price Index (CPI), (a) what is the current weight (b) when was it last updated (c) since it was last updated, by how much have tobacco sales fallen (d) what would be the weight if assigned today?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Statistics Canada Reports:

(a) The weight of tobacco in the CPI is determined through a survey of family expenditure. The survey which gave rise to the current CPI weights took place in 1986. It only provided a combined weight for Tobacco and Smokers Supplies. That weight is 2.1 per cent of family expenditures.

(b) The last update to the CPI weights took place in December 1988 but reflected the results of the 1986 Family Expenditure Survey.

(c) If measured in current dollars tobacco sales increased by 35 per cent between 1986 and the average of the first nine months of 1990. But if sales are measured in constant 1986 dollars, they actually dropped by 13 per cent over the same period.

(d) Since there have been no new family expenditure results since 1986, strictly speaking we do not know what the weight would be if assigned today. However, based on data taken from the National Accounts of Canada the weight should be approximately the same.

CONSUMER PRICE INDEX

Question No. 428—Mr. Malone:

In relation to the weight attached to tobacco products in the Consumer Price Index (CPI), does the government plan to (a) assign a new weight (b) adjust the weight on a regular basis?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Statistics Canada reports:

a) Statistics Canada plans to update the CPI weights in January 1994 with the results of a Family Expenditure Survey for 1992.

b) CPI weights are updated approximately once every four years. This has been the pattern since 1978. The next update is delayed by one year because Statistics Canada wants to ensure that the effects of GST are reflected in families' spending habits. Statistics Canada has no plans to update weights more frequently because all its experience shows that more frequent updates would only make marginal differences to the CPI.

CONSUMER PRICE INDEX

Question No. 429—Mr. Malone:

If tobacco prices were to increase by (a) 10 per cent (b) 25 per cent (c) 50 per cent (d) 100 per cent, (i) what would be the impact on the all-items Consumer Price Index (CPI) (ii) what would be the impact on the all-items CPI if the products had a weighting in the CPI that reflected current sales levels?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Statistics Canada reports:

(i) Suppose that over a period of twelve months prices do not change. The corresponding CPI annual rate of change is 0 per cent. Suppose now that the only prices that change over the same period are those of tobacco products and that they change by (a) 10 per cent, (b) 25 per cent, (c) 50 per cent and (d) 100 per cent. In that case, the CPI annual rate of change becomes (a) 0.3 per cent, (b) 0.7 per cent, (c) 1.3 per cent and (d) 2.6 per cent.

(ii) Since the weights are approximately the same there would be no difference.

RAISE TAX ON TOBACCO AND TOBACCO PRODUCTS

Question No. 430—Mr. Malone:

In order to achieve cost recovery due to medical costs and lost jobs and time due to tobacco use, does the government intend to raise the tax on tobacco and tobacco products, and if so, by how much?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Since this is a matter that must be dealt with in the context of a budget, it would be inappropriate to provide an answer at this time. However, the member's representation on medical costs and lost jobs caused by tobacco use will be considered in the preparation for the forthcoming budget.

AIDS/HIV/HEPATITIS B CASES REPORTED WITHIN THE CORRECTIONAL SERVICE OF CANADA

Question No. 433—Mr. Nunziata:

For each year, from 1985 to 1989, among (a) staff of Correctional Services of Canada, (b) inmates of the Correctional Services of Canada, how many cases of (i) AIDS (ii) HIV (iii) Hepatitis B have been reported?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada):

(a), (i), (ii), (iii);

The Correctional Service of Canada does not have the requested information as it is considered to be medically confidential and does not have to be revealed by the employee. All records containing AIDS, HIV, or Hepatitis B related personal information must be designated as protected and handled in accordance with the provisions of the Privacy Act and the confidentiality requirements outlined in the Occupational Safety & Health Policy, the Employee Assistance Program Policy, and the Security Policy of the Government of Canada.

(b), (i), (ii);

AIDS and HIV statistics were not maintained on a yearly basis by the Correctional Service of Canada until 1989. However, a cumulative total can be provided as follows: from late 1985 to December 31, 1989, 4 confirmed cases of AIDS and 43 HIV infected inmates were identified.

As of December 31, 1989, there were 24 HIV infected inmates incarcerated in federal institutions and no inmates with AIDS.

(b), (iii);

The number of reported cases of Hepatitis B for fiscal year 1986–87 is not available. Statistics for the remaining years requested are as follows:

1988–89—99
1989–90—132

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT CASH CONTRIBUTION: POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION AND HEALTH

Question No. 435—Mr. Karpoff:

Under the present Federal–Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post–Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act has the federal government determined when its cash contribution for these provincially–administered programs will (a) begin to decrease (b) reach zero and, if so, in what two fiscal years will this occur in (i) Newfoundland (ii) Prince Edward Island (iii) Nova Scotia (iv) New Brunswick (v) Quebec (vi) Ontario (vii) Manitoba (viii) Saskatchewan (ix) Alberta (x) British Columbia (xi) The Yukon (xii) Northwest Territories?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): The reply to Question No. 265 answered on June 26, 1990 provides detailed projections of federal cash and tax contributions to provinces under this legislation.

(a) On the basis of these projections and consistent data for earlier years: for Ontario, Quebec, Saskatchewan, Northwest Territories and Yukon, 1989–90. For all other provinces: 1990–91. These estimated dates are subject to change as further data become available.

(b) No cash contributions reach zero during the forecast period (up to and including 1994–95).

TOTAL AMOUNT OF TAXES PAID BY ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

Question No. 440—Mr. Walker:

For the years (a) 1988 (b) 1989, what is the total amount of taxes (direct and estimated indirect) paid by aboriginal peoples?

Hon. Otto John Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue):

(a) (b)

Revenue Canada, Taxation:

The data requested is not available. It is not possible to produce the data requested from the information supplied with individual tax returns.

Revenue Canada, Customs and Excise:

In 1988 and 1989, Federal Sales Tax (FST) payable under the Excise Tax Act was collected at the manufacturer's level. It is not possible to obtain statistics on the sales of taxable, manufactured goods to aboriginal peoples. Consequently, it is not possible to provide an estimate of the FST content of the taxable goods which were purchased by aboriginal peoples.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, if Question No. 417 could be made an Order for Return, this return would be tabled immediately.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 417 be deemed to have been made an Order for Return?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

THE BUDGET

DESIGNATION OF ORDER OF THE DAY

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons) moved:

That, notwithstanding any Standing Order or Special Order of this House, at 4.30 o'clock p.m. on Tuesday, February 26, 1991, the Speaker shall interrupt any proceedings then before the House, and such proceedings shall be deemed forthwith adjourned, and the House shall proceed forthwith to the consideration of the following motion, to stand in the name of the Minister of Finance, for the purpose of the budget statement of the Minister of Finance.

"That this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government"—;

That, immediately following such budget statement, the Speaker shall recognize a member of the Official Opposition in debate on the said motion, and when such debate is adjourned the Speaker shall adjourn the House until the usual time of meeting the next sitting day; and

That, the resumed budget debate be in accordance with the Standing Orders.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in the Standing Orders there are long-standing provisions going back decades, Standing Orders 84 and 83(2), that provide for the establishment of an Order of Day for the hearing of the budget simply by the minister standing in its place, but that was a time when we sat in the evenings and the budget was usually done at eight o'clock in the evening after the markets had closed.

Now those provisions do not allow us to start a budget at the usual time. Government Orders commence while the markets are still open in this country and it is inappropriate to give a budget at that time, so that is the reason for this special motion which is necessary as a result of the Standing Orders not keeping up to the change we have made in the hours of sitting in the House.

Last week when the government indicated that it was prepared to present a budget in the House on Tuesday, February 26, I and my colleagues contacted the opposition parties and Independent members as well, to review the schedule the government had proposed and, generally speaking, there was concurrence with that. So, today, we hoped to finalize the timing of the budget presentation by asking that the House concur in this motion and we can then proceed with other business.

I understand that some members have expressed a desire to speak to this proposed motion. I understand that desire and I understand that after a limited amount of debate there will be a disposition to pass the motion and move on to other orders. That is a brief explanation of why the motion is here. We have had considerable discussions and I would hope that we would be able to proceed with this motion relatively soon.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, while the opposition quite naturally will agree to this proposed order regarding the presentation of a budget, I think it important to take a few minutes to put a number of things on the record.

This is the first time that I have been called upon as opposition House leader to co-operate with the government in arranging the business of the House. I want to make it perfectly clear that I hope I shall be in a position to provide this kind of co-operation on most occasions.

It should be noted, however, that co-operation is very much a two-way street. It is my intention to approach discussions about House business as my predecessors have done in a reasonable and understanding manner, and I expect that the leader of the government in the House will do the same.

While the underlying assumption in parliamentary democracy is that the majority shall in the end prevail, it is essential as a facet of the process that the minority has the right to express its views in full. This House represents all of the people of the country, including the 57 per cent who did not vote for the government in the last federal election.

While we accept the parliamentary results of our democratic system and the legitimate expectation of the government that its proposals will be brought to timely decisions, we also insist on exercising the rights that the same system grants to us.

We know that you have a responsibility to ensure that our rights as a minority are maintained. We hope, however, that the government will be able to proceed with the normal courtesies—I underline those words —that will lead to these rights being respected as a matter of normalcy.

It is well known that the government has initiated a discussion with the other parties in the House concerning the rules and procedures of our proceedings.

We enter these discussions with every expectation that the result will maintain the balance between the legislative needs of a duly elected government and the Canadian people's demand for thorough and proper examination in Parliament not only of the government's proposals, but also of all of its actions.

This is best accomplished through the normal co-operative conduct of the business of this House through honest and meaningful consultation. Our agreeing today to this order is an example—and I want to underline it for the government House leader—of our willingness to make this system work.

I want to get his assurance that in the future with all matters pertaining not only to government business, but indeed to all activities in this House, he will respond with courtesy, with meaningful consultations and not with a whip.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to spend just a couple of minutes on this motion.

I do so not from the perspective of the House leader of the Liberal Party. It does not seem to me to be useful to have a great deal of debate or discussion about co-operation at this stage. We certainly feel that this is a sensible motion. There is no problem with our reaction to it.

However, in a sense it is a motion which sets out the procedure for the budget. I want to say that from my perspective as the critic in my party responsible for responding to the budget and making suggestions with respect to the budget and so forth, it is unfortunate that the budget is being presented in this House with so little lead time before it in terms of House business.

We would certainly ourselves have appreciated the possibility to make use of some opposition days to put forward some of our suggestions with respect to this budget. For instance, the Minister of Finance today suggested that our position as a party was that we simply wanted to see a great deal more spending take place in this country. We wanted to see the deficit expand, et cetera.

It would have been very useful to have had the chance for some preliminary discussion so that we could point out to the minister that that is certainly not our position.

Our position is very clear. It is a position which says that there is a massive interest rate gap between ourselves and the United States, something which historically is usually a gap of about 1 to 1.5 percentage points. It has become a gap of about 4 to 4.5 percentage points. In fact, this gap has been consistent for virtually two years now.

As a consequence of that massive gap between the two interest levels in our two countries, the Canadian dollar is at a level which frankly makes many of the businesses in my community and many of the businesses in communities across this country uncompetitive. Despite the fact that the skilled workers are there, that good investment has taken place, there has been a sabotaging of the efforts of many of these companies because of the high value of the dollar which has reflected the high value of interest rates in this country, not in an absolute sense, but relative to interest rates in the United States. Therefore, we have stressed the need to reduce that gap so that it returns to its historical level.

The interesting thing is if that is done, we would save as a country in the first year at least $5 billion in interest payments on our national debt because we would be dealing with lower interest rates.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I must ask him to keep in mind the relevancy of his remarks in a debate on a motion concerning the time of the budget speech. Eventually the hon. member will have ample time to talk about the issue he is raising now, namely the elements of the budget policy.

Therefore I would ask the hon. member to be relevant to the motion now before the House.

[English]

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I shall certainly try to keep my remarks more pertinent.

As I was suggesting in the original point, my concern was with the presentation of this motion at this time. This is a motion which sets out the procedures for when the budget is to be presented to the House of Commons. The point which I made is that I think it is crucial that there be a period of time in which members of Parliament, prior to the presentation of a budget, have a chance to put forward suggestions, considerations of importance that the government should be concerned with in bringing a budget forward. In that sense, certainly that portion of my remarks I hope, was considered pertinent.

I want to just add to those points two final comments. First, if there had been the possibility of, for instance, this motion being framed in such a way that we were talking about the budget being presented some weeks in the future, it would be possible for us, particularly in our party, to be able to present to the House of Commons some of the ideas, some of the concerns which we heard across the country on the economic recovery tour, which the New Democratic Party carried forward during the period in which the House was not sitting.

As you have suggested, Mr. Speaker, I certainly will have a chance to talk about some of those ideas and other of my colleagues will as well in the debate on the budget itself. But I do have to stress that it is important for many of the people who made presentations to us and indeed, those who made presentations to the Liberal Party in its somewhat different tour, that their ideas be presented to the House for consideration by the government before the budget was actually presented.

The point I am making, Mr. Speaker, is that as we look forward to the budget debate which this motion will structure, certainly for ourselves we will be commenting with respect to the government's budget proposals. But we will certainly be presenting alternatives which reflect the work of people within our own caucus and the comments and concerns which have been presented to us from various places across the country.

We have prepared a discussion paper on our alternatives for economic recovery. We have talked about these across the country. We will talk about these within this budget debate. We certainly welcome this motion which structures the debate. However, we hope in future years that the government would see to it that there is a possibility to have some preliminary debate, some preliminary chances to put before the House the ideas and suggestions that come from many people across Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to take part in this debate on the pre–budgetary motion, all the more so because, on the eve of the budget presentation, it gives us an opportunity to examine the various factors which make it necessary for the Minister of Finance to table a budget within the next 24 hours.

This is a good time for me to convey to the Minister of Finance some of the thoughts I have concerning tomorrow's exercise. Hopefully he will keep them in mind, Mr. Speaker, because his fiscal and monetary policies have landed us in a mess.

Right now, Quebec is paying very dearly as a result of the fiscal and monetary policy of the Minister of Finance. I would even suggest that the Minister of Finance, intent on cooling down the overheated Ontario economy, is prescribing rather strong medication which forces us Quebecers to pay millions if not billions of dollars more than our own economic indicators would normally call for.

By way of explanation, Mr. Speaker, I support this motion introduced by the government because I am anxious to hear what the Minister of Finance will be telling us. How can he explain that in 1988 the inflation index or the CPI in Ontario, for example, stood at 5.5 per cent as against only 4.2 per cent in Quebec, a difference of 1.3 per cent, and that this year inflation in Ontario is running at 6.6 per cent while it is at 4.7 per cent in Quebec, a difference of 1.9 per cent? We all know that the government's budget policy as it relates to interest rates and fiscal issues is supposedly aimed at fighting inflation. Therefore Quebec now has to pay much higher interest rates, even with that kind of difference, quite simply to make inflation less severe in Ontario.

We can see the same indications on the labour market. This fight against inflation in Ontario therefore has cost 126,000 Quebec jobs since August 1990. We are talking about 126,000 Quebec workers who have been laid off as a result of the Canadian monetary policy, not to mention their loss of dignity when they lose their jobs and find themselves in the line-up with other Canadians seeking unemployment insurance benefits.

The Minister of Finance will be facing quite a challenge tomorrow. You know that in Quebec now we have record unemployment levels—around 13.3 per cent for Quebec as a whole, but the situation is even worse in some regions like the Lower St. Lawrence and Gaspé area. In the Gaspé area and the Magdalen Islands the unemployment rate stands at 20 per cent.

• (1550)

For example, the unemployment rate in the region represented by my leader, the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean, is 17 per cent. I would suggest that all the members from Quebec who are impatiently waiting for the budget of the Minister of Finance will want to urge him to implement special measures for Quebec because of the fact that the national policy seriously harms the over-all economic situation in Quebec.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I must interrupt my friend the member for Shefford as I interrupted the previous speaker, the hon. member for Essex-Windsor.

I am looking at the motion before us, the aim of which is only to specify the way the Budget will be presented. I just realized that the hon. member is in fact speaking on the substance of a possible Budget.

I would therefore ask him to limit his comments to the subject of the debate. The hon. member for Shefford.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I understand that you would be annoyed, since unemployment is very high in your area also.

I want you to know that this motion is extremely important precisely because it provides us the opportunity to take a look at the notice, which states that the Minister of Finance tabled a motion requesting: "That this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the Government." Mr. Speaker, this government's general budgetary policy cannot be dealt with without considering unemployment, inflation and interest rates. That is why I think all these factors are interrelated.

Of course, we could debate only the procedure, but I know you have a much broader view than that, and that you too are concerned about inflation. No doubt you were extremely worried last week when you heard that inflation rose above six percent during the past month in Canada, and 1.8 percent of it is due to a voluntary measure taken by this government, i.e. the implementation of the goods and services tax.

You too must have been flabbergasted to see that this government—

Mr. Duhamel: And staggered as well!

Mr. Lapierre: —who claims to battle inflation has become the number one inflation-maker. As I said, Mr. Speaker, like you, I am concerned and nervous at the thought that tomorrow the Minister of Finance will rise and could be announcing yet more taxes, more horse medecine, and I understand your uneasiness.

The fact is, that the number of bankruptcies in Canada increased by 69 percent over the past few months! In the province of Quebec, we are hitting record highs, as indicated in the weekend edition of La Presse.

I wonder if we should allow the Minister of Finance—after all he is responsible for driving down our economy over the past seven years—to go on messing up the Canadian economy and particularly the Quebec economy. Our economic situation is getting worse by the day, and Quebec is paying an exceedingly high price. Quebec is suffering the consequences of the national policy. That is why organizations such as the Quebec Chamber of Commerce are starting to question the economic purpose of the union, the Confederation. People are starting to question the way the fiscal policy is established. People now want to know why they should pay exceedingly high interest rates, rates 5 points higher than the American rates. Why indeed, after our inflation was brought under control and the labour movement made big sacrifices. Why ask them to make yet more sacrifices?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member for Shefford again. I just want to set his mind at rest. The Chair is neither irritated nor upset. It is simply the servant of the House and has its duty is to apply the Standing Orders. According to the Standing Orders any debate must be on the purpose of the motion, which is merely to indicate that tomorrow afternoon, at 4.30 p.m., the Minister of Finance shall be allowed to make his Budget statement.

I would appeal to the hon. member's common sense and spirit of co–operation.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, like you, I was wondering whether we should allow the Minister of Finance to bring down his Budget tomorrow afternoon. With all the figures we have here, I think we are entitled to ask this question. That is the purpose of this debate. I am sure the Standing Orders of this House are not meant to prevent people from considering, for instance, the record number of bankruptcies we have seen. It is a fact that most Quebecers are concerned about the economy and are not looking forward to the fact that the Minister of Finance will rise in his seat tomorrow at 4.30 p.m. They don't know what to expect.

Besides, they listened to the last two or three Budget speeches made by the Minister of Finance. Those budgets were supposed to have an extraordinary impact, but things are going from bad to worse. As the member for Shefford, I must remind the Minister of Finance before he rises tomorrow afternoon that there are real situations out there. There are unemployed workers who today are still covered by the Unemployment Insurance Act but who will lose their benefits very soon because of the new Unemployment Insurance Act. The last time the Minister of Finance rose, he promised them occupational training courses. You know as well as I do that the minister did not keep his word, because today, there is still no new agreement on occupational training that could provide some support for these workers. These people are worried because they know the federal–provincial agreement on occupational training was not signed on March 31.

Mr. Ricard: Jean, wait until tomorrow! You will know all about the Budget tomorrow!

Mr. Lapierre: I heard the hon. member for Laval who doesn't speak very often but when he does, he speaks from his seat—

Mr. Ricard: Because you talk all the time!

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I can tell you that tomorrow's Budget is making us very upset. We will probably support this motion because we recognize the government's responsibility. Like you, however, I want to make sure before I finish my speech that the Minister of Finance realizes how seriously Quebec has been penalized by his policies and that immediately after his Budget speech tomorrow, he should set up a program to compensate Quebec and restore its economic vitality, because high interest rates, the government's monetary policy and endless taxes have undermined Quebec's economy.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the Minister of Finance is directly responsible for the nasty surprises and statistics we are getting now, and I think he should act accordingly, because Mr. Speaker, under our present system, we must ensure that none of the parties is unduly penalized. In this case, I hope that by 4.30 p.m. tomorrow, the Minister of Finance realizes that his last Budget, his monetary policy and his fiscal policy have caused Quebec very serious harm, and I would urge him to prepare immediately a program that will compensate for the negative impact of his monetary and fiscal policies.

Mr. Ricard: I'll give him the messsage, Jean!

Mr. Lapierre: You never even talk to him!

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my colleague, who just addressed so eloquently the concerns of the Quebecers about tomorrow's Budget. He spoke about compensatory program, but we know that in his two last budgets, the same minister froze the equalization payments to the provinces, so that the Quebec government lost more than one billion and a half dollars. Did he want to suggest in his remarks that, since we managed to give Newfoundland two billion dollars in grants after the Meech Lake Accord demise, one billion dollars for Western development and another one billion for eastern Canada we should—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry, but I cannot tolerate this any more—I am naturally a tolerant person, but the debate relates to the timing of the Budget speech. I am a very understanding person, but I do not see the relevance of the remarks to the timing of the Budget speech. Resumed debate.

• (1600)

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Yes, resuming debate, I was giving my question the finishing touch. Mr. Speaker, I am very happy—

During the question and comment period that follows a member's speech, it seems to be the usual procedure of the House, and it is the first time the remarks of a member have been censored. Often, when a bill is discussed, we hear members talk about everything under the sun without the House interrupting on content. The House will intervene about procedure, but never about content.

In that sense, I wanted to put a question to my colleague from Shefford about the compensation fund he was talking about, to warn the minister, still regarding the relevance of tomorrow's debate—which is what I am talking about since that is what the motion is all about—the relevance of allowing the government to table a budget.

Should we allow the minister to table a budget without letting him know the wishes of our constituents? Regarding the suggestion my colleague made about a special fund to pay back the money lost through equalization, if the Minister of Finance listened more closely to the people, the government could get better results in the polls.

I would like my colleague to give us more detail about that compensation fund he is suggesting to the minister.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Shefford, with due regard to relevance of the debate.

The hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, all Canadians are interested in this debate on the economy.

I think today is the right time to get a few messages through to the Minister of Finance since he is the one asking our permission to speak tomorrow at 4:30 p.m.

Mr. Ricard: It's already done, Jean!

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, you know then that a few of your colleagues—sorry, a few members across the way—don't even bother to stand up when they're speaking. I hope they will stand up and tell the Minister of Finance how their government has thrown Quebec into an unacceptable recession.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that those members who are mute, who are like sheep, will once and for all tell the Minister of Finance that Quebec urgently needs the one billion dollar compensation fund to get its economy going again.

Mr. Speaker, I think that the delays and the economic problems we are presently experiencing are a direct consequence of the government's monetary policy.

Mr. Peterson: That's true.

Mr. Lapierre: We are not blind, Mr. Speaker, to the reality of interest rates. One can see historically prosperous concerns go bankrupt every day; the bankruptcy rate has gone up by 69 per cent, Mr. Speaker.

And the members across the way have the nerve to applaud the Minister of Finance when we know that the bankruptcy rate has gone up by 69 per cent. The government itself is going bankrupt, Mr. Speaker. It is going bankrupt economically and politically. Consequently, we are giving it the chance to boost its fortunes and to help Quebecers have a bit more faith in its administration. I urge them to take immediate action and to demand of the Minister of Finance demand a compensation fund which will help Quebec's economy get going again, as it should be. The fact is, this government is responsible for strangling Quebec's economy.

Mr. Peterson: And Canada's economy.

Mr. Lapierre: And all that was done in an attempt to please Ontarians, or rather to control inflationay pressures in Ontario. And I feel sorry, Mr. Speaker, for my colleague, the member for Willowdale, who is forced to admit it. The government of Canada has drawn its policies for Ontario to the detriment of Quebec. In that sense, Mr. Speaker, it is unacceptable and I hope that they correct the situation no later than tomorrow at 4:30 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions or comments?

Mr. Rocheleau: No, Mr. Speaker, debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. The Hon. Member for Hull—Aylmer has the floor.

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): In the House which is nearly empty, I am concerned with the fact that the minister of Finance will table his budget tomorrow, while the current budget is not yet over and that we have lived through some significant events over the past year. Not only this government, but Canadians generally have had to face very tragic times following the implementation of the Finance Minister's last budget. There is a motion calling for a budget to be tabled. Yet, Mr.

Speaker, this motion makes it possible for hon. members to warn the Minister of Finance who is about to table his Budget tomorrow that in view of the very serious and negative economic situation faced by most Canadians, while provincial governments—I am talking here about the Quebec Government which, under the Ryan reform, will dump a $500 million deficit into the municipalities backyards—while the Quebec Minister of Finance indicated a few weeks ago to the Quebec people that the Federal Budget this year would deprive the Quebec economy of several tax points. Mr. Speaker, the House is almost empty as the government is about to tighten the screw without taking into account its Budget's implications.

Mr. Speaker, we were told in last year's Budget that interest rates would come down markedly. Over the last months, we have just experienced the beginning of a reduction. Last year's Budget never mentioned a recession. Yet, we had to face a recession "made in Canada". Why is the situation today so serious? It is because the Minister of Finance orchestrated a recession which he doesn't know now how to control.

This is the situation as it exist today and we want to warn him, Mr. Speaker. We are not especially against the fact that the Minister of Finance will table his Budget tomorrow. We are not against the motion. We just want to give him fair warning, and I do so on behalf of my Hull—Aylmer constituents, because we are part of the National Capital Region. My riding which is on the Quebec side of the Ottawa Valley remains a federal constituency pending Quebec's sovereignty. Until then, there are federal civil servants working here and I want to make sure that they will not be transferred as was the case for some last week under the immigration agreement policy. Some 60 of them were transferred to Montreal or Quebec City.

The same with the GST, Mr. Speaker. Some 500 civil servants were transferred to tie in the GST with the provincial tax. These National Capital Region civil servants are being moved away. Just now, we are in a constitutional deadlock and the Finance Minister will table a Budget. Quebec is being penalized because of Ontario's overheated economy, and we should keep quiet about it. Just a minute! We are still Canadian citizens. We still carry Canadian passports and we are here to defend Quebec's best interests and we want to be heard. This government Tory members do not speak out on behalf of Quebecers. It is the members of the Bloc québécois who stand up for them. That is what we wanted to tell the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions and comments.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): First of all, I wish to congratulate my colleague from Hull–Aylmer for questioning the appropriateness of tabling the Budget tomorrow, of allowing the Minister of Finance to table a Budget tomorrow. I would like to ask my colleague this: Can we afford to allow a Minister to table a Budget if he indicated in the preceeding weeks neither the intention to control the deficit nor a firm commitment on the part of the government to help businesses and act on bankruptcies. Record numbers of bankruptcies in Montreal are reported in today's paper, but no commitment has been made toward reducing unemployment. All that was picked up by my colleague and very well conveyed by him, especially when he talked about shovelling. Could he explain further what he was saying about the Federal Government having shovelled in the backyard of the provinces and the provinces in turn shovelling in the backyard of the municipalities, so as to show the minister before he tables his Budget how important it is to put an end to that shovelling through a freeze in transfer payments?

• (1610)

So, very briefly, Mr. Speaker, we heard today the Minister of Finance tell this House that the Canadian Air Force had been authorized to fly bombing missions over Iraq and Kuwait, which would increase expenditures in the Defence operating budget. That is all shovelling. We are already contributing to this war effort as part of the United Nations. First, we provided protection and, in the last month, we played an escort role. Today, everything seems to be going perfectly in the US–Irak war. And now, because the Prime Minister is up a few points in the polls, we take on an attack role. How many more millions will that cost, Mr. Speaker? That is all shovelling in one another's backyard.

We were told last week and again this week by the President of the Treasury Board in Quebec, Mr. Daniel Johnson, that there would be no tax hikes. Right! Some 500 millions in expenditures will be shovelled in the backyard of the municipalities. There will probably be no federal tax hike, but the deficit will increase accordingly and the Federal Government will transfer to Quebec important expenditures which Quebec will in turn transfer to yet another level. That is what shovelling is all about, and that is why Canada's present system is not working anymore.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions and comments.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I only wanted to address a short comment to my colleague from Hull—Aylmer. I undestood him well when he criticized the minister of Finance as I could do the same, of course. We are all afraid when we realize that the minister is preparing a new budget because, if we consider the other budgets that he introduced in the past, we are aware of the damage that they did to us. But I didn't understand my colleague when he spoke of daydreamers because in the past he called daydreamers a certain group of people, mostly the independentist in Quebec and when standing up for Quebecers, he said the Bloc Quebecois is the only real defender of their rights. I ask myself a lot of questions about that because I find there is a certain hypocrisy in the House which might be normal because people are a little bit like that. But when we are talking about the rights of Quebecers and the Bloc quebecois, I am obliged to say that I checked if my colleagues of the Bloc quebecois voted in favor of abortion.

Some hon. members: That is not true.

Mr. Edmonston: During the vote, I remember that some of them voted for the bill and one of them voted against it. You can read in the record and you know who it was, it was the member for Verdun. I took note of that and I said to myself: "Here is the one who stands up for Quebecers, women as well as men." I can speak to you about—

Mr. Lapierre: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Shefford on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I know that my hon. colleague for Chambly should know better than that for he would have noticed that the member for Shefford, the member for Hull—Aylmer and the member for Richelieu have all voted against that measure. We strive for all Quebecers but, most of all, for the Quebec women.

Mr. Edmonston: Mr. Speaker, if I am mistaken, I am ready to admit what the hon. member just said, but surely, when one looks at the results of the vote here in this House, one finds some contradiction. For example, on the issue of war, as the hon. member for Saint-Denis just mentioned, we do not see a political party voting as one, but a political party rather torn by dissension on many important issues.

Mr. Lapierre: Free men!

Mr. Edmonston: Free men, as my honourable friend just said.

But on the issue of war, for example, I do not think the way the vote was presented and the way the Bloc Quebecois voted had anything to do with the interests of Quebec. We might have different views, but I do not think that to vote for this war was to stand for the interests of Quebec.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, speaking of standing for the interests of Quebec, we have seen members of the Bloc Québécois vote for the GST and now, of course, they complain that the GST is hurting us. But we have to talk about the background of those people. Before becoming members of the Bloc quebecois, they created the evil they are now complaining about. That is not what I call to stand for the interests of Quebec men and women.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Hull—Aylmer had a question or a comment?

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, I did not detect any questions, but I still want to comment on one of the statements that the member made.

I voted against the Abortion Bill. As for the war issue, I think we voted to support the UN, but I did not vote, for example, for our CF-18's to bomb Kuwait and Iraq.

The minister of Finance told us this morning that that will cost more in the Budget, and I am against that.

The Bloc quebecois is defending the interests of Quebec here in this House, because the three members of the Bloc quebecois, beside the member for Chambly, rose to speak, while no Quebec member from the Conservative Party did. Soon, it will be too late, the Budget will be passed and, after that, it will be criticized. I would rather criticize before than after.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is one minute and a half left for questions and comments.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, the member for Hull—Aylmer mentioned the most particular situation of his region and I would like him to expand on the situation of public servants in his region, who could be affected by the Budget. For instance, it has been said that the Minister of Finance's Budget would be at the expense of the public servants. I would be pleased if he could elaborate.

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, I must say to my colleague from Shefford that it is true that since the Conservatives took power in 1984, there has been a reduction of about 10 per cent in the number of civil servants. The Outaouais has had to absorb part of that reduction. Today, we hear about significant cuts and the President of the Treasury Board has even given notice of that. Will the people of the Outaouais and of the National Capital have to bear the brunt of this Government's mismanagement or will it be the same kind of cuts in the Public Service that we have seen in the last few years? That is a concern for me and for the other members on this side of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): That puts an end to the question and comment period. Resuming debate.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, like my two colleagues, I wonder how relevant it is to let the minister of Finance table his budget tomorrow. The Minister is about to table a budget in cooperation with our two traditional political parties which have not bothered to let him know that our people, our constituents are very, very worried. They are concerned about what has been going on for the last two years, and before a new budget is tabled, they would like the minister to promise them budgetary cuts, expenditure restraints for example, in order to reduce the deficit.

Before the budget is tabled, they would like the minister to make a very firm commitment to fight unemployment. For example, what does the minister plan to do about interest rates? Will he let them go 4 percent to 5 percent above interest rates in the United States? Will he let the Canadian dollar go as high as 90 cents, knowing that would hurt some companies in my constituency? I would like to have all these commitments before we have a final text, in theory at least, before we give the Minister of Finance leave to table his response to the current recession that he created with his last two budgets. What kind of commitment does he make, before tabling his budget, that he will fight the recession?

Can he promise that he will not freeze equalization payments as he did the last two years, because that was very damaging to Quebecers? What kind of guarantee do we have that the federal government will not, as headlined today the Journal de Montréal, continue to waste taxpayer's money. What guarantee do we have that we will not see extravagant spending like $14,171 for a video on "Minister Bill McKnight". Fourteen thousand dollars to make a video to send to military personnel. Is it acceptable to spend $34,533 for a TV program on the Department—I mean the Defence Department—sent via satellite, and $36,385 for a video on safe driving in Germany? Could the minister guarantee, before tabling his budget, that such profligacies won't be repeated?

Mr. Lapierre: This is awful!

Mr. Plamondon: For a video on controversial flights by NATO planes over the Goose Bay area, in Newfoundland, they spent $37,554. And then a further amount has been granted for translating it into Italian, German and Dutch. Could the minister promise the House that no more funds will be wasted in such a way? And what about $40 000 spent for the making of a video on a State visit to Rideau Hall? How could the Department of National Defence spend more than 40 million dollars on various videos? More than 200 videos have been made so far. What next? Porn flicks? We could always make some to entertain our soldiers who might be lonesome abroad. The Canadian International Development Agency spent $55 000 to make a video on the various cuisines of the world. And that kind of spending has been going on for years. Most of these video films are available only to a restricted client group according to the newspaper report. That is what has been going on for two years while cuts have been made in equalization payments, forcing the Government of Quebec to recover its loss from the municipal governments.

Such permission should not be granted to a minister. I think that the Prime Minister should remove the Minister of Finance and allow another minister to manage the finances of the Canadian Government and I suggest that that the minister would make commitments through a public statement followed by a request put to the House to ask its permission to table a Budget that would embody what he thinks of state financing. But no, today, they table a proposal, a blank cheque saying: the Minister of Finance wants to table another controversial budget which will not cure unemployment, which will continue to drive industries into bankruptcy, which will maintain an untolerable deficit, which will still allow high interest rates in collaboration with John Crow, in charge of the Bank of Canada, and an inflated value of the Canadian dollar, which will harm our exports, force us to stay in a perpetual recession and to invent a new recession made in Canada. Can we allow such a Minister of Finance to table a budget tomorrow? It is what this House is asking us today. I am asking you: would it be logical and would we not be the accomplices of this minister if we agreed to the tabling of such a budget without a public commitment from the minister that this government has indeed come to its senses.

No, there is no commitment that we are going to curb this intolerable deficit, lower the rate of unemployment or stifle an overvalued Canadian dollar. There is no commitment, so my dear fellow citizens, brace yourselves, it is going to be tough. Tighten your belt while we make $14,000 videos about minister Bill McKnight and a $36,000 video, in French and in English, on safe driving in Germany.

Can we allow that to go on? Can we allow that kind of expenditures to continue? Another video about Rideau Hall—

An hon. member: Sheer irresponsibility!

Mr. Plamondon: It is unacceptable. That is why—

An hon. member: About Rideau Hall?

Mr. Plamondon: Yes, sir, about Rideau Hall, $35,000 spent by National Defence to tell us all about Rideau Hall. So those are the kinds of expenditures, no wonder we read scathing headlines about on-going irresponsible expenditures of taxpayers' money. This is why we in the Bloc Quebecois find it so hard to allow the minister to go on spending like that.

Today we fail to understand why the Quebec Conservative members remain silent—

Mr. Lapierre: They are not here!

Mr. Plamondon: Now that the Prime Minister has delivered his federalist speech, they can be expected to behave like the old Liberal noodleheads of 1982 who stood idle while the government repatriated the Constitution without Quebec's consent. Now of course they are like lambs, silent, glued to their seats. But tomorrow they will all be here to give a round of applause to the Minister of Finance, but such days are nearly over. After the next election we will be glad to mail pension cheques to those who deserve them, but the others will have to apply for unemployment insurance and then they will realize that this government has cut down the benefit period. They will perhaps be affected themselves and they will be in a better position to understand why people have a hard time accepting that this House is silent and allows the Minister of Finance to table a budget tomorrow without making a public commitment to his constituents, and the citizens of his province and of our two countries, Quebec and Canada. No concrete commitment has been made and this government asks for a blank cheque. I could not put up with this undemocratic procedure and such callous indifference to the hardships of my constituents. I thought it was my duty to stand up and refuse the blank cheque this government is asking for.

I had to warn this government who has been such a disaster for the Canadian economy, particularly in the last two years, I had to tell you, before the tabling of your budget, that we will not tolerate the same kind of budget once again. Things have to change. While all other members in the three official parties were silent, we will have done our duty and publicly warned this government about the dissatisfaction of our constituents and the tragedy the whole Canadian economy is about to experience.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I would like to start by congratulating the hon. member for Richelieu. His speech illustrates the difference between a member who is free to speak his mind and a group that is absent from the House but nevertheless carries a great responsibility. There are about 50 or 60 Conservative members from Quebec but in today's debate, we have not heard from a single one.

The hon. member for Richelieu is to be commended because he is not afraid to say what he thinks. He has no qualms about expressing the frustrations of his electorate on the floor of this House. The Minister of Labour has just come in. Perhaps he could give us his opinions and the opinions of his constituents on the very serious unemployment situation in Quebec, the bankruptcies in that province and the very serious situation in the city of Montreal. Ever since he became the minister responsible for Montreal, things have gone from bad to worse. He is the worst minister responsible for Montreal Island we have had since Confederation. All he does here is smile, without saying a word, without responding to the concerns of the people of Montreal. I want to say to the hon. member for Richelieu that if the minister responsible for Montreal Island had as much courage as he does, he would not be as low in the polls as he is today. The minister should have come sooner, because the hon. member for Richelieu had a lot of good advice for him about how to get Quebec's economy back on its feet. I would ask the hon. member for Richelieu whether he could provide a short description of the situation for the benefit of the minister who just came in.

Mr. Plamondon: With pleasure, Mr. Speaker. I want to thank my hon. colleague for his kind words, and I would also like to return the compliment and say how much I appreciated his speech. He proved his point most eloquently on the relevance of warning the minister of the problems facing Canada before allowing him to bring down his Budget. He referred to the minister responsible for the Montreal region, the Minister of Labour. They say the name of his department is going to be changed very shortly to department of unemployment a more appropriate description of the minister as well and the region of Montreal which he represents in this government. His continued silence is typical, so that the problems I raised earlier concerning unemployment, record bankruptcies—A newspaper like La Presse had the following headline: Montreal has record bankruptcies! So I think the minister should act responsibly and do something to—It says here it is worse than in 1982, in terms of businesses that have been forced to close down. The minister should take his own department and his responsibility for the Montreal region in hand and do something to stop this. I also mentioned the deficit. For two years the government has been promising us the deficit would go down, and now we will have an even bigger deficit than predicted. Their excuse will be the war in the gulf and interest rates, but did they do anything to control those interest rates? I mentioned this earlier: the 4 or 5 per cent spread between interest rates in Canada and the United States has been very harmful, especially to Quebec. Of course, it served the interests of other regions in this country but Quebec did not matter, as usual.

We talked about the value of the dollar which is now at 87 cents. What kind of commitment is the minister prepared to make to change this? And this is why we in the Bloc Quebecois are very reluctant to allow the minister, as proposed in the motion tabled today, to bring down his Budget. Can we say yes to a minister who has made no commitment and who acted irresponsibly, keeping interest rates high throughout the year, to serve the interests of one particular region in this country, at the expense of Quebec? A minister who froze equalization payments—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. De Blois): I am sorry but I have to interrupt the hon. member for Richelieu because he is talking about the Minister of Finance whereas the motion is about the moment when the Budget will be tabled.

Mr. Plamondon: Thank you, Mr. Minister, I mean Mr. Speaker.

An hon. member: He is not a minister yet.

Mr. Plamondon: I mean Mr. Speaker. Again, when you bring me back to the subject matter, I sometimes have the impression that it is a form of censorship in the sense that the British parliamentary system has always been very open—

An hon. member: He would be a better minister.

Mr. Plamondon: Yes, perhaps, you are the Speaker, but you probably would make a better minister than our present Minister of Finance.

An hon. member: It always destroys them in the end.

Mr. Plamondon: My colleague is suggesting words that I would not dare to repeat. I leave that to him.

I was speaking to the minister responsible for the Montreal region, because the region was deeply affected, and I was hoping, by calling on his attention, that he would have the Minister of Finance undertake public commitments. We expected that from the minister before the House was recalled, we wanted him to undertake public commitments to put the situation right and avoid the same type of budgets that always cornered Quebec, that always did Quebec wrong. More than $800 million in the last budget on account of an equalization which was frozen, without notice. And we get ready to cut again.

But they want to keep the powers to themselves. They want the constitutional powers. But when comes the time to pay, they pass the bill on to Quebec. The only assurance Quebec has from the federal governement is that it will get the bill. That is for sure. But it is another thing to get concrete commitments to remedy unfair situations created by this minister— the recession created by this minister. Should we allow a minister to table a Budget? That is the question. And, Mr. Speaker, as was already mentioned a while ago, we have to ask ourselves today if it is adequate to table a Budget. Or is it adequate to allow a minister responsible for heavy unemployment, many bankrupcies, an inacceptable deficit, intolarable interest rates, a too strong dollar and a recession—

Can we say today to a minister, while smiling as do the Opposition members, NDP members and especially my conservative colleagues from Quebec, that he can continue to ruin this country by tabling a Budget that will do nothing to remedy the economic situation? Can we do that? Are we going to be that irresponsible? Are we members of the House only, as my colleague from Hull—Aylmer said, when the strings are pulled, and all jump to their feet to vote en masse as the whip says, or will we be in control, take our responsibilities as parliamentarians and warn this Minister of Finance that he will not be able to table a budget if he does not seriously commit himself to correct the disastrous economic conditions we are in today.

We, members of the Bloc quebecois who decided last weekend to found a political party, warn all of you who remain silent today, that you will have to face a member of the Bloc Quebecois and will pay dearly for your silence and the economic destruction of the country you are entrusting to the Minister of Finance. We will not allow him to table a budget without saying aloud and shouting our determination—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I apologize for interrupting, but in case other members would like to— Other members may want to put questions to the hon. member for Richelieu.

Is the House ready for the question? May I be dispensed from reading the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–91, an act to amend the Financial Administration Act and other acts in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendment) from a legislative committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It has been proposed that Mr. Peterson replace Mr. Milliken. Is the House agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There are three motions on the notice paper at the report stage of Bill C–91, An Act to amend the Financial Administration Act and other Acts in consequence thereof. They are all in the name of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

[English]

Motions Nos. 1, 2 and 3 are acceptable and will be debated together but voted upon as follows: Motions Nos. 1 and 2 will be voted on separately.

Affirmative votes on Motion No. 1 or Motion No. 2 will obviate the necessity of a vote on Motion No. 3.

If Motions Nos. 1 and 2 are rejected, Motion No. 3 will be put to a vote.

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Jim Peterson (for Mr. Milliken) moved:

Motion No. 1.

That Bill C-91 be amended in clause 6 by striking out line 19 at page 4 and substituting the following therefor:

"the service or the use of the facility to the user or classes of user who benefit thereby."

Motion No. 2.

That Bill C-91 be amended in clause 6 by striking out line 47 at page 4 and substituting the following therefor:

"lation or order provided that such rules for adjustment may not provide for the consideration of any new factors for adjustment of the amount of a fee or charge."

Motion No. 3

That Bill C-91 be amended by deleting clause 6.

• (1640)

He said: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the consent of my colleagues to speak on this issue.

First of all, let me say that the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, who proposed our party's three amendments, has done an excellent service on behalf of many people who have come to him, to me as well as to our party, to discuss the potential implications of these amendments to the Financial Administration Act.

In brief, we applaud the government for many of the proposals which it has put forward in this bill. We feel that many of the housekeeping amendments which it has made have been long overdue. Many have been recommended by the Auditor General for a number of years.

We commend the government for dealing with these important issues which are going to streamline many of the government operations. But it is wrong to assume that the entirety of this bill to amend the Financial Administration Act deals simply with housekeeping amendments.

There are some provisions which give our party, the people on this side of the House, and many Canadians a great deal of concern.

The one that has caused the most concern is the one which deals with the concept of user fees. By these amendments the government is enlarging its power to impose fees or charges for services for any of the functions which it performs on behalf of Canadians.

You might ask, whether it is proper for Canadians who benefit to have to pay the cost. We do not do that in everything. We have a general revenue fund out of which we pay the costs of health, the costs of education; after all, it is not just students who pay the costs of education because we all benefit from having a highly educated populace.

The concept of user fees and charges can be taken to an extreme whereby one could destroy the basis of what this country is about, and destroy the basis for imposing taxes. If the concept is taken too far, only the people who benefit in any measure or used any type of facility would be the ones who would have to pay for it.

Let us be fair. There was not a groundswell of Canadians who came forward to speak to the committee about the problems created for their particular groups or industries because of this bill. But those who did come forward raised some very important concerns for us.

One of the major concerns was: How far is the government going to go in imposing user fees or charges? What are the real intentions of the government?

We asked this at committee and they said: "Well, we might have to charge a little more for passports to make sure that the costs of issuing passports are borne by the people who receive them. We may have to charge Xerox costs or reprinting costs."

We have no objection to small things like this, but they would not confirm for us that they were going to limit the powers granted to the Governor General in Council—not the subject of a debate in Parliament, but simply an Order in Council proposed by the government and written up behind closed doors.

We asked questions such as this: What is the government's hidden agenda? How far are they going to go? Will there be user fees for the Trans-Canada Highway? What about services at our airports? What about customs services for our importers and for our exporters? Should only they bear these costs?

What about the airport user fees themselves? Must they all be self-supporting and self-sustaining? It is taking the concept of privatization and pay-as-you-go to the maximum limit.

We have one particular industry which raised concerns with us, namely the shipping industry in Canada. Let us look at a bit of the background. A short while ago Transport Canada proposed that the shipping industry pay a higher cost for certain services rendered by the Government of Canada to it. However, it said that these costs were not going to be borne by pleasure craft owners or fishermen, but were going to be borne by our commercial shipping industry. These charges, according to the government, are going to be borne by the big shippers, those who ship grain, coal, iron ore and steel.

Who should pay for the costs of shipping services such as navigational services, search and rescue, ice-breaking, the Coast Guard fleet and navigational aids? Reasonable people are going to debate and have differences of opinion on who should bear the costs of maintaining a high standard of navigational safety and sophistication in Canada. We want the search and rescue operations of the Coast Guard, but who is going to pay for them? Should it be all boaters? Should part of it be out of the general revenue fund of Canada? These are issues which are critical to all of us as Canadians and must be the subject of debate and representations in the House of Commons.

For example, now the big shippers themselves pay for 100 per cent of Ports Canada. They pay for 100 per cent of the Seaway costs, the pilotage costs and most of the costs of the Grain Commission in Canada. But if we are going to extend the costs to these big shippers of these other services that Transport Canada is talking about, why will the government not come forward and say so?

What the government have said to us is that it does not know what it is going to do and it will not give us any commitments as to how far it will go. Then it proposes some amendments to its own bill in response to these representations which have been made to it. I appreciate that the government is attempting to be forthcoming, but I really do not think the government heard or understood exactly what those representations involved.

First of all, what we as Liberals, and what the Milliken amendment attempted to do was to say that if additional fees are to be imposed on users as opposed to the general revenue fund or the budgets of departments, please make sure that it is borne by all of the persons who use that facility. In other words, do not just hit either the big persons or the small ones, or the foreigners who come into Canada, or the domestic people, or the people from central Canada; make sure that the users who benefit from those facilities are the ones who are paying for it. If you do not benefit why should you have to pay for it?

Should not the question of increased services to our shipping industry be the subject of open discussion with them? If they do not want those services why should they have to pay for them? Why should those services not be the subject of a political decision? Then the fees could come out of general revenue or departmental budgets.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands who has just come in here now, had proposed three amendments on our behalf. These amendments were designed to ensure that the persons who pay were the users who "benefited" from the services provided. Surely this is reasonable. Why would the government not have accommodated our party and the hon. member's proposal by allowing this simple amendment?

That is why, there is much good in this bill. We congratulate the new Treasury Board minister for his efforts in bringing forward this bill to update the law in the Financial Administration Act. But we do not want to give a blank cheque to the government, under the section 6 amendment dealing with user fees, to be able to impose the fees right across the board. It is arbitrary. It is against what we stand for in Parliament. It is unfair to those persons. It could hurt industries unfairly and that is why we have to oppose this bill, unless we can get the amendments which we seek.

• (1650)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before recognizing the next speaker, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for South West Nova—Fisheries; the hon. member for North Island—Powell River—Oka; the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—Regional Development.

Resuming Debate.

[Translation]

The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State (Finance) has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs) and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I think there was a promotion in there that was not intended.

Mr. McDermid: Take it while you can.

Mr. Worthy: I would like to address the motion made today by the hon. member opposite on Bill C–91. This is the aspect that has generated the most discussion, both in this Chamber as well as in committee. It is, of course, the amendment to section 19 in the act concerning user fees as proposed in clause 6 of this bill.

What section 19 of the Financial Administration Act is primarily concerned with is services that are provided to discrete and identifiable users or a group of users. The underlying principle is that, subject to program considerations, costs of services and rights and privileges should be paid by those individuals or groups of individuals.

I would be remiss if I did not underline the qualification in there: "subject to program considerations". The impact that fees will have on users, other affected parties and program objectives are very important considerations. In some cases there may be no user fees that should be imposed, or they could possibly be set to recover less than full cost, where imposing a fee or recovering full cost would jeopardize program objectives. On the other hand, not imposing appropriate user fees where circumstances warrant places an unfair burden on the general taxpayer.

An aspect of clause 6 that has been the subject of considerable discussion is the concept of setting fees by class of users. This change is intended to clarify that costs are to be averaged within classes when setting fees, where it is impractical to set individual fees every time a service is provided. While it may be decided for public policy or other program reasons that certain users should not bear the full cost of this service, it is not the intent that these costs will be recovered from other users.

However, concern has been raised that the current wording does not provide assurance that a class of users will not be charged more than the cost of service provided to that same class of user. In our view, taken as a whole, the current wording of clause 6 does provide this assurance. However, it may be useful to make it clearer.

The hon. member opposite proposes to do so through using the words, "to the user or classes of users who benefit thereby".

I do not want to take a lot of time, but I think we should indicate that this wording in itself has some problems. The phrase, "who benefit thereby" introduces a subjective test, whereas what is important is that a particular service or facility has been provided to a user or class of users.

For example, in the case of certain inspections falling under the Department of Agriculture, there is no question that a service has been provided, however one might argue who has been the ultimate person to benefit from that.

Accordingly, as an alternative to the wording suggested by the member opposite, I propose two amendments.

First, that motion No. 1 to amend clause 6 of Bill C–91 be amended by deleting all the words after the word "therefor" and substituting the following therefor:

> "the service or the use of the facility to the users or class of users."

Second, that motion No. 2 to amend clause 6 of Bill C–91 be amended by deleting all the words after the word "therefor" and substituting the following therefor:

> "lation or order, but no such rules may provide for the consideration of any factors of adjustment that are not specified in the rules"

I think the House will see that this will in fact make the situation clearer for all.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Both motions presented by the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Finance are admissible.

MEASURE TO AMEND

[English]

Mr. Angus: On a point of order, is it not a requirement at report stage that if notice has not been given of amendments that unanimous consent must be sought to allow these amendments to be put.

Mr. Baker: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I wonder as well if you could consider the motion that is presently before the House which, as you explained it, is really a combination of three motions and one of them, if I understood you correctly, was to eliminate an entire section of a particular clause. I am wondering how one can amend an amendment that calls for a deletion.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): As for the first point of order raised by the member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan, I am told that it is not necessary to give notice to move an amendment which is already before the House.

Regarding the second point of order raised by the member for Gander—Grand Falls, the Chair is taking note of it. I will render my decision as soon as possible. Meanwhile, the debate of the motions can resume.

MEASURE TO AMEND

[English]

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, it is a bit of déja vu for me to rise on this bill today. It takes me back to another bill in this House at another time, back in 1985. It was called the Canada Shipping Act, Bill C–75 and it was clause 4 at that time. That clause attempted through the front door to do what clause 6 in Bill C–91 is attempting to do through the back door and that is the imposition of user fees, particularly on the marine industry of Canada.

• (1700)

The government's attempt with Bill C–75 failed back then. This attempt must fail as well. If it does not fail it will be yet another nail in the coffin of Canada's maritime industry. In fact, it will go the way VIA Rail and other industries did in Canada at the hands of this government.

One more cost burden is being put on the marine industry that will only accelerate the following: the scrapping of existing ships owned by Canadian companies and turning them over to the wrecking yards; reflagging of the remaining salty-lakers on the Great Lakes–St. Lawrence Seaway; consolidation of steamship companies both on the Great Lakes and elsewhere. These actions in turn will see major job losses and major losses to the treasury of Canada and to the provinces and, obviously, increases to unemployment insurance and welfare.

I must say at the outset that the amendments put forward by the government do not deal with the real problem. While they are an attempt to make a bad bill slightly better, the problem still exists and that is the policy of this government and the implementation factor contained in this legislation that would allow them to proceed with the cost recovery measures.

As a nation that is based on exporting, we will at some point be without our own marine industry in which to transport our grain, coal, potash, as well as our other commodities.

In the short time available to me I want to quickly underline the procedural situation that we are in. We have the government that on the one hand is saying clause 6 of Bill C–91 does not in any way give it new powers as it applies to the marine industry. In fact, the Minister of Transport said in a letter on December 17, 1990, to the President of the Treasury Board:

> It is my understanding that no new legislative authority is necessary to permit implementation of the department's proposals, should it be decided in due course to do so. In the opinion of the Department of Justice, the existing section 19 of the FAA (Financial Administration Act) provides a sufficient legal foundation.

The Financial Administration Act has been around since well before Bill C–75 was tabled in this House and debated. The question I ask and representatives of the marine industry ask is: if in 1985 amendments were needed to the Canada Shipping Act to allow for the Coast Guard's cost recovery measures to be implemented, why all of a sudden is no legislation required now?

Or if, on the other hand, the amendments in clause 6 are not aimed at the marine industry, who are they aimed at?

The marine industry has tracked this particular legislation from the time it came to realize that in fact it was a threat to it, that it would enable the government to do through legislative means what the industry believes, and certainly reports from the joint committee on scrutiny of regulations indicate, that the government under the old clause 19 does not have the power to implement a user fee or cost recovery mandate on the marine industry. In particular, the documentation provided by the Maritime Chamber of Commerce suggests that unless the fee is applied to a specific user, whether it is an individual or a corporation, at the request of that user or corporation, then legally the government cannot use the Financial Administration Act to levy cost recovery measures on the marine industry.

Throughout the debate at report stage and third reading, whenever we get to that, my colleagues and I will be outlining the impact of this legislation and the cost-recovery policy of this government, that is slowly working its way through the bureaucracy to the minister's desk, to indicate why it cannot go forward.

We have seen a major shift in transport where the marine industry has been declining because a variety of factors have pushed it into a weak position. For example, tonnages on the St. Lawrence Seaway have declined from 74 million tonnes in 1979 to 48 million tonnes in 1989, a drop of 35 per cent. Cargo volumes carried by the CSA fleet have dropped by 18 per cent from 94 million tonnes to 77 million tonnes during the same period.

The largest decreases have been in grain and iron ore where structural changes in the respective industries have been beyond the control of the marine industry. Government policy and shifting world markets are largely responsible for the drop in water-borne grain tonnage. The long decline in North American competitiveness in steel production has caused a major drop in the demand for iron ore.

Aside from a decline in markets, it should be noted that the inland marine mode itself faces heavy competitive pressures. Competition is being experienced from other modes, primarily rail, and other routings, Mississippi River, U.S. east coast, and Canadian west coast ports for grain only.

The result of forces at work on the marine mode is evident in the number of marine carriers which have had to sell, cease or consolidate operations in this increasingly uneconomic industry. The names of more than a dozen marine carriers have disappeared in recent times. In addition, existing marine carriers are consolidating bulk carrier operations as evidence of continuing pressure to reduce costs and provide for more efficient services.

In the past decade alone the number of actively trading ships in the CSA fleet has steadily declined from 176 in 1979 to 119 in 1989. According to the Canadian Lake Carriers' Association, the number of actively employed unionized seamen under their aegis has dropped from 3,592 in 1979 to 2,245 in 1990, a 38 per cent decrease.

This policy through this legislation will hit every region in this country. It will hit British Columbia in a very negative way. It will hit Ontario in a negative way. It will hit Quebec especially hard. It will also hit Atlantic Canada.

In doing so it will hit all of this country because without the ships to move grain, potash or coal from the prairies through the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Seaway then the prairies will decline.

If we do not have ships moving then less steel is needed to build those ships. In fact, we have no ships being built; we have not had ships built for a number of years because of the policies of this government.

In spite of the last-minute tinkering by the government this particular aspect of the legislation is unacceptable. It is unacceptable to all of us who represent marine communities, who represent ports, who recognize the value of the marine industry in Canada. It cannot afford one more cent being added to its cost of operation.

What this government should be doing, instead of its cost-recovery measures, instead of this particular clause, is what the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority has been doing, developing lower incentive tolls to bring more products through the system so that more people can work, more people can benefit, and the country as a whole can benefit.

I urge the government to agree to entirely drop this particular clause, clause 6, amending section 19, so that the rest of the bill can go forward and this particular clause can be sent back to where it belongs and never seen again.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before recognizing the next speaker I am in a position to say that, after taking under advisement the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls about the motion introduced by the hon. member for Cariboo—Chilcotin and after due consideration, the Chair still believes that the two amendment motions presented by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State (Finance) are in order. Resuming debate. The hon. member for York West.

• (1710)

[English]

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise and speak at report stage of Bill C-91, which essentially encourages, through clause 6, the essence of cost recovery and generation of greater amounts of revenue for the federal government. Despite the amendments proposed by the parliamentary secretary, my party and this caucus have a great deal of concern with clause 6. We believe that clause 6 should be stricken from Bill C-91.

Clause 6 essentially says, on page 1990 of the bill, that the Governor in Council may, on the recommendation of the Treasury Board, (a) by regulation prescribe the fees or charges to be paid for a service or the use of a facility; and (b) authorize the appropriate minister to prescribe by order those fees or charges.

There have been a number of members who have alluded to the complications and the ramifications that this bill, particularly clause 6, would have on the shipping industry. The dramatic effects were in fact first discovered by representatives of the Great Lakes shipping industry.

In essence, it could mean an additional $25 million at the bare minimum in terms of additional charges being placed on a shipping and marine industry that, as has been mentioned, is hurting. It is hurting in all regions of the country, particularly in the province of Quebec. Rather than trying to create a greater sense of confidence, rather than trying to create incentives, rather than trying to create policies that are going to be a shot in the arm to this particular industry, passing on greater cost recovery services to that industry is a way of aggravating an already bad situation.

Representatives from that industry are looking to this Parliament, are looking to this government, for reassuring signals that the government understands the plight of that industry, understands the importance of not trying to make it more uncompetitive, because they are already facing a very difficult competitive situation .The shipping industry is down anywhere from 8 to 12 per cent in various parts of the region, and therefore it can least afford at this time any additional costs on doing business.

It is not the first time that we rise in our places to try to come to grips with this problem. As the transport critic, on November 5, I raised this very issue when we were discussing the Port Wardens Act as it affects the ports of Montreal and Quebec City. We talked about the possibility that this is another way of trying to raise $25 million from the users, who traditionally have used the facilities provided by the federal Government of Canada.

We also raised on November 20, 1990, the possible ramifications of extended user fees to our various airline companies, particularly the smaller regional services in regions such as Atlantic Canada that will be hit the hardest. The scheme is not only unfair but it is unproportional, so that the smaller airlines based in Atlantic Canada, for instance, will in fact be paying greater amounts of cost recovery fees than the larger airline services in central Canada. As well, airports in northern Ontario will be paying more, proportionately speaking, than airports in Toronto, such as Pearson International, and other regional airports.

On November 2, I asked the very questions that we raise today, of the Minister of Transport, giving him and his administration yet another chance to try to come to grips with the problem.

Despite the many representations that have been made by colleagues on my side and by my colleagues in the New Democratic Party we have, as our first order of business, a piece of legislation that shows no sensitivity to the many representations made in this Chamber.

In addition, obviously the various interest groups have brought to bear their frustrations. Norman Hall, president of the Canadian Ship Owners' Association, in briefs and in submissions to the government, has made its position crystal clear on the ramifications that clause 6 would have on its industry. Mr. Peter Smith from the Chamber of the Maritime Commerce, in a lengthy and well outlined exposé of the shipping industry, has also come to the same conclusion. Yet, as I mentioned moments ago, we are still trying to make the government understand the ailments of the shipping industry as one industry that would be impacted by the larger amount of user fees.

When we talk about user fees, we are talking about the greater movement, once again, to privatize. When we look at the transportation network in this country we have the privatization of Air Canada, we have the gutting of VIA Rail, we have the whole movement of deregulation that was supposed to be a Messiah for the country and for the travelling public and it has been the exact opposite. We have the privatization of Terminal 3 where the builder did his job. The builder designed a class operation in Terminal 3, but the jury is still out on what kind of job the government did because it is clouded in secrecy. Canadians do not know what deal was struck between the developer and the government.

So you cannot look at C-91 in isolation. Put together with the other aspects that have been part of the government's agenda it demonstrates a greater move to privatize, a greater move to deregulate and a greater move for the federal government, through Transport Canada, to divest itself, in one way or another, from its responsibilities and the infrastructure that has been created for many a year.

Our party will not stand idly by and watch the disintegration and removal of the federal government from this national infrastructure. While the world is changing before us, while the federal government needs to be flexible considering the political situation with regard to the Constitution; we also have to keep in mind the importance that transportation plays not only in terms of jobs, economic wealth and spin-offs, but also in what it means to the continuation of this country. It is a large country. We know that when we travel from our ridings. Some of us know it better, certainly than members from Toronto, when we have to travel six and seven hours by plane. It is like going to Europe.

One of the forces, one of the networks, that has permitted this country to continue so successfully has been its transport infrastructure. I think, by the moves to VIA, by the moves to privatize Air Canada, by the moves to increase privatization, greater emphasis on user fees and greater pressure on the private firms which are having a tough time as it is, we are beginning to see the foundation begin to crumble.

I do not think we can see this bill in isolation because if we do we will—pardon the pun—miss the train, but it is in concert with the other moves of this government that we can see the big picture. The big picture is very troubling.

Therefore, I request our parliamentary secretary, who is the lead spokesperson for this bill on the government side, to rethink and to relook at clause 6. Our position would be to advocate a lifting of clause 6.

• (1720)

We had the minister, back in December, suggest to us that he was going to come back in February and give us his undertaking on what he is going to do with the whole question of user fees. We have yet to hear from the Minister of Transport. He has ushered no final position on the question of user fees. Therefore, let us not use the back door, as was mentioned already, to deal with an instance that should be dealt with clearly from a full, open perspective.

Therefore we are suggesting that this is an inappropriate way of dealing with a monumentally important issue.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, in addressing Bill C-91 and in particular the impact of clause 6 on our maritime industry and thus on our resource industries, I would just like to begin by saying that not only does this impose user fees on the transport marine industries, but it is also just another tax increase in addition to the 33 that have already been imposed by this government since its commencement.

One of the problems with the proposal before us is that it is open-ended. It is going to increase the costs of our maritime transport industry and thus our export cost for resources, just at a time when many of our exports are in serious trouble as a result of many other aspects of this government's economic policies.

We have high energy costs, the costs of the high Canadian dollar, the memorandum of understanding on softwood lumber, and the grave difficulties that many of our coal shipments are having in the province of British Columbia. This latest thrust by the government, which is open-ended, will place us in an increasingly uncompetitive position with regard to these major resource exports.

Kootenay West—Revelstoke is an interior riding, a long way from the maritime industries some would say, but one thing has an effect on another. Within both the West Kootenay and the East Kootenay many of our mineral exports—from Cominco, for instance, lead and zinc, the largest smelter operation of its kind in the world, which is already undergoing a great many serious difficulties with regard to the effectiveness of its modernization program in which this government is a shareholder—are experiencing difficulties caused by this government's and the previous Liberal government's policies.

When it comes to the problems that the coal industry in the East Kootenay is having and the major difficulties that our softwood lumber industry is having all over Canada, but particularly in British Columbia where it is such a major part of our entire economy, more and more of our shipments of both exports and imports of these resource commodities are now being shipped through U.S. rather than Canadian ports due to both government inaction and bad government action.

We are afraid that the current proposal before us within this bill, and particularly with regard to clause 6, is going to complicate matters further at the worst possible time for those industries, the workers within them and the communities that rely upon them.

It is little more than a back door attempt to accomplish what clause 4 of Bill C-75 failed to do in 1985. Clearly it gives the government the legal ability to impose user fees on the marine industry and on our resource industries. If this attempt by the government does not fail, it will be yet another nail in the coffin of Canada's maritime industry and one more cost burden that will accelerate both the scrapping of existing ships and the consolidation of shipping companies which in turn will have very deleterious effects. These actions in turn will result in major job losses, major tax losses and increased costs to both UIC and welfare as employees within these basic resource industries are impacted severely.

As our earlier speaker, the member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan, mentioned, I want to deal with the impact on certain specific commodity and industry groups. There is some ground for believing that the first-year target of $25 million envisaged by the government might well be conservative on the basis of the charges proposed. Information provided by shippers, port and industrial interests suggest that a limited number of companies and commodities, not more than about 20 in all, could pay upwards of $22 million to the cost recovery program.

More important than this total, however, are the potential sectorial shifts resulting from the additional transportation costs for market sensitive commodities in situations where the commodity, the carrier, or the port, is head to head with its competition. This is particularly true where the final delivered price is separated by a matter of cents from competitors who either do not pay the charge or enjoy a mileage advantage under the scheme.

While it is beyond our ability to analyse every movement, the Canadian Shipowners Association has identified certain commodities and situations which Transport Canada may have overlooked.

Marine traffic volumes of these selected commodities are, in the case of coal, some 30.8 million metric tons of exports to be effected and some 17.7 million metric tons of imports; in forest products, 18.6 million metric tons of exports and imports, simply .5 million metric tons.

In the sector of mining and metals, preliminary estimates suggest that as much as one-third of the total year one target of 25 million would be recovered as a result of movements of mineral and metal products. Shippers are particularly concerned about market share effects since transportation is a substantial component of the delivered cost of many raw materials. Thus, what may appear to be minor increases in the delivered costs of a number of commodities can cause sudden shifts in the delicate balance governing the ability to penetrate competitive hinterlands, resulting in lost sales and markets particularly to foreign competition free of this burden.

In the area of coal, most exports of coal are from west coast ports while imports and domestic movements are in the east. Imports include large quantities of U.S. coal used for electricity generation and steel production in southern and northern Ontario shipped from U.S. Lake Erie ports such as Toledo, Cleveland and Sandusky. Some western Canadian coal is shipped from Thunder Bay.

Very important from a cost sensitive point of view, however, is the movement of U.S. Appalachian coal currently moved from Cleveland by Canadian lakers for transhipment to very large bulk carriers at Sept Iles proceeding to offshore markets. This move is particularly sensitive to transportation costs, since it is in direct competition with the port of Norfolk, Virginia, and will be jeopardized by the double imposition of the user charges.

Western Canadian producers of export coal are also highly concerned with the CCG cost recovery charges which they believe they will have to absorb. The large majority of these coal exports are metallurgical coals, the demand for which is flat or declining. The world market is highly competitive, and coal prices have dropped significantly.

Export coal producers located in British Columbia lost over $4.4 million in 1990. Export producers believe that their competitive position is already penalized by high Canadian rail diesel fuel taxes, high interest rates and an over-valued Canadian dollar, and that the new marine user charges will further impair their financial viability. This stresses what I was saying before, that this kind of action, open-ended as it is, comes at the worst possible time for the Canadian resource industry, particularly in western Canada.

Finally, in the matter of forest products, 39.8 million tonnes of forest products were transported by the marine mode in 1988. It has been estimated by the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association that the proposed cost recovery policy will cost the forest products industry approximately $4 million in additional marine shipping costs. Export shipments will absorb the majority of these additional costs.

In conclusion, additional transportation costs and declining traffic volumes could further disrupt transportation patterns and tonnages by upsetting the delicate competitive balance of key Canadian export commodities in U.S. and offshore markets.

The concerns of all these various interests must be rigorously addressed before any further steps are taken to implement the user charge scheme as currently proposed. That is why we take this position. We ask the government to rethink what it is doing before it drives one more nail in the coffin of Canada's resource export industries.

• (1730)

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, this bill presently before the House should be called the collection agency's bill. The reason for that is because, of course, the clauses all complement one another—clauses 4, 5, 6, 7. What it does is bring a new element into fees and moneys owed to the federal government and that is the collection agency, those people who hound usually poor people for moneys owed to this or that person, this bank or this or that agency.

Under this legislation two entire sections deal with collection agencies. It even defines what a collection agency is, in case one cannot pay the fee imposed or one owes money to a federal government department. They define them as follows: a collection agency means a person other than an employee of a department—and department is defined in the Financial Administration Act as really being a department of the government—who (a) carries on the business of collecting debts for other persons and is registered or licensed as a member of the legal profession or as a collector of debts in the province in which the person carries on the business of collecting debts.

There are two things wrong with the legislation, and these are serious things. These are outrageous things to put in an act of Parliament. One is, of course, that you are going to charge all of these new fees and, second, you put into place a system of employing collection agencies to do all the collecting for you.

I suppose the signal to be taken from this is that the Government of Canada is saying the business to get into these days is the collection agency business. If you are not a receiver, then the collection agency business is the place to be according to this legislation.

There is something wrong with that. Suppose it is not your fault that you owe the money. Sometimes it is our fault that Canadians owe money; it is not their fault they owe money. This Parliament passed a law in 1988 called the advance child tax credit act or some sort of legislation. Right now in Canada there are debts owed to the Government of Canada by widows whose husbands perhaps died in November or December, or debts that are owed to the Government of Canada because of a fire that took place in December and burned down a home and the children had to be put into a foster home for the month of January.

We passed a law that said that advance child tax credit payments would be paid out to mothers in the month of November in the amount of $518, I think it is, initially, and if you have no child care expenses you get an additional $38 or something like that, but you do not qualify for it unless every single child claimed was in your care in the past January.

Now we have the situation across Canada of single parents and widows owing money to the Government of Canada under this legislation. This authorizes collection agencies to collect that money, so there is a danger that sometimes it is not your fault that you owe the money.

The second thing that is unfair about these fees is that where they are in place in the fishing and shipping industries, for example, the fees favour foreign nations. I will give you one example, because I have a total of only 10 minutes as I understand it.

I was looking at some figures on the weekend of the Japanese take for blue fin tuna and sharks in Canadian waters. They do not have a quota, but they actually took 170 tonnes of blue fin tuna and 53 tonnes of shark without a licence and without a quota.

The way it is done legally is this. Of course, they caught it as a by-catch, more than Newfoundlanders or Nova Scotians are allowed to catch. They caught it as a by-catch. It was perfectly legal. They only caught their by-catch, and then they got out. They did not catch the other species they were fishing for.

They do not pay a fee for their licences. No foreign nation in the world pays a fee for their licences when they go to pick them up in the office in St. John's, Newfoundland or Halifax, Nova Scotia. A Canadian cannot get a licence unless he pays a fee.

What happens to all these fees? Over the years, they send bills to these countries. We see examples today of France negotiating half the fee that it owes for fishing off the east coast of Canada.

It is not fair to have Canadians bearing the brunt of these new fees and a different system, a discriminatory system, against our Canadian fishermen in place that lets all those foreign nations off the hook for all those fees that are supposed to be paid. Because they are all foreign nations, it is really done through the Department of External Affairs and billed over a period of years.

Mr. Speaker, you might say with the Japanese fishing fleets that they are the sharks and we have become the bait in the fishing industry.

There are many other things wrong with the legislation. I do not have time to go into it. I wish I did because if I did perhaps government members would vote against this bill.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to participate in the debate this afternoon. The debate is rather interesting but somewhat old theme in this House since the arrival of the Conservative government in 1984.

What we are looking at today is yet another form of taxation on the people of Canada and the kinds of taxations that have occurred on the people of Canada. The public is absolutely outraged at this government. It is completely outraged.

It was expressed in an interesting way just early in the year when somebody pointed out that the present government is enjoying the confidence of about 12 per cent of Canadians. They suggested that to put that into perspective it was necessary to understand that 15 per cent still thought Elvis Presley was alive and that they had seen him in public more often than they had seen the Prime Minister.

Ultimately, the erosion of the confidence in this government is incredible. It is largely because of things like privatization, deregulation and cost recovery, the destruction of Canada's national infrastructure.

It is ironic that this government would have time after time taxed Canadians so heavily with not just income tax, but with charges such as these at every turnaround, driving up the cost of doing business in this country.

So often the cost of recovery comes out of the pockets least able to pay such as the goods and services tax, an enormously regressive tax. It is absolutely abhorrent to the vast majority of Canadians just as this proposal that affects the shipping industry will be today. The government forges ahead. The Prime Minister, at 12 per cent in the polls, facing enormous opposition from every citizen in this country from coast to coast, except that stalwart 12 per cent, said: "Never mind, I know what is best for Canadians and I am going to do it no matter what they think about it".

• (1740)

In reality what has happened is that the Prime Minister neither knows what is best for Canadians nor enjoys any of the confidence in this country.

One of the things that is so catastrophic for Canadians is that this Prime Minister, in whom Canadians have no confidence whatsoever, is the person who is going to restructure Canada, who proposes new constitutional forums that are going to, by the look of it, decentralize this country, devolve Canadian federal government powers to the provinces and essentially Balkanize this nation. You have to ask why. Why the cost recovery, why the privatization, why the deregulation, why the devolving of powers to all the provinces and removing the strength of the federal government, the integrity of this nation?

One school of thought says that the trade agreement was not in fact a trade agreement, it was a proposal for economic union with the United States. The way that you would bring about an economic union with the United States is to not only negotiate the fundamental agreement, but also destroy the national infrastructure that holds this country together on an east–west basis. You would destroy the rail system, VIA Rail. You would sell off the national energy corporation that gives Canada a national energy policy from one end of this country to the other. You would sell that off, turn it back to one of the seven sisters or the equivalent.

You would in the process put in an open skies policy in which you allow American carriers to run the route from Vancouver to Toronto, and run it at a lower rate than Air Canada and Canadian could do it. You could destroy the national air transportation structure, completely destroy it, turn it over to American carriers, U.S. Air or American Airlines. That would destroy the east–west structure. The removal of the railroads, VIA Rail, would destroy the east–west structure that holds this country together.

You would then get rid of the communications system. You would begin by loading into the legislation something that destroyed the CBC, the national communications system that holds us together on an east–west basis.

Gradually, one step at a time, from 1984 through 1985, through 1986, through 1987, you would begin to undo this country, the infrastructure that holds the east–west nature of this country together against that enormous pressure from the south.

You would also put in things like foreign investment. You would remove any controls over foreign investment so that American firms could come into Canada and literally buy up Canadian firms. The Americans would not only be working with a destroyed infrastructure in this country, a destroyed national infrastructure, but they would also be dealing with a country whose economy was largely owned and controlled by foreign owners from the United States.

I have the greatest fear that one day the Prime Minister, in the not too distant future, still at 12 per cent in the polls, still behind those that believe Elvis Presley is alive, would come up and say: "Well, it is time to leave. I have achieved everything I set out to do".

It is interesting that the chairman of the finance committee, in a candid statement one day, said: "You give us two terms in here and nobody will ever put it together again". What an ominous statement for Canadians.

It would be interesting to know that down the road when this Prime Minister is not able to garner any more than 12 per cent or 15 per cent in the polls and must leave, the Conservatives will put another leader in place. With the pig-headed determination to pursue such wrong-headed policies, policies that are completely opposed by Canadians, the only answer that he could give Canadians as he leaves office to be replaced by someone else that the Conservatives will use to try and get another victory would be that "I have achieved everything that I had set out to do". This is the systematic destruction of Canada: privatization, deregulation, cost recovery. Just a couple of quick, beautiful examples. Deregulation is an opportunity to let as many carriers get into an area and service an area as they possibly can and do it as cheaply as they possibly can. The Nanaimo–Vancouver run for aircraft is a beautiful example. They moved from two to five carriers. Had the carriers pooled their money, built a bridge and put a toll on it, they would have made more money. It would have been cheaper for them in the long run.

When the five of them were involved the fare from Vancouver to Nanaimo was $17. The lowest fare that you could travel that distance was $17. Of course they went broke. Of course they had serious accidents, fatal accidents. Finally the two main carriers took over and now it is $96.50 to travel from Vancouver to Nanaimo, a completely outrageous monopolistic price.

I notice my time is running short. Let me give an example of cost recovery. The northern end of Vancouver Island, an area with a precarious economy, is working hard to build that economy and give a decent living to its inhabitants. National Revenue decided it was going to remove the customs office. What happens now is that in order to clear customs, to move in and out of that economy in the northern end of Vancouver Island, you must go somewhere else. If you go somewhere else and it is more expensive because of what the government has done in cost recovery, you might as well stay somewhere else. Gradually the economy on northern Vancouver Island begins to implode, to shrink and the homes and lives of people there are negatively affected.

They blame directly this government's wrong-headed cost recovery procedures, the same wrong-headed procedures that are in this bill before us today.

Hopefully it will withdraw the open skies policy. Hopefully it will withdraw this provision of the bill and begin to take some responsibility to provide a national infrastructure as a national responsibility so that local and regional economies can grow with that kind of sheltering and assistance.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I want to draw to the attention of the House the effect of this legislation on communities in northern Canada, such as my own in Labrador. I am wondering if the House and the government have an appreciation of exactly what this will mean for northern communities. I am talking about resource based communities where there are no alternatives to the extraction of iron ore or to the catching of fish. I am talking about single industry towns which have no alternative in terms of job creation for those people who live and who have lived there for 20 or 30 years.

When I talk about my own riding I could just as easily be talking about communities in northern Quebec, northern Ontario, northern British Columbia, the Yukon or the Northwest Territories. Those small isolated northern communities are resource based, have no alternatives and depend wholly and solely on those resource industries. They are also isolated for a great part of the year and depend on either sea transportation in the summertime to get goods in and to move goods out or depend on air transportation in the wintertime to do the same things for passengers and freight and commodities. Those are the communities that are going to be negatively affected by this legislation.

It is worth while noting that those communities, isolated, vulnerable, resource based with no alternatives already have imposed upon them airport user fees, whereby people travelling by air—there are no roads and there are no ships in the wintertime—must travel by aircraft, already have to pay on top of their high cost of transportation an airport fee. They will now have to pay GST on the cost of goods and services moved into those communities.

These communities already have the highest cost in Canada in terms of fuel. A litre of gasoline in my riding, for example, at this moment is close to $1. Does anybody else in Canada pay $1 a litre for gasoline? That is the kind of costs I am talking about. That is the kind of costs that companies and individuals have to pay that live in the north. Yet this government is now thinking about imposing a further cost.

We are not talking about handouts here. What we are talking about is the imposition of a further obstacle to survival on companies and individuals who live in northern Canada.

• (1750)

I am talking about the imposition of additional user fees on small airlines, for example. I am talking about the imposition of possible user fees on ice-breakers, where a long liner is caught in the ice in the springtime and an ice-breaker has to be sent in to set that boat free. That fisherman in that boat, who is already suffering from a decline in the fish stocks off the Atlantic coast, could now be charged an additional user fee for freeing his boat from the ice.

What about search and rescue? Are we going to be charged now for search and rescue? If your life is on the line, if you are lost in a storm at sea, or if you are caught in the ice in the spring, would you have to pay a user fee now so that your life can be saved and your boat preserved?

This is the kind of cost that is going to drive companies and individuals in the north out of existence altogether.

I want to talk in particular about the iron ore industry. When I talk about the Iron Ore Company of Canada and Wabush Mines, I could just as easily be talking about mining companies in northern Quebec, northern Ontario, the Yukon, or the Northwest Territories, because all of those are going to have to depend on transportation to ship their product to market.

The Prime Minister will understand that because at one time he was president of the Iron Ore Company of Canada, president at a time when it was going through a great deal of difficulty. That company has gone through that troubled time. It has cut its costs, it has had some lay-offs, and it is now competitive in the marketplace. But it is not making a great deal of money; it is barely surviving.

If there is going to be an added imposition, an added financial burden on that company, it is going to drive that company that the Prime Minister formerly headed completely out of existence, as it will with other mining companies.

I want to read into the record what Mr. Muloin, the general manager of Wabush Mines, has to say about the legislation in question. This could very easily be any other mining community in the north. He says:

> As you are aware, Transport Canada has resurrected the concept of user fees for the Marine Industry. This proposal will have a serious impact on the members of your riding.
> Under the proposed legislation, international (including USA) customers will be charged $0.12 per ton for the iron ore shipped from the Canadian iron ore mines while Canadian customers will be charged $0.06 per ton.
> This fee, if adopted, will increase the cost of Canadian iron ore products from the Quebec/Labrador area by over $4 million per year.
>
> Iron ore is an internationally traded commodity that is currently in oversupply. It is therefore critical for producers such as Wabush Mines to remain cost competitive if we are to continue to sell our product and to remain in business.
> This initiative by Transport Canada poses a serious threat to our ability to remain competitive and, as such, threatens the employment and living standards of the families that work in the Quebec/Labrador iron ore industry.
> I urge you to convey our objections to this proposal to your colleague, the Honourable Doug Lewis, the Minister of Transport.

I have done that today, Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Transport and to the Government of Canada.

I want to read into the record as well a letter from Mr. Bill Kelly, who is the Mayor of Wabush. And I am sure he is supported by the Mayor of Labrador City, and I suspect that he is supported by the Mayor of Fairmont and those communities over the Quebec border that also have iron ore mines as well.

Here is what he says:

> We have been informed that Transport Canada is in the process of restructuring the concept of user fees for the Marine Industry.—
> Wabush Mines has been able to survive and remain competitive in the iron ore business because they are very cost conscious and efficient. The slightest increase in cost per ton could mean the difference between a successful operation and one which is closed.
> Wabush is a single industry town. Our existence depends on Wabush Mines being able to sell its product at competitive prices. To remain competitive and to reduce costs, Wabush Mines has reduced its workforce— We are very concerned that substantial increase in the cost per ton will result in more lay-offs or even a shutdown.
> The Quebec/Labrador area produces 90 percent of the iron ore in Canada. This fee, if adopted, will increase the cost of iron ore produced in our area by over $4,000,000.00.

We are not talking about hand-outs here. What the government is doing is imposing a financial burden on those companies which will make it impossible for them to survive, to make sure that they do not maintain or create jobs, but in fact lay off people and close those industries in northern Canada.

We are not talking about financial support or hand-outs. We are talking about a fair chance to survive. This government, which supports the private sector and says quite rightly that the private sector is the only way to create long-term jobs, has to get its house and head in order, and stop imposing fees on isolated, vulnerable, northern communities that are going to be driven out of existence if this government has its way.

That is why clause 6 of this legislation must be defeated.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to stand today and say a few brief words about the bill that is before us, Bill C-91.

I would like to preface my remarks by saying that in British Columbia where I come from, particularly the riding of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, the economy is based on agriculture as well as on forestry and to some extent on mining.

All of these things depend on the ability of the producers of these commodities to be able to ship their goods to the markets. Of course, being from British Columbia, the markets that we are looking at aside from the United States are the Pacific Rim markets.

Over the last number of years, we have seen major problems in the forest industry in particular, not only in British Columbia but throughout Canada.

In British Columbia of course, we have the free trade agreement, the Memorandum of Understanding between Canada and the United States that levied 15 per cent tariff on top of the price of the wood products that were being shipped into United States.

We have the artificially high Canadian dollar and artificially high interest rates. When the free trade debate was raging in 1987 and in 1988, the forest industry thought that perhaps as a result of this particular agreement they could have some benefit. It was contingent upon the dollar remaining low and interest rates remaining reasonable.

As history has shown us over the last couple of years, that has not happened. Interest rates have skyrocketed. The MOU came in. The forest industry has run into major problems, and this particular bill with the user pay feature in it for forest products is one more nail in the coffin.

In my province, this industry right now is in the throes of the recession and is having a hard time. As the recession goes world-wide, so goes the forest industry. If they cannot sell their products to the housing industry, then they have a lot of problems.

More and more the problem we are seeing is government hitting this particular industry while it is down. The forest industry is more than a housing industry. It includes, of course, the major part of pulp and paper. The policies of this government have not helped in that particular instance. In fact, it has hurt one of our major producers in the province of British Columbia. By introducing cost recovery, we find more and more that this is what is happening to our industry and part of the reason why we are seeing major lay-offs in the province of British Columbia.

These lay-offs are having a major effect on access to unemployment insurance. Instead of taking two to three weeks to get their unemployment insurance benefits now these people are looking at six, eight, and sometimes 12 weeks in order to get those benefits. That, I believe, is a direct consequence of what this government's policies are, one more thing that is stuck in the way of increasing the ability of the forest industry as well as mining, whether it be in metallurgical mining, coal mining, or whatever, it is an extra cost that is being added. It is hitting regionally at areas like British Columbia, northern Ontario, and the maritimes.

These industries have to be assisted with those shipping costs to ensure that they are able to continue to produce and ship to export markets, to markets overseas, to ensure that we have increased industry, employment within our areas and the ability to add to the marketplace.

What I see in this also is some of the tendency of this government toward a major privatization. The user-fee aspect in itself perhaps is not that bad. But when you take it and add it to all of the other things of privatization, whether it be privatization of Petro-Canada, Air Canada, or whether the thrust will be toward the privatization of our rural post offices and the post office sector as a whole, it is a whole malaise that is going across the country through the actions of this government. This is simply one other plank, if you will, in the deck of privatization; it is privatization simply for the sake of privatization itself instead of a move toward something that will assist or help the people of Canada and the people of my riding.

One of the former speakers in this debate talked about the difficulty and the overflow in this area upon the air industry. I am sure that you know, the problems that the transportation industry has, especially with the addition of the goods and services tax, the actual triple taxation that the transport area is running into. They pay their taxation either at airports or at the marine facilities. They pay their taxation on their fuels. Now with the user fee they will be paying a fourth tax, aside from the goods and service tax added to the problem that they have got.

It seems that we are more and more getting to the area where we are pushing down those that in fact need some assistance. In Canada, with the long distances and transportation costs many of our industries need that assistance. Throughout the history of Canada we have always ensured that assistance was taken into consideration for the the development of mining coal, forestry, or whatever in a particular region.

We are seeing the abandonment of that principle in Canada. We are seeing the abandonment of the idea of Canada as a single united entity.

All of these things pick away at that particular part of the Canadian unity. When this government starts to realize and recognize the importance of all of this to the whole network, instead of compartmentalizing and beating down all of these individual sections, it may then have an idea of what we can do to unite this country.

BRETTON WOODS AND RELATED AGREEMENTS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-93, an act to amend the Bretton Woods and Related Agreements Act, as reported (without amendment) from a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is one report stage motion set down on the Notice Paper, an amendment to Bill C-93, an act to amend the Bretton Woods and Related Agreements Act in the name of the hon. member for Essex—Windsor.

[Translation]

The motion is admissible. The debate is now on motion No. 1.

[English]

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C-93 be amended by adding immediately after line 16 at page 5 the following clause:

"6. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto the following section:

(14) The Minister of Finance shall cause to be laid before Parliament the communiques issued by the Interim Committee of the International Monetary Fund and the Development Committee of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the International Monetary Fund."

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, there has been some confusion with respect to precisely what could be tabled before the House and precisely when it could be tabled before the House. I wonder, therefore, if I could have unanimous consent to change a brief section of this amendment which says at the moment:

The Minister of Finance shall cause to be laid before Parliament every six months reports of the meetings of the Interim Committee—

If we could replace that with:

The Minister of Finance shall cause to be laid before Parliament the communiques issued by—

That to replace the every six months reports of the meetings held.

I wonder if I could have unanimous consent to that small change.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order.

Mr. Manley: I do not have any great problem with the substance of what is being proposed by way of amendment.

I would like to know from the Chair whether the intention is to accept this as a precedent that a bill may be amended to amend a section of the act that is not being amended in the bill which is what is being accomplished with this amendment.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, my friend makes a valuable point and I think it is important that we understand that from time to time the House does do a variety of things by consent and that is not in any way to establish a precedent. I appreciate the point he has made is a valid one and we would certainly support his concerns, but in this this particular case we are moving by consent and, therefore, do not expect it to be in any way a precedent.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair takes under advisement the comments from the hon. members. The motion has already been deemed admissible, but it is not inappropriate to take another look at it. Meanwhile, the debate may resume.

[English]

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, what we have been concerned about with respect to this bill is that the bill itself is an effort to increase the capacity of the International Monetary Fund to apply sanctions against less developed countries that run into problems with the IMF.

It is an interesting point which we can take up in the third reading debate whether it makes sense to move in this direction or not. But if we are to move in this direction of increased sanctions which the IMF is able to make use of vis-à-vis less developed countries, it seems to us in this party very important that there should be regular reports to the House of Commons from the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. This would make it possible for the House to be aware of how these powers, in which we would acquiesce through this bill, are being used.

This amendment would include, within the proposed legislation itself, a commitment that whenever there was a meeting of the Interim Committee of the International Monetary Fund or the Development Committee of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, the communiqués emerging from those particular meetings would be laid before Parliament. That would make it possible for members of Parliament to be fully apprised of the way in which these new powers, which we are granting to the IMF, are being used.

I would just like to briefly explain the changes, for which I have asked for unanimous consent, which I have been given, from the House to put forward. It is not clear that within the usual scheduling of the IMF and the World Bank every six months is a figure which will be operative, that it may be five months on one occasion or seven months on another occasion until a meeting takes place of the Interim Committee and the Development Committee. That is the reason for taking out the every six months. The replacement of reports by communiqués is simply to make it clearer that the documents which should be laid before the Parliament of Canada are the documents which emerge from the Interim Committee and from the Development Committee of the World Bank and the IMF.

As I say, I think it is important to establish the principle that these regular reporting procedures be established clearly in legislation. It then becomes the responsibility of the government to see to it that those reporting responsibilities are in fact met, and it becomes possible for members of Parliament to respond to those communiqués when they reach the House of Commons.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, although I remain confused about whether we are establishing a precedent here or whether it is still under reserve, I did have a couple of comments to make on the substance of the amendment itself. These relate in part to the—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): One moment, please.

[Translation]

Before you speak to the merits of the motion, I would just like, considering your earlier comments, to make it very clear that the amendment moved by the member for Essex—Windsor relates to the amendments brought by Bill C-93 and that it is admissible. Therefore, it is not a new element in the sense that you mentioned earlier.

Consequently, the House is justified to consider the proposed motion moved by the member for Essex—Windsor.

[English]

The hon. member for Ottawa South has the floor.

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the clarification because the citations in Beauchesne seem to imply that it would not be in order, so I presume we have established a precedent in this case.

I would first of all like to express minor concerns about the references in the amendment. When you review the Bretton Woods and Related Agreements Act and when you review the schedules to that act, the Bretton Woods agreements, it is difficult to understand in the context of the legislation itself what is the interim committee.

The interim committee exists and we are all aware of it, but as a legal or statutory entity I do not believe that it exists in Canadian law, either in the act or in the schedule. So I am concerned about the clarity of the drafting.

Furthermore, the reference to meetings of the interim committee, of the IMF and of the World Bank leave open some question as to what meetings in particular are being referred to.

Those being my concerns about the drafting of this provision, I would like to say that the substance of it, its intent to make the participation of the Government of Canada in activities of the International Monetary Fund in particular more accountable to the Parliament of Canada, is a very desirable objective. We have found over the years that in many ways the objectives, particularly of Third World development, of realignment of Third World debt, have been frustrated by policies pursued by the IMF. Many times these policies are carried out without the direct knowledge of the Parliament of Canada.

To the extent that the amendment of the member for Essex—Windsor intends to present before the Parliament of Canada the substance of what is being discussed and debated and decided in meetings of the IMF and the World Bank, then I am fully in support of that.

I think that our party would like to see an increase in the accountability and the reports delivered by the minister so that we can be fully informed, so that the Canadian public and those in the media who report on matters of Third World development can be fully informed as to the status of our government's participation and of the decisions that are being made which in many ways are so important.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 1 (Mr. Langdon) agreed to.

Hon. Tom Hockin (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Worthy: Mr. Speaker, I believe you will find that there is a feeling in the House that we should deal with the bill right now.

Mr. Hockin (for Mr. Wilson, Etobicoke Centre) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make just a few comments on third reading of this piece of legislation.

I think it is very important that we recognize that this is a bill which does two things. It is a bill which effectively increases the amount of—

Mr. Dingwall: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am sure there would be a disposition within the House, in view of the courtesies which have been extended to the hon. member, particularly by this side and by individuals opposite, that he would give the floor to my colleague from Ottawa South who is the official spokesperson for the opposition on this particular matter. I am sure the hon. member would want to concur with that.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the member for Essex—Windsor agree to yield to the member for Ottawa—South?

[English]

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, in the interest of peace, harmony, and good feeling, if not to reflect my view of a certain party, I shall be very pleased to allow my esteemed colleague from Ottawa South to speak.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Speaker welcomes the collaboration.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): I must say, Mr. Speaker, that after two years I still continue to be mystified by procedure here. I am very grateful to the member for Essex—Windsor for granting me the floor. Perhaps the mystery will resolve itself one day if I stay here long enough.

An hon. member: There is little chance of that.

• (1830)

Mr. Manley: Somebody says there is little chance of that.

What I would like to say concerning Bill C-93 is that this bill provides us with an excellent opportunity to review some of the concerns that many of us have had about the International Monetary Fund and how it has impacted upon Third World development and problems.

That being said, it should be remembered that the issues raised by this piece of legislation reflect only two fairly minor amendments to the method by which the IMF functions. First of all, it increases the quotas which countries are obliged to hold on deposit with the IMF. Second, it introduces a new mechanism of discipline for those countries that are in default with the IMF, namely the suspension of voting privileges.

With respect to the first of these proposals, I think we find that there is general and perhaps entire support, with the possible exception of the United States, for increasing the quotas contributed to the International Monetary Fund.

These quotas which will not take effect unless they have been approved by an 85 per cent voting majority of member countries require that member nations increase their contribution to the fund.

In hearing this, I think all Canadians become a little concerned that this is yet another expenditure of government assets that is ultimately going to cost us all as taxpayers.

In supporting this bill, it is on the assurance by the government and by government officials that the method by which these quotas are achieved is the placing on deposit of assets with the IMF that then reflect the fact that these are assets of the Government of Canada.

In other words, we are assured that these increased quotas are not an expenditure item for the Government of Canada. They do not cost the taxpayer anything is what we are told.

Accepting that, I would note the concern that we have about the suspension of voting privileges for defaulting nations. It is true, as we said in the earlier debate on this—and I had the occasion to debate at that time this issue—that the IMF occasionally needs a workable method of seeking to enforce payment of obligations to it.

Until now that method has been the right to suspend member countries from participation in the fund, a somewhat draconian measure, one which has never been taken.

The suspension of voting privileges is much more usable as a disciplinary measure because the consequences are somewhat less grave. To do so, however, essentially silences the voices of the countries that are weakest and that are most in need of the financial assistance provided by the fund.

To move in this way raises for many of us—I know for the member for Essex—Windsor as well—the concern that in using its impressive powers as a funder of international business transactions the IMF will further fail to hear in many cases the voices of those countries that are most in need of assistance.

We support this bill. I think the way to explain why, however, is best expressed in the words that were presented to us by Roy Culpeper of the North–South Institute when he appeared before the legislative committee on Bill C–93.

He referred to the concerns of many MPs about the response of the government to the report of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade which was tabled somewhat earlier.

Although these concerns are there and although other organizations, including the North–South Institute, raised many concerns in appearing before the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade as it completed its study, Mr. Culpeper advised us to go ahead with the bill. He stated:

> I do not believe that Bill C–93 provides the best vehicle to carry forward this debate. In my view, Bill C–93 should be enacted so that Canada can give its support to help make the quota increase effective as early as possible. The IMF is not, to be sure, without its faults or without need of improvement. But this legislation does not provide adequate opportunity for a thorough and much–needed review of the IMF and for political input from our legislators and the public. The point I want to make is that Canada, probably along with most other member countries, lacks an adequate review process to ensure the accountability of this supremely important international institution to the public at large.

The point is that we have a bill which achieves certain objectives that the North–South Institute has endorsed but which fails to raise, in essence, the important issues of ongoing accountability of the IMF and concern for what is happening with respect to Third World development.

What we find is that many of the policies pursued by the IMF, well intentioned, structural adjustment policies, have not been terribly successful in improving the state of Third World countries. The result of IMF interference in the performance of some Third World countries, together with the increasing debt crisis in the Third World, is that IMF policies have in some cases actually hurt the countries they were intended to help.

We typically had in the IMF medicine prescribed for ailing countries prescriptions for cuts in subsidies to the poor, devaluations, deregulation, and the intention of trying to create trade surpluses which had the effect of eliminating agricultural production that sustained the population and provided adequate food for them.

After nearly a decade of IMF adjustment, GNP per capita in the Third World, I am told, is 6 per cent lower than it was 10 years ago. Even on strict economic grounds IMF policies have often seemed to be unsuccessful.

We have these concerns. We have them in Canada and in other countries that have participated in support of the IMF. They are concerns that need to be brought forward, both in Canada and elsewhere, in debate as we approach, we hope, the imminent end of a war in the Persian Gulf. We concern ourselves with the frequent interpretation in Third World countries that this in fact is a war of the rich nations against the poor, that it is a war between the north and the south, interpretations that I do not agree with but which are there in these emerging countries. We have to face in that context what our population perceives as generous aid to Third World countries, with the realization that the flow of wealth continues to be not from north to south but the net transfer of wealth in the world today is from south to north.

While many of us, Canada and other countries, maintain a pretext of helping the developing countries of the Third World, the reality is that through our policies, through our debt structure, we continue to draw wealth away from Third World countries. We continue in many cases to draw their people away. We draw their best and their brightest through immigration policies that award points for skills and education. We find places in Canada for the very best of the Third World, but not for the very poorest or the very weakest.

In this context, I think all of us as Canadians have to realize that there surely will come a day of reckoning when the poverty, the hunger, the deprivation, the famine, the problems which exist that seem insurmountable in the southern hemisphere will come back to us for solution. If we do not begin to work on the basis of solutions today, the problems will be even more insurmountable tomorrow.

Therefore, as I said earlier, I support the amendment of the hon. member for Essex—Windsor that has been accepted in terms of its content. I hope that we will see increasingly the attention of parliamentarians in Canada and in other developed countries to the issues related to how we solve on a long-term basis the problems of the developing world. They are problems which we must recognize that we share as Canadians, and I suspect that members of the governing party are less likely to share this than some of us. But I think Canadians by and large do recognize that within Canada we must seek to find ways to ensure that all parts of the country share in some measure in the prosperity of our land.

It was one of the basic principles upon which Canada has expanded its Confederation over the years, one that we need to be talking more about today. Surely the same principle needs to apply on a global basis. Surely we need to begin to recognize that we cannot forever deny citizens of other countries a share in the wealth that we enjoy. It is not ours by right of any goodness that is inherent to ourselves. The responsibility lies on us as trustees of enormous wealth to ensure that poverty, disease and deprivation does not destroy the hope and the goodwill of people in whatever nation they happen to have been born.

Therefore, we are looking at a technical bill in some ways, but a bill which has underlying it matters of great importance. It is important now that parliamentarians renew their efforts to address some of these issues.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, as I was just starting to say before we decided to change course a little bit, this is a bill I would like to say just a very few things about.

First, this bill does accomplish an important purpose. It is one step in the agreement of the number of countries that will be necessary to increase the total financial resources of the International Monetary Fund to make it possible for that fund to lend more money to developing countries that are facing serious debt crises. We in this party support that goal very much.

Unfortunately, the bill also has within it, apparently under the influence especially of American representatives to the IMF, a number of increased sanctions which can be applied against developing countries if they find themselves in arrears to the IMF.

This becomes possible if this bill is accepted by this Parliament and, in turn, by a number of other Parliaments throughout the world. If that happens, it will be possible for the first time for the International Monetary Fund to actually suspend voting rights for member countries of the IMF.

Prior to this, it has been possible if the IMF becomes so concerned about a country which is in arrears to expel that country from the IMF, a solution which is so Draconian that it has generally not been adopted by the IMF.

This particular piece of legislation, in concert with a number of other countries, will make it possible to have the way of getting at Third World countries that are in arrears to the IMF without having to kick them out of the organization entirely.

To suspend the voting rights of a member within the IMF is a penalty which I certainly hope will not be applied except in the most serious and in the most irresponsible of cases in which a country blatantly refuses to make any efforts whatsoever to put itself into a position of starting to deal with some of its IMF arrears. This bill does make it possible to take such action regardless of what the circumstances are of the arrears which exist.

This is, as the previous speaker noted, a technical bill. I want to just bring it down to earth, if I can, for members of the House and to tell them a little bit about one of the countries that I worked quite closely with in Africa when I worked for the International Development Research Centre before becoming a member of Parliament.

That country is Zambia. It is a country which got itself into serious debt problems not because of anything it did itself, but because of a catastrophic drop in the price of copper. Zambia, in fact, had been a country which had developed fairly sophisticated methods of planning for the future, five-year plans which were aimed to program out quite carefully the new development projects which the country wanted to carry forward.

It was also a country which had recognized that to carry this kind of development forward, it had to put into effect a very strong support policy for individualized agriculture in the country. In fact, one of the things which the IDRC worked on was support for some of these projects with peasant agriculture in Zambia.

I could go on in more detail about Zambia, but I will spare the House that. This is a country which has done a great deal to try to deal with its economic problems. Despite that, because of the tremendous decrease in the price of copper, it found that loans it had taken out for development projects, which looked perfectly viable at the time it took out those loans, suddenly became next to impossible to pay back because there were no longer the export revenues from copper which had seemed to be there in the past.

The consequence for the people of Zambia was that in order to try to pay off some of these loans, it became necessary for the Government of Zambia to massively reduce social programs, to cut back on educational expenditures, on health care, and to significantly reduce the wages of copper workers, for instance, producing the exports of the country.

In short, life for the average person in Zambia became very much harder as a consequence of having to pay back these loans which had been incurred in the past.

We recognize that in the case of many of our aid loans to developing countries, when circumstances like that come up, it makes sense to forgive those loans, to let the country move ahead and therefore to be able to purchase goods from us and purchase goods from other countries in the world.

In the case of commercial loans, however, that is not possible. In the case of bank loans it is not possible. In the case of IMF loans it is generally not something which the IMF permits. Unfortunately, that results in considerable pain and suffering for the people in the country involved.

Some of these countries affected probably have been guilty of irresponsible policies which are very difficult to justify. Panama, for instance, is a country which was not careful in the kinds of development projects it put into effect.

One might make the same case for Cambodia and Peru and, perhaps, for a number of other countries such as Zambia, Sudan, Sierra Leone and Costa Rica. These are countries which have generally tried to follow sensible development patterns and yet have found themselves, because of changes in commodity prices—coffee in the case of Costa Rica—unable to pay their debt. I have mentioned copper in the case of Zambia; cocoa in the case of Sierra Leone. These countries faced problems, not because of anything they had or had not done, but because of changes in the world economy.

Mr. Speaker, our hope would be that the IMF will approach such countries with a sense of understanding and a sense of care for the human costs which a tough application of the kinds of policies that lie behind the increased sanctions in this act represent.

I would hope that such a sensitive approach will be taken by the IMF. It is on that basis that we are prepared to see this legislation go forward.

We are not, however, prepared to support this legislation. Despite the useful steps in increasing the amount of money which will be available for Third World countries, the establishment of these new sanctions against such Third World countries represents a negative step which we feel is something the IMF should not be taking and which we are not prepared to support as a party.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs) and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, this bill has been in front of the House since prior to Christmas. It has received good debate. It has been an example of legislation where there has been a lot of co-operation between the various parties in committee and in the House, and for that I would like to thank the members opposite for their assistance in passing this legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, it would appear that we have made some decent progress today, with one government motion passed, one bill through report stage and a second bill through report stage and third reading. I wonder if the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader could indicate what is on the agenda for tomorrow.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my hon. friend for his point of order.

We have indeed had a good day today, and it establishes a wonderful precedent. Therefore, tomorrow, we expect that we will complete third reading of Bill C-91. We want to complete the debate on Bill C-26 and, after we have done that, at 4.30 we should be able to complete the debate on the budget.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

FISHERIES

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise this evening to expand further on the question I asked the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans on December 17, 1990 regarding the individual transferable quota system his department planned to implement for Scotia-Fundy. I say "planned" because today it is being implemented for the Scotia-Fundy inshore fishery.

In answer to my question, the minister said on that day that the draggermen of that area have been asking for it, have been asking for individual transferable quotas.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know of any dragger fishermen in the area, small or large dragger fishermen, C-1s or C-2s, who have actually asked for an individual transferable quota. And I will speak more on that. They may have asked for a viable quota, at least a quota that would give them their livelihood.

Adjournment Debate

The minister, in my opinion, has not had the decency, the courage or the political will to meet with the fishermen in Nova Scotia, particularly the inshore fishermen, whether in Ottawa or in Nova Scotia. He will always meet with big company officials who come to Ottawa, and I do not want to question why he meets with the larger companies and not the many hundreds of people who are connected with the inshore fishery.

As well, I do not know what his officials have been telling him, but judging from my meetings and the mail, they certainly did not bother to consult with the inshore fishermen of Nova Scotia. The minister may have the Hâché task force that he can refer to, but Mr. Hâché and his officials did not do the two important things that the fishermen were looking for when they went around: one, evaluating the present stocks before going ahead with their idea of cutting back in the inshore without looking at the actual stock evaluation in those waters; and, two, providing a viable quota. I stress the word viable because this minister is not doing that.

At every meeting I attended and with every letter I received on the subject, it is clear to me that the Scotia-Fundy inshore wants no part of an individual transferable quota, nor any part of the current management plan. You just have to look at the court cases that have been attempted. The dockside grading that the minister wants to implement as it is being looked at in Newfoundland and will come into play after the unemployment scheme for training these people runs out in August, where the individual fishermen, if there are any left, will have to pay for a scheme, that this minister allows, where the fishermen has to report six hours before he can dock and he must report at least two out of the six before he can land, storm or no storm.

It is ridiculous. The minister has forgotten that the markets will not take a good quality fish, that they have individual quotas, that they can report what they have caught, but to continue this system of forcing fishermen and processors to abide by dockside grading and paying for it is ridiculous.

Because of this great management plan we now have National Sea and other large companies transferring their enterprise allocation to smaller boats—which are more efficient and who used to catch that fish because the offshore could never catch it in the Bay of Fundy and in other areas of the inshore fishery—and we have the large companies asking the under 65-foot dragger fishermen to now fish for them at a reduced price, half the price for the fish, and that fish is then transferred to the offshore companies' plants. That fish used to go into the inshore communities.

That alone should tell the minister that the inshore communities want to meet with him. I would like to have an opportunity to meet with him. In all the time I have been a member of Parliament, whether I was on the government side or the opposition side, I have at least been able or been given the respect in an answer to a letter or a request or whatever to meet with any minister in the House. I have at least been given that. I have waited almost two and half months for a reply to a letter seeking a meeting with the minister on friendly terms, just to talk about the disaster his policy is having. But no, you have to be a big company in order to rate this government or that minister's attention.

I want to tell you what the individual transfer quota will do. This is perhaps the last step in my mind of privatizing a once common resource. It used to be that if you put a quota on, they could go out and fish it. But the result of this transferability is going to be to squeeze out the small owner-operators. Some local industry representatives estimate that the individual transferable quota will result in the loss of one-half of the current employment when the fighting and transfers are finished. I venture to say that you will see with the transferability one to five companies controlling all the catch in the inshore fishery at the end of this management scheme unless this minister is stopped.

I want to say one last thing. It is about the appeal process to this management scheme.

The fishermen got a four-page letter last July 23 and they were given one month to appeal it. What did they have to do?

I think it is almost against human rights. "For a review of catch history, use package A attached." There was package B, too. I think it was 25 pages. "Complete the cover page and Table 1, Table 2, Table 3 for any year's landing you wish to contest, and sign the statement confirming data accuracy." The fishermen needed an accountant.

They needed all that in the middle of summer at the time when they were supposed to be fishing, when accountants are on vacation. But they had one month. Supporting documentation was required for the information contained in the tables. This is an affront to any Canadian.

For people who have been in the fishery for 10, 20 or 40 years, documentation must include the following: copies of the buyers' purchase slips, copies of fishing logs, a signed permission form for release of income tax documents to DFO, a signed permission form for release of UIC documents to DFO. This minister is a lawyer. He should realize that is an affront. Any cases of suspected fraud in a letter will be referred to the RCMP.

Now, you tell me that this government is playing fair with the livelihood of the inshore. I know the parliamentary secretary is going to say something on behalf of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans but I think she should tell the minister that if only he would come to meet the fishermen, he would know what is going on, rather than listening to one or two of his officials.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, there are difficult decisions faced in the 1991 Atlantic Groundfish Management Plan and these were made only after careful consideration of the advice and views provided by the organizations, by fishermen and industry members and provincial governments as well as by fishery scientists who gather and analyse the vital biological data on the various fish stocks, including those of Scotia–Fundy region.

A reasonable balance has been achieved between the conservation of the resource and stability for the participants in the industry and for the economy of the Atlantic region of Canada. The new multi–year approach to managing the groundfish fishery will allow for better planning of Atlantic Canada's groundfish industry and allow Canadian exporters and their customers to develop long–term planning as fish stocks are rebuilt.

The multi–year plan establishes three–year quotas for most groundfish stocks. These TACS will be reviewed by scientists on an ongoing basis and they will be revised should scientific evidence warrant this.

The 1991 plan particularly helps cod fishermen in South West Nova where the quota has been increased to 26,000 tonnes. Furthermore, both inshore draggers and fixed–gear fishermen within the Scotia–Fundy region are better off this year than last. Therefore, the plan will help maintain and provide for long–term stability.

As for the introduction of ITQs for various fisheries, this plan was announced months ago on May 7, 1990, as part of the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program. Where it is deemed feasible and after thorough consultation with affected fishermen, the individual transfer quota systems would be extended to more and more fishermen.

In 1989, over 40 per cent of landings on the Atlantic coast were from vessels operating under the ITQs. The stated plan is thus a reflection of a process which started in the early 1980s in the offshore groundfish fisheries.

Today, all offshore fisheries are under the same type of ITQ and a similar system has recently been extended to smaller vessels in the Gulf and Scotia–Fundy inshore groundfish fisheries. Discussions are ongoing with industry and provincial governments for the introduction of ITQs on the Gulf shrimp fleet.

It is important to notice that the ITQ systems do not entail the privatization of the fishery. Indeed, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans retains his authority to vary these quotas subject to conservation and socioeconomic needs. All transfers of quota between participants require authorization from DFO in the form of amendments to fishing licences.

The introduction of ITQs is a management approach in line with current realities.

• (1910)

Individual allocations allow fishermen to better plan their annual fishing operations and to operate more as business enterprises.

OKA

Mr. Raymond Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, this late show debate involves the question that occurred some time ago in the House on the matter at Oka and a request from our side of the House of the Minister of Justice to implement a public inquiry into the matter at Oka.

I would like to explain why it is absolutely critical that a public inquiry go ahead rather than the partisan, locked-horn relationship of the committee which I really do not think will elucidate the kinds of things Canadians have to know.

In the fall of 1989, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development said he had an agreement in principle with the Mohawks at Kanesatake over the land settlement issue which led to the Oka crisis. In fact, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development had no agreement. The minister submitted a document which he claimed was an agreement in principle, but the document was in fact only signed by three officials of the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs and no one else. It was not an agreement.

The minister claimed that the Mohawk leadership was unable to produce an agreement because it was so badly divided, but in fact the Mohawk leadership had absolutely and unanimously rejected this minister's proposal for an agreement. It is interesting. If the minister is telling the truth he should submit that document to the House of Commons forthwith.

The second matter was that in the spring of 1990, the minister said that he was willing to purchase the lands at Oka, the lands in dispute, and thereby resolve the matter at hand. The Mohawk leadership has a tape of a meeting with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development on June 21, 1990. On that tape the minister says that he cannot purchase the land because there is no money in the Treasury.

If the minister is telling the truth, he should forthwith lay all documents related to the purchase of those lands before the Oka crisis before the House of Commons.

Every opportunity to resolve this dispute was in the hands of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It involved lands that the municipality at Oka had paid less than $200,000 for. The stupid and incompetent bungling of this issue had to be resolved with 4,000 members of the Canadian Armed Forces faced off against the Mohawk Band at Kanesatake. The stupidity and incompetence of the handling of this issue resulted in a $200 million bill to the Canadian taxpayers and the Canadian taxpayers are still paying as this process evolves.

We should not be here demanding a public inquiry, which is the only way that we can get the truth from the government and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development by having a judge who can compel witnesses to attend and compel witnesses to testify and produce the documents involved.

These are things that neither this House nor the committee will ever see both because of the lack of power and the lack of determination of the government to bring this matter before the people. We need that public inquiry if Canadians are ever going to see a true version of what happened in the lead-up to the turning loose of 4,000 members of the Canadian Armed Forces and the spending of $200 million in taxpayers' money.

What should really happen is that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development should resign immediately because of the absolute lack of credibility in the contradictory statements put forward by the minister in this House. What the minister's statement contradicts is the truth.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has once again raised the question of a need to call a further inquiry into the stand-off at Oka. The Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs in fact has voted to conduct a comprehensive and independent inquiry into the events of the summer of 1990. The committee will be inviting members of the public who wish to comment on these events to contact it.

This will give those interested an opportunity to discuss fully their concerns and will assist in achieving a full review of the events at Oka and Kahnawake.

To date, there has been substantial review of the events at Oka including an inquiry by the province of Quebec under the National Defence Act and the conclusion by the Federal Court of Canada on two separate occasions that the actions of the forces did not result in any violations of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

I am confident that the report of the standing committee will support these earlier findings. However, I welcome the decision of the committee to conduct its inquiry, as I believe this forum will present Canadians with sufficient opportunity to air concerns and access the type of information they may be seeking.

It will also provide answers to questions which may be outstanding. I strongly believe, though, that while we can learn from the past we must look ahead and apply that knowledge to the future for the benefit of all Canadians.

This is the objective of the government's new agenda for aboriginal peoples outlined by the Prime Minister in his speech to this House on September 25, 1990. In that speech, the Prime Minister spoke of an agenda with four main pillars: land claims, economic and social conditions on reserves, the relationship between aboriginal peoples and governments, and concerns of Canada's aboriginal peoples in contemporary Canadian life.

The goal of the agenda is the creation of a new relationship between aboriginal and non-aboriginal Canadians. Defining and developing this relationship will take creativity and perseverance, the courage to see things as they are, the honesty to acknowledge them for what they have become, and the common resolve to correct current problems for the benefit of future generations.

The success of the agenda depends on the commitment and leadership of governments and aboriginal leaders. I am confident that by working together, while looking to the future and applying the lessons of the past, we can achieve the goals of the agenda.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to bring to the attention of the House the sad demise of Winnipeg's Core Area Initiative. This program was begun 10 years ago under the leadership of the member for Winnipeg South Centre who, in his capacity as a minister, brought together the three levels of government work concerned about the future of Winnipeg's inner city.

Up to that point, there had been a great deal of division among these three governments as to what to do with important issues such as the CP rail tracks.

Under the leadership of the Liberal government at that time, a $100 million program was put together which was then renewed and changed in 1985-86. This program is now being left to hang in the air and Winnipegers would very much like to know the intention of this government.

There are rumours that there will be a one-year extension with no funding. I would like to say to this House that is totally unacceptable to people in the inner city.

Since rumours began to circulate last year that the Core Area Initiative was not going to be renewed, several groups have been meeting in the inner city to discuss the implications of this issue.

The Urban Futures Group, under the leadership of an academic from the University of Winnipeg, presented to the federal and provincial governments several proposals to change the core initiative and to give some 90 groups from the inner city a chance to speak out.

I attended these meetings and I can assure the House that there is a wide range of opinion from both the social activists and the business community seeking to restore the Core Area Initiative to its proper role as a focus for public action in the inner city.

Subsequently, governments refused to meet with this group and its program has been put on the back-burner. Last week, Inner City Voice, a well-known local community newspaper in the inner city, put together another group to discuss these issues.

At that meeting which I attended, many people brought out issues such as housing, the poor condition of housing in the inner city of Winnipeg caused in large part by the refusal of CMHC under this government to fund properly co-op and low income housing. It has left one block after another looking devastated.

In addition, when people do want to renovate their homes, the moneys are no available because the Core Area Initiative has run out of funds.

Second, people talked about day care. We hear a lot from this government about jobs, jobs, jobs; get out, work and look after yourself. Mr. Speaker, you can imagine a situation in which most people who are single parents cannot find the support through day care in order to get into the work force. This government has turned its back.

There was a wonderful program, Parent-Child Centres, in the inner city. It was low cost. There was no bureaucracy attached to it. It involved a few parents getting together in a very simple storefront operation. This government through the Core Area Initiative, could not see its way to continue support. As a result, all these small infrastructures are being taken away. Another organization on Broadway Avenue in the inner city, the West Broadway Family Centre, had a parent respite centre where people could drop in and talk about their problems, talk about the difficulty of bringing up a family alone. That, too, has been taken away.

• (1920)

Everyone in Winnipeg agrees that perhaps North Main is one of the most devastated urban areas in this country. It reminds us in our worst dreams of what it must be like to live in the inner core of an American city.

The North Main Development Corporation, a group of business people, have bravely tried to put together an organization for the last five years in order to build up public support for new facilities, for new infrastructure, to change the impression that only derelict hotels and run down businesses are there, and to try to enhance the value of their properties.

One would think that such a conservative agenda would appeal to this government. That the very least they would do is say: "Yes, let us work on North Main". But, no, the only response is a deafening silence that will not help out North Main.

Or perhaps take a look at the CP station, which is one of the most historic sites in Winnipeg. Very responsible leaders in the aboriginal and business community have come forward with a very well thought out program to purchase that building. CP is interested in making a deal. They need one government to take the initiative, to step forward and say: "We will be first in". Then the others would follow.

The Core Area Initiative was designed to help such people get started. Without the core there is no one around to say: "We will give you that extra push to make sure your program takes place."

Again we find that the absence of an active federal government is having devastating results in the inner city.

Mr. Speaker, I could go on with several other examples of how, in the last ten years, the core has become an essential feature in Winnipeg despite some very subtle errors in judgment, such as the way it has become involved with the Forks, or the way it has become involved in the North Portage development site. But the essential idea is to have a concerted effort in the centre part of a city under tremendous economic stress and to put in a large chunk of money and to have something visible, something that would help out new Canadians, the unemployed, that will train aboriginal youth. A program like that is essential for the future of the city.

This government has ignored Winnipeg when month after month, we have needed government action, a symbol of reassurance that it in fact is committed. We need assurance that the federal government will not pull out of the core as it did out of federal–provincial relations or economic and regional development agreements, that it will not pull out like it did in major industrial projects, that in fact it understands Winnipeg.

We have asked and asked again in the House and there has been nothing but silence. So I ask this government one more time: will they not support the Core Area Initiative, sign a new agreement, show some life, show some support for the centre part of Winnipeg?

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, as the member for Winnipeg North Centre has noted, the Winnipeg core area initiative was created in 1981 under the umbrella of the Canada–Manitoba General Development Agreement in order to respond to what was then a decline in the inner city. This was having an impact on the whole province because the population of Winnipeg is 62.5 per cent of the province of Manitoba.

By 1986 after the expiration of the first five–year agreement considerable strides had been made in reversing that decline and the momentum at that particular time was deemed as just too recent and perhaps too fragile for a withdrawal of public support.

Therefore, as the hon. member has suggested a second agreement under this government was negotiated in 1986 and the five–year economic and general development program was put into place.

Core II, as the program was called, was designed to solidify the momentum and ensure that the trend toward renewed investor confidence was consolidated. That has happened. A brand new 33–storey Toronto–Dominion Centre on the corner of Portage and Main, for example, stands as a testimony to the idea that investor confidence has been renewed in the inner city.

All governments have an obligation to ensure that public funding is directed toward the highest priorities, that it responds to current situations and needs, and that it relates directly to mandates of certain areas of government.

Many of the needs of the inner city of Winnipeg, to which the member has referred, fall most appropriately within the mandate of the city and the province. Even so, Winnipeg itself is looking ahead and beyond the inner city. It has shown excellent initiative in establishing Winnipeg 2000 to provide a focal point for economic development for the entire city, economic development, Mr. Speaker, led by the private sector.

What has emerged from this is a renewed sense that the real long–term solution to inner city needs is to increase job opportunities through private sector investment in the city. So whether we achieve this by way of a new tripartite agreement or something different, remains to be negotiated.

However, I will say that Ottawa is not on the verge of abandoning either Winnipeg or Manitoba.

In the health care sector, as an example, some $200 million of investments will be made in Winnipeg and Manitoba and these will include the federal government's virology lab which will be located in the inner city and will have a significant impact on Winnipeg's economy. Canada is committed to co–operating in areas of federal mandate, whether that will involve formal agreements or simply co–ordination of program areas, it is a little too soon to say.

However, the objectives of Winnipeg 2000 which include the priority emphasis on urban natives as well as on general economic development throughout the city are very much the objectives of my government.

With the private sector, as well as with the municipal and provincial governments, we are moving together in advancing the diversification and industrial development of Winnipeg and of Manitoba as well as focusing the needs on people such as in the native community.

We believe that our directions are those which will have the greatest long–term impact for the community and for the 1990s.

It is with this in mind that the Hon. Jake Epp met with the provincial and municipal counterparts and will be meeting again to discuss an era of new intergovernmental and private sector co–operation for the 1990s.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted.

The House, therefore, stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 7.27 p.m.

POINT OF ORDER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I know I am rising slightly late. I should have risen under Statements by Ministers. I wonder if I can put a question to my hon. friend, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader, concerning the rather extraordinary events unfolding in the last number of hours in the Persian Gulf.

Does the member know whether the Minister of National Defence will be making a statement in the House any time during the day or indicating the government's view as to those recent developments in some other form?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I can advise my hon. friend that I am sorry I do not know if that is the government's intention. However, I can assure him that if such a situation arises I will inform him at that time.

CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE ACT AND SECURITY OFFENCES ACT

CONCURRENCE IN REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak to a motion which I placed on the Order Paper in September. The motion is that the report of the Special Committee on the Review of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service Act and the Security Offences Act presented to this House on Monday, September 24, 1990 be concurred in.

The effect of this motion is to ask the House to concur in the report called In Flux But Not in Crisis. I take this particular opportunity to bring this motion because yesterday—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The proper procedure is that the motion be read and I think I should proceed to do that. It is moved by Mr. Brewin:

> That the report of the Special Committee on the Review of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service Act and the Security Offences Act presented to this House on Monday, September 24, 1990, be concurred in.

• (1110)

Mr. Brewin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I apologize for having sought to pre-empt your role in reading the motion; it was inadvertent.

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. member may know, I expected him to perhaps be making some remarks in another direction with respect to this motion. That is why I allowed him to go on. I appreciate the courtesy of the hon. member.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak to the report itself and, if it is not bending the rules, to comment in passing on the response of the government to it.

The Canadian Security Intelligence Service Act was adopted in 1984 by the House of Commons. It essentially established a new regime for security intelligence in Canada. It provided that instead of the RCMP being responsible for security intelligence, a new agency, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, would be created.

The 1984 legislation contemplated that there would be a review by a committee of Parliament five years after the act had passed. That committee was established in the summer of 1989 and was chaired by the distinguished member for Lethbridge, if I have his constituency correct. That committee worked hard for a year to produce this report, which is called In Flux But Not in Crisis.

I want to say at the outset that the committee report was unanimous. All members of the committee—Conservatives, Liberals and New Democrat—approved the recommendations in this report. It was the product not just of a unanimous report but of very extensive work by the committee. We had an extremely good staff, the committee worked very well together, and I want to pay a special compliment to the chair of the committee, who worked hard to draw us together to try to reach some constructive recommendations.

As with any unanimous report, it represents to some extent a compromise of various points of view. But we were very proud of the work that we did and felt that, in making this report, we were making a constructive set of suggestions and recommendations that would be for the good of this country and the good of the governing of this country.

Security intelligence is a difficult area, because essentially what we say to the government in establishing a security intelligence service is that we give you, the government, special powers in the interests of preserving the security of this country. But we have also learned over the years that it is essential to place certain restraints, constraints and restrictions on the special powers given to the government, to ensure that the rights of our citizens are not violated by the government.

As we in the committee got into the report, we actually found that there were two concerns. The first concern was in the area of civil liberties. It was whether CSIS, in the course of its work, was interfering with the civil liberties of Canadians; and whether there were adequate checks and balances to ensure that on those occasions when citizens or residents of this country felt that their rights were being challenged and perhaps violated by CSIS, that there were sufficient remedies that would enable those actions to not only be reviewed and looked at but, where an error was found, to be corrected.

So, that was the first issue, civil liberties.

The second issue was whether CSIS and the government, in running this operation, was spending the public's money wisely.

By this current fiscal year, $190 million a year will be spent by CSIS. It has over 2,000 employees. What are those employees doing? What are they spending the money on? That leads to the question of why the secrecy, because we found the more we looked at it that the operation of CSIS was completely shrouded in secrecy and mystery.

Was the secrecy justified in the interests of protecting the country's security, was it covering up a government attack on the rights of citizens, or was it hiding a profligate waste of money on the part of this government agency? We found that CSIS was not going to tell us any of this. We found that the government was not going to give us any information on this. Now we find, when the government responds to the recommendation, that it has no intention of telling Parliament or the Canadian people what it is doing in Parliament's name and in the name of the Canadian people. We find that the government continues to hide behind the rubric of security and produces no justification for so doing.

Let me take a minute or two in summarizing some of the specific recommendations. The most important recommendation in my view is the recommendation that instead of a periodic review by Parliament there should be established a permanent subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General of the House responsible for security intelligence matters. The subcommittee would have a permanent security-cleared staff, have secure premises for its own work and would be able to receive information from the government in camera.

The subcommittee's role would be to focus on the question of estimates, is the government's and Parliament's and the people's money being spent wisely? It would also focus on broad policy issues related to the interests of civil liberties and security in the country and the balance thereof. This particular recommendation owes its genesis to the McDonald commission which preceded the establishment of CSIS but was one in which all members of the committee concurred, one which makes good sense, one which is important if public confidence in CSIS is to be developed and maintained.

We found that the problem with a five-year review was that it took us some time as members of Parliament who were first coming to these issues to get up to speed. We found it took some time for the security agencies to develop some confidence in the committee and for us to develop a level of expertise necessary to ask the right questions of the right people. It seems to us that the system has matured to the point where a parliamentary subcommittee is important.

At one level the existing Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General has the mandate from Parliament to review the work of CSIS and other security agencies, including that of the RCMP. But that committee has a mandate to cover a range of topics and it was our view that it was important that a group of parliamentarians, per force a small group of parliamentarians, develop the kind of expertise which we in the committee felt we had gained in the year's work on the committee. That recommendation has been trashed and rejected by the government. The wisdom of all members, not just NDP members, but all members of Parliament, has been rejected by the government and instead the government wants to go back to the five-year review.

Mr. Lee: Seven.

Mr. Brewin: Has it gone to seven? Seven-year review.

I have not even had a chance in the last 24 hours to read in detail all of the comments of the government. I read through it very quickly. I have some responsibilities now in another area.

A seven-year review.

• (1120)

One of the problems that the security people, the CSIS people, indicated to us was that there is sort of a lurching of response within the security intelligence community to the effect of imposing this special parliamentary review. There is no opportunity to get used to the fact of parliamentary review and, instead, what happens is they have to turn the House completely upside down trying to respond to the various questions and concerns that are exhibited by the committee.

When we went down to Washington and met with the CIA and other government people, we discovered that the senators and the congressional people in the States had found that they were able to develop over a period of time a level of confidence on both sides.

Let me say first, then, that I am extremely disappointed that the Solicitor General and the government have rejected this recommendation. I do not propose that it should be lost entirely, because in the final analysis it is within the jurisdiction of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General to make a decision as to how it is going to order its work. I would hope that all members of that committee will review this particular recommendation and see if they cannot bring themselves to accept the wisdom of this unanimous recommendation.

A second important recommendation was to broaden the review and oversight capacities to include other agencies than CSIS. What perhaps many members of the Canadian public and even members of Parliament may not appreciate is that the mandate of CSIS is confined to a particular area. The RCMP is also involved in security intelligence work; the Department of National Defence is involved in security work, and other departments have various agencies and various components of their work involved here.

Those agencies do not have the special power of CSIS, but it seemed to us to make sense that where there are concerns, including the secret spending of money for example, the communications security establishment's spending is not reviewed by Parliament. For practical purposes the RCMP's expenditures in this area are not reviewed by Parliament. DND's other expenditures are not reviewed by Parliament, and perhaps for good reason. It may well be that by revealing the details of those expenditures, exactly the wrong people get the information.

Again we saw the importance of giving this parliamentary subcommittee, which could meet in camera and could receive security information, the responsibility for reviewing these other expenditures and the work done by other departments. As well we thought it important that the Security Intelligence Review Committee be given that mandate. Again that recommendation has been rejected.

One of the constraints on CSIS is the definition section of the legislation which limits but by its effect CSIS's mandates to the specially defined threats to the security of Canada.

One of the most important recommendations was the proposal to delete section 2(d) of that act which gives the government, through CSIS, the authority to use its special powers to look into what is called subversion under the act.

The more we looked at this section, the more we asked people who came before the committee: "What kind of subversion? What kind of activities are you talking about when you mean subversion?" We all agreed that CSIS needs to worry about terrorism. CSIS needs to worry about espionage. We as a Parliament are doing our responsibilities correctly when we give to this agency the duty to look into terrorism and espionage.

The more we looked at it, the more we found ourselves saying: "For the life of us, we can't see what kind of subversion we are talking about here." Subversion becomes very close, in some people's minds, to what, in another way of looking at it, would be perfectly legitimate political activities.

What we really are saying here, when the report recommended the deletion of 2(d), is that when challenges to the state get to the point of the use of violence or the threatened use of violence that is terrorism, and we say look into that.

When foreign governments spy in this country, we should know that that is happening. The history of this country suggests we should become very concerned when the government has its own definition of subversion and gives to itself the licence to look into groups that may have some difference of opinion with the government line of the day.

The most revealing testimony was from a former public servant, John Starns, who was vigorously defending the continued inclusion of clause 2(d) in the legislation. When he was asked by one of the members of the committee to give an example of subversion, his suggestion was those who would favour separatism or independence for Quebec.

I suspect it was that answer which provoked the government members, as well as the opposition members, to see how there could be an abuse of the rights of CSIS and the rights of government as embodied in the legislation.

No matter how many of us, as do virtually all members of Parliament, disagree with the proposition that Quebec or any other part of Canada should separate, we are in a democracy. Those people are entitled to that view as long as they express it within the democratic parliamentary system. That is the way in which we should work out these ideas. We should not give to our government the right to spy on those who are working within the democratic system on an idea, albeit one with which we disagree.

If people who have that view begin to contemplate violence in the pursuit of that political aim, then that becomes something which we should look into. Therefore, the unanimous view of the committee rejected by the government was that this section should be deleted.

There are many other important recommendations in this committee report. There are suggestions about the appointment to the Security Intelligence Review Committee which is Parliament's alleged watch-dog in this area.

We have seen the fiasco of the last appointment. The committee unanimously came up with ways which we believe would avoid that and restore to SIRC the confidence that it is entitled to.

We have various recommendations with respect to CSIS employees. I note with some disappointment that even though the director of CSIS said he favoured collective bargaining for CSIS employees, the government has merely said that it generally has no objection to that. What we do not see is a commitment by the government to amend the legislation to ensure that that right is available to the members.

There are a number of recommendations to improve the warrant process and to improve the rights of those who have been rejected for security clearances. Much of what happens in the security area comes under the general heading: "Security Review" and gives security clearances to people who are seeking to become citizens of the country, who are seeking to immigrate into Canada, and who are seeking jobs in the public sector.

Yet, that system is not only bogged down with an enormous amount of paperwork. Not only were we not able to really get to the heart of how the system was working but, further, the checks and balances against an abuse of that system have not been addressed by the government report.

In sum, the answer of the government to this very comprehensive and well thought through report by the special committee reveals perhaps why this government has been in office simply too long.

It is hard for me to imagine that the government elected in 1984, after the previous 25 years in opposition, would so quickly jump to the defence of the security establishment and the bureaucrats and would fail its duty to this Parliament to respond with a greater open mind to the recommendations of this committee.

• (1130)

The rights of Canadians ought to be the prime concern of this Parliament. This motion I have on the floor now calls for concurrence in this report. In effect, it will represent a direction by this Parliament to the government that this report should be enacted.

We now have a contrast. We have the report of the parliamentary committee and we have the report of the government. They stand in contrast. It is important, in our view, that this House stand behind the committee, endorse the recommendations of the committee, and enact this charter for the next five years for the security intelligence system in this country.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague from Victoria on a very excellent address this morning on the Solicitor General's answer to the special committee looking into the affairs of CSIS. I have a couple of questions I want to put to my hon. friend.

The first one comes from a passage at page 76 in the Solicitor General's response, which is entitled "On Course". The last paragraph on that page begins: "The government recognizes the need for consultation with opposition leaders regarding appointments to SIRC".

If memory serves, there was a tremendous verbal blow-up, to put it mildly, when the present chairman of SIRC was appointed a year and a half or two years ago. At that time the former leader of this party made it very clear that he had not, in fact, been consulted, although there was provision at that time for consultation. There was simply a phone call. He was away from his office. The appointment went ahead and then he was apprised of the appointment following it.

My first question to the hon. member for Victoria is: Does this insertion in this Solicitor General's response on page 76 lend any greater credibility to the process than was already there and as it was used or abused some two years ago?

My second question relates to a statement the member made with respect to the special committee's journey to Washington where it consulted with officials on the government side. That is the CIA and other federal U.S. agencies in the security field.

I want to put this question to him. Did he get any impression at all that members of the CIA or any other related groups, such as the National Security Council, had suffered professionally or had their work been infringed upon in any way by the fact that in the United States of America, both at the Senate level and at the House of Representatives level, there are what we would call parliamentary or congressional oversight committees on an ongoing basis that look into the operation and management of those secret organizations?

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I thank my friend for his question. I may say that as my duties changed, so did his. The member for Brant is now responsible within our caucus for matters of security intelligence. I would hope that if this subcommittee can in fact be established, he will have an opportunity to serve on it. I know he will serve with distinction in that event.

He asks two questions. First, with respect to the appointment of the Security Intelligence Review Committee, I could take the time to go through the whole sorry history of the last appointment. Instead, let me take my time to refer specifically to recommendation 80 of the committee's report. I will precede it by the comments of the committee.

To appoint members to SIRC, the Prime Minister must first consult with the Leader of the Official Opposition and the leader of every party having at least twelve members in the House of Commons. The committee is aware that the process by which the current chairman of SIRC was appointed, caused some public concern.

That is an understatement. It goes on to say that the committee must hold the confidence of all Canadians.

In the end the committee recommended that section 34 of the CSIS Act be amended to require the Prime Minister: one, to notify in writing the leaders of each of the parties with more than 12 seats in the House of Commons that an appointment to SIRC is to be made; two, to request the leaders of each party so notified to put forward a short list of names of persons they believe to be qualified to be a member of SIRC; and, three, to communicate and discuss with the party leaders in the House so as to be apprised of their views on who should be appointed.

This recommendation specifically tightens up the procedures which would ensure that the opposition leaders are in fact consulted in the appointment of this important committee. I may say finally that the government merely recognizes the need to consult and fails to make a specific commitment that there should be an amendment to the CSIS Act in that respect. That is a cop-out on the part of the government.

The second question is the statement about the CIA and other intelligence agencies in the United States. What we found was that members of the security intelligence community in the United States who had been very apprehensive about the establishment of permanent committees of Congress to oversee their activities found that in the end it was in fact entirely helpful. They believed they were doing a good job and they found that the committees ultimately concluded that most of the time they were doing a good job. The committee served as a safety valve to deal with those issues where there was the inevitable screw-up on somebody's part.

We believed that as best we could find out CSIS was doing a good job. There were some safety valves established in the regime of the 1984 act, including the Security Intelligence Review Committee, but in our view those safety valves could be improved, in fact CSIS would benefit as with the rest of the security intelligence community from having permanent parliamentary overview, and they had nothing to fear from having permanent parliamentary review. I must say I ask when I look at the government recommendation of the government rejecting our recommendation: What is it that the government has to hide? Why does it not want us to look at how it is spending the money? Why does it not want us to look at what security intelligence is doing in Canada?

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the member for Victoria for affording us the opportunity to respond to this committee's report, the committee that was chaired by the hon. member for Lethbridge.

I want to say at the outset that I lived through the experiences of World War II as a young man. I would hope the member for Victoria would understand that the ethnic group from which I draw my roots and which I enjoy "enjoyed" considerably scrutiny during World War II and considerable public scorn at the time simply because of our generic names. I recall very clearly what it was like to be of Germanic extraction during World War II and the automatic suspicion that this incurred during wartime. Therefore, I and members of my caucus have first-hand experience of what it is like to be under unwarranted scrutiny.

I just want to say as forthrightly and as kindly as I can that we really do not need lessons from the member for Victoria about concern for civil rights in our society. While he is visiting with his seat-mate there, I would point out to him that those of us who have experienced that kind of scrutiny welcome the establishment of this agency, as well as of SIRC, as well as parliamentary review. We think it is a way of ensuring the civil rights of Canadians that these institutions be developed and these methods of review be developed. I just want to underscore to the member for Victoria that we as a government do not take this issue lightly. On the one hand we are accountable and responsible for the security of all Canadians from threats, but we are also responsible for the civil rights and the security of the civil rights of all Canadians.

We have a dual responsibility and we mean to discharge both of those responsibilities with vigour.

I debate the motion "that this House concur in the report by the special committee for the review of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service Act and the Security Offences Act entitled, In Flux but not in Crisis".

This legislation is important to how we, as a society, deal with threats to our security, while protecting our democratic rights and freedoms. In 1984, when Parliament was studying the proposed CSIS and security offences legislation, it decided that there should be a review of the provisions and the operation of these acts five years after their coming into force.

I would like to commend the members of the special committee, chaired by the hon. member for Lethbridge, for the work that they carried out. The committee has made many observations and recommendations that deserve careful study by the security intelligence system of government.

Within the 150 days provided for by Standing Order 109, the government has tabled in Parliament its considered response to the committee's recommendations. I note that the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Lethbridge, in a press conference following the tabling of the report observed that the "review revealed no crisis or improper activities within our security and intelligence community".

It is also interesting to note that at the same press conference the hon. member for Victoria, the sponsor of this motion, stated "CSIS gets good marks from us as a clear improvement on the past".

The world has seen dramatic changes in the past five years. The Berlin wall has fallen and the cold war is over, at least we presume it is over. What will rise from the ashes is yet undetermined. I recall seeing a press report at the time when the Federal Republic of Germany was celebrating the unification of the two Germanys and on the night before the final act of unification the Soviet secret police were still meeting with the East German secret police, urging them to carry on their secret police activities. So while we hope the cold war is over, it means that some of those activities still carry on and those old habits die hard. Security is still a primary concern for the Canadian people.

I note also that the Prime Minister recently said to the conference of Interpol here in Ottawa:

> Where states were once preoccupied by war, they must now also worry about other threats to their security. The drug dealer, the terrorist, the environmental criminal, the money launderer, the technological spy, the syndicates of organized crime. We must be as vigilant and vigorous in co–operating to meet those new challenges to national security as we have been to meet the old.

For CSIS, their mandate includes two of these threats, the terrorist and the technological spy.

Despite these changes in the world, then, most people would agree on the need for a system to protect Canadians from threats to their security and the need for a security intelligence service. In the government's view there can be no doubt that Canada needs CSIS.

The special committee concluded there is a need for a security intelligence service like CSIS. I also note that the committee found no witnesses who took the position that security intelligence was no longer necessary or that the mandate of the civilian domestic security intelligence service should revert to the RCMP.

Threats to our security do exist. Consider the threat from terrorism. Canadian democracy depends upon a climate of freedom, where political objectives are pursued through open discussion, debate and lawful advocacy. This climate, as well as public safety, are jeopardized when any person or group seeks to gain their political objectives by carrying out acts of violence or by threatening to do so.

In the 1980s the threat of terrorism became an immediate security concern and this government has directed CSIS to treat terrorism as its first security intelligence priority. Our first line of defence must be intelligence.

The other major threat, espionage, has been an ongoing reality since the emergence of nation states. All nations seek to advance their position in the world. Some resort to covert means to do so, and this threat exists today despite changes in the international political climate. Despite these changes, the threat posted to the security of Canada by hostile intelligence services continues to be high.

Canada must have the means to protect itself from such threats, whether they take the form of traditional espionage or attempts to steal knowledge of sensitive high technology. The government owes it to Canadians who are devoting their careers to providing their country with scientific advances. The special committee also concluded that terrorism and espionage continue to threaten Canada and Canadians.

When this parliamentary review began, the government stated it believed that the Canadian Security Intelligence Services Act and the Security Offences Act are sound pieces of legislation which are working as Parliament intended. The special committee has stated it is satisfied that the basic architecture of the act was sound, functioned well and should be preserved.

I would like to remind the House of some of the fundamental views the government took into the review process as outlined by the new Solicitor General when he appeared before the special committee.

The CSIS Act provides a statutory framework for balancing effective national security with respect for individual rights and freedoms. The CSIS Act defines CSIS' mandate to collect intelligence and advise the government on threats to the security of Canada. It gives the service the powers necessary to fulfil that mandate.

The act that sets up a unique guidance system for the agency, consisting of a legislative framework that defines and limits the powers of CSIS, political control and accountability, a system of judicial controls and significant external review by the Security Intelligence Review Committee.

Finally, the act provides a mechanism for hearing the complaints of any person or group about any aspect of CSIS's activities.

The Security Offences Act confirms the security offences enforcement and protective security responsibility of the RCMP. These acts provide a well-conceived legislative framework that allows flexible response for changing circumstances, within an unprecedented legal and policy framework which is unmatched in the world.

The government has used policy direction to guide the interpretation and implementation of these acts. All of the key players in the security intelligence system in Canada have worked hard to ensure the legislation operates in a practical and effective manner.

The service has developed and operates on the basis of a sound and stringent targeting process. A rigorous process is in place for warrant applications, and the reporting function of the service is being enhanced to improve and reflect better the process of policy development and decision-making within the government.

• (1150)

The Inspector General and the Security Intelligence Review Committee have carried out their roles in an orderly and rigorous way, and I think the member for Victoria would agree with that.

The reports of the Inspector General reassure the minister that CSIS is conforming to the law and ministerial policy directions while SIRC, by its annual reports, which the minister must table in Parliament, completes an annual cycle of public accountability for CSIS. To infer that another jurisdiction like the United States has a scrutiny that Canada does not have is a little bit misleading and I hope that the member for Victoria would agree with that.

Finally, the RCMP and CSIS have measures in place and a working relationship that ensures effective co-operation. This is how the legislation is working today.

As legislators, I think we can all appreciate that five years is not a long time to implement fundamental change. Nevertheless, a great deal has been accomplished. The CSIS Act and the Security Offences Act went through an initial working-in period. The new acts were a dynamic and self-correcting system which provided a sound security system for balancing effective national security with respect for rights and freedoms.

After three years of experience with the new CSIS Act, the need for accelerating the transition process became apparent in 1987 through internal warning signals and external reports of the SIRC and the Joint Parliamentary Committee on Official Languages. The government established an independent advisory team headed by the Hon. Gordon Osbaldeston to determine how CSIS should evolve more rapidly towards meeting the goals set forth by Parliament.

As you know, the Osbaldeston report, released in November 1987, concluded that the CSIS Act was basically sound and that CSIS is an important national institution staffed by dedicated professionals. However, after three years, the evolution of CSIS needed the discipline of an action plan to accelerate its transition to a modern security intelligence agency.

The government accepted the Osbaldeston report's recommendations as a mid-course correction for the service, and I hope the member acknowledges that.

I would now like to describe some of the major accomplishments achieved by the government since the act was proclaimed in 1984.

In the area of the internal management of CSIS:

1. The director now plays a strong role in managing intelligence operations; for example, he personally chairs the key internal operational committees.

2. CSIS has adopted a tighter and sharper operational policy on targeting.

3. Deputy directors responsible for corporate management and for human resources and official languages have been appointed in order to improve CSIS's internal planning and accountability process, human resource development and official languages capacity.

4. CSIS has been provided with an adequate budget, brought for the first time to a level commensurate with its requirements and CSIS personnel will be brought together in one headquarters building.

5. CSIS's training academy has been re-established in Ottawa with a range of training programs in both official languages.

In the area of government control of CSIS, ministers have conveyed to CSIS, by formal direction, the following points: The government's national requirements for security intelligence to keep intelligence production in line with the needs of the government. The definition of threats to the security of Canada found in section 2 of the CSIS Act defines the parameters for collection of intelligence. These broad subject areas can be further refined to focus more directly on the intelligence needs of consumer departments. Consumer needs shall, in future, be organized under five national interest areas within which strategic information on threats to the security of Canada may be reported to the government.

This direction sets out five national interest areas: One, public safety; the ability of people to engage in ordinary social activity without fear of harm. Two, integrity of the democratic process; the functioning of those institutions, rights and freedoms fundamental to the political well-being of a democratic society. Three, security of government assets; the responsibility of the government to protect those human, intellectual and physical assets which it manages in trust for the Canadian people. Four, economic security; the conditions necessary to sustain a competitive international position, provide productive employment and contain inflation. Five, international peace and security; the ability of the international system to evolve while avoiding war, containing regional conflicts and minimizing violence.

The directive also specifies how ministers expect a director to be accountable. It gives direction of the general conduct of investigations which includes the principles enunciated by the McDonald commission. The investigative means must be proportionate to the gravity of the threat posed, and the probability of its occurrence. The need to use various investigative techniques must be weighed against possible damage to civil liberties and valuable social institutions.

The more intrusive the technique, the higher the authority that should be required to approve its use. Except in emergency circumstances, the least intrusive techniques of information collection must be used before the more intrusive techniques, and the rule of law must be protected.

Mr. Brewin: Oh, oh.

Mr. Friesen: The member for Victoria takes it lightly, but the government does not.

A direction on the use of human resources, the key principles which are—

Mr. Brewin: You do not even read well.

Mr. Friesen: I do.

An hon. member: Yes, he does.

Mr. Friesen: Sources are to be used when and to the extent that it is reasonable and necessary.

Second, the need to use resources must be carefully weighed against possible damage to civil liberties.

Third, sources must be centrally directed and controlled.

Fourth, sources must act within the law.

Fifth, sources are to be managed so as to protect both the security of CSIS operations and the personal safety of the sources.

Sixth, sources should be treated ethically and fairly by CSIS in terms of compensation and handling.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): One moment, please.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The hon. member's time is up unless the House agrees to extend it. Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions or comments.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I will not say anything mean about the hon. member's speech which was, on the whole, very sound. He did it very well.

He said during the course of his speech that the government says that spying is still going on. I want to ask the member how he knows that. Are we expected to buy it just because the government says it is so? Did he read it in Time magazine?

We concluded in our report that there is terrorism and espionage, but we were not able to find out the extent of it. Is there sufficient spying to justify $190 million worth of expenditure? How are we supposed to know? The government will not tell us. How does the member know how much spying is going on in Canada?

He says the scheme is working as Parliament intended. What we said in the report was that it was doing fine as far as it went, but it still had a long way to go. Why does the government reject the rest of the road? Why does the member say we should get away with that? Even since our report came down, there have been dramatic changes in Europe. The Warsaw Pact just yesterday was officially disbanded. Maybe the hon. member had not heard that. Maybe he did not hear when the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that we must now treat the Soviet Union as an ally.

• (1200)

There surely is a better way to arrange for affairs between nations than to continue the exercise that this government continues.

In summary, I would ask the member: How do we know how much spying is going on in Canada, how much terrorism is going on in Canada? We worked at it for a year and CSIS and the government would not tell us. How do we know?

Mr. Friesen: These agencies advertise in the local paper, don't they? This is exactly why the Solicitor General reports to Parliament every year on his responsibilities.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the parliamentary secretary in connection with one aspect of the government's response to this report.

It relates to the agency called the Communications Security Establishment. In the committee's review of CSIS, it also took the opportunity to cast a glance at what we believed the operations of CSE were. It became apparent to us that CSE operates outside the ambit of any review mechanism. Parliament has no idea of all of the resources and dollars that go to CSE for its work, and we were unable to obtain from the Privy Council Office, which oversees the bulk of CSE's work product, precisely what CSE was doing and how it was spending its money.

This is an agency that was created under the Department of National Defence but its product goes principally to, and it appears that the management of CSE is done mostly by, External Affairs. They would consume the "foreign intelligence signals", intelligence information that CSE gathers.

This is an agency that has, if I read my papers properly and if I read between the lines of what we learned in the committee study, the leading edge of eavesdropping technology, is fully capable of listening to every telephone conversation in the country, and operates without any review mechanism whatsoever. The government acknowledges, generally, that this is so and says that it would like to deal with it and will make an announcement at some point. It refers to putting some procedures in place involving the Department of National Defence.

My question is: What precisely is the government going to do with an agency that now operates outside any of the controls that Parliament purports to oversee now and any that the government purports to have put in place outside of SIRC? What does it intend to do? How is it going to solve that problem involving the rights and freedoms of Canadians?

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I think the member has just answered his own questions, in a somewhat contradictory fashion. On the one hand, he seems to infer that it is beyond review and yet his own committee looked into the matter.

I would point out to him that this is an agency that is under the direction of the Minister of National Defence, and it would be proper to refer the matter to him—because it is properly referred to him. If he is really curious, he could simply read the report that was tabled yesterday, pages 53 and 54, where he will find the answers to his questions.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I have a question that I want to put to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General. He said in his remarks, I believe it was in answer to a question just a moment ago, that Parliament has SIRC, the Security and Intelligence Review Committee, to report on the activities of CSIS. Yet the special committee found during its deliberations that it was difficult to get a lot of information both from CSIS and also from SIRC because SIRC was forbidden by law to reveal a lot of the information at its disposal.

Indeed, in this morning's Globe and Mail there is an article entitled "Official faults CSIS scrutiny". In this article the former researcher for the special committee, that brought forward its report last summer, is quoted as saying: "It proved during the special committee's work that despite its stated wishes to the contrary SIRC was not fully Parliament's man". In other words, he confirms what the committee stated in its report, that it could not get answers that it wanted from SIRC.

Therefore, SIRC, as far as this institution is concerned, as far as Parliament is concerned, is irrelevant because what information does come to this institution, this House of Commons, comes either from SIRC or from the Solicitor General. The Solicitor General has to vet everything that SIRC sends to the House of Commons so that indeed, what information does come to this place is vetted or sanitized by a minister of the Crown.

I put it to the parliamentary secretary: is that democracy? Does that make any sense at all in terms of democracy? Would he not agree that power and responsibility in a parliamentary system comes from the House of Commons, from the legislative branch and is given on behalf of the people of Canada to the ministers of the Crown who are directly responsible to this place exclusively, not to themselves or to cabinet?

Mr. Friesen: I wish that the members of the New Democratic Party, rather than bringing this question forward today had first read the report that was tabled yesterday. He can read on page 68 of the report the answer to his question.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for recognizing me and I am pleased to have an opportunity to address in debate the motion by my colleague from Victoria.

Before I launch into the body of my remarks, I want to give some credit where credit is due. Credit is due to the relatively large number of individuals who work in the security intelligence establishment here. I am talking about the career men and women in CSIS, the RCMP, and those other agencies that, as far as we can see from our review, have operated and served well and are continuing to do so even in the current circumstances where a significant challenge has been presented to them.

That is not to say that mistakes have not been made. It is not to say that mistakes are not being made. One of the problems we have in this area is that if they are making mistakes, they are apparently not subject to the kind of scrutiny that other government officials would be in such circumstances.

Our committee, the special committee of this House, spent over a year working in this field. It was an intensive study. We operated within a framework that frankly caused a number of restrictions.

• (1210)

Ultimately, compromises were made that permitted us to achieve many, but not all, of our goals as a committee.

We encountered a learning curve. It took us a few weeks to realize that the area we were studying was an area none of us had truly had an opportunity to see previously. It took a while for us to realize that. Then we were able to proceed in our review of this relatively closed field of government activity.

The reason we were asked to do the review is contained in the original statute itself. This Parliament asked other parliamentarians to review this law after five years. This was not an ad hoc committee developed to review CSIS. It was planned well in advance by parliamentarians who knew and understood that the laws being developed in this area might well need some fine tuning.

The title of the government's response is On Course—National Security for the 90s. Well, national security is a combination of security intelligence and foreign intelligence. The title "National Security" is slightly pretentious because it appeared in our review that the whole field of foreign intelligence was kept pretty much away from CSIS, from the RCMP Security Offences Act, and resided for the most part with the the Department of External Affairs and the Interdepartmental Committee on Security and Intelligence within the Privy Council Office. So, we did not have a good look at national security.

One of the recommendations we made, to set up an office of national assessments, as other jurisdictions have done, was rejected by the government. We will not have that balanced, objective review of foreign intelligence and security intelligence that comprises a complete picture of national security.

We have already entered the age of technological big brother. I referred earlier today to the potential for electronic eavesdropping upon all Canadians. Well intentioned, I am sure, but electronic eavesdropping of the most intensive sort. A form of eavesdropping where anything that is said, anything that moves, whether it is audio or video, whether it is an electronic field, can be monitored through walls from distances of miles. I believe that the mechanisms Parliament has put in place, and I think all of the committee believes this, need fine-tuning, need updating. If the government thinks it is moving into the 1990s and ready for the 1990s in this field, it is my view it is doing it with a rear-view mirror. If the government had paid closer attention to the recommendations of the committee it would be much further ahead.

I would like to hope that after the next federal election, the next Government of Canada will be able to pay closer attention to this area.

I want to touch on five or six areas of recommendation that the government failed to deal with. The committee had hoped that the Solicitor General and the Director of CSIS would expand on the areas of ministerial direction. These directions are the framework operating documents that are prepared by the Director and put in place for CSIS as it carries out its work, both for work that involves interests of surveillance and work that is simply analysis.

We had hoped that those directions could be expanded. To give some credit to CSIS, since we made our report one of the more important areas of ministerial direction was created and put in place. That had to do with the definition of the threat mandate. There are many more areas where we had concern and there is still a lot of work to do.

In dealing with review mechanisms, I mentioned earlier that CSE does not even show up on the screen of review mechanisms. The parliamentary secretary said review is referred to in the government's response. Well, the four items referred to as scrutiny, or review, or monitoring are in-house legal counsel from the justice department.

That is not review. That is not supervision. That is not scrutiny. That is not monitoring. Every department in government has a Department of Justice counsel at the other end of the phone. That is a zero.

The second item is that CSE consults frequently with senior officials in the Privy Council Office, the Department of National Defence, and Department of External Affairs. They are the same people that they carry on their work with. That is not supervision, review, or monitoring.

The government says that CSE is subject to internal Department of National Defence administrative review, so is every other government department. The government also says that CSE submits strategic plan and policy proposals for review by the Interdepartmental Committee on Security and Intelligence; that is the Privy Council Office, the people they work with. That is a closed shop, and that is not supervision or review.

Let us not be misled that the government has replied effectively to that question. CSE is not monitored. It is not reviewed, and it is still operating out there without review.

We had a lot of time to look at the operations of the national security investigations directorate of the RCMP and it was our view that when problems or complaints arose with regard to the security work of the RCMP, those matters should be referred to the Security Intelligence Review Committee as a complaint, but that they should be investigated by the RCMP special complaints commission.

That is not interference with the RCMP. That is simply a procedural consolidation of the complaints process. We thought it would be easier if the public felt there had been an error made and a complaint warranted if it could be made to one location, the Security Intelligence Review Committee.

We felt that the Security Intelligence Review Committee should be able to make special reports to Parliament. It is the organization that works for Parliament, for Canadians. It should be reporting to Parliament whenever it feels the need, whenever it is appropriate.

Instead the law now says that it reports annually. I do not think that is adequate, our committee did not think it was adequate. It should have the ability, the jurisdiction, to submit a report to Parliament for us, for our constituents, whenever it feels so advised.

Government did not accept that recommendation.

We felt in the complaint process that the Security Intelligence Review Committee ought to have the ability to self-initiate a complaint. The government did not agree with that, nor did it agree with our view that a complaint could be made directly to the Security Intelligence Review Committee.

Although I referred to that process earlier, in fact the law requires that all complaints go to the director of CSIS. In other words, go right to the agency that you are complaining about in the first place. We felt there should be a way for a complaint to go to the Security Intelligence Review Committee directly.

I want to talk about the actual parliamentary review. The member for Victoria referred to our study of the review mechanism used in the U.S. Congress and I thought I detected some scepticism from the other side about that study.

• (1220)

In the United States 25 years ago they were roughly where we are now; there was not an effective congressional review of security and intelligence matters. They had some problems 20 years ago, 15 years ago, at the time of the Vietnam war, and some other problems occurred subsequent to that. Legislators there then began to act. The result now is that a standing committee of Congress, a joint committee on security and intelligence, reviews all matters and reviews the appropriations and budget matters for all security and intelligence agencies within the U.S. government.

That, one would expect, could cause a problem; but I am advised by officials, experienced officials including the former head of the Central Intelligence Agency who visited with us, that that process works very well, that there are no leaks, that the security and intelligence establishment actually appreciates the oversight that exists. They appreciate the fact that they know we are looking, the legislators are looking at what they are doing at all times, and that helps to keep them honest. Shedding sunshine on the process has been effective in the United States. That is what we are told.

In terms of a further review here as an alternative to a parliamentary subcommittee which we had suggested, the government replies: "We will take a look at the matter again in seven years", near the end of the 1990s. One way to get through the 1990s is to have a review at the end of it.

Mr. Brewin: They won't be around to hear it.

Mr. Lee: They probably won't be in government then. You are right.

The Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General has a mandate generally to work in this area. While there needs to be further consultation on it, the government has agreed that all committee functions are in the hands of committees. I know it will stand by that. It may well be that the justice committee may choose to set up that subcommittee and proceed with the kind of work that the committee recommended.

We made recommendations dealing with management and employee relations. I mention that because here is an area of Public Service employment where you are cut off, sealed off, from the rest of the Public Service. It is like a little island out in the Pacific inside CSIS. When you are in there, you do not get a chance to communicate very often with other government agencies. Because most of your work, for many of the professionals who work in it, are things that you do not really take home from the office, you are less inclined to communicate in a two-way basis with other people in government. We made recommendations that would assist management and employees in CSIS to overcome the psychological isolation that they have in doing their work.

Last, I want to address the issue of the appointments to the Security Intelligence Review Committee. We have had reference to the previous set of appointments. The government, in its reply on page 76, says—and it was read here earlier—that government recognizes the need for consultation with opposition leaders regarding appointments to SIRC. Isn't that nice of them to recognize the need? It is not a need. It is the law.

It is stated clearly in the section that there must be consultation. If my memory serves me correctly, the last initiative at consultation involved a letter sent to the leader of one of the opposition parties the day before the appointment. The leader did not even get the letter. That was explained to me in a letter from the Prime Minister as being consultation.

I drafted a claim in a lawsuit in court. I sent it to him and I said: "This is in my characterization of the effectiveness of your consultation process". I took no further action on that because I had hoped that the government might respond a little more fully in its reply to the CSIS review committee's report. It has not. I am disappointed in that and I am disappointed in the page 76 trite, light, wimpy discussion of that issue. I want Parliament to know that more work is going to have to be done in that area.

As we finish this debate and as we deal with it in a procedural sense, we are cutting loose this whole area, this committee report, the five-year review contained in the statute. We are sending it on. We are walking away if we do nothing further in the way of renewal or refining of the institutions that should be there.

Given the government's response, as thin and light as it is, there remains much work to be done in this area. I am hopeful that the justice committee will carry on with some of these recommendations. I urge adoption of this motion by all members and all parties in this House.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate this morning. I do not intend to take my full 20 minutes, as I know there are two others who would like to make a contribution as well.

I do not wish to reiterate the very excellent arguments that my friend and colleague from Victoria presented at the outset of the debate this morning in moving the concurrence motion. Rather, I would first of all like to speak in more general terms with respect to secret intelligence organizations, secret agencies and the secret world, itself, in a democracy, and the place and responsibility of those agencies in a democratic society.

I know that perhaps to some extent we are all captives or many of us are captives of current literature in the field and sometimes we are swept away by fiction as opposed to fact. But the facts still remain that most if not all countries, whether totalitarian or democratic, do have and indeed need secret intelligence services in order to keep them apprised of any threats or potential threats to the security and safety of the state. That goes without saying. We are not arguing, obviously, whether or not we should have a security and intelligence service. The crux of the matter surely is that service's place in our society, how it operates in our society and to whom it should be ultimately responsible.

I would argue this morning, in view of the Solicitor General's total rejection of the 117 recommendations of the special committee, that the ultimate authority for establishing CSIS was and still is the House of Commons and therefore CSIS is ultimately responsible to the House of Commons, its maker. That is theory but that is also practice. If we are to retain the basic precepts of democracy in a parliamentary system, all government agencies, whether it is the CSE or the intelligence networks of DND or the External Affairs Department or CSIS, or indeed SIRC, all must be ultimately responsible to Parliament.

How do we go about facilitating that relationship and that ability to be responsible to this Chamber? Obviously it would be cumbersome. It would be indeed impossible to force an agency such as CSIS to be responsible to the entire House, or to come before open committees of this House and present arguments or counter-arguments to questions put to it, or to justify its budget perhaps, or to justify its actions. But surely one way, a way in which our colleagues to the south of us in Washington have found an answer and have set up a system, is to have an oversight or a review committee of this House meeting, no doubt most of the time but not all the time in camera, and charged with the responsibility of maintaining confidences and having adequate research staff and advisers in order to facilitate its work. Then CSIS could be directly responsible to an appendage of this House or part of this House, which would be that all-party committee.

• (1230)

That all-party committee would have horrendous responsibilities. There is no question about it. It would not be a normal type of committee, but it would be a vital link and it would keep alive that very important relationship in terms of accountability and responsibility.

A government agency—in this case CSIS—responsible to a minister, yes, but also responsible directly to the body that created it and that is responsible for it, namely, a special committee of this House of Commons.

American congressmen in the House of Representatives, and indeed the senators, have already gone ahead and established such review committees. The committees have not in any way infringed upon the operations or the operational integrity of such organizations as the CIA or the National Security Council and the various military intelligence organizations or intelligence gathering organizations in that country.

Yet, in his response, the Solicitor General when he tabled his report yesterday, thoroughly rejected the idea that we should set up a special subcommittee in this House for that very purpose.

I am very disappointed because of that lack of sensitivity on the part of a cabinet minister in a very sensitive area. Yet, on page 77 of that very report, On Course, subtitled National Security for the 1990s, the Solicitor General writes: "To refuse to discuss national security issues publicly with Canadians is to encourage mistrust and ignorance".

That is the problem we are faced with this morning. We have a minister who recognizes that to deny public access to the workings of his department, specifically CSIS, is to encourage mistrust. That is exactly what he says in his report. On the other hand, he denies the very access that we are seeking in this House, that is the special committee. I do not understand his logic or indeed his lack of logic.

I could speculate that the Solicitor General has become a captive of his officials, that his deputy and the director of CSIS have said: "No way',' and the minister has had no choice but to go along with his senior officials. He has agreed with them. If my speculation is correct, that is indeed regrettable, and I am putting it very mildly when I say so.

Experts on the subject of secret intelligence organizations generally agree that upwards of 80 to 90 per cent, if not more, of the work that those organizations carry on is in fact not secret. The reason they insist on retaining the wall of secrecy around them, they meaning the officials within those bodies, is simply self-promotion. It is survival.

If you remove the emperor's clothes, he is no longer an emperor. If you remove the secrecy or a lot of the secrecy, the aura of secrecy disappears and it becomes just another agency of the Crown. Therefore it is doubly difficult to get appropriations and the proper funding.

While I am on that subject, I should insert here that CSIS is one of the few government agencies that for the past five years since 1985-86 and on into 1990-91 has consistently increased its funding with an average of 14.4 per cent a year. No doubt, this afternoon when the budget comes down, we will not see any decrease in that apportionment of public funding.

Yet, when we stand in this place or in a committee where we should be asking questions about the financing and funding of CSIS, we are told that they cannot give us the answers unless we are in camera. Even then I doubt whether they would give us specific answers to specific funding questions because it is contrary to the act.

I was here in the early 1980s and it was not the intention of Parliament at that time to prevent us from finding out in general ways what the Solicitor General, the deputy solicitor general and the director of CSIS were all about not in terms of specific operations, but in terms of policy and funding.

For what purposes were Canadian tax dollars going and were they going appropriately, honestly and fairly toward the legal execution of the duties of CSIS itself? We cannot find that out. We have no way of knowing whether or not public funding is not only wisely spent in CSIS, but that it is effectively spent. Every time the director comes back with his proposed new budget, it is all worked out in secret and in private. We have no input, but worse than that we have no say. We cannot reduce the budget and we cannot even ask why the money is being spent and for what purpose.

I also want to refer to another aspect of this which has already been dealt with this morning, that is the choosing process of members of the review committee. I do not know any of these people personally, although I believe one is a former member of the House of Commons. I have never met Mr. Bassett. I do not know what his capabilities are. The record to date certainly raises eyebrows, but that is as far as I will go; I will leave it at that. The process of choosing Mr. Bassett was totally unacceptable and, as has already been stated, it was not a result of consultation. It was take it or leave it. Even at that, we were apprised of the appointment after it was made and had no way of effectively opposing it in any way.

To choose a person for such an important office, to chair the Security Intelligence Review Committee which is charged with very serious responsibilities, to allow that choice to be done in such a haphazard way and to go to a party hack—and there is no other way of putting it; Mr. Bassett may have many fine attributes as a gentleman and as a human being, but he is a strong, and always has been, partisan supporter of the party in power—this is not the kind of person that calls out for that kind of appointment. It should be somebody in my view above politics, somebody outside the political arena, somebody who has a gift for that kind of office. It is very important that the head or the chairman of SIRC be seen to be totally removed from the political scene, and that did not happen.

There are several other aspects of the special committee's report that I could expound upon this morning, but I realize that time is limited and that there are two other members of the House who wish to speak. I do, however, in closing also wish to comment very briefly on the committee's recommendation to delete section 2.(d) in the definitions section, specifically the definition of subversion.

In a democracy we not only tolerate, but indeed promote healthy, lawful descent and controversy. We should not be afraid of it. We should stand up and accept it, argue with it if one wishes or support it, depending on which side of the argument one happens to be at any one time. But that kind of activity has been in the past and continues to be interpreted by some individuals as being, if not subversive, at least borderline. The physical approach that the police and CSIS and other organizations, the RCMP for example, take in terms of demonstrations and marches, no matter what the purpose is for, is such that they are all suspect. The cameras come out, pictures are taken and are put away in some folder or filing cabinet or put on microfiche or something, in case somewhere down the line they may wish to withdraw those pictures and say: Ha, ha, so–and–so was at that demonstration at that point in time. Therefore, now we really suspect that he or she may be a subversive individual depending on the circumstances.

• (1240)

An hon. member: You should see your file.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Somebody has just said: "You should see my file". It is probably half a foot thick by now, I do not know. I have not been very active in street marches for a number of years, but it may be away in some dusty file some place. I hope it is. In fact, I hope some day I have a chance to look at it to find out just what a horrible person I am.

Mr. Speaker, I am going to close. I am profoundly disappointed in the Solicitor General's approach in answering the very excellent report of the subcommittee. His response, On Course is not acceptable as far as I am concerned. I sincerely hope that in short order we will take a different attitude towards CSIS and look upon it more or less as just another agency of the Crown which does bear scrutiny by a special committee of this House to make certain that the committee knows what is going on. Indeed, CSIS will have the advantage of having the security of knowing that members of the House of Commons do know what they are doing and therefore it is acceptable.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to rise and say a few words with respect to the government's official response entitled On Course which members know is a response to the committee report entitled In Flux. It was a unanimous committee report to which the government has now responded.

I can understand the frustrations of members. Our document had over 100 recommendations and the government has not come out with a chart responding exactly to every one of the recommendations that we have made. I want to say that I am still proud to have been a member of that committee. I believe that members of the opposition, who were mostly new members of Parliament, should be and can be immensely proud of the contribution they have made. I do not say that lightly because it needs to be seen in the context.

Many of us remember the pre-1980 regime that had gone on since the beginning of Confederation where the security issues were developed within the RCM Police. There was virtually no public accountability at all. Indeed, most members of Parliament did not even know what the CSE was, the Canadian Security Establishment, in the latter years. That was the way the system worked through all the many years before 1980.

As a result of events in Quebec and the McDonald commission, a new regime came forth and it became law in 1984. That regime really did provide a lot of accountability, primarily through an independent agency called SIRC, which has members of all three political parties. That was felt to be the primary mechanism to hold the civilian agency accountable.

We found in our group that in fact has worked very well. But again I really want to take members back to the point that the system has incrementally been getting better and better. There has been more and more information made available to members of Parliament, to the SIRC committee, which as I say, has representatives from all three political parties, and which does a tremendous job day after day. We members of Parliament become so busy and occupied with the many other pressures in our lives, we cannot put the time into that which we might like to and what the topic deserves. That is why our committee really felt that SIRC was an excellent agency and deserved to continue on.

With respect to the government's response, I think that the most important part of it is that for the first time we have a document that is available to every Canadian who wants to have it, with its major authoritative setting out of the whole area of security. Anybody who reads this document will know all of the players, they will know the mechanisms for control, accountability and responsibility. That in itself is very powerful information for people to have. As a result of my experience here in Ottawa, I am firmly of the view that if an agency or a government gets out of line, brown paper envelopes are very quickly leaked. Given the number of civil servants, the number of photocopy machines, one just cannot get very far out of line. Information gets out. As long as the opposition is vigilant and the standing committee on justice is vigilant, these things can be raised.

We have a vigilant media in Canada. Not only are they vigilant, but some members are very knowledgeable, indeed, experts in this area of security and intelligence. We have an ever-increasing body of researchers and academics who now have their own association called CASIS. They are very sophisticated, operated by fine women and men. So I believe it is impossible for the same mistakes that the RCMP made to occur again, that certainly on a broad basis information will get out.

Just that in itself, to my mind, makes the review that we conducted in 1990 worth it. But there are other advantages and I suppose the other most important was that the government has accepted the fact that there should be another review in 1998.

I know from the evidence we received from all the major players in the security intelligence field that they felt a parliamentary review was like the sword of Damocles over them. They really did have some fear and apprehension about coming before us because we do represent this whole Parliament. However, for the most part, I think our committees do very good work in that area.

The annual reports that the minister and the director have to give to Parliament directly is a major step forward. It lets the justice committee have another avenue to get the minister before the committee and ask specific questions. The last point I want to make is that it will really depend on us as members of Parliament. This Parliament has all sorts of committees. While I do not sit on the committee for disabled Canadians, handicapped Canadians, I trust that my colleagues on that committee are asking the right questions, are taking that area of our public life and advancing it step by step just as we who had the responsibility to do the security review. We were successful in getting more information out to the public. We have incrementally increased the knowledge that Canadians and our fellow members of Parliament have.

To my mind that is the whole system. That is the way that democracy works. It is slow. It is tedious. We all sit for hundreds of hours on these committees and get absolutely no political credit back in our own riding in terms of votes. However, it does strengthen the public life of the nation and it does hold our bureaucrats more and more accountable. We all agree, including the bureaucrats, that accountability is the secret. It is a day by day, step by step building of the system.

I think the other major advantage of having gone through the process is that we have built the confidence level. It was most interesting when we started and the CSIS people were coming before us. You could see they were really nervous, perhaps to the point of being scared that the national security of the country would be somehow jeopardized by this committee. They do have an important role and we all recognize that we need to have security.

The world is not a playground. It is not an area where people are honest and straightforward. There is a lot of information that needs to be kept secret. We all recognize that. But they were somehow fearful that the whole system was going to collapse. The fact of the matter is the system has not collapsed. This is a result of very responsible conduct on the part of the members of the committee, both the government backbenchers and the opposition members.

As that process went on throughout the year we could just feel that they were prepared to share more and more information. We received some confidential briefings, the information from which has been held confidential and will always be held confidential because none of us is going to subvert our country just for the sake of a question in the House of Commons, or some narrow advantage to us personally, or our party. People do not work like that.

We found that was much more the case in the United States where, over a period of years, they had built confidence levels so that their elected congressmen had more information than we did.

It is true that the two systems are a bit different. A congressman in the United States system has more individual accountability back to the nation. They have an obligation, constitutionally, to make sure the government continues to operate. In our system, we are little different simply because the cabinet has to be chosen from this House and to be accountable to this House.

If the Prime Minister was elected separately and could choose the cabinet from all of the people in the country, that would be a different type of body. We would then be pure legislators and would have an obligation to make the system work; whereas here, there is not that same obligation. The opposition's objective is to point out all the defects of the government, but as well to try and bring the government down by way of a whole series of non-confidence motions.

If opposition members got secret information that could be damaging to the government, they would be in a very tough position and I think would almost have to reveal that information, because they have an obligation to bring the government down under these non-confidence motions.

That was what we debated. It is a troubling issue, and there is no easy solution.

I think we should move to a bit more of a congressional form of government, because I would like to be known as a legislator and I would like to be able to be held accountable by my own electors for how I stood on the issues. It would get away from a lot of this partisanship; we would then be working across party lines. There would be lots of times when I would be voting with the opposition, and vice versa.

I think that would be good for our country, but for other reasons.

Mr. Boyer: Agreed.

Mr. Thacker: The last point I want to make, Mr. Speaker—because I want my friend opposite to have the last few words—is that the opposition parties can do a lot with this report, if they are unhappy, by developing their own positions with respect to our document Influx and the government's response. If they could prepare a detailed reply, they could take it their caucus, to their shadow cabinet, and get their approval to say that "if we are the government, this is exactly what we will do".

I would advise them to do that, if they feel very strongly about it. What they will find is that when and if they become the government—I think some time around the turn of the century, perhaps—

Mr. Boyer: Don't rush things!

Mr. Thacker: Their cabinet ministers, when they become part of the executive council, take on a different constitutional role, take on a different hat and have very different responsibilities. They have sworn special oaths of secrecy. It is amazing how quickly it makes them much more responsible—and much quieter, if I can put it that way. It is more difficult to get responses out of them because of the constitutional obligation that they have. I have noticed that many times.

It is the same with access to information and privacy. It was amazing the number of cabinet ministers who before, when they were in opposition, were very gung ho for freedom of information, but when they got to cabinet and got this constitutional responsibility—and also got a little bit more information on both sides of the issue—became much more reticent in their support for freedom of information.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is a privilege to have been able to chair the committee. I once again thank the members for sitting on it because I believe that, collectively, we did do a good job. And I believe on an incremental basis, by 1998, our successors will look back and say: "They did a good job."

Thank you, members, for serving on that committee.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, in the limited amount of time left, I did want to make a few comments because I had the privilege of working on the committee. It was a good committee under the chairmanship of Mr. Thacker and it worked very well.

There were unanimous decisions on almost every point and it was a unanimous report. I think to a degree, what is a little upsetting in the final result is how the government has treated a hard-working committee's unbiased and unanimous recommendations. There were 117 recommendations and by my quick count I think the government responded to one and a half out of the 117. I do not think that, quite frankly, is the proper approach.

The other interesting thing is we have matured in this country as far as CSIS is concerned. When the agency was first formed in 1983–1984, there was a large hue and cry about the land. That is not the case now, nor was it as the committee did its work. There were constructive suggestions from a number of individuals, but there was not the concern that existed in 1984. So with that in mind, I think the committee came up with the proper balance. The key element that came out of the report, which the government has chosen to ignore, is the one dealing with oversight.

Mr. Speaker, I would refer you to recommendation 108.

> The committee recommends that the function of the subcommittee be to review the budgets of security and intelligence organizations with a view to providing reports to such committees as the House of Commons may determine and to review the work undertaken by SIRC and the Inspector General and to undertake reviews of a general nature—

That is a very positive recommendation and will go a long way, not only to protecting Canadians, but also to protecting the organizations that would be within the spectre of this review because they would have the benefit of parliamentary oversight.

It is shocking to look at the Estimates and see that this department has spent roughly $200 million over the last year and all we know is that it is a one-line item in the Estimates. That, quite frankly, is unacceptable. There must be more parliamentary involvement in that process. We should not allow $200 million to be spent and not have any idea where it went. Did it go for employees, for buildings, for equipment? What was it utilized for? Parliament has no idea at all.

In the United States, for instance, they have two oversight committees, one each in the House of Representatives and the Senate. They do check to see where the money is spent and whether they are getting a proper expenditure of funding rather than a cursory examination of funding.

We have heard it said time and time again that about 95 per cent of the information these agencies gather comes out of newspapers and 5 per cent is secret. If that is the case, I do not see where an oversight committee would be of that much harm to the organization.

Additionally, another important recommendation was to have SIRC actually review all of the agencies involved in security intelligence, not just CSIS. That was in Recommendation 87 and that becomes very essential.

However, parliamentary oversight is more critical because of what this government has done in the appointment process of SIRC. John Bassett's appointment, in effect, sullied the whole operation of SIRC. It is absolutely necessary that parliamentary oversight be provided, and provided so that Canadians have confidence in what is actually taking place.

We must remember we are dealing with human rights here, and we are dealing with intrusions into people's private lives. In those circumstances, we must be most vigilant. If you politicize the agency that is actually going to be checking on CSIS, by politicizing the appointment process, then you really are putting human rights in jeopardy. That is why parliamentary oversight must occur. That is why, I am sure, most members of the committee, including government members, were concerned that that recommendation was not picked up in the Solicitor General's response.

I think, too, that the whole committee system in Parliament is now under threat or on trial here. There is an obligation to respond to committees and to enact at least in part, what has been done by these hard-working committees. To be treated in this cursory way is unsatisfactory.

I know that my time is going by. In conclusion, I would like to say that maybe the justice committee should take the suggestion of the chairman of the committee and enact a parliamentary oversight committee in spite of the government. I hope that can be achieved.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AGRICULTURE

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to urge the federal government to provide assistance to Canadian farmers on Prince Edward Island who are affected by the United States' decision to its their borders to a majority of Prince Edward Island seed potato stock.

I call on the government to compensate those farmers affected by this ban, to provide assistance in the efforts that will be required to eradicate the disease, to clarify with the United States exactly what it considers to be acceptable for certification procedures and customs standards.

The federal government must also assist in efforts to reaffirm Prince Edward Island's well known reputation as the number one producer of potatoes in the world.

I am confident that if the federal government is willing to provide the necessary assistance, the potato industry in Prince Edward Island has the potential to emerge from this problem stronger than ever.

The federal government's failure to act is increasing the anxiety within the potato industry. Farmers deserve to know where they stand. We need action now.

HEART MONTH

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to speak from the heart to all members and remind them, and Canadians, that February is heart month.

Cardiovascular disease is the main cause of death and a major cause of disability in Canada. Over 70,000 Canadians die from this disease every year. Many of these deaths are preventable by adopting healthy lifestyle habits such as good nutritional habits, physical activity and not smoking.

Control of high blood pressure and diabetes is also important. I am pleased to note that the Department of National Health and Welfare, in collaboration with the provincial departments of health, has launched a Canadian heart health initiative to help reduce the burden of cardiovascular disease.

For the heart, in my own riding of London—Middlesex, there were 3,000 volunteers canvassing for the heart and stroke foundation, raising a total of $244,000 reaching their goal, the biggest and best ever.

On March 1 in London there will be a luncheon, a soup kitchen, at the Century Theatre. One hundred businesses are donating to this cause. There will be a cookbook to help all of our healthy hearts by Ann Lindsey and the Heart and Stroke Foundation called the Light-hearted Everyday Cookbook.

All Canadians should take part raising money and providing a healthy future for all of us.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, in 1986, the Conservatives caved in to pressures from the United States government and signed the Softwood Lumber Tariff Memorandum of Understanding.

This tariff, together with the government's resource management and economic policies, have cost this country thousands of jobs in the forest industry, particularly in British Columbia and northern Ontario.

This Thursday, the trade minister will meet with Premier Vander Zalm who, on the day the MOU was signed, declared that it was a "great day for British Columbia."

Given the American administration's refusal to renegotiate the MOU, it is time for this government to say clearly that it now opposes this agreement and will take immediate steps to terminate the Memorandum.

We wish the minister success in trying to convince the Vander Zalm government to join with the Ontario government and New Democrats across the country to fight this regressive deal.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, weekly newspapers are the backbone of the communications system of rural Canada. This is why, for years, the Government of Canada has supported through subsidization the distribution of what are called community newspapers.

Last year, the Department of Communications announced the withdrawal of a substantial amount of that subsidy. Unfortunately, this information failed to reach many weekly newspaper publishers who sold yearly subscriptions last fall on the assumption that there would be no significant change in postal rates for 1991.

In December, notice came of massive proposed increases which, quite frankly, caught a lot of people off guard.

Indeed, the extent of the increase, combined with the removal of the subsidy from communications, places the future viability of some papers in question.

We need our community newspapers.

I urge the Minister responsible for Canada Post and the Minister of Communications to see what can be done to delay or ameliorate the new rates for community newspapers in order that those affected can properly prepare for the financial impact of these inevitable increases.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, once again the United States is considering oil exploration and development in the heart of the Arctic wildlife refuge in Alaska.

The Arctic wildlife refuge along with the coastal plain and Canada's North Yukon Park constitutes the greatest most productive intact arctic ecosystem in the world. Oil development in the area will definitely jeopardize that ecosystem, and for what? For about 200 days worth of oil supply.

The Arctic National Wildlife Refuge is a calving ground for over 180,000 caribou which provide the basis of the economy of aboriginal communities in Alaska and the Yukon. The herd is also the largest in the world and a unique and priceless resource to all Canadians and Americans.

In July 1987, Canada and the U.S. signed the international agreement for the conservation of the porcupine caribou herd. The agreement calls on both countries to conserve both the animal and its habitat.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has been an advocate for the preservation of these lands and I urge the government to continue its opposition to the development of these lands which could forever destroy a priceless heritage. I further urge the Prime Minister to notify President Bush that the United States could be in violation of the intent of this international accord if development proceeds.

GOVERNMENT AID

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, speaking at the closing lunch of the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association's convention in Montreal, Mr. George Petty, president of Repap, accused John Crow, Governor of the Bank of Canada, of being downright stupid, adding that Crow was on the warpath, aiming his high interest rates at entrepreneurs and workers alike.

According to the Journal de Montréal of February 2, 1991, what George Petty conveniently forgot to say was that in 1986, 1987, 1988 and 1989, his company did not pay a cent of income tax on total profits of $509 million! On top of that, the company received $407 million in government assistance during that period, including $330 million in the form of investment tax credits and $77 million in subsidies!

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, Canadians by now have heard a lot about global climate change. After studying this threat, the environment committee last fall urged the government to take action to reduce one of the main causes; carbon dioxide emissions. Over 700 scientists from 120 countries at the Second World Climate Conference also called for immediate action. Despite the significant scientific evidence calling for reductions of carbon dioxide, all this government plans to do is to freeze emissions at 1990 levels by the year 2000. This falls far short of the recommendations by the scientific community.

The fact of the matter is that without a long-term energy policy, this government is incapable of responding to the climate change threat. Unfortunately, there is no leadership despite all the proclamations at home and abroad by the Prime Minister. This government is retreating from the responsibility of governing, unfortunately.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, the finance minister is about to present us with a hologram budget. It is a vision of make believe that Canadians will see right through. The devastating combination of high interest rates, high dollar and free trade has forced the elimination of at least 1,500 manufacturing jobs in Hamilton and area; companies like Camco, Dare Foods, Stelco, Greening-Donald, Canada Wire and Cable, Nabisco, Ball Packaging, just to name a few. This year, job losses have swelled the welfare case load in Hamilton-Wentworth by 46 per cent over last year.

We say job prospects are bleak. The Minister of National Revenue tells us there is nothing to be concerned about, that businesses are expanding. Well, I wonder if has spoken to his own brother, Henry Jelinek, Jr., who has decided to expand his Ontario manufacturing plant, not in Oakville but in the United States—

Some hon. members: Shame.

Mr. Keyes: —saying that all future hirings will take place in the state of New York.

CANADIAN INSTITUTE FOR RESEARCH ON CULTURAL ENTERPRISES

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, the people of Macleod have been calling for restraint in government spending since before I was elected in 1988. We continue to call for more cuts. That is why I and so many of my constituents are so offended by a recent announcement by the Minister of Communications to create a Canadian Institute for Research on Cultural Enterprises.

• (1410)

This elitist, cosy, so-called cultural research institute will cost $45 million and is an insult to the common sense of the average Canadian, creating yet another subsidized lobby group to add to the clammer for government funds, will not help the deficit, nor will it help Canadian culture.

I call on the Minister of Finance to reduce the budget for this department by at least $45 million.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

TRADE

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, this government's handling of the North American free trade issue gives all Canadians real cause for concern. Canadians have questions that need to be answered.

Does this government have any understanding of the implications the deal will have for ordinary Canadians? Apparently not. It has yet to release any detailed economic analysis.

Does this government have any idea what our negotiating position should be? Apparently not. One day the trade minister tells us that the free trade agreement will not be affected by any new deal and the next day he says there may have to be changes to the free trade deal.

Does this government realize that the Canadian public must be consulted on a potential North American deal? Apparently not. Although the start-up date for negotiations is fast approaching, the government shows no inclination to get any direction from ordinary Canadians.

Does this government have any idea what it is doing to Canada's trade and economic future? Apparently not.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, the readers and publishers of rural and farm weeklies are about to find out exactly what free trade means to them. The Minister of Communications, who found $45 million for the cultural enterprises debacle in Montreal, is now axing the distribution assistance for weekly newspapers. As a result, on Friday, March 1, Canada Post is to increase postal rates for farm and weekly newspapers in Canada by up to 700 per cent. Weeklies like the Western Producer and the Shellbrook Chronicle have played a crucial role in the economic and social development of rural Canada, but this government wants to put them out of business.

That is not the Canadian way. Rural members of the Tory caucus who have been home in their constituencies all know how people feel about this issue. They know that the Minister of Communication is costing them votes. Therefore, I call on them to have enough courage to get this un-Canadian policy changed.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, in my corner of rural Nova Scotia, the weekly community newspapers play a very important role. The Oxford Journal, The Citizen, The Truro Weekly and the Springhill Record protect and encourage the very fabric of our way of life.

Proposed postal rate increases for the community newspapers will increase their mailing costs for some papers as much as five times the previous rates and these smaller newspapers just simply cannot absorb it. Another problem is that although the increases were announced in the Gazette, many of the newspapers are just now realizing the impact on their businesses and require more advanced notice.

Collectively, these newspapers have asked that a two stage approach be taken to address this issue. First, that a scheduled postal increase be reduced and, second, that the resulting increases be phased in over a period of time with adequate notice so that they can adjust their rates and notify their customers accordingly.

I strongly support this position and urge the ministers involved to work with the industry on this issue.

CANADIAN SECURITY AND INTELLIGENCE SERVICE

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Solicitor General tabled the government's response to the report of the Special Parliamentary Committee to Review the Canadian Security and Intelligence Service Act.

That committee reported in September last with a unanimous report containing 117 recommendations. Of those 117, the government has accepted only two.

This is disappointing to the members of the committee. It should also be disappointing to this Parliament. However, many of the committee's recommendations can still be implemented by the Solicitor General, by CSIS, by the Security Intelligence Review Committee and by other agencies within the security establishment.

The Solicitor General has committed himself to making an annual report to Parliament on this subject and Parliament's concerns in this area are clearly set out in the original report as a touchstone for updating and reform.

Notwithstanding this failure of the government to fully and fairly respond to this parliamentary report, all members of Parliament and this committee and the committees of this House can, and we hope will, preserve the many unfulfilled goals of this report in the time that remains in this Parliament.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

POVERTY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Not only are the Tories poor managers of our economy, they are poor managers without compassion. During this Prime Minister's two terms there has been economic growth throughout the world.

If the Tories were so good at managing the economy, why are more than one million children living below the poverty line? Why do 250,000 Canadians need help to find shelter? Why do the majority of native children live below the poverty line? Why do more than 500,000 Canadians have to use food banks every year? Why, Mr. Prime Minister?

[English]

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I think that on this side of the House we can stand proudly on our record on the economy over the last six years.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Loiselle: I am personally very proud to be part of the government that has created more jobs than any government in the past, that has caused the economy to increase faster than any other government in the past.

That being said, I would like to tell the hon. member also that the number of people below the poverty line has been reduced considerably and the wealth of this country has been increased considerably.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister should realize that the victims of the Tories' poor management of the economy are not just statistics but real people.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he is aware of the fact that in Saint-Henri, the average life expectancy is 11 years less than it is on the other side of the track, in Westmount. Is he aware of those statistics? And is he also aware of the fact that 99 per cent of poor children never go to college or university? After six and a half years in power, is the Prime Minister proud of his record as far as Canada's poor are concerned?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): To hear the hon. member talk, Mr. Speaker, one would think her party had never been in power. I may remind her of the deplorable state of this country's economy when we came to power in 1984. It was terrible!

That being said, we realize there are still pockets of poverty in this country. And that is why it is so important to work together to increase the wealth of this country. However, every time we tried to do so, every time we wanted to take steps to reduce the government's presence and leave more room for business and small businesses, all we got from the opposition was opposition, nothing else.

This government is determined to improve this country's economy and its prosperity, for the benefit of all Canadians.

[English]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, perhaps at some point in the next few months this government is going to start taking responsibility for its agenda.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Copps: Last January when we were out consulting with the people we heard, for example, that a mere two blocks from Parliament Hill a soup kitchen serves 80,000 lunches a year to people who do not have enough to eat. That soup kitchen was not doing business at the time that the Liberals were in government. They are doing business now and they are doing a business of 80,000 lunches a year.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Copps: Well, perhaps if you took the time to consult, you might hear what the people are saying about the situation in 1991.

Three out of five single mothers in the province of Manitoba live below the poverty line. If the government's economic agenda is so good, why are the facts on poverty so devastating? If the government's economic record is so good, why are there so many food banks, so many homeless, so many welfare cases, why so many poor Canadians?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to give to the hon. member certain numbers that will help her understand the road that we have taken since 1984.

Let us start with Newfoundland where employment has grown by 18.5 per cent from 1984, your regime, to January of this year, our regime.

• (1420)

If you go to Nova Scotia, there is an increase of 13.3 per cent employment; New Brunswick, 17.4 per cent from your regime to our regime. I could down the list: Ontario, a 12.4 per cent increase; Manitoba, a 6.4 per cent increase; Alberta, 11.9 per cent; British Columbia, a 21.4 per cent difference between your management and ours even in a time of recession.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Finance.

In discussing interest rates, the government never mentions the fact that the difference between U.S. and Canadian interest rates has remained at unprecedented high levels over the past year. At four percentage points the continuing spread is contributing to an overpriced Canadian dollar, which resulted last year in the decline of Canadian exports to the United States of $1 billion.

How can the government seek to promote Canada's international competitiveness when the spread between Canadian and U.S. interest rates remains unchanged, when the government's high dollar policy is undermining our export industries?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and others in this House have indicated the importance of reducing the interest rates.

We have indicated to the opposition party how we were working at bringing the interest rates down. The result of our policy is that over the last two months interest rates have gone down by 200 points. This is not rhetoric; these are facts.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, evidently the minister did not understand what I was asking. I am not saying that the interest rates have not come down. I am saying that the spread between Canadian and U.S. interest rates has not diminished. Canadian interest rate reductions have been tracking U.S. interest rate reductions.

The problem facing Canadian industry, Canadian exporters, is that that spread has remained the same for the past year. We are rendering ourselves—

Mr. McDermid: That is totally wrong.

Mr. MacLaren: It is not wrong. The spread has dropped from only 5 to 4 per cent and is still at an historically high level. When is this government going to bring down that spread so as to give Canadian exporters the opportunity they deserve to participate in world markets?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed very important that we get these interest rates down. I take the point made by the hon. member that there is indeed a spread, but this spread is there because of the pressures.

We have been trying to explain to the hon. member that this country has been living under higher pressure than the United States. Our monetary policy was addressed a year ago. In this House I indicated to members that we found that demand was too high. The economy was slowing down but Canadians were still buying and buying. Demand was going up and we said: "This is very dangerous. We are living beyond our means". Every time we wanted to bring our contribution fiscally and otherwise to reduce this, we never got any support from the opposition parties. Far from it; all of our measures were refused.

This is the result of our policy. Interest rates are coming down and the gap is narrowing.

GULF WAR

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Iraqi troops are now withdrawing from Kuwait, and yet President Bush has decided to pursue the war and to reject every proposal to bring this war to an end. I think Canadians would like to see the Prime Minister stand up and give an opinion on behalf of Canada and not simply echo the U.S. position.

Today the Prime Minister made a statement that he would like to see the Security Council hold a meeting to discuss compliance of Iraq with the resolutions.

I would ask the Prime Minister, in addition to that, will the government also support a cease-fire which can be monitored by the United Nations and support that cease-fire immediately? By any standards the war is won. When is enough enough?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, enough is enough when an aggressor nation indicates once and for all that it is going to honour all of the resolutions of the UN Security Council.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: Iraq's Ambassador to the United Nations was asked at 12.30 today whether or not Iraq intends to honour all 12 resolutions of the Security Council, and his answer was no. He said: "Some of these resolutions may be invalid. We have our own reservations. Some of them lend sort of themselves to different interpretations. So we really have to take it step by step."

All members of the coalition, from Denmark to Great Britain to the socialist Government of France, today said the position put forward by the Leader of the NDP is unacceptable.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. At least, Mr. Speaker, the NDP has its own position and not just one that it copied from George Bush.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, all witnesses say the Iraqi army is withdrawing en masse. My question is still directed to the Prime Minister.

Will the Canadian government support the ceasefire to allow the withdrawal of Iraqi troops under UN surveillance?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for the New Democratic Party stated that the NDP has its own specific position. And indeed it does. It is practically the only party in this country and the only socialist party in the world that is taking this position. In France, they were saying this morning that France was favourable to putting a stop to the hostilities, provided all Security Council resolutions were strictly observed. However, it did not want to run the risk of dilatory manoeuvres at a time when its soldiers were engaged in combat. France believes it is up to the Security Council to take note of any official statements by the Iraqi authorities, that they agree to act on all the UN's decisions. That is France's position, it is Canada's position, and it is the position of any civilized country.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister and I are in agreement with one thing, and that is that the New Democratic Party is the only party that has had the courage to stand up and say: "Try diplomacy, try other methods and use war as a last resort".

We know that much of Iraq's military force has been destroyed, that in fact the UN resolutions that authorized force to ensure that Iraq withdrew from Kuwait, which is what the last resolution says, is being done, we understand, by the retreat of Iraqi troops. U.S. pilots have told reporters that while Iraqi troops are fleeing from Kuwait, they are bombing them with cluster bombs on the highways north of Kuwait City. In the words of one pilot, "we hit the jackpot."

My question to the Prime Minister is: Are Canadian pilots involved in this bombing of the retreat of Iraqi forces?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, Canadian pilots and CF-18 aircraft are fully engaged in the prosecution of the effort to ensure that the President of Iraq conveys, unmistakably, his complete acceptance of the 12 United Nations resolutions to the Security Council. At that time and at that time alone would a cease-fire be appropriate, and would the Government of Canada instruct its CF-18s to cease and desist from the kind of action in which they are engaged in prosecution of the defence of the United Nations.

My hon. friend began with a prefatory remark that the NDP is the only party to try diplomacy and to try other methods. But she did not complete the NDP policy. It is also the only party that says that when we have to fight to defend freedom or the United Nations, count the NDP out.

• (1430)

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pursue some questions with the Prime Minister on the same topic.

I think we all recognize that this is a very crucial time and that there is a hope that the fighting can be brought to an end.

It is my understanding that the Security Council is meeting this afternoon and will be inviting the Iraqi representative in New York to present the case that the Iraqi government has announced and to determine its judgment.

What I would like to know from the Prime Minister is: Has Canada, according to the statements just made, already rejected outright this announcement of withdrawal, or is Canada going to await the judgment of the United Nations Security Council as to whether it meets the conditions or not?

In other words, are we prepared to await whether the Security Council itself decides that the conditions are appropriate, or have we already made up our mind?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the informal meeting of the Security Council has just broken up. Iraq did not report. Iraq has not reported or responded to the Security Council. What Iraq has done is issue a radio broadcast. That is not the way to settle this dispute, and Iraq knows this.

The way that this matter can be brought to an end is for Iraq to come to the Security Council and to present its clear acceptance, as the Prime Minister said today unequivocally and clearly, of the resolutions of the Security Council.

As it has been from the beginning, the way to end this war has been in the hands of Saddam Hussein.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs to clarify a point.

Is it not true that an outside country such as Iraq, while it is a member of the United Nations and not a member of the Security Council, cannot attend informal meetings of the Security Council, but that in fact there have to be formal meetings to which they can be invited? Under the rules of the UN that is not possible when it is in informal proceedings.

Will Iraq be specifically invited to make its case in front of the United Nations? Does the government believe that in crucial matters such as this it should be the UN Security Council that makes the judgments as to whether the requirements of the UN resolutions are being met, or is that a decision that is simply being made by the coalition partners? Where is the decision being made, by the UN or by the coalition?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, to answer what the hon. member calls his technical question, the Soviet Union, as he should know, has made it known that it would be prepared to make itself available to convey a message to an informal meeting, if that is what Iraq chooses, of the Security Council with respect to Iraq's specific acceptance of conditions.

The point is not who will carry the message. The point is that there is no message. Saddam Hussein has not indicated that he is prepared to accept the will of the world as spelled out in the Security Council resolutions.

With regard to who decides, the Prime Minister of Canada has made abundantly clear on a number of occasions and again today that the decisions rest with the Security Council, with the United Nations, with no one else, but before the United Nations can decide on the response by Iraq, Iraq must respond positively, absolutely and unconditionally to all of the resolutions set forth by the United Nations.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

Our planes in the gulf have had a number of roles throughout the war: air patrol, sweep and escort and, more recently, a bombing mission. I want to ask the Minister of National Defence: What is the role of the CF-18s in the gulf at this moment? Is it business as usual? Have any new orders been issued or are they contemplated to the CF-18s in the gulf by the minister or by the Canadian commander in the gulf?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker. I have said on several occasions that the role of the CF-18 squadron, under the air tasking orders as agreed to by the Canadian commander in the Middle East, is that of combat air patrol, sweep and escort, and air to ground interdiction.

There has been no change, and I do not anticipate any until the results of the coalition effort have brought about a compliance with the United Nations resolutions under which the CF-18 squadron and all Canadian personnel are involved in enforcing.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

Technically our country has not declared war in this Persian Gulf conflict. Consequently, that would mean that our men and women serving in the gulf do not qualify for veterans' pensions.

I want to ask the minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, to tell this House and the families of these service people today what they can expect in terms of veterans benefits. Will they qualify for the same benefits equally as veterans of the two world wars and the Korean war?

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, naturally all members of this House hope and pray that there will be no casualties in this war, but we have to face that possibility, that reality, because that is the reality of war.

It is for that very reason that this government has declared the gulf area to be a special duty area. That gives the men and women serving there very special, preferential treatment with regard to pensions.

I should mention, so as to make it very clear to the families of the people who are serving there, what is covered under that. First of all, they are covered for 24 hours a day while there. They may qualify disability pensions, treatment services for their disabilities, survivors' benefits, attendance allowance, special clothing allowance, home modification, retraining assistance, and exceptional incapacity allowance.

Of course this is in addition to what my colleague, the Minister of National Defence, has announced in the way of benefits for those people who are so valiantly serving their country in the gulf area.

CANADIAN AVIATION INDUSTRY

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

The Minister of Transport is proposing to give American airlines the right to undermine and possibly eliminate Canadian carriers through a change in the Canada—U.S. bilateral air agreement. This change which would give the Americans cabotage rights to provide scheduled air services between Canadian cities is opposed by the majority of the Canadian aviation industry and in fact was opposed by all members of the all-party special committee on transport.

Will the minister today instruct his negotiator that cabotage is not to be granted to the United States aviation industry under any circumstances whatsoever?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as the House well knows and the committee knows, we are renegotiating this agreement in an effort to get improved service for Canadian consumers, Canadian communities, and Canadian airlines.

The all-party report said that the status quo is not acceptable. That is what your hon. friend said.

Mr. Marchi: What did they say about cabotage?

Mr. Lewis: Well, let's get to cabotage. In discussing the negotiating mandate, the committee said in its report: "We have reached the conclusion that we are not in a position to recommend a specific negotiating option to the government. We will negotiate for a better deal for Canada".

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, the report of the special committee states on page 12: "While we want to give the government as much latitude as possible in these negotiations, we do not think that American carriers should be given cabotage rights under a new agreement".

That reflects the overwhelming opinion of the aviation industry, whether it is industry, labour or the community groups. The minister rejected this comment by the committee when he spoke not to Canadians, but to Americans, and said that cabotage was on the table. Why is he going against the wishes and the reality of the Canadian aviation industry?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I repeat. The Canadian airlines have encouraged us to give them more opportunities to serve Canadians and to serve the routes. That is one of the recommendations of the committee.

My friend quotes from the committee report. He did not go on to read page 27 wherein it states: "We have recognized that the government must be given the maximum negotiating latitude and that limited cabotage exclusively for our carriers may be an advantage in the negotiations".

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue.

The unemployment insurance legislation the government passed last year was supposed to produce the be-all and end-all for Canadians. In family owned businesses the regulations concerning non-arm's length relationships created backlogs in the Department of National Revenue where rulings had to be made on individual cases. It created hardships for many families who went without income for several weeks and who had to be supported by relatives, friends, and the municipal welfare offices.

Will the Minister of National Revenue today commit himself and the government to ceasing to treat Canadians in such a callous a uncaring way and see to it that National Revenue will never again hold up unemployment insurance payments to the unemployed?

• (1440)

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, this government ceased treating Canadian taxpayers in a callous way the moment that one of my predecessors, the present Minister of National Health and Welfare, brought in the taxpayers' bill of rights.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

An amendment to the Canadian Constitution in 1940 transferred the responsibility for the unemployed to the federal government. Many municipal welfare budgets have doubled and tripled in the last few months as a result of this government-created recession.

When is the Government of Canada going to live up to that constitutional responsibility and stop throwing the burden of unemployment in this country on to the backs of the municipalities and the provinces?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will know that Bill C-21 went a long way toward alleviating some of the problems to which he refers.

Unfortunately, there was a problem in the Senate in having this passed in an appropriate fashion. We have now taken every step to alleviate this problem. I can assure the hon. member and members of this House of Commons that this problem has now been resolved.

GAS PRICES

M. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The Competition Act has no regulations to deal with fraud concerning gas prices. The legislation only refers to price fixing. Why doesn't the department take the initiative and set up an agency to prevent fraud instead of merely acting in a monitoring capacity?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member ought to know that retail gas prices are a provincial responsibility. The federal government's responsibility concerns competition and whether there is any collusion with intent to defraud or act against the interests of consumers. The provinces have plenty of room to intervene. Two provinces already have legislation to deal with this, and I have discussed the matter with my provincial colleagues. They have plenty of room to manoeuvre, and I hope, Mr. Speaker that it was not the hon. member's intention to ask me at this stage to intervene in what is really a provincial matter.

[English]

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, for the same minister.

Consumer groups and Canadians across the country are not satisfied with the government's assurances that gasoline prices are entirely the result of market forces.

Canadians deserve to have concrete evidence that the price of gasoline is fair. Will the minister establish an independent review board to investigate gasoline pricing in Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member considers what has been happening across Canada during the past few weeks, he will notice that there has been a very real drop in the price of gas in most Canadian regions, which can only benefit Canadian consumers. This government has always believed that it was in the interest of consumers to have as much competition as possible in this sector, so that Canadians can continue to enjoy the benefits of price reductions and competition.

TRADE

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade and it involves Algoma Steel.

If the federal government wants positive proof that its economic policies are not working, it is Algoma and the effect of high interest rates, the high Canadian dollar and the free trade agreement.

Given the fact that provincial loan guarantees were listed as a subsidy by Americans in a countervail action against SYSCO Steel, what is the minister doing to reassure steel corporations in this country that loan guarantees will not be construed as a subsidy, and this will not happen to Algoma?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether or not the hon. member made his presence felt when there was a five-month strike at Algoma Steel some time ago that certainly badly crippled Algoma Steel.

With respect to the subsidy question, I hope the hon. member is pleased that we now have the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement in effect so that if there is an allegation of any subsidy, in connection with Algoma Steel or any other company, it can now go to a Chapter 19 panel which will have the final say on whether or not there is such a subsidy as they have done in the pork case, which establishes beyond any doubt the efficiency and the finality of the dispute settlement system and by itself shows how valuable the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement is. I am delighted to relieve the hon. member's mind in that instance.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I will pass on the reassurance of the minister and indicate that you won a pork ruling but have lost all steel rulings, so it is no assurance at all.

My supplementary question is for the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology, and I do appreciate his personal involvement in this issue to this point in time.

In a meeting on February 11, he indicated to me that his department would serve on the task force studying the long-term viability of Algoma. In the ensuing press conference he indicated that in no way could the federal government involve itself in the long-term restructuring of Algoma. Now, these statements conflict.

Will the minister reaffirm his commitment to serve on the task force and what positive initiatives is he considering to ensure the long-term viability of Algoma and for Canadian jobs?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I want to say first that I was pleased to work on the loan guarantee for Algoma with the three other partners. This government did this particularly for the people of Sault Ste. Marie.

Second, I made no conflicting declaration. I said that the people of Industry, Science and Technology would always be available to work with anyone to see if there is a way that we can helpful in terms of the future of the company. I said also that there is no way that the Government of Canada, as my friend knows very well because of any countervailing action, could be involved, in light of the policy which was put forward in the steel industry in 1984. It has always been respected that the Government of Canada will not be involved in the restructuring of the company itself. But, if we can be helpful in terms of advice which could be given by the department, we will be pleased to do so.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue. Just one of the many positive aspects of the GST is the federal sales tax inventory rebate and many businesses are anxiously awaiting their refund.

If an application for the rebate was received by the department in the middle of January, when could the rebate be expected? Second, what could a specific business do if the need is urgent?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, at the outset the claims for federal sales tax rebate on inventory exceeded expectations. There was a temporary slowdown in the processing of those rebate claims. Since then we have streamlined the process.

I can assure the hon. member that we are back on track and able to expedite them in the 21-day period as we had intended from the start. In fact, we have to date expedited 23,302 claims and those cheques have gone out to the businesses across the country to assist them with their cash flow.

May I just conclude, Mr. Speaker, by taking this opportunity to compliment the business sector, particularly the Canadian Retail Council, for doing such a tremendous job in assisting the business community with this massive tax change, to have made it as smooth and as efficient for the business community and the consumer as is possible.

BANKRUPTCY

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and it concerns the unprecedented level of bankruptcies caused by this government's own policies.

For every statistic, for every business that is driven into bankruptcy, there are employees who at the end of the day have to go home and tell their families there will be no more pay cheques. They will have to call the bank and say that the mortgage payment will be late. They will be hounded by bill collectors, suffer tremendous family stress, with many driven to become part of the statistics because they will have to declare personal bankruptcy themselves. My question to the Prime Minister is clear. Why does his government consistently and absolutely refuse to recognize and address the real tragedies, the human tragedies, caused by his government's economic policies?

• (1450)

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): I will not deny the fact that we are in a recession. I will not deny the fact that for many Canadians this is very tragic, and I will not deny the fact that we have to do everything we can to extricate ourselves from this sad situation.

That being said, I would like the hon. member to remember what the federal bankruptcy superintendent said, when you start comparing, for example, January with January. In January, 1990, we were booming, so going up. In this particular time we are in the midst of a recession. The superintendent said, and he is a neutral person, "I am very confident that come May, because we are not comparing apples with apples, come May we will be comparing apples with apples and the situation will be much improved".

That being said, I recognize that Canadians would like us to do everything we can and we are fiscally and financially to help Canada recover a good economy.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister.

The recession is hitting southwestern Ontario hard. Nearly 30 per cent of Chatham's automotive work force is unemployed. Motor Wheel has lost over 600 jobs. Welfare cases in Kent county are up over 400 per cent from 1981 levels.

This is no ordinary recession. Many companies are shut down for good. Jobs are lost forever. How will the minister help workers and their families?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I would like to come back to the first question my friend asked about bankruptcies in this country.

Yesterday the Minister of Finance insisted on the fact, and the Minister of State for Finance raised it today also, that since 1984 with the prosperity we had with this government, a lot of companies were starting up. For that reason it is obvious that we have more companies in bankruptcy today because there are many more starts in 1990 than there were in 1984.

He knows very well, Mr. Speaker, and the Minister of Finance said yesterday that we have closings, mergers, for a lot of reasons. Otherwise the bankruptcies themselves are due to recession.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, my friend and his party should look at what is the real economy and he will understand those figures.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture.

Prince Edward Island has been virtually locked out of all of its North American seed potato markets. This year is lost. Forty million dollars have gone down the drain.

In addition, the American and Canadian bans give no indication to the growers as to how they can recertify. What the seed growers need to know is where do they get certified seed for their spring plantings in order to stay in business?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is aware I am sure of the work and the co-operation that has been going on between the two levels of government and indeed the producers. I think what is really necessary is summed up in the words of Mr. George Webster, the chairman of the P.E.I. Potato Marketing Board. He said: "This year may be lost but we have to start to salvage and rebuild our seed industry".

That is precisely what we are attempting to do. We are looking at a compensation package. An eradication program has been developed with the co-operation of the growers and the government. As a matter of fact, as of right now, there are further negotiations and discussions going on in Washington with the aim of restoring normal seed to our trade patterns.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I think George Webster would also like to know where he is getting his certified seed for his planting for spring.

Agriculture Canada does not know where the virus PVYN came from. The Americans do not test for the virus, but we do. The virus could very well have come into Canada from the United States. Why will the minister not demand the same rigid testing standards to potatoes coming into Canada from the United States as the Americans are demanding from us?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the hon. member would be delighted to know that we are applying the same standards to the American product crossing the border into Canada as product going into the United States. He shakes his head in the negative. I indicate to him that that is the case. We are in fact doing that as of now.

The PVYN virus was detected in late summer last year. After further analysis and post-harvest testing and laboratory analysis it was identified to be prevalent on 14 farms in Prince Edward Island and three farms in New Brunswick. We immediately, in co-operation with the two provincial governments and with the producers, set out an eradication program, a certification program in an attempt to deal with this very critical disease. That is continuing.

I have assured both the growers and the two ministers of agriculture that Agriculture Canada would take all necessary steps to eradicate the disease and to save the producers harmless from their losses.

NORTHERN TAX BENEFITS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue.

In early December the government announced that a number of communities would be reinstated in terms of receiving at least a partial northern tax benefit. That was early December. No legislation has been introduced in this House and no tax forms are available for those Canadians in order to fill in their taxation for that 1990 taxation year.

First of all, when will the legislation be introduced in the House and second, when will the tax form be available so those Canadians can fill in their 1990 taxation forms?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the New Democratic Party will be supportive of the initiatives that the Minister of Finance, in conjunction with Revenue Canada, have been taking. We are now in the process of discussing this matter with our House leader and hopefully other House leaders as to when this can come before the House for consideration.

Revenue Canada is prepared and ready to deal with this matter any day. The sooner this passes through this House the better for northern residents.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows that the government made a decision two and a half months ago to change this legislation. It has not introduced it.

We would like to ask the minister this. Will he guarantee that they will not blackmail people in the north and that there will be legislation introduced immediately which is specifically on the northern tax benefit and does not include other measures which implement the government's budget?

These people have waited two and a half months. Why not introduce the legislation now?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, that suggestion is just ludicrous. That should not surprise me coming from where it comes from.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Jelinek: There has always been and continues to be an ongoing attempt for widespread consultation on every issue that this government undertakes and the northern residents' benefits is no exception.

The hon. member will know, and his leader agrees with this, that we have embarked upon a most extensive consultation process with northern residents on this matter. That is why there has been a delay.

The House resumed sitting after a short break just yesterday. If the hon. member will co-operate, as I am sure will the Liberals, he will have his legislation and northern residents will have their benefits.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, a single question.

FISHERIES

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries who, in the midst of this made-in-Canada recession created by his government, is intent upon compounding the difficulties facing Atlantic fishermen with massive new dockside monitoring charges. These charges come at the same time as inshore fishermen throughout Atlantic Canada are paying for his government's mismanagement through quota cuts and falling prices.

Where is the fairness here? Will the minister not rescind these new dockside monitoring charges before hundreds of fishermen go out of business?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): No, Mr. Speaker, I will not.

THE LATE GUS MACFARLANE

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Gus MacFarlane, a former member of Parliament who passed away this past weekend.

Gus proudly and diligently served the citizens of Hamilton Mountain as their member of Parliament between 1974 and 1979. Those who knew him during his years in Ottawa, and his many other friends, remember his cheerful personality and wonderful singing voice.

He served with commitment as Chief Government Whip. His fellow parliamentarians will remember his special project fighting for the rights of backbenchers on both sides of the House.

Outside of politics, Gus MacFarlane was extensively involved in several national organizations. A member of the Canadian Paraplegic Association since 1985, he was also a founding member of the association's Prince Edward Island branch in 1986. For the last two years, he served as the Chairman of the Canadian Paraplegic Association's national fund raising committee.

Gus was also deeply committed to Canadian amateur football. A past president of Football Canada, he was most recently the President of Football P.E.I., working to resurrect the sport on the island.

The greatest tribute to Gus MacFarlane will not be in our words of sadness today, but in the memories of the many people to whom he provided so much encouragement.

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, following on the words of the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain, I wish to pay tribute to the late Gus MacFarlane.

I was a new member of Parliament when Gus was in the House. He was always extremely helpful to me, and a friend to me, as he was to all colleagues on this side of the House.

I am sure that the whole House, and all of his former constituents in the Hamilton area, wish his family their deepest sympathies at this moment of their sorrow. They should know that the House of Commons thought very highly of Gus MacFarlane.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I want to join my colleagues in expressing my sorrow at the passing of Gus MacFarlane, whom I knew very well.

He was the Chief Whip of the Liberal Party at a time when I was the Chief Whip for the New Democratic Party a number of years ago.

Gus MacFarlane was one of those members who was very well liked by all members of the House of Commons, regardless of which side of the House they sat on. He was well liked, very outspoken, and very frank. He was also a great orator with a loud, booming voice. I am sure that all of us who were here remember him well.

He was also very interested in sports. It was an activity that he followed long before he was elected as a member of Parliament, that he was involved with as a member and, of course, after he was no longer a member in 1980.

Gus will be missed by all. I extend, on behalf of my party, our sympathy to his family and to his many friends.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I just want to add a few words to those already said here.

Gus MacFarlane came to Charlottetown some years ago. He came to work for Veterans Affairs as a member of the War Veterans' Allowance Board.

Soon after his arrival in the city, he became very well known as a community leader. One of the first acts he did in Charlottetown was initiate the Charlottetown Winter Carnival, which has become a well-known annual event.

As my colleague has said, he was also responsible for the resurrection of amateur football in the city of Charlottetown.

I would like to express to his family my deepest sympathy. The youth of our country and of my home province were the beneficiaries of the many hours of hard work and dedication that Gus MacFarlane gave.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I asked a question, which was answered by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in which I took a direct quote from the transcript of a statement issued by the Secretary-General of the United Nations.

In response to that, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that I was taking liberties with this statement, and furthermore that this was a repetition of an attempt to misrepresent statements of the Secretary-General and this was not an honest process of foreign policy.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to read to you directly the quote of the Secretary-General. It says:

> —in consonance with the resolutions of the Security Council. Openings towards the cessation of the conflict have been clearly revealed during the past two days. It would be tragic in the extreme if > the opportunities that have been created were now being lost. I appeal most earnestly that this not be the case.

He then went on to say:

> The United Nations and I, I may add as the Secretary–General, are passing through a most trying and painful experience. Since the beginning of the crisis, there has been devastation on a vast scale. The consequences for a vital and strategically most important region of the world are incalculable.

This is the quote I used:

> We have the obligation to uphold the principles which prompted the Security Council's resolutions and we have to respond to the supreme moral imperative of preventing further destruction of life. These two objectives should not be irreconcilable.

Then he goes on to say how he hopes the decisions will be successful.

The point I am making, Mr. Speaker, is that I quoted directly from the Secretary–General. I quoted in the context that the Secretary–General was making an appeal that a peaceful resolution be found, as I have just quoted from his statement.

Unfortunately, the Secretary of State for External Affairs was unable to read these transcripts properly, or understand them, and I think it is an imputation against my privilege as a member that I was trying to misrepresent the Secretary–General and not deal with this in an honest way. I think it is unfortunate that the Secretary of State for External Affairs, when he is not able to answer a question, tries to impugn the motives of a member who asked it.

I ask that this privilege be examined by Your Honour under section 48 of the rules.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, let me remind the House that my response to the member for Winnipeg was that it would serve the interests of us all if he did not take liberties with statements of the Secretary–General. This is not the first time, as he will recall that I had to call him to order in committee. This is not the first time that he has taken one phrase from a statement by the Secretary–General and then attributed to the Secretary–General a meaning quite different from what the Secretary–General of the United Nations had indicated.

This is what the member for Winnipeg said in the House, referring to the Secretary–General of the United Nations. He said: "that the UN resolutions against Iraq could be upheld while still addressing the moral imperative for preventing further destruction. And we know this appeal of the Secretary–General was not successful this past weekend".

The clear conclusion anyone would draw from that is that there had been an appeal made by the Secretary–General which was rejected.

Let me quote from what the Secretary–General of the United Nations has been saying on that subject.

In answer to the question "Do you think that the ground offensive cut off any chances for constructive diplomacy before they really had time to achieve anything?", the Secretary–General answered: "History shows that hostilities and diplomacy can live together. The one thing we have to be hopeful for is that something can be done in order to avoid losses of lives."

There was then another question asking about military operations. He said to the person posing the question: "You are probably more knowledgeable about military operations than me, but it appears it is something which is indispensable in order to obtain the objective which is exclusively to liberate Kuwait."

The honourable member, I know, is a reader of The New York Times. He will know that the interpretation of The New York Times in an article of yesterday, entitled "UN Chief Backs Strike" accepts my interpretation, not the interpretation he put on the record and tried to raise again today.

In the committee the other day, the member for Winnipeg said: "On the weekend the Secretary–General of the United Nations quoted in a BBC commentary that he is anguished that the lives of millions of civilians are in danger by confrontation, that civilian casualties are mounting, and that there is widespread damage to residential areas."

As a matter of fact, the statement was not made by the Secretary–General, it was made by a senior UN official. That was clear in the news article which I believe the hon. member was quoting, an article in the Sunday Citizen of February 10, by Mr. Trevor Rowe, which says:

> A UN official who works closely with Perez de Cuellar says—

I went on in the context of that committee hearing to make the point.

I think it is correct to say that the Secretary–General of the United Nations expressed his anguish at the loss of civilian life.

• (1510)

Everyone in this committee would express that anguish. To translate that into a criticism or to make it something that it is not does no service to the facts or to the Secretary–General of the United Nations.

I think that, at best, this is a matter of debate, but since the hon. member put his version on the record I thought I would place mine.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre wishes to respond. Very briefly, please.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has, once again, going to sleight of hand, quoted from a different document. I am quoting from the statement the Secretary–General made on February 23, 1991, a direct statement where he said it would be tragic, in the extreme, if the opportunities that have been created were now to be lost and he appealed most earnestly that this not be the case. If that is not an appeal for a peaceful resolution, I do not know what is. I would simply say that it is up to the Secretary of State for External Affairs to start treating statements in this House with the seriousness with which they were presented and quit trying to distort them and smear them, as he always tries to do.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I listened very carefully to the exchange yesterday and I have had an opportunity to reread it. I have listened to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and to the right hon. the minister.

One of the difficulties in brisk exchanges in this House is that sometimes there is an indication from one side or the other, and often from both sides, that neither version which they are counting on is as accurate as someone on the other side might wish it to be.

I have no doubt as to the sincerity of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre in putting the question he did. The right hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs replied and engaged the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre in some argument as to what had been said at certain times and what meaning should be put upon it. That, I am afraid, is a question of debate and in the absence of very clear words of defamation exchanged between members, that is where it must stay.

I thank both hon. members for their courtesy.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Right Hon. Joe Clark (for the President of the Treasury Board) moved that Bill C–9l, an act to amend the Financial Administration Act and other acts in consequence thereof, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs) and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make just a few final remarks about C–91, the act to amend the Financial Administration Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

I think that not only people in this House but people across this country, business people and other citizens, recognize that any business that tried to function in today's environment with rules and procedures that were over 40 years old would find it impossible. It would be inefficient and would not be able to operate long. That is the situation, in effect, that the Government of Canada now finds itself in. Although it has been manoeuvring around it, the rules and procedures that it operates under are 40 years old. I think it is recognized on all sides of the House that those procedures must be updated.

Bill C–91, therefore, is largely technical in nature. It is intended to make the financial management processes more efficient and to modernize certain procedures. The ultimate objective is to bring financial administration in the federal government into the modern electronic world. By permitting the introduction of new efficiencies and the use of electronic technology, these amendments would assist departments to do more with less to the benefit of all Canadians.

More specifically, the bill will improve the management of the federal government's cash inflows and outflows, increase the efficiency with which government programs and services are administered, streamline and modernize internal administrative processes, provide enhanced tools to facilitate the management of the public debt and provide more flexibility in the funding and delivery of services, thereby providing better service to the public.

For example, the amendments to section 17(4) and (5) contained in clause 5 will eliminate the current cumbersome process that is involved in settling with banks and other financial institutions for NSF cheques received by the government.

This amendment will also pave the way for streamlining the process of paying fees and commissions to agents who act on behalf of the government, thereby minimizing the paper burden imposed on them.

It has long been an accepted practice for agents in the private sector to withhold their fees and commissions from the funds collected. This applies whether one is selling a house, a ticket to a sports event or a concert, or even selling real estate. Even the provincial government permits retail outlets to withhold their administration fees from sales tax collected.

But not so for the federal government. The full amount collected must first be deposited in the Consolidated Revenue Fund and then a separate cheque issued for fees and commissions payable.

The changes contained in this bill are long overdue and essential to fostering an efficient and businesslike approach to day by day transactions.

The bill also includes amendments designed to streamline and modernize the payment process. The amendments to section 34 will provide greater flexibility to use modern principles of risk management when verifying invoices and other claims for payment, while those to sections 35 and 36 mean that the government would truly enter the electronic age and take full advantage of electronic payment techniques. This would be of particular benefit to the government suppliers since payment would actually be in their hands on the due date. It also has cash management implications for large contributions and other major financial assistance to industry. With electronic payments, large cash advances would be eliminated and funds held in the Consolidated Revenue Fund until the last minute. This means savings for the people of Canada and the Government of Canada.

Other improvements in the financial management process are aimed at streamlining the approval process for tax remissions, reducing internal red tape and other impediments to collecting at least part of the millions of dollars worth of debts currently deemed uncollectable. Those are dollars owed to the government, to the people of this country, that this government must make sure to collect if at all possible.

The bill provides uniform and consistent authority to waive charges and forgive money owed to the government on humanitarian grounds and where circumstances otherwise warrant. This, in fact, would make our government more human.

It also clarifies the requirements for recording and settling debts owed at the end of a fiscal year thereby eliminating any unwarranted overhead costs.

It reduces the paper burden by eliminating reports that nearly duplicate information already provided to Parliament through the expanded information now provided in part 3 of the Estimates.

In summary, this bill is designed to bring financial management practices in the government into the modern age and to increase productivity. This it will do without sacrificing or diluting the fundamental principles of parliamentary control of our expenditures.

I would, however, be remiss if in concluding I did not mention that during debate in this Chamber, and also in committee, certain concerns were expressed over the wording of clause 6 on user fees. These concerns related principally to ensuring that users would not be called upon to pay more than their appropriate share of the cost and, more specifically, that no one class of users would be expected to bear the cost of services provided to other users.

• (1520)

In addition, assurance was sought that the rules of the game would not be changed in mid-stream and that new adjustment factors would not be introduced without amending the original order and without providing users an opportunity to make their views known.

The government has listened to these representations and it has made every effort to accommodate them. I am convinced that the bill, as now amended, meets the essence of these concerns.

I am now in a position to thank all hon. members who helped with the implementation of the bill to this stage. I would ask for speedy and positive support of the bill today.

[Translation]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in this debate, and it is a pleasure to do so this afternoon, on third reading of Bill C-91. I have a number of problems with this bill, but generally speaking, I think the government is to be commended for introducing this bill to amend the Financial Administration Act. This is very important. I agree with the parliamentary secretary when he says that the purpose of this bill is to bring this government into the twenty-first century, which is excellent, and in that case, I am delighted to support this bill. Not, however, as far as section 16 of the bill is concerned. That is why I would like to make some brief comments, and I also want to discuss another matter that concerns section 30 of the bill.

[English]

Perhaps, if I continue in English, it would be easier for me as well as for hon. members.

Clause 6 of this bill represents a serious power grab on the part of the government. I think it is apparent to all that it is so, in spite of the protestations of the parliamentary secretary.

I want to thank him for his consideration of the amendments I proposed in the House. I recognize that the government has accepted the principle of one of them, with a minor modification in language. In respect of the other, I submit that there is still disagreement between us as to the effect of the amendment, and certainly the effect of clause 6 of the bill that has been presented.

In my submission the new clause 6 represents an attempt by the government to take to itself the power to impose charges in the nature of taxes on Canadians in exchange for the services they receive from their government. The normal procedure, as everyone knows, is for the government to introduce a bill to provide for certain services for Canadians. Parliament normally votes the funds on an annual basis through the Estimates for those services to be provided.

What the government has now taken on itself to do is the power to charge Canadians for those services based on the costs of those services without recourse to Parliament This is a fundamental objection I have to this clause. This clause in its amended form has enhanced the power of the government in this regard, and that cannot be denied. If it did not have to be enhanced we would not have this amendment before us. I think the hon. parliamentary secretary knows that full well.

What we have here is a case where the government has decided that it does not have to come to Parliament any more—it does not want to come to Parliament any more—in order to increase in effect the tax burden on Canadians. Parliament would have voted the funds to pay for the services and presumably those funds will continue to be voted. The government, on the other hand, can charge a fee for the provision of the service and thereby recoup the costs of the provision of the service and use the money presumably voted by Parliament for other similar purposes, such as enhancing other departmental programs and facilities that come under the same vote as authorized by the House.

I think it is important that Canadians realize that this House is losing power because of the actions of the government in proposing this bill and assuming for itself certain additional powers.

In my submission this amounts to taxation without representation. It is a subject that led to the American revolution, as we all know. It is a subject that is very important in a parliamentary democracy, that the elected representatives of the people are the ones that determine who shall pay taxes and on what basis. In other words, all tax bills are required to be introduced here and all taxes can only be raised after a vote of this House, except in cases where we have delegated that authority to the government.

What is happening here is the delegation of authority that submit is beyond reasonable limits. It gives the government far too much authority, more than it had before.

Having said that and having expressed my objection to that—and I will come back to that theme later in my speech—I want to turn to the specific clause that the government has changed. Perhaps the easiest way is to look at the amendment I had proposed.

The words of the amendment that I proposed yesterday, which my hon. colleague, the member for Willowdale, was so pleased to move on my behalf, requested a change in the wording of the bill and read:

> "the service or use of the facility to the user or classes of user who benefit thereby."

I am quoting the words and I know they sound out of context, but the purpose of the amendment was to ensure that where the government decided to charge a fee for the provision of a service only persons who benefit from the service would be required to pay the fee.

The government has raised an objection to the words of my amendment on the basis that the use of the word benefit is too vague in law and that it could be construed to mean that someone who used the service but was refused the privilege sought by the service would thereby claim not to have benefited and would therefore not have to pay.

I can understand the argument. I know that it is there. I can understand that perhaps the use of the term in law would cause confusion, whereas it was clearly intended that persons who use the service pay whether or not they actually gain in the sense of improving their lot by reason of the use of the service. Charges for the use of the service is clearly what is intended, and I will concede that.

I want to make it clear today in this House as far as I can that the amendment that the government proposed to my amendment, which was ultimately accepted on division by the House yesterday, was intended to cover the situation and ensure that people who use the service pay for it. Whether the benefit actually accrues to the people as a result of their use of the service may not be the criterion. Indeed it is suggested that is not. The user of a service may be charged, but the question of benefit will only be considered in the sense of one having had use, so the charge is to be paid by users.

I hope that that construction of the words which the government amendment contains will be in fact applied in the courts. I realize as a lawyer that the courts are reluctant to look at parliamentary debate as authority for what was intended in an act of Parliament when the words are in fact passed. However, if there is any reference in the courts to the use of this section, I hope that recourse will be had to my speech and to the parliamentary secretary's speech. Perhaps he wishes to clarify the point if I have misconstrued what he has said.

I would also refer, for the assistance of the courts, to the words uttered before the legislative committee that considered this bill. The person who was making the statements was the deputy comptroller general, Mr. McCrindell, on Tuesday, December 11, before the legislative committee on Bill C-91. In his statement he said the following as reported at page 1-15 of the transcript of the committee's proceedings:

> When setting fees, program objectives and the effect on users and other directly affected parties are major considerations. The over-all objective will be to achieve greater equity in the financing of governmental activities by shifting the burden from taxpayers in general to those who benefit directly.

I stress the use of his words "benefit directly", which are not now in the bill because of the difficult construction of the word benefit in the English language. I hope when the matter comes before a court that the words used in the act will be construed very carefully to ensure that persons who do not benefit from the provision of a service—and I again use the word in its normal sense—are not charged for that service. Clearly that is not the intention of the government as stated by the deputy comptroller general in his statement to the legislative committee which we have attempted to put into this legislation by specific amendment.

There is one other item which I think has to be examined. We have not dealt with it in the House. I know we have now completed consideration of the amendments. They have been adopted in the bill. However, there is another item that was not included in the government's bill which is very important. Since this is an opportunity to amend the Financial Administration Act, I think it is one that we should look at in Parliament as something that should have been included in this bill. I refer to section 30 of the act which deals with the use of special Governor General's warrants.

I have dealt with this subject in Parliament before. I feel constrained to do it again today because the government has missed an opportunity to correct what I think is a serious flaw in our law. I do not think the flaw is actually in the law. I think it is in the government's construction of the law and its use, or should I say abuse, of the system that is in place.

Perhaps I could review for hon. members for a moment the substance of our system of financial control which is, after all, the root of the powers of this House. It is a matter that led to the execution of a king in the United Kingdom. It is a matter that goes to the very root of parliamentary democracy. That fundamental principle is that there are no supplies or moneys granted to the government without the consent of this House. That is embodied in the legislation, in the Canadian Constitution. It is known that all Estimates must be voted first by the House of Commons. It is specified to be so in the Constitution of Canada. We know that supplies are voted by this House based on the Estimates which the government tables in this House. We are expecting a new set of Estimates on Thursday of this week, as I understand it, for the coming financial year.

In the 1988–1989 financial year and the 1989–90 financial year things were a bit different. Members will recall there was an election in November 1988, and the government saw fit to recall Parliament for two weeks in December. It discussed only one item of business, really, and that was the free trade deal. Rather than call Parliament back in the new year to vote supplies to complete the financial year, the government saw fit first of all to use a special Governor General's warrant pursuant to section 30 of the Financial Administration Act. That is exactly what they did on January 19, 1989. It got the Governor General to sign one of these special warrants authorizing the expenditure of $80 million from the public Treasury without a vote in Parliament.

Then on February 16, it did it again for $507 million without a vote in Parliament. The financial year, as we all know, comes to an end on March 31. In other words, it cleaned up the work of the old financial year but to avoid the difficulty of having to meet the House and get supplies voted, it then prorogued Parliament. Parliament was then in session but not actually sitting because it was adjourned. Rather than face any further difficulty, it prorogued Parliament and set a date for recall on April 3 or April 4, 1989. I have forgotten the exact date. That was into the new financial year. It had to have money to operate for the first few months of the financial year and Parliament would not be able to vote money right away. That would take a few weeks. Instead of calling us back in March, as it should have done so that this could all have been dealt with, it waited until April 3 or April 4. On April 1, April Fool's Day, it went to the Governor General and got another warrant, this time for $6 billion. It was $6,175,011,778 to be precise.

It took that money and ran the government until Parliament got an interim supply bill passed in, I believe it was May 1989.

An hon. member: Shameful.

Mr. Milliken: It was shameful. I am glad the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception recognizes that, because really what happened here was the first abuse ever of these special warrants.

It was the first time these special warrants had been used between sessions of Parliament, except for one isolated case in the early part of this century when there was some problem with the roof of this building.

I want to turn to section 30 of the act, and I want to stress the words of this section. It says:

> Where a payment is urgently required for the public good when Parliament is not in session—

When it is "urgently required for the public good". There was nothing urgent about these payments in this case. Parliament could have been recalled to deal with them. In every case these were payments for the general operation of the Government of Canada.

It was not a war situation where there was an emergency. It was not a case of government buildings falling down that needed immediate and urgent repair. It was not a case of a catastrophic event occurring in some part of Canada.

This was a case of a government unwilling to face the elected representatives of the people in this House. It was unwilling to come back and have us consider the question of the Supplementary Estimates or the Main Estimates. It simply said: "We will help ourselves by special warrant to this money." Never before had section 30 of the Financial Administration Act been so abused.

I have raised this issue in the House under questions of privilege. The Speaker has made rulings, and I recognize that we seem powerless to effect a change in that respect.

However, as MPs we do have some power to change the Financial Administration Act. I am disappointed that the government in introducing a substantial revision of this act as the parliamentary secretary has called it—and I agree with him that it is—would not have taken the opportunity to correct what is a glaring problem with the act if the government's interpretation of the act is accepted.

It has clearly been accepted for certain purposes, at least limited purposes, by the House because there is nothing else we can do as a minority in this House to object to this interpretation. However, I think it is an opportunity that the government might have taken up to make the amendment. I would have been glad to move it. But for the record I want it clear that such an amendment would have been out of order because it amended a section of the act that was untouched by the government's own bill.

I was instructed accordingly that the amendment would have been out of order had I attempted to move it. I have on the Order Paper a bill to amend the Financial Administration Act to prevent that kind of abuse, Bill C–211. I know I indicated my enthusiasm to the parliamentary secretary to ensure that that bill be incorporated as an amendment to Bill C–91, but apparently it was out of order and that could not be accomplished without unanimous consent. That was not forthcoming.

The difficulty is compounded in this case, in my submission, by one other little example of government arrogance. The government is required, under section 30, having used special Governor General's warrants, to make a report to the House. In accordance with the act, the government duly tabled a statement on special Governor General's warrants. In fact it tabled two: one for its use of the warrants in 1988–89 and one for its use of the warrants in 1989–90.

In the case of the 1989 financial year, that is the one ending March 31, 1989, there had already been laid before Parliament the Main Estimates which had been approved by the House, I believe in June 1988, although I was not here. Then there were some Supplementary Estimates tabled in the December session. Then another set of Estimates, apparently Supplementary Estimates (C), were subsequently prepared but never tabled in Parliament.

They were referred to in the report that the government House leader, I believe it was at the time, tabled in respect of the use of the special government warrants. This happens to be Sessional Paper 342–1/258. The references in the opening summary where the portions of money not actually voted by the House are listed refer to a document as Supplementary Estimates (C), not tabled. Subsequent to the tabling of this document, one of the standing committees of this House conducted hearings in respect of the uses of these warrants. I may say that I had an opportunity at that committee to ask questions of the public servants who were responsible for the preparation of the special warrants and who obviously had something to do with the preparation of the supplementary estimates.

I asked at the committee hearing that copies of the Supplementary Estimates C referred to in the report be made available to members of Parliament. The witness before the committee on that occasion indicated that he would look into the matter and report.

Apparently he did report to the chairman of the committee and the reply that he sent to the chairman of the committee in June, 1989, which unfortunately did not get into my hands until I had sent some further correspondence on this in January of this year, indicated that, and I quote from the letter to Mr. Turner, the chairman of the consumer and corporate affairs committee: "I am advised that such a document, not having been tabled, constitutes a draft prepared only for the consideration of ministers and as such cannot be released".

That is where the matter was left. The document could not be released because, although it was Supplementary Estimates C, it was prepared in draft for tabling in Parliament had Parliament, in fact, been called to meet.

Although Supplementary Estimates C were referred to in the report we are not allowed to see them.

Why the secrecy? Why would the government seek to deny the production of these documents to Parliament? This is the body that is supposed to deal with the granting of moneys to the government for its purposes, yet it will not make those purposes clear in this House by presenting this document.

Surely it was a reasonable request that those draft supplementary estimates be made available. Of course they were draft. Everybody knew that. But why is the government seeking to conceal those supplementary estimates from us in this House? I think it is a question that might be asked. We should have an answer.

I realize that, strictly speaking, this provision is not in the bill. It has not been dealt with in the bill, but it is an omission from the bill. It is an omission on the part of the government to table these documents. It is an omission on the part of the government to deal honestly and cleanly with this House in telling us what it wants the funds for because the purposes are contained in the estimates. That is where they are supposed to be and that should surely be made available to members of Parliament, even if we did not get a chance to vote on the provision of the money. That was taken away by the use, or misuse in this case, in my submission of Section 30 of the Financial Administration Act.

It is my submission that having looked at the abuse of this act, it is not surprising that we have had a change in attitude on the part of the public toward politicians and toward members of this House in general. I have here—

Mr. Reid: I have a hundred letters on it.

Mr. Milliken: Yes, I get a lot of letters on it, too. I am glad the hon. member for St. John's East agrees.

I have here a quotation I would like to read from a recent article by Andrew Love who is a student at Queen's University in my constituency.. It appeared in the most recent publication of Policy Options magazine for January, 1991. On page 22 of his article Mr. Love makes the following statement. I will refer to the dates in a moment, but hon. members might want to hear about these dates:

> Consistently over the last decade, Canadians have voiced an ominous degree of resentment against what they consider impersonal and inefficient intrusions by the state in their lives. The most recent Decima Quarterly Report on Public Affairs Trends reaffirms that, due to overt cynicism towards public programs, Canadians are becoming more self-reliant and are rejecting institutional and collectivist options. Close to 60 per cent of Canadians feel politicians are unprincipled, up from 28 per cent in 1980; and 81 per cent think politicians are more concerned with money than with people, up from 53 per cent in 1980. More seriously, only 32 per cent of the respondents thought that politicians were competent, down from 57 per cent in 1980.

From a partisan perspective, it is easy to understand why there has been this loss of confidence, given the actions of this government for the last six years. You will notice the date of the early figures is 1980. Things were a little bit different then.

Now we are faced with a government that, frankly, has disappointed Canadians in so many respects that it is hard to imagine they have the gall to continue without calling an election and proceeding as suggested by the leader of my party a week ago.

The hon. member for St. John's East thinks that I am nervous about the prospect of an election. I want to assure him that that is not so, but it is he that is nervous about the prospect of an election because he knows, as my colleague from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception can tell him, that the Conservative Party is down at 6 per cent, 6 per cent in the maritime provinces including Newfoundland. I am sorry, 8 per cent. They are even lower than the prime rate in the maritimes and the hon. member from St. John's East knows perfectly well that if there was an election tomorrow he would be down the tubes with his colleague from St. John's West.

[Translation]

Mr. Saint-Julien: I have 100 per cent in my region.

Mr. Milliken: I don't doubt it. He has 100 per cent in Abitibi. That's great. In Kingston the figures are quite different, I can assure you.

[English]

We have a case here of complete loss of confidence and I suggest to the parliamentary secretary and to the ministers, if any of them were here, to listen, that part of the reason for that failure is the fact that the financial administration of Canada, through the use of these warrants and so on, has been fiddled with by the government. People are untrusting of a government that abandons established procedures, changes the arrangements for the protection of the public from the misuse of public funds and fails to come clean with Parliament in its financial dealings.

If there is any place where the government ought to be making clear what it is doing, being honest and forthright in its management of public funds, it is in this House. It is in this place that we are charged with an onerous responsibility of ensuring that the government is acting properly and of bringing the government to account if it fails to do so.

We, as members of the opposition, are crippled in our efforts to do that if full and complete financial information and estimates and so on are denied to the House.

Here we have a case where Supplementary Estimates (C), which were in draft have never made available. Here we have a case where the government, instead of calling Parliament and dealing with estimates in the usual way, chose to carry on in an unprecedented manner and help itself to the public treasury of Canada by special Governor General's warrants.

I have no trouble mentioning what I have said. The hon. member knows full well that what I have said is correct. He knows that the government did this in a way that was completely unprecedented. I suggest to him it was wrong and the government knew it was wrong. They chose to do it because they had no interest in facing the music that they would have to face in this House. They would have to face Question Period. They would have to face members making speeches on subjects that they did not want to hear about. So they sent Parliament away and said, "never mind, we will just take our money by special Governor General's warrants." The hon. member knows that is correct. He knows that what I am saying is true and if he looked at the record in a non-biased way, he would see that he would agree with me.

What we have here is a case of a floundering government that has failed to deliver on its promises and which has caused this loss of confidence, documented by Mr. Love in the article. I urge hon. members opposite to read it and, perhaps, they could appreciate the position that I have taken in respect to this bill.

To recapitulate then, I have three points. The bill is unfair in that it takes away from Parliament the right to impose taxes on the people. That is a fundamental right of this House and the government is taking additional powers from this House by this bill and in that respect, and particularly in respect of section 6, I believe that is wrong.

We have tried to get some safeguards in it. The amendments that the parliamentary secretary has proposed to mine in which I have improved the bill in my view may help. But we can only hope that they will be construed in the way that it was intended they be when the bill, as it will undoubtedly be, is challenged in a court in Canada.

Second, the omission from the bill of the amendments to change the provisions aimed at special Governor General's warrants which would have stopped their use between sessions of Parliament in my view is a serious omission. Had the parliamentary secretary and his minister—who I am sorry is not here to hear my comments—got together and tackled this problem squarely, they would have realized that it would have restored some confidence in politicians, in this House and in its members.

• (1550)

Had they said: "We will in fact agree to such a restriction on our actions; we will come back to Parliament in future to get our money and stop dishing out the treasury to ourselves by the use of these warrants; we will come up with some amendment that will allow us to use them only in emergency situations, which was exactly the intention of the act", instead of acting as they have in violation of that act. I think we would have felt better about this bill, the public would have felt that perhaps things were not as bad as are shown in these polls, and we would have enhanced the reputation of the members of the House and the government.

I do not like to see the government always looking bad. I would prefer to see it look good and that is why we are here. It may look as though often times our criticisms are always negative, but they are intended to improve the government's performance.

The hon. member for St. John's East should be rejoicing in the fact that we try—

Mr. Duhamel: He is. Look at his smile.

Mr. Milliken: I notice he is smiling—try to enhance the performance of his government because if it is not improved considerably, and I mean perhaps more than we could reasonably expect, his chances of re-election are so slight that I can only sympathize with his plight.

I say in conclusion, we have a bill here that could have been improved in two particular areas. I am sorry that the government has acceded in part to one but failed to act at all in the other. Accordingly, we will be voting against this particular legislation for those reasons, although some of the initial clauses in the bill that deal with regular and normal administrative matters are sensible and wise. We feel that the omission and the one failure to correct the amendment that I had proposed, are insufficient to bring us to vote in favour of this particular legislation.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak for a short while to this bill. I must say that Bill C-91 certainly took me by surprise when I was looking into the subtleties of how this would affect a number of things in my riding of Vancouver East, and in the country generally. I am sure that Canadians —and particularly Canadians in some of the industries that are directly affected and the workers that are directly affected—probably are not aware of the very negative and yet subtle changes that are being brought in in this bill.

I refer of course to the authority that is given under Bill C-91, an act to amend the Financial Administration Act of Canada. It gives authority to the cabinet to impose and increase user fees in a whole range of public services in Canada, services that the public has come to expect, and should expect, as their right and that should be paid for out of the general revenues by all of us who are taxpayers and should not be subject to user fees.

It is not surprising that this government is using this sneaky negative approach to get money out of people and they are imposing a marketplace approach so that people, regardless of their incomes, and corporations and businesses, regardless of their financial position, will be forced to pay user fees for services that they have rightfully expected to be public services and that should be available to them, regardless of income.

I think it is a very important principle of Canadian life and Canadian society. It is a principle that this Conservative government has continued to erode while they have been in power. It was bad enough under the Liberals, but it is becoming even worse under the present government.

Bill C-91 enables the federal cabinet to impose charges against users of government services without coming back to Parliament for parliamentary debate. They can do it in camera, in privacy of cabinet with no hearings or consultations with the people who would be directly affected by these increased charges and, of course, with none of the committee process that we feel is very important when new measures are adopted. So in my view, it is a very dangerous bill. It gives the cabinet the chance to increase user fees which may seem to be token fees at this point in some cases, but I am sure will be increased under this budget and will continue to be increased with no public reference at all by the will of cabinet.

I would like to just take two or three examples. The more I thought about this and did a little bit of consultation into matters that I have a particular interest in and people on the west coast have a particular interest in, and I refer particularly to the Canadian shipping industry and also the shipbuilding industry.

I also would like to note that this reference to cabinet secrecy in imposing fees would mean that they could impose it on a whole range of social programs: health care, hospital care and certainly on rights of citizens. We already have user fees, for example, on applications for landed immigrant status, for passports, for taking out citizenship; things that have been the rights of Canadians and should still be the rights of Canadians. We should not be putting a monetary charge on them, they should be part of the services of Canada paid for out of general tax revenues.

I would like to concentrate first of all on the question of the shipbuilding industry. We know, of course, that the Canadian shipping industry is under attack from all sides, as is the shipbuilding industry itself. The government seems bent on destroying this industry.

I have been appalled, when I recall prior to the 1984 election, to when the Conservative platform said they were going to do so much to enhance and restore shipbuilding in Canada. They had what looked like a fairly good program that was part of their election platform at that time. They have gone on to do none of the things they promised and, in fact, step after step have eroded the industry, undermined it and removed the kind of essential subsidies necessary for any shipbuilding in a progressive and western country. I refer especially, of course, to the removal of all subsidies for shipbuilding that other countries know are essential if we are going to have a national shipbuilding program.

Second, of course, from a west coast point of view, the betrayal we felt and still feel because of the cancellation of the Polar 8. It is interesting to look back and see that the cost of the Polar 8 which would have been used to service our north in a peaceful way, to all of the community services in the north as well as act as an ice-breaker, was turned down. Yet, we have been able to find many more millions of dollars than that would have cost to conduct a war in the gulf. One wonders where our sense of values are in this.

I am told that the cancellation of the Polar 8 has already resulted in massive lay-offs of workers which could total up to 350 more workers, unless the government does something about this.

There has also been no assistance to the shipyards, which have been hit hard and many workers have been laid off. I know in the greater Vancouver shipyards have closed down as a result of this or they have had to curtail their operations and many workers have been laid off.

In the government policy on shipbuilding, and again I refer back to the negative impacts of Bill C-91. We have to remember also that the government has been really unfair in the allocation of contracts for the building, repair and refit of Canadian ships.

I would like to refer to a document I have here called: The Federal Government Response to the British Columbia Shipbuilding Action Group, dated February 1991.

The B.C. Shipbuilding Action Group proposed a number of amendments and stressed a number of problems. One of the things they documented was the unfair allocation of contracts that we have in Canada—the Coast Guard ships, the repair, refit and building of Coast Guard ships, icebreakers and naval vessels.

• (1600)

As you know, most of these contracts go to eastern and central Canada and it is, as is proposed in this brief to the government, essential that there be a fairer policy and that the shipbuilding needs, technology and facilities on the west coast be considered as well.

We know also, and this brief stresses it again, that there have been impacts from the free trade agreement on shipyards. This has certainly put B.C. shipyards at an unfair advantage. There is a need for a review of the tariffs on repair and maintenance of vessels. This bill, of course, will add a further hardship and penalties to shipping and to shipbuilding industries. They already, of course, are charged user fees for Coast Guard services, for government wharfs, and for the use of many government services. The use of government facilities for cranes to move containers is another area.

Under this bill not only will the present user fees not be removed, but they will be increased quietly with no public notice and with no chance for the public to appeal them or even be heard as to their impact on an industry that already is suffering greatly and finding it difficult to compete with the American ports and the American shipping companies.

Bill C-91 means that the cabinet will make decisions in camera and that it will undoubtedly increase user fees for government facilities and equipment. There is particular concern about the effect on the competition of the port of Vancouver, for example, with the ports of Seattle and Tacoma.

It will also mean added costs for cruise ships in particular. There is a large trade related to cruise ships which stop in Vancouver, and a lot of spin-off business. The cruise ship companies have already complained about the heavy tariffs charged by the Canadian government which risk discouraging their use of Canadian ports. Increased user fees for facilities, which in turn will be passed along to the cruise ships, are enough to perhaps tip the scale and there is concern about the loss of this extra trade in the Vancouver region. I am sure the same thing applies to east coast ports as well.

I would like to take a minute to quote the concerns expressed by the Chamber of Shipping of B.C. regarding Bill C-91. The Chamber of Shipping of British Columbia has a membership of 50 locally based companies, the majority of international shipping companies that serve the B.C. coast and ports. They provide the link for efficient movement of western Canadian resources and goods to overseas markets and are essential to the entire economy of Canada.

The Chamber in a letter of January 28 to the Hon. Michael Wilson states that it has a great sense of urgency to draw attention to the proposed changes of the Financial Administration Act under Bill C-91, which enables the federal government to exercise the imposition of charges against users of government services without parliamentary debate. It goes on to mention a number of ways the increase in user fees and proposed charges will affect domestic and international shipping under the cost recovery program. It anticipates that this is just the beginning of the escalation of these costs, which will have a very negative effect on the industry. The letter states, and I quote:

> We fear that unchecked imposition of charges against shipping, could well pyramid to a degree that will strangle the ports on both coasts of Canada. Shipping and trade is a major part of the Canadian Gross National Product and diversion of cargoes by United States ports can become a real threat if costs continue to escalate.
> Our industry now pays one hundred per cent of the Pilotage costs on the west coast, plus about one hundred and twenty per cent of the costs of running the Vancouver Port Corporation and the Prince Rupert Port Corporation, et cetera.
> We feel strongly that authority to levy additional taxes against shipping by way of "User Fees" should be dealt with by Parliament and not by Cabinet without debate.

There you have it. Our party agrees very strongly with the position that the Chamber of Shipping of B.C. has taken. We are very concerned, not only with the present user fees that are being charged, but the authority that is given to cabinet to continue to add to these costs.

We implore the government to give consideration to this. It is not too late. We are at third reading of this bill, and we would like to see this bill delayed until it can be reconsidered.

In view of the philosophy of this bill, it is with great trepidation that we think of what is going to be in the budget today, or even what is not in the budget but what is going to happen despite the budget.

We may see that, for example, there are not drastic cuts in some of these areas, but drastic increases in user fees to increase revenue can be just as devastating to industries and to workers who are being laid off from essential industries.

There are many other areas that will be affected by the increase in user fees and the authority that is given to the cabinet to do this without any reference to Parliament.

For example, in my own critic area of multiculturalism and citizenship, particularly citizenship and immigration, it used to be that Canadian citizenship was regarded as a right. That is, of course, what it should be. It should be a right in Canada.

We should not have to buy citizenship in Canada. We should not have to buy a passport. Surely, being able to obtain a passport is a right. Now, of course—this is just the beginning—we have to pay $25 for a passport.

If a person is applying for citizenship after they have been here three years, if a new immigrant is applying for citizenship he or she has to pay a user fee again to apply for this citizenship, instead of being welcomed by Canada.

What kind of a message does this give to new Canadians who have settled in our land? I spent the last month in my riding dealing with immigrant cases, the very desperate situations of many immigrants—particularly refugees—who have no medical coverage, no money to survive on and who are desperately afraid of their future and who are feeling very insecure.

When these people try to apply for landed immigrant status, even the beginning of the process, even though they may be turned down later, they have to find $250. Undoubtedly, that is going to go up under this bill.

You may laugh on the Conservative side about this, but I am telling you that there are people in my riding who want so much to be in Canada that they will be giving up food for their kids in order to try to find $250 which this government is charging for the right of residency in Canada.

I think that is appalling. It really defeats everything that we care about in Canada as far as the rights of citizenship are concerned.

I could go on and on, and I am sure my colleagues will, about what this means for the erosion of medicare. We already know what has been done to erode transfer payments to the provinces, both under the Canada Assistance Plan and the Canada Health Act.

This government is already eroding health care and basic social services in this country.

Now, we know that the cabinet can go ahead and approve user fees for services for hospitals and for other health care services. Is this the kind of Canada that we want? The Health Care Act says that there is supposed to be accessibility and universal access to health care.

Yet, it is obvious that quietly—and we do not want it to be quiet, we are going to keep screaming about this—this government is undermining the whole principle of universality, equal access, accessibility, and transferability between provinces, because it is allowing provinces to charge user fees.

• (1610)

I will conclude at this point. I just want to say again that I think Canadians are unaware of the implications of this bill. It is a very dangerous erosion of the very principles of Canadian citizenship. The whole question of the cabinet having authority to charge user fees for essential public services, which our country has regarded as the rights of citizens that should be paid for by the income tax we all pay and tax revenues, is a disgrace. We are very much opposed to this bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I understand that this bill is intended to help the government manage its finances more effectively and to help reduce the deficit.

In 1987, the federal government made similar proposals in Bill C-75. Today's policy proposal is very much the same, i.e. cost recovery in the marine and air transportation sectors. Mr. Speaker, instead of opting for additional charges, the federal government should consider implementing recent recommendations by the Auditor General of Canada, which suggested cutting costs and privatizing certain services to save money, instead of introducing additional charges.

Mr. Speaker, I also would like to point out that transportation should be considered within the global and intermodal context, instead of selecting specific sectors such as marine and air transportation. Railway and highway transportation are also very important.

Another aspect that should be considered is our national transportation policy as stated in Section 3 of the National Transportation Act. As I see it, the proposed fee schedule goes against certain elements of this policy. That is particularly true when we read that fares, rates and conditions set by each carrier or mode of transportation shall not constitute an undue obstacle to the interchange of commodities between points in Canada. I must say the timing is very poor, now that shippers are being affected by the recession, soaring gas prices and the crisis in the Persian Gulf.

Mr. Speaker, they now want to charge overhead costs for the use of certain airports in remote areas in Quebec. This will hurt Abitibi and northern Quebec, where the price of a plane ticket will go up considerably.

Mr. Speaker, I received a letter from lawyer Jean Roberge with the Quebec mining association, who wrote the following to the Department of Transport: "In fact, cost recovery will mean increased costs for companies, which we will not be able to recover from customers who can find other suppliers on the international market. In Quebec, the expected cost increase would be at least 15 per cent on top of marine shipping costs of totalling at least 12 million. At this rate, Quebec companies will find it even harder to remain competitive.

The department explained that the cost recovery policy was developed in a spirit of fairness and efficiency. We disagree. We do not think it is fair to apply maximum distances of 300 nautical miles in Quebec, while other ports on our country's coasts are allowed a number well below those 300 nautical miles.

Mr. Roberge went on to say: "The proposed rates will cause considerable harm to the Canadian economy, especially in the primary sector. Canada and Quebec, which rank among the world's major suppliers of minerals and metals, may find their position will start to erode considerably". Those were comments made by Mr. Roberge of the Quebec mining association.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding, I would like to say that the federal Minister of Transport should consider the recommendations made by the Quebec mining association, the Quebec Minister of Transport and my own recommendations, to ensure that Quebec's and Canada's remote regions, as well as central regions like the Port of Quebec and the Port of Montreal, are not penalized by this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions and comments. Resuming debate. The hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls.

[English]

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I will try to keep this very short. In fact, I should be able to finish my comment in about five minutes.

It is to present a matter of great concern to me, and to Canadians if they knew what was in the bill. The Financial Administration Act is used not only to levy fees and make charges in this bill, but also to introduce a new element into our legislation.

This new element affects all moneys owed to the Receiver General of Canada—and there is no other way under our legislation to write a cheque to the Government of Canada except to write it to the Receiver General of Canada. All of our legislation that has been passed in this Chamber ever since Confederation, every bit of it, contains regulations that spell out how money is to be recovered by the Government of Canada when it is due to the Government of Canada.

The bill that is being passed here today brings a new element into the picture. The new element is found in a new clause in this legislation called clause 17.1. It brings into play, for the first time in our history, the words "collection agency". The words "collection agency" are defined as a member of the legal profession or as a collector of debts registered within a province.

All of our legislation and regulations that contain provisions whereby somebody can pay back money over a period of time, and each part of our regulations, at least most of them, have a limitation on the collection of debts.

The Unemployment Insurance Act has a limitation of three years, unless it is fraud and then it is six years. The collection of debts relating to the Department of Finance or National Revenue, in the case of somebody who owes money to the Receiver General of Canada for the advanced child tax credit, should never be collected.

People owe that advance because they suffered a tragedy that caused their children to be absent from their homes in the month of January of this year. The legislation we passed in this Chamber in 1988 said that in order to qualify for the advanced child tax credit you had to be a resident in that home and receive family allowance for the following January. Some of the reasons for this absence, most of them disastrous, were fire in the home, family break up, or a death in the home. Sometimes the children were in foster homes. Women, mostly, are now told this month that they have to pay back $2,000 or $3,000 to the Government of Canada.

In the regulations of the Family Allowance Act it is spelled out how that money is to be collected. It is collected by taking the GST credit or the federal tax credit or family allowances over a period of time. Some of these widows who experienced the disaster of fire or death in the home in the month of January owe $4,000 or $5,000.

Now all of those regulations go out the window. All of those Acts of Parliament go out the window. All of those accepted, humane methods of collecting money—and if you do not collect it then you do not get it—now go out the window with the introduction of the collection agency. This is the collection agency bill of the Government of Canada.

The only thing that I can surmise from this is that the Government of Canada is suggesting that perhaps the occupation of the future is going to be with collection agencies. It is a terrible change to our legislation. The Government of Canada should rethink it or not use it when this act is passed.

• (1620)

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind our viewers that Bill C-91, of course, is a bill that deals with the administration of public moneys.

[Translation]

—the management of public funds and finances.

[English]

I wanted to make three points and ask my colleague to react if he would, please.

Our colleague, the member of Parliament for Kingston and the Islands, indicated to the government that this was a good opportunity, if it chose to do so, to correct this special warrants concern he has raised a number of times in Parliament, that is where the government uses special warrants in order to use public funds without referring to Parliament. I am wondering whether or not he would choose, subsequent to my other questions, to comment on that.

The user fees issues is of course one of great concern to me because it is in a sense a camouflage tax. It is a hidden tax. It is an undeclared tax. Many of us will know that the government has introduced 33 tax increases since it came into power in 1984, including the goods and services tax, but no one has really looked at the number of undeclared taxes through user fees.

This is interesting, because if one looks at the public accounts one notes that the government was receiving in 1984 in revenue $70 billion per year. Now it exceeds $120 billion. There has been over a $50 billion increase in the "regular tax increases" of the 33 increases I have mentioned. How many other dollars are there in these hidden kinds of taxes? Is this not perhaps a less than on the table approach to taxation?

I have a number of concerns, being from western Canada, from Manitoba. I have heard colleagues in the House refer to the possible introduction of user fees in health and education, but they have also mentioned shipping and other modes of transportation such as airport and air transportation, transportation by trucks and other modes. They have also mentioned the possibility that user fees be introduced in agriculture, in mining, in communications and in forestry, and I will stop there.

What are the implications for western Canada—all Canada, obviously—where relatively speaking there is a fairly small population base and where the communities are dispersed, small, and frequently very far from each other. I would like to have a comment on that.

I would also like to complete my remarks by asking the following question.

[Translation]

I think it is clear the government should correct the deficiencies I just mentioned as, well as others identified by my colleagues, before proceeding with this bill.

[English]

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, if I understand the hon. gentleman's question, that they will have to correct deficiencies that are presently in place before this bill can work, I have to agree completely with the hon. gentleman and highlight the following example from this particular piece of legislation.

I refer specifically to section 29.1 in a new clause of this bill, which states:

> A department may, in respect of its approved programs or authorized expenditures, be authorized by an appropriation Act—to expend revenues that it receives in a fiscal year through the conduct of its operations to offset expenditures that it incurs in the fiscal year;

The hon. members who are close to me from Moncton, New Brunswick, know that at this very moment air traffic controllers are holding negotiations with the Government of Canada to talk about wages. If this were correct, it would mean that air traffic controllers in Moncton, New Brunswick—the two members from New Brunswick next to me know exactly what I am about to say—and in Gander, Newfoundland and those air traffic control centres are making a profit for the Government of Canada. They charge air traffic control in this country, in case hon. members are not aware, for every initial contact made on a foreign carrier that goes across the Atlantic from Europe or from Africa or from the Soviet Union. Each initial contact costs that foreign carrier at least $150 per initial contact because of the service provided by air traffic control. But what happens to that money: $150 per initial contact? At about 500 contacts a day, that is about $25 million. Where does that money go?

An hon. member: A month?

Mr. Baker: That is about $25 million, give or take $4 or $5 million. Where does that money go? That money goes into the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

What we have in this bill, as the hon. member just pointed out, is a big fib. The money that goes into the Consolidated Revenue Fund of the Government of Canada is not credited to air traffic control, or we would not have the disputes in air traffic control in this country of not paying adequate compensation, of having to hire air traffic controllers from the United States to come up here, air traffic controllers who were laid off or fired eight years ago by the United States. We are not training enough in this country today, while they make millions and millions of dollars for the Consolidated Revenue Fund of the Government of Canada.

This bill which says the department can use whatever revenues it generates in the expenditures within its department is not correct. I cannot use the word lie, so I had to say it is just a fib in the legislation.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I realize it is very difficult for you to hear, given the volume of the background noise in the House today as we are awaiting the budget.

In the few minutes I have available, I realize that I will not be able to do more than just start my remarks. One of the reasons we are continuing to debate Bill C–91, when it was thought that it was going to pass very easily, that it was only housekeeping measures, is that it was discovered that there is a key clause in the legislation that would allow the government wide–open latitude to charge user fees, to impose new, almost tax regimes on the various components of the government operation.

One in particular is that of the Minister of Transport in terms of the marine industry. Many of us in this House are concerned about its long–term viability. In fact, we are concerned about the short–term viability of the maritime industry, whether it be on the west coast of B.C., the Great Lakes, the St. Lawrence River or the east coast.

This legislation if passed in its current form, particularly clause 6, will make it more difficult for a lot of our industry to survive. In doing so, it will also make it more expensive for many sectors of our economy—the grain sector, the iron ore sector, the coal sector, the potash sector, the forest industry, all of which must rely on at some point in time the shipment of their goods by ships whether it is domestically or internationally. This particular clause 6 will allow the government, through the Minister of Transport and his policies of cost recovery currently working their way through the system, to put the maritime industry in jeopardy.

We might ask why the government is doing so. Why is this particular clause include in this particular bill?

If I can go back to 1985 and another bill, the amendments to the Canada Shipping Act, the government at that time tried to include in the bill a specific cost recovery clause, clause 4. We successfully defeated that clause. We got the government to withdraw it. Through the back door it is now trying to do with this bill what it failed to do with with Bill C–75. There seems to be some confusion in the government's own minds as to what is needed. In responding to the maritime ministry, the Minister of Transport and the President of Treasury Board say that they currently have the legislative authority to enact user pay.

• (1630)

In a letter dated December 17, 1990 to the President of the Treasury Board, the Minister of Transport said the following: "It is my understanding that no new legislative authority is necessary to permit implementation of the department's proposals should it be decided in due course to do so. In the opinion of the Department of Justice, the existing section 19 of the FAA provides a sufficient legal foundation".

The question I must ask is: If they do not need it today, why did they feel they needed it back in 1985 under Bill C–75, the amendments to the Canada Shipping Act?

The government really needs this particular clause in order to have a solid legal basis for implementing the cost recovery measures currently being proposed by the Government of Canada through the Minister of Transport.

It is obvious to me from all the communications I have received from the industry and the communities involved that this particular bill is a serious threat to their economic viability. I indicated yesterday during the clause by clause debate at report stage that the clause should be withdrawn and that we would be quite prepared to proceed to receive third reading as long as that particular clause was deleted from the bill.

I do not know how much time I have left, but perhaps, Mr. Speaker, you might want to call it 4.30.

Mr. Speaker: It being 4.30 p.m., pursuant to order made on Monday, February 25, 1991, the House will now proceed to Ways and Means Motion No. 18.

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance) moved:

That this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

He said: Mr. Speaker, my previous budgets have introduced a wide range of fundamental economic and fiscal reforms. Today, I will propose further far-reaching initiatives.

Our policies have been challenging for Canadians and for the government. But they are essential to help our country manage the risks and seize the opportunities of a rapidly changing economic world.

The world economy continues to grow more fiercely competitive. A relentless tide of economic change is having profound effects on people, industries and countries. While the opportunities have increased, so have the risks.

Since my last budget, rising uncertainty has taken a heavy toll on both economic confidence and performance in Canada and around the world.

We have seen international stability shaken by military hostilities in the Persian Gulf and by political upheaval in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union.

[Translation]

Vital negotiations to open up world trade have encountered serious problems, posing large risks to Canada's trade-oriented economy.

As in a number of other countries including the United States, our economy is now in recession. Many Canadians have lost their jobs; many others have lost confidence in the economic future.

[English]

And this is happening at a time when some are questioning the future of Canada itself.

And yet, we must deal with the world as it is, and not as we might wish it to be.

Toward recovery

In difficult times, it is easy to lose perspective as well as confidence. But it is times like this when a clear, realistic perspective is needed to rebuild confidence and to chart a sound, sensible course of recovery.

We must not lose sight of the fact that a strong foundation exists for optimism as we face the major challenges that lie ahead.

[Translation]

Internationally, the vast majority of countries continue to express their powerful, common interest in maintaining a stable world order and in developing more reliable and open economic relationships.

We are a resilient, resourceful country. A stronger, more confident Canada is well within our reach, if we are prepared to work for it.

[English]

During the past year, we have made encouraging progress in reducing both inflationary pressures and interest rates. As a result, the prospects are hopeful for an economic recovery beginning in the second half of this year.

But we must also recognize that hope alone will not be enough.

A time for action

This time of uncertainty and risk is also a time for action, at home and abroad, to solve our problems and restore confidence in our future.

Abroad, Canada will continue to play its part in co-operative efforts to provide greater stability in political and economic affairs. As a vital part of this responsibility, we will continue to support the United Nations' effort to restore peace and order in the Persian Gulf.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): We must and we will provide the men and women of our armed forces with all the support they need to complete this task. We must also be prepared to play a constructive role in the area after hostilities end.

Here at home, we must take further decisive action to move our economy toward early recovery and sustained growth.

RECOVERY, GROWTH AND PROSPERITY

This budget sets out a Plan for Economic Recovery—a strong, confident recovery that not only puts the recession behind us but leads us forward to continuing growth and renewed prosperity.

Our priority is action to create the essential conditions for recovery. Ours is not a plan for increased spending. That approach has been tried in the past and failed.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The key to recovery is lower interest rates. The Plan for Economic Recovery will bring about lower interest rates through the following actions:

We will set out clear, achievable inflation targets. Inflation will be reduced to 2 per cent by mid-decade.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The result of lower inflation will be lower interest rates.

We will put government finances firmly on the course to a balanced budget. We will remove the build-up of the public debt as a source of inflationary concern.

• (1640)

The Expenditure Control Plan announced in the 1990 budget will be extended.

The government will legislate mandatory program spending limits.

We will establish a Debt Servicing and Reduction Fund solely dedicated to offsetting the costs of the public debt. By law, all revenues from the Goods and Services Tax and from privatization will flow into this fund.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): We will severely restrain the operations of government. Operating budgets will be frozen at current levels and the wages and salaries of Cabinet Ministers, Members of Parliament, all Order-in-Council appointments, and all federal public servants will be tightly restrained.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): These measures reflect a fundamental commitment to strong, effective government management and control which will serve Canadians well for years to come.

They will ensure that we achieve key fiscal goals in line with the plan set out in my 1989 and 1990 budgets.

We will eliminate new federal borrowing in financial markets after 1993-94.

We will tightly control spending. Extending the Expenditure Control Plan will limit program spending growth to 3 per cent per year after 1991-92.

We will hold the deficit to $30.5 billion this current year and next.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): That, Mr. Speaker, is despite the pressures of recession. In 1992-93, with recovery and lower interest rates, the deficit will fall below $25 billion for the first time in a decade.

[Translation]

This budget will result in a better balance between fiscal and monetary policy. It will provide the lower interest rates and greater confidence essential to our economic recovery.

The economy will recover in the second half of this year and grow strongly in 1992.

Restoring economic growth is essential. But we must go beyond recovery to attain our full measure of prosperity. To do this, we must find a way to get Canadians working more effectively together, in a broad national partnership to meet Canada's competitive challenges—a partnership for prosperity.

We must begin by being honest with ourselves about the challenges we face. We must see our problems as they really are.

[English]

The fundamental problem is this: our underlying ability to compete in the world marketplace has been falling behind that of our trading partners.

We have seen how living beyond our country's means can lead only to higher inflation, higher interest rates, less investment, lower consumer spending, slower growth and fewer jobs. All this in turn contributes to a growing burden of public debt.

It is easy to point the finger at others: business and labour at government because of the exchange rate, interest rates and taxes; or business at labour because of wage levels; or labour at business because of high executive salaries and bonuses or inadequate training.

But shifting the blame will get us nowhere. The problems are caused by us all and the solutions must involve actions and co-operation also by us all. There is too much at stake for anything less than a full, national effort.

The government will take the lead in a major national exercise to bring together the ideas and the efforts of Canadians in all walks of life and from all across our country, to strengthen Canada's ability to prosper in a tough economic world.

Before describing the budget measures in more detail, I want to be very clear about why, in a time of recession, it is necessary to call on Canadians to exercise patience and restraint.

FACING UP TO ECONOMIC REALITY

Without doubt, this is the most difficult of the seven budgets I have presented. Particularly so because of the painful economic circumstances facing Canadians today.

It is clear that the weakness in our economy continued and deepened during the last quarter of 1990. I expect the economy to stabilize by mid-year after a total decline of almost 2.5 per cent in output. The unemployment rate will exceed 10 per cent in the first half of this year and then decline as growth and employment recover.

In the months leading up to this budget, I have talked with, and listened carefully to, people from all across the country. I carried out extensive pre-budget consultations with leaders of organizations representing a variety of business, labour, social and other interests. I hear directly from individual Canadians on a continuing basis, in my visits to various parts of the country, in letters and in many other ways. I have heard the anguish of people who have lost their jobs or their businesses.

While the views that we are hearing on some of the shorter-term policy issues range widely, there is little disagreement on basic issues.

Canadians want a strong, growing economy that provides good jobs and expanding opportunities for themselves and their children. They want a government with the financial means to maintain the essential programs that help to hold this country together.

Canadians know that the deficit and the debt are serious problems that must be solved. They know that firm, determined action is needed to solve these problems. And they believe this should be carried out with the least possible adverse impact on those in greatest need.

[Translation]

In designing our Plan for Economic Recovery, I have been mindful of these views. One of the best things we can do to strengthen the unity of our country is to strengthen our economic union and our fiscal position. Our approach also reflects careful sensitivity to the difficulties that many Canadiens are facing today. This is evident in the fact that program expenditures will increase by 6.9 per cent in 1991-92. While this is too high in purely fiscal terms, the reason for the increase can be clearly understood in human terms.

[English]

Of a total program spending increase of $7.5 billion, here is where the bulk of the money will go: $3 billion for assistance to the unemployed; $1.6 billion for the elderly; and $1.3 billion for farmers in difficulty.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): We have also allocated $600 million for national defence to meet increased responsibilities in 1991-92.

These four areas will account for more than 80 per cent of the increase in program spending.

In short, the money is going where it is needed, when it is needed.

At the same time, we have acted to ensure that our medium-term goals will not be compromised, as they must not be if we are to achieve continuing economic growth.

Let there be no doubt: The actions in this budget are tough and they are challenging. And I can assure you that government and the people who work for it will feel the pinch. We will have to give better value for taxpayers' dollars.

But Canadians know that finding the solutions to Canada's economic problems will continue to demand the participation and effort of everyone.

In this budget I am asking Canadians to share the burden of further fiscal restraint. I fully recognize the sacrifices that many Canadians have already made in the name of restraint. I know there will be some reluctance to accept the necessity for more of the same.

• (1650)

In earlier times, periods of economic weakness have been occasions for Ministers of Finance to put some extra money in people's pockets, spend more on programs, and worry less about the government's fiscal situation. But in earlier times, we did not have to face persistently high deficits, high public debt and the economic damage that would result from ignoring these serious problems. Let us not forget that during the last recession, Canada's deficit doubled from $14 billion to $28 billion. We are still struggling with the problems this caused.

Our public debt is forecast to reach $400 billion by mid-year—about $15,000 for every man, woman and child in Canada. The interest alone on the debt will eat up more than $43 billion next year—more than we spend on old age security, unemployment insurance and family allowances combined.

[Translation]

Since coming to office in 1984, the government has waged a long, uphill battle to reduce the deficit and bring the debt under better control. The growth of the debt has been substantially reduced. The deficit, though still too high, has been cut in half as a proportion of our national income.

Throughout this period, many Canadians have become increasingly concerned about what government can do for them, about the value they are getting for their tax dollars.

This is not suprising. In 1984, the federal government was handling out $1.33 in programs and services for every dollar it collected in taxes. That was no bargain.

[English]

We are now paying the price, over and over again, for too many years of consuming more government services than we were willing to pay for—and borrowing to make up the difference.

We must get off this treadmill.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Decisions made in the 1970s and early 1980s that led to the massive debt of the 1990s have taken away many of the choices that Canadians and their governments might want to make today—choices about supporting priority programs and services or reducing taxes.

In my 1989 budget, I set out a medium-term fiscal plan to sharply reduce the deficit and bring an end to new government borrowing in financial markets by 1994-1995. My 1990 budget reaffirmed this plan and introduced a program of expenditure control to meet it. However, revenues are now lower than forecast, expenditures are higher because of the weak economy and debt charges are substantially higher.

If we did nothing to deal with this worsening fiscal situation, the deficit would be significantly higher than forecast over the next five years and the public debt would increase by at least $25 billion more in the same period. This would aggravate all of the fundamental problems that must be solved if we are to ensure a strong recovery. And if we increased our spending still further, the debt problem would be just that much worse.

Instead of lower inflation and lower interest rates, we would be sowing the seeds of higher inflation, higher interest rates and, unavoidably, higher taxes.

Instead of making more room for productive, job-creating investment, we would be crowding out that investment.

Instead of restoring the government's capacity to do the things Canadians want and need to build a stronger economy and a stronger country, we would be weakening that capacity.

Instead of building greater confidence in Canada's ability to deal with its problems, we would be assaulting that confidence in a direct and irresponsible way.

While the detailed policy choices facing the government are difficult, there is no doubt about the broad course that we must continue to follow. We must stay the course that we set out in 1984 and that we reinforced in 1989.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

ACTION FOR RECOVERY AND PROSPERITY

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The first challenge is to ensure that interest rates continue to come down. This is the key to our plan for economic recovery.

We are making real progress in the battle against inflation. As a result, interest rates have declined more than four percentage points since their peak last May. But we must now build a stronger level of certainty that a further easing of monetary conditions can be achieved and sustained.

Restoring the financial stability of government is essential to build that certainty.

Extending the Expenditure Control Plan

Sustained expenditure restraint is the key to deficit reduction and debt control. Government program expenditures must carry the burden of restraint.

In the 1990 budget, the government introduced a two-year Expenditure Control Plan that affected a broad range of government spending, with some important exceptions.

The Expenditure Control Plan will be extended. Exemptions will be continued for income support programs for seniors, families and veterans, unemployment insurance, as well as the equalization program and Canada Assistance Plan payments to lower-income provinces. Indian and Inuit programs will also be exempted.

Under the Expenditure Control Plan:

We will extend the existing 5 per cent cap on the growth of Canada Assistance Plan payments to the fiscally stronger provinces of Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta for three additional years.

The existing freeze on total per capita cash and tax transfers to the provinces under the Established Programs Financing will also continue through 1994-95. These transfers will continue to grow with provincial populations.

A number of other programs will remain frozen, including payments under the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act, payments to Telefilm Canada and concessional loan financing by the Export Development Corporation.

Science and technology programs and cash payments under Official Development Assistance will grow by 3 per cent per year.

The existing 15 per cent reduction in planned funds for new social housing will continue.

Grants and contributions to businesses, interest groups and individuals will be reduced by $75 million next year and $125 million thereafter.

In summary, programs which are exempt from the extension of the Expenditure Control Plan, accounting for 60 per cent of program spending, will grow at an average annual rate of 3.9 per cent from 1991-92 to 1995-96. All other program spending will grow at an average annual rate of 1.7 per cent.

In view of our difficult fiscal circumstances, the government has decided to reconsider a number of recent decisions.

We will withdraw the previously announced contribution of $88 million to the Toronto Ballet Opera House, in line with the decision of the Ontario government.

Expenditures under the Green Plan will be spread over six years instead of five.

Funding for the Canadian Jobs Strategy will be reduced by $100 million in 1991-92.

We will delay the provision of financial support for the construction of concert halls in Edmonton and Montreal.

The cultural research institute in Montreal will be delayed.

[Translation]

Reforming government management

From the outset, we have recognized that fiscal responsibility by the government means fiscal responsibility in the government. Operating costs have been tightly restrained since 1984 and have actually declined in real terms. This was achieved by reducing the size of the public service, eliminating programs and improving efficiency.

This effort has ben intensified in recent years. Since December 1989, operational restraint measures have been implemented to achieve total savings of $6 billion over a five-year period. Budgets for travel, vehicles and equipment, supplies and office space have been cut. Government construction projects in the National Capital Region have been delayed.

• (1700)

[English]

We recognize that Canadians expect the government to bear its share of restraint. And we recognize that politicians and federal public servants must demonstrate leadership and resolve in helping the country through this difficult period. We are therefore taking further actions to restrain costs and improve efficiency.

The ministerial pay of the Prime Minister and Cabinet members will be frozen for one year.

The wage budgets of departments will not be adjusted in 1991–92 for any increases in costs arising out of new collective agreements. Departments will have to absorb any such higher costs from within existing budgets. Each increase of 1 per cent in average wage settlements across the public service could lead to a loss of about 2,000 jobs.

Over the next three years, the government is not prepared to contemplate wage increases beyond 3 per cent at an annual rate.

Rates of salary increase for the executive category in the public service, deputy ministers and heads of Crown corporations will be limited to a level no higher than the average of negotiated settlements in the federal public service.

The salaries of Members of Parliament and the Senate, which currently increase at the rate of inflation minus 1 per cent, will now increase at a rate which is the lesser of this formula or the average of negotiated settlements in the public service.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): We will eliminate layers of management and reduce the number of senior managers in the public service by 10 per cent.

Capital spending and non-wage operating budgets will be frozen at 1990–91 levels.

We will continue to seek an agreement with public service unions on a work force adjustment policy that will permit the contracting-out of government services where this is shown to be cost-effective. If such an agreement cannot be negotiated, we will introduce legislation to permit contracting-out.

This program of restraint will generate savings of $3.6 billion over the next five years.

Let there be no doubt the government and the people who work in government will be doing their part.

Details of these and related measures will be announced shortly by my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board.

Wage policy

Mr. Speaker, I want to deal briefly with the approach the government is taking in its wage-setting policies. Continuing wage restraint is a key element of our plan for economic recovery.

As a leading employer, the government has a responsibility to ensure that public sector wage settlements do not add to inflationary pressures in the economy. To this end, the government has exercised restraint in federal contract settlements, while maintaining the principles of collective bargaining. Wage settlements since 1987 have been lower than those concluded in the private sector and by provincial and municipal governments.

However, given the seriousness of the fiscal situation, the government believes it must exercise further restraint in concluding wage settlements with its own employees. In taking this step, the government wishes to stress that federal employees are not being singled out for restraint. All Canadians face difficulties during the present period of recession. In the past two months alone, more than 140,000 jobs were lost in the economy. In the current situation, the government must cut back in all areas of spending, including wages.

All levels of government have a responsibility to restrain their expenditures. Let us remember that we all serve the same taxpayer—the same taxpayer who must pay the price when our spending gets out of line. And we will all share the benefits of reducing government spending—the benefits of lower interest rates, stronger growth and lower taxes.

Pay restraint is particularly important at the provincial and municipal levels, including education and health services. Wages and salaries in these sectors account for 45 per cent of all expenditures. Wage settlements in these sectors have been running ahead of inflation and our ability to pay. Some provinces have already introduced programs to limit the pay increases of their employees. It is vitally important that all provinces take part.

Wage settlements in the private sector have also been contributing to inflationary pressures. Reducing these pressures will help to lower costs and improve our competitive position. This will lead to more growth, new jobs and higher incomes.

Other management and efficiency initiatives

In addition to the measures I have described, the government will proceed with a number of other actions to streamline operations and encourage efficiency as part of our Plan for Economic Recovery.

Revenue Canada will take steps to improve the collection of tax revenues owed to the government. Changes will also be introduced to permit the recovery from tax refunds of debts owing to the government.

New cost recovery measures will be developed in the areas of transportation services and border crossings.

Privatization and Crown corporations

Since 1984, the government has privatized or dissolved more than 20 Crown corporations and improved operations of those remaining. As a result, the number of Crown corporation employees has been reduced by close to 80,000 since 1984–85. In the coming year, the government will continue to divest itself of investments no longer required as instruments of public policy.

The privatization of Petro–Canada will proceed now that legislation has passed.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Legislation will soon be introduced to enable the government to proceed with the sale of its shares in Telesat Canada. The government intends to privatize CN Exploration, a subsidiary of CN.

The Canada Oil and Gas Lands Administration will be disbanded and its responsibilities transferred to other departments. Petro–Canada International Assistance Corporation will be dissolved. With these actions, the last remaining institutions set up under the National Energy Program will be wound up.

The use of Special Operating Agencies will be extended to improve service and efficiency and cut costs, particularly in activities delivering services to the public and to departments. Organizations or functions to be converted to this status include the Canadian Grain Commission, Race Track Supervision, and the Patent and Trademark Office of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Further candidates for conversion to Special Operating Agencies will be announced in due course by the President of the Treasury Board.

We will also be considering the reorganization of certain aspects of government operations in order to bring government closer to those whom it serves. For example, the National Energy Board will be relocated to Calgary.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1710)

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The privatization program has been implemented to date through the Office of Privatization and Regulatory Affairs. Privatization remains a priority of the government. In keeping with our desire to streamline government operations, the functions of this agency will be redeployed. Ongoing and future privatizations will be managed by the Department of Finance under the responsibility of the Minister of State (Finance and Privatization).

Legislating spending limits

The expenditure restraint measures in this budget are crucial to our Plan for Economic Recovery. These measures build on a record of discipline that has reduced annual program spending growth to 3.7 per cent in the past five years compared with 13.8 per cent per year in the previous 15 years.

Having proven that we can manage spending responsibly, we can now provide Canadians with further assurance that future program spending will not get out of control again as it clearly was before 1984.

The government intends to impose mandatory, legislated limits on annual program spending for the next five years. By setting these limits in law, we will ensure that the budget's program spending track will be met. Flexibility will be provided only to meet a very limited set of contingencies that will be defined in the legislation.

This law will bring a significant change to the way government manages its expenditures. While the legislation will not preclude the introduction of new programs to meet new needs, it will mean that the government will have to fund new programs from within the total legislated spending ceiling.

The government will consult on the precise form this important legislation should take. I will release a draft bill in the next few weeks and at that time provide further details of the consultation process. Final legislation will be introduced later this year.

Allocating GST revenues to meet the debt challenge

The GST has improved the competitive position of Canadian-made goods in both Canadian and foreign markets. We have finally brought an end to the outdated manufacturers' sales tax and the damage it inflicted on growth and job creation in Canada.

I have been particularly encouraged to hear the positive response from a number of export-oriented industries already seeing the benefit of the new tax system. I am pleased, too, at the progress we have been able to make towards a harmonized system with the provinces. First Quebec and now Saskatchewan have decided to adopt the GST structure. This will pay dividends as businesses in those two provinces take advantage of the investment incentives the GST offers. The fact that provincial and federal taxes will be collected by a single administration will mean lower costs for taxpayers. Even more important, small business will be a big winner as the costs of compliance are reduced.

The competitive advantages offered by the GST are clear. At a time when Canada needs to fight hard to maintain its position in the world economy, it is all the more important for other provinces to harmonize their sales tax with the GST. It is good for the provinces. It is also good for Canada.

I am well aware that many Canadians have expressed concern that revenues from the GST might be used to finance new spending programs instead of helping to reduce the deficit. While the legislated spending limits I have just described should ease concerns about new spending programs, an additional safeguard will be provided.

As part of our Plan for Economic Recovery, we will ensure that all GST revenues are allocated solely to the effort to bring the public debt under control. This will be done through legislation to establish the Debt Servicing and Reduction Fund into which all GST revenues will flow. Private contributions for debt reduction and other specified revenues, such as those from privatization, will also flow into the fund. An annual audit of this fund by the Auditor General will be presented in the Public Accounts of Canada.

Establishing national inflation targets

The government and the Bank of Canada have made a clear commitment to achieving price stability in order to promote stable growth, equity and prosperity in Canada. To achieve this, our Plan for Economic Recovery includes further action to reduce inflationary pressures.

The benefits of price stability are enormous. Stable prices will strengthen our ability to compete. They will protect those least able to protect themselves, such as the working poor, the elderly and others on fixed incomes. They will result in lower interest rates by removing the inflation risk premium that lenders demand, thus making home ownership more affordable for Canadians. They will lower the cost of capital, and particularly risk capital, to Canadian businesses. Price stability will help to avoid the wasteful "boom and bust" cycle that rising inflation triggers in the economy.

As the budget papers point out, Canada's inflation for much of the post-war period has compared favourably with other industrialized countries, including Germany. From 1950 to 1973, our inflation rate averaged only 2.8 per cent—better than Japan's performance. There are no insurmountable barriers to attaining price stability.

Accordingly, I am announcing today, with the Governor of the Bank of Canada, that we are establishing intermediate inflation targets to serve as key steps on the way to price stability. We are committed to lowering inflation gradually to 2 per cent by 1995 and to making further progress toward price stability thereafter.

Reducing inflation requires reducing inflation expectations. The adjustment to price stability can be significantly eased by providing the public with specific targets and a clear timetable so that people know what to expect, to rely only on market pressures to bring down inflation expectations, risks an unnecessary period of economic weakness. A smoother and more rapid downward adjustment of inflation expectations will permit a substantial narrowing of interest rate differentials with the United States.

• (1720)

Reinforcing fiscal stability

The measures in this budget will ensure that expenditure restraint continues to make a major contribution to the restoration of fiscal stability. In my 1990 budget, there were no new taxes. In this budget, there are two specifically targeted revenue-raising measures.

Financing unemployment insurance

The unemployment insurance program is one of the most important elements of Canada's social safety net. In recognition of this, it is required by law that the Unemployment Insurance Account be maintained in a healthy condition on a self-financing basis.

Premium rates were set in 1989 for a three-year period beginning in 1990 on the basis of economic conditions expected at that time. At the current rate of contributions, the unemployment insurance fund would move from a surplus at the end of 1990 to a deficit of $6 billion by the end of 1992 because of higher than expected benefit payments.

We have seen the consequences of failing to act quickly to prevent debt problems from building up. Responsible stewardship requires that we take the necessary steps to ensure the fund remains self-financing. Accordingly, the unemployment insurance premium rate will rise by 55 cents per $100 of insurable earnings to $2.80 for employees. For employers, the rate will increase to $3.92. These measures will take effect July 1, 1991. The after-tax cost of the increase for employees with the maximum insurable earnings will be $2.70 per week.

Increased tobacco taxes

Our national strategy to reduce tobacco use addresses all aspects of the problem of tobacco consumption. In particular, it is aimed at discouraging young people from beginning to smoke.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): It includes initiatives in areas such as public awareness, advertising and crop substitution. This strategy has worked to reduce the use of tobacco by Canadians. Studies show that tobacco taxes are particularly important in discouraging young Canadians from smoking.

Effective midnight tonight, the excise tax on cigarettes will be increased by three cents per cigarette. The excise tax on other tobacco products will be increased proportionately. These increases will also apply to existing inventories of tobacco products.

As a result of an expected continuing decline in tobacco use by Canadians, revenues generated by the measures are also expected to decline in the years ahead. In light of the damage to health caused by smoking, this is one kind of revenue erosion that I am pleased to accommodate.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): As a result of these measures, it is estimated there will be about 100,000 fewer teenage smokers.

[Translation]

Provincial capital and payroll taxes

Over the past decade, the provinces have made increasing use of payroll and capital taxes as revenue sources. This has raised two issues for the federal government: whether the federal government should pay provincial payroll taxes; and the impact of increasing provincial capital and payroll taxes on federal corporate tax revenues.

After a review of the issues, I am announcing our intention to continue to pay voluntarily provincial payroll taxes of general application; and to limit the deductibility of provincial payroll and capital taxes from federal corporate income tax.

This limitation will be phased in to allow sufficient time for businesses and provincial governments to adjust, and will be the subject of consultations before it is implemented. It will treat payroll and capital taxes on the same basis as income taxes. This will remove the bias in favour of those deductible business taxes which have substantially eroded federal corporate income tax revenues in recent years. Small business will be protected from the impact of the change. No additional revenue will result for the federal government, but the reliability of federal corporate income tax revenues will be protected.

Assisting disabled Canadians

Since coming to office in 1984, the government has taken major steps to promote equal opportunities for Canadians with disabilities. The Prime Minister has appointed a Minister responsible for the Status of Disabled Persons; we have passed the Employment Equity Act; and we have put in place fairer, more generous tax assistance.

In short, this government has done more than any other to improve opportunities and to enable Canadians with disabilities to participate more fully and more fairly in the work place, in their communities and at home.

To build on the progress that we have already made, I am today announcing further positive steps to assist disabled Canadians:

The disability tax credit will be increased from $575 to $700 as of the 1991 taxation year.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The definition of expenses eligible for the medical expense tax credit will be broadened and will include the cost of part-time attendants in the home.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Costs incurred by employers in modifying their premises to accommodate disabled persons will become fully deductible in the year they are incurred.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Benefits provided by employers to disabled persons to enable or assist them to work will no longer be taxable.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Whether in the design of tax policies or in the development of legislation and new programs for individuals with disabilities, the government has benefited from extensive consultations with groups representing the views and interests of Canadians with disabilities. The government will continue to work with these groups to improve the effectiveness of the tax system in meeting the needs of disabled Canadians.

THE PROSPERITY CHALLENGE

I want to turn now to the challenge of ensuring Canada's prosperity. It is a continuing challenge, but also an increasingly urgent one.

The key to prosperity is to increase our productivity, for this is what will determine our earning power in the years ahead. Despite strong economic growth in the past six years, the growth in our manufacturing productivity was the poorest among the Group of Seven industrial nations.

In our increasingly competitive world, there is no room for complacency; and there is no safe hiding place for uncompetitive industries or countries. We must adapt to the new world reality or fall behind in the effort to preserve and enhance our future prosperity.

This competitive challenge was central to the Agenda for Economic Renewal introduced by the government in 1984. The wide range of economic and fiscal actions taken to implement that agenda have provided a better framework for building new competitive strength.

[Translation]

But there are growing concerns from Canadians about our ability to compete. These concerns relate to the broad economic environment, including inflation, interest rates and the exchange rate, and to the structural problems with our productivity performance, including the effectiveness of our investments, the burden of government and the climate for business.

Governments have a responsibility to create an environment favourable to the growth of competitive enterprise. In this budget we are acting to restore fiscal balance and attain price stability. This will strengthen our ability to compete in a tough economic world.

• (1730)

[English]

Our ability to compete abroad begins at home. We must maintain and strengthen our economic union. In this and other areas, governments must step up the pace of structural reform. I have been working with my provincial colleagues to develop shared approaches to basic economic issues. One of the key questions to be faced is this: How much government are people willing to pay for? In our discussions, we are already looking at the rising costs of government and at overlap and duplication. In addition, the Prime Minister has asked the Economic Council of Canada to carry out a major study of the impact of governments on competitiveness.

As a further positive step, I propose to encourage greater investment in Canadian equity markets by making changes to the tax environment affecting pension plans. The aim will be to eliminate the existing bias in favour of debt instruments by pension funds. This will encourage a larger source of capital for equity investments with the potential to make Canadian business more competitive. The government will discuss these proposals fully with interested parties.

But more needs to be done to assure our future prosperity. We need to look hard at the quality of our investments in infrastructure, machinery and equipment, training, education, and research and technology. There are signs that in some areas, such as private sector spending on training and research, we are not doing enough. In other areas, such as education, our level of spending compares well with international standards but our performance appears to be falling behind. In these and other areas, the co-operative efforts of Canadians in both the public and private sectors will be crucial to our competitive success.

[Translation]

This is not an issue only for business, labour and government. All Canadians have an enormous stake in strengthening Canada's competitive ability. The perspective of workers, consumers—people involved in every aspect of economic life—will be a valuable part of the process of identifying the problems and developing solutions.

To help assure our future prosperity, the government will launch a national effort to build a new partnership for prosperity that draws fully on the talents and efforts of Canadians in every sector of economic life. As a first step, we will release a discussion paper in the spring to help focus public debate toward the building of a broader consensus on the problems we face and the development of solutions.

[English]

FEDERAL–PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS

This budget has important implications for federal–provincial fiscal arrangements, and particularly for the system of major transfers: Equalization, Established Programs Financing and the Canada Assistance Plan. These programs account for more than 90 per cent of the funds transferred by the federal government to the provinces to help pay for a variety of programs and services.

For decades, the federal government has provided large and growing financial support to the provinces. Next year alone, total federal transfers to the provinces will reach $36.9 billion, including both cash and tax transfers. These transfers are simply too large to exempt from our expenditure restraint program. The deficit is a national problem and it demands a national solution.

The federal government is not asking more of the provinces than it is doing itself. Major transfers to the provinces, including both cash and tax transfers, will grow on average by about 3.7 per cent per year from 1991–92 to 1995–96. All other federal program spending will grow by 3.4 per cent.

I recognize that limiting the growth of transfers under Established Programs Financing raises concerns about the ability of the federal government to continue enforcing national Medicare principles under the Canada Health Act. Legislation will be introduced to ensure that the federal government continues to have the means to enforce these national medicare principles.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The principles of the Canada Health Act will not be compromised.

[Translation]

The measures in this budget bring the growth of federal–provincial transfers into line with current fiscal realities. But it is also time to ask ourselves whether the system of transfers and tax arrangements can be reformed to better meet the emerging challenges, priorities and needs of the 1990s and beyond.

In recent months, my provincial colleagues and I have been working together to address Canada's fiscal and economic problems. I have already referred to our discussions on the question of overlapping spending. We are also working in a co-operative way on a number of important taxation and fiscal transfer issues.

[English]

Reform of the major transfer programs

The federal government will consider reforms to the major transfer programs within the fiscal framework set out in this budget. We want to ensure that, in the future, the system of transfers:

provides for the sharing of the opportunities and benefits of Confederation;

supports a more efficient and competitive Canada; and maintains the principles and standards that are the basis of Canadian citizenship while respecting provincial flexibility.

All Canadians have a stake in these reforms, and we will be considering how best to seek their views.

Discussions on the updating and renewal of the Equalization program are already well under way, and will be carried forward as an integral part of this broader process.

Federal-provincial tax collection agreements

A number of my provincial colleagues have expressed concern that federal-provincial tax collection agreements do not provide enough flexibility for them to meet their own social and economic priorities. Some have suggested that provinces should have the right under these agreements to levy provincial tax on taxable income, rather than on basic federal tax. Indeed, the possibility of establishing separate tax collection systems has been raised by some provinces.

Given the importance of these and related issues, the federal government will seek the views of individual Canadians and tax professionals. We will release a discussion paper in the spring to explore reforms to the tax collection agreements. The objective will be to assess whether the flexibility of these agreements can be enhanced while maintaining the competitive benefits of a tax collection system that is simple, and consistent, and that enhances the accountability of governments. Following these consultations, we will put forward specific proposals.

ECONOMIC OUTLOOK

Our Plan for Economic Recovery will help ensure that Canada will be a stable, attractive place for investment in new growth, jobs and opportunities for Canadians.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) The components of our Plan for Economic Recovery reinforce each other. Lower deficits and less government borrowing will mean more favourable conditions for lower inflation and lower interest rates. This in turn will help to reduce the deficit by spurring stronger growth and reducing the interest costs of carrying the public debt.

The economic recovery will begin in the second half of this year and accelerate next year.

Inflation will decline. The inflation rate will decline to 3 per cent by the end of next year and average just over 2 per cent in the three years thereafter. Canada's inflation rate will be significantly less than that of the United States. This will strengthen the fundamentals of our economy and our ability to compete. It will also further ease the pressure on monetary policy.

• (1740)

Interest rates will continue to fall. Short-term interest rates are assumed to decline to an average of 9.5 per cent for 1991, well below the 1990 average of 13 per cent. This will contribute to a rebound in consumer spending and housing starts.

Strong economic growth will be secured. Real output will expand by 3.5 per cent in 1992 and average 4 per cent in the medium term. Real personal disposable income will grow steadily throughout the period. Employment growth will begin in the second half of this year and will strengthen in the years ahead.

I am tabling the budget document including Notices of Ways and Means Motions. Details of the measures are included in these documents.

I will also introduce a bill seeking borrowing authority for the 1991-92 fiscal year.

I am asking that an order of the day be designated for consideration of these motions.

CONCLUSION

Mr. Speaker, this is a strong budget—a budget for economic recovery.

It deals resolutely with our fiscal challenges.

It imposes strong disciplines on government spending.

It requires vigorous restraint in government operations.

It sets out a clear path toward lower inflation and lower interest rates.

It is designed to give Canadians confidence that we are facing directly our immediate economic and fiscal problems.

[Translation]

But it does more than that. It established a clear direction as to how we must face the more fundamental problems undermining the competitive position of our economy, and it is sensitive to those in greatest need.

In short, it will provide leadership and direction in our economic affairs at a time when Canadians are asking fundamental questions about the future of our country.

[English]

Our Plan for Economic Recovery is different from those in previous recessions.

Our plan does not have the government throwing large amounts of money at problems. Those are band-aid solutions.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): This government is dealing in a fundamental way with the problems that it can directly influence. This is the best way to generate a positive environment in which Canadians can live and work.

It asks Canadians to do the same in the more positive environment which the plan will foster.

But I would add something else, Mr. Speaker. Too often Canadians complain that some other region of the country or some other group is doing better than they are. The challenge to all Canadians is to do what each of us can do to strengthen our country.

At this time of great stress in our national unity, it is important to put aside jealousies and defeatism and start working together for our country.

Canada has come a long way in 123 years. Let's not sell ourselves short. Let's start thinking positively and take heart from our past success.

We have forged a country that is the envy of the world—a tolerant and open society with the world's second highest standard of living.

This prosperity was put at risk by abandoning the traditional Canadian value of paying our way.

I believe that this budget will help us regain some of the key elements that brought us strong growth in the past—low inflation, responsible financial management and a desire to work together to succeed.

The realization of this can rekindle our pride and give us a solid basis for hope and confidence in the future—hope that is important at this time in our history. For a strong economy will strengthen our national unity—and faith in our national unity will reinforce our economic strength.

We all wish to see a strong, united and prosperous Canada. Our Plan for Economic Recovery will help us achieve that goal.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the budget we have just heard is a disaster for the great majority of Canadians.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): This Budget is a real disaster for most Canadians.

[English]

The Minister of Finance has just said to Canadians: "If you are out of work or if you fear being out of work, you are on your own."

This Minister of Finance has just said to Canadians: "If you are sick or poor, you are on your own."

This minister speaks of national unity. He is telling Canadians they can be unemployed together. That is all he has to say to them in this budget tonight.

Last year, when the minister presented his budget on February 1990, we said that budget was a blueprint for a made-in-Canada recession. The minister disagreed with us, but we were right and he was wrong because we have a made-in-Canada recession. We are suffering from it because of the policies of this Minister of Finance and his government.

There is no reason to believe—none whatsoever—that the minister knows what he is talking about today any more than he did in that last budget, especially when he says that the budget he has just given sets the stage for recovery and growth.

After all, the minister admits that unemployment under his budget that he gave tonight will rise to double digit levels, to 10 per cent and be almost as high as 10 per cent next year.

This means misery and suffering for 1.5 million Canadians who will be unemployed, out of work, due to this minister's misguided sense of priorities.

He is abandoning working Canadians to the misery he has created and all he has to say to them is that they have to pay more to survive the devastation he has created for them. He is actually making them pay higher unemployment insurance premiums, in effect a tax increase, and at the same time he is cutting job creation programs by another $100 million. This is a real slap in the face for working Canadians.

This minister is extending, for another three years, the freeze in transfer payments to the provinces for medicare and higher education. He is continuing the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan. These are real cuts in federal transfers for vital programs for all Canadians.

• (1750)

This means that the government is not really cutting its deficit, instead, it is once again simply transferring it to the provinces. This means higher taxes for Canadians from their cities and their provinces.

This is a budget without hope, a budget of despair, a budget that leaves a growing number of unemployed simply twisting in the wind. With this budget the Minister of Finance is washing his hands of any responsibility for the devastation he has created with his own made-in-Canada recession.

I say the minister's priorities are wrong when they ignore the need to help unemployed Canadians and when they ignore the need to help this country get out of the recession.

I say this minister with this budget is making it less likely there will be any real progress in reducing the deficit he claims to be so concerned about.

There is no certainty that the minister's policies announced tonight will work to bring about real recovery any more than exactly the same policies had when they were used by the finance minister of R.B. Bennett, the Conservative Prime Minister during the Great Depression. Those policies at that time did not bring recovery. They did not stop the devastation of the thirties and this minister's policies are likely to have no better effect.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I say by way of conclusion this evening that the 1990 budget of this Minister of Finance created a made-in-Canada recession. But I say that the budget he has presented today is a blueprint for de-Confederation. It is a blueprint for de-Confederation because this budget, in cutting, to all intents and purposes, after a few more years all federal support for medicare, cutting out support in any real sense for higher education, for social assistance is what is causing all too many Canadians to question the need for a national government, a federal government.

I say that the problem is not with our national government. The problem is with this Minister of Finance and his Prime Minister and his cabinet.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Canadians see this and that is why Canadians will reject this budget. Therefore, I think it appropriate to move:

That this debate be now adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to the order made Monday, February 25, 1991, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

The House adjourned at 5.53 p.m.

THE BUDGET

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Finance and the government launched a vicious attack on workers across Canada by imposing a 3 per cent cap on Public Service wage increases. They have told every employer in Canada that it is okay to throw away the right to bargain, it is okay to threaten workers with job losses and contracting out. If all that does not work, the government is prepared to interfere with conciliation and arbitration and force workers back to the job.

Workers in every community across Canada will suffer from this cynical severe attack on the hard won rights of workers. When 1.3 million Canadians are out of work, taking purchasing power away from consumers only guarantees that suffering will be even deeper and more prolonged.

The Minister of Finance has told working people they are going to have to swallow the devastating affects of his high interest rate policy, his high dollar policy and his high unemployment policy. They are going to pay twice for the GST; once at the cash register and next in their pay cheques.

Workers in Canada are not going to savage each other to survive, they are going to savage this government.

GULF WAR

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, as Iraqi troops withdrew from Kuwait, pursuant to UN resolution 660, coalition aircraft, including huge American B–52 bombers, dropped cluster bombs and 1,000–pound bombs on the fleeing troops. U.S. airmen said: "We hit the jackpot. It looks like the Iraqis are moving out and we are hitting them hard. It is not going to take too many days before there is nothing left of them."

The Prime Minister, exercising what former UN ambassador Stephen Lewis has described as poodle diplomacy, has refused to state what role Canadian CF–18s are playing in this carnage.

Today, Foreign Minister Tariq Aziz stated that Iraq accepts all relevant UN resolutions. It is now clearer than ever that the U.S. is determined to press on far beyond any UN resolution to achieve their agenda of the total destruction of Iraq's military, political and economic structure.

When will our Prime Minister finally show some independence and tell George Bush that enough is enough, this mad war must stop and that Canada will no longer be part of the killing machine.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance is to be congratulated for setting a clear course for recession recovery and the restoration of economic growth and renewed prosperity.

I, for one, was brought up to believe you have to pay your bills and I am sure most Canadians believe their government should do the same thing. The government can serve Canadians best by bringing inflation and interest rates under control. A strong economy is the best road to full employment and prosperity for Canadians. I commend the Minister of Finance for leading the way by freezing his own salary, and I am sure all members will join me in agreeing to the cap on our salaries. It is only reasonable that we should be joined in this restraint by our fellow employees in the Public Service.

The continued cap in growth of EPF payments sends a strong message to the provinces that they too are part of the problem, thus must be part of the solution. The Minister of Finance has set a solid course. Let us all get behind him with our full support.

THE BUDGET

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, yesterday's Tory Budget completely forgot Montreal. In Montreal, the unemployment rate is now 13.4 per cent. The government has made cuts in unemployment insurance, the job development program, social housing, medicare and payments to the provinces.

[English]

In a report dated February 4, Statistics Canada said that Montreal had more poverty than any other city in Canada. Twenty two per cent of the residents of greater Montreal live below the poverty level compared to 13 per cent in Toronto. And what is the Conservative government's answer? "Too bad, boys, get help somewhere else. We can find $1 billion for a war in Iraq but we cannot find money for housing, hospitals and jobs at home." God bless Canada.

THE BUDGET

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise today on behalf of all Canadians to demand honesty from this government.

Yesterday, the finance minister announced his plan to slash $75 million this year, and $125 million every year thereafter, from groups working for equality and social justice. But his government has refused to tell Canadians from where those amounts are being taken. Nor will it tell us in the estimates, the traditional forum for revealing the victims of this kind of budget slashing.

What should Canadians make of their government's spineless secretiveness? There is only one conclusion, Mr. Speaker. This government plans to knock off equality-seeking groups one at a time in order to escape organized opposition.

This government was so intimidated by the headline-grabbing protests over last spring's budget proposals to eliminate women's centres funding that it now hides behind the thin veil of ministerial consultation. Canadians are not fooled. They demand to know who is being targeted and why.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I was glad to see that in the 1991 Budget, program expenditures will increase by $7.5 billion in 1991-92, and also that the 6.9 per cent increase over the previous fiscal year will go to where needs are most pressing, i.e. $3 billion for assistance to the unemployed, $1.6 billion for the elderly, $1.3 billion for farmers in difficulty, $600 million to support our troops in the gulf and $1 billion for all other programs.

Mr. Speaker, for the sale of equity, the disability tax credit will be increased by $125 from 575 to $700 as of the 1991 taxation year. This means that federal assistance to disabled Canadians will increase by $35 million per year.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, a headline to a newspaper article reads:

"U.S. firms warned Canada's GST to hurt them".

American companies should wake up and smell the GST, says a U.S. tax expert.

"I think American companies are going to be the big losers under the goods and services tax", said Cliff Massa, a Washington lawyer who specializes in value-added taxes.

Now largely ignored by U.S. firms, the seven-per-cent GST will make Canadian competitors more efficient.

"I do not know why companies here seem so disinterested."

Massa, who has been sounding the GST alarm in the United States for the past year, said Canada's old federal sales tax was a boon to U.S. companies.

"I think everybody understands (the federal sales tax) discriminated against the Canadian manufacturer."

"It has both amazed and frustrated me, in that I don't think Americans have been paying any attention to the GST," said Massa.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the budget stands as the last will and testament of medicare. It is impossible to conceive the government can surrender its bargaining power of transfer payments and still keep provinces from bolting from the national health care system.

Provinces are being forced to close hospital beds. Deaths occur while waiting for surgery.

This budget will create a two-tier system of health care. Where you live and what you earn will determine your status in the system.

• (1410)

And who will suffer the most? The struggling middle class, the seniors and the poor.

Health care is a fundamental right of Canadian citizenship and now the government is destroying this right. For six years this government has failed to enforce the Canada Health Act. Now we are asked to believe national health standards will be upheld with new legislation.

We do not need new legislation to save us from user fees and extra billing. What we need is a new government.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, recently the United States imposed a restriction on Canadian seed potatoes because there were reported cases of potatoes being contaminated with the plant killing virus PVY-N.

The Department of Agriculture has indicated that the infected areas have been clearly identified and the spread of the virus has been confined, ensuring the successful eradication of the disease.

New Brunswick seed potatoes received a virtual clean bill of health as a result of the various tests.

As a result, the Americans amended their restrictions and are now allowing New Brunswick potatoes to cross the border. However, the Americans continue to have stringent controls on P.E.I. potatoes. The lesson for Canada is simply this, that we must ensure top quality products only are exported out of our country into neighbouring countries to ensure quality.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my constituents in Haldimand—Norfolk were shocked and dismayed at the callous attack the Minister of Finance took on the tobacco farmers and communities of my area.

Did the minister have any idea of the economic hardship that the people of Haldimand—Norfolk have been going through because of his economic mismanagement?

Did he have any idea that the implementation of this tobacco tax would push many of my constituents over the edge into bankruptcy?

Even though the minister collects over $5 billion a year with this tobacco tax, less than $10 million of that is returned to the farmers whose livelihoods depend on it.

Did the minister not know what the impact of his budget would have on the communities and the small entrepreneurs surrounding the tobacco belt?

Did the minister not know that there is anger and frustration and that people are desolate and, in some cases, without hope, and that they are taking this frustration out on themselves and, in some cases, on one another.

Tobacco farmers have subsidized the minister's programs long enough. It is time the minister put his money where his mouth is and either buy tobacco farmers out of give them the long-term certainty that they need to survive.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, following a budget there is always an outcry from those free spenders who feel the government has unlimited resources. We are hearing this chorus again today, but we are not hearing it from the average Canadian, the taxpayer, the person who pays the bills.

Our taxpayers have had it with government spending and this budget gives them hope.

The Minister of Finance has listened to those who demand that government operate in a more fiscally responsible manner. Business cannot survive if it overspends and neither can our country.

Committing all GST revenue to the debt servicing and reduction fund is a positive step. Canadians do not like taxes and appreciate the legislated assurance that GST revenues will go toward debt reduction and not new spending.

For the first time, we will put a ceiling on how much politicians can spend. My Private Members' Motion No. 684 asks for this and I am pleased to see it included in the budget.

The country faces difficult times and the minister has chosen to make tough decisions and thinking Canadians are going to support him.

THE BUDGET

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, the champagne bottles were popping all night in the boardrooms of The Business Council on National Issues and the Prime Minister's friends.

Unscathed in their tax shelters, big business has been toasting their beloved Minister of Finance. He has relentlessly unleashed devastating fiscal bombs on the working poor and middle class Canadians.

Budget damage assessment will show that he has inflicted severe hardships on just about everybody except his cronies, the 150 members of the BCNI—and the deficit.

The Minister of Finance said last night and I quote:

> I have heard the anguish of people who have lost their jobs or their businesses.

Yet, while the unemployed line up at the food banks, I can only hear Tom d'Aquino and his gang clinking the glasses of their tax-deductible cocktails.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commend the finance minister on the new tax measures he has introduced to assist disabled persons.

Last June, the Standing Committee on Human Rights and Status of Disabled Persons chaired by our colleague, the hon. member for Oxford, tabled a report calling on the government to make the economic integration of disabled persons a national priority.

The important new steps taken in yesterday's budget constitute one element of this strategy to promote equal opportunities for Canadians with disabilities.

They build on an impressive series of initiatives to improve the quality of life of Canadians with disabilities and remove barriers to their full participation in our society.

By assisting both employers and employees, these new tax measures will help ensure that disabled Canadians have equal opportunity to participate in the workforce.

FILM INDUSTRY

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): With the Tories' cut of $28 million to Telefilm Canada, Canadian film makers will be singing the Bye, Bye Blues.

Since this government entered into close trade relations with the Americans, Canada's film industry has suffered from the divided loyalties. The government first cut the tax incentive program for film and video production which was $200 million yearly.

Then it failed to produce distribution legislation to increase the number of Canadian films on our screens to 3 per cent against its own task force recommendations and promises but close to the heart of the finance minister's American cousin, Jack Valenti.

Not only could the Telefilm freeze impact on the feature film industry, but it also could become une histoire inventée for the CBC as it receives about $31 million yearly from the broadcast fund.

It is clear to this side of the House that this government is editing its film policy and determined to leave the Canadian film industry on the cutting room floor.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE BUDGET

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, let's get one thing clear.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Copps (Hamilton East): Canadian consumers did not cause this recession. World stock markets did not cause this recession. The Persian Gulf crisis did not cause the recession.

If the Minister of Finance wants to know who caused the recession, he should buy a mirror, pay the GST and look in it because he made this recession.

I ask the Prime Minister why, in this time of recession, he allowed the Minister of Finance to cut social and job programs at a time of devastating unemployment. Why did he allow the Minister of Finance to cut housing programs at a time when emergency shelters are bursting at the seams?

Why did the Prime Minister approve a budget which attacked the victims of the very recession he and his government created?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I might remind the hon. member of something that she said about a year or so ago.

She said: "We face the danger point with the deficit." She went on to say: "I think it is important for any leadership candidate to go to the country and to preach fiscal sanity."

Some hon. members: More, more.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I would also draw to her attention comments that were made yesterday by representatives of the provincial government that is the greatest amount in debt and the one that is facing the same type of problem that we are in the federal government.

Mr. Hubert Kitchen, the Minister of Finance of the province of Newfoundland, said: "Mr. Wilson's budget is quite a responsible one given the times in which we live and given the essential importance of all governments in Canada of living within their means. I think he has made a sincere attempt at that. I think we should give him credit for attempting to do better."

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): This is the essential choice that Canadians face. We either live within our means, or we move to the approach that the hon. member is suggesting that we take of saying: "Let's forget about fiscal sanity," to use the words that she used last March.

We must realize that we had been running, until 1984, government spending far too quickly, averaging 13.8 per cent per annum. It is important that Canadians and the hon. member for Hamilton East understand the significance of this budget in getting us back to fiscal sanity.

• (1420)

Ms. Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, his interest rate policies have failed. His employment policies have failed. His tax policies have failed. This is a minister who is not in a position to talk about fiscal sanity.

Could the Prime Minister explain why he is allowing the Minister of Finance to destroy our country's system of universal medicare? How can the Prime Minister pretend, on the one hand, to support universal medicare and then destroy funding for it? How can the Prime Minister tear the heart out of our health care system at a time when the very nature of the country depends upon the hallmark of decency and caring that is reflected in our health care system?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, how soon former Liberal leadership candidates forget what they once said.

According to the Manitoba Dauphin Herald, when the hon. member opposite was running for the leadership of the Liberal Party, she said this: "Copps said if she is Liberal leader and Prime Minister, she will reform the income tax system and cut government spending instead of imposing a tax".

How soon they forget.

What threatens the social programs that are important to Canadians is the fact that out of every dollar that goes to Ottawa in tax revenues, the first 35 cents goes just to pay the interest on the national debt. That means that each Canadian, every man, woman and child in this country, has a debt in Ottawa of over $15,000.

How much higher is the hon. member prepared to see that go, or will she be honest with Canadians and say that it is time that this generation started to pay its own way?

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister, who was supposed to be responsible for Canadian unity. He knows this Budget is not only anti-Quebec but anti-Canadian as well. The federal government is forcing the provinces to introduce user fees. It is forcing them to cut health care by cutting its health insurance program. The federal government cuts payments and still asks the provinces to provide the same services. Could the Prime Minister inform the House, at this difficult time in Canada's history, why he is attacking health insurance, the only program that unites Canadians in Quebec, Ontario, western Canada and the Maritimes? The only program in which all Canadians really believe? Is the Prime Minister going to tell us he is willing to sacrifice the health insurance program to the national debt?

[English]

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time that members opposite have taken the approach of trying to frighten the elderly, the sick and the poor. It is a tactic that is reprehensible. It was a tactic that was followed by them in the last election and was rejected by Canadians then. It will be rejected by Canadians now.

The federal government is not asking the provinces to do anything that the federal government is not prepared to do itself. Transfer payments to the provinces will go up by some 3.7 per cent, while spending on federal programs will be going up by 3.4 per cent. Mr. Speaker, if you look at the cost to the provinces, this amounts to less than one-half of 1 per cent of provincial revenues. And to suggest that this is the death-knell of medicare is simply Liberal scaremongering once again.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): My question is for the Minister of Finance, who seems to enjoy quotations.

Back in 1982 when he wanted the job of presenting budgets, he said this: "The government must begin to realize that it is individual people who are being hurt. We cannot stay here in an ivory tower in Ottawa; we must deal with individual Canadians who are losing their jobs and their businesses."

Can the minister explain how a $100 million cutback to the Canadian Jobs Strategy and interest rates which he projects to be in excess of 10 per cent will help individual Canadians keep their jobs and businesses?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend should search a little longer for quotes, because I think he will find that consistently through all my time in government I have been cautioning about the growth of deficits and debt.

When we faced the preparation of this budget, we were looking at a budget deficit of $35 billion, which we have been able to bring down to a deficit of $30.5 billion.

What I am hearing from hon. members opposite is that they would want to increase that deficit from $35 billion to $36, $37, $38 billion. That is completely unacceptable. That would result in an increase in interest rates, and the people he is referring to in that quote he took of mine would be the first ones who would be hurt.

We have designed this budget to bring interest rates down. We are doing that through legislated controls on government spending, through getting the deficit down from where it would have been and getting it down even further next year, and by bringing in inflation controls, inflation targets, which are designed to bring interest rates down. That is the fundamental difference between the government on this side of the House and the Liberal Party on the other side of the House. We are going to bring down interest rates to ignite the economy. The Liberals on the other side would just spend their way into oblivion.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, the minister's problem is that he thinks deficits are about numbers. Deficits are also about people.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Manley: According to yesterday's Budget, even if economic recovery begins in the second half of this year, we will still have a million and a half unemployed in this country.

Mr. Speaker, I have another quote. The Minister of Finance also said, and I quote:

[English]

"When people are struggling for survival, when people fear that they will lose their jobs, there is not much trust".

[Translation]

In light of what he said, could the minister explain how his Budget could give a million and a half unemployed Canadians and their families any reason to trust the government?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in the 15 years leading up to 1984, what we saw—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am going to show hon. members how this is very relevant to today.

An hon. member: You haven't been right on a prediction yet.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the 15 years up to 1984 government spending increased at 13.8 per cent per annum, year in and year out. According to Jeff Simpson this morning, he said: "Ottawa became a fiscal cripple in the years 1975 to 1984 when the federal government accumulated nearly $200 billion worth of debt".

The message here, which is totally lost on the Liberals on the other side of the House, is that choices they and we might want to make today have been taken away from us by the runaway spending during that time as the debt built up.

If hon. members do not understand that lesson of the past, they are living in another world.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance talks about choices. He talks about making these choices but not having any room to move. There are over 1.5 million Canadians who have no choice because they have no job.

I want to say to the Minister of Finance that certainly the Liberal government during the last recession also, I might add, capped old age pensions and family allowances, cut wages, put over a million Canadians out of work. At that time this Minister of Finance said to the then Liberal government: "Why is it that the Liberal government continues to take Canadians to the edge of a cliff and push some of them off?" That is what Canadians are asking this finance minister and this Conservative government.

My question to the finance minister is simply this: Why in this budget is there not any programs to get Canadians back working? That is the choice this minister should be giving Canadians, the choice of a job.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I have to say that my friend opposite totally misunderstands this budget. The essential objective of this budget is to get those Canadians that she is talking about back to work by bringing about lower interest rates. By bringing about lower interest rates we can give the greatest amount of stimulus to the economy that we can.

What I am hearing from my hon. friend is that she would take that $35 billion deficit we are starting with this year, sprinkle around money through all parts of the economy, build it up to about $37 billion or $38 billion. The result of that would be higher interest rates, which would totally overwhelm the limited benefits of that additional spending.

That is the direction we are going with this budget. It is designed through the spending caps, through the reduction in the deficit and the inflation targets to get interest rates down and to keep down in the broadest possible way.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, for the Prime Minister.

The Minister of Finance says that creating 1.5 million unemployed is creating prosperity. When the interest rates were even higher, he told us we needed the high interest rates because that was going to be better for the economy. Now he tells us he is going to lower the interest rates with which we agree, but he still says we have to have over 1.5 million unemployed. This is totally unacceptable.

I want to ask the Prime Minister who, just two weeks ago, told Canadians in a major speech in Toronto that a major part of national unity was to continue the Canadian tradition of national standards and singled out health care and the environment in particular.

How can the Prime Minister seriously talk of national unity when this budget helps to destroy medicare, does not do anything for the environment and does not have any job creation at all? How can he speak of national unity when he cannot even provide jobs for Canadians?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend says that the Minister of Finance indicated that we must have 1.5 million people unemployed. That is a complete distortion. He never said any such thing, and I know that my hon. friend—

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: He never said any such thing and I know that my hon. friend at an appropriate time will want to rise and correct the impression that she has given because it is completely inaccurate.

In point of fact the figure of 1.5 million is, however, applicable because it is just about the number of new jobs created by this government since it was sworn in, in 1984. That job creating record was the best of all the OECD countries and led the G–7 with the exception of Japan.

We are now in a recession, which we have acknowledged. We are going to work our way out of it in the real world not by promises of some better day to come by spending borrowed money, but by getting interest rates down, re–energizing the private sector, attracting international investment, and creating durable jobs.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, for the Minister of Finance.

There are many ways that the Minister of Finance can justify his budget, but it is the Minister of Finance who said that he projects 10 per cent unemployment. That means about 1.5 million Canadians unemployed. I am not suggesting he likes it, but that is his projection and so he has projected a budget based on a high unemployment rate.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance another question.

[Translation]

In 1982, the current Secretary of State for External Affairs told the Liberal government that it was asking low and middle–income Canadians to shoulder more than their fair share of the burden. Yesterday, the Tory government made the same mistake. The disadvantaged and the middle class are still footing the bill.

My question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Why didn't the government decide to get rid of corporate tax loopholes in this Budget?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how many times I have to say it to the hon. member. The essential purpose of corporate income tax reform was to close a number of the loopholes that she talked about and was quite correct back two or three years ago, but we have seen many of those loopholes closed. We have the banks, which at that time were paying no tax, paying about $1 billion worth of taxes this year.

We brought in the large corporations tax. That is covering all corporations that have capital over $10 million. We have seen in this last year where corporate profits have fallen by about 40 or 50 per cent, but corporate income tax revenues have only dropped about 5 per cent. Why? It is because they do not have the same loopholes that they had before. They have been closed by this government.

If she has any other loopholes she wants us to close, she should bring them to my attention. I would be very delighted to listen to them and respond if it is appropriate.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The Minister of Finance in the province of Newfoundland may be impressed with this budget, but the people of Newfoundland and Labrador know that this is the mother of all budgets.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Tobin: What we see is the Minister of Finance and his budget in full retreat in the face of the recession. This minister has forecast a 10 per cent unemployment rate, a 10 per cent unemployment rate at the same time that job strategy has been cut by $100 million.

My question is the following: Why is this government preparing to abandon 1.5 million unemployed Canadians on the battlefield of his made-in-Canada recession, made by this Minister of Finance?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I want to remind my hon. friend the last person who used the expression "the mother of all wars" just got wiped out.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Possibly my friend will wear his beret into the House tomorrow. He has the moustache.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance is very fast. Saddam promised the mother of all battles. He delivered the mother of all budgets. And they are both in full retreat.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, the simple fact of the matter is that this minister—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, the simple fact of the matter is that the government that promised jobs, jobs, jobs is now preparing to leave 1.5 million Canadians unemployed, without shelter, without hope.

Why has the government cut $100 million from job development? Why has this government increased UI premiums by 24 per cent at a time when Canadians are being told they are to expect no hope, they are on their own in the face of this recession?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is wrong again.

• (1440)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): We are reducing the budget of the Canadian Jobs Strategy, that is correct. However, at the same time, we are adding moneys to the amounts that we are putting into training because of the amounts that we are spending in the unemployment insurance fund. We do not like to reduce that amount of funding in the Canadian Jobs Strategy because it is a good program.

Mr. Tobin: Why are you doing it, Michael?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Well, I will tell you why we are doing it. The fact that we are doing this demonstrates the serious nature of the deficit and debt problem.

My hon. friends opposite are being presented with a choice; they can have a healthy economy through lower interest rates or they can have an economy that is going to drag along with high interest rates. The approach of the Liberals and the New Democratic Party as well is to spend, spend, spend, hoping that we are going to get ourselves out of a problem. All it is going to lead to is higher interest rates and a continuation of that problem.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. This budget is a direct attack on the labour movement in this country. The government has effectively declared war on its own employees.

In 1989, more than 68,000 Public Service employees earned less than $30,000 and, interestingly enough, two-thirds of those employees were women.

In light of this, would the Minister of Finance now admit to this House that these measures are aimed solely at the total destruction of the union movement and their rights to bargain in good faith?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Obviously, Mr. Speaker, the government will admit to no such thing. If you have read the budget this year and if you have read the budgets of last year and the year before, you will realize that we are facing a difficult fiscal situation, largely due to the very large debt, whether you like it or not, that was left to us by your regime.

To illustrate the dimensions of our problem, in order to service that debt next year we will have to pay in excess of $43 billion. This is a very difficult situation at a time when Canadians are being laid off and losing their jobs, when some are reopening agreements in order to help their companies along. We have had to take difficult measures.

We are not attacking our Public Service, far from it. We are asking them to help us in solving this problem for all Canadians.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister.

The government's own Labour Canada statistics confirm that the federal employees' wage settlements have fallen far behind both the private sector and the public sector. Based on these figures and those in my previous statement, will the Minister of Finance now agree to abandon these ridiculous plans to control the federal Public Service wages before its own employees take them to task?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, we have not decided on a wage freeze. We have said there would be a cap on the wage budget.

That being said, I will agree with the hon. member that we have negotiated with the Public Service unions very good agreements. I am proud to say that we have negotiated them below inflation rates. We have managed better than the private sector. We have managed better than other governments and other administrations.

That being said, we are still faced with a fiscal situation. Everybody must bring its share to the solution of that problem. We are taking our cuts and we are bringing in our share. We expect all the employees to participate. I met with all the union leaders this morning except one and we had a very frank exchange. I am very confident that together we can manage this situation.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, Canadians needed a budget of hope to get people back to work. What they got was the same mean ideas which had shut plants, lost jobs and destroyed hope for people right across this country.

My question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In the budget and in Mr. Crow's news conference today, the government committed itself to inflation targets. Will the minister show that he cares about jobs and commit himself to reduce unemployment by setting unemployment reduction targets for this country?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there is a booklet with the budget called Canada's Economic and Fiscal Performance and Prospects. I refer him to page 37 where there is a chart which shows the inflation record of this country in the 1950 to 1973 period and the impact that that had on the economy. Inflation was 2.8 per cent. The deficit, by the way, was at zero.

Federal programs spending was at a low level relative to the size of the economy. Labour productivity was nearly three times what it was in the 1974 to 1984 period, and the growth in the national income was 5.2 per cent in real terms as opposed to 3.3 per cent in real terms in the 1974–1984 period. During that same period the unemployment rate was a good deal lower than it was during the 1974 to 1984 period. That, demonstrates as clearly and as succinctly as I can the benefits of low inflation.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): In fact, Mr. Speaker, in the minister's own budget, he projects a 10 per cent unemployment figure and what is worse a 9.8 per cent unemployment figure for next year. Is it not possible for this minister to recognize that there are people hurting across this country, that the anguish that he talked about in his speech is real? Therefore for this minister, it should be just as important to put inflation targets into effect, yes, but just as important to put unemployment targets into effect. Will this minister in fact do that? Will he stand up in the House and commit himself to such targets?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do recognize that Canadians are hurting. I have heard very directly of the anguish of people losing their jobs and losing their businesses. It is precisely that which drives me to bring in the type of budget we brought in yesterday. It is because this budget is going to bring down interest rates. It is going to bring down inflation. It will result in the employment growth that my hon. friend would like to have.

Now, he shakes his head because he does not understand the approach that we are taking. What his—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in his Budget speech the minister justified cuts in spending on the environment as follows: "Since the Green Plan was announced, the economic situation has deteriorated." Mr. Speaker, the Green Plan was announced only two months ago. What does the minister know today that he didn't know two months ago? And what should the minister have known in December that he knows now?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard is aware that these are difficult times for the economy, and the Budget reflects the measures the government must take to deal with a difficult situation. As far as the environment is concerned, we should recall that yesterday's Budget reconfirmed the federal government's commitment to injecting $3 billion into the Green Plan over a period of six years instead of five. We should also remember that all initiatives described in the December Green Plan will be maintained by the government, and we intend to act on every one of these initiatives.

• (1450)

[English]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, I cannot believe that an intellectually bankrupt Minister of the Environment stands up to defend an intellectually bankrupt Minister of Finance.

In December, the Minister of the Environment told us, and I quote: "All the moneys for the Green Plan have been committed for the next five years". Now the Green Plan has been trashed. Why? Because Finance has told us that the fiscal deficit is more important than the environmental deficit.

Well, since the minister wants to answer, will he tell me this. Does the minister agree that the fiscal deficit is more important than the environmental deficit? Does he agree that there are no economic opportunities in environmental technologies? Does he agree that there are no economic costs in the environmental deficit? Is this minister happy being the lapdog of his colleagues?

[Translation]

Is the minister glad to be Environment's Marcel Masse?

[English]

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, in the fiscal year just ending, the Government of Canada will spend $1.3 billion on the environment. Given the fiscal plan that was put forward by my colleague, the Minister of Finance yesterday, that will be increased in the next fiscal year by $250 million.

I will spell out exactly what that means for my hon. colleague opposite. That is an increase of 20 per cent. And yes, I believe this government is firmly committed to the environment. Look at the numbers and watch us go.

[Translation]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Saint-Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

[English]

A little more than a year ago the Prime Minister stated and I quote:

> In our second mandate, we are going to focus more and more of our attention and resources on the fundamental building blocks of a competitive society—(on) long-term investment in people, skills training, education, research and development.

Yesterday's continued freeze on transfer payments for education, as well as a $100 million cut in training completely contradicts the Prime Minister's statement. Why? Why this flagrant contradiction?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, first of all, what my colleague has said is simply wrong. The transfer payments to the provinces will increase by 3.7 per cent over the next four years.

Mr. Mulroney: They are not frozen.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): They are not frozen. They will be going up.

My colleague from Winnipeg says that is less than the inflation rate. No, that is greater than the inflation rate.

I appreciate that my hon. friend has not read all of the aspects of the budget. But if he would read this, he would see that one of the principal components to improving the competitive position of an economy is to get the macro-economic elements right, that is, low inflation, low deficits, low interest rates. These are all key elements to improving the competitive position. They have to be done in conjunction also with improvements in education, science and technology and things like that. However, we must get the macro-economic elements right and that is what this budget is designed to do.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): How the Minister of Finance can know that the transfer payments are going to be more than next year's inflation rate is beyond me and, I suspect, beyond most Canadians.

[Translation]

I have a supplementary. According to the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada and the Canadian Federation of Students, there will be a massive increase in tuition fees and student debt as a result of the freeze announced by the government. The total increase per student will be at least $1,000 by 1995. Will the minister confirm that from now on, the rich will have better access to education while the middle class and low-income Canadians, especially in poor provinces like Manitoba, will end up being left out altogether?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me remind my hon. friend again that the major transfers to the provinces will be going up by 3.7 per cent.

An hon. member: Not frozen.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The hon. member raises certain aspects of the impact of this. Those are the responsibility of the provinces. The provinces have to decide how they are going to manage their own fiscal position. I would say to my hon. friend that it is important that the provinces also restrain their spending because their spending has been increasing at almost double the rate of the federal government's spending.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The minister said in response to my leader, and he was careful in what he said, that he had closed some of the loopholes in the tax system that were put there by the Liberal Party over 15 years. But he has not closed all of them. The minister either never reads anything or he has deliberately ignored the many recommendations that have been made to him over the course of the last few years about other loopholes that could have been closed if the minister was serious in his rhetoric about distributing the burden of deficit reduction.

Why did the minister not eliminate the business and entertainment tax deduction, the dividend tax credit, the manufacturing and processing tax credit and the tax breaks that exist for real estate developers in this country, many of whom have become millionaires at taxpayers' expense? Why did he not eliminate those tax breaks if he is serious about everybody contributing to deficit reduction?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has raised four different, what he calls, loopholes. If he wants to raise these in committee, I would be glad to give him a specific response.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I do not think the Speaker would allow me to give a full response, but I will start anyway. Let us start with the manufacturing and processing deduction. This is designed to put our manufacturing industry on a competitive tax basis with the manufacturing industry in the United States. If this was removed, the tax rates of the manufacturing sector would increase significantly. That would result in job losses here in Canada. It would result in the creation of jobs in the United States.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will put his question please.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance knows full well that that tax credit was put there partly in response to the manufacturing sales tax, which has been eliminated. Therefore, the need for that tax credit has also been eliminated.

How does the minister have the nerve to come before this House today and yesterday and talk about burden sharing and deficit reduction and not ask of the business community, his friends over at the BCNI, one single sacrifice? How does he have the nerve to talk about deficit reduction and not ask them for one single sacrifice?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says that the manufacturing and processing tax was brought in to offset the manufacturers' sales tax. That is wrong. The manufacturers' sales tax was brought in in 1926. In the late 1970s the government brought in this manufacturing and processing tax to offset a new export enhancement tax that the United States had brought in. It was designed to put the American and Canadian tax position for manufacturing companies on the same basis so we did not lose jobs to the United States.

If my hon. friend wants to lose jobs to the United States by jacking up the taxes in this country, let him have it, but please do not do it to this country and government.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, the federal-provincial implications of this budget reek with arrogance—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): If I may, Mr. Speaker, the budget's federal-provincial implications reflect an incoherence which borders on arrogance. On one hand the government reduces its contribution to provincial health insurance programs, on the other it seeks additional powers to dictate to the provinces their expenditure level and program contents. How can the government justify its intention to pay less and control more at the same time?

Mrs. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): Lucien, ask for the CNTU's proper interpretation of that!

[English]

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should be aware of the fact that the federal government continues to increase transfer payments to the provinces.

• (1500)

The federal government will be holding federal program spending to a 3.4 per cent year over year increase. It will be increasing transfer payments to the provinces by 3.7 per cent.

In the case of EPF, we will be transferring some $20 billion, $14 billion of which is for health care. I believe the taxpayers of Canada have a right, when $14 billion of their money is being spent, to set minimum national standards to be met for all Canadians.

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I assume that this is the renewed federalism the government has been dangling in front of Canada and the provinces: The provinces pay the bills and Ottawa makes the decisions.

[English]

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat embarrassed to even point this out to my hon friend, but it says in La Presse today: "A budget, honest, which looks far into the future. Wilson gives an example."

What we are trying to do here is demonstrate to Canadians the essential direction that this country has to take to strengthen national unity and our ability to work with the provinces in support of the traditions and the principles that are important to this country.

My hon. friend says he wants more flexibility for the Canada Health Act. Is he saying he is in favour of user fees and extra billing?

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of personal privilege.

I found the exchanges that occurred this afternoon during Question Period and the language that was used to be personally offensive.

There was talk about the "mother of all budgets", the "mother of all battles". Not only did it bring a tone of levity into this House that is absolutely inappropriate both to the war and to this budget, it denigrated motherhood.

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1991–92

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. John McDermid (for the Minister of Finance) seconded by Mr. Blais, moved for leave to introduce Bill C–97, an act to provide borrowing authority.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

RECYCLING ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask unanimous consent of the House for leave to withdraw Bill C–272, standing in my name on the list of private member's bills. I gather the appropriate words are that the order be discharged and the motion be withdrawn.

I ask for unanimous consent for that to take place.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): So ordered.

Order discharged and bill withdrawn.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I have two housekeeping motions. The first one applies to next Monday and relates to the normal time for Private Members' Business. Because of the budget debate, that time will not be used for Private Members' Business. This motion simply allows us to continue with government orders and thus give more members time to participate in the budget debate.

Therefore, I move:

That, notwithstanding any standing order of practice of this House, the House meet at one o'clock p.m., Monday, March 4, 1991 to resume debate on Government Order, Ways and Means proceeding No. 18, in the name of the Minister of Finance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Does the hon. member have leave to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is not consent.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I assume there will be unanimous consent for this motion. It arises out of the fact that the names of the standing committees have been changed and as a result a document referred to one committee did not go to the others, which it had to be.

Therefore, I move:

That, notwithstanding any order or practice of this House, the annual report of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1990, which was deemed referred to the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs on February 26, 1991, be deemed referred as well to the Standing Committee on Industry, Science, and Technology, Regional and Northern Development.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

GULF WAR

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition under Standing Order 36. I have a number of petitions here from citizens in Victoria and in the area. The petition is with respect to the Gulf War and was written before we heard the reports today in which generals were proclaiming the enthusiasm of shooting at retreating soldiers.

It calls on the governments of the United States, Great Britain and other countries with forces in Saudi Arabia not to use offensive action against Iraq because of the catastrophic consequences of war. The generals were saying today that thousands upon thousands of soldiers were killed, clearly in unnecessary action.

• (1510)

If I may add, Mr. Speaker, there was one name that was not accepted on the petition. A 90-year-old citizen of Victoria named Percy Gray expressed his strong objection to the war, and I would like to place that in the record of the House.

NATIONAL PAROLE BOARD

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to present a petition signed by many residents of the province of British Columbia pursuant to Standing Order 36 concerning the National Parole Board and its releasing of convicted murderers without due consideration for the safety of the public.

These petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to revise the laws of Canada relating to parole to make a life sentence mean life in lieu of the current 12 to 15 years the first degree convicted murderers are currently serving prior to being released by the National Parole Board.

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty to present several petitions which have been approved by the Clerk pursuant to Standing Order 36. One of them is from residents of a number of municipalities in Ontario and Quebec. It refers to the practise of low-level flight training in Labrador. It states that they wish Parliament to have the government join with the First Nations, the Innu of Labrador and the aboriginal peoples of northern Canada in opposing this use of their lands for NATO and NORAD attack training, and to redirect Canada's NATO-NORAD funding toward enabling Canada's aboriginal peoples to regain control of their lands and their livelihood and promoting sustainable development for all Canadians.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have a further petition from a number of residents of Toronto, Weston, Downsview and Mississauga opposing the goods and services tax, asking the government to reject it and to reduce the need for such a sales tax by reducing the bank interest rate so as to help small business and increase employment.

GULF WAR

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have a further petition from several hundred residents of Toronto who petition the House of Commons that it call upon the government to declare its absolute commitment to a peaceful resolution of the mid-East conflict, to oppose any offensive military action against Iraq, to withdraw all Canadian Armed Forces from the region until we can be assured that they are not deployed in an offensive capacity but solely as is necessary to make sanctions effective, and to use our tax dollars for useful social programs such as child care, pensions, health care and education, and not for military adventures in the Middle East.

I have a further petition from residents of Toronto on the same subject, asking that the Government of Canada use all means available to encourage UN members to give sanctions a chance to work, to refrain from offensive military action against Iraq and not to commit the Canadian Armed Forces to offensive military action against Iraq.

PARLIAMENT HILL

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I present a petition from citizens of Lebel-sur-Quévillon in Quebec who request that the Government of Canada shelve the project described as the Parliament Hill sector which, at the estimated cost of $68 million, provides for a parking garage and a shopping mall under Canada's Parliament Hill. They urge the government to acknowledge the need to preserve the environment and the historical character of the buildings and the site of Parliament Hill in Ottawa.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, question no. 407 will be answered today.

[Text]

SUBSIDIES/TAX EXEMPTIONS

Question No. 407—Mr. Saint-Julien:

For the years (a) 1984 (b) 1985 (c) 1986 (d) 1987 (e) 1988 (f) 1989 (g) 1990, did the government grant subsidies under federal programs or tax exemptions to the Canadian National Railways and the Ontario Northland Railways for any rail subdivisions within the federal ridings of Abitibi and Témiscamingue and, if so, what is the breakdown of subsidies and tax exemptions granted under these programs (i) by year (ii) by subdivision?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am informed by the Departments of Finance and Transport as follows:

u The following comments respond to the tax exemption issues raised in the above question.

Ontario Northland Railways is a branch of the Ontario Northland Transportation Commission, which is a provincial Crown Corporation. As such, it is exempt from federal income tax under paragraph 149 (l)(d) of the Canadian Income Tax Act, which is a general provision applicable to all provincial Crown Corporations.

No Remission Orders granting specific tax relief to the Canadian National Railways (C.N.R.) were passed between 1984 and 1990. As such, the treatment of income and deductions for this taxpayer over this period would have been in accordance with the general provisions contained in the Canadian Income Tax Act. In general, these provisions do not provide for partial exemptions for some of a corporation's business activities based on their nature or location.

However, certain investment tax credits in respect of qualified capital expenditures are provided for on a regional basis and are available in the region in question.

Although the confidentiality provision of the Income Tax Act prohibits the release of tax information about specific taxpayers, C.N.R. itself has made available through Transport Canada an account of their investment tax credit refunds resulting from capital expenditures in the federal ridings of Abitibi and Temiscamingue for the years 1984 through 1990:

ITC Refund by Year
($ thousands)

1984	1985	1986	1987	1988	1989	1990	Total
10.3	72.0	11.0	10.5	0	0	0	103.8

The following comments respond to the federal subsidies issues raised in the aboved question.

Canadian National received federal subsidies under the Railway Act (1985) and subsequently the National Transportation Act, 1987 for a portion of one subdivision, the Taschereau Subdivision. The section of line in question runs from La Sarre, Quebec to Cochrane, Ontario. Approximately 17.5 percent of the 82.4–mile line segment which has been approved for abandonment in September, 1991 falls in the federal riding of Témiscamingue. The balance of the line segment falls in another federal riding in Ontario. National Transportation Agency officials advise that they are unable to allocate the subsidy amounts to specific segments of trackage within the line in question. However, it is possible to pro–rate the subsidy on the basis of track miles. Accordingly, the total subsidy paid to CN in respect of the line segment is listed below as is the imputed subsidy (determined on the basis of track miles) for that portion of the line segment falling with the federal riding of Témiscamingue.

(i)	(ii)	(ii)
	CN – Taschereau Sub (La Sarre – Cochrane)	CN – Taschereau Sub (Témiscamingue segment)
Year
(a) 1984	–	–
(b) 1985	–	–
(c) 1986	$ 286,767	$ 50,114
(d) 1987	494,653	86,444
(e) 1988	370,386	64,727
(f) 1989	475,172	83,040
(g) 1990 (est.)	290,000	50,680

The Ontario Northland Railway does not receive federal subsidies in respect of the portion of its Kirkland Lake Subdivision falling in the riding of Témiscamingue.

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Tuesday, February 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, on Monday I asked the Minister of Finance about bankruptcies. As we know all too well, Canadians are being hit by bankruptcies in increasing numbers, up by 69 per cent this past January alone.

In the budget speech he gave yesterday we saw a different kind of bankruptcy. It is the political bankruptcy of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance.

When it comes to integrity, this Conservative government is bankrupt. When it comes to fairness, this Conservative government is bankrupt; and when it comes to constructive ideas and compassion, this Conservative government is bankrupt. It is bankrupt when it comes to concern for the needs of ordinary Canadians, workers, fishermen, farmers, small business people, Canadians who live and work along the main streets of this country.

[Translation]

Every Spring for the past seven years, the Minister of Finance has tabled his budget in the House of Commons. Right wing ideologists, who cling to outdated theories, always look forward with impatience to this annual event. Budget number seven will not disappoint them. It contains a great many goodies for them.

[English]

For most Canadians there is nothing; nothing positive in this budget. For the majority of Canadians this minister's seven years of budgets have brought only seven years of bad luck.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): His most recent effort does not change Canada's losing streak under this Conservative government. For most Canadians, it is little more than what has already been called "A Nightmare on Wellington Street, Part VII".

Examples of this nightmare are not hard to find in this budget tabled by the Minister of Finance here in this House yesterday.

In his last budget, the minister put medicare, one of Canada's proudest achievements, on life support; and from this budget the result will likely be that the minister will end up pulling the plug. A full $2.3 billion has been cut from transfers to the provinces for medicare, risking the end of a health care system that has been the envy of the world.

In this budget, the minister has told Canadians that in just a few more years the federal government will be out of the business of supporting medicare. If there is no direct financial involvement in medicare by our federal government, how can we possibly continue to have a national health care system with the same standards from coast to coast to coast.

These cuts in yesterday's budget will also assist in the destruction of post-secondary education. Yesterday, the minister, in effect, told low-income students that their days of education in our post-secondary institutions were numbered.

More than anything else this budget confirms that this Conservative government has placed us all on a path that will lead to the disintegration of Canada. The minister is killing off some of the very programs which have held us together; the programs which have made us proud to be Canadians.

The nightmare does not end there. For the thousands upon thousands of unemployed Canadians this budget offers no hope, but only despair.

Not only does the minister accept that this very high unemployment is here to stay, he is making that high unemployment an integral part of his economic plan. He is telling us without even blinking that this year 10 per cent of Canadians will be unemployed and next year he says it will be more of the same. That is simply obscene, simply obscene.

• (1520)

For the next two years the minister has told us that nearly 1,500,000 Canadians will remain out of work, 1,500,000 people, Mr. Speaker. Instead of doing something about this problem, he simply makes it worse. He gives the unemployed a kick in the teeth not once, but twice. First he slashes $100 million from federal job creation programs. Then he raises unemployment insurance premiums by 25 per cent.

This Minister of Finance, this Prime Minister, this cabinet, and their caucus are pushing hundreds of thousands of Canadians on to the unemployment lines and, even worse, on to the welfare lines.

This budget shows how this government is ducking the blame for its mismanagement, its own mismanagement of the Canadian economy, for when confronted with the grave recession that is causing so much suffering this government blames the economic problems of the United States. It blames the turmoil caused by the war in the Persian Gulf, and when confronted with unemployment the government blames and hurts the unemployed.

When confronted with regional disparity this government blames and hurts our regions. When confronted with thousands of Canadians losing their jobs and thousands of Canadians in desperate need of decent housing, what does the Minister of Finance do? He not only increases unemployment insurance premiums; he actually slashes $411 million from housing programs aimed at helping lower income Canadians.

The facts are clear. The blame lies at the government's own doorstep, and nowhere else. This recession now battering Canadians from coast to coast to coast started well before the Persian Gulf war. It started well before any recession in the United States. It started some 11 months ago, last April in fact. It was initiated by this minister's February 1990 budget and his earlier budgets. If the minister does not want to believe me, he can ask the non-partisan Conference Board of Canada. It told him that last fall his own mismanagement has given us our "first made-in-Canada recession".

The minister should know that already. After all, the recession is the natural result of seven years of narrow-minded Conservative policies, particularly their high interest rate policy and their high dollar policy.

And what did the Prime Minister say about all this last October? He confessed, and these are his exact words:

> We have induced a slowdown. Mr. Wilson said as much in his (last) budget. Look at the budget—it's as clear as spring water. Mr. Wilson spelled it out".

That is exactly what the Prime Minister said. If there is one thing that is as clear as spring water, it is that Canadians are mired in a tough unrelenting recession. It is also clear that this government induced the recession. The Prime Minister has said as much.

Something else that is as clear as spring water is that yesterday's budget is going to do nothing, nothing to get us out of that recession. As the economist Michael McCracken of Informetrica said after hearing the budget, and these are his words: "This is a recession making budget". This is what Michael McCracken of Informetrica said and I repeat. He decided this is "a recession making budget".

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, this government had the gall to decide on our country's economic future on a roll of the dice. All Canadians men and women are the losers. The Minister claimed today, as he did yesterday, that interest rates are coming down. Yet, this reduction is again too little too late. It will take months before this drop in interest rates has any impact.

[English]

This is because it will be many, many months before businesses and consumers once again have any kind of real confidence in the economy. But, in the meantime, thousands more Canadians will lose their jobs and thousands more small businesses will go bankrupt.

So what does this budget offer those Canadians and those small businesses? Well, nothing positive, Mr. Speaker, nothing positive at all.

While economic flames rage destroying the lives of Canadians, the minister does nothing constructive, nothing positive and nothing useful. Instead, he fiddles like some modern day Nero and with this budget he is simply stopping his fiddling only to throw more gas on the fire he himself has started.

Economists tell us the recession created by this government could last for many more months, and that is far too long. We Liberals say that what is needed now is more than a new budget. Canadians do not merely want to wait out the recession. They want a new and a better economic plan to lead us out of this recession as soon as possible, and there is no such plan in this budget.

The Liberals have been calling for a new economic plan since early last summer, one built on much lower interest rates and a much lower dollar. As part of this, Liberals have been calling for adjustment programs to help the firms and the workers hurt, and hurt badly, by the U.S.-Canada free trade deal and by this recession. Liberals have been calling for policies which will help us to restructure, to modernize our work place and retrain our workers. Above all, Liberals have been calling for policies based on fairness. We want to see fair policies which create more jobs, fair policies which bring back strong economic growth, fair policies which end this Conservative government's destruction of our industrial base.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): The Prime Minister once promised jobs, jobs and more jobs. Instead, his government has handed Canadians only cuts, cuts and more cuts. It has handed Canadians a good and services tax, a GST that has pushed inflation up to record breaking levels. It has handed them a recession, the Prime Minister has admitted, his government has induced. It has given us high levels of inflation. It has given us an announcement it is seeking free trade with Mexico, without first having any public debate, without first setting out any goals and objectives, and with no effort to undo the damage caused by the Conservative trade deal with the United States.

Yesterday, as the Minister of Finance has done so many times before, he talked about what he plans to do to reduce the deficit, but he does not admit at all that the national debt has doubled, yes doubled, since his government came into power in 1984.

Canadians should not bother to listen to what this Minister of Finance has to say about the deficit and the public debt, because he has no credibility left on this issue or on any other issue.

The minister and the government have their priorities all wrong. The minister is refusing to focus on what is needed, which is to make getting us out of this crippling recession his priority. By failing to do this he is making the deficit problem worse. The minister admits as much on page 70 in his own budget document when he writes:

> —the economic situation has deteriorated with a consequent impact on the deficit.

• (1530)

Exactly. What has brought about this deterioration? The Conservative government's own policies, including its support for high interest rates. This has simply made the situation worse. This high interest rate policy has added billions of dollars to the costs of this government's borrowing, and this adds billions to the deficit and to the national debt.

By the way, each time interest rates drop a single percentage point, it saves the government almost $2 billion. If the minister would bother to read his own budget papers, I think he would agree with me, finally. Giving priority to solving Canada's economic crisis will obviously, greatly help the government to deal with its own financial management problems.

The minister's proposed deficit reduction fund, using the proceeds of the GST, is an economic shell game, plain and simple. It adds nothing to government revenues that will not already be there. Meanwhile, the GST itself remains in place to continue to hammer lower and middle income Canadians and create an administrative nightmare for small business.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I urge the Minister of Finance to pause for a moment today to think things over. I urge him to forget the embraces of his Cabinet and caucus friends. I urge him to pause and listen to the voices which can be heard more and more every day outside these walls. I urge the minister and his Cabinet colleagues to listen to the shouts of anger bursting forth everywhere in this country. Canadian men and women have just had enough of this government's callous policies.

More and more Canadians are telling the government that they are fed up with the GST and they will no longer stand any budgetary restraints in the areas of health care and higher education.

[English]

Canadians are fed up with the cutbacks to research and development. They are fed up with the way our fishery, agricultural and forestry sectors, the north of our country, and our auto industry have been systematically undermined. They are fed up with the gutting of medicare. They are fed up with cuts to post-secondary education and, as I have already said, they are fed up with the deterioration of our industrial base, all since this Conservative government came into office.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, Canadians have watched as this government has gutted VIA Rail and shut down post offices all across this country.

An hon. member: Shame.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): They watched as this government slashed services and scrapped local television programming by the CBC all across this country.

An hon. member: Shame.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Canadians have watched as this government dismantled the institutions which have helped make this country what it is. They are angry. They want it to stop, but this government does not want to listen to them.

In January and February of this year, while the government was listening to its big business friends on Bay Street, members of the Liberal caucus were criss-crossing the country listening to the real people on Main Street: 35 hearings were conducted by the Liberal caucus, more than 300 submissions were made. We have heard from business associations, labour groups, social action groups, municipalities, provincial government representatives, cultural organizations, and average individual Canadians. The Liberals listened to what Canadians had to say, and what they had to say is this: This Conservative government, this Minister of Finance, this Prime Minister have lost the trust and the confidence of the Canadian people.

The economic policies of this government and this Prime Minister, Canadians have told us, are hurting single mothers, children and small businesses, working men and women and the sick and the elderly. The facts speak for themselves. Economic growth is at the lowest level in 10 years. We have a made-in-Canada Conservative government produced recession, and the most heart-wrenching fact of all: 186,000 Canadian children have been forced to stand in line at food banks across the country; one in six children goes to bed hungry every night.

This budget will not help those hungry children. It will not help working people or small business or farmers or fishermen or anyone else, except maybe the handful of people who still support this government's right wing agenda. But this minister is simply not listening to the overwhelming majority of Canadians.

The words our task force heard were not the words of some narrow corporate elite. They are the words of average Canadians, like the people of my community: auto workers who have seen their jobs disappear forever to the United States and Mexico due to the insensitive policies of this Conservative government. They are the words of Canadians battered by the GST, the free trade agreement and the Conservative government's other insensitive and narrow-minded economic policies.

But does this Minister of Finance, this Prime Minister and this government want to listen? This budget proves they do not. This budget proves that this government is bankrupt when it comes to integrity and constructive ideas. The budget the Minister of Finance has tabled in this House is the last straw. It shows the true face of this government and this cabinet.

They may go around, as the Prime Minister has been doing lately, talking about re-Confederation. But this budget shows us the unvarnished truth, since this budget is simply a blueprint for de-Confederation. The institutions and programs which hold Canada together are being unravelled by this government. Just look at what it has done to VIA Rail, to Canada Post, to the CBC.

[Translation]

And let's take a look at what they are doing to health care and postsecondary education. By cutting transfers to the provinces, Mr. Speaker, by the year 2009—which is not that far off—there will be no more federal transfers to the provinces for health care. And if that prediction is correct, the federal government will not be in a position to enforce the standards for health care provided under the Canada Health Act.

[English]

There are other examples, but the bottom line is the same. This government is dismantling the institutions and the programs which make Canada great. This government is dismantling the institutions and the programs which define Canada, the institutions which have made us so admired in the eyes of the world. As they move Canada ever closer to the brink of economic and constitutional ruin the minister, the Prime Minister and their cabinet colleagues are not listening to what average Canadians have to say any more.

This budget is a Scud missile attack on Canadians. It is an attack on medicare. It is an attack on the jobless. It is an attack on the very institutions and programs that help make up the very fabric that is Canada.

In his budget the minister pays lip service to the notion of a strong and a united Canada.

• (1540)

He cries tears, hopefully not crocodile tears, for Canadian unity. Then, he presents a budget document that is—I repeat—simply a blueprint for de-Confederation.

Yesterday, the minister gave Canadians a blunt lesson in the politics of cruelty. He said to Canadians that they are on their own.

Yesterday, in the midst of a harsh recession the minister told low and middle income Canadians: "You're on your own."

Yesterday, the minister told homeless Canadians that they will just have to make do to get through the winter. He told them that they are on their own.

Yesterday, the minister told sick and elderly Canadians that it does not matter if his policies force provinces to shut down hospitals and lay off doctors and nurses. The minister told sick and elderly Canadians: "You're on your own."

Yesterday, the minister gave us a blueprint for de-Confederation and after seeing it, Canadians are saying: "Enough is enough." They are saying: "It is time to stop this Conservative government before it rips this country apart."

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Ottawa South:

> That the motion be amended by deleting all of the words after the word "that" and by substituting the following therefore:
> this House condemns the government for presenting a budget that offers no relief to Canadians from the made-in-Canada recession created in 1990, undermines the social and economic foundations of Canadian federalism, increases the already unfair and disproportionate financial burden on lower income and middle income Canadians and provides no program that will, in fact, bring about the recovery of the Canadian economy.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I find the motion in order.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, it is difficult in responding to a budget not to fall into the trap of choosing rhetoric, phrases and over-statements which make people think that you are not seriously trying to grapple with the way of thinking of the government and the Official Opposition, as opposed to the approaches which we would take in the New Democratic Party, faced with the economic conditions of today.

I want to try to avoid rhetorical flourish. I also want to convey to the House and to the country our sense of profound disappointment in this budget which Mr. Wilson has presented to Canada.

As we listen to people across this country and as our New Democratic economic recovery tour visited different parts of this great country of ours, we heard people say to us just how tough things were, how hard life had become as this recession had begun to bite, how serious and deep the human problems were that they were facing. We heard, for instance, from people such as one of the farmers who talked to us, who talked about what was happening in his community, and I quote directly: "The lay-offs, plant closures, bankruptcies, work sharing, these are only numbers in the paper and at Statistics Canada. But in our community they are real and they hurt". It is a tragic story of broken pride, food bank line-ups, needing welfare assistance, family tensions.

He went on to say that workers between 45 and 64 years of age, many of whom have spent their entire working lives with a single employer, find themselves out in the cold, their jobs eliminated by free trade.

As the director of the Unemployment Help Centre in London said to us: "The social safety net in this country strains under the demands of people hurt by this recession".

As the St. Thomas District Labour Council said to us: "The consequence of a succession of Conservative budgets over the past six years have been devastation for most Canadians". Unemployment is soaring, plant closures and mass lay-offs are everywhere, workers' real average earnings are falling, poverty and hunger are spreading, farm bankruptcies are increasing at a record level and the many victims of these Conservative budgets are being denied the help they need because of cuts in unemployment insurance and welfare.

Or, as the Waterloo Regional Council said to us: "Seventy per cent of all applicants for welfare in that community are now applying for the first time". Seventy per cent, Mr. Speaker. The total number of recipients of general welfare reached a record high level, higher than they have ever seen before, of over 6,000 in the month of December. In 1989 the Waterloo regional food bank distributed 400,000 pounds of food to people in need. This year they forecast distribution of a million pounds from their food banks to people in need.

As the Community Opportunities Development Association in Cambridge said to us, and they put it very bluntly, if very simply: "The downturn in the economy has put fear into the souls of many members of our community".

• (1550)

That is the reality, Mr. Speaker, which this government seems incapable of recognizing. That is the reality which is devastating lives right across this country, which is destroying families, which is giving people a sense of despair, a sense of pessimism, a sense of fear about the future.

And so I have to say, Mr. Speaker, that I stand up here with a sense of growing fury at this government and its inability to listen to the real voices of people across this country. I say to this government that it is time they recognize the anger, the frustration, the bitterness, the sense of complete and utter failure of hope that hundreds of thousands of Canadians across this country are feeling.

For the sake of this country's future, for the sake of the hundreds of thousands of people being hurt across this country, for the sake of the future of the children of our country, I ask this government to start listening, start to pay attention, start to show you care about those hundreds of thousands of people who are being hurt.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Langdon: People wanted a budget of hope and what did they get? They got the same mean message which they have had for the last six and a half years, the same shameful message of cutbacks, of taxes that hit the ordinary person while the large corporations go scot-free; the same fixation on inflation as the concern, the same fixation on the deficit, when it is people across this country who have lost their jobs or have seen their plants shut.

As one person said to me in one of our meetings across the country, "in the 1981–82 recession of the Liberal government, things were bad. We were hurt, but at least we saw the plants were still there. We hoped the jobs would come back and eventually, not because of anything the Liberals did, but because of an upturn in the rest of the world, the jobs did come back and the plants were there for people to go back and work in. The farms were there to give people a sense of prosperity for the future. The small businesses were there."

But this person said to me, "in this recession it is different. In this recession the plants are shutting and they are leaving." They are going to the United States, thanks to free trade. They are going to Mexico and thanks to this government's further foolishness, there will be more of them going to Mexico. More of them will move south. More of them shut and more people hurt across this country as a consequence.

We need a change in direction that says: "Not just targets for inflation, but above all, targets for jobs, for reducing unemployment and for dealing with this recession; targets to get people back to work," so that this country once more starts to work.

It is a very hypocritical budget. It is a budget which talks about the need for national unity. Then in its details cuts back the CBC, destroys national institutions like VIA Rail, and breaks its promises to the provinces.

[Translation]

I am a member from Ontario, but if I were a member from Quebec, if I were a citizen of the province of the Quebec and I were looking at this Budget, I would notice a lot of terms referring to national unity. But what is the real situation? We have a government that has broken its promises to the provinces, that decided that all its promises to the province of Quebec, for instance, were worth nothing, that they could be conveniently ignored or changed or broken!

The results, for Quebecers and all Canadians, are more unemployment, fewer services, and perhaps the dismantling of our national health care system. We cannot accept that in this country!

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Langdon: We must fight, and I must say that as a party we want to fight this regressive approach. It is not one we can accept, and it would destroy our country.

Mr. Edmonston: It's against the interests of Quebec.

Mr. Samson: It is unacceptable.

[English]

Mr. Langdon: That is one piece of hypocrisy: the discussion of national unity and the lack of any reflection of things that would help to build national unity.

There is also talk of co-operation and how we all must work together. All of us must share the burden. Yet, the reality in the budget is what? It is an attack on workers, on the 6,000 public servants who will lose their jobs.

It is an attack on the possibility of workers being able to keep up with the rate of inflation in the salaries and wages which they receive.

It is an attack on small business.

• (1600)

It is not widely recognized but an increase in unemployment insurance premiums hurts workers. It is true. But, in fact, it hits small business even more than it hits those workers. Small business people across this country will find themselves devastated by the increased burden of these unemployment insurance premiums.

When it comes to workers there are burdens. When it comes to small business there are burdens. When it comes to women there are burdens, as some of the women's groups are cut back as is the support which they have received in the past.

But what about those large companies? What about the big corporations? Is there a single thing in this budget that attacks those corporations? Is there a single thing that asks those corporations to start to pay a fair share? A single thing? Not a single solitary point, not a single change in the tax loopholes that exist, not a single thing to even respond to the willingness which was expressed on the part of some big business groups to share the burden. Yet, not a single thing was done to make such corporations contribute to the burdens that are falling on workers and on small business people across this country.

There is also discussion in this budget of competitiveness. We all must seek competitiveness.

[Translation]

Competition is important for the future.

[English]

We agree. But what is the reality of the budget? The reality is an attack; an attack on education, an attack on science research, an attack on job training, an attack on environmental support. All of those are the basis of future competitiveness in this budget.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Langdon: Yet what does this government do? It cuts. It cuts not for the sake of eliminating waste, because we stood up here in this House and pointed out again and again cases of waste which this government has refused to do anything about.

We had to talk for over two years about grants which were being given to questionable companies in Cape Breton before the government finally recognized that in fact the grants being given were part of a scam and therefore should not be continued.

It took us two years. The member for Nickel Belt and myself fought here in the House, fought in committee. We finally forced the government to recognize the waste which was involved in that particular case. It is so hard to get the government to do something about that sort of waste. It will instead do a few symbolic things like say that it is freezing the salaries of cabinet ministers when, in fact, all that it is freezing is the extra amount which those ministers get as members of the government. They still get their increases as members of Parliament.

We have here an incredible case of hypocrisy within this budget. We have a Minister of Finance who has stood up in the House and said that he heard the anguish of people across this country who had lost jobs and lost their small businesses. He heard that anguish and then he did nothing about it. He did not do a single thing to help people who were being hurt.

I would like to move, on behalf of our party, a subamendment to the amendment which has been moved by the Official Opposition. I move:

> That the amendment be amended by adding the following words:
> "fails to respond to the anguish of people who have lost their jobs or their businesses; undermines the principles of universal medicare; and fails to introduce a program of fair taxation, including a minimum corporate tax."

There was a choice. The government did not take that choice. It kept to the same old path. If it had taken the choice that we put before the country, the many hundreds of thousands hurting across this country would be in much better shape.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will take the subamendment under advisement. I will go to questions and comments. The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the speech by the hon. member for Essex—Windsor, and I must say I was disappointed when he failed to mention the impact of this Budget on federal public servants. If we look at yesterday's Budget speech, on page 10, it says:

> The wage budgets of departments will not be adjusted in 1991-92 for any increases in costs arising out of new collective agreements. Departments will have to absorb any such higher costs from within existing budgets.
> Each increse of 1 per cent in average wage settlements across the public service could lead to a loss of about 2,000 jobs.

[English]

It is quite evident to those of us who care about the Public Service of Canada that the government has declared war on its own public servants. By stating that each per cent increase in wage settlements could lead to 2,000 job losses from the Public Service of Canada, the government is endorsing and promoting the kind of prejudice that some people in this country have against public servants.

This country happens to have one of the best public services in the world. I feel that to not have addressed this question today, which spreads the seed for labour unrest, not only in the Public Service of Canada in the years to come, but in other departments. For the NDP, who are the socialists of this country, what I like to call the arm-chair socialists, not to have alluded in one sentence in the speech to the labour unrest we are going to be suffering because of this government's lack of sensitivity is beyond my understanding.

I want to ask the member from Essex—Windsor, why is it that his party and his opening speech on this most important budget speech did not once mention the impact of this budget on labour in general? Specifically, why did he not address the impact on the Public Service of Canada, the public servants of this country who are doing a damned good job for Canada?

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, every time a spokesperson from the Liberal Party gets up to defend workers, I have to say that I am especially amused. I am especially amused when they get up to defend public servants, because this member and his party, if the hon. member would remember back a few years, was the very party that brought into effect controls on public servants—the six and five program which was opposed bitterly by the Public Service across this country and across the community of Ottawa. Let me tell you that the impact on morale in the Public Service, which is certainly going to be very negative over what the Conservatives have done in this budget, was also extremely negative over what the Liberals did during the 1981-1982 recession when they did precisely the same thing. They tried to make workers into the cause of that recession instead of recognizing that in fact working people are very much those who are hurt by recession.

If the member had listened to my speech he would also have noticed that I did in fact talk precisely about the 6,000 jobs that this Conservative approach to the Public Service will likely lead to being lost. Those 6,000 jobs will be lost if public servants take their full 3 per cent increase, which itself is well below the rate of inflation. That will force an elimination of jobs within the Public Service.

Now if the member did not recognize that I was talking about the sections of the budget which deal with the Public Service in noting those 6,000 potential job losses then it shows that despite his past work he really does not understand very well the way in which these particular measures from the Conservative Party are going to negatively impact public servants here in Ottawa and across the country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, the member for Windsor—Essex mentioned the small business community and how it was going to be hurt. I would like to describe, in my introductory remarks here, how the unemployment insurance filters down and, as employers, how this is going to affect the small business community. Not only directly, but in the municipalities. These increases in unemployment insurance, the increases in Established Programs Financing or the cuts to Established Programs Financing and the cap on the Canada Assistance Plans all filter through to the provinces and through to the municipalities.

The biggest employers in most small communities across Canada are municipalities, hospitals and school districts. These people and these groups are going to be hurt directly by UI and by the cuts in these various programs. Those people are going to have to pick the money up somewhere and pass it down to the taxpayers through property taxes and through provincial taxes. In this way it also hurts.

My question to the member is this. Would he agree that, although the government has told us there will not be tax increases, in fact, once again, the low and middle income earners are being hit by tax increases by underhanded methods of this government?

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, the member has made a very important point. I want to just indicate to the House some of the comments which we received from small business people during our economic recovery tour in different parts of the country.

For instance, as somebody said to me in my own community in the hearings that we held there: "The GST, the high dollar and the recession are killing us". This person is the head of the Downtown Business Persons Association in my community. We have to recognize what this government is doing this year. It is, first, putting a very serious burden on small business with the introduction of the GST. The level of administrative cost that small business will have to absorb is extremely heavy. Many small business people across the country have talked to me about the damage that is going to be done to their prospects for the future as a result of that administrative cost.

In addition to that GST impact, the government has now decided as well to increase unemployment insurance premiums. And, as I indicated in my speech, that is going to impact most on small businesses across this country because, of course, small businesses pay $1.4 for every $1 that a worker pays into the unemployment insurance fund. That is just one example of the way in which the unfairness that this government has put into effect in past budgets continues in this budget, and it is one of the reasons why we oppose this budget so strongly.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated.

Before I recognize the hon. minister, I have looked at the amendment to the amendment, and I accept the amendment to the amendment.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to lead off the debate on the Budget on behalf of the government side in this House. After listening to my NDP colleagues who are up there in the clouds, I think we should get down to earth, for a change.

I must say I was puzzled when the hon. member for Windsor West said we had to create jobs for Canadians but certainly not open our markets to the United States and even less to Mexico. Far too dangerous! Let's create jobs here to produce goods. And where would we sell them? That, of course, is a minor problem. It is a minor problem for NDP members who don't have a clue about government finances and financial administration, about being competitive and being able to manufacture goods and sell them at competitive prices. It doesn't fit their vision and concept of society.

However, after the Minister of Finance brought down his Budget yesterday, others did react, Mr. Speaker. Frédéric Wagnière, in this morning's La Presse, qualified this Budget as honest and far-sighted. He said it had been a long time since we had a budget that reconciled both the government's financial requirements and the economic interests of Canadians. He went on to say that the government had understood the gravity of Canada's economic and financial situation and had decided to do something about it. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Wagnière also said that the Budget was straight forward in that it meets problems head on, without compromising our economic future in the long term.

Mr. Speaker, clearly these people are far more objective than the hon. member for Essex—Windsor, as far as I could gather from his comments. I believe that the plan for economic recovery set forth in the Budget brought down yesterday puts Canada and Canadians on the path to renewed and sustained prosperity. The key to dynamic economic recovery and the nation's future growth and prosperity is obvious.

• (1620)

Interest rates must go down and remain at low levels for some time. To achieve this, we will have to meet a very basic requirement, equally obvious, which is to bring about a continuing and sustained reduction in inflation and the inflationary expectations of Canadians. Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, I heard another member from the Windsor area say that an unemployment rate of 10 per cent was obscene. I find such comments hard to accept, coming from the Liberals, since at the time they inflicted unemployment rates on Canadians that in some parts of the country were as high as 20 per cent, and interest rates that for a while were as high as 24 per cent, with 12 per cent inflation— there was for instance— Perhaps the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There will be opportunity for questions and comments a little later.

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I can assure you that Canadians who had to fork over these huge amounts and pay the astronomical cost of that recession are not about to forget it. Indeed this is why they saw fit at the time to get rid of those great administrators, those glorified public clerks, and replace them by a government which proved to be responsible during its first mandate from 1984 to 1988 and which will continue to steer the country towards prosperity with the measures unveiled yesterday.

Mr. Speaker, of course there is a direct link between inflation and interest rates, as evidenced by our past economic performance. During the 1950s and 1960s when inflation was low—averaging less than 3 per cent a year—interest rates were low as well. When inflation rose in the 1970s, so did interest rates.

Comparisons with other countries confirm the existence of that link. Between 1980 and 1989 the major industrialized countries of the Group of Seven where inflation was lowest on average—Japan and Germany—were also those where average interest rates were lowest too. Then there were countries where inflation was left running rampant. For example, France and Italy generally recorded the highest interest rates, and that was unfortunate for those people. Mr. Speaker, we are working to bring about such conditions as will enable the economy to get back on an even keel by the middle of this year, not in five years, this year. And we are making progress because interest rates have already declined by more than four points since last May's peak. Canadian consumers throughout the country will see for themselves when they renew their mortgages or personal loans in the coming weeks that indeed they have more money in their wallets to cope with present conditions precisely because their interest rates will have gone down by 2, 3 and 4 per cent.

Still if we hope for a sustainable economic growth we cannot be satisfied with getting a handle on inflation. Our national objective must be to check inflation and then reduce it considerably and keep it down. Price stability spells enormous economic and social benefits, and lower interest rates are just one of a good many others.

[English]

Price stability is vital for Canadian companies and workers to compete and succeed in today's global marketplace.

With inflation, Canadian products can end up costing more than comparable goods sold by other countries. This means companies lose sales and workers lose jobs.

Price stability also supports increased investment by business.

Research indicates that lower inflation is one reason the cost of investment capital is lower in Japan and Germany than in Canada and the United States. Economic fairness is another crucial reason why Canadians should work toward lower inflation. Keeping price increases down is simply the best way to protect those with the least ability to protect themselves against inflation:

the poor, the elderly, and people on fixed incomes. These are compelling reasons why our plan for economic recovery takes direct aim at reducing inflation further.

The budget announced realistic achievable inflation targets. They are based on the Consumer Price Index, the most commonly used measure of inflation. The official targets are: by the end of 1992, an inflation rate of 3 per cent; by mid-year 1994, inflation down to 2.5 per cent; and the year after, by the end of 1995, an inflation rate of 2 per cent. I think that this is achievable.

Clearly, in the words of Terence Corcoran in The Globe and Mail this morning:

> —Mr. Wilson has defied many forecasters with a deficit-controlling, opposition-rattling Recovery Budget.

[Translation]

After 1995, as I explained, Mr. Speaker, the government will continue its efforts to achieve price stability. The goals and methods then adopted will be based on the experience gained over the next few years and on the continuing consultations of Canadians. The inflation targets described in the government's Plan for Economic Recovery make sense and, in my opinion, are necessary. Canada had much lower inflation rates in the past and is able to equal this performance. It is only since the 1970's that Canada's performance has deteriorated compared to those of such countries as Germany and Japan.

There is no reason why Canada could not repeat its performance of those years, provided we work together to reach this goal.

The benefits of a lower inflation rate are evident and concrete. Interest rates would be coming down, as they are currently doing, Mr. Speaker. Our economic productivity and competitiveness would be strenghtened. Already second in the world, our standard of living would improve, and so would our social equality. Consequently, Canada would be a stronger and more prosperous country which could rank among the economic leaders, Mr. Speaker.

With this budget, we are putting government finances firmly on the course to a balanced budget. We are taking steps to eliminate the build-up of the public debt as a source of inflationary concern. For this purpose, we are extending by nearly three years until 1994-95 the Expenditure Control Plan developed in the 1990 budget. Of course, this decision does not please our NDP friends whose only policy is to spend more and more, because they think that throwing away borrowed money can help a country prosper. Clearly their position does not have the support of any economists, except their own, and as everybody knows, Mr. Speaker, has no credibility among Canadians.

We are legislating mandatory program spending limits and we are setting up a Debt Servicing and Reduction Fund solely dedicated to offsetting the costs of the public debt. By law, all revenues from the Goods and Services Tax and from privatization will flow into this fund. This way, Mr. Speaker, we expect to achieve our goal in time—it will not be easy and will require time, energy and determination—but I am convinced that we can do it.

Also, the government and its civil servants will do their share. We will severely restrain the operations of the government. Operating budgets will be frozen at current levels and the wages and salaries of Cabinet Ministers will be tightly restrained. Severe restrictions will be placed on the salaries paid to members of Parliament and senators as well as all federal civil servants and any person designated by an Order in Council from this government. That is why it was said, Mr. Speaker, and I am again quoting from this morning's edition of Le Soleil: "Wilson sets the example."

• (1630)

I think that it would be extremely difficult for the government to ask the Canadian people to make sacrifices, while allowing its own expenditures to keep growing by 8, 10 or 12 percent. Of course, we could very easily go on spending. There is nothing easier, Mr. Speaker. We could borrow and establish programs, as our predecessors did for years. That is how they created a structural deficit which had reached $200 billion when we came to power. It is so easy. Any government can borrow money, establish programs and spend irresponsibly.

Mr. Ricard: And foot the bill later!

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, if we want our children and grandchildren to enjoy prosperity in this country, we have no choice but to make government accountable. We appreciate that these measures are very hard on the government. They are hard on our employees. They are indeed, but we have no choice.

In a family faced with a shrinking income for one reason or another, the father and mother sit around the kitchen table and decide on ways to reduce overall expenditures so that money will be assigned to specific purposes and earmarked for the neediest. That is how we came to earmark more than $7 billion in spite of the difficult economic context. We managed to identify an amount totalling over $7 billion which is earmarked for the unemployed who are the neediest this year. We understand what they are going through. There is also $1.6 billion for the elderly and another $1.3 billion for farm producers who are struggling for reasons beyond our control and having to do with the global environment.

I think it is wise to consider and respond to the needs of particular groups, Mr. Speaker.

The programs I mentioned earlier account for over 90 percent of the financial support given by the federal government to the provinces in order to help them finance a wide range of important services across Canada. That is essential. No wonder that the Budget that was tabled yesterday has some major effects on the federal–provincial fiscal arrangements, particularly on some components of the transfer payments system to the provinces, that is, the Equalization program, the Established Programs Financing and the Canada Assistance Plan.

[English]

For decades, the federal government has provided large and growing financial support to the provinces. Next year alone, total federal transfers, including both cash and tax transfers, will reach almost $37 billion.

The cash portion alone of the transfers accounts for one–fifth of all federal program spending. These transfers are simply too large to exempt from our expenditure restraint program.

The deficit is a national problem and it demands a national solution. Major transfers to the provinces, both cash and tax, will grow by an average of 3.7 per cent per year from 1991–92 to 1995–96. All other federal program spending will grow by just 3.4 per cent. It should be noted that the 1991 budget has no effect on transfers in the current fiscal year or the next.

For 1990–1991 and 1991–1992 transfers will be made on the basis of the February 1990 budget, which provinces have already factored into their planning. The new measures in this year's budget will cause 1992–1993 transfer growth to be reduced by roughly $700 million or about one–half of one per cent of provincial revenues.

In addition, the measures are tailored so as to have a smaller impact on the low income provinces.

[Translation]

I think, Mr. Speaker, that we have taken the necessary measures to insure that our initiatives with regard to the provinces are just and fair. I think that ultimately, as the Minister of Finance of Newfoundland said last night, the Minister of Finance's approach is just and fair and, despite certain difficulties that we appreciate, we will be able to cope with the situation.

The cap on the growth of transfer payments for Established Programs Financing raises concerns about the ability of the federal government to continue enforcing national medicare principles under the Canada Health Act.

Legislation will be introduced to ensure that the federal government continues to have the means to enforce these principles. As we said yesterday, and as we are saying again today, the principles of the Canadian Health Act will not be compromised.

The measures in this budget bring the growth of transfer payments to the provinces into line with current fiscal realities. But it is also time to ask ourselves whether the system of tranfers and tax arrangements can be reformed to better meet the energing challenges, priorities and needs of the 90s and beyond.

The federal government will consider reforms to the major transfer programs within the fiscal framework set out in this budget. In this regard, we will keep in mind that one of the best things we can do to strengthen national unity is improving our economy and our financial position. We want to ensure that, in the future, the system of transfers provides for the sharing of opportunities and benefits of Confederation, supports a more efficient and competitive Canada, and maintains the principles and standards that are the basis of Canadian citizenship while respecting provincial flexibility.

It is false to claim, as I heard the hon. member for Essex—Windsor say a moment ago, that by cutting—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has terminated his debate. We will now turn to questions and comments.

The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, on the first question or comment.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, like the minister, I can quote headlines from newspapers of Quebec, his province: "Wilson's Budget, A lack of courage", in La Presse, from Montréal; "Business and Labor are disappointed with Michael Wilson's new Budget", by Serge Truffault in Le Devoir; "Wilson squeezes civil servants and provinces first", by Chantal Hébert, in Le Devoir. And I can quote several others.

Mr. Speaker, the minister who just spoke to us would have us, Canadiens, believe that his government cares about the economic problems of our country. We do not trust this government, Mr. Speaker. It is clear. We cannot entrust the future of our country to a group of people who did not keep their word.

I would like to ask the minister how he will explain to his colleagues and to the Québec taxpayers an article published in today's Le Devoir under the headline: "Gérard-D. Lévesque: A Budget that will cost $732 millions to Quebec". Gérard-D Lévesque is a somebody. Is he not one of your chums? He regrets the rise of the UI contributions. He says it will hurt Quebec to the tune of $136 millions. He also says that the $10,000 cap on capital tax deductions for businesses planned by Ottawa is bad news for Quebec. And it goes on and on like that in the article.

I am sure the minister read today the comments of well informed people, of responsible people, in the newspapers from both Quebec and Canada. So I ask him: how can he tell us here, in this House, that he is in favour of national unity, while he is a minister under a government which pulls out gradually of national programs' of established programs financing in the health, social or education areas? This government says to Canadians: "Don't worry. We withdraw from established programs, from social programs, from health programs, but we will introduce legislation to make sure that those programs are continued by those who are responsible for them. However, we will not pay for them anymore. I ask the question, Mr. Speaker. How is it possible to make Canadians believe that?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I may remind the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier that the same Mr. Lévesque, the Quebec Minister of Finance, supported our government's decision to introduce a goods and services tax and agreed to harmonize the provincial tax with the federal tax. Mr. Lévesque's government supported our government on free trade with the United States and on a tripartite free trade agreement with Mexico, and it supported the Meech Lake Accord. I think if we are going to quote Mr. Lévesque, we should quote him across the board.

Mr. Gauthier: I am talking about the Budget.

Mr. Blais: The hon. member has a selective memory, Mr. Speaker. In any case, transfer payments to the provinces, in the case of the province of Quebec, rose from $9.8 billion last year to more than $10 billion—I believe $10.2 billion—this year, and next year it will be $10.6 billion, Mr. Speaker, which represents about 30 per cent of the budget of that province. Unless my arithmetic is completely off base, this is an increase, not a reduction. Granted, we had to keep increases down as much as possible, but I am convinced the provinces will spend this money wisely and that they will harmonize their budgets with the federal Budget, reflecting the kind of responsible attitude expected of all Canadians, including municipal and provincial governments and Canadians in general, who will realize that this budget is a way to achieve expenditure control. And I am convinced that provincial ministers will accept the Budget as did Mr. Lévesque and Mr. Kitchen.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have four people who would like to ask the minister a question. I will go to the hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair and then I will go to the hon. member for Scarborough and then I will go to the hon. member for Laval-Est.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I will not get into a discussion about how wrong Mr. Levesque and this government have been about the GST and all the other economic policies of this government which at root of the cause of the disassembly of this country.

I want to try to understand how this minister claims to understand economics. Peter C. Newman in Maclean's today points out that the Liberals and this government have been responsible for deindustrialization of this country and are making a Third World nation out of Canada because they do not understand what the deficit is really all about. That deficit will continue to rise so long as this country is not capable of creating the wealth that it needs in order to cut down expenditures for make-work programs, unemployment and everything else.

I wonder if this minister understands the severe damage that has been done, even from the point of view of the announced expectations for economic growth, by this government and its Prime Minister: when it continues to cut on research and development, continues to cut on post-secondary education and continues to cut on training. Everybody who has spoken to the issue—including the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology, when every single industrial and high technology consortium—has told you, and told this government, that if it does not change its pattern of expenditures and emphasis on training, education, and research and development, this country will go down the tube and its deficit will increase.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, only a New Democrat could say that an increase of 3 per cent in the funds reserved for science and technology is in fact a decrease. Only a New Democrat can see it that way and only a New Democrat can see Canada, can reduce Canada —I let my honorable friend make his point and I wish he would give me the opportunity to finish. Only a New Democrat can see Canada as a Third World country, which is not a polite thing to say to Canadians who, for the most, enjoy the second highest standard of living in the world. Canada's economic performance was not bad during these last years. In fact, it ranked first among the 24 OECD countries on numerous occasions. I do not think we can take that kind of comment seriously and I believe that our government has endeavoured to maintain the 3 per cent increase in research and development funds. With the tight budget we must deal with, I believe, that my colleague should applaud and commend the government for the action it has taken.

[English]

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I have some comments and then a question for the minister.

I would remind the minister that history does not stop at 1984. This government has been around since 1984 and has done, I might say, a lamentable job with respect to the economy, the budget of this country, the physical aspects of this country, and the deficit of this country.

The minister knows perfectly well that the over-all debt of this country has doubled during the six short years that we have been held ransom by the Conservative Party in government. So, let's have a little bit of truth.

The minister was talking in his speech about a nice picture that I accept, that being a family struggling to meet their financial obligations. They sit down in the kitchen—and I accept that—and they talk to each other about those problems. But they do not try and pull the wool over each other's eyes and they do not try and pretend that things are not the way they are.

I am going to ask the minister a specific question relating to pulling the wool over people's eyes. I am referring specifically—and the minister will know this because his colleague delivered the speech yesterday—on page 2 of the finance minister's speech, talking about the aspects of recovery, growth and prosperity, there is a very simple sentence:

> By law, all revenues from the Goods and Services Tax—will flow into this fund.

I repeat, all revenues. On page 13 of the same speech, he says:

> —we will ensure that all GST revenues are allocated solely to the effort to bring the public debt under control.

That is what his colleague, the Minister of Finance, said.

If, however, you turn to page 78 of the budget document, you will see that:

> The Prime Minister has given a commitment that any above-projected revenues from the GST will make a contribution to deficit reduction—

And lo and behold, something that was not in the minister's speech:

> To implement this commitment, the government will introduce legislation to establish a specified purpose account, to which will be credited net GST revenues—

A family does not do that. A family does not play with words, in a speech in Parliament, saying "all" GST revenues and then in the explanation saying "net" revenues.

The question is simple: What does "net" revenues mean? If your colleague said "all" GST revenues, why does he then say "net" GST revenues?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, fortunately, life did not stop in 1984 because we were left with a debt of $200 billion.

An hon. member: Now, it is $400 billion.

Mr. Blais: Yes. But the compound interest on that $200 billion is more than $120 billion.

So, $87 billion of that actual debt is a result of the debt that was there when we came into office in 1984. That is the truth, that is the reality. That is the truth and that is the reality. It was an annual deficit of $38 billion and an increase in expenditures of 13 per cent to 14 per cent, that is the reality.

• (1650)

About the net GST revenue, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

It is very obvious the government will have to take into account the fact that out of the revenues from the GST we should not forget—and I am a little surprised my colleague did—we give back several millions of dollars to Canadians through credits to allow low income families who earn less than $ 30,000 to receive their GST refund in advance. This gives me once again the opportunity to emphasize the value of this measure, which allows us to refund millions and millions of dollars to Canadians before they can go to the stores and do their purchases. This measure, precisely has been provided within the GST framework. I believe this answers my colleague's question.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): A very short question or a comment.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, before I start my comment, I would like to ask my hon. colleague a question. He quoted an article in Le Devoir—which is very dangerous to quote when you do not read the paper—concerning $732 million of Mr. Gérard-D. Levesque's budget. I am asking him because I read the article this morning in Quebec. It is in my area and I know what is written in the paper. I hope he did not do that on purpose, but I hate to see things like this here and $732 million—

[Translation]

—M. Speaker, I hope he is watching us on television—this amount of 732 million will be spent over a three year period which means it is only $244 million a year. I know it does not have the same impact to talk about $244 million; it is much more impressive to talk about $732 million, but things have to be clarified. I have Le Devoir here: We are talking about $732 million over three years, which comes to $244 million a year.

First of all, M. Speaker, since I am not a member of the Opposition, I would like to mention some positive things. I would like to ask my colleague a question, if you would give me at least a few minutes to prepare it, since only negative things were mentioned. There must be some positive elements in this budget, even if it contains a tax on tobacco.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): A point of order, the hon. member.

Mr. Parent: Is it your understanding, Sir, that we are able to question the questioners in these question periods or are we talking to the minister? What is it?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): He is now asking a question. My understanding was that he was questioning the hon. minister on a particular speech, but I just got the word here from the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood that it was in regard to the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier's speech. The hon. member should know, because he has been here for quite awhile, that you do not, on questions and comments, ask or question another speaker. The one who just spoke is the one you ask the question of.

[Translation]

Mr. Della Noce: I do understand, Mr. Speaker, and I thank you. Just the same, I should like to make a correction while this is still fresh in my memory.

My honourable friend did not quote the right amount of money. He was wrong when he said $732 million; since this amount will be spent over a three year period, it is only $244 million a year. I wanted this correction to be part of the official record. My honourable friend has read the same article as I have, I am sure.

Now, here is the question I wanted to direct to my honourable friend. In fact I might have risen on a question of privilege, but there are still in the budgets some positive measures, even if there is a tax increase on cigarettes. I still sympathize with the people involved in this industry who have been in a very difficult situation for several years. On the other hand, nobody mentioned for instance that there has been no tax increase on gas, something which affects a great many businesses.

My question to the hon. member is very simple: Today, during the Oral Question Period, I realized that many members still do not understand transfer payments to the provinces work. Personally, I understand perfectly but I was quite suprised today—my hon. friend will correct me if I am wrong—to hear that many Opposition members did not or pretended not to.

We have made no cuts to the transfer payments to the provinces—I think he mentioned this in his remarks—but we limited the increase to 3.7 per cent. Therefore, I should like my Hon. friend to tell me if I understood him correctly or whether the opposition feigned not to understand. I feel the opposition should read again the document which the Minister of Finance tabled yesterday.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. Obviously, as my hon. colleague just said, transfer payments will increase in each of the provinces. Only the amount of such equalization payments to the wealthier provinces will in some cases be limited.

But the fact is that despite harsh economic conditions and with very little room to manoeuvre, we were able to considerably increase transfer payments to the provinces in many areas. What we have indicated is that, in tough times, we have to better identify our priorities. That is what we have done, as well as increase transfer payments to the provinces by 3 per cent, and transfers for research by 3 per cent. Also, we were able to come up with $7 billion, including $3 billion for the unemployed.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that questions and comments are now terminated. Debate.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, last night as I listened to the Minister of Finance deliver his seventh budget, I asked myself: "Where are the ideas that could animate and inspire a whole generation?" Ideas, visions and principles move a nation, and for ideas to have meaning they must be returned to their centre. That centre is the human being; the human being suffering, working, striving and hoping. This is where I think the Minister of Finance and his advisers have failed. They have failed to relate to the human being. Our distinct Canadian society is centred in the person.

This minister talked about a national exercise to bring together the ideas and efforts of all Canadians. But for an effective and meaningful national exercise, trust must be the first rung on the ladder. For a minister of finance to earn trust, people will look at his track record, past and present. Does the past track record of the Minister of Finance build the trust factor or diminish it?

I would suggest over seven budgets of cuts, cuts, cuts—and I do not talk about cuts to eliminate waste, I talk of cuts because of lack of creativity. There have been multiple tax increases on the personal side, GST, sell-offs, giveaways of Terminal Three; a litany of forecasts never achieved. The trust factor on being sincere about reducing the deficit from 1984 to 1988 when we had one of the best economic performances in this country, where was the effort to reduce or hold the deficit and the debt then? He supervised. He was the Minister of Finance when the deficit went from $180 billion to $370 billion and blamed all of that on Liberals who were not in power. The trust factor for this minister is on precarious ground.

Let us talk about the present, last night's budget. Once again, the cornerstone of this government's plan, its Speech from the Throne, was the environment. And right off the bat we see in last night's budget cuts again. The Canada Assistance Plan which will affect our municipalities; Telefilm Canada cuts; Science and Technology, which affects our research and development, which affects our training, something we need so badly to meet the competitive levels that the Minister of Finance talks about.

Housing. We have the worst state in our history for affordable shelter in this country, and what does the Minister of Finance do instead of trying to alleviate this problem? He pulls back over five years $411 million.

• (1700)

I am going to mention the Toronto Ballet Opera House. I am going to mention it because on the face of it, it would seem that the minister does not realize that a ballet house is not just for those who go to the ballet. The ballet is a cultural contribution and this is one of the greatest industries that we have in this country. It is also for tourism which is the biggest job creator in this country. But, once again, he has misread it and it is cut.

The same with cultural centres in other parts of the country.

Wage controls for the Public Service. The Minister of Finance does not realize that now with the problems we are having during a recession, with the unemployment rates going so high, with the problems we are having in immigration because of refugee backlog, with the problems we are having at Canada Mortgage and Housing, that at this time more than ever we need our Public Service to really give the kind of service that supports all of us as parliamentarians. So, when you sort of come along and spit in their faces, as we have done with this budget, that affects morale, that affects productivity and that affects the mood of this entire country.

When it comes to the present and we look at this budget, once again I see that the Minister of Finance's trust factor is again diminished.

The minister used the words "national exercise", "national unity", "faith", "Canadian value system". We have the world's second highest standard of living.

I am absolutely amazed when I hear this group of Conservatives rediscovering the word "national".

I am amazed because for the last six years they have been decentralizing and denationalizing and retreating from national programs and national standards as if they were in some form of a dismantling race.

When I hear the Minister of Finance use the word "national", I feel it is like some kind of a deathbed conversion.

I want to repeat that the human being is where we must begin.

I suggest that human beings want to be treated fairly. When fairness is a part of the national mood, then productivity will increase. Then, and only then, will the objectives of lower interest rates, lower inflation, lower cost of goods, full employment happen. Only when a human being feels like he is being treated fairly can the trust factor take hold.

I believe that the instrument the Minister of Finance has to begin that national mobilization that he talks about, to begin that galvanization, the instrument that he has at his disposal is the tax system. It is the one instrument that touches everyone coast to coast and the Minister of Finance ignored that instrument. He ignored it last night. He had one page in this budget devoted to the tax system and said: "Over the next few months we will listen to people. We will listen to their ideas and then we will go from there".

How can trust be present unless we begin with the human being and that is where the Minister has failed. He is looking at a set of numbers in a macro sense, but he is not going back to basics.

The way we galvanize the will of this nation is by treating people fairly. We know that the current tax system in this government, run by this government right now, and I will say that previous governments which we were a part of, is in sad shape and needs a major overhaul. The Minister of Finance failed to have the courage to address it in last night's budget.

I want to mention Mr. Yves Séguin, who was Minister of Revenue for Quebec until six months ago when he resigned over the GST. He said last night on Radio–Canada, the French CBC network, Le Point: "Canadian unity is in danger if the tax system is not profoundly reformed. It is favouring the rich more than ever".

How can trust be present with a minister who has failed to address the human being? What we have here as a result of that is a policy document with no moral substance. Therefore, I say, that with every good intention of this minister, this document is going to end up like the previous six where very little of it will come to reality.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval—Ouest): Mr. Speaker, I listen to the speeches of members of the opposition and I am having some difficulty with examples they give.

I will first make a comment then ask a question, Mr Speaker. We know the budget is divided roughly into three parts: one third for the servicing of the debt, about one third for transfers to the provinces and the other third for programs. When we came into office in 1984, debt servicing cost about $200 billion and we had to borrow approximately $30 billion a year just to pay interests on that debt.

If my arithmetic is right, $30 billion multiplied by seven years amount to $210 billion, plus the $200 billion we inherited in 1984, $410 billion all told. This is about what figures now reveal.

I listen carefully when the members of the opposition tell us that we do not cut down on the right expenses. Well, it is impossible to reduce the service of the debt that calls for the third of the budget. As for the transfers to the provinces, the minister said earlier that he did not reduce them in the budget. So, that leaves the federal programs to be examined.

I would like to ask a question to the Hon. Member who has just made such an eloquent speech. If we examine the federal programs—as the minister himself suggested it—how could we rearrange the system so to recover adequate amounts of money first to pay the debt and second to improve the lot of Canadians?

[English]

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I would like to respond to the hon. member by saying that first of all when his party took power, the debt was approximately $180 billion and the interest payments during that first year were closer to $18 billion because of the current rate of tax and other accesses his party had to foreign capital. So when he uses numbers like $30 billion and $200 billion I do not mind a small increase, but when he is almost doubling, I get a little disturbed.

The point of the matter is, his party took power when we had one of the best economic performances ever. The Minister of Finance last night talked about setting up this reserve fund, this debt reduction fund, which I think is an interesting idea. My point would be that he mentioned when he was the finance critic in opposition in 1982 and 1983 that he was going to come in and attack this deficit, this debt problem. Why did he not implement some of those ideas at that time when he had an economy that was working in his favour? That was the time to begin acting on his words.

When we have a severe recession on our hands, it is not the time to ignore those 1.5 million people who are unemployed.

• (1710)

If these 1.5 million people are put to work, it will generate revenue and that will pay down the debt and the deficit a heck of a lot faster than an almost programmed unemployment. With 1.5 million people unemployed the entire social safety net becomes stressed to the point where we are locked into these deficit and debt numbers. That is where we take exception.

We hear about job creation programs being gutted and tourism programs being gutted and the small business of this nation, which employs 80 per cent of the labour, being threatened by an almost 150 per cent increase in UI premiums. That is not how to get an economy working again. That further demoralizes it.

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the very reasoned and reasonable critique of this budget by my colleague. In his remarks he mentioned the cuts in the transfer payments. I feel that the young people of our province and of our nation are going to be attacked by this budget because it is going to put tuition fees and the price of books, on which they are charged the GST, out of their reach.

I would like to address a very specific question to my colleague. I would like to know how he feels this budget is going to be of any benefit to the people who are in our post-graduate institutions here in Canada. Would he have any suggestions they might be able to use in order to enable them to get through the problem of this budget.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his question.

He has asked me a very tough question. When I go through the litany of cuts and see the attitude in terms of cuts in science and technology and programs related to training and cultural industries, I do not see any real hope there. Because I do not see any hope, I think this budget is on the wrong track. I want to repeat, I do not think the minister is dealing with the human being who has individual aspirations. He does not realize that in order to get people to achieve at the level my colleague is talking about, or even at shop floor level, he has to put some fairness into our system. I do not think this budget addresses fairness in any way, shape, or form.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will entertain a supplementary, but first I will recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg St. James.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood for an excellent presentation.

When he talks about putting people at the centre of things that we do, I think he is on the right track.

I want to remind my colleague from Toronto about a debate we had two and a half years ago about the free trade agreement. Our concern at that time was something that we called harmonization, in particular harmonization with certain social programs in the United States. Our concern was that this Conservative government would drag down our social programs to the level of the Americans, in other words, reducing our social programs to the lowest common denominator.

And what have we seen? I will give two examples. In the budget of yesterday there was an increase of 24 per cent in UIC premiums. UIC has been disavowed in this country. The government has backed off from unemployment insurance, a la the American style.

What about medicare? The same dismal story. The government is backing away from medicare. More than $2 billion was taken out of transfer payments in this budget alone.

In my opinion what we have is harmonization; harmonization that is rampant. I would like to know from my colleague from Toronto whether he sees exactly the same thing.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, in my riding of Broadview—Greenwood there are 20,000 senior citizens. If there is one comfort they feel in our community, in our country, it is our medicare system.

Canadians are aware of the fact that there are close to 40 million Americans without medicare, close to 40 million. When they see or feel us shifting to a standard that is similar to the United States, and they are at a period in their lives where they are basically helpless to do anything about that shift, they become very nervous. I hope this government will not last long enough to get to that point of harmonization, but I have absolutely no doubt in my mind that because of its fear of being lacking in competitiveness it will choose cuts, cuts, cuts rather than creating a bigger pot.

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval–Ouest): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I correctly understood the answer of the member who just spoke a few minutes ago. I think I heard that he was suggesting to the government that the deficit be increased by some billions of dollars instead of cutting or reorganizing some programs.

I wonder if he is aware that the people cannot afford an increase in the deficit. Am I correct in understanding that?

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, what I tried to say in my speech was the following: if a nation, a people, feels it is being treated fairly, then productivity grows immediately. Increased productivity creates more products at a better price, which creates more revenue for the Government of Canada, which creates more jobs, which means that there are fewer people on UI, fewer people on the welfare rolls, and more exports. That is where I am coming from.

It is only when the government introduces the GST and cuts, and demoralizes a community that there is a disincentive to productivity, and that disincentive to productivity comes right back in its deficit face.

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity today to speak in support of the budget that was presented by the Minister of Finance last night.

This budget is consistent and can be taken in the context of the long list of economic reforms and restructuring that we have been pursuing over the past six years. At that time we set out on economic and non-economic fronts to deal with, what were in some cases, long outstanding problems that were the country and restricting us from reaching our true potential.

During that time we reformed the energy sector through abolition of the National Energy Program and deregulation. We reformed the transportation sector through deregulation. We reformed the investment sector through abolition of the Foreign Investment Review Agency to allow for increased foreign investment, especially needed in resource areas of the country like Alberta and western Canada.

We have been privatizing Crown corporations. We are trying to expand trade opportunities through such measures as the Free Trade Agreement with the United States and are now examining the possibility of a trilateral trade agreement between Canada, the United States, and Mexico.

We made major reforms to the unemployment insurance program. The list goes on and on.

• (1720)

All of these have been an attempt to make the Canadian economy more market oriented, more able to compete in international markets. I believe each of these steps has been positive in itself. Frankly, on most of them we have no choice.

The world economy has undergone and is continuing to undergo radical change. If we think back to 20 or 30 years ago, there were a few industrialized countries like our own producing most of the industrial products and services for the rest of the world. We think of countries like Japan back in the fifties and sixties. They were thought of as producing low quality products that nobody really wanted. We do not think of Japan in that way any more. The same can be said for countries such as Taiwan, Korea, now Thailand, and others, which have gradually moved to value added high technology products that now compete with the best that we can produce here in Canada.

We are currently seeing a virtual revolution going on in eastern Europe. Those countries have recognized that they must move forward and they must become more market oriented if they are going to share in the same kind of economic benefits as has the rest of the world.

What this means is that we no longer have a monopoly on technology and industrial production that we used to share with a few other countries. Today, our former customers are now our competitors. But we have always been and continue to be a trading nation, the second most dependent nation in the world on trade.

Now trade, investment and capital flows are more international than ever before. It is competition that we have not known in the past or at least not known to this degree, and it is probably going to be much more severe in the future. This means that we have to prepare ourselves for what is coming.

I believe that these structural reforms, along with the signals that have been given in yesterday's budget, put us in a position to do that. On page 51 of the budget document reference is made to this:

> The government's structural reforms, implemented since 1984, have helped raise the economy's potential growth rate from about 2 3/4 per cent during the 1980s expansion to a projected 3 1/4 per cent over the medium term.

That increased capacity of approximately three-quarters of a percentage point of real growth per year is where we can find the resources, among other things, to deal with the deficit and debt problem we are concerned about, but also on an ongoing basis free up money and capacity to do the kinds of things that most of would like to get on with.

The potential growth rate is determined by the growth of labour, capital and total productivity. As noted on page 51:

> The Free Trade Agreement with the United States, deregulation of industries, and the effect of the GST will stimulate capital spending. The capital stock is expected to grow 4.4 per cent a year over the medium term, up from 3.5 per cent—The structural reforms will also raise total factor productivity growth which should average 0.5 per cent a year compared with virtually no growth during (the last) expansion.

While aggregate output growth is expected to be similar over the 1993-96 period to that recorded between 1984-87, there will be many differences in the over-all performance of the economy. Much more of the growth will come from business fixed investment and a net trade balance than in the previous expansion which was led by growth and consumption, both by households and governments.

Productivity performance should also be better. These differences in the composition of growth, more supply and less consumption will contribute to fundamentally lowering inflation pressures and an improved competitive position internationally. The economy will therefore be in a much better position in 1996 than it was toward the end of the 1980s.

By 1996, Canadians, under this scenario can achieve an economy with no government sector debt, no current account deficit, no net reliance on foreign savings, and low inflation. This represents a return of the more balanced economic type of environment that we had been 1950 and the mid-1970s.

In short, we will have set for sustained growth and prosperity rather than the wrenching cycles that we have been going through between the 1970 and 1980 period.

How do we achieve this? I guess what is important in the message from the Minister of Finance's budget last night is the fact that fundamentally we must continue to keep the growth in the deficit and debt under control. The only way to manage and keep sustained growth in the economy is to keep interest rates low on a permanent basis. High public sector deficits do not allow for that.

Many people do not understand the relationship between government debt and interest rates. Essentially, there is only so much money available in an economy from the savings that people have put into retirement plans and other savings instruments. If the government consumes all those savings or a substantial part of them, it crowds out demand from other sources such as business which wants to borrow for investment. Essentially the price then goes up or interest rates go higher, meaning our companies and Canadian business cannot compete in the capital markets against other countries where capital is available at a lower rate. We have seen this, for example, in Germany and Japan.

There is no other way of doing this. Other countries have tried. They have tried, for example, printing money, which is about the only other choice. That just simply does not work.

Sometimes in this House we tend to talk as if the government and the Bank of Canada can set interest rates simply where they wish, with no other consequences. The fact of the matter is their ability to do that is limited. Essentially, international capital markets are going to have a much more greater influence in the things we do in Canada.

That is why, in order to establish the environment for lower interest rates, we must give the signal that both public sector debt as well as inflation are going to be maintained under control. That is why in his budget last night the Minister of Finance dwelt essentially on those two items, because both are related.

If we keep inflation under control or reduce it to the 2 per cent level that he is seeking, this sets the environment for lower interest rates on an ongoing, sustained and permanent basis. This naturally reduces the cost of borrowing for everyone, including the government, which means that the debt we carry will be easier to pay the interest on. As well, we will be able to start to reduce that debt because after about the middle of this decade, about 1995, we will hopefully be in a position where we will not be issuing any more new government bonds.

Of course all of these are predicated on some assumptions, but I believe that the Minister of Finance in his budget last night has made realistic assumptions, as realistic as anyone can make given the nature and times that we are living in. None of us, for example, a year ago in the budget debate would have expected to have gone through a war between then and now. We will likely face other challenges between now and next year's budget.

I think what the Minister of Finance has shown last night is that he is prepared to make the adjustments necessary to stay on track. He set the track several years ago. He has consistently addressed this every year. Adjustments are required and he made them. We have made some adjustments again in terms of the public sector and what we plan to do as a government. We have done that, to send a signal to the private sector so that it can have the confidence that the economic climate, inflation and interest rates will be maintained and that levels of inflation and interest rates will be reduced.

Hopefully this will bring the kind of investment stimulus that we are all looking for and the kind of job creation that we would all like to see.

I would like to say one thing, because I see there is a member of the Liberal Party seeking to ask me a question.

• (1730)

I enjoyed his speech, by the way. He talked about tax reform, which is a favourite topic of his recently. I wonder if he could comment, while he is asking his question, on when he is prepared to come to the finance committee and explain his proposal, because we had to postpone the meeting which was scheduled before Christmas.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I will address the question regarding the single tax, which is a fairer and simpler system than the one we have on the table now. It needs refinement and modifications, which I am doing in conjunction with my leader's tax task force.

Our single tax team would be happy to appear before the finance committee in the not too distant future. We hope that we will provide some creativity for him.

My question has to do with the dollar. I notice that the Minister of Finance last night never talked about the dollar, and none of the speakers today on the government side talked about the dollar. We all want to increase our competitiveness, we all want to get full employment going again, and we are all concerned about exports.

I would like to know the member's thoughts on bandying the dollar around 78 and 82 cents. He never mentioned his thoughts on the dollar during his speech. I wonder if he would elaborate on what he thinks that might do to stimulate exports, which would take people off the unemployment rolls. That in itself would not have a great effect on inflation or interest rates in my opinion, but at the same time would probably take less drag on the deficit.

What are his thoughts on that?

Mr. Dorin: Mr. Speaker, first I would like to say that when he gets his caucus to agree to his tax proposal, I can assure him that I will have no problem in getting mine to support it.

Mr. Mills: Did you hear that?

Mr. Wappel: Absolutely.

Mr. Dorin: As far as the question about the dollar, there is often debate as to whether or not the dollar is too high relative to the productivity in the country. But when he suggests that somehow we can bring this dollar down, one has to ask: how does this happen?

There is a suggestion that the Bank of Canada has been doing something to keep the dollar high. In fact, the numbers do not bear that out. Foreign reserves are at an all-time high, something in excess of $20 billion. What that means is that the Bank of Canada has been intervening in financial markets, essentially to try and keep the dollar from going even higher.

Beyond intervening in those markets and accumulating even higher degrees of foreign reserves, there really is not any direct way of dealing with it unless we are prepared to impose some kind of currency controls.

We used to have a fixed dollar; we used to have it fixed to the United States. But that was abandoned because, essentially, it did not work. The government could not make it stick. There was simply too much pressure on the dollar. There were too many dollars available for sale that the government then had to buy up, and that policy was abandoned. Most countries in the world that have had those kinds of policies have also abandoned them.

There is really no industrial country in the world at the moment, that I can think of, that has this kind of policy. The Europeans are trying to bring about a more common currency. The Deutschmark does dominate the economy there—and they do intervene—but in part that is because they have the Bundesbank in Germany essentially supporting that. For us to peg the dollar to the United States dollar would, for the most part, require us to get the Americans to agree to assist us. I am not sure that they would, in the first place, and probably we would not want them to do that.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the member's address. If I understood it correctly, the member has great faith in the prognostications and tea-leaf reading ability of the Minister of Finance. I of course do not have that same faith.

I would like to ask three specific questions to the member, addressed to some of the prognostications that were made by the finance minister last year as compared to what he in fact said last night in his budget speech.

He said last night, and I quote, "We will hold the deficit to $30.5 billion this year and next"—I repeat, $30.5 billion this year and next—"despite the pressures of recession". Then he predicts that the deficit will fall next year below $25 billion for the first time in a decade. I ask the hon. member, does he believe that, in view of the fact that last year the Minister of Finance did not say that he was going to hold the deficit, but rather predicted that it was going to be below $30 billion? He did not predict a recession, which he himself made.

Later in his speech he said, and I quote: "The economic recovery will begin in the second half of this year and accelerate next year". So the question is: Does the member believe that statement, in view of the fact that last year the finance minister in no way in his speech predicted that this year there would be a recession? On the contrary, he predicted the exact opposite and was wrong.

Finally, he predicted in his speech yesterday—he was talking about interest rates—that the interest rates will be well below the 1990 average of 13 per cent. Indeed, the 1990 average was 13 per cent, but I am sure the member will remember that the finance minister predicted that they would not be anywhere near 13 per cent when he delivered his budget in 1990.

I ask the member: Does he believe in the prognostications of the Minister of Finance on those three points, three points on which he was 100 per cent dead wrong one year ago? If he does, why has the minister's future seeing ability, clairvoyance, suddenly got better?

Mr. Dorin: Mr. Speaker, I will try to respond to that as briefly as I can because I think we are nearly out of time.

First of all, yes, I do believe that the minister will meet his targets. I think that anyone involved in predicting economics, or for that matter in budgeting in a business, would recognize that in terms of the order of magnitude we are talking about a difference in the deficit between what was predicted and what it is now coming in at of about $1 billion to $2 billion.

In government we use billions, but in business we deal with either thousands or millions. In order of magnitude with a $150 billion approximate expenditure budget, we are talking about something between a 1 and 2 per cent variance here. I think that with any business plan that comes in with a 1 or 2 per cent variance, most businessmen would think they had been pretty close.

In terms of the economic recovery, the member has asked why do I believe that that will start in mid-year. I think that is probably a good case because last year it was expected that the economic slowdown would come sooner than it did. In fact, it came somewhat later in the year, which probably means that the recovery now projected is going to begin somewhat sooner than we might have thought last year.

As far as interest rates, the fact that the economy remains stronger than predicted for a period of time is one of the reasons interest rates also remain higher. What we are seeing now is the response. Interest rates have fallen; the demand for borrowing and credit has been reduced. In all likelihood, I think if anything the Minister of Finance's projections are probably conservative.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, a number of my colleagues have already or will shortly speak on specific aspects of the budget and how they affect Canadians in various regions of our country and in various sectors of our economy, the adverse impact that the budget will have on the expectations of Canadians during this period of recession.

I want to spend a few moments in this budget debate on the question of where the government has come from and pick up a point that my colleague from Scarborough just touched upon, and that is the credibility of the government and of the Minister of Finance in offering Canadians their budget forecast for the time ahead.

The Minister of Finance and the government enjoy nothing more than to attempt to blame the current recession on the Liberal government in the period prior to 1984. This seems like a footling waste of time of the House of Commons and indeed of the people of Canada to engage in such surrealistic thinking. The fact remains that, in statistical terms, what the government says when it attempts to blame a previous government for its present dilemmas is nonsense.

I shall offer the House one example and then proceed to a consideration of the background of the budget itself.

The Minister of Finance enjoys, it seems, pointing to the 1980–81 recession when interest rates were over 20 per cent. But what he does not add is that at that same time inflation was 12.5 per cent. Not only in Canada, but globally inflation was high. In Canada it was 12.5 per cent, so that the real interest rates were 7.5 per cent.

What happened in May 1990 when this government and this Minister of Finance were in office? Interest rates were at 14.1 per cent, inflation was 4.4 per cent. So the real interest rates in May 1990 were 9.7 per cent and in 1981, as I say, they were only 7.5 per cent, so who is fooling whom? The fact is that this government has made its own recession. It has created its own recession. At a time when interest rates could have been much lower, the government pursued its wrong-minded interest rate policies and contributed to the recession that all Canadians have been affected by during the last year or so.

I shall return to that point shortly, but I also want to say that, prior to this budget, Canada has been a country in quite severe recession. That is in part the result of the failure of this government to take the five and six years of unprecedented prosperity in the 1980s as an occasion to rein in government spending, to make those years a real occasion of reducing the debt and reducing the deficit in accordance with all orthodox economic thinking.

After all, in past years, thanks in part to the measures of the Liberal government prior to 1984 introduced, we have had strong employment, strong economic output, strong income. Then there was a case for a more conservative fiscal policy. When the economy is buoyant that is the occasion to take measures to curtail in government spending and to permit the private sector to expand and develop as it can do in the circumstances which I have described.

But what we have seen is a reversal of Keynesian economics. We have had a reversal of orthodox economic thinking from this government. It did not act in a time of prosperity. It did not act during its first years in office to counter excessive spending in the economy. It did not rein in government spending. When the time came that it realized that the economy needed regulation and control, it sought only the monetary route to do so. It imposed ever higher interest rates on Canadians. It imposed interest rates as virtually its sole method of attempting to fight what it perceived as growing inflation in Canada. In doing so, it not only discouraged investment, discouraged small business, discouraged farmers from making further commitments to growth in our economy. But the government also increased, and I have to think intentionally, the spread between Canadian and U.S. interest rates to unprecedented levels. Now what does that mean for the average Canadian? It means a loss of jobs. It means a loss of exports. That is what the continuing wide gap between U.S. and Canadian interest rates means. Yet, this government went right ahead and persevered in its wrong-headed policy of ever-increasing interest rates.

The government knew that by doing so, that each point of increase in interest rates meant a yet higher deficit service charges for Canadians. Our deficit service charges increased until the point has been reached where the government has had to acknowledge in this budget that it has made no progress in reducing its deficits. Our deficit today is far higher than the Minister of Finance predicted only a year ago. It is back to what it was when he came into office following a major recession.

The result of this high interest rate policy and of the differences in interest rates between Canada and the United States has been to drive up the Canadian dollar. It has driven the Canadian dollar up to unrealistic levels, levels which do not match our productive capacity. The result of that unrealistic exchange rate is that we are suffering from the inability of Canadians to export not only to the United States, but abroad, because the value of the Canadian dollar is grossly inflated.

We have seen the results in Canada of the effect of the high interest rate policy the government has pursued with a wrong-headed obstinacy. If anyone does not believe what I am saying is reliable, let me refer to the Economic Council of Canada, a respected economic think tank financed by the government.

In reviewing economic policy of the past two years, the Council said that it does not believe that the current rate of unemployment is acceptable and unavoidable. The council concluded: "One painful lesson learned about fighting inflation with monetary restraint—that is, high interest rates—is that the remedy only works when it brings on a recession. This in turn reduces employment, investment and export sales". That is exactly what this government has done. It has brought on a made-in-Canada recession. It has driven up unemployment. It has discouraged investment and our exports have sagged.

That is part of the background to the budget that the Minister of Finance introduced last night.

I want to turn for a moment to a more specific review of the minister's credibility. Last year in his budget, the Minister of Finance projected that interest rates would fall from 12 per cent in 1989 to 11 per cent in 1990. Instead, they averaged 13 per cent, further fueling the pressure on the deficit that I have already touched upon. As interest rates go up, so goes the deficit. The government has in response now cut and slashed programs in the name of reducing the deficit. Yet it created many of the circumstances, through high interest rates, that have lead to the major deficit that confronts every Canadian.

The Minister of Finance, in his last budget, predicted an inflation rate which would decline from 5 per cent in 1989 to 4.7 per cent in 1990 and would reach 4.5 per cent by the end of last year.

• (1750)

Yet, what is it today? Canada's inflation rate stands at 6.8 per cent although our economy has been enduring the made–in–Canada recession for over six months.

I want to cite another example of the inability of this Minister of Finance to offer the Canadian people accurate forecasts, accurate predictions, of what is going to happen in the economy in the time ahead.

The Minister of Finance's deficit prediction was $28.5 billion for 1990, and for 1991, $26.8 billion. Now we know that the deficit this past year has amounted to $30.5 billion and indeed the minister himself acknowledges that it would have been $35 billion if he had not acted in some way to reduce the growth in the deficit.

One can go on. There are many examples of how inaccurate this minister has been in his forecasting and in offering the Canadian people any certain guide to what lies ahead.

In his last budget, the minister predicted that Canada would experience a 1.2 per cent growth rate in 1990, but he added: "Growth is expected to rebound in the latter half of 1990 and in 1991, led by an improvement in net exports".

In fact, the economy shrank in the second quarter of 1990 by almost 2 percentage points to be followed by further contractions in both the third and fourth quarters of last year. Moreover, in the first quarter of 1990 I regret to say that Canada marked a record current account deficit in its trade of $20 billion. This was not the improvement in net exports which the Minister of Finance not a year ago promised the Canadian people.

What is the situation if we turn to the budget today? What is the situation with regard to the government's credibility and the Minister of Finance's forecasts?

This budget which is full of rhetoric but short of facts offers the assurance that short–term interest rates are expected to fall to 9.5 per cent this year from the current level of slightly over 10 per cent, and average 7 per cent over the medium term.

This is an interesting statement on the part of the Minister of Finance because until very recently he was as staunch a monetarist as the governor of the Bank of Canada. He was saying: "We must above all things pursue high interest rates as a method of restraining inflation". But suddenly the Minister of Finance seems to be a born–again fiscalist. He has given up his monetary obsessions and has now decided that the principal obstacle to increased affluence in Canada and increased prosperity is high interest rates. Above all things, we must now bring down interest rates.

Yet it was he himself who raised interest rates steadily every month, every month over the past year and a half. It is he who has now decided that his principal task is to bring down interest rates. But they are not to come down very much. They are just to come down from the current 10 per cent to a 9.5 per cent average over the next 12 months.

That is not much of a reduction. It certainly will do nothing to close the gap between Canadian and U.S. interest rates. It certainly will not be enough to bring about the resurgence of investment, the resurgence of economic commitment that all Canadians seek.

In believing that he can bring down interest rates even to that limited level, the Minister of Finance suggests that inflation will fall to 2.9 per cent by the end of 1992 and 2 per cent by 1995. Mr. Speaker, 2.9 per cent inflation by the end of 1992 from the 6 per cent and 5 per cent inflation that Canadians have been experiencing is a major reduction. We are to see inflation cut in half in two years.

The Minister of Finance does not tell us how he is going to do this.

This is quite wonderful. This is quite marvellous. There is nothing that any of us would prefer to see than inflation brought down at such a rapid rate. But as the Toronto Globe and Mail said today, these numbers are amazing. They are not backed up by any information, any projections, any details about how Canada is to achieve this quite remarkable reduction in inflation while at the same time interest rates are only supposed to fall a very little bit.

The minister further claims in this budget that in 1992–93, instead of the present $30 billion–plus represented by the deficit, we shall have a deficit of $24 billion, $16 billion the following year, and $10 billion in 1994–95. These are amazing numbers, as the newspapers have said. But the Minister of Finance does not tell us how he is going to get there.

I would suggest that we take a very careful look at the assumptions made in this budget. The Canadian people will ask themselves where, for example, the 3.5 per cent growth is to come from next year. Canada, deep in a recession today and with some quarters exhibiting no growth and some quarters negative growth, suddenly next year is to achieve growth of 3.5 per cent and 4 per cent in the following year. The Minister of Finance, in offering these bald numbers unsubstantiated by any analysis, stretches the credulity of the Canadian people. Who can have confidence in these numbers on the basis of the minister's past performance or in the past performance of this government? These are numbers one might hope will be achieved, but on the present evidence and on past performance, the Canadian people can have no confidence that this government is capable of bringing about the radical change that is set forth in this budget. And yet, at what a price? At what price has the government set itself these goals?

The government talks about radically restructuring the economy, making Canada more competitive. What is most striking about the government's failure to act over the past seven years is that on the debt, on the underlying structural weaknesses in the economy, this government has not acted. It has not acted for seven years. It is now attempting to act in an inappropriate way. This is what comes from an economic philosophy that believes that the government has no role in the economy, in a political agenda which has resulted in the fragmentation of our country along regional, linguistic or social lines.

What the Canadian people are looking for are not these pie–in–the–sky, excessively optimistic, unsubstantiated budget measures which do not really address the principal issues confronting Canada today.

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacLaren: I am very pleased to hear the member opposite supporting the views that I have just set forth. I am sure their views—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Well, on that basis my clock here shows six o'clock. The hon. member will have ten minutes remaining in his questions and comments when he begins tomorrow.

It being six o'clock this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at eleven o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

STANDING COMMITTEE ON JUSTICE AND THE SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question of privilege.

The matter giving rise to my claim for privilege arose in the month of December last. On December 18 I rose in the House and gave notice of my intention to raise a matter of privilege. At that time I indicated that the matter might better be raised and discussed at a point in time later. Subsequent to December 18, of course, the House adjourned. It did come back to deal with the gulf war, and this week we have been dealing with the budget.

During that time there have been discussions between a number of parties involved in the events that gave rise to my claim. These discussions have enhanced, in my view, the understanding of the issues among the parties, but the matter has not, unfortunately, been dealt with.

The first thing I have to do here, Mr. Speaker, is to show to you that a prima facie case of privilege exists here, and I want to outline just precisely what that is now.

Mr. Speaker: The matter which the hon. member is raising was raised, as he has very properly pointed out, some weeks ago.

• (1110)

I may have to interrupt the hon. member before his submission is concluded because I have some procedural difficulties with hearing this application at this time.

However, I would invite the hon. member to put, not in extensive argument, but briefly the point that he wishes to make. I may have to interrupt him at that point. If I do have to interrupt him, I want it made very clear that that does not in any way preclude the hon. member from raising this matter at perhaps a later time.

I am not trying to preclude the hon. member, but the Speaker may be in some procedural difficulty here. I will explain that if I have to.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your intervention. If I may just comment very briefly, I believe I have the general sense of what the member is concerned about.

I do not believe, from what I know of it, that it is a case of privilege. However, I think it is an issue that is important to the House and therefore if the member were to be brief, succinct and to the point, I want to signal to the chair that we, on this side, are prepared to listen to his arguments.

I would have some brief comments after, if that would be allowed by the Chair.

Mr. Speaker: I very much appreciate the comments of the hon. parliamentary secretary. I do know, of course, about the issue. I think all hon. members do. It is an issue of terrible importance to the public and I think to all members of this House.

I will accept the hon. parliamentary secretary's invitation to hear the hon. member.

Mr. Lee: Simply on a point of order, would it be preferable, Mr. Speaker, if I were to defer making this case to a later time today when the hon. minister has completed his work in connection with the estimates?

If that is the difficulty, I would be prepared certainly to postpone my argument until Orders of the Day had commenced. The reason I say that is because I do not believe the privilege matter I wish to raise here lends itself to a cursory introduction.

I believe it is more complex and important to the House than that. I would prefer to place all of the case at one time.

Mr. Speaker: I think I should say this to hon. members and again to the public which is listening and watching. I do not take anything away from the hon. members' advocacy.

This matter arises because a committee has indicated that it wishes a minister to release certain information in a confidential report that relates to an individual who escaped from custody and committed offences while he was out of custody.

That is the issue. That is the subject matter of the issue, but it is not the procedural issue that I have to face.

The matter has been reported by the committee back to the House. It has not been dealt with yet by the House. For me, that creates certain procedural difficulties.

If the hon. member wishes to let this matter go for a little while longer, I most certainly of course will consider that as an adjournment of the question of privilege and I will hear the hon. member further.

I want to make it very clear that I understand, very clearly, not just as Speaker of the House but as a member of Parliament why the hon. member does not want to just make a cursory comment.

It probably would be better, now that the hon. member has raised it for the second time in the House—I appreciate the hon. member's co-operation in this—that it be adjourned further. That does not preclude the hon. member from raising it.

I thank the hon. parliamentary secretary for indicating that there is agreement on the government side for that course of action.

I also want to say to the House that the co-operation and the attention that the hon. member has given to this matter and to the information that has been given to the Speaker—not just, by the way, from the hon. member but also from the other side of the House—is helpful to the Chair.

I thank hon. members for that.

The hon. member on a point of privilege.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I do not raise points of privilege very—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps there has been an error somewhere, but the Chair does not have any notice of the point of privilege.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, I could have perhaps run up to you and given you this while you were in the midst of a ruling. I understand that points of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: I have to say to the hon. member that my difficulty is this: The rules are very clear. I certainly can hear the hon. member later on in the day, but I don't think I can hear the hon. member à ce moment-ci.

Perhaps the hon. member would give me notice, and I will take it under consideration and hear him later in the day.

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1991-92

EXPLANATORY STATEMENT BY PRESIDENT OF TREASURY BOARD

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting Estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1992, was presented by the President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance) and read by Mr. Speaker to the House.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, in support of the Estimates I should also like to table Part I, the Government Expenditure Plan; as well, on behalf of my colleagues I will then file with the Clerk of the House Part III of the Estimates which includes the expenditure plans of 87 departments. These documents will be distributed to members of standing committees to make it easier for them to consider the borrowing authority sought in Part II of the Estimates.

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEES

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Orders 81(4) and 81(6), I move:

That the Main Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1992, laid upon the Table earlier this day, be referred to the several Standing Committees of the House as follows:

Since there is a detailed allocation of the Estimates to various committees and the list is lengthy, Mr. Speaker, I would ask that it be appended in Hansard as if it had been read.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours thereof.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and the privilege of tabling today the government's Main Estimates for the 1991–92 year.

The Main Estimates provide a host of details on the way the government will spend most of the $159 billion earmarked for budgetary expenditures, as announced Tuesday by my colleague, the Minister of Finance.

By tabling the Main Estimates, the government is asking Parliament to approve new spending authority totalling $47 billion, while the remaining $110.5 billion is authorized under legislation already approved by Parliament.

The Main Estimates reflected our absolute commitment to expenditure control and keeping a tight rein on the cost of government operations.

Since it came to power in 1984, our government's first priority has been to reduce the cost of government operations while continuing to provide Canadians with the programs and services they need. We made it clear that we were committed to sound management and the judicious administration of tax revenues.

• (1120)

Orderly management of a country's finances requires a strict and continuous review of federal programs and services, and a lasting commitment to spending restraint. In this area, we have achieved major results over the past six years. I will understand if you do not applaud, Mr. Speaker, in view of your duties in this House.

The annual increase in program spending was kept down to an average 3.7 per cent between 1984–85 and 1990–91, well below the rate of inflation.

The annual increase in operating and capital expenditures, including Public Service wages, dropped to an average 3.3 per cent during the six years our government has been in power. Again, this is well below the annual rate of inflation and far less that the average of 10.4 per cent we saw during the first half of the decade.

The Public Service has become leaner since 1984–85 and is now about the size it was in the middle of the seventies. This happened despite a significant increase in the volume of work involved in programs and services, increased air traffic, a larger number of travellers going through customs and larger numbers of pension cheques being delivered each month.

The heightened efficiency of government operations was the result of more than strict expenditure controls. We also made a point of focussing on better management of the government itself.

Since 1984–85, operations and maintenance expenditures have been controlled very carefully, and departments and agencies have had to absorb any cost increases due to inflation.

Better financial management made substantial saving possible. Measured wage increases have helped to maintain the government's wage bill at a reasonable level.

Altogether these measures have sent a clear message to Canadians that the times when governments were spenders were over. This is particulary important now that we are going through a period of economic recession, marked by unpredictable external pressure that are likely to generate new expenditures.

[English]

Program spending for 1991–1992 will amount to $116 billion. This represents a year over year increase of 6.9 per cent or under 3 per cent after discounting temperate factors such as high unemployment insurance benefits and support to grain producers.

Public confidence in government expenditure control remains a key to restoring the economy to good health. To bolster that confidence and to keep the plan of deficit reduction on track, we will need to reduce program spending further and to take other steps to increase the efficiency of government operations. This requires more than simply a frugal continuation of business as usual. Previous spending cuts and other internal economies have taken the fat out of government operations.

The spending cuts we are implementing are bound to have an impact on internal operations and on the level of services that the government provides, but every effort will be made to minimize adverse impacts.

Although departments have not yet determined the precise areas that will be affected, there are some cases where reductions are already known. These range from the elimination of internal government publications, such as Dialogue, to the elimination of direct federal spending on National Crime Prevention Week, to the phasing out of land use planning in the north.

To achieve the savings necessary to sustain a healthy economy and a sound financial position for the government, there will have to be fundamental changes in the way that programs and services are delivered to the public. Departments will have to rationalize their delivery systems and perhaps reduce the number of points of service delivery.

This is a program of expenditure reduction and restraint, and I make no apology for it. We will not ask Canadians to spend more on government than the country can afford.

In the budget the Minister of Finance announced a number of measures intended to bring about both immediate savings and lasting efficiencies in government programs and services. I am announcing today details of some of these measures.

[Translation]

The linchpin of this restraint program is the extension of the expenditure control plan and strict controls on the cost of government operations.

The measures we are introducing this week to control the cost of government operations will generate a savings of nearly $870 million for 1991–92. Over the five–year fiscal planning period ending in 1995–96, cumulative savings will exceed $5.2 billion.

These initiatives will have a direct impact on the Public Service, at all levels. We are introducing a three–year wage restraint program which, depending on the outcome of collective bargaining, may result in the loss of 6,000 jobs. Management levels in departments and agencies will be reduced, and the number of management level employees will drop by 10 per cent.

However, although cost reduction is vital to the well–being of our country at this time, it is not the only reason for these changes.

The measures announced today Mr. Speaker, reflect the realization that we can no longer justify the present complexity and cost of government operations. To serve Canadians well, the government must innovate in the way it provides services and depend on organizations that are managed far more efficiently.

We are convinced that these reductions and reforms are necessary if the government is to have sufficient funds for essential programs and services and if it is to set an example to other employers in this country.

All these measures will substantially change the way the government runs its operations.

There will be a freeze on operations and maintenance expenditures and on capital spending related to existing programs.

To accomplish this, the operating and capital budgets of each department will be reduced by 3 per cent in the Main Estimates. As a result, overall spending on existing programs in 1991–92 will be maintained at 1990–91 levels.

The government is taking other steps to reduce spending on grants and contributions that are not otherwise affected by measures already included in the Expenditure Control Plan.

The Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Vice–President of the Treasury Board, my colleague, the Hon. Harvie Andre, will review current spending on grants and contributions. This review will ensure that current spending is reduced in line with government priorities and with a minimum of inconvenience to the public. Mr. Andre will submit recommendations on how best to target grants and contributions, promote autonomy and reduce duplication.

• (1130)

These additional measures, Mr. Speaker, will generate savings of $75 million in 1991–92, which will reach $125 million by 1992–93.

As indicated by the Minister of Finance, the government will introduce a bill to limit expenditures. Canadians can be assured that program expenditures management will be done in the context of the fiscal plan.

[English]

Given the seriousness of our fiscal situation, the government must look carefully at its wage costs. Our approach to collective bargaining must also reflect our commitment to the inflation targets announced by the Minister of Finance.

The government has a responsibility to show national leadership in wage restraint. We are not prepared, therefore, to contemplate wage settlements at greater than 3 per cent annually over the next three years. We believe that this can be accomplished under the current collective bargaining system. We are prepared, however, to introduced legislation if necessary to maintain essential services and to avoid excessive third party wage settlements.

Salary budgets for 1991–1992 will not be adjusted to compensate for new collectively bargained wage increases. There are simply no additional funds available to compensate departmental operating budgets for increased wage settlements.

Any increase in wages must be paid, therefore, through other reductions in the wage and salary budgets, largely through a reduction in Public Service employment. The tradeoff between wages and job losses must be clear and direct and must be understood by all concerned. Each 1 per cent will result in a reduction of about 2,000 jobs so that if agreements are negotiated at 3 per cent the resulting reduction would be in the order of 6,000 jobs.

The choice between wage increases and job losses is not one that is easily made, either by the employer or the bargaining agents, but in the present circumstances of restraint this choice must be faced.

I have already met with the heads of the Public Service unions to seek their support in minimizing job losses. Departments have been asked to identify the job reductions that would be entailed by potential wage increases of up to 3 per cent annually.

Should settlements force a reduction in employment, it is the government's hope that this could be achieved wherever possible through attrition rather than outright lay–offs.

[Translation]

In this time of restrictions, the government feels that senior officials wage increases should not exceed that which their unionized counterparts obtain through collective bargaining. A certain degree of relativity must also be maintained between managers and the union members under them.

Therefore, the wage increases for members of the Management Category, deputy ministers and heads of Crown corporations will be restricted and will not exceed the average bargained rate of increase for the Public Service.

The number of managers in the Public Service will be cut, as I mentioned earlier, by 10 percent or approximately 475.

This reduction in personnel will be carried out through a government–wide program aimed at bringing down to three the number of management levels under that of deputy minister. It will enable us to rationalize departmental activities, cut costs, speed up the decision–making process and give more powers generally to the officials in the regions and at points of service.

The departments have been asked to develop a plan to eliminate layers of management and reduce managerial staff by 10 percent. These plans will be implemented starting on September 1, 1991, and the personnel will be reduced over the next two years.

[English]

The government will improve the matching of payments it makes with any money it is owed. Revenue Canada, Taxation, will improve the collection of debts owed to governments through its matching and post–assessing activities. These programs are designed to ensure taxpayer equity and the integrity of the tax system. This will be done through the verification of income reported by taxpayers, the examination of claims for deductions and exemptions.

Since 1984, the government has been intensifying its efforts in the area of user fees. Revenues from external user fees now exceed $3 billion, which is more than double the 1984–85 levels. The government is continuing to look for new areas where the application of user fees is appropriate.

Transport Canada will continue to increase the amount of cost recovered from specific users of its services so that the burden of cost on the general taxpayer for these services will be reduced.

The government's privatization program has already moved more than 18 Crown corporations and other corporate holdings to the private sector and other levels of governments.

The government will privatize CN Exploration, an oil and gas company created to exploit CN's mineral rights in Saskatchewan.

Petro–Canada International Assistance Corporation, PCIAC, will be wound up. Canadian foreign aid in the energy sector will continue to be delivered through the Canadian International Development Agency. This will rationalize Canada's energy aid and result in administrative savings.

Canadian Oil and Gas Lands Administration is being wound up. Residual functions will be taken up by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, the National Energy Board, and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Privatization remains a key priority. Given our experience to date, however, and our desire to streamline government operations further, there is no longer a need for a separate agency dedicated to this function. Accordingly, the Office of Privatization and Regulatory Affairs will be dismantled.

The regulatory review functions of that office will be transferred to the Treasury Board Secretariat. Responsibility for the co–ordination of future privatization activities will be assumed by the Department of Finance.

[Translation]

The government firmly believes that numerous tasks are best and most efficiently carried out by civil servants. However, the government also considers it is important to be able to provide services to Canadians in a variety of ways.

That is why we made sure we could contract out certain functions outside the Public Service when that is in the public interest in terms of costs, efficiency or quality of service. The Canadian people expect nothing less, from a government committed to the sound management of the country.

We have negotiations ongoing with the Public Service unions regarding the development of a new labour adjustment policy which will be eliminating barriers to contracting out.

Should it become obvious that it is impossible to reach an agreement before the existing policy expires on March 31, 1991, the government will introduce in Parliament a bill to confirm its right to contract out, thereby eliminating any existing barrier.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Loiselle: You agree. I can feel it. But you do not want to say so.

• (1140)

Mr. Speaker, our objective is quite simply to give the government enough leeway so that Canadians may derive maximum benefits from the taxes they pay.

Special operating agencies are a major government initiative designed to improve the delivery of public services. In the past year we set up five organizations, including the passport office and the Canadian government printing services, and the results are quite encouraging. By establishing such organizations we hope to enhance the quality of services and increase the over–all value of taxes paid by Canadians.

In his remarks the Minister of Finance referred to the creation of three new agencies: the bureau of intellectual property, a government agency to monitor racetracks, and the Canadian Grain Commission.

We made that decision to implement private sector management techniques more systematically so we can operate on a commercially–oriented basis for enhanced cost recovery.

I am pleased to announce today that the government will give six additional units serving a wide range of clients the status of agency. Here they are:

Office of General Standards of Canada;

Transport Canada Training Institute;

Canadian Administration of Indian Oil and Gas Lands;

Correctional Services Professional Development Program;

Canadian Heritage Information Network;

Canadian Conservation Institute.

I also asked the Treasury Board Secretariat to co–operate with departments to define, assess and create other agencies over the coming year, particularly the kind of organizations which serve the public directly and whose future outlook is most promising.

[English]

There should be no ambiguity about the steps we are taking today: they reflect the government's continued determination to reduce the costs of government programs and administrative overhead; they reflect the need for significant changes in the way in which government operates; and they show our commitment to look for the most efficient means of delivering services to Canadians.

These expenditure reductions and other management initiatives form an essential part of the government's broader national agenda: for economic recovery for the continued reform of government.

Change is seldom easy, and significant change can be painful as well as difficult. But significant change in the way the government does business is no longer an option, it is a necessity.

Federal Public Service employees have worked hard to maintain services to Canadians over the last six years of restraint. I am confident that they are able to respond to these further changes and challenges.

Canadians will welcome changes that reduce the size and cost of government while better equipping it to provide the services that taxpayers are entitled to expect.

But the basic message should be clear: we are serious about restraint and we are serious about reform; we are determined to cut expenditures, and to organize and operate the government in a manner that suits the real needs of Canadians.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the hon. member for Acadie—Bathurst, the hon. House Leader for the Official Opposition has a short point of order.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, while the minister is in the House with his parliamentary secretary, I wonder if the minister would check to make sure that the courtesies which have been extended to opposition parties in the past would be delivered upon today. We have an example whereby copies of the estimates are not readily available to members of the Official Opposition.

They were not distributed to our lobby as was done for the New Democratic Party. I am wondering if the minister and his parliamentary secretary would forthwith embark upon that particular mission, to make sure that that common courtesy which has been extended to us in the past is indeed provided today.

Mr. Loiselle: I do apologize. I was not aware of this and the next time I will make sure that you get the documents to which you are entitled.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order raised by my friend, members of my caucus got the the documents. We did not receive any preferential treatment.

I would also like to ask the minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, to determine why government members were seen in the tunnel between this building and West Block carrying estimates even before the House began its sitting for the day, let alone before the minister rose in his place to table the documents. That, I think, is unacceptable.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sure the minister will check into it. Maybe it was just too heavy for the minister to carry. On the same point of order?

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, could the minister give the House an undertaking that he will report to the House on the matter which I and my colleague for the New Democratic Party have raised? Will he report to the House by day's end as to what has happened with regard to this particular matter? It is a tradition which has been followed in this House and there seems to be a lot of confusion surrounding the delivery of those estimates in the minister's department.

Mr. Loiselle: I would like to tell the hon. gentleman that I came to the House directly from my office, getting into this House at 11 o'clock, so I did not follow very carefully what was unfolding. I am aware that vast numbers of documents were made available, that some briefings were given to members, as is customary, and that from my knowledge everything that had to be done was done, but I will certainly check on the matters that have been raised in this House today.

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, before beginning to respond to the comments of the hon. minister with respect to the estimates tabled today, I would like to avail myself of the opportunity to join, I am sure, all of my colleagues and all Canadians in expressing my profound happiness with the fact that the war in the gulf has ended. May I express, Mr. Speaker, through you, to the men and women of the Canadian Armed Forces our great appreciation for the valorous, competent and professional way in which they have conducted themselves.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Young (Acadie—Bathurst): I wish to begin my very brief remarks by referring to part of the conclusion of the text of the hon. minister in which he said, and I quote:

[Translation]

"Canadians will welcome changes that reduce the size and cost of government while better equipping it to provide the services that taxpayers are entitled to expect".

Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether Canadians, after listening to the Budget speech made by the Minister of Finance on Tuesday and today's statements by the President of the Treasury Board, really believe they are now better equipped to pursue this country's economic development.

I think most Canadians will share my concern that in the Budget and the documents tabled with the Estimates, the Government of Canada has demonstrated its approval of the Allaire report. I fail to see why the Tory government does not state its position clearly, as so many others have done. If it wants to see this country dismantled, let it come out and say so.

• (1150)

The Allaire report has been questioned by many people. Not long ago, Canadians drew some assurance from the fact that the Prime Minister of Canada had said once again that he was a great federalist. He was, and we have to take his word for it, during the referendum in Quebec in the early 80s. But now, Mr. Speaker, all of a sudden the Government of Canada decides to introduce a number of tax measures that prove to Canadians that the federal government has no, or very little, reason to exist.

Make no mistake. If the federal government admits it no longer has any reason to exist, reflected not only in what it says but also in the measures in this Budget and the notes on how the Budget will be spent, what does this mean for Canadians who seek leadership and are asking the government to show that it wants to maintain a form of Confederation that will include Canadians from the Atlantic to the Pacific to the Arctic?

[English]

I and my colleagues, in the weeks and months to come will, like all Canadians, be looking very closely at the estimates and at the budget. Already there has been reaction.

It seems to me that many Canadians will be astounded that the government has chosen the budget documents to do exactly what has been rejected by federalists in the Quebec Liberal Party, such as Mr. Paradis, Mr. Ryan and many business people. The Conservative Government of Canada, at a time when the Spicer commission is looking for reasons to keep Canada together, when we are anticipating the Campeau–Bélanger report, is accepting the premise that is clearly stated in the document called the Allaire report, and I quote:

> The central government will continue to exercise exclusive authority in the following areas: Defence and territorial security; customs and tariffs, management of the common debt; currency and equalization.

That is all that is left of Canada as far as the federal government is concerned in the vision put forward in the Allaire report. That is nearly identical with the vision, if that is what one can call it, that is being put forward in the budget and in the estimates.

Surely there has to be more the Government of Canada can do in indicating its commitment to the future of this country. This is a total abdication of government. It is an admission that it has become irrelevant. I think the implications go far beyond the budget and all the talk we are hearing about what has been improved as a result of moneys being spent or how much an improvement we are going to see in control of the deficit and the debt as a result of restraint.

Those elements will all, undoubtedly, be debated. However, I would be extremely surprised if Canadians who look into this are not struck by the approach the government is taking, of abdicating its responsibility for national programs. It makes no difference what aspect of it you look at; the government has said there really is no need for a strong, central federal government looking at maintaining some national standards and equality among the peoples of this country from coast to coast.

The government recognizes, as we all do, that one war apparently has come to an end. On Tuesday and again today, the government confirms that they are declaring war on the regions of the country. They want the provinces now to go to war because it is the only way they are going to be able to survive as a result of some of the measures in the budget and the estimates. They want public servants to go to war among themselves, to fight among themselves for raises and/or jobs.

Surely Canadians expected a budget and an attitude on the part of this government that would reflect the unease that we have as to whether or not we can maintain this nation.

I suspect that the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board are going to bask in the same kind of comments as the Prime Minister did a couple of weeks ago when he made his return to federalism in speeches in Toronto and Quebec City in terms of the comments of Mr. Parizeau, the leader of the Parti Quebecois in Quebec. Mr. Parizeau thought that the Prime Minister's comments were very apropos and made no bones about stating that. I am sure we are going to hear from Mr. Parizeau and probably people who sit in the Bloc Quebecois who are going to tell us that this government has confirmed what they have been saying, that there is no need for a federal government because it no longer has any commitment to Canada, to the regions of Canada, the poor of Canada, the students of Canada or the elderly of Canada.

My colleagues, in the next few weeks, will not derive any pleasure in pointing out where the national government has abdicated its responsibilities.

We talk about trust. It is a quality that many people discuss and many people seek in others and in their institutions. It is not something that is often found these days, but my colleague from Newfoundland yesterday was quoted widely on his description of the budget.

Much of the jargon around these days is related to what has happened in the Persian Gulf. Certainly, if one were to continue in that vein—plagiarism is not always something that I get involved in—surely the prime example of what happened to this government, its lack of direction and its lack of commitment to the country could be as what some might describe as the "mother of all commitments".

This is what the Prime Minister had to say a few years ago, in 1983. The Prime Minister, then leader of the opposition of course, said: "I have said and repeated dozens of times as far as the Conservative Party is concerned, medicare is a sacred trust which we will always preserve".

I wonder if anybody in the country can be expected to have any trust in what anybody says, if that kind of a comment is weighed in the light of what has happened in this budget and what we find in the estimates with respect to how Canadians can look forward in the next year to receiving services from their government.

The vicious people in this country might suggest that one of the truisms is being proved by this budget and these estimates. The R.B. Bennett syndrome is certainly back among us. Tory times are tough times. It has often been said and there are a few people around who can remember that as an axiom.

Surely this whole notion of being tough, standing up, talking about deficit and restraint in a very dispassionate way brings back memories to those people who either lived through or who have made themselves familiar with Conservative Party policy in previous hard times.

This is the first time that the Conservative Party has had to deal with tough times in this country since the 1930s. I think the elderly in our country are going to shudder when they see the consistency in the approach that this government is using.

• (1200)

The Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board today indicated that they had very limited choices, very restricted choices. There is no doubt that that is true. I think every Canadian understands that we are faced with extremely difficult choices with respect to the level of debt, the burden that that debt places on us and the resulting deficit.

Even when there are limited choices, the choices we do make should be guided by a vision. I am sorry to say, but I believe that this government has taken on a dark vision of Canada, a negative vision, a divisible vision, one lacking in any optimism. It is nearly a scorched earth policy where I suppose, at 15 per cent or so in the polls, you say it does not matter too much so at least we will play to those few people who still support us across the country, who insist on inflicting hardship on the poor, the under-privileged, on disregarding the realities of regional disparity and so on.

There is very little to be upbeat about today. I want to speak for a moment or two because of the last year's experience that I and many Canadians had with the policies of this government with respect to interest rates, monetary policy, the value of the Canadian dollar and so forth.

The conversion on the road to recession that has been experienced by the Minister of Finance is really something to behold because to suggest that the estimates are going to be able to achieve what the Minister of Finance has suggested and what the President of Treasury Board has suggested is unbelievable, especially when you consider from whence it comes. These are the people who said that high interest rates had to be maintained, that high unemployment levels had to be allowed because that was the way to control inflation, so inflation was at 4 per cent, 5 per cent, 6 per cent, depending on which month you choose in the last year or so.

Now, after the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Chamber of Commerce, the National Council on Business Issues and all of these people begged the government to reduce interest rates and had those pleas ignored and refused, the rates have come down. This is the weird and wonderful world of Wilson. With the interest rates coming down, so is inflation. The projections are that if everything turns out according to the budget and the estimates, inflation is going to be reduced to 3 per cent and then 2 per cent, interest rates are going to drop to 9.5 per cent and 9 per cent. Imagine this conversion that the recession has wrought. For months and years we have had people's pleas for interest rate relief and some adjustment of the artificially high Canadian dollar downward fall on deaf ears. All of a sudden a new combination comes forward with lower interest rates, mind you continuing high unemployment and even higher unemployment, and we are going to wind up with very, very low rates of inflation.

I wonder how the people who are going bankrupt and the nearly 1.5 million people who are unemployed are going to respond to this new theory of economics being put forward by the government, the Minister of Finance and the President of Treasury Board, but most significantly, by the architect of much of this.

When interest rates are high, they are kept up there by the Governor of the Bank of Canada. When they drop, we get the royal 'we' and the Minister of Finance says we have reduced interest rates.

The interesting thing is that yesterday, as far as I know, in an unprecedented press conference, the new Crow doctrine had been put forward and that is that we can achieve lower inflation with low interest rates. It is going to be interesting in committee and so forth to find out how this new alliance was forged between the Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada because the formula of high interest rates and high unemployment and a high Canadian dollar led to inflation, as I said, at 4 per cent, 5 per cent, and even as high recently as 6 per cent. Now we are going to go the other way. We are going to have lower interest rates and we are going to have lower inflation.

The confusion that seems to be obvious inasmuch as no one understands what is taking place is not the result of people not being able to deal with facts. It is because we are faced with a government that has no commitment, no plan. It is not what I said or predicted yesterday that matters. It is what I am telling you today. But you have to believe that what I am predicting today will come true six months or a year from now regardless of my past track record.

The reason I spoke of conversions is that not so very long ago, because the Minister of Finance likes to relate back to the early 1980s for very obvious reasons, he, in the early 1980s had a great deal to say as well. For example, he spoke about the funding of the established programs and he said that if they decreased, it would lead to a decline in the quality of post-secondary education and an increase in bitterness and confrontation between the federal government and the provincial governments. We do not need a decline in post-secondary education said the then finance critic. We need an increase in the quality of post-secondary education. That was in November 1981.

Speaking of established programs funding, he said that the cuts could have disastrous effects on universities and on colleges and on the operations of hospitals. Let us not make hospitals, universities, and colleges a battleground between the federal government and the provincial governments. Let us not solve those problems on the backs of the hospitals and universities. This is the present Minister of Finance in the early 1980s.

Well, I think that we can probably put as much faith in what the Minister of Finance had to say on Tuesday about what is going to be happening a year from now as people generally should have put in the statements of the Minister of Finance when he was in opposition in the early 1980s.

The last point I want to make with respect to the record of the government is what they have had to say about management because that has been, from the government's point of view, its strong suit.

What is unfortunate is that that self-analysis is not shared by outside observers, even among the best friends of the government. When people look at the budget and look at the estimates, I am sure they will keep in mind with respect to management what the Canadian Manufacturers' Association had to say in December 1990. Restrictive monetary policy, large federal sales tax hikes, among others, have directly raised inflation rates and put the economy into a recession and caused large job losses.

Mike McCracken, president of Informetrica says: "The government chose to put the economy into a major recession". Well, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Chamber of Commerce, the National Council on Business Issues all share the view that the government has mismanaged the affairs of this country. The unfortunate thing is that now the people will have to pay.

Hopefully, over the next few weeks and few months we will be able to demonstrate to Canadians that there are many of us who still believe in this country, who still believe in a strong central government, and that not everybody will buy the approach that this government has taken through the back door of fiscal policy and through budget processes and estimates to demonstrate what it was not able to say up front, that it supports that view of Canada where all the national government does is manage the debt, take care of national defence, and be responsible for currency.

I think the people of Canada ask and demand a great deal more than that. I expect that the Government of Canada will find that pitting provinces against the federal government, pitting public servants one against the other, will not be a very appropriate or acceptable way for it to continue to mismanage the affairs of this country.

• (1210)

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity, but I cannot say I am particularly happy with this opportunity, because I do not think there is anything in either this budget or in these estimates to make any Canadian happy. I could stand here, I suppose, and say amen to most of the remarks made by my friend from Acadie—Bathurst, but that would not be in the tradition of the House, so consequently I will add a few points.

First of all, I want to say that the estimates, which were tabled in the House today, were put there for the enlightenment not only of members of Parliament but also for the enlightenment of the people of Canada. They should do that. If you take a look at them, you will find they do a considerable amount of confusing rather than enlightening. For instance, there are several neat rows of figures which add up to a particular amount which are said to be the estimates of the Government of Canada. However, last year's Main Estimates which are listed there do not include any Supplementary Estimates, and consequently are incorrect for a good portion of the departments.

If you wish to compare them to the 1991-92 Main Estimates, these estimates do not include a number of commitments made, restraints in some cases and increases in other cases, in the budget just a few days ago. When you have 1991-92 Main Estimates which are also listed and which are also incorrect, these estimates do as much to confuse as they do to enlighten the people of Canada.

As I said before, we have a document with two neat rows of figures, both incorrect. Surely a government that spends as much money as it does on keeping track of funds could do better than that in providing the kind of document that would make it back to the people and to members of Parliament.

There is in this document another confusing element. That is the fact that there is a very sneaky way of reducing payments in any particular year and reducing the amount of money in a particular year. If you look at these estimates, you will find for instance that a certain amount of money is designated over five years. In the budget the other day this was extended to six years.

However, the figures in the estimates are still those of the five-year program and consequently are also incorrect. But enough about the incorrect part of these estimates.

There are a number of things in the estimates which need to be discussed. First, there is a real attempt in here, a real direction as far as the government is concerned, to move away from person years. This has been recognized as a concern in the public accounts committee and other groups in Parliament, both on the government side and on the opposition side, of recognizing some concern with the establishment of person years as a method of controlling expenditure. But what the government is doing here now is not reducing the control of expenditures by moving away from person years. What it is doing is establishing a method of privatization which is in the process, or may in the process eliminate, as it has suggested itself, as many as 6,000 jobs, which was threatened in the budget speech. This move away from person years gives the government an opportunity to move into more contracting out.

In the past, when asked, the government has been unable to justify contracting out as a method of saving money, that in fact many senior civil servants consider it more costly than in-house operations, as well as more inefficient. They say this because when somebody is contracted, you have to teach them what they are supposed to do. After the contract is through, you have to fit what they have done into your program. You as the manager in a particular department have to designate people to do that kind of work. It may take as much time as the contract took to get it back into the situation where it is worth while. In the end, you have paid more money for the operation than you would have if you had had the job done in-house.

The minister said in his speech: "Should a new agreement not be reached by the time the current policy expires March 31, 1991, the Government will introduce legislation confirming the right to contract out. This will eliminate any barriers to contracting out that may now exist".

This really is a new wrinkle in labour relations.

An hon. member: Union busting.

Mr. Hovdebo: The government is going to pass legislation to make sure that the union cannot take action because there will already be legislation in place giving it the authority to eliminate their jobs. That is another factor of contracting out I think we should look at because we know from experience that contracting out by this government has been another way of patronage to its friends. If you increase the amount of contracting out what you are able to do is pay more of your friends for their support.

There is another concern in this process of legislation and reduction of civil servants. The minister said in the budget speech the day before yesterday that there is going to be a trade-off between wages and job losses. As my colleague from Acadie—Bathurst indicated, this pits one employee against the other. It affects the morale of the departments, the morale of the Public Service considerably and it is a way of inviting labour unrest rather than making for people who will work hard and effectively for the government and for the people of Canada.

It is very interesting also that in the minister's speech he indicates that the government House leader and vice-chairman of the Treasury Board will lead the review of the current spending of grants and contributions. In other words, he will take charge of the review of the grants and contributions. That covers every department of the government. Every department contributes a certain amount to organizations that are involved in their particular area. It covers every department and it is a major factor out there of the outreach of the Canadian government to the people of Canada: heritage grants, grants to exhibitions. This is the main contact between the Government of Canada and the people on the street.

It is given to a minister who is going to review it, and he is going to take into account the government priorities.

• (1220)

He is going to improve targeting, promote self-reliance, and reduce overlap. It sounds very good, but this sounds like a way to punish those who do not agree with government policies. That is what was done the last time there was a reduction in grants and contributions. We remember the impact on newspapers, on communications from native groups. It is a way to punish the people who do not agree with the government. Or, is it a method of providing further patronage to one's friends?

One thing that this government is obviously working toward is that in the third year of the government we need some money to expend. I can remember back in the old Liberal days when the senator from Saskatchewan, Hazen Argue, had a considerable slush fund that he used around Saskatchewan, which did not work out particularly well because they elected no members.

However, the development of a slush fund is also part of this government's approach to these estimates. For instance, there is the slush fund of $3.3 billion, which is designated as such. It is a reserve, with nothing attached to it.

Mr. Milliken: Does it say slush fund in the estimates?

Mr. Hovdebo: Not quite, but it could be; it might say slush fund if one interprets it right. It is there, but besides that there is a number of areas in which the government has funds available.

In forestry, there was a 7 per cent cut across the board, but several agreements have not been put in place. The government is going to make these agreements and then is going to have to go to this $3.3 billion slush fund to find funds to support that forestry development.

In the budget speech the minister indicated a $1.2 billion amount of money for agriculture. It does not appear in the estimates. GRIP and NISA, which people from the west and from the agricultural community will recognize, are not mentioned in the estimates. In the budget speech, $1.2 billion was set aside for agriculture but was not designated for GRIP and NISA.

Therefore, it is there as a slush fund, to buy votes, if you wish, by this government, or to buy votes for a provincial government, as we have had a certain amount of experience with in the past. In B.C., the forestry funds are leading up to the B.C. election; in Saskatchewan, the funds for agriculture from this government are leading up to an election in Saskatchewan.

Let's take a look at the impact of UI. There was a $3.1 billion saving by pulling out of UI, by Bill C-21. They have taken all this money out of the department, and they have taken it out this way: $20.7 million from labour development, $100 million out of the Canadian Jobs Strategy.

If one did not know the priorities of this government before now, one should be able to get a bit of an inkling by this. Who are they worried about? To whom is this budget directed? Whom is it supposed to help? Obviously, not the workers.

What the workers are getting is increased premiums. If they lose their jobs, they are going to get less training and generally less concern for job development across the country. When they got out of the UI operation a while ago, the Minister of Finance said that the government would cover the shortages in the UI fund.

What happened? In this budget, in this particular instance, he has increased the premiums to make up for any shortages within the fund.

Again, the workers are not being helped by this budget in any way. The cost of unemployment insurance is up 55 cents per $100 of insurable earnings. If they spend half of it on goods and services, it will be 3.5 per cent. Inflation is still up around 5 per cent. CPP payments are being increased. There is nothing in here that would indicate that we should be happy with this budget.

There is no doubt that the priorities of the government show through every area, even where it has proclaimed increases in expenditure. There has been a deliberate move to downgrade services to people. There is a total abdication of the government role of services to Canadians. The tax on medicare via reduced payments to the provinces, the tax on the unemployed by a reduction of training and services, the tax on the workers by UI premiums, GST, CPP increases, continuing inflation and wage restraints, the tax on small business with the GST and UI, and the withdrawal of training from jobs—all these are reducing the impact of government on assisting and making life more bearable for a large number of Canadians.

As need grows, the commitment of government reigns and goes where it will help the multinational corporations make more.

I hope that the committees are able to deal with these estimates. Some of them have not met for a considerable length of time. This is not a people's budget and it is confirmed by these estimates. We should not have expected anything different, because this is not a people's government.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

TABLING OF TWELFTH REPORT ON ACTIVITIES OF CANADIAN SECTION OF AIPLF

Hon. Andrée Champagne (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34, I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the twelfth report on the activities of the International Assembly of French-speaking Parliamentarians.

The report refers to a meeting of the Bureau de la Commission politique et de l'administration générale, held in Paris from December 7 to December 9, 1990.

The purpose of this meeting was to review the way contributions are calculated.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

BUDGET DEBATE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions, and I believe you will find consent for the following motion:

> That, notwithstanding any standing order or practice of this House, the House meet at one o'clock p.m., Monday, March 4, 1991, to resume debate on Government Order Ways and Means Proceedings No. 18, in the name of the Minister of Finance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to

PETITIONS

GULF WAR

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and pleasure to present a petition, in accordance with Standing Order 36, from more than 300 people, residents of Toronto and Montreal.

They respectfully call upon Parliament to declare its absolute commitment to a peaceful resolution of the Middle East conflict, to oppose any offensive military actions against Iraq, to withdraw Canadian forces from the region, and to use our tax dollars for useful social programs such as child care, pensions, health care and education, and not for military bunkers in the Middle East.

I have another petition from over 270 persons in Toronto and other parts of Ontario, who condemn this war and Canada's involvement in an offensive military action against Iraq.

They urge our government to disengage our troops from the theatre of war and to redeploy them where possible for humanitarian and medical purposes under United Nations auspices.

• (1230)

They also urge our government to take all possible measures at the United Nations and elsewhere to bring this tragic war to an immediate end and restore peace to the region through an international peace conference on the Middle East.

Further, Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from a number of residents of many parts of Canada who point out that the overwhelming weight of informed opinion is that economic sanctions and political pressure need more time to work against Iraq.

The petition was completed in January, but of course it was not possible to introduce it before the present time. They also point out that Canada should have a vital role to play as a peacemaker in that region.

Therefore, the petitioners ask the government to use all means available to encourage UN member states to give sanctions a chance to work and to refrain from offensive military action against Iraq.

They further ask that the government not commit Canadian Armed Forces to offensive action against Iraq.

URANIUM MINING

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and privilege to rise to present two petitions signed by people from Saskatoon, St. Brieux, and Fort Qu'Appelle, Saskatchewan, and from Waterdown, Hamilton, St. Catharines, and other locations in Ontario.

These people are very concerned by the regulatory meltdown which led to the spill of 2 million litres of contaminated waste into Wollaston Lake in 1989. They are appalled that the Eagle Point mine is proceeding under the same Wollaston Lake without the proper public hearings ever being held.

Therefore, the petitioners are calling on Parliament to convene immediately a comprehensive, independent, public inquiry into uranium mining in northern Saskatchewan and northern Canada, which effectively involves aboriginal people and northerners.

They are also calling on this government to halt development of that Eagle Point mine until the proper public hearings have been held.

RURAL CANADIANS

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I have two sets of petitions to present.

The first petition is from a group of people from Humboldt, Saskatchewan, who call on Parliament to support Canada's rural way of life by immediately implementing new economic and social policies to enable rural Canadians to work and live in their communities while still being able to provide a decent quality of life for their families.

CANADA POST

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I have a second series of petitions from the people of Munster.

This is the second group of petitions I have had from Munster. They are pleading with the government to keep the kind of post office they have at the moment.

The petitioners humbly pray to ensure that Canada Post operated rural post office remains intact, with the permanent postmaster/postmistress and staff personnel in the town of Munster.

They so pray and ask the government to take this message to the Canada Post Corporation so that it can maintain the kind of post office they need in the town of Munster.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure today to rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition from a good number of people from all over Canada: from Alberta, Saskatchewan, and British Columbia.

Although cuts have been made to VIA Rail, people are still concerned over those cuts given the thrust toward new environmental awareness and whatnot. These petitioners are concerned about the cuts that the government has made. They are calling upon Parliament to maintain VIA Rail, Canada's national network.

They are asking further that the service of VIA Rail be upgraded with new equipment, and that VIA Rail be given a sufficient budget to maintain its national mandate for passenger service.

These people, as I do, see VIA Rail as part of what is necessary in keeping Canada together as a unified and united country.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I too have a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36, and it has been certified as correct.

This petition comes from many Canadians all across Canada. Whereas the railway services carried on by VIA Rail is an essential means of transportation for many Canadians, whereas the Government of Canada has announced the cuts of $400 million over five years in its operating grants to VIA Rail, they are urging the government to maintain this essential service and to get back into the transportation of people across Canada in a more efficient and orderly manner.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, if Question No. 426 could be made an Order for Return, this return would be tabled immediately.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House that Question No. 426 be deemed to have been made an Order for Return.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

STORING WASTE FROM NUCLEAR FUELS

*Question No. 443—Mr. Saint-Julien:

Since 1977, have Atomic Energy of Canada and Environment Canada had Canadian universities and/or other academic institutions carry out studies, research or visits north of the 49th parallel in Quebec, for the purpose of storing waste from nuclear fuels, and, if so, and for each organization (a) how many studies have been undertaken (b) what are the titles of the studies (c) how many visits were made (d) what areas were visited e) by how many Canadian universities and academic institutions (f) which ones?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Insofar as Environment Canada is concerned:

No Canadian universities and/or other academic institutions have carried out studies, research, or visits north of the 49th parallel in Quebec since 1977, at Environment Canada's request, for the purpose of storing waste from nuclear fuels.

Insofar as Atomic Energy of Canada Limited is concerned:

No, AECL has not had Canadian universities and/or academic institutions carry out studies, research or visits north of the 49th parallel in Quebec for the purpose of storing waste from nuclear fuels.

However, following the inception of a study by researchers at the University of Waterloo under NSERC (Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council of Canada) funding on the subject of saline groundwaters originating from the Canadian Shield, AECL contributed funding to the University for the collection of water samples from five operating mines for geochemical analysis. The information obtained through these samplings would allow a greater understanding of the geochemical characteristics of deep groundwaters from the entire Canadian Shield and, as such, would be useful, in generic terms, to the Canadian Nuclear Waste Management Program. The dates and locations of samplings taken by the University of Waterloo are as follows:

Location	Date Sampled
Sigma Mines Val d'Or, Quebec	June, 1984
Lamaque-Teck Corp. Val d'Or, Quebec	June, 1984
Selbaire Mines Joutel, Quebec	August, 1985
Matagami Mine Matagami, Quebec	February, 1985 July, 1985
Norita Mine Matagami, Quebec	February, 1985 July, 1985

STORING WASTE FROM NUCLEAR FUELS

*Question No. 444—Mr. Saint-Julien:

Since 1977, have Energy Mines and Resources, Atomic Energy of Canada or Environment Canada carried out studies, research or visits north of the 49th parallel in Quebec, for the purpose of storing waste from nuclear fuels, and, if so, and for each Department (a) how many studies have been undertaken (b) what are the titles of the studies (c) how many visits were made (d) what areas were visited?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am informed by the Departments of Energy, Mines and Resources and Environment and the Atomic Energy of Canada as follows:

No studies, research or visits north of the 49th parallel in Quebec, for the purpose of storing waste from nuclear fuels, have taken place since 1977.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON JUSTICE AND THE SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, given that I had begun to address the matter earlier today, I will not belabour the items that I raised at that time. I will continue roughly where I left off.

I would point out that following discussions with colleagues opposite I will delete from my remarks a number of factual items that perhaps, while relevant, may be seen by some to be collateral and not directly on a point in making a prima facie case.

I want first to refer the Chair—and I am sure I have no need to do it in detail—to precisely what we mean here when we are talking about privilege. I will make a number of references. I will not read all the materials, but I will cite them.

The first item would be the definition of privilege which has been read in this House many times and cited. I would just refer to two parts of it: that is that the privilege is the sum of the peculiar rights enjoyed by each House collectively as a constituent part of the High Court of Parliament, and the last portion which states:

> —privilege, though part of the law of the land, is to a certain extent an exemption from the ordinary law.

I will refer to that later. That citation is from Beauchesne's and is also contained in the current document called Privilege in the Modern Context published by the House.

The second item I want to refer to is the particular right as one of the rights and privileges that I address here. That specific right is the right to institute inquiries, call witnesses and demand papers. That is a collective right of Parliament and its committees. That right is listed as one of a number of rights also at page 2 of the document Privilege in the Modern Context.

The particular right breached is the right to obtain information through committee orders. I note a second citation in Erskine May, page 69, twentieth edition, where he states that:

> When any of these rights and immunities is disregarded or attacked, the offence is called a breach of privilege—

I maintain that the failure or inability of the minister, in a manner that I will refer to later, is a disregard of that right.

• (1240)

I would also refer to section 18 of the Constitution Act 1867 which codifies, generally, the rights and privileges of Parliament as we knew them in 1867, Sections 5 and 6 of the Parliament of Canada Act which restates them, and section 108 of the Standing Orders which provides the existing codification of the mandate of the House and its committees. I will not read them into the record.

I would point out that in all of these there are no restrictions on the right of Parliament in committees to obtain information other than the limiting subsection referred to in the Parliament of Canada Act and the Constitution which confines those rights and privileges to those existing in 1867 and it is not to go beyond those.

I had hoped to cite a reference—it will take up too much of the House's time given my earlier discussions—of an unfortunate individual in the British Parliament named Mr. Lee who, in the year—roughly 1704—had failed to comply with an order of a committee and was taken into custody by the Sergeant-at-Arms and brought to the House. I will resist the anecdotal recital of that, as amusing as it might be.

My obligation here is to show you a prima facie case that the right and privilege has been breached. The standard I must achieve is not that of beyond a balance of probability, nor is it beyond a reasonable doubt, it is simply a prima facie case and there may, in fact, be justification, as will be put forward as I hope the procedure will evolve here.

The facts on which the claim is based originated in June of 1987 when an inmate of the Edmonton Institution escaped. Following that, the Commissioner of Corrections commissioned a report pursuant to section 14 of the Penitentiaries Act. In December 1989, the report was tendered to the Corrections Commissioner and the report was made public. However, there were portions of the report deleted. There were deletions of pages and paragraphs and two of the conclusions and recommendations in that report were deleted.

In May 1990, the Standing Committee for Justice and the Solicitor General were reviewing the mandatory supervision provisions of the Parole Act and asked for an unexpurgated copy of that report, which has become known as the Weir report. At the same time, the committee asked for an unexpurgated copy of what has become known as the Légère report, a report which dealt with an escape of an inmate in New Brunswick.

In our request for these documents, the committee was unsuccessful. On December 4, in the face of the refusal or inability of the Solicitor General to provide the requested unexpurgated version, the committee formally ordered that the Solicitor General provide this report. I believe I should read that particular order into the record at this time. It reads:

> That pursuant to the Committee's own mandate, the Committee order the production before it of the uncensored version of the reports to Correctional Service Canada by one, Mr. Weir, governing the escape of Daniel Gingras in the province of Alberta and, two, by the Board of Investigations concerning an offender (Allan Légère) unlawfully at large in the Province of New Brunswick, pursuant to—

And here we have the recital of the statutes I had earlier brought to your attention.

> —and that the documents be delivered within seven days of the date of this order.

The Solicitor General was not able to comply.

I have with me, and it may be appropriate to table, the written reply of the Solicitor General to the order of the committee. He states that he has carefully reviewed the motion and the request for copies in each case without deletions. He recites a section of the Privacy Act and states:

> With regret, I must conclude that the public interest does not outweigh the invasion of privacy which would result from a release of the unedited copies of these reports.

In the case of both reports the conclusions, the reasons, and most of the supporting testimony have already been made public.

Mr. Speaker: I ask the courtesy of the hon. member to let me intervene for a moment on another matter.

I would like to make it very clear that in the mind of the Chair, we are in Government Orders. That will have some consequences, perhaps, at one o'clock and I just want to make that very clear to the House. Would the hon. member please continue.

Mr. Lee: Mr. Speaker, following that reply of the Solicitor General the committee reported to the House of Commons with the seventh report of the committee.

I wish to match those facts with the law stated earlier. In the face of that clear order of the committee which was properly and effectively delivered to the Solicitor General, and in the face of clearly defined rights and privileges of the House, often referred to as the undoubted rights and privileges, the Solicitor General has declined to comply with that order, contrary to the will and wishes of that committee.

Now the Solicitor General has stated that he is prevented from complying because of provisions of the Privacy Act.

The House has therefore been blocked in the completing and the carrying out of its work. We in the committee, collectively and individually, are being denied the information we need as legislators to do our job.

The matter has been discussed with the Privacy Commissioner and I feel that the Privacy Commissioner as he then was, Mr. John Grace, should be noted here because he has commented and on May 24, 1990, a very short quote in a reply to a question from our colleague, Mr. Rideout, Mr. Grace says: "And if a legislator cannot see it, my goodness, who is seeing it?"

That is cited from the minutes of the justice and solicitor general committee on May 24, 1990.

I will not review the provisions of the Privacy Act. I do not believe they are necessary to the making of the case here, but I will refer to one thing and that is this: Although I am of the firm view that the Privacy Act does not derogate from the rights and privileges of Parliament, some may argue that it does. I have heard the argument and I believe, although I will not attempt to characterize what the Solicitor General's view is on this, that he is attempting to confront the issue reasonably. In any event if someone were to suggest that the Privacy Act did, I want to point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that the Privacy Act does not mention Parliament in any of its rights and privileges, and it does not attempt to bind Parliament in the restrictions that it places as part of the general law of the land.

It does however place restrictions; actually it gives rights to certain groups and institutions as courts and investigators. They are specifically given rights to override the restrictions of the Privacy Act. Parliament is not referred to in the act other than a reference to the right or ability of a member of Parliament to obtain personal information where he or she is acting on behalf of a constituent.

I want to refer you, Mr. Speaker, to the element I raised earlier in the definition of privilege and the section which states that privilege, though part of the law of the land, is to a certain extent an exemption from the ordinary law. I commend to you that concept in viewing the effect of the application of the Privacy Act in this.

This is not a partisan approach to this issue. Although many Canadians see the House of Commons from time to time being very partisan, this is apparently not. The committee was unanimous in its order and there have been a number of discussions between members on this side and members opposite in connection with this. All parties have participated in good faith in those discussions.

It is my view that this motion I make to you today is an assertion of the rights of everyone who put us here in this Parliament.

There are three other quick points I would like to leave with you because I believe they are relevant and will assist you in reaching your decision.

If the committees, as now structured, do fail in their ability to obtain information in the manner that has transpired here, then the committees will fail in doing their work. If the justice committee fails, then other committees will also similarly come up short.

Second, if this is a contest between the rights and privileges of Parliament and the obligations of members of the government—that would be ministers in this House, or let us simply speak of the executive branch of government—if it is a conflict between the rights and privileges of Parliament and the executive branch of government then you, respectfully, Mr. Speaker, have a duty—and I know you understand this—to uphold the rights, privileges and powers of Parliament in the face of that.

Third, if you do find that there has been a prima facie case made that the collective rights and privileges of members of this House have been breached in this instance on the facts of this case, then I am prepared to move to an appropriate motion. However, I would ask that the Chair allow 24 hours, a day, that would permit me and others, including the chair of the justice committee to consult with the House leaders, the committee chairs, and the Solicitor General in constructing a motion that would serve the needs of Parliament and all of the members of the House.

Mr. Speaker, unless you wish me to, I will not address the conceptual issue of the difference between a procedural motion for concurrence and the privilege claim that I make here today. If you wish me to, I could do it very shortly, and it might assist.

Mr. Speaker: First of all, I want to say to hon. members, and also to the public, this is one of the finest arguments that has been presented to me in my years as Speaker.

I want to say to all hon. members on both sides of the House that I am very aware that this matter is being brought to me after a great deal of co-operative discussion among many members.

I accept very much the invitation of the hon. member to get into a further stage of the discussion. However, if I am reading correctly the hon. member's remarks, it is not necessary at this time. I would ask the hon. member perhaps to conclude and I will then hear the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Lee: Mr. Speaker, it would only be necessary for me to address this in the event that you felt there was a conflict between that procedure and the privilege procedure. If I might, for the sake of the 30 seconds it might take, I think I will address that.

There was some thought among members and staff here—

Mr. Speaker: I cannot help but intervene by saying that if we get to that point, I will certainly give you more than 30 seconds.

Mr. Lee: Well then, I will pass on that in the hope that if further argument is required, I will have an opportunity to address that.

To conclude very briefly, the order of the justice committee on December 4 was a valid, subsisting, uncomplied with order. The order materialized or crystallized a right of all members of this House: a right to obtain information, a right to require production of papers. The right to require that, to achieve that objective, has been breached by the failure of the Solicitor General of Canada to provide the information that was clearly, specifically outlined in the order.

The failure to do it in the way that was cited earlier in the quotation from Erskine May, and I will just note it very quickly: "That when any of these rights and immunities is disregarded or attacked the offence is called a breach of privilege and it punishable—" et cetera. We are not into punishment here. We want to resolve a conflict.

In my view it is clear that the right is there, the privilege is there. The breach occurred, it is unrectified and that you, Mr. Speaker, must find that there has been a breach of privilege, and if I may use the term, collective privilege because it is not my privilege alone, it is the privilege of every member on that committee. That has been breached and the House must deal with that breach.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I too want to add to your compliments to the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River on a very, very thoughtful and well-done argument.

I have had the privilege over the last 11 years of participating in several points of privilege and order. I have to say that the hon. member has made one of the best and more thoughtful arguments that I have heard in some time. I do want to compliment him on that.

Having just said that, I do also want to say that I do not agree with him. He has made a good case but I do not think, in this particular case, that he does have a point of privilege.

I want to come back to that in a couple of moments. But I want to address what I think is the issue here. We really have two conflicting issues that put the House, the committee and the members of this House and I guess to a certain degree the Chair as a result of this point of privilege, in a difficult spot.

The conflict is this. First of all, we have a committee pursuing a subject in which the committee has a great deal of interest. They have pursued it with diligence. They have done a lot of work on the issue. They have come up with a report, or I will describe it as a report, an order in the end, and that is what this House is then seized with.

None of us in this House argue with that process. In fact, we consider that a fundamental part of our parliamentary procedures and therefore, we want to support that tradition, we want to encourage that tradition. We do not want in any way, if possible, to limit the powers of committees. We see them as absolutely fundamental to our process of government and to democracy, as we see it, in this country. That is the first part of this issue.

The second part of the issue, and the one that causes us the difficulty, is that this particular committee has made a request of a minister for a document. Unfortunately, the minister is faced with a difficulty in complying. I think the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River put the right tone on that when he indicated that it was for the minister a difficulty. It was not as though he was trying to be obstructive or difficult with the committee. In fact, all of the signals I have received is that he would like to comply but he is in a difficult situation.

• (1300)

What is that difficult situation? The difficulty is that he has legal advice—which is an interpretation coming out of the Privacy Act—that in fact if he were to respond to this particular request of the committee, he would be in violation of the law and of the Privacy Act.

Of course, any time there is legal argument, there are always two sides, or we would not have a court case; we would simply throw it out of court and it would be decided there.

But in this case, I think we all agree that we are up against legal advice, which certainly appears to be sound legal advice, legal advice which may be debatable but nevertheless is advice that I think all of us would argue has the right to at least have a hearing. It is sufficiently strong advice that it cannot be ignored.

That is the conflict we are faced with. We are faced with a situation where all of us want to see the committee succeed in its work, and support the concepts of committees having the right to information, the right to pursue a subject unfettered. At the same time we then have another principle which we support, that being that we, as parliamentarians, whether we are backbenchers or ministers of the Crown, are not above the law. We have to comply with the law.

I do not agree that the member has a point of privilege. I do not think I have to go into a lot of argument about that, because most of us would agree that in fact he does not have a point of privilege. He certainly has a point of order, and he has a point of grievance or concern, which I think he has demonstrated and argued very well in the House. But he does not have a point of privilege.

As you know, when there is a concern arising out of a committee, there is a fixed process according to our Standing Orders—Standing Order 117 being the one that I think is operative—that prescribes for the committee a particular process by which this House is seized with the issue.

So, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe he has a prima facie case of privilege. As I said, he makes a very valid argument, one that I think is fundamental to those of us as members specifically, to those of us as members generally, and certainly to the House and its traditions.

I would therefore put before you what I think would be a reasonable suggestion, one that I hope the hon. member will accept and I think other members of the House will accept; that is, that we refer the issue of the committee's right to pursue information—and the concern that the minister has, were he to comply with the request of the committee—to our Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections and Procedures, and that that committee have an opportunity to examine the issue, to report back to this House, and to then not only pursue an issue that is of great philosophical importance to us but also of practical purpose in this particular circumstance.

Therefore, I think that would provide for the House a resolution to a difficult conflict. That having failed, we have no choice. What do we as a House have left to us? We are then faced with a concurrence motion. Of course that puts all members of this House in a very difficult position of how one would vote on a concurrence motion, because we are up against two concepts, two principles, two fundamental values that we see as being important. I think it puts the members and the House in a very uncomfortable and awkward position.

I think the best way to handle it, therefore, would be to refer the issue that my friend from Scarborough—Rouge River raised—and as I said earlier, raised very well—to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. That would give us an opportunity to pursue it, to have a look at it, and to give some advice to this House.

Mr. Speaker: We are witnessing today some extraordinarily thoughtful and good arguments. I thank the hon. parliamentary secretary.

I notice that there are others who wish to rise. I will recognize now the hon. member for Edmonton East.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I rise briefly to bring to the Speaker's attention a couple of matters of which he may not be aware.

I was not able to hear the argument of the hon. member who raised the point in its entirety but rather only the end of it. That reference was made to Beauchesne's citation No. 625 on page 198 of the fifth edition where it is noted:

> (1) Committees may send for any papers that are relevant to their Orders of Reference.

Further, I assume, reference was made to citation No. 626(1) on page 199, where the only stated condition on that is noted and it would seem, in my submission at least, not to be pertinent here.

I was a bit surprised to hear the hon. member opposite who just spoke refer to Standing Order 117, which is a Standing Order governing the maintenance of decorum in committees. I do not know that that is directly pertinent in this instance.

However, the other matter that I would wish to bring to the Speaker's attention is that the document over which this is all being carried on has in some senses already been made public. That was done in the edition of the Edmonton Journal of Saturday, January 6, 1990, in which excerpts from the so-called Weir report were published including sections of that report which were expurgated in the copies of the report forwarded by the minister to the standing committee. I do not know that that will bear directly on the Speaker's decision in this regard, but I would note that that being the case, it leaves members in the awkward situation, especially members of the committee—and I would note, Mr. Speaker, that I was present and voting at the committee on the day the unanimous decision to seek the unexpurgated report was made—of having to rely on reports in a newspaper for the full story of what I think by any reasonable person must be seen as the legitimate contention that the committee ought to have available to itself in the normal conduct of its work.

That that continues not to be the case is I would suggest correctly identified by the member who raised the matter as a matter of privilege.

I sympathize with the Solicitor General in his difficulties, at least his apparent difficulties, under the Privacy Act—

Mr. Speaker: I am going to certainly allow the hon. member for Edmonton East to continue. In the interest of making sure that all hon. members know some of the background of this, it was my understanding, and I stand to be corrected, if necessary, that whatever appeared in the press was not done so as a consequence of the minister releasing any information. Would the hon. member affirm that, if that is the case, because I think that is very important in this matter.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, to the very best of my knowledge that is in fact the case. The reporter who authored the story that included the excerpts from the report never did identify the source through which he received a copy of that report, but I feel safe in assuming it was not the minister, for some fairly obvious reasons.

Mr. Speaker: The reason I intervene on that point is that if a minister had revealed information at one point and then took a position later to not give the information to a committee, it might make quite a difference to the position of the Chair in having to rule on the circumstances. I thank the hon. member for clarifying that particular matter.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Of course, were that the case, the matter would be much clearer than unfortunately it is.

I would just like to note that I cannot believe that it was the intention of Parliament in establishing the acts and regulations under which the Privacy Commissioner pursues his or her duties thereby to constrict in any way the privileges enjoyed by this Parliament. Therefore, in this instance, even if it is established that there is a conflict, I would suggest that as the servant of this House, Mr. Speaker, you must in defending the rights and privileges of this House rule that privilege holds sway in this instance.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, perhaps the hon. member could help the Chair.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to make a very brief intervention which is really consequent on the excellent one by the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River in presenting his case. I wanted to comment on the parliamentary secretary for his very thoughtful remarks, but I had a couple of comments on them and there are two aspects that surprised me and I thought in dealing with your Honour's decision on this matter you might want to consider this point.

• (1310)

It surprised me that the hon. parliamentary secretary argued that the question of the propriety of the minister delivering the report was an issue. It seems to me that the committees of this House and the House itself have certain powers of a court and courts clearly have jurisdiction in respect to the Privacy Act to receive documents that may be otherwise protected under that act and determine whether the documents in fact should be made public.

It seems to me that a committee of this House must have similar powers. It was, after all, a statute passed by this House that created this act. Parliament has the residual powers of a court for certain purposes. It has power to examine witnesses and call for production of papers and those powers have been an inherent jurisdiction of this House and of its committees from time immemorial. It is one of the privileges of the House to be able to exercise that jurisdiction, in effect the jurisdiction of a court.

The committees of the House are creatures of the House and have similar powers, and I am surprised to hear the parliamentary secretary arguing otherwise. I leave it at that.

The second aspect of his remarks which I think deserves comment was his suggestion that the issue of the propriety of the minister complying with the committee's request be referred to another committee.

Certainly as a member of the privileges and elections committee I would be more than happy to embark on such a study because it seems to me that it is an interesting point if, in fact, he is right on his first one, that somehow the committee lacks jurisdiction to make the determination that a court could make.

If he would like the issue studied, it could be studied there or by the committee that has already done so much work on this issue in dealing with this matter, and I am happy to support that part of the suggestion if your Honour feels it is necessary. But my argument is that I do not believe it is necessary for the minister to be concerned about the propriety of him making the release to a parliamentary committee.

Similarly, he should not be concerned and I am sure he would not be if he were releasing this document to a court of law at the order of the court. I do not know why the request of a parliamentary committee should be treated any differently than the order of a court, and I am surprised to hear the parliamentary secretary suggest otherwise.

I invite your Honour to look at the origins of parliamentary privilege, to look at the juridical basis for them and the similarity between the privileges of Parliament and the inherent jurisdiction of a Superior Court and determine whether that jurisdiction exists. I think it follows that this document should be produced.

Mr. Speaker: I began by complimenting the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River and thanked the parliamentary secretary for his thoughtful contribution. I extend the same compliments to the hon. member for Edmonton East and the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

I think a suggestion has been made which I would like to ask the House if it would be prepared to concur in, a suggestion made by the parliamentary secretary that the matter be referred to the committee of privileges and elections.

It would seem that this might be an appropriate way to resolve this without putting the Speaker in a position where I have to rule on what is clearly a very difficult case. If I were to decide that there were a prima facie case on the basis of the eloquent arguments of the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River, that is if the House supported my notion that there was a prima facie case, it would go to that committee.

We have a suggestion in front of us, and it seems to me very sensible, from the hon. parliamentary secretary from the government side that if there were a disposition of the House to put it in front of that committee that we allow it to go there. In a moment I am going to ask the House if the House will agree to that.

I want to make it very clear that this is a very difficult issue indeed. The subject matter is the release of a person in custody who, during that time of release, overpowered a guard and committed another crime; a matter that strikes right to the fundamentals of our system of justice.

This is a matter of very intense importance. On the other hand, as the parliamentary secretary has pointed out, the Solicitor General is in a dilemma because of an act of this House.

As Speaker, I am not in a position to rule on the interpretation of an act of this House. I am confined to the question of privilege.

The hon. member for Shefford has just joined us, and I hope that he has been able to have been following this difficult, but I think intensely important, matter. He is a member of the House with many years standing, and he might very well want to discuss with his colleagues the general suggestion made by the parliamentary secretary.

If the hon. member for Shefford would like any more time, I would of course extend that to him. He indicates to me that that is not necessary.

I think the appropriate thing to do at the moment is to put to the House the suggestion of the parliamentary secretary which seems to the Chair to be a very sensible one and that this matter be moved by unanimous consent to the appropriate committee.

Is that agreed?

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Is there any discussion on the proposed motion?

Mr. Speaker: It is not a motion. I am asking for consent to proceed to put this matter to the committee. It was suggested by the parliamentary secretary. I happen to know there have been discussions that preceded this in the best tradition of this place.

It is not a question of debate. I have to put the recommendation to the House. If there is a question of clarification, then I would, of course, want to hear it.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): On that point of clarification, Mr. Speaker, I do not see the difference between whether it goes to the member's committee or the existing committee because I think you are taking away powers of the committee.

The reason I say that is that it could go in camera and discuss any document with the idea that it would not go outside of that. I have seen it done when there were international negotiations and when there are other things. It goes into in camera without press, without anything, just for the information of the members of the committee.

As you take away more and more powers of a member of Parliament—I say this in all honesty because for the first time in my life, I had to send five dollars to get access to information because I wanted it within a month and not within a year from the date of the letter.

As our rights here become more and more infringed upon by some ministers who will not answer letters for a year or six months, I feel that Canadians have a right, through their elected representatives, to have access, at least in committee if the committees are meeting, to the business before that committee.

Second, it was in the press, so outside people had access to it that members of Parliament do not have. I just think that if the committee itself is not going to be able to deal with this in camera then I am sure that we can debate it forever before another committee or with a time limit.

It will just cut back on some of our rights as members of Parliament because majorities are in these committees. You, Mr. Speaker, have a right to guard all members of Parliament's access.

I think that whatever happens out of this, we will be watching to see how much the rights of members of Parliament will be infringed upon in access to information.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for South West Nova for her intervention. She is a member who has been here for many years, and I cannot quarrel with much of her thesis.

• (1320)

What we are dealing with here is a very difficult situation. The minister has received advice as a consequence of an act of this House. If that advice is correct, he is put in the position where he says, by law, he cannot give this information. This is the kind of dilemma that ought to be deliberated upon by a committee of this House, because out of that deliberation may come a solution to the problem.

But clearly there is a dilemma. There is no difference of opinion in the Chamber as to the necessity to resolve this dilemma, and there has been the clearest understanding on both sides of just what it is we are facing.

The suggestion has been made, and I sense agreement in the House. Having taken into account the remarks which the member for South West Nova has made, with which I cannot quarrel, what we now have is an opportunity, by consent, to put this matter in the committee that it would go to if it were debated and voted upon in the House, in any event.

It seems to me a very sensible way to try to deal with what is a very difficult problem and a matter, by the way, which the public is very much aware of.

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to ask this question on clarification.

If we agreed unanimously, Mr. Speaker, to your suggestion, which I think has has a lot of merit in one respect, that we would end up there anyway, as you said. But what happens if in the next two or three weeks we prorogue and the committees are disbanded? The justice committee has worked on this issue since 1988. We have had endless witnesses on it, as late as last week again. What happens in this committee that we are referring it to if prorogation occurs in the next month?

Mr. Speaker: I was going to answer immediately, but I thought that under the circumstances it would be best if I asked for some counsel on this.

I think it is very clear that the matter would, for all practical purposes, die if the House prorogues, if the government should prorogue the House. But that is going to happen whether I put to the House that there is a prima facie case of privilege and the House supports that. It will happen, in any event.

Just to be absolutely certain that we all understand what we are doing, that of course does not mean that the matter cannot be raised again when the House comes back into session. Of course it can. The issue does not go away. The proceedings are nullified because they were in the last session, but it can all be raised again; it can be brought right back to me the day that the government decides to bring the House back, if it prorogues, with a throne speech.

If the House accepts the suggestion of the parliamentary secretary today, which seems to the Chair very sensible, that at least is a recognition we have a problem which all members realize is very serious, and on an issue of great seriousness. It puts it exactly into the committee which it would get to if I were required to make a ruling.

I will hear the hon. parliamentary secretary and then I will come to the hon. member for Mississauga West.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I want to clarify very quickly a point that was made earlier.

Citation 625 of Beauchesne's fifth edition refers to the whole question of the power of committees to summon witnesses, papers, and so on. Citation 625(2) states:

> (2) The procedure for obtaining papers is for the committee to adopt a motion ordering the required person or organization to produce them.

That has been done. There is no dispute over that. It continues:

> If this Order is not complied with, the committee may report the matter to the House, stating their difficulties in obtaining the requested documents. It is then for the House to decide what action is to be taken.

That to me is the nub of this whole argument. That is why I feel is so essential that we come to an understanding, because if we do not come to an understanding we are faced with a very difficult dilemma.

What do we do? Do we vote to ask a member of this House, a member of the cabinet, to comply with the committee request which advice says he may be breaking the law to do so? That is the nub of the question. That is why it is so difficult for members of this House to make a decision on that.

I do not think it is wise for this House to divide on that particular issue, because I think if it divides we lose both ways. If we make the reference to the committee, then I think we have an opportunity to explore this very difficult problem to make some recommendations as to how we handle those situations should they arise again and I think we then resolve the problem. But if we do not do that, we then are faced with a very serious conflict of ideas, of law and of interpretation of law. That is why I put forward the suggestion that I did, because it is only the House that can decide this issue.

If we do what I have recommended it takes the House out of a very difficult dilemma, and by that I mean members of the House.

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the standing committee out of which this problem arose, I want to point out that I did follow the procedures outlined by the parliamentary secretary in Beauchesne's. I did report to the House and that unanimous consent to have the House look at the motion was refused.

However, I think it is a reasonable proposition that the parliamentary secretary has put forward. There are always rumours of prorogation and the possibility of prorogation. Well, that is fine. If there is to be prorogation, we know it can be lost and, as you rightly say, Mr. Speaker, the issue does not die; the issue can be taken up again.

However, before I give unanimous consent, does the Speaker of the House have the right to ask that committee to move expeditiously, or does it have the right to put time limits on the committee to look into this?

Mr. Speaker: I will try to respond to the hon. member. The Speaker is the servant of the House. As hon. members know, it is not the Speaker's place for the most part to interpret what goes on in committees and, second, certainly not to tell committees what to do.

However, there is a sort of rule of general common sense that applies even here despite what others may say. This discussion is taking place in the most public of arenas. I can only say that I would hope the committee meets very rapidly and gets on with it.

In that spirit and picking up a cue again from the parliamentary secretary, I think the hon. member who has raised this matter, after consultation with his colleagues, would perhaps like a moment or two to wrap up, and then I am going to put the question to the House.

Mr. Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I am of the view—and I am sure all members are of the view—that what we are dealing with here to some extent may break some new ground. I realize and have some sympathy for the position of the Speaker in single-handedly having to take on this issue framed in privilege. I would like nothing better than to offer, along with colleagues in the House, a mechanism that would lift some of the burdens we have here in dealing with this issue.

I fear being toyed with by procedure; not by people, but the procedures that I have experienced over my last couple of years here I find to be a little unwieldy from time to time. If we were not to deal with the issue of whether or not this is technically a breach of privilege, if we were to accept that there is a problem and to put it to a committee, I am of the view that we should do that only on terms which would make it very clear to whichever committee dealt with it that the issue had to be resolved on certain terms. To send it to a committee without terms might, given the way things often evolve here, simply consign the issue to a committee report and the House may never have a chance to deal with it until another issue of a similar type arises.

I would like to suggest to the Speaker that from my point of view as a member who has raised an issue, I would find it acceptable. I would take no umbrage if the Speaker deferred going through the process of making a decision for another day and permitted members on all sides of the House to confer on the framing of an order that would accomplish the goals of the justice committee and hopefully the needs of all members of the House and in the end possibly obviate the need to deal with the technical issue of whether or not this is a breach of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: It is not often that the House gets so close to making up its mind about something and then lets it slip away. I do not know whether to call on the hon. parliamentary secretary, but I am in a position where I know very extensive discussions have taken place.

I am in the hands of the House, and yet it seems to me that the attempt here has been to put this in a committee of this place, which is exactly where it would go if I were to rule that there was a prima facie case of privilege. The committee, of course, could decide whether it is privilege. The committee could decide how ministers are to deal with things which are apparently contradictory between a law that has been passed by this House and the ancient laws and traditions of this place. Sooner or later somebody is going to have to look at this. We have right at our fingertips the opportunity to do so at this point.

I can only say that the whole approach that has been taken up until now seems to make a lot of sense and would be a very great help to the Speaker, because what comes out of that committee would be a very great help to the Speaker in subsequent cases.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I came in late on the debate, but I just wanted to offer any assurances to the hon. member who raised this point of privilege that this is viewed, in the government's perspective, as a genuine dilemma for which guidance and so on is sought and on which we need to have the kind of discussion and evaluation that the committee could ascribe to it.

Leaving it just a question of privilege, because of the adversarial nature of the House and the nature of the direction, puts the government in an awkward position. We might, quite frankly, argue that nothing the minister has done has breached any privileges and so on. We would be forced to in that sense. I think that would be too limiting. I think that would be inappropriate.

If there is concern, as I understood, about prorogation and what effect that might have, you certainly have my assurances in regard to that whatever order of the House is necessary to carry this on through any prorogation and to pick it up after prorogation. You have my assurances of full co-operation in that regard. There is no attempt here to put it aside or into a closet, but rather some attempt to address this fundamental problem that the Solicitor General has at this time. One does not have to be too imaginative to hypothesize many of these kinds of dilemmas. If we can make progress and resolve it, I think we are serving the interests of the House. I give my assurance of full co-operation.

Mr. Speaker: I know that this might lead to some sense that members need to speak further. I think it is appropriate for the Chair, though, to say that the matter has been not only very well debated following the splendid lead of the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River, but very fully debated.

Perhaps I can say this. I have been a member of this House since 1972. I have never seen a very serious issue so close to being resolved by agreement as I see it in front of me now. That does not mean that what comes out of the committee will necessarily satisfy everybody, but what it does mean is that we have a committee of this House dealing with what is essentially an extraordinarily difficult issue and an issue which, by the way, was not even dreamed about several hundred years ago at Westminster.

Is the House in agreement?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I thank hon. members. I know that hon. members will allow me to say again that I thank very much the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River for not only the excellent position that he took, the excellent address, but the manner in which he brought this matter to the House. I extend that compliment to all members who have taken part in this. This is one of the better moments in our long history. Thank you.

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Wednesday, February 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government; the amendment of Mr. Gray (Windsor West) (p. 17722); and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Langdon (p. 17725).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Etobicoke North had 10 minutes left in his questions and comments. The hon. assistant whip on a question or comment.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague for an excellent speech. It was very good. It is clear from his speech that this budget is long on optimistic forecast but very short on policies that would produce these desired results.

What did this government fail to accomplish over the last six and a half years in the face of what is happening now with this recession and these economic difficulties? What alternatives could it follow in order to help our economy rebound?

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her excellent question.

The real point about the budget is not what the government has done; indeed, the budget itself relies almost entirely on statistical smoke and mirrors. What the government has failed to do over the past seven years, as the member has noted, instead of undertaking the kind of economic restructuring so frequently promised, the government has relied on ad hoc cuts which have only served to whittle away the existing apparatus.

Instead of addressing the root causes of inflation in the economy, that is to say the structural barriers in the marketplace and in the under-employment of Canadians and of Canadian resources, it has relied on the blunt and inequitable tool of high interest rates.

This is what comes from an economic philosophy which holds that the government has no role in the economy and a political agenda that only serves to aggravate regional, social and economic differences.

In essence, this budget is the logical outcome of this government's refusal to address the fundamental problems in the economy. It is a hamstrung budget, one which demonstrates the extent to which this government, through its own policies, has backed itself into a corner from which it appears unable to extricate itself.

In 1981 the Liberal government of the day employed a counter-cyclical fiscal policy to bring Canada out of recession. By contrast, this government's failure to reduce its deficits over the following seven affluent years, resulting in a $400 billion international debt, means that it is now in no position to undertake such steps. The government projects record growth and productivity based on lower interest rates which, in turn, relies on historical low inflation rates, but it offers no policies which could produce the desired results.

The member has asked what alternative policies might the government have followed. I am certainly not one to argue that the solution to Canada's economic malaise lies in turning back the clock in attempting to re-employ the old tools of state intervention.

• (1340)

Nor would I for a moment argue that the government should attempt to rebuild Canada's trade fortress walls in attempt in some way to isolate itself from the global economy which has emerged in recent decades.

I would, however, suggest that there are ways in which public involvement in the private sector can bring benefit to all Canadians, one where government focuses less on creating economic activity than on creating the circumstances within which economic activity will naturally flourish. That is to say, one which takes as its priority supply-side, as distinct from demand-side, intervention.

Under the present government, the foundations that must underpin productivity have been eroded, both through neglect and through growing national divisions. The new rule for the state should be to rebuild these foundations from the bottom up.

Such a strategy, for example, could include working with the provinces to improve educational standards, enhancing our communications and transport infrastructure, removing interprovincial barriers to the movement of goods, services, capital and people and working towards sustainable development by building environmental costs into the costs of production, distribution and consumption.

Industry will need access to long-term, competitively priced capital in Canada if it is to invest in the high value-added sectors of the future. This government should have done more to foster the formation of indigenous capital. Instead, we have seen the government engaging in siphoning off domestic capital and generally weakening the economy. A policy of deficit spending has burdened Canadian industry with the most costly capital in the industrialized world.

This, in turn, has forced industry to turn increasingly to offshore investors, reducing domestic control of the economy and leading to the current balance-of-payments deficit.

Government must also re-examine, in answer to the hon. member's question, the ways in which our financial institutions are structured by looking again at how Canadians channel investment into Canadian industry. We should enable Canadian industry to have access, not only to long-term capital, but to capital that is domestically owned and controlled.

Finally, there is a need to develop mechanisms in our country for enhancing co-operation among business, labour and government and, indeed, among the various sectors of the economy. Unless a broad census can be achieved about the direction the economy should take and the way economic restructuring should occur, there is little hope that Canada's technological, industrial and natural resources can be channelled efficiently and painlessly into what Canada does best.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to have the opportunity to rise today to participate in the debate on the budget which was brought down on Tuesday. But before I begin my discussion of that, and I realize I will not have an opportunity to finish before we adjourn, I do want to make a few comments about the events which occurred overnight in the Persian Gulf.

I think we all rejoice to know that hostilities have been suspended. We are waiting anxiously for results from the UN Security Council meetings. They met this morning and will be going into formal meetings this afternoon, with the hope that Iraq will have acceded to the conditions and will ensure that prisoners of war are exchanged, that reparations can be paid and all the elements of the cease-fire are met so that, indeed, it can be a permanent cease-fire and we can get on very challenging task of rebuilding and restoring peace and order in this difficult part of the world.

I think it is perhaps also appropriate this morning to mention that our thoughts are with the people of Kuwait. They have suffered such atrocities and such devastation of their country; we have seen some of that on television over the past few hours. It will take time to not only rebuild the physical infrastructure of their country but also to, I think, rebuild the people so they can once again live without fear or terror which they have been subjected to over these past months. Of course our thoughts are also with the families of those who have been killed or injured during these hostilities.

It is also a time to give thanks. I want to take the opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to express my thanks to so many who have worked so hard over these past seven months, and no more so than the 2,500 Canadian men and women who are serving in the Persian Gulf and those who have served during the earlier rotations. They have done an outstanding job and I think we can be very proud of the contribution that Canada has made and Canadians are playing in this situation.

We have seen that some of the personalities on television, Commodore Summers, Captain Dusty Miller, Colonel Lalonde, Denny Fireball Roberts, and all the others who have been so vigilant: on the navy side with the ships and air component, with the CF-18s and those working in the hospital. There are 550 Canadians who have worked there as well.

My thanks also go out to our Prime Minister and our Secretary of State for External Affairs. When the story of this situation is written, I hope it will be documented in a way that will truly show the outstanding leadership which the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have played throughout; their efforts of diplomacy, and the continuing strength that they have shown to the United Nations and to our coalition partners.

It has been an extraordinary time which has brought nations from all over the world together and to say that they will not countenance aggression and have put actions behind those words.

We give thanks as well to the United Nations because it is perhaps now a renaissance in the history of the United Nations and we hope from the successful role that they have played in this situation, they will become the beacon of hope and really be able to help establish international peace and order.

I want to give thanks to the families of our service personnel. I have had the opportunity of visiting with many of them over this past month in the many bases across the country and many cities and communities. They have been stalwart and strong in their support. I want to give thanks also to the support we have received from so many communities and so many Canadians. It has been overwhelming but I think it is indicative of the kind of Canadian spirit and fortitude to show their support to our people.

There have been many others back here in Ottawa and across the country, many women who serve in the Armed Forces, were not in the Persian Gulf but enabled our activities to take place and who have worked around the clock for nigh on seven months; I want to pay tribute to them as well. They have really done an outstanding job, both on the military and civilian sides.

Now we wait and we hope and we pray that peace will come and that this will provide the opportunity for the world to reflect anew and through the auspices of the United Nations to ensure that we have mechanisms that can maintain peace, order and stability in this world and that we know where there are words there are also actions.

I think Canada and Canadians can stand tall today to know that they have made their contribution to this most just and important end.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Collins: Mr. Speaker, let me now turn back to our discussions on the budget. I think it was a very important budget. It was our Minister of Finance's seventh budget. We have seen through these seven years a constancy and a consistency. But this budget perhaps more than any other that I have seen over these years really reflects what is so important for us to be doing in this country. It not only responds to the needs of Canadians in this recession, but most importantly it positions Canada for economic recovery in the months ahead.

• (1350)

This government has had to make difficult choices with respect to the Persian Gulf. We now are making the difficult choices which will ensure that Canadians can enjoy economic prosperity, that our young people can look forward to a Canada that is going to have a sound economy in the future.

In order to maintain the standard of living that we have all come to enjoy and in order to provide the very social services that have made Canada an envied nation around the world, we must be able to compete effectively in the marketplace. We know so much of our economy is based on our ability to trade and to be competitive.

Our social services will not survive if Canada does not prosper in the new globalized economy. Indeed, our gains in employment equity—something which I have a great deal of concern and interest in—would be undermined if we were to lose our market share.

Certainly, Canada's economic prospects will be dim so long as we must continue to spend 36 cents out of every dollar on servicing our debt. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the federal government this year must pay $43 billion in debt charges. In fact, it is the largest single spending item. How much easier it would be to respond to the recession and to our options today if we were not shackled by paying $43 billion for what previous governments had borrowed in the past.

This government has no intention of mortgaging the future of Canadians. Through this budget, the Minister of Finance has outlined our plan for recovery. It will be a recovery that is based on some very fundamental principles which I think every individual understands as we do our own budgeting, as we do work with our own financial affairs.

It is a budget that is based upon lower inflation and lower interest rates so that stable prices by the mid-1990s will mean that families will be able to budget with confidence. They can feel more secure. It will mean that the elderly and the unemployed, the working poor, people on fixed incomes will have less fear of the future because they will know that they will not be hit. One of the worst things that can happen is runaway inflation.

The budget is not content simply to tighten our belts while giving us promises of better times to come. This government will help those who have been hardest hit by the current recession. Restraint is not a burden that will be carried on the backs of those in greatest need.

As you examine the budget, Mr. Speaker, you will see that the additional expenditures include more money for seniors, the unemployed and for farmers, who have been particularly hard hit by falling grain prices.

I would remind the House that the expenditure control plan that was introduced in last year's budget, with certain programs exempted from the restraint. Among those were major transfers to persons. Transfers to persons comprise the largest component of federal program spending. It is about a third.

These transfers include old age security benefits, the guaranteed income supplement, spouse's allowances, family allowances, veterans' payments and unemployment insurance benefits.

In other words, these are government cheques that go to the people who are most in need. Particularly in a time of recession I want to assure this House that these are the expenditures that are not being touched.

We have to recognize that our population is aging, and because seniors' benefits are fully indexed to inflation, benefits to the elderly are one of the fastest growing areas of government spending. In fact, the elderly are the beneficiaries of about half of government's spending on social programs.

From my perspective, I know that as a result of differences in life expectancy, the majority of these seniors are women. In fact, when we examined the portion of our senior population over the age of 85, we found that in 1989 there were more than twice the number of women than as men.

That is why in my portfolio responsibilities as Minister responsible for the Status of Women I am very pleased that this budget calls for an increase of $1.6 billion in the amount spent on the elderly. It also calls for $3 billion to be spent on the unemployed. Unemployment insurance continues to be one of the most important elements of Canada's social safety net. The government will continue to use the unemployment insurance programs to provide for those who have lost their jobs.

Just another example of how our recovery will not be sought at the expense of the disadvantaged, I think then we can turn to the new initiatives to help disabled Canadians. Last November my colleague, the Minister responsible the Status of Disabled Persons introduced a strategy to promote equal opportunities for Canadians with disabilities. This budget implements many of those proposals.

The disability tax credit, something that the disabled community has been asking for, recognizes that Canadians with disabilities face higher costs of living and working. It will be increased from $575 to $700 in 1991. As well, the budget recognizes three new disability related expenses in the medical expense tax credit. This change is expected to benefit $35,000 Canadian households at a cost of $20 million. In the past allowances for the disabled, such as subsidized parking and transportation, have been treated as taxable benefits. This budget drops these requirements.

In order to promote more opportunities for disabled Canadians to go into the workforce, and that after all is one of the objectives, one of the cries of many from the disabled community, the business costs of modifications for the disabled, such as wheelchair ramps, will be totally deductible in the year they are incurred. This measure, I believe is fully consistent with this government's commitment to employment equity, a commitment that has helped create new opportunities for the disabled, as well as native Canadians, visible minorities and women.

Let me turn now to another area of the budget and one in my other portfolio that I have a particular interest in; the impact on defence. As my colleagues know, this past year has presented the Department of National Defence with some extraordinary challenges. Certainly foremost among those has been the conflict in the gulf. Our government's decision to deploy 2,500 Canadians to the gulf region has imposed significant and unforeseen pressures on our national defence budget.

Our servicemen and women have played a vital role in the coalition effort. They are serving Canada, they are serving the cause of international peace and security with great skill and dedication, which I mentioned before. I know the vast majority of Canadians have supported these efforts. They have supported our forces serving in the gulf because the cause that they have served is just. Like previous generations of Canadians in wartime, we must be prepared to pay the costs. Where necessary, these are costs to help ensure the kind of world that we want for our children and for ourselves.

It goes without saying that the Government of Canada, through the Department of National Defence, has a responsibility to support those who have served in the gulf, to ensure that they have the equipment, the training and the support that they need to fulfil their mission. The government has been fully committed to this end. In the Department of National Defence, supporting our force's operation in the gulf is currently our highest priority.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. minister will have four minutes left in her debate, plus ten minutes questions and comments.

It being two o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to Statements by Members, pursuant to Standing Order 31. The hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[Translation]

THE BUDGET

Mr. Guy Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, the Budget brought down Tuesday by the Minister of Finance is a full-scale attack against the Atlantic provinces and rural regions.

The $2.3 billion cut in transfer payments for health care and education will cause the provinces to either increase taxes or cut back on their services.

The Tory Budget proves this government is economically brutal, not fiscally responsible.

[English]

Instead of providing a job creation strategy for the 1.4 million Canadians who are unemployed in the midst of a recession, the finance minister has slapped them in the face with a $100 million cut in the Canadian Jobs Strategy fund. Where is the funding for the job training the government had promised in Bill C-21?

Rural and Atlantic Canadians have been served a budget that cuts job creation dollars, ignores national unity, attacks health care, education and labour and continues the Prime Minister's policy of transfer—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Elgin-Norfolk.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Ken Monteith (Elgin—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, the budget presented by the Minister of Finance on Tuesday is a balanced and fair budget, with the exception of the tobacco tax.

This increased taxation will have a devastating effect on the tobacco farmers of Elgin—Norfolk, many of whom are already suffering from Canadians' declining consumption of tobacco. I would hope the minister will be able to provide some ray of hope for these farmers by ensuring that funding is available to assist them in diversifying into other crops.

THE DISABLED

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the Conservative government has made new tax benefits available to the disabled, in addition to an increase in the tax credit from $575 to $700. Mr. Speaker, I hear the travelling minister, the hon. member from Sorel, who is always complaining about members on this side of the House. We could call him the "best travelled minister since 1984."

Mr. Speaker, the range of deductible medical expenses has been expanded to include services ranging from attendant care to the purchase and maintenance of a guide dog.

Families supporting a disabled child or adult will also see their deductions increased, and the government has introduced incentives for employers to make changes that will improve building access for the disabled.

CANADA POST

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise today under Standing Order 31 regarding the village of Watford's recent experiences with Canada Post.

Their efforts to deal with this in a responsible, positive way have been bureaucratized and aborted by the deceit and mistrust of Canada Post.

Canada Post has finally shown its stripes: For example in a letter from the reeve of the village, he points out that the alleged retirement of the postmaster this spring was not factual.

The village's request for information promised on financial issues never came. It must still be in the mail.

Canada Post privately told favoured individuals to tender before the public was offered the same opportunity.

It awarded contracts without doing credit checks and asking for bondable contractors.

It offered contradictory information through its bureaucrats and then set deadlines that were unreasonable.

Village negotiations for the purchase of the Canada Post building whose site is shared with the cenotaph honouring the men and women who served Canada in the world wars are under way. The village is understandably very concerned about dealing with Canada Post on this matter, given its past record of misleading statements and the withholding of information.

I call on the minister responsible for Canada Post to hold the corporation accountable for its actions.

S. O. 31

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, the GST is a tax that is not only outrageous and regressive in principle, but is producing abuses in practice.

Under the law, non-commercial tenants are not required to pay this lousy tax on the rent for parking spaces, even if it is not in their lease, the money is paid to another company, or the parking is in an adjoining building. But Crown Life in Montreal, collected over $5,000 in illegal GST payments since January from tenants in the La Cité complex in Montreal for their parking spaces.

That is $5,000 that Crown Life is going to have to pay back to those tenants, Mr. Speaker. I reported this abuse to Revenue Canada and they promised to get the money refunded. But members of Parliament should not have to pressure Revenue Canada to have the law respected. It is Consumer and Corporate Affairs which must stop this illegal taxation, which I am told is Canada-wide.

JUSTICE

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, it is time for someone to take a serious look at the Department of Justice.

Yesterday, after two years of foot-dragging and two years of stonewalling, the justice minister announced she will not reopen the David Milgaard case. There was a mountain of evidence that cast serious doubt on Milgaard's murder conviction of 21 years ago. The place to clear the air was the courts, but the justice minister, with little explanation, slammed the door.

She has never explained the process of investigation. Where did Milgaard's application fail? There are charges of cover-up, Mr. Speaker. Is the department really fit to carry out an investigation of this kind? After all, it is asked to investigate itself. It is time to have a public inquiry. Canadians have a right to know whether the Department of Justice is deserving of its name. In the meantime, the spectre of an innocent man languishing behind bars continues to haunt us.

GULF WAR

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, the world rejoiced last night with news of the cease-fire in the gulf. All Canadians can take pride in the effective role played by our Canadian men and women in the gulf. We are equally grateful that it would appear that there will be no Canadian casualties.

Nevertheless, these people have put their lives on the line in support of what not only Canadians but the nations of the world believed was essential.

I commend the government, the Ministers of National Defence and Veterans Affairs for having recognized the gulf area as a special duty area, with the benefits and allowances that the designation implies. The leadership and encouragement which these ministers have provided throughout the conflict is to be commended, as is the contribution of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Needless to say, the leading figure throughout this crisis has been the Prime Minister of Canada, who has shown Canadians and all parliamentarians the true meaning of political leadership, indeed, the true meaning of statesmanship. Thanks to all for a job well done.

STATISTICS

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, the government has come up with a rather ingenious way of bolstering its image. Believe it or not, it is now hiding the bad economic news. It is doing so by cancelling the collection of statistics.

We learned recently that the government has cancelled the annual census of construction. It has also cancelled the mid-year survey of business investment intentions. In early January, we learned the government was planning to discontinue collecting all science and technology statistics.

Given the Prime Minister's promises to increase Canada's scientific efforts, this would have been acutely embarrassing to the government, you will admit, Mr. Speaker. So, the minister ordained that Statistics Canada should continue to collect science and technology statistics. But, apparently, construction and business investment were less sensitive targets. There is only one possible conclusion to come to, Mr. Speaker, the government has made such a mess of Canada's economy that its only recourse is to hide the evidence from Canadians.

TRANSFER PAYMENTS

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, this government has increased its transfer payments to the provinces by 3.7 per cent over last year. And yet, I keep hearing about how we have cut our payments to the provinces and therefore health care and education will suffer.

The provincial governments are well aware of the fact that these transfer payments are block payments made to them with no strings attached. It is up to the provincial governments to make the appropriate allotments. But, of course, it is far easier to blame the federal government for not giving more money than it is to examine the province's spending habits.

It is time for the provinces to realize that they must be part of the solution. They must stop blaming the federal government for their fiscal problems and set about getting their fiscal house in order.

FORESTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, in the government's estimates tabled in the House this morning, the new forestry department is getting another kick in the teeth. Funding is being cut by 7 per cent, largely because forest agreements with the provinces have not been signed. These agreements give the department its ability to deal with the provinces on many important forestry and environmental issues. We are told that the agreements with Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario might be funded out of the government's reserve funds.

These agreements expired in March 1989, and still the government has not done anything. Even Western Diversification has sat on the funds for these so-called partnership agreements. When is the government going to get its act together and treat our forests with the priority that it should?

RED CROSS

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, last Monday, the annual Red Cross fund-raising campaign in Quebec was launched in Montreal. On that occasion, Mr. Claude Béland, president of the Mouvement Desjardins and honorary chairman of the campaign, reminded Quebecers of the importance of the traditional role played by the Red Cross in our society.

Mr. Speaker, the Red Cross is a lot more than blood donor clinics. The Red Cross is active in water safety and other areas, and when there is a disaster, it provides victims with on-going humanitarian support. I am sure that if we could help a person in danger, we would, without hesitation. However, since we are not in a position to do so, the Red Cross does this on our behalf, and with our donation it will be able to continue to finance its activities. The Red Cross urgently needs funds, Mr. Speaker. Give generously!

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, this government, by its own hand, has reaped economic devastation from coast to coast in this land, as illustrated all too graphically by the 12,000 businesses and 43,000 personal bankruptcies racked up in the last year.

In the ultimate act of contempt, the government refuses to take responsibility for the thousands of shattered lives and dreams that result from these cold statistics. In P.E.I. bankruptcies are up by 19 percent. In Ontario, nearly 20,000 personal and business bankruptcies. Behind each statistic there are real people, many of whom have had their lives shattered forever, who have lost their businesses, lost their jobs, their families, who have lost their pride, all because of this government's insane economic policies, which have driven a stake through the heart of the Canadian economy.

In the ultimate act of contempt, it brings in a budget that offers no relief but just promises more of the same to those businesses and individuals who are still hanging on by their nails. The people of Canada do not need a new budget, they do not need a new finance minister, they need a new government, a Liberal government and, for the sake of all Canadians, the sooner the better.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, Canadians have so much to be thankful for today. In the Persian Gulf our forces have fulfilled their mission with courage and expertise and all Canadians across this country share an immense pride in our men and women in the gulf.

At the same time, Canadians at home are searching for answers that will make our country stronger and more united. Lucille Hilston is one of my constituents in Niagara Falls who feels very strongly about her country. Mrs. Hilston has written an anthem celebrating Canada's birthday entitled "Happy Birthday, Canada". She hopes that it will promote positive feelings across the country, especially at this time in our constitutional history. I will read a couple of lines from this inspiring song:

> It is time for celebration
> The birthday of our nation
> Land of love and liberty
>
> Historical creation
> Of many years duration

This is just one person's response to help promote a united and happier Canada. I thank her for her efforts. Anyone who would like a copy of that, please write to me in care of the House of Commons.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, if there was any doubt after the budget speech that this Tory government is continuing its seven-year program of attacking low and middle-income Canadians, a peek into the 1991-92 estimates document lays that doubt to rest.

At a time of recession and high unemployment, this government is slashing $3.1 billion from the Employment and Immigration budget and stealing $100 million from the Canadian Jobs Strategy program. It is threatening job losses as a direct result of any wage increases to public servants as it pits employee against employee. It further damages the collective bargaining process to legislate its right to contract out work presently performed by its employees.

With the $60.3 million in cuts to transfer payments under the Canada Assistance Plan, it has again shown its contempt for ordinary Canadians by attacking those programs that Canadians are most dependent upon.

When the Prime Minister said his party was best to manage change, Canadians had no way of knowing how drastic or how devastating those changes would be for our country.

POSTAL RATES

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago, management of the papers La Terre de chez nous and Les Affaires had an unpleasant surprise when they heard that as of April 1, 1991, they would no longer be eligible for third-class mail rates. This decision will increase mailing costs by over 600 per cent and will soon lead to the demise of these two periodicals.

How can the responsible minister justify this increase when most Canadian-owned periodicals will face an increase of only 5.5. per cent? I think it is arbitrary, to say the least, that two magazines that reflect the values of Quebecers and their desire to be well informed are being penalized for the fact they are printed on newsprint, not stapled and appear more than 48 times a year. Mr. Speaker, I am sure you are aware of the role played by these two publications in helping Quebecers stand up for their rights. La Terre de chez nous is a symbol to Quebec farmers. It is their main source of information as well as a touchstone for rural values in Quebec. Les Affaires—

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ESTIMATES

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday, when the Liberal Party said that the government was trying to destroy medicare, the Minister of Health accused us of scaremongering. In the government's estimates, tabled less than three hours ago, the government is planning a $1 billion cut in medicare payments.

I want to ask the Prime Minister how he can claim on the one hand that his government is protecting medicare and how his own estimates, on page 19–8, predict a $1 billion cut.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is well aware that the transfer to the provinces under the Established Programs Financing is made up of both tax points as well as a cash transfer. She has only referred to the cash transfer. The total transfer, tax points and cash transfer amount to an increase for the provinces, as a whole, equivalent to approximately 1 per cent.

In addition to that, there is the equalization program of which seven provinces are beneficiaries. That is also used to help those provinces support medicare, the post–secondary education programs, as well as any other program they wish to apply it to. And that is increasing quite substantially this year, on top of the tax transfer and EPF.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I am going to read for the Minister of Finance from his own estimates: "Insured Health Services Program Main Estimates 1990: $5,448,000,000."

And in 1991–92, Mr. Speaker, the same Insured Health Services Program, $4,400,000,000, for a cut, Mr. Speaker, of over $1 billion.

[Translation]

The Prime Minister knows perfectly well that today, the Quebec Minister of Health predicted that the government's budget policies and cutbacks would provide ammunition for the separatist position. Those were the words of the Quebec Minister of Health. My question is directed to the Prime Minister.

Since we have a secure universal health care program that is used by all Canadians—in Quebec, Ontario and across Canada—why is the Prime Minister encouraging the separatists with these cutbacks in health care funding?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I repeat, there are two kinds of transfers to the provinces: cash transfers and additional transfers in the form of tax points. The hon. member only referred to the cash transfers. So I repeat, the figures mentioned, which were indicated in Tuesday's Budget, will not have any impact on transfers for the coming year.

[English]

Ms. Copps: My supplementary is for the Prime Minister.

There is a billion–dollar cut predicted in his own budget. He will know that the Minister of Health in Quebec has stated: "That this government with its cuts is nourishing the argument of those who would like to separate from Canada."

• (1420)

I would like to ask the Prime Minister very specifically, knowing as he does that medicare is one of the building blocks of our nation, why he is prepared to cut one of the building blocks out of our nation.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the minister of health from Quebec was also the campaign chairman of my hon. friend when she ran for the leadership of her party.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: The minister of health from Quebec knows full well that the amounts of money from the federal government to the provinces are going to increase, which is not the case with a decision that he and his colleagues took in Quebec when they off–loaded hundreds of millions of dollars on to the municipalities of Quebec.

When next you are speaking with him, ask him that.

Oral Questions

HEALTH CARE

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, neither the Minister of Finance nor the Prime Minister has given us any explanation why there is any cut in any funds in the estimates for health care. Bearing in mind the need for quality health care in this country, their evasion of an answer speaks volumes for Canadians.

My question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Yesterday, when asked about his government's plan to phase out federal money for medicare, he said that our concerns were simply Liberal scaremongering.

Yesterday, Dr. Lionel Lavoie, President of the Canadian Medical Association, speaking for the association said, and I quote:

> The Government of Canada is financially strangling medicare. Health care will suffer.

Will the minister now admit that when his government is in effect pulling the plug on life support for medicare it is not scaremongering; it is simply the truth?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it is just the opposite. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that when the Liberal Party of Canada distorts the facts and suggests that the fact that money is shifting between cash payments to the provinces and transfer of tax points represents a retreat on the part of the government on medicare to the tune of $1 billion, that is simply false. It is the Liberal scaremongering I referred to yesterday.

What threatens medicare and what threatens quality social programs in Canada is the fact that today the first 35 cents out of every dollar that goes to Ottawa in Canadian's taxes is going just to pay the interest on the national debt.

It is a time for honesty. It is a time for opposition members to make it clear. Do they favour a higher deficit? Do they favour higher taxes, or do they favour cuts? It is time to come clean with Canadians.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, it is time for the Minister supposedly for National Health and Welfare to come clean with Canadians and to say whether he is accusing the President of the Canadian Medical Association of scaremongering when the president of the association says that the government's budget is financially strangling medicare. Is he going to stand up and make that accusation? I bet he does not have the guts to do that.

[Translation]

Dr. Lavoie went on to say that he was, and I quote:

> surprised at recent government decisions with respect to medicare, during a national unity crisis.

I therefore want to ask the minister how he can stand idly by when the Minister of Finance and the government are dismantling Canada and fundamental programs such as our medicare system?

[English]

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, Canada spends about $2,000 for every man, woman and child in this country on health care. Only the United States with its disorganized system spends a higher percentage of GDP than Canada does on health care.

We are transferring this year some $14 billion to the provinces. It is a commitment that remains.

It is only the friend of the hon. member for Hamilton East who has proposed that the federal government should vacate responsibility for medicare. It is her responsibility to explain his position, not ours.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Statistics Canada announced today that the effect of the recession, the impact on people, is even greater than this government would have had us believe. Yesterday, the National Association of Food Banks said that in the last year almost 200,000 children relied on food banks. I point out to the Prime Minister that not very long ago he was up speaking in this House, and he was chairing a world summit, on the poverty of children.

I want to ask the Prime Minister: Given that there are real needs and human needs out there, why has this government chosen almost $2 billion in cuts to post-secondary education and health services, to the kind of services that fulfil people's needs? These are not frills that we are talking about.

In 1981 the Liberal recession was fought on the backs of the poor, of those who needed health care and the unemployed. In 1991 we do not see one new idea.

What is the Prime Minister going to do for those Canadians, those children today, in 1991, who have real needs?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the most important thing the government can do is to get the economy moving again, to bring down interest rates, to allow Canadians to find jobs, to allow Canadians to move off welfare, out of poverty, and into decent paying jobs, into security, and into a future.

Members of the NDP profess to care about our children's future. Yet, what they say is that we should be spending now on this generation and sending the bills to our kids. It is time to stop stealing from our children.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I and I would think most Canadians would fail to see how having children for the next generation go hungry does something for the future of those children and for the future of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Prime Minister. The provinces and the territories all agree that health care social services and education needs are growing. When times are difficult, Canadians across the country count on their government to do something. Instead of cutbacks, when doesn't the Prime Minister reconsider his decision and stop punishing the least advantaged in our society?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): The budget cutbacks and economic decisions announced by the government have had, as the Minister of Finance clearly pointed out, the effect of lowering interest rates. Only a few hours ago, interest rates in Canada were lowered again this week, for twelfth or thirteenth week in a row. So that is good news for the economy.

I agree that, coming out of a recession, we do have social problems. As the Minister of National Health and Welfare just explained, the government has a range of programs to help those who are less well-off in our society. However, on the subject of reducing the number of people living in poverty, he noted that today several hundred thousand fewer Canadians are living in poverty than in 1984. And despite the negative impact of a recession, Canada has continued to make substantial social progress. Our views on economic ideology differ from those of the New Democrats. We intend to focus on the private sector and lower interest rates, because we believe the private sector will be able to contribute more towards creating new prosperity for all Canadians, starting with durable jobs.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, for the Prime Minister.

If the Prime Minister wanted to help that business sector which creates the most jobs, he would help small business, and those are the ones that are being hit by this budget.

• (1430)

The estimates issued today estimate that the increased costs of the Senate are going to be some $5.6 million.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Ms. McLaughlin: Surely at least a large percentage of these costs will be associated with the eight GST senators whom the Prime Minister appointed. At the same time, the Minister of Finance has announced that there will be almost a $2.7 million cut to the Northwest Territories for aboriginal language programs and a phasing-out of land use planning in the north where of all places in Canada it is most needed since we have land claims and since we have a fragile environment. That has both environmental consequences as well as consequences for the development of the north.

Would the Prime Minister not consider getting rid of some of the GST senators, using that money to invest in the north where the future is?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I know my colleague is very interested in the concerns of the small business community. I am sure she realizes that the small business community has one of the lowest tax rates of any small business community in the industrialized world. I am sure she also realizes that one of the things not only the small business community has asked for, but Shirley Carr of the Canadian Labour Congress, the Exporters Association, the Manufacturers' Association and social groups have all asked for is low interest rates. That is precisely what this budget is designed to do.

We are not just walking around snapping our fingers saying: "I hope, I hope, I hope that interest rates will come down". We are taking the policy decisions which will put in place a framework that will ensure they will come down. That is the essential message of this budget.

THE ESTIMATES

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The Main Estimates tabled this morning contain a special allocation of $600 million to cover the cost of maintaining Canadian forces in the Persian Gulf during the next 12 months beginning April 1.

Given that the gulf war is now over and that the outstanding men and women of our Canadian forces will soon becoming home, will the Minister of Finance—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, it is a great shame that the government party would not take this opportunity to applaud our forces and not make cat-calls.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Finance tell the House what portion of the $600 million set aside in this morning's estimates for the next 12 months, money which will now not be used because the gulf war is over, can now be made available to assist Canada's projected, the minister's own projection, 1.5 million unemployed?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government included in the budget amounts of money to make sure that the outstanding men and women who serve Canada in the military receive the full and complete support of all Canadians, whether they are serving overseas or whether they are here.

The government will make sure that the needs of the military are met because when the government brought before the House of Commons a commitment to send the military to fight a war on behalf of freedom, we committed to them that we would give them everything that was required, and the members of this House and this government stood with them then and we will stand with them now.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Tobin: And we agree with that.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, there is $600 million—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member.

Mr. Tobin: Given that there is $600 million set aside this morning for the next 12 months beginning April 1, given that we do not anticipate on this side our force being in the Middle East for the next 12 months, therefore we anticipate a savings, is it not time to give Canada's unemployed a peace dividend by restoring the $100 million cut to job-creation funds made by this minister in his budget a few days ago?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Canadian Armed Forces serving in the gulf will appreciate the expression of support from the hon. member.

But they will be somewhat perplexed at the fact that he proposes or would recommend that these amounts be withdrawn before they even return.

I think my hon. friend will recognize that the forces are there. They may be there for a considerable period of time. We still do not know. The Government of Canada will continue to deploy all resources to make sure that the men and women who served Canada in such a courageous way receive the full support of the government and the people of Canada.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, my first question is for the Minister of Finance.

Officials of the Department of Finance have now confirmed—they confirmed it this morning—that they will be deducting from the equalization payments of the four Atlantic provinces $60 per head of population each year to recover what they call the largest overpayment ever in equalization grants given to the four provinces, and that the overpayment took place some three years ago.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance: Why do the people of Newfoundland, on top of the restrictions on the transfer payments announced in that terrible budget, now have to repay $58.3 million in payments of over $1 million every two weeks for the next two years, and the maritime provinces will have to do the same thing?

The Government of Canada forgives moneys owed by foreign nations and foreign banks. How about giving the people of Newfoundland and the maritimes a break?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I thought I heard correctly that the hon. member referred to that terrible budget.

Some hon. members: Yes.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Why is it that the President of the Treasury Board, Mr. Winston Baker—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): —of Newfoundland, had some words of praise about that budget?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): He said: "All governments generally have reached the limit of spending beyond their means, which spending will have to come out of the pockets of people 10 to 15 years down the road".

The President of the Treasury Board of Newfoundland does not agree with this being a terrible budget. He thinks it is a good budget. I do not know why the hon. member would use those words. He should speak with his brother.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The hon. member has asked a serious question that deserves a serious answer. That is not to say that my first response was not a serious response.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member.

• (1440)

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the minister that on this question I am not my brother's speaker.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Baker: Will the Minister of Finance now admit that his budget and the estimates tabled today are really taxation by the back door. Will he not admit that these place an undue onus on the shoulders of provincial governments and on the backs of the managers of our Public Service who are now being order to lay off 2,000 employees for every 1 per cent increase in their salaries? The government is treating our public servants like a pack or rats and the minister thinks he is the exterminator.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, all I can say in response to my hon. friend's first answer is, that is the brother of all answers.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. minister would answer the question.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, my friend has referred to the steps we have felt bound to take in controlling the wage costs of the government. This is something that we do not like to do, but we have to recognize the difficult fiscal position the country is in and the difficult deficit and debt problem the federal government has.

We have asked our public servants, as we have asked all members of the House, to participate in solving this problem. We have to take into account the fact that other parts of the country, other people in the country are suffering from wage cuts, salary cuts and from lay-offs. In that broad context, if we as members of Parliament, as members of the Public Service, can help get this country back on its feet again, can help get interest rates down, can help get the economy moving again as we expect it will be in the second half of the year, then I think that is a good move on the part of all of us.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

My mother used to say, "eat your greens", but it looks like the Minister of Finance took it literally in his budget on Tuesday. The Minister of the Environment tried unsuccessfully to make a silk purse out of a sows ear yesterday with his claim that a $600 million cut to the Green Plan adds up to a 20 per cent increase. Today's estimates, in fact, show that the environment budget increase is below the rate of inflation and today's estimates reveal that the Green Plan has been kept as a secret political slush fund, quite separate from the environment estimates.

Would the minister justify for the House the continued secrecy of the Green Plan slush fund and would he justify the 50 per cent cut to environmental assessment and his colleague's cuts to alternate energy and to conservation, supposedly the pillars of the minister's plans to deal with global warming?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to know that my colleague from Skeena reads carefully both the budget and the estimates.

He will find in the budget a clear commitment to spend an extra $250 million for the Green Plan over and above what this government was spending last year on the environment. That is, indeed, on a base of $1.3 billion, a 20 per cent increase, as I stated yesterday.

He will find in the estimates that over and above that, the A base of the Department of the Environment is increasing by 4.8 per cent. That is above the 20 per cent. When you add the two, you get a very major indication of this government's commitment to the environment.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. A moment ago, the Prime Minister was talking about the importance of the creation of wealth, yet every single person in the world seems to know, and the finance minister seems not to recognize, that the creation of wealth in any modern industrial state is dependent upon research and development, technology and a highly educated and trained work force.

My question to the Minister of Finance, as he points in various directions over there, is when is he going to stop this empty-headed and catastrophic attack on research and development, on post-secondary education and on training? When is he going to realize that such attacks are directed towards the deindustrialization of Canada and its conversion to Third World country status, and that in fact it will lead to a yet higher deficit in the final analysis?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, what will lead to the deindustrialization of Canada is the continued high interest rates that this country has to go through because of the deficit.

If you want to look at research and development, you will note—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Winegard: I have lots of time, Mr. Harvey.

Science and technology has a very preferred position in this budget. It is one of the highest increases that there is in the budget, and that indicates that the Minister of Finance has been listening to me.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The Canada Health Act, introduced by the Liberal government and which became law in 1984, is a source of national pride. In contrast, Bill C-69, which was forced through the House and became law this year, cuts the legs from under medicare and is a national disgrace.

The government now says medicare protection will be legislated as the budget, which further freezes transfer payments, escapes enforcement power from the Canada Health Act.

What other means does this government have in mind to help enforce the Canada Health Act that are not already in this act? And would the minister admit that weakness lies, not in this health act, but in the government not willing to act?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I was very pleased with the statement by the Minister of Finance that measures will be taken to ensure that as the balance between tax points and cash changes under the transfers that we are making to the provinces, they will be able to protect the provisions of the Canada Health Act.

The important point to make is that the government, this year, will be transferring for health care some $14 billion to the provinces.

Transfer payments to the provinces have gone up since the last year the Liberals were in office in 1984. They have gone up by over 50 per cent. I think that is an important increase and I believe our commitment to ensuring the health of every Canadian is an important commitment to this country.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister. Americans demanded the removal of the federal subsidy to unemployment insurance during the free trade negotiations. Last year, this government capitulated and did away with that subsidy. Now the same government is retreating from its commitment to medicare. I ask the minister to unveil his government's next scheme to further harmonize Canadian social spending with his American model?

What is the next sacred trust to be foreclosed?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, that particular canard was flown by the Liberals in the last election and rejected by every Canadian because they knew that the attempt by the Liberals to frighten the elderly, the sick and the poor was simply a reprehensible political tactic.

Members opposite inherit a world where it is possible to spend without having to worry about where the money is coming from. Back here on planet earth where ordinary Canadians have to live, we realize that governments cannot repeal the laws of economics, that it is important that governments follow the same rules as every homemaker, every family farmer, every businessman, and recognize the fact that if you keep spending more money than you are bringing in, you will have very serious problems, indeed. We will protect Canada's social programs by putting Canada's finances in order.

EMPLOYMENT

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

The unemployment rate in Montreal is very high. Perhaps more than others, new Canadians find it difficult to land a job. Would the minister explain how a $100-million cut-back in employment planning can possibly help these people find ways to survive?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is very important to note that in Montreal as in other cities and urban regions of Canada a lot of money is allocated for immigrant language courses and training.

It should be noted as well, and I take this opportunity to mention it, that this year the government has earmarked in excess of $3 billion for employment training and assistance—$500 million more than last year.

SPICER COMMISSION

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

With respect to an article published in today's Le Soleil, Mr. Robert Normand, who sits on the Spicer Commission, said, and I quote the article in Le Soleil: "Mr. Normand finds rather strange the fact that some of his fellow commissioners are working on the basis of 30 days a month at $600 a day. According to him, five or ten days a month with a few more intensive periods now and then would be more normal". He goes on to say: "Apparently some commissioners have hired $40,000-a-year executive assistants and huge amounts have been paid for overtime for mostly unknown reasons".

Prime Minister, my question is this: What corrective measures do you intend to take in this case?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know Mr. Normand very well, not only an excellent man but also an outstanding administrator who sits on the Spicer Commission.

The hon. member would know that when the government appoints royal commissioners they are free to conduct their business as they see fit. I saw today's statement and I am sure that the Commission Chairman, Mr. Spicer, will read it carefully and, if need be, take all corrective measures required.

We should keep in mind that the government gave Mr. Spicer a wide-ranging mandate about which he is expected to report in relatively short time. Still Mr. Spicer is fully aware of all federal government management standards and we also know him as a man of utmost integrity. We know that his commission will fully abide by these standards.

EMPLOYMENT

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

This budget is an attack on working families. The minister has laid the claim for his economic policies at the feet of public sector workers. He said in the budget that he would listen to the anguish of people, yet there is nothing in this budget to help those who have lost or who are about to lose their jobs.

In fact, when the estimates are compared to the budget, it is clear that more dollars than anticipated were taken from the Canadian Jobs Strategy at the last minute. Could the minister explain what, at the last minute, became more important than training unemployed workers?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there is nothing more important to this government than training unemployed workers. I appreciate her support on this issue. It is too bad she did not support Bill C-21 sooner and we could have had funds at work last year.

I also want to point out to the hon. member and repeat what I said earlier, that over $3 billion is going to be spent this year on training, on training allowances and on employment initiatives all across Canada. That is $500 million more than last year and $900 million more than two years ago.

That is directed at unemployed workers, at workers who need to upgrade their skills and to meet exactly the requirements which the country has for a better trained workforce, as well as to give individual workers a more satisfactory life and a stable source of income.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, on October 26, 1990, the finance minister said in the House there would be no changes to the UI premiums for three years and that the government was planning accordingly. He even said, and I quote, "If there is any shortfall, then this will be made up by the government". The minister should know that a nation out of work cannot work as a nation.

Why is the Minister of Finance putting the burden of the deficit on the backs of working Canadian families and on the backs of the unemployed?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member totally misunderstands the objective of this budget. What we have set out very clearly in the budget statement itself is a series of ways in which we are going to get interest rates down further from the 400 basis points, the four percentage points, that we have already seen interest rates come down.

You cannot just wish interest rates to come down to help the unemployed workers that my hon. friend is concerned about. What is necessary is taking the steps to make sure that it does happen.

What I am hearing from both the New Democratic Party and the Liberal Party is that they would have started with that $35 billion deficit that we were looking at when we started the budget planning this year and increased the spending. All I have heard today are suggestions for increased spending from both the New Democratic Party and from the Liberal Party. If they are going to have an increase in spending on top of that deficit number of $35 billion, interest rates would not have gone down; they would have gone right up. That would have done far, far more to—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Abitibi.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. The Quebec mining association strenuously objects to the proposed amendment to the Financial Administration Act concerning cost recovery in marine shipping, especially in the ports of Quebec City and Montreal, as far as the mining industry is concerned.

My question is this: Could the minister inform the House today whether Bill C-91 will have a disastrous impact on the economy of certain regions, especially in the mining industry—copper, iron, zinc and salt—by making it more attractive for Canadian freighters to go through U.S. ports instead?

[English]

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board has stated, Bill C-91 has no bearing on the government's authority to implement cost recovery proposals. The existing section 19 of the Financial Administration Act is the legal foundation.

I should also tell my hon. friend that we are still consulting on cost recovery measures. As late as this morning I met with officials of Stelco and I am sure that when we do develop a proposal that it will be acceptable to the industry.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa West, a single question.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The minister has told Public Service employees if they want to feed their families they have to axe their friends.

In 1982 the same minister said about wage controls: "There is no flexibility when a limit is placed on everyone, whether a clerk, SX-3, deputy minister or president of a Crown corporation".

Why has the minister changed his mind? Why does he now find it perfectly acceptable that the president of a Crown corporation, making as much or more than $300,000, can now have an increase this year equal to the entire salary of 70,000 public servants, equal to the entire salary of a clerk living on a poverty wage needing every cent to feed her children?

• (1500)

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the hon. member read very carefully what our proposal is. There is indeed a lot of room to manoeuvre within our proposal. This is not a freeze. We said that we are living in difficult times.

I remind her again of what I told the union leaders of the Public Service at a time when Canadians are hurting and being thrown out of jobs, renegotiating their agreement in order to help their company. As I went around the country preparing for the budget and pre-budget consultation, they all said, in Ottawa and in the government, you must do your share and I think, rightly so, we all have to do our share. The Public Service has done its share in the past and I am sure it will do it again.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Charles-Eugène Marin (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for regional development in Quebec.

It seems the Quebec Minister of Health and Welfare recently accused Conservative members from Eastern Quebec of sabotaging the forestry agreement, on political grounds. Could the minister perhaps clarify this statement?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I may add that Minister Côté accused Conservative members from Eastern Quebec of doing a very good job, and I think we agree on that score.

In any case, the agreement to which the hon. member referred is a federal-provincial agreement under which $18 million was allocated for R&D in the forestry sector, with funds managed by the federal government. We tried to consult with the Quebec government, which suggested amendments that were turned down by local consultation committees. At the unanimous request of all local consultation committees in Quebec, we have decided to implement the agreement as signed as of April 1, 1991, Mr. Speaker.

PRESENCE IN THE GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I draw the attention of hon. members to the presence in the gallery of the Hon. Shirley Coppen, Minister without Portfolio and Chief Government Whip, Government of Ontario, and to the Members of the Standing Committee, the Legislative Assembly of Ontario.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the government House leader. Would he be so kind as to explain to the House what the business will be for the remainder of the week, and Monday and Tuesday of next week?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, we will continue this afternoon with the budget debate, as well as on Friday and Monday. On Tuesday, it would be my intention to call second reading of Bill C–97, the borrowing authority bill and, quite possibly on Wednesday, I might make that an allotted day or an opposition day. I will be in discussion with my colleagues on the other side in regard to this.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, during the break a committee of the House met on gun control and submitted a report. I wonder if the government House leader is in a position to say whether the government will be bringing back Bill C–80 before the House prorogues, or will that bill die?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is correct, there was a committee of the House that looked into the subject matter and came forward with a number of recommendations in that regard. Apparently, the Minister of Justice is examining and she will be proposing the proper course to follow, whether it is to amend C–80 to reflect these changes or, perhaps, a more expeditious way might be to bring forward a new bill. The Minister of Justice will be bringing forward recommendations in that regard.

While I am on my feet, before we get to Orders of the Day, I understand there has been discussions with the opposition critics and general agreement that we would revert to Statements by Ministers at this point in time for a short statement from the Secretary of State for External Affairs, followed by statements from the critics of the two opposition parties in that regard.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, there have been some discussions and there is agreement from this side for the Secretary of State for External Affairs to proceed with a statement at this time, a short statement as I understand it, followed by my colleague from Winnipeg and, I assume, that the time will be added on to the remainder of the day and the vote will be taken later than 5.45 this evening.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Agreed and so ordered.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SOUTH AFRICA

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Commonwealth Committee of Foreign Ministers on Southern Africa met in special session on February 16 in London to discuss Commonwealth policy in light of recent developments in South Africa, including the statement made by President de Klerk on February 1, 1991 which committed the South African government to repeal the remaining legislative pillars of apartheid.

Members will recall that both the Prime Minister and I welcomed the courage and the leadership shown by President de Klerk in making these announcements as we have welcomed the determination of black leaders to work more closely together.

I want to report briefly today to Parliament on the work of that committee which Canada chairs and to seek permission at a later point in the proceedings to lay upon the table a copy in both official languages of the communiqué.

Participating in the committee were Commonwealth foreign ministers from Australia, India, Malaysia, Nigeria, Tanzania, Zambia and Zimbabwe, the Secretary General of the Commonwealth and the former foreign minister of Guyana.

We benefited from the participation of Mr. Thabo Mbeki, Director of the International Department of the African National Congress and Ron MacLean, Canada's Ambassador to South Africa.

The situation in South Africa is changing quickly and profoundly. Many white South Africans, personified by President de Klerk, have re-examined their consciences and undertaken to change not only public policy, but also personal practices and beliefs.

Many black South Africans, particularly Nelson Mandela, demonstrate a generosity and vision that are extraordinary in people so long oppressed. Others, including leaders of Inkatha and the Pan African Congress, are beginning to show flexibility, a willingness to experiment, to compromise. And still other South Africans, black and white, are victims of anger, ignorance, fear.

The world is involved in South Africa precisely because the system of apartheid is so powerful and so deliberate a denial of basic human equality, so singular an instrument of racial prejudice. Just as many South Africans show remarkable responsibility in facing their new challenges, so must the world community weigh and apply our influence with great care. The moral imperative remains: to end apartheid. Now, with change in the air, the question of how we contribute to that goal becomes more complex.

Commonwealth foreign ministers, after extensive debate, reflecting the representative nature of that group, agreed unanimously on a position that recognizes a commitment to real reform, but will only reward actual changes which dismantle the system of apartheid. We believe our strongest sanctions should remain until the system is, effectively, abolished; but that lesser sanctions should be lifted in response to tangible proof of a determination to end apartheid irreversibly.

The committee, therefore, decided to adopt a "programmed management approach" that would reward concrete action in South Africa. The first stage in the program would be reached when the remaining political prisoners are released, when the way is cleared for exiles to return home, when repressive provisions of security legislation are repealed and when the group areas act, the Population Registration and Land Act are repealed.

[Translation]

These changes may all be implemented by the next meeting of Commonwealth ministers, to be held in late spring or early summer. At this meeting, ministers will look at the kind of progress that has been made and decide whether there are grounds for lifting certain sanctions such as visa restrictions, the embargo on tourism and air traffic and restrictions on official contacts.

My colleagues and I were afraid that the present security legislation would be a major obstacle to political freedom. We appealed to the South African government to stop detention without trial, to lift restrictions on public meetings and to grant South Africans the universal right to freedom of assembly, freedom of expression and due process of law. The record must show substantial progress on the return of exiles and release of political prisoners by April 30 this year, as agreed in the announcement from Pretoria last August.

• (1510)

[English]

The committee also addressed the question of sporting contacts. In future, the embargo on sporting contacts will be treated independently from other sanctions. The committee agreed to be guided by representative sports bodies at South African, African and, in the fullness of time, international Olympic levels. These organizations will provide the signal for the re-admission of South African sports to international competition. Indications are that this will probably take place on a sport-by-sport basis.

The committee agreed that Commonwealth support and encouragement for the unity talks in South African sports organizations are a high priority.

In order to support the process of negotiated change, the committee further agreed to provide constitutional expertise and funding for research and conferences which will contribute to the birth of a new, non-racial and democratic South Africa. For its part, Canada is providing $1.8 million in 1990-91 and has earmarked $2.3 million for this purpose next year. Canada has also committed $5.8 million to assist with the return of exiles and released political prisoners.

The committee also welcomed the interim report of the Expert Group on Human Resource Development for a Post-apartheid South Africa, which the Conference of Foreign Ministers established at our Abuja meeting. That committee is chaired by a Canadian, Mr. John Harker. We endorsed the expert group's call for an enhanced Commonwealth program of training and work placement to prepare black South Africans to take senior jobs in a post-apartheid government.

The meeting demonstrated the continuing unity of purpose of the Commonwealth. The concept of the "program management approach" marks an important policy development for the Commonwealth and for the international community. Sanctions have been crucial in bringing about the changes that have occurred to date, and will go on being crucial if the destruction of apartheid is to be ultimately assured.

South Africa is starkly different from what it was. There is a long way to go. Canada has played a steady, constructive role in moving that change forward, and we intend to continue on that course.

With the permission of the House, I would like to lay upon the table a copy, in both official languages, of the concluding statement of the committee which met in London on February 16.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the right hon. gentleman have permission to lay that on the table?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, first, I would like to thank the Secretary of State for External Affairs for presenting this statement to the House. It comes at an important time. It is worth observing that, for the past several months, we have all been quite obsessed and preoccupied with the events in the gulf and perhaps have not given the importance to other international events that have been taking place.

It is important that this House, which over the years has expressed a strong interest in the issues of South Africa, in general part, has provided consensus on the approach to be taken. I think virtually all Canadians have had general support for the thrust and direction that have been taken by successive governments toward the actions of South Africa. It gives us an opportunity to make a brief re-examination of the circumstances that now ensue as a result of the quite important statement that President de Klerk offered on February 1.

In this, I would like to join the Secretary of State in also congratulating the de Klerk government for the initiatives that they are taking. In some ways, they are courageous.

We know that there are very strong political forces in that country that are railed against the present government and are trying to impede that progress.

Equally, I think we must congratulate the efforts being taken by Nelson Mandela and the African National Congress and the way they are changing their own policies. I think we are all encouraged by the recent meeting between Nelson Mandela and Buthelezi in terms of coming together to provide a more common front in South Africa to allow some kind of progress toward reform in which the black majority of South Africa can work in a more directed way.

Also, I think it is important to pay some tribute to the many Canadians, particularly those in the churches and non-governmental organizations who over the past several years have maintained this as an issue of priority and have provided, as we all know, a continuing sense of encouragement and support for the actions in Parliament.

I think they can begin to now see some fruits of those long years of struggle when it looked like no progress was being made. In fact, I think we can say that two or three years ago, anybody in this House who would have predicted a South African government making the announcements about the changes in the apartheid laws that were made on February 1 would have considered it to be impossible.

The predictions at that time were that we would be facing a horrible feeling of violence and racial conflict. It looks now that there is a good chance for a peaceful transition, not an easy one—it will not be easy—but at least a peaceful one.

Again, we want to offer our continuing support as the Official Opposition to any efforts that can be made both to the Commonwealth Foreign Ministers and the very important work that they are doing.

It is my own belief that the Commonwealth Foreign Ministers group is perhaps the most important group dealing with the issue of apartheid at the international level.

I would hope that the Secretary of State, because he is chairperson of that group, might use that position to also make the views known directly to the European common market ministers, who were meeting at about the same time, about the need to follow what they called their "plant management approach". I think it is very important that this area work in concert.

If I might be allowed just to still raise some words of caution. Time is running out. We know that there must be a constitutional meeting by 1991 and I believe the mandate of the de Klerk government begins to run out by 1994.

If significant changes are not taken and we do not encourage those changes then we might find ourselves in a position where all the progress that has been made up to now will be lost. It is very important that we consider the kind of dilemma that the Secretary of State has offered.

How do we, in fact, maintain the constant pressure of having applied sanctions over the years and at the same time provide encouragement? It is an extraordinary act of international skill and diplomacy that we maintain this balance.

In this case, Mr. Speaker, if you will give me a small moment's indulgence to comment on sanctions themselves—it is a topic much discussed in this House for the past several months—I think the Secretary of State himself has recognized sanctions can work and can be effective. They have worked in the case of South Africa, not with the speed of military action but certainly without the kind of side effects that we have seen so dramatically displayed.

It is important to recognize that because sanctions must not be discarded. They are an important tool in the arsenal of the international community coming to deal with things of the serious nature of both apartheid and of aggression. I would hope that we would sit back and reflect more carefully about how useful and effective sanctions are.

In that case, we agree with the approach being taken, that the existing economic sanctions must be maintained until we see action taken to underline the words. We support that and will continue to give the government support in that area.

I would like to make, if I might, a major recommendation to the Secretary of State that he could communicate to his colleagues. We think it is also important at this time that a serious review be done in Canada about what has taken place in South Africa, and in particular, what kind of criteria or steps would be taken to further induce, encourage or support the reforms that are under way.

I think the Standing Committee on External Affairs might be the proper body, so it would not be just an inside decision of the minister and his advisers but would give Canadians an opportunity to come and be heard and to make their cases in terms of the direction they would like to see the future Canadian government policy take, as this is a crucial area.

I would strongly urge the minister to communicate with the standing committee chairman, as we will, that this kind of review be undertaken as one of the priorities so that when he goes to the meetings on April 30, and perhaps to the First Ministers' meeting in Harare, he can carry with him and the Prime Minister the full weight of a general basis of Canadian opinion and they can express it at that point in time.

• (1520)

I have one other point to make, if I might, Mr. Speaker, before I leave. I would like to offer an observation. One of the unique and important contributions that Canada has made in the whole debate over South Africa has been the support for the front-line states. I think we, among many other countries, have given special attention to their needs. What we must do now is realize that their needs are even greater.

In talking just recently to one of the ambassadors of the front-line states, he told me that his own country since the inception of the gulf war has suffered a net income loss of $800 million and that that kind of experience is repeated in the other front-line states, in fact in virtually all the African states.

It is very important, therefore, that when we come to the question of how we deal with the economic consequences of the gulf war we recognize that there is a host of nations—front-line states of Africa among many others—that are suffering deeply and terribly as a consequence of this war. It is going to be a real responsibility and obligation of countries like Canada to come to grips with how do respond.

I say that with great sadness, looking at the budget of Tuesday. It is again a further restraint or restriction on our ODA budget. It does not give us the kind of manoeuvring room or the kind of resources we need. I also look at the kind of negative response that was given by the government to the committee report on Third World debt, wherein the recommendations were virtually all rejected.

It would have been another important way in which we could be moving to provide a more active and positive source of relief for those states. That is even more important now as a result of the war. I do not think the war is the only pretence, because the problem was always there.

I would again urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who in the past has shown particular leadership in dealing with the front-line states, to recognize that they now face even more serious problems than they faced six or seven months ago.

In that case we would say there is a lot of work yet to be done. We in this Parliament can help this government to provide that work both by using the full resources of Parliament to help develop the future policies which the minister can use to advise his Commonwealth colleagues but also to come to grips with the continuing and enfolding tragedy of some of these states, both in those related to South Africa and in the entire African continent, that are facing very troublesome and difficult times.

We appreciate the opportunity to make this statement and to say to the minister that we hope to be able to continue to work with the government not always in concert with his views, but certainly with the general thrust that we must have apartheid come to an end, and the sooner the better.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise on behalf of my colleagues in the New Democratic Party to express our strong support for the Commonwealth foreign ministers' decision to maintain sanctions against the South African regime.

I also want to signal the contribution that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has made in his role as the chairperson of that very important and crucial body. I also want to associate myself with the remarks of the member for Winnipeg South Centre with respect to the very difficult situation facing the front-line states. My hope is that our government will recognize that and will continue to provide the kind of support they so desperately need, particularly in light of the developments in the gulf.

I was also pleased to hear the remarks of the member for Winnipeg South Centre with respect to the importance of sanctions. Unfortunately it was not until the mid-1980s that the Government of Canada finally took the step of enforcing firm and effective economic sanctions on South Africa. I very much regret that predecessor governments did not take that important step, that they allowed South Africa to continue its system of apartheid without in fact implementing those kind of firm sanctions that should have been implemented long before the mid-1980s.

We in the New Democratic Party share the view of the African National Congress, the Organization of African Unity, the African Commonwealth States, and human rights groups here in Canada and South Africa that while the South African government has made important preliminary steps toward dismantling apartheid, the foundations of this repressive and racist system remain untouched.

I want to join in commending the Canadian NGOs that have been so active in this area, the many individuals who have worked hard through the voluntary fund and elsewhere for these long overdue changes.

As one of those individuals representing a very important organization, Anne Mitchell of the International Defence and Aid Fund for South Africa, recently wrote: "Repression continues. South Africans continue to be detained and imprisoned, harassed, tortured, and even killed because they are known to oppose a system of apartheid".

There were more political trials in 1990 than in 1989 despite the reforms which have taken place. Political prisoners remain in jail. Political exiles remain outside their country. Repressive legislation remains on the statute books.

I would note that it is not just a question of legislation, but issues such as housing, education, training, literacy, unemployment and health must all be addressed in South Africa as well. The fact, for example, that the per capita spending on social services in the last year, in 1990, was five times more for whites than it was for blacks in South Africa.

I would hope that in a new South Africa, in a democratic South Africa, there would be a major commitment to attacking the desperate poverty of blacks, the fact that some 70 per cent of blacks live below the poverty line, by addressing the inequitable distribution of both land and wealth in that country.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs is well aware also of the serious concerns that have been raised by Amnesty International on the question of the existing security legislation and abuses under that legislation in South Africa. Indeed, at the current meeting of the 47th session of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, at which Canada is very ably represented by Ambassador Reynell Andreychuk, serious abuses of human rights were documented by Amnesty International. I would hope that they would continue to be addressed vigorously by our government.

We believe that the existing sanctions must remain in force until President de Klerk has fulfilled his promise to release the remaining 2,500 to 3,500 political prisoners who are held in South African jails and to allow the some 40,000 political exiles to return home freely.

As well, South Africa's strict security legislation must be revoked, particularly the Internal Security Act which provides for detention without trial and the banning of public gatherings. Most important, existing sanctions must continue until blacks are guaranteed full democratic rights in the South African Constitution; in short, until there has been irreversible change in the evil system of apartheid.

We support the concept of a constituent assembly. I would commend to the South African government, as I am sure the Secretary of State for External Affairs would, the experience in Namibia which I think is quite relevant in this context. Long before the convening of a constituent assembly in Namibia, all of the political parties in Namibia were able to agree unanimously on constitutional principles and later, even during the heat of their election campaign, they again agreed unanimously on a code of conduct. I would hope that that kind of example is one that would be followed by South Africa.

I would hope as well that they would address the homeland system, which is an expression of the system of apartheid and some of the measures that are taken to ensure that all people of South Africa, including those in the so-called TBVC states, participate fully in the future of their country.

While we commend the Secretary of State for External Affairs on his recent important work at the Commonwealth conference, we strongly encourage him not to abandon Canadian sanctions until all of these conditions have been met.

I would suggest in closing that we owe nothing less to the black majority of South Africa, to their courageous leaders such as Nelson Mandela, and to the memory of all of those who have died in the struggle for democracy, for justice and freedom in South Africa, including Steve Beeko imprisoned in 1977, those who died at Sharpeville, those who died at Soweto, and those who continue to die until this evil system has finally been eradicated.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government; the amendment of Mr. Gray (Windsor West) (p. 17722); and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Langdon (p. 17725).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. Associate Minister of National Defence has the floor. She has four minutes, plus ten minutes questions and comments.

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, before Question Period, I was just talking about the impact of the budget on the Department of National Defence. I would just like to conclude those remarks by indicating that the costs of our operations in the gulf have been running about $105 million a month. We have absorbed much of that within our regular budget. We did have a supplementary estimate in the fall, about one-third of which was directly related to the operating costs in the gulf.

In this budget there is provision for $600 million to look after some of our costs, some of which will be incurred in this fiscal year, but not paid for until the following year. We also anticipate there will be some continuing costs over the period of time.

• (1530)

I have already heard from colleagues on both sides of the House that perhaps that money will not be needed and that they want it for their particular programs. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that DND will be using that money as frugally as possible. Any remaining, however, will be going back to reduce the deficit, not for any individual programs that members might promote. I want again to assure that we do have the funds to look after the men and women, the equipment and the transportation that will be required during this period.

Finally, coming back to the budget, I think all members of this House, no matter which side of the House they are on, would want to congratulate the Minister of Finance. What he has done is walk the very fine line required in this time of recession. We know that times are tough, and we know that many Canadians are suffering in one of the worst economic downturns in years.

But in responding to those troubled economic times, the Minister of Finance has avoided hampering our economic prospects for tomorrow by imposing band-aid solutions. He has responded, first of all, by helping those Canadians who are hardest hit by the recession but, more important, he has positioned us for an economic recovery that will take advantage of low interest rates, low inflation, and new opportunities for Canadians.

Who will benefit as a result of this budget? All Canadians will benefit. As we emerge from the recession with stable prices, with government spending under control, perhaps the greatest beneficiaries will be future Canadians, our children. They will thank us for taking strong measures now to reverse the mistakes of the past and pave the way for tomorrow's opportunities.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have some questions for the associate minister, which arise from her comments about defence spending and the budget.

I personally was a little confused about comments in the budget that came down yesterday. I went back to the expenditure noted in the 1990 budget to find that last year we had budgeted under defence $11.87 billion and for 1991-1992, this year, we were to have an expenditure of $12.46 billion. In the budget that came down this week, we see the budget for this year instead of $12.46 is $12.7 billion. However, we did have in Supplementary Estimates, a vote which increased the defence budget to cover the costs of the gulf war.

Repeatedly I have asked at the joint meeting of external affairs and national defence, which has been sitting while the House was adjourned, about the cost of the gulf war. I have heard the minister of defence say that all the funds that were voted in the expenditures in December covered all the costs of the war up to and including the end of March 1991. But when those Supplementary Estimates were voted in December, we were not at war at that time. We know that we have had additional costs since then. He assured me that all those additional costs were included in the Supplementary Estimates.

My confusion is: if they estimated that was to cover us up to the end of March and we are presumably today, thanks be to God, seeing the end of that war in the Gulf, I cannot understand the need for $600 million in addition to the regular budgeted additional funding to defence this year. I wonder if the deputy minister could explain that, please, the associate minister.

Mrs. Collins: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has the same difficulty many people have. It is the associate minister. The deputy is of course our very fine deputy, Mr. Fowler, who gives us excellent advice on so many issues related to defence.

Just to bring us back to what we are talking about in the defence budget, we have received 5 per cent nominal growth in the defence budget, this year over last year. That is not including the $350 million. That did not become part of our base, Mr. Speaker, so you take our old base and add 5 per cent. There have been some adjustments because we no longer have to pay GST. That came out of the budget, but we basically have $12.8 billion for the coming year.

The $350 million which was allocated in the Supplementary Estimates was not all for gulf related expenses. There was expenses for Oka in that, $16 million; some for the operations in the gulf; and some for capital. For example, $100 million was for the acquisition of the additional Hercules aircraft, the transport aircraft. Some of the additional $600 and million will also probably go toward that capital will be required, but there will be expenses that will flow into next year. We have incurred expenses that I am sure will not get paid for until the coming 1991–92 fiscal year, and the expenses have been going up.

The deployment of the field hospital was not taken into account in our earlier estimates, so our costs have risen, running now at about $105 million a month. We have been accommodating about $70 million of those in our regular expenditures and about $35 million we are looking to come out of the additional allocations. All the bills are not in; it is hard to say. We do not know what the costs are going to be to bring our people home or how long they are going to be there. The hospital, for example, might stay for a period of time if there is a need for it, if the British or others require it. There may be a need for the ships to remain for a period of time.

Really until we see how things unfold at the UN Security Council, what the future is going to be, it is a little hard for us to predict what those kinds of expenses are going to be. But we will be monitored on the $600 million. We are not allowed to spend it on just ordinary things. They are going to make sure that it is used for its purpose. What we do not spend goes back to reduce the deficit.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of questions for the associate minister. The first springs from, of course, the effect of the end of the gulf war for which we are all, no matter what our differences on how we arrived there, grateful. All of us have also shared a great admiration for the professionalism and competence of our forces there. We differed on the instructions the government should have given them, but we supported their role in the sanctions and supported them in their professionalism and on the work they have done.

There is now the question of what happens next. The Huron is half way there. The Restigouche has orders to sail on March 5, which is coming up very quickly. The people of our area, greater Victoria, are obviously very concerned as to whether the orders will change as a result of the outcome of the war. The government, it seems to me, owes it to the families and to those who are on board those vessels to make an immediate decision as to whether those orders should be changed or whether they should be confirmed.

Let me say that the situation is such that it would seem to me imperative that the government not only review the orders quickly, but in fact make a change in the orders. Our forces would no longer face an enemy that is armed and equipped to attack the naval forces in the gulf.

Sanctions may be continued, presumably for a relatively brief period of time, in order to enforce the remaining UN resolutions, but sanctions will not require a significant military force from countries outside the gulf in order to enforce those sanctions. The naval forces of Bahrain, Qatar and the other countries in that region are entirely capable of enforcing the sanctions in the current situation.

We would call on the government to make an immediate decision, to bring our forces home and to reverse the orders given to the Huron and the Restigouche.

Let me ask one other quick question. Our forces who served there, all of our forces who served there, served in a very dangerous situation. Our CF–18 pilots actually were in effect in combat, and our naval forces worked under the threat of Iraqi missiles and planes.

• (1540)

The war veterans legislation provides that veterans of other wars be given pensions under that legislation. It will require an amendment to the legislation to cover the veterans of the gulf war.

I would ask the minister to make a commitment on behalf of the government, that legislation will be introduced to provide that those who served Canada in the gulf be treated as veterans of other operations.

While the minister is on her feet, would she also make a commitment to those who have served in peacekeeping, because they too have served Canada in a dangerous and risky situation?

Mrs. Collins: Mr. Speaker, there are a number of questions there.

First of all, I believe it would be imprudent to make decisions today about the arrangements for our ships until we know the outcome of the Security Council deliberations which are going on as we speak. Until we know for sure that there will be a permanent cessation of hostilities and until there has been some agreement on what the future regime is going to be with respect to sanctions or continuation of any kind of a presence, we want to continue to be ready to deal with the rotation of our ships. The Athabaskan and the Terra Nova have been there. We have committed that we are going to bring them out as quickly as possible.

If for some reason there should still be a need for a Canadian naval presence over the next couple of months, we would want to make sure we had our other ships there so the Athabaskan and the Terra Nova would be relieved and be able to come home, as we have promised them.

At this time, we have, in fact, told the Huron to continue on its voyage. We are, of course, reviewing the situation. Our senior military advisors are in touch with our commanders in the field, with the members of the other coalition forces to assess just what should happen and will make other decisions relating to these matters as quickly as possible.

Until we have all the facts, until we have all the information, I think it would be foolish to make precipitous decisions.

I might say that from my understanding, the sailors ready on the Restigouche probably want to go. Even if they got down to Hawaii and had to come back, I think they would probably prefer that rather than staying in port.

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to take this opportunity to congratulate my colleague from British Columbia, the hon. minister, particularly for the clarifying comments she has made.

We both know that the B.C. government has been very critical of the federal government for the fact that we don't have a balanced budget such as the one they are so proud of in British Columbia. Yet we have been making real progress, I think, in this budget to come to a balanced budget. Mr. Vander Zalm, has continued to be extremely critical of the federal government.

I was just wondering if the minister could clarify for Mr. Vander Zalm why this budget is such a good thing, not only for Canada, but particularly for British Columbia.

Mrs. Collins: I would be pleased to reply to my hon. friend from British Columbia.

I know that in British Columbia they often enjoy fed–bashing. I am not particularly keen on provincial–bashing. But I must say that in this instance, the premier is wrong. This budget is good for British Columbia. After all, British Columbia's economy is based on trade and a viable, vibrant economy and low interest rates, low inflation, which are absolutely critical to the expansion of the economy of British Columbia. Those are the kinds of initiatives we are undertaking.

The initiative in this budget to legislate spending limits is the kind of thing I would expect the province of British Columbia to applaud. It would seem to be consistent with their philosophy. The provisions in this budget to set up a special fund into which the net revenues of the GST will go, guaranteeing that they will go to reduce the deficit, not for other programming expenditures; a fund to which the profits from privatization will go; a fund to which individuals can contribute to help reduce the deficit. These are the kinds of measures that the province of British Columbia should be applauding, because they are the kinds of measures that will ensure that we have economic growth and that we have the entrepreneurship flourishing in British Columbia.

One other thing. Just prior to the budget I had the pleasure of announcing in Vancouver, that my colleague, the Minister of Finance, was approving amendments to the Income Tax Act which would allow for the establishment of international maritime centres. This is something the province of British Columbia has been asking for and something I have had the honour, as the minister responsible for the Asia—Pacific initiative, to work on over the past two years. That initiative by my colleague, by this government, is going to result in a considerable number of jobs, some of which have already been announced this week when the first company announced it is moving its mine and management operations from outside Canada to Canada, to Vancouver, bringing 80 jobs. That is one week. We have lots more to come.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has a minute and a half if he would like to ask as very succinct question, and then I will recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona on debate.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I would be delighted to make a succinct comment to the minister. I listened to her speech with some interest. She talked about the dreadful deficit situation that this country was in, which she of course neglected to mention was the fault of the government of which she is a member, which has doubled the debt in the last six years. In fact we are going to hit $400 billion sometime during this financial year. It is a shocking statement of the government's abdication of responsibility; it keeps trying to shuffle it off as though it was the fault of someone else.

I am glad to hear the minister talk about her conversion to this necessity for restraint on government expenditure. But I would like to ask her why it is that the Minister of Finance who has been in office after all now for six or seven years—this is the seventh budget—and he talked about the need for restraint in year one, why it is that his policies have been such a disaster for Canada? If he believed in restraint from the beginning as he says he did, why did he not impose this restraint at the beginning and solve the problem we are now faced with and that is continuing?

I note that the deficit has gone up this year. It is going up again next year and he does not seem to be doing anything constructive to bring that figure down.

Mrs. Collins: Mr. Speaker, I could go on at length on this, because we have. Do you not recall that in 1984 we inherited a deficit of $38 billion? We brought it down to below $30 billion. We have made real progress in terms of reducing the deficit in some difficult times. We have had marvellous economic growth through these years to the extent that we are one of the leading countries in the OECD.

I am delighted that the member is now talking about restraint. Perhaps his colleague, the Premier of New Brunswick, who talked about how governments must conduct themselves like private citizens: borrow if necessary for capital assets like your home, but pay as you go for current expenditures like groceries, that is the kind of approach this government is taking. I wish the Liberal Party—it is not reflected in his leader, or his deputy leader, and their comments in this House. Perhaps he might heed the Premier of New Brunswick and understand that this is the kind of initiative—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate, the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, it is always interesting to hear Liberals and Conservatives arguing with each other about who has responsibility for the deficit. It is like two Mafia families arguing with each other about who has been able to commit the most robberies in their respective jurisdictions.

The fact is that the deficit owes its origins to the policies of both of these parties over a great many years.

This is a budget allegedly preoccupied with addressing the problem of the deficit. This is a budget which calls in glowing terms for all Canadians to do their part. But the big corporations that finance the Conservative Party and that financed the promotion of the free trade agreement have emerged unscathed and unchallenged. They apparently are not part of the larger Canadian community that is called upon to face economic reality and pitch in.

Yet everyone else is being called upon to contribute to a debt problem that has its origins, as I said just a few minutes before, in the tax breaks that these same people, these same large corporations, received over the last 15 years, many of which—that is to say these tax breaks—had their origins in the policies of Liberal governments.

This budget eliminates not a single such tax break. So the rich will continue to get richer, the poor will continue to get poorer, and middle-income Canadians will increasingly be taxed until they, too, are poor.

The boys over at the Business Council on National Issues will be breaking out the champagne. Others, and not them, thank God, are called upon to help their country. Oil companies whose profits have risen since the gulf war also get off scot free while working Canadians are asked to pay more taxes to help pay the cost of other working Canadians fighting in the gulf.

• (1550)

Average Canadians are to suffer a tax hike through increases in Unemployment Insurance premiums, a measure that will also hurt small businesses.

The unemployed, themselves, see their job creation programs chopped: $100 million from the Canadian Job Strategy.

Those who could benefit from new social housing see that program cut back.

Provinces are hit with the next stage in the step by step withdrawal of federal commitment to cost-shared programs and by the limiting of deductibility of provincial payroll and capital taxes. A revenue neutral measure, so the Minister of Finance says, that could therefore only be vengeful in nature and hardly a contribution to national unity. And all Canadians who use provincially administered services like health care will become the victims of further cutbacks in their respective provinces.

Meanwhile, the rich will continue to be able to afford to send their children to private schools to avoid the effects of cutbacks in education. They will continue to be able to fly to U.S. hospitals to avoid waiting lists for surgery in Canadian hospitals increasingly overcrowded and burdened because of under-funding owed to the fact of federal cutbacks in EPF.

And, in between, they will also be able to enjoy the over-all fact that their debt burdened country is still not asking them to contribute in the form of a truly progressive income tax system, in the form of increased capital gains taxes, in the form of wealth taxes, or heaven forbid, not being able to deduct their business lunches.

They may also take comfort in the fact that the dividend tax credit remains and that the corporations that many of them work for or own will continue to receive the subsidy of the 5 per cent federal sales tax credit, the subsidy for business lobbying and other political activities and the subsidy for Canadian multinationals investing overseas.

Nor will they have to fear the dreaded minimum corporate tax. Real estate developers, in particular, can relax and continue to enjoy all the breaks that enabled so many of them to become millionaires at taxpayers expense.

These people, all of them great critics of the welfare state, but not a peep out of them when it is they who have their nose so deep in the public trough.

A budget truly committed to deficit reduction and burden-sharing would have asked the corporate sector in this country to put up or shut up about the deficit. Indeed, there were some indications prior to the budget that the business community was asking for it, that they were asking to be asked to contribute, but they were not.

Instead, we have a budget that by its own words is more committed to "tax competitiveness" than "tax fairness".

Unfortunately, "competitiveness" is the euphemism employed by Conservatives for the growing immorality and unfairness of our tax system, recently capped of course, by the GST.

One can only suppose that the tax system in various military oligarchies, like Guatemala, where income tax itself is seen as radical, is the ideal of tax competitiveness to which good Conservatives aspire. The long-range goal of the hemispheric free trade agreement makes this more than just political rhetoric. Not for the Conservatives, the many European examples where social justice and competitiveness have gone together.

If a budget is more than just a tool for managing the economy, if it is also a statement about the values that inform the organization of that economy, then this budget is a failure on both counts.

I am glad to see the Minister of National Health and Welfare in the House because he said he did not want to miss the speech and I can understand that because I hope to talk about the whole question of Established Programs Financing and the future of medicare and, perhaps, while he is here I will have the opportunity to engage him in conversation about that.

I think what is happening to Established Programs Financing and to the programs which it it intended to finance, i.e. medicare and post-secondary education, is indeed worthy of all the rhetoric which has been used to describe the government's budget in the last few days.

The problem is that there is no one decision which, in itself, is the end of medicare. It is a bit like the story of the frog which will allow itself to be boiled to death if you simply turn up the heat one degree at a time. There would be no point at which the frog feels the increase in the heat enough to jump out of the boiling water. Yet inevitably at some point, the frog will be done so to speak and dead.

This is the case with those programs in this country which are being, over time, step by step, starved to death by the federal government. This process started not with the Conservatives but with the Liberals in 1982. It was former finance minister Allan MacEachen who was the first finance minister to unilaterally change federal–provincial fiscal arrangements.

The last time the federal–provincial governments agreed on this sort of thing was in 1977. I see the hon. member for Mississauga here. He will know what I am talking about. It was in 1982 that the Liberals unilaterally changed and cut back on federal transfer payments to the provinces under the rubric of the established programs financing, a move which at the time was denounced as the most dastardly deed possible by the Conservative opposition.

Yet unfortunately, what the Liberals did at that time set a precedent which has been followed religiously, and not just at the five year intervals of renegotiation, but in almost every budget, of unilateral cutbacks to federal transfer payments to the provinces.

There is no point at which in cutback after cutback after cutback we can say: "This budget kills medicare." What we are able to observe from 1982 onward—and an inescapable fact is that for most of the years since then the Conservatives have been in power—is a trend which if not stopped and reversed will eventually lead to the destruction of medicare as sure as I am standing here.

One cannot expect the health care system to be carried by the provinces, which are being asked to carry a larger and larger share of the burden. The share that the provinces have been asked to carry has grown. They may have benefited in the late 1970s and the early 1980s, but from 1982 on and particularly from about 1984, their share of the burden has been increased and their ability to carry the health care system has been affected.

What will be the results of that? Eventually, people will try to find ways; that is, provincial governments will try to find ways to supplement the reduction in funding and particularly if they are Conservative provincial governments, they will look for various ways of getting private money into the system.

That will happily coincide with their ideological views in the first place because many of them have a philosophical objection to medicare. And so we see everything falling into place, not to mention the effect of the free trade agreement in the long term on medicare.

One must do some analysis to see all this, but it is there. That is why I feel no intellectual or political embarrassment whatever in getting up and saying: "This budget is part of the end of medicare." Not tomorrow, not even next year, but it is part of a process that will eventually lead to the end of medicare. I rest my case with respect to that because I have other things I want to say.

• (1600)

I want to go back to the question of tax loopholes.

It seems to me that this is the glaring economic and moral flaw in a budget which calls upon everybody to sacrifice, that not one single sacrifice is asked of the corporate sector in this particular budget. Not only that, there are more benefits to come for the corporate sector. Just the other day, the Minister of Finance released draft legislation with respect to providing a capital gains tax exemption for people who have had their money tied up in trusts over this 21-year period that began in 1972 and which ends in 1993. The government has brought in draft legislation which proposes to extend the 21-year exemption for the taxation of capital gains from trusts until the last beneficiary of the trust dies. Under current rules, the government would have collected billions in revenues from trusts starting in 1993.

The current legislation, implemented in 1972, requires trusts to include in their income capital gains every 21 years. This legislation would allow the trust to extend the 21-year exemption, as I said, until the last beneficiary dies. The billions saved by trusts would be a gift to the top 1 per cent of wealthy Canadians who benefit from these trusts.

This exists at the same time as all these other measures in the budget which scapegoat people who work in the Public Service, the unemployed, and a variety of other people, and make them out to be the cause of the deficit. One of the causes of the deficit—a principal cause of the deficit—is the tax expenditure account that government after government refuses to significantly change.

I see the member for Mississauga South. He will recall that in 1979 when the Conservatives came to power, they released a thing called "The Tax Expenditure Account", because they had promised to do that. They have not done it since. They were then defeated and they were out of power for four years. When they came back, they decided that maybe that was not such a good idea. I don't know why.

The fact is that in 1979 the tax expenditures—that is to say, that money which could have been collected in the form of taxes but which was not collected—amounted to $32 billion. And the deficit for that year was $14 billion. So, at that time what the government did not collect in the form of tax expenditures, loopholes, shelters, super depreciation allowances, write-offs, was twice what the deficit was for that year.

It is those kinds of policies, cumulatively, which result in the fiscal situation that we find ourselves in now. I think if the government were serious about the deficit, it would get serious about closing some of these loopholes.

Surely to God, there is no reason on earth why we have to maintain something like the business and entertainment tax loophole. Many other industrialized countries of the world have done away with this, and their economies did not shrivel up and die. Many other industrialized economies in the world have wealth taxes; their economies have not shrivelled up and died. Many other countries in the industrialized world have more progressive income tax systems than we do, and they have not shrivelled up and died; in fact, many of them are more prosperous than we are.

So, I think that the government, if it is really concerned about the deficit, should look to asking those who have, and have in abundance, to pay in abundance in order to bring down a deficit that owes its origins to their abundance in the first place.

Mr. Speaker, I see you waving your finger at me. Twenty minutes goes by very fast.

Mr. Tremblay (Lotbinière): And you said nothing.

Mr. Blaikie: Somebody over there said that I did not say anything. I don't think that person was listening, Mr. Speaker, because what I have done is go over a variety of things, concrete loopholes that the Minister of Finance could have closed. The Minister of Finance is always saying: "Come up with suggestions". We have come up with suggestions. Year after year we have made suggestions, but those suggestions are not heard. Why are they not heard? Because if those suggestions were implemented, the people who run the Conservative Party of Canada and who run this country would not be very happy. The people down at the Business Council on National Issues or at the Canadian Clubs and the Carleton Clubs and all the other clubs where decisions are made about the country, they would not be very happy. Maybe the Tories could not go down there for lunch any more. They might have to go to some cafeteria somewhere and eat with ordinary folk.

I will not believe that the Minister of Finance is serious about deficit reduction until he hits these people. Until he does, I believe that the Conservative Party is using the deficit as a political cover for doing things that they would ideologically prefer to do in the first place.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the member for Winnipeg Transcona in the finance role he has now taken on. It would be wonderful if he could come to the finance committee meetings and go over tax expenditure hearings and give us some excellent advice.

The tax expenditure material is available. The finance committee did major studies on that at the time of the last major tax reform on income tax, going over every particular allowance to see what could be done to reduce any tax expenditure and I did not hear any great suggestions coming from him or his members or the member on the committee, his House leader, at that time. But perhaps he could get together with his House leader and find those various ideas.

Really, what he has said is that we should have no deficit. What we ought to do is make the rich pay. That is the kind of argument I heard once in an election from a Marxist-Leninist candidate. I was wondering if the member would like to define to this House who are the rich. How much more would he want us to increase taxes for those earning $28,000 a year, for those earning $58,000 a year? How much more would he want to put on their backs? Would he be specific? Make the rich pay. Well, who are the rich and who should pay? Give us the names, give us the people. What are the rates?

Let us not have any more of this ballyhoo, let us have the rates.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I find it amusing to have the member for Mississauga South accuse anybody else of ballyhoo, because the one thing he could have done when he got up would have been to have answered the long list of tax loopholes I pointed out that the government has not changed. But he never chose to comment as to why the government did not close them down. In the same way the Minister of Finance responding to me yesterday in the House only chose to debate me on one point and completely ignored all the rest.

It simply lacks all credibility for the member to get up and suggest somehow that I might regard people who make $28,000 a year as in the category of the rich. If the finance committee has done even a fraction of the study that the member claims, he would know just how ridiculous a claim that is.

The member knows to whom I am referring. The member knows absolutely and perfectly to whom I am referring. He knows about all the large profitable corporations in this country that pay absolutely no taxes at all on the corporate side. He knows that his own party has reduced a number of categories in the income tax system that results in a case where somebody making $60,000 a year pays the same amount as somebody making $600,000.

Perhaps the member could get up and tell us why he continues to defend real estate developers who receive all these tax credits for write-offs, for mergers and take-overs and all these sorts of things. Why is he a defender of the paper economy by which so many people have made millions by doing absolutely nothing over the last 10 or 15 years?

• (1610)

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, the member has commented on how there are countries as prosperous or more than ours but nevertheless, for example, tax wealth. They tax some of their well-to-do people much higher on income tax than Canada does and yet he says those countries have not had their economies shrivel up.

The kind of taunt that is very often tossed against the member or others who make that comment is that the wealthy people if they were taxed at all according to their ability to pay would simply run away to another country and take all their wealth with them.

I would like the hon. member to comment on the conduct of this country for the years during World War II and for two or three decades after when the tax rates were much more fair regarding people's ability to pay, how this country fared in those days and whether the wealthy people ran away from this country then.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for that question. He points out that the balance which used to exist in this country between the tax burden which was borne by the corporate sector and the tax burden which was borne by individual Canadians has disappeared. The burden on individual Canadians has risen, both in the form of incomes taxes and also in the form of consumption taxes, the latest incarnation of that being the GST, and the burden on the corporate sector has gone down, down, down, down until it has almost gone off the graph.

The question concerning whether if we were trying to reverse that, that people would leave, is interesting—that is to say rich folk would leave, because poor people generally have to stay where they are, and generally they are more dedicated to their country anyway because they have not been brought up in private schools where they learn to be dedicated to money rather than to countries or to society.

The fact of the matter is that if there are any Canadians here who think that the tax system would be enough to make them move to another country, then I have only one thing to say to them: "good-bye, good riddance, get lost, go somewhere else," because we can build a country without those kinds of people. In fact, we can build a better country without those kinds of people.

The fact of the matter is that if we were willing to enter into a long-term investment strategy to build up infrastructure in this country, technological capability, skilled worker capability and research and development, we would to create a certain kind of country that people would want to live in, work in and invest in anyway. This is what is called in a recent article in the Atlantic Monthly by Robert Reich "the virtuous cycle" rather than the "vicious cycle" which this government has got us into by trying to lower wages, not spend on infrastructure, and attract foreign investment. But when you lower wages and you do not spend on infrastructure, things get worse, people are not willing to invest, then you figure you have to lower wages one more time. You get into this downward spiral of degrading your own country, socially, economically and environmentally.

I would recommend to the government that it have a look at that article and consider getting out of the vicious cycle it is in now and get into what Mr. Reich has called "the virtuous cycle", which I think other countries—not the United States—but some European countries have been in for a long time, where they do not have a problem in attracting foreign investment because they have created the kind of skilled work force and technological adaptability and other forms of social benefits and strengths that make people want to invest and live there regardless of the fact that they have to pay taxes in order to create that kind of society.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. On debate, the hon. parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, forgive me for kneeling like this on my seat, but it is the best I can do in my condition.

I am happy to speak on these seventh Estimates presented by the Conservative government. What is most disheartening about the comments made on these seventh Estimates is that the Opposition is repeating the same thing every time. We have heard seven times now the same negative comments on the seven Estimates the Minister of Finance has tabled. Nevertheless, these have been gradually bringing the country back on the right track.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to review briefly the economic situation of Canada over the past ten years. But first, I would like to respond to my hon. colleague who just made reference to corporations which allegedly pay no tax among other things. That is false, Mr. Speaker, absolutely false. Since we came to power, in 1984, legislative amendments were brought forward so that Canadian corporations now pay their fair share.

Again, the hon. member provided no specific example of tax shelters for corporations in Canada. There is a good reason for that, Mr. Speaker: All tax shelters have been eliminated. There is even a tax for big corporations. Corporations have to pay taxes whether or not they make profits. Unfortunately, the hon. member failed to mention that. He failed to mention what this government has accomplished for social justice, as he failed to point out that all Canadian taxpayers, every individual, man or woman, are subject to a minimum income tax and that no one can avoid paying income tax through whatever mean or tax shelter.

Let's not forget that the taxation system established two years ago, which has reduced the tax burden of Canadians—and this is something else my friend forgot to say—; it is a system which is more equitable, fairer, a system with only three brackets, where people earning less pay less tax, and where those who earn more pay more. And that, Mr. Speaker, is something he forgot to mention.

At the beginning of my speech, I wanted to mention it to him.

Mr. Speaker, with your permission, I would like to read extracts from an editorial which appeared in Le Nouvelliste, an editorial written by Mr. Claude Bruneau and entitled Beyond the Budget, the deadlock remains. Mr. Bruneau said, and I quote: "Canadians everywhere urge Mr. Wilson to achieve two aims: reduce the deficit and stimulate the economy. But at the same time, they forbid him to use two means of going about it: tax hikes and pumping new money into the system, or spending". And he went on to say: "You can't ask one to do the impossible". And further still: "And in all that has been said in the last two days, we can find no trace of the ideal budget which would solve the problem without causing a public outcry".

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that these few words by Mr. Bruneau show that Canadians have come to realize how important and serious the deficit and the national debt have become.

You know, Mr. Speaker, we must not delude ourselves. When we speak of services provided to Canadians by all levels of government, federal, provincial, and municipal, as well as by the schools, we are speaking of services which have to be paid for. Canadians are starting to realize that, in effect, when they pay their taxes, it is for these services that they do it.

• (1620)

The question today is this: Are we willing to spend more to keep the services we have? That is the question. This year, we have a deficit of $30 billion, and without the cuts and the extraordinary performance of our Finance Minister, we would have had a deficit of $35 billion. And we also have a national debt which, as was pointed out earlier, has doubled in six years. Mr. Speaker, 87 per cent of the increase in the national debt is due to the interest we have to pay on the debt we inherited in 1984—87 per cent! This means that although the government has reduced its annual deficit, it is still and it must keep working on reducing its annual deficit, Mr. Speaker, because this debt is not the debt of Ottawa's elected representatives it is the debt of every single Canadian. Mr. Speaker, 36 cents out of every federal tax dollar goes to paying off the interest on the debt.

Not a single family in the riding of Trois-Rivières or in your own riding, Mr. Speaker, could survive if it had to spent 36 cents of every dollar on interest payments alone, without even paying back the capital, Mr. Speaker. No family could manage that. And we can't manage it, either. That is why these and other measures that will be taken are so severe. That is why provincial governments have a debt average of 11 cents per revenue dollar, which we could call reasonable.

Municipalities don't have the right to have a deficit. They are lucky. We, Mr. Speaker—thanks to the careless management of the previous government, which did have the right to incur a deficit, to have a national debt—had to pick up the pieces.

Mr. Speaker, in 1981-82, people were talking about a recession. This was 1981-82. The deficit was $14 billion. The government at the time doubled that amount, Mr. Speaker. The deficit soared to $28 billion in one year, the excuse being that Canadian men and women had to be helped through a difficult period. You know the results. The inflation rate was 10 per cent. Interest rates were around 22 per cent. The deficit doubled and it didn't solve a thing.

Taking money out of the pockets of some Canadian taxpayers and trying to put it in the pockets of other Canadians is no way to deal with a recession or inflation or interest rates. They tried this in 1981-82 and it was a real flop. Mr. Speaker, our Finance Minister has brought down a straightforward budget for economic recovery. He didn't raise taxes so he didn't stimulate inflation. He didn't spend more money, so he didn't make inflation go up, and he is taking care of lowering interest rates.

This is a budget to put companies and individuals on the road to recovery. It is realistic and adapted to the present situation, Mr. Speaker. The opposition's comments are typical. They keep talking about giving away money, investing money, but the question is always: Sure, you can invest money but where do you get it? I repeat, as Mr. Bruneau pointed out so eloquently, there is no one on the opposition side, to my knowledge and his knowledge, who has found a way to raise revenue which we have left untried.

Mr. Speaker, that is the major problem we have to face. There are no draconian cutbacks in this budget. There are no major cuts that might shock Canadians. And I am glad to see there is nothing that effects the riding of Trois-Rivières. However, Mr. Speaker, there are two extraordinary new measures. First, legislation to prevent departments from overspending their budget. And that Mr. Speaker, is news.

I think it is important, something which was positively emphasized in general. The other excellent measure is that specific legislation will be introduced to make sure that, by law, all revenues from the Goods and Services Tax will be allocated solely to bringing the public debt under control. Thanks to this excellent legislation, Canadian men and women will be assured that this government is using revenues from the GST to reduce the deficit and not to finance new spending programs which the Opposition is asking for daily, because they constantly ask us to increase spending.

When, as a young boy, I asked my father for money, sometimes he would say: "Where do you want me to get it?" Now, I am asking the Opposition where do they want the government to get the money? It is all very nice to keep on asking for money, but the time comes when the debt must be paid. The credit card is at the limit. Canadians understand now that such is our situation.

They will talk again about the so-call cuts which the Federal government is making in the transfer payments to the provinces. There are not such cuts. There are mainly two kinds of transfer payments to the provinces, namely the established financing programs and the equalization payment programs. Minister Wilson said that as far as Established Program Financing is concerned, the amount is frozen. Freezing and cutting are two different things. That is for one program. As for the equalization payments, they continue to increase.

Which means that from one year to the next, the provinces will get more money, especially those which are getting equalization payments and which are considered less affluent. For instance, Quebec received $8.2 billion in 1984-85; it will get $10.2 billion in 1990-91. This is a large amount which accounts for 30 per cent of Quebec's budget.

The provinces all together will get $36 billion—not $36 million—per year and as the Auditor General said, the Federal government transfers to the provinces $36 billion without getting a receipt. The provinces are free to spend that money as they please.

As I see it, Mr. Speaker, it is important to emphasize that because all departments here in Ottawa—the departments of my colleagues at Health and Welfare, the Secretary of State or Transport Canada—have to account for every cent they spend. And so they should. The Auditor General is responsible for checking all that, except for the $36 billion transferred to the provinces. The federal government has full confidence in the provincial administrations and let them spend that money as they see fit.

Mr. Speaker, again I must point out that this is not a cut-back but a freeze on established programs financing and an increase in equalization payments. I would suggest that the provinces—all provinces have boosted they expenditures by about 5 or 6 per cent a year since 1984 while our government has kept its yearly increases to 3 per cent—should examine their own performance. They have to look at the current situation in this country—they are part of it—and realize that if the federal government cannot afford increases over 3 per cent perhaps they too should consider imposing some restrictions.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all Canadians are aware of the extent of the problem in this country. And there are other problems besides that one. You will hear other people claim that the deficit is a minor issue, that the Constitution is more important. We each have or own priorities. When the economy is in the doldrums, everything else is down. That is the message Mr. Wilson wanted to convey. First things first, all Canadians must have bread and butter on the table. So what does that call for. It calls for business people who have faith in the administration of their government. It calls for business people who are satisfied that this government can indeed administer public finances, opt for harsh measures, and have enough political courage to implement them.

Criticizing comes easy to members opposite. I have been here for six and a half years and have yet to hear an opposition member make a positive comment on any of the legislation introduced by this side of the House. Never did I hear members opposite say: Well, this is a good piece of legislation. We agree it is good. Others we feel are not good, but this one is. Never, Mr. Speaker! Not one piece of legislation ever got their approval. It is mathematically impossible for a government not to pass a good piece of legislation in six and a half years. And the best evidence in that respect—all mathematical considerations aside—is that the people—

Mr. Wappel: Nonsense!

Mr. Vincent: —in 1988, the people acknowledged what we had done and we were reelected.

Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see we woke up someone on the other side. That is nice to see.

An hon. member: One of the three people on the other side, since that is all there is!

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, we were finally able to wake them up! That is a good sign.

So, Mr. Speaker, no one had the guts to say we had introduced some good pieces of legislation. This year, with this budget, and given the economic situation we are in, the opposition should support the budget and all the work that is being done to facilitate the economic recovery in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, you are telling me my time is almost up. In conclusion, I would like to read two articles, two editorials, one of which was published in La Presse yesterday, the second one, in Le Soleil. In Le Soleil, the article is entitled "Wilson sets an example". I think that title says a lot, not only to the provincial and municipal governments, but also to the business people. "Wilson sets an example".

In La Presse, Mr. Speaker, the editorial was entitled "An Honest and Far-Seeing Budget". Mr. Speaker, we often hear that a picture is worth a thousand words. In this case, I would say that these two titles are worth a thousand words.

Mr. Speaker, again, I invite the opposition to support the budget and the government in its effort to trigger Canada's economic recovery.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I get into questions and comments, I wish to inform the House that because of the ministerial statement Government Orders will be extended by 27 minutes this day.

The government Whip, on a point of order.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I think you will find unanimous consent in the Chamber for the following motion:

> Notwithstanding Standing Orders 33(2) and 84(4) the time to be added to government business this day as a result of ministers' statements will be added immediately following the division on the subamendment of Mr. Langdon at 5.45 o'clock p.m.

That would enable us to keep the timetable we had planned for the votes this evening, and yet not deprive members of the opportunity to speak on the major debate. I think you will find that the Whips of the other two parties would like to make a comment.

[Translation]

M. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, in a spirit of cooperation and to keep the House proceedings running smoothly, we give our consent to this motion.

[English]

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Yes, Mr. Speaker, there have been consultations. One of the things Whips strive to do is to have a degree of normalcy in a place that is not known for such. We wanted to avoid the confusion that was occurring because of the delay. Members have established their travel plans based on something they thought was fixed in the schedule of this House. I just want to say to some of my colleagues who were advised that the vote might be delayed that it is now back to where it was scheduled, so when you hear the bells, please come running.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Next time would you consider the chair officer too after the vote?

Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I would like to respond somewhat to my colleague from Trois-Rivières.

[Translation]

I should say, Mr. Speaker, that I have only been here for a little over two years, and I was elected as a member of the Liberal Party. I personally worked on a bill to amend the pension system in Canada. Not only was I in favour of this bill, but my Party supported it and voted for it.

Now, if my colleague on the other side of the House—

Mr. Gagliano: It is not the first time we hear the hon. member for Sudbury talks through her hat.

Mrs. Marleau: —if he paid more attention to what is going on in the House, he would realize that when government members are prepared to act in a reasonable and sound way, we on this side are also willing to serve the Canadian people. We are often told: "We know everything, we are the best there is, and you know nothing." Decisions are made by people in high places and imposed on people who would often have a lot to say, even things worth listening to.

If we were more attentive to what they have to say, our country would fare better, I think. You know, we hear people say things in an attempt to put the blame on others, who of course did everything wrong. But that is not the way to manage a country. It is high time we, as elected representatives of the people to the federal government, put an end to all of this. It is time we realize we have a country, with a lot of problems, and the way to solve them is not by tabling budgets that make no sense at all and claiming to have the answers to everything.

Sure, the debt is causing a lot of problems, that is obvious, but the recession is giving us problems too. The budget you brought in did not provide any solutions; you made forecasts based on projections that—

Mr. Gagliano: Never come true.

Mrs. Marleau: And we do not even know where you got them. You decided that within two or three years, the deficit will go down to $25.6 billion. That would be great if you were able to do that and show us how you will achieve it.

Mr. Gagliano: In 1985, they told us they would make it go down to $18 billion.

Mrs. Marleau: You are always promising things, but meanwhile we lose many jobs; people are unhappy, our country is coming apart, we do not know where we are going.

So, don't you think it is high time to begin thinking a little about people, particularly the neediest ones—and it looks like there are more and more of them. Do you want us all to be like that, do you want this country to become divided, finished, because there is nothing left? You know that when we do not invest in the future, the dollar we do not spend today will have lost two or three times its value in five or six years. When Conservatives came to power, you had years of extraordinary growth. So, do not try to put the blame on us if the debt kept growing, if it doubled. You, ladies and gentlemen opposite, have a lot to answer for.

• (1640)

If you were to try to justify the projections you have made in previous years and if you could explain those projections, then maybe, and I say maybe, we could believe you, but it is very hard when you change history as you go. I know I speak for my constituents and thousands of Canadians when I say you have lost all credibility.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I must apologize to the hon. member because I remember I worked with her on the bill, and I remember she agreed to do that. I apologize, because I remember now.

That being said, Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to the hon. member that since 1984, the number of individuals and families that has managed to rise above the poverty line has increased. There are fewer poor people now than there were in 1984. And that, Mr. Speaker, is something the hon. member will have to recognize as well.

As for the debt, Mr. Speaker, and the hon. member brought this up but I would like to remind her that in 1984, the debt was $200 billion. Since that time, interest payments on the debt are roughly equivalent to our annual deficit. The hon. member can check this: 87 per cent of the increase in the national debt represents the interest payable on a debt that existed before I was here. I know she doesn't like to hear that, but it's the truth, Mr. Speaker. We have to live with it, she does and I do and all Canadians do.

That's the problem. That's why I say that every time her party asks or she asks for more money, it has to come from somewhere. The question is, where do we get the money we need to pay for the expenditures she wants, in whatever area? Of course, as a government, we can spend in practically every area. There are plenty of opportunities for spending. But where do we get the money? That is the question.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I would also like to point out to the hon. member, that when she talks about divisions across the country, last year her caucus helped to create those divisions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Further questions? The hon. member for Edmonton East.

[English]

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I noted that towards the conclusion of the hon. member's remarks he said—I am relying on the translation—"We need a government in which business can have confidence".

Given the indulgence, not to say the bottomless generosity, with which this government has treated its soulmates in the Business Council on National Issues, I should think that big business— big corporations and the wealthy in this country—would not only have confidence in this government, they would be enchanted with it. Anything less could only be seen by fair-minded people as the most churlish ingratitude on their parts.

However, the hon. member started his speech saying that my confrère from Winnipeg was out to lunch when he was claiming that there were people in this country who were not paying taxes.

The proof of the pudding is in the tasting. Revenue Canada produces annual statistics for which 1988 was released in November of last year. It showed that of all those Canadians earning $250,000 or more in 1988, 140 of them paid no tax. That was up by 40 per cent from the same figure for 1987. Of those earning $50,000 or more, fully 5,430 paid no tax and that was up by a whopping 87 per cent from the year earlier.

How this can be construed by anyone as evidence of a fair taxation system quite escapes me. But I would be fascinated to listen to the hon. member's attempt.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I don't have offhand the figures that the hon. member mentioned. However, I hope he will understand, since he has been repeating the same thing for two years, and I hope too that the Canadian people will understand.

There is now, in the Income Tax Act, provision for a minimum personal tax, and there are only three tax reduction schemes. First, the person has suffered a loss. He or she can deduct it from his or her income, and this is only fair, if you lose money you should be able to claim the loss.

Second, the person has made charitable gifts, and third the person is paying alimony. These are the only three possibilities allowing a person earning, say $100,000, not to pay income taxes. If that person does not pay taxes it is because he or she is entitled to these deductions, and they are the only three. My colleague might not understand that, but if he had lost $50,000 last year he would be glad to be able to deduct that loss from his income. If it is a loss it can be deducted, but these are the only three reasons.

I will conclude by saying that my colleague should go back to his books and try to understand the system.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Central Nova. I am sorry; the hon. member for South West Nova.

The Budget

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): If I had the power of the member for Central Nova, I would do a few things differently, Mr. Speaker.

In the finance minister's budget speech this week he spoke solemnly of the need for realism and I quote:

> —we must deal with the world as it is, and not as we might wish it to be.

That is the finance minister's view of the world, but he neglected to add that the uncertain world Canadians now face is largely of his making.

This, after all, is our first made–in–Canada recession, and given this government's trade and economic policies, recessions may soon be the only thing we will be able to make in Canada. It falls to the members of the Liberal opposition to set the record straight on both the extent of the government's responsibility for economic mess and how its prescription for recovery will affect average Canadians.

We have to put a human face on this government's so–called "plan for economic recovery". I think of it as a continuation of the government's plan for the end of Canada, a Canada as we used to know it.

Somebody said that The Gazette this week showed a picture of the Prime Minister with Schefferville behind with an X through it and he was holding Canada in his hand with a question mark. I have tried to trace that cartoon because I think it is very real as to what is happening in Canada.

Let us talk about the deficit. The member from Trois–Rivières has his ideas. I commend him for his ideas, but I would also like to talk about it from the other side.

In every budget since 1984, the Minister of Finance has loudly proclaimed his unshakeable commitment to get Canada's public finances in order, to correct "the mess" he claimed the Liberal government had left for him to clean up.

In this budget he made the same claim. On page 2, he says:

> We will put government finances firmly on the course to a balanced budget.

As an aside to that, with the GST revenues he should be able to.

The time has come to call his bluff on this one. When he took over finance in 1984, the annual deficit stood at $38 billion and the accumulated public debt at $187.2 billion. This is high, to be sure, but understandable when you consider that Canada was coming out of the worst—not a made–in–Canada recession—international recession; forces that were beyond Canada since the depression.

• (1650)

This, we are told, is a made-in-Canada recession, forces are in the direct control of this Minister of Finance. Nobody else can be blamed. He is the Minister of Finance. It is a made-in-Canada recession, not international, not when all the other countries in the Group of Seven had high interest rates, high inflation and high unemployment.

In 1991, the annual deficit is forecast to be $30.5 billion, and the total debt—this is the minister this week—has exploded to $388.2 billion, going to $400 billion this year. This is incredible when we remember that for most of this government's time in office, we have seen unprecedented economic growth and prosperity, and no attempt to control their deficit or to reduce the total debt.

Rather than attempt to retire the accumulated debt during the good times, this government made no progress at all. Now we find ourselves in a serious recession, a downturn that may be worse than the one in 1981-82, a made-in-Canada downturn, and the minister is saying that he has no room to manoeuvre. The minister is telling us he has no ideas; no room to stimulate the economy, no room to give Canadians some hope for the future.

Today the government is saying that we are going to have lower interest rates, lower inflation, but higher unemployment. Given the minister's poor track record in meeting his own targets in the last budget, it is unlikely that his interest rates and inflation goals will be achieved, and one has to fear that the unemployment rate will be even worse than he predicted this week.

What little progress the minister may have made toward controlling expenditure during the good times was made exclusively on the backs of the average Canadian through massive tax increases, not through any enlightenment by the minister for finding new means to create something in Canada.

Since 1984 when this government first came into power, individual Canadians have been hit with 31 major tax increases—between 1984 and 1989. Average Canadian families have suffered as much as a 176.3 per cent increase in their tax bill. The Canadian Tax Journal of March, 1990 reports that the tax changes since 1984 have seen the average Canadian family pay about $1,000 more in tax while 640 Canadians earning more than $100,000 paid no tax at all in 1987.

Other figures show that where the 1984 tax system is still in effect, Canadians households would be paying some $11.1 billion less in taxes. That $11.1 billion could have been circulating in the economy. It could have been generating wealth and creating jobs. It could have been supporting demand for Canadian goods and services.

This year Canadians will have to put up with the goods and services tax and the additional 7 per cent burden on all their purchases. They will face this 7 per cent every day and not just when the quarterly rebate cheques come out.

I do hope that the government follows through on its plan, that it did put this 7 per cent tax in without having said why it was putting it in. But in the budget this week, the minister said he would now bring forward a new fund to show how it would reduce the accumulated debt. In the meantime, until we get that, it is going into general revenues. I do not think that is a fair expectation. The Canadian people do not want to see the government spend this money irresponsibly; not when that GST is so severe on so many Canadians.

Since 1984, during unprecedented growth and prosperity, no effort was made by the government to plug loopholes in the tax system.

I think of capital gains. Perhaps we did not need them, if you tax the working poor to the extent that they are being taxed. When speaking of capital cost allowances and inventory cost accounting, Mrs. Maxwell, when she appeared before the committee, said that those were areas that could have been closed.

Even the RRSP: Canadians were savers in the past. They used their own savings for their own direction. Maybe it is time that the RRSP should be looked at, because it certainly is not the lower income Canadians who are using the RRSP. We hope on this side that our tax group which is looking at tax reforms will look across Canada to find solutions. This government certainly does not seem to be talking to ordinary Canadians.

They should have looked at some of the program expenditures. I can mention one: ACOA, $2 billion. Where did the $2 billion go? As it now stands, ACOA is using the money to help some businesses. I don't know how some businesses get it and others don't, but that is the discretion of somebody in ACOA, creating, in my opinion, unfair business advantages. It has created an unfair playing field for many entrepreneurs, when it should be spending to upgrade the regional economy generally.

What do I mean by "upgrading"? We need to improve water and sewer services, transportation services; we need to improve skill development; we need to ensure that economic development will be environmentally sustainable. I take note, with considerable regret, that these latter two—skill development and environmental protection—have taken a serious blow in the budget. We need to develop this regionally so that the region, as a whole, can compete more effectively in the Canadian, North American and world markets.

Unless such basic infrastructure changes are made, we will continue to see ACOA-funded businesses fail, like the closing of Dominion Textiles, a textile plant that had existed for 115 years or more. So many jobs are gone just like that. They have gone to Quebec, when it started in Nova Scotia as a textile plant. We have to ask ourselves why did it go to Quebec? Why is it more effective to have a textile plant in Quebec than in Nova Scotia?

I myself think that it will not just stop in Quebec, it will go to the U.S. Under the free trade agreement that is where some of the jobs in Yarmouth have already gone.

The Atlantic Defence Industries, with several millions of dollars of both provincial and federal assistance has gone under. It has a life of six months to finish the contract.

Why this? Why the selectivity and not longer lasting? Why is ACOA not telling us what is wrong?

We will also see the tourist business go under, because we see big grants to some hotels and not to others. You can take probably any area and find that one was funded by ACOA and an existing business is not getting the funding. It is not a fair playing field.

Had the government been genuinely creative in addressing the deficit over the past few years, it might not be in the ridiculous position of trying to balance the books during a recession. It is too late to do that now. You cannot, in my opinion, balance the budget when we are in a recession. You cannot balance a budget with growing unemployment. You cannot balance a budget when business bankruptcies are running at record levels. You cannot balance a budget on the backs of the unemployed and the under-employed, the working poor, and those working in unstable part-time and low-paying service sectors.

Let me talk about the budget as it relates to Nova Scotia. Let's look more specifically at the effect of the budget forecasts in cuts, as it will affect my own province.

The minister forecasts an unemployment rate for 1991 of 10 per cent. This is a national average, of course. In Nova Scotia, we usually have a higher rate than the national average. In 1989, for example, the Atlantic rate was 9.9 per cent, 2.2 per cent above the national rate. When you consider the lay-offs that are hitting my area alone, in Yarmouth where 300 jobs will be lost at Dominion Textile plant, in Bridgetown where Atlantic Defence Industries may soon close—and that has only been around since the last election project; that was an election project. Atlantic Defence Industries may soon close for good, taking some 200 jobs with it and, of course, the effect of the new individual quota system on Scotia Fundy inshore fishermen and processors alone may cost one-half of existing employment. The rate is only going to increase. The rate of unemployed has to increase.

• (1700)

Remember that the unemployment insurance rate does not account for the many discouraged workers who have given up looking. I am looking at something in which the Canadian Labour Council states that the real unemployment rate in Canada is 14.6 per cent in December because about 738,000 Canadians have been forced either to drop out of the work force or take part-time work.

The real rate of unemployment is not what the minister is talking about. He is just talking about those who are still in the labour force survey.

No, it does not take into account the hardship facing young people, the elderly, who make up the 175,000 of Nova Scotia's 1986 population of 873,000. We understand that large numbers of people have been left out in the cold by this plan for economic recovery. No, it does not take into account many thousands of Nova Scotians. We just know that the rate in Nova Scotia, even if it stays at 10 per cent, will mean that 41,930 people in Nova Scotia who were collecting unemployment insurance last November, in 1990, when the provincial rate was 10 per cent, can look forward to another year of unemployment, thanks to this government.

They might survive if the new unemployment insurance rules brought in by this government do not force them on to the welfare system first.

The topic of welfare leads me to discuss the extension of the freeze on Established Programs Financing transfers. I should say here that the minister through government should not reduce the deficit through Established Programs Financing cuts in 1991. The minister himself said that in 1982.

I have a quote to which I will not refer, but he was talking here in this House.

The Established Programs Financing cuts will hit Nova Scotia particularly hard since Donald Savoie said in his recent report, "Reaching Maturity for ACOA", that people in Nova Scotia earn about 15 per cent of their income through transfer payments compared to the national average of 11 per cent.

Preliminary estimates show that the extension of the freeze will cost the province another $423 million in health care and post-secondary education funds. When added to the previous established program funding cuts by this government, the extension brings the cost to Nova Scotia to upward of $1.5 billion in the fiscal year 1995-96.

What does it mean to the people of Nova Scotia? It means fewer students attending our universities and colleges because tuition fees will have to go up to pay for the cutbacks. For those students who do go, it means classes that are in the hundreds and in deteriorating facilities.

Imagine the hypocrisy of our Prime Minister loudly proclaiming his commitment to upgrading our labour force skills as he presides on the systematic dismantling of our post-secondary education system. It means hospital beds being closed and longer line-ups.

Apart from their direct effect, these cuts will have an effect on provincial budgets. They will also have an indirect effect on municipal budgets and ultimately on all the people because they will see their services being cut back by the provinces not being able to share in the 50 per cent dollars under the Canada Assistance Program and also being cut back by the Established Programs Financing freezes.

A person could talk quite at length, but I have to say that the saddest part of this budget is that it does not take into account the problems that exist in the manufacturing areas in our province. In the Atlantic economy review of 1990, in agriculture, for instance, in Nova Scotia, the total farm cash receipts in 1989 were $229.9 million. In 1990 they had decreased; $228.5 million.

In fishing the total of all groundfish—and this is a sad one— caught in 1989 was 197.5 tonnes at a return of $132 million. In 1990 the amount of fish caught was 178.7 tonnes and the value of it with a higher dollar was $138.7 million. We are not giving responsible manufacturing approaches to the regional economy of our area.

We have a Minister of Fisheries who will not talk to businesses. We have a press release, I think was put out today, by the Maritime Fishermen's Union saying, unless the province and the federal government start looking at what they are doing to the inshore fishery, unless their policies are not directed to big companies, the multinationals, we are not going to have anything left of the inshore. I quote from the Maritime Fishermen's Union: "As well, the maritime inshore ground fishery cannot survive DFO's individual boat quota system which allows large companies to buy inshore quota and fish it with larger vessels. It is only a matter of time before the inshore will lose complete access to groundfish stocks, thus eliminating inshore ground fishery."

It does not listen to people. The Liberal task force on the recession heard that this government is not listening to Canadians. If it listened, this Minister of Finance might have new and innovative ideas. He will not listen.

I say to the minister; come down and talk with the Minister of Fisheries who will not talk to Nova Scotians in the fishery. I say to him; come down and talk to the people and he will know that this is not the budget that is going to take us out of the recession.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate my colleague on an excellent speech, focusing on an issue that I think we have seen to be a hallmark of the Conservative government and that is, very simply, not listening to people.

I was interested in how my colleague focused in on her area of the country, which is something we sometimes forget. When we look at a budget, we look at budget papers, we look at averages, we look at numbers, we look at statistics and, of course, we forget about people. We see that the unemployment rate is forecast to be an average of 10 per cent. Of course, my colleague reminded us all that, indeed, in her area of the country it is very likely going to be much higher.

She invited the government to listen, but did not have an opportunity to tell the government what she heard when the Liberal task force went through her area. So, I would like to ask her if she would be kind enough to tell me and, hopefully, some members on the other side who might just listen, exactly what was heard when the people of Nova Scotia spoke.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I think there were probably three things that came through. The representatives of the Chamber of Commerce for Nova Scotia said that the interest rates of the government had brought on an awful lot of the problems and that they had lost control of that. They also felt that the free trade agreement, for whatever it was, was certainly taking away from the manufacturing sector and that the jobs created were certainly lower paying service industry jobs, rather than manufacturing.

I tried to point out in my speech that if you lose agriculture, if you lose fisheries, you are losing high paying manufacturing jobs. Whereas, if you are creating in the service industry, you are starting at a very minimum wage and chances are those people are not going to have full-time employment. Let us say Sheraton is going to build in New Brunswick under a lot of ACOA funding, how is it to compete with other establishments there? They can start with very low wages as well. The other thing that was heard was that they are not listening to people. The mayors said that if they would just leave it as a fair playing field then we could compete, but they are not doing that. Their policies are from one point to the other.

• (1710)

The third thing, of course, being in my area, they heard from fishermen who have been involved in the fishery. They have asked for the minister to come down and he will not. I cannot understand how the Minister of Fisheries can be a Minister of Fisheries, take responsible taxpayers' money and still not go and see where the concerns are for his job. I cannot understand a Prime Minister who would have a Minister of Fisheries who has not gone in to see the inshore fishery in Nova Scotia. I just show you the Maritime Union. That is not the larger boats, but the smaller boats.

The other thing that people are hearing is that this minister talked about realism. Well, reality means that disabled persons have to live on fewer dollars a month. It means that young children are going to bed at night cold and going to school in the morning hungry. It means family breakdowns, the increase of family violence and crime, all of which impose their additional costs and have to be covered somewhere in the system.

It is the ultimate irony. It will mean a reduction in the type of social services designed to help people and families who are going to be in that situation.

I want to give one example. I had a person who came in. He had a full-time job. He was entitled to unemployment insurance. He worked part-time at K-Mart. He was married and had two very young children, one of whom was sick. He was in his mid to late 20s. His take-home pay was about $400 and he was able to supplement it—some people do not realize that you can get UI benefits to supplement your income per week—to, I think, about $600. However, he needed more than $600 for a family of four to live on, even in Nova Scotia.

I phoned welfare on his behalf. When you looked at the budget, he was entitled to $41 more a month out of such a rich country. There were no jobs. He would have liked to have gone on training, but there was no training. He would have taken anything. In a country as rich as Canada is, to see that time and time again in the three constituency offices in my riding, it begins to hit home that something is wrong.

How do the people tell this government that its policies are not working? Where do they want them to go? They do not even have money to take them out of Nova Scotia let alone train them for other jobs that they might be able to go to. You know, $600 is not much to live on for a family of four. The man wants to work and he is working part-time. If there was a full-time job he would be working. That is what people are saying.

The Budget

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the member who just spoke would tell the House this.

One of the problems that we have with the people on the other side in the government is that it seems to me they are primarily concerned about an upper-income constituency in Toronto or Montreal. I cannot say Ottawa any more in light of what they have done to public servants here, but the Forest Hill, Bridal Path, Upper Rosedale set, I think, is their natural constituency. I wonder when they cap education programs, welfare—

An hon. member: You should be gentle to your ex-buddy.

Mr. Blenkarn: The wealthy Kilgours.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We have one minute left. The hon. member for Edmonton Southeast will put his question.

Mr. Kilgour: Before the member was rudely interrupted, would you tell us how these cappings on education, welfare and so on are going to affect the provinces, including the maritime provinces, which I suspect some of these people with us today have never been to.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): I want to say that the member is a welcome addition to our party. I have had some good conversations with him, and I am sure his question today shows this House exactly what will happen.

I can tell you what will happen. You just have to take an area under a school board, Mr. Speaker. It used to be that the province could get 50 cent dollars to pay for some of the services that they are giving. Now, they have to squeeze it somewhere else.

If they have to squeeze it from the school board, then the school board has to go to the municipal councils and say: "We need more money to maintain that remedial teacher," or, "to maintain our classes at 30 or 40 students." Who is hit again ultimately because of this minister's improper measures and improper ability to judge how far he can go? It's the Canadian people.

The people have been over taxed. They have a new GST to try to cut the deficit, but he has nothing stimulating to keep them going and employed. If they are not employed, there are not going to be taxes for those services. Again, we are going to become third class citizens in a wealthy country that we should not be.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I have been involved in the budgetary process in Parliament since 1979. I have been involved in lockups with Ministers of Finance since then.

I remember the budget of 1979, as I am sure you do, Sir, where the hon. member for St. John's East presented a budget that would have balanced. It would have provided for a tax on gasoline of 18 cents a gallon and would have given mortgage interest deductibility.

At that time in 1979, the funded debt of the country was $44 billion. I say "funded debt" because that is really the debt we should be talking about. What do we owe the bondholders? What do we owe the people from whom we borrow money on treasury bills? What do we owe people who have Canada Savings Bonds?

At the end of December 1979, we owed those people $44 billion. Then came the government that was elected in February 1980. By the end of its term, the funded debt for this country was $163 billion.

An hon. member: What is it today, Don?

Mr. Blenkarn: We are coming to that.

That funded debt was increased by that party in one Parliament only, four and a half years, a little better, by $119 billion.

Today on February 22, 1991—the last Bank of Canada statement on the amount of outstanding funded debt in the hands of the public—the amount we owed was $272 billion. I am rounding. That means the debt has increased in the six and a half years we have had the Minister of Finance in charge by $109 billion.

In terms of what we owe the public and not what is in the national accounts, not what we owe from one pocket of government to the other pocket of government, is $272 billion. That is an increase of $109 billion. All of that increase is a result of compound interest because we have not, in the course of managing the country, been able, despite massive cutbacks in expenditures and despite tax increases, to get the matter turned around as well as we would like.

I will come around to the turning around as we go along, but I want to let my friend from Edmonton Southeast, who is an expert writing on finance matters but never comes to finance meetings, have some information. The amount we are going to have to borrow this year will be $21.6 billion, plus or minus whatever has to happen in the exchange fund.

I might point out to the member for Edmonton Southeast that we presently have $23 billion in the exchange fund if we converted it to Canadian dollars. It costs money to keep an exchange fund.

Perhaps we ought to be able to reduce some of that exchange fund, but we are concerned of course about the trading value of the Canadian dollar. It would be impossible to reduce the exchange fund and not increase the value of the Canadian dollar right away. A lot of that is built up by trying to keep the Canadian dollar reasonably modest in the exchange rate with the United States. We have to treat the exchange fund as an asset, but it is an asset that does cost the country some money to carry.

I do not want to underestimate the cost of the debt and the problems we face, but let us not get carried away with crazy figures saying: "You owe $400 billion and $450 billion", and so on. The facts are set out weekly, for the member for Edmonton Southeast, in the Bank of Canada statements. All he has to do is look at them. He has been around here long enough, and I am sure he gets them delivered to his office every week. Why does he not look?

We have had a problem with the cost of running the country. On average since 1985 the cost of expenditures on program has been restrained to a 3.7 per cent annual increase. That is less than the rate of inflation. Despite increases in taxes, and despite keeping costs less than the rate of inflation, we have not yet been able to get to the point where we do not have to go to the market to borrow further money.

Hopefully, we will be able to do that, but this is not an easy matter. I want to speak, as I have spoken in the past, to this House on that matter.

We have a system that is a bit out of control. There are two things we have had to do and we must continue to do. First of all, we must look at the fiscal balance between ourselves as a federal government and the provinces and the responsibilities of the federal government and the provinces.

Second, we must eliminate the overlapping and duplication and triplication and quadruplication in some cases of government activity where the taxpayer—and there is only one taxpayer—pays bureaucrats.

Take Environment as an example. It pays bureaucrats in this government. It pays bureaucrats in the provincial government. It pays bureaucrats in the regional governments in Ontario. It pays bureaucrats in the municipal governments in Ontario and in every conservation authority it pays further bureaucrats, all dealing with environment, all with separate rules, all with separate ways of looking at things and all at enormous costs because they all get paid from one person. That is you and I in our taxes or you and I or our children when we borrow the money to pay them.

What we have to do is very seriously reduce and eliminate overlapping and duplication in government and very seriously priorize our claims on what we want from government, so we get our demands against the public purse reduced to the lowest amount possible.

Let me deal first of all with priorizing. A lot has been said about medicare. In the minister's speech he says that we treat medicare as a must. I think all of us and our constituents treat medicare as a must, but we have to do some priorizing. We cannot go on. The member for Winnipeg Transcona spoke about medicare and the erosion. We cannot go on the way we are going. We have to priorize.

I can just give a few examples. If one asked my constituents whether they would rather have medicare or the CBC, I bet they vote for medicare. If one asked them whether they would have medicare or the National Film Board, I will bet they vote for medicare. If one asked them whether they want medicare or VIA Rail, I will bet they vote for medicare. If one asks them whether they want medicare or the DIPP, I bet they vote for medicare. Let us have some priorization, and let us have some suggestions of priorization so it is not just duplication. It is the question of priorization of expenditures.

I take a look at some of the things we do, and those things we do, for example, in a field that comes before my committee, and that is the field of financial administration for the banks, trust companies and so on. A trust company in this country has to go to be disciplined by provincial inspectors and by the federal inspector. Both governments have offices of financial administration where they run their own show and they have their own separate rules and laws. All of that cost is borne not by government, but by you and I because you and I are the taxpayers for both of these governments.

I think what we have to do is realize that we have to restrain ourselves, and in the restraining process the federal government has in this budget brought that restraint directly to the attention of the provinces by cutting back, again in this budget, with some of the transfers.

My friends opposite decry that. I think it is important that we realize that the expenses for operating the Government of Ontario through 1984 to 1990 rose at an average rate of 10 per cent a year, back to back, one year after another. The cost of running all of the other provincial governments averaged across all provinces 7.2 per cent every year, back to back. The cost of this government has been 3.7 per cent. Somewhere along the line we have to get together with the provinces and reorganize the distribution of income, the distribution of responsibilities, and rationalize that because we cannot carry on as we are going in any realistic fashion.

I want to deal for a moment with the issue of unemployment insurance. That is a nasty question to talk about when we have a lot of unemployed people, particularly in a society where this year we will be paying out $17 billion in unemployment insurance, a full $4 billion more in unemployment insurance than last year as a result of severe unemployment.

One of the problems in this budget, in trying to balance things, in trying not to increase the public debt, is that the minister has found it necessary to increase unemployment insurance premiums. Let us take a look at those premiums to see whether we can really afford this program the way this program is written.

Under the minister's suggestion in the budget, the premiums are increased for individuals—that is individuals who work—to 2.8 per cent of payroll to about $28,000 a year. For companies which employ people, that is everybody they employ, 3.92 per cent of payroll to about $28,000 a year. That is a total of 6.72 per cent of payroll as a payroll burden. Think about it: a 6.72 per cent payroll burden represents three weeks' holiday pay for every single working person in Canada.

Do you really think your constituents would willingly give up three weeks' holiday pay for unemployment insurance premiums? These are the things that we as a Parliament have to look at. These are the costs that we have to take into account when we say to taxpayers that they have to pay for this fund or they have to pay for that fund, or we are going to have to increase their Canada pension contributions.

These costs are being borne by our constituents and these costs injure the productivity of the country because they make it more expensive to employ people. They make it necessary for companies to pass their wage costs on in their prices. They make us uncompetitive, or less competitive, than we should be in world markets.

What we have to do as a country is become more competitive. What we have to do is take a look at all of these things and ask: can we really go along with what has been happening year after year with no real change, or should we again take a look at the programs and say: "You know, we have got to change that program?"

We have got to get along with a little less benefit. We have got to get along with different criteria. We cannot just sit back and say that every program of government is all of a sudden a sacred trust and nothing can be altered, because there is only one person who we have as a constituent—and that is you and I and our friends, our neighbours and our constituents who pay taxes—the taxpayer. That person can only bear so much.

I think it is in our obligation not to just decry the problems of the budget, not just to decry the fact that taxes are going up, not just to decry the fact that programs are cut back, but to come at the cost of government by giving that cost of government a rethink.

I want to say how impressed I am with the minister's ability to cut back bit by bit on the borrowing requirements. This year the minister will require about $21.6 billion to borrow on the marketplace, depending on how the exchange fund works. Next year the minister's budget calls for $14 billion in borrowing, the following year $5 billion in borrowing, and it puts us in the position where we start paying back the national debt in 1994–95.

Compare that deficit situation with what we inherited. When we took power in 1984 the deficit was 8.6 per cent of the Gross Domestic Product. This year the United States will have a deficit of 5.7 per cent of the Gross Domestic Product and our percentage of debt to Gross Domestic Product, expressed the way they express it, expressed on a national accounts basis, is 3.5 per cent.

In other words, we have reduced the shortfall from 8.6 per cent of Gross Domestic Product to 3.5 per cent of Gross Domestic Product, and bit by bit we are turning it around.

But we cannot go on the way we are. We cannot go on with income taxes because of the inflation, partial deindexing rising year after year. Families cannot go on with the payments they are asked to make on income tax, on goods and services tax. My friends on the left call for capital taxes. We cannot go on this way and build a competitive society.

What we have to do, therefore, is learn how to train our demands on the state to what we really can afford, what we really need, not what we would like or what would be jam. Let us get our costs and our demands on government back to a more realistic level.

Our problem is very simple. For a number of years we were trained by government that any time you needed something you went to the government in prayer. You went to the government in prayer. You said: "Mr. Government, I have a problem. I want to start a business. Give me a grant. I have a problem. I need an assistance program." I need this, I need that. Give me, give me, give me. Take it to the Lord in prayer. And what we did is we got used to receiving $1.1 for every dollar paid in taxes.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. There will be an opportunity for questions and comments in about two minutes. The hon. member for Mississauga South has the floor.

Mr. Blenkarn: They will get at me, I am sure. What we have to do is understand right now, as we try to conquer our debt problem, that we are paying about $1.25 in taxes because a great part of it is going in interest, and we are only getting about $1 worth of benefits. We have to change that around. We have to change the cost to government around and it is up to this House to do that.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a comment first, and then ask my hon. colleague, who is also chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance a few questions.

I would like to remind him that, not long ago, when the Finance Committee held hearings on the GST in Vancouver, the mayor of that city appeared before the committee and taught us a lesson, or should I say lectured us, on the tax system. He said that it was time to stop reaching into other people's pockets, which meant that the federal government, to cut expenses, passes the burden on to the provinces, which pass it on to municipalities. But everybody forgets about the taxpayer.

I hope the chairman of the Finance Committee gave that advice to his colleague, the Minister of Finance, but judging by the last budget, he did exactly the opposite. So I would like to know what he thinks, Mr. Speaker, because we see, year after year, that the Minister's projections are wrong. In 1985, he said that the deficit would be about $19 billion this year; we still have a $30 billion deficit. So we do not need his projections because we know that they never materialize.

I have another question. Earlier, my colleague said that he was very concerned about the debt service, and therefore about the debt itself. I would like to remind him that the total debt accumulated in 177 years since Confederation was doubled by his government in the last six years. It is something that has to be said, Mr. Speaker.

But I would like to ask him a question. If they really want to reduce the debt, they must not do it by making cuts in the programs designed to help needy Canadians. How come—read the estimates tabled today—how come the government is spending $3 billion a year on advertizing, consultations and public relations? If we are in a recession, instead of making cuts in programs for people who need a hospital bed or for people who need affordable housing, a roof over their head, or for people who need jobs, why not cut in government's expenses on consultation, advertizing and public relations it does not need in any case?

[English]

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, quite obviously my friend has not been paying any attention. Let me give him some information for his record. He will note that this is the only Minister of Finance that has ever come anywhere close to being accurate with respect to his forecasts on borrowing requirements and his forecasts on public accounts debt.

On the public account debt he forecast $28.6 billion last year. He came in at $30.5 billion, but he made a change in forecast part way through the year as a result of interest rates. If he goes back to the prior year, he will find that the minister was able to come in $.5 billion less than he forecast.

On borrowing requirements, the minister forecast to borrow $21.5 billion and he had to borrow $23.5 billion. But this is the only Minister of Finance and the only government that did not do what the last government did, and that is have two borrowing authority bills a year. In one case it had three borrowing authority bills because they could not get they act together. They kept spending more money than they even forecast themselves, so they had to come back to the House time after time for more borrowing authority.

My friend from Edmonton knows that. He was there at the time. He remembers the extensive debates on borrowing authority. Perhaps he would like to tell us.

• (1740)

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member, knowing that he is and has been known to be very frank and very truthful. Having sat on the finance committee with him and knowing that he is the author of the term "gouge and screw" tax, I know he will give me a level answer. I want to know on behalf of members of Parliament and the people of Canada something about the debt servicing reduction fund.

If we look at page 13 of the minister's budget speech, he states:

> As part of our Plan for Economic Recovery, we will ensure that all GST revenues are allocated solely to the effort to bring the public debt under control.

Then if we turn to page 78 of the budget and we look at the second paragraph it says:

> The Prime Minister has given a commitment that any above-projected revenues from the GST will make a contribution to deficit reduction rather than provide the leeway for an expansion in discretionary government spending.

The next paragraph goes on to say:

> The fund will be established to a specified purpose account to which will be credited net GST revenues and from which will be debited public debt charges.

The attitude that seems to be given is the one that all GST revenues after the administration charges, in other words approximately $16.5 billion, will go into this specified fund and will pay down the debt at that rate per year.

My question to the member is: Can he tell us openly and honestly, as he has with the "gouge and screw" tax, the definition of "all" or the definition of "net revenues", so the people of Canada and I, in fact, will know the amount being paid into this fund?

Mr. Blenkarn: I am delighted. That is a sensible question.

The goods and services tax is a gross tax that has certain rebates to it. In particular, hospitals, schools, charities and so on receive part of their tax back. You take the gross of the tax, and those people who receive part back and that comes off the receipt of the tax.

The same applies with respect to real estate. We have a tax of 7 per cent on the transfer of a house, but if you buy a new house as a single family owner you only pay a 4.5 per cent rate, so that really there is a rebate of 2.5 per cent of the tax.

Those rebates come off the gross tax. Also coming off the gross tax is the refund to low income people that is paid quarterly. That brings it to the net tax. That is the amount of net tax that goes in the deficit reduction fund. There is no other deduction from that.

This is an honest and straightforward way of saying to the people of Canada: "We know you didn't like this goods and services tax, but we are putting it toward the debt and that is where it belongs. When we get rid of the debt maybe we can get rid of the tax".

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of interesting questions to ask the hon. member opposite. He talked about unemployment insurance and how we should carry our fair share of that particular burden.

The Mayor of Yellowknife in the Northwest Territories said: "Increased unemployment insurance contributions will cost $154 a year for each worker for the city of Yellowknife. It means $35,000 to $40,000 increase in employer contributions". She goes on to say: "What may be saved at the federal level and avoided at the territorial level, will eventually be passed on to the ratepayers and municipalities. Needed infrastructure may not go ahead unless municipalities and municipal governments pay for it by raising mill rates".

With regard to the north, there is 60 to 90 per cent unemployment. The Canadian Jobs Strategy cut of $100 million is going to have an impact because unemployment is so high. Essentially unemployment insurance and training programs are like a sub-economy. I know the minister to have had an attitude toward specific groups who he feels get free stuff. He had this validated and verified in a survey that he did.

I would like to know what initiatives he would use to kick-start the economy in the north, rather than gouging and screwing the constituents of the north.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 5:45 p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 84(4) and an Order made further earlier this day, to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the amendment to the amendment now before the House.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment to the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the amendment to the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion, the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment to the amendment, which was negatived on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the amendment to the amendment lost.

Resuming debate.

Mr. Samson: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Timmins—Chapleau on a point of order.

Mr. Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, during the vote I noticed that the member for Fraser Valley West voted, rose and left. At least one other member rose and left whom I could not identify. I would say that at least that one vote should not be counted.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Crowfoot on the same point of order.

Mr. Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak to the same point of order because it may very well be that we should have the rules clarified.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley West, who is my seatmate, did in fact leave after the vote. He had to catch a plane. That is the rule of the House, and perhaps the rule ought to be respected.

It is also the rule of the House that in Question Period, questions should not be argumentative. It is also the rule of the House that questions should not have a preamble. It is also a rule of the House—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Malone: The hon. member for the NDP would like to pick and choose rules, to have rules that he thinks might damage some members of Parliament—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is a convention—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I can stay here until 11 o'clock if you would like.

An hon. member: Is that a promise or a threat?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is a threat.

The hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair has a point of order?

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, I think that that is probably the most fatuous intervention I have heard in all the time I have been here.

The rules are clear and unambiguous. Members are required to remain here until the vote has been completed and the count has been released.

Even this hon. member should understand the consequences of the waiver of the rule, and it is that immediately after each one of us has voted, we could very well have left. You could imagine the spectacle that that would represent.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is a convention in this House, and it is under Beauchesne's citation 223(3):

> If a Member who has heard the question put should inadvertently vote contrary to his intention, he may not be allowed to correct the mistake; but his vote must remain as first recorded. Debates, July 1, 1926, p. 5311.

Shall we carry on with debate? The hon. member for Cape Breton—Highlands—Canso has the floor.

A point of order, the hon. member for York South—Weston.

Mr. Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, the point put before you for consideration was the fact that an hon. member of this House left before the vote was announced. By not removing that particular member's vote from the official record, in effect, Sir, you would be setting a precedent. That precedent would be that once you stand and your vote is recorded, you could vacate or leave the House. That is not the convention of this House. In the seven years that I have been here, it has been very clear that in order for your vote to be counted, it is essential that you remain in your seat until the vote is announced. By allowing this particular incident to carry on, as I indicated, the precedent would be set whereby throughout the course of a vote you would see members standing and then leaving the House.

• (1820)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will go to Beauchesne's Citation 223(2):

> A Member must be in his own seat should he wish to vote and should remain in his seat until the division is complete and the result announced. Journals, April 18, 1956—

There is convention here that members should remain in their seat, but it has not been done here in the last six years that I can recall. New members have come into this Chamber. I will listen to the hon. member's point of order, but there has to be a little more decorum so the Chair can see what is going on too. It is pretty hard to see if members walk in and out getting their drink of water while the vote is going on, and that has happened here in the last six or seven years that I can remember.

I think that we should just leave it at that. I will check and see if we can find out if this has happened. The hon. member is an honourable member. If he feels that he should come in after he has taken his trip back home, if he has caught his plane, and if he feels that his vote should be withdrawn, he will stand up in the House like any honourable member and do what has to be done. Otherwise, I think we should carry on with debate. We had another 26 minutes left. We only have about another 17 minutes left in debate.

The hon. member for Windsor—St. Clair has another point of order.

Mr. McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I think that I have no alternative, as I am sure my colleagues have no alternative, but to express considerable concern about the manner of the ruling.

The Speaker, in the first instance, ruled on an issue that was not at all raised, and then the Speaker read from the rules of order to find that if in fact the hon. member did absent himself before the release of the count he had abrogated those rules. His colleague, sitting right next to him, concurred with the hon. member behind me in respect to his having left before the vote was completed.

It seems to me that it would have to be self-evident to the Speaker that if his ruling was to form the pattern of behaviour in this House, the House would be reduced to absurdity. I would ask the Speaker to change his ruling with some thought behind it.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I would like to indicate that we on this side of the House have no problem at all should the Chair decide to enforce such standing order.

I do want to emphasize to the Chair that we would be happy to have the Chair do that, but we will also insist that Beauchesne's be followed to the letter in all cases.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Just before I recognize the hon. member for Crowfoot, the convention does not provide for sanctions by the Chair. He must be in his seat to vote, but he should remain in his seat. That is fine. Now that is all there is to it.

Now can we get back to debate, please. The hon. Whip for the NDP.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I would like to rise on a point of order. In all seriousness, I think that it would be appropriate for the Chair, in consultation with the table officers, to reflect on what has happened in the last few minutes and come back at some later point to the House to review the matter, rather than continue it at this point, and allow us to get on with the debate. I would like to suggest that we not leave—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I hoped that the hon. member would have suggested that 10 minutes ago. Thank you.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, it is nice to see so many government members have waited for this speech. I want to address as an Atlantic Canadian some of the serious issues touched upon by Tuesday's budget.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I know that they are trying to reflect on the Hill Times, but I know the hon. member has a very serious speech and I wish he could get to it.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): I know they are jealous, Mr. Speaker. I would like to recommence my speech. I hope I will be able to complete it before the time is up.

I want to address as an Atlantic Canadian some of the serious issues touched upon by Tuesday's budget. These are issues which go to the heart of Confederation and Atlantic Canada's place in it.

Recently, with some of my colleagues, I had the opportunity to travel throughout Atlantic Canada to see first-hand the effects of the recent recession on people in Atlantic Canada. During this time I heard the views and concerns of Atlantic Canadians about the impact of this recession, the government response to it, and what impact that is having on their lives.

In Yarmouth we listened to Bob Anthony, the warden of Yarmouth County and a small businessperson. He told us of the crushing burden of high taxes and interest rates on small businesses in his region.

In Saint John we heard Allan Kurtz of the St. Stephen Retailers Association describe how his community, along the border with Maine, was being turned into a ghost town because of cross-border shopping since the free trade agreement came into effect.

In Harbour Grace and in Corner Brook, we were told repeatedly how federal mismanagement was killing the Newfoundland fishery and how nothing was being done to create a new and better future for Newfoundlanders.

I learned above all else that hundreds of communities in Atlantic Canada are suffering under the economic policies of this government. I cannot shake the sinking feeling that this government simply does not care.

In November 1984 the finance minister presented Canadians with an agenda for economic renewal. Now, seven years later, he presents us with a plan for economic recovery. What does Canada have to recover from? It is the consequences of the misguided and failed policies of this Tory government; that is what.

Real interest rates, which have never been so out of line with those of the United States, are throttling our businesses and are a daily reminder to investors of the economic uncertainty into which this government has plunged Canada; an unacceptably high dollar which is crippling our exporters; a trade agreement which is leading to the deindustrialization of this country and forcing Canadians to downgrade their social programs to the level of those in the United States.

Now we are presented with the Minister of Finance's seventh budget and, God willing, his last.

I firmly believe that once Canadians have had a chance to comprehend fully what this document is attempting to do, what this government is attempting to do with this budget, they will understand the devastating implications of the Conservative agenda now laid bare for everyone to see.

Let us examine the facts. In 1984 when this government came to power it promised economic renewal. It promised to reduce the deficit and to curb the growth of the debt. Above all else, it promised jobs, jobs, jobs.

What have the government's economic policies brought us? They have brought us our first made-in-Canada recession, where interest rates have been pushed up past the breaking point for many Canadians; where today nearly 1.5 million Canadians are out of work; where inflation is growing, not diminishing; where 34 consecutive tax increases by this government have foisted the tax burden squarely on the backs of lower and middle income Canadians.

The Minister of Finance now expects Canadians to believe him, that he has a firm grasp on what must be done and that Canadians should trust him and they should hang on just a little longer. I ask the minister: Why should Canadians believe him now? Why should we believe his deficit projections which have been so consistently wrong? Why should we believe his interest rate predictions which were so out of line in last year's budget? Why should we believe his Pollyanna promise of 2 per cent inflation in three years? His policies and especially the GST have actually increased inflation.

• (1830)

What the minister fails to make clear, what he fails to mention in his budget document, is that the consequence of trying to achieve these inflation targets will be unacceptably high unemployment.

We are now expected to believe that the Minister of Finance who got Canadians into this mess can get us out with this hocus-pocus plan for economic recovery. That is like asking Saddam Hussein to supervise the rebuilding of Kuwait.

His projections for the deficit this year stand at $30.5 billion. After several straight years of economic growth in the Canadian economy, is this the best he has been able to accomplish? How long are Canadians expected to hang on? Many Canadians are past the point of hanging on. Far too many have seen their jobs disappear. Far too many are fighting a losing battle in simply trying to keep their families sheltered and clothed and their children properly fed.

These Canadians have been ignored by the minister in this budget and, by ignoring them, the minister is punishing them, punishing them for being at the wrong end of the economic spectrum.

As members of Parliament we have often been accused of being cut off from the realities of day-to-day life in Canada. We have been accused of being insensitive to the needs of ordinary Canadians.

Some people ask: How can we understand the plight of a man in his fifties who without warning has lost his job and is unable to get adequate retraining as he watches his unemployment insurance benefits run out? How can we appreciate what it means for a single mother to be forced to line up at a food bank, for a young person to come to the realization that he or she cannot afford to attend university, for or a fisherman to have to sell his livelihood and that of his father and his father's father because he is being squeezed out by bigger and more competitive companies?

Maybe we cannot fully comprehend what these things mean to the people directly affected, but that does not mean that we should stop caring. That does not mean that we can fool ourselves into thinking that with brave projections as to likely economic trends, we will ultimately be helping these people. Economic indicators mean little to those who are desperately looking for work.

In Canada, people need help today, right now. This government has forgotten about them or has chosen to ignore them. They point to the pages of The Financial Post or The Globe and Mail and claim their actions are justified. No one is more guilty of this than the Minister of Finance.

I truly wish the minister had joined my colleagues and me in early February when we toured Atlantic Canada, asking ordinary Canadians what could be done to reverse the tide of economic woes which had befallen our country. I wish the minister had experienced the frustration these people are feeling and the desperate sense they have that their country is falling apart.

Again and again, the same issues were raised: aging infrastructure and the unwillingness of the government to address the problem. Excessive taxation which has left Atlantic Canadians with less money and less earning power, the gross mismanagement of the fisheries which has left fishermen and fish processors crippled, and a level of unemployment which some believe the government will never address.

Nowhere I believe are these feelings more passionately felt that in my riding of Cape Breton Highlands—Canso. Unemployment in Cape Breton is now over 17 per cent. Cutbacks in job training and increased UI premiums have left Cape Bretoners feeling that the problem is only going to get worse, because they feel this government does not care.

What else are they to think? Last January the government cut VIA Rail passenger service from Truro to Sydney, and repeatedly CN has sought to downgrade portions of its service on the island. The application to partially close the swing bridge at the Barra Strait is yet another example.

In December this government closed the CBC station in Sydney and ended one of the most popular CBC programs in Atlantic Canada, Land and Sea.

This government has refused to support the request by Scotia Synfuels for assistance to establish a coal liquefaction plant at the Strait of Canso, which would use Cape Breton coal in an environmentally friendly way.

Indeed the minister of industry refuses to meet with the principals of this important project which has the support of community and business leaders across the island. Decreased transfer payments have jeopardized the ability of my riding's most famous institution, St. Francis Xavier University in Antigonish, to provide a quality education to its students.

It currently faces an $800,000 operating deficit, which is forcing it to reconsider many of the programs currently being offered. What makes this all the more ironic is that St. FX is the Alma Mater of the Prime Minister himself, the self-styled education Prime Minister who has claimed on the one hand that education and skills training are vital to Canada's ability to compete internationally. Then, on the other hand, he has allowed his Minister of Finance once again to continue the freeze on transfer payments, crippling our universities and forcing drastic cuts in job training programs.

My constituents need take no lessons from this government about the impact the recession is having on our economy. My constituents understand what this latest budget is about. It is about more unemployment, more cutbacks, more essential services lost, and more economic desperation. All this in the part of the country that has already seen more than its fair share. I say this knowing full well that what is true for Cape Breton Island is also true for much of Atlantic Canada.

What is most disturbing about this budget from an Atlantic Canadian perspective is what it does not do. It provides essentially no hope for the people who are feeling the brunt of the recession.

Rather than provide for additional retraining funds for the unemployed, the government has cut $100 million from the Canadian Jobs Strategy program. Instead of encouraging businesses to hire and train unemployed workers, this budget increases unemployment insurance premiums by nearly 25 per cent. These higher UI premiums are a direct tax on jobs, a new tax on lower and middle income workers and on the businesses across the country.

This is a new tax being levied right in the middle of a recession, on the heels of the government's most massive and complicated new tax grab, the GST. It is yet another tax which will force additional businesses to lay off workers and drive others closer to the brink of bankruptcy. So much for Tory economic logic. So much for Tory compassion.

Farmers will receive $1.3 billion in this budget. That is something, but for fishermen in Atlantic Canada and elsewhere still facing a crisis in their industry there is nothing. How should the fishermen feel, Mr. Speaker? I will tell you how they feel. They feel forgotten, ignored and betrayed.

Fishermen understand what recession is all about. They also know what it is to be cast adrift by a government that has simply stopped caring about what happens to them.

In talking to fishermen over the last couple of days, one question has been asked of me over and over again: Who is supposed to represent us in cabinet? Why, when we are facing a crisis at least as serious as the one facing farmers, are we being ignored?

The answer is simple. The current minister of fisheries has simply grown tired of dealing with fishermen and representing their concerns. He does not care any more. In fact, the same minister was recently quoted as saying that he wants to spend less time dealing with the crisis in the fisheries and spend more time dealing with the issue of national unity.

That is a fine thought. If this minister does for national unity what he has done to the fisheries, then we may as well all pack up and go home right now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 6.37 p.m., this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Thursday, February 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government; and the amendment of Mr. Gray (Windsor West) (p.17722).

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I would like to express my pleasure that I have an opportunity to rise today to speak on the hon. Minister of Finance's most recent budget, a budget which comes closer to addressing the needs and expressed desires of Canadians than any other budget which I have seen before this House.

There has been one very clear message which I have received as a politician during the course of the last few years, and particularly during the course of the last 12 months. A frequently expressed desire on the part of my constituents, and I believe other Canadians, is that the Government of Canada must show leadership and take the necessary steps to start to address the problem of the national debt and the annual deficit.

Canada's national debt is now reaching the total of some $400 billion. I suspect that many of us live in a world where the magnitude of $400 billion is not entirely clear to us. When you think in terms of $400 billion meaning a debt of some $13,000 or more per capita, I think that figure becomes more comprehensible for us as Canadians.

When I speak to people of all ages, I find a very broad consensus on the fact that that the problem of the debt is one which is starting to worry and, in some cases, starting to almost terrify some Canadians.

When I speak to senior citizens or when I am in discussion with grandparents, they often raise the question of the debt and what the implications will be for their grandchildren. In fact, I find that many senior citizens—and I know that their economic circumstances are somewhat at variance with others—are saying: "We are enjoying many benefits today which we have not previously enjoyed in life."

I have had some senior citizens say to me that they are better off in economic terms than they have ever been before in their life. That is not to suggest for a moment that all senior citizens fall into that category.

What they go on to say is the fact that they are concerned for their children, and particularly for their grandchildren.

To some degree, I suppose, their abhorrence of debt is a reflection of the fact that they lived during the 1930s. They were parents during the 1930s and had the responsibility of trying to raise others at a time when there was immense depression in Canada and elsewhere throughout the world.

One of the by-products of the 1930s for many people who lived through it was the determination that they would never ever again become the victim of being in debt because they realized how vulnerable they were in that situation.

I come from western Canada. Part of the tragedy of the 1930s was not only the loss of jobs but the loss of farmland which occurred. A real crisis developed due to the fact that people who were in debt could not meet their obligations.

Their generation, particularly, is dismayed by the policies of government at all levels, which originated in the 1970s and into the 1980s, where we began to spend money which we did not have.

It is ironic that we began to spend money at a time when we did not need to spend money.

• (1010)

In any event, we have a legacy today, a legacy of debt which we are leaving to future generations, of almost $400 billion. Each of us in this Chamber understands that that figure must continue to grow because of the interest on the debt. We have a situation today where the interest on the accumulated debt is now some $43 billion.

Although we have been able to make progress as a government, since 1984, in having a balance in our favour, in terms of operating costs, that debt, which is a burden, a millstone around the necks of all Canadians, means that the debt continues to grow each year because of the interest on it.

What I see in this budget is a determined effort by the Minister of Finance and his colleagues to address the question of the annual deficit. When that is addressed we will be in a position to address the issue of the national debt itself.

I sense from the reports which I have had from my constituency and conversations which I have had with my constituents that this budget, quite frankly, is being received better than any other budget that we have brought down since we came to power in 1984. One of the reasons for this is that we are focusing less on spending and more on saving.

One of the ironies of being a politician, when you come to meet with your own newspaper people after a budget, is that very frequently the question which they ask is: What is in this budget for this constituency? In this case, what is in this budget for Brandon—Souris?

The interesting thing about that question is that there is an implication that no budget can be relevant to my constituency, or perhaps to any other constituency in Canada, unless it is a spending budget which is bringing them dollars from the Government of Canada, i.e. from the people of Canada. The interesting thing this time is that I did not hear that question being asked as frequently as I have in the past. I think there is a very broad consensus, including among the journalists of Canada, that we are at a crisis point and we must continue to save.

A second theme which I heard frequently throughout this year was that the federal government must show leadership and must begin to get its own act in order. I suggest that we have made some progress in that regard. For example, there are now 12,000 fewer civil service positions than there were in 1984. There are many people in my constituency who are pleased by that, because they believe that government has grown larger than they, as Canadians, can afford.

They have been saying in the province of Manitoba, and certainly in the constituency of Brandon—Souris, that we must show leadership by ensuring that some caps and restraints are put in place on these huge federal-public expenditure programs, of which we are a part.

I believe the decision of the federal government to ensure, for example, that there will be regulations on spending during the course of the next five years, regulations put in place by law, will be well received. I believe that the decision to cap civil service salary increases by 3 per cent will be well received by the majority of my constituents—not by all of my constituents, of course. I believe the fact that the cabinet will take a freeze in salary for the upcoming year will be well received. I believe the fact that the salaries of members of Parliament and senators are to be more tightly constrained will be well received.

I believe that most Canadians will understand that we are in fact trying to place our own house in order and they will understand, therefore, that we can quite rightly turn to the provinces and to other levels of government and encourage them to accept our leadership as well.

Another issue which I heard a great deal about this year was the GST. I have spoken in the House before about a meeting I had in my constituency at which those present indicated in no uncertain fashion their displeasure with the GST.

Having said that, a second part of their message to me then and later was the fact that they would find the GST to be a more tolerable tax if they were certain the revenues would not be used to fund new government programs. They were afraid that any additional revenue that might be derived from the GST would go to create new programs, which has characterized government spending since the beginning of the 1970s.

The fact that GST revenues will be directed toward a deficit reduction fund will be very well received in my constituency. The fact that the resources from privatization will be directed toward such a fund will be well received in my constituency. The fact that Canadians, if they wish, can make direct contributions to such a deficit reduction fund will be well received in my constituency. The fact that there may therefore be, once the economy turns around, more revenue from this particular tax than we might have anticipated will also be more acceptable to my constituents because it will be directed specifically toward deficit reduction.

The question of transfer payments is, of course, important to the province of Manitoba as it is to many other provinces. I would like to spend a few moments looking at that, if I may.

I come from a constituency and a province in which we have depended to a very substantial degree on transfer payments. In fact, some recent research which has come to light indicates that Manitobans on a per capita basis have benefited more significantly from the transfer payments and from the federal government's sharing of moneys than have citizens of other provinces, somewhat to the surprise of my own constituents.

It is important to understand that the transfer payments to the province of Manitoba, as they will to many other provinces, will increase with this budget as they have done with previous budgets. Not to the extent that our friends in the provincial government would wish, because they are obviously anxious to receive as much revenue from outside their own jurisdiction as they can. Transfer payments will increase to the province and the Government of Manitoba, according to my calculations, by 3.1 per cent. I think it is important to stress the fact that there will be an increase because there are so many people who talk in terms of "reductions in".

There is an assumption, therefore, when you read only the headline, as many people are inclined to do, that provincial governments, including the government of Manitoba, will be receiving less money in the future than they received in the past. That is not the case. Indeed, they will receive more money in the coming fiscal year than they received in the current or the previous fiscal year.

According to my calculations, Manitobans will receive $1,720 per person in the form of transfer payments from the Government of Canada and that constitutes a very significant part of their budget, somewhere in the vicinity of 37 or 38 per cent, if I recall correctly.

I also want to make it clear that there has been an immense amount of concern in my province, as in other provinces, with respect to the needs of agriculture, and I represent an agricultural constituency. When I say that, I include the city of Brandon in that definition, because certainly the business community in Brandon is exceedingly dependent upon agriculture. We are living in very, very difficult times in the field of agriculture.

As I stand here, I am proud that I can say to my constituents and to this House that support for agriculture has been and continues to be a very obvious priority for the Government of Canada. In fact, our support has increased—

An hon. member: Nonsense.

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): My hon. friend say it is nonsense. If he will check his statistics he will understand, perhaps, more clearly than he does now that our support for agriculture has increased by some 500 per cent in terms of direct payments to farmers since we came to power in 1984. My constituents understand that, even if my hon. friend who represents the constituency of Kingston and the Islands does not. In this budget there is an additional $1.3 billion for agriculture. At a time when the government is cutting back in other areas, it is continuing to provide more money for agriculture. It may indeed not be enough. There is money in the reserves within the estimates and I would suspect that we as a government will have to make use of some of those reserves to assist with some sort of additional form of assistance to agriculture.

• (1020)

In the meantime, we in this budget are providing the funds necessary to support two exceedingly important agricultural stabilization programs, the program which we know in the west as GRIP and the program which we know in the west as NISA.

Unfortunately, in the province of Manitoba, the government has not yet decided under what circumstances it will participate in the GRIP program and it has indicated that it unfortunately does not believe that it can financially participate in the NISA program. If indeed that is their decision this year, I will regret it but I would hope that the government will be able to participate next year; that it will understand the importance of doing so.

There is also in this budget new financial assistance for the disabled. I would like to mention in passing that I am particularly pleased to see that not only because the disabled of Canada have some very special needs that often go unrecognized, but particularly because as I stand in this House today I am conscious of the fact that I am the successor to the Hon. Walter Dinsdale who served this House for some 31 years and who throughout that entire career demonstrated a very strong commitment to the disabled. I know that if he were here today, he would be very pleased to see the provisions in this budget which would help meet the needs of that particular constituency.

I am also conscious of the fact that in this budget there is additional spending, perhaps more additional spending than some of my constituents would prefer. There is additional spending to assist with the needs of the unemployed. We are conscious of the fact that we are in a recession. The newspapers seem to suggest to some degree that this recession is worse in Ontario and perhaps in Quebec than it is in the west. I personally would differ with that on the grounds that the recession came to the west in my mind before it came to the eastern part of Canada. However, things that happen in the west are not always as well noted by the media of Canada, unfortunately. Nevertheless, the reality of the recession is there and there are some provisions to try to assist with that.

I think that the most important theme within this budget is the theme that suggests that we as a government understand that Canada can go only so far down that very slippery road to massive debt. There is also a theme within this budget that if we are to address the problems of that debt, there are no easy ways of doing so.

I think that is worth noting because I am afraid there is a certain inclination with some of my constituents and undoubtedly with other Canadians to assume that there is some sort of easy solution to the reduction of the deficit and to the abolition of the debt. I dare say that any of us, as members of Parliament, or any of those who are watching, could probably create their own wish list of what could be abolished, what programs could be cancelled and where we could save money. I would think that most of us could identify $1 billion in savings that we would gladly put in place.

With human nature being what it is, that $1 billion saving that we would come forth with would probably not include many programs, perhaps not include any programs, which would impact upon us as individuals because there is obviously a human tendency to want to make savings at the expense of someone else, someone perhaps of a different class, someone who works in a different profession, someone who lives in a different city, someone who lives in a different provinces or a different region. The reality as we well know is the fact that we cannot easily reduce the deficit, which will be some $30 billion this year. We cannot do that in such a way that does not impact upon us as individuals.

I am reminded as I speak of certain reductions and savings which we have made in the past. I am reminded, for example, of the fact that we proposed in a previous budget to reduce the subsidies to VIA by some $300 million over an extended period of time. We did that because the required subsidies for VIA were going out of sight; $600 million with the evidence indicating that the subsidies would eventually reach $1 billion per year.

When we did reduce those subsidies we heard very quickly from those who would be directly impacted by it and even from many who had not made use of VIA for a long, long time. One of my most vociferous critics on the question of the reduction of VIA subsidies mentioned to me once in passing that he had not been on the train for seven years. I guess the message there is that if we are going to reduce subsidies to VIA or if we are going to reduce subsidies in any other given program, it is going to impact upon us wherever we live.

There are no easy ways to reduce the deficit. Surely if we are honest with each other we would understand if there were an easy way to reduce the deficit and reduce the national debt, governments would have found it in the past.

What we are asking now in this budget is that Canadians realize first of all that we are committed to the task of deficit reduction and, second, that we are prepared to provide leadership ourselves and, having done so, we can rightly call upon other Canadians to follow in that example.

This debate and this budget are about more than just the next fiscal year. This budget is about the directions Canada will follow in the next decade. That is why this budget, in my mind, may well be a bell-wether for budgets to come.

What we are saying to the people of Canada is that we currently must take 35 cents out of every dollar of the tax revenues which we receive in order to service the debt. We can no longer afford to do so and we must ask others to join with us in ensuring that this budget in fact is a beginning of what I hope will be a crusade to attack the deficit and eventually to reduce the national debt.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, I also represent an area, as does the hon. member, that depends largely on transfer payments. He mentioned that there is no easy way to reduce the deficit and I agree.

I would just like to ask the hon. member for Brandon—Souris some questions in terms of how this government is trying to reduce the deficit. Why is it trying to reduce the deficit on the backs of Canadians who may not necessarily have the resources to succeed as much as other Canadians? I am talking about the $100 million which is what I believe has been cut from the Canadian Jobs Strategy, some cuts in the Canada Assistance Program, some cuts in the native programming, or outright elimination of some native programming, cuts in the CBC programming, and cuts in what I consdier a very important area, the environmental green plan, which would have tried to do something about the pollution that is occurring in the north not because it is our fault, but because international forces are creating pollution in the region.

If we are going to be environmentally conscious in the future, I am wondering why we are cutting back on the environmental spending? Those are the questions I would just like to ask, as well as some others about other services that have been cut such as the Postal Services Assistance Program for the north.

• (1030)

Mr. Clark (Brandon–Souris): Madam Speaker, my thanks to the hon. member for his series of questions, because he has introduced several themes that I think are important to address.

Perhaps I might begin by dealing with them in reverse order, if I may. He refers to the environment and, I think, if I heard him correctly, he talked about cuts in spending on the environment. The reality is, as the minister indicated in the House yesterday, this government is providing an additional 20 per cent to 25 per cent to the Department of the Environment to be used during the up-coming fiscal year. There is no reduction in spending for the Department of the Environment, in fact it is just the very opposite.

First of all, in the estimates tabled yesterday, there is an increase of 4.7 per cent to the department itself, and there is an additional $250 million being provided under the green plan.

When the hon. member made his comments, I think he was referring to the fact that the green plan is being extended from some five years to six years. That is true, but what is important to understand is that the entire objective of the green plan remains intact. All of the strategy within the green plan remains intact. We will, for example, still plant 325 million trees, but we will plant 325 million trees over six years instead of over five years.

When speaking of the green plan, I think it is important to remember that this is the only government in Canadian history that has ever developed any long-term strategy for the environment. This is the only government in Canadian history that has ever put in place a long-term—in this case now six years—spending program for the environment.

While we might differ on what should be in that program or how rich it should be, the significance in that accomplishment should not be lost by either the House or Canadians in general.

The hon. member refers to the CBC in terms of reductions and spending for the CBC. One of the things that I sometimes discuss with my constituents is the fact that we, as a government, as a country, must have priorities in spending just as we as families must have priorities in spending. None of us in our own family situation or, I suspect, none of us who are members of Parliament at least, can afford to do everything within the family that we would wish to do, nor can we afford to do everything for the family that we would wish to do. Government is really no different than that.

I guess what I would say in return to the hon. member is that when the time comes to establish priorities, we must again make some tough decisions, decisions that will not necessarily be popular in all parts of the country, nor are they necessarily the decisions which would be made by each and every Canadian. I look at this budget and I see certain reductions in place.

The hon. member has mentioned the CBC. Let me mention the proposed cultural research centre for the city of Montreal or the proposed expenditure of $88 million on the ballet centre in Toronto, and the cultural centre that was proposed for Edmonton. I can appreciate that each of these proposed programs has merit, and I can appreciate as well how they are important, particularly to the people who would be directly served by them. However, I would also suggest to the hon. member that the vast majority of my constituents, but not all, would place some of these proposed expenditures on a lower priority. They would give them a lower priority than others would. I think they will understand, therefore, how we cannot provide each and every proposal with the kind of dollars they would wish.

With respect to the Canadian Assistance Program, I think it is important to understand that those provinces, such as the province of Manitoba, which receive transfer payments will be as fully funded under CAP as they were in the past. Yes, transfer payments under the EPF, the Established Programs Funding, are frozen, but not under the Canada Assistance Program.

With respect to the Canadian Jobs Strategy, I, for one, am pleased by the innovation which I have seen in the Canadian Jobs Strategy but there are many who were very sceptical of it, including some in my own community who traditionally provided some of these training programs at community colleges.

I think, by and large, the money which has been spent has been useful. For one thing it has provided more flexibility than we have had in the past. So I like the strategy. I also understand that we have not fully utilized some of the moneys in the past so I gather there is some flexibility in that regard.

Finally, with regard to the ability to pay, the question of transfer payments. This is a major issue in my province. I would like to remind the provinces that the government requires 35 cents of every tax dollar to service the debt. They, on average, only require 12 cents of their revenue dollar to service their debt. Those figures in themselves suggest to me in terms of ability to pay that we have less manoeuvrability and less flexibility because of the debt and the cost of servicing that debt than do our provincial colleagues.

We are not asking them to do anything more than we are willing to do ourselves. But we are asking them to share in the task of dealing with the burden of the national debt because it is a national problem. It is not just a problem of this government. It is not just a problem of this Parliament. It is a problem for all of Canada, and the implications are real and will be severe for those who come after us.

It is easy for politicians to spend money. Normally when we spend money, the people who receive it are pleased, there is publicity, we are doing something, we are bringing something to them. We are at a sad state of affairs if we have reached the point in Canada when the only criteria for accomplishment, when it comes to measuring the history of a government, is the fact that it spent more money than previous governments.

That is not what is being asked of us. What is being asked of us now is that we accept the task of providing leadership, of making difficult decisions, sometimes even unpopular decisions and clearly we suffer as a result in terms of the public opinion polls. It is important to provide that leadership because the decisions which we are making today are not designed simply for our benefit as politicians or for this generation; they are designed for the benefit of future generations.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order to seek the unanimous consent of the House to allow any member who wishes to do so, and who is prepared to announce it at the commencement of his or her speech, to share the time with another member from his or her caucus. That would allow us a ten-minute speech followed by a five-minute question and answer period followed by another ten-minute speech and a five-minute question and answer period for the full 30 minutes.

There has been some informal discussion among the parties. I am not sure if on the government side word has gotten through from the lobby, but I did consult with the officials there, as well as with the Official Opposition. I think you will find there is agreement to do what we normally do in matters like this to allow more members to speak.

Madam Deputy Speaker: This is something that has been done quite often in the midst of major debates.

The House has heard the suggestion of the hon. member. Is there any objection to the possibility of members sharing their 20–minute time?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Agreed. The Chair would appreciate if the lead member would announce it so it would be easier for the Chair to keep note of the time.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Madam Speaker, in compliance with your recent announcement, I will be using ten minutes of the time and sharing with another member of my caucus.

I should remind the House that I represent a rural constituency made up of farms, small towns and small cities. It is the kind of constituency that the Conservative Party has traditionally considered itself as speaking for. But, over the past seven or eight years that tradition has fallen apart very sadly.

• (1040)

Now when I go into small towns to meet with chambers of commerce and councils, I find that they are worried about what is happening to their post offices. One of the few federal profiles in each of these communities is the federal post office, now being closed in many communities, shifted over to being privatized or, in some instances, disappearing altogether.

Usually the second federal profile that occurs in my small communities is the RCMP. The federal government at this very moment is busy trying to push off more of the cost of financing the RCMP on to these local municipalities. While most economic analyses show that 30 per cent of what the RCMP do in those rural communities is looking after federal responsibilities, the federal government is saying that is too much for us to bear, let the provinces and the small towns and small cities look after it.

The end result for some of the small cities is that they are placed in an almost impossible situation. They are in the position of hiring a police force of their own of four or five people at a cheaper rate than what the federal government is asking them to pay for the RCMP. Now these people do not want to give up the national police force. They believe in it. They are proud of it. Yet this last symbol of federalism in rural Canada is being pulled away by an off–loading of costs by the federal government.

Last, the thing that all small communities take some pride in is their local weekly newspapers. Canada Post, through a directive from the federal government to show a profit, has now decided that they are going to increase very dramatically the postal rates on those small community newspapers. All of the weekly papers which ship beyond a 40–mile radius have huge increases in postal costs, 10 times, 11 times the amount that they are paying now is being asked. This puts a further burden on holding small communities together, particularly in the prairies where 40 miles is barely the area which they service with the closure of towns and the thinning out of the population.

This budget, when you listen to the government's side, is a budget that has not raised very many taxes, except for a tobacco tax. They claim that there has been no increase in cost to people, that this is a hold the line budget and that this is an effort to reduce expenditures and get at, if not the national debt, certainly the annual deficit.

When you look at what is being put forward, you can readily see that the deficit is really not being cut. It is still at $30.5 billion. It has been hovering around $30 billion for the last seven years. The national debt has increased to in the neighbourhood of $400 billion, which has more than doubled in the period of time that the Conservative Party has held power. However, when you start looking into the budget, you see that there are a lot of extra costs that taxpayers and ordinary people are going to have to bear with the continuation of the program that this government put in place over previous budgets.

I recall David Suzuki, in a different context, trying to explain how the environment was getting into big trouble. He said we are all like the frog that is put into a pan of water and the heat is put under it. It begins to get warm and the frog sits there and becomes so insensitive to the extra heat that eventually it cooks. That is, to some extent, what is happening to people in rural Canada with this increased and continuous pressure from the federal government to put more costs on to them.

The costs that have been added this year, which are not mentioned in the budget but are there, are the increased amounts of taxes which people will have to pay because of a continuation of deindexing.

In the personal income tax system alone this affects people. Adding up the reduced purchasing power of the family allowance because of the continuation of deindexing, the continuation of the clawback on family allowances and old age security, the reduction in the buying power of the child tax credit maximums and the income thresholds, the reduction of the buying power of the income tax brackets that are established, the reductions in the buying power of the value of the tax credits for personal, age and the married and child credits, we can see that the combined measures of this particular program being continued for this year will cost each family in Canada about $300 per year, an increase in tax revenues of about $1 billion.

As well, we have increases to the unemployment insurance accounts. It is not called a tax increase but it is about a 25 per cent increase in the amount of deductions that will come off working peoples' cheques to pay their share of the unemployment insurance program and employers will pay an equivalent percentage increase. This is in spite of the government having just changed that legislation in recent months to make the unemployment insurance fund self-sustaining, meaning no tax dollars go into it directly. We just collect through levies.

We were assured at that time by the government that the levels that were set in that legislation would remain for at least three years. Less than six months later there is a 25 per cent increase. That comes out of peoples' pockets.

As well there is the off-loading of costs from the federal government to the provincial government. My time only allows me to go into a few of them, but in my province the off-loading of health costs and post-secondary education costs through the Established Programs Financing means that Saskatchewan will lose funding from the federal government of $348 million in health care dollars and $140 million in post-secondary education financing over the next five years. That means there is about $100 extra cost per man, woman and child in Saskatchewan this year. Added to the off-loading of federal responsibility for farm programs on to the provinces and individuals, the result is a tremendous figure.

Saskatchewan will be participating in the GRIP program. That means their annual charges at the provincial taxpayer level will be about $200 million, which almost quadruples the amount that Saskatchewan spends on agriculture. The bill that the farmer is asked to pay, including increased costs for crop insurance and GRIP, will be somewhere between $1 billion over the next five years for the province and between $1.5 billion and $2 billion over the next five years for producers. Just in additional provincial taxes, if the province wants to maintain the barely adequate service that they now have in health care and post-secondary education, it will cost every man, woman and child in Saskatchewan an additional $300 per year, thanks to the actions of this government in this budget. To say it is not a budget that increases taxes is completely false.

The last thing I would like to refer to, because few people have mentioned it, is the government's bogus effort to control spending. The government is proposing to implement legislation that would limit the amount of spending that it can engage in for each of the next few years. If the government is interested in that, it would recognize that the buck stops there. No one on this side of the House can initiate spending.

• (1050)

No backbencher on the government side of the House can initiate spending. Only the Prime Minister and his inner cabinet can initiate spending, by getting a royal recommendation. If the government wants to control spending, it can be controlled right there. The legislation they are proposing has so many provisos for breaking the rules that essentially it remains the same rule that we have followed for 123 years in this country; namely, that the Prime Minister and his inner cabinet decide when expenditures shall take place. And passing a "no spending" law will not change that.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I rise to speak on this budget with a comment that will I follow up with what I have to say. This budget is mean spirited, vindictive, and Draconian. In fact, this budget reminds me of a book that I read a number of years ago when I was first entering the workforce, a book called The Iron Heel.

An hon. member: In 1986.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): No, it was a little longer ago than 1986.

When I read The Iron Heel, I could not believe that in the two countries in North America that I was most familiar with in those early days, Canada and the United States, the kinds of things that happened in that book could in fact happen to working people, to the citizens of our countries. And yet looking at this budget, The Iron Heel is in fact coming down on the necks of the men and women who make this country strong through their work.

This budget continues the Tory attack on social services and renews its attack on the workers of this country. The Liberals gave us six-and-five; this government is giving workers three-and-two. If we remember what happened under six-and-five, I suspect that three-and-two will create even further suffering in this country.

This government has singled out public sector workers in its attack. It has used the threat of legislation to renege on its obligations to bargain with its employees in good faith. This government threatens back to work legislation if workers in the public sector exercise their legal right, and legitimate right, to strike. It threatens workers with lay-off if they negotiate a wage increase.

The effect of this budget on public sector workers is that for every 1 per cent increase they negotiate, they will be faced with a lay-off of 2,000 colleagues. What would be the point in accepting a 1 per cent salary increase in one hand and accepting a pink slip in the other hand? What kind of an option is that at the bargaining table? What kind of a pre-emptive strike has the government introduced at a time when this very week it has arrived at the bargaining table with the Public Service Alliance to negotiate the next round?

This legislation has clearly singled out public sector workers for wage restraint. This government has told public sector workers that they, loyal servants or not of the country, of this government, of all of us, will carry the burden for the terrible economic policies that this government has continually introduced since 1984.

It is also important to consider that, in addition to the attack on public sector workers, this government has singled out transfer payments to the provinces for further cuts. This means cuts to those on welfare, cuts to hospitals, and cuts to colleges and universities.

These cuts will mean further lay-offs of health-care workers, of social service workers, of education workers. It will mean reduced services. It will mean increased hardship.

The Tory-made recession has already thrown hundreds of thousands of workers on to the unemployment insurance system and into the social service system. This budget ensures that these workers will suffer more and carry the brunt of the costs of this recession. In fact, Mr. McCracken from the right-wing Informetrica estimates that this budget will cost an additional 68,000 jobs.

The finance minister has made much of the fact that there are no new direct taxes in this budget. What he fails to mention is that the GST has cut into the household budget of Canadians already. What he fails to mention is that increased UI premiums will cost workers more, after a promise during the debate on Bill C-21, the changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act, that there would be no increases.

What he fails to mention is that provincial governments will be forced to recoup shortfalls in transfer payments from individual taxpayers, yet again the very people this government is attacking under this budget.

The minister has forecast double-digit unemployment rates, up to 10 per cent this year and 9.8 per cent next year, yet, there is no money for job creation.

Recent Stats Canada data show an additional inflation rate of 6.8 per cent. This will mean family allowance and old age security payments will decrease in real terms as they are only partially indexed to inflation. Families and seniors will suffer. The threshold for the clawback of these payments will rise, capturing more and more needy Canadians in its claws.

Inflation alone will add $300 to the tax bill of average Canadians—this on top of the GST.

We see cuts to labour adjustment programs, especially those aimed at helping older workers. When a worker in this country is laid off between the age of 45 and 65, the chances of being re-employed at a level that will maintain his or her existing lifestyle, is tremendously diminished. This government had the temerity to cut labour adjustment programs.

We see cuts to the Canadian Jobs Strategy, this only months after the minister for employment made much of the new money being directed for training. There is no new money. It is smoke and mirrors. There is a shift and they are shucking and jiving. There is no new money.

Contrary to what the Minister of Finance said, this budget is not about shared responsibility. It is not about sharing the burden for the recession. Sharing the burden does not mean letting the wealthy off the hook. Sharing the burden does not mean letting big business off the hook. Sharing means fairness and this budget is not about fairness. It is about punishing Canadian families for Tory mismanagement.

The most optimistic of us cannot help but see that this budget is an attempt to break the back of organized labour in the public sector. It directly attacks public sector workers.

Yesterday the President of the Treasury Board announced that his government will be legislating contracting out of public sector jobs. This will mean, in fact, violation of the existing collective agreement. Does this mean that the end of free collective bargaining is happening in the Public Service? Is the minister in fact telling Canadians that this government's signature on a contract means nothing? Has this government become so bankrupt that it has abandoned all principles?

In closing, I would like to say that if the finance minister is truly interested in the bottom line, there is no doubt at all that the bottom line would include an investment in Canadian workers and in their families, the very people who labour to pay for government services, people who are unemployed and want to be part of the growth and redevelopment of this country. They need the tools.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, this morning members of the Liberal caucus met with 20 unions, representing more than half a million workers in the federal and provincial public sectors, to discuss the inane measures announced earlier this week by the finance minister.

The Public Service Alliance of Canada has 140,000 employees out of a total of 165,000 members in a negotiating position with Treasury Board. The Professional Institute of the Public Service has 22,000 employees out of 25,000 members who have been without a contract since before September 1990 and 10,000 of those are employees who are in a legal strike position.

It is quite clear from these figures that this government waited for exactly the right moment to introduce wage controls. The government waited until the majority of its employees were in a negotiating position before attacking. The government took advantage of a vulnerable Public Service and is forcing its workers to fight each other.

It is also clear that this government has one goal in mind and one goal only, the complete dismantling of Public Service unions at the federal level.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Allan Koury (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve): Madam Speaker, I wish to thank all those who called and wrote, and all the people I met, who expressed their support for our Canadian troops and the government during the gulf crisis.

Thank you Rosemont, thank you Hochelaga—Maisonneuve!

ARTS AND CULTURE

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, yesterday the government cut $18 million from the cultural sector in Canada. This is a terrible loss. This government does not realize how important the arts are in increasing understanding among Canada's different cultures.

Last night I attended the Ottawa premiere of an outstanding aboriginal play, "Dry Lips Oughta Move to Kapuskasing", written by Tomson Highway, a Cree Indian from Manitoba.

The performance last night was in support of the Canadian Native Arts Foundation. This foundation was established by John Kim Bell, a Mohawk Indian, to assist native youth with artistic talent to achieve their dreams.

I commend the Canadian Native Arts Foundation, Tomson Highway, and all the native actors, including Graham Greene, for a superb performance.

Aboriginal artists are emerging as a major cultural force in this country. I encourage everyone to see this play. It is full of deep spiritual meaning. I urge the government to stop cutting and to assist and support aboriginal languages and cultures.

MINES AND MINING

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, construction will start this year in Quebec on a new CANMET mining research laboratory, at a cost of $15 million over a period of 5 years. The laboratory, which will have access to the Dorval mine in Val-d'Or, will be used to test mining methods, procedures and equipment.

Thanks to the active involvement of representatives from the mining, economic and political community in the Val-d'Or area, and of course the tremendous work done by Benoit Bouchard, Jake Epp, CANMET officials and the Prime Minister of Canada, this laboratory will open its doors very shortly in Val-d'Or, Quebec.

Madam Speaker, since 1984, I have defended the Abitibi region in Ottawa. That is what Quebec Tory members do in Ottawa. Thank you, Michael Wilson!

THE LATE DR. GUILLERMO UNGO

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, Dr. Guillermo Ungo, Leader of the National Democratic Revolutionary Party of El Salvador, died February 28 while recuperating from brain surgery in Mexico.

Dr. Ungo, lawyer and academic, spent the sixties helping to organize a democratic socialist movement in which he became a leader in 1968 and formed a coalition with other parliamentary parties for peace and democracy.

After many coalition leaders were massacred in 1980, he travelled the world raising international support for peace and democracy in his homeland. In 1978 he was elected a vice-president of the Socialist International.

In 1988 he returned to El Salvador as presidential candidate of the Democratic Convergence in the March 1989 elections.

Since then, he campaigned for freedom of speech for churches, unions and other community groups in a national dialogue for peace. His party is contesting the mid-term elections in El Salvador on March 10, 1991. He is remembered for his motto "It is not possible to be a democrat without being a revolutionary, nor to be a revolutionary without being a democrat".

RESTORATION OF PEACE IN PERSIAN GULF

Mr. Jacques Vien (Laurentides): Madam Speaker, two days ago President Bush announced that operations in the Persian Gulf had been suspended, a moment we were all looking forward to. We can now expect peace to be restored in that part of the world, and we can only hope it will be a lasting peace. We must never forget that during these recent events, peace was always the primary motive in decisions made by this government. Our basic objective was to restore and maintain peace. I think this reflects honourably on all Canadians. We shall continue to sursue that goal.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Madam Speaker, two weeks ago, the Northern Ontario Liberal caucus held meetings to hear presentations on the economy of the region. No one was surprised as each of the 57 witnesses confirmed this government's dismal handling of the economy. The government has created a "made–in–Canada" recession with its high interest rate policy.

The softwood lumber industry has crumbled. Exports to the U.S. are practically nil. The flow–through shares program was cancelled last year. Mineral exploration is down to 15 per cent from what it was five years ago.

In addition, the budget has cut $100 million from the job–training program. This will affect our youth and our laid–off workers.

Furthermore, the high cost of living that has resulted from the GST means that northern residents will not have that extra cash to invest in their RRSPs anymore.

This budget should have been introduced five years ago when the economy was strong. No, this government has chosen to hurt needy people while leaving their corporate friends unscathed.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, this Conservative budget actually threatens to legislate contracting out.

What does this mean? It means that qualified government employees will see their jobs being given to this government's friends. It will become the worst institutionalized abuse of patronage, kickbacks and money laundering in history. These consultants, who often have no expertise and no experience, will receive their rewards through untendered contracts.

Tory bagmen, candidates, election organizers and contributors will charge the government hundreds of dollars per day for work that could have been done by qualified regular government employees for a mere fraction of that rate.

In the last seven years, Conservatives have hired thousands of their friends through contracting out.

The Liberals were no better. One untendered contract was given in Manitoba to not one, not two but to three Liberal candidates, one of whom is now a member of this House.

Before the government is allowed to institutionalize and expand upon through legislation the abuses of themselves and the Liberals we need a truly independent report of the experiences of the last decade. Who received contracts?

ASSOCIATION DES NORD–CÔTIERS

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Madam Speaker, I would like to pay special tribute today to a group of men and women on the Lower North Shore in the riding of Manicouagan, who worked very hard during the past three years to set up the Association des Nord–Côtiers.

[English]

Three years ago, the Coasters Association was a dream in the mind of a few men and women from the Lower North Shore. This dream became reality during the weekend of February 16 and 17 when over 100 people met in La Tabatière to adopt the by–laws and elect the first board of directors of the Coasters Association.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, the cynical measures in this government's budget to put a 3 per cent cap on all Public Service wage settlements and to threaten workers with job losses if they complain about it is nothing more than a mean-spirited, vicious assault on all Canadian workers.

• (1110)

By its own actions, this government is telling every employer in Canada that it is acceptable to throw away the right to bargain and it is acceptable to hold over the heads of workers the threats of job losses and contracting out.

If this government can be so cavalier at throwing away such basic, hard-won rights and principles of this nation's workers, will pay equity and equal opportunity be the next to go?

Who will be affected the most by this government's actions? The very members of our work force who are the most vulnerable: women, the disabled and visible minorities. Already their quality of life has been severely eroded by so many of this government's policies and now they are again in the direct line of fire.

This is clearly unacceptable and we, on this side of the House, will not stand for it.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Madam Speaker, I want to congratulate the federal government on its announcement last Tuesday night to move the National Energy Board to Calgary. This is a positive step. It contributes to the goal of effective and efficient government decentralization and it recognizes the source of funds used to finance the National Energy Board's operations.

Some 14 to 15 months ago, I tabled a motion urging this government to make the move and we can now see it is a reality. Calgary is the energy capital of Canada and that is where the Board should be.

I want to acknowledge and say thanks to the Calgary Chamber of Commerce for pursuing the issue. It is now a reality.

TASK FORCE ON CANADIAN UNITY

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister is ready to release his Canada Geese. Madam Speaker, $8.1 million has been set aside for a task force on Canadian unity. The referendum season is open. Quite an about-face, for a government that at the time was so critical of the Canadian Unity Information Office and which has now resurrected it in the form of the task force on Canadian unity. Welcome back, Paul Tellier, Richard Dicerney, Dan Gagné! The same faces, the same budgets and the same strategy. How come in 1980, 1981, 1982 it was propaganda, at least according to the Tories, and today, it is information? In 1980, according to the Prime Minister it was Jean Chrétien's honey pot, but today, it is money well spent. How come in the eighties it was a slush fund—

FUEL ETHANOL

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, last week, at a very important conference on fuel ethanol in Lethbridge, people in western Canada caught a glimpse of the future.

Fuel ethanol is good for farmers because it constitutes a whole new market for their grains. It is good for rural towns because local small-scale ethanol plants can employ 10 to 15 people in each of the rural communities hosting them, and can be part of the solution to the municipal solid waste disposal problem.

And fuel ethanol is good for the environment because, unlike every other carbon-based fuel, ethanol recycles carbon already in the biosphere rather than dredging up yet more carbon from underground.

Even the Alberta government's representative at the conference, not an ethanol enthusiast, said that with just a 3 per cent Alberta market penetration by ethanol, farmers could sell another 450,000 tonnes of grain and there would be a net benefit to the Alberta economy of about $7 million.

From virtually every point of view, fuel ethanol makes wonderful sense. It is time—

TOBACCO INDUSTRY

Mr. Gaby Larrivée (Joliette): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance has shown he understood the message sent by Canadians to reduce and control government spending and improve management of the Public Service. The Budget brought down on Tuesday contains measures that will promote economic recovery, reduce unemployment, control the debt and when in a period of renewed prosperity.

However, although I have no reservation about spending cuts in general, I must say I do not agree with the excessively high tax increases on tobacco products as proposed in this Budget. I realize this is part of the government's national strategy to fight smoking, but I think moderation would be more palatable to the industry.

In view of these increases, I would urge the government to immediately take appropriate action to help producers who will be severely affected by this decision.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, but the hon. member's time has expired.

JOB RETRAINING

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, in my riding of Parkdale—High Park, there are more and more people out of work, both from plant closings and layoffs in the wake of the free trade agreement and the effects of the recession.

My constituents remember hearing the promise of retraining for workers who lose their jobs as a result of the free trade agreement. However, when they go to request that retraining, they are put on a waiting list and told it will be a year or more before they can get any training. Madam Speaker, they are out of work right now. They need to upgrade their skills right now if they are to move from jobs in light manufacturing and industry into the age of computers and technology. They are being left behind because the funds promised by this government are not available. Empty promises do not pay mortgages or feed families of Canadians. Empty promises do not prepare people for career changes in this age of technology. It is time to stop cutting training funds and start honouring the promise of retraining so that Canadians can work their way out of this recession and into the 21st century.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

Given his heartless budget this week, what does the minister have to say to the woman who is lined up today at the welfare office because she has no hope? What does he have to say to the child who this very noon will be eating lunch in a soup kitchen? What does the minister have to say to the grandmother whose operation is on hold because the hospital is too crowded? What does he have to say to the young person who will be sleeping in the street tonight because there is no more room at emergency shelters? What do the minister and the Prime Minister have to say to all those Canadians other than "Sorry, we have to fight the recession on your back"?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I do not think there is anybody in this House who is at all comfortable or happy to hear of the people who are at food banks or who are homeless, who are unemployed, who have lost their jobs or lost their homes. These are things that none of us like to contemplate at all and we are trying to do everything we can to deal with the difficulties that these people have in a variety of programs that are delivered at the federal, the provincial, and in many cases the municipal levels.

I think that my colleague, when she asks a question, is trying to deflect totally the concern of Canadians from the very, very real problem that we have of the debt in this country, and that each one of those Canadians whom my hon. friend refers to has indirectly, through the federal government, a debt of $15,000 that if we do not get under control, we are going to be able to help much less than we can now, because as that debt has mounted over the years, so has the cost of servicing that debt to the point now that 35 cents out of every revenue dollar goes simply to pay the interest on that debt. Those revenues cannot be used to help the homeless, to help the people who are unemployed or to help the people who are losing their jobs or a business.

An hon. member: You are making it worse.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): My hon. friend says I am making it worse. Where he is quite wrong is that what this budget is precisely designed to do is to get interest rates down to ensure that we get a healthy economy to put those people back to work and to help the businesses create the jobs and the opportunities that will get them back to work.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance referred to the real problem. The real problem is that 200,000 children have to go to food banks to get something to eat. The real problem is that 1.5 million Canadians will not be able to find jobs when the government cuts its job-creation programs. The real problem is that tens of thousands of Canadians have no decent accommodation, and the government has decided to cut funding for subsidized housing. The real problem is that we are facing a crisis in our universal health care system, and the government goes and cuts $1 billion in this area.

Does the minister realize that by abdicating his responsibility for dealing with the problems the provinces are facing, he is playing right into the hands of people who want to destroy our country? When will he understand the real problem?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am sure the hon. member would be reluctant to say something she knows is wrong. During Question Period yesterday, in the House of Commons, I explained why the hon. member's statement is wrong.

My hon. friend referred to Tuesday's Budget. I would like to quote from page 89 of the English version, under the heading Cash and tax transfers to other levels of government. These transfers will increase from last year's $36.3 billion to $36.9 billion this year.

So my hon. friend knows perfectly well she is wrong, and the result is to mislead the Canadian people.

• (1120)

[English]

She knows that she has a responsibility as acting leader of her party to speak responsibly and honestly to Canadians.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, the figures speak for themselves. The minister's own estimates tabled yesterday show a cut of more than $1 billion in federal payments for universal health care.

This budget is a separatist's dream. It is a federalist's nightmare.

At a time in the history of our country when the role of the federal government is under attack, the Conservatives are feeding the argument of those who want to tear this country apart. The Tories are doing the job by dismantling our national programs, bit by bit by bit.

Does the minister not understand that Canadians expect a national government to take care of the sick, the homeless and the jobless? Does the minister not understand that while John A. Macdonald was the Father of Confederation, his own Prime Minister has become the father of de-Confederation?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, the hon. member asks to be taken seriously by Canadians when she demonstrates that she cannot even read the estimates. Transfers to the provinces for health care this year will increase by about 1 per cent.

What the hon. member seeks to do is to confuse Canadians by completely ignoring the fact that transfers of tax points at exactly the same cost to the federal government as cash and at exactly the same benefit to the provinces as cash are increasing. She seeks deliberately to ignore that fact.

She talks about the effect on national unity. Yesterday she cited approvingly the comments that were made by her former chief organizer in Quebec, Mr. Côté. As she well knows, Mr. Côté advocates the dismantling of medicare and the destruction of our national health care system. Is that the policy of the national Liberal Party?

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

When it signed its recent agreement on immigration with the Province of Quebec, the government said that from now on, constitutional negotiations would be approached as a single unit. In Tuesday's Budget, the government abandoned social policy to the provinces. It started its constitutional negotiations without public consultation. It ignored the advice of its experts.

My question is this: Why? Why do this with a single stroke of the arbitrary pen of the Minister of Finance?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have had consultations with the provincial finance ministers on an ongoing basis. I indicated to them in both December and January the very serious nature of the fiscal problems of the federal government, and I gave them every indication that there would have to be changes to the transfers to the provinces in this budget. They understand that. They got that message very clearly back in the meeting in January.

My response to the hon. member is that we have had these discussions. We are going to have ongoing discussions with the provinces on the major transfers. We have discussions under way now and have had for about a year now on the changes to the equalization program.

We have also indicated to them our intention of bringing forward specific proposals on changes to the tax arrangements between the federal and provincial levels of government. There has been very, very extensive consultation.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Madam Speaker, this is not simply a financial debate; it is a constitutional debate. It is the same taxpayer. You have not changed the national deficit. You have simply transferred it from one level of government to another, and you have not done a thing.

What this government has done is that it has made exactly the same mistake in the constitutional debate that it made in the free trade agreement. There, desperate for a deal, the government made all kinds of concessions before the real negotiations even started. As a result, this government went to the negotiations with the Americans without any clothes on and got skinned.

Now, here, in the opening shots of the constitutional negotiations, the government has made the same cowardly mistake. It has given up all of the bargaining chips and, in doing so, has fundamentally altered the nature of the country.

My question is: How could this government play so fast and loose with the country? How could it so prejudice the nation without any kind of national consultation, without even the slightest hint of a national debate?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think my hon. friend has this all wrong. He has to realize that what we are doing in the discussions that we are having with the provinces is not deciding on what powers the provinces should have or what powers the federal government should have. We are addressing a serious fiscal problem which I think, if he had the honesty to address himself, he would agree with me that we do have a serious fiscal problem and must deal with it.

He is saying we have a fiscal problem because of it. If he would be honest with himself and if he would be honest with the Canadian people, he would realize that in the 10 years leading up to 1984, when this government came into office, program spending increased by 13.8 per cent per annum. Since then it is 3.7 per cent per annum. The momentum that was created by that runaway spending of 13.8 per cent per annum created the problems that we are having to deal with today. That runaway spending at that time is taking away the choices that we have today as a government, as Canadian people, and if we do not get the—

Some hon. members: Order, order.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Increasingly, as people have had a chance to analyse this budget, they see that it is a budget designed to increase the recession, to deepen the recession, rather than to get people working, to get the poor back to earning a decent standard of living. This budget is clearly on the backs of the poor, the unemployed, and those in our society who have not had a chance. This finance minister is not giving them a chance.

The minister has said that this is a budget about choices. While others have said this will clearly deepen the recession, the choices the minister has chosen to make is to increase funding for Canada's spy agency by $24 million, to increase funding for the Senate by over $5 million, and to increase defence spending by almost a billion dollars. And yet he chose to cut jobs, cut medicare, cut social programs.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance: Will he stop cutting away at the things that help people in this country? Will he do something real for national unity and get Canadians back to work?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party referred to three programs. One of them increased, I think she said, by $20 million, the other by $5 million, and she knows that changing the funding in those programs would have had essentially no impact on the $35 billion deficit that we are looking at.

On the question of funding for defence, yes, we did have a choice.

• (1130)

Our choice was to assist and participate in the fight for freedom. If the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party is against fighting for freedom then she is in a different camp than we are on this side of the House, and let her stay in that camp because it is a camp that we do not want to be in.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): We did have choices. It is three days since the budget, and what I have heard from the New Democratic Party is that the New Democratic Party wants to spend additional amounts of money. As I said to her yesterday, when we open the books on the budget planning for 1991–1992 we are faced with a deficit of $35 billion. What I am hearing from her is that she would be quite comfortable to see that go up to $36 billion, $37 billion, or $38 billion.

Time and again she sat in this House and said: "Get interest rates down". Would she explain to me how moving the deficit from $35 billion up to $37 billion or $38 billion would get interest rates down? Or, would she admit, as I think she should know, that that would cause an increase in interest rates?

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

There are people who say that there are a lot of dream projections in this budget. The minister is saying that the New Democratic Party has said we want to increase the deficit, that is absolutely wrong.

We are talking about priorities. He says $24 million for the spy agency, no money for the unemployed, and we say that is wrong.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Minister of Finance. About a million and a half Canadians are now unemployed, and analysts say that the Budget will help push this figure even higher. The Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops commented that some thought should have been given to an approach that would have promoted job creation and a better distribution of wealth.

Why did the government decide against putting anything in the Budget to create jobs?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I believe that my hon. friend, Shirley Carr, the head of the Canadian Labour Congress, and the Catholic bishops have all said that we should get interest rates down.

The Leader of the New Democratic Party has said let us hope that interest rates come down. Hope will not bring interest rates down, but what will bring interest rates down are actions taken in this budget, which is precisely designed to bring interest rates down.

The limits on spending, the reductions in the deficit, and the inflation targets are all designed to bring down interest rates. If my hon. friend is looking for a way to help the unemployed, if she is looking for ways to help people get off the unemployed list, the best way that we can stimulate the economy is to bring down interest rates, and the fundamental design of this budget is to bring down interest rates, to stimulate the economy, and to generate employment.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, day after day the minister stands in this House and says that he has to get inflation down to bring interest rates down. Maybe we do not disagree with that.

Then, why, I have to ask the minister, is he bringing in inflationary measures by introducing the GST that he knows caused the inflation rate to go up. He brings in a tax on cigarettes that he knows is inflationary. He increases unemployment insurance premiums that he knows is inflationary for small business and workers who have to pay that extra expense.

In addition and at the same time this finance minister says that he is not destroying the national medicare system. I want to say to him that we know he did not start that destruction—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. member will put her question.

Ms. McLaughlin: Madam Speaker, I want to ask the minister who has said—and the minister of health—that the medicare system is not being destroyed and that the reduction in transfer payments started by the Liberals is not destroying medicare if they will not listen to their own National Council on Welfare that says this federal government's budget can mean the end of medicare. If they will not listen to the people of Canada, will they listen to their own advisory council?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I almost could not believe my own ears. Is the hon. member saying on behalf of her party that she opposes the measures taken by the Minister of Finance to reduce by 100,000 the number of teenage smokers in Canada? If that is her policy, let her say so explicitly.

I strongly support that policy, a policy that will save thousands of lives in this country, that will save tens of millions of dollars in our health care budgets. If the NDP believes that taxes should not be increased to discourage young smokers, let it say so.

In so far as the National Council on Welfare is concerned, its responsibility is to argue for more spending on behalf of social programs, and it does that job well.

In this House of Commons, the responsibility of the hon. member and of members on this side is not only to say where we would favour more spending but also where we would get the money from. It is time to come clean with Canadians and for the Leader of the NDP to spell it out.

CITIZENS' FORUM ON CANADA'S FUTURE

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, my question for to the Minister of Finance.

Regrettably, yesterday the Prime Minister was unable to answer questions regarding allegations that have been made by Mr. Robert Normand, a member of the Spicer Commission.

Given that the Prime Minister and the government have both a moral and legal obligation for the proper operation of the commission, will the Minister of Finance tell the House of Commons today, and through the House the people of Canada, whether or not there is any substance to Mr. Normand's allegation that some commission members may be collecting up to $18,000 a month, improperly?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I think it is very important to reiterate that Mr. Normand at no time has suggested that anyone is doing anything fraudulent on the commission. He stated that quite unequivocally.

The hon. member knows very well, as we stated in the House yesterday, that a commission such as the Spicer commission operates independently.

Although it was announced at the beginning of November, the financial requirements for 1991–92 are still under consideration and will be included in the Supplementary Estimates for 1991–92. The financial requirements for this year, 1990–91, will be part of the final Supplementary Estimates that will be tabled in Parliament shortly, so there will be an opportunity for parliamentary overview.

But I would remind the hon. member that although the commission is independent, it does come under the purview of the Auditor General.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, the commission was appointed by the Prime Minister and cabinet to do important work; that is, to deal with the question of national unity. This is an important question for Canada. It cannot operate under a cloud raised by an eminent member of the commission, not by the opposition, not by outside parties.

I again ask the Minister of Justice whether or not she understands the importance of clearing the air of this dark cloud that has been raised and put above the commission by a member of the commission. Will she make a full report to Parliament and to Canadians that indeed no member of this commission is being paid $18,000 a month, supposedly picking the brains of Canadians to solve the problem of national unity?

Canadians want to know that these commissioners are doing their job: picking our brains, not picking our pockets.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, once again I repeat: the hon. member knows that this is an independent commission. I am sure that if I or any of my colleagues sought to interfere in its activities, the hon. member would be the first on his feet in this House to complain.

I think that if the hon. member wishes to contribute to the clarity of the process and the ability of the commission to make a contribution, he will avoid making statements that put the commission under a cloud. Although the commission is independent, it does not operate at large; it does not operate without any constraints.

We have a process of auditing all of the commissions of Parliament precisely to avoid the kind of thing that the hon. member is talking about. Those proper agencies will do their job to assure the Canadian people that their money is being properly spent, and that is how it ought to be.

CANADA POST

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for Canada Post. As of today postal rates for many weekly newspapers will jump dramatically, some over 1,000 per cent. The minister has made the situation even worse by giving half the papers a three-month reprieve yesterday while throwing the rest to the wolves today. This will wipe out many valuable weekly farming community publications right across this country.

Will the minister assure us in this House today that these ludicrous rate increases will be stopped in their tracks?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): What is ludicrous are the comments made by the hon. member about what is happening.

As was announced some two years ago, the subsidies for publications are being reduced as part of the fiscal management of the government. What was announced yesterday were the rates which will apply for weekly newspapers. There is a 90-day delay for the small town weekly newspapers in terms of its implementation.

There was also, at the same time, an announcement that there would be an additional $2 million of subsidy available for these broader regional weeklies to which I think the hon. member was referring.

The matter is being dealt with sensitively, properly and in an expeditious manner, as is usually the case with this government.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Madam Speaker, half of them are being driven out on the street today. The minister has not addressed the problem.

Does the minister not realize that these weeklies operate on a paper-thin profit margin and any increase in postal rates would close many of them down? The minister has attacked rural post offices and he is now laying siege to rural communication lines. Will the minister tell Canada Post that it can no longer add to its fat profits on the backs of rural Canadians?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): The hon. member's use of hyperbole is quite astounding. He is following the example of the deputy leader of his party, I guess.

The continuous program, administered by the Department of Communications for quite a number of years, long before this government came into office, is a program of subsidy to publications in this country. Weekly newspapers, small town newspapers for towns under 10,000 population will continue to have the first 2,500 copies delivered by Canada Post free of charge.

As a result of the adjustments, on average across the country, these small town weekly newspapers will pay in the order of eight or nine cents a copy for delivery. When you compare that to the 40 cents which it costs to deliver a first class letter or a smaller package, I think he will realize that in fact the program is still quite generous, in recognition of the important role of the small town newspapers.

What is needed is understanding by everybody involved. It is not aided by the wild hyperbole, exaggeration and mistruths of the hon. member.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance, who continues today to talk about the serious fiscal problems facing the Government of Canada and the need for everybody to contribute.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance why he has not changed the interest deductibility rule. Is he aware that at a recent tax conference in New Zealand, a New Zealand multinational by the name of Fletcher Challenge bragged about setting up in Canada, because Canada was a tax haven, which enabled it to make $128 million in 1989 and pay absolutely no taxes at all, because Canada is a place where it can borrow money to finance its global operations and at the same time avoid taxes. If the Minister of Finance is interested in reducing the deficit, why did he not do something about that and why did he extend that rule in December 1990, rather than getting rid of it?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, on the question of interest deductibility, interest is deductible if it is used in borrowing money, if it is paid on borrowed money designed to earn profits for the company that is incurring that deduction. The Fletcher people are taking advantage of a particular tax provision, which is available in many other countries of the world today. It is designed to generate profits here in Canada. Those profits will be fully taxable.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, the fact is that it helps them to generate profits all over the world which are not generated in Canada. The only people who are affected are the Canadian taxpayers who end up financing Fletcher Challenge to the tune of millions of dollars.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance, who talks so soberly about sharing the burden, why he refuses to do anything about that kind of rule. Why does he allow the Canadian taxpayers to continue to be pillaged by these multinational corporations. Why, for instance, he is not willing to do anything about the business and entertainment tax loophole, the free lunch loophole which is worth $1 billion in free lunches to the business community.

Why did he not have the nerve to ask them to contribute to reducing the deficit? Why do they continue to get a free lunch?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, we did change the business entertainment expense. We brought it into line with what the provision is in other countries, in particular in the United States. My hon. friend can rail away as much as he wants about the provisions in the corporate income tax system.

If he would study the corporate income tax system, he would realize that it is just on the margin of competitiveness in relation to our major trading partner, the United States.

We could raise our taxes. We could eliminate a number of the provisions in the corporate income tax system, but the result would be that companies like Flyer Industries in his riding would move down to Minneapolis. He might feel very good about the change in the income tax system, but he would be the first up on his hind legs in this House saying: "Why are you doing things that are causing companies to leave Canada and move to the United States?"

That is precisely why we have to maintain a corporate income tax system that is competitive in this country.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Last year in passing Bill C–21, the government made a legislative commitment to freeze unemployment insurance premiums for three years. In announcing this freeze, the minister said: "The government will continue to finance any deficits in the unemployment insurance account in difficult times when it may not be appropriate to allow premiums to rise."

That is what the minister said. Why then is the minister now increasing unemployment insurance premiums by $2 billion when we are in a serious recession? He himself says that we are in difficult times. Why is he breaking his word of last year?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member well knows that under the Unemployment Insurance Act there is a requirement that premiums be established to keep returning the fund to a balanced position.

In other words, if there is a deficit, there is a requirement in the law that premiums increase, and, if there is a surplus, that they go down. When the premiums were established in the last budget, it was done in the expectation and the forecast of what the economy would look like at the time.

Those circumstances have changed. The government will continue to fund the deficit throughout the period. The fund will be in deficit and the government will carry it. In order to bring it back to balance, otherwise premiums will have to increase faster. If we did not increase premiums now, they would have to go to $4 or $5 at the end of the period to cover that deficit.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Madam Speaker, the fact is that in 1990 the Minister of Finance made a commitment to freeze unemployment insurance premiums for three years.

The minister said in his budget that in hard times, he would cover deficits out of general revenue. That is what he said, and now he is making a $2 billion flip–flop.

Let me have this answer, Madam Speaker. Was the minister totally incompetent when he made that legislative commitment last year, or was he simply lying to the Canadian people?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I certainly think that the question is an offensive one.

It is certainly offensive because we are continuing to carry the fund while it is in deficit. I would remind the hon. member that it was his party which delayed this whole project well beyond where it might have been providing some better use during the recession.

He also knows that we are going to continue to carry the fund while it is in deficit.

THE BUDGET

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, Canada's cultural community is already singing the "Bye Bye Blues" with the Wilson budget cuts and delays of $197 million.

Will the Minister of Communications walk over to his friend, the Minister of Finance, as he carves up grants and contributions, and tell him that at a time of strained national unity, this government should be strengthening the ties that bind us rather than following a search and destroy mission against Canadian culture.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, the government is very much aware of the importance of cultural activities in Canada, and that is why it has made available to government agencies and the Department of Communications the kind of funding we need—which compares favourably with other activity sectors—to define policy and be present in all cultural areas in this country.

[English]

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, it is a sad day when the Minister of Communications becomes the minister of vacation and is not around to defend Canada's cultural community.

In the same vein, funding to women's research groups has not been restored and small group funding has sustained a $75 million cut this year alone.

Will the Minister of Finance admit that research and community development is at least half of the equality battle—if he cares—and refuse to strangle these groups and their work for women any longer?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, the government has added $8 million this year to the Canada Council, for the arts.

Furthermore, the government is also actively involved in our cultural industries because the market situation in Canada is a difficult one. In addition to investing in these agencies, the governement must also ensure that our cultural industries develop as they should, in order to support our cultural market. It is with this in mind, Madam Speaker, that the government has tried to provide for a fair distribution of programs and grants between these agencies and the Department of Communications.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. He has just responded to my colleague from Winnipeg by suggesting that we have to keep our tax system in this country somehow competitive with other countries and that justifies the very gross loopholes which exist in our tax system.

Let me ask the Minister of Finance this. The United States, which is our major trading partner, has a minimum corporate tax. It has just put into effect a luxury tax. It has an inheritance tax. All of these are things which we do not have in this country. Let me ask this minister why he is not prepared to put these kinds of fair measures into the tax system to help Canadians and to give the ordinary person a tax break?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I want to ask my hon. friend whether the United States has a large corporations tax. I want to ask my friend whether the United States has as high a capital gains tax rate in that country as we do? We have a higher burden on corporations than the United States. What one has to look at is the bottom line on the corporate tax system.

As I said to his colleague from Winnipeg, we can have a good time feeling warm all over by hammering the corporations and raising the tax rates, but the people who live in his community would find that the jobs would not be there. They would have to go across the border to Detroit and get jobs in Detroit because the businesses would not be able to support the same type of activity in Windsor as they could working across the way in Detroit.

His community is fortunate because people can go across the river, but people who live in other communities are not be so fortunate. It is for that reason we must have a corporate income tax system which is not just somehow competitive but actually competitive, to ensure that we retain jobs here in Canada and not export them to the United States.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance cannot have it both ways. He cannot say we have to be competitive and so we have to keep our tax system in line with other countries and, when we point out to him the tax system in the United States has these various mechanisms which in fact hit higher income people and large corporations, he says: "Oh well, we cannot do that".

Why is the Minister of Finance prepared to use the excuse of the United States when it is to his benefit? Why is he not prepared to use the example of the United States to put fairness into our tax system as it should be?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the only point that I was making is that the United States has a very complex corporate minimum tax and, rather than have that corporate minimum tax which adds a lot of complexity to the tax system, we have the large corporations tax which is very simple and has the same sort of impact. That was the only point that I was making.

Now the hon. member refers to fairness in taxation on individuals. If he would refer to a study that has been recently completed by the Organization of Economic Co-operation, the OECD in Paris, it shows that the Canadian tax system for the average worker is a fair tax system, that the take home pay after taxes for Canadian workers is on the high end of the range.

He will also be aware, I am sure, of a study that was done by Price Waterhouse comparing the tax system for upper income people in Canada and the United States. It indicates that the tax burden on upper income people in Canada is considerably greater than the tax system in the United States.

FORESTRY

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): My question is directed to the Minister of Forestry. For many months, the Canadian government has tried to conclude a Canada-Quebec agreement on the forestry sector, and we all know that the federal Department of Forestry is prepared to inject $100 million to help forestry workers in Quebec this year. The question is this: Could the minister inform the House today whether he is pursuing his talks with Quebec for the purpose of concluding an agreement on the Quebec forestry sector, because forestry workers in Abitibi—Témiscamingue are sick and tired of waiting for the province to make up its mind?

[English]

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, my discussions with my counterpart in the province of Quebec are ongoing. They are progressing toward a new agreement that would respect both the objectives of the province of Quebec as well as certain legitimate national objectives.

Keeping in mind that the provinces, of course, own and have the principal responsibility for the management of the resource, we have a number of serious national objectives which we are attempting to pursue. A few of those are the stabilization of private woodlots in the provinces, research, environmental questions and general labour and manpower questions.

I made an offer to the province of Quebec on August 24 and I am hoping to have an agreement completed within the not too distant future.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, at a time when the unemployment rate and the welfare rolls are skyrocketing, the Minister of Finance, who has predicted a 10 per cent unemployment rate, has now frozen public servant wages, including those of the armed services whom the government has just congratulated for a job well done.

This government has declared open season on public servants across Canada, be they federal, provincial, municipal or school board employees. All public servants will be affected by this Tory budget. How can the Minister of Finance stand in this House and say that by gouging one group, the public servants of Canada, he is correcting the economic difficulties caused by his own incompetence.

• (1200)

Mr. Andre: Does Sheila write everybody's question?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): In this budget we are not attempting to gouge anybody. What we are putting forward in a very clear way is an assessment of the problems of this country. We have a serious fiscal problem. We are asking the employees as well as members of Parliament and ministers to participate in the solution of this major fiscal problem. We have asked the public servants to be a part of that and recognize that their position in the country as a group which provides some leadership, some direction for the over all country can help in getting the costs of the Public Service down.

What I hear time and again from private sector people is the costs of government are getting too high. Provincial governments and municipal governments have been entering into wage settlements in the past couple of years two and three percentage points higher than the rate of inflation. If what we do in Ottawa can help them bring their level of increase down to a level that is more consistent with what the private sector can afford, then the economy of this country is going to be better off for it. We will become more competitive. There will be more job opportunities or more business opportunities, and that is going to be a very important element in getting the economy going again and creating the revenues that pay our public servants.

Tributes

Mr. Speaker: It is my unhappy duty to advise the House that we will be hearing tributes to a former colleague.

I will call first on the hon. member for Calgary Southwest.

THE LATE PETER C. BAWDEN

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay a very special tribute to a long time friend, a colleague of this House who passed away last evening, Peter C. Bawden.

Peter was born and raised in Toronto and moved to Alberta in the very early 1950s where he pioneered the oil well drilling business. Bawden Drilling was formed about 1952, and as the company grew and expanded and became more specialized, its drilling rigs could be found operating in Alberta, British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Sable Island, the far northern Arctic, Winter Harbour on Melville Island, the United States, California, Central and South America, Australia, Indonesia, Iran, and the North Sea, all operating with onshore and offshore facilities.

Safety was always one of Peter's goals; to make sure the men who operated the equipment were well informed, well protected and well trained. He started in the very beginning always having a drilling safety supervisor who worked the rigs, ensuring that peoples lives came first.

He loved sports. He was involved in the aviation industry. Peter was everywhere. He served on many boards, various charities and at the University of Calgary. He gave so much of his life to his community of Calgary, to the province of Alberta and, indeed, to all of Canada.

Peter Bawden served in this House as a Conservative member of Parliament from 1972 to 1979, working in so many ways, always for a better Canada. It was just over a year ago when Peter received the Order of Canada, recognizing his givings, his talents, his accomplishments and his contributions.

All of us here today regret the loss of a dear colleague and extend our very deepest sympathy to his wife Margaret and to his children; Jennifer, David, John, Valerie, Kate and Louise.

I thank you, and God bless Peter.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, we are all very saddened to hear of the untimely passing of Peter Colwell Bawden, internationally known in the petroleum industry, a very highly successful businessman. Those of us who served with him saw how well he represented his constituents.

I was surprised when he decided to retire in 1979, having been elected in 1972 and successfully re-elected in 1974. I had the privilege of knowing him very well. I repeat again, we were all very surprised when he decided not to run in 1979. May I say we were all disappointed when he announced his decision that he would rather concentrate all his activity on his highly well known business enterprise where he was so successful.

What we remember of him is that he always conducted himself as a perfect gentleman, a very highly sensitive person. These are times to reflect on these great qualities that Peter Colwell Bawden represented so well.

Our leader has asked me, on behalf of our party, to extend our very sincere sympathy to his wife, whom some of us knew very well, and to his children.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, it is a real shock to hear of the passing of Peter Bawden. I knew Peter very, very well. Peter was one of those members of Parliament who was well liked on all sides of the House, who was well known on all sides of the House.

One of the things that struck me about Peter was that after he left this place, he still kept in touch with a number of us who were his friends during the days that he was a member of Parliament representing the city of Calgary.

Peter brought to the House of Commons expert knowledge in the field of energy, in the field of business and a real concern for his community of Calgary, a concern about sports and a concern about education. He was recognized by his country, as my friend from Calgary has just said, when he received the Order of Canada just a short while ago.

He will be missed by all of us. On behalf of my party and myself, I want to extend our sincere condolences to his wife, to his family and to his many, many friends not just in the city of Calgary, but indeed right across this country.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I just want to add on behalf of the government a couple of words about Peter Bawden who, as the member for Yorkton—Melville has just commented, even though he left this House in 1979 to devote full time to his business, did keep in touch. I can say personally, as a good, close friend of Peter and Margaret, that of all the friends and associates he had around the world—and he had them around the world because of his business interests—and across the country, none he valued more than the associations he made here in this House. It was for that reason he kept in such close touch.

It is tragic that he died at this very early age. My wife and I had the pleasure of spending a couple of days with Peter and Margaret just after the new year. Even then, in the late stages of his illness he had that tremendous interest in what was going on, constantly probing, asking and suggesting. It was part of his character to be terrifically interested in what was happening to this country, what was happening on the political scene, to be vitally concerned about it and doing what he could right up to the very end to try to make things better. We will all miss him.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, just a word or two for those of us who are involved in the energy portfolio. Peter Bawden not only was a pioneer in that industry, but remained an adviser to me almost to the end.

Peter had a very great sense of life. I remember not only being elected in 1972 with Peter, but in 1973 the government convened the Western Economic Opportunities Conference in Calgary. Peter had just been newly elected and I remember our attendance at that conference. Peter saw us on one of the major access roads into Calgary. He stopped his vehicle, backed up the wrong way in traffic and invited us to the conference. That was Peter in a very direct and human way. While we were partisans here, he was a friend to all of us outside of the House.

• (1210)

Just a last point, Peter exemplified in the oil industry possibly the very pioneering spirit that has marked that industry. He came from a background that was not at all the derring-do of the industry and the men and women who were its pioneers. Peter exemplified that. When I became minister of energy, he only had words of support and advice and it is that advice that all of us will miss.

POINT OF ORDER

BLOC QUEBECOIS—ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have to rise on a point of order because I am under the impression that circumstances in the House are such that my colleagues and I cannot properly discharge our responsibilities.

We had a number of issues to raise this week. For instance I see the Secretary of State and I can think of a number of questions about his new Canadian unity information centre. We had questions to ask about the Spicer Commission. Mr. Speaker, this week we were recognized for only one question. That is not fair and equitable distribution, and I draw that to your attention because, quite frankly, it prevents us from properly performing our duties. I would suggest that the purpose of the House is not to prevent members from asking questions. Our members have been in attendance throughout the week, quite prepared to work, but unfortunately we have not been recognized in accordance with our numerical representation.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I have listened carefully to the hon. member and I will consider his remarks. I would hope that on balance over the past and even to the present a statistical examination of questions of members recognized and questions asked would show that all members of the House are being fairly treated.

I will consider the hon. member's comments.

JUSTICE AND SOLICITOR GENERAL

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, according to Standing Order 109, I have the honour of tabling the governmental response, in both official languages, to the fourth report of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General on prostitution and soliciting.

JUSTICE

TABLING OF ANNUAL REPORT

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I would also like to table according to Standing Order 32(2) the annual report of the Department of Justice for 1989–90, in both official languages.

CANADIAN MULTICULTURALISM ACT

TABLING OF SECOND ANNUAL REPORT

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to table today, in both official languages, the second annual report to Parliament on the operation of the Canadian Multiculturalism Act.

[Translation]

The report I am tabling pursuant to section 8 of the Canadian Multiculturalism Act relates to the 1989–90 fiscal year.

RECYCLING ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–348, an act respecting the recycling of refillable containers.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to introduce this recycling bill. I am sure the Minister of Transport will want to support the bill. I see him chuckling on the other side.

This is an important matter because it concerns the environment of Canada, which we all want to clean up. This bill provides that a person selling or offering for sale any beverage that is in a container made of glass, plastic or metal will be required to charge a deposit on the sale of such a receptacle. The rates for the deposit are set out in the bill, and they vary depending on the size of the container.

The purpose of the bill is to ensure that such containers will be returned so that the deposit can be repaid to the purchaser. I believe that the institution of such a practice will lead to a tremendous clean–up of Canada's environment because fewer bottles, cans and plastic containers will be discarded at the roadside.

I am optimistic that that will be the case. I hope all hon. members will support the bill if it should be selected for debate.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present two petitions today. The first comes from a group of residents of Rivière Saint–Jean and Magpie in the riding of Manicouagan who ask that Parliament make representations to the CBC management and take all measures required to re–open and maintain services at the CBST television station on the North Shore.

LABELLING OF PREPACKAGED FOODS

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Madam Speaker, the second petition originates from a group of citizens of the Montreal region, specifically from the West Island, who urge the government to pass legislation or regulations to amend the food and drugs regulations with a view to making it mandatory for restaurant operators, manufacturers and retail merchants to list ingredients and other additives in prepackaged food.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Milliken: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Reid: Oh God, don't do this to me.

Mr. Milliken: I sympathize with the parliamentary secretary and his appeals to the Almighty.

I am not trying to badger him particularly, but I have had a question on the Order Paper since November 26, 1990. I asked that the answer be given both orally and within 45 days.

This is now March 1. The government has had all of December, January and February. I realize February is a short month, but three months and four or five days are enough for very simple questions which ask about the cost of three royal commissions is a lot of time.

It cannot be a difficult question for the government to answer. I sympathize with the hon. member for St. John's East who I realize is filling in for the usual channels today, but perhaps he could raise it with his colleagues on bended knee and see if he could not solicit some kind of answer from the government so that I could receive a response to this very important question that Canadians are most interested in.

Mr. Reid: Madam Speaker, I would like to assure my colleague that if my plea for assistance is answered, his will be also. I will pursue the matter with my colleagues. I know that they are anxious to co-operate with our friends across the way, as I know they are fully anxious to co-operate with us. I will raise it with my colleague, the parliamentary secretary.

Madam Deputy Speaker: After these words, I am sure that all will agree that all questions will stand.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

THE BUDGET

FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that this House approves in general the budgetary policy of the government; and the amendment of Mr. Gray (p. 17722).

The Budget

Madam Deputy Speaker: We are now starting the five-minute period of questions and comments following the speech by the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, on questions and comments, the member who spoke on behalf of the New Democratic Party is the labour critic of our caucus.

I was spokesperson of our caucus when the Liberals introduced their legislation in the mid-1980s when they broke the collective agreements that the government itself had signed with the Public Service of Canada.

• (1220)

I know the hardship and the bad feelings that existed among the Public Service at that time, the time of the six and five legislation. I wonder how our critic views the threats that were in the throne speech where the government said, for example, that it was going to negotiate the right to contract out with the Public Service, but, in the very next sentence of the throne speech: "—and if we do not get our way we are going to legislate our way".

The whole idea of collective bargaining is that the two sides come together and try to resolve their differences. I wonder how our member feels about the threat that the government makes when the government says that it does not matter whether it negotiates or not because it is going to get its way through legislation. This is just like the Liberals who actually broke the collective agreements that they themselves had signed with the Public Service.

We now have a new government, the Conservative government, saying it will negotiate but if it does not get its way it is going to legislate. I wonder how the member feels about that.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, one of the hon. members across the way said "disappointed". Outraged, I think, would be a more appropriate term.

This government has not just threatened the public sector with legislation, this government has guaranteed in its budget that it will legislate the public sector workers. In doing that, it has threatened private sector workers that they will be next. Because what will automatically happen is that pressure will be on to reduce and tighten the screws on workers in other sectors while profits continue not to be controlled.

We will then have our well-educated, dedicated, hard-working Canadian workers creating a Maquiladora north with the low wages and poverty, and the rich collecting large profits.

This is is not short-term. This is a long-term plan to ensure that Canadian workers and their families suffer under the kind of government this government is offering us.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the member for Mission—Coquitlam about her excellent comments about this government's budget and, in particular, the reference in her speech to the concerns across the country now, particularly in our home province of British Columbia, about transfer payments to the provinces.

The member will know well that when the Liberals were in office part of their six and five program was the lifting of the requirement that federal funds for post-secondary education and health were required to be spent in that area.

We have the premier of British Columbia, Mr. Vander Zalm, a former Liberal himself, and the Liberal Party now and we are not sure if that is still their position.

My question to the member is, what does she think about that proposal? Would she support a measure that would ensure that federal funds on health and education are, in fact, spent on health and education in the provinces?

Ms. Langan: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague who asked the question.

One of the serious flaws in this government's policy of cutting back on transfer payments is that while the national standards that the government sets and this Parliament sets regarding how health care and education should be delivered in the provinces is already being eroded under this kind of budgetary plan. With fewer and fewer dollars going to the provinces, there will be less and less control on maintenance of national standards.

In my constituency of Mission—Coquitlam, nurses have been laid off just recently and health care workers in the hospital there cannot keep up with the numbers of people who are seeking health care. Nurses are being laid off, and that was before the budget.

This government, if it indeed takes its responsibilities for health care and education seriously, has to maintain the position that it imposed and ensured that national standards are maintained. This government must, very much, rethink its policies.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I am quite pleased to have an opportunity to join today in this budget debate. Before I get started, I would like to congratulate the Minister of Finance who has done a masterful job of steering the economy in the right direction despite the constraints he is faced with as a result of years of mismanagement by the previous administration—17 years at least.

I am not the only one who says this. The Hon. Frank McKenna, the premier of New Brunswick, pointed it out in a speech last week. He said: "The Liberal governments of the 1960s and the 1970s and up to 1984 had abandoned their principles by spending beyond their limits and creating a massive deficit, in effect a mortgage on the future of Canada".

The policies of the Liberals in the 1960s and 1970s undermined our long-term ability to be productive and in 1984 we decided to change the course.

In our first year of government, we established an agenda for economic renewal which outlined the competitive challenge which was faced by Canada. Subsequently we have worked to provide a better framework for restoring productivity growth.

I think it is fair to say that Canadians are increasingly concerned about our ability to compete. What we have tried to do in this budget is re-establish once again the foundation to enable us to compete through the 1990s.

We feel that governments have a responsibility to create an environment that encourages the growth of competitive enterprise. What we have done in the 1991 budget is set out a plan for economic recovery, actions which will restore our fiscal balance and move toward price stability.

There is a great deal more that has to be done to ensure our future prosperity, but if we can boost our productivity growth then our prosperity will be ensured for forthcoming generations.

This is not something that can be done just by governments. We need the assistance of the private sector. We have to create an atmosphere and opportunities for the private sector and we have to try to maximize our productivity growth.

We need to examine the quality of our investments in infrastructure, machinery, and equipment, training, education, research and development, and private sector spending on training and research. That is not just an issue for government. It is an issue for business and for labour as well.

All of us can help to strengthen our competitive ability by identifying problems and developing solutions. We intend as a government to launch a national effort to build a partnership for prosperity that draws fully on the talents and efforts of Canadians in every sector of economic life.

In my capacity as Minister of Transport, I would like to take a minute within the context of the budget debate to describe some of the initiatives which we are taking at Transport Canada to face the challenges of tomorrow.

We are working in partnership with the private sector, in communities across Canada, to try and find those solutions. First, in airport devolution. We have taken some firm steps toward the management of Canada's airports. Our policy on the transfer of airports to local airport authorities allows the communities to have a greater say in the business of their airports.

What we are trying to do through the creation of these local airport authorities is serve the interests of the communities, enhance regional economic development potential, and permit our national airport system to operate in a more cost-effective and commercial manner. It will create, we feel, a new spirit of competition among airports and thus the communities of Canada.

• (1230)

When I was in the United States a couple of weeks ago talking with some financial analysts, they told us that over the past ten years they have gotten away from the airport, non-aviation side, being run by engineers and accountants and more and more they are run by people with marketing experience. I think we are going to see in Canada, through the devolution of these airports, economic opportunities open up for us.

We have reached an agreement in principle with the Edmonton Regional Airport Authority. We are negotiating with Vancouver, Calgary and Montreal and we expect that in the course of this year we will finalize those negotiations. As well, there are several other communities that have expressed interest in this type of airport operation.

This, I would suggest, is an indication of the government's commitment to provide for sound and representative economic management, as well as ensure competitiveness in the transportation system.

When I got this job the Prime Minister said to me: "Lewis, I want you to fix Pearson". I set about trying to continue the work done by previous Ministers of Transport to expand this wonderful facility as much as possible. As everybody knows, Pearson is the cornerstone of our aviation system and as a result of years of neglect, the infrastructure at Lester B. Pearson International Airport is showing. We have made a commitment to fix Pearson and to make it a world class facility. As the House knows, it is the hub of Canada's aviation system, the third largest gateway to North America. It is big business.

It is big business in this way: I do not think Canadians realize what an economic engine Pearson and other airports can be. Pearson directly and indirectly employs 60,000 people; 14,000 people go to work at Pearson every day. It brings in $630 million in taxes to three levels of government and $4 billion in business revenue. The economic impact of Pearson and other airports across the country is tremendous.

But at Pearson we had a difficulty. We had a facility built for eight million passengers a year accommodating 21 million passengers a year. We went to the private sector with Terminal 3. We opened it last week, increasing our capacity by 40 per cent. We feel this is a milestone in Canada's aviation system, because it was built at no cost to the taxpayer. It is owned by the private sector. It is proof that we can have a partnership between government and the private sector that can bring benefits to the country.

I would suggest that Canadians are going to be boasting about Pearson International Airport around the world and visitors from around the world are going to be envious.

At the same time, we are improving Terminals 1 and 2. A $40 million extension to the international wing of Terminal 2 was opened in December; which provides new gates for wide-body aircraft. We have increased the customs capacity at the terminal. We opened the first phase of a $52 million package of improvements to Terminal 2's domestic wing in January. The second phase we expect will be finished later this year. We have opened it up with windows, skylights and moving sidewalks, and have improved the baggage handling facility.

An hon. member: State of the art.

Mr. Lewis: I think it is. It is state of the art now and we have more improvements we want to make.

As well, we have announced that we intend to go to the private sector to participate in the further modernization of the two terminals.

We have an Environmental Assessment Review Panel under way to see what new runway capacity we can add to Pearson. That work is well under way and we expect the results of that sometime later this year.

People might ask, why am I emphasizing Pearson? I am emphasizing it because 60 per cent of our aviation traffic travels through Pearson one way or another, is affected by Pearson in any one day. Modern facilities at Pearson are essential to the economic and social development of metro Toronto, the surrounding communities in southern Ontario and, in fact, all of Canada.

On the international scene, we are working to improve an air agreement with the United States that, quite frankly, is archaic and restrictive. We want an air agreement that will bring to Canadians the benefits of a competitive air transportation network that is responsive to market demands and new opportunities. We want an agreement that will enable our business people to do business in the United States. We want an agreement that is going to get Canadians out of the airport lounges and into their customers' boardrooms to sell the products and the services which Canadians provide so well.

When I became Minister of Transport, as I travelled around this country, community after community—Halifax, Kelowna, Moncton, Calgary, Montreal, Thunder Bay—all said: "Look, we need a new agreement", and they know that if we are going to put this recession behind us, we have to get into the United States to sell our products.

We realize that these are difficult times for Canadian airlines, but that is no different than anywhere else in the world. Carriers all around the world are encountering difficulties. But we have confidence in the Canadian airline industry and are confident that, given the right environment, given a level playing field, Canadians can compete with anybody. We are looking for an agreement that responds to market forces and demands which allow the carriers of both countries to take advantage of new market opportunities and a regime that is as expansive as possible.

We want better services for the communities of Canada, better services for the consumers of Canada and better opportunities for Canadian airlines. We are under way on that and I am quite optimistic that we can negotiate a better deal, a better deal for our Canadian carriers, consumers and communities.

I should not spend all my time on the aviation side of things. I have come to realize, although it might be said I am an individual with not much maritime exposure, the importance of shipping to all Canadians. I thought I might get some applause from that. That is a bit of a conflict of interest there.

But I realize that the financial stability of the marine industry is important to us. I realize that marine issues are just as important if you are trying to ship grain out of Saskatchewan as if you are in one of the ports. We are spending time on that because our ships move wheat from Saskatchewan. They move iron ore from Quebec, potash from Saskatchewan, steel from Ontario and petrochemicals from Alberta, and so we have paid some attention to marine policy.

There are two things I would like to talk about today, one of which is our efforts to try to achieve greater delegation of authority for the port system of Canada. Ports Canada, as the House will know, administers the major commercial ports and some local port corporations. This is a Crown corporation which has been quite profitable over the past four years and it has returned some $250 million worth of dividends to the Government of Canada.

We want to enable the ports to mature and be competitive. We are going to delegate it more authority so that they have the opportunity to expand their operations and be competitive within the marine system.

I also would point out that the government recently announced an initiative to make us better able to compete as a maritime nation.

• (1240)

We have the international maritime centres legislation, which will enable international shipping companies to locate in Canada. We think that this legislation, which was announced last week, will bring shipping executives, maritime law experts, marine architects and a host of other shipping professionals to Canada to develop an enhanced marine sector that we do not now have. As well, we are looking at our ability to get containers in and out of the ports more efficiently. I am expecting to receive a study on container competitiveness very soon so that we can see what we can do as a government to facilitate an improvement in that system.

Last summer I became involved in trying to sort out some difficulties in the trucking industry. I want to report to the House that we commissioned some studies through Transport Canada, because I was quite frankly fed up with having 14 different theories on what the tax system was in Canada and the United States, whether I got them from the trucking industry, from Finance, or wherever. We have formed a steering committee of all the stakeholders, and when we get these studies done, we will know exactly what the situation is and try to take some corrective measures.

One aspect of transport that was touched on, not so much in the budget, but as affecting transport was the legislation for disabled Canadians. I was quite pleased with the efforts of the finance minister to assist disabled Canadians. What I have tried to do is to put a focus on the disabled in transport. The House will know that the disability tax credit is going to be increased from $575 to $700 as of the 1991 taxation year. Perhaps more important, the definition of expenses eligible for that tax credit is going to be broadened and will include the cost of part-time attendants in the home. Costs incurred by employers in modifying their premises to accommodate disabled persons will become fully deductible in the year in which they are incurred. Benefits provided by employers to disabled persons to enable or assist them to work will no longer be taxable.

I dealt with this when I was Minister of Justice, and I am pleased to tell the House that, as Minister of Transport, we have carried the focus into transport. The House will know that the government provided some $3 million over the last five years to 130 communities across Canada for the Accessible Vehicle Acquisition Program.

We have an advisory committee on the disabled, which is comprised of some 17 representatives of consumer groups and six industry representatives. We have had some meetings and we have been able to achieve some improvements. Last fall I announced that there had been an agreement between the Air Transport Association of Canada and Transport Canada to provide Braille and large print safety cards on commercial airlines for a one-year demonstration period. If that is successful, it will be carried on.

I think we have been able to do some things in transport which co-ordinate with what the minister has done in his budget, and I can assure the House that we will continue to do so.

I want to touch on something in the budget as an employer.

The Minister of Transport has, under his jurisdiction in transport, some 20,000 public servants. I found in my travels that they work pretty hard for the government. Some of them, as the House knows, do not always have the safest jobs in the world; I am talking about search and rescue jobs. The public servants employed by the Ministry of Transport—and I think it is fair to say at all levels of the federal government, in all ministries—I have found by and large work very hard for the government. I appreciate that there is a 3 per cent cap on increases, and I appreciate that this is probably going to be difficult. But I think we all have to try to play a part in the difficulties that we are facing. I know that the public servants who are very loyal to the government and to the country understand what we are going through. I just wanted to recognize the contribution the public servants make in Transport Canada, especially, and in other areas. I am sure the measures that have to be taken will be taken with some sensitivity by all departments. Especially, we will try to do that in Transport.

In closing my remarks, I would say that we have demonstrated in this government leadership in terms of our financial difficulties. We have had to take some hard choices. It would be much more pleasant to be doing some nice things with money but we do not have it. We do not have the money to throw at problems. Canadians realize that running a government is just like running their daily lives. They are not stupid. We have a situation on our hands and they realize, just as though it were their household budget, that we have to get it under control. They are looking for fiscal responsibility and other responsibilities from government.

I say that we have given fiscal responsibility the people of Canada since 1984—that may be a measure of debate for my friends across the way—and we will continue to do that for the rest of our mandate.

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Madam Speaker, I have a couple of questions on two particular items for the minister. First of all, up front, I want to thank the minister for his co-operation on the development of Bathurst Municipal Airport. I know he has talked about Pearson airport and its importance to millions of travellers, but we have smaller airports in the country and I want to take the opportunity to thank him for his assistance with the Bathurst municipal airport. We know it is a complicated situation with airports of that size across the country.

I would ask him if he has any plans to get involved, because we have seen mention of user fees in the budget, in some sharing of administrative costs. He will be aware that we have been in touch on this matter. It is an unusual situation so I would like to have him comment on if he feels there is any way the government can participate in some of the operating costs of the smaller airports on a shared basis or whatever because there have been reports through the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans in New Brunswick that there may be some assistance forthcoming.

The only other point I would like to have the minister comment on, because I know a number of my colleagues want to chat with him also, is the Trans-Canada Highway in New Brunswick. As he will know, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Newfoundland are interested in the Trans-Canada Highway because there is so much land transport across that area now. The budget and the estimates did not have anything specific with respect to the Trans-Canada that I could find. So I wonder if he would comment on those two issues.

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank my hon. friend for his comments. There has been a fair amount of activity in the smaller airports in New Brunswick. I think actually if I were to guess it would probably run Ontario, B.C., New Brunswick in terms of what we have been trying to do for smaller airports. I certainly am paying attention to my hon. friend's comments and to those of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans with respect to what we can do at Bathurst.

With respect to the Trans-Canada Highway this has been the subject of much discussion and much study. I would hope that this year we can take a look at our national roads policy and decide whether or not we should take a run at a comprehensive national roads policy which would involve some 23,000 or 24,000 kilometres of our national highway system in order to upgrade it. I especially appreciate the problems in New Brunswick. They are being attended to now I believe by the province and if there is a way we can become involved in that we will certainly try to.

The problem is once again cost and how we are going to finance it.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the House for this opportunity to raise some questions with the minister. I will make a series of points and questions I would like the minister to respond to. I will try to do it very quickly.

One of the difficulties we have, as the House knows and the minister knows, is that the Standing Committee on Transport is unable to meet because of an impasse between the government and the opposition. The chief government whip is not allowing the committee to continue its work.

Normally after estimates are tabled all standing committees invite the minister they work with to come before them to discuss, as we are trying to do today, what do these figures mean, and what are the ramifications.

• (1250)

I wonder if the minister would be prepared to attend an unofficial meeting of the transport committee that my colleague from the Liberal Party and I will be arranging some time in the next couple of weeks. If the minister is agreeable, at his convenience, to come before all members, not just the opposition, but the government as well, to talk to the minister about the matters in the estimates.

I have specific questions I want to put to the minister today. One of the big questions is about terminal 3. What is the Government of Canada gaining financially? I realize the minister may not have a specific dollar amount, but no one has been prepared to tell us what the deal is. Is it a percentage of gross revenue? Is it a percentage of net revenue, somewhere in between, or is it a fixed amount?

I think the people of Canada need to know, that in order to evaluate whether or not the principle of privatization, of private participation in a development and operation of airports is appropriate, irrespective of the philosophical differences that we may have in this House.

The other question ties into that, in terms of the devolution of airports. Can the minister indicate the department's projections as to what that is going to mean to the revenue side of the balance sheet for Transport Canada. If these airports are turned over, whether it is a private sector or a community or what have you, there obviously has to be some kind of new financial mechanism. What is it going to cost the system as a whole because, quite frankly, Pearson and Vancouver have been helping to cross-subsidize the operation at the other airports.

The one final question I would like to put at this point relates to the estimates. There seems to be an underlying erosion of the minister's tools for safety. For example, under surface and railway safety there is a decline of $3.2 million last year to this year. The Transportation Accident Investigation and Safety Board is getting less than a 1 per cent increase. Third, Marine Search and Rescue shows a $12.9 million decrease. I realize on this last one that it may be because of some kind of shuffle and perhaps the minister could indicate that.

But it seems to me that at a time when we are seeing higher instances of rail accidents, that we have an excellent working commission dealing with the Dryden inquiry that will report later this year and, in fact, its report may have some impact on the operation of the board, that one would assume that there needs to be dollars there to do the work.

Madam Speaker, I know you are anxious to hear from the minister and so am I, so let me sit down and hear him.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I was just wondering how the minister would find time to answer all the hon. member's questions considering the time that was being taken to put the question.

Mr. Lewis: That is easy, Madam Speaker, I will just answer the easiest questions.

I do not want to interfere with the government whip's work on committees, so I think that both the government whip and the opposition whip—and my hon. friend is an opposition whip— can settle their differences quickly. I am always glad to come to committee and field the questions.

Let me just say this. Presently, Pearson produces financial statements so the hon. member can see the asset base. The operating statement is available to everybody. I would suggest to you that when the revenue from T-3 kicks in, it will show in the financial statements.

We have an agreement with the developer. It was part of the deal that the contract would be private between the government and the developer, but the money we get from T-3 will be shown in the financial statements of Pearson. So I think that will take care of that.

As far as the devolution of airports is concerned, what we intend to do and what we have been doing is saying that is the asset base, the taxpayers of Canada will get a return on their investment and then we want a cut of the action. We want a cut of the terminal development, the coffee shop and the land rentals. So the taxpayer is going to get out of the business of running airports. The government should not be in the business of running airports. We do not need the Minister of Transport and public servants to decide whether a room this size should be a coffee shop or a duty free shop. Some days it would make a good hangar. But it is not necessary for the government to do that. That is why we are transferring it. We are getting a percentage of the action on it. We have that bill before committee next week, and I will be glad to come to committee and answer any questions on that.

The last question was about safety. Safety is an absolute priority of Transport Canada. Any rearrangements of person-years and funding always bears in mind the fact that safety is a top priority. It will continue to be a top priority.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Madam Speaker, we are here supposedly to deal with the Budget. But the fact is that we are here to deal with the government's ability—or total lack of it—to provide Canadian men and women with a sound and effective management of the economy.

On Tuesday, the Minister of Finance presented the Seventh Budget of his government. For sure, it was not a lucky seven for Canadians.

Early in 1991, Canada's economic outlook is rather gloomy. I quote:

"We foresee that the Gross National Product will be down 0.3 per cent. Unemployment will reach 10 per cent. The economy will grow at a rate of about 0.9 per cent, its lowest level in the last decade. Our economy is sinking into a recession. For the past two years, the Minister of Finance has been telling us that the only way to fight inflation is to create unemployment. In this Budget, he is telling Canadians that they can expect one more year of the same. There is not one atom of a comprehensive economic strategy in this Budget. There is no overall vision, no indication that the government knows to where it is headed."

Madam Speaker, the reason our country's economy is ailing is that the government just does not know how to manage the shop. Over the past six years, the government could have used a number of positive factors to cure the economy.

The world economic growth—Six years of tax increases, six years of program cuts.

Mr. Bellemare: Shame!

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): You are perfectly right to say shame.

In spite of that, the country is overburdened with debts as well as an enormous deficit. It is a shameful performance.

Mr. Bellemare: Indeed!

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): A shameful performance which is likely to continue if we accept this Budget. In short, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has lost his bearings.

[English]

When this government came to power, it had one goal: deficit reduction. It has failed miserably. Why? Because of its failure to understand that deficit reduction does not only come from cutting; it comes from growth, and growth comes from investment.

This government has consistently under-invested while other countries in the world, such as Germany and Japan, have invested. Those countries now prosper while Michael Wilson has brought this country to its knees. How? Let me count the ways.

Cutbacks in education. There is an inherent contradiction between this government's constant rattling on about its advocating competitiveness on the one hand and promoting policies on the other which must inevitably lead to cutbacks in education.

Twenty-five per cent of Canadians are functionally illiterate. We have, among the industrialized countries, one of the lowest rates of high school attainment. What is this government's answer to this? It is to make sure that every student who wants to go to university next year will have to pay up to $1,000 more.

It is about to cut out the support systems for single parent families who want to send their children to school. It is a failure to understand that the sinews of the nation are built on the nation's youth.

Cutbacks in social programs. This government's failure to invest in people perpetuates a cycle of poverty. The government fails to understand that a dollar invested in Canadians today will make you $5 later on.

• (1300)

Indeed, when I see this particular Speaker in the chair, it gives me some pleasure to raise the cutbacks in the environment. This government has just trashed the green plan. The green plan was not very good. It did not have much vision. There was not much of a message. There was not much in it, but it was the best this lamentable government could come up with and what it has now done is thrown it in the wastebasket.

The minister stood opposite me and told us how he was going to spend $3 billion over five years. He told us it had not only been approved but that it was committed. He virtually told us that it was a sacred trust. He has now announced a one third cut in the first year alone—$600 million over the next five years.

The government will tell us it is a deferment. That is guff. The green plan as presented by the minister was a rolling plan. More moneys were to be spent in the sixth year and in the seventh year. This is an absolute cutback of one third, $125 million in the first year alone.

Yesterday it was reported that the Minister of the Environment in scrum outside here said that industrial development was more important than the environment. Well, that is a statement which is as dated as the Edsel. It is an incredible statement. It is incredibly discouraging for those who believe in the environment to think that the Minister of the Environment would say it. It arises from a failure to understand that the environment is a moral value. It arises out of the failure of this government to understand that in the new economics you cannot have a sound economy in an unsound environment.

An hon. member: Absolutely. Bravo.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin: I thank my colleagues. It arises out of a failure to understand that a nation is not growing because of its failure to invest in research and development. The environment and the development of environmental technologies represent one of the great growth industries of the future. This nation is now in a position where if it does not develop those technologies, in 10 years it will be buying them from the Germans and the Japanese, as it buys VCRs and record players today. But if this nation develops them today, then maybe it will develop a new industrial base. The environment is not a cost. It is a phenomenal opportunity for us to build a new economy.

This government's problem is that it fails to understand that the environmental deficit is an economic deficit. It fails to understand that the social deficit is an economic deficit. If there is any doubt about this, simply look at this Minister of Finance's record over the last seven years. In his time there has been a doubling of the deficit and it has arisen out of one thing: this government's failure to understand the necessity of investing in the future.

This budget contains many facets, all of them bad. I began by saying that we are not here to debate the budget. Indeed, we are here to debate this government's competence. I should have said we are also here to debate national unity. This budget represents the opening shot in the government's battle to hold the country together and it could not have been more inept. It could not have been more self-defeating.

An hon. member: Right on.

Mr. Martin: How anyone could think that reneging on our commitments to the nation builds a nation is beyond me. The Tories will say that cutting payments for health and education improves the nation's finances. Well, that is garbage. The national debt is not only the federal debt, it is the federal debt in combination with the provincial and municipal debts. Shifting the debt burden does not solve our financial problems. In the end it is the same taxpayer who pays. But the way in which this government is going about it is weakening the sinews of the nation. Even more to the point, this government is repeating the mistakes it has made many times in the past, mistakes that have had a devastating effect on this nation.

In the free trade agreement this government, so desperate for a success even if it was only paper thin, and so afraid of failure, sat down cowardly with the Americans and gave up the ghost before the negotiations started.

An hon. member: Shame.

Mr. Martin: It made every single concession. Every point it thought the Americans would raise at the table, it gave up before it got there, because this indeed is a craven government.

Then what happened with the Americans and the Canadians? John Crosbie stood up and said: "We have a great victory." It reminds me of peace in our time in 1938.

An hon. member: Right on.

An hon. member: Shame. Yes.

Mr. Martin: Well, it has just done the same thing. Now, as it prepares to sit down with a multitude of provinces across this country, this government is in the process of dismantling the nation so that there is nothing left to discuss, no bargaining chips on the table, and for those of us on this side of the House, those of us who believe in this country, it is beyond belief to stand here and watch what this government is doing with one of the nations that God put on this earth to fulfil great things.

There is one man who must love this budget, and that is Jacques Parizeau, sitting there in his intellectual grey. He must be laughing all the way to the bank.

Well, there are other lessons that this government has not learned. In the course of the Meech debate, Canadians on either side of the debate said they wanted a public debate, they wanted to be consulted. But we sort of thought that the government would come to that conclusion itself with the formation of the Spicer commission. And yet, now before Spicer has returned, now before Gordon Smith and the federal bureaucrats have gone through their papers and presented them to the nation, this government blunders ahead with constitutional reform.

We do need a restructuring. It may well be that we are in 1865 and that great foresight is required. But, it will not be shown by this government.

There can be a no more manifest attack on national unity than the discriminating attack on certain parts of our country. My colleague from Newfoundland has spoken eloquently about this, as indeed have my other colleagues from the maritime provinces.

Let me speak a little bit about another part of the country that is suffering as a result of this budget. Quebec, Montreal, and you will forgive me but my own riding of LaSalle—Émard—

[Translation]

Ever since this government came into office, the economic situation in the Montreal area has been deteriorating. There is only one message in the Minister's Budget: Your are on your own! Good luck! With its fiscal policies, the government clearly indicates that it could not care less about Montreal's economic development.

All the same, my city is certainly the Mecca of Quebec entrepreneurship. It holds an enormous potential which could help Canada improves its competitive position. Unfortunately, the government stands idly by and allows a potential which a great many envy us to be wasted.

In Quebec, over the past 12 months, the number of personal bankruptcies has increased by 67 per cent and the number of business bankruptcies by 26 per cent. It is scandalous!

Last month, Montreal was the city which recorded the highest unemployment rate in Canada: 13.4 per cent. The rate in Montreal East was over 20 per cent. The Tory government has abandoned Montreal and Quebec. Its policies have ruined one of the finest economic areas in the country.

[English]

I can see the clock is winding down, so just let me make one last remark in conclusion: Our country is in the throes of a national unity debate unseen before in our history. We are in the midst of a massive economic decline, permanent job loss and fundamental change far deeper than any of us ever anticipated, certainly far deeper than this government anticipated when only six months ago it failed to understand what everybody else in the world knew: Canadians were suffering deeply and the recession was biting hard.

• (1310)

This budget makes a bad situation worse. The continuation of high interest rate policies, the lack of decent adjustment programs, the continued strengthening of the Canadian dollar, all of which have crippled the nation, show on the part of this government a lack of economic and national understanding which is simply unforgivable.

An hon. member: Absolutely.

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): A nation needs national purpose. This budget represents national defeat. Let us in this House at this critical juncture of our country's history give the nation hope.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have to say I am always one to carefully follow the speeches of my hon. friend because his father, of course, was previously the member of Parliament for the area which I now have the honour to represent.

I do want to ask the member two or three questions. As I look back to the period of the last Liberal government that we had in this country, I see first an attack on the Public Service not much different from the attack that took place in this budget, the six and five program. I see, second, an approach to the tax system which built into that tax system a great many of the problems which we continue to attack the finance minister for today, such as the capacity for companies to borrow money here in Canada for activities any place throughout the world and to be able to deduct the interest costs of those funds from their taxes that they would otherwise have to pay here in Canada, something which costs the ordinary taxpayer in this country a great deal.

I see as well a reduction, which the Liberals started, in the rates of income tax for higher income earners in this country—the 1983 budget of Marc Lalonde which brought tax rates for upper income earners from 42 per cent down to 34 per cent. Conservatives have taken that down to 29 per cent, which I am sure we both agree is unfortunate in terms of fairness in this country and in terms of a sense of national unity in this country.

What seems to me to have been the case in these three areas that I have cited, and I could cite many more, is that the Liberal Party started in the direction which the Conservative Party has followed. I want to ask the member whether he is, in making his strong plea for national unity in this country, saying that he will renounce and that his party renounces this past record of serving the privileged, of helping the wealthy, and of assisting the large-scare corporate sector in this country. Has there really been a case of the leopard changing its spots?

Mr. Martin: I would like to thank the member for his references to my father, who I believe in fact is probably watching this particular debate. I hope he is not watching the debate because if indeed he is, he, who loves this House and who certainly loves his city of Windsor, would feel quite badly about the shallowness of the intervention made by the member for Windsor.

I grew up in a family where the Public Service was something to be very proud of, with great names around our diningroom table—the O.D. Skeltons—the great names that one reads about today. How any member could think that the Liberal Party, which effectively built the structure of this nation and made the Canadian civil service what it was, could engage in an attack on the civil service or would reduce it, is really base partisanship that is unworthy of this member who has an otherwise impeccable record in this House—occasionally.

There are a couple of other things that I would like to say.

At the time the Liberal government brought in wage and price controls, inflation was triple, almost quadruple what it is today. The world was a far different world, and I am glad to say that it was Liberal policies—a far greater preference to absurd high interest rates that we have now—that brought the country back.

I would also like to say to this member that as I sit there watching the activities of Bob Rae in Ontario and I see as he reneges on election promise after election promise, when I see Bob Rae begin to retreat into a narrow little shell and that all the rhetoric that the NDP has stood for suddenly finds itself to be empty and worthless as he tries to grapple with the realities of government, I begin to understand what hypocrisy really is.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin: I would also like to say to this particular member, as he asks the question "why should the Canadian government support Canadian companies that operate around the world ?", that he is indeed giving us an indication of how narrow the NDP thinking is. Let the member understand that great companies are the instruments of state and they are the agents which provide young Canadians with value-added jobs. I want to be in a country who's companies are operating in Malaysia, South America, and around the world. This member may think that the world ends at our borders, but it does not. We Canadians are prepared to take on anybody. I think it is disgraceful that the NDP, so rooted in the orthodoxy of the 1930s, fails to understand that this country can compete with anybody. We can take on anybody. This country can win.

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): I would like to direct a question to the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard. He is a gentleman with a tremendous business background and brings a very astute mind to this Chamber. But I would like to ask him if he would agree on what has really been the record of control in the last 20 years. Let me remind him that it is factual that, for 15 years prior to 1984-85, the Liberal government spent, on average, an increase of 13.8 per cent a year. That literally doubles, as he knows, every six or seven years. The record should also show that when we assumed office, the national debt of this country was around $200 billion. Again, with his business background, he would understand compound interest. We have been running deficits, but lower, for the first four years. The compound interest on that debt amounts to approximately $120 billion.

• (1320)

The legacy that the Liberal government has left Canadians is a burden something in the order of $320 billion.

Now, he just spoke of hypocrisy in the other opposition party here. I would like him to comment on the scandalous out of control spending for 15 years. That is what Canadians are going to remember. That is what is going to be in the history books. Would he like to dispute that factual account of the disastrous control by the Liberals.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, the member talks quite eloquently about compounding interest. What he really ought to understand is that what this government understands is compounding problems.

It is very clear how this country got into the soup. Following the free trade agreement—again, whether you were for the agreement or against the agreement—this government made a series of fundamental mistakes. I have been told by the Speaker that I must move quickly. Number one, no adjustment policies; number two, the government drove the dollar to 86 cents; number three, it drove interest rates up five points higher than the Americans and we were not able to compete, and you took us into this recession eight months ahead of the Americans, eight months. It is the first time and we are going to come out of it a year later.

We are in this because of the deliberate decisions of this government. The member knows it. Unfortunately, I am out of time.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Bob Layton (Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis): Mr. Speaker, Canada has one of the highest standards of living in the world and a quality of life second to none.

[Translation]

We are indeed fortunate to be Canadians and to live here, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

But there is a battle that we have been fighting since 1984, a battle to restore health to our economy and to pull ourselves out of the hole the debt has dragged us into. We are paying the price now over and over again for too many years of consuming more government services than we were willing to pay for and borrowing to make up the difference.

In 1984 the previous government handed out $1.33 in programs and services for every dollar it collected in taxes. Today our public debt is forecast to reach $400 billion by mid year, about $15,000 for every man, woman and child in Canada. The interest alone on the debt will eat up more than $43 billion, more than we spend on old age security, unemployment insurance and family allowances combined.

This cannot continue. As trustees for Canada's future, we must keep it strong and free for our children and all who follow.

[Translation]

Yet, Mr. Speaker, the 1991 Budget puts forward a plan for economic recovery. The Federal government wants to make the recession something of the past.

[English]

This budget will rebuild consumer and investor confidence and lead us into the environment of continuing growth and renewed prosperity. How can this be achieved? By creating the essential conditions for recovery. Increased spending will not create these conditions. Lower interest rates will. Lower interest rates will bring direct economic benefits to Canadian homeowners struggling to make their mortgage payments. At the current rate of about 12 per cent, a $100,000 mortgage with a 25-year amortization requires monthly payments of about $1,030. But the same mortgage at a rate of 9.5 per cent would require payments of about $850 a month, representing a savings of $180 a month or nearly $2,200 each year.

It is clear that for my constituents, living at the west end of Montreal, and for all new Canadian homeowners, our commitment, this government's commitment to lower interest rates, will be a direct economic benefit.

The plan for economic recovery is going to bring down interest rates by lowering inflation and by setting the government on course to balance its budget and reduce its borrowing.

The answer is not more spending. More spending would drive the interest rates up. The answer is lower spending and lower interest rates.

The new budget is quite simply an all-out assault on the deficit. All GST revenues will be used to service the debt. Grants to business and special interest groups will be cut by $75 million this year and $125 million next year.

The increase in cigarette taxes by three cents a cigarette will help keep the deficit down and, at the same time, discourage teenage smoking.

There will be no new income taxes, but unemployment insurance premiums will be increased to make sure this program pays its own way as required by law.

It is a tough plan. It is directed at the government, too. Ministerial salaries for the Prime Minister and all cabinet ministers will be frozen for a year. Members' and senators' salaries will again be increased by less than the cost of living. Senior management positions in the Public Service will be cut by 10 per cent.

Operating budgets will be frozen at current levels, and the government will legislate mandatory program spending limits.

This new budget plan will be tough on all governments, but we are not asking the provinces to do anything more than what we are doing ourselves. The 5 per cent growth limit on Canada Assistance Plan transfers to the wealthier provinces will be extended to 1994-95.

But, CAP contributions, these same contributions and equalization payments to less wealthy provinces, will continue to be exempt from budgetary controls.

The per capita freeze on established program funding announced last year will continue, but EPF transfers in total will continue to grow with the increase in population of each province.

Limits to the growth of transfers under EPF has raised concerns about the federal government's ability to continue enforcing Canadian national standards, particularly in medicare, under the Canada Health Act.

This has been addressed. Legislation will be introduced to ensure that the federal government continues to have the means to enforce these principles and standards. The commitment to medicare in Canada will not be compromised.

Our battle is not only to restore Canada's economy, to bring about short term economic recovery, but to set the stage for a long term recovery assuring a stable and competitive economy, providing job opportunities for all who are ready to work.

All Canadians are in this battle. As the Minister of Finance stated in the House this week, there is too much at stake for anything less than a full national effort.

Yes, Canadians enjoy a quality of life second to none and we want to ensure that it stays that way.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I do enjoy listening to hon. members from the government side talking about the burden of the national debt. It seems they always like to go back to 1984 and talk about the deficit at that time.

I would like to remind the hon. member who has just spoken of a couple of things. First of all, his government came into office in September 1984. Shortly after that, the Minister of Finance projected in an economic statement in November the deficit for the year in which the government was elected, 1984-85.

By the end of March, he had exceeded his own forecast because he put every possible expenditure he could find and shoved it through the books of the country in that fiscal year. He still cites that as being the Liberal deficit.

Not only was that the case, but when he looks at the numbers, he will discover that more than half of the current national debt has been run up by the current government and the current Minister of Finance, almost $400 billion of debt, more than double what it was when he took office. That is from a government that was elected to bring down the debt.

• (1330)

I want to ask him to comment on two quotations that I am going to read to him. I would like him to say what he thinks about these views, which were expressed with respect to an economic statement at a time when the country was coming out of recession.

The first one is this, and I quote: "In this budget that the minister has just presented unemployment insurance premiums are going to increase by 40 per cent. That is purely and simply a tax increase. It is a tax increase when it can be least afforded and it is another colossal error".

The second quotation is: "The minister announced a $500 million job-creation program. I guess we have to say, Mr. Speaker, it is a step in the right direction. They have addressed the problem of unemployment in this budget, but it is a very small step. Five hundred million dollars sounds like a lot of money, but it is $300 per unemployed worker and amounts to some one-quarter of one per cent of the total size of our economy today".

An hon. member: It sounds like Wilson.

Mr. Manley: Those two quotations are from the present Minister of Finance.

Does the member agree with the Minister of Finance in 1982, or does he agree with him today?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris)): Just before recognizing the hon. member and giving him a chance to reply, may I inquire as to whether or not he is planning to use his full 20 minutes and a 10-minute question period, or is he sharing his time with someone else in light of the fact that he did not speak for the full 20 minutes?

Mr. Layton: No, I will be happy to provide that time to the other members.

My hon. colleague from the opposition has raised the question of the national debt. There is no question, as we spent and spent in the 1970s and early 1980s and came into a period of recession in the early 1980s, that the ability of the government to tax at the rate it was spending became impossible. It was totally non-political to consider taxing, but it was very political to consider spending.

Buying our way out of trouble was the in thing. The community that we are all part of in Canada became a me, me, me society. "Look after me". "Not in my backyard" was another expression we used to hear.

The real truth was that we became convinced we could afford anything. Suddenly, it became loud and clear that we were going into debt at such a rate that the debt would decide what we could do in the future. The size of the debt and the interest on it were the determining forces on whether or not we could include day care centres or service of all kinds of programs.

To not reflect on those years when we used to increase spending, on average I think the estimate was 13.4 per cent per year, and brought it down to where in these last six years since our government was elected with an obligation to the voters of this country that we would attack the deficit and control the debt and manage the economy, we actually have increased our government expenditures at less than the cost of living, meaning we are constantly reducing the fat in government.

The fat can be overlap; it can be duplication. All of us know that between this level of government, the provincial level of government and the municipal level of government there are sometimes three agencies looking after the same service. The answer is that we must come together as a country and eliminate this kind of waste.

One way of promoting that kind of dialogue and that kind of resolution will surely be when we stop providing the money to be spent. The open-ended "you give away the service and we will pay for it" has to end. This government in these last two budgets has made it very clear that we are no longer going to spend for excess.

Let us get together. Somebody raised the question, I think it was the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard in his remarks earlier, that this kind of activity is going to break up Canadian unity. It is the one thing that gives our country the chance not to blow our opportunity through waste, duplication and overlap. Let us start bringing all provincial governments and all municipal governments into the same harness that says there are only so many dollars in the kitty, in the taxpayer's pocket. We cannot charge it to our grandchildren or their children.

I might answer the second question which was in the area of UIC. It is now becoming accepted that it needs to and, by law, must meet its obligations.

We are going through a period of recession. There are demands on those funds. They have to be met by law. But, there are already indications and forecasts from all kinds of sources that with the way in which this country is being governed, in comparison with our big neighbour to the south and all our other trading nations, we will be into a recovery before mid-year, or certainly into the early part of the second half of the year.

With those job opportunities, we will be back on the cycle we began in 1984, since when there have been 1,600,000 new jobs created, many of them out in the west end of Montreal.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I thought that what the hon. member for Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis, in Quebec, had to say was very interesting. During his speech on the Budget, he mentioned cigarettes. If I remember correctly, one of the major companies in the province of Quebec is Imperial Tobacco. Canada's heaviest smokers are probably in Quebec.

That being said, I want to get back to the cigarette issue. He seemed proud of the fact that the Conservatives were now going to take 3 cents more per cigarette from young people in Quebec and across Canada, every time they smoke a cigarette, which means 75 cents more per package.

He seemed to be proud of taking money from young people, because it hits them where it hurts. It takes two or three kicks to teach them how to do things properly. I can inform the hon. member that is not the way to explain cancer-related problems to children. If you are really interested in dealing with smoking, you should do a lot more research on cancer related problems. You should spend a lot more money on research and on publicizing the negative effects of cigarette smoking. You should spend more money on public education, to help people quit smoking gradually.

I repeat, kicking people in the pocketbook or in the face is not the way to correct their vices, if it is a vice.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris)): Please keep your answer brief.

Hon. Bob Layton (Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis): Mr. Speaker, in response to the concern raised by the hon. member regarding the introduction of youngsters to the hazards of smoking, it is certainly primarily incumbant on parents or grandparents like me to promote caution.

In my youth, smoking was considered harmless. Today, its dangers are well known, as are the costs involved for every citizen once the habit is firmly rooted and the demands on our health care system to treat, patch up or save the smokers' organs. All that is known. By charging 75 cents more on each pack of cigarettes, we are giving a clear indication to our young people who have some financial means, yet limited, that we, in this country, want them to take a good hard look at that habit.

I hope that this obstacle, this reservation expressed nation-wide, will make our young people across the country think of their health before becoming smokers.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I rise before the House as the member for Winnipeg North and also as the Official Opposition critic for National Health and Welfare. I will therefore focus my debate on the budget in this area.

With this portfolio comes a responsibility to warn this government that its new budget will provoke the destruction of health care as we know it today. I am surprised the members of government need to be warned. The signs are all around them.

For months I have been watching the steam build on the issue of medicare. It started with the budget of last year, and then I saw Bill C-69, the complicated government expenditures legislation, slipped past this House and into the Senate and given Royal assent sadly early last month.

This Bill C-69 launched a critical government assault on medicare. As the social and health care groups across the country can attest, Bill C-69 is a deadly bill for health care and other social programs. It freezes and caps transfer payments, the amount transferred by the federal government to the provinces to aid medicare and post-secondary education.

With this freeze we will cripple medicare, we will cripple post-secondary education, and we will cripple other social programs.

And so the steam builds. Adding to the pressure was a particular meeting in the autumn of last year when western finance ministers grouped in Winnipeg, in my home city of Winnipeg. Something very significant happened at that meeting, something that will bear on Mr. Wilson's budget, on this government's budget.

The western ministers agreed the federal government should deliver transfer payments while relinquishing control over national standards of health care. They want a disentangling of federal funding and autonomy for health care policy in the provinces.

The steam builds under medicare.

On December 7 last year came an announcement from the Minister of Health from Quebec that he planned to revamp his province's existing health care system. This included a $5 disincentive fee, which I prefer to call a user fee for non-essential visits to the emergency wards.

I do not blame Quebec. Provinces are being forced to take initiatives like this one because the federal government has been limiting its proper financial share of the implementation of medicare.

There you have it all. All the signs are before you, Mr. Speaker: the budget of 1990, Bill C-69, the threats by the provincial finance ministers, the flagrant disregard for the Canada Health Act, and failure on the part of this federal government to enforce that Health Act. All the signs, all this steam building under medicare—pressure, pressure, and more pressure.

Then three days ago the government delivered the fatal blow and this is not exaggeration. The fatal blow to universal health care came when Mr. Wilson skimmed an additional $2.3 billion from transfer payments to the provinces.

Did he not see the signs? Was he not forewarned of the volatile situation of health care? Why did he not move to protect the health care system instead of pummelling it with further cuts?

I cannot understand it. Our health care system is one of our most prized possessions of citizenship and now it is slipping from our grasp. Or should I say medicare is being torn from our grasp by this government?

I shake my head in wonder as I hear the government rationalize its decision. As the government says, and I quote:

> Legislation will be introduced to ensure the federal government continues to have means to enforce these national medicare principles. The principles of the Canada Health Act will not be compromised.

I believe the compromise took place long ago when in a Centre Block boardroom in this building, Mr. Mulroney and his ministers decided to whittle transfer payments down to the quick. Now they promise the new legislation, and I quote: "The principles of the Canada Health Act will not be compromised".

But I ask: Why is new legislation necessary? The current legislation enables the government to enforce the five cardinal principles of medicare: accessibility, portability, universality, comprehensiveness and non-profit public administration.

The key enforcement tool is the ability to cut transfer payments. That is in the Canada Health Act. How ironic that the government is bartering away its enforcement power. In the words of my colleague, my deputy leader: "He who pays the piper calls the tune".

Who will be calling the tune? Will it be the federal government or the provinces? Who will be dancing to it? The poor, the elderly, the children of poverty and the struggling middle class.

The weakness lies not in the Canada Health Act; the weakness lies in this Conservative government.

How can the Canadian people trust the word of this government as they are being asked to do? How can this government protect medicare?

Let me give you two examples of the deep concern the government holds for the principles of the Canada Health Act.

For years the citizens of Quebec have been denied portability, often paying out of their own pockets for health care received in other provinces. Has the federal government interceded on their behalf? No, instead, a blind eye has been turned to the situation. Quebec is forced to do this because the federal government is not doing its share.

Has the government intervened when Alberta and British Columbia charged all citizens, regardless of income, the same premium for health care?

No, it has not and it does not. People from those provinces who cannot afford their premiums are disallowed from visiting doctors and medical care must be received from the emergency wards.

The federal government has set the stage for a showdown between provinces and the Canada Health Act, and what a fight it will be. In one corner are the provinces, determined to win autonomy over health care. In the other corner, Mr. Mulroney, Mr. Wilson, Mr. Beatty, seemingly championing the cause of universal medicare.

Honestly, who do you believe will be victorious in this battle? If I were a betting man, I would not put my money on the triumph of medicare.

The provinces will undoubtedly win and leave that ring flanked by an entourage of extra billing and user fees. And medicare, which was promised by that great Liberal Prime Minister, Mackenzie King in 1919, would suffer defeat.

How long will it be before the provinces call the bluff of the federal government?

What have they to fear?

The minister of health for Quebec no longer believes the federal government will protect national health care standards. He stated that Ottawa has been reducing transfer payments to provinces, proving that the federal government can no longer afford universality of health care. This would suggest Mr. Côté believes that reduced transfer payments have exacerbated the stress to the health care system. He believes Quebec should make its own way and avoid federal government bungling.

• (1350)

Quebec's Intergovernmental Affairs Minister has said that government has no business dictating health care standards for his province and, to do so, is unconstitutional.

The Minister of Health for that province also said: "Certain provinces—"—and he was alluding to Alberta and British Columbia—"—have shown an interest in debating with the federal government the relevancy of some provisions of the Canada Health Act. We are one of the provinces and we will open the debate."

In 1946, another great Canadian, Tommy Douglas, introduced the Saskatchewan Hospitalization Act providing public insurance coverage for hospital care. Later, in 1966, the National Medical Care Insurance Act succeeded this legislation.

Eventually, posed by threats of extra billing and user fees, the Liberal government introduced the Canada Health Act. It was ushered in Parliament and passed in April, 1984 with the approval of all political parties and all Canadians. It has been a source of national pride. It is a solid piece of legislation and one that has the respect of the world. Our health care system is second to none. It belongs to all Canadians regardless of race, culture, place of residence or earnings. It should be protected and must be preserved.

Instead, this federal government is eroding medicare away to nothing. The government will explain this away and patronize Canadians with the quotation: "You simply do not understand", and, "Let me explain one more time". But make no mistake about it, medicare is in danger.

Continually, the government points to the national debt as the reason for all the hardship in this new budget. I heard it today, I heard it yesterday and I have heard it many times. I am equally concerned about the national debt, but the total national debt is not the equivalent of per-person debt as this government would like all Canadians to believe. It is not. Eighty per cent of that money is owed to municipalities, provinces, other Canadian citizens and the Bank of Canada, and therefore as revenues to the government. Please remember that the debt has doubled since this government came into power. You cannot criticize the past when your own past is not as good.

The government also says the rising public debt is a growing concern, a cause for concern. I, too, believe the increasing public debt is a grave situation, but I must point out that the Tory government caused this recession which led to drastically increased bankruptcies which fed into the public debt and neither the public debt or deficit should be used as an excuse to deny funding to medicare.

The detractors point to our health care system and criticize. They say we already have too much, that we must learn to expect less from medicare and from the government. Well I have this response for them. It is easy to speak against medicare while you are healthy and wealthy. Not everyone, like members of Parliament, can be treated at the exclusive National Defence Medical Health Centre clinic, but if they had to join a queue for life-saving surgery or seek treatment in an overcrowded, understaffed health care facility their thinking might change.

Indeed, sometimes health care can mean the difference between poverty and prosperity. This morning, at the Canadian Medical Association Leadership Conference, a distinguished Canadian, a former member of this Parliament, the hon. Mitchell Sharp said:

> I was saved from personal bankruptcy by a universal system of health care.

For most, the case is different. They will not miss medicare until it is gone.

Here in Canada, even before the newest funding cuts, people were dying while on waiting lists for surgery. This is shameful.

I ask the government to turn its attention to the hospitals closing beds due to lack of funds. Explain to patients and staff that transfer payment cuts are not a problem, that direct taxation by the provinces will fill the breach.

Meanwhile, our nurses and doctors are flocking to practice in the United States. American companies hand out glossy brochures displaying sunshine and smiles. Money is not an object, the way it is in our country, despite the fact that more of their Gross National Product goes to health care than any other country.

As our shortage of nurses becomes critical in Canada, we will see them disappear, beckoned south by higher wages and salaries that are commensurate with the respect they deserve.

Look south again for the services Canada has not the funds to provide: the state-of-the art cancer treatment centres; centres for rehabilitating victims of drug and alcohol abuse; facilities for children suffering from psychiatric illnesses.

These are just some of the services Canada cannot or does not provide its citizens fully.

There are other things as well. Treatment facilities for new diseases and for the elderly. We lack new technology and laboratory equipment, and its purchase is becoming an impossibility.

These are the problems with health care now, today: beds closing, inadequate care and stressed health care professionals. How can funding cuts be justified?

There is an old saying that goes like this: "If you have not got your health, you have not got much." How true.

Unfortunately, medicare will collapse into a state of extra billing and user fees. A two-tier system of health care will develop. The rich will be segregated from the poor by expense and privacy, while the poor languish in over-crowded, sub-standard hospitals and clinics where health care professionals struggle to accommodate them.

This is not fear-mongering. This is the reality we face if health care is not made a top priority by government.

Yes, we have the verbal reassurances, the confident answers that seem to rise with ease from this government in trying to quell the fears of Canadians.

On December 3, the Minister of Finance said: "We have no intention of relinquishing any sense of responsibility we have for the National Health Act. We have every intention of continuing to assist provinces and in particular, assist those provinces that are low-income provinces to assure that they can continue to provide the services that are available in the wealthier provinces of the country."

That same day, the Minister of Health said that no changes to the Canada Health Act were being contemplated.

Yesterday afternoon in this House, under question by my colleague, the Liberal finance critic, the Minister of Health in reply declared that Canadians had a choice between "debts, higher taxes and cuts". He said what threatens Medicare is "the interest being paid on the national debt".

In a recent interview on nursing published today, Mr. Beatty denied there is a crisis in nursing and said: "The strain on the health care system is a symptom of our success. The birth rate is low and the elderly are living longer".

I guarantee you, 1.5 million unemployed and more than 1 million children living in poverty are not the hallmarks of success.

We have been reassured again and again and again by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance that health care is not in danger. Now, we are assured freezing transfer payments is the lesser of three evils: cuts, debt and higher taxes.

In fact, the Liberal Party has been accused by this government of scare-mongering and of misrepresenting the facts for pointing out that health care is being disassembled piece by piece. Well, in the remaining minute, no matter how you analyze the issue, these cuts and freezes and caps are hurting medicare. Not only are they destroying medicare, but they are crippling Established Programs Financing.

Did you know, Madam Speaker, that within the budget there was no mention of child poverty or day care? And $100 million were taken from the job creation fund.

The poor are met with cuts or contempt, enclosed in a thundering silence from this government that does not care for them and does not care at all.

• (1400)

Yesterday, I had a call from Joanne Oberg of the Canadian Day Care Advocacy Association. She asked my staff if they knew of cuts being made to her program, which is partially funded by the Minister of State. The government's promised universal day care program was a fleeting election fantasy, now replaced by an impending threat that even day care organizations will be cut off. Again, who will be hurt by this? Those who have the least.

I must again reiterate the fact that there was no mention, not one word, in the budget of a strategy for child poverty and how to solve it. When will the government move on this issue? Why does the government not take revenue from the GST, which we oppose, if the revenues will be there and apply it to our future, our children? Children cannot eat line graphs on inflation and promises of decreased debt. All the talk and rhetoric from this government will not make them grow strong and healthy. They need immediate help now. It is deeds, not words, on which this government will be judged by all Canadians.

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Madam Speaker, I just happened to hear from the hon. member from Edmonton that there are a few pigs out there. The hon. member for pigs. I do not know what this man is really referring to, but he may want to get up and make a speech on it.

I would just like to make a comment and ask the hon. member from Winnipeg who spoke of the dire straits that the Liberal Party finds now in this country since the Conservatives have been in government. Apparently, listening to what the gentleman said, the country has deteriorated in its ability to deal with health problems because of the finance minister's budget. There is, he said, some indication that we have nothing but poverty among our children of Canada, as if you go down the street and they are all holding out a little can for food aid.

If you listened to the member from Winnipeg, he painted a picture of this country just being in total despair as a result of this government. Yet, he also believes that if the Liberals were in power, they would address the dire needs of this country. He made no mention at all of the tremendous growth in the economy and in the way government dealt with a severe deficit when we took power in 1984. He does not even wish to consider that as an area of concern by the party of which he is a member.

I would like to ask the member from Winnipeg, just what does he see as the answer to this severe problem of poverty in children and homelessness? Is it to spend $1 billion, $2 billion or $3 billion or $5 billion at this time, to borrow the money to overcome that problem? Is that his party's answer today, to spend more money? And, by doing that, would his finance critic stand up in the House six months from now and say: "This government has allowed the deficit to grow", and criticize the very government that he would ask to spend the money? These are the questions that he has not answered in his condemnation of the finance minister's budget, and I would like to hear what he has to say in that regard right now.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Madam Speaker, it is regrettable that the hon. member was late in coming in because I did indicate and I tell this government that you cannot equate the total national debt as the equivalent of a person–to–person debt, because only about 20 per cent of the total national debt is owed to foreign people in foreign currency.

When you pay interest and principal to the Bank of Canada, that is revenue for the government of this country, so do not mislead all Canadians. They are more intelligent than you think.

I am very serious. If they would care to go to the Library of Parliament and research, read some excellent works on economics by a professor at the University of Manitoba, they would have no basis asking and commenting this way.

Second, the hon. member from Portage asked if I would borrow money, as though borrowing money for a good cause is bad. When children are sick, would you let them go and die and be hungry in their stomachs only because we would like to allocate money for military arms, for CF–18s, the nuclear submarine program that we asked be scrapped, and it was scrapped because once you listened to us.

Borrowing and investing in the future of our country is not deficit, it is investment. How can you say that you would like to be competitive and then reduce transfer payments for education, and then make it difficult for our young people to learn? They may even die and you want them to be competitive. You want them to develop expertise. I cannot understand this member's understanding of health care at all.

What would I do? I would establish a policy of full employment for this country. I would increase the minimum wage for federal civil servants. That is how you solve poverty.

I would end my answer to the hon. gentleman by saying that denying that problems exist is not the way to solve the problem. Denying that poverty exists is not the solution to the problem of poverty. Denying that there is a crisis in the health care system is not the way to solve the crisis in the health care system. I am reminded due to my medical background that denial on the part of a patient is not the way to participate in treatment.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): I think all Canadians know that the New Democratic Party is the party that was responsible for the birth of medicare in Canada with Tommy Douglas taking the leadership in Saskatchewan against tremendous opposition, including the opposition of doctors who went on strike, like my colleague who just spoke, against medicare.

When national medicare was brought in, it was a partnership between the federal and provincial governments, a 50–50 partnership, and that partnership carried on until it was smashed by the Liberal government. In 1977, when the established program funding was introduced, it was to get away from the cost-sharing of a 50–50 partnership.

I would like my hon. colleague to say how come it was the Liberals who started backing away from the 50–50 partnership. First of all in 1982, when Allan MacEachen, that famous person in that other place, ended the revenue guarantee. It cost the provinces $1.2 billion in lost revenue by 1984, $1.2 billion that the Liberals took out of national medicare by 1984. In addition, the six and five program took another $250 million out of post-secondary education.

The precedents for the smashing of the partnership between the provinces and the federal government were put in place by the Liberals. The foundation for the devastation of medicare that the Tories are now going forward with was developed by the Liberals.

I would like the hon. member to explain how he can now stand up and criticize the Tories for doing exactly what the Liberals did.

• (1410)

Mr. Pagtakhan: Madam Speaker, had the New Democratic Party introduced this budget, I would criticize the New Democratic Party. You have to know who introduced the budget.

Second, when one has only a selective memory, it is bias. In my speech I gave credit to Tommy Douglas, but this member who posed the question refused to acknowledge the lesson of history. It was the great Liberal Prime Minister, Mackenzie King, who in fact promised medicare for this country. And that also, incidentally, can be researched in the Library of Parliament.

Madam Speaker, if a member would like to ask a question and receive an answer, he must listen. Since he refuses to listen, I will end my answer.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, it is a privilege to rise in this House and address a few comments to the budget and to the overall fiscal situation of the country.

As you know, I have recently been away and have had a lot of time to do reading from a broader scale of material than we read when we are actively day-to-day fighting the battles here in the House of Commons. I also had a chance to travel across the country and speak to people as Canadians, without them knowing that I was a member of Parliament or in public life at all. I have found out some interesting things.

Madam Deputy Speaker: A point of order from the hon. member for Winnipeg North.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Madam Speaker, I missed a crucial fact, and I must apologize.

I would like to say that I resigned from the medical association when it tried to fight medicare.

Madam Deputy Speaker: That was not a point of order, according to our rules. But I see that the hon. member wanted to set the record straight.

The hon. member from Lethbridge has the floor.

Mr. Thacker: Madam Speaker, one of the points that came home to me very strongly as I talked to people, without them knowing that I was a member of Parliament, was the fact that they think that what we get into in this House is really a bunch of silliness. People are truly fed up with the way the minute the television camera hits us, we all start to act as if we were Clark Gable. It really is a tendency, and I am not criticizing anyone else any more than myself, because that is the reality of what we do. The minute television hit the House of Commons, we all became actors and the power had to leave. The decisions are now made in committees, where we do not have television, because we cannot seem to address the issues in a sensible way.

What I would like to try to do today is to say a few words about the reality of the situation. If I had any goal, it would be to try and face the world as it is today and have Canadians who might be listening this afternoon realize that the budget has to be seen in a broader Canadian context and, indeed, in a global context.

The opposition parties, of course, will adopt the strategy that we used in opposition. It is a strategy of trying to pick out little parts of the budget and blow it up as if it were the most important part of the budget, rather than seeing everything in a broader context. That is a very clever debating strategy, and we all do it. But I think the citizens out there often forget that that is the debating strategy and the tactic that the opposition parties use, and quite properly use.

I think Canadians are beginning to realize, too, the awesome power that special interest groups have come to hold in our country. I can say as an elected person over the last 12 years that the growth of the special interest groups and their power to virtually force us to make decisions in their favour rather than in the common good of the nation as a whole is very disturbing. I honestly do not know what the answer is. It is much worse in the United States of America, where individual congressmen are virtually captured by what they call PAC groups—personal action committees—which pay them a lot of money and get them re-elected. We do not have that problem to the same extent here because we use financing through the tax system. I think that is an excellent system and we want to keep that up because it puts more distance between us and the special interest groups. Nonetheless, the combination of a powerful special interest group and the national media, as we all know as members, here in Ottawa is totally isolated from the reality of Canadians who live in each of our individual ridings.

We are all very happy with our regional media who try to give some balance and are much better in giving both sides of the story than the national media. The national media seems intent on bringing down a Prime Minister or a government of whatever stripe is here. It is as if the national media believe that they are the opposition of the country and have a credibility or have the right to destroy people. They will destroy anybody in this House if they can get anything on you with absolute immunity. That is not right, but again with this concept of freedom of the press, I myself do not know how we can control it. I know that it is at the point where we have got to do something to bring that into a better system of balance.

What is the context of this budget and the government policy in general? I think again we have to understand the world as it is. There have been enormous changes in the world in the last 5, 10, 15 years. For example, in the European Economic Community we find this very powerful grouping of the European nations. It will be a common market by next year and they will have fewer barriers regarding the transfer of goods, capital and labour between sovereign nations than we have between our 10 provinces in this country.

Just think about it. Less than 50 years ago they were at war with each other and killed millions of themselves in that Second World War. Yet today they have fewer barriers regarding the transfer of goods, capital and labour, between the sovereign nations than we do here in Canada.

The think tanks, or the economic groups, tell us that there are some 1,600 barriers between the free transfer of goods within this country. In agriculture alone there are something like 160 barriers to the so-called Canadian common market. What that means is that as a nation we have not been able to compete with the other countries in the world.

Then look at Asia. Look at that ASEAN group with Thailand, Brunei, Singapore and Malaysia. They again are into a common market that is very big; over 300 million people and the free transfer of goods, capital and labour.

We had to do something in this country because we are 24 million people. We are not isolated in the world. It is true that our dairy industry operates only for the Canadian market. It is true that the poultry industry and the feathered industry operate only for the Canadian market. But virtually every other aspect of agriculture—beef and grain, our forestry industry, our mining industry—creates wealth for us and has to compete in the world. Therefore, we have to meet that global situation. Whether it is with our tax system, whether it is with our free trade agreements, or whether it is with the tariff system, we have to be able to get on and compete in the world. That competition is fierce.

Privatizations; countries around the world of whatever political stripe, New Democratic, Liberal, Conservatives have all moved to privatizations. Why have they done that? Simply because it has been shown by just hard day-to-day evidence that nationalized companies cannot keep up in the marketplace. They cannot make those competitive decisions fast enough. They cannot deliver the goods. Partially, the reason is that when they are controlled politically, when they get into trouble, rather than making the proper decisions within their corporate context, they come to governments and governments bail them out. Again, as a special interest group, when they come in and say to us "If you do not give us this money, we are going to lay off 10,000 employees", of course we give them the money. Other countries have done that around the world. The solution has been to privatize, get the company out where politics cannot play a role in it and distort it.

What is the marketplace? It really is simply the sum total of all the individual decisions that Canadians make and people in other countries make.

• (1420)

That amounts to the marketplace and we believe fundamentally, or certainly I do, that millions and millions of individual decisions taken in the best interests of individuals themselves will lead to a far wiser result over all than if a government cabinet of whatever political stripe—it does not matter to me whether it is Conservative, Liberal, or NDP—makes them. I just know from my life experience that governments cannot make those decisions to replace the millions of individual decisions that people make in their own interest.

The Liberal Party once believed that, and then under Prime Minister Trudeau it got off on a different track where it was much more socialist. The NDP is still, at the national level anyway—they are much more realistic at the provincial level where they have actually have had to exercise power—locked into the ideology of centralization. The NDP still wants to nationalize banks, to nationalize the CPR, and to nationalize the distribution of farm products.

I think the NDP will gradually get away from that. I hope they will in their next national policy conference. The fact of the matter is that social democratic countries across Europe are getting rid of their manufacturers' sales tax which we finally have, they are recognizing the rights of intellectual property.

Just think of the battle we had over the patent legislation on drugs. No doubt some years ago the drug companies were increasing the prices higher than they ought to have and so nations reacted. Other countries put in price review boards. What did Canada do? We took away their patent rights. So why would a company do any research and development in Canada? Of course, it would not. It would do its research in Germany, in Britain, in Switzerland, the United States where it could get a patent right.

When we tried to give patent rights here and instead substitute a prices review board we had an awesome fight. The NDP was instrumental in opposing that and held it up for many months.

It was the same with plant breeders' rights for agriculture. Other countries moved to plant breeders' rights 15 years ago. I can remember Eugene Whelan bringing in plant breeders' rights. We were in favour of it but the NDP and a number of church groups were opposed. They actually held up that bill for 15 years. By the time we brought the bill through, Canada and its young researchers are 15 years behind.

Fortunately, I have to say, they learned their lesson because when we came to the Integrated Circuits Intellectual Property Bill, to give patent rights to the people who design these chips and the way these microchips work, both opposition parties were in favour of that. But they delayed the drug patent bill, they delayed plant breeders' rights.

Yet social democratic countries around the world adopted them years ago, 15 years ago. Why is it that Canada has to be so far behind? That is what has hurt us. We are behind. As a developed country we should be ahead. We should be leading the charge, not following along behind.

I have mentioned a number of things, for example, the GST. That fundamental move to replace a tax on our manufacturers, again other countries around the world had a manufacturers' sales tax and abandoned it years ago, but not Canada. We hung on to it and hung on to it, partially because this House has become stymied in being able to act quickly enough. Finally it has been replaced and we are joining the world community of nations in having a consumption tax. It is far better to tax consumption—people who consume more pay more—rather than taxing savings because it is the savings in a nation that are used to build its plants. It is savings that are used to refurbish plants, to move into new industries.

We have even got away from that. We were spending our savings on consumption. We were spending our savings by giving it to provinces, for example, the Canada Pension Plan. There is a contrast between the Quebec Pension Plan, where those premiums are taken and put into investments to build their province, and as a result Quebec today has a very dynamic small business industry, and the Canada Pension Plan, which was given to provinces at a very low rate of interest and they spent it on operating programs. As a result we have had to borrow money. We have a national debt of $400 billion of which half is owed offshore. We are totally captured by the capital markets of the world.

The new budget—the reality of 1984.

I want Canadians to appreciate the significance of 1984 and that budget deficit of $38 billion because it had two components to it. One component was the operating deficit and that was some $16 billion. What that meant was that Canadians were receiving $1.33 worth of programs. They were only being taxed $1 and the government was borrowing the rest under the table.

Now for the individual it looked good. They had these wonderful programs. We love them. We were only taxed a dollar so we still had lots of money in our pockets. What did we do? We went out and paid too much for our houses, we paid too much for our farms, we paid too much for our businesses. So that in the area where I come from, land that was valued at about $100 per acre, based on its productivity, suddenly went up to $600. Of course, it could not continue on that basis because $600 land cannot be paid for with the produce it produces.

So, naturally, those are the farmers today who are in trouble, the people who bought that land for $600 an acre in my hometown, when it was really worth $100. That was all a result of receiving $1.33 in benefit programs and being taxed only $1 and the government borrowing the difference on the side, so to speak, or practically under the table. So the national debt started to grow.

When we came to power, we had a $38 billion deficit; $16 billion on the operating and $22 billion already for interest on that national debt.

Could the government change that around in one year? Well, anyone with any common sense knows that it cannot do that. It cannot increase taxes by $16 billion in one year and cut programs by $16 billion. We had to come up with a staged program. The first goal was to balance the operating budget, and our Minister of Finance did that in five years. It went from a deficit of $16 billion to, today, a surplus of $12 billion.

What that tells us is, if past governments had not built up the national debt, we could, this year in this budget, reduce taxes by $12 billion. Every cent of the deficit today is interest on the national debt. It was unnecessary because when Mr. Trudeau came in, indeed, Mr. Turner was the Minister of Finance who had a surplus budget. He started us into that routine of deficits and every year for 15 years the operating budget went up by 14 per cent. The Liberals did not have the honesty, I think, to turn to Canadians and say "look, you want this program, fine, here is a corresponding tax to pay for it".

If we could just put an amendment in our Constitution that governments had to say "for this program there is the tax, what is your choice", that would force a lot of restraint on governments and save people from getting into this long-term trap.

The people who should be really annoyed are the young Canadians. It is the young Canadians who see in this budget, for the first time, some hope. First of all, we are going to start to pay. Our generation is going to have to pay for these programs that we are using today. We are going to have to pay the taxes to not only cover our programs today, and we do, but we have an extra $12 billion in taxes to go toward interest on the national debt.

With the GST, by 1994, if everything works out, and nobody can guarantee that it will—but it is a reasonable plan and the past plan, to take the $16 billion deficit on operating to a $12 billion surplus, worked—we hope that by 1994 we will be equal. We will not have to borrow in the markets. Would that not be marvellous, that the federal government would not have to go out and borrow new money from Canadians. Then that money could be available for developing the economy and doing what Canadians want.

Then, what also happens is, as we pay a dollar down on the national debt at that time, we do not have to pay interest on that dollar the year after and we can get it going in an upward spiral so the more we pay on the debt, the more interest we have, we can then pay more on the national debt. It will be marvellous, but it is going to take 15 to 20 years because you cannot get yourselves into trouble over 15 years and get out of it in one or two years. It will probably take 15 years before we are out of it, but hopefully the national government will stick to that plan so we do not back off.

What I thought I would do with my remaining time is talk to Canadians who might be listening today about some of our programs. The Established Programs Financing transfers from the federal government some $20 billion to the provincial governments. When the opposition says that medicare is being destroyed, that is that tactic of trying to take one thing and trying to put some fear into Canadians, but it is not really based on reality. Twenty billion dollars a year is still being transferred to the provinces for medicare.

The reason medicare is in trouble goes back to that original program where the federal government was transferring money to the provinces, and the provinces were using it without being accountable. That is the fundamental problem that we have to solve. The people who spend the money should also have to tax for it, because they were getting the money, using it, but not giving any credit. We were taking on the national debt but they were spending the money.

In my home city of Lethbridge we have two huge hospitals. When you go out and look at all the little surrounding towns, you see every surrounding town has a hospital. We have not applied our medical capital well. We could have done it better and should have done it better. It is clear to us now but we have all these buildings. We have people working in all the buildings. How do you get rid of them?

It is the same with post-secondary education. The federal government pays an enormous percentage of the post-secondary education operating costs across the country. We get absolutely no credit as members of Parliament, nor do we get any say. At least in health care we have these five comprehensive conditions that we can hold up to a greater or lesser degree. In post-secondary education we have nothing. The federal government should have much more say in post-secondary education because it could then direct it in the national interest of Canada in order to compete with the other countries of the world.

I see my time has expired. I would love to go on for another half hour because I have many things I would like to put out by way of my point of view.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, I enjoyed the words of the hon. member opposite. I know he has been here for quite a while and I thought he would be getting educated each year, but he seems to be going in the reverse direction.

He talked about our party being honest with the people and, if we did not have the money to spend for the programs, we should have told Canadians that. I was wondering if he could explain to the House and to Canadians why his party, in the first year of office, spent $34 billion over revenues that it took in? Why were they not honest and why did they not Canadian people: "Sorry, this is $34 billion we do not have and we cannot spend"? It would have been at that time, six years ago, that the annual deficit and the public debt would have started going downhill and have not gone from $177 billion to $400 billion. I would like his explanation on that.

I would also like his explanation about the hospitals and post-secondary education. I do not know what he is recommending. Is he recommending that we eliminate the hospitals from small towns? Is that what he is suggesting? Yes, maybe the hospitals should be more efficient. I guess that is the Tory philosophy, yes. They are closing post offices so they want to close hospitals too.

He also mentioned that the federal government does not get any credit for post-secondary education. I disagree with him. The more students we graduate and at a higher level, the more we all get credit: the entire country, the nation. And we become more competitive.
