Mr. CARMICHAEL: I was not objecting to the size of the executive committee. I was pointing out the possibility of a small number being entrusted with the carrying out of very important work.

Mr. CHAPLIN: This is a very large committee, and a great many of the members live at a long distance from this city. Is it contemplated that the expenses of this committee should come out of the fund? Because if you take the expenses of nearly a hundred people the amount is going to run into a lot of money. We are not going to be through with the expense when we spend $250,000. That is evident. Is it worth the money? For my part I do not think it is.

Mr. BELL (St. Antoine): In view of the fact that a number of names were mentioned to-night as well as the other evening of persons whom it would be desirable to have on the committee, would it not be wise to provide that the executive committee should have power to add to their number?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: So they have.

Mr. BELL (St. Antoine): The members of various associations might be omitted although it might be important that their names should be added. I see no provision in clause 5 or clause 6 for making that addition.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is some such provision in the bill.

Mr. ERNST: There is nothing to prevent any six members of the committee constituting themselves an executive and no provision in case they fail to attend meetings for notifying others. It would be quite possible for the Prime Minister to have a coterie of his own in such a case as that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I can assure my hon. friend that the Prime Minister has no intention of doing anything of the kind. I confess I am rather surprised that he should make that particular remark. If he has any amendment he wishes to move to this clause, I am sure the committee would be pleased to receive it.

Mr. ERNST: I do not want to move an amendment. I simply want all the members of the committee to be notified, and not only six.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is a little defect in this clause and I think the point is well taken. Subclause 2 reads:

> The persons whose names are mentioned in section 2 shall constitute the provisional executive committee, and provided that six of the said persons are present at the meetings, the corporation may be organized and the executive committee may be elected by them.

There is no provision for the calling of the meetings. If six members of the committee saw fit to meet at Ottawa, I do not know who could take objection to their doing so. There is no provision in this clause for notice. A meeting of the committee should be called and provision should be made for notice. Then if some members do not attend, let six do the work.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sure my hon. friend must realize that any notice sent out for the calling of a meeting of the committee would be sent to every member of the committee in plenty of time for every member to be present. One of the officers of state will be charged with the duty of notifying all the members to come to Ottawa on a particular date. The press of the country will have ample notice of the particular date on which they will be assembled. If there was the slightest danger of members not being notified, I would say; Certainly add more clauses to the bill. May I draw my hon. friend's attention to this point? The government of which he was a member drew up a bill to administer the Canadian patriotic fund. This bill, as I mentioned to the House the other day, is modelled on that bill, clause for clause. I so directed when the bill was being drafted. I do not think anyone would have presumed that the Prime Minister of that day was seeking to gather a few favourites around him to administer the Canadian patriotic fund. Surely we can discuss these things with each other as gentlemen.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I quite agree with that, but the bill goes into some formal matters and this is a simple question that could be settled now by way of amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Move the amendment.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Just insert the words:

> The persons whose names are mentioned in section 2 shall be duly called together for the first meeting of the said committee.

And state that six are a quorum as provided in the bill. Supposing they were not called together, supposing half a dozen were omitted in the notice and they felt offended or affronted or legal action resulted, that would be very unpleasant. I am only suggesting a difficulty might arise. I am quite willing to take the word of the Prime Minister that no difficulty will arise, but it is quite easy to have provision made for notice of the first meeting.

Mr. BROWN: As there is no provision for notice, can not it be taken for granted that the first names on the committee will be the conveners?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: First of all, might I answer the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie)? Without knowing what amendment he will propose, I will say in advance that I shall be pleased to accept it. This is not a party measure in any way, and

I am anxious to meet the wishes of the committee as a whole. If my hon. friend (Mr. Brown) wishes to insert the name of any individual to call the committee, I am sure it would also be a pleasure to insert it. The same method of calling together this committee will be adopted as was adopted in calling together the Canadian patriotic fund committee.

Mr. BROWN: What was that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand the Under-Secretary of State or some permanent official of the government sent communications to all the parties whose names were mentioned, asking them to meet at Ottawa on a particular date. I do not think it will strengthen the matter to name any particular official to call the committee, but if that is the desire of hon. members, we shall have that inserted.

Mr. HOCKEN: Is it the purpose to have a series of celebrations or simply to have one big celebration at Ottawa?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government has no desire to dictate what form this celebration shall take, whether it shall be one celebration at Ottawa, whether it shall be celebrations in the different provinces, whether it shall be along educational lines or along the lines of display in one form or another. The purpose of calling the committee is to let the committee decide all that. Once the committee is chosen, it will be the body that makes that decision.

Mr HOCKEN: If there is to be one celebration in the capital city, probably the amount that is being appropriated will be sufficient; but if, as one of my hon. friends has suggested, there is going to be a series of celebrations, one in each provincial capital for example, then the amount that is being appropriated will not be sufficient. That must be clear to any person. I presume before this parliament prorogues, we shall have some idea as to the scope of the general celebrations from one end of the country to the other. Is that the expectation of the Prime Minister?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If this debate does not continue too long, it is.

Mr. HOCKEN: I am just trying to get this thing right because I am strongly in favour of this celebration. The sixtieth anniversary of our birth as a nation is a great event in Canada, and it should be celebrated with all proper dignity and enthusiasm. My idea would be that this committee might go even further than have a series of celebrations in the different provinces, and might encourage local celebrations wherever they can be organized so as to make the day one of general observance from coast to coast. That would be my idea of a great observance of the sixtieth anniversary of our confederation. I want to see enough money appropriated to carry out the thing properly, and I would suggest to the Prime Minister that before the House rises, some effort should be made to ascertain from any executive committee that may be formed the extent of their plan so that sufficient money may be provided to carry it out in a proper and dignified fashion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I can assure my hon. friend that is in all probability exactly what the executive committee will do, namely, to announce at as early a date as possible the plans proposed, and I hope that will be done before parliament rises.

Mr. McGIBBON: Has there been any communication from the provincical governments as to whether they will assist in the financial undertaking? I quite agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Hocken) that the amount appropriated in this bill is absolutely inadequate. If the sixtieth anniversary of the birth of the Canadian nation, as we are now called, is going to be fittingly celebrated, it seems to me we shall need many times that amount of money. We all know that as a general rule the government or party that will lead in expenditure will be allowed to do the paying. It would be right and proper that the provincial governments should be first sounded out to discover what contributions they will make.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The expectation I should think would be that the provinces would wish to have provincial celebrations and to make appropriations therefor. Once this committee is formed, one of its functions will be to get immediately into touch with the provinces in order to ascertain what they are prepared to do.

Mr. McGIBBON: Will the committee work in conjunction with the provinces or separately?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is in the bill a clause which indicates that one of the purposes is to coordinate the work between the provinces and the Dominion.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The remarks of the hon. gentleman (Mr. McGibbon) are of course his personal opinion and he is welcome to it. In my opinion this sum is ample; it is indeed too much. I wish to register a protest against any effort on the part of any hon. member to increase the amount to be voted. If any provinces are so very anxious to enter into a celebration at the same time, let it vote its own money. I think an appropriation of $250,000 or a quarter of a million for a celebration, when, as the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) said, there were so many soldiers and others out of work, anxious to get jobs and earn something, is extraordinary and ridiculous.

Mr. HOCKEN: We heard a story this afternoon of a bounding prosperity. There is nobody out of work.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): To which the hon. member's party did not agree.

Mr. HOCKEN: We have heard this afternoon that prosperity in this country is so great that everybody is at work. I think, Mr. Chairman, that the particular responsibility for this celebration rests upon this parliament. This is the parliament of confederation. It represents every province in Canada, and why should not the national treasury stand the whole cost of a proper celebration of that day, giving proper consideration to each province that desires to take part in it? I do not know; I may be a different kind of Canadian from my hon. friend from Bow River.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Hear, hear.

Mr. HOCKEN: I was born here, and I am a real Canadian. I am not one of the imported variety, and perhaps I have a different feeling towards this Dominion than my hon. friend has.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I too am a real Canadian, a real Canadian for three or four generations, and I protest against language of that kind being used against any member duly elected to this House.

Mr. HOCKEN: As usual, my hon. friend from Winnipeg messes in where he has no right to get, and raises a point of order that is not a point of order at all. If there is any man in the House to whose speeches objections can be made upon this ground, it is my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre. I am urging, Mr. Chairman, for a dignified and suitable celebration of our natal day. I do that as a Canadian born, and if there are any people in this country who are imported Canadians and who do not see the thing as I do, of course, they are entitled to their own opinion, but I have a seat in this House and I stand for Canada and Canadians, and I want Canadians on this occasion to show the world that they are capable of appreciating the wonderful heritage they have and the privileges they enjoy, and mark in a befitting manner the progress we have made in this country in the past six decades. We could go further than that, and in this celebration not only draw attention to our past accomplishments, but do a great deal perhaps to inspire the young men of this country to a greater love and a higher respect for their own nation, and if that is part of the result it will be money well spent no matter how much it costs.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The amendment which I propose, Mr. Chairman, and which may get us over a difficulty in the future, reads as follows:

That subsection 2 of section 5 be amended by inserting after the word "committee' in line 24 the following words:

The said committee shall hold its first meeting at the city of Ottawa. The Secretary of State for Canada shall convene the first meeting of said committee by notice in writing sent by post to the members thereof.

On section 6—Co-operation with other bodies.

Mr. KAISER: I am not clear as to just what is meant by a celebration. It is not the intention, I take it, to permit all this money to be expended upon a demonstration. I understand that the committee will be permitted to expend money in any direction they see fit in order to bring home to the people the significance of this great event. The anniversary of the confederation of Canada is one of the outstanding events in our whole history, and from the time it was first mentioned in the speech from the throne, I have endeavoured to induce my own constituency to centre upon this historic event. I think that is giving a proper lead to the people. As to the expenditure of money, I have asked our county council to do one or two things. I have asked them to gather together photographs of the men who sat in this first parliament and passed the confederation act. This they are undertaking to do at their own expense, and in other ways they are preparing to mark this great event. Am I right in my impression that some of the money under the control of the committee will be used in directing affairs of that kind? Would that come within the scope of the committee?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend is entirely right, and that what he has just described would come within the scope of the committee's activities. There have been a great many proposals made as to how the diamond jubilee should be commemorated; I will use that word instead of "celebrated," as it perhaps will explain away the idea of a mere spectacle. Some of these suggestions have related to educational aspects, others to pageants and the like. There have been no end of suggestions come to the government in one form and another from persons throughout the country as to what would be the most appropriate thing to do. The government intends to hand over to this committee every suggestion that has been submitted, and allow the committee to adopt or reject as it sees fit, in other words to draw up a program of its own.

I might make mention of another feature. The government is being asked to contribute advertisements to publications with respect to Canada in the sixtieth year of confederation. We have felt that unless some committee is placed in charge of that work, there will be no control of expenditure on such advertising and publicity, and our purpose is to turn over to this committee that phase also of the celebration.

On section 11—Head office.

Mr. HARRIS: Inasmuch as the committee seems to be open to suggestions, it might be well to put on record this idea. Throughout the Dominion a great many community affairs, some political, some non-political, are held on the first of July, and the theme of the addresses on this particular day might well centre around this great event that we are commemorating. I think the suggestion might well be passed on to the committee that each of these constituencies be given $1,000 of this $250,000 fund in order that they may celebrate in a proper manner the sixtieth birthday of confederation and so arouse the whole country to a realization of the significance of this great event in our national life.

On section 13—July 2 a public holiday.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might explain to the House that as July 1 this year comes on Friday the government thought it would be the wish of parliament to have Saturday declared a public holiday as well. There would thus be three consecutive holidays for the celebration.

Mr. WHITE (London): Does this mean that July 1 will also be a public holiday?

On section 14—$250,000 granted to the corporation.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, the Prime Minister has intimated that once this corporation meets it may approach the government and parliament for further sums of money. Whether parliament will be able to control the granting of such further sums will depend on its being in session. Therefore I would ask the Prime Minister to give an undertaking to this House that no further sums of money will be granted for the celebration unless passed by parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, I hesitate to give an undertaking in those specific words. I will inform the executive committee of what I have said in the House; indeed my first duty will be to give to the committee a copy of the debate which has taken place on this very subject. But I am unable to say what may take place after this parliament adjourns and before it meets again. Conceivably some expenditure might have to be made in the interim, for example, in connection with the visit of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and the Prime Minister of Great Britain. A certain amount might be required in addition to what is here proposed which could not be foreseen and which it would be essential to grant. I should not like to bind the government in such a manner that we would not be able to carry out the celebration on a scale befitting the occasion. In saying that, however, let me state to my hon. friend that the executive committee will be advised of what I gather to be the view of this parliament, that they should seek to confine their expenditure to the amount here set forth. If the expenditure runs beyond the $250,000, there will have to be good and sufficient reasons furnished—reasons that at least in the opinion of the government would meet with the approval of parliament.

Mr. EVANS: Mr. Chairman, while I am not altogether opposed to this bill, I do think that $250,000 is an ample amount for the city of Ottawa to celebrate our diamond jubilee, seeing that other places will have to stand their own expenditure for this purpose.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me correct my hon. friend. This is not an expenditure for the city of Ottawa alone. This fund will be handled by a national committee. It is to cover the expense of what that committee may decide to do from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Undoubtedly certain features of the celebration will take place in Ottawa, but it may be assumed that a large proportion of this money will go to meet expenses incidental to much that will be done outside the capital.

Mr. EVANS: I think $250,000 should be the limit, and therefore I propose the following amendment to section 14:

That after the word "Act" the following words be added, "and that it shall be understood that no further grant from this parliament shall be made".

Mr. McGIBBON: Mr. Chairman, I hope the Prime Minister will not accept the amendment. This celebration should be held in a manner in keeping with the dignity of the nation, and to tie the hands of the committee to an expenditure that is after all only an average of $1,000 for each riding in the whole Dominion is to my mind cutting the expenditure down very low indeed. I hope the Prime Minister and his government if they are going to proceed with this celebration will not so tie the hands of the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, the government cannot suppport the amendment of my hon. friend, and I hope the committee will not accept it.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

MONTREAL HARBOUR COMMISSION

LOAN OF $12,000,000 FOR TERMINAL FACILITIES

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 60, to provide for a loan to the harbour commissioners of Montreal.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 2—Loan of $12,000,000 to the corporation.

Mr. STEVENS: I purposely refrained from saying anything on the second reading of the bill, because I did not wish it to appear that I intended delaying the minister. There is however a very serious question which I wish to direct to the attention of the committee and to have discussed at this point. It is rather difficult for one to determine precisely the right moment to bring this matter up, but I am inclined to think it should be done on this section. I refer to the absence from this bill of a section which appears in acts of a similar character and which in the present measure should be numbered 6, providing for the repayment of the loan. The minister may have a complete and satisfactory explanation to offer, but I think the committee ought to be made aware of all the facts before proceeding with the bill. What may be described as the original act in legislation of this character was passed in the year 1896, and similar bills went through this House in 1922 and 1923. In 1922 a bill almost identical in terms with the present one was adopted, the only difference being that it contained the following:

The principal and interest of the sums advanced to the corporation under the authority of this act shall be paid by the corporation out of its revenue mentioned in section 8 of chapter 10 of the Statutes of 1896 (first session) and shall be charged upon the said revenue in the same manner and to the same extent as if the sum so advanced had been borrowed by the corporation under the said chapter 10.

In 1923 a similar bill was passed for the same purpose of advancing moneys to the Montreal harbour board and a similar section was incorporated in it. I shall read precisely the provision made in that case; it varies slightly from the first:

The principal and interest of the sums advanced to the corporation under the authority of this act shall be paid by the corporation out of all its property and assets, and out of all its tolls, rates, dues, penalties and other sources of revenue and income whatsoever, and shall rank as a charge thereon, and have precedence in regard to payment next after the payments provided for in section 8, of chapter 10 of the Statutes of 1896.

In the statute of 1896 the section 8 referred to in these two acts provides:

The principal and interest of the sums of money which may be borrowed . . . . shall be paid out of the revenue arising from the rates and penalties—

And so forth. Then it sets forth the standing of the various charges against such revenues:

(a) Payment of all expenses incurred in the collection of the said revenue, and other indispensable charges;

(b) The defraying of the expenses attendant on keeping the harbour clean, and on keeping the wharfs and other works therein in a thorough state of repair;

(c) The payment of interest due on all sums of money borrowed under this act or under any of the acts repealed by The Montreal Harbour Commissioners Act, 1894, without priority or preference;

(d) The paying off of the principal of such sums.

I want the committee to note that in the original bill provision is made for the repayment of principal and interest out of the earnings of the harbour. In the two acts to which I have referred, passed in 1922 and 1923, measures similar in every respect to this bill, provision is made for precisely the same thing, mention of which is made in the section of the act of 1896 to which I have alluded, namely, that the principal and interest shall be repaid out of the earnings of the harbour, out of dues, collections and so forth.

Last year, when this bill was first brought to the attention of parliament, a notice of motion was given by the minister. That notice of motion, given on June 7, 1926, provided:

That it is expedient to authorize a loan to the harbour commissioners of Montreal in an amount not exceeding $12,000,000 to carry on the construction of terminal facilities, upon approval by the governor in council of detailed plans, specifications and estimates for such works and the deposit of debentures of the corporation to cover said loan—

The committee would do well to note this particularly:

—and further, to establish a sinking fund to be applied to the reduction of the debenture indebtedness of the corporation to His Majesty.

On June 9, two days afterwards, when the resolution of which notice had been given appeared on the order paper, these significant words to which I have just referred were found to have been omitted. In the first place the resolution ought not to have been changed; it ought not to have appeared on the order paper except in the form of which notice had been given. The words to which I have referred, namely:

And further, the establishment of a sinking fund to be applied to the reduction of the debenture indebtedness of the corporation to His Majesty—

—were omitted from the resolution appearing on the order paper of June 9, 1926.

After this somewhat lengthy preamble I come to the bill now before the House. In every particular it follows the acts of 1922 and 1923 with the one exception that section 6 is left out. I have already intimated that this section 6 is the clause under which provision is made for the repayment of the sums advanced. Let me read from the bill of 1923, in order to remind the committee of what has been dropped:

The principal and interest of the sums advanced to the corporation under the authority of this act shall be paid by the corporation out of all its property and assets, and out of all its tolls, rates, dues, penalties and other sources of revenue and income whatsoever, and shall rank as a charge thereon, and have precedence in regard to payment next after the payments provided for in section 8 of chapter 10 of the Statutes of 1896, first session.

I submit in the first place that the minister should make a very clear explanation of the rather strange disappearance of this important clause; and I wish to emphasize that in connection with the harbour board of Montreal, which I have had reason both to compliment and to criticise in this House, that corporation has provided for the repayment of these loans out of its earnings and has carefully preserved the practice of paying the interest. It has done that because of these sections to which I have referred, which make it obligatory upon the harbour commissioners to provide out of their earnings for repayment of both principal and interest. I am going to listen to what the minister has to say in explanation, and unless he can give me complete assurance that the practice so well established is to be followed in this case, I will later move for the addition of this clause. It is passing strange, however, that this clause, which has appeared in all the other acts to which I have referred, is now dropped. I made inquiry from the law officers of this House as to why this bill was different from the preceding bills, because the minister himself told us the other day that this bill was the same as that passed last year, and was similar to those passed on previous occasions. I was rather inclined to accept the bill as merely a routine measure, the main question being whether we should grant the $12,000,000, but as a matter of fact it is very much different from the others.

Mr. CARDIN: I am sure I will have no difficulty in relieving my hon. friend of his anxiety in this connection. If he had waited until we reached the proper section of the bill it would not have been necessary for him to make his remarks, because I have already prepared as an amendment to be added as clause 6 the very clause which can be found in all the previous bills covering advances to the harbour board of Montreal. This question does not properly come under section 2, but I have no hesitation in saying that if this clause has been dropped it is only an oversight.

My hon. friend referred a moment ago to the resolution which was introduced last year providing for this very clause. There was an addition in that resolution which had been placed there by an overzealous employee of the department, no doubt with good intentions, providing for a sinking fund of one and one-half per cent. This was absolutely new; in no bill which has been presented to this House has there been anything providing for a sinking fund as set out in the resolution, and I thought it unfair to impose such a thing and make it obligatory. My hon. friend will notice that the resolution made it compulsory not only in connection with the $12,000,000 in question but also in connection with all previous loans, and I thought that most unfair. The money loaned to the port of Montreal in 1923, as well as that loaned in 1896, should not be subject to any new condition which might have presented itself to the officials of the department in 1925 or 1926. This money was loaned to the harbour commission on certain conditions, which are found in the bill. There was no sinking fund mentioned in the bill of 1896 and none in the bills of 1923 and 1924.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister permit an interruption? While no specific mention was made of a sinking fund, is it not implied in the language of the act, which in that of 1896 was as follows:

> The principal and interest of the sums of money which may be borrowed under this act, as well as all sums already borrowed. . . . shall be paid out of the revenue arising from the rates and penalties imposed by or under the Montreal Harbour Commissioners Act, 1894, for and on account of the said harbour.

Then it outlines the priority of charge against that revenue, and in subsection (d) goes on to say:

> The paying off of the principal of said sums...

Then in the act of 1923 it refers to this section and says that the commission shall provide for the payment of principal and interest. How can the commission provide for the payment of principal alone, leaving the interest out of it for the moment, unless it sets up a sinking fund out of the earnings of the harbour? While it is not specifically mentioned that a sinking fund shall be established, it is certainly a duty imposed upon the commissioners by this act. I ask my hon. friend if that is not correct.

Mr. CARDIN: I am free to admit that this clause has been so interpreted by the harbour commissioners themselves, because they have established a sinking fund of one per cent on all the loans. At present they have over $1,000,000 in the sinking fund ready to meet an obligation of $1,000,000 maturing next July. What I objected to last year was the creation of another sinking fund of not one per cent but one and a half per cent, to which I could not agree.

[Mr. Cardin.]

Mr. STEVENS: It does not say that here. It says:

> And further to establish a sinking fund to be applied to the reduction of the debentude indebtedness of the corporation to His Majesty the King.

No amount is mentioned.

Mr. CARDIN: But in the documents placed in my hands by the officers of the department a sinking fund of one and one-half per cent was provided for and I thought that most unfair. I desired to keep the bill in the same form as the previous bills; I decided to drop that clause, but due to an oversight we have dropped this other clause which existed in every other bill. The point was not raised then, but this year I observed that this clause had been omitted and I prepared an amendment which will be clause 6, containing exactly the same words found in the bills of 1896, 1923 and 1924. The clause will read as follows:

> The principal and interest of the sums advanced to the corporation under the authority of this act shall be paid by the corporation out of its revenue mentioned in section 8 of chapter 10 of the statutes of 1896, first session, and shall be charged upon the said revenue in the same manner and to the same extent as if the sums so advanced had been borrowed by the corporation under the said chapter 10.

With this clause added the bill will provide for the same needs that were provided for in the previous bill.

Mr. CAHAN: Does the minister intend to add that clause to the bill?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, I intend to propose that it be added to clause 5.

Sections 3 and 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Deposit of debentures to cover loan.

Mr. STEVENS: We had a discussion in connection with this phase of the bill, and I am not directing the attention now to the Montreal harbour commission but speaking in a general sense. I believe that in this bill, and in all similar bills dealing with other harbours, there should be inserted, as a subsection of section 5, a provision making the Auditor General of Canada the auditor of the accounts of all harbour commissions. This is a principle that I think should be accepted. We discussed it last year in a very friendly spirit and received from the minister a good deal of encouragement, the idea expressed then being that our views were not repugnant to his own. The other evening we had a discussion also on the same subject. Mr. Chairman, the minister ought to provide for such a subsection in connection with this section. I have not one drafted; in fact I would prefer that it should be drafted by an able lawyer like the minister himself rather than by a poor benighted layman.

Mr. CARDIN: Do not exaggerate.

Mr. STEVENS: The principle that the Auditor General should be auditor of these harbour commissions should now be established, and this is a good opportunity for the minister to do it.

Mr. CARDIN: I would not have any very serious objection to my hon. friend's suggestion as a general principle, but I do not think it would be fair to single out the port of Montreal for exceptional treatment.

Mr. STEVENS: I was very careful to explain that that was not my idea.

Mr. CARDIN: It has been admitted by everyone, even by my hon. friend himself, that the port of Montreal has been well administered, and the country has been fortunate, under all governments, on account of the excellence of that administration. Possibly the port of Montreal is the only one which is paying interest on its loans. That in itself is sufficient reason why the port should not be singled out for exceptional treatment and further responsibilities imposed on the commissioners. The suggestion my hon. friend has made is already covered by the Audit Act.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. CARDIN: Under the Audit Act the Minister of Finance is empowered to have an audit made at any time into the affairs of all the harbour commissions. I think the public is amply protected by that provision in the law. If any hon. member desires to have an investigation made into the affairs of the port of Montreal I will say promptly, go on and make it. As a matter of fact investigations were made last year and the previous year also into the accounts of the harbour of Montreal by direction of the audit board. That audit board has been created precisely for that purpose—to make an audit of the accounts of all the public corporations to which the government has made or is making loans. Why then insist upon greater safeguards in the case of the only corporation which has provided a sinking fund to meet its obligations when they mature? It seems to me that it is rather severe treatment to extend to the harbour commission of Montreal when it has made such a good showing. If it would suit my hon. friend I would be willing to take into consideration the matter of applying the principle which he suggests. We are going to incorporate certain other harbours in Canada before very long, we are going to deal generally with the harbours. When that time comes it may be opportune to make the principle of such an audit applicable generally; I do not think we should introduce the principle into a bill providing for a loan of $12,000,000 to the harbour commission of Montreal. I hope my hon. friend will consider the suggestion I have made a reasonable and proper one.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister has not responded at all to the spirit in which I advanced my suggestion. He now takes refuge behind a statement that the suggestion is directed at Montreal. I stated in the most clear and precise terms, after paying a compliment to the port of Montreal, that I did not direct my observations to that port. I said that other ports ought also to be brought in, but I did say that this was a good time to begin to enforce the principle.

I cannot allow another statement by the minister to go unchallenged. He says that Montreal is the only port which has erected a sinking fund. Why, the next greatest port, the port of Vancouver, erected a sinking fund many years ago, and I am informed by the officers of the department that it is being properly administered. I also asked, and have asked before, that the accounts of the port of Montreal should be brought under the audit of the Auditor General. I will say here that there have been expenditures in both these ports—I am not desirous of bringing up the subject now but I have been forced to do so by the minister's observations—in the port of Vancouver as well as the port of Montreal in times gone by that were rather reckless and greatly exceeded any estimate. I recall one particularly that ran into $3,000,000, although $900,000 was the estimate of the minister. I could cite three or four cases at Vancouver, aggregating I think over a million dollars, of what I consider to be needless expenditures of the money granted by this parliament that could never have been made had the Auditor General been in charge of the accounts of that port. It is for the purpose of safeguarding not only the port of Vancouver, the port of Montreal, the port of Quebec and other ports that have harbour commissioners, but also other ports in which commissions are to be created in future, that I am making my present appeal. If the minister would give the committee the assurance that he will bring in an amendment to some general act, or such amendments to specific acts, as may bring about the placing of these commissions under the direct audit of the Auditor General; if he will assure us that such a measure will be brought in this session, I will not press the matter further.

Mr. CAHAN: Clause 5, to which an amendment is now suggested, simply deals with the deposit of debentures of the Montreal harbour commission to cover loans made from time to time. Such being the case it does not seem to me to be a proper clause in which to deal with the matter of an audit of all the accounts of the Montreal harbour commission. There was an opinion expressed in this House during the only session of the last parliament that all the expenditures of these commissions should be subject to an audit by the Auditor General. Under the Board of Audit Act, as I remember it—I looked it up at the time—the Minister of Finance can call at any time for a complete audit of the expenditures of each of these commissions. It was stated last session, if I remember correctly, that if anyone wished to see an audit which had been obtained within a few weeks or months, it would be open to any hon. member who made the request. If I remember aright, it was the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) who made the request. It was offered to him for his inspection and for the inspection in a confidential way of other members of the House.

There is a great deal to be said in favour of an audit by the Auditor General, but I am clear in my opinion that if such a provision is to be adopted, it should be by way of amendment to the Board of Audit Act, and it should be brought in so that it may be clearly understood that it is a general law applicable to each and all of the harbour commissions. If that general amendment is to be proposed, there are in connection with each of those harbour commissions certain matters which must be regarded as more or less confidential, and when that general amendment is brought in I should like to discuss it from that point of view. The harbour commissioners of Montreal are competing with several United States companies, transportation companies as well as storage companies, and there are certain matters relating to that competition which should not be generally disclosed. Such an audit should not only be open to the minister, but it should be open to my hon. friend if he thinks there is any fraud or trickery or misfeasance of office in connection with the administration of the harbour commissioners.

When we come to deal with a general amendment, I for one would like to discuss it from the point of view that the general audit of all these harbour commissions should not be made a public report in all its particulars, because I think it would be very injurious to those various ports to have certain matters, which are more or less confidential, and which enable them to compete with United States ports, freely exposed to the public.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The manifest advantage to this House of having an audit by the Auditor General is, I think, well known to every hon. member. The audit provided by the Audit Act may be sufficient for the Minister of Finance, but it affords little information for hon. members and we have no opportunity of going behind it or of making inquiries into it. It was pointed out pretty fully last session that an audit by the Auditor General is a different matter. An audit by the Auditor General would give an opportunity in this House of bringing the matter before the public accounts committee of parliament and of summoning any members of the harbour commission or any of the staff of that commission to appear, produce papers and submit to examination. That is the advantage to this House of an audit under the Auditor General. I understand the minister to say that he is not opposed to that proposal, but he thinks it should be introduced in the form of some general enactment. I am inclined to the same opinion. I realize that we have several great harbours in Canada operated under boards of harbour commissioners, and it is quite likely that we shall have more in the near future. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre, (Mr. Stevens), who brought the matter before the committee this evening, stated very clearly that he would be satisfied if the minister would introduce a general act for this purpose. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) also acquiesces in the proposal, and if the government would introduce a general act applicable to all these boards of harbour commissioners, with any necessary reservations as to secrecy of proceedings or the like as suggested by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, that would be quite acceptable on this side of the House. For my part I do not desire to interfere particularly with the Board of Harbour Commissioners of the city of Montreal, and if the minister will grant us an assurance that the matter will receive consideration in the near future, we can let the matter drop.

Mr. CARDIN: I have no hesitation in saying that I am ready to give the best consideration to the suggestion that has been made, but really there is no doubt that the public is absolutely protected. In the Audit Act power is given to make an investigation into all the affairs of such commissions. These auditors are empowered with the same authority as that of commissioners under the Inquiries Act. Their report is made to the Minister of Finance, and section 7 of the act reads:

Each report of the board shall be laid before both Houses of parliament within twenty-one days of the date of its receipt by the minister, or if parliament be not then in session, within the first twenty-one days of the session then next following.

What greater protection can we ask? If on the production of this report any hon. member, after reading it when it has become one of our public documents, wants some details, some information, wants a more thorough investigation into the affairs of the port, he has the power of asking for a more complete investigation into all the affairs of the port.

Mr. STEVENS: Nonsense.

Mr. GUTHRIE: He would if it were in the Auditor General's report, but he cannot under the report from the board of audit.

Mr. CARDIN: I can give my hon. friend the assurance that if he asks for an inquiry into that port of Montreal, as long as I am Minister of Marine and Fisheries he will get it. I shall have no hesitation in granting an investigation of that kind.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not refer to the port of Montreal. I am speaking of the general principle.

Mr. CARDIN: I shall be glad to give the assurance as regards all other ports.

Mr. GUTHRIE: When the suggestion was made it seemed to impress the minister favourably and he promised to give it consideration, but nothing of course has since been done. The advantage to the House and to hon. members is that we can take the matter before the public accounts committee and investigate it to our hearts' content. I do not say that we need to do so. The occasion might not arise, but it might arise. That is the usual way of treating matters which are audited by the Auditor General and which appear in his report. It is a privilege accorded to this House. When the report is made under the Audit Act and the report comes back to the Minister of Finance, it is laid on the table in due course, but so far as hon. members are concerned that is the end of it. The Minister of Finance might pursue the matter further, but this House could not do so.

Mr. STEVENS: I hesitate to delay the committee, but the minister is surely not serious in the suggestion that if an hon. member rises in his place and says: I would like to have an audit of the port of Montreal, the minister would immediately grant it. Why, on the very face of it—I hesitate to use the word, but it is absurd. The first thing the minister would say to me if I rose in my place and made such a request would be: Will the hon. member please bring such charges as he desires to make, and we will then have them investigated. You would have to have some charge. Certainly a member rising in his place and simply asking for an audit here or an audit there—why, the Minister of Finance will not say that it would be granted. In fact I do not think it would be sensible to ask it.

I will give the minister and the committee two or three very cogent reasons why I think this should be done, and I shall not, in doing so, refer to the port of Montreal, for the simple reason that the minister persists in returning every argument as if it were particularly directed against the port of Montreal. I just as steadily persist that that is not my objective. It is the general principle I am fighting for, and that I fought for last year and the other night. This House from time to time grants sums running into the millions. To-night it is $12,000,000—I think this has been preceded by some $40,000,000 to this particular port, and Vancouver I believe has received some $15,000,000 or more—by way of loan on the debentures of these ports for general investment, and this House and the members of this House have no more right to scrutinize the expenditure of these moneys than has any person outside the House. Now that is wrong in principle. You ask me to give some reason. I will give you a couple of good reasons.

This House granted the harbour commissioners of Vancouver a loan of $5,000,000, similar to this, for the purpose of improving that harbour. Now I am going to tell the House how a couple of million dollars of that loan was expended. In one instance the harbour commissioners bought a piece of land from a certain company controlled by a gentleman by the name of Mr. Gale, who, by the way, was a political candidate—I am just stating the facts—for the purpose of constructing a jetty to carry grain carriers out for the delivery of grain to be loaded on ships. That jetty was constructed for the purpose of serving an elevator owned by a company owned by Mr. Gale and his associates. On that jetty, out of the moneys granted by this parliament, was spent the sum of approximately $1,000,000. The fixed charges, interest and sinking fund, against that amounted to $112,000 a year; I am now quoting from returns that have been laid on the table of the House. In the first year of its construction the harbour commissioners secured a revenue of $12,000, and laid out in fixed charges $112,000. The next year they got a revenue of I think $23,000 or $27,000, and they paid out $112,000 in fixed charges. The point there is this; In the first place, the harbour commissioners should never have made the expenditure. In the second place the money was spent extravagantly; the construction was very extravagant, and there has been no control over that expenditure except by auditors appointed by the commissioners themselves.

I will give another illustration. The harbour commissioners in Vancouver, out of one of these votes supplied them by the House, bought an elevator known as the Woodward elevator. A gentleman by the name of Woodward went to Vancouver some years ago, about 1921, and went into the elevator business. He went broke in the undertaking; he did not have sufficient capital, and he went to the commissioners and asked them to take it over. I heard that they had done so, as did the business people of Vancouver. I wrote a letter to the chairman of the harbour board and pointed out to him that if he took over that project it would probably cost him upwards of half a million dollars to put the institution in good shape, and that he would only lose money very heavily as a result. When he was in Ottawa attending the minister I warned the chairman again, and I warned the department against entering into that project. However, they went on. The commissioners bought the property, and it now stands a cost to the harbour commissioners of some $960,000 or $970,000. It is leased today, I think, at a rental of about $30,000 a year. An arithmetical calculation will show to what an extent this country has profited by that. What was the trouble? The expenditures were extravagantly made. Has there been any check on that expenditure? No. Why? Because this House has no control over it. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, an attempt was made a session or two ago to have these matters investigated, and what were we told? That we had no right to bring these accounts before the public accounts committee for the simple reason that they were not under the Auditor General and did not come within that category. If we accept the minister's suggestion, or the suggestion of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, and leave these matters to be dealt with by the audit board, we members of the House have no means of investigating, none whatever. All that will happen is this: I can stand in my place and make charges and all that sort of thing, and then we get an audit board appointed. The audit board reports to the government, and there is no committee of this House investigating. The public accounts committee have no chance to investigate, nor has anyone connected with this parliament any right to investigate, no more right than any man outside the House.

What I have been trying to argue for the last three sessions—last session in particular I emphasized it, and previously in this session, and again I emphasize it now—is not that we should harrass these harbour boards. I am wholeheartedly behind the harbour boards of this country, such as are run in a proper manner, and I want to help them in every possible way. I will vote for this expenditure, but I do ask, as a matter of right to this House and as a matter of reasonable safeguard to the harbour commissioners themselves, that the Auditor General shall be placed in charge. These harbour boards appoint their own auditors. I submit now to any trained business man or accountant in this House, is it a sound thing to have the management of a concern appoint its own auditors? It is not sound; it is contrary to every business principle. I will admit that in many institutions the shareholders are indifferent to their rights and allow the management sometimes to nominate the auditors; but that is private business, and here we are dealing with public moneys. The principle which is sound in private and in public business is that the shareholders concerned—and this parliament represent the shareholders in this case—should appoint the auditors of the management, and not the management appoint the auditors to audit their own affairs. All we ask of the minister and of the government is that we, representing the people whose moneys are being expended, should have our auditor, the Auditor General, audit these accounts.

In regard to the suggestion made by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, I wholly agree with him in this, that there are certain matters that must be kept private, but there is not a sensible auditor in the country who does not know exactly what should be kept private and what should be made public. That is what they are trained for; that is their business, and there will be no difficulty whatever about that. I will assure the minister from my own knowledge of the auditing game, which has extended over a great many years, that I would never think of asking that secret, confidential information, or information that would harrass the board, be made public. But in the interest of the harbour boards themselves—and goodness knows they are harrassed enough politically and in other ways for advantages here and advantages there—in the interest of inspiring confidence in public affairs, and in the name of what is right and fair, I ask on behalf of this House and the people of this country that the Auditor General should be put in charge of these harbour commissions, expending as they are millions of the people's money—$12,000,000 this year—and I hope the Vancouver harbour commissioners may later, perhaps not this session but next, get a further advance; and the same with other harbour commissioners. But let us put these expenditures under the eye of the Auditor General, and so give to this House and to committees of this House an opportunity to scrutinize everything fairly and frankly.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member has explained certain expenditures in the harbour of Vancouver. Would he care to suggest that the manner in which the funds have been expended made it necessary for the harbour commission to ask for increased charges on grain going through that port?

Mr. STEVENS: Absolutely not. I say the increase in the charges at the port of Vancouver are unjustifiable. I have always said so. They never should have been increased. The old charges were quite sufficient for their needs.

Mr. CANTLEY: Mr. Chairman, I would remind the minister that some years ago one of the most important harbours in the maritime provinces, then under a commission, was defrauded of a very considerable portion of its revenue through the defalcations of its treasurer. The only audit was a local audit. Had we had an audit such as that referred to by various speakers on this side of the House, I am satisfied that those defalcations would not have occurred. The irregularities, I may say, extended over a period of years. As probably two important harbours in the maritime provinces will soon come under some form of commission or government control, I think it highly important that we should have some sort of official governmental audit. There is not much use in locking the door after the horse is gone. The mere fact that such an audit would be held would undoubtedly have a deterrent effect on any official who might be inclined towards or tempted to dishonesty. I think in the interests of all concerned, not only the members of the House but the various harbours, and the sections of country which they serve, that it is highly important to apply one general principle to bodies controlling our harbours or receiving public money and administering large harbour revenues.

Mr. GARDINER: Has the audit board ever audited the accounts of the Vancouver commission or any of the other harbour commissions?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, last year and the year before.

Mr. STEVENS: Who on behalf of the audit board audited the Vancouver harbour accounts last year and the year before?

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Edwards, of Toronto, chairman of the board.

Mr. SPENCER: Was the report satisfactory to the Minister of Finance?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, it was a most satisfactory report. It was tabled and is available to hon. members.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, the government has spent $44,000,000 on this harbour, and we are now asked to spend another $12,000,000. In addition to that we are liable for the cost of a bridge, which at first we were told would run to $6,000,000, but now we may have to face an expenditure of $15,000,000 on this account. Up to a few years ago this particular harbour was under the control of the Department of Public Works, then it was transferred to the Department of Marine and Fisheries. Last session it was charged in this House by two hon. members that the Montreal harbour board was in politics. I do not like to think that this is so. We have been told that there is as much politics in the port of Montreal as in the Canadian National Railways, and if that is so it is going pretty far. As I say, I do not like to hear it, and I do not think it is true, but if there is any foundation for the statement the quicker the port is taken out of politics the better. The port of Montreal is the largest grain exporting port in the world, and in the value of its total commerce is second only to New York and Liverpool.

Every good Canadian admires the port and wants to build it up. But with all due respect to the minister, the time has come when the accounts of this port and all its contracts and other business transactions should, like those of the national railways, be placed before the public accounts committee of this parliament.

Although this government has contributed not a cent to the Toronto harbour commission, and although no charges were made against its administration, the minister ordered an inquiry, and the Central Liberal Association of Toronto asked the government to appoint a board of politicians to take charge of the inquiry, although the city council had appointed Sir Thomas White to conduct the proceedings. It seems to me that so many of our judges have little or nothing to do that half their time is spent on these political commissions, contrary to the Judges Act. Now, as the minister ordered an inquiry into the affairs of the Toronto harbour, what about his own harbour, what about his own bailiwick? In the city of Vancouver the other day the government dismissed all the commissioners and appointed a new board, whose members seem to know nothing about harbour affairs but were appointed largely because they were Liberals. To be consistent, the minister should appoint a commission of inquiry into the affairs of the port of Montreal, in connection with which certain charges have been made, when he did so in relation to the Toronto harbour commission, against which no charges whatsoever were made. Let the minister ascertain whether the port of Montreal is run from a commercial aspect or not, and whether politics has entered into its administration. As I say, I do not like to think so, but it is his duty to the House and to the country to make a declaration of policy with respect to this matter.

All these ports at Montreal, Halifax, St. John, Vancouver, Quebec are in the public interest, and they will always have my support. I know the chairman of this particular port, and I am sure he is an honest man and a brilliant young Canadian. This is a national port and it should be properly administered, but I do not believe the minister was wise in accepting the advice of a few Liberal ward politicians and paying fifteen to twenty thousand dollars to a Liberal lawyer in Toronto to provide him with a job. The commissioners there have worked for nothing, having devoted years of their life to the service of the public. I admit that the commission in Montreal has done good work, but it seems to me that the minister owes the committee some further explanation.

[Mr. Church.]

Mr. MacLAREN: Substantial reasons have been given why there should be a general application of the Audit Act to harbour commissions. The minister has been urged to give an assurance that an amendment will be made to the act to provide for an audit under the Auditor General in the case of this commission. He does not seem willing to give that assurance. Will he state to the committee the objections he has to accepting what seems to me a very reasonable and a valuable suggestion which has been offered from this side of the House?

Mr. CARDIN: I think there is some misunderstanding regarding the relative positions of the various harbour commissions in Canada. It is not for the mere pleasure of appointing harbour commissions that these boards are established. They were established because it was felt at the time that the affairs of the ports could be better administered by that means than from the department in Ottawa through the ordinary officers of the government, and it was decided by those who first created the commissions that it would be preferable to have reliable men of experience, familiar with the local conditions, deal with the affairs of the ports concerned, rather than leave their administration to the department. We must have confidence in the men we appoint, and if we are to drag the harbour commissioners before the public accounts committee every year and compel them to answer questions in detail with reference to the smallest transactions they superintend, it will be very hard indeed to find men of reputable standing who will be ready to undertake the duties of harbour commissioners and expose themselves to all the criticism to which they might be liable. This departure was made by previous governments and approved by this one because it was thought that the affairs of a port could be best administered in this manner. Of course, if we have no confidence in the commissioners, that is a different matter; but if we trust them sufficiently to appoint them to this responsible position we should be satisfied with the guarantees and the securities which are provided in the law as it stands.

These harbour commissions are becoming more general: witness the Duncan report in its recommendation as to the advisability of having harbour commissions at Halifax and St. John. I maintain that there exist already, in the law as it stands, all the safeguards which we can reasonably require in a matter of this kind. I mentioned a moment ago one of the provisions of the Audit Act; there is another which is well worth considering. Section 8 of the Audit Act provides that nothing contained therein shall impair the authority given by the Consolidated Revenue Act and Audit Act to the Auditor General of Canada. And if you refer to chapter 24 of the revised statutes of Canada, Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, section 63 you will find, with reference to the powers of the Auditor General, the following:

> Besides the appropriation accounts of the grants of parliament, the Auditor General shall examine and audit, if required so to do by the Minister of Finance, and in accordance with any regulations which are prescribed for his guidance in that behalf by the Treasury board. . .

So that section 63 of that act provides a safeguard, the Auditor General having power to audit "any other public accounts which, though not relating directly to the receipts or expenditure of the Dominion of Canada", and so forth. I contend that the harbour boards through the assistance which they are receiving come under subsection (g) of section 63 of chapter 24 of the act in question. "Any other public accounts" may be taken as including the accounts of harbour commissions, and I do not consider it fair to ask that all the affairs of the harbour boards in general should be submitted to the public accounts committee to be discussed in detail a year after the expenditure has been made. This is not going to prevent any expenditure; the public accounts committee does not deal with prospective expenditures but with those already made, and only by way of criticism can the government be checked if we are not as strict as some gentlemen think we should be. So even through the public accounts committee the safeguard would not be greater because the expenditures would be considered after they had been made. In view of the safeguards we already enjoy I think it only fair that the bill should go through in its present form, which leaves matters in exactly the same position. The matter raised by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) and supported by others is one which is worth consideration and I am ready to give it the best of my judgment. I will consult the Minister of Finance, by whom the Audit Act is administered, and if anything can properly be done to improve the control we may exercise over these boards, I am quite ready to do it provided we do not embarrass them or complicate their affairs.

Mr. MANION: I would like to say a word on this question, because I believe it to be very important. In a general way I would like to support the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre; I did not hear his speech, but he has explained the gist of it to me. On different occasions and in different parts of Canada I have heard criticisms of certain harbour boards, criticisms certainly not complimentary to those boards. I am not saying anything against the Montreal harbour board or any other particular board, but I have received letters, some of which are on my files at present, charging some of these boards with taking part in politics and with using funds for political purposes which should be used for the harbours. I do not say that these statements are correct, although I have received them from most responsible citizens, but under the circumstances and while there is danger that these boards may be charged by some people at least with misconduct, would it not be in the interest of the boards themselves to have the Auditor General look into their accounts? It seems to me a most fair proposition. I am not charging any board with misconduct, but it certainly seems to me that the minister will be doing more justice even to the men who compose these boards, and these men should feel that they are receiving more justice, by having the Auditor General look through their accounts and clear them of the charges of misconduct which are being made rather freely in ordinary conversation throughout the country to-day. I believe the minister should promise to make it a general rule that all these harbour boards be put under the control, so far as expenditures are concerned, of the Auditor General.

Probably the minister has very good reasons for saying that it would not be fair to insist that these accounts be brought before the public accounts committee, and the members of the boards interlocuted by all the members of that committee. We all know that outstanding men have taken positions on these boards; I can look back at members of the Montreal harbour board whom I have met in the past; they were outstanding men just as there are outstanding men on that board to-day. But I should think these men would also welcome this proposition, and I think the minister would be well advised in saying to-night that all these boards should have their accounts investigated by the Auditor General. If the boards have nothing of which to be ashamed, as the minister says he is confident they have not, they should welcome the investigation. I believe the minister should take the attitude that the Auditor General of Canada will investigate every one of these boards annually and report to this House.

Mr. CAHAN: In looking into this matter I find that there are two acts, first the Board of Audit Act of 1925, and then the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, which is chapter 24 of the revised statutes. I find that in 1925 this parliament decided upon a certain policy with respect to the investigation of the accounts of certain public bodies such as the Canadian National Railway Company, the Canadian Government Merchant Marine Limited and other undertakings which are owned or carried on by the government of Canada, as well as any commission or other public body the operations of which are carried on by appropriations from the treasury of Canada. This harbour commission therefore comes under the Board of Audit Act, section 4 of which provides:

> It shall be the duty of the board to act in an advisory capacity to the Treasury Board and under its direction to inquire into and report with regard to any matters entrusted to it by the Treasury Board including the following:

Then it proceeds to provide for an inquiry into the accounts of the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian Government Merchant Marine Limited and any harbour commission in Canada. This places it entirely within the discretion of the Treasury board as to whether any such public audit of the Montreal harbour commission or other commissions shall be made, and only when the Treasury board gives such direction is an audit of the accounts of such a commission made. It seems to me reasonable to suggest to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Cardin) who has charge of this bill, and also to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), that this Board of Audit Act might be so amended as to provide for annual audits of such commissions as the Montreal harbour commission, so as to not leave it entirely within the discretion of the Treasury board as to whether or not such audit should be made. If such annual audits are made, section 7 of the act applies, which sections says:

> Each report of the board shall be laid before both houses of parliament within twenty-one days from the date of its receipt by the minister, or if parliament be not then in session, within the first twenty-one days of the session then next following.

I am inclined to agree with the minister that when such a report is laid before this House it is quite competent for any hon. member to move that it be referred for further consideration to the public accounts committee. If there is any doubt about it, however, the doubt might be set at rest by a further amendment, in case the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries should consider such an amendment necessary. It might be clearly stated in clauses 6 and 7 that the report should be laid not only before the House but before the public accounts committee as well for its consideration. I can see no objection to that. Therefore we come back to the question as to whether the audit board is the proper authority to audit these accounts. I am subject to correction, but I do not understand that the Auditor General of Canada has anything to do with the accounts of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, or the accounts of the Canadian National Railways; I understand they have their own audit but come so far as public audit is concerned, under the Board of Audit Act of 1925. Is not that correct? I understand it to be so. Therefore I can see no reason why the harbour commission should be dealt with in any different way, in the matter of audit, from that in which the accounts of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Government Merchant Marine—two corporations which are receiving and expending very large grants of public money—are dealt with. But I do see a reason why those reports should not be made at the mere suggestion of the Minister of Finance. The report of the Board of Audit should be made annually; it should be compulsory for the board to make an annual investigation of the harbour commission's accounts and annually report upon them. Then the report should be placed before parliament, as now provided in section 7 of the act, and made available to the public accounts committee for further consideration. I can see no real objection to following such a course as that. The contention is that these audits should be made by the Auditor General. I do not know that there is any virtue in an audit by that official which may not be found in an audit under the Board of Audit Act of 1925. I do not think that we should demand an explicit undertaking from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries tonight. But I think that he and the Minister of Finance should consider the whole matter and give it their careful attention, so that later on, when the estimates for the current year are under consideration, they might give us some assurance that either under the Board of Audit Act of 1925, or under the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, which is chapter 24 of the revised statutes, an audit and report should be compulsory in each and every year, and that the report made as the result of such audit should not only be laid before parliament as now provided, but should go before the public accounts committee for such consideration as that body may deem necessary to give to it.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): I heartily support the attitude of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). I have nothing at all to say in criticism of the Board of Harbour Commissioners of the port of Montreal. I have had the privilege on several occasions of looking over that port and examining the conditions very closely and as far as I could see the port is well run, and conducted in a manner that is in the interests of this country. But I want to remind the minister that some three years ago we considered and discussed in this House the affairs of the harbour commission of Vancouver. Let me remind hon. gentlemen of the important fact that had it not been for the action of the provincial government of Alberta in appearing before the grain commission inquiry and laying its case before that body we should not have discovered what was brought to light at that particular time. The revelations then made were of sufficient importance to bring to the attention of parliament, and we had a long discussion of the situation disclosed. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre has cited to-night two cases in connection with the harbour commission of Vancouver which are detrimental to the interests of that port and of the people of Vancouver, as well as detrimental to the interests of the nation as a whole. We hear statements in this House, and we see long articles printed in the public press from time to time, as to the reasons why the Canadian products do not go through Canadian ports, and propaganda has been directed against the western Canadian farmer because much of his grain passes through ports in the United States. Now there are reasons why Canadian grain goes through those ports. I am not going to say that the only reason is that some Canadian ports are not as well managed as they should be, but undoubtedly that fact enters into the situation. Last season less grain was shipped out through the port of Vancouver than for many years previously. This was not because of the charges made and the conditions brought to light, because there are other factors to be considered. Nevertheless the disclosures made had a certain influence. But it must be borne in mind that the ports on the west coast of the United States are to-day making a great bid for the grain business of Alberta. They are trying to get the grain of that province diverted to their ports instead of being shipped through the port of Vancouver. Now we farmers of the west desire to see the most of our grain go through our own ports, because we feel there is then less danger of admixture than when our grain goes through United States ports. Let me remind the minister that only a short time ago the Vancouver harbour commission raised the rates on grain going through that port, and we had no opportunity to contest their action, at least that is what we were assured by the government of Alberta, and there was no one to speak on our behalf. The situation therefore seems to be this: If harbour commissions were subject to an audit that would be reported to the House and thoroughly considered here, I am satisfied it would increase the efficiency of our ports and would give them a much larger business than they handle now. I hope the minister will see to it, if he possibly can, that the harbour commissions shall be brought under some audit which will be reported to the House, and, if necessary, the commissioners themselves summoned before a parliamentary committee to give explanations.

Mr. CARDIN: I have no hesitation in saying that I would be inclined to favour an annual audit by the audit board such as the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) has suggested. I am quite willing to take the matter up with the Minister of Finance, who is in charge of the two acts to which allusion has been made, and to discuss matters with him along the lines suggested by my hon. friend. If we have an annual audit the report made with respect to it will be tabled according to law. I think this assurance ought to be satisfactory to everyone interested. I understand that the leader of the Progressive party objected the other day because the audit the Minister of Finance might decide upon was merely optional. I shall be prepared to make it compulsory and to have it every year.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) brought to the minister's attention another matter, namely, that if the audit takes place under the audit board, while the report must be tabled in the House, no provision is made that any committee of this House will look into that report if it is found necessary to do so. That is the weakness of the situation. If the minister will promise to provide ways and means to overcome that difficulty, that will probably be satisfactory.

Mr. CARDIN: My hon. friend will surely remember that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George expressed the opinion that according to the law as it stands, the report can be referred to the public accounts committee.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, but the minister must remember that that is only a lawyer's opinion and we have heard a good deal about lawyers' opinions. What we want is to be secured to the extent that the report shall go before the committee if any member or members of this House shall deem it desirable to have the report so considered by the committee.

Mr. CARDIN: I have no objection to taking the matter up with the Minister of Finance and discussing the suggestion with him.

Mr. SPENCER: Would the minister be prepared to move an amendment to this bill in accordance with the extent to which he has said he is willing to go? I cannot understand why he has hesitated so long to-night before agreeing to meet the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) half way. It seems to me that he has protested too much. When anyone protests too much, naturally people begin to make inquiries and to wonder why the protests are made. I am glad the minister has at last appreciated the fact that members of this House want to know more about these harbour boards. I would be glad if an amendment could be inserted in this measure.

Mr. CAHAN: It should be an amendment to the Audit Act.

Mr. SPENCER: If the minister can assure the House that an amendment will be brought down to cover all ports, I shall be content.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: There is a little information I should like to get as to the method provided for meeting maturing obligations, a somewhat important matter in this House. I understood the minister to say—and he will correct me if I am misquoting him—that the Montreal harbour commission were already providing a sinking fund of one per cent per annum for that purpose; but as this loan obligation which the commission is now securing will mature in twenty-five years it is obvious that a sinking fund of one per cent will not be sufficient to meet it when it matures at the end of that period, even with the accrued interest on the amounts that are retained. What other provision is made, or will the large percentage of that maturing obligation have to be met by further loans? Because if further loans are required, that might mean a continuous increase of the total obligation beyond the point of security.

Mr. CARDIN: Of course a sinking fund of one per cent per annum is not sufficient to meet the total amount of the loan, but it would certainly go a long way towards paying a substantial amount on account of the loan and it would be easy to renew the balance. We must not forget that we are practically making a deal between the right and the left pocket. These commissioners are not proprietors of the things which they are administering. They are administering only the affairs of the state, and the money which is expended by them is for building wharves, elevators and so on, which are the property of the government, and in taking guarantees and all sorts of protection we are practically taking a mortgage on the left pocket for the benefit of the right. By this method it is easier to keep accounts; but we should not forget that we are dealing with our own affairs, our own property; we are lending money to a corporation which represents the government and the state. We should not be too severe in establishing the sinking fund because we are dealing with our own property. I am not objecting to any safeguards. My hon. friend (Mr. Spencer) said that he was surprised that I did not agree to that at first. I have no objection to state the reason. I thought at first that this bill was not the proper place to establish a general principle, as it would apply only to Montreal harbour and would not cover the other harbours that we have. The proper place to make this amendment is in the Audit Act. Secondly, according to my poor judgment and my short experience as a lawyer, I contend that practically all that is being asked for to-night is already in the statutes as they exist.

Mr. CAHAN: It is discretionary in the present statute and we wish to make it compulsory.

Mr. GEARY: Is it the practice of the Montreal harbour board or any other harbour board to set up a depreciation reserve to take care of property used up in the service of the board?

Mr. CARDIN: I do not think so.

Mr. SPENCER: What has the country invested in the port of Montreal, including this $12,000,000?

Mr. CARDIN: The amount is $44,000,000 prior to this.

Section agreed to.

Mr. CARDIN: I beg to move that the following clause be added as section 6:

6. The principal and interest of the sums advanced to the corporation under the authority of this act shall be paid by the corporation out of its revenue mentioned in section eight of chapter ten of the statutes of 1896 (first session) and shall be charged upon the said revenue in the same manner and to the same extent as if the sum so advanced had been borrowed by the corporation under the said chapter ten.

Mr. STEVENS: This, of course, largely meets the objection which I raised at the opening of the proceedings to-night in regard to this bill; but the statement made by the minister some time ago to the effect that no sinking funds were established sufficient to take care of these loans as they matured is somewhat disturbing. I do not wish to delay the committee, but I would point out that the minister's statement of a moment ago, namely, that this is merely a transition of funds from one pocket to the other and that these commissioners are administering our affairs and so on, is scarcely a fair one. These commissioners are corporate bodies created by this parliament. They are carrying on business in competition with private concerns. For instance, in the ports of Montreal and Vancouver in particular they are carrying on a great grain conveying business in competition with other persons in the grain trade. It is unfair to general business, private business, that corporate bodies of this character should have huge loans from the government of Canada without their being compelled to operate these facilities in such a business-like manner that they can fairly compete with the others. For instance, the question of fees enters into the matter. This is a board, we will say, not setting aside a sinking fund to take care of its principal investment. By statute and by regulation of the grain board under the Grain Act the private concern is kept down to the same fees that the public concern charges, but the private concern must take care of its principal and interest. So it is an unfair competition unless the harbour commissioners are compelled so to conduct their business that out of their revenues they shall take care of both principal and interest. I submit therefore, in conclusion, that it is contrary to the original act of 1896, where it is specifically laid down that the principal and interest shall be taken care of, and which deals exactly with, first, the charges against making the loan; next keeping the harbour and so on clean; and lastly, principal and interest. I submit to the minister that parliament should insist that these boards set up a sinking fund sufficient to take care of these loans as they mature.

Mr. CARDIN: The last criticism of my hon. friend is not well founded. There is no difference between this clause and the one which exists in the bill of 1896. The three last lines state "and shall be a charge upon the said revenue in the same manner and to the same extent as if the sum so advanced had been borrowed by the corporation under the said chapter 10." So the loan is under the same restrictions as are provided in the bill of 1896.

Mr. STEVENS: My criticism was that the harbour commission is not carrying out the spirit of these statutes, and my criticism is based on the minister's own statement of a moment ago and his statement of some time ago. At some future time, when we have the estimates before us and can discuss the question generally without being constantly reminded that we are attacking the port of Montreal, I intend to discuss this question of providing sinking fund and the question of adequate protection in the way of audits.

ROYAL AGRICULTURAL WINTER FAIR ASSOCIATION OF CANADA

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 64, for the granting of assistance to the Royal Agricultural Winter Fair Association of Canada at Toronto, Ontario.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Grant for building at Royal Agricultural Winter Fair, Toronto.

Mr. GARDINER: Of what value is it to spread these payments over twenty years? I understand that they propose to put up the building now. Is this merely an instalment?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The bill makes provision for annual instalments of $35,000 for twenty years. That carries with it the interest charges as well.

Mr. GARDINER: Will bonds be issued for the payment of this building, and be redeemed in part annually?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think so. I understand that the city of Toronto will issue bonds.

PRIVILEGE—MR. MACKENZIE KING

CORRESPONDENCE WITH LORD BYNG

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. The matter has reference to an editorial which appears in the Ottawa Journal of Wednesday, February 16, 1927, entitled: The Byng-King Correspondence; Some Secret History. I would have referred to this matter yesterday, when it first came to my attention, had it not been that my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), was about to deliver the budget address, and I thought the House would not wish to be detained at that time. I may say that were it not that the article is being copied in other papers throughout this country, and has also been telegraphed abroad, I would be prepared to treat it with the silent contempt which I accord most of the editorials which appear in the Ottawa Journal in reference to myself. However, as the article, apart from constituting a reflection on the personal honour of the former Governor General of this country, is in the nature of things and as a matter of fact, a fabrication from beginning to end, I feel that as it relates to an important constitutional question, I must make a very clear and emphatic statement concerning it.

I say in the first place that the article in the nature of things is a fabrication, because it implies that the former Governor General was prepared to accord to the Journal the right of listening in on conversations which took place between the Governor General of Canada and the Prime Minister of this country, conversations which in the nature of things were in the strictest confidence. In the second place, it implies that the Governor General was prepared to make to the Journal, or to other persons, statements which he was not prepared to make a matter of official record, and in fact did not make a matter of record in correspondence which admittedly was designed for purposes of official record and to which alone this parliament and the people of this country at the present or at any subsequent time can appeal as the authoritative record. As a matter of fact the article is untrue, as I am in a position authoritatively to state. I shall not read the entire article, but I will refer to one or two pertinent paragraphs. Near the close of the first paragraph the article has the following:

Referring to the correspondence which was laid on the table of the House—

> —makes it possible, and indeed desirable, to reveal what the letters do not disclose, but what was the very heart and centre of the whole difficulty. The Journal, therefore, herewith presents the exact circumstances which led up to—and which justified—the action of Lord Byng.

The action referred to being the refusal of dissolution to myself as Prime Minister last year. I may just note in passing that the use of the words "and which justified" would seem to indicate that even in the mind of the editor of this paper, so far as the official record is concerned, the Governor General's action on constitutional grounds was not justified.

The paragraph that I wish particularly to bring to the attention of the House and to refer to is the following:

> To understand and appreciate the position taken by Lord Byng, in refusing Mr. King dissolution, it is necessary to go back to October, 1925. Following the election of that time, which saw Mr. King return to parliament with 16 fewer supporters than Mr. Meighen, Mr. King went down to Rideau Hall and intimated to Lord Byng that he intended to resign. Three or four days later, however, (after he had consulted with his ministers, who told him that he must not resign), Mr. King visited Lord Byng again and told him that he had changed his mind, that he thought it was his duty to meet parliament and to take a chance of surviving a non-confidence motion. Lord Byng, naturally surprised, in view of what Mr. King had said to him at their previous meeting, told Mr. King that he would agree to having him meet parliament, but he added that he thought it should be understood—> —that in the event of his (Mr. King's) government being defeated, either upon the meeting of parliament, or upon a later date in the session, or in the event of Mr. King finding himself unable to govern, he (Lord Byng) would consider it his duty to call upon Mr. Meighen to find out whether or not he could form a ministry.

And then the following appears in italics—

The italics end there and the article goes on:

> Mr. King said that was perfectly satisfactory. Lord Byng thereupon suggested that Mr. King make this understanding known to his cabinet, and Mr. King said that he would do so. The matter rested there until toward the end of June, 1926.
> Following adverse votes against his government in the House of Commons toward the end of June, Mr. King went to Lord Byng—and said that in the circumstances, he would have to advise him to dissolve parliament, Lord Byng at once reminded him of their understanding...

Fortunately as respects adverse votes against the government, there are the journals of this parliament to appeal to and I repeat what has been repeated time and again, that there was no adverse vote against the government of which I was Prime Minister in the last parliament nor is there record of any to be found in the journals of the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The records of this House speak for themselves on this point.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The next point to which I wish to refer is the repeated reference in the editorial to an alleged understanding between Lord Byng and myself arrived at after the election of 1925. I wish to say emphatically, on my responsibility as Prime Minister of this country, that there was no understanding between Lord Byng and myself other than what appeared in the public prints of this country in a statement which I issued to the public, after having submitted it to Lord Byng in the first instance for his approval. There was no understanding of any kind, and I cannot make that statement too emphatic nor too clear. The only advice which I tendered to Lord Byng was to let parliament decide with respect to the situation that arose after the election of 1925. That advice was accepted by Lord Byng, and parliament met and did decide the question as to who was to be the leader in this House in the last parliament.

I hold in my hand a statement which I gave to the press on the night of November 4th. This particular statement—

Mr. CAHAN: What year?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Nineteen twenty-five. The election took place on October 29. This statement was handed to the press on the night of November 4, and will be found, I think, in the press of the day following. Before giving this statement to the press I took it personally to government house and presented it to the then Governor General who approved it in its entirety. It was then given to the press; it appeared in the press of our country, and from that moment to this, no exception whatever from any source has been taken to it. The statement is as follows:

The latest official returns having made it apparent that as a result of the general election held on October 29, no one of the participating political parties would of itself have a clear majority in the House when parliament assembles, it became my duty as Prime Minister to acquaint His Excellency the Governor General with the situation and to advise His Excellency as to the course which should be pursued. After several interviews with His Excellency at which the position brought about by the recent general election was fully discussed and all alternatives presented, I have taken the responsibility of advising His Excellency to summon parliament for the earliest practicable date in order to ascertain the attitude of the parliamentary representatives towards the very important question raised by the numerical position of the respective political parties. His Excellency has been pleased to accept this advice.

After careful consideration of the constitutional precedents and their bearing upon the situation which has arisen as a result of the general election, the cabinet decided unanimously this afternoon that it was their constitutional duty to meet parliament at the earliest possible moment, regard being had for the legal requirements with respect to the time necessary for the return of the writs and the official gazetting of the members who have been elected.

In the interval, until parliament assembles it is the intention of the government to refrain from making appointments beyond such as are essential for the proper carrying on of the public business.

In the present situation there are three possible courses of procedure, each of which has been carefully considered by the cabinet:

1. That His Excellency be asked to grant an immediate dissolution of parliament.

2. That His Excellency be asked to call upon the leader of the largest political group to form a government.

3. That His Excellency be asked to summon parliament at the earliest practicable date for the purpose aforementioned.

With respect to an immedate dissolution it was felt that it was not in the interests of the country to occasion the turmoil and expense of another general election until at least parliament had been summoned, and the people's representatives in parliament had been afforded an opportunity of giving expression to their views.

With respect to the leader of the political party having the largest definite following in the House of Commons being called upon to form an administration, the cabinet holds the view that responsible self-government in Canada rests upon the principle that the majority are entitled to govern, the majority so understood meaning not the political party or group having the largest number of members, but the majority as determined by the duly elected representatives of the people in parliament. Far from indicating that Mr. Meighen is in a position to command a majority in the newly elected House of Commons, the results of the election appear clearly to indicate that he is not in such a position. I am not aware of any precedent in Great Britain or in Canada for recommending, before parliament meets, that the leader of a party not commanding a clear majority in the House of Commons should be called upon to form a government.

To summon parliament and to allow the House of Commons to disclose its attitude upon division, is the procedure warranted by constitutional precedent and by the present circumstances. To take any other course would be to fail to recognize the supreme right of the people to govern themselves in the manner which the constitution has provided, namely by expressing their will through their duly elected representatives in parliament and in accordance with recognized parliamentary practice.

I wish to repeat that before that statement was given to the press, the very sheets from which I have read the statement and which I now hold in my hand and to which I have attached a memorandum of identification, were read by His Excellency the then Governor General, and His Excellency approved the statement exactly in the form in which I have now read it. May I say that the implication of the article in question is that there was some sort of a bargain between the Governor General of this country and myself as Prime Minister whereby I was to hold or be permitted to hold office. Any implication of that kind is a reflection upon the Governor General as the representative of His Majesty the King and a reflection upon myself as Prime Minister. Moreover, it entirely ignores, what at least anyone sitting on this side of the House would maintain as the only constitutional position, and indeed the position which I have stated over and over again to be the constitutional position, namely, that the power to govern in this country comes not from the Governor General but from the people of the country through their representatives in this parliament. That was the one and only position which I as Prime Minister took in conversations with Lord Byng as the Governor General, and it was the basis of the advice which I then gave His Excellency regarding the summoning of parliament and allowing the people's representatives to decide. There was no understanding apart from the advice which I gave in that regard.

May I add that the official record as laid on the table of this House discloses, without the possibility of controversy, that in His Excellency's mind there was no understanding of any kind that could have been directly or indirectly material to, or relevant to, or a salient feature of, the conversations held between us subsequently. If there was any such understanding, it would have been the duty of His Excellency to have made mention of it in correspondence which passed between us and which was for the purpose of having of record exactly what had transpired in conversation. To assume that a Governor General on a great constitutional issue would ignore in an official communication to his Prime Minister the reason which actuated him in taking a particular course is, to imply, to say the least, that the holder of that great office was not competent to fill it. The House I am sure will agree that every pertinent fact with respect to a great constitutional issue, where an official record is being made of the situation, ought to be made a part of the official record.

I wish to read to the House what His Excellency the Governor General wrote me, and I would ask the House to note with care the precise words used in this communication. This letter has already been laid on the table of the House:

Government House, Ottawa,
My dear Mr. KING, June 29, 1926.

I must acknowledge on paper, with many thanks, the receipt of your letter handed to me at our meeting yesterday.

In trying to condense all that has passed between us during the last week, it seems to my mind that there is really only one point at issue.

May I pause to direct the attention of the House to the two phrases used in that sentence:

In trying to condense all that has passed between us.

Note the "all," that is clear and comprehensive. It does not ignore any salient feature, and so as to make it emphatic may I pause to say that Lord Byng, while Governor General, or since has at no time in conversation with me ever alluded to any understanding between himself and myself apart from anything that is of official record here, and this for the good and sufficient reason that there was no understanding apart from what is recorded. Lord Byng continues:

It seems to my mind that there is really only one point at issue.

Only one point, note again the "one." What is the point?

You advise me "that as, in your opinion, Mr. Meighen is unable to govern the country, there should be another election with the present machinery, to enable the people to decide." My contention is—

Not that there was some understanding on which I was holding office, but——that Mr. Meighen has not been given a chance of trying to govern, or saying that he cannot do so, and that all reasonable expedients should be tried before resorting to another election.

Permit me to say once more that, before deciding on my constitutional course on this matter, I gave this subject the most fairminded and painstaking consideration which it was in my power to apply.

I can only add how sincerely I regret the severance of our official companionship and how gratefully I acknowledge the help of your counsel and co-operation.

With warmest wishes,

Yours sincerely,

BYNG OF VIMY.

To that communication I replied as follows:

Ottawa, July 3, 1926.

His Excellency, General
The Right Honourable the Lord Byng of Vimy, G.C.B., G.C.M.G., etc., Governor General of the Dominion of Canada, Ottawa.

My dear Lord Byng:

I duly received Your Excellency's letter of June 29th, for which I desire to thank Your Excellency.

Paragraph three of Your Excellency's letter reads as follows:

"You advise me 'that as, in your opinion, Mr. Meighen is unable to govern the country, there should be another election with the present machinery to enable the people to decide'."

Also:

"My contention is that Mr. Meighen has not been given a chance of trying to govern, or saying that he cannot do so, and that all reasonable expedients should be tried before resorting to another election."

To the accuracy of the statement of Your Excellency's contention as set forth in this paragraph, I have no exception to take. Inasmuch, however, as what purports to have been my advice to Your Excellency appears in Your Excellency's letter within quotation marks, and might therefore be assumed to be words of mine as expressed in conversation with Your Excellency in tendering advice, may I respectfully say that the words "with the present machinery"—apart from the entire sentence appearing as a quotation,—are quite misleading, as no such words were used or referred to by me in any advice tendered. Fortunately, the text of the quotation clearly indicates that, taken as a whole, the words as quoted could not have been words coming from me.

I advised Your Excellency that, in my opinion, the existing situation in the House of Commons demanded a dissolution of parliament, and there should be another election to enable the people to decide upon a new House of Commons.

In reply to Your Excellency's contention that Mr. Meighen had not been given a chance of trying to govern, or saying that he could not do so, I said that I could not advise Your Excellency to send for Mr. Meighen or for any other member of the present House of Commons to form an administration, as I did not believe any other administration could be formed which would command the confidence of the House. As to Mr. Meighen not having been given a chance of trying to govern, I pointed out that at the commencement of the session it had been left to the people's representatives in parliament to decide as to who was to advise Your Excellency, and that Mr. Meighen's chances to obtain the support of the Commons had been quite as good as my own; that the House of Commons having declined to express any confidence in Mr. Meighen throughout the entire session, I could not see wherein there was any probability of the House giving him the support which would enable him to carry on the government, and that therefore I could not assume the responsibility of advising Your Excellency to send for him. As there was still less probability of any other hon. member of the House being able to command its confidence, dissolution, to be followed by a general election, in which the people would be given an opportunity to decide, appeared to me the only course which I could advise, and I advised accordingly.

As no formal record of the conversations between us was kept—

I will ask the House to pay attention to this paragraph, because I was drawing the attention of His Excellency to the advisability of having a record of exactly what was said between us, knowing that this question at some future time would be raised:

As no formal record of the conversations between us was kept, I have felt, in view of the representations of paragraph three of Your Excellency's letter, which will become a matter of official record, I should also record on paper my own statement of the advice tendered Your Excellency both as regards dissolution and Your Excellency's contention in reference thereto.

With respect to the concluding paragraph of Your Excellency's letter, may I say that I am sure that the regret felt by Your Excellency at the severance of our official companionship was not any greater than my own, and that I acknowledge with not less gratitude the help of Your Excellency's counsel and co-operation throughout the period during which I had the privilege of enjoying Your Excellency's confidence.

I am, You Excellency,
Yours very sincerely,
W. L. MACKENZIE KING.

Now what was the reply made by His Excellency to that communication, which, as I state, is the official record of what took place between us both as regards dissolution and His Excellency's contention in reference thereto. It was as follows:

Ottawa, July 5th, 1926.

Dear Mr. KING,

Many thanks for your letter of July 3rd. The letter in question was written entirely from the wish on my part to express my sincere gratitude for the help and co-operation you have given me during your tenure of the Premiership. The quotations in it are by no means intended to recall words used at our meetings, and in that connection I would ask you to read the preceding paragraph.

I was stating my impression as to the one point at issue, and endeavouring to put it in a condensed form.

I repeat that statement:

I was stating my impression as to the one point at issue, and endeavouring to put it in a condensed form.

Of course, I readily add your letter to the documentary record of the situation.

Yours sincerely,
BYNG OF VIMY.

The Rt. Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King,
C.M.G., etc., etc., Ottawa.

There is the official record as given to this parliament of all that actually transpired that was material between Lord Byng and myself, and I submit, Mr. Speaker, that no public journal in this or any other country has a right to circulate false statements, false representations with respect to communications between the Prime Minister of a country and the representative of His Majesty, and this more especially when it is known that the only source from which the truth can come is either the representative of the crown itself or the Prime Minister of the country with whom the conversations were had.

Again, as Prime Minister of Canada, I wish to repeat that the record as laid on the table of the House here sums up, in its entirety, all of what transpired between Lord Byng and myself in reference to dissolution as respects all salient and essential features.

MARITIME CLAIMS—THE TARIFF

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. THOMAS CANTLEY (Pictou): I should like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), who in his budget statement yesterday, which is to be commended for its brevity and clarity, made the remark that he and his colleagues had considered it to be the part of wisdom to make no changes in the tariff at the present session. May I ask him what bearing this has on the implementing of the Duncan report?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): I think my hon. friend has read Hansard correctly, and he will have to place his own interpretations upon the budget.

Mr. J. A. CLARK (Vancouver-Burrard): I note that at a recent convention of the British Empire Service League, presided over by Sir Percy Lake, a recommendation was made to the government that the returned soldiers' insurance, should be reopened for a period of one year. I would ask whether that recommendation has been considered and adopted by the government.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The question which my hon. friend has just raised is one on which the Minister of Health (Mr. King) would be best informed, and I would ask that the question might stand until Monday. I shall direct the minister's attention to it.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved the third reading of Bill No. 56, to amend the Indian Act.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

ST. REGIS INDIAN RESERVE

CONTROL OF ST. LAWRENCE RIVER ISLANDS BY SUPERINTENDENT GENERAL

The House resumed from February 15th consideration in committee of Bill No. 55, to provide for special control by the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs of certain islands in the St. Lawrence river being part of the St. Regis Indian reservation.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: When we discussed this bill, before, I understood that the minister was going to inquire and bring down a memorandum showing the reasons advanced by the officials of the department why there should be special clauses in this act different from those in the general Indian Act.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Edmonton, Superintendent General of Indian Affairs): In our discussion of section 2 of the act the other day, the hon. member for Argenteuil asked why the necessity for its inclusion in this bill, and had we not authority in the Indian Act itself? We have authority in sections 127 and 128 of the Indian Act to prevent the cutting of timber, and penalties are provided for the prosecution of parties who trespass and take off the timber, but the provision in the act applies only to lands occupied by the Indians. That is distinctly stated. I have gone thoroughly into that matter, and that is the reason we are asking for authority here. Where the land is not in occupation by the Indians or owned in common by them we have no authority in the act to prevent the Indians from cutting timber. We want this provision because we are dealing with land which is the common property of the band not allocated to any member of the band and not resided on by the Indians. The provision is practically identical with the provision contained in the Indian Act for the purpose of the prevention of depredations or cutting of timber on land held by allotment.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Since the matter was in the committee on a previous occasion, my hon. friend from Stormont (Mr. Smith) came to see me and endeavoured to explain what was really behind this special bill. Perhaps if my hon. friend from Cornwall would enlighten the committee it might make the matter clearer, because I think he understands the question better than any other hon. member in the committee.

Mr. SMITH (Stormont): These islands mentioned in Bill No. 55 lie opposite and east of Cornwall. Unfortunately, the other day when the bill was before the committee I was called out of the House. I am very glad it has come up again because it gives me an opportunity to say a few words in regard to it. I have read over the Hansard report covering the questions asked when the bill was before the committee on a previous occasion, and I notice that some hon. member asks if these islands were in any way required for the St. Lawrence development. I may say that all works in connection with the St. Lawrence development are several miles west of these properties. The nearest island is the Easterbrook farm on Cornwall island. That island is occupied by the Indians of the St. Regis reservation, with the exception of one farm, which was leased about 105 or 106 years ago to the Easterbrook family and has been occupied by them ever since. Hamilton's island and Macmaster's island were in the same position, except that they were leased to families of the present tenants and were never occupied by the Indians. Colquhoun's island which is referred to by another name in the bill is also in the same position. A few years ago the department, feeling that the present tenants were not paying anything like an adequate rental for the property, took action in the Exchequer court to have the leases terminated at the expiration of the first ninety-nine year period. The cases have been in court for some time, and in connection with Macmaster island judgment was given declaring that the leases were not renewable for the next ninety-nine year period. The Colquhoun estate, which held the lease for Colquhoun's island, accepting this as good law, abandoned the island, and threw themselves upon the mercy of the department so far as future leases were concerned. The Easterbrook and Hamilton island cases are still pending and have not yet been brought to trial, but undoubtedly the same judgment will be given in these cases. Macmaster island was the summer home of the late Sir Donald Macmaster and is not suitable for any other pur-

4 p.m. pose. If the Indians were in possession of that island it would be absolutely of no use to them and would not be productive or return any revenue. Hamilton island is a fairly large-sized island. On one end of it there is the Hamilton farm, and on the other end of it there are about thirty-five summer cottages, with some little timber back of the cottages. This island, outside of the one farm on it, would not be suitable to produce any revenue whatever for the Indians, but as a summer resort it is largely used by the people of Cornwall and surrounding districts. Colquhoun's island would not produce anything at all of any value to the Indians of that section, or any other section, but it likewise has some thirty-five to forty summer cottages. The Easterbrook farm is a farm of about 200 acres on the Cornwall island, and was held by the Easterbrook family and while a good farm is more valuable from a sentimental standpoint. It is not a very convenient location, because they have to cross in small boats to get to market in Cornwall. The leases were held to be non-renewable. Under the existing regulation the department would have a perfect right to allow the Indians to go on the lands in question but the band would not have a right to lease the property to any particular Indian. The land would be non-productive. These lands would not be of any real value to the Indians, because the Indians, as I know them are anything but thrifty, and the result would be that those summer cottages would be destroyed and no rental would be received. The Indians would be content to lead a life of luxury in the cottages so long as they stayed there. The only request I have to make to the department is that if this bill goes through, and if the islands are leased under short term leases, the Indians shall get the benefit of the higher rentals that might be obtained on any renewal of leases. I am content, in order to safeguard the Indians, that a clause should be put in providing that the leases should be for five years, or any short period the department may fix. I heard it mentioned by some hon. member that perhaps there was some motive behind this bill. There has been a rumour that the island is wanted by some American organization for the purpose of constructing an hotel, or something of that description. I would be the first to object to that, because I am very much interested in the people who have possession of the place now, and who, by the way, are using the place more or less as squatters, and are not paying any rent in the meantime, because the department refuses to accept rent. The department claims that they have no right to be there and they cannot make any lease with them, although there is back rent coming to them since the time the leases were declared to be terminated.

The Indians have been provided with every safeguard in this matter, they have everything to gain by the bill going through and the department obtaining for them a fair rental, and I hope the committee will consent to this measure being passed.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: What the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Smith) has said is very interesting, and I think we begin to understand pretty well what the situation is. It strikes me the minister should give the present occupant the first chance of obtaining a renewal of his lease from the government. The other day he said he would do that but nothing has been stated yet which explains to me the reason why the government wants this bill at all. The hon. member from Stormont stated definitely that there was no scheme behind this legislation, that it is plain and aboveboard, and that what the department proposes to do is for the benefit of the Indians. Under the present Indian Act the Minister of the Interior has the power to lease these islands with the consent of the band. Now if it is definitely proved that it is for the benefit of the Indians it cannot be supposed that the Indians are going to refuse their consent. As regards section 2, I still do not understand why the government is unable to proceed under the Indian Act and do all this with the consent of the band.

Mr. SMITH (Stormont): The trouble is that under the present law Indian lands can be dealt with only by lease, when the Indians themselves have allocated the land, and then only with the consent of all the members of the band. The Indians, like the rest of us, have their squabbles, and if you consulted them as to whom the land should be allocated to in order that a lease might be entered into for the band, all sorts of trouble might arise. We are right on the American border in our particular section and irresponsible agitators have been disturbing the Indians on the question of national status. So that if you called the St. Regis band together and asked them to suggest the person to whom Colquhoun island should be allocated there would be such a dispute as could hardly be settled. Each one would want to have his claim recognized.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Does the hon. member mean that this island would have to be allocated to a particular Indian before the government could lease it?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, the hon. member is referring to the lease. Each lease is independent and under the proposal of my hon. friend it would have to be passed upon by the band. There are a great many leases involved here. A number of summer cottages are already in existence and the courts have decided that the leases no longer hold good. If the Indians go there to-day and destroy timber the property is their own and we have no provision in the act whereby we can prevent them. The leasing is only a matter of convenience. The moneys are definitely to go to the benefit of the band, no matter what the rentals may be. Perhaps it might be interesting to give the rentals on the ninety-nine year leases. They are:

Macmaster, agriculture and cottages.. ..	175	$10	$200
Snyder..	25	4	Barren of trees, no cottages
Lewis..	10	14	200, 10 cottages on island
Hamilton..	100	20	600
Easterbrook..	200	10	200

We have no authority to lease the land without obtaining the consent of the band, which is now scattered, some of its members being in the United States; and the property might all be destroyed without our being able to prevent it. While the leases were in existence the lessee had his rights, but once the leases are abrogated the land is the common property of the band. We are asking for the privilege of protecting the property of the Indians themselves.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Does the minister say that the band is so scattered that consent could not be obtained as in the case of other bands of Indians?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Before action can be taken with respect to Indian lands you must have a majority vote of the band, and there are always a number of agitators who are ready to start trouble. I do not want to be arbitrary; I am merely pointing out the situation that exists. On such land as is the common property of the band, under the act we have little or no authority to protect these islands unless the band were prepared to grant individual leases. And that would be exceedingly difficult of achievement.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Would it be more difficult than in the case of other Indian lands?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes. In the case of a grazing or a timber lease, on property situated on the reserve itself, there is no reason on earth why the band could not be consulted fully, and if they disagreed further action would be impossible. But in this case, where the property is separate from the reserve and you have such conditions as prevail there, we are bound to have the special legislation for which we are now asking, because we do not want to amend the provisions of the act generally. We simply want to define our extended authority and to say where it begins and ends with respect to these particular lands.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: There is no particular hurry about passing this bill and an hon. member on this side would like to say a few words in regard to it. The minister is assuming a very unusual power in this legislation. He says that the proceeds go to the band, and points out that this provision is contained in the general act. But he has not much faith in the general act.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We have no authority to divert any of the funds. I am merely asking for the authority to allocate funds under $2,000. Beyond that I cannot do at all.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the bill?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: No; the hon. member for Vancouver Centre would like to say a few words on the subject.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I suggest that we report the bill and if on the third reading the hon. member desires to recommit it there will be no objection.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

The House resumed, from February 15, consideration in committee of the following proposed resolution—Hon. Mr. Heenan—Mr. Johnston in the chair:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure respecting old age pensions, and to provide,—

1. That the Governor in Council may make an agreement with the Lieutenant-Governor in Council of any province for the payment to such province quarterly of an amount equal to one-half of the net sum paid out during the preceding quarter by such province for pensions pursuant to a provincial statute authorizing and providing for the payment of such pensions to the persons and under the conditions hereinafter specified and regulations made under the proposed legislation.

2. That every agreement so made shall continue in force so long as the provincial statute remains in operation or until after the expiration of ten years from the date upon which notice of an intention to determine the agreement is given by the Governor General to the Lieutenant-Governor of the province with which the same was made.

3. That before any agreement so made comes into operation, the Governor in Council shall approve the scheme for the administration of pensions proposed to be adopted by the province, and no change in such scheme shall be made by the province without the consent of the Governor in Council.

4. That all sums payable to any province in pursuance of any such agreement shall be payable from time to time on the certificate of the Minister of Finance out of any moneys belonging to the consolidated revenue fund of Canada not otherwise appropriated.

5. That provision shall be made for the payment of a pension to every person who, at the date of the proposed commencement of the pension:—

(a) is a British subject, or, being a widow, was such before her marriage;

(b) has attained the age of seventy years;

(c) has resided in Canada for the twenty years immediately preceding the date aforesaid;

(d) has resided in the province in which the application for pension is made for the five years immediately preceding the said date;

(e) is not an Indian as defined by the Indian Act;

(f) has not made any voluntary assignment or transfer of property for the purpose of qualifying for a pension.

6. That the receipt of a pension shall not by itself constitute a disqualification from voting at any provincial or municipal election.

7. That the maximum pension payable shall be two hundred and forty dollars yearly, which shall be subject to reduction by the amount of the income of the pensioner in excess of one hundred and twenty-five dollars a year.

8. That provisions be made as to the credit to the pension authority of the annual value of a pensioner's residence, and the recovery of pension payments out of deceased pensioner's estate, and for the distribution of pension burden among provinces by proportionate reimbursement or proportionate reduction where the pensioner resided in more than one province or transfers his permanent residence to another province, and for ceasing of payments where he transfers his residence to some place out of Canada, and the revival of his rights upon again becoming a resident of Canada.

9. That no pension shall be subject to alienation or transfer by the pensioner, or to seizure in satisfaction of any claim against him.

10. That on or before the thirtieth day of April in each year, the Minister of Finance shall make a full report to parliament of the operation of the agreements made pursuant to the proposed act, and of the moneys of Canada paid to the provinces under each of the several agreements entered into pursuant thereto.

11. That the Governor in Council shall have power from time to time, on the recommendation of the Minister of Labour, and with the approval of the Treasury board, to make regulations, not inconsistent with the provisions of the proposed act, with regard to the pensions herein provided for, and such regulations shall be published in the Canada Gazette, and be laid before parliament.

Mr. BARBER: This is the proper time to offer criticisms or suggestions in regard to the subject of old age pensions. We should be in a better position to discuss this matter this year, because in the meantime we have passed through a general election in which this question was considered by hon. gentlemen opposite to be one of the main issues. We on this side of the House were charged with opposing the principle of old age pensions and with actually killing the bill. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who were here last year will agree that these charges are not well founded. We offered criticism, as we have a perfect right to do, but the bill passed the House without a division. In my own campaign I was very unfairly charged with opposing this principle, and in that connection I wish to refer to two general statements which I made when the matter was being considered last year. At page 2537 of Hansard I said:

> There is probably one point on which we all agree, and that is that something is necessary in the way of old age pension legislation.

Then further on, at page 2538, I made another general statement:

> Now, at the present time we know that from all over the Dominion there is a call from many aged people for immediate relief, and I am of opinion that the source of that relief should be the federal government...

Throughout the campaign I adopted the same position which I am adopting to-day and which I took last year.

I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) on his appointment to the important post of Minister of Labour, but considering his long experience with social legislation I am somewhat surprised that he did not bring down a bill a little more acceptable to the country; I had hoped that he would have fathered a federal scheme. In fairness to all parts of Canada I am convinced that old age pensions should be administered by the federal government, but the minister has decided otherwise, and according to the resolution before the House the bill will be the same as that passed last year, in spite of the announced opposition of a majority of the provinces. I think I am safe in saying that, from the replies read the other day by the minister. He followed the reading of those letters by a statement, which I did not quite understand; he said:

> If in view of these replies, we now introduce a bill that removes the obstacles mentioned, would you not consider that the provinces are in favour of an old age pension scheme?

Further on he said:

> As an example, the province of British Columbia was opposed to this scheme because the obstacles in the way were insurmountable, but to-day we have the spectacle of a bill introduced in the legislature providing for this on a co-operative plan.

The minister said British Columbia was opposed to this bill because there were insurmountable obstacles in its path, but I think hon. gentlemen will agree that these obstacles could not have been removed by the legislation, because he tells us that the bill is similar to that passed last year. Then why did the Premier of British Columbia adopt the scheme? He did so simply because he considered it a good weapon to use in the interests of the Liberal party in the last election. He toured the province during that campaign in the interests of the Liberal candidates, and promised the electors that he would bring down legislation accepting a federal scheme; he also advised them that it was in their interests to send to Ottawa Liberal members. Mr. Oliver kept his word so far as the bill was concerned, but apparently the electors did not accept his advice. The Minister of Labour, in referring to the fact that this was one of the main issues of the campaign said:

> If we are to interpret the will of the electorate on that question in the way we usually interpret electoral decisions, there can be no question that the principle adopted in this Bill was endorsed by the people of Canada.

I wonder how he interprets the results in British Columbia? I will undertake to do that for him, in a very few words. I passed through that campaign, and I am convinced that the people of that province are favourable to old age pensions, but they are not favourable to the bill introduced last session.

In view of the fact that we cannot have a federal measure, and since British Columbia is willing to accept something in the way of a co-operative scheme, as one of the representatives of that province I am prepared to accept such legislation if it is made fair and reasonable, but I am going to offer a few suggestions which I think would make the proposed bill a little more acceptable.

Dealing first with clause 5 of the resolution, it is proposed to set the age limit at 70 years. If this age limit were in force in Australia, where the limit is now 65, we are informed that 90 per cent of those now in receipt of an old age pension would not receive anything. In New Zealand the disparity is even greater. There the limit is 65 for males and 60 for females, which limit may be reduced to 60 and 55 respectively where two or more children under fourteen are dependent on the recipient of the pension. Just in connection with this point I would like to quote an extract from a letter appearing in a Vancouver paper which reached me to-day. The letter deals with this matter and is signed by an ex-soldier:

> In regard to the proposed pension bill now being advocated, surely some clause should be inserted or brought up giving special privileges to the returned soldier who has prematurely aged through war service. The present act stipulates at the age of 70, but I would venture to say that many of us, especially those like myself who perhaps were not wounded but suffered from camp life and exposure, will not last out to this age and, moreover, if living to the age of 60, will be unable to carry on work in civil life. These are the ones who surely deserve special consideration in a scheme of old age pensions.

I would suggest to the minister that he consider the scheme adopted in New Zealand whereby the age limit may be reached in certain cases.

Clause 7 of the resolution provides for a maximum pension of $20 per month, as compared with $26.50 in Australia. In this connection I would like to draw attention to another letter appearing recently in the Vancouver press:

> ...you credit Premier Oliver with being a generous man. Is the following a sample of his generosity? He was reported as saying he is in favour of the old age pension bill of $20 per month for men of 70 years, as passed by members of the Commons and, moreover, was cited as saying "Half a loaf is better than none." And that in face of the fact that prisoners in British Columbia jails are allowed $1 per day for their upkeep by the British Columbia government and no room rent to pay.
> What on earth could our poor old indigent men do with $20 per month? The lowest price for a small, clean bedroom in Vancouver is $2.50 per week. That figures out at $11.17 per month and would leave them $8.83 to buy food for thirty-one days, and would mean slow starvation. Why such discrimination against our aged poor? The eligible age should be 65, the same as in England, Australia and other countries, and the pension not less than criminals in British Columbia jails are receiving for their upkeep, $1 per day.

I would urge that the minister give a little consideration to the advisability of increasing this pension. I also point out that the resolution only permits a pensioner to have an income of $125 per annum. Now New Zealand is much more generous in the matter of private income. It permits the pensioner to have an income up to $390 per annum or $650 if the recipient is married, and the net value of accumulated property may be as high as $2,000.

But the clause to which I take the greatest exception is the one which provides that on the death of the pensioner his home or his estate shall be sold, and the total amount of the pension plus five per cent compounded annually, shall be taken out and placed to the credit of the pension authority, in this case the government. Five per cent compounded annually! The minister will find that is a greater rate than many of the loan companies charge.

In the proposed legislation we are asked to set aside certain sums to be paid out of this pension to a certain class of people. Before the session closes we shall be called upon to vote from the revenue of this country over $38,000,000 under the heading of pensions. It is true that of this amount something over $37,000,000 may be termed war pensions, and that over $1,000,000 is to provide pensions to other classes authorized by statute. I take no exception to the granting of these pensions. No doubt they are given in recognition of service rendered or of sacrifices made. But the same claim holds good in the case of the very class that we are concerned with to-day —the old people of our land who suffered hardships and made many sacrifices in carrying on the pioneer work of this country. They have passed through the earning period of their lives, and through misfortune are in need of assistance. That assistance should come from the state, and I believe the pension is the proper form it should take. But does the Minister of Labour think that this paltry $20 a month would take care of an aged person who is without a home, who has no income, who is in fact destitute? Is this pension intended to supply all the necessaries of life, such as rent, fuel, food and a few comforts? I think not. The provinces will be called upon to look after the majority of these cases in their institutions as they have in the past. I do agree however that this small amount will greatly assist, particularly in cases where the recipient has a home and a small income.

Now I come back to paragraph 8 of the resolution dealing with the recovery of pension payments out of a deceased pensioner's estate. Is there such a condition enforced in the case of the pensioner who will benefit from the vote of $38,000,000 to which I have already referred, which will stand as a charge against the estates of these pensioners? No, there is not, I do not think anyone would wish that there should be such a provision, although no doubt in a large number of cases the recipients have comfortable homes and in many cases fairly large incomes. Why then should the pension in this case stand as a first mortgage against the class that we are considering to-day? This clause really changes the pension into a loan, and I would strongly urge the minister to consider cutting the paragraph out. Or if he insists on leaving it in, let him apply the words which he himself used the other day and change the title of this bill to "Old Age Loan Bill". Because the clause in question makes the pension a loan secured by a first mortgage bearing a rate of five per cent compounded annually.

Mr. HEENAN: Supposing the aged father or mother should have a son who is fairly well off but refuses to take care of the parent, and the pension authority was called upon to award a pension of $240. If the aged people had their own home the pension authority would never ask them to leave their home, but when they died does my hon. friend think that their property or estate should go to that son?

Mr. BARBER: No.

Mr. HEENAN: The clause is intended to meet a case of that character.

Mr. BARBER: I understand that in this province, as well as in the province of Nova Scotia, the provincial statutes make the sons or daughters responsible for the care of the aged parents.

Mr. LADNER: In British Columbia also.

Mr. BARBER: I should like to answer that question in this way: Suppose that an old man, one of our early pioneers, who is past the earning period of his life has been able to save sufficient to secure a little home and garden for himself, but feels that he should have some assistance, and in fact is in need of it. Under this legislation you say to that man, "We will give you a pension but it will be only in the form of a mortgage on your home". That old man would consider such a restriction very unfair. As a citizen he should have the privilege of doing what he likes with his home; it is not likely that he would leave it to the son who has refused to come to his assistance although he might bequeath it to an institution or to some person who was in need. Such a provision is very inadvisable. As I said before it changes this measure from a pension bill to a loan bill.

Mr. HEENAN: I point out to my hon. friend that subsection 3 of section 9 will meet such a case as he has described.

Mr. BARBER: I do not think it covers it exactly.

Mr. HEENAN: It is intended to cover it.

Mr. BARBER: I think the minister will find that it does not meet such a case. I assure my hon. friend that I am offering these remarks in a kindly spirit.

Mr. HEENAN: I am sure of that.

Mr. BARBER: I am prepared to give the minister all the support possible, but I hope he will consider the suggestions I have made so that when we are considering the bill in committee of the whole he will be prepared to make amendments in the direction indicated.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We labour representatives have all along been in favour of a federal measure. That was shown very clearly two years ago when my colleague Mr. Irvine, proposed an amendment to that effect. However, as the government undertook last year to introduce a measure along the lines recommended by the parliamentary committee of three years ago, we felt that the best thing we could do was to support the measure then introduced and endeavour to make as great a success of it as possible. At that time it was not apparent that any of the provinces were in favour of this or any other old age pension scheme. It was not clear that the members of the House were in favour of any old age pension scheme. In the vote to which I referred just now the older parties had united in opposing a federal scheme. Therefore we felt that the only thing to do was to take a half loaf, and we hoped that this scheme would produce at least some good and that, once it was placed on the statute books, it might ultimately be amended so as to bring it more in harmony with our ideals.

I can see some advantages in having the provinces administer the act. In that way there will be in the administration a certain check which might not be present if the machinery were handled directly from Ottawa. Nearly all the provinces have already administrative machinery which might be utilized for this purpose, and therefore it would not be necessary to set up duplicate machinery. On the other hand, I think that in principle men or women ought to be eligible for this pension, not merely because they happen to be living in a particular province which has adopted the scheme, but because they are citizens of Canada.

I would, however, suggest that if the federal government has finally decided upon a co-operative scheme, it should be willing to grant say 75 per cent of the amount. That is frankly a compromise, but it is a compromise that would add greatly to the efficacy of the bill. I am afraid that if the bill is put through in this form, it may not be operative in all the provinces. Since we had the discussion in this House last year, I had an opportunity of meeting citizens of nearly all the provinces from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and I found that in the east, especially down in the maritime provinces, it was very doubtful if the provinces would adopt the scheme if it were put on a fifty-fifty basis. We are anxious to have a scheme that will be operative, that will be effective, and I would suggest that we would ensure that much more effectively if the Dominion government could see its way to give 75 per cent of the amount As the House knows, we private members are precluded from bringing in an amendment along that line, but we would earnestly press this action upon the government. The government is quite safe. The official opposition has already expressed itself as favourable to a federal scheme, but as prepared to support some such scheme as this if it is impossible to put through a federal scheme.

There is no measure which has received such popular support across the country as has the old age pension scheme. In almost every province it was one of the foremost subjects for discussion in the recent election. Even away down in the east, in Nova Scotia, where I say that it may be difficult to put the scheme into operation, I was told by the editor of one of the leading Conservative newspapers that undoubtedly this was the most important election issue in that province. Under these circumstances the government ought to feel justified in going a great deal further than it did a year ago.

The situation has altogether changed within the past year. Sometimes if we re-introduce the old measure, we are going as far as we did last year. Sometimes when the situation is altogether changed, a re-introduction of the identical measure is by no means as venturesome a proposal as was that of a year ago. Hon. members will remember that in Through a Looking Glass the queen is made to say to Alice: "Now, here, you see, it takes all the running you can do to keep in the same place." I am suggesting that if the government wants to maintain the same place before the public that it occupied when it introduced this measure a year ago, it ought very distinctly to improve the measure.

I should like to endorse a great deal that has been said by my hon. friend (Mr. Barber) with regard to the various particulars in the bill. I believe the age ought to be lowered. Especially in industry among the people who will most need these pensions, a man is not worth very much by the time he passes the age of forty or forty-five. That is a most lamentable state of affairs, but none the less it is true that in a large number of industries when a man gets beyond the age of forty or forty-five, younger men are preferred and he often finds it difficult to hold his accustomed job. Long before he reaches the age of seventy he is a burden upon himself or upon the community. As we know, under modern conditions when men shift about necessarily from job to job there is no sense of responsibility on the part of the individual employer. There perhaps have been a dozen or twenty or fifty employers in the course of a man's life, so that no one employer feels really responsible when the man reaches the age of seventy years. Under those conditions of modern industry it seems only right that the state should assume its share of responsibility.

Again I would suggest that a larger amount should be granted, but more particularly a larger sum should be permitted as outside income which a man may receive without his being disqualified to receive a pension. If a man is capable of doing a little work on the side, he ought to be able to do work to the extent of more than $125 a year or to have property that would bring him in an income of more than $125 a year without being disqualified from receiving a pension of this character. I compare the treatment that we are meting out to these pensioners with that which we mete out to our higher public officials. I think of those to whom the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) referred a year ago, namely our judges and many of that type who are receiving large incomes from private sources and who yet are not debarred from receiving large pensions from the public treasury. There ought to be something like equality in dealing with matters of this kind.

Further, a particular modification which might readily be made by the Minister of Labour is that if a man has been living in his younger days in a province in which the pension is operative and has moved to a province in which it is not operative, he ought to be able to draw at least the government portion for the whole of his time. I do not see why if he moves from one province to another the entire 50 per cent that should be paid by the government should be cut off, but wherever he is living, whether or not the province has been donating to this fund, he should not receive the entire federal contribution. I think that is an eminently fair amendment which could very readily be made, and will be quite in keeping with the whole tenor of the bill.

There is another matter upon which I should very much like to have an expression from the minister, and that is with regard to the possible revision of this bill. We have been told that once we get it on the statute books, it will be quite possible to make revisions later, possibly in the way of granting a larger amount or some amendment of that sort. It does seem to me however that this bill is something in the nature of a contract between the Dominion government and the provinces, and I would like to be sure—I hope the minister will make this very clear—that the bill can be readily modified even if all the provinces are not in favour of such a modification. We ought not to enter into any permanent arrangements in a matter of this kind, but rather leave the way open so that without any great amount of red tape we might bring in such modifications as time shows to be desirable.

In conclusion, I would repeat that it seems to me that if the government is sincere in hoping for the success of this bill, and I have no reason whatever to believe they are not, they would seriously consider the giving of a much larger proportion by the federal treasury than is now provided for.

Mr. HEENAN: As the Governor General is to be here at five o'clock to give royal assent to certain bills, I move that the committee rise to sit again this day.

Progress reported.

The House resumed in committee consideration of the resolution respecting old age pensions, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. LADNER: I rise to make some observations on the provisions of this bill, in the spirit of constructive suggestion, which have come to me as a result of the last general election. It is well known that the old age pension bill was an important concern, if not the chief concern, of the masses of the people during the recent general election. All kinds of arguments and suggestions were presented; sometimes not very fair criticisms were made by each side one against the other, and in some constituencies some of the most worthy and excellent members of the government were very nearly defeated on account of the provisions of the old age pension bill, and it is those provisions which I now seek to correct if the minister will listen to suggestions. Section 2 of the resolution deals with the question of the agreement in force between the federal and provincial governments, and states that the agreement shall remain in force so long as the provincial statute remains in operation, or until after the expiration of ten years from the date upon which notice of an intention to determine the agreement is given by the Governor General to the Lieutenant-Governor of the province with which the same was made. I make the suggestion that there is an uncertainty in that provision which is not necessary. It means that, through political conditions or political manoeuvres, it is possible that some province may undertake to enter into an agreement on which the people entitled to receive old age pensions will depend, and they may depend that it will remain in force for a number of years, and yet that province, perhaps after some election, can terminate that measure immediately without notice. It would be just as easy for the minister or the government to provide in this measure for notice on the part of the province as they have provided for notice on the part of the federal government. The federal government are required to give ten years' notice from which date a notice to terminate the agreement is made. My suggestion is that there should be twenty years' notice provided for on the part of both the provincial and the federal government. The reason why I make this suggestion is this. A man of seventy who has been receiving his pension has after ten years come to rely upon that pension, and at the age of eighty having made no other provision, the ordinary charitable or benevolent institutions having become less or gone out of existence, through the political manoeuvres or machinations of some government that man may find himself without a pension. I think if the principle of old age pension is to be adopted in Canada it should be made certain and definite, not only so far as governments are concerned, but so far as beneficiaries are concerned.

My first point is that if definite notice of a term of years on the part of the Dominion government be necessary, it should also be necessary so far as the province is concerned, and I make the suggestion that twenty years' notice should be required under the terms of the agreement entered into between the province and the Dominion. I have before me the bill which has been recently presented to the legislature of British Columbia, Bill No. 12, an act to provide for old age pensions. Clause 2 deals with the question of the agreement with the Dominion and I ask the minister to note it, because it affects the other provinces, British Columbia being the first province to enter into this arrangement. That clause reads:

The Lieutenant Governor in Council may enter into an agreement with the Governor General in Council as to a general scheme of old age pensions in the province pursuant to the provisions of any act of the Dominion heretofore or hereafter passed relating to old age pensions—

Mr. IRVINE: What is the hon. member reading from?

Mr. LADNER: From the bill recently presented to, and I presume now before, the legislature of British Columbia, and the point is that the essential feature of the bill is the authority of the Lieutenant Governor in Council to enter into agreement with the Governor General in Council under the terms provided by the legislation. Let the federal parliament take advantage of this recommendation and make their terms. Let them stipulate for ten years' notice and make it a part of the agreement. It will necessarily be a part of the provincial statute. The next point I make is with reference to clause 5 of the resolution, and I direct the minister's attention to the absence of the subsection between (e) and (f) which formerly existed in the bill. I refer to Bill No. 21 which passed the House of Commons 28th May, 1926. That bill, clause 8, subsection 1 (f), provided that a person would be entitled to a pension if he were not in receipt of an income of as much as $365 a year. In the resolution before the House that clause is omitted, and I would ask the minister if I may, at this stage, the reason why that clause is left out, because without that clause a person with an income of $25,000 a year may ask for old age pension.

Mr. HEENAN: The resolution does not contain all the provisions of the bill. There are, I think, about eleven clauses in the resolution whereas there are about twenty clauses in the bill.

Mr. LADNER: As regards that item the resolution is specific; there are the subsections from (a) to (f) which are precisely in the words of the previous bill. This is something that will form an important feature of the bill.

Mr. HEENAN: It is contained in the bill.

Mr. LADNER: That is all right, then. Subsection (a) of section 5 provides for the payment of a pension to any person who is a British subject or, being a widow, was such before her marriage. The Minister of Health (Mr. King, Kootenay) and I had a considerable discussion on that point. He charged me in the province of British Columbia with not having frankly stated the matter to the people. In the case of a woman married to an alien who has become naturalized, I suggest that if the alien is from a country where there is dual nationality—that is to say, where a person retains the citizenship of his country of origin even though he may have become naturalized in Canada, for example—it is possible that such a woman if she became a widow might not be entitled to any pension, notwithstanding that the act might intend her to have one. The minister should consult the Department of Justice on that question with respect to people from countries with dual nationality. Under international law a serious point might arise in that connection. I have not gone deeply into that particular phase of the matter, but I believe that there is some danger in that direction.

Another important feature of the bill has reference to the age at which people are to become entitled to pensions. The bill categorically fixes the age at seventy. I strongly impress upon the minister the fact that if the spirit of the legislation is observed it will not be possible to determine eligibility for pension merely by a consideration of the number of years a person has lived, for many people are old at sixty—much older than others who have actually lived seventy years. The proposed method of determining when the pension should be payable is not a sound one. I suggest that it might be advisable to fix an arbitrary age at seventy and allow the pension authorities some discretion to determine whether in particular cases people at the age of sixty or sixty-five, by reason of physical infirmities or because of other conditions that justify it, should be entitled to consideration. I do not know any other practical method of meeting this difficulty. If you fix upon the age of seventy arbitrarily, you rule out many thousands of aged and worthy people who ought to receive pensions because of ill health after a long life of hard work. In Australia where the age limit is sixty-five—I ask the minister to note this particularly—ninety per cent of those in receipt of pensions would get nothing if the limit were fixed at seventy. This shows the far-reaching effect of the principle I am pointing out. To fix an arbitrary limit of seventy virtually rules out ninety per cent of the people who, in my opinion, should be given pensions. In Australia, it is said, of 105,000 persons receiving pensions a little over ninety per cent are under seventy; and in New Zealand the limit is fixed much lower. Australia has a smaller population than ours.

My hon. friend (Mr. Woodsworth) has discussed the question of removal from one province to another. The legislation as it stands does present a handicap to any pensioner moving from one locality to another in the Dominion. Suppose the pensioner lives in Saskatchewan, a healthy place to live in. For good reasons the doctor may order him to go to a milder province like British Columbia. And because of that removal the pensioner's allowance is cut down. This is wrong in principle, and this very fact constitutes an argument in favour of a federal scheme. In my opinion, to have a really workable pension system in Canada it must be federal in its scope, because many of the provinces will never come in, and those that do will be faced with such restrictions as will make it difficult for pensioners to get the benefit of the legislation. I have already spoken with regard to the question of income.

Mr. HEENAN: The hon. member misinterprets the provision. Section 4 provides that any pensioner removing to another province with which no agreement under the act is in force shall continue to be paid the pension by the province in which it was granted.

Mr. LADNER: I refer to the section relative to a transfer of residence as between two provinces both of which are in the scheme.

Mr. HEAPS: If a person at the age of sixty-five moves from Saskatchewan to British Columbia, say, having no claim in British Columbia but one in Saskatchewan, that person loses a part of his pension, as I understand the bill.

Mr. HEENAN: Yes.

Mr. LADNER: I want to direct the attention of the minister to what I consider a fatal defect in the proposed legislation, and that is the virtual confiscation of property belonging to the aged. A discussion took place a short time ago between my hon. friend (Mr. Barber) and the minister on that point, and although the minister may not officially admit it I am sure he knows from his contact with people that if there is one objectionable feature to the old age pensions bill which strikes the average person with a sense of revulsion it is the provision that thrifty people who have worked hard during their lives and put by a little money in order to buy a home, may be faced with the prospect that after their death some dependent, for whom they have provided what little they can, will be deprived of the benefit of their economy. They may have saved up money to provide the means of education and under this legislation the pension authorities can levy out of the property the amount of the pension paid, plus five per cent interest per annum, compounded. I heard the minister's suggestion of the wealthy son or daughter who was unwilling to assist the old folks, and who finally inherited property from the deceased pensioner. It is conceivable that such cases may arise, but the other class of cases will also occur. You may have an aged lady looking after a granddaughter whose future education she may have in view; she may be anxious to send that girl to high school or to normal school or to have her educated in some other way. The old lady dies and the government steps in and says. "We will take the property and the child can go to the orphans' home." Surely it is within the resources of the minister to find something more just under the circumstances. In Australia they allow a maximum amount of property of $2,000. That is one method of getting over it. It could be suggested that if the property is going to people in affluent circumstances who, having a duty to look after their parents have failed to do so, the state would then have priority, but to pass a clause of this kind which confiscates the property under all circumstances, or practically all circumstances, is unjust, inequitable and unnecessary.

Mr. HEENAN: I assume the hon. member to be familiar with the bill we had last year, which says:

> ...no claim shall be made by a pension authority for the recovery of such debt directly or indirectly out of any part of the pensioner's estate which passes by will or on an intestacy to any other pensioner or to any person who has, since the grant of such pension or for the last three years during which such pension has continued to be paid, regularly contributed to the support of the pensioner by the payment of money or otherwise to an extent which, having regard to the means of the person so having contributed, is considered by the pension authority to be reasonable.

In other words, if someone has contributed to the upkeep of this pensioner, the government has no claim whatever.

Mr. LADNER: But that does not cover the point I am making. That section only says that a person who has assumed the duty of the state—

Mr. HEENAN: No.

Mr. LADNER: That is what it means, a person who has assisted the old people; to such a person the state says "We will not come in and take the money; we will let you get your money back first and then we will take ours." That is not the point I am making. No government would suggest that if the old people wanted to pay back a son or daughter who had given money in place of the pension, the government should have any priority. I am dealing with the case where an old couple or an old person may have a home worth $2,000, which they desire to leave to some grandchild who may be an infant. Under this provision the pension authorities would step in and take that home to the extent that a pension had been given to the old person. That is quite a different situation, if the minister appreciates my point.

Mr. HEENAN: I would like to ask my hon. friend a question. The purpose of the act is not to give anything to those who have some property now, but to give something to those who are almost destitute. If we have no pension plan such as this in operation, those relatives of the aged people will have to contribute, will they not? If that is so, and we relieve them of that burden, is it not fair that the pension authorities, or in other words the taxpayers of the country, should get back that money spent in relieving the relatives of their duty?

Mr. LADNER: As the act is drafted it covers a number of cases which would carry out the purpose of the government and be fair; but it also covers a number of cases which would be very unfair. You would put a premium on extravagance; you would tell the old people of Canada that it is no use to save so long as this statute is in effect. They will get a pension anyway, and they might as well spend their money on automobiles because after a while that money will be taken by the state. So I say the principle underlying that clause is fallacious and unsound, it does not encourage thrift; it is not to the advantage of the pensioner or the immediate relatives of the pensioner and is not of particular value to the state. I would suggest that an exemption similar to that in force in Australia be included, which would allow the old people to have property up to a certain amount. You can make provision that dependents having a natural duty or even a legal duty to provide for their parents and failing to do so could be deprived of sharing in the property.

There is another situation which arises just at that point. Ontario and Quebec pay eighty per cent of the taxes of Canada. Supposing these two provinces do not accept this pension bill, while the western provinces and the more eastern provinces adopt it. Ontario and Quebec have homes for old people, as well as all kinds of charitable and benevolent institutions to relieve the needy. If this bill goes into effect and these two provinces refuse to accept it, they will then be in the position of paying eighty per cent of all the money contributed by the Dominion government to the other provinces, and in addition they will be paying for the maintenance of the old people of their own provinces. That is a fact which is very clear. What will be the consequence? When this legislation is presented to these provinces it is unlikely that they will accept it, and I do not see anything in this bill which makes provision enabling the province of Quebec, let us say, or the province of Ontario to take their share of this old age pension money and apply it to the institutions already in existence. They are now taking care of their aged in a scientific manner, and they may say they want to turn the money over to these institutions. Is there any provision by which such an arrangement might be made?

Mr. HEENAN: There is no such provision in this bill, which is identical with the bill we passed last session. I might also say that the government is trying to get the principle of old age pensions established and then they can see what amendments are necessary later on.

Mr. LADNER: Why not find out now, while we are preparing the legislation?

Mr. HEENAN: There are a lot of things we do not know yet.

Mr. McGIBBON: When this bill went through the House last year, in common with many others on this side of the House I advocated a federal measure. We do not need to rehearse our criticisms, but we said the bill was no good because it was unworkable, and so far I do not think we have changed our minds. But I have a suggestion which the minister might consider. My suggestion is that the federal government might bring in a succession duty tax which would probably make up the fifty per cent which the provinces should pay, and that would enable us to make it a strictly federal measure. I understand that we would be invading a provincial field of taxation there, but since we are assuming provincial burdens I think it would be fair and in addition to that this parliament would have absolute control over the pensions. I think that idea is workable, because the Dominion government could invade the provincial field of taxation in view of its assuming the fifty per cent obligation which the provinces would otherwise have to carry. If you adopt this suggestion you will make the proposed bill workable; I do not think it is workable as now contemplated.

Mr. CANNON: What would be the effect of putting my hon. friend's suggestion into force, in view of the existing succession duties levied by the different provinces?

Mr. HANSON: Confiscation.

Mr. McGIBBON: You could not put on an additional tax.

Mr. CANNON: That would be in addition to the existing provincial tax.

Mr. McGIBBON: For instance, in Ontario to-day, if I understand correctly, these succession duties are applied to educational purposes. It would be a much fairer thing to tax the estates of the dead and apply the proceeds of that tax towards paying pensions to the aged and infirm. I do not think the provinces would have any real moral objection to our doing that if we assume their fifty per cent share of old age pensions. The effect would be to consolidate the existing legislation and make this law really workable.

Mr. CANNON: Then in addition to the existing provincial succession duties, there would be a duty levied by the federal government under my hon. friend's proposition?

Mr. LADNER: I do not want to get too far away from the main points I am endeavouring to present to the minister and which if not properly met will, I fear, be the undoing of this measure. In common with all other hon. members here I am desirous that an old age pension bill be passed. I wish not only that the bill should be passed but that it should become operative, and above all things that the people who are entitled to receive an old age pension should get their cheques. I made the prediction a year ago, and also two years ago, that under this measure the old folks of this country will not get their cheques. I repeat that prediction now. There are too many impracticable provisions in the proposed bill to permit of that being done. The outstanding one is the one I mentioned to the minister a moment ago.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does my hon. friend refer to the provision transferring or taking the property of the aged pensioner?

Mr. LADNER: That is one of them.

Mr. ELLIOTT: May I just call my hon. friend's attention, while he has his mind on that subject, to the fact that the provision in this bill is nearly identical with the provision which has prevailed for many years in Ontario with regard to indigents in houses of refuge? In that province if an indigent admitted to a house of refuge had any property, it was thought to be only fair such property should be available for the county houses of refuge. There was power vested in the county court judge, if the indigent objected to transferring the property, make the transfer to the county in trust for him, and if anything was left after meeting the cost of the indigent's maintenance in the institution the residue was to go to his estate. The county held that property in trust and the provision under which that procedure was adopted is, as nearly as possible the provision contained in the bill we propose to pass here. That is to say, if you are going to grant a pension to an aged person, his heirs, when they are making no provision for him, should not be permitted to receive the pensioner's property after his death.

Mr. LADNER: The minister will note that in the case he has outlined the province provides the building in which the indigent person is housed, and everything else necessary for his care, but in the case of a pensioner under the scheme we are now considering there is nothing of that nature. A grant of money is supposed to be made to aged persons who use that money to maintain homes for themselves. The two sets of conditions are entirely different. In Australia they have adopted the principle of granting exemption to the pensioners. However, the point I have just been discussing is only one point. There are quite a number of points involved here. There is, for instance, the age provision. then there is the question of the transfer of a pensioner from one province to another. But above all there is this question and to this I should like to direct the attention of the minister: How is he going to meet the situation of these two great provinces of Ontario and Quebec, which now pay eighty per cent of the taxation of this country and have institutions in which hundreds of thousands of dollars are invested for the maintenance and care of their old folks? What will happen to these institutions? In Quebec for example how are you going to distinguish between aged persons in these institutions and other aged persons outside? Would it not be better if the federal and provincial authorities united in the common purpose of looking after old people, and utilized their joint forces towards that end? What will happen to the homes which are maintained by the provinces at the present time if they accept the old age pensions scheme? Would the minister entertain granting any concession by way of allowance to these governments to the extent of the responsibility involved by their maintaining indigent people in these homes?

Mr. ROBB: We have had a very interesting and instructive discussion on the resolution. Perhaps hon. gentlemen will permit us to make progress with it in order that the Minister of Labour will have an opportunity of introducing his bill. When the bill goes into committee it can be considered in detail.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HANSON: May I ask the minister a question. I was not here when the resolution was discussed the other day and I should like to ask him—

Mr. HEENAN: Just a moment. If the hon. gentleman will permit me I should like to reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner). In the regulations pertaining to the bill it will be possible to provide for contributing towards the support of a person in a hospital or in a home.

Mr. LADNER: Can you provide for making a contribution to the government which is paying for the maintenance of these persons?

Mr. HEENAN: The question of contributing towards the maintenance of a person in a home can be provided for by regulation after a conference with the particular province concerned as to how this should be done. I think hon. members might accede to the request of the Minister of Finance and pass the resolution in order that the bill might be introduced. There will be ample opportunity for discussion when the bill is in committee.

Mr. LADNER: There are very few suggestions of the Minister of Finance I would not readily accept, especially in view of the budget he brought down yesterday, but before a bill is introduced the principles on which it is based must be considered. That is the time for making practical suggestions as to the proposed legislation in order that it may contain whatever ideas can be gathered from the collective wisdom of hon. members. That is why, in my judgment, discussion of the resolution is preferable. However, I have covered the points which I rose to make and may I say this in conclusion: The suggestions I have advanced are those about which very considerable discussion took place during the recent general election, and from the response of the audiences which I addressed it was clear to me that the average person throughout the country would like to see corrections made in the proposed pensions measure along the lines I have mentioned, especially with regard to the age at which persons should receive a pension, and in connection with this matter of old persons cared for in homes. I ask the minister to give the most serious consideration to the suggestions and to embody some if not all of them in the bill which he proposes to introduce.

Mr. PETTIT: I am in favour of the principle of the proposed bill, but I rather concur in the remarks of my leader and of other hon. members on this side in favour of a federal scheme rather than the scheme outlined in the resolution. I do so because I see in this scheme delay and possible and very probable non-concurrence on the part of some of the provinces to the scheme, and in the future possible withdrawal of some of the provinces from the scheme, and consequent inequality and injustice, whereas I see in the federal scheme a scheme that will be administered by one body and that will therefore be much more simply and less expensively administered. I would put the age at sixty-five instead of seventy; I would raise the amount from $240 to $300, and I would make the maximum pension payable subject to reduction by the amount of the income of the pensioner in excess of $150 instead of $125 a year. I would also reduce the time limit in paragraph (d) to three years instead of five. I appreciate the fact that owing to the financial situation of the country that is a matter which can probably be dealt with much better in the future when our circumstances will permit, and that this is perhaps a good start. I therefore urge upon the government as strongly and emphatically as I possibly can in my humble capacity as a member, to change their minds, to drop the scheme as outlined in the resolution, and to bring in a bill providing for a federal scheme along the line that we on this side feel and so earnestly desire should be the measure put into effect.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ESLING: Mr. Chairman, the hon. minister has told us that this is precisely the same bill as that brought down last session, and therefore the House and the country at large ought to be familiar with its provisions. Almost every hon. member who has spoken today has pointed out some objectionable feature in the bill, and it seems to me that if this measure is to be presented to the various provinces for acceptance, now is the time and this is the place to remedy these objections, instead of batting the question backwards and forwards between the provincial governments and Ottawa in an effort to arrive at a measure that will be acceptable to all.

I think that neither the customs scandal nor the tariff nor any other issue in the last campaign received quite so much prominence as did this old age pension measure. It was a subject of discussion on practically every platform, and I expressed my strongest sympathy at that time, as I do now, with any measure for the relief of the aged. I do think, however, that there might be added to those who are to be benefited, the blind, and those who are crippled beyond the possibility of earning a livelihood. It seems to me that if there is one thing to commend this bill at all, it is merely that it paves the way to improved legislation. We might as well keep pace with the sister dominions in enacting an age limit of, say, 65 instead of 70, and most assuredly I think it would not be unreasonable for us to provide that ex-service men should come in at the age of 60. That has been a general request from the various local branches of the Canadian legion throughout Canada. I think that even the government will admit that this bill can be improved upon, and that now is the time and this is the place to do it, because if the provincial governments are to make amendments it will simply mean that the measure must come back to Ottawa, and its operation will be delayed for a full year.

I regret to say that in my district, as in other portions of British Columbia, practically every Liberal speaker took the opportunity to prejudice public opinion against Conservative candidates by the absolute assertion that the Conservative members at Ottawa had opposed this measure. In British Columbia the hon. Minister of Health in the federal cabinet was heralded as the father of the old age pensions bill. I presume, now that the Minister of Labour has the bill in hand, he will be acclaimed as its stepfather. However, neither of them can take very much pride in their offspring. The Minister of Health was in charge of the campaign in British Columbia, and I think that he too must answer for some rather gross misrepresentations concerning this measure, because I happen to have here a full page advertisement published by the hon. minister, or at least by his committee, in which his picture appears and in which he tells the people that "the old age pension bill provides $480 a year for the rest of their lives." That is what the Minister of Health, who I believe is also in charge of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, tells the people in this Cranbrook paper, his home paper—that the old age pension bill carries with it an annuity of $480.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): So that there will be no misunderstanding, if my hon. friend will read the advertisement he will find that an aged couple who had not means and were entitled to come under the act would receive under its provisions $480.

Mr. ESLING: The advertisement says in plain English that the Liberal pension bill "provides $480 for the rest of their lives."

Mr. KING (Kootenay): For an aged couple.

Mr. ESLING: Into West Kootenay the hon. minister brought from the city of Vancouver a breezy Liberal candidate by the name of Gale, who deliberately stated from the platform that his Conservative opponent voted against the old age pension bill. I do not charge that the hon. minister supplied this Liberal candidate with his ammunition,—I mean platform ammunition, of course, but the fact remains that he travelled with him, spoke from the same platform and assisted in his campaign, and never once did the hon, minister see fit to say that the statements made by his candidate were not correct. He was perfectly willing to let the public receive a wrong impression and allow his candidate to go to any extent in order to win that election. As I say, the minister was in charge of the campaign in British Columbia, and when the smoke of battle cleared away he was able to come back to his leader at Ottawa and say: "Behold, chief, I went into battle in British Columbia with ten Conservatives, and I have brought you back twelve. And I almost missed the train myself." ,So that when you consider the debilitated condition of the Liberal ranks in British Columbia it is not to be wondered that the Prime Minister saw fit to give to that province a Minister of Health. While we are at this stage it is rather peculiar to note the changed conditions, or the change of opinion, on the part of the government in connection with these ministers. I think it was last session that the Prime Minister made a statement, of course, from political expediency, that he was going to reduce the number of portfolios; and on page 1400 of Hansard he stated that the portfolios of soldiers' civil re-establishment and public health would be combined with some other department; in other words, that it was not of much importance and he would practically do away with it. Now the difficulty is that they cannot find enough portfolios to go round, and so they are creating still others.

All I have to say in connection with the old age pension bill, which was a matter of much discussion in West Kootenay district, is that if the ton of money spent by the fourteen Liberals in endeavouring to secure their own election had come out of their own pockets, they would have been so financially finished that they would be the first fourteen applicants for the old age pension. If we are going to be in earnest in this thing, why not improve the measure now? What is the use of fooling the people any more? Hon. members all know that this is the most important piece of legislation that came down in 1926, and yet the government did not see fit even to mention it in the speech from the throne. It was brought down simply as a matter of expediency, and if we are going to do the right thing, why not do it now and give the people the bill they want? This matter is going back to the provincial legislatures for consideration, and if the government does not act on the constructive suggestions offered by many members this afternoon there is only one conclusion the public can draw, and that is that in reality the government does not want the various provinces to bring this measure into operation. There is no other way out of it.

I desire to refer to two or three clauses in the bill brought down during last session. The alleged father of this bill, as I say, now fills the portfolio of soldiers' civil re-establishment, and it was rather pathetic, on the eve of his by-election, when he went to two or three places in British Columbia, gathered round him the local branches of the Canadian legion, and told these men how solicitous he was about their welfare, how anxious he was to learn their problems and how sympathetic he was with all their purposes. Now, for instance, they ask for a sixty-year age limit. That was the unanimous request from the local branches, and I want to ask the hon. minister if during last session he, at any time, raised his voice on behalf of the ex-service men about whom he seemed to be so solicitous. If he did not, now is his opportunity. He can remedy the difficulty when the bill comes up, and I propose to see that he makes himself heard on that one phase of it. In the old bill, paragraph 1 of clause 9 provides an old age pension of $240 a year. It also provides that the maximum income of a pensioner from all sources, including the old age pension, shall be $365, notwithstanding the fact that the hon. minister gives the impression it would be $480. However we will assume that this pensioner may be an ex-service man. He may be receiving a war pension of $20 per month or $240 per year. That with the old age pension will amount to $480, and the various local branches of the legion ask that that war pension be not considered in figuring the total income of $365. They asked for that before. They asked for it while this bill was being discussed during the 1926 session, and I want to ask the minister or any other hon. member of this House if the minister then raised his voice on behalf of the ex-service men, about whom he seems to be so solicitous.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think at the time the bill was under discussion last year I suggested that if there was a desire to give special treatment to returned men it should be done under a separate bill.

Mr. ESLING: No.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The idea of mixing up an old age pension with various other matters is not sound and would not be considered by those who are giving the matter careful consideration.

Mr. ESLING: I submit there is so much mix-up in this bill that it would not do a particle of harm to exempt the ex-service men in calculating their total income. Inasmuch as the minister has not interceded on behalf of the ex-service men, particularly as he is Minister of the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, I ask him if he will not now raise his voice in their behalf, because this is the opportunity, this is the time and the place. These men are permitted to receive a total income of $365. If they had the old age pension and their war pension, that would amount to $480, but from that would be deducted the difference between the $365 and the $480—that would be taken away from the old age pension. One hon. member this afternoon particularly referred to paragraphs 2 and 3 in section 9. It makes no difference how the hon. minister, or any other minister endeavours to construe the clause, it is plain English and means one thing; that where an aged pensioner leaves an estate of any kind on his death, that estate is taken over by the authorities and sold, and that is all there is to it. From the proceeds of that sale is deducted the amount of any pensions which he has received under this old age pension bill. The hon. member for Fraser Valley stated this afternoon that the interest is compounded at five per cent. Why the thing is almost ridiculous, and it is pathetic as well as ridiculous. You step into a home of those who perhaps are getting the benefit of the old age pension, and you take the old lady's clock, which she has heard ticking for fifty years, and her rocker, her cookstove, her lamp and everything else and sell it. It seems to me when you bring down a clause of this character you are fostering legislation for pawnbrokers, instead of enacting an old age pension bill.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I would remind my hon. friend that he is speaking in the House of Commons; the section he is referring to will be read, and it does not purport to say what he is trying to inform the committee is the fact. It states that the property will be sold, but if any relative or other individual has reasonably contributed to the support of the aged, then the property goes to that person.

Mr. ESLING: The minister is perfectly right. But suppose no one has contributed to the support of the pensioner, not being able to do so. Does that alter the fact that every bit of household furniture will be sold?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Whom should it go to if not to the state?

Mr. ESLING: Why not start right? The government knows that these clauses are objectionable, for they have been discussed on the public platform from one end of the country to the other. What sense therefore is there in attempting to fool the people longer? You will either give them an old age pension bill which will prove workable or you will not. If you intend to pass a bill which you can put into operation with some hope of success it is not unreasonable to ask that the government take cognizance of the suggestions that have been made.

A special committee reported on this legislation a year or two ago, suggesting a conference of premiers to determine upon some uniform measure which would be acceptable to all. As hon. members know, that conference was never held, for the reason that at the time it was proposed there was not a Conservative premier in the whole Dominion. Since that time considerable water has gone under the wheels and to-day the situation is somewhat different. Apparently it has not been deemed advisable to bring together in conference the premiers of two opposite parties, but surely it is not too late to call such a conference if the government is in earnest about passing a satisfactory old age pension bill. Such a conference could readily be convened, and the premiers could agree upon some bill which would be acceptable. The Prime Minister himself shared this view. What had he to say with reference to the report of that committee? On May 1, 1925, as will be found at page 2746 of Hansard, he said:

> It is all important that before any action is taken by the federal administration we should understand very fully and finally the attitude that the several provinces will take on this particular question.

I do not know that one could ask for anything plainer or more sensible than that, and there is no obstacle whatever in the way of calling the premiers together before the session closes, so that the public may be assured that the government is not any longer trying to fool them, but really intend to enact a workable old age pensions measure. Failing this, however, there is nothing for us to do but accept the bill as it stands. You have to admit that you are asking the provinces to contribute one-half of the amount while you are giving them no voice in the matter. The provinces must accept the bill as the government presents it to them, or forego the benefit of the federal contribution. I submit in closing that the proper thing to do would be to get the premiers together for the purpose of formulating a uniform and acceptable piece of legislation. But, as I say, if this is not forthcoming we are willing—I believe that practically every member is willing—to accept the bill which has been brought down on the principle that the half loaf is better than no bread at all.

Mr. VENIOT: I should not be doing my duty to my constituents nor to the province of New Brunswick if I allowed this matter to pass without offering a few comments upon it. I have listened attentively to the discussion which has taken place on both sides of the House, and I am somewhat surprised at the speeches delivered by our friends opposite. To-day they assume an attitude entirely different from that which they assumed, or at least which they pretended, when they went to the country, to have assumed on the floor of the House last session.

Mr. ARTHURS: What is the difference?

Mr. VENIOT: Your attitude is quite different now. It is true that our friends opposite finally voted for the bill and advocated the policy that the provinces should contribute.

Mr. ARTHURS: Not at all.

Mr. VENIOT: If my hon. friend will possess his soul in patience he will be able to present his argument when I have finished. On the hustings in New Brunswick, on the hustings in Nova Scotia, on every platform from which he spoke there, the Prime Minister of the day, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, laid down the principle which the government is laying down to-day in relation to this legislation.

Mr. ARTHURS: What is that?

Mr. VENIOT: I will tell my hon. friend in time if he will be patient. If our friends of the opposition desire any evidence today of the attitude of the provincial governments towards this bill as it is now before the House, all they have to do is to put into practice the principle which the last speaker has established to-night, namely, that when a minister of the crown sits upon a public platform listening to a candidate of his propounding a question and does not contradict him, thus tacitly agreeing with what he says, then he accepts the views of that speaker. Well, the premiers of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia in the last campaign followed on many occasions the then Prime Minister of Canada, Mr. Meighen, and heard him laying down this policy that the federal government and the provincial governments should co-operate in carrying out an old age pensions scheme. They heard that proposal and did not dissent. If therefore silence gives consent, the province of New Brunswick stands and should stand ready to support this bill and contribute its share towards the amount necessary to put the measure into force.

Mr. LADNER: Is it not a fact that Mr. Meighen always took the stand that he was in favour of the principle of old age pensions, through co-operation, but only after a conference of the premiers so that a practical scheme might be worked out? Did he not say that this should be done only after the provinces had come to some mutual understanding?

Mr. VENIOT: Why should he consult the provinces if the federal authorities were to pay the whole amount involved?

Mr. LADNER: Answer my question.

Mr. VENIOT: I have answered it by asking another.

Mr. LADNER: The hon. member has made a statement with respect to what Mr. Meighen is supposed to have said. I ask him whether Mr. Meighen did not also say that there should be a conference of the premiers. Is that not correct?

Mr. VENIOT: It is quite correct. I hold the then premier's speech right here in my hand, and like the Irishman I will answer the hon. gentleman his question by putting one myself. Why does he want to co-operate with the provinces if it is not his intention to make the provinces pay a part of the money necessary to carry out this scheme?

Mr. LADNER: May I answer that question?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes; keep on interrupting.

Mr. LADNER: It was always the principle of the Conservative party that the provinces should co-operate after the conference, but we considered that the conference was necessary before co-operation could be practical, and this government will find that out before they are through.

Mr. VENIOT: There was no necessity for co-operating with the provinces if the federal authorities were to pay the whole bill, and there is where my hon. friend is wrong. But here is a speech made by his then leader, and I am surprised that those who followed him then think so little of him now that they do not adhere to the principles he laid down. In that speech he said:

> We favour old age pensions legislation. We intend to pass old age pensions legislation, but we are going to get the provinces together first.

Why get them together if the provinces are to have no interest in it? If the federal authorities are to pay the whole of the money involved in carrying out this legislation, the provinces have not a word to say about it. Now let me read a little further:

> We are going to see that we get something that will go into effect.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes; you will say that later on.

> It is the operation that must be looked after,...

Who is going to operate it? Why apply to the provinces to operate it when they do not contribute a cent and have no interest in it whatever? I read further:

> ...and we will make sure that ours will operate before we put it on the statute books. We will get the concurrence of the provinces...

In what? In the contributions, of course.

Mr. LADNER: Not necessarily.

Mr. VENIOT: My hon. friend surely does not wish us to take him seriously. I know I do not.

> We will get something practicable, something which will be acceptable to the provinces.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. VENIOT: Why must it be acceptable to the provinces when they have nothing whatever to do with it under the legislation then proposed? If what my friends are now pretending is correct, they wanted the provinces not only to manage this work but to contribute their share to maintenance, as well as management, under the principles laid down in the bill. There can be no other conclusion arrived at in reading the speech of the then Prime Minister. I heard the Prime Minister of that time deal with this question in one of his speeches in my own town of Bathurst, and he was then very emphatic in claiming that the Conservative party deserved as much credit as, if not even more credit for bringing down old age pension legislation than did the Liberal party. What credit could he claim if he were not in accordance with the Liberal party when they brought that bill before the House, for which hon. gentlemen now credit themselves with having voted?

Mr. ARTHURS: What about the Labour party?

Mr. VENIOT: If my hon. friend would do a little more labouring perhaps he would have a better idea of what is going on in connection with this bill. I would advise him to get down to labour. I claim, Mr. Chairman, that the principle of asking the Dominion government to relieve direct municipal taxation is a vicious one, because that is the prerogative of the provincial governments. It may be all right, and I can see no harm in it, for the Dominion government to come to the assistance of the provincial governments in relieving taxation, but let it be done through the provincial governments and not entirely through federal channels. What is the condition of affairs to-day so far as the municipal governments are concerned? They—not the federal government—look after the poor; they look after the maintenance of the aged poor in the different asylums established for that purpose, and the people themselves are directly taxed for their maintenance. In the maritime provinces there is not a single government which contributes anything towards the relief of municipal taxation in that line.

Mr. JONES: Prince Edward Island does.

Mr. ARTHURS: And Ontario does.

Mr. VENIOT: My hon. friend says Prince Edward Island does, but the government of Prince Edward Island does not take charge of municipal affairs, does it?

Mr. JONES: Yes, the provincial government does it all, in connection with the maintenance of the poor.

Mr. VENIOT: Then let us consider New Brunswick; I can speak more correctly of that province, and I hope my hon. friend will not be able to contradict me there. The hon. gentleman to his right (Mr. Arthurs) will correct me if I am wrong, I am sure. In New Brunswick to-day the provincial government has imposed, for the maintenance of indigents and unfortunates in the provincial asylums, direct taxation upon the people of that province, but in no way have they attempted to relieve that burden upon the people. Rather have they increased it, since under the Liberal government previous to the present government the upkeep of these unfortunates cost $2.50 per head per week, and under the present Conservative government that rate has been raised to $5 per head per week. The government of New Brunswick to-day only pays 30 cents per head per week for the maintenance and upkeep of those who are unfortunately confined in the provincial asylum. Therefore I claim it is not the prerogative of the federal authorities to relieve direct municipal taxation, and for that reason I claim that the principle laid down in this bill under which the provinces are to cooperate and contribute their just share toward the maintenance of the poor people over the age limit laid down by this bill, is proper and just.

Then there is another point. Hon. gentlemen opposite make a claim now of which I did not hear during the last election, although I do not know what took place here in the House last session. They claim now that $240 per year is not sufficient. If the person accepting that contribution or pension is not able to show that he has an income of $125 in addition, as I understand it the pension will be increased by that amount, and they will receive as much as $365.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would like to ask the minister if that is correct; I think not.

Mr. HEENAN: What was the question?

Mr. VENIOT: Where the recipient of a pension is unable to show that he has a total income of $365, the pension will include the exemption otherwise referred to.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is wrong; $240 is the maximum.

Mr. HEENAN: The maximum paid by the government is $240, but there is an exemption of $125, making a total of $365.

Mr. MANION: If a man earns $125 a year, the government will graciously allow him to keep it.

Mr. VENIOT: And what would my hon. friend do if he were in power?

Mr. MANION: I would give a little more.

Mr. VENIOT: Why did he not advocate that last year when he was carrying on his election campaign?

Mr. MANION: In a moment I will tell what I advocated, if the minister will finish.

Mr. VENIOT: My hon. friend will not answer now?

Mr. MANION: Yes, I will answer. The present Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) during the election last year, according to reports which came to me, made the statement that I opposed the scheme of old age pensions in this House. I do not know if that report was correct, but I was told that the present minister stated that I opposed the scheme in this House.

Mr. HEENAN: I made that statement.

Mr. MANION: The minister admits that? Then I wish to say that the Minister of Labour stated what was not so, because at no time did I ever oppose an old age pension scheme.

Mr. VENIOT: That is not answering my question.

Mr. MANION: I will answer the question in a moment. The minister insisted on my getting on my feet, and I am going to answer the question in my own way. I never opposed the old age pensions scheme in the House. The minister was not in the House last year although he is accusing our party of taking a certain attitude with regard to the old age pension bill of last session.

Mr. VENIOT: Answer the question please, do not make a speech.

Mr. MANION: I have the floor and am going to answer the question in my own way.

Mr. VENIOT: You asked for the privilege of answering my question and I gave you the opportunity.

Mr. MANION: The minister insisted on my getting up, and I said I would get up when the minister sat down. I will answer his question. He has stated that the Conservative party took a certain attitude in the House last year on this question. I am going to state what attitude the Conservative party really did take.

Mr. VENIOT: The question is what my hon. friend did, not what attitude the Conservative party took.

Mr. MANION: I supported the old age pensions scheme last year.

Mr. VENIOT: That is not answering the question I asked.

Mr. MANION: I want to go a little further. The Conservative party in the House last year supported old age pensions as a body. There may have been one or two individuals who offered criticisms but that is no justification for saying they opposed the bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: I will go further because I wish to be fair. I myself, and a number of other members, criticised the details of the bill just as we are criticising the details of the measure before us this evening. We have a perfect right, even while supporting a bill, to criticise the details. As to the attitude of the Conservative party on old age pensions at the present time, we would prefer to have a federal scheme, with the necessary grants paid out of the federal exchequer, but if we cannot get a federal scheme we are going to support this bill. That, however, does not deprive us of the opportunity of criticising some of the details of the measure, and because we offer some criticism of certain details is not to say that we are opposed to the bill itself. So I hope that the Minister of Labour will adhere to the facts in the next election better than he did in the past. I will yield the floor to the Postmaster General now.

Mr. VENIOT: I do not want my hon. friend's permission.

Mr. MANION: I accord him permission because I have the floor at the present time.

Mr. VENIOT: I understand perfectly that under the rules of the House I cannot address myself directly to hon. gentlemen but must speak to the Chair. But when my hon. friend (Mr. Manion), after all the experience he pretends to have, adopts that course I think I should be permitted to do the same.

Mr. MANION: Very well, go ahead.

Mr. VENIOT: I am glad my hon. friend has got that little speech off. He rose for the purpose of answering a single question I put to him and went on making a speech. In that way I suppose he expected to divert me from what I had in mind.

Mr. MANION: Oh, no.

Mr. VENIOT: But I am not going to be diverted.

An hon. MEMBER: Too bad.

Mr. VENIOT: It would be too bad if he could succeed in doing it. I just wish to say that the statement I made was that the Conservative party had adopted the very same attitude in my province in connection with this bill that we are adopting towards this measure.

An hon. MEMBER: They did not.

Mr. VENIOT: Well, speaking in the city of St. John, at a meeting over which the Hon. Mr. Baxter presided, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen advocated the very same principles that are set forth in the measure that is before this House to-night. And when during that campaign it was pointed out that certain members of the Conservative party, who do not occupy seats in this chamber but are none the less identified with Conservative deliberations before the country, had voted almost in a body against this bill, the Prime Minister of the day took upon himself to explain that while that may have been true, the Conservative party in this chamber stood four-square for the very principles that are laid down in the measure we are now considering. In view of that fact I cannot understand the attitude which hon. gentlemen opposite are adopting in criticising the measure and suggesting that the federal government should bear the entire cost rather than call upon the provinces to contribute any portion of it.

Mr. LADNER: What was the attitude of the hon. gentleman's government in the legislature of New Brunswick in May, 1925?

Mr. VENIOT: In May, 1925, the government of the province of New Brunswick, which I had the honour then of leading, had before it two questions. In the first place we had a commission which investigated the question of widows' pensions, and the report was submitted to the House toward the dying hours of the session. We then had the intention of appointing a commission to look into the question of old age pensions so that we could see how far we could go in carrying that principle out as a government.

Mr. LADNER: What was the report of the first commission?

Mr. VENIOT: The report of the commission on widows' pensions was favourable.

Mr. LADNER: And the other?

Mr. VENIOT: The other commission was not appointed, and therefore there was no report. The present Conservative government never had the commission appointed; consequently we have no report upon old age pensions.

Mr. LADNER: Will the minister permit me to ask him one more question?

Mr. VENIOT: Yes, sir.

Mr. LADNER: Did he write a letter to the parliamentary committee on behalf of the government of New Brunswick from which the following is an extract:

This province is now considering the establishment of what is known as widow's pension, and we are not prepared to make any decision in the matter of an old age pension. While I do not disapprove of the old age pension, and feel that it would be a good thing, yet it would be impossible for me to commit the province to any action in this matter at the present moment.

Mr. VENIOT: That shows the attitude I took. What is the date of that letter?

Mr. LADNER: May 23rd, 1925.

Mr. VENIOT: Exactly. We were then dealing with widows' pensions, and we wanted to get through with that phase of the question first, before we undertook to deal with old age pensions. We went to the country on August 10th, 1925. Our program and policy then was the adoption of widows' allowances first, and afterwards we would deal with old age pensions.

Mr. ARTHURS: What action was taken in regard to widows' pensions?

Mr. VENIOT: The report on widows' pensions, that is to say the interim report of the commission, was submitted to the legislature later in the session, and no definite action was taken upon it. But when we went to the country a few months afterward we laid down in our platform the principle of widows' pensions.

Mr. ARTHURS: And was it carried?

Mr. VENIOT: No, I was defeated. But that was not what defeated me. Does my hon. friend want to know what it was? If so, I will tell him.

Mr. DUNNING: That is all right, tell him.

Mr. VENIOT: He does not want to know. As a new member I do not want to take up too much of the time of the committee but I felt that I should say a word or two upon this very important subject. The measure now before the committee should be adopted. I feel that the maritime provinces should recognize the principle of old age pensions, and should contribute their share towards the relief of the aged class aimed at in this legislation.

Mr. HEAPS: In listening to the discussion which has taken place this afternoon, and reading over the discussion in Hansard, I have been very pleased indeed to note the cordial manner in which the principle of old age pensions has now been accepted in all quarters of the House. It was not so last year. The bill of last year received a good many knocks, and even the principle of old age pensions received a good many knocks from different quarters of the House. I am not going to blame anybody for changing his mind from last year or two years ago, but I think if we looked around to find out how many members of this House have changed their minds on this question in the past two years, we should find that probably seventy-five per cent of them have. However, I have no desire to hark back on what took place in the last election. If the members of this House now feel inclined to pass a scheme of old age pensions, what took place a year ago or two years ago is not of very much importance so far as I am concerned. What I am anxious about is to see that we get an old age pension measure which will become a fact, and not merely a dead letter, so far as assisting the old folk in this dominion is concerned.

The resolution before us and the bill to be based upon it is practically the same, I understand, as we had last year. I said a moment ago that I was extremely happy to note the cordial manner in which the principle of old age pensions has been accepted by the House, but I regret exceedingly that the same bill we had last year is about to be again introduced before the House of Commons. I regret it for more than one reason. But the chief reason why I regret it is that there may be provinces in the Dominion of Canada that will not accept the provisions as outlined in the bill of last year. It would be a cruel thing, Mr. Chairman, as I view it, if after what was said in the last election, after all the promises that were held out by the Liberal party and by the Conservative party, there should be old people in some of the provinces who would not be in receipt of an old age pension. I do not think there could be anything more cruel than to give the old folks of this country, the aged and the needy, the idea that they were going to receive an old age pension, and then when the bill becomes law, so far as this parliament is concerned, there should still be thousands of people in some of the provinces who would not get an old age pension. Therefore, I think our first duty, the most important duty that the House of Commons has to perform, is to see that we get enacted a bill that will meet with the acceptance and approval of all the provinces of the Dominion. I frankly admit that a bill which in its main provision provides for only a fifty per cent contribution by the federal exchequer is not going to meet with the approval of the provinces, and if I could urge anything upon the government it would be to increase that contribution from fifty to seventy-five per cent at least.

There has been a good deal said this afternoon in connection with a federal scheme of old age pensions. Nobody has outlined what is meant by a federal scheme. A federal scheme would involve federal administration, and personally I am in favour of provincial administration, because I believe that by provincial administration we are going to get more efficient administration. For that reason, because I believe in the provincial administration of such a measure, I am in favour of the provincial governments making some slight contribution, but I certainly object to this government asking the provinces to contribute at least fifty per cent, in addition to which the provinces will also have to bear the cost of administration. I believe that if my friends on the Liberal side of the House could express their feelings freely on this matter, we would have a good many hon. gentlemen sitting on the government side of the House who would be heartily in favour of a seventy-five per cent contribution from the federal exchequer to the scheme of old age pensions.

This afternoon I listened to the right hon. the Prime Minister give a rather lengthy explanation on constitutional matters, and he spoke of the supremacy of the House of Commons. I would like the membership of the House of Commons to be supreme in this question of old age pensions, and to allow a free vote of the members of this House on matters connected with the old age pensions bill. As a private member I am unable to move any amendment to this bill that will involve additional financial obligations. I could not move in this House that the contribution by the government be increased to seventy-five per cent, because that is entirely the prerogative of the government, but I would like to see the House divided on that question because I am satisfied that the preponderance of opinion in this House would be in favour of a much larger grant from the federal exchequer than is contemplated in the measure which we have now under consideration.

Only yesterday the members of this House were discussing the question of the celebration of the diamond jubilee of confederation. During the past election, and subsequently, I have received quite a large number of letters from many of the old people in this country who are looking anxiously forward to the day when the old age pension law will become a fact. These men and women who have written to me, and probably to many other members of the House, have dealt with their pioneering days in the Dominion of Canada. I believe that there could be no more fitting way to celebrate the diamond jubilee of confederation than to put on the statute books of this country a really workable old age pension scheme that will give to the pioneers of confederation something that is worth while.

I do not think that in considering this measure the government have given proper thought to the changes which have taken place since last year. When this measure was introduced in this House a year ago there was a great deal of doubt very probably in the minds of the government, and a great deal of doubt in the minds of hon. members, as to whether the principle of old age pensions would be accepted by this House. Well, it has been accepted by this House, but we do not know as yet what is going to happen in another House. However, I believe that the Conservative party, in the criticism to which they have been subjected so far as the members of this House are concerned, have had visited upon them the sins of the Conservative members in another House, and really the party cannot altogether escape that. I have often thought that if the Conservative members of another House had showed the good sense shown by a good many Liberal members of that House and had walked out, they would have been well advised on that occasion. There have been great changes since a year ago. The doubts we had then on this matter have all been dispelled. This House now accepts the principle of old age pensions, and not only has the principle been accepted by this House, but it has been accepted throughout the whole country. From one end of Canada to the other we find Liberals and Conservatives vieing with each other as to which can give to the old people of this country the better old age pension measure. Here we have our friends of the Conservative party telling us that they will give to the old people perhaps more than the $20 a month that is mentioned in this bill, and they say that they want to reduce the age limit from seventy to sixty years. They will give many other things away in excess of what is contained in the bill. I am, however, prepared to accept the bill, subject of course to that one particular amendment which I have just mentioned.

There is one other question that I wish to touch upon before I sit down, and it appertains to the amount which an old man can earn outside of the amount which he receives as a pension. When we speak of a pension, I hope this matter is looked upon as a pension and not as a gratuity, as it is, I believe, considered by some hon. members. When men or women have reached the age of seventy years, having lived honourable lives and having given of their best to this Dominion, the least the state can do for them is to provide them with something to tide them over their difficulties in their old age, and that should not be looked upon as charity but as something the state owes them. An old lady hailing from Kingston came to see me in the city of Winnipeg where she was living on the gifts of her friends. She told me that her grandfather was one of the founders of the city of Kingston, and yet that old lady of about seventy-five years was compelled to go round and live on the charity of the people of the city of Winnipeg.

The bill as it came before us last year provided for a maximum earning, including the pension of $240 per annum, of $365 per annum. In other words, if a pensioner was earning more than $10.50 per month, he would have a reduction made from the amount of his pension. If he was earning $20 a month, his pension would be reduced by the amount which he earned over $125 a year. In other words, if he earned $240 per annum he would be entitled to a pension of only $125 per annum. That is one of the lowest amounts of any pension scheme that I know of in any part of the world. The limit has been practically wiped out of the old age pension legislation in Great Britain. The limit in Australia is considerably higher than that proposed in the bill which probably will come before us in the next few days. I hope the government will take into their serious consideration the question of increasing to $240 per annum the amount of earnings allowed in addition to the pension of $240.

I also hope they will take into consideration the question of increasing the grant from the federal treasury to the provincial treasury from fifty to seventy-five per cent. The reason I make that as a minimum stipulation is very easy to understand. If the provincial governments have only twenty-five per cent to contribute to the cost of pensions, there will be little excuse for any provincial government not to put into operation a scheme of old age pension. On the other hand, if they are asked to contribute fifty per cent, there will be a very good reason for many provincial governments, who now find their financing difficult, to put into operation such a scheme, and the Dominion government will have to assume the full responsibility in those provinces in which the old age pension scheme will not be in operation.

Yesterday when we all listened so earnestly and attentively to the statement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) the word which was probably most used in his statement was "prosperity". If there is as much prosperity as was stated by the Minister of Finance it should not be difficult for this government to provide the extra $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 that is involved in increasing the fifty per cent to seventy-five per cent. If that is going to mean the difference between having or not having an old age pension scheme in the provinces of Canada, it would be in the interest of this government to increase the fifty per cent to seventy-five per cent, so that when the time comes no province will be able to say that it cannot put the scheme into operation and, what is much more important, there will be no aged men and women, who have been looking forward anxiously for the establishment of this scheme which will give them at least that minimum of $20 per annum, who will have looked in vain.

Mr. ARTHURS: The keynote of the observations of my hon. friend (Mr. Heaps) regarding this bill has been that of charity. He pointed out that it was necessary for this Dominion to come to the rescue of certain of its inhabitants on the ground that they should be charitably dealt with in one province or another. We have had a similar case in Ontario, and I know no difference between the case of mothers' pensions in Ontario and that of old age pensions in the Dominion of Canada. No difference can be made between the case of a widowed mother in Ontario and one in Quebec or any other province; and the same should apply in the case of an aged father of seventy years or over. The principle should be the same; that is to say, if the province is liable and if it assumes the responsibility in the one case, it should certainly assume the responsibility in the other. In Ontario we have assumed responsibility in regard to mothers' pensions.

Two years ago my hon. friend or his associate moved a resolution asking that the Dominion should put into operation a scheme of old age pensions, one hundred per cent Dominion. I may be wrong in the name; if it was not my hon. friend it was the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) then the hon. member for East Calgary. The motion was put and, as we quite admit, the consensus of opinion in this House was against it. But my hon. friend has been eminently unfair in saying that in the discussion last year we were opposed to the principle then enunciated.

Mr. HEAPS: I did not endeavour to convey that impression.

Mr. ARTHURS: I spoke last year on this question and I was then and I am to-day hundred per cent in favour of the principle of old age pensions. I was one hundred per cent against the principle of the Dominion embarking upon this scheme without the consent of the various provinces. Apparently no effort was made then or prior to the time when the discussion occurred, nor so far as I know has any effort been made up to the present time in regard to the matter. The minister from Saskatchewan might be a good authority.

Mr. DUNNING: On what?

Mr. ARTHURS: On whether or not the provinces should enter the scheme.

Mr. DUNNING: I want to say a word when my hon. friend has finished.

Mr. ARTHURS: My assertion is that there has been no discussion on the part of the various provinces in regard to this matter, and no information is available to the members of this government as to whether the provinces are or are not prepared to embark upon a scheme of this kind. We know by information which we receive every day that certain provinces are not prepared to embark upon this scheme.

Mr. HEENAN: British Columbia has indicated by correspondence that it is willing to co-operate.

Mr. ARTHURS: We have heard that several times. What about the other provinces? What about Quebec?

Mr. HEENAN: I understood my hon. friend to say that no province was prepared to co-operate.

Mr. ARTHURS: I did not say that.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is none yet. The bill in British Columbia has not yet been read a second time.

Mr. HEENAN: I had a letter from the premier.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That does not matter.

Mr. NEILL: The bill has been introduced and passed its second reading.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is not law yet.

Mr. ARTHURS: Is that prior or subsequent to the acceptance by British Columbia of the motion?

Mr. NEILL: It has passed the British Columbia House.

Mr. ARTHURS: It is anticipating this bill. There is no doubt that at least ninety per cent of the total population of Canada in the various provinces have given no assent to this bill in any way, and the provinces represented here by some hon. members are among those which are not likely to give assent to this bill at the present time.

Mr. DUNNING: Is my hon. friend looking at me?

Mr. ARTHURS: I could not avoid looking at you, you are so good-looking. During the previous election, as many hon. members have said, the Conservatives received many knocks regarding this particular legislation. They did not deserve it. I stood on my feet at the last election in exactly the same position as I stand now.

Mr. FORKE: You would not stand on your head, would you?

Mr. ARTHURS: And I am still here, in spite of all the Forkes they might have put up against me. I made the statement then that this was a matter for Dominion legislation and no other—and some of the Forkes have passed between now and then. I make the same assertion now that this legislation, to be of any use to the whole Dominion, must necessarily be Dominion legislation. The expedient put forward by my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), that the government of the day should assume seventy-five per cent instead of fifty per cent, is absolute camouflage. If it were right that we should adopt fifty per cent or seventy-five, why not say one hundred? Has any hon. member an answer to that? Has my hon. friend changed his mind as between the fifty per cent and the seventy-five, as between the different provinces and the Dominion? Why should he not support the suggested amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre? And if seventy-five per cent, why not one hundred per cent?

There is no question as to the result of this thing. On this side of the House we are absolutely in favour of the principle of old age pensions. We are absolutely opposed to the principle of putting up some bill which in itself, and to the knowledge of every member of the government, is a subterfuge and a camouflage, and will never have any effect so far as relieving the old people are concerned.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend addressed a question to myself, particularly relating to the province of Saskatchewan, which gives me an opportunity to say a few words with respect to the resolution now before the committee. I think everyone who has spoken in this debate has expressed his adherence to the principle of old age pensions. Principles are fine things, but they do not keep body and soul together. We require to get further than a mere discussion of principle in connection with a matter of this kind, if it is going to be of practical value to the people affected by it. May I submit that it does not advance the cause of legislation in this House for any hon. member to rise and describe a piece of legislation as camouflage or subterfuge, known to be such by its promoters and not intended by them to work out properly, as the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Arthurs) has done? I submit the government is serious in advancing the measure as one calculated to establish in the country a system of old age pensions, which may not be perfect in its inception, but which will at least—

Mr. ARTHURS: I did not say the government knew. I said certain members of the government.

Mr. DUNNING: I thought my hon. friend said "every member." He says now "certain members." Well, in any case I say that the legislation now before the House, if and when enacted, will establish this principle in operation. My hon. friends opposite say that their policy would be to introduce such legislation only after a conference with the provinces, and after securing with the provinces an agreement to co-operate in connection with it. I say now what I said during the election campaign with regard to that policy. If we wait until the nine provinces are all agreed on the kind of old age pension scheme that they desire to enact we will wait till doomsday. Why not proceed in connection with this matter on the same principle on which the Dominion proceeded some years ago, when my hon. friends opposite were on this side of the House, namely, to volunteer assistance to the provinces in the matter of building roads? Did they wait till all the provinces had agreed to accept a proportion of the partnership scheme then proposed in the construction of highways? No, the federal machinery was set up and any province might take advantage of it, and most of the provinces availed themselves of the proposition—not all of them immediately, but some of them delayed till the time fixed for the scheme had almost expired. I might mention the application of the same principle in connectioan with the scheme for agricultural education and in connection with the Technical Education Act. When the federal parliament lays down the terms on which they are willing to assist any province in carrying out what is really an essentially provincial undertaking, it involves a recognition by the federal government of the desirability of national assistance in connection with what has been considered to be a local undertaking. Frankly I am favourable to provincial and dominion co-operation in this matter, and I am favourable to it on practical grounds. The practical grounds are these: The provincial government at the present time, in the nature of things, deals with matters affecting property and civil rights. Their provincial administrative machinery is much closer to the people in dealing with a matter of this kind than federal administrative machinery can possibly be. The administration of a completely effective scheme, supported one hundred per cent by the federal government, would mean the setting up of a complete new piece of federal machinery from one end of Canada to the other, because we have no existing federal machinery readily adaptable for the purpose contemplated by this bill. On the other hand, there is scarcely a province in the Dominion which is not at the present time administering, directly or through the municipality, some analogous undertaking, some undertaking very similar in its general character, such as the mothers' allowance scheme, or such as the various child protection acts, involving as they do the supervision of foster homes, where children have been adopted under the provisions of the various child protection acts. They have now the machinery, they have the inspectors, and they can add the administrative machinery contemplated by this measure with very little expenditure; while, so far as the Dominion is concerned, it would require a new and expensive piece of machinery.

Some of my hon. friends would get round that difficulty by saying, Well, if the provinces had the machinery why could the Dominion not bear the whole hundred per cent and return the money to the provinces for administration? That argument has been advanced, and I submit it is unsound in principle for that body which is responsible for the raising of the money to exercise no control over expenditure under a scheme of this kind. There must be some control to expenditure and administration by the body which has the responsibility of raising the money. In this case, under the measure now before the committee, the Dominion has the responsibility of providing one-half the money. It is quite a sufficient check upon the administration of the scheme to have the provinces charged with the responsibility of raising the other half of the money required.

Mr. ARTHURS: My hon. friend has given me instances of Dominion grants for roads in the various provinces. Will the minister tell me how much has been saved by the Dominion through the fact that they have had control of a certain amount of the administration?

Mr. DUNNING: I do not quite get my hon. friend's question.

Mr. ARTHURS: There were twenty millions voted for roads in the various provinces. What has been saved the Dominion by the fact that we have had some share of the administration of the act?

Mr. DUNNING: The Dominion's share in the administration of the Federal Highways Act is indeed very small.

Mr. ARTHURS: But in the end we paid the $20,000,000.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course we did, because parliament authorized the payment of the money, in the manner prescribed by the law itself, among the various provinces in proportion to their population, and the expenditure of that money was carried out by the province, except for audit work and engineering inspection on the part of the Dominion in order to ensure that value should be received for the outlay. I am not proposing in connection with this scheme that the Dominion should not exercise the same supervisory authority over the machinery created by the province for the administration of old age pensions. But the detailed administration can be well and economically taken care of by existing provincial machinery, and I submit that it will prove cheaper in the long run so to do.

May I remind members of the committee and particularly my hon. friend (Mr. Heaps) that while some of us may be sympathetic to a larger proportion of the cost being borne by the Dominion, the matter is not so easily settled. My hon. friend himself said that he was sympathetic to the idea of the Dominion bearing a larger proportion. May I point out that parliament consists of two Houses and that what we do here is subject to review elsewhere in a place which I am not permitted to name nor to discuss in this House. Those of us who believe in the principle of old age pensions are aiming at getting a measure which will pass the parliament of Canada; and the parliament of Canada consists, as I have said, of two Houses.

Mr. HEAPS: Does the minister think that if he fixes the proportion at seventy-five instead of fifty per cent this will influence the other House in any degree?

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps I can best answer that question by saying that I do not think it will make the passage of the bill any easier in a certain other place. That is my opinion.

Mr. HEAPS: In view of the fact that the political complexion of the other House is not the political complexion of hon. gentlemen opposite but the same as that of most hon. gentlemen on this side, and in view of the further fact that hon. gentlemen on this side advocate a one hundred per cent contribution, is not a seventy-five per cent proportion just as likely to pass in the other House as fifty per cent?

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friends opposite were as logical as the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, perhaps there might be some force in his suggestion. But after our experience of last year in this regard,—and I do not want to trench upon subjects of doubtful order in this discussion—I am sure we all have a very vivid memory of the attitude of some members of the parliament of Canada on the question of old age pensions. I can speak, by the way, of members of the parliament of Canada, meaning the whole parliament, without getting out of order. I say that we all remember that members of the parliament of Canada of one political persuasion in one House took an attitude quite in contrast to that of some members of the parliament of Canada of the same political persuasion in another chamber. We have a very vivid memory of this, and because of that experience we are inclined to take with a grain of salt the protestations of hon. gentlemen opposite with reference to the attitude of the great Conservative party on old age pensions. However, suffice it to say that last year's bill did not become law; and this, not through any fault of the Liberal party, not through any fault of the Progressive party, not through any fault of the Labour party, not through any fault of the United Farmers of Canada—

An hon. MEMBER: Through no fault of the Conservatives.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, then, evidently no one was responsible.

Mr. LADNER: The minister speaks of the illogical attitude of the Conservative party in this connection. May I ask him if he was responsible for a letter written by the government of the province of which he was premier on the nineteenth day of November, 1925, to the parliament of Canada, as follows:

> The government of Saskatchewan is of opinion that an old age pension scheme for Canada can best be adopted by the federal government alone. There would seem to be so much difficulty in the way of providing any scheme that would be suitable to all the nine provinces of Canada as to make it impossible, and it will be readily understood that if any number of the provinces were to remain out, it would be almost impossible to adopt any scheme that would not subject those provinces within the arrangement to a considerable expense that should rightfully be borne by those outside the scheme. While we are disposed to think that an old age pension scheme should be undertaken, the difficulty in the way of the suggested scheme appears almost, if not entirely, insurmountable.

Did the minister write that letter?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend has the signature before him. Let him read it.

Mr. LADNER: I have not. I have only extracts from the correspondence between the government of Saskatchewan and the chairman of the committee on pensions. I presume that it was my hon. friend's government who wrote this letter advocating the federal scheme.

Mr. DUNNING: I apologize to the hon. member; I thought he had the signature before him. However, let me tell him that the signature to that letter is not mine. I was expecting that the letter would be quoted the moment I rose to my feet, and I ought to thank the hon. gentleman for allowing me to proceed thus far without introducing it. It was quoted in the debate last year. The letter is signed by the Hon. Mr. Gardiner, now Premier of Saskatchewan, and represented the first reaction of that government to the proposal that it should, back in the year 1925, embark upon the scheme as submitted by a committee of the House of Commons at that time. The province of Saskatchewan, however, does not stand still. My hon. friend does not recognize that.

Mr. BENNETT: That is, since you left.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, since I left. May I take this opportunity of saying for my hon. friend's benefit that the province of Saskatchewan is going forward even faster since I left than it did while I was there. My successor is carrying on the tradition of the Liberal party in that province in a very able manner. It so happens that a discussion has taken place recently in the legislature of Saskatchewan with reference to old age pensions. Such a discussion has occurred, indeed, on one or two occasions since the date of the writing of that letter to which my hon. friend has just now referred, and I hold here a report of a debate which took place on February 7 in the legislature on this subject. It gives the considered attitude of the government of Saskatchewan at the present time. The argument has been advanced from across the floor that the provinces will not take advantage of the scheme; but we know that the province of British Columbia is already prepared to do so, and I can trust public opinion, as expressed throughout Canada during the last federal election, to see to it that most of the provinces of the Dominion will follow suit. To state that the provinces of this Dominion are less responsive to public opinion on a matter of this kind than is the federal parliament is to state something which of course is not correct. The present Premier of Saskatchewan, discussing the matter, read the letter referred to by my hon. friend as indicating the attitude of the government of that province at that time towards the question, and then—

Mr. LADNER: Was not my hon. friend Premier of Saskatchewan at that time, in the year 1925?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. But the trouble with my hon. friends opposite is this: because they are standing still they want all the rest of us to stand still. That is the difference between us.

Mr. LADNER: Will the minister then admit that in November 1925 he did advocate a federal scheme, which he is now condemning?

Mr. DUNNING: No, I will not admit anything of the kind. I will say this, that when the matter was first propounded to the government which I had the honour to lead, without the information which came later, involving as it apparently did a very considerable provincial expenditure, a very cautiously worded reply was returned to the proposal that the province should undertake large expenditure in connection with such a scheme. Of course I will admit that the government of Saskatchewan and the members of the legislature of that province later had the benefit of studying the evidence taken before the committee of this House, and also had the benefit of the discussion which occurred in this House last year when the matter was very thoroughly threshed out. As I said before, we do not stand still, and the attitude of to-day is what matters. Surely my hon. friend does not hold strongly to exactly the same opinions on every matter which he expressed in the month of November, 1925?

Mr. LADNER: No, but my reason for speaking of this letter was that the minister was endeavouring to ridicule the stand taken by the Conservative party and by Mr. Meighen.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. LADNER: Yes, and he was attempting to show how illogical and foolish it was. I merely wanted to present a picture of other people under similar circumstances.

Mr. DUNNING: I suppose we could go on along this line all evening. I might point out, however, that in the illogical position I was depicting, frankly I had no intention of ridiculing Right Hon. Arthur Meighen; far be it from me to attempt to do so; in fact it is beyond my powers. I was contrasting members of the same parliament of Canada on the same occasion, dealing with the same matter, and my hon. friend brings up a cautious opinion expressed two years ago based on partial information, and contrasts it with an opinion expressed to-day based on more complete information, as evidence that we are guilty of the same illogical attitude adopted by the Conservative party in both Houses last year.

Now perhaps I can state what the attitude of the province of Saskatchewan is to-day. I would like to read what the premier of that province has said:

> Saskatchewan to-day was in the position of waiting the action of the federal government to reintroduce its old age pension plan of last year or of introducing a provincial scheme. To bring in a measure now when a bill was probably to be brought down at Ottawa, would be selfish. Should the Dominion bill be introduced the Saskatchewan government could offer its assurance that careful consideration would be given to any Dominion-wide scheme, so far as it affected the people of Saskatchewan.

That, I submit, is a wise attitude to take pending knowledge of exactly what the legislation emanating from this parliament will be.

Mr. LADNER: Is a federal scheme referred to by the words "Dominion-wide"?

Mr. DUNNING: I have given my friend a lot of latitude; surely he does not need more. Just in conclusion, touching the point made by one of the hon. members for Winnipeg, I do not believe the present scheme to be perfect. I am not now suggesting improvements, which I think can be very much better suggested in the light of experience in operation.

Mr. HEAPS: Might I ask a question? Once the bill becomes effective, would not the nine provinces be required to give their consent to any change?

Mr. DUNNING: Not necessarily; I think the machinery of the law can be operated in such a manner as to enable us to deal with the matter in much the same manner as other joint matters between the Dominion and the provinces have from time to time been dealt with. Just recently there was a conference of the provinces interested in the Technical Education Act, and the views of the provinces and of the federal administrators of the act were taken into account. I believe that the minister concerned is now giving consideration to those views arrived at jointly by the responsible officers charged with the administration of that act and the representatives of the provinces. I do not apprehend very serious difficulty in that connection. I do plead this however, that we should get an old age pension scheme on the statute books of Canada; that so far as we can now see, the scheme outlined now represents a fair start on the problem. There can be no mistake; the people of Canada endorsed what we did in this House last year with regard to this matter, and endorsed it very emphatically. That being the case I submit that this bill represents a good place to start in order to deal effectively with this problem.

Mr. MILLAR: This may not be a good time to discuss the details of such a measure, but since it has been discussed at considerable length already I propose to offer a few general observations. This is a measure which I have very much delight in supporting. I have noticed during the last five years how easy it has been to get through legislation which makes the rich richer, and how difficult it has been to pass legislation which will assist those who are most in need. I am convinced that there is a malady which has attacked all countries; Canada has suffered perhaps as little as any, but this country is not entirely free from it. The will of the rich is imposed on those who are not able, either financially or otherwise, to protect themselves. It has made my heart sad sometimes when I sought relief for some real sufferer, perhaps a returned soldier suffering from a disability, only to find all sorts of difficulties placed in the way. I have a letter on my desk now from a returned soldier suffering a twenty-five per cent disability. He has a sick wife and a family to keep, and says, "All I want is a chance to earn a living", yet he does not get that chance. I have noticed that it is most difficult to get redress for such people, and therefore I am very pleased to support legislation which will assist those most in need.

I suppose there are those throughout the country who have been looking with a great deal of pleasure and satisfaction towards such measures as the reduction in the income tax, and I suppose there are those who have in other days looked for the protection given by an increased customs tariff. But I can assure the House that it means very much more to the old man and the old woman who have lived seventy years; who have passed through difficult times and through no personal fault are now destitute. It means to people of that kind a living; it means food and clothing, and throughout this country are thousands who are looking for this relief.

A great thinker in addressing an audience in the United States a short time ago pointed out that people are coming to a stage where they will not stand for the unequal distribution of wealth. He had noticed that to which I have referred. He instanced those who are drawing salaries of from $10,000 to $50,000 a year, and contrasted others working as hard, working longer hours, just as able in their own line, but only receiving one-tenth or less of the salary.

At some other time than to-night I shall perhaps have something to say about the tendency in this House to give pensions to those who are receiving now and who have received for years a very large salary, one of perhaps $8,000 or $10,000 per year. A salary so large is quite sufficient to enable them to provide for their old age, by insurance if not otherwise, but how readily a measure will pass this House increasing their salaries or providing them with a pension for their old age. That is the class of legislation to which I refer when I mention legislation which makes the rich richer, but this is a measure which helps the poor.

There is one clause in this resolution that I should like to criticise. Paragraph 7 reads:

> That the maximum pension payable shall be two hundred and forty dollars yearly, which shall be subject to reduction by the amount of the income of the pensioner in excess of one hundred and twenty-five dollars a year.

Thus if an old person who has reached the age of seventy should perform some small service and earn a hundred or two hundred dollars a year, that amount is deducted from his pension. Is not that a mistake? Why in the name of common sense should not aged persons, if they are industrious and willing to work in order to add a little to their income, be allowed to do so without being penalized? How will this provision work in most cases? In the majority of cases the old person will reason like this: If I earn $150 I will simply lose it to the government. The government will simply pay me that much less, so what is the use of working?

Mr. HEENAN: That is not correct.

Mr. MILLAR: The minister says that is not correct. I should like him to explain that point before I proceed.

Mr. HEENAN: The exemption is $125, so that if the aged person earns $150 he will only lose $25.

An hon. MEMBER: Deduction is made on the excess earned?

Mr. HEENAN: The amount earned in excess of $125. That would mean that if such person earns $250 more than the $240 he would be penalized to the extent of $125. That is to say that if a person earns $125, he will receive a pension of $240, making $365. If a person earned $126, he would lose $1.

Mr. HEAPS: If he earned $30 a month he would be entitled to $5 a year.

Mr. MILLAR: That is not much of an improvement. He would lose a part of what he earned if his income went above a certain amount.

Mr. HEENAN: Yes.

Mr. MILLAR: I think that is wrong in principle. When the pension is only $240 a year, a small part of what will suffice to keep body and soul together, why not delete this restriction altogether?

It has been pointed out sometimes that such measures as this are abused. I have no doubt there are persons who will take an unfair advantage of a law of this kind just as they will in the case of unemployed insurance. But I would point out that after all the number of such persons will be comparatively small. I have some other objections to this measure. I have noted the objection raised by other speakers that some provinces may not come in under the measure but the minister is right in saying that it is a start. This legislation is likely to pass the other House and perhaps it would be well not to be too critical at the present stage. In the light of experience it will be possible to amend the bill when it goes into effect, make it more workable, and give relief to a greater number.

Mr. NEILL: I will only detain the House a few minutes. I do not care who gets the credit for passing the proposed bill. As long as I can have the child and keep it, the paternity is of no concern to me. There has been a great deal of discussion along that line which I will not follow up.

There has been also a great deal of criticism by hon. gentlemen opposite, so much so that it can be crystallized into a general sentiment instead of being looked upon as merely expressing individual opinions, I think I am right in saying that the general trend of the opinion of hon. gentlemen opposite is that there should be a wholly federal scheme. I hope hon. members opposite will endeavour, now they are so agreed on such a policy, to imbue their friends in another House with their views. Because I have here the Hansard of last year, although I will not detain the House by reading it, showing that man after man got up in the other House last year and said that his sole objection to the bill was that it should be a provincial matter.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is a rule of the House that we are not allowed in debate to refer to the action of the other House on any of these matters. We have very carefully observed that rule on this side in this debate, and I think it should be just as strictly observed by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. NEILL: I will not stress the point, but I think it is a little late in the day to raise that issue.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think perhaps it should have been raised before. I notice that even ministers have transgressed the rule.

Mr. NEILL: The question has been discussed time and time again this session. Last session it was discussed not for one day but for weeks at a time. However, if my hon. friend wishes to adhere to the strict letter of the rules, I have no objection.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I know that if the Senate discussed our actions we would very speedily repudiate such a proceeding. I think we should be very careful on that point in our own discussion.

Mr. NEILL: I think if the hon. gentleman reads Hansard he will form a different opinion. However, I may perhaps be permitted to express the point in a somewhat different way, and say that those hon. gentlemen opposite who are now so strongly in favour of a wholly federal scheme will, I hope, use their influence with any friends they may possess in favour of that scheme. I can quote at least the views of their late leader, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, which I had not intended to do. Perhaps they may recall Mr. Meighen's remarks when speaking, in the district in British Columbia which I represent, he gave utterance to the following statement:

It was a matter for the provinces—

This is the opinion of the late leader of the party, which is now almost wholly in favour of a federal law.

It was a matter for the provinces and if they could not agree, then the Dominion can do nothing.

Further on he said:

It was just sham legislation. If the bill had become law no one would have got a dollar pension out of it. It was a sham and sham was written in perforated letters—

Why perforated letters?

—across four-fifths of the legislation of the King government.

And so on. Some hon. gentlemen made the assertion this afternoon that the Conservative candidates in British Columbia did not admit the charge of opposing the bill in this House. I have quoted the language of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen on the very first occasion, I think, when he spoke on old age pensions in British Columbia, although he did get a little more enthusiastic as time went on.

The question of cost was raised this afternoon and I will deal with that later on, but I just want to draw attention to it as I go by. Remember always that making the scheme a purely federal one will at least double the expense, which is one of the reasons which led to its failure last year. I am not saying this in any critical spirit against any particular hon. member. I have no doubt some hon. members are genuine in their desire to see a bill and a good bill passed. A few attacked it from a political aspect, and one or two endeavoured, by their belated statements in this House, to cover statements which they made on platforms throughout the country.

Several hon. gentlemen raised the point that the age limit should be sixty-five instead of seventy. Certainly it should be sixty-five, but we must walk before we run, and to make the age limit sixty-five would enormously increase the cost. We have it on record that Great Britain, which, so far as the British Empire is concerned, first initiated legislation of this character, began with the age limit at seventy, and the old age pension in Great Britain begins at seventy years to-day. Some people contradict that, stating that the age limit is sixty-five, but that is a separate and contributary scheme. Between sixty-five and seventy years of age, there is a sort of preliminary scheme which is contributary in character; but after people reach seventy years of age they drop their payments under that scheme and they come under the standard old age pension scheme which now, as at the beginning, in Great Britain still stands at seventy years of age. I would again point out that one hon. gentleman—although I do not admit his figures or his argument—demonstrated, at least to his own satisfaction, that to lower the age at which the pension would begin from seventy to sixty-five would increase the cost by ninety per cent. There again you have a ninety per cent increase in the expense.

An hon. member from British Columbia, to whom I will not give the publicity he would like by mentioning his name, said that it was not the right way to deal with a scheme of this kind to consider the age and destitution of the person, but that his physical condition should be taken into consideration. He suggested that the Minister of Labour should have discretionary powers to take in a man or a woman who was under the age of seventy, provided that he or she suffered from some physical disability. In other words, the Minister of Labour could, I suppose, by order in council or on his own initiative—I do not envy him his job—decide that someone was seventy when he was only fifty-five. That is a most admirable position for someone around election time. I would point out that this measure is called an act respecting old age pensions. It is not an act respecting the blind which is a very worthy object and one that should be taken up some day, the sooner the better so far as I am concerned. It is not an act respecting cripples or those suffering from any other disability, nor even an act respecting soldiers. It is an act respecting destitute old people, and I think the act is big enough to be passed without our bringing in other aspects of disability with which it has nothing to do, but which tend to becloud the issue, increase enormously the expense and perhaps render the whole thing inoperative.

Another hon. member said that a pension of $20 per month was too little. I know it is; I agree with him that $20 a month is too little; but we must begin small and we know that it will never get less. One or two other hon. members said that the pension should be raised to at least $30 a month, an increase of 50 per cent again. I will deal with those figures later on.

I think one hon. member from British Columbia stated that in our gaols we allowed a dollar a day for keeping each prisoner. Being more familiar perhaps with gaols than he is. I would point out that there is a reason for that. To begin with in gaols there is a certain amount of extra expense for fortifications, guards, bars and police that have to be provided. But there is another aspect of the matter and perhaps I am not giving away my province when I say this. There has been a movement there for some years past to induce the different municipalities who do their own policing, to turn over that obligation to the province, at a price, of course. The movement is gaining some headway and it is desirable from the point of view of the government that they get this all within their control. They think in that way they can control it better and do the work more cheaply than the municipalities. The price used to be only fifty cents a day and now they have raised it to a dollar. The reason is not because it costs a dollar now any more than it did before, but because it makes the municipalities more willing to turn over the responsibility to the province. That is the reason why they have jacked up the price of keeping a prisoner, which price of course has to be paid by the municipalities, to a dollar a day. It does not really cost as much as that to keep him.

An hon. member, from British Columbia again, trotted forward—no, he was ashamed to bring forward the argument he used in this connection on the platform, but he tried to cover it up in this way. He brought forward the question of a widow who was not a British subject before her marriage. On every platform in the campaign I was assailed by the idea that this legislation had deliberately and heartlessly legislated against the poor woman, say a Scandinavian who had come to this country and been a good, honest and faithful wife to a British subject for twenty years and who had raised a large family—the number varied from time to time—and then when her husband died no provision was made for her because she was an alien before her marriage. Some speakers were really ignorant, but hon. members knew that was a complete mis-statement of fact. None knew better that that was put in not to hurt any widows but to protect them. As I think someone explained this afternoon, it was put in to cover the case of a Canadian woman who married an American. As at least every lawyer knows she then takes the nationality of her husband, and therefore, when he dies, she still remains an American woman and ineligible for a pension. It was this case that the bill provided for. In that case she could in five years get back and renew her nationality with expense, worry and nothing to eat in the meantime. We provided that while she was technically an alien, an American, she was allowed to go back to her own British nationality. Therefore it was a very well thought out thing, but it was thrown against us that we were not taking care of the poor woman. In his desire this afternoon to confuse the issue, he said there might be a case, yes perhaps one in a thousand or five thousand— of a woman with a dual nationality where after the decease of her British husband she would still have both a British and a Japanese or a German nationality. How many times would that occur in a thousand years? Any difficulty of course would be obviated by the fact that if she returned to Japan—and only in that way could she regain her Japanese nationality—she would cease to draw the pension.

Mr. LADNER: My hon. friend seems reluctant to name members to whom he refers. I do not know why he lacks such courage. I ask him whether my statement of law with respect to the national status of dual citizenship is not correct, because he knows.

Mr. NEILL: It is possibly correct that a woman or man can have two nationalities, such as British and German. If they went back to Germany, they would be Germans. The same might be true as regards Japan. It was the case until a year or two ago and probably it would be found that they could easily regain their Japanese nationality. But that could happen only if they left Canada, and if they leave Canada, this legislation says that they lose their pension anyhow. The chances of that happening would be one in a thousand. That was not the contention and well does the hon. gentleman know it. The contention made on the platform was that we were discriminating against a large number of decent people who had come into this country and married Canadians.

Mr. LADNER: I wish to take exception, on a question of privilege, to the remarks of the hon. member. That was the contention made and my hon. friend, whose casuistry and sophistry are so apparent on the platform, has sometimes to have these facts clearly stated. The contention which I made, and made in his constituency, was precisely the one I made in the House to-day, and none other.

Mr. NEILL: I seem to have touched somebody on the raw. Another criticism that was made on the platform was this. He said —I am reading from his own party paper:

> The act they proposed said that pensions would be paid in accordance with regulations thereunder. The act was so involved in a technical way that nobody could get a pension under it.

In a technical way!

> To obtain the pension a person had to confess to being 70 years of age.

Would not that be a terrible thing?

> The women would not like that. They do not like to give their age.

And so on, and so on. A moment later he added:

> The Senate did not kill the bill. All they did was to bury it. The Liberals' old age pension bill was a sham and was designed solely as a vote catcher.

That is the bill which he now says he is heartily supporting!

There is one other clause with which I would like to deal. I think this was the section which he referred to as the most damning in the whole act, and that is section 9. That is the one which empowers the board to claim the estate of a deceased pensioner under certain conditions. I think he used the language—I took it down at the time—that this meant confiscation under all circumstances. That will show in Hansard tomorrow if it is put down as I heard it. I think the hon. minister questioned the accuracy of his statement, and I think he then modified it, but that was his original statement which would have gone out to the country without contradiction if the minister had not risen—that this section meant confiscation under all circumstances.

Mr. LADNER: The hon. gentleman is as incapable of clearly stating the facts here as he was on the hustings in his own constituency. I did not say that. The section is quite clear as to what is meant. I explained very clearly the nature of the effect of the section which I described as being a confiscatory section, calculated to confiscate the home, which it does, but not confiscation under all circumstances. Such a contention is clearly ridiculous.

Mr. NEILL: Hansard, if it has not been tampered with, will reveal the truth tomorrow.

Mr. LADNER: Mr. Chairman, I ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw that.

Mr. BENNETT: Hansard is not tampered with. The idea of any man suggesting that!

Mr. LADNER: The hon. gentleman from Comox-Alberni may indulge in that practice, but I do not. I ask that the hon. gentleman withdraw that statement, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: I personally did not hear the hon. gentleman make that statement. If he did make the statement which he will know himself, I think in fairness to the reportorial staff he should withdraw it.

Mr. NEILL: What I meant was this, Mr. Chairman. It is a well known custom that we are allowed to revise our speeches to make them read a little better, by putting in a word here or extracting a word there.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not tampering.

Mr. NEILL: What I meant was that if the statement has not been corrected, Hansard will show that it was as I have stated. I had no intention whatever—I cannot emphasize this too strongly—of making any reflection on the reportorial staff.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): Would it not be wise, Mr. Chairman, to ask the hon. gentleman to express his views on old age pensions without doing so much quibbling about what certain hon. members said on the hustings in the province of British Columbia? I am sick of listening to this sort of thing all day. It is a shame to be wasting the time of the House listening to such bunk, and it is pure bunk. The hon. member should not be listened to at all. He is quite capable of expressing himself on the subject of old age pensions. He did it in the committee, and he should keep to the subject before the Chair. We should not have to listen to this.

Mr. NEILL: It was not the hon. gentleman who has just sat down who had to suffer from these unfair allegations in the campaign.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): It is taking the time of the House that should not be taken.

Mr. NEILL: I was going on to explain about this case of a deceased pensioner. I really think it is deserving of being explained in the fullest way. It has been alleged that after the man dies, the government steps in and takes his property. What are the facts? He can leave it to any other pensioner he likes. He does not need to be a blood relation or anything of that kind. If he has a little property he can leave it to an old friend or chum as long as it goes to help the scheme, which in turn will be able to pay bigger pension later on. That is all right. Then they are allowed to leave it to any one who has helped them in their old age by ever so little. It does not even need to be in cash. It says in cash or otherwise, I think. Supposing a man says: "Well, there is an old couple, and their pension is not very big. I have a cottage that I do not need very much, and I will let them have it rent free." It would apply to that. Or a son might not be able to give a cash contribution, but he might be able to give house-room to his father or mother or his mother-in-law. In a case like that, however little the contribution was, if it was at all a genuine attempt to carry out his filial obligations, he would be allowed to get the full amount of what the deceased pensioner left.

One hon. gentleman opposite—I will not put it nearer than that, to save interruptions—asked, what about the grandchild? The hon. member suddenly produced a grandchild of the pensioner, who is in a state of destitution also, and when the old man died, who was to keep the grandchild? I recall in one of Mrs. Nellie McClung's books a lady speaking on the platform on behalf of the franchise for women, and some man said, "It would never do. Who would mind the baby while the woman went out to vote?" And the lady replied with a good deal of aptness, "Why, I think I could get the same person to mind the baby that minds it when I go out to pay my taxes." I think the same thing is true here. I think the same people who were keeping this grandchild before the old man died would continue to keep it after his death. They could not have been living on the old man. If they were totally destitute, they would have been looked after in the home, or taken care of in some private family.

We have a branch of the federal government which is devoted wholly to endeavouring to get people in this Canada of ours to buy annuities. Why should we do that? It is a case of a man taking all his money and handing it over to the government and getting a certain annuity for life.

Mr. BENNETT: No. He pays weekly or monthly contributions as the case may be.

Mr. NEILL: He can pay it in a lump sum if he likes.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, if he has the money.

Mr. NEILL: Should we discourage that because when he dies his grandchild will have nothing to get at all? Why not oppose that too? Let me give you an instance that comes home to both of us, and this is in British Columbia, with which we are more familiar. When the hon. gentleman talks about this iniquitous clause that is going to damn this bill, does he know or does he not know, or will he not tell, that in British Columbia we have what is called an Old Men's Home, and you get admission to it by somebody—usually the municipalities—undertaking to pay so much. Sometimes if the people are without the scope of a municipality the government takes them in free. But before that poor old man goes to that home he has to sign over to the government not only all the property he possesses, such as his land or something of that kind, but all the property he may ever become possessed of. He may come into a fortune while in the Old Men's Home, but it is all assigned and turned over to the government when he dies. I am not saying that that is a good scheme but I am saying that the scheme in the bill was a good deal better than that because we did allow the man's property to go to his friends, relations and so on.

Mr. IRVINE: Does my hon. friend know of a similar clause in the legislation of Great Britain?

Mr. NEILL: As to the government receiving deceased pensioners' estates?

Mr. IRVINE: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: I do not know. I want to sum up from the point of view of making it a federal scheme. As we know, the difficulty is the high cost. Now, let us lump the whole criticism together and see where we stand. As we know, it was partly the high cost that made its passage doubtful in the other House last year. Now it is proposed to make the scheme purely a federal one. It was estimated last year that it would cost $11,500,000 a year. Making it a purely federal scheme would bring the cost to $23,000,000. Let us accept that. Let us also accept the suggestion that we should give this relief to people sixty years of age. That would increase it ninety per cent and bring the cost up to $43,700,000. Then we come to the hon. member who says that we should raise it from $20 to $30 a month. That would bring the cost up to $66,500,000. Then there is the whole of the administration cost. Of course if we take it over as a federal scheme we will have to run it ourselves. Then there were one or two other minor suggestions which, if adopted, would bring the cost up to $70,000,000; that is, if we accept the various suggestions which have been made, and the government has been urged to accept them in a fair spirit of criticism, that would mean that the cost would be nearly $70,000,000. What does that mean? It means that the bill would never pass this House, would never pass the Senate and would never pass the country. The result would be that the very object of the bill to give relief to the old people would be nullified entirely, because we would never get anywhere with a proposal to expend $70,000,000 annually on the scheme.

Mr. BRADY: Being a new member of the House, Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to discuss in any way the old age pension scheme, as I am not familiar with the clauses of the bill. I have listened to the discussion with the greatest care, hoping to gain from it an elucidation of the clauses of the resolution that has been introduced. The mass of material presented to us to-night has reminded me of a well-known fable. A deer, having been wounded in the forest, retired to a comfortable shady place where there were enough luscious grass and tender leaves to keep him from hunger and starvation until his wounds were healed. But a great number of his friends came from the surrounding forest to sympathize with him, and one suggested one thing and one another in order to give him relief. They consoled and sympathized with him in his sickness, but it was not long until that deer died—not from his wounds but from starvation. And so it seems with the old age pension scheme.

I would not have risen to-night had I not heard one thing in particular that the Minister of Railways said. After this discussion we are convinced that the position of the Conservative party has been emphatically and clearly enunciated—that they are behind this scheme for old age pensions, whether it be under federal control or in conjunction with the provinces. I wish the minister were here to correct me if I am wrong, because I wrote down the words he uttered. In referring to this matter he said that they, the opposition, were not in favour of the old age pension scheme unless after consultation with the various provincial legislatures. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that words bearing that meaning were uttered in this House by hon. members on this side. If they were, Mr. Chairman, I would oppose the proposition, because personally I feel that we are wasting precious time on a matter in respect to which there is absolute unanimity, and such unanimity has been expressed in this House to-night.

I was impressed by the words of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps). I felt that he expressed what must have taken place in this House last year when he said there was a great difference of opinion in regard to different clauses of the bill. However, I think we have reached the stage now that it is not a question of the clauses of the bill, because these can be discussed when the bill comes before us. It is not a question of what took place on the hustings last year nor a question of reading reports from last year's speeches which have no relation to the question now before the House. The question is, are we decided, are we unanimous that this old age pension scheme should be put into force and that even if not perfect, it will be given a chance. That is the question, Mr. Chairman, and I have heard the leader of the opposition emphatically say that we were behind it if it were decided that the provincial legislatures should participate in the scheme with the federal government. I regret that we have had so much sophistry and so much discussion; it makes it look to me as if we are not sincere. What does it matter who is to have the honour of passing the old age pension scheme? The point is that throughout the length and breadth of Canada there are people waiting for the verdict of this House. Them we must consider, not whether it shall be a bill of ten clauses or a bill of twenty clauses, but a bill pledged to these people, an old age pension scheme.

Mr. BENNETT: I would not rise to address the committee at this late hour were it not that in the recent election there was so much misrepresentation of the Conservative party and of certain members thereof in this House during the last session on the subject now under consideration. So great was that misrepresentation that it is absolutely essential that in self defence at least one should offer some observations in respect of the matter.

It is for instance very much to be regretted that an hon. gentleman in one of the Ontario constituencies charged that I opposed the old age pensions bill. Nothing is more certain than this, that if under our democratic institutions it is impossible to discuss in parliament a measure of this kind without liability to a charge of opposition to the measure itself, then indeed the value of those institutions, the value of parliament will have passed, and we shall have become mere rubber stamps, registering the will of governments. It is of the utmost importance that every phase of a question of this character should be thoroughly discussed. I find on consulting Hansard of last year, at page 1975, that I spoke as follows:

> I apologize for trespassing again to-night upon the time of the House, but I feel very strongly on this subject. I am deeply interested in it; I desire to see it succeeed. I am convinced that it cannot succeed without the co-operation of all the provinces, unless the Dominion, in defiance of our constitutional jurisdiction as voiced by the Deputy Minister of Justice, sees fit to undertake the whole responsibility, which would involve us in an expenditure of $23,000,000 per annum.

I said that because I had previously read the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice —with which, of course, I did not necessarily agree—that there was some question as to our constitutional power in the premises. But I pointed out that if the bill as then introduced by the Minister of Public Works of the day, acting as Minister of Labour, had passed into law, no single individual in Canada could have benefited by the legislation. And on the hustings the Conservative party repeated that statement. For it is a fact that cannot be denied that had that measure been passed by the Senate and given the royal assent, becoming a statute, there was not a single individual in Canada who would have received one cent under it. And why? Because not a single province had enacted old age pensions legislation.

Now there is this to be said, and every hon. member will, I am sure, seriously consider it. To what extent should the parliament of Canada by legislation enforce its will upon provincial legislatures? That is a question that affects the whole structure of our constitutional system, and if we enact statutes whereby we declare that a certain class of people within the province may receive the benefits of federal legislation only on condition that the province shall refrain from crossing a single "t" or dotting an "i," merely doing what we tell them to do, then the provincial legislatures are deprived of the very power which, under our constitution, they should possess. And this statute proposes to make those provincial legislatures, who desire to avail themselves of the advantages of this law, nothing more nor less than registering automatic machines to carry out the will of this parliament. Let there be no misunderstanding about that. We are imposing our will upon the provincial legislatures.

Mr. HEAPS: What does the hon. member mean by imposing our will upon them? There is no provincial legislature which is bound to accept this proposal.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely my hon. friend with his astuteness sees that that is the very point I am making. No legislature is bound to accept the proposal, but if it does it must accept it in its entirety without crossing a "t" or dotting an "i". It must take the measure as it is presented by this parliament. In other words, as I say, this parliament imposes its will on the legislature of any province that accepts the measure.

Mr. HEAPS: Would the will of parliament not be more wholly enforced upon the province if the scheme were a purely federal one?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, because every federal statute is of dominion wide application; in its operations it extends to every part of the country. But that is the important difference; for a federal statute does not leave its application to the will of any provincial legislature, either to accept or to reject its terms. I was happy the other evening to hear the observations of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine), who was in the House when the committee reported on this subject originally a couple of years ago. That report, following on the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice, was predicated upon the idea that a provincial conference would be held so that we might arrive at some definite conclusion whereby we could prepare a satisfactory measure to place upon the statute books, a measure that would have federal application. The difference between a federal and a provincial statute is this: one is operative solely within the boundaries of the province, while the federal statute applies to the Dominion at large. If therefore the province is compelled to accept a measure passed by this parliament, or, on the other hand, to decline it in toto, then the legislative power of that province is curtailed and restricted to that extent, and its legislators no longer exercise their jurisdiction but are subject to the will of this body. My hon. friend (Mr. Heaps) will clearly see that. That being so we did point out last year that under the circumstances it was desirable that a conference should be held. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) the other evening read into Hansard an observation of mine, dissociated from its text, in which I asked the Prime Minister not to force the measure last year. I implored him to take steps to see that the report of the committee should be carried out and a conference of representatives of the provinces held, so that some measure of uniform application might be drawn up. But it was charged throughout the country from one end to the other, and in some of the Ontario constituencies particularly, that the Minister of Finance was opposed to old age pensions. I can only repeat what I have just now read. If anyone will take the trouble to refer to Hansard and to read in its entirety the observations I made in this regard—I hope no one will do anything of the sort—he will find that I gave a considerable amount of attention to the matter. I had had an opportunity of studying the subject at first-hand in England, and after many inquiries I had obtained a good deal of information. There were two classes of cases to be dealt with: one, the case of those over seventy years of age who would get the benefit of the legislation if the provinces passed an old age pensions measure. I urged a contributory system and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was good enough to felicitate me on what he graciously described, as my helpful observations. The matter was not of a controversial nature. But I realized that under any contributory system there are in every country numbers of men and women between the ages of sixty-five and seventy who would find it impossible to make any contributions, not having the financial ability to do so. And in the very closing words of my remarks, which I made to the House on that occasion, I used the following language which I now desire to repeat:

I think the government, therefore, will be well advised perhaps to release the whip on its own members and let the opinion of the House as a whole determine whether or not it is desirable at this session to push into this matter or, in the light of a subsequent conference between the provincial and Dominion authorities, arrive at a conclusion which will enable us to place on our statute books legislation of a character that will redound to the credit of this country and that will maintain the confidence and self-respect of the future citizens of this Dominion by encouraging the practice of economy and thrift, while providing for the aged of to-day by suitable contributions to provincial schemes.

That is to say, in order to meet the case of those who could not immediately make contributions because of financial inability, we should ourselves make the necessary grant of money under the circumstances. I referred at that time to a speech of the Hon. Winston Churchill, Chancellor of the Exchequer, to show that millions of pounds were involved in the scheme in operation in England, and at the same time I mentioned the observations of Neville Chamberlain upon the same matter.

Now, let us for a moment forget all about the past. It is not a matter of great importance to me that I was misrepresented. I do not care except for the fact that I owe a duty to friends of mine to correct wrong impressions of this character. I am quite content that the record should speak for itself and I am not concerned about what was said in the late elections. I am however concerned that we should have a clear appreciation and a full understanding of just what we are doing in this legislation. We are not granting old age pensions. That is number one. That, we have said in this resolution, is to be done by the provinces. All we are doing is to place upon the statutes books a provision whereby a sum of money will be granted to any province that sees fit to pass legislation in terms set forth by us. That, to all intents and purposes, is a federal scheme, without having the advantages and benefits of a federal scheme. In the province of Alberta it was a Labour member of the legislature who moved its rejection although at present the Alberta legislature is giving the matter further consideration. It was Mr. White, Labour member from the city of Calgary, who moved the resolution in the legislature condemning this provincial legislation, and I have found out since why that was done. It was done because they said, "This is a very simple matter; you are endeavouring to pass this on to the municipalities, and that is just what the municipalities do not want you to do." They say that "If this is to be a scheme let it be a federal scheme; if there is to be such a scheme let the Dominion take the responsibility for it, and do not endeavour to place the responsibility on the provinces and deny them the right to formulate their own scheme. Do not give them a grant of money without permitting them to have something to say in the matter." That is the situation, and there can be no doubt about it; anyone who reads the bill or the resolution will find that that is so.

I regret to say further that during the last election one of the successful candidates, now sitting in this House, published an advertisement in which he pointed out that it was a "board of strategy" which induced gentlemen in another chamber to destroy the bill. Misrepresentations of that character are not calculated to enhance the value of our institutions. Mr. Meighen has said publicly on many occasions, and he is not now here to repeat it, that he had no part in what happened, nor was he advised of it. He has further said that it was against his protests, when he did hear of it, that the action took place in another chamber which resulted in disaster to that measure. This side of the House gave its support to that measure after pointing out its weaknesses; we did not ask for a division, and for myself I then stated, as I now state, that I believe in an old age pension scheme. But I do not believe in an old age pension scheme based upon a mere granting of money to a provincial authority, thus imposing our views upon them willy nilly. There must be an exercise of some legislative discretion by these legislatures if they desire to pass a measure of this kind, but that is denied them; they must either accept or reject. They must take it as it is or drop it; they cannot get a sou unless they take it as we give it to them, and if they take it in that way they may get some money. That is the position, and that is what the leader of this party pointed out the other day.

Mr. ROBB: May I ask a question? In what respect does this measure differ from the act giving aid to agriculture and the good roads assistance, which were supported by my hon. friend in 1913 and 1914?

Mr. BENNETT: I was going to begin my answer by calling my hon. friend my dear friend; I feel almost affection for him, because I have known him so long, and he is always kindly and courteous. The fact that someone passed legislation with respect to agriculture and highways does not in any sense make this legislation good, because there was a conference with respect to those measures.

Mr. ROBB: There was no conference.

Mr. BENNETT: Pardon me, but I happened to be present, in a very unofficial way, at one of those conferences. I do not know whether or not all of the provinces were represented, but I do know that many of them were.

Mr. DUNNING: Surely, my hon. friend will not say that the provinces agreed to the terms of that federal legislation?

Mr. BENNETT: I am coming to that. The provinces were granted aid for highways and agriculture because the highways were of an interprovincial character, and were so intended to be. My friends will recall the circumstances; it was felt that great trunk highways of an interprovincial character, which really had a federal aspect, should be assisted out of the federal treasury, and the conditions under which assistance should be given were laid down by regulation and agreement. With respect to agriculture the position is that under the British North America Act jurisdiction is given both the province and the Dominion, and the Dominion has been steadily granting aid to agriculture. But there came a time when some of the provinces urged that the obligations of a local character were so vast that they desired aid from the federal treasury, and this aid was granted under conditions which were agreed to by the representatives of the federal and provincial authorities. But that is a very different situation from that which now confronts us. Here all we are doing is placing on the statute books a provision by which a grant is to be made, covering half the money paid for old age pensions, but the terms and conditions under which the provinces will have to carry on their scheme are fixed by us.

Mr. DUNNING: As in the other cases.

Mr. BENNETT: In those cases the terms were fixed by regulation and agreement, but this is a measure which says willy nilly, "Accept or reject." If they reject, what happens? The difficulty is that they still pay.

Mr. KING (Kootenay). The conditions are the same as in those other cases.

Mr. BENNETT: But in the other cases all the provinces availed themselves of the benefits of the legislation.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They will do the same in this case.

Mr. BENNETT: But the point I desire to make is that which was pointed out by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) last year. First of all you should not have this parliament thus imposing its will on the provinces, and giving them no discretion at all; then, if we are going to make a grant of money and impose the terms under which it may be used, let us have our own scheme and not a hybrid plan, partly provincial and partly federal. That is the position, and that is the reason my leader made his observations the other evening with regard to this matter, with which I wholly agree. I say to this House that there is no chance of a proper scheme with respect to old age pensions being made successful by the provinces without making further demands upon the federal treasury. In that regard I have had the advice of men who do not live in this country at all; they have studied the question from every aspect and tell me that if we desire to make the scheme a success, it cannot possibly be done by the provinces alone. As was pointed out in the Alberta legislature, the burden would be passed on to the municipalities and added to the tax bills, so it must in the long run be borne by further applications made to the federal authorities. That is the position as I see it with respect to this matter.

So far as I am concerned, notwithstanding the evident and manifest difficulties in the way, having pointed out this situation I propose to support this measure, but I do so only after bringing to the attention of the House the inevitable consequences. It was a great English statesman who said that under our modern democracy if one was right he could never afford to say so, because that invited a certain situation which brought about a great many difficulties. I will not elaborate the statement, but some day I will read the exact words to the House, because I think they will be of interest.

This I will say, however: If free discussion in parliament is to be subjected to the misrepresentations which took place with respect to the attitude of the Conservative party in this matter last fall, it will be most injurious to the maintenance of free institutions. Who will say that a discussion upon the measure such as took place last year was not a benefit? Even the Prime Minister himself was good enough to felicitate the hon. member for West Calgary for the observations and contributions he made during the debate, and yet what happened? Someone goes out in the hustings, to a constituency containing a lot of labouring men, and into the railway shops, where he reads two or three lines from a speech. That is what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) did on the fifteenth of this month, when he read a few lines and said the hon. member for West Calgary was opposed to the measure. My constituents know better, but the public is sometimes not so well informed. Someone holds an official position for a very brief time, as can easily happen under our institutions, and the public attach more importance to what he says than otherwise would be the case. I do think that in the interests of fair discussion it is not desirable that that habit or practice should continue. It reminds one of the advertisements sometimes seen in newspapers, wherein someone says that someone else has said very offensive things which are not true. It seems to me that these things must be remedied, because if we cannot discuss these matters on their merits and demerits we will injure the very institutions we are attempting to assist. That is the reason I again pointed out to-night the real situation with respect to this matter. Right Hon. Arthur Meighen was charged with saying, in Vancouver, that this was a sham, but what he did say was quite different. In elaborating his speech, he said that in so far as giving a single dollar to a single Canadian man or woman by virtue of this legislation, it was a sham.

Mr. THORSON: May I ask the hon. member a question? Am I correct in saying that the attitude of the Conservative party in the last election on this issue was that there should first be a conference with the provinces; that they should agree upon a scheme of co-operation, and that after that agreement was arrived at the Dominion should proceed with this scheme of old age pensions?

Mr. BENNETT: Answering the question of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Thorson), I will say first that in the last election it was the policy of the Conservative party that there should first be a conference. They pointed out that this parliament had unanimously agreed there should be a conference, and that the report dealing with it was put upon the table of this House. That report can now be read by the hon. gentleman if he so desires. That is the answer to number one. Then, the gentlemen who had the matter in hand had agreed that it was highly desirable that a conference should be held; the committee had considered the matter and provision was made in the report itself whereby members of the conference who were not elected to the House might come back to the conference, and upon further consideration of the matter by the conference legislation would be predicated. That was the policy of the Conservative party. What has the hon. gentleman (Mr. Thorson) had suggested to him that he should now ask?

Mr. THORSON: I am reading from a report of the speech delivered by the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen at Vancouver on August 17:

> The meeting closed with what Meighen himself described as "the most strenuous day of my life", and it closed his speaking program on the Pacific coast. He indicated his intention: First to call a conference between the Dominion and provincial governments to work out an old age pension scheme along the lines of the recommendations of a special parliamentary committee.

Was that the policy of the Conservative party in the last election?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member has again asked a question, thanks to the slip which was passed to him so ostentatiously a moment ago, and he has read a speech with which he is not very familiar representing that Mr. Meighen's policy was that there should be a conference between the provinces and the Dominion in furtherance of the report of the select parliamentary committee. That was his policy. Now that is the Conservative policy which was not accepted, we will say, by the people, and this government is now dealing with the matter on its own responsibility by placing upon the statute books an act that imposes upon the will of each legislature the will of this parliament if they accept it.

Mr. THORSON: May I ask the hon. member—

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend can make his speech afterwards.

Mr. THORSON: May I ask the hon. member another question?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman can make his speech afterwards. I do not propose to be catechized by the hon. gentleman, eminent though he may be as a cross-examiner.

Mr. THORSON: Am I to take it that the hon. member for West Calgary does not wish to answer the further question which I desire to ask him?

Mr. BENNETT: That is a very cheap form of endeavor to get a reputation for high courage.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman read a speech of Mr. Meighen's upon which he asked me a question, and he asked two others. I think I have acted fairly in answering them. I think that if there is any member of this House who is willing to answer questions it is myself, but I do not propose to be catechized or cross-examined by any counsel in a case of this kind.

I would say that at the moment we have placed our views as to this legislation before this parliament and the Canadian people. Until every legislature in Canada acts each province will or will not have an old age pension depending upon the action of that legislature, and there may be one province that has and another province that has not. That is the reason the suggestion was made by the leader of the opposition the other evening. I am most desirous there should be placed upon the statute books of this country a measure that is workable and useful. There are two considerations to be borne in mind. First of all we must consider those who are coming up to manhood and growing older, and secondly the class that can no longer contribute. I believe in a contributory system—I have never hesitated to say that I believe in it. The father of the old age pensions scheme of England said that without it you are doing a great injury to the very people whom you would benefit. I believe that; my reading induces me more and more to believe it is right. When the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) speaks of annuities I venture again to point out what I referred to last year and it is this—that a small contribution made by men from month to month and week to week that will ensure them an annuity at sixty-five or seventy years of age is one of the most desirable things that you can have in any country. It is true that the Australian system has been changed, and they have now gone on a contributory basis. The Department of Labour furnished last year a little memorandum showing what each country in the world was doing. I suggest to the hon. minister that it might be desirable to reprint it in order that the House might have the benefit of that information. I did not have that information at the time I made a few observations last year based largely on information collected from the report of the select committee appointed in Massachusetts, and from the documents that were laid before the English House when the last measure was being considered by them.

Now, it might be well to look on the political side of the matter. You know what took place in Australia under conditions such as these. You are going to have a system that is not contributory. An election is coming on. They go out and say that more money should be given, that $20 is not enough. "Well, we will give them $25 if we get into power," says the hon. member for Regina.

Mr. DUNNING: Pardon me—

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend is not premier yet. I was simply pointing out what might be said with respect to such a matter as this. That is the position. That is what happened in Australia. Each party tried to—

Mr. HEAPS: May I ask my hon. friend a question?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. HEAPS: Can the hon. gentleman give any evidence of the statement he has just made? Because I understand the increase in the old age pension in Australia came about as a result of the report of a commission which inquired into the amount being given.

Mr. BENNETT: If my hon. friend will refer to the Statesmen's Year Book it will give him, I think, the information I took from it and which I quoted last year. I do not happen to have it with me; it is among my papers upstairs. A commission was appointed but the commission had no power to pay money, and so the contending parties, the government and the opposition, were endeavouring to outbid each other in the matter of old age pensions, and in this particular election we have an illustration—

Mr. HEAPS: Is it not a fact though that the commission recommended an increase in the old age pensions in Australia?

Mr. BENNETT: The commission did that, but the general election had no reference to the commission, and the contending leaders were intending to secure the popular vote by promising to make an increase in old age pensions. Those are the facts. Consider what would happen in Canada.

Mr. THORSON: The hon. member seems to be willing to submit to cross-examination from other members.

Mr. BENNETT: This interruption is wholly out of order. The hon. gentleman has still something to learn, great though he may be. I only suggest to him that I have answered three questions of his, and when I declined to submit myself to cross-examination it was not because I in any sense feared the astuteness of that cross-examination or any of his questions. The hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) in asking me a question with respect to the Australian system, was endeavouring to correct what he conceived to be a misunderstanding of the situation on my part. That, I think, is the correct way to put it. But I desire to point out the political possibilities of a situation such as this. That is what happened in Australia where a non-contributory system was abandoned and the contributory system insisted upon. Because where you have each individual making some contribution he begins to realize what I endeavoured to say yesterday, that all contributions by the state mean taxation, and an expenditure of the money of the people, great or small, poor or rich. That is what I desire to make clear to this House. What I rose to say was I think it is highly desirable that we should have at least not to assert that men in this House oppose measures which they supported merely for the sake of getting a little support from those who are vitally affected. I suffered from it; other hon. members suffered from it. I have the papers; I was going to use them, but I will not engage in acrimonious discussion in respect to the matter because life is too short and the affairs of state too important for that. But the fact is that an effort was made during the last election to lead the people to believe that the Conservatives were opposed to an old age pension scheme and in some cases the effort succeeded.

Mr. DUNNING: But they defeated it.

Mr. BENNETT: Once more the hon. member for Regina does himself a great injustice. There is a very old saying: "One may smile, and smile, and be the villain still." The villainy in the piece in this incident is to have the people believe that because the House passed this measure without a dissenting voice and because in another place adverse action was taken not wholly by that party, the Conservatives defeated the measure. The Conservative party did not defeat the measure. It has never defeated such a measure and, so far as I know, it never will. We on this side of the House are a unit in supporting the measure and, so far as I know, from the observations that have been made, the Conservative party will continue to be in that spirit and to support the measure.

Mr. DUNNING: Can my hon. friend name one Conservative member in another place who supported the measure?

Mr. BENNETT: The leader of the Conservative party during the recent parliament, Senator Robertson, supported the measure.

Mr. DUNNING: I think the Parliamentary Guide describes Senator Robertson as a Labour member.

Mr. BENNETT: That may be, but he was a member of a Conservative administration in 1921 and one of the leaders in the Senate. The Parliamentary Guide has described the Minister of Railways by various titles in days gone by.

Mr. DUNNING: All correct.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, he is a chameleon indeed. That is all that may be fairly said.

Mr. MANION: We have lots of Labour members supporting us.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely and we shall have more. That is all I have to say. I rose merely for the purpose of endeavouring to refute the observations that were published throughout the country, and out of fairness to those to whom I have been largely indebted for support in days gone by and whose confidence I hope to continue to receive in days to come, I wish to go on record as objecting to being thus misrepresented in common with hon. members who sit to the left of the Speaker at this time.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I quite agree with my hon. friend that in the conduct of discussions of this kind, not only in the House but in the country, as nearly as possible an accurate report of what is said by members on the other side should be given. As my hon. friend referred particularly to discussions that took place in Ontario, and as it was my privilege to attend a number of meetings in that province, I want to say that, so far as I was able to hear the discussions in Ontario, I heard no misrepresentations whatever. I do not know the riding to which the hon. gentleman refers.

Mr. BENNETT: I have not in my desk but I have upstairs the papers giving the report of a public meeting at which the Minister of Railways was present, and at which the statement was made that I had opposed the old age pension legislation. I said that that was either maliciously untrue or ignorantly made, and then a long newspaper advertisement appeared.

Mr. DUNNING: I never made any such statement.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member was present.

Mr. DUNNING: I was not present.

Mr. BENNETT: Then I will say that the newspaper reported the hon. gentleman as being present.

Mr. SANDERSON: Perhaps I can throw some light on the situation. I believe the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) is referring to me and, if he is, he may say so. At a meeting in South Perth, at which the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) was present, I stated that the hon. member for West Calgary spoke against the old age pension resolution as brought into the House of Commons last March. I repeat that to-night on the floor of this House and I am prepared to defend the advertisement to which he has referred and to speak of that later. I have the advertisement with me and if I may be permitted to-night, I will read the advertisement and I will take back nothing I said in it.

Mr. BENNETT: In that case we shall have a really good time here between now and one o'clock. I will deal with the hon. member.

Mr. SANDERSON: All right. Do not think I am afraid of you.

Mr. ELLIOTT: As regards the discussions which took place in Ontario and which it was my privilege to hear, there were no misrepresentations whatever. I want to say to my hon. friend and to other hon. gentlemen on that side of the House that I am glad now to know that both sides are unanimously in favour of this measure. We have at last reached common ground.

Mr. BENNETT: We were there last year.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The people did not think so.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly.

Mr. HANSON: That is what you told them.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I want to say to my hon. friend and other gentlemen on the opposite side who have complained of being misrepresented or misunderstood, that they may have been misrepresented. I take it when they say that they were misunderstood, they were correct in so saying. But the people of the country, when they were voting last fall, did not think they were misunderstanding the attitude of certain hon. gentlemen in regard to this measure at the time it was going through this House. There is no doubt the bill as presented to the House last year and as presented to the House now is a certain, definite, clearly defined measure. We are either in favour of it or we are opposed to it. If we are going to conjure up all kinds of possibilities that may arise, for instance, if one province does not accept it, or if another province does not accept it, I take it for granted that we are opposed to that measure. That must be a fair inference. You have just the one measure before you, and you either take it or refuse it.

Mr. LADNER: Surely when the principles of a bill are submitted to the House we are not faced with the sole issue of being for it or against it. The bill is brought in for the consideration of parliament in order that the experience and judgment of hon. members may be given to the government and to the minister in charge so that such corrections may be made as may be deemed advisable. For my part I would not want to be put into the category of being opposed to it or for it because I made certain constructive suggestions.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I quite agree that my hon. friend does not want to be.

Mr. LADNER: But I shall be.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The discussion is to ascertain what the views of hon. members are.

Mr. MANION: And then if they ask any questions they are said to be opposing the measure.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Not at all.

Mr. MANION: That is the attitude my hon. friend is taking now.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No. I take as being absolutely sincere the statement of hon. gentlemen when they say that they are in favour of the measure. I do not believe the interests of the measure or of either party are advanced by referring to any proposed legislation that comes before the House as a sham or a subterfuge or anything of that kind. Not only are we wasting time and wasting money by assuming that attitude, but I do not think it is the proper attitude for hon. members to assume towards a measure that is introduced into this House. I say that no matter from what side that kind of criticism comes. I know it refers particularly to what I think is a misapprehension in regard to what the scheme really is. The hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) says that we are trying to impose upon the provinces the will of this House. Section 4 states that every agreement made pursuant to this act shall continue in force so long as the provincial statute remains in operation or until after the expiration of a certain period. Then clause 5 provides that before any agreement is made pursuant to this act the Governor in Council shall approve of the scheme.

Mr. BENNETT: Then it says what the scheme shall be.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes. It says: "shall approve the scheme for the administration of pensions proposed to be adopted by the province".

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, and gives the details.

Mr. ELLIOTT: There is no idea of coercion, of any one party imposing its will on the other. This is simply an offer by the Dominion, if the bill is passed as it was last year, to contribute in a particular way a certain amount. The representatives of the provinces and of the Dominion meet, discuss the proposal, and if they can come to an agreement, the province accepts it. There is no coercion. There is no imposing our will on the provinces, and I believe the very fact that certain provinces have already indicated their intention—

Mr. BENNETT: They have not passed their statutes yet.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, there is no statute for them to go on yet, and that is the reason why it is so essential that we should make a start by getting something absolutely binding on this House and upon this Dominion which they can consider and, if acceptable to them, adopt. It was not my intention to enter into a discussion, other than to call my hon. friend's attention to the fact that in the campaign which took place, so far as the meetings I attended are concerned, it was not necessary to discuss old age pensions because the people had come to the conclusion themselves, so far as I was able to gather, as to which party was the real friend of old age pensions. I am glad now to find that both parties are the friend of this measure. The criticism of my hon. friends opposite may have been misunderstood, but a great many people throughout the country did, I think, believe that they were not as sincerely favourable to the measure as—

Mr. MANION: They were helped to believe that by a lot of speakers on the other side of the House.

Mr. ELLIOTT: To whom do you refer?

Mr. MANION: I stated to whom I referred this evening, when the minister was not here.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I did not hear to whom the hon. gentleman referred, but so far as the meetings I attended are concerned there was no misrepresentation, and the people made up their minds accordingly.

I want to point this out to the House again. This is exactly the measure that was before the House last year, and the people of this country by their vote have made it clear, I think, that they favour a start being made along these lines. The measure is not perfect. Nobody thinks it will be, but it is a start; it will be adopted no doubt by several of the provinces, and once you get one or two provinces in, the others will no doubt feel that they are making a mistake and losing money by not adopting the scheme. I do say to my hon. friends that I think the interests of everybody who favours old age pensions, and particularly the people who are sought to be benefited by this measure, will be advanced by making a trial of it, and, if it is found to contain weaknesses which can be improved upon, coming back here to get them remedied. But I do think there is danger of my hon. friends opposite being misunderstood again if the criticism goes on to the length of taking up a great deal of time—

Mr. MANION: Half the time has been taken up by the other side of the House.

Mr. STEVENS: What is the minister doing now but delaying the committee? We were ready to stop.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I had no assurance of that. I am very glad to know the hon. gentleman is.

Mr. STEVENS: I have been sitting here since eight o'clock patiently listening to all that has been going on, and now we have the spectacle of a minister uttering a lot of provocative statements which parliamentary language will not permit me to characterize as I would like to, and we are expected tamely, to sit down and let this measure go through with the minister's final word.

It has been stated here time and time again, last year and this year, that we were wholly in favour of a workable scheme of old age pensions, but surely this parliament has not come to the pass where, to use the minister's own words—which I wrote down, we are "either for or against this bill"—we must either take a particular legislative proposal or leave it. Is this parliament reduced to the position that any minister of the crown can walk in here with a measure, lay it on the table, and then say to this honourable House—take it or leave it? Are we to be muzzled? Are we not to be permitted at least to scrutinize the language of the measure?

I have under my hand the full record of this House upon this question of old age pensions. I have here all the dates for the last fifteen years when this measure has been brought up, and in every instance it was brought up by a Conservative, until recent years, when the Labour party was represented in the House and it was brought up by them. In season and out of season for seventeen years I have supported in this House an old age pension bill. Long before my hon. friend ever entered the House, long before other hon. gentlemen over there entered who have been indulging in some rather extravagant language during this evening's session in attempting to castigate this party I supported and urged for an old age pension scheme. I have quotations here from Hansard where I questioned and urged and pleaded with the Hon. Mr. Murdock, a former Minister of Labour, to bring in an old age pension scheme. A committee was appointed, and my hon. friend from Wetaskiwin, formerly from East Calgary, took a very important part in its deliberations. We have in season and out of season—not the whole party, not every member, but a sufficiently large percentage of the party, speaking with some responsibility—urged for an old age pension scheme.

What we said to the government last year and what we say again this year is that in our opinion this proposal will not work satisfactorily, and because we are convinced of that we urged last year, and we have suggested again this year, that an effort should be made to have a measure that will be assured of success. The day I left Vancouver, Mr. Chairman, two elderly ladies—I should say they were seventy years of age—came to my office, and pleaded with me to do what I could for old age pensions. They did not know much about parliamentary practice. They had the idea that a member of parliament had some mysterious power that he could exercise to secure this measure. All I could say to them, and all that hon. members of this House have been able to say is: We will do our best to get a measure through. We are anxious to get that measure. We are told to-night by the Minister of Health—he is not in his seat at the moment—that this measure will be supported by all the provinces. Now I am going to quote the Minister of Agriculture. There has been a lot of quoting done here to-night, and this is what he said, as reported in the Vancouver Daily Star, a strong and respectable and reliable Liberal paper, in its issue of August 25th:

> Dealing with old age pensions Mr. Motherwell said the measure had met a sad fate at the hands of the Senate. He was sorry to say the Conservatives had obstructed the bill at all times.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Hear, hear. What are you doing now?

Mr. STEVENS: There has been, I have noticed, during this sitting a good deal of hilarity and laughing over this matter, but I do not think it is a laughing matter at all, Mr. Chairman. It is a very, very serious matter. He went on to say:

> If the people have to wait until the provinces are united to co-operate with the Dominion in the operation of an old age pension, then we will not get any pensions during the present generation.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well?

Mr. STEVENS: I believe the minister is right, if we have to wait until the provinces co-operate with the Dominion under the terms of this bill, we will not have old age pensions for a generation. That is my opinion and I expressed it last year. It is the opinion, Mr. Chairman, that we have been trying to impress upon the minds of the ministry. We stated through my leader at the opening of this session that if we had an old age pension bill that was under the jurisdiction of the Dominion we might be certain it would be successfully applied, but if as the Minister of Public Works now says, we have either to take this bill or leave it—in other words if we are to be branded as opposed to the whole scheme of old age pensions if we criticise this bill—then we are prepared to accept it, but to do so after pointing out to the minister that in our opinion it will not achieve what it is pretended to the people it will achieve, namely, pensions for the aged. We are telling the minister that, and I hope that as the years go by and as hundreds, yes, thousands of people in this country are disappointed at not being able to receive a pension under this bill, it will be remembered, just as keenly remembered as some other statements of ours that we have made in this parliament, that we warned parliament it would not work successfully as a measure.

Now there are clauses in the bill I would like to discuss. There are clauses which obviously are not fair. There is one clause in particular that has been cited here to-night, and I think if the people of Canada fully realized it they would not for one moment support the bill. I refer to the clause providing that the maximum pension shall be $240, and if any person applying for a pension is in receipt of an income in excess of $125, the increase, whatever it is, shall be deducted from that pension. Let me put it in plain, simple language; as one of the ministers said a minute ago, it means that if any applicant for a pension of $240 happens to have a meagre annual income of $200, he will not receive $240, but will receive $240 less $75, namely, $165. In other words it means that any person who, with the pension, can gather together $365, that is all he will get, including the pension. The thing is preposterous on the very face of it. There are other features of the bill that might very properly be criticised, but if we criticise it the minister says we are against the bill.

Mr. DUNNING: Not at all.

Mr. STEVENS: If we offer suggestions we are against the bill and we must be branded through the country as against the principle. We are either for it or against it. I am wholly in favour of the bill in so far as it deals with the principle of old age pensions, but I say again that the measure as now presented and presented in the House last year will not achieve the result which the minister said it would achieve.

Mr. ROBB: Since the opening of the session the House has made very fair progress and the government appreciate the co-operation of hon. members opposite. The question now before the House involves the principle of an old age pension. I gather from the debate to-day that the House is practically unanimous on this measure. We have reached the time in Canada when we might have an old age pension. This measure involves the principle of an old age pension. After the resolution has been passed we will introduce the bill, and we can debate details later. I am told that this is the third time this resolution has been before parliament this session. We have debated this question all afternoon. It is now fifteen minutes after eleven when I think we should all be getting home and going to bed on a Friday night. If hon. members are prepared to allow the resolution to go through so that the bill may be introduced and we will learn what the measure is I think it would be wise. If further debate is desired then I shall ask my colleague to move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think the minister will agree with me that the time which has been occupied in the discussion of this measure has not been lost, as it will shorten the time which we usually take in the discussion of a bill when in committee after the second reading. It matters very little, I think, so far as the consumption of time is concerned whether the discussion takes place now or on the second reading of the bill. It is not likely to take place again. I think the discussion has been very useful, notwithstanding the rather provocative speeches by the three ministers of the crown who have spoken at great length to-night on the measure. The discussion on this side of the House has been entirely sympathetic.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Not at all provocative.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Not at all provocative, and I think we made it as clear as it could be made that that is the position we occupy. We are prepared to accept and pass this measure, not as a perfect measure at all, but, as I said a day or two ago, it is apparently the only thing the government is willing to give, and it is on that condition we are willing to pass it. I have no objection to the committee rising and reporting this resolution, but I cannot agree that there will not be further discussion when the bill is in committee of the whole.

Mr. ROBB: We expect that.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Heenan thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 70 respecting Old Age Pensions.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first and second times.

Mr. HEENAN: I move that the House go into committee on the bill.

Mr. STEVENS: Go into committee to-night and report progress immediately.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Go into committee at the next sitting of the House.

Mr. ROBB: Very well.

On motion of Mr. Robb the House adjourned at 11.20 p.m.

Monday, February 21, 1927

was to be considered in the present general rates investigation now going on before the Board of Railway Commissioners, said decision having been made during the last summer months.

RETURNED SOLDIERS—CIVIL SERVICE APPOINTMENTS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. K. ESLING (West Kootenay): I desire to ask the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment two questions. First, is the minister aware that the preference clause for returned men is being disregarded in West Kootenay?

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment): I should be glad to have more information on the subject of the question asked. If my hon. friend has information of that kind and will bring it to my attention, I will be glad to have it inquired into.

Mr. ESLING: If I hand the minister two specific cases of such disregard in writing will he see that the disregard is remedied?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I will be glad to make inquiry into the matter.

Mr. ESLING: And see that it is remedied?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

IMPORTATION OF SCOTCH MINERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): I wish to ask the Minister of Labour or the Minister of Immigration and Colonization if the attention of either has been drawn to the fact that on the 14th of this month a carload of miners from Scotland were imported into the Glace bay district to work in the mines there, although a large number of miners in that neighbourhood are already out of work.

Hon. ROBERT FORKE (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): I may say that I have no knowledge of any such occurrence as stated by the hon. member.

Mr. HEAPS: I did not hear what the minister said.

Mr. FORKE: I have no information in regard to that matter.

Mr. HEAPS: I wonder if the minister will be good enough to look into the matter and let us have a statement?

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Do you not know what the government is doing?

An hon. MEMBER: Who can answer?

REVISION OF THE STATUTES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): May I ask the Minister of Justice whether the revision of the statutes has been completed, and if not whether there has been any change in the personnel of the commission having that matter in hand?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): There has been no change in the personnel of the commission. The work of the commission has been extended in order to include the legislation which will be passed by parliament at the present session. My hon. friend knows that many laws would have been placed on the statutes last year had not parliament been dissolved in July. It was suggested to me the other day by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) that the legislation of this as well as of last session should be inserted in the revised statutes to be distributed and published. It would not be advisable to pursue any other course and we are hoping—as a matter of fact I know—that the revised statutes will be completed and given to the public after this session is over.

Mr. J. A. CLARK (Vancouver-Burrard): On Friday I asked a question in regard to a recommendation made by the convention of the Canadian Legion, presided over by Sir Percy Lake, at a recent meeting at Winnipeg, in which they recommended that the returned soldiers' insurance be re-opened for a period of one year. The Prime Minister on that occasion promised to bring the matter to the attention of the Minister of Soldiers Civil Re-establishment and give the information to-day.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I regret that the matter was not brought to my attention, but I will make inquiry and give the information to-morrow.

RURAL MAIL ROUTES AND BOXES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): Can the Postmaster General inform the House as to whether there is any immediate prospect of a supply of mail boxes being available for rural routes?

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): Has my hon. friend any particular route in mind or is he speaking generally?

Mr. STIRLING: I have one route in mind. I have seen the Postmaster General about it.

Mr. VENIOT: I may say there has been a call for tenders for rural mail boxes but the contracts have not yet been let. The department has received several applications for rural routes on which no definite action has yet been taken. Those applications are being considered by the department.

Mr. STIRLING: If I may go further, Mr. Speaker, I would point out that the rural route to which I refer, East Kelowna, as the Postmaster General will remember, has been agreed to.

Mr. VENIOT: I cannot hear my hon. friend.

Mr. STIRLING: I say that the rural route at East Kelowna, as the Postmaster General will remember, has been accepted, but it is still waiting for boxes and has been for months. My question was whether the Postmaster General sees any immediate prospect of these boxes being available?

Mr. VENIOT: The rural route of East Kelowna was not accepted by the present Postmaster General. I believe it was accepted, and we will be prepared to carry on just as soon as the contract for the boxes has been let and we can obtain them from the contractor. I expect to be able to let these contracts some time this week.

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): While we are on this subject, may I ask the Postmaster General a question as to the policy of the government with regard to the extension of the system of rural mail service throughout the country. Is it the intention of the department to extend the system?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Surely this is not the class of questions that should be asked before the orders of the day are called.

Mr. SPENCER: With regard to the shortage of mail boxes for rural routes, I am given to understand by the department that that was the reason why many mail routes that had been passed by the department were held up. I would be glad to know if we can get some relief from the situation as we find it to-day with regard to promised rural routes.

Mr. VENIOT: I am sorry that I did not hear the whole of the question.

Mr. SPENCER: The question was somewhat answered by the promise of the minister a short time ago, but I would be glad to know when the various rural routes that have been promised by the department can be put into operation because I understand they are being held up on account of lack of boxes.

Mr. VENIOT: I will not say that all the routes to which reference has been made have been promised by the department, because I have not that information. Since I have been head of the department I have promised no mail routes, and those that have been promised and reported upon as feasible will likely be put into operation as soon as we can secure the mail boxes.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Thursday, February 17, the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of ways and means.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, in his opening remarks on Thursday last the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) made a very brief reference to the post-war depression which had been so evident in Canada in 1920 and 1921, and the gradual improvement in each budget brought down since he had been acting as Minister of Finance. He was becomingly modest in that he did not as usual give to his budgets the credit for all the improvements that had taken place. It is fortunate for the minister that he has held the portfolio of finance during the years in which the country has been recovering from the effects of its post-war deflation, and in which an improvement has been taking place.

I feel that if we were to analyse the matter we would find that credit for the improvement must be given largely to the primary producers of this country. Canada is primarily an agricultural country; agriculture is her basic industry, and the agricultural class were the worst sufferers from the deflation in 1920 and 1921. The purchasing power of the farmers' dollar, in many cases, dropped below fifty cents as compared with pre-war times, yet our farmers never stopped producing. The acreage which they sowed to wheat would be an indication of the way in which they tackled their problem. Let me quote the acreage for a few years during this period:

It is true that a large number of farmers were forced off the land, but the acreage sown to wheat shows the spirit in which they tackled their problem. They did not rush to the government for relief or for a higher tariff. They tackled their problem in their own way.

I might remark in passing that the improved condition in which the Canadian National Railways stand to-day is largely attributable to the same cause. The credit for that should be given to the producers of this country who went ahead and produced, not knowing whether there would be a market for their product or at what price it might be sold. They were willing to take a chance on the world price. I am reminded of a statement made by Sir Thomas White when, as Minister of Finance he was floating one of our victory loans. He said that if this debt were ever to be repaid it would be from the top six inches of Canadian soil. The improved condition of our farmers, due largely to their own efforts, is responsible, to a considerable extent for the easy financing which the Minister of Finance referred to in his opening remarks. When the farmers are prosperous, business is good and government financing is made easy.

Many compliments have been handed to the Minister of Finance because of his brief and plain statement in the budget speech. It certainly is a very brief statement; it has every appearance of having been prepared in a hurry and with the idea of getting it through the House of Commons in a hurry. The minister neglected to tell us what the net debt of Canada is. There is no statement whatever in regard to our railway financing, and it seems to me that the budget is not complete without some reference to it. The minister should also have included in his statement details of the revenues from the different war taxes, such as sales tax, stamp tax and transportation tax, some of which he proposes to reduce. How is the House to know just what our revenue is likely to be next year unless we have some details? A statement of revenue showing an increase in our receipts of $11,900,000 is certainly an indication of improved conditions generally. The customs revenue shows an increase of $14,000,000. We do not know how much of this is due to increased valuation of goods for duty purposes and how much to a larger importation of dutiable goods.

I am certainly pleased that there is a reduction in our net debt and that in four years we have had a net reduction of $95,000,000. I am advised by the Department of Finance that our net debt to the end of the present fiscal year is estimated at $2,358,364,000. At the average rate of reduction which we have had for four years we may be able in the next one hundred years to retire our national debt, but it is hardly to be expected that that will be done if the present proposals are put into effect. It is the duty of the minister to consider and to present to parliament some definite plan for the systematic retirement of our national debt.

In comparing our revenue and expenditure, we should note that expenditure attributable to war is $162,922,000, or 45 per cent of our total expenditure. Revenue from war taxes amounts to $154,000,000. or $8,000,000 less than the expenditure attributable to war, or only 39.17 per cent of our revenue. The only changes which the minister proposes in this budget are reductions in war taxes, and these reductions are estimated at $27 000,000. The reductions in expenditure attributable to war are estimated at not more than $2,000,000, thus leaving our war charges at $160,000,000 with estimated revenue from war taxes of only $127,000,000, or 32 per cent of our estimated total revenue. I believe our war tax revenue should be sufficient to take care of expenditure attributable to war, but in this coming year apparently they will fall short by $33,000,000. If our former sources of revenue, namely customs duties and excise taxes, are sufficient to take care of ordinary and capital expenditures, and to reduce the national debt by $25,000,000, that is all that should be expected from them, and a reduction of five per cent in our customs tariff would afford more relief to business than the reduction which is proposed in the income tax.

So far as the minister's proposals for reduction of taxation are concerned, I congratulate him upon his action in removing the tax from notes and overdrafts particularly. I believe his cut in the sales tax is a good move, and that it will help business generally, but I do not know yet whether we can afford to make the reduction.

As to the income tax reduction, I cannot agree with the minister that the income tax should be reduced at all. I think the reduction which was made in our income tax last year was quite sufficient, and I would urge that the income tax be maintained at least at its present level. The proposal of a reduction of ten per cent appears to me to be the first move in the elimination of this tax. I remarked a moment ago that it would take, at the present rate, one hundred years to pay off our war debt, but at the present rate of reduction in the income tax, it will take only ten years for that tax to disappear. Personally I would like to see the income tax maintained until all the war debt is paid.

Just a few words in regard to the redemption of our debt. The minister shows a surplus on operations for the present fiscal year of $34,269,260. In another part of his address he states that the cash on hand from the previous year was $27,068,121, or a total of $61,337,381. Out of this amount he redeemed bonds in the present fiscal year amounting to $43,000,000, so it would appear that we will have on hand in cash at the end of this year $18,337,381. This is my own calculation; it is not mentioned in the minister's statement. Now there are maturing this year notes totalling $8,000,000, bonds due on November 1, 1927, amounting to $29,068,400, and bonds due on December 1, 1927, amounting to $63,437,250, or a total indebtedness maturing this year of $100,505,650. As I said before, we should have a cash surplus from the year 1926-1927 of $18,337,381 to apply on this amount, leaving the amount of $82,168,269 which may have to be refunded this year.

The proposal of the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) for refunding loans during the coming year at 4 per cent per annum is at least a very interesting one, and I think it should receive the careful consideration of the Minister of Finance and of the government. The speech of the hon. member for West Calgary was a very welcome change from the budget speeches which we have been in the habit of hearing from the front benches of the opposition during the last five years. His speech contained at least a new idea. My own suggestion for lowering the interest rate on the loans maturing this year would be to open a government savings bank at every money order post office in Canada, and to advertise that we will receive deposits bearing, if necessary, 3½ per cent interest, and that these deposits will have the full guarantee of the Dominion behind them. I am sure that if that were done the minister would have no difficulty in securing enough deposits at 3½ per cent to retire the bonds which mature this year.

Mr. ROBB: I am quite interested in my hon. friend's remarks, and I want to assure him that I am asking this question just for information because I know he is a student of economics. Would my hon. friend be good enough to favour the House with his own opinion of the proposals of the hon. member for West Calgary regarding insurance bonds.

Mr. COOTE: Not at the present moment. I have been busy enough trying to get up a budget speech of my own, without going very deeply into the proposal of my hon. friend for West Calgary.

The minister gives us no definite statement of the revenue he anticipates for the year 1927-28, except to say that the tax reductions will reduce the revenue as compared with this year by $27,000,000. The revenue for 1926-27 is estimated at $394,870,000. If that is decreased next year by the $27,000,000 which the minister suggests, that will leave his revenue for 1927-28 at $367,870,000. There is no estimate of expenditure, except the opinion that it will be slightly larger than that of the present year. The main estimates as tabled are larger by the amount of $6,634,087. The expenditure for 1926-27 is estimated at $360,600,740, I think we are warranted in saying that the estimated expenditure for 1927-28 would be $6,634,087 more, which would make the amount $367,234,827, as compared with an estimated revenue of $367,780,000. That is, there would be an apparent surplus estimated for the coming year of approximately $500,000. I would like to ask the House where is there here any provision for the reduction of the debt next year? There is nothing contained in the minister's speech which would lead us to believe that there can be any reduction in the debt for the coming year if these budget proposals are carried out. There is only the pious wish that business conditions will be better next year, and therefore, that there will be a little more revenue with which to reduce the debt. I do not think any business house in Canada budgets in that manner, and I think this House and the government should budget so as to be prepared to reduce the national debt by some amount next year.

So far as western Canada is concerned, there is no indication that the coming year will be any better than the one we have just passed through. As a matter of fact our wheat is not grading as high, and we are not receiving as good a price. There is no indication there of any change for the better, and if for any reason we should have a poor crop the chances are that business conditions will not be so good and the revenue may not be quite as large as is now anticipated.

There is current talk in the newspapers and around the House of Commons that the government will this year have to provide some amount for increasing the subsidies to the maritime provinces. They may have to provide an amount to subsidize freight rates to the maritime provinces. I cannot see in this budget any provision for taking care of any such expenditure. I think it is only fair to say that if assistance in this manner is given to the maritime provinces there is bound to be a demand from the other provinces for increased subsidies, from provinces perhaps that can show just as good reasons why their subsidies should be increased. May I point out to the House that the subsidies which the provinces are now receiving have a purchasing power of only a little over sixty cents on the dollar as compared with the time when they were granted, and I think there is no doubt in the world that the House will have to consider the question of whether the provincial subsidies generally will not have to be increased.

We have been discussing here for two days a bill to grant old age pensions in this country. If the government are sincere in their expressed belief that the provinces will pass the necessary legislation and come in under this old age pension scheme, we shall have to find some money to pay for our share of the old age pensions. I cannot see that there is any provision made in the budget for these old age pensions. I think that matter should be taken care of. It is quite possible the minister may have to pay some amount under the old age pension scheme in the coming fiscal year, because we are told that the British Columbia government at the present time is putting an old age pension bill through their legislature.

In view of all these circumstances, I doubt very much whether we are justified in giving effect to all the proposals for tax reduction which the minister has made, and it seems to me there is no doubt in the world that the minister is making a mistake in proposing a reduction in the income tax, at any rate. The bonds which were issued for our war debt, which are such a millstone round this country's neck financially at the present time, are chiefly held by the class of people who pay a large share of this income tax. If this income tax is done away with you are going to entirely relieve this wealth from taxation.

The hon. member for West Calgary, seems to be in favour of replacing the income tax with a turnover tax, which I assume would be a direct tax on every business transaction. Surely a turnover tax must retard business more than the present income tax. We are told that the income tax retards the inflow of foreign capital. I cannot find anything in our history to confirm this view. Mr. Fiske of New York, a prominent authority on financial matters, estimates that the investment of American capital in Canada increased from $750,000,000 before the war to about $3,000,000,000 at the present time, and our income tax has been in force practically all that time.

In 1924 the Department of Commerce of the United States issued an estimate of British and American capital invested in Canada which showed a total of $1,890,000,000 British, $2,425,000,000 United States and $348,000,000 for other countries; or a total of $4,463,000,000 as of December 31st, 1923. Our own Bureau of Statistics issued a statement last year showing a known new investment of American capital in Canadian securities amounting to $483,000,000 in the past four years.

In the face of these figures, I do not see how it can be contended that the income tax retards the investment of foreign capital in Canada. As a matter of fact what our industries need is not an increase of capital but an increased market for their products. In most manufacturing lines we are well supplied with factories, and in very few lines are our factories working to anything like full capacity. A reduction in income tax will not increase consumption, although it might release a very small amount for investment.

One of the difficulties of Canadian industry to-day is over-capitalization, and the capital is badly water-logged. I have before me a copy of a speech delivered by Colonel Arthur Hatch at the annual general meeting and dinner of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, held at the Windsor hotel, Montreal, June 1924, and at this dinner Colonel Hatch, discussing the development of Canadian industry during the fifty year period from 1870 to 1921, gave the following figures of the amount of capital invested, the employees' wages and the products:

Capital invested increased from $80,000,000 to $3,200,000,000.

Employees engaged increased from 188,000 to 517,000.

Salaries and wages increased from $40,000,000 to $581,000,000.

The value of their products increased from $222,000,000 to $2,748,000,000.

In other words—and this is Colonel Hatch's own statement—in the interval between 1870 and 1921 capital invested multiplied forty times; employees engaged three times; wages and salaries paid fourteen times and value of products, twelve times. I think there is evidence in that statement of the president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association that Canadian industries are very heavily overcapitalized. Any hon. member who was in this House two years ago when we discussed the resolution moved by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) in connection with watered stock in Canadian companies does not need to be told of the vast amount of water there is in the stock of some of our manufacturing industries.

One advantage of the income tax is that it is inexpensive to collect. Last year we received from this source $55,571,000, at a collection cost of $1,724,000. We collected through the customs tariff last year $171,375,000, which cost us to collect approximately $7,000,000. It is generally estimated that for every dollar the government collects in customs revenue from two to three times the amount is taken from the pockets of the people. A protective tariff is a tax on consumers, not for government purposes, but for private purposes, although incidentally it does bring in some revenue to the government. The best feature of the income tax, and one that I would like to commend to the attention of the House is that it is taken only from those who are able to pay. If it is replaced by a tax on commodities which people must purchase it will have the effect of wholly releasing from taxation large amounts of capital which have been accumulated in the hands of a small number of men who are in control of our manufacturing industries and our financial institutions, and men who have accumulated fortunes out of the exploitation of our natural resources. Surely it would be unfair to allow the incomes from those large amounts which have been accumulated in the hands of a comparatively small number of men, and in many cases through favours handed them by the government, to escape taxation. The service rendered by the state to the citizen is largely the protection of his property. We even protect his property after he is dead, and see that it is handed over to the heirs whom he names. If this is so, why should not the citizen who has a larger share of wealth or income contribute according to the share which he has? Trade is restricted by taxation; this is especially true of customs, sales and turnover tax, all of which are a direct tax on commodities. The hon. member for West Calgary complained that the cost of living was too high, but if we are to replace the income tax with a turnover tax I do not think there is any doubt that the cost of living will be still higher. The income tax retards trade the least of any tax which we are imposing to-day. I do not think that statement can be challenged. The turnover tax, the sales tax and all consumption taxes, compel married men to pay more taxes than bachelors. They compel the man who has a family and children to pay more taxes than the couple who simply raise a poodle dog or a persian cat. If taxes are collected on consumption one man may have to contribute ten per cent of his income, while another may contribute only a fraction of one per cent, without any regard whatever to their ability to pay. I think that under an ideal system of government each citizen should contribute to the state an equal share of his time. To-day each contributes his money, not time. If one man has an earning power much greater than another, why should he object to paying to the state a little more in the way of taxation?

The hon. member for West Calgary referred to certain principles of taxation laid down by Adam Smith. I have taken the trouble to again read certain portions of the Wealth of Nations and I should like to quote three or four of the requirements which Adam Smith thought should be met in levying taxation. This is the first requirement:

> The subjects of every state ought to contribute towards the support of the government, as nearly as possible, in proportion to their respective abilities; that is, in proportion to the revenue which they respectively enjoy under the protection of the state.

Surely income tax meets that requirement. Then he says:

> Every tax ought to be levied at the time, or in the manner, in which it is most likely to be convenient for the contributor to pay it.

The income tax meets that requirement, because the taxpayer does not have to pay the tax until he has earned it, and he does not have to pay it unless he has earned it. Adam Smith's next requirement is that:

Every tax ought to be so contrived as both to take out and to keep out of the pockets of the people as little as possible, over and above what it brings into the public treasury of the state.

I think the income tax meets that requirement; it is as inexpensive to collect as any tax we have. His final requirement is:

The tax which each individual is bound to pay ought to be certain as to the time of payment, the manner of payment, the quantity to be paid, ought all to be clear and plain to the contributor and to every other person.

I think the income tax also meets that requirement. If it does not, it is simply because the income tax law itself is not properly worded or properly administered. But I was so interested in reading the Wealth of Nations that I perused over twenty pages and came to this statement, which I believe may have a little bearing even to-day:

In the disorderly state of Europe during the prevalence of the feudal government, the sovereign was obliged to content himself with taxing those who were too weak to refuse to pay taxes.

When I read that passage I naturally wondered whether in this present case the government were following the line of least resistance and because there is much objection from these wealthy and powerful individuals and corporations they decided to reduce the income tax.

But Adam Smith is dead. I want to quote very briefly from a living political economist —Professor Stephen Leacock, of Montreal. Coming from such an authority as Professor Leacock, I think this should command the attention of the House.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Will the hon. gentleman say whether Professor Leacock is writing as an economist or a humorist?

Mr. COOTE: I am sure that on this occasion he was speaking as an economist. The passage which I am about to quote is from a lecture delivered by Professor Leacock in the city of Ottawa on January 10, 1927, and anyone reading it must be impressed with the serious vein in which the professor spoke on that occasion. He said:

Observe what Adam Smith wrote—The Wealth of Nations—an inquiry concerning the causes of the Wealth of Nations. He was preoccupied with that; we are not. What we would like now is that somebody would write an inquiry concerning the causes of the poverty of individuals. The wealth of nations is a solved problem.

There is a temptation to quote at great length from this speech, but I will content myself with one other quotation:

Even a child understands that one man receives wages, another receives a salary, another earns profits and another draws wealth from some investment source.

Even a child understands that.

Here we have a set of claimants—the workingman, the salaried man, the man living on his interest, the man accumulating or losing profits. These different claimants to the world's goods receive their shares in varying amounts; to the one a mere pittance, to the other wealth undreamed of a century ago.

In wages, salaries and profits the widest and strangest discrepancy exists. We live in a world of the most extraordinary disproportions. What are we to think of it? Are those claims right? Is the sharing true or proper or is it not? That is a problem of economics as important for social justice as the problem of which I spoke is for the world production.

I draw the attention of the House particularly to this last sentence:

That problem of distribution has got to be solved or the world will blow up.

I think that quotation from Professor Leacock's address should make the House pause to at least consider whether we should at this time reduce the income tax, which is only a slight effort to correct the great inequalities of reward for service rendered. We do not appear to have any system of levying our taxation, unless it is, as an hon. member said to me the other day, the possibility of extraction.

In his budget speech the Minister of Finance gave a table showing the quantities imported of certain goods, classified for statistical purposes as, "goods imported for further manufacture." These were valued last year at $224,000,000. An examination of the list shows that nearly all these items are admitted free of duty. I have the table before me and with the permission of the House I will place it on Hansard in order to save time:

In this House we are very often reminded that we are importing too much goods from the United States. It worries all my hon. friends who sit to my right. But may I point out to them that the Canadian manufacturers are the largest importers of United States goods? The list which the minister dealt with in his speech aggregates $224,000,000 out of total imports valued at $513,000,000. If you add to that list coal and other commodities which these manufacturers imported last year, I am sure you will see that they imported over half of the goods which appear as imports from the United States. The customs tariff allows our manufacturers to buy in a free market and to sell in a protected market; while the rest of the people, the farmers particularly, buy in a protected market and sell in a free trade market.

The collection of income tax is only a small attempt to remove some of the inequalities in the wealth of our citizens—inequalities caused, at least in part, by the operations of the tariff. The minister said that his aim has been to lighten the burden of taxation generally, that is on every taxpayer, rather than afford relief to special groups. But by reducing the income tax he is really intensifying the difference between the manufacturers and capitalists on the one hand and the great body of wage-earners and farmers of this country on the other. It is reduction in taxation affecting only about 10 per cent of our people—and the most highly favoured class at that. As the minister said last week, in reply to a speech from the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church):

> The war is over, but it is not yet paid for.

The income tax should remain until it is paid for. With the exemptions from income tax now allowed, I cannot see that any hardship whatever is caused by this tax. The tax which to-day restricts trade more than any other form of taxation is the customs tariff. The situation in Europe became so acute that in October last a manifesto was published in London, signed by hundreds of the most prominent business men and bankers in Europe, as well as a large number of prominent bankers in the United States. It is worth noting that the manifesto was signed by the leading men in the countries which took part on either side in the Great war, it was signed by men in England, France, Italy and Belgium as well as by men in Germany, Austria and Hungary. It is one of the most important documents given to the business world for a long time, and is well worth incorporating in Hansard. It is too long to read here, but if I have the permission of the House it may appear in Hansard without being read, as it will only take about a page. It should be remembered also that this statement is not made by Adam Smith or by any other man who lived a hundred years ago, when conditions were very different; it was written by men living to-day, some of the most astute business men in the world, speaking from their own personal experience and observation. The statement is as follows.

The manifesto printed below, called A Plea for the Removal of Restrictions upon European Trade, was published in London on October 19.

We desire, as business men, to draw attention to certain grave and disquieting conditions which, in our judgment, are retarding the return to prosperity.

It is difficult to view without dismay the extent to which tariff barriers, special licenses, and prohibitions since the war have been allowed to interfere with international trade and to prevent it from flowing in its natural channels. At no period in recent history has freedom from such restrictions been more needed to enable traders to adapt themselves to new and difficult conditions. And at no period have impediments to trading been more perilously multiplied without a true appreciation of the economic consequences involved.

The break-up of great political units in Europe dealt a heavy blow to international trade. Across large areas in which the inhabitants had been allowed to exchange their products freely, a number of new frontiers were erected and jealously guarded by customs barriers. Old markets disappeared. Racial animosities were permitted to divide communities whose interests were inseparably connected. The situation is not unlike that which would be created if a confederation of states were to dissolve the ties which bind them, and to proceed to penalize and hamper, instead of encouraging, each other's trade. Few will doubt that under such conditions the prosperity of such a country would rapidly decline.

To mark and defend these new frontiers in Europe, licences, tariffs, and prohibitions were imposed, with results which experience shows already to have been unfortunate for all concerned. One state lost its supplies of cheap food, another its supplies of cheap manufactures. Industries suffered for want of coal, factories for want of raw materials. Behind the customs barriers new local industries were started, with no real economic foundation, which could only be kept alive in the face of competition by raising the barriers higher still. Railway rates, dictated by political considerations, have made transit and freights difficult and costly. Prices have risen, artificial dearness has been created. Production as a whole has been diminished. Credit has contracted and currencies have depreciated. Too many states, in pursuit of false ideals of national interest, have imperiled their own welfare and lost sight of the common interests of the world, by basing their commercial relations on the economic folly which treats all trading as a form of war.

There can be no recovery in Europe till politicians in all territories, old and new, realize that trade is not war but a process of exchange, that in time of peace our neighbours are our customers, and that their prosperity is a condition of our own well-being. If we check their dealings, their power to pay their debts diminishes and their power to purchase our goods is reduced. Restricted imports involve restricted exports, and no nation can afford to lose its export trade. Dependent as we all are upon imports and exports, and upon the processes of international exchange, we cannot view without grave concern a policy which means the impoverishment of Europe.

Happily there are signs that opinion in all countries is awaking at last to the dangers ahead. The League of Nations and the International Chamber of Commerce have been labouring to reduce to a minimum all formalities, prohibitions, and restrictions, to remove inequalities of treatment in other matters than tariffs, to facilitate the transport of passengers and goods. In some countries powerful voices are pleading for the suspension of tariffs altogether. Others have suggested the conclusion for long periods of commercial agreements embodying in every case the most favoured-nation clause. Some states have recognized in recent treaties the necessity of freeing trade from the restrictions which depress it. And experience is slowly teaching others that the breaking-down of the economic barriers between them may prove the surest remedy for the stagnation which exists. On the valuable political results which might flow from such a policy, from the substitution of good-will for ill-will, of co-operation for exclusiveness we will not dwell. But we wish to place on record our conviction that the establishment of economic freedom is the best hope of restoring the commerce and the credit of the world.

A reduction in the taxation on consumption helps to increase business and encourages the producer to increase his volume, which can scarcely be said of a reduction in income tax. A reduction in the customs tariff or in the sales tax would undoubtedly have the effect of increasing business. Last year the minister reduced the tariff on automobiles, and we were warned by the Conservatives that the automobile industry would be ruined. The condition of the industry to-day proves that it has been greatly benefited by those reductions. I have here an advertisement which I took from the Calgary Albertan last August; it was inserted by Dodge Brothers of Canada Limited, and states that for the three weeks ending July 17, 89 per cent more cars and trucks were delivered to customers than during the same period in the previous year. Then I also have a statement made by Mr. R. S. McLaughlin, president of General Motors of Canada, Limited, whom I presume to be a good authority. This is taken from the Annual Review of the Montreal Gazette, published on January 8, 1927. Speaking of the automobile industry Mr. McLaughlin says:

> The increase in production during 1926 was occasioned almost entirely by demands of the home market, for exports as compared with 1925 remained almost stationary; the total for the ten months ending October 31, being 60,118 vehicles, as compared with 58,007 vehicles for the same period of 1925. A complete survey of the home market in 1926 shows that it absorbed approximately 166,000 motor vehicles, of which 136,000 were made in Canada and 30,000 imported.

I have examined the budget proposals very carefully, and it does not need a magnifying glass to show one that no reduction is proposed in the tariff schedule. I believe that the present government owes its existence to its formal claim of being the low tariff party in Canada, and because of this claim it received very generous support in the agricultural districts last year. This budget, however, is one which might very well be brought down by a Conservative government.

I cannot feel that the Minister of Finance can shelter himself behind the advisory tariff board, since decisions in regard to the tariff rest with the minister. He stated that the tariff board had been instructed to investigate and report on fifty-two applications for tariff changes. He did not enumerate those applications and I do not know what they were, but I understand that in every case they were made by outside parties; I do not understand that the minister took the initial step in referring any of these matters to the board. I believe there are several hundred items in the customs tariff schedule on which the general tariff is from 30 per cent to 37½ per cent. Is it the policy of the government to take no action in regard to any of these items unless some producer or consumer takes the responsibility of arguing the case before the tariff board? If the government policy is that no change will be made in any item in the tariff schedule until the matter has been investigated by the board, surely the minister should immediately refer to the board most of the items on which the general tariff is over 25 per cent, and he should see that competent counsel is engaged to present to the board these claims for reduction.

I have here a short list of items taken at random from the present tariff schedule. I was in a hurry when I made up this list and simply opened the book at random, and I would like to give it to the House. The tariff I am going to quote is in each instance the general tariff rate. There is a lower rate, a preferential tariff, on most of these items, but in many cases the preferential rate is still too high:

I would like to remark here that ladies now like to wear silk stockings and the gentlemen like to see them worn. I think this tariff item is as much out of date as are long skirts, and it should be made over to keep up with the fashion. The tariff on many of these items should be abbreviated, just as much as ladies skirts have been shortened in the last few years.

For a few moments now I wish to deal with the statement of the minister in regard to our trade balance. Our favourable trade balance for 1925 was about $401,000,000, while the estimated balance for this year is $260,000,000, showing a loss of $141,000,000. I believe that very often too much stress is laid on this matter of a trade balance, which may mean much or little because there are so many invisible factors entering into it. If we are just entering on a period of great prosperity and a large influx of foreign capital is beginning, we are likely to have a decrease in our favourable trade balance, largely due to the fact that this inflow of capital comes mainly in the form of goods. I think this statement is proved by a study of our trade balance with the United States and the large increase of American capital invested in Canada during the years 1914 to 1923. If hon. members will study the tables of imports in the speech of the Minister of Finance it will be seen, as I have already said, that the largest importers from the United States are the manufacturers. It is quite evident to anyone that for many years to come we must continue to import, largely from the United States, such materials as oils, cotton, iron and coal. The member for West Calgary seemed rather to lament the fact that we were depleting our natural assets by exporting some of our raw products to the United States, but we are importing raw products from the United States. These natural resources are really only potential assets until you apply human labour to them, take them out of the ground, and put them into a form in which they can be sold. Then you turn potential assets into real assets. Until Canada becomes a self-contained country we must import many of these things, and if we are going to import raw materials surely we must be willing to export them also. Our imports must be paid for by exports. I think that is admitted by most men to-day. I have a table here, compiled from the statistics of the Department of Trade and Commerce for the year 1925, and which I will place on Hansard, if I have the permission of the House, showing that our agricultural, vegetable and animal products amount to 56 per cent of our total exports. The table is as follows:

Agricultural and vegetable products	$443,298,877
Animals and animal products	163,031,415
Fibres, textiles and textile products	9,711,720

I have also a statement from the Bureau of Statistics covering the exports of wheat for the last five years, which shows that our export of wheat which is the most important and largest item in our export trade, was valued at $401,000,000 in 1925. That statement is as follows:

I simply mention the extent of our exportation of wheat to remind the House that our farmers, in many lines, are producing largely for export trade. They have to meet the competition of the world in prices, and the export price of their products largely determine the price at which their products are sold at home. We must, if farmers are to cotinue to export, have as low a cost of production as it is possible to get in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, it has been customary in Canada for many years for parties in this House to outline to the country their policy on economic matters at the time the budget is before the House. It is a rare thing, so far as I know, for budgets to be brought down without an amendment being presented by some party.

I may say that our group have given very careful consideration to this budget. There are some things in it that we approve of; there are some things that we disapprove of. There are proposals contained in the budget that should not be there, and things which it ought to contain are not there. Under the circumstances we have to decide whether the omissions are important enough to warrant the moving of an amendment to the budget. So far as the present budget is concerned, we have come to the conclusion that the principle of direct taxation, consciously or unconsciously, is being attacked in favour of indirect taxation. We believe this is a backward step in our taxation policy, and that the question is of such importance that the members of the House should have the opportunity of placing themselves on record in regard to this principle.

We believe the Finance minister has no good excuse for refusing to suggest some reductions in the tariff simply because the tariff board has a number of applications before it on which it has not reported. We cannot allow the board to become an excuse for inaction or indifference on the part of the government, and the seeming indisposition to carry out that policy as expressed in their platform, and in the utterances of their leader and the members of their party generally.

We are also impressed with the fact that no attempt is being made by the Minister of Finance to deal in a systematic way with the reduction of the national debt, the interest on which at the present time is absorbing 36 per cent of our total revenue. Under the circumstances we feel that it is our duty to present an amendment to this House. I therefore move:

That all the words after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

Whilst recognizing the advisability of certain minor changes proposed, this House regrets that the budget as presented by the honourable Minister of Finance contains no effective provision for the reduction in the high cost of living, in so far as such is due to the protective tariff;

That the budget shows a further departure from the principle of direct and visible taxation based on the ability to pay.

And further that no systematic effort is being made to reduce our national debt, the interest on which absorbs so large a proportion of the revenues of the Dominion.

Hon. JAMES MALCOLM (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, it is with a feeling of considerable satisfaction that I rise on this occasion to pay tribute to my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) on the favourable statement of the country's affairs which he has presented this year in his budget speech. Not only has the Minister of Finance reason to feel proud but the country as well should feel highly pleased at the statement which he presented to the House.

The budget as delivered deals with the relief of taxation, and I wish to compliment the Minister of Finance on having been able to deal so directly, in the second consecutive year, with the burden of taxation which falls on the average citizen. I think the Minister of Finance should feel very gratified to-day at the manner in which his budget pronouncements have been received. He has been the recipient of compliments, not only from the press, but from citizens throughout the Dominion of Canada; and I am quite sure that no one in this Dominion will hereafter make so bold as to prophesy the ruin of Canadian industry by reason of the action of this government.

I wish also to pay a compliment to the ex-Minister of Finance, the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett). While we might expect from an hon. member with the political knowledge and the legal and financial experience of my hon. friend a speech worthy of any subject, it was to me a great satisfaction that from the opposition side of the House we had on that occasion a speech which was not purely destructive but which contained many constructive suggestions, and I wish to compliment my hon. friend thereon.

The statement presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) was a plain, uncoloured statement of facts; a statement which could easily be understood and the accuracy of which could not be questioned. And this is as it should be for the presentation of our annual statement should at all times be so clear as to leave no question as to its accuracy. I feel sure that in this instance the Minister of Finance has met that requisite. I also wish to compliment the minister on presenting a statement in which he does not take to himself all the credit for conditions as they exist throughout the country. He rather leaves it to the good judgment of the House to decide whether or not his policies have been beneficial to the national life.

His budget deals particularly with relief from taxation, and he chooses on this occasion as in the last budget to make that relief apply more especially to direct taxation. The statement of the affairs of this country which the budget revealed surely is one which will enable us as a people to go forward with courage and confidence into the future, filled with the realization that we are now indeed on the verge of an era of prosperity. I believe the budget itself will accentuate that condition of affairs.

The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) has criticised at considerable length the income tax reductions proposed by the Minister of Finance, and I wish to refer briefly to his criticism. The hon. gentleman endeavours to create the impression that the whole load of the income tax is on that section of the Canadian people possessed of higher incomes, and that it is therefore a good form of taxation to keep at a maximum. It will be remembered that the Minister of Finance in his budget last year increased the income tax exemptions and the benefits that were derived from last year's budget were practically altogether in favour of those with lower incomes. I believe it will be found that as a result of last year's income tax reductions about 75,000 of our citizens were relieved from income taxation altogether. There were only about 150,000 who came under the old act. Is it not fair that when so many have been entirely relieved, the budget presented this year by the minister should take some cognizance of that fact and make a reduction such as has been made all along the line? I consider that the reduction in income tax made by the minister this year is an extremely fair one. As a matter of fact it is simply this: when the income tax is computed by the established method, a straight discount of 10 per cent is given on the income tax so computed. That is equality in relief from taxation.

My hon. friend worries as to the revenues of the country and our ability to pay off the national debt. In 1921-22 we collected about $78,000,000 from income tax. In the years following the amounts were in the neighbourhood of $55,000,000 to $60,000,000 per annum or less. Last year it was estimated by the minister that the loss due to his reductions in income tax would amount to about $14,000,000, but it has turned out that the loss of income tax due to those reductions will be only about $8,000,000. This is attribuable to several reasons. The general increase in prosperity in the country has undoubtedly been a factor in giving better returns on invested capital. The larger agricultural wealth, referred to by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) undoubtedly played an important part in the creation of the increased wealth of the community. Furthermore from time to time tax-free securities have been called in. It is reasonable therefore to suppose that with continued prosperity there will not be as serious a falling off in the income tax collections as some people believe.

The hon. member for Macleod stated that our income tax does not prevent United States capital from coming to Canada, and I would like if I might be permitted, to clarify his mind in respect to that matter. To a certain extent it is true, in that United States capital which comes to Canada is held by citizens of the United States who own such securities on which income tax is not payable in Canada. That is the justification for the corporation tax. The corporation tax of 9 per cent is the one method the Minister of Finance has to get at the large United States company operating in Canada, the dividends of which company go to the shareholders or stockholders residing in the United States. So long, however, as Canada retains a high ratio of income tax on large investments just so long will we not be able to get investors of large amounts of capital to become Canadian citizens and pay income tax in this country. That is the point in question. Is it not natural to expect that the converse will also happen, namely, that men possessed of decided wealth in Canada, who do not care much whether they make their permanent home, in let us say, the city of Montreal, or their winter home in the south, should finally establish their residences in the United States and pay their income tax there under less severe rates? If the hon. member for Macleod reviews the situation, I believe he will come to that conclusion.

I consider that he is also wrong in stating that the income tax reduction is not a popular move with the agriculturist. I do not think anyone can question the interest taken in agriculture by the Premier of Manitoba. Premier Bracken is probably as much interested as any man in western Canada in the agriculturists, and I would inform my hon. friend that last week Premier Bracken brought down a budget announcing a reduction in the income tax.

I now wish to refer briefly to the reduction made by the minister in the stamp tax on commercial documents. There is a very erroneous impression abroad as to who pays this tax. To me it is burdensome and paid by the wrong class of people altogether. It cannot be denied that in every instance it is the debtor who pays the tax. A debtor has obligations enough in paying his debt in addition to the ordinary banking charges on commercial paper, without having ten or twelve dollars added to his note in the form of taxes, and without the necessity every time his note is renewed at the bank, or a cheque given, of covering the whole back of it with stamps. In reducing this tax the minister is appreciably relieving those in our country who are heavy borrowers and who are paying their bills. The banks do not pay this tax. The commercial houses do not pay it. In every instance the man who meets the obligation is charged with the cost of the stamps which have to go on his paper. There is every justice in making the tax on commercial paper as reasonable an amount as can be set. I am glad the tax is being continued from the standpoint of revenue, but I am glad it is being removed in its present excessive form.

With regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Macleod concerning the sales tax, I wish to make just this observation, that I have never been an enthusiastic supporter of the sales tax. I think it drives up the cost of merchandise, it is unquestionably pyramided, and it eventually slows up merchandising and trading. On the other hand, no better illustration can be given of the difficulty of removing a tax once it has been established than the problem of the sales tax. Many people have argued in favour of the complete and speedy removal of this form of taxation. Many representations have been made to the minister and much has been said in the press in favour of this. But the minister must take into consideration the very disturbing effect the sudden removal of a full five per cent of the value of the merchandise would have on business. Merchants and wholesalers all over the country have enormous stocks of merchandise, of a value probably many times the total capital invested in their businesses and if the government were to make a sudden reduction of five per cent in the value of the stocks held, it might mean a fifty per cent reduction in the total assets of those businesses. Therefore, I compliment the minister in doing what he has done, in making a gradual reduction in the sales tax, and my advice to him would be to continue with this gradual reduction, such as can be absorbed without causing any very great hardship to the merchants, until the tax is finally eliminated.

My hon. friend from West Calgary, the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Bennett) made a statement in his speech on Thursday to which I wish to refer. While it is very easy for me to admire a speech made by my hon. friend, it is not always so easy to agree with the premises on which he bases his argument or with the conclusions at which he arrives. He made the general statement that the Dominion government took from the people of Canada in the year just closed $1.64 more per capita than it had taken in the previous year. First, I wish to correct my hon. friend as to a slight inaccuracy in his mathematical calculation.

He took the difference in the two years' revenue and divided that by the population of Canada in June, 1926. Now in June, 1925, we had a population in Canada of 9,268,000; in June, 1926, we had a population of 9,390,000.

Mr. BENNETT: I might say to the minister that no allowance was made for the numbers of people who had left Canada between 1925 and 1926, and I took the figure as given by the department for June, 1926.

Mr. MALCOLM: The hon. gentleman's remarks are quite in order. I took the same figures as were given to him for June, 1926, but I also got from the department the figure 9,268,000 as the population of Canada for June, 1925. Now if we divide the revenue for 1925 by that figure, we find that $35.34 was the total per capita amount of federal taxation for the fiscal year 1925, whereas dividing the population of 9,390,000, the figure for June, 1926, into the revenue of $343,000,000 collected in that year, gives us a per capita contribution of $36.53, resulting in an increased per capita contribution, not of $1.64 as stated by my hon. friend, but of $1.19.

But aside from this slight inaccuracy, Mr. Speaker, we cannot accept the very simple method of my hon. friend in arriving at the per capita contribution of the people of Canada to the total of taxation. My hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Coote) referred a moment ago to the very heavy increase in the importation of raw material by the manufacturers of this country. That is quite true, and that becomes a very important factor with respect to the duty collected when these goods are manufactured here and exported to another country. My hon. friend from Macleod assumes that all the goods imported by the Canadian manufacturers are free of duty. As a matter of fact, all equipment used by Canadian industrial plants which manufactured for export pays duty, and there is no rebate, and even where there is provision for rebate, in no case is the total duty rebated. I desire therefore to point out to the House that a considerable contribution to the exchequer results from duties paid on equipment and plant, and merchandise imported which is afterwards exported to other countries of the world. This particular source of revenue forms, I believe, an increasingly larger and more important part of the revenues of this country as the years go by.

There is also another matter which my hon. friend from Macleod has I fear entirely misunderstood. He speaks of the excise revenue as being a per capita revenue. Personally I do not think that excise revenue can be treated as a per capita revenue at all. I do not believe that all people contribute equally to the excise revenue. I do not think that my hon. friend from West Calgary, for instance, and a few other gentlemen are charged with as large a proportion of excise taxation as some other people.

There is another factor which is very important in the distribution of revenue per capita, and it is this. In times of prosperity, is it not true that the wealthier of our citizens purchase more luxuries, which in Canada are dutiable, and thereby contribute in greater proportion to the revenues of the country? And is it not still more true, Mr. Speaker, that when times are prosperous, the average citizen indulges in the purchase of more articles, more comforts for his home, thus by the purchase of two articles instead of one, adding to the total revenue of the country?

But then, after all, supposing we did collect more revenue last year than the year previous. Did any harm result? I submit not. My hon. friend from West Calgary himself pointed out that as a result of that increased revenue and the lessening of expenditure we were able to do what my hon. friend from Macleod says we are not doing fast enough—pay $43,000,000 off our deadweight debt. Surely there is ground for satisfaction in that.

My hon. friend analyses under the heads of the various departments the money extracted from the people by means of taxation. In this connection I think he will agree with me, that the $1.50 per capita deficit of our Post Office department is not one which can be very much questioned. We as a people in Canada have chosen to accept a uniform postage rate from the Atlantic to the Pacific, rather than a rate based on mileage, the same as transportation. Canada has been built up by those who have pioneered the vast spaces, and it is only logical that those of us who live in the more densely settled districts, where the distribution of mail matter is much more economic, should be more heavily charged than those who live in the sparsely settled districts. The whole question of postal revenue is one of national policy, and I believe that every man in the country to-day is in favour of a uniform postage rate and a uniform parcels post rate; I believe that every man in the country is in favour of rural mail delivery in order to make the lives of the people in the country a little more pleasant. I have never found any difference in policy as between any two governments in Canada on this question, and I believe that if there is a slight deficit in the returns of the Post Office department this year, the Canadian people are quite satisfied that those who live in the more heavily settled districts, and receive the cheapest service so far as actual cost is concerned, should pay a greater proportion of the cost of the whole service.

I wish to refer for a moment to the criticism of the hon. member for Macleod as regards the budget and the tariff. The budget has announced no tariff changes this year, and I presume that that furnishes legitimate ground for criticism by those who want tariff changes either up or down. Many applications for advances and many applications for decreases in the tariff have been laid before the tariff board. There were charges both ways. It was charged that the high tariff made living expensive. It was also charged that the lowness of the tariff made it difficult to conduct industry in this country, and that unemployment was caused thereby. Much data has been collected by the board, but, Mr. Speaker, not nearly all the data that is necessary to substantiate the claims of those who are seeking an increase in the tariff has yet been collected, more particularly with respect to the major industries, steel, woollens, and boots and shoes. Nor has there been anything like unanimity in their arguments on the part of those asking for tariff increases. People in various branches of the steel industry, for instance, in their presentations before the board have held diametrically opposed views as to whether the tariff should be increased on certain articles, articles, for instance, which are the finished product of one mill and the raw material of another. Therefore, until these diametrically opposed views can be reconciled it is only reasonable to suppose that in this major industry the minister could not deal with the request for advances in the tariff. The case of the tariff on woollen goods has yet to be heard and when it comes up the same condition may arise. Various branches of the industry will probably hold different views. There may have to be revision of classifications, and a considerable time must elapse before the board can collect the required data. With regard to the question of boots and shoes, hearings have taken place but I understand further hearings are to be held. Truthfully it can be said that in no industry of major importance has all the evidence been brought down or all the facts established for submission to the government.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it not true that something over forty odd reports have been made to the minister?

Mr. MALCOLM: No, only twelve.

Mr. BENNETT: Only twelve? It must have been more than that.

Mr. MALCOLM: The hon. gentleman heard my statement. I will come to that question in a moment. The hon. member for West Calgary in a speech some time ago stated that the difficulty experienced in arriving at a satisfactory conclusion as to what measure of tariff should be applied was very great. To quote his actual words, in the House of Commons debate, May 18, 1926, he said:

> We realize, as every man in this House must realise, how difficult it is to understand fully the complex operations of the tariff, and come to an adequate and proper conclusion with respect to how far-reaching its ramifications may be.

Just so. With regard to the major industries they are so complex that a great deal of evidence has to be compiled after the first representations are made, and on these major industries, regarding which the country is looking for decisions, there has not yet been sufficient evidence compiled to justify the minister in making a decision. Furthermore, it has been pointed out by my hon. friend that the tariff board is not making definite findings, that it is only an information-collecting bureau. When this information has been collected and placed before the Minister of Finance, the government itself must assume responsibility for the action taken as a result of the findings. It is therefore logical to assume that some consideration must yet be given even to those cases to which my hon. friend referred a moment ago in his question. I wish to point out to the hon. member that the items which have been before the board, and on which the board has secured information and submitted it to the government, number ten or twelve—I think, thirteen altogether. Now there is no item of such major importance as to justify a revision of the tariff this year. They are small items indeed. An application was made for a reduction of the duty on calcium chloride. A reduction was asked for on certain pumps. An increase was asked on piano player rolls, though the matter is really a question of classification in the Customs department, as to whether they are to be classed as sheet music or musical instruments. A reduction was asked in the tariff on imported candles. An application was made with regard to gabardine cloth, and I suppose the minister saw no particular reason why he should consider that application before he had reviewed the whole textile industry. And so on all down the line. All the matters that have been reported upon by the board are comparatively of so little economic importance to the country that I think the minister has done wisely in withholding his decision on that group, until he could deal with the major industries. I will however say this—that when the evidence and the facts are brought down they will be reviewed, and on the evidence submitted and having regard to the economic conditions in this country, the government will bring down its policy for reduction or increase, and will be prepared, as it has always been, to stand by its decision.

If some of my friends who are strongly in favour of no increase in the customs tariff were very wise they would also be very patient. Patience is the course of wisdom, if you are looking for no increase, for the reason that the industries which two years ago were in a stagnant condition are this year prosperous, and it will be more difficult, as prosperity continues, to establish a case for increase in tariff. I believe that this year we have got into our stride and that manufacturers are in a better position than heretofore. As a result of that many industries which were blaming the tariff for their troubles will be no longer inclined to do so, because the trouble has disappeared. In last year's budget the most important item of change was the reduction of the duty on motor cars, and the establishment of a qualifying content of fifty per cent Canadian labour and material. I do not wish to embarrass any hon. members opposite by quoting to them their speeches regarding the dire disaster that would befall the automobile industry, because I feel that genuine alarm was felt by them, as well as by some on this side of the House. The fact however remains that the important item with respect to the motor car tariff reductions was the fifty per cent qualifying content made necessary. To-day everyone is agreed as to the wisdom of the policy which the minister announced in last year's budget, that before certain rebates of duties would be granted to American concerns manufacturing in Canada Canadian labour and material must be used to the extent of fifty per cent. We realize the great wealth and resources of the American republic, and we are willing to admit that probably our geographical position deprives us of many of the commodities which we would desire in this country—many commodities which are necessary to the economic life of the country. The hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Gott) I think had a question on the order paper to-day in regard to agricultural imports into Canada. Such agricultural imports consist largely of tropical fruits and vegetables which we do not grow, and which though termed agricultural products, are entirely different from those produced in this country. We need these commodities, but our climatic conditions do not permit us to produce them. We do not for example produce cotton and rubber. Our limited production of certain commodities and the limited production in other parts of the empire of commodities such as we produce, has induced the government to support a policy of British preferential tariffs. There is no question but that the policy of a British preferential tariff, not as we extend it to some other countries, but as some other countries extend it to us in return, has induced many manufacturers to come to Canada to establish branch plants. If an industry comes to Canada and is merely an assembling plant it is not of very much consequence to Canada, and the best way to turn that assembling plant into a real manufacturing plant that will give employment to Canadian labour and build up the industrial growth of the country is to stipulate that before the plant will be given a preference in this country the production must be a certain specified percentage Canadian.

Premier Bruce and Premier Coates visited Canada on their way home from the Imperial conference, and we were glad to have them honour us with their company. They both asked us in effect: "Is it reasonable that we should give to you a preference on motor cars, of which we buy practically our whole supply from you, unless those cars are Canadian-made and not merely assembled?" No one can gainsay the wisdom of the Australian and New Zealand governments in inserting a clause in their custom tariffs for that purpose. What our Minister of Finance did by his last year's budget was to compel our automobile manufacturers to bring their cars up to the 50 per cent point of Canadian content. Had he not done so then, the motor car manufacturers would have found themselves forced to take that course by virtue of the customs regulations of the countries to which they export their cars. With the permission of the House I should like to place on Hansard a table showing the production of passenger automobiles, trucks and chassis in the Dominion during the past eight years.

1921	66,246
1922	101,007
1923	147,202
1924	132,580

In 1919 we produced 87,000 motor cars in round figures. That production gradually increased until by 1923 it had reached 147,000. In 1924 there was a decrease. In 1925 both export and domestic business improved and the total production reached 162,000; while in the year just closed the production increased to 205,000, about half being for domestic consumption and half for export. There is no cause to worry about the employment of labour when we have such a big increase in production. I may say that there has been a very material improvement in employment conditions in our motor car factories. Not only that, but any man who is interested in the great number of supply houses—and there are several such men in this House—representing a variety of genuine Canadian industries, owned by Canadian capital, founded and developed by Canadians, is aware that those industries have benefited to a very great extent because the motor car manufacturers have had to place their orders for supplies with such Canadian industries, thereby giving employment all over the country.

There is a very great difference, Mr. Speaker, between an industry in Canada which was built up by Canadians and an industry established here for the definite purpose of securing the benefit of certain preferential tariffs. Especially is this difference realized when we consider that in the latter case most of the stock is owned in a foreign country, and the dividends do not pay income tax here except perhaps on a small percentage of the stock held by people domiciled in this country. The greatest benefit of the 50 per cent requirement laid down in last year's budget has been in the form of orders from our motor car manufacturers for other Canadian industries.

With regard to employment, Mr. Speaker, many statements have been made. The statistical branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce keeps a record of 6,000 industries, which make monthly returns to the department. This number remains constant, because only when one industry passes out is another taken in. From those returns an index number of employment is carefully compiled. The peak of the post war boom was in January, 1920, and accordingly the index number for that year was placed at 100. By 1921 the index number had fallen to 87.4 and from that time on there has been a gradual rise, until to-day the index number is at 98.4. In other words, there has been an increase in the index number of practically 11 points. Every point in the index number represents over 8,000 people. The total increase in employment, as estimated for me to-day by the bureau, shows a gain in all our industries of about 100,000 since 1921. This cannot be said to apply to the motor car industry alone; it is spread over every industry in the Dominion. A population of 100,000 workers unquestionably means a total population of about half a million, assuming that it is true to say that those dependent upon industrial workers represent a ratio of 5 to 1. I believe therefore that the industrial improvement in this country during the past four years represents an improvement in population of 500,000.

This increase in industrial development can best be judged by the rise of security values, and there is no one in this House at the moment but is willing to admit that we have had a tremendous increase in our security values. The common stocks of our banks have improved; that speaks well for the solidity of our financial houses and for the volume of transactions. Our power stocks have all improved; that speaks well for the consumption of power in this country—and we must remember that the greatest consumer of power is industry. Our manufacturing stocks have also improved, and not even in some of the lines of industry for which members of parliament are wont to beseech further consideration of customs tariff do we find any necessity for assistance.

The hon. leader of the opposition, I think, was trying to take a fall out of me in his speech on the address when he asked me to give to tariffs for other industries the same support I gave to a tariff for the furniture industry. May I point out that the furniture tariff is 30 per cent general, 27½ per cent intermediate and 18 per cent British preferential as against a general tariff of 35 per cent on all woollens, an intermediate of 25 per cent on knitted goods, 27 per cent on flannels, 29¾ per cent on fabrics, socks and stockings, and a British preferential of 18 per cent on knitted goods and flannels, 22½ per cent on socks and stockings and 24¾ per cent on fabrics. It is therefore evident that the furniture industry is not one of our highly protected industries, and I do not think our furniture or woodworking manufacturers—and they are not asking for increased protection—can show as rapid a rise in the value of their stock as can Penman's—from 152 to 186 in two years; as can the Dominion Textile common stock—68 to 107; as can Canada Cement—92 to 131 in a like period. I could give a long list of other industries whose stocks show a similarly rapid rise, but I will not weary the House with further examples. No, Mr. Speaker, the position of the industrial life of this country the government does not take entire credit for; but the government does take credit for making the pathway along which business can proceed profitably and easily and to that extent it is entitled to credit.

[Mr. Malcolm.]

The business of this country is expanding, as my hon. friend said, owing, for one thing, to the enormous production of our agricultural wealth. It is also expanding because there has been a very great improvement in our exports of manufactured products. As the hon. member for Macleod mentioned, our exports are 56 per cent agricultural. Let me ask him what the other 44 per cent represents. From year to year we have been developing a greater market abroad for our manufactured goods. Our trade commissioners, established by Sir George Foster when he was Minister of Trade and Commerce, have done good work in various parts of the world. Canadian implements and Canadian automobiles are becoming well known in all parts of the Empire. Our industrial life is growing apace with our agricultural wealth, and I believe every hon. gentleman will agree with me that that is what we desire. We do not want to be a one-sided nation. As my hon. friend the former member for Lambton said, we want to be a well-rounded household, able as far as possible to create wealth within ourselves, but able to sell our wealth in the form of merchandise to other countries.

My hon. friend from West Calgary referred to the exhaustion of our mineral wealth In the course of his speech following the introduction of the budget he mentioned that we exported a tremendous amount of minerals. It is true that we exported about $52,000,000 worth to the United States but we also imported from the United States $83,000,000 worth of minerals in the same time. That is not a very bad state of affairs.

Mr. BENNETT: One was coal.

Mr. MALCOLM: It is true that we exported a million dollars worth of nickel, but we imported a million and a half dollars worth of aluminum. We did not export any iron ore, but we imported a considerable amount, worth a million and a half dollars. It is true that we have exported gold, but I would like to ask my hon. friend of what use gold is if we do not export it. We cannot use it all in the fine arts. Gold is a medium of exchange; it is very valuable, but we in this country do not want to hoard all the gold we produce. We imported $50,000,000 worth of coal, but my hon. friend has a most logical mind, and I would suggest that since the exportation of mineral is an exhaustion of our mineral wealth, surely the importation of coal is a conservation.

Mr. BENNETT: I will answer that at once. The estimated coal in the province of Alberta alone is enough to take care of the needs of the British Empire for something like half a century.

Mr. MALCOLM: I quite recognize the value of my hon. friend's comment, but I would like to know the estimated wealth of the north country in gold and other minerals, and whether he has any fear of those?

Mr. BENNETT: I was referring principally to asbestos, nickel and wood pulp.

Mr. MALCOLM: I must say that my friend even went further than the leader of the opposition, who in his speech on the address said it was all right to export farm products as they were replaceable. My hon. friend said the other day, however, that they were not replaceable, to a certain extent, as they exhausted the soil. He recalls to my mind a very frugal and cautious countryman of mine in the county of Bruce; he wasna' happy when he had no crop because he had no siller, and he wasna' happy when he had big crops because it was hard on the land.

Even in connection with immigration, which is so much discussed, the figures are improving. Last year 134,984 immigrants came to our shores as against 84,000 registered in 1925, but most significant of all, and the thing I think we should be most happy over, was the fact that 48,000 Canadians came back from the United States, and at the border declared their intention of residing in Canada. We are not increasing our population nearly as fast as we should, but I believe that if the feeling of optimism and of loyalty to our government and institutions is preserved; if those of us who are out of power quit knocking our country and all join together, our immigration figures will rapidly improve. It is little wonder that people went from Canada when half the people were saying Canada was not fit to live in. I am glad to compliment my friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Bennett) for giving the lead to the note of optimism and for pointing out to this House that while there is something to be gained by destructive criticism, much more can be done by constructive suggestion.

The volume of business done in this country has been enormously increased in the past year; the figures of the clearing houses in the different banking centres show that in 1926 they handled commercial paper to the extent of $30,358,000,000. In 1925 the amount was $28,126,000,000, and in 1924 $27,157,000,000. Therefore it will be seen that the financial transactions in this country have been gradually improving, and conditions becoming better. Both official and non-official figures on building construction show a marked improvement. MacLean's building reports show contracts awarded in the past year to the amount of $373,000,000, in round figures, while the Statistical Bureau, which deals with sixty-three cities, reports a figure of $156,000,000; in both cases the transactions show an increase of 25 per cent. My hon. friend referred to life insurance, which is another good indication. Life insurance in force is amazingly large in Canada; in 1921 the figure was $2,934,000,000, and at the end of 1925 that had reached $4,159,000,000. It is estimated by competent authorities that to-day the Canadian people are carrying insurance on their lives to the extent of $4,500,000,000. Surely that is an indication of prosperity, and it has taken place in the short period of five years. Another good indication of wealth is the number of motor car registrations. That number has increased from 465,000 in 1921 to 728,000 in 1925, which is an indication of the ability of people to purchase luxuries. The number of telephones in use in Canada, also an indication of the ability of the people to procure conveniences rose from 902,000 in 1921 to 1,114,000 in 1925.

Perhaps the best indication of all as to our condition is the Canadian National Railways. In 1921 the government of my honoured leader came into power facing a deficit in operation of $11,000,000. The fact cannot be gainsaid that the rapid change in the financial condition of the National railways, which I will leave the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) to enlarge upon, has been a very great factor in reducing our taxation. In the five years the situation has so changed that to-day we have an operating surplus of over $46,000,000, making a total change of about $58,000,000 in that short time. I will deal in a moment with the expenditures and receipts of the country in this connection, but before doing that I would like to make one other reference. When a people numbering 9,000,000 are able to handle $30,000,000,000 worth of transactions through banking houses in a year, when they are able at the same time to pay premiums on $4,500,000,000 of life insurance; when they are able to pay taxes amounting to $35 per capita and, in addition, increase their savings in actual cash in the banks to the enormous total of $1,372,000,000, they are not in very bad condition.

I would like to deal for a moment now with the expenditures of this country, divided into two columns to show the relative importance of the expenditures made on the Canadian National Railways in the last few years. The first column of figures is taken from the public accounts of 1925-26, at page 44, and is exclusive of advances made to the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian Government Merchant Marine and so forth. The second column is taken from the Canada Year Book of 1925 at page 767, and is inclusive of the advances to the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, and so forth.

1922-23..	350,608,547	434,735,277
1923-24..	344,021,787	370,589,247
1925-26..	343,980,513	355,186,423

And for the first ten months of 1926-27 the figures are $267,758,384 as against $278,293,593. When you review these figures it will be seen that the difference to-day as compared with the condition in 1920-21 amounts to practically $100,000,000 the sum which the government of that year had to find for the Canadian National Railways. Is there any reason why Canadians should not be proud of the success of that system? I think not. Is there any particular reason why grave criticism should be made against the man who has brought that about? I think not. Sir Henry Thornton is not operating the Canadian National railway system alone and much credit must be given to that very loyal, worthy and clever band of operators who form the executive staff under him. To these men great credit is due. But Sir Henry Thornton himself has done well. He has created a feeling of pride among the Canadian people in their system, he has created a feeling of loyalty in the employees of that system. In other words Sir Henry has sold the national system to the people and to the employees, with a consequent saving of one hundred millions to the taxpayer.

The hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett)—I am sorry he has left the chamber—dealt with a rather clever and unique suggestion as to the financing of the national debt. The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) did not comment very extensively on that scheme. I have no doubt in the world but that a man of the experience and ability of the ex-Minister of Finance gave the scheme most careful thought before he proposed it. On my part I have not gone into it sufficiently to justify any very detailed comment on it, but I do venture to draw a few points to the attention of the House. There is no doubt but that in time of great stress such as war, a government is entitled to confiscate if it wishes, for the saving of the nation. Constitutionally, under the War Measures Act, we were justified in doing many things that we would not be justified in doing in times of peace and prosperity. In the first place I do not know whether this particular scheme is constitutionally sound. Secondly I do not know but that the Dominion of Canada can get sufficient money without resorting to such a drastic scheme. Therefore I am not sure that it is economically necessary. Finally I am not sure but that it would not be morally wrong to ask the policy holders of the life insurance companies to make the sacrifice which would be necessitated by the investment of their funds in a lower rated security than would otherwise be the case, and that for the benefit of those of us who are not heavy holders of life insurance. To my mind the scheme is good if it can be worked out without inflicting hardship on those who have investments in the banks and expect the rate of interest to be governed by the earnings of the bank, as well as on those who have investments in bank stocks and expect their directors to be able to invest their money in the highest money market. If the scheme can be worked out as the hon. gentleman suggested by taking care of the surplus which is not earning four per cent, I think the suggestion is worthy of a good deal of consideration.

I have spoken for a longer time than I intended and I will now bring my remarks to a close. It is a cause of very great satisfaction I think to all members on this side, who have generally supported the policy of the British preference, to note the extent to which that policy has been taken up by other parts of the empire, and to see how it is coming to be supported by men on the opposite side here—by men who a few years ago were bitterly opposed to it. I was therefore delighted to hear the remarks of the ex-Minister of Finance on what he claimed was a better plan, namely economic union. My hon. friend is right in his desire but he knows as well as I know that in so far as the motherland is concerned, economic union is impossible except by the creation of a tariff in Britain under which she could give preferences. The creation of such a tariff would materially affect and indeed probably destroy her foreign trade. The success of the mother country is based upon her trading, her revenues from her shipping, her revenue from control of merchandise the world over. Therefore we feel that our contribution towards empire unity should be the installation of preferences in so far as we can, and we have accepted the doctrine that we will give to the British government preferences on Britain's exportations of merchandise to this country, knowing that the same preferences must and will extend to other parts of the empire. I say this not only from the standpoint of empire trade, not only from the standpoint of empire development but from the basic viewpoint of the development of Canadian trade; I believe that in the years to come, as Canada's manufacturing grows, we will be the greatest gainers of any part of the British Empire by the preferences granted to us by other countries.

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition made some reference to our foreign trade. I am going to crave the indulgence of the House for not going into the criticisms made by him on that particular occasion; I want to deal with that matter at a later time. I may say however that it is a question of very serious doubt as to whether the statements made in relation to the foreign trade of this country are accurate or not. Statistics purporting to show where our merchandise goes are not accurate. Statistics as to where our merchandise comes from are not accurate. The statistical department can only keep records as to what is supposed to be the country of destination, and can only keep account of what is supposed to be the country of origin. I have been endeavouring for some weeks to try and find a better scheme than we have at present for compiling statistics. Every man in this House knows that with the improved facilities for ocean radio, cargoes are diverted on the high seas just as cars on tracks are diverted in the domestic field. A cargo of grain leaves Canada and is billed to England. We class it as an export to the motherland. The Liverpool merchant intercepts it. It may go into the Mediterranean, say to Greece. We cannot follow where our cargoes finally go. As a result of the fact that the Netherlands and Great Britain are the two heaviest traders in Europe, they are credited with much of the merchandise which finally goes to other countries. In a similar way we are not credited with as much trade with some of our sister dominions as we actually enjoy. Premier Bruce referred to the great problem he had of justifying the small purchase we made of Australian merchandise. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition and the ex-Minister of Finance referred to the increase of our purchases from Australia, as being 300 per cent. As a matter of fact we did improve our trade with Australia about $2,000,000, each way it was about even; but the Australian sales to us were so remarkably small previously, that the two million increase we gave them did make an increase of 300 per cent, and taken on a percentage basis it looked ridiculous. But, Mr. Speaker, Premier Bruce makes the assertion that we are not buying anything like enough merchandise from Australia. I pointed out to him, however, when we discussed this matter, that it will be necessary for us to get some further statistics before we can substantiate that fact. We buy enormous quantities of Australian wool from the United States and Great Britain in tops, noils, or yarn. It comes in various forms. Some comes from the United States, but mostly from Great Britain. That wool is the product of Australia and Canada should be credited with importing it, just the same as the country which imports cereals from us should be credited with the exports which we send. In dealing with trade figures, therefore, it is a very difficult matter to determine exactly where the goods go. The general trade figures are therefore the most interesting and significant index. Whether or not we are doing as much foreign business as we should do is the question to be considered.

The hon. member for Macleod referred to the fact that there was a very great decrease in our foreign trade in the past year. He is hardly correct in his statement. Taking the fiscal year we did get to the enormous favourable balance of $400,000,000. The calendar year however shows a credit of only $275,000,000. That is largely due to outside factors. The British coal strike tied up navigation and made a scarcity of ships. Then there was an early freeze-up at the head of the lakes which tied up grain in the elevators. Everything tended to retard the movement of grain in the first ten months. It may be that in the coming year we shall see a freer movement of the crop in the spring, that we shall not be faced with the same navigation difficulties, and that we shall be able to get out a large proportion if not the whole of the year's crop. We may have from time to time unfavourable conditions such as these, but I believe the total balance of trade in Canada is satisfactory. What my hon. friend says with respect to overestimating the value of a favourable trade balance is also true. Some economists say that in times of prosperity when a country is growing the best, its balance of trade decreases. That remains to be seen. If we bring in capital from another country in the form of merchandise, undoubtedly such is the case. In the construction period of our railways, when Mackenzie and Mann and other railway contractors were borrowing money in Europe and taking not cash, but steel rails and equipment, we had heavier duties and an adverse balance of trade. That condition is not so likely to apply in Canada at present.

I have before me a table which I am anxious to place upon Hansard, a table which I think is worthy of review by members of the House. It deals with our exports and imports, our trade balances, favourable and unfavourable. There are forty-one countries with whom we have a favourable trade balance. Of these twenty-six are outside and fifteen inside the empire. The table shows twenty-seven countries with whom we have an unfavourable trade balance. Of these nineteen are outside and eight inside the empire. These figures are as accurate as we can compile them from present statistics, and I am sure they will be of interest to many an hon. member in discussing the question of foreign trade. The tables are as follows:

I have spoken at greater length than I had intended, but I wish to say this in closing; with the finances of Canada improving as they are; with taxation being gradually lightened, whether it be by reducing direct or indirect taxation I care not; with trade responding and with our people happy, can we not as a nation outgrow what has been going on in this country since confederation and what does not as a matter of fact obtain in the United States? Elections take place in that country, but the day after the election the United States is the best country in the world to the Americans and they are all boosting for it. Unfortunately the party in opposition in Canada has for many years been trying to discredit the party in power by saying that the country is going to ruin at the hands of the government. No one party alone has been guilty of such tactics; we have all been guilty of them. Can we not as a nation criticise the government in power fairly and constructively? Can the government in power not be big enough to take constructive suggestions from the opposition and apply some of them? Under the conditions existing in this country to-day we have as a people more to be proud of than any Canadian citizens had in the past, and I look forward to this era as being the greatest in the history of our Dominion. Let us do our part.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, let my first words on rising be words of congratulation to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) who has just taken his seat. This is the first opportunity I have had of congratulating him upon his elevation to the cabinet, and after his very excellent speech, with a great deal of which many if not most of us, can agree. I should like to point out to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) who is leading the government at the moment, that the wisdom of the government is revealed in their taking a good, stable, allround protectionist into the cabinet. I repeat that with much of the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce we can all agree. There are parts of it which might be criticised; but as I have my own speech to make I do not intend to take up much of the time of the House in dealing with the remarks of the hon. gentleman.

With the appeal which the minister made just as he was closing his speech I think the whole House can agree. When he points out that it is the duty of an opposition not to offer only destructive criticism but to offer constructive criticism, I might point out that if he will look back over the speeches of many members of the opposition during the last few years, he will find that while there has been a good deal of destructive criticism based upon facts there has also been a good deal of constructive criticism. If I may be pardoned for a personal reference, I have endeavoured all my life never to make a speech that is wholly destructive. I feel that a speech which is wholly destructive is one that is of very little use to anybody or to any party. All speeches should at least finish with something constructive on behalf of the man who is making it and the country which he is trying to represent. So no one will quarrel with the hon. gentleman, but of course the hon. gentleman, now being a member of the government, would like, and quite justifiably so, to have the members of the opposition never offer any criticism at all.

Mr. MALCOLM: Oh, no.

Mr. MANION: What he would like, and what members of the government would naturally like, would be that members of the opposition would do nothing but tell them how to carry on the business of the country. That would be constructive criticism, and anything else would be destructive criticism. Let me ask him if it is destructive criticism to point out the facts? I do not think so. I believe if we stand up in this House and refuse to point out the facts as we see them, facts which are perhaps not useful to be published but which the country should know in order to correct any ills which arise from them, we are not doing our duty as an opposition. For example, the hon. gentleman mentioned immigration. Unfortunately the immigration that is coming in at the present time is nothing like the immigration that should be coming in, and nothing like what was coming in before the war, back in 1913 and 1914. Unfortunately the exodus from this country —and this is supposed to be a great deal of the destructive criticism which we have offered at different times—is going on to too great an extent. I hold in my hand a despatch from Washington of February 2. I meant to use it at a later point in my speech, but I will read it now. It states:

> During the last six months in 1926 a total of 49,335 persons emigrated from Canada to the United States, according to the report of Immigration Commissioner Hall, made public to-night.

That may be said to be destructive criticism. I shall be told by somebody that by telling that, I am causing people to give up jobs which they have in this country and run off to the United States to hunt up new jobs. I tell it for this reason, that I think there is too much of an exodus from our country; it means that too many of our boys and girls are giving up their homes in this land of ours and going to the United States to earn a living. I give it with the sincere hope that this government, which will probably be in power for some time—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: I admit that freely. It is not likely that we shall have an election within a year or two. I mention it in the hope that this government will endeavour to correct an evil which means that we are losing our young Canadian boys and girls to the United States at the rate of 100,000 a year, not counting those who are going by the underground route. It is a constructive suggestion to the government to do everything they can to cure that ill.

Dealing with the budget itself, I do not wish to be factious in my criticism in any shape or form. I intend in this speech—and I so intended before the minister sat down—to make a few criticisms of the budget, and then to offer to the government what I consider to be a very constructive suggestion, one which I have offered before but which has been little heeded, although it has to do with a matter of the utmost importance, not only to one great section but to all sections of this country. There is not very much that fair-minded people can criticise in this budget. It was probably a good, fair presentation of the facts as seen by the Minister of Finance, except of course, that one might criticise a little the political padding which it contains. For example, the Minister of Finance—and this is only an example; I will not go any further with it—said that all the factories in Canada are working full time. I could take him to a number of factories in my city that are not. I could take him to one factory which was working prior to the time this government came in but which is not working at all now, a factory which employed three hundred people and which with a very small amount of protection would open up again and sell its goods to the prairie provinces and the rest of the country which are now being supplied by American products. I could take him to other factories in my city which are working half time because of the goods that are being imported from foreign countries where labour is cheap and living conditions are much lower than ours. Surely those are not good conditions. I venture to say further that there are many representatives in this House who come from industrial constituencies who could take the minister to plants in their constituencies where similar conditions prevail.

Mr. HANSON: The boot and shoe trade, for instance.

Mr. MANION: Yes, that is one, but I shall not go into that now. It is the prerogative of the Minister of Finance, to which ever party he may belong, when he is bringing down his budget, to paint things in the rosiest possible light. It is his duty to do that, and I do not begrudge him it at all. But my hon. friend from West Calgary (Mr. Bennett), in one of those brilliant speeches of his to which we all are pleased to listen, exposed some of the fallacies of the reasoning of the Minister of Finance. He pointed out that while there was in the budget of last year an apparent reduction in taxation, there was actually a real increase in the amount taken from the people. Certainly it is a strange paradox when you can cut down taxation and yet take more money from the pockets of the people.

Mr. DUNNING: It always happens.

Mr. MANION: It always happens when the Liberal party is in power. I fear that the Minister of Finance is somewhat of a financial Christian Scientist. He realizes that it is not so important to cut down taxes as to make people think you are cutting them down. I well remember a witticism of Mr. Dooley, that famous character of Finley Peter Dunne. He said that if Christian Scientists had a little more science and medical men a little more Christianity, it would not matter which you called in so long as you had a good nurse. Now the Minister of Finance is the financial nurse of the Canadian people, and I will admit that he has put over his financial Christian Science so well that he has made a great many people believe that they have had their taxes reduced, when as a matter of fact they have not been reduced to the extent he points out.

The Minister of Finance came into Ontario in the election campaign, and like another warrior of some centuries ago, I will admit that he came, he saw, he conquered. He impressed the people very much. He has such an honest, frank appearance, almost too frank at times. Outside of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), the Minister of Finance is the most honest looking man in the present government, and on one occasion I remember pointing out in the House that the Minister of the Interior looks more honest than any man could possibly be. So when the Minister of Finance came into Ontario the people looked him over and said: Once more the Liberal party has given us an honest man. They had become almost hopeless of finding one in the Liberal party since my good leader and myself left it. They found the Minister of Finance was such a frank, blunt, honest gentleman, that they really believed him when he told them he had cut down the taxes of every man, woman and child in the country, for that is really what he said. The Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and all the other ministers, and their friends too I suppose, stated that the taxes of every man, woman and child had been cut down by the last famous Robb budget.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They did not need to tell them. The people believed it.

Mr. MANION: That is what I say; that is where the Christian Science came in.

Mr. DUNNING: They felt it in their pockets.

Mr. MANION: The Minister of Finance forgot to tell them that while the automobile cuts he made may have perhaps lowered the price of automobiles, that did not affect the family of the ordinary workingman. He forgot also to point out that the ordinary workingman is not an income tax payer, and that the ordinary workingman does not give many receipts, from which the Minister of Finance took the tax last year. He might have added that the ordinary workingman in Canada has given many less receipts in the last four years than ever before, unless you take into account receipts for visas and passports to go to the United States; for apart from that the ordinary workingman has not had very much to give receipts for. I repeat what I stated last year: The only reduction made in the cost of living to the ordinary workingman in this country by the budget of last year was an occasional one-cent postage stamp on the letters he mails. I will admit that the present budget is a little improvement on that because the Minister of Finance this year has reduced the sales tax, and that will be of some benefit to the ordinary working people. But I would point this out in regard to the sales tax: When we went out of power in 1921, our sales tax was three per cent. It was raised to six per cent by the incoming Liberal government, of which the Minister of Finance was a member; was lowered to five per cent last year, and the minister now reduces it from five to four per cent, or reduces it, as he says, twenty per cent; so the sales tax is still about 33⅓ per cent, to use the minister's own method of figuring, higher than when we went out of power in 1921. I fear that cutting it from five to four per cent will not make a very great deal of difference to the ordinary workingman.

The income tax has been reduced by this budget. There is nothing in that for the ordinary workingman of this country, for he does not pay income tax. We have also a reduction in the stamp tax on cheques and on notes and overdrafts, but the ordinary workingman does not indulge in any of those to any great extent, so the sales tax is practically the only thing by which the ordinary workingman will benefit by this budget.

I find myself sometimes propounding this problem to myself: How is it that this government, which avows that it contains the only Simon pure friends of the workingman, that it contains the real tribunes of the people, finds it so difficult to give proofs in its budgets of its love for the workingman? I remember reading of Tom Moore, the poet, saying that he wrote for the masses and the classes, but not for the asses. The budgets of my good friend the Minister of Finance are for the classes, but not for the masses. That is his attitude in regard to the workingman.

An hon. MEMBER: Where are the asses?

Mr. MANION: The asses are those who believe everything the Minister of Finance tells them in regard to budget taxation.

Oh, yes, I forgot one cut that the minister has made in this budget for the workingman, and that is in the excise duty on matches. Those pipe smokers who smoke more matches than tobacco now have the gratifying knowledge given out by the Eddy Company the other day that there will be a one cent reduction in the price of a large box of matches. So the workingman does gain a little there.

May I sincerely congratulate the Minister of Finance on one feature of his budget, and that is that he has quit, for this year at least, the tariff tinkering which did so much to bring about instability and depression in business, unemployment, and that exodus from our country which has been greater in the past four years than ever before in our history. At the same time I find myself wondering what has become of those boasts he made, as well as the Prime Minister and other members of the government, even the Minister of Trade and Commerce this afternoon indulged in them—that these cuts in the tariff have not only improved the industries concerned, but have improved the conditions of the ordinary workingman and have helped to bring about general prosperity.

Mr. DUNNING: They have.

Mr. MANION: If they have, why is it the Minister of Finance has stopped making cuts? What has become of that famous speech of my good friend the Minister of the Interior regarding the death knell of protection? What about those famous speeches from the housetops of the Minister of Immigration on the beauties of free trade? The real fact, Mr. Speaker, is this, that the Minister of Finance has at last come to the conclusion that we have been right in saying during the past four years that what Canada wants is a stable tariff policy. We have not been advocating a high tariff policy, but have been advocating a stable tariff policy, and I submit that the Minister of Finance should be thoroughly congratulated on his adoption of the views we have adhered to and expounded for the past four years.

After recess I propose to take up another subject of great importance to this Dominion of Canada.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

Mr. MANION: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I was congratulating the Minister of Finance on the fact that he had once more come back to the sane attitude of a stable tariff policy for this country. I was pointing out that his budget represents the attitude which has been advocated by the party on this side of the House for the past four years, and that we were all happy that the tinkering with the tariff, which had caused so much depression and unemployment and such a great exodus from our country in the past four years, had been halted for some time at least; and I was asking him why, if the cuts in the tariff which he had made in his former budgets were good for the industry of the Dominion, they had been discontinued.

I wish, now, Mr. Speaker, to devote a few moments to general questions affecting the country as a whole before coming to the constructive suggestion that I hinted at—a suggestion, it is true, applying largely to one great section of our country, but which if adopted would have a very marked and profitable effect upon the country as a whole. It has become more or less a trite saying on the part of our public men that Canada is confronted by many difficult problems, which are largely the outcome of geography. For example, it is said that we have on our hands a large railway problem, a serious taxation problem, a pressing immigration problem, a disquieting exodus problem, and perhaps a problem of sectionalism. In discussing these problems our public men in addressing various Canadian Clubs have divided our country geographically into four sections, although in some of my own platitudinous speeches I have increased these to five. These five sections are easily discerned when one looks at the map of the Dominion. First, there is the eastern section comprising the maritime provinces; then comes Quebec and eastern Ontario, which should be taken as another great section; next comes northern Ontario, which is often described as an uninhabited barren waste, but which extends for 700 miles from North Bay on the east to the Manitoba boundary on the west, and which I shall show in a moment is really a vast empire in itself; to the west again we have the prairie provinces; and, finally, across the Rocky mountains comes the fifth section comprising the province of my good friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens)—British Columbia.

Each of these five sections, as has been pointed out many times, has its own resources, its own problems, its own aspirations and its own sectionalism; and if we are to progress as a nation, as has been said on frequent occasions—and I believe it is very true—we must in each of these sections treat our local problems rather from a national than a sectional viewpoint. In other words, we cannot develop this country in patches, we must look at all questions nationally, in a spirit of compromise, ready to do what is best for the Dominion as a whole, each section regarding the problems of the other sections in the kindliest spirit possible.

Mr. ROBB: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: Let me point out to you, Sir, a few examples of the problems to which I refer. In the maritimes we have had the very fine, kindly, hospitable people there—people whom I had the very great pleasure of visiting during the recent elections, and who are represented in this House by I think a group of men as brilliant as any group representing any other section of the country, if not the most brilliant—I say we have had those very kind people in a veritable slough of despond by reason of the problems confronting the maritimes, which problems the Duncan commission was appointed to study and to find remedies for.

The Duncan report has been laid before this House, but I regret to say, Mr. Speaker, that I have failed so far to discern in the budget speech any intimation from the Minister of Finance that he is prepared in any way to make provision for any of those recommendations. And my good friend from Pictou (Mr. Cantley) in the question he put to the Minister of Finance recently did not receive very much encouragement in this respect. However, I do hope that before this session is much further advanced the Minister of Finance and the government will show that they are deeply impressed with the Duncan report and propose to give effect to a large part, if not all, of its recommendations. Personally I am not directly interested in the maritimes, but I am interested in the building up of a great Canadian nation on this part of the North American continent, where my sons and yours may live and love and propagate their species, instead of being forced, as in the past, to go across to the United States to earn a living. Because of that feeling, I am looking at the maritime question as I try to look at the questions of the other sections of this country, from a national standpoint, the standpoint of building up a great nation in a great empire.

Then take Ontario and Quebec, which I have placed together, because despite all differences of race and creed these two sections have the same industrial, agricultural and economic interests, and even these sections have their troubles. We heard something of them here this afternoon, when the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) criticised the Minister of Finance because there were no more cuts in the tariff. That is an absolutely opposite attitude to that which I am taking, Sir. One of the problems of this great industrial section of Canada, eastern Ontario and Quebec, is that problem of a stable tariff policy. Old Ontario and Quebec have the big industrial developments of our country and they have the problem of regaining a stable tariff policy in order to carry on the industries of this country. You must have confidence in the country in order to carry on business prosperously and progressively, and I hope the members of this House from the prairie provinces will look at that problem in the same spirit I mentioned a few moments ago when I mentioned my standpoint in connection with the maritime question. They must remember that while they demand a number of things, they should consider the interests of this eastern industrial section of our country, and they should hesitate to destroy a tariff policy which, for a period of fifty or sixty years or more, has helped to build up the industrial life of Canada.

If you take Quebec alone, that province has its own problems, one of which was referred to by the Premier of Quebec in a recent speech when he said that it would be wise for the people of Canada generally to keep their hands off the British North America Act. In our country there are, unfortunately, what I sometimes call constitution mongers, people who are so worried about the constitution of our country, or so worried about the autonomy of Canada and so much afraid that we are subservient to some other part of the empire that they wish to put all the power of our people in the hands of this parliament. Mr. Taschereau, if I read his remarks aright as I think I did, stated recently that it was the policy of the people of Quebec to guard those rights which they were given in the British North America Act, of which they are passionately fond, and that he objected to any of those rights being taken away by any other part of Canada. He contended that the act should remain as it is unless changed by the same parliament which put it into force. I believe that to be a proper attitude; I believe this confederation may only be held together by looking at all matters in the light of the best interest of each portion of that confederation. The Prime Minister of Canada recently stated at a meeting in Toronto that if my leader and the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) should get into an argument as to the rights of the minorities in the province of Quebec, the people of that province knew quite well from whom they would get the greater justice. I will not criticise that statement, but I will say that I am very sure Premier Taschereau was not worrying about the present government nor the present Minister of Justice, and neither would he have worried if our party had been in power. The Premier of Quebec was probably looking ahead forty or fifty years to the time when, instead of there being only two English speaking people to one French speaking person, there may very possibly be five or ten English speaking persons to one person speaking French, and he was fearing for the future of those minority rights which the French people of the province of Quebec value so highly. Again I say it is the duty of everyone to look at these problems in the same way as we looked at them when the question of confederation was first mooted.

I might take another section before I deal with the problem of my own particular part of Canada, referring now to the prairie provinces and British Columbia. They have their problems also, largely questions of transportation because of the great distance, in the case of the prairie provinces at least, to the seaboard. The situation is somewhat better now in British Columbia because of the Panama canal, but the prairie provinces have a long haul to the sea. It is true that Mr. Beatty recently stated that Canada has the lowest freight rates of all the countries of the world. I do not differ from him at all but, Sir, even though the freight rates are low, because of the vast distances over which our producers have to ship their grain to the markets of the world before it reaches seaboard, in comparison with the distances other grain-growing countries have to carry their products, even the lightest burden of transportation charges is quite heavy enough for the people to bear. Again I say it is the duty of those in other sections of our country to look at these problems as broadly as possible, remembering at the same time that in Canada we have two great railway systems in which the people of Canada and the people of other countries have invested something like $3,000,000,000, and we must consider the rights of these railways to a certain extent.

I would like to deal for a moment with the Hudson Bay railway, and then I will pass on to the problems confronting my own part of Canada. The Hudson Bay railway is another sectional question; the only people who are arguing very strongly for its completion are those in the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan. I may say here and now, very frankly, that I have very little faith personally in the Hudson Bay railway ever becoming a very serious competitor of the present railways as a grain carrying route. I am also free to admit that I may be wrong, but even with that feeling which I have expressed I have never opposed the Hudson Bay route, although it was wrongly said in the prairie provinces that I had done so. Yet I believe with many others that even if it turns out a failure, the millions spent there might be well spent if they bring about a better national understanding and a better general good feeling in our country than we have at present.

This afternoon the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) stated that Canada is an agricultural country, a statement which has been made very often. I am going to assume the risk of making a prophecy to-night, although I know that prophesying is a very dangerous game. I believe that within twenty-five years, instead of our greatest interests being in agriculture, Canada will probably have a far greater interest in minerals. Even in 1926, the past year, we produced minerals in this great country of ours to the extent of almost a quarter of a billion dollars, the exact figure being $243,000,000; that is the value of the products of our mines in the last year. It has been pointed out by geologists, and if you look at a geological map of our country you will find it to be so, that 85 per cent of our country is potentially a mineral country, and only 15 per cent agricultural. If those figures are accurate, and I have received them from geologists whom I could name if necessary, then I think I have some basis for the prediction I made a few moments ago. In Canada we have a vast extent of pre-Cambrian rock, which is the oldest geological formation known in the world, and it has been pointed out by these same geologists that all the rich mines in the world have been discovered in that rock.

[Mr. Manion.]

The rich Rand mines in South Africa; the Mysore mines of India, and the rich Australian mines have been discovered in pre-Cambrian rock, and more than half the surface of Canada is made up of this formation. If you look at this geological map you will find that there is an immense horse shoe of rock almost completely surrounding Hudson bay, taking in northern Quebec, in fact nearly all of Quebec; all new Ontario; northern Manitoba, northern Saskatchewan and extending up to the Arctic regions. This area contains about two million square miles, more than half the total area of our country, and it is all made up of pre-Cambrian formation. That shield of rock was described very recently by the secretary of the Ontario Mining Association as the greatest undeveloped mineral field left in the world. Those are his own words; I am using his own expression, and I believe it to be correct from my study of the matter. Mr. Corliss, one of the directors and general manager of the Mond Nickel Corporation, a very able and outstanding mining engineer who has been in the north country for about twenty years, in speaking of this same area stated that only 5 per cent to 7 per cent of that pre-Cambrian shield has ever been explored. That part includes a small section which juts down into the United States just west of lake Superior. In that 5 per cent to 7 per cent which has been explored we have the immensely rich copper mines of Michigan, which have been worked for nearly a hundred years and which turn out annually millions of dollars worth of copper; we have the immensely rich iron mines of Minnesota, which annually turn out about 60,000,000 tons of iron ore; we have also the Sudbury nickel mines, which supply 90 per cent of the nickel of the world, and which have turned out $700,000,000 worth of nickel since they were opened up hardly more than a generation ago; the rich Porcupine gold mines, and the rich Cobalt silver mines, to say nothing about the Rouyn district in the province of Quebec, the Woman lake and Red lake districts of northern Ontario, and the rich mineral areas up in northern Manitoba. If, as Mr. Corliss states, in from five to seven per cent of our country lying under this pre-Cambrian shield we have found the immense riches I have just mentioned, what lordly dreams we might conjure up in our minds of the possibilities of the exploration of the other ninety or ninety-five per cent of that area of pre-Cambrian shield!

Let me take the liberty for two or three minutes of presenting to the House a few facts, and many such could be given. These are so startling that it is worth while perhaps to mention them because I think the question is a very important one. In the first place, look at the Hollinger mine, which I had the pleasure of visiting a few months ago. It is an immense gold factory which employs three thousand men the year round and which turns out in dividends at the present time about $6,000,000 a year. Eighty per cent of these three thousand men are Canadians and own their own homes, and the Hollinger mine is on the verge of becoming the greatest gold mine in the world.

Speaking of nickel, I mentioned a moment ago the fact that the Sudbury nickel mines produce ninety per cent of the nickel used in the world, that they have produced $700,000,000 worth of nickel since they opened up about a generation ago, and that they have paid about $100,000,000 in dividends.

Speaking of silver, the Ontario silver mines are stated to be adding one ton of silver a day to the silver supply of the world.

As to the district of northern Manitoba under this pre-Cambrian shield, the Flin Flon mine there is stated by authorities to-day to have $226,000,000 worth of ore already blocked out. A quarter of a billion dollars' worth of ore already blocked out!

In Ontario in 1910, roughly sixteen years ago, we produced $42,000 worth of gold; to-day we produce $31,000,000 worth, and the authorities declare that it will shortly become the second greatest gold producer in the world, second only to South Africa. Many other facts of this kind might be stated, if I wished to take up the necessary time. But the facts I have mentioned are so startling, so outstanding, it is a sufficient indication of what I mean when I speak of the importance of the great pre-Cambrian shield. And, Sir, it should impress upon this government the importance of the mineral aspect of our country which has not been sufficiently dwelt upon in the past. In fact I believe no government of the past has been sufficiently seized of the importance of the mineral development of our country.

Now, Sir, to get closer to the problem which I am going to discuss, if you look at the map of Canada—and it is sometimes worth while looking at that map—you will find that the northern section of Ontario to which I have alluded is in area an empire in itself. It is 700 miles across and is wider than the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan together. It has been described as an uninhabited barren waste, and yet that area is as great as the area of England and France together, having a population of only about 200,000 people, but on account of its richness in pulpwood we, in association with the province of Quebec, are turning out much of the pulp and paper which is going to make an immense export from our country; and I have already mentioned some of the potentialities in regard to the minerals. But because of the scarcity of population up there and because of the small agricultural development, it is a heavy burden on the three lines of railways which run across it from east to west and from west to east. Any solution, therefore, which would bring about greater development, greater freight traffic in that section, would be beneficial not only to the railways, not only to that section, but as well to the country as a whole. In addition to that, Sir, any great development of that country—and it must take place ultimately—will mould into one mighty whole the two areas of Canada which that section divides.

Sir, besides the precious metals which I have briefly mentioned, and the fringe of which we have merely touched, we have in that section—and there are in other parts of the country which I will mention in a moment, for instance the province of Quebec, from which my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) comes—there are hundreds of millions of tons of undeveloped iron ore. Mr. Corliss, whom I quoted a few minutes ago, states that the United States government geologists have asserted that we have in northern Ontario nine thousand million tons of thirty-five per cent iron ore or better, which at the present rate of use of iron ore in the United States would last that country itself for over one hundred years. In addition to that, other great discoveries have been made in the provinces of British Columbia, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and Manitoba, the Belcher islands in Hudson bay showing the occurrence of immense deposits of iron ore; and in spite of the existence of hundreds of millions of tons, perhaps thousands of millions of tons, we are not using one ton of Canadian ore in the blast furnaces and steel plants of the country. We are importing to-day about a million of tons of ore a year, two-thirds from the United States and one-third from Newfoundland; and we imported last year about $200,000,000 worth of steel products, quite a large proportion of which would, under a proper policy, be produced in this Dominion.

In the development of iron ore, coal is very important indeed—in fact, iron ore cannot be converted into pig iron and steel without the use of coal. We imported as well last year about $60,000,000 worth of coal, and we exported about $4,000,000 worth. Yet we have down in the maritime provinces, in Alberta and in some other sections of the country immense deposits of coal, in fact the second largest coal deposits in the world. We have also immense deposits of iron, which I have just described. Surely, Sir, with these vast deposits we should apply our brains to working out the problem of developing our own iron and steel industry from our own iron ore and our own coal. And, Sir, it can be worked out; in fact to my mind has been worked out, and I shall give proofs of that in a few minutes—because I shall not take up a very great deal of the time of the House on this occasion.

Sir, iron and steel are basic elements of commercial progress in any country. If you look over the commercial history of the world you will find every country on the face of the globe which has gone ahead very rapidly commercially has based the foundation of its commercial progress upon iron and steel development. That is true of England, it is true of Germany, it is true of France, it is true of the United States. I could give figures to prove that but I do not wish to take up the time of the House in doing so at the present time. May I point out, as well, to those who are studying international affairs that the iron and steel valleys between Germany and France are the cause, to a great extent, of the periodical wars between those countries. They are the cause at the present time of the difficulties in settling the problem between these two countries, showing the importance to any country of iron and steel.

Now before I go into further details, may I give you a few of the reasons why I am not a lone voice crying in the wilderness in regard to this great problem? In the first place an iron ore committee was appointed by the Drury government, the Drury progressive government in Ontario, I think it was in 1922. The committee investigated the whole iron and steel problem. They spent much time visting various parts of this country, they were men experienced in this question, they investigated the whole iron and steel problem of our country, and in 1923 when Mr. Ferguson had come back into power they made their report. They had not completed that report when Mr. Drury went out of office, they made their report to Mr. Ferguson. In brief their report was to this effect—that we could develop the iron ore resources of our country by a bounty, by a coöperative bounty, if I might express it in that way, given by the provincial and the Dominion governments towards that development. That report was accepted by the Ferguson government, they agreed to carry it out, and the question was put up to this government, here at Ottawa. But so far as I know no serious consideration has even been given it by this government. In 1924 I put a question on the order paper regarding it and was informed by the Minister of the Interior that the question was still under consideration. So far as I know it is still under consideration, and of course as we all know, that does not mean very much. In other words the Dominion government did not at all, so far as I know, coöperate in any way with the provincial government of Ontario.

But I should like to point out to you, Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and to my other French-Canadian friends in this House, that Ontario is not alone interested in this great question. A few years ago in Quebec, around Chicoutimi, millions of tons of iron ore were discovered. It is described as titanic magnetic iron, and government geologists have passed upon this as being possible of economic development. That is stated in scientific issues of our government papers. Because of that immense discovery the Taschereau government in 1925 passed an act called the Iron Ore Premium Act, which is reported in an issue of Investigations of Mineral Resources and the Mining Industry, 1924, by the Department of Mines, as bringing forward the proposition that they would offer four-fifths of a cent per unit, that is, per one per cent iron, of any ore mined in Quebec and used in the steel plants or blast furnaces of that province. So the great Liberal government of Quebec, great at least from the standpoint of the Liberals, has come to offer a bounty for the development of the iron ore of that province. Surely if I have no weight with the Minister of Finance, the Taschereau government should have some weight. Here we are sitting to-night, midway between the Conservative government in Toronto and the Liberal government in Quebec, both of which have realized the importance of this great question and have offered bounties for the solution of it, and we have the Ottawa government, sitting here midway between the two, which, so far as I have been able to discover, has made no move even to consider the question.

In 1926 the Canadian National Railway officials issued a booklet, a copy of which I hold in my hand, and a perusal of which is worth the time of any hon. member. If any hon. gentleman has not read that booklet on the mineral resources along the Canadian National railways in northeastern Canada, he should make it his duty to do so at once. In that booklet they give pages to the iron ore question. They state that the Vermilion ranges and the Mesabi range in the state of Minnesota extend into Canada and they conclude their article on pages nine and forty-seven by advising that this Dominion government—and

I commend this to the Minister of Railways, who is giving me his kind attention—should coöperate with the provinces of Quebec and Ontario in the development of those ores by a bounty system. In addition I have letters from high officials of the Canadian National Railways to whom I wrote some years ago on this question. They point out to me that this is a vital question as regards not only Canada but the national railways, and at the bottom of one letter the following sentence is used:

I do not know of anything of greater importance to Canada than the development of our iron ore resources.

That the Canadian National take the attitude they do is, I think, a reason why this government should give the question some support.

But I have still another very good authority, a man who has the respect of all classes in this country, a man who certainly has the respect of all the Liberal party in this country, a man who is looked upon as one of our Canadian statesmen. I refer to the Right Hon. W. S. Fielding, who made two speeches in this House dealing with this question. One was in 1909 and the other in 1920. Naturally I did not hear the one in 1909, but I did hear the one in 1920 and I listened to it with pleasure. I took the trouble to look it up and I have on my desk the statement regarding this question. I will read just a couple of passages, although the whole speech dealing with bounties is worth reading. He was dealing not directly with the question I am supporting, that is, the giving of a bounty for these iron ores, but with the question of bounties for the iron and steel industry, which bounties, he pointed out, were instituted by the Conservative government under Sir Charles Tupper before the Liberal party came into power in 1896, and which he carried on. This is from Hansard of 1920, volume 2, page 2505.

Bounties on iron and steel originated with the Conservative government in the days of Sir Charles Tupper. The operations under them were not large. There was a small operation in the province of Quebec and another in the province of Nova Scotia. I have not the figures but I think no very large sum was paid out until after our government took up the question.

Then on the next page he says, and this practically sums up the conclusion to which he comes:

At all events the time came when the bounties automatically ceased, and to-day no bounties are paid. What was the result of that? Was there anything in the result which would justify that departure from free trade principles? I am afraid my farmer friends will not agree, but I believe it is susceptible of proof that every dollar that was paid out by way of bounties on iron and steel, and millions were paid out—

By the way, between $18,000,000 and $19,000,000 were paid out.

—came back to the Dominion treasury in the form of excise and customs duties on the new business created as the outcome of that policy. I think that can be established as a pure financial question, but there is more than that.

Then he goes on to describe the growth of the iron industry in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and some of the other provinces. I made it my business, since reading his remarks, to look up the growth of that iron and steel industry, and it is worth while putting on record a few figures which are very expressive of the growth of the iron and steel industry after the bounty system had been inaugurated in this country by Sir Charles Tupper and supported by Mr. Fielding and the Laurier government, just as the old national policy of Sir John A. Macdonald was carried on by them in the same way.

In a pamphlet called Iron and Steel, which I have under my hand and which was issued by the Statistics branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce, they point out that in Canada in 1924 there were 1,005 iron plants manufacturing iron and steel with a combined production of $371,000,000, and capital employed $537,000,000; men employed, 79,000, and wages paid, $100,000,000 per annum. What I am going to give now is of interest to my friends, particularly from the prairie provinces; I refer to the distribution of these different plants. The distribution is as follows:

	No. of plants
Ontario	645
Quebec	174
British Columbia	69
Nova Scotia	36
Manitoba	32
New Brunswick	20
Alberta	18
Saskatchewan	6
Prince Edward Island	5

In other words, every one of the nine provinces of this Dominion had some of those iron and steel plants, the foundation of the progress and prosperity of which was laid in the bounties of the Conservative government, followed by the Laurier-Fielding government. If I may digress just for a moment, I should like to point out in this connection the progress that is being made in manufacturing generally in those western provinces. The Statistics branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce, in the same year, 1924, issued a report on manufacturing in the four western provinces. The figures are as follows:

Four Western Provinces

Capital invested in manufacturing	$458,000,000
Gross value of the products	384,000,000
Wages paid	76,000,000

I do not wish to go into details, but in order to explain the point a little further I may say that about one-half of that development has taken place in British Columbia and the other half in the three prairie provinces. Therefore, not only in iron and steel but in manufacturing generally the western provinces have profited by the policy which we advocate on this side of the House, and which was carried on for so many years by the Laurier-Fielding government for the purpose of assisting so far as they could in building up the industries of this country.

I have still one more reason, and then I shall have concluded with my reasons why this question is worthy the consideration of this government. I refer to the Duncan report, which I mentioned a few moments ago and which is of the utmost importance to at least one great section of this great country. The Duncan report deals with the different problems in the maritime provinces. It deals, among others, with the coal problem and it gives three recommendations for the solution of the coal problem of the maritime provinces. In the first place it says that the tariff board should immediately investigate the reasons for imposing, if necessary, a tariff on coal coming into this country. I believe that is being done by the tariff board at the present time. Secondly, it advises federal aid to coke ovens. That means a bounty system. Third, it advises that a bonus should be paid on all Canadian steel when it is made with Canadian coal.

I have given you, sir, the report of the Duncan commission, which backs up absolutely the attitude I am taking, and I hope that that report, not only in regard to coal but in regard also to other branches of industry in the maritime provinces, will be acted upon by this government in the very near future. I have cited to you authorities from all sections of our country and support from all classes in our country, support from political leaders of opposing parties and different sections, in regard to the necessity of this government giving some attention to the development of the iron and steel industry in Canada. There is this to remember. If you offer a bounty for the development of iron ore in this country and no Canadian iron ore should be developed, not one dollar will be lost to the treasury; in other words, failure will cost you nothing.

It might be asked why the United States is not giving bounties for the development of this industry. There are many reasons. In the first place the United States is an immensely rich country, and it is much more densely populated than Canada. In the second place they have richer ores than any that have so far been discovered in Canada. I have been over there and have stood on the brink of a body of ore that stretched as far as from here to Keith's theatre, into which trains were running, loaded with ore by means of steam shovels. That ore is very easily mined. Again, they have immense capital; they have their own railways and steamboats: and, as well, they have a tariff which has built up the iron and steel industry in that country.

Mr. DUNNING: I wonder if my hon. friend has given any thought to the side of this question which he touched upon a moment ago when he spoke of the very much better quality of ore, the higher iron content of the United States ores as compared with Canadian ores, from the point of view of how high a bounty would be required in Canada to make it more economical for Canadian iron and steel plants to use Canadian ore of the lower quality, rather than import United States ore as they are doing at present.

Mr. MANION: I have given a good deal of thought to that, but I do not wish to go too much into detail to-night. There are reports before this government and before the provincial governments. They have an act in the province of Quebec under which a bounty of four-fifths of one cent per unit is paid, which would work out at about 40 cents a ton of 50 per cent iron. To my mind, although I am not an authority at all, that would not be sufficient to develop our bodies or ore. But I have the impression that once our iron ore deposits have begun to be really developed we will find some richer types of ore such as they have in the United States. With all the immense deposits of iron ore we have in this country, surely the good God did not let all the good ore stop at the 49th parallel. Surely Canada has been treated a little better than that.

Mr. DUNNING: The Belcher deposits are better.

Mr. MANION: Yes, they are better. I noticed in the Financial Post issued just a few days ago an article dealing with Belcher deposits and saying that Captain Bernier was being employed to go up to Belcher island and take a cargo of iron ore from there to England for testing purposes; and if it is found worthy of being developed they are either going to carry the ore across to England or build some plant on the border of the Hudson bay, if they can get the water power they require.

Mr. James J. Hill, that great Canadian-American, wrote a book in 1910 from which I quoted in later years in this House. He stated in this book that those immense deposits of American ores would in from twenty-five to fifty years be well within sight of depletion. To-day the rich ores in the United States are being so rapidly depleted that they are beginning to use the lower grade ores, ores of a very much lower grade than they were using twenty years ago, and it is only a matter of time when we would bring in our low grade iron ores. I am one of those Canadians who do not wish the development of my country to take so long that we shall all be gone and forgotten before any of these immense deposits —9,000,000,000 tons—of iron ore are developed. I agree with Mr. Dooley when he says that he doesn't know what posterity has done for us that we should do so much for posterity. Let us do something for this generation, so far at least as the development of our iron ore and coal deposits are concerned.

I have another suggestion to make before I sit down. We have to-day a Minister of Mines who gives his spare moments, perhaps an occasional spare hour from his multitudinous duties as Minister of the Interior, to the question of the development of our mineral deposits. I believe that without increasing the size of the cabinet at all there are within the government a number of ministers who have much less to do than the Minister of the Interior, and this whole question of the mineral development of our country is so important that it might be well for the government to put this matter into the hands of some other minister who has more time than the very busy Minister of the Interior—I say this of him in no critical spirit. This mineral development is an important question. It is a question which if properly solved would help to solve in a very large way the railway problem of our country; it would help to solve our immigration problem; it would mean more work and more wages for our people; it would lower taxation in this country.

My good friend the member for West Calgary offered something constructive to this House. I am copying him, if you will, although I had this idea also, but I care not who gets the credit for this development if it should take place. I am quite willing to give the credit of this development to this government, and to give them my meed of praise if they will come forward and develop these great resources, but I do desire this great country of ours to be made a country where our boys and girls can remain and find employment, and help to build this country up into a great Canadian nation. I hope, in other words, that this government, which I have abused perhaps as much as anybody—somebody behind me says, "not half enough"—I hope they will so act that they will prove to our boys, the boys who went to the front, if you like, that this is not only a good country to die for but a good country to live for.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as the various budgets have come up in the last few years we have been trying from this corner to present as far as possible the distinctive viewpoint of labour with regard to the various points at issue. I take it that, since we will all acknowledge that labour is basic, what is in the interests of labour is really in the interests of the people at large. If we raise the level of labour we raise the general level. As one American economist puts it somewhere, the effect on the marginal people of the community is a good test of the value of any policy.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) has taken a very optimistic view indeed of the situation in Canada. He says:

> The Dominion enters its diamond jubilee year with a happy outlook. Our farmers have, in general, enjoyed bountiful harvests; our industries are active and working well up to capacity, many indeed are working overtime; employment is at a high level and our transportation companies report a large volume of business; retail trade is brisk, money is plentiful and a buoyant spirit prevails.

While that may be true with regard to certain individuals or groups, I submit it is not true of very considerable sections of our community. It may be true that some have great prosperity, but I would point out that there is a great difference in these days between the rewards which are received by the ordinary worker, whether in industry or on our farms, and those which come to many who live largely by their investments. I have been trying as far as I could to get statistics from Canadian sources, but I find that our bureau of statistics is not adequately equipped to give matters of this kind the attention that they require. However, the general conditions existing here and in the United States are somewhat similar, and I suggest that a detailed statement of the conditions in the United States affords a very valuable sidelight on our conditions in Canada. Recently the United States Bureau of Statistics has been taking a census in which there is a survey of American statistics from 1923 to 1925 covering some 160 lines of manufacture. They find that the number of individual establishments is decreasing and that the number of workers employed in these establishments is decreasing. The statement is made that during those two years the compensation received by the workers decreased $5,000,000 while the employers' profits went up $380,000,000, or a net gain for the employers of $385,000,000. I can quite understand that in these circumstances the employers might take the attitude assumed by the Minister of Finance and consider that things were now very satisfactory. The figures also show that the output per worker increased from $3,157 in 1923 to $3,461 in 1925, an increase per worker of $304. During that same period those workers who were retained on the job had their wages increased an everage of $31 a year. In other words, for every dollar paid out in increased wages the employers added nearly $10 to the price of his product at the door of the factory. That is the evidence afforded by the United States Bureau of Statistics. What are the workers in this country to think of this condition of things? I was glancing over a labour paper some days ago in which there was some comment with regard to the enormous profits that were being made in the automobile industry, and a long list of figures was given from Motor Stocks, fourth edition. This was the comment on the figures taken at random from one of these reports:

> The first figure shows that $1,000 invested in the Buick Motor Car Company, organized in 1904, returned in eleven years $710,000. What does this mean? It means that a man earning $1,500 per year (and that is more than the average worker earns), would have to work almost five hundred years to earn as much money as this one thousand dollars would bring by being invested for eleven years.

That helps us to realize the situation that exists. Then we ask ourselves, why work when it is easier to make more money by not working and investing in this way? A case is given in the press in connection with a man named James Cousens, who had been working as a bookkeeper at $75 per month. After spending years and years of energy in this capacity he was able to save $1,500. He borrowed $1,000 and lent the $2,500 to the Ford company and went to work in the Ford factory in 1904. Twelve years later we are told that Cousens, in addition to drawing a large salary from the Ford company, received $30,000,000 in dividends, and in 1916 he sold out his interests in the Ford company for $30,000,000. That undoubtedly is an exceptional case, but these exceptions help to illustrate the effects of a situation under which very large awards are being given to those who invest and much smaller awards in every way to those who are actually producing. I should like to quote a statement given by our Dominion Statistician with regard to the distribution of income. He says:

> According to an authoritative study of wealth and income of the people made by W. I. King, and published by the National Bureau of Economic Research, some years ago, the income of the people of the United States is divided approximately as follows, according to the diffrent sources: landlords' rents, (using the term landlord in a strict economic sense) one-twelfth; interest, two-twelfths; wages, six-twelfths; and profits, three-twelfths. This distribution of the national income would probably fairly well correspond to the distribution in Canada.
> The Bureau's estimate of the national income of the people of Canada in 1923 or 1924 is somewhat over four billion. Using Professor King's proportions, we would estimate the total of income received as wages in Canada was something over two billions per annum in these years; that business profits were somewhat over one billion; landlords' rent perhaps 350 millions, and interest on capital 700 millions. The term "profits" as used here, of course includes the business profits of the 700,000 operating farmers, as well as those of the big corporations.

Then I turn to King's book for further illustrations of the distribution of wealth. He says:

> In 1918 about eighty-six per cent of the persons gainfully employed have incomes of less than $2,000 per annum and almost fourteen per cent have incomes exceeding that sum. In the same year, about sixty per cent of the national income was divided among the eighty-six per cent of the gainfully employed who have incomes less than $2,000 per annum and almost 40 per cent of the national income was divided among the fourteen per cent of the gainfully employed who had incomes exceeding $2,000.

> The most prosperous one per cent of the income receivers had 14 per cent of the total income,
> The most prosperous 5 per cent of the income receivers had 26 per cent of the total income,
> The most prosperous 10 per cent of the income receivers had 35 per cent of the total income,
> The most prosperous 20 per cent of the income receivers had 47 per cent of the total income.

I think it is high time that our bureau of statistics was able to furnish us as full statistics along this line as are being furnished by the United States departments.

Now I want to consider for a few minutes the statement as given us by the Minister of Finance. With regard to taxation I notice there was a decrease in the amount received for income tax of $8,671,961.57. There was, nowever, on the other hand an increase in the amount received for customs duties of $14,144,856.50. It is very significant indeed that whilst the proceeds from income tax are decreasing the proceeds from customs duties are increasing. That is, upon those who are least able to bear the strain a greater burden is being imposed. Let us see what sums are "being extracted from the pockets of the people," to use the very graphic phrase of the member for West Calgary. The total amount received for taxation, according to the statement of the Minister of Finance, was about $343,000,000. That means $38 per head on an estimated population of 9,000,000, or $190 per family of five. Of this total the customs import duties alone, according to the minister's statement, amount to $141,500,000. That means $17 per head, or $85 per family. It is this particular kind of taxation that is steadily rising; already it is $85 per family; while the income tax received from a comparatively small group, who, however, own the greater part of the wealth of the country, is steadily decreasing.

For what are those amounts secured from the taxpayers of Canada? It is difficult for most of us to apprehend these large figures; it is much easier to understand proportions. Now let me give a few items upon which, according to the minister, we expended these revenues: Health expenditure, .19; scientific institutions, .27; labour across the country, so far as this government is concerned, .39. We talked for nearly two years about giving relief to the Home Bank depositors. The amount paid them represents .13 of our revenue. These four items together amount to only .98 —less than one per cent to these very important calls on our exchequer. Now, supposing old age pensions were put into operation in all the provinces, the proportion which would be paid by the Dominion government, according to the present scheme, would amount to only 3 per cent of our income. Bear in mind that the minister has told us that the proportionate amount of our expenditure that can be directly attributable to the war was 45.18 per cent. I think a comparison of these items will enable us to see that we are drawing enormous sums chiefly from the poorer sections of our community—the less wealthy, if you like to put it that way—and that on the other hand the greater part of these huge sums is going to the people who hold a mortgage on this country, and to whom interest must be paid on the war debt.

With regard to the proposed changes put forward by the minister, I would congratulate him on the reduction of the sales tax. I think that is a good move. But on the other hand there is a 10 per cent reduction on all the rates of income tax, which will have the effect of relieving taxation on the higher incomes out of proportion to the relief granted the lower incomes. The same thing is true in regard to the two-cent stamp on all cheques, irrespective of value; two cents on a small cheque is an altogether different proposition from two cents on a large cheque. Thus throughout this budget, in almost every case we find it is the higher incomes or the higher expenditures that are being relieved. I am not quite sure, but as far as I can see there is one gain that labour makes in addition to the sales tax—cheaper matches. Since this is the one outstanding example, it may be well for us to consider how much it amounts to.

On each package of matches manufactured or sold: three-fourths of one cent for each one hundred matches or fraction of one hundred matches.

In recent years I have not had enough to do with household buying to know just how many matches we use in a year. I suppose those of us who are not smokers use about twenty packages. That would look to me something like a yearly saving of 15 cents! But supposing it is ten times that, what is a dollar or two saving in the annual budget of a family that pays through the customs import duties $85? Yet in view of this wonderful saving of 15 cents or a dollar a year the minister says that the diamond jubilee of confederation should unite us to work for the lasting prosperity and progress of this our glorious land. Should it? I would suggest to the minister that there will have to be some more changes than he has announced in his budget before a good many people become very enthusiastic over the prospects of prosperity. Some hon. gentleman suggests that as there is a poetical license there ought to be a ministerial license. Even then this is rather extravagant language.

For a little while I should like to turn to the alternative suggestions offered by the member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett). I presume that the Conservatives are pretty well satisfied with this budget; they have offered no amendment. I presume that even the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) must be fairly well satisfied with it, or he would not be where he is to-day. Let me examine the statements made by the member for West Calgary, for if we must accept some alternative to the Liberal proposals I suppose it would be along the lines he has put forward. After reading his speech with considerable care I am inclined to believe that he is a better lawyer than an economist. Apparently his ideal is largely that of a self-contained nation. As he says:

> The domestic market is of the first importance to Canada—

And he urges that this market is:

> —the only means by which we are able to build up the industrial life of Canada and bring to our shores a consuming population for our own products.

And again he warns:

> Every time we open a channel of trade; every time we seek for our commerce an outlet; every time we develop for ourselves a means to send our trade and commerce to foreign lands, we place ourselves in a position where it may be possible for a foreign legislature to destroy that channel overnight with untold injury to the Canadian people.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that is mere rhetoric. We might as well say that every time we cross the street; every time we go for a walk; every time we take a meal and every time we inhale a breath we expose ourselves to some dangers. But do we propose to shrivel up and die because there may be some possible dangers in the ordinary course of living? I think we may understand that we must take the dangers along with the benefits which come from international trade.

The hon. member envisages a world filled with commercial enemies. That may have been true at one time, but to-day we are more and more living in a coöperative community; industrially, commercially and financially we are closely interlocked, and we are developing into a vast inter-related world. Only politically, as a matter of fact, do we maintain our independence with a moderate degree of success; otherwise we are closely related to all parts of the world. We all know that we have $2,000,000,000 of British money invested here, and that we have $3,000,000,000 of American money; that means that whether we like it or not, to that extent English and American investors are penetrating and controlling this country. They are crossing our international boundaries every time their money crosses. We must necessarily send our goods to every part of the world; to-day we are anxiously watching events in China and other parts of the world, which simply indicates that we have interests scattered over the world, and it would seem to me that we would be turning the clock back if we were to revert to the idea of self-contained communities with other communities as commercial rivals profiting at our expense. Rather I think we are advancing to the stage where the benefit of one is the benefit of all, and where world trade flows freely there is mutual benefit.

The hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) was very much perturbed because Canadian trade with various countries does not always balance, or because in some particular instances our imports are greater than our exports. In effect he says, "I found that from Switzerland we imported last year goods amounting to $9,170,000, while we sold that country goods amounting to only $1,310,000. Can we afford to establish a channel of trade with that community?" I should like to ask why not. These figures by themselves are of very little value, because trade is not always direct, and we have all sorts of three-cornered, four-cornered and six-cornered trades We all know the place the clearing house has in ordinary banking affairs, and I submit that in the world's great clearing house it is a matter of comparative indifference on what bank my cheque is drawn. In our analysis of these figures we must take into account the larger and more complicated relations, not simply the figures which relate to the direct traffic between one nation and the other.

The hon. member seems to have conveniently forgotten the paramount importance of the domestic market when he bemoans the fact that the export of trade is falling. For the life of me I cannot see that this latter part of his discussion is at all consistent with his earlier remarks. He said, "I view with the greatest apprehension the diminution of our export trade; to the extent to which that trade is diminished, to that extent does it work a hardship upon the Canadian people." A little earlier it was the domestic trade that was of importance, now he bemoans the fact that the export trade is said to be diminishing. This kind of reasoning, it seems to me, is very characteristic of some of those who seek protection as the cure all for our social ills; they have not realized fully that we can export only as we import. Apparently such a simple consideration has not yet entered into the consciousness of a great many of those who are so keen on what they call protection. We export only as we import; the one process is absolutely dependent on the other. If we hinder importation we hinder exportation, and if we increase the one we are liable tc increase the other, indeed must ultimately increase it. It is by fixing attention for a while on one process and then forgetting it altogether and concentrating on an altogether different process that some of the advocates of this policy manage to win and apparently hold public approval.

The hon. member is somewhat consoled with the ten per cent reduction in the income tax, and hopes that in time the income tax will be entirely abolished. If we turn back to the figures I gave a while ago it will be seen that if the income tax is abolished the larger part of the wealthy people will go almost scot free. What would the hon. member substitute? To use his own words, "A universal turnover tax, a tax by which every man who buys something will be able to make some contribution, a known contribution, a percentage levy." Surely that is a brilliant scheme to fleece still further the man with the lower income. As I understand it, and I am subject to correction, we are banishing the sales tax but erecting a super-sales tax, a universal sales tax, one affecting all commodities notwithstanding the fact that a great many of these commodities are already taxed by means of the customs duty. I want to be fair to the hon. member. So I quote his own words:

> ...if we impose a tax based upon the expenditure of the people, then as the poor man has less to spend than the rich, his contribution will be correspondingly less, but because he exercises the franchise he will make some contribution to the life of the state in the form of taxation.

Really, the audacity of the rich and their representatives simply staggers one! I wonder whether they really believe that by their specious arguments they can any longer fool the great mass of the people. Perhaps it is only fair to think that they have so long concentrated on their own view of this question that they have absolutely failed to realize the viewpoint of the majority who are not the beneficiaries of the present system. A man's ability to pay surely must be judged not by what he spends on the necessities of life but by what he has left after spending that money—the very part which, according to this scheme now propounded, would be exempt.

The hon. member has given us two new rules which should apply with regard to taxation, two grand new principles which may be added to those of Adam Smith—universality and visibility. For a long century we knew nothing about these two principles! The world waited in earnest expectation. At last in the fulness of the time they have been revealed to us through the mouth of the hon. member for West Calgary. Visibility and universality! And what about visibility? Why, the hon. member would take away the only tax that we have to-day that is clearly visible—the income tax. And what about universality? From those who have the large incomes—on which he says he would like to abolish entirely the income tax—he is removing the opportunity of paying to any considerable extent for the upkeep of the country. He is placing the greater part of the burden, according to this statement, upon those people who must pay for the necessaries of life, and who as they spend would have to carry the weight of taxation. It is rather interesting in this connection to note the plea that is made as to benefactions obtained from well-minded people. The hon. member states that in this new country hospitals have to depend on benefactions that come from well-minded people. On this there are one or two comments I should like to make, because the whole viewpoint that is put forth here is so very characteristic of one class in our community. In the first place I would say that the statement that the hospitals have to depend entirely upon benefactions is not correct. I know of a great many hospitals throughout my own part of the country, and the greater part of their income is not derived from benefactions but from taxation. It is quite true that some of the benefactors seek, where possible, to retain the right to sit on boards, and more or less manage the concerns of the hospital, but the greater part of the revenue comes out of public taxation. I should like to ask further why hospitals and educational institutions should have to depend upon benefactions? These institutions which minister to the primary interests of the people should not have to wait until some well disposed people come along and endow them. It would seem to me that the very first claim upon the resources of the country ought to be the hospitals and educational institutions. The implication behind this suggestion is that these public benefactors, who are the wealthy people, of course, know much better than the public where their surplus wealth should be placed. The raison d'etre of the income tax is that the public ought to decide where the surplus wealth is to be placed. And if we carry out the principle underlying the income tax still further it will remove this surplus wealth, because after all that wealth has been built up out of special privileges which have been given because of the protection afforded by the government or society at large.

A little earlier in his speech the hon. member for West Calgary suggested that the poorest man, in fact everybody who has the franchise, should contribute to the upkeep of his country. I would say much more should these well meaning benefactors who have grown wealthy through the arrangements that at present exist in society—much more should they be willing to do their share in carrying forward the larger concerns of our country; and I am a little bit suspicious, I must say, of philanthropists who would seek to avoid their obligations to the state which has enabled them to amass their wealth.

Further the hon. member has a very interesting plan to suggest with regard to the paying off of our debt without our being conscious of doing so. I suppose you may characterize that as painless extraction. We in our Labour group believe in paying off the debt, but we believe also in that splendid principle of visibility; we believe that it should be paid off in such a way that people would see who was paying it, and that the people themselves would decide who was best able to pay it. Now, in order to be perfectly fair I propose, for the benefit of those who may be present to-night who have not closely read the speech of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett), to read a paragraph containing the scheme which he set forth and which is already being commented upon in our leading newspapers:

> Therefore I propose that the Minister of Finance should, after creating his four per cent consolidated Canadian securities, provide by legislation that a percentage to be hereafter determined, of the revenue of the insurance companies, amounting to a net total of over $110,000,000 this year and from the deposits of the Canadian people in our savings banks, amounting approximately to at least another billion and three-quarters, should be utilized for the purpose of paying off this $100,000,000 This four per cent security I would maintain at all times at par—a very simple process. Under our Finance Act, our Department of Finance operates practically as a federal reserve board, and all that the insurance companies would have to do if they require additional money would be to deposit, either through their banks or with the Minister of Finance the four per cent consolidated securities and receive the money from the federal reserve board.

Well, I should like to congratulate the member for West Calgary upon his boldness in setting forth this scheme. I have thought over it, and it seems to me that it really involves the conscription of money at four per cent. I can see it in no other light than the conscription of money at four per cent. Even four per cent, however, may not be a bad thing from the standpoint of the insurance companies, for I notice in this morning's Mail and Empire of Toronto the following sentence referring to Mr. Bennett's proposal:

> It might be welcomed by the insurance companies as a source of an irreducible return of four per cent, and as an influence to check the upwardness of other trust fund prices.

So it is possibly doing the insurance companies a good turn, now that rates are falling so rapidly. The member for West Calgary spoke as follows:

> I submit, Sir, that the time has come, for this parliament, in the exercise of its unquestioned authority and power, to say that these deposits of the people should be utilized to the extent necessary to provide for the maturing obligations not met out of surplus.

I am sure that the House ought to be very grateful to have this high legal authority assure us that parliament has unquestioned authority and power, but I should like to ask, why select the savings in the hands of the insurance companies and in the savings departments of our banks? What of other forms of wealth? Why limit the operations of this scheme to those particular kinds of wealth? Why should we not conscript every kind of wealth? I am inclined to think that the principles laid down by the hon. member would carry us a great deal farther than he would like to go. The hon. member tells us that "this country in the present moment of stress and strain should utilize the savings of the people in the interests of the whole population"—surely a far-reaching principle. Personally I would substitute for the word "savings" the word "wealth". But let that go; the hon. member would probably maintain that all wealth represents savings.

I am sorry that the hon. member is not now in his seat, but I should hope that he will be able to induce his colleagues to support a motion in his own terms which I propose to place upon the order paper:

> Resolved that in the present moment of strain and stress, the time has come for this parliament, in the exercise of its unquestioned authority and power, to utilize the savings of the people in the interest of the whole population.

I propose to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), because it is in line with the policy on which I was elected to this House and which, in the form of an amendment, I brought before the House several years ago. The Independent Labour party of Manitoba has these sections in its platform:

1. Abolition of fiscal legislation that fosters and sustains class privilege.
2. Removal of taxes from the necessities of life.
3. Taxation of land values.

4. After exemptions of small incomes, a steeply graded income and inheritance tax.
5. A capital levy for the extinction of the war debt.

I should like to dwell for just a moment in closing upon the last clause of the amendment:

And further that no systematic effort is being made to reduce our national debt, the interest on which absorbs so large a proportion of the revenues of the Dominion.

As the minister has informed us, the principal expenditures attributable to the war amount to something like 45.18 per cent of the total expenditure. Last year in his budget speech the minister went on to point out other expenditures in addition to these. He referred to the heavy railway and merchant marine expenditures and other expenditures which grew out of war conditions. He said that during the war and demobilization period, large outlays were charged to ordinary expenses which, while not actual war costs, were directly attributable to war conditions. In addition to these there were heavy annual charges not taken into consideration in the summary submitted, for which the war is responsible. He stated that there might also be included the cost of housing the staffs connected with these services, which is now carried by the Public Works Department.

Therefore putting these items together I think we are safe in saying that practically one-half of the entire revenues of the country go to pay for the war, a large part of it being interest on the war debt. That means that there is a huge mortgage resting upon this country, and as long as we permit that mortgage to remain, a large part of our revenue must be used in paying the interest charges. Sooner or later we must frankly face the war debt. If you do not want to repudiate it, why not have a capital levy or in some other way deal with it? We are not suggesting in this amendment the manner in which that may be done. That is for the government to decide. But I would suggest that in ordinary business concern, the president, in reporting to the board of directors, would deal, not merely with current income and current expenditure, but with the mortgages carried by the corporation. We ought not to go along year by year simply accepting this war debt and spending the great part of our time and energy in collecting money from the poorer people to pay to the wealthier who hold the war debt mortgage. I have much pleasure in supporting the amendment moved by the hon. member for Macleod.

Mr. J. A. FRASER (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, in rising to say a few words on the motion before the House I want, in the first place, to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) on taking holus-bolus and adopting as his own child, one of the most important principles of the Conservative party, namely, stability of the tariff. Unquestionably if there was one point that the Conservative party urged from time to time during the last session of parliament that I had the pleasure of being in this House, it was that what the country required was stability of tariff, and the Minister of Finance in his budget has adopted that as his own baby.

I want also to congratulate the minister on the fact that he is still trying to make the people of Canada believe that he is reducing taxation. He told the people last year that by some miraculous means that I have yet to ascertain he was reducing taxes to the extent of $25,000,000, and at the same time he was spending more money than he was the year before. How he bridged the gap I do not know; but having successfully made the majority of the people of this Dominion believe that he had done so, he promises to repeat the dose. In this budget he says that he is reducing the taxes of the people of Canada by $27,000,000, and still in his speech which is reported in Hansard he says that he is actually increasing expenditure by $6,000,000. There is thus a gap of $33,000,000 which he has to bridge in order to show the people where he is reducing taxation. So far as I can see he is increasing the taxation of this country by about $3.50 a head, if I know anything at all about mathematics. The majority however, of the people during the last election believed that the Minister of Finance was actually reducing taxation.

I want to extend further congratulations to the Liberal party. I desire to congratulate most heartily the members of the Liberal party from Quebec in that they have succeeded in imposing upon their Liberal friends from the western prairies the good old protective principle of the Conservative party, because if there is one principle which is maintained in the present budget it is, as I said before, the protective policy of the tariff, and if there is one thing which the Liberals of Quebec are to be congratulated upon it is that no further reduction is to be made in the tariff during the present year. Therefore, as I said before, we are to have stability of the tariff for at least another year.

This afternoon the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) made a few remarks regarding imports and exports of raw materials. Some mention was made of the fact that we were exporting a considerable amount of raw material. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that we were exporting about $50,000,000 of gold. I do not know exactly what he means by the exportation of $50,000,000 of gold; I suppose what he had in mind was commercial gold, not gold in its raw state. I do not remember the figures as to exportations of gold during the last year, but I believe they were somewhere in that neighbourhood. I want, however, to draw his attention to his own report, the report of the Department of Trade and Commerce for the year ended March 31, 1926, in regard to the export of some of these raw products. What I think is meant by raw gold is gold in the shape of ore which is shipped out of this country and the values smelted in a foreign country. That is exactly what is happening in my own province of British Columbia, where large quantities of quartz are being shipped out of the country for the values to be removed on the other side of the line and the money sent back to this country. That is what I understand by the exportation of raw gold.

In the last annual report of the Department of Trade and Commerce there is given on page 13 a list of the principal Canadian commodities exported. Raw gold was exported to the extent, in round figures, of $25,968,000, of which, $11,360 went to the United Kingdom and $25,956,734 to the United States. There is an example of the export of our raw materials to foreign countries, the question that was under discussion this afternoon, and no one can deny that the United States is a foreign country. Let me call attention also to some other significant figures in the report of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. On the very same page I find our export of nickel. The minister stated this afternoon that we exported $1,000,000 of nickel, but he pointed out that we imported $1,000,000 worth of aluminum, which he said about struck a balance. I find on page 13 of the minister's own report that instead of exporting $1,000,000 worth of nickel, last year we exported $12,829,000, of which $4,000,000 went to the United Kingdom and nearly $7,000,000 to the United States. We also exported copper ore and blister to the amount of $13,945,000. That is another case of our raw material going out of the country to be smelted on the other side of the line and there fabricated into articles of commerce which are shipped back and sold in this country. Of pig lead we exported $13,292,000. We exported raw asbestos to the amount of $9,000,000, and aluminum in pigs to the amount of $6,000,000 odd. We exported zinc spelter to the amount of $4,862,000. These items, all of which are the raw mineral products of this country—and this is not the full list; I am giving only the more important items that enter into our exports—total just around $100,000,000. We export that amount of our raw materials to be smelted and fabricated in a foreign country into the finished products which are then shipped back here. Now if there is one thing that the Conservative party has always emphasized on the floor of this House and throughout the country it is that we should find some way to stop so large an exportation of our raw products.

Coming as I do from a mineral province, I have been very much pleased to see so many references in the speeches that have been delivered in this debate to the mining industry and the importance of mineral development. Last year very little was said on this subject, but I hope it will be discussed more and more as the years go by. I was very much interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) a short time ago, and I heartily concur in his prediction that in the next few years the mining industry will be one of the most important in this country. I am not so sure but what it is very nearly in the first place now. I should like to emphasize that conditions generally in this country cannot be more rapidly improved than by the development of the mining industry throughout the whole country. I have seen it stated somewhere—I cannot give the authority at the moment—that during the last twenty years there have been more minerals used all over the world than in all previous time. That is a significant statement, and it will be appreciated particularly by those who live in a country so rich in mineral resources as Canada undoubtedly is. Here is another significant statement. Since the year 1800 the population of the world has doubled, and since 1800 the production of iron alone has increased one-hundredfold; so you see how rapidly the production of these metals is gaining on the population of the world, and the same applies to coal and many other minerals.

I should just like to point out the influence that the development of the mining industry has on the development of any country, and I would like the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) to pay attention to this. No mineral has had a greater influence in the development of different parts of the world than has the mineral that is known by the name of gold. No mineral has had more to do with the colonization of different countries in the world than gold has had. A gold strike is one of the greatest colonizers that there is or ever has been on the face of the earth. When word comes of a gold strike, what do you find? You find that every man with any ambition is anxious to get into that country. I need not enlarge upon that, because you all know it is true. The discovery of gold in the Yukon is within the experience of us all. With the rush of men into a country where gold is discovered there springs up a demand for all kinds of agricultural products; for these men must be fed and the next thing you find is that those who are not so much interested in mining as in agriculture immediately start to develop agriculture in that part of the country, and long after the gold has been depleted the agricultural wealth of that part of the country continues to grow and expand. I need only mention, for instance, the development that took place in Australia; it was a gold strike that started the colonization of that country. Then look at what happened in California. Before gold was discovered in California there were very few people there, but the moment gold was found people were attracted from all over the world. They got to California just as fast as they could, and later on many of them started in agricultural pursuits, probably when they were not successful in mining. However, that may be, the discovery of gold, important though it was to California, was not one-hundredth part so important as the development of agriculture. Anyone who has gone there and looked at the wealth coming every year from the orchards and fields of California must realize the amount of wealth which is being distributed from that source. The initial impetus given to the development of that particular state at least was the discovery of gold.

I need only tell you what happened in my own province of British Columbia. In 1858, when gold was first discovered in the Cariboo district, what happened? There were then a few traders and a few wandering bands of Indians in that province, and nothing more; nobody knew anything about it. But as soon as gold was discovered thousands of people from all over the world were at once attracted to that province. These people went into a section which was absolutely impossible so far as the pursuit of agriculture is concerned, because it is far above those parts of the province where you can grow any kind of agricultural product. I refer to the original Cariboo gold fields, which were at an elevation of four thousand feet and produced practically no agricultural products. But the very fact of a population of ten or fifteen thousand going into that district brought about a demand for agricultural products, the result of which was that some of these men went down to the lower level where there were agricultural lands and started to develop them, and that development has continued to this time. So that from a population of two or three thousand in British Columbia when the development started we have at present 600,000 people, and their occupation is very largely agricultural.

I wish to draw the attention of hon. members from the eastern provinces to the present development in the northern parts of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Does anyone suppose for one moment that we would have had the development we have seen in the northern part of Ontario to-day had it not been for the discovery of precious metals in that district? Everyone knows the history of that development. Everyone knows that the object of the construction of the railway into that part of the country was to develop the agricultural lands of the district, and it was only by accident that the minerals were stumbled upon. But the impetus given to the development of agriculture in that northern country would never have reached its present stage had it not been for the minerals discovered there. The same thing applies to the northern part of Quebec and Manitoba, the development of which we have heard so much about to-night from the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion). We from British Columbia feel jealous that there are so many of these things going on in the eastern provinces, because we know they are good things and we would like to see more of that kind of development in British Columbia.

Not only is the mineral industry of great importance to national development, but the same applies to almost every line of industry. For instance, we have on our hands what we are pleased to say is a great railway problem. That is one of the great problems the people of Canada have to solve, and nothing will solve it more quickly than a revival of or the giving of an impetus to the mineral industry, because taking all the railways together the mineral industry is responsible for thirty-five per cent of the traffic accruing to them. I have seen a statement of the Canadian National Railways in which they attributed forty-seven per cent of their total revenue to the mineral industry. If that is so, surely it is important that every person in Canada should pay careful attention to the development of that industry; and it is particularly important that the government do so.

I call attention also to the fact that out of every dollar spent in the production or development of the mine fifty cents is paid out for labour. Another important fact in regard to the mining industry, which will cause the farmers to realize that it is the best friend they can have, is that out of every dollar spent in mining twenty-five cents goes directly for farm produce. That surely should attract the attention of our good friends from the prairies, because last year the production from the mines of this country was $243,000,000—a record for all time, I am pleased to say, so far as the mining industry of Canada is concerned. If twenty-five cents out of every dollar goes to the farmer to provide supplies and sustenance, it means that $60,000,000 out of $243,000,000 goes directly to the farmer.

I wish further to show what this production of $243,000,000 will do for the labouring man. An expenditure of $243,000,000 in the mines means that labour is paid about $120,000,000. That means that 60,000 men will be supplied with an annual income of $2,000. We all agree that population is what we require, and anything that will bring a number of people to our shores and help us to carry our load of debts is in the interests of the country. The miner is a good customer of the farmer, and the farmer in British Columbia knows perfectly well that if the miner is in a prosperous condition he himself has a pretty good chance of being prosperous too. This applies not only to British Columbia but to the whole Dominion. It is impossible to find a better market for farm produce than a prosperous mining community, and when mining is in a flourishing condition in British Columbia our farmers there are not worrying about overseas markets.

Now, I repeat, what is good for the railway and the farmer and the labouring man of this country must be worth while studying from a national standpoint. As I have said, mining stands third among our primary producers. As my hon. friend said to-night, 85 per cent of the Dominion is mineralized. Last year our mines produced per capita $27 of new capital. In 1890 our mineral production per capita was $2.23. So you see we are getting along pretty well, but there is lots of room for further development. Let this government and our provincial governments work together to put our mines on a still better producing basis. To accomplish this we require the co-ordinated efforts of all our people and all our governments, and I advise this government, so newly elected, that the mining fraternity of the Dominion expect it to pay a little more attention to the mining industry than has been paid during the last few years.

Now let me touch a different angle of the mineral industry. I refer to the bearing that it has on our imports and exports. Last year we had a favourable trade balance of $401,000,000. It may be asked, what relation has our mineral development to our national trade. I propose to give a few outstanding facts to show how the two are very closely related. I should explain that the Department of Trade and Commerce classify our imports and exports under nine different heads. In speaking of our mineral trade I shall take three of those nine, namely, iron and its products, non-metallic minerals, and non-ferrous minerals, because I consider that they all have a bearing on our mineral industry. The trade returns are for the year ending March 31, 1926. I find our mineral imports amounted to $367,923,725, or 39.5 per cent of our total imports. Our mineral exports amounted to $196,780,192, or 14.5 per cent of our total exports. We established that credit of $401,000,000 in order to help pay our interest charges and our other financial obligations abroad.

I think the Minister of Finance will be interested in hearing what part our minerals had in establishing that credit abroad. Had it not been for the adverse balance in regard to our minerals, we would have had $171,143,533 more of a favourable balance of trade. It is an important question for our people to consider how we can bring that unfavourable trade balance to a position very nearly favourable. It is also very important that our people should understand the relation of that particular mineral industry to the general trade of the country. Therefore I am going to give some further figures for the benefit of hon. members and the public. These figures deal with the first four months of the last fiscal year, and they indicate how this debit balance in our mineral products is accounted for. I have shown by reading a few items in the trade returns that we sent out $100,000,000 of minerals in the raw state. Now I propose to show in what shape we are bringing them back. Taking the first four months of 1924, we imported in the form of castings and forgings $1,447,444 worth; for the first four months of 1926 we had increased that amount to $1,831,522, or 26 per cent. It was bad enough before, but, you see, it is growing worse. In those respective periods our imports of rolling mills products have increased from $13,508,740 to $16,564,143, or 18 per cent. Then take tubes, pipes and fittings. Can anyone in this House tell me why we cannot make those things in Canada? I am not an ironmonger and I do not know much about it, but it seems to me that it should be possible for a good Canadian to manufacture tubes, pipes and fittings, and if a good Canadian cannot do it I can tell you where you may find people who can. You will find them on the Clyde in Scotland, and you can bring them here if you will show them where to get work. During the first four months of 1924 our imports of these materials amounted to $924,290, and during the first four months of last year they increased to $1,462,043, or 58 per cent. The next item is wire. Is there any reason in the world why we cannot make wire in this country? I would like some of our foundrymen to tell me that, because in the first four months of 1924 our imports of wire amounted to $878,561, and they rose in the first four months of 1926 to $1,204,666, an increase of 37 per cent. The next item is engines and boilers. In 1924 our imports amounted to $2,389,577, and in 1926 to $4,570,731, or an increase of 91 per cent. I want to say to the Minister of Finance that here is where some of his tinkering with the tariff last year came in, and on looking at these figures I am not surprised that he thinks it better to stop that tinkering for one year to see how it will work out.

The next important item is one which I wish my hon. friends from the west to notice. The imports of farm implements in the four months of 1924 amounted to $3,013,040, and in the same period last year they amounted $7,467,065, or an increase of 147 per cent. It seems to me that I heard something about a reduction in the tariff on farm implements last year. On the other hand our imports of machinery, except agricultural machinery, amounted to $9,029,850 in 1924 and $13,131,545 in 1926, an increase of 45 per cent. Then I think I heard something about a change in the tariff on automobiles.

An hon. MEMBER: Yes.

Mr. FRASER: Thank you. Here we have an item under "vehicles," and in 1924 our imports amounted to $10,486,668; in the first four months of 1926 they amounted to $24,641,565, or an increase of 135 per cent. That is what tinkering with the tariff did to the automobile industry, and that is what it is doing at present.

Mr. ODETTE: Does the hon. gentleman know that the motor car industry in Canada is busier and in a more prosperous condition to-day than at any time since its inception in this country?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. FRASER: I hear a great thumping of desks, so I suppose that must be true; I do not know. I am giving you the position, however, and would not the industry be in a much better position if the automobiles represented by that figure of $24,000,000 were manufactured in Canada?

Mr. ODETTE: I would refer my friend to the secretary of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association for an answer to that question.

Mr. FRASER: He is not here, so I cannot talk to him.

Mr. BROWN: Has the hon. gentleman the amount of duty paid on the imports of automobiles, as compared with the other years?

Mr. FRASER: I have not.

Mr. BROWN: I think it would be very useful to have those figures; it might perhaps set the hon. member right on the question of rates of duty versus total revenue.

Mr. FRASER: The hon. gentleman has not spoken in this debate; he can bring down that information.

Mr. ODETTE: I would call the attention of the hon. member to the fact—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. FRASER: I am very glad to see that I have touched up a few of the high spots on the other side of the House. I have not very much more to add because I do not want to waste all the night.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FRASER: Thank you. I wish to point out just a few items in this little blue book issued by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and entitled, "Monthly Report of the Trade of Canada; imports for consumption and exports, July 1926." There are some very interesting items here; on page 199 I find the following:

> Articles not otherwise provided which enter into the cost of the manufacture of goods, chiefly agricultural implements, enumerated in tariff items 445, 446, 446b, 447b, 448 and 591, when imported by manufacturers of such goods for use in such manufacture, from April 11, 1924.

I think it well that the working men who have had to leave this country and go to the United States should understand why they have had to take that little trip in order to get a job. In the first four months of 1924 the importations under that item amounted to $353,340, while the amount this year was $1,053,729, or an increase of 198 per cent. Here is another item:

Cream separator materials, which enter into the construction and form part of cream separators when imported by manufacturers of cream separators to be used in the manufacture thereof, and articles of metal for use in the manufacture of cream separator parts.

That item increased from $63,090 to $218,225, or an increase of 252 per cent. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that with that result before us it is not strange that a halt was called in the tinkering with this tariff, until it was seen how the last reductions would affect the body politic of this country.

We also have the other two divisions of mining one of which is non-ferrous metals and their products. These increased from $13,560,915 to $15,352,227, or an increase of 13 per cent, while the non-metallic minerals increased from $46,155,591 to $50,188,217, or an increase of 9 per cent. Notwithstanding the remarks of the Minister of Finance the other night in regard to how busy Canada was, requiring more raw products to keep her factories going, I find that both coal and petroleum remained about the same for the first four months of this year, which does not indicate that they are making any difference in the imports and exports of this country. And then a very strange thing. I do not understand the significance of it, I must admit, but I find that during the four months that I am speaking of, the importation of stone and its products advanced fifty per cent. Now I want to know why we have to import stone? Coming from a province like British Columbia, and having in mind the Rocky mountains and the rest of the available areas in this country, I am amazed to think we have to import stone at all; yet I find we are increasing our imports of that material by fifty per cent. And here is another marvelous thing: an increase in the import of sulphur and brimstone of sixty per cent. Sulphur and brimstone! What for? I am inclined to think these products were imported to raise a fog in order to enable the government to deceive the people in the last election and help them out of their difficulties.

Now I want to point out to these gentlemen the significance not only of the import and export of these minerals but of their destination, and the bearing that it has upon our international trade. In the four months ending July, 1925, we imported minerals to the extent of $119,338,844, and in 1926 we increased that importation to $148,725,002, an increase of $29,386,158 or, putting it on a percentage basis, an increase of 24.8 per cent. That is what the imports of mineral products into Canada during the current fiscal year show, an increase of 24 per cent. Now let us see what the destinations of these minerals were, and how they are affected by this interchange. We find in the first place that from the United Kingdom we imported $13,524,976 in 1925, which was decreased to $11,545,493 in 1926, a total reduction in value of $1,979,483, or a decrease on a percentage basis of 14.56 per cent. Remember the total importations increased by 24.8 per cent, and the importations from the United Kingdom decreased 14.5 per cent. From the United States we imported $99,428,122 worth in 1925, and in 1926 we imported $128,283,965 worth, a total increase in value of $28,855,843 from the United States, or a total increase of 28.92 per cent from that country. Hon. gentlemen will note a 24 per cent increase in total importations, a decrease of 14 per cent in the importations from the United Kingdom, and an increase in the importations from the United States of 28.92 per cent. I think I heard someone opposite this afternoon mention how they on that side stood for preferential trade. Did I not hear some statement of that character? I believe I did. In the four months in question of 1925 we imported from other countries $6,385,746, and this year our importations amounted to $8,895,544, an increase in value of $2,499,807 or 39.11 per cent. Those are the importations from all other countries. That is the kind of preferential tariff we are getting in our mineral industry from the present government—an increase of importations from all other countries except the United Kingdom.

Now I suppose a person making statements of that kind during this session, when we were supposed to have so much coöperation, should give some direction to the government, should indulge in some constructive criticism that would help them along in their endeavours to build up trade. Well, in looking around I saw where I could make some suggestions that might be of benefit, that might indicate in what direction the government could travel in order to build up the industries of this country. As to the production of copper, in order to get my information I had to go to the United States; I could not find any statistics, although I suppose they are extant, so far as Canada is concerned. You sometimes hear rather gloomy statements in regard to the production of copper —that the production will be greater than the demand; that the next thing you know the mines and smelters will be closed, and the men employed there will be out of work. All this, it is predicted, would take place if the price gets down to a certain point. I want to indicate to the government what my opinion is in regard to the use of copper and its alloys, bronze, brass, and other materials. I am not going to distinguish between them, I am going to indicate some new uses which are already in effect and which are being more largely employed, in order to try to show the government that they need not be afraid of expanding the mineral industry, and especially the mineral manufacturing industry.

In 1921 the electrical industry in the United States consumed 450,000,000 pounds of copper and 765,000,000 pounds in 1925. The automobile industry consumed 70,000,000 pounds of copper in 1921 and 245,000,000 pounds in 1925. The radio industry consumed 3,000,000 pounds of copper in 1924 and 10,000,000 pounds in 1926. Iceless refrigeration was not heard of at all in 1924, but in 1926 it consumed 45,000,000 pounds of copper. Now let us take building construction. In 1922, with a building program in the United States of five thousand million dollars, they consumed 64,000,000 pounds of copper. And note these figures: In 1926, with a building program of only five thousand five hundred million dollars, or an increase of five hundred millions which is only about five per cent, they increased the use of copper to 111,000,000 pounds, or an increase of 68 per cent in the four years.

Now let us take washing machines. In 1921 not fifty per cent of the washing machines manufactured in the country were constructed of copper. Last year 95 per cent of the washing machines manufactured in the United States were constructed of copper, and the industry consumed 15,000,000 pounds of that material. Then you have the expansion in the use of copper shingles, which are becoming very common in the construction of large buildings. Also you have lighting fixtures, the demand for which is going to grow from time to time, especially in a country like Canada where you are proposing to harness your water powers and produce electrical power in increased quantities. Then you have also the copper that is going into the construction of large public buildings, such as halls, parliament buildings, libraries and various other edifices. These items from 1921 to 1925 increased the consumption of copper by 600,000,000 pounds, or at the rate of 150,000,000 pounds per annum, so that there is not much danger of a decline in the copper industry for the next few years. It is about time—and it would be a first class thing for the government to do—to proceed to give to that part of the mineral industry such assistance as they possibly can. In submitting these statistics I want to impress upon the government the necessity of doing more for the mining industry in the future than they have done in the past.

There are two ways in which they can very easily do that. In the first place by tariff legislation they can very largely assist Canadian manufacturers to turn these goods from the raw state into the finished article, without the necessity of sending our raw material to foreign countries to have it fabricated into articles of commerce and then returned to this country at 5, 10, 15 or maybe 100 per cent increased cost to the individual. I say to the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) that so far as I can see there is no better colonizing agent than the mining industry. An increase in the manufacture of our mineral products is the best basis on which to build up an immigration policy. Indeed I do not know that I would not favour a policy under which the minister would dismiss his immigration officials altogether and use the $3,000,000, which is the appropriation for his department, in helping the prospector and the mining industry in this country. If you were fortunate enough to make one good mining strike in any part of the Dominion it would attract more people to this country in the course of three or four months than all your immigration agents would do in the next ten years.

The second method is by a little more liberal appropriation. The government should be inclined to give a little better consideration to the Geological survey, especially with reference to British Columbia. The industry of agriculture absorbs 1.64 per cent of the national expenditure. These are figures submitted the other day by the Minister of Finance; I am not manufacturing any of my own. Dominion lands absorb 1.20 per cent; fisheries, .41 per cent; public works, .28 per cent and mines, .17 per cent of the national expenditure. That means that seventeen one-hundredths of one per cent of our national expenditure is devoted to the development of our mines. In other words, you are spending on immigration just four times as much as you are spending on your mines, and the amount spent is out of all proportion to the returns you are getting from your immigration policy.

I am not familiar with the activities of the Geological survey in the eastern provinces, but I know that in British Columbia it is doing valuable work. I do not want anyone to get the idea that I am trying to knock the Geological survey branch, because I know it too well; I know it has splendid officials and it is doing valuable work for the Dominion. But from my point of view, coming as I do from a mining province, the amount provided for the work to be done by the Geological survey is out of proportion to the needs of the country; it should be multiplied, at the very least, by five or even by ten. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) was depicting to us to-night one part of the country which is a mineralized area, and he did not say a single word about the other great range which is equally as big as the pre-Cambrian range. I refer to the Cordilleras, a range which extends from Mexico to the Yukon and beyond, and which has been touched only in spots. There is plenty of opportunity for work to be done throughout all these sections. We have in British Columbia to-day in the city of Trail the largest smelter in the world, employing more than 3,000 men, with an immense pay-roll, making huge sums of money. That is only one instance. In all parts of British Columbia there are possibilities for repetitions of that sort of thing, but in order to find those prospects we must have a systematic and intelligent survey of geological conditions throughout the province.

I think British Columbia has a little stronger claim for consideration in regard to the expenditure of these funds than any other province, because when it came into confederation one of the conditions of union was that the Dominion of Canada should carry on our geological survey. I recommend to the careful consideration of the Minister of Mines and the cabinet the advisability of appropriating a little more money to the Geological survey. I know the minister will get results, because I know the men in the department. They are capable men and they could easily make profitable use of an additional appropriation in that service.

If I were Minister of Mines I would be ashamed of the conditions under which men are expected to work in this city of Ottawa. The first thing the minister should do is to provide a substantial appropriation for a suitable building for the important work which these men are carrying on. The present buildings in the southeastern part of the city are the most ramshackle, untidy looking structures that I have ever seen in my life. I have been looking a little into the conditions of the mining department here, and I find that the different branches are scattered all over the city. There is no appearance of consolidation at all. It seems to me that about one-quarter of the efforts of the minister's department are dissipated in going from one part of the department to another. He should be able to secure useful information and recommendations from his officials as to a proper building with suitable headquarters in this city. If he cannot spend any money in British Columbia, perhaps he could spend some here.

I want to bring to the attention of the different ministers some of the very modest requirements of my constituency. Let me tell the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Elliott) that British Columbia has an area of something like 400,000 square miles, and that the district of Cariboo comprises about one-half or very nearly one-half of that area. Hon. members can imagine what kind of territory it is. There are people scattered all over that vast district. In the first place I am requested to ask for an extension of the telephone system, and I do not think that is an unreasonable request. How are you going to get pioneers into those places if you do not give them some of the comforts of modern civilization? They will not do it without them. I want to tell the present Minister of Public Works that I shall not be satisfied with what I got from the last Minister of Public Works. I put in a request last year for an expenditure of $26,000 for telephone service, and that included the Peace river country. I think it was a very modest sum to ask for, but I am not half as modest as the minister. How much do you suppose I got?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Twelve thousand dollars?

Mr. FRASER: Three hundred dollars. Do you think that a square deal? I appeal to the Minister of Finance, who squeezes the last dollar as long as he can squeeze it. I got only 1.15 per cent of what I asked for, and the amount I requested had all been passed upon by the officials of the department as a reasonable one. On account of the treatment I got last year from this Liberal government I thought I had better make it plain on the floor of the House that I was really after something.

There is another matter. Accommodation has to be provided for the public in the shape of post offices. I have been looking over the reports of the Postmaster General for the past couple of years to see what has been expended on post office buildings in the different parts of the province, and I want to tell him that I have received requests from two different parts of my district for new post offices, one from Prince George, and the other from Salmon Arm. I am sure that if the minister were living in either place he would be in full agreement with the people who are asking for these new post offices, because he looks rather reasonable, and I want him to grant this request.

Mr. VENIOT: Might I interrupt my hon. friend to say that that comes under the Minister of Public Works? I might help you out by recommending it.

Mr. FRASER: I am aware of the fact that the recommendation must come from the Postmaster General and his officials, and I appeal to him to make a recommendation in these two cases.

There is another expenditure that is badly needed in my district, and that is for the construction of roads. In that immense district the only means of communication for a lot of the settlers is the roads. In 1918 the Conservative government initiated a policy of assisting the provinces in the building of good roads. British Columbia has exhausted her portion of that grant, but there are thousands of miles of roads yet to be built in British Columbia, particularly in the district of Cariboo. That policy of the Conservative government was a very popular one in British Columbia, because it takes a lot of money to build the kind of road that is required, and we need assistance. I can assure the different ministers that if they provide a certain sum for this purpose I am sure they will be amply repaid for any expenditure they may make if they will only take a trip out to British Columbia and see the magnificent scenery we have out there. I have received all kinds of requests from my district, but I am a very modest man and I do not ask for anything that a reasonable man would not readily grant. I submit with all respect that the requests which I have put forward to-night are very reasonable and proper ones for me to make, and particularly with respect to the expenditure on telephones. Let the Minister of Public Works not forget that he granted only 1.15 per cent of what I asked for last year. I want him to do much better this year.

On motion of Mr. Young (Weyburn) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe the House adjourned at 10.48 p.m.

Tuesday, February 22, 1927

The House met at three o'clock.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved that the names of Messrs. Blanchard, Ilsley and Sinclair (Queens) be substituted for those of Messrs. Rutherford, Lacroix and Fontaine, on the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization; that the names of Messrs. McRae and Telford be substituted for those of Messrs. Bouchard and Stevens on the select standing committee on marine and fisheries; that the names of Messrs. Cannon and Ralston be substituted for those of Messrs. Jacobs and Ilsley on the select standing committee of miscellaneous private bills; and that the name of Mr. Bradette, be substituted for that of Mr. Telford on the select standing committee of public accounts.

Motion agreed to.

PEACE RIVER RAILWAY OUTLET

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): During the discussion a few days ago on the Peace river matter, a number of members of the House requested that they be provided with copies of the engineers' report in connection with that proposal. I find that the committee on public printing is not likely to meet for some time, and in view of the fact that the resolution of my hon. friend from Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) was referred to the committee on railways and canals, it is very desirable that copies of the report in question be made available for the members of that committee. I therefore move:

That rule No. 74 be suspended and that five hundred copies of the report of the engineers of the Peace River railway project be printed in English, and that seventy-five copies be printed in French.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): I should like to find out from the minister how this committee was appointed, and whether the forty-eight hours' notice which the rules require for such a resolution has been given.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand from the Clerk that the committee has been properly constituted and that it will meet to-morrow.

Motion agreed to.

NATURAL RESOURCES—ALBERTA

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): I beg to present a number of petitions praying for the transfer to Alberta of its natural resources without restrictions or limitations as to its complete control of its educational or other affairs.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT, 1920, AMENDMENT

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Health) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 105 to amend the Food and Drugs Act, 1920.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The minister might give us an explanation of this bill.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The Food and Drugs Act, as is well known, was enacted in 1920, its object being to protect the purchasing public from infractions of the law, and, more particularly, to prevent adulterations of food and drugs. It has been in operation since that year and has accomplished a very considerable amount of good. The members of the staff desire to have a few amendments made to certain clauses in order to strengthen the act and make it more useful. These sections can be discussed in committee and explanations given at the time.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill No. 66 (from the Senate) to incorporate Gatineau Transmission Company.—Mr. Fontaine.

LIVE STOCK ACT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture when we may expect a new Live Stock Act to be introduced, an act providing amongst other things for facilities in connection with coöperative marketing.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): Unless something quite unexpected occurs, we hope to introduce either a consolidated Live Stock Act or an amended one some time during the next two or three weeks.

CIVIL SERVICE SALARIES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): Is it the intention of the government at the present session to bring about a salary revision for the civil service? I ask this question because of insistent inquiries made in different parts of the country and an insistent rumour that it is likely that this revision may be carried over until a subsequent session.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): The matter is under consideration.

CANADA GRAIN ACT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he can give the House any information as to when the bill to amend the Canada Grain Act may be placed before parliament.

Hon. JAMES MALCOLM (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The bill is receiving consideration and it will be introduced in plenty of time for full discussion before the end of the session.

FLAG OVER CANADIAN LEGATION—WASHINGTON

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): What flag does the government propose to have fly over the new separate Canadian embassy at Washington on account of Canada's new status as a nation?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): The same flag as is flying over the Canadian building in London.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Health): In reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Clark) on Friday last, I would inform him and the House that resolutions growing out of the Winnipeg convention of the British Empire Service League and some one hundred in number, including the resolution he spoke of, namely, insurance for returned soldiers, are under consideration in the department at the present time.

WASTE OF NATURAL GAS IN ALBERTA

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. D. F. KELLNER (Athabaska): I should like to ask the Minister of the Interior if anything is being done to stop the wastage caused by the escape of natural gas from oil wells in Alberta.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): A great deal has been done to stop it. It would take too long to answer a question of this character. If my hon. friend will put a question on the order paper, I shall be glad to give him full information.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Monday, February 21, the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of ways and means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Coote.

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I am not inclined to favour the amendment moved yesterday by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote). We have to-day a tariff board set up for the express purpose of examining into all applications for changes in tariff. We have been insistent and will continue to insist that no changes be made in the tariff until they are examined into and reported upon by that board. It would be a grave mistake on our part to begin now to make exceptions to that rule. If we should insist to-day on the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) making certain reductions in the tariff without reference to the board, where would we be if some future Minister of Finance taken from the other side of the House should begin to make increases in the tariff without reference to the board? What could we say to him? We would not have a leg to stand on.

I am opposed to the amendment for another reason. I do not consider it good strategy. It may be a spectacular thing; it may be a heroic thing to undertake to demolish a fortress with a spattering fire of musketry, but it will not get one very far. I think Napoleon's great rule of warfare was: Always be stronger than the enemy at the point of attack. But the proposed amendment of my hon. friend reverses that rule and proposes to attack the tariff where it is strongest, to attack it at the point where it increases the cost of living. If he had undertaken to direct his attack at the point where it increases the cost of production, I think he could have made out a stronger case. I had the matter very aptly put in a letter which I received not long ago from a friend who said, The Canadian industrial coach is well able to bear the burden of taxation if you put the load on the axle where it belongs; but if you put the load on the tops of the wheels, it will act as a brake and tend to stop the coach. To my mind the greatest evil of the tariff to-day is that it puts the weight of taxation on the tops of the wheels and retards industrial progress. That is the point at which we should attack it. For these reasons I say I am not in sympathy with the amendment moved by the hon. member for Macleod.

Perhaps the most notable feature of the budget is the complete absence of any changes in the tariff. All things considered, I believe this was a wise plan. The tariff board is now functioning. It is bringing to light much valuable information in regard to the tariff which has not hitherto been available, and because of the existence of the board we are learning many things about the tariff which we never knew before. It is the part of wisdom that we should wait for the findings of the board before attempting to interfere with the tariff, for the most outstanding fact that has been revealed in the discussions before the board is this, that no changes, either upwards or downwards, can be made in the tariff, the effects of which changes can be confined to any one industry, but every such change will be felt by every industry in the country.

It is imperative that before we undertake to make any changes in the tariff we have the report of the board as to just how far-reaching those changes will be. Some men have argued that the board has already reported on a number of cases, and they ask: "Why does the government not act in regard to these cases?" The answer is very simple. It is true that the board has reported on some twelve or thirteen cases, but those reports have only recently been handed to the Minister of Finance. They have not yet reached members of this House. Any changes made in the tariff and based on these reports will have to be decided upon by this House. The tariff advisory board gathers the information and submits it to the minister. Based on that information, the minister will make recommendations to the House, but we the members of this House are the men who will have to decide whether or not those changes are to become law. We are the men who will have to defend those changes before the people of the country, and I for one do not purpose going before the electorate and defending any change in the tariff either upward or downward by saying: "We made this change because the minister recommended it on certain evidence that he received from the tariff board, but what it was, I do not know." Before we undertake to sanction or to make any changes in the tariff we must have before us the reports of the board and the evidence on which those reports are based. It would cost the government a little more money, I know, to print the evidence, but they have already gone to considerable expense in creating the board to gather this information, and of keeping a Hansard reporter there to record the evidence, and the only additional expense would be the cost of printing and distributing the report to the members. To-day we are in receipt of printed copies of all the evidence taken before the Senate divorce committee. Nobody reads it: we all throw it into the waste paper basket as soon as we receive it. That is a service that could very well be dispensed with, and the money thus saved could be devoted to the cost of printing the evidence taken before the tariff board and putting it into the hands of the members of this House.

But while it is important that we refrain from making changes in the tariff until such time as we have these reports before us, it is of infinitely more importance that we see to it that nobody else makes any changes in our tariff without our knowledge and consent. It is infinitely more important that we so frame our tariff laws that no man or body of men other than this House shall have power to say what our tariff shall be. I wish to call attention for a moment to section 47 (a) of the Customs Act, which reads as follows:

If at any time it appears to the satisfaction of the Governor in Council on a report from the Minister of Customs and Excise, that natural products of a class or kind produced in Canada are being imported into Canada, either on sale or on consignment, under such conditions as prejudicially or injuriously to affect the interests of Canadian producers, the Governor in Council may, in any case or class of cases, authorize the minister to value such goods for duty, notwithstanding any other provisions of this act, and the value so determined shall be held to be the fair market value thereof.

That is section 47 (a) of the Customs Act. In a word, it gives the Minister of Customs and Excise power to place an arbitrary valuation on certain classes of goods if, in his opinion, the importation of those goods is injurious to Canadian interests. I ask you to pause for just a moment to consider the full significance of these innocent sounding words. Let me read them again:

If at any time it appears to the satisfaction of the Governor in Council on a report from the Minister of Customs and Excise, that natural products of a class or kind produced in Canada are being imported into Canada, either on sale or on consignment, under such conditions as prejudicially or injuriously to affect the interests of Canadian producers—

Last session I sat in this House day after day, week after week and month after month, from January to July, listening to hon. gentlemen opposite argue that all such importations were injurious to Canadian producers. Now let us suppose for a moment something that actually happened. Let us suppose that hon. gentlemen opposite, who hold those views were to get into power, which they did, how hard would it be to persuade a minister chosen from their ranks that such importations were injurious to Canadian producers. All that it would be necessary to do would be to produce a customs return showing that imports were being made, and then what would follow? Read what the act says:

The Governor in Council may, in any case or class of cases, authorize the minister to value such goods for duty, notwithstanding any other provisions of this act.

In other words, the Minister of Customs is there given power to set aside the whole Customs Act and place the tariff as high as he likes. Those are the provisions of section 47a of the Canadian Customs Act, and that clause was inserted by the parliament of Canada in the session of 1922. Was there ever such an abject surrender of the powers of parliament? Parliament when it inserted that section in the act practically said to the minister: We are no longer capable of managing our own affairs; we are no longer worthy to be free; do you manage our affairs for us, and do with us as you will.

I wish to call attention to another section of another act, section 6 of the customs tariff, commonly known as the Dumping Act. It reads as follows:

In the case of articles exported to Canada of a class or kind made or produced in Canada, if the export or actual selling price to an importer in Canada is less than the fair market value of the same article when sold for home consumption in the usual and ordinary course in the country whence exported to Canada at the time of its exportation to Canada, there shall, in addition to the duties otherwise established, be levied, collected and paid on such article, on its importation into Canada, a special duty (or dumping duty) equal to the difference between the said selling price of the article for export and the said fair market value thereof for home consumption; and such special duty (or dumping duty) shall be levied, collected and paid on such article, although it is not otherwise dutiable.

Provided that the said special duty shall not exceed fifteen per cent ad valorem in any case:

Then, further down, is a provision which says that such special duties shall not be imposed unless the Canadian producers are able to supply the market.

Now what happened. I have here a copy of order in council P.C. No. 1088, dated Government House, Ottawa, Tuesday, July 13, 1926, which reads as follows:

PRESENT

His Excellency

The Governor General in Council—

Whereas the Acting Minister of Customs and Excise reports that, from information in his possession, it is established that fruit and vegetables of a class or kind produced in Canada are being imported into Canada from glutted markets in the United States at values such as prejudicially or injuriously affect the interests of Canadian producers;

Therefore His Excellency the Governor General in Council, under and in virtue of the provisions of section 47a of the Customs Act, is hereby pleased to authorize the Minister of Customs and Excise to value such fruit and vegetables for duty, notwithstanding any other provisions of the Customs Act; the values so determined to be held to be the fair market value thereof.

So section 47a of the Customs Act was set in motion, and let us see what happened. The order in council was passed on the 13th day of July, 1926, and I have here a letter dated July 29, 1926, some sixteen days after, from a wholesale fruit and vegetable dealer, who says:

Under the authority of section 47a of the Customs Act and by order in council No. 1088 July 13th, the hon. the Acting Minister of Customs and Excise values certain fruit and vegetable products when imported from the United States of America, as follows:

Then he gives a long list of vegetables, and the valuations per pound—tomatoes, cucumbers, cabbage, celery, onions, potatoes, asparagus, carrots, beets, lettuce, spinach, cauliflower, peaches, raspberries, and, a few days later, pears, prunes and plums. The letter goes on:

The Canadian jobbing trade, as well as the consumer, is always willing to give preference to Canadian-grown fruits and vegetables at reasonable prices. In the past we have often passed up American goods at cheaper prices owing to certain help being needed in British Columbia. I have never known of vegetables being imported into western Canada when Canadian-grown vegetables were able to fill the demand. To-day—

That is sixteeen days after the order in council was passed.

To-day Ontario is not yet shipping tomatoes and British Columbia is unable to take care of the demand at $1.75 per crate, yet American tomatoes which on July 13th only cost around 50 cents a crate f.o.b. Tennessee are raised to a value of 85 cents a crate when they could do no harm to Canadian-grown tomatoes nor help the Canadian farmers, and is a straight tax on the consuming public. This means that all the customs would have collected would be 30 per cent of 50 cents—

The duty on tomatoes is 30 per cent:

—or 15 cents a crate. There are 1,000 crates in a car, which would make the duty $150.

Under the new regulations, the duty is raised to thirty per cent of 85 cents plus fifteen per cent of 85 cents as penalty or a total of 38 cents a crate or an addition of $230 per car.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what was done? An order in council was issued giving the minister, under the authority contained in clause 47a of the Customs Act, power to place an arbitrary valuation on tomatoes. He did so, and placed the value at 85 cents a crate when tomatoes were being bought in the United States for 50 cents. In so doing he raised the duty from 30 per cent of 50 cents, which is 15 cents, to 30 per cent of 85 cents, which is 25½ cents. But the minister did not stop there. On top of all that he imposed the dumping duty. Section 47a of the Customs Act gives him power to put on an arbitrary valuation. Where did he get the power to impose the dumping duty? Not in the statutes of Canada. The dumping duty section specifically states that it shall not be imposed unless dumping is being practised. That is to say unless goods are being sold for importation into Canada at a lower price than the price at which they are being sold in the country from which they come, and the minister, after increasing the duty, turned round and imposed this dumping duty. What was the effect? The regulations under 47a and the order in council No. 1088, gave him power to increase the duty to 25½ cents. If dumping had been going on he could have increased the duty 15 per cent ad valorem. That would have been at the very most 27¼ cents. He actually increased it to 38¼ cents. He actually increased the duty on tomatoes from 30 per cent to 76½ per cent a straight increase of 46½ per cent. How did he do it? He did it by pyramiding section 6 of the customs tariff on top of section 47a of the Customs Act. I inquired of the Customs department why that extra fifteen per cent was imposed, and they said that that was penalty. Penalty for what? Penalty for having an arbitrary valuation placed on your goods by the Customs department. Who gave the customs officials of this country authority to impose a penalty on anybody who was not violating the laws? They told me that dumping was going on. I undertook to find out whether it was going on or not and to find out what evidence there was that it was being practised. I went to the Minister of Customs and asked him. He reminded me that the Liberal party was not in power at the time and that the Conservatives were responsible. He referred me to his private secretary. I went to the private secretary and he referred me to the deputy minister. I went to the deputy minister and he referred me to somebody else. I went to that somebody else, and he referred me to still another. I think I went to every man in the customs building, except perhaps the policeman and the janitor, and I put the same questions to everyone. "What evidence had you that dumping was being practised last July when you imposed the dumping duty?" They all made the same answer: "Plenty of evidence", but when I asked further: "Might I see the evidence?" they all began with one accord to explain that the evidence would be found in some other office. At last I found a man who told me he thought the evidence could be found in the Department of Agriculture. I wended my way to the Department of Agriculture and asked them if they had any evidence that dumping was carried on last July, and they said no, they had no evidence, but that they thought they knew where I could get it, and they put me in touch with the paid secretary of a growers' association who has an office in this city. I got the gentleman on the telephone and asked if he had any evidence that dumping was going on at the time referred to. He replied that he had abundant evidence. I said I would like to see it. We arranged an interview for the next morning. The next morning I screwed my courage to the sticking point and went to interview in his own den, the man who dictates to the people of Canada what taxes they shall pay. He was not such a formidable looking man when I met him, but was a very genial unassuming looking fellow, apparently quite unconscious of the power that he wields. He said, "You want some evidence of dumping", and I said "Yes", and he laid before me a number of resolutions passed by Canadian fruit growers associations in different parts of the country, asking that the duty be increased, on their products, I read them over carefully and I said, "These are very interesting, but you promised me some evidence of dumping", He said, "Oh, yes", and handed me a lengthy telegram from some marketing agent out in British Columbia, stating that the United States that year expected to harvest a very large crop of fruit, and Canadian growers were afraid that some of this fruit might find its way into the Canadian market, the telegram asked that the government take some steps to keep it out. I said, "This is very interesting, but you promised me some evidence of dumping". Now, Mr. Speaker, he had not one shred, not one scintilla of evidence of dumping. There was not even a charge of dumping, and finally he said, "We did not need any evidence, for we knew it was going on". That was enlightening. I then asked him how he proceeded in the matter. The procedure, was very simple. He went to the Acting Minister of Agriculture. I am sorry that the acting minister has left his seat. The acting minister made representations to the Acting Minister of Customs—I am sorry he is not in his seat. The Acting Minister of Customs made representations to his acting colleagues. I do not think any of them are in their seats. The acting colleagues got busy, and acted quickly in the matter. They passed order in council 1088 and all the rest was done automatically. How they arrived at the figure of 85 cents a crate as the fair market value of tomatoes in Tennessee last July, I do not know, and it makes no difference. Under section 47a as it stands, he could have placed a value of $85 a crate and still have been within the law. There is no limit. I think probably he arrived at 85 cents on the same kind of evidence as that on which he arrived at the fact that dumping was going on. It was John Bourinot who made himself famous by writing that book How Canada is Governed. I believe he could make himself famous in heaven if he would come back now and write the sequel to it. Let us review now briefly what happened. Certain tomato growers in Canada who were receiving a good price for their early varieties of tomatoes, but whose main crop was not yet ready for the market, being unable to supply the early market, and realizing that as soon as the main crop of Canadian tomatoes came on the market the price would drop, as it should drop, conceived the idea if they could shut out American tomatoes from the early Canadian market, they could store up Canadian appetites for their future use, and that by so doing, when the main Canadian product did come on the market the people would be so hungry for tomatoes that they would snap it up regardless of price. I do not know how wealthy these people are, but they are wealthy enough to keep a paid secretary in Ottawa to convey their wishes to the government. This secretary whispered into the friendly ear of a sympathetic government and section 47a of the Customs Act and the order in council passed under it did all the rest, and they increased the duty on tomatoes from 30 to 76½ per cent.

My hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), who was Acting Minister of Customs at the time, had much to say last session about the people defrauding the Customs department. I wonder if he will have anything to say this session about the Customs department defrauding the people when he himself was at the head of it. To-morrow, Mr. Speaker, I intend to move for a return showing in how many cases the Customs department has been compelled to disgorge the dumping duty after collecting it.

It used to be charged that our tariff was made behind closed doors, that certain giants of rapacity would call on the Minister of Finance in his office and tell him what they required in the way of tariff protection; and it was done. The Liberal government a year ago undertook to put a stop to all this and appointed the tariff advisory board. Henceforth all applications for changes in the tariff were to be made before the board and heard in broad daylight, and were to be passed on by the tariff board before being submitted to parliament. But "what boots it at one door to make defence and at another to let in the foe?" No sooner had my hon. friends opposite got into power than they discovered a secret door through which the enemy could be admitted. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre, at that time Acting Minister of Customs and Excise, opened this side door, which is No. 47a, and allowed the enemy to come in. I am not arguing, Mr. Speaker, for a higher tariff, I am not arguing for a lower tariff; I am arguing for parliamentary control of the tariff. Under such an arrangement as this by invoking section 47a of the Customs Act in conjunction with clause 6 of the customs tariff, it is possible for officials to do anything they like with the tariff. I am arguing for a return to parliament of the power which rightfully belongs to it—power to say what our customs duties shall be. It was never contemplated that under the dumping clause the special duty should be more than 15 per cent, but by pyramiding one on top of the other they have actually put on a special duty of 46½ per cent.

I urge on this House and on the government the necessity, first, of repealing section 47a of the Customs Act and, secondly, of making provision that the dumping clause shall never again be applied until satisfactory evidence has been produced before the tariff board that dumping actually exists.

Mr. GOTT: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. gentleman disclose the author of the letter that he has read to the House?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): The letter was written by a wholesale dealer in western Canada, but I have not had time to get his permission to attach his name to it. However, the facts in it are all borne out by official documents to which my hon. friend can refer.

Mr. GOTT: In the course of his remarks my hon. friend asked a question which I should be very pleased to answer with his permission.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Yes, answer anything.

Mr. GOTT: The hon. member asked what effect this order in council had. In the riding which I have the honour to represent it meant the immediate consumption of Canadian-grown produce by Canadian people.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I think we see the effect before us.

Mr. R. C. MATTHEWS (Toronto East Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask your indulgence for a brief space in order that I may make a few observations on the subject now before the House, namely, the budget speech delivered on Thursday last by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb). I congratulate the minister on his review of our financial position. His deliverance has the great merit of brevity and lucidity. To deal with the finances of Canada with such completeness in a brief address is in itself an achievement, and one upon which I have much pleasure in offering him my congratulations.

The minister takes credit for the present indications of a revival in trade and commerce. It is quite natural perhaps that he should do so. I do not know, however, that in assuming that credit the minister can lay claim to very much originality. If he inquires carefully he may find that other ministers of finance in their day have not been too modest to suggest at least that similar credit belonged to them. It is probably true there is a feeling of optimism abroad, but I am not able to follow the logic that this has been brought about by governmental achievement. Every banker, every publicist and every other man of practical knowledge of affairs, knows that through the efflux of time and through much tribulation on the part of our trading and manufacturing community we as a country have happily emerged at last from post-war deflation; that stocks of merchandise have been liquidated and that the writing off period has finally passed. The great merchant class is now buying commodities, carefully it is true, but new and fresh stocks are in demand, not because this government has brought about the condition, but because the slow process of liquidation is virtually complete and a new demand for merchandise has at last sprung up. This is a condition to be desired, and is the inevitable consequence of drastic writing down and of the unprofitable era of trade through which we have recently passed.

Our deflation period was a long and trying one, longer than that of our neighbours to the south. Our early entry into the war, and our loss in manhood, which was high in comparison with that of the United States, made it impossible for us to have the quick recovery which they enjoyed. That the tide has not really more than set in is shown by the current loans of our chartered banks. Their current loans and discounts at the end of December, 1926, amounted to $970,000,000; at the end of December, 1925, they amounted to $903,000,000—an increase of $67,000,000. This increase, so far as it is an indication, shows that there is some expansion in business, a little over seven per cent. But it is to be observed that the United States consular offices are still crowded with applicants who desire to leave the Dominion. Our savings deposits on December 31, 1926, amounted to $1,372,000,000, and our deposits not bearing interest to $608,000,000. With this general condition facing the Dominion, the resumption of business on a scale not experienced in recent years, was the sure effect of a certain cause, and only governmental action of an alarming nature could have prevented it. Added to this was the gratifying fact that the country in 1926 enjoyed a harvest of unusual quantity and value.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on the question raised by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) in regard to the liquidation of our national debt. I approach this subject with a good deal of respect because it is of such magnitude and importance to Canada. I think you will agree that it should be dealt with in the most comprehensive and, at the same time, the most careful way. The minister was good enough to make a statement in regard to his prospect of handling the capital obligations of the country maturing in 1927. He pointed out that he hoped to be able to redeem the $8,000,000 four per cent three-year notes in cash, and he stated further in regard to the $29,000,000 five and a half per cent renewal loan maturing on November 1 of the current year that our finances permitting, he would redeem at least a portion of this loan in cash and the balance would be refunded. The loan of $63,000,000, five and a half per cent tax-free victory bonds, maturing on December 1, 1927, he will refund at a lower rate of interest, the minister presuming of course, that the present ease in money will continue until such time as he makes his refunding loan.

But the minister stopped at that point. He did not take the House into his confidence as to what his intentions are, if he has any intentions, in respect of loans maturing within a measurable period, and which are of great magnitude. The government may say that the time is not yet at hand for any particular worry or action in this regard, but I would respectfully point out that in recent months inquiries have been general concerning this matter. Surely it is not the intention of the government to wait until the year of maturity of these important loans to outline to the House and to the country what its intentions are.

1927	5½	$ 29,068,400
1927	5½ Victory	63,437,250
1928	5	53,000,000
1931	5	52,931,500
1932	5½	73,325,150
1933	5½	446,658,800
1934	5½	511,910,650
1936	4½	40,000,000
1937	5 War	90,166,900

These amounts total $1,596,797,600. Here we have this vast financing facing us, and there may be even further maturities within this period of which I have not the particulars. It is true that some of these bonds will not mature until 1937, but from 1931 to 1934 inclusive the amount that must be taken care of is $1,084,826,200. When you consider that within the next few years we shall have over one billion dollars coming due, with few if any sinking fund provisions operating to reduce the debt, and without any plan of amortization offered, the matter is certainly not one for congratulation.

A situation not altogether unlike this one, but of course of less magnitude, was found to exist three years ago in the province of Ontario. Not only were the annual deficits so large as to alarm the province, but the great bulk of the debt, which had been tremendously increased in recent years, was in a state somewhat similar to the condition of Canada's obligations of which I am now speaking. There were no sinking funds, nor was there any plan calculated to effect retirement. The then treasurer of the province, after consideration, decided to make a survey of the whole matter and he asked the Bankers' Association as well as the investment bankers to name an expert each. These gentlemen, together with the government accountant, made a survey of the whole debt of Ontario, with a view to its ultimate redemption, and they brought in proposals to retire the debt within forty years, which proposals the government adopted. The treasurer, speaking in the legislature, referred to the redemption plan in the following terms:—

I believe it is the most important thing that has ever come before this legislature, and will have a very large effect. It will enable the province to save over $128,000,000 during the next forty years. It will be a positive, definite advantage in handling provincial finances.

If some such plan were important for the province of Ontario, surely it is equally important for the Dominion. In regard to future loans the provincial treasurer made this statement:

I have dealt with the present provincial debt. We are making provision to pay this off, but in the future all loans placed by the province must provide for a retirement on the instalment annuity basis, or on a sinking fund basis.

It will be apparent that the Dominion likewise must presently face its debt liquidation. Our financial and economic security and confidence demands the formation and the adoption of a policy covering the whole problem of debt retirement, and the question as to how this debt shall be met, and within what period. A knowledge of this matter would give to industry and finance a basis on which to formulate their own plans.

The Minister of Finance has spoken of retiring certain bonds in the present year. As to his proposals for 1927, I have no criticism to offer, because he anticipates the redemption out of a surplus of several million dollars. But the debt problem remains unsolved; it is not grappled with. I submit, it would be better financial policy to make a general arrangement for debt retirement, and announce as Ontario has done, than to go on and overtax the people, retiring a little here and a little there from year to year as circumstances may warrant. Instead of formulating a policy of its own and grappling with the problem, the government has left it to this side of the House to crystallize this matter into definite proposals. The first proposal that has come forward has been from the financial critic of this side, the hon. member for West Calgary. He at least has given the question his close attention and has made a proposal that must appeal to the imagination of the country at large. Whether his plan is feasible in its entirety, or just as he outlined it even in general terms, I suppose few men in this country would be prepared at the moment to say. But there is a good deal of merit in it, and with modifications it may be capable of at least partial adoption. It does aim at a definite goal, namely, the complete retirement of Canada's national debt as it exists to-day, and on that basis alone, it is worthy of the most careful examination and consideration. It not only has a great national financial achievement in view, but it embodies a patriotic appeal, and if those institutions which are most directly concerned will view the matter in this light, it is possible that something may eventuate which will be of enormous advantage to our whole financial fabric. At the moment, in comment with others who have heard of this plan only within the last few days, I am not prepared to give it full approval, but I am sure that the country will give the hon. gentleman who proposed it credit for a thoughtful and interesting proposal, and for a patriotic endeavour to deal with the great problem to which the government apparently has given little or no consideration. The outstanding fact is that the ultimate redemption of the national debt is a vital question. At least a billion dollars should be paid off in the next forty years, which would mean I am told a yearly payment of something like $10,000,000.

The government also point with pride to certain reductions in taxation. This relief as far as it goes is welcome. Other countries are following the same course, and the reductions now proposed are only an indication of the general tendency of government finance. The income tax was instituted as a war measure in 1917. The war is over but the capital debt remains, and the ministry feels obliged to proceed with caution in doing away with this plan of taxation. Whether we agree or do not agree that Canada's income tax is a wise and necessary form of extraction, there are one or two facts upon which there should not be much difference of opinion. The first one is, that if this tax is to remain it should be enforced. The act makes it obligatory upon certain persons to pay taxes. Every resident of Canada to whom its provisions apply should be under the necessity of complying with this act. The enforcement should make every citizen who is assessable contribute his share as laid down by the statute. If latitude is allowed to individual discretion it would seem that the revenues must suffer in consequence. Is it reasonable to suppose that all taxable persons on April 30 of every year will make to the government a full and complete statement of all items of income received from any source for the prior year ending December 31? If it is an assured fact that without exception those assessable will do so, well and good, but I do not know of any country where such scrupulous care would be used by the population who are called upon to perform what many describe as a very disagreeable function, that of paying taxes. Perhaps we can learn, in this as in other matters, something from Great Britain where many years of experience with the income tax has taught them not to leave this matter largely in the hands of those who are to pay income taxes, but to collect at the source. This withholding of the tax at the instance of the government assures the country of its proper collection, and all persons are treated alike in so far as they are involved in the necessity of contributing to the government's finances in this way. The tax is made compulsory and evasion is practically impossible. Of course, Mr. Speaker, I am well aware that in many respects, as for instance in the case of the salaried man, and company directors and the shareholders, there is compulsion in Canada perhaps equal to that in England or in the United States, but in its broader application the tax is left in a large measure to the honesty of those making the returns. This is not a phase of the subject that one can reason to definite or accurate conclusions to be expressed in dollars and cents, but, nevertheless, one does feel that if there were no escape from the payment by those properly assessable the rates would not be as high as they are to-day to ensure the amount of money that is now collected.

Is it not a fact that in the collection of this tax the government follows the lines of least resistance, and confines its greatest efforts to those whose incomes are a matter of record? That is the impression that is abroad, for reading a quotation in the Ottawa Citizen, of February 21, I find the following statement copied from the Vancouver Province:

> The federal income tax for the last fiscal year yielded $56,197,056, according to a report made by the Department of Finance at Ottawa. The various provinces paid as follows:

> The returns show that Ontario paid nearly half the tax, and that Ontario and Quebec together paid four-fifths of it. British Columbia, the third province, paid something over six per cent. It is worth noting that British Columbia paid nearly as much income tax as Manitoba and Saskatchewan together, although our population is not much more than half theirs, and that we paid three times as much as the three maritime provinces, whose population greatly exceeds ours.
> If these figures mean that our prosperity here on the coast was proportionately greater than the prosperity of the prairie provinces, or the maritimes, we should have no complaint to make. But it scarcely means that. It means on the contrary, that we, being more highly industrialized, have larger payrolls and therefore more people who are shining marks for the shafts of the income tax collector. As a matter of fact, the income tax of Canada is paid almost entirely by the people of the cities whose incomes are easily ascertainable.

If this is true, if the tax lacks universal application, that application should either be put into force or the tax done away with. Canadians should be treated alike. I believe they do want to share their country's burden according to their ability to do so, if they feel they are getting a square deal.

Dr. J. C. Hemmeon of the Department of Economics of McGill university, speaking before the Professional Institute of the Civil Service in Ottawa last night, is reported in the Journal to have said:

> It is a little strange, that when our income tax was the same as the United States', they raised thirty times as much from this tax as we did in Canada.

Moreover, in the United States, all municipal bonds, or debentures as we call them in this country, are exempt from federal taxation. What the total of such securities would be, I have no idea; it would be a very difficult thing to calculate; but certainly it runs into the billions, and all those securities issued anywhere in the United States are, I understand, free from federal income tax. Canada has the advantage in that incomes received from all bond or debenture issues are taxable with the exception of those received from several federal bond issues which will mature within the next ten years.

In the second place, if the tax is to remain, the rates should be lowered. In comparison with other countries and particularly with our neighbour, the United States, our rates of taxation on medium incomes are very excessive. The adjustment of rates in 1926 had the effect of increasing the exemption and lowering the tax on comparatively small incomes. The particular point that I wish to make is that a general decrease in the income tax schedule and the enforcement of the provisions of the act, would not necessarily involve a diminution in the amount of money received. Rates would be lower, and if the tax were collected at the source, every taxpayer would be treated the same as every other, according to his responsibility. I am sure the government would be surprised at the happy results to the federal treasury.

As an example of this, it is well known to the Minister of Finance that the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States made in 1926 very substantial reduction in income tax rates, on the assumption that a scientific revision would not only result in satisfaction to the people, but would induce many who had exercised every possible device to escape income tax, to change their attitude when they found that the government had made drastic reductions. They would discontinue evasion and make payments according to the revised provisions.

So, it was with very special interest that the outcome of Mr. Mellon's experiment was awaited, and on January 26, 1927, the results were announced. These proved that, as a prophet, the Secretary of the Treasury had been vindicated. The collections for the year increased from $1,825,000,000 in 1925 to $2,172,000,000 in 1926, although the rates of income tax had been substantially reduced. There are those who are always ready to say that if you reduce our very high income tax rates, you will necessarily reduce the amount collected. The experiment in the United States has not justified such a belief. On the contrary, it has shown that as a result of the very drastic reduction made prior to the collection of 1926 taxes, $346,000,000 more was paid in income tax money in 1926 than in 1925. This, in the face of the reduction in rates by congress early last year, was considered to be a most remarkable result.

The Secretary of the Treasury had told congress, and had emphasized the fact, that within reasonable limits reduced rates upon scientific lines would produce greater revenue. If levies were cut down to a sensible, peacetime basis, the tendency to evade taxation would diminish and the result would be increased income to the government. The figures completely support that theory, and so, Mr. Speaker, I venture to say that the same result could be achieved in this country. If evasions were stopped and if the rates were reduced, you would find surprising results and a more general approval of this particular tax, because every man would feel that he and his neighbour were both obligated to pay according to the amount of income they received.

There is just one other matter to which I would like to refer, and that is relief from income taxes of those public-spirited citizens who are giving of their means for carrying on work to the advantage of those who are less fortunate financially and who need either government or private assistance. Such relief, it seems to me, might well be instituted to the extent of contributions to hospitals and educational institutions. This country should not be able to afford to place a specific fine on largeness of heart. There are thousands of our citizens who are in need of hospital treatment and who cannot pay for it, and their good-hearted neighbours are coming forward and placing at the disposal of hospitals and other institutions funds that make it possible for them to help the poor and needy. In some cases gifts are withheld or diminished in size because of dissatisfaction over the application of the income tax to such gifts. On this account it is becoming more difficult to realize from taxpayers the necessary amounts to carry on educational and charitable work.

The purposes of relief work have such a human appeal that those who do not pay income tax could not make any objection to the relief of the taxpayer who is willing to make his contributions. It is a fact to-day that the beneficent work of hospitals cannot be carried on without enormous private contributions. The demand for relief from income tax on contributions made to charitable institutions is widespread throughout the country. Its application would be simple and easy of control and would be a wholesome recognition to men and women who are to-day concerned in giving, in many cases until it hurts, to services that are for the general public welfare.

The United States amended its revenue act in 1926 to permit deductions from incomes of contributions such as gifts to the state itself, or to charitable, scientific, literary, educational, and other specified purposes up to, I think, 15 per cent of the taxpayer's net income. McGill university six years ago made an appeal for several millions, and twenty-four hundred subscribers paid $100 or more. The Toronto General hospital is presently appealing for $2,500,000. The Sick Childrens' hospital is a most worthy institution and is truly national in scope, and those who support it by voluntary gifts, as in other such cases, are obliged to pay income taxes on their contributions.

I am informed that appeals for funds for large institutions in Toronto this year will be made to the extent of $4,500,000. The canvassers are met daily by income tax objections. Doubtless subscriptions would be greatly increased if donations, properly limited as to application by the department, were excepted. This matter was referred to earlier in the debate, and I hope that the Minister of Finance will see his way clear to make such amendments to the Income Tax Act as the United States has done, to cover the urgency of this situation.

These observations, I have tried to make, Mr. Speaker, in a helpful or constructive spirit. I have not criticised for the sake of criticism. We should address ourselves to Canada's great problems in a larger way, in the hope that good may accrue to the enduring benefit of all the people.

Mr. J. A. GLEN (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, like most of the other speakers in this debate, I should like to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) on the presentation of his budget. I should like to congratulate him, in the first instance, on something which I hope to emulate in my remarks, and that is his brevity. I cannot hope to emulate him in the importance of the subjects embraced in his address, but I think I have something to contribute which might also be of importance to this House.

During the course of this debate there have been a number of curious things said, but of all the things said, what struck me as the most curious was the remark of the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) when he advocated what, if it is not a capital levy, is certainly the commandeering of wealth. I little expected to hear from the Conservative side of the House a suggestion to any government for the commandeering of wealth, and although I have a sneaking regard for that particular form of levy, I do not think the hon. member has made out a case which is worthy of consideration at this time. I was more concerned with what the hon. member for West Calgary said when he congratulated the Minister of Finance on the provisions of his budget. I have always looked with suspicion upon any Conservative who was willing to support a Liberal budget. That to me is always a very suspicious circumstance.

Miss MACPHAIL: For the Liberals, yes.

Mr. GLEN: For the Liberals, yes. I have always been a Liberal, latterly a Progressive, and I always hated to see Conservatives supporting my policies. I remember long years ago, when Sir William Harcourt was going through the old country pleading on behalf of the Liberals, he landed in Edinburgh and made a wonderful speech. The next morning one of his friends said to him, "I see that you have obtained the congratulations of the Edinburgh Scotsman,"—the greatest Tory paper in the east in that day, and Sir William Harcourt replied, "If that is so, I fear I have failed in my duty in stating Liberal principles." And a curious thing, Mr. Speaker, is this: Not only has the benediction of the hon. member for West Calgary been placed on the head of the Minister of Finance, but the whole Tory press of this country, so far as I have read, are in like agreement. Not only that, but the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) went out of his way last night to throw bouquets at the Minister of Finance for the provisions in his budget. I fear there must be something wrong with that budget. I fear that there is something in the way of criticism that is needed from this side of the House, and I am going to examine for a short time some provisions in that budget, and give some reasons why the Tories should praise it.

[Mr. Glen.]

In the first place, the income tax has been reduced. The unfortunate thing is that we have had no justification given to us from either side of the House for that particular reduction, but I am hopeful that before this debate closes we shall hear from this side of the House the reason why there was a reduction in the income tax at this particular juncture.

Miss MACPHAIL: Because the people who paid it put up a holler—that is the reason.

Mr. GLEN: My hon. friend says, "because the people who paid it put up a holler," and I am inclined to agree with her. I think those who wish reductions must necessarily make hollers, and it is an unfortunate state of affairs in our politics that in order to get what probably belongs to you you have to raise a holler, as it is called. If I read history aright, I know this, that when income tax was imposed in any country it was imposed at its inception as an emergency measure. But I also know this, that wherever an income tax has been imposed upon a country, at no time in the history of that country, so far as I know, has the tax been entirely abolished. At times it is reduced, as the circumstances of the country warrant, but there is no country that I know of in the world to-day where the income tax has been abolished in its entirety after having once been put upon the statute book. If that is so, Mr. Speaker, then why the reduction? Does this embody a new principle in Canada? Is it the intention of the government that this temporary decrease in the income tax is but the prelude to its abolition? I know that, from our point of view, the imposition of an income tax was one of the causes which made possible the adoption of the free trade movement in the old country, and I know that the immediate loss of revenue resulting from its adoption, was made up by the income tax. But the principle most commonly enunciated at the time when the income tax was imposed on this country was that it was not only a war measure, but that it was a tax that fell upon those who had the greatest ability to pay, and that principle is commonly accepted to-day, that the income tax shall be placed upon those who have the ability to pay.

A good deal of complaint has been made that the farmers in the west are not paying income tax. It is said that they are not paying income tax like the people in the cities and in the east. Well, Mr. Speaker, there is a mighty good reason why the farmers in the west are not paying income tax, and that reason is that they never have incomes sufficient to make them liable under the act.

Mr. COTNAM: What about the $500,000,000 they receive for their wheat crop?

Mr. GLEN: The levying of taxation by direct methods is a principle which we must support, and any attempt that is made to reduce the income tax, which is a direct method of taxation, must be viewed with a good deal of suspicion if no sufficient reason is given for its reduction. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the levying of taxation by this direct method, and in accordance with the ability of the person to pay, is essential if the burden of the national expenditure is to be distributed equally and justly among all our taxpayers. I think the income tax should be maintained at its former level, and the surplus used, not to reduce the income tax, but to lessen the burden of taxation. The reduction of taxation, as it becomes possible, should take place by reducing and removing those protective duties on imports which increase the cost of living and the cost of production.

Now, Mr. Speaker, last evening the Minister of Trade and Commerce gave an illustration of the reduction of the income tax in my own province of Manitoba. He gave that illustration as a trend of the time. But he omitted to make this statement also, that in Manitoba Premier Bracken has introduced a cut in the income tax to the extent of twenty per cent, but he has also introduced a cut of 37½ per cent in the municipal commissioner's levy. There is no tax in the province of Manitoba that can be compared with the customs tariff tax of the Dominion, except the municipal commissioner's levy. It is a form of indirect taxation and is analogous to our customs duty. They made a cut in the income tax, but cut the indirect tax by 37½ per cent. The amendment of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) states that the budget shows a further departure from the principle of direct and visible taxation. As I have already said, no evidence has been submitted to justify a departure from that principle, and we need further light upon it. I would ask: Is it the intention of the government to declare their policy by this reduction, and is this the first step towards the abolition of the income tax? We should be informed as to what the policy is. I know that the Minister of Finance when on the hustings during the election, took the point of view that the income tax and sales tax, which he considered nuisance taxes, should be reduced. He has given this view sanction in his budget to-day and has implemented his promise.

Allied with and forming part of the amendment is also the large question of the tariff, and it seems necessary for those on this side of the House to state in absolute terms the position of the group of which I am a member. I know of no departure from the principles which have been so well expressed by so many members of this group, not only in this House but in the country during the last election. If during the last election there was one issue that was before the people of western Canada it was the question of lower tariff. That is the paramount issue so far as western Canada is concerned. There might have been other issues having a particular appeal in different localities. Of these I do not speak, but I say that of all the issues raised during the election that of the lowering of the tariff was the paramount issue so far as western Canada is concerned. In particular the Robb budget of 1926 was discussed, analysed and approved ninety-nine per cent in western Canada, for, with the exception of one lone member from western Canada, they returned to this House members supporting lower tariffs and in particular the principles enunciated in the budget of the present Minister of Finance of 1926. In connection with lower tariffs I may say that we have always been told that there can be no prosperity in a country unless under a protectionist government, and if we were to believe the whispers of death that circulated throughout the whole of this Dominion some time ago, we would be led to believe that unless a protectionist Conservative government were returned to power the country would be in a bad way and that its condition would undoubtedly become worse. I should like to point out in passing that from my point of view, we can have just as prosperous conditions as were ever attained under a protectionist government. I will go further and say that we can have much better and more equitable conditions under low tariff than under high protection. The proposition that we must have a high tariff is now I think an exploded fallacy, because under the low tariff government—and I am assuming the present government is a low tariff government—we have obtained a considerable degree of prosperity. It has been stated on many occasions throughout Canada by different people that the low tariff is not the cause of the great prosperity. Well, I am not so foolish as to say that these things can only happen under a low tariff government, but I do say that the condition of the common people is much better, more equitable and the country is a better one to live in under a low tariff government than under a high tariff government. I have no reason to doubt that under the regime of the present government the conditions in the Dominion of Canada will be better for the common people than they have been in the past.

I would remind this House that the conditions in western Canada have not materially changed since 1921, that period of economic depression, and we still have depression in the west. I will go further and say that we have a tremendous economic uncertainty so far as the farming industry is concerned. People speak of the stability of government and say that we can have no stability of government except by the retention of tariff duties. Is there to be no stability of the farming industry as well? Can we not have stability of government as far as farming is concerned? We do not hear that cry very often. Perhaps my hon. friend from Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) will say it is because we have not raised a big enough holler. I know the conditions in the west are not what one would desire. The hon. member for West Calgary speaks of the amazing crops that we have had in the west recently. I speak whereof I know when I say that men in my own constituency are not able to pay their way, and generally speaking, most of the farmers in my constituency which I think is typical of most of those of western Canada, are finding difficulty in paying their way, and that despite the amazing crops of the past three years.

I wish to say a word with reference to the opinion expressed by the people in the last election. The people of western Canada, by their vote and the return of the members whom they sent to Ottawa, have shown where they stand. They have not altered one iota from the stand which they took years ago. They believe that protection is the embodiment of despotic government. They believe that the supreme condemnation of the tariff lies in this, that while it draws most of the taxes of the country from the poor, at the same time, it imposes upon the poor the heaviest burden of living, and it builds up the fortunes of the rich and fails to tax the rich even as much as the poor in the numerous cases where the poor have larger families than the rich. They still believe, as was expressed by the hon. member who represented Brome Mr. McMaster, in a former parliament, that free trade is the right of every man and every nation to buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest market without the law intervening to help any given set of producers. They still believe that the building of tariff walls to keep out goods is bound to react disastrously on the consumers and purchasers. They know that their product represents the largest item of our exports and that they compete in the open markets of the world and buy in the protected. They have experienced in the west and have derived benefits from every reduction of tariff that has taken place and they cannot believe that further reductions are likely to be detrimental to Canadian industries. They cannot understand why, if the binder twine industry which produces a commodity that is essential to the farmers can compete successfully against outsiders, other industries cannot do likewise. They believe that, first, there should be a removal of the duties on foodstuffs and on implements of production, to be accompanied by the abolition of the duties on iron and steel—the raw materials of the manufacture of these implements and of many other of our products. They believe also in the abolition of the duties on boots and shoes and on articles of cotton and woollen clothing, and that this should be accompanied by the removal of the duties on the raw materials entering into their production. They believe that all duties should be removed from coal.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the people of western Canada cannot understand why the protectionists say that our industries cannot compete with the highly paid and highly skilled labour of the United States; and then the converse, that they are unable to compete against the low paid labour of Europe and depreciated currency. The protectionists cannot have it both ways, and the people of western Canada do not understand why these arguments, so directly contrary to each other, should continue to be advanced by our protectionist friends. Let me read something that was written by an acknowledged authority sixty years ago, but which is just as opposite today. I am quoting from John Stuart Mills' Political Economy:

> The only case in which a mere principle of political economy protecting duties can be defensible is when they are imposed "temporarily" (especially in a young and rising nation) in hope of naturalising a foreign industry in itself perfectly suitable to the circumstances of the country. The superiority of one country over another in a branch of production often arises only from having begun it sooner. There may be no inherent advantage on one part or disadvantage on the other but only a present superiority of acquired skill and experience. A country which has this skill and experience yet to acquire may in other respects be better adapted to the production than those which were earlier in the field.
> But it cannot be expected that individuals should at their own risk or rather to their certain loss introduce a new manufacture and bear the burden of carrying it on until the producers have been educated up to the level of those with whom the processes are traditional. A protecting duty continued for a reasonable time will sometimes be the least inconvenient mode in which a nation can tax itself for the support of such an experiment. But the protection should be confined to cases in which there is good ground of assurance that the industry which it fosters will after a time be able to dispense with it. Nor should the domestic producers ever be allowed to expect that it will be continued to them beyond the time necessary for a fair trial of what they are capable of accomplishing.

We in the west know that the estimated agricultural wealth of this country is roughly seven and a half billion dollars. We also know that the capital invested in Canadian manufactures in 1923 was roughly a little over three and a third billion dollars. We cannot understand why equal terms cannot be given to those engaged in agriculture in which there is invested double the capital invested in our factories.

When we see the tremendous expenditures on public works in the east, so far in excess of similar expenditures in the west, we believe, rightly or wrongly, that we are being discriminated against. Take, for example, the following list, which was supplied to me a few days ago, of some of our great undertakings:

New Welland ship canal.. ..	$48,797,000
Trent canal..	2,733,000
Victoria dry dock..	9,000,000
Quebec harbour..	2,400,000
Montreal harbour..	11,110,000
Vancouver harbour..	9,595,000
Toronto harbour..	6,972,000
St. John harbour..	6,712,000
St. Lawrence ship canal.. ..	69,794,000

These expenditures were made between 1918 and 1925. Rightly or wrongly the people of the west feel that they are being discriminated against in some of these matters. And when they see the small estimate of $5,000,000 odd asked for the Hudson Bay railway, and hear criticism of the most adverse character coming from hon. members opposite and from the Conservative press with respect to this proposed expenditure, I think they have good reason to feel that they are being discriminated against. We believe that the Hudson Bay railway is necessary as an outlet for the products of the west, and the whole of the west resents the criticism which is being directed against the expenditure for the completion of that railway. We have to face that adverse criticism, but, Mr. Speaker, I think there is not the slightest doubt that we will raise a sufficient holler, if that is necessary, for the completion of the Hudson Bay railway, because we believe it is essential to the well-being of the west.

Now, the people of western Canada think that they are being discriminated against in the matter of freight rates, and it seems to me that they have good reason for so thinking. Only the other day at the hearing of the freight rates application before the railway commission one illuminating fact was brought out in cross-examination—that the system of railways in the province of Manitoba gathered in the largest amount of revenue at the least expenditure of money of any other part of the system in the Dominion. If, then, the province of Manitoba and the other two prairie provinces are giving the railways the largest returns at the least cost of operation, is it any wonder that they make a demand for lower freight rates in order that their cost of production may be reduced? Can you wonder if the farmers of the west are asking for some relief? Can you wonder that they are dissatisfied, and that their dissatisfaction culminated in the birth of the Progressive party, which was formed some time ago? Do hon. gentlemen in the east believe for one moment that the spirit which animated that movement is dead? Let me say to the House that that spirit is just as much alive to-day as it ever was. It may be more or less passive at the present moment, but that quiescence, Mr. Speaker, is accounted for solely by the fact that they believe the fruition of their hopes is likely to be accomplished under a Liberal government, and that in the legislation to be presented to this House the government will give expression to those hopes of the Progressive party.

But that brings me to this viewpoint, and I wish the Minister of Finance to note carefully what I am about to say. The main issue raised by the amendment is the absence from the budget of such reductions in the tariff as would lessen the cost of living and of primary production in Canada. Colour is undoubtedly lent to the view that this omission marks the inauguration of a new policy of the government by the application of the large surplus of revenue to the reduction of the sales tax and the income tax in preference to the reduction of protective duties. The Liberal-Progressive members of this House are pledged to the reduction of the tariff in order to cheapen living and enable primary production to be profitably pursued. They are pledged to the maintenance of a reasonable measure of direct taxation, based on ability to pay, through the medium of the income tax. They cannot but regard the apparent reversal of this dual policy in the budget of 1927 with misgivings and dissatisfaction. The reasons given by the government for the omission from the budget of a further instalment of tariff reduction may have, however, a sound basis in fact. The tariff board is at work. It is compiling information on many of the most important, and incidentally the most highly protected, Canadian industries. With the complete information at its command the government will be in a position to pursue the policy of tariff reduction. But, in view of the circumstances attending our election, we must be absolutely confident that this pursuit is the intention and policy of the government. If we may assume with confidence that the omissions from the budget are temporary and accidental and that future budgets will both reduce the tariff and maintain the income tax as a permanent fiscal instrument we shall feel fully justified in voting with the government. If, on the contrary, we must assume that the government is inaugurating a new policy looking to the abolition of the income tax and making only such changes in the tariff as are dictated by expediency and not by low tariff principles, we should be compelled to vote for the amendment. Which of these courses we are to pursue can be decided in only one way—we must have from the government a categorical and incontestable statement of its position in regard to future tariff reductions. Refusal to give such a statement must inevitably be construed as an admission by the government of a desire to depart from the policy of tariff reduction.

Mr. C. H. DICKIE (Nanaimo): I do not intend to detain the House for any considerable length of time, because there is little that could be said just now which would accomplish much. Good crops in the country, together with the expansion of our wood and pulp industry, as well as of our mineral industry, have made the task of our Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) a fairly easy one at this juncture. However, there are some matters I might touch upon, matters of omission rather than of commission. It is to be noticed that the minister did not touch upon the extent of our adverse trade with the United States. Last year we bought $95,000,000 worth of merchandise and produce from that country more than we did the year before, representing an advance of nearly 100 per cent. We have an adverse balance of trade with the American nation of $196,000,000, whereas, through preferential agreements in our dealings with the British Empire, we have very favourable trade relations with our own people and a favourable trade balance. A great deal of our money for very many years has gone to enhance the prosperity and the prestige of our American neighbour. When are we going to stop this thing? Just imagine, Mr. Speaker, a nation of nine million sending $196,000,000 more to the United States than they send to us, every year! We cannot endure such a condition if we are to prosper.

Owing to good crops and other favourable conditions our industrial situation has not been bad. Things are not really bad in Canada at the present time. At the same time I consider that Canada with its immense resources and good crops, as well as for other reasons, should be to-day on the top of a wave of prosperity. Instead, we are simply making a little progress here and receding there. We have been told that the factories are running full time in Canada; but that is true only in part, for I know that prosperity does not reign in the west. Forty per cent of our sawmills are shut down in British Columbia, and others are likely to follow suit; still we hear it said that there is a great wave of prosperity sweeping over the country. Canada, under proper direction, could be made one of the greatest countries on the face of the globe. What we want is good, sane government, and in this respect I will not confine my criticism either to the present or to past governments. Indeed, Sir, I would rather that my criticism should be constructive than that it should take the form of faultfinding. I want to impress upon the government and the House, however, that what we are doing to-day is simply sowing the wind in order to reap the whirlwind. The bulk of our exports to the United States last year consisted of forest products. We shipped to that country over $240,000,000 of wood products and paper and these exports, be it remembered, are taken from a vanishing asset. The forests will not last forever. Let us remember that. I have seen the forests destroyed in the great state of Michigan, and I have witnessed the same thing in the state of Wisconsin. I remember hearing leading economists in the United States pleading with the people to conserve their forests, but the people there took the very attitude that our own people are assuming. Oh, they said, the forests will grow again. Now, to say anything of that kind is the height of absurdity. It is idle to say that the forests will grow again in the lifetime of your grandchildren or of mine. Let anyone take a trip up the Gatineau or the Ottawa for a few hundred miles and he will see, if he examines the forests, how long it will take for a new growth to replace the trees that are once cut down. I have seen the forests of the states of Michigan and Wisconsin simply wiped out, and the springs dried up, so that what was once beautiful country became a windswept, fire-stricken waste. The result is that the people of those states are obliged to-day to import lumber from British Columbia.

We cannot prevent the cutting of timber, but we can certainly do more than we have been doing in the way of reafforestation. People will tell you, when they see some green foliage on the tops of mountains, that there you have a forest in embryo, a forest in the making. But examine it and what do you find? You find a few scattered trees here and there—Christmas trees, we call them in the west—which will never make a forest, and from which it would be impossible to produce either sawlogs or pulpwood of commercial value. The only method of growing a great forest is by means of what is termed in forestry parlance the thicket growth. The thicket must be so thick that the sun will not penetrate to the foot of the trees. With that condition, in about twenty or thirty years' time you will have a tree thirty feet high. The sun has not been able to penetrate towards the bottom, so that limbs do not start near the base of the tree. After the thicket has reached that height, if there has been no fire—if a fire does once start it sweeps through the growth like a wild horse—such a tree will outstrip its fellows and rear its head above the rest, spreading out what is known as a roof canopy. The trees around it, deprived of the life-giving effect of the sun's rays, will of course die. When therefore you reflect that it will take at least seventy-five years to raise a forest of trees one foot through under the best conditions, you will see what little hope there is for the restoration of our forests within any reasonable period if once they are destroyed. In Germany they see that the annual increase keeps up with the annual cut of the forests, but their forests are only small in extent as compared to ours. In Sweden and in Finland they do the same. We are cutting down our forests without any regard to the future; the greed of the people engaged in the lumber business is greater than their patriotism. I have preached this doctrine on the floor of the House for five years. I have never accomplished anything but it is a pleasure for me to pursue this campaign and follow it along the lines which I know posterity will recognize as being good common sense even if the people of this age do not. In Germany the forests are being propagated, and they are keeping pace with the decrease being brought about by cutting. I could take a number of what are known as the "high lead" outfits from British Columbia, with five or six hundred of our British Columbia lumbermen, and I could go through the forests of Germany as reapers would go through a field of grain. But if we attempted for one day to adopt such methods as are being adopted in British Columbia, those responsible would be stood up against the wall at sunrise and shot—that is those responsible for cutting down our forests without regard to the people who are to come after.

Last year we sent out of British Columbia—exported out of the country—227,000,000 feet of logs. Those logs were cut in our forests and sent over to sawmills in the United States, and to Japan, and our people follow them over there just as surely as a chip will follow the receding tide. They went over to build up lumber towns on the American side. Now, do you realize, Mr. Speaker, what 227,000,000 feet of lumber means? It means—based on the average growth of timber here in the east, which I think would be about 10,000 feet to the acre—that the timber grown on 22,700 acres was cut that year and exported to the American side. That 227,000,000 feet practically approximates the total cut of saw logs in the province of New Brunswick. I am not quite sure but I know that the New Brunswick cut does not exceed 300,000,000 feet. We are preaching against that in British Columbia, but can do nothing. A great many of our forests there are owned or controlled by American interests and they are shipping their logs across the line. We want these logs manufactured in the country. We think there is too great haste, too reckless haste, in denuding our lands of their forests. When our forest growth has been exhausted, as the growth was exhausted in Michigan and Wisconsin, we have a great source of revenue cut off. Were it not for our exports of pulp, paper and saw logs to the United States to-day our adverse balance of trade would be so enormous that we would fear we were on the verge of bankruptcy. We do a wonderful business with our neighbours to the south in wood products, pulp and paper; but last year, Mr. Speaker, we sent again, as we have done for years, $14,000,000 worth of pulpwood across the line to be put through the pulp and paper manufacturing plants on the other side. That pulpwood was manufactured into at least seventy or seventy-five million dollars worth of paper. Thousands of Canadians, many of them French Canadians, cross the line to find employment in these pulp and paper mills, and we are denuding our forests to supply our American neighbours with the pulpwood to keep their mills going, receiving in return a measly fourteen million dollars. We could take every rancher and every farmer engaged in exporting pulpwood from the province of Quebec or the province of New Brunswick to-day and keep them in the Chateau Laurier at greater advantage to this country than allow them to continue to ship out this pulpwood. But we know there will be an end to it some day. As was reported by the pulpwood commission which toured the country, we know that in some parts of Canada the stocks of pulpwood will not last for more than twenty-five years. I know British Columbia fairly well, I know Vancouver island very well, and I can assure hon. members that in two decades from now the fir forests will have absolutely disappeared from Vancouver island which at one time possessed one of the finest stands of forest trees in the world.

As I said before, the greed of some people exceeds their patriotism, and we continue day by day cutting down those forests and in many instances shipping logs across to the United States to increase the prosperity of that country. I know of no reason why this government should not say that after the first of January, 1928, we will put an export tax of $2.50 or $5 a cord on pulpwood going out of the country. I know no reason why they should not put the same export tax on saw logs. But give those people who have their money embarked in this enterprise in Canada a chance to rearrange conditions so that they will not suffer loss; we should not act hastily. Even with that assurance it would be a good thing, and those of us who love the forests and would like to see them conserved would welcome it.

There are other points in respect to our importations from the United States to which I wish to refer. Last year we imported from that country $307,000,000 of what are known as mineral products. That includes iron and its products. It includes non-ferrous metals, that is metals without iron. It includes also non-metallic minerals. We bought no less than $307,000,000 worth from that country. They bought from us only $83,000,000. Note the tremendous adverse balance in that connection. I have heard it said, and it has been stated even across the floor of the House during the present session, that we import a large amount of raw material. What amount of those materials do we import? We imported last year fifty or sixty million dollars worth of coal; we imported $28,000,000 worth of cotton; we imported a little wool. These are the principal imports of raw material; nevertheless we bought $666,000,000 worth of products from the United States.

It is amusing to hear the remarks of gentlemen, such as the hon. member who has just resumed his seat, with respect to free trade. I would like to be as sure of anything as the hon. gentleman in question appears to be of everything with respect to the trade policies of the world. Where is there a nation of any consequence in the world that believes in free trade to-day? It is an absolutely exploded idea. We in Canada, perhaps more than the people of any other country require a protective tariff. We require a protective tariff like the one that has made the United States great. That protective tariff in the United States has drained Canada of its best men. Go into New York, Philadelphia, or Washington. Take a walk through the streets of these cities and see the calibre of the men you meet there. Go down through the streets of this delightful city of Ottawa and see the superior type of men compared to the type you meet in the cities enumerated. No better men in the world were ever bred than are bred in Canada in this climate of ours from a sturdy race of ancestors. The manner in which they have been leaving our country as long as I can remember, is a crime, a sin. In company with others many years ago I was forced to leave this country in order to make a living in the United States. Some of the best men I have ever known came from the county of Oxford, men reared on oatmeal and codfish, and educated on the Toronto Globe. Later on in life in the state of Michigan I met men from this Ottawa valley, men from around the Ottawa river, men from around the Madawaska—wherever it is; I do not know but I remember the name—men from the county of Glengarry; men from the province of Quebec, cousins of Joe Monferrand. I could pick out from their ranks—wonderful men some of them, others you might term brutal—two hundred and fifty who could scale the walls of Troy before breakfast, throw Paris and Hector into the ash can, and send Helen back to her folks on the farm. Then you could throw a few drinks into them and you would have a fight worth while. Those are the men that left this country.

As I say, some of them may have been abysmal brutes, but what better foundation on which to build a great nation? Why should we let them go as they did? Colorado, northern California, are filled with them. You find them in Arizona, Texas, Mexico. Wherever you go you find Canadians, fine stalwart fellows, men who, as I say, were brought up on the farm and had perhaps a little religious education, men who were taught in the country or village schools that honesty was the best policy. I remember many years ago when the best recommendation that any man could have in California was that he was a Canadian. If he was a Canadian they thought he was an honest man. He was resourceful, honest and faithful, and his services were valued. If you cross over from British Columbia into those great cities of Seattle and Tacoma you will find many, perhaps the greater proportion, of positions of trust held by that class of Canadian. We see them go day after day out of this country. Why should we allow this? I hate to copy anybody; but why should we not do as the people of the United States are doing? They have made their nation great simply by protecting their industrial population.

What did they do last year? Let me give the House one little instance. In 1925, we sent $1,400,000 worth of butter across the line to the United States side. The United States farmers immediately said: That is too much butter to be imported; we want greater protection. The United States government imposed an additional duty of four cents a pound on butter so that if butter went into the United States from Canada, it had to pay a duty of twelve cents a pound. Last year our export of butter to the United States amounted to only $101,000 worth, so that we lost the sale of $1,300,000 worth of butter to that country. That shows how they protect their agricultural interests. Our good friends —and good men they are—from the prairies, that country of wide horizons and sometimes, I think, of narrow visions, although I do not know why, want free trade. Had they any other idea than just their prosperity for the moment, free trade for them alone would no doubt be beneficial. But I know they will appreciate the fact that they are Canadians and I know they want to see this a great country. There is no reason why even if these gentlemen are penalized because of our protective tariff, we cannot repay them in some other way by subventions or by lowering railway rates, because I should not like to see our protective tariff bear unfairly on any part of this great Dominion. But we must do something to stem this tide of Canadian people going across to the United States. The people of the United States are laughing at us. From time back as far as I can remember they came here; they took our money; they would dump their goods on us. In the early days when the period of deflation occurred in trade relations they practically gave us their wagons, agricultural implements and things of that kind, and it was impossible to maintain manufacturing establishments in Canada. That was before the wise policies of Sir John A. Macdonald were put into operation.

I remember when there was practically no money in that part of Ontario in which I lived. As an example to show how money was valued then, I remember a man telling this story, although I will not vouch for the truth of it. He said that he and a number of his friends were standing on the bank of the mill-pond idly skipping stones across the water, and that some man came along who wanted to show off. Having pulled a fifty cent piece out of his pocket—he must have come from abroad or he would not have had it—he skipped it across the water and it went over to the deep part of the pond and sank. He said that they were diving for that fifty cent piece until the ice came on the pond. He said that he went to California, and on his return ten years afterwards there were old men with whiskers still diving for that fifty cent piece. I do not know why he said it, but he concluded by saying that it was a Scotch community.

I think I have pretty well run the gamut of what I intended to say. I do not know whether I have accomplished anything or not; but now that the tide has receded to its very lowest ebb, when there is no reduction in the tariff this year, I hope the tide will return; that waves of prosperity will return with it, and that we shall have from the government a political policy that will protect, a policy such as protects the furniture trade of Canada and others to-day. That is all we want. Let us build up an industrial Canada. Let us make of this a country in which our boys and girls who are educated on the farm will have some place to go. Last year a hundred thousand people left this country to go across to the United States and at least two thousand more I know left British Columbia without the immigration authorities having any knowledge of their going. It is no trouble at all for Canadians to step across the line and become residents of the United States. I know the quota lists for intending emigrants to the United States, men who happen to be born in the old country, are filled now. If a foreign born person goes to an immigration office to make application for entrance to the United States they will put his name on a quota list and it will be eighteen months before he is allowed to go. But there are men in this country who are smuggling foreigners into the United States. Any man resourceful as Canadians are—and some of them are a little acquainted with the smuggling business—can get across the line at any time.

As I say, a hundred thousand of our good people went to the United States last year and we want to make some place for them in Canada. Why can this great Liberal government not accomplish this? Why can it not live up to the traditions of Sir Wilfrid Laurier who in his time lived up to the traditions of Sir John A. Macdonald? I would support with pleasure any government that would enforce a fiscal policy that would keep those good people from Quebec, Ontario, or further west, at home instead of having them make of the United States a great nation. They have drifted away from their homes, from their association, from the church in which they were brought up, and they are making good citizens in the United States. As was pointed out so well yesterday by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion), we have in this country potentialities, possibilities, that would justify the expectation that we could make this a country with a population of thirty millions. It is the opinion of leading geologists that in the Laurentian plateau that the hon. member so well described we will have the greatest gold mines in the world.

We still have forests. Let us conserve them; let us spend more money on them; let us see that new forests are springing up although, at the present rate at which logging is being done they will not spring up in time to replace the old ones. We can, however, do something in that direction. Let us say to ourselves that we are going to be greater Canadians than we have been in the past. We want a greater Canadian spirit. I can quite understand that people coming here from the old land, do not perhaps have the same love of this country as those of us who were born here. We want to make Canada a great country and we can do it. All that is necessary is that we have sane, sound legislation, legislation along the line that is being adopted throughout the civilized world to-day. Where is there a nation in the world putting into practice the policy that was enunciated to us just before I started speaking by that eloquent and no doubt lovable gentleman, the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Glen). No nation can succeed as a free trade nation when it is alongside a country that is so highly protected as is the United States.

Mr. B. W. FANSHER (East Lambton): Mr. Speaker, in common with all members of the House I rejoice with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) that he has been able to present to the House a financial statement which provides for a reduction in the national debt of some $31,000,000. I might add that I rejoice with the citizens of this country that in spite of the somewhat hectic session that was held in this House last year, the producers of this country, while the legislators were concerned perhaps more with party matters, were so intent on making Canada prosperous that the Minister of Finance is able to present the splendid financial statement he gave to us the other day.

The hon. Minister of Finance was very modest in claiming but little credit for governmental activity in producing a balance on the right side of the ledger. He attributed, as is nearly always the case, a great part of the credit to the splendid crops we have had in this Dominion. He also said that there was more of a buoyant spirit evident throughout Canada to-day than there had been at any time previous. I wish to develop that thought a little.

I believe that to-day in Canada there is more of a buoyant spirit, more of a determination on the part of our citizens to see that our heritage as citizens shall be guarded, rather than our heritage as partisans, and I am pleased that that is true. It has been quite evident since this House assembled that there is a desire on the part of the members to assist in a constructive way the legislation that is brought down. It has been our privilege to listen to the financial critic of the official opposition, and I have never before in this House heard criticism of such a constructive nature as was offered by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett). I congratulate him upon his speech the other day.

But there are other contributing factors to the present prosperity of this Dominion which have not been touched upon at all as yet since this debate began. It is true that the crop of 1925 is reflected in the receipts and revenues of this country this year. It is true that when more wealth is produced, the artisans, tradesmen, labourers and farmers generally throughout this country have a larger purchasing power, which is reflected in the revenues of this country, because our taxation is based upon the expenditures of the people; in other words, our taxes are applied nearly every time that we make a purchase, and if the purchasing power of the individual citizen is increased, that is reflected in the country's revenues.

One very great factor in the increased wealth of this country, in my opinion, has been the organization and development of the wheat pool in western Canada. To that perhaps more than to anything else has been due the increased purchasing power of the farmers of Canada. We produce in this country, as was stated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) the great majority of our exports from the soil, and wheat is the one commodity above all others which is exported in great volume. By organization the farmers of western Canada have been able to market in an orderly manner the bulk of the wheat crop of that vast wheat-producing area. In the crop year just ended, the amount marketed by the wheat pool of western Canada was over 52 per cent of the entire crop—over 187,000,000 bushels. By controlling the marketing of that vast quantity of grain, and carrying the world's price back to the producer, less only the handling charges and transportation costs, the price of wheat throughout the year to the farmers has been increased to a higher level. If we look at the report of the Minister of Trade and Commerce for the average price of wheat to the farmer for the last five years, we find these figures:

1924 (wheat pool in operation)	1.22

The crop of 1926 has not yet been entirely sold, and we cannot tell yet what the price will be, but the operation of the wheat pool, I say, has done more to add to the purchasing power of the citizens of this country than anything that has been attempted before in the history of this or any other country, and we have immediateley reflected in the financial statement as presented to the House this year the result of such organization and of the adoption of such a marketing system.

Not only has the price of wheat been raised to the grower, but wheat being the stable commodity, the staff of life, its increased price has had a beneficial influence on all other grains to a greater or less extent. Not only has the wheat pool had an influence on the price of wheat in western Canada, but it has maintained the price of wheat in eastern Canada, in sympathy with the price in the west, to a level in the fall of the year, at harvest time, that we never reached before in the history of the province of Ontario except in war years.

Analysing the balance of trade for the last few years, we find that it has a direct relation to the production of wheat in the western provinces. If the production of wheat in the western provinces is large and the return from that crop to the farmer is good, we find that that is reflected in the following year in the financial statement that is brought down to this House. That is the case this year. The balance of trade for the year 1925-26 was $402,000,000 in our favour, and that balance of trade bears a direct ratio to the splendid crop and the price obtained for that crop in western Canada. While I am from the province of Ontario in eastern Canada, I cannot help but recognize the great benefit that this organization has been, not only to the farmers of this Canada of ours, but to all business in Canada east and west.

I wish to come more directly to the budget and the items contained therein; but before dealing with this year's budget I wish to make a few remarks upon the budget as presented last year. In that budget we had taxation reduction in two departments of collection, the income tax and the customs tariff tax. Outside of that no material reductions were made, and I wish to trace the effect of these reductions. The reduction that was made in the income tax last year produced a deficit, or a reduction in the revenue from that source, of $8,671,000; in other words, it had a direct adverse bearing upon the amount of taxes gathered from that source. Quite the reverse was the case in connection with the customs tariff. Although we had substantial reductions on some items, especially on automobiles and on lighting plants, the apparatus to generate electricity, and on a large number of other articles, yet our income from that source was increased $14,000,000, and I was quite pleased yesterday when the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning), commenting upon a speech of an hon. member in this House, made the observation that tariff reduction always acted that way, that it always brought about an increase in revenue, and I was somewhat at a loss to know why the policy of reduction in the customs tariff was not followed this year rather than the policy of reduction of direct taxation. Reduction of income tax, as I said before, resulted in decreased revenue to the extent of nearly $9,000,000. Reductions in the customs tariff, although substantial in a number of instances, did not bring about decreased revenue; on the contrary, we have an increased revenue of $14,000,000. If the Minister of Finance was viewing this situation purely from the standpoint of the treasury and from the lesson which last year's budget teaches, surely we should have expected this session further reductions in the customs tariff, and, therefore, increases in the revenue next year. Quite the contrary, as hon. members well know, has been the course pursued, and that is why we in this corner of the House take exception to the budget as presented this year. I am reminded of a passage in Scripture which says:

> There is that scattereth, and yet increaseth; and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty.

And perhaps that may be so in this case. I was quite struck with the remarks of the hon. member who just addressed this House in his plea for higher tariff, for protection in this country, and I could not help observing that in the last fifty years our average tariff has never been below twenty per cent, and that it stands at over twenty-three per cent to-day. I got these figures from the annual report of the trade of Canada for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1925. Anybody can verify them. They are to be found on page 10, where the calculations are made. Yet under these circumstances the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House (Mr. Dickie) says we have lost hundreds and thousands of our Canadians to the great republic to the south. It might be well for us to look about for some other reason why our Canadians go to the south, rather than say that the lack of tariff protection drives them away. Surely an average of twenty per cent assistance to industry, one-fifth, is large enough inducement, from the conservative viewpoint, to retain the citizens of this country within Canada. Should we not look for another reason? In my opinion the reason why hundreds and thousands are leaving Canada is that they are taxed out. A very good example of that was placed before me a few years ago, just before I came to this House, in conversation with a citizen of this country who had spent four years at the war. He said, "I hope the members of this parliament will try to reduce the customs tariff. You are taxing us out of the country. I returned from the war and got a job as a traveller. I found that travelling conditions were different from what they were before the war, and I had to have a car." This was before the reduction of the duty on motor cars was made. He continued, "A car costs me a hundred dollars more in Canada than had I decided to travel in the state of Michigan," which is just across the river from my county. "I had to furnish my office with typewriters and other equipment, and I found I had to pay nineteen dollars and some cents more than if I had decided to start travelling just across the river in the state of Michigan." He further added, "I am just as good a Canadian as ever stepped in shoe leather. I spent four years at the war, but you are taxing me out of this country." Now I want to place before the Minister of Finance, before the government and before the members of the official opposition this thought, that they may be induced to look at the real reason why the citizens of this country are leaving and going to the United States. It is true we are trying to check this exodus by an immigration policy which brings in settlers from Europe to go upon the land not only in eastern Canada but in western Canada. But to my mind as long as economic conditions are not what they should be in this country our immigration policy will not bring forth much fruit. The machine, so to speak, may work all right to bring the settler into the country, but unless we provide him the opportunity to gain a livelihood after he arrives here, that is, to make a profit on his farming operations, our immigration policy is not functioning properly. I might give a practical illustration in this regard, I think it has been given before. If the knotter on a farmer's binder is not tying the sheaves regularly he does not attempt to correct the fault by putting a new driver on the machine and telling him to go ahead. He corrects the fault at its source—he puts the tying apparatus in proper order. I want to say to the government and to the Minister of Immigration that I do not think our system of immigration can be perfected simply by placing a new driver in the seat—even if he does come from the Progressive party. The trouble lies deeper. We must make the basis of agriculture fundamentally and economically sound. We must so shape conditions in this country that immigrants can make a living on the land, otherwise our immigration policy is largely in vain.

There are a few other items in the budget with which I wish to deal. The Minister of Finance has announced that by the reduction in the stamp tax on cheques, bills and notes, 70 per cent of the nuisance taxes will be removed. I agree with him that 70 per cent of the revenue will be lost; but 100 per cent of the niusance will remain. The nuisance is still there; every cheque over ten dollars, every note, every bill, must still bear a stamp. It is no more trouble to lick a 20-cent stamp than to lick a 2-cent stamp and place it on a cheque. The result of the reduction of the stamp tax on cheques is simply to throw away that much revenue without removing the nuisance. Very largely the only fellow who will benefit by the reduction is he who can write a $10,000 cheque. Hereafter he will pay no more than the man who writes a $10 or $15 cheque—the workingman. I cannot see that any equality of taxation is brought about by this reduction. Surely some persons other than our labouring men got the ear of the Finance minister before he made this reduction.

The sales tax is a form of direct taxation, and is a tax which I do not object to at all. It costs the least to levy of perhaps any tax outside the income tax. The reduction of 20 per cent in the sales tax will afford some small relief to the labourer and the commonplace citizen, but outside of that I do not see that this budget will afford much relief to the ordinary Canadian. To my mind it gives relief to those of our citizens who are in the best position to pay. I regret this reduction because it comes at a time when we can ill afford to reduce this form of direct taxation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am criticising the budget because I am a strong believer in tariff reduction. I believe if, instead of this $27,000,000 relief which the Minister of Finance says the reduction in the income tax, the sales tax and the stamp tax represents, a similar loss in revenue had been occasioned by a reduction of the customs tariff, the relief to our taxpayers would represent at least $100,000,000. I base that statement on the fact that a four per cent sales tax on the business of the country is estimated in this budget to bring in $104,000,000 in revenue, while the average tariff tax which is 23 per cent on our business is estimated to bring in a revenue of only $141,000,000, although that tariff tax is five times as great in percentage. Therefore I am led to believe that the customs tariff is not nearly as efficient a method of collecting revenue as is the income tax. If we figure out the ratio, we shall find that while one dollar is gathered into the treasury three times as much goes into the pockets of the interests protected under the customs tariff. It seems to me that this perhaps is one reason why Canadian industry has not been as prosperous as it should be. I do not believe it is possible to build up a strong, virile industry by a system of coddling any more than it is possible to build up a sturdy manhood and womanhood by such a system. I think that industry can be made strong and prosperous in this country by being in large measure thrown on its own resources. Surely after fifty years of assistance under a protective tariff, under which our manufacturers have never got a lower average protection than 20 per cent, we may well urge a party that year after year has promised tariff reductions to give us results. True, in the fourteenth parliament some reduction was made on agricultural implements, and a further reduction was made last year. But it seems to me extraordinary conditions must develop before we can effect a reduction in the customs tariff. I hope however that the government realizes the importance of implementing this plank of their platform, which apparently they are abandoning,—a plank which, by the way, had a good deal to do with the election of a considerable number of those who sit to the right of the Speaker. The tariff reduction afforded in the last budget, and the promise of further reductions, played no small part in returning an increased Liberal membership from the province of Ontario. Just so long as the government keeps faith with those electors, just so long will they retain their confidence in the future.

There never was a time in the history of Canada when the people were so free from party ties, and so eager to approach every question from the broad standpoint of Canadian citizenship as a whole, as they are to-day, and governments may well take warning that promises made by political parties will be expected to be carried out to the letter. This is the case to-day more than ever before in our history.

There is no doubt that there has been an alarming exodus in the last twenty years. Out of over 400 townships in old Ontario only 61 have increased in population in that time, according to the 1921 census, and these few have been close to cities or towns where there has been an overflow into the township. In some constituencies there has been a reduction of 5,000 in ten years. The rural citizens believe that the foundation of any nation is the soil, and that is why they are anxious that tariff relief shall be given the agriculturists. This is what the rural communities of Ontario want, so that they may rebuild this old province. There is homestead after homestead throughout the province unoccupied at the present time, and vast pasture lands waiting to be utilized. We must not forget that the foundation of the nation is agriculture. It is time, therefore, that we harked back to the welfare of the men on the soil; otherwise we may wake up some day and find ourselves in a very unenviable situation. We are this year commemorating the diamond jubilee of Canadian confederation. We have been sixty years a nation. I trust that when the celebration takes place due consideration will be given the pioneers of this country, those who laid its foundations and handed down to us the great heritage which we enjoy. The agriculturists of Canada for fifty years have contributed to the welfare of Canadian industry to the tune of over twenty per cent, and it was sincerely to be hoped that in this jubilee year we might have expected a budget that would give a substantial measure of tariff relief to the rural communities.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of ways and means, and on the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Coote.

Mr. J. C. BRADY (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, from time remote the introduction of the budget has been associated, not only in England, but in most European countries, with a ceremonial befitting the importance of the occasion. As hon. members know, the word comes from the French word bougette, a little bag, and it was customary in those days to have the budget brought into the House of Commons in a small blue bag. One can imagine the exciting interest that prevailed in the House when the bag or budget was opened. To-day in our parliament that ceremonial is not a part of the reading of the budget, but nevertheless the budget speech is a far-reaching and important document to the people of Canada, because on it will depend the knowledge which we have of the present status of the country's finances and the future prospects of the country.

I have heard that it is usual on the budget debate for hon. members to be given a certain liberty of speech and that any subject may be discussed. I do not intend this evening to discuss a variety of subjects, but I hope to bring to the attention of the government a few things that may be of importance when they come to consider their future policy in regard to Canada.

It was a source of gratification and perhaps more of a feeling of pride in Canada to learn from the budget that by the end of the present fiscal year we would have a favourable trade balance of probably $250,000,000. but there is to this, an aspect, which I think, is worthy of the consideration of every right-thinking man and woman in this broad Dominion. There may be a danger that in parting with our great natural resources, particularly of our forests and mines, we may go too far, because there is a limit even to those two great natural resources in Canada, just as in the case of the tower of Pisa, which has stood many centuries removed from the perpendicular, yet, we find that engineers are to-day engaged in endeavouring to save that ancient monument because it is now fourteen feet from the perpendicular and at any moment may topple. I bring in this illustration just to show that it is a dangerous path we tread, when steadily, year by year, we export a large volume of the two important natural resources of our country which demand the greatest care in order that they may be conserved for future generations.

I gleaned from the budget one or two things which it might be of value to bring before the government in connection with the particular resources to which I refer. We find in the budget that the export of gold bullion and quartz in 1925 amounted to $23,600,000, and in 1926 to $5,000,000, or a decrease of over $18,000,000. I am sure that those who advocate the development of our subsidiary industries will look upon it as a source of congratulation that we are adopting a measure which will meet with the satisfaction of all the people of Canada. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the government will continue to work in that direction, and may we hope the same course will be adopted with other of our natural resources, because we believe—and I am sure that not only the members on this side but those on the government side hold the view—that our subsidiary industries must keep pace with our growth and population. Our primary industries, like our great wheat fields, our forests and our mines must likewise be developed, but it must be done in connection with the development of our subsidiary industries. I regret to say that while we continue to increase our export of asbestos, copper, aluminum, iron, and pulpwood, we show a decrease in the export of wool and butter. That may seem to members of the government a mere trifle. I will endeavour to prove that it is a very important thing and worthy of notice. In 1925 Canada exported to the United States 4,397,232 pounds of butter, valued at $1,407,683 and, in 1926 the export was 353,808 pounds, valued at $101,744. Here we see a decrease which shows that something has happened that we should note particularly. What do we find as the cause of this great decrease? The United States on March 6, 1926, raised the duty on butter imported into that country from eight to twelve cents a pound, and that increase of four cents reduced the export of Canadian butter into the United States from 4,397,232 pounds to 353,808 pounds. Now I have heard, and we hear it repeatedly, that free trade is a necessity for Canada to-day, but let me remind those who believe in this policy that, although Bright and Cobden said that free trade was a good thing for England in the hungry forties of the nineteenth century, it is not a good thing for England and Canada in the second decade of the twentieth century. We know—and I am convinced that if hon. members on the government side declared what they believe in their hearts, they would say—that a tariff policy protecting our young industries is an absolute necessity.

Another matter that I think is worthy of notice is in reference to Canada's trade with the United States. For the twelve months ending November, 1926, Canada exported to the United States $470,149,366 worth of goods. That means that there was an increase over the 1925 export of $408,042. The imports from the United States into Canada for the same period in 1926 were $666,128,368, an increase of $95,747,527. Briefly, what does that mean? It means simply this; that we increased our exports to the United States in 1926 by less than one per cent over 1925, and we increased our imports from the United States in the same period sixteen per cent. I am not going to be an alarmist. I do not intend to say anything that would exaggerate or make foolish any of these statements, but I do say—and the people of Canada know it—that there is a tendency to forget that the future of Canada and its progress are bound up with the development of these secondary industries which would enable us, instead of importing so much manufactured goods, to export our own goods. I believe that the government is anxious to do the best for Canada, and that it thoroughly understands the sacred duty which devolves upon a government. But this I do say, because I speak what the heart of the people wishes to express: The government of Canada should not think of a particular class or a particular interest; rather they should do what is best for the interests of Canada as a whole and for the future progress of this country.

It may seem strange to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and to the government as a body that although last year's budget was pronounced to be a great success, although Canada had enjoyed a year of great prosperity and substantial reductions were made in taxation, although an elevator was built by the government in the city of Prince Rupert and by all common logic it would seem that the constituency of Skeena should have returned to this House a government supporter, yet it did not do so. It may seem ingratitude on the part of the electors not to return to parliament a Liberal member because Prince Rupert was held in such affectionate regard by the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who looked with fond eyes upon its birth and pledged almost his political destiny that that port should be developed. My predecessor, I am sorry to say, is more to blame for my presence here than perhaps any act of mine during the last federal campaign. I tell the government to-day that I was sent here to do what he failed to do, to present facts, not fancies, to the government for their consideration. I think it is the duty of a member of parliament, Mr. Speaker, to represent, not a section of the people, but all the people; to be honest and straightforward in his presentation of matters political, and neither to exaggerate nor to minimize conditions as they exist in his constituency. My predecessor did not present to the government the facts as they existed. According to him, everything was well in the land of Skeena. Everything was flourishing, and the people were basking under the beneficent influence of the government. From Atlin in the north to Ocean Falls in the south Skeena was a land, according to him where everything was well. It is a great land, Mr. Speaker. It is rich beyond the bounds of imagination, but I say to this House to-night that the aspirations of its people, their wants and their legitimate demands, were not presented to the government in order that the conditions under which they were suffering might be ameliorated. When men come from contact with reality, and very often tragic reality, they are apt to have small patience with the ordinary conventions of speech which are sometimes used to conceal the truth. The people's representative should be a representative of all classes, of all occupations and of all interests, and he should voice the aspirations of the people before the tribunal of parliament, the highest and the greatest tribunal in a democratic country. But, Mr. Speaker, when we see in that land, endowed with all the riches of nature, whole countrysides in a stagnant and moribund condition, when we see men and women struggling for a living under conditions that are perhaps too severe, we are looking at sights that should not be seen in Canada to-day.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): My hon. friend has stated that his predecessor fell down in his duty as a representative because he failed to present the facts as they existed. The late member for Skeena was a very highly respected member of this House, and we would like to hear the particular occasions on which he fell down and the particular matters which he failed to present to the House.

Mr. BRADY: I shall enumerate them as I proceed. The country population, Mr. Speaker, is the most vital element in any nation, and it should be given a better chance of continuance and growth. We are creating in Canada to-day, by our neglect in assisting the industrial centres throughout our rural districts, a parasitic state of existence, drawing our youth to the towns, very often to get little clerical jobs either in the banks or in the government, and thus breaking down the morale and the character of our young manhood and robbing them of those healing and beneficent influences which come from participating in the development of our resources—because, Mr. Speaker, tilling the soil and developing our great natural resources is the one great source of patriotism and love of country. So long as our youth are not given a chance to participate in the upbuilding of Canada, so long shall we have this exodus to the great republic.

Hon. members may smile and think that the opposition have nothing to do but attack whatever the government brings forward. That is not so. In my view, Sir, the duty of an opposition is an honourable and onerous one, and I believe that the government are always pleased to find in the ranks of the opposition men who will point out where legislation is weak and offer constructive criticism to make it better.

Undoubtedly, Mr. Speaker, Canada's immigration problem is greater than the immigration problem of any of her sister dominions. The reason is that Australia and New Zealand, for instance, being far remote from a great industrial country such as the United States, their sons and daughters remain in the land where they were born, and likewise the immigrants to those dominions are content to remain in their adopted country. But we are in a very different position. Owing to the lack of employment for our youth commensurate with their ambition, they go to the United States, where they meet with pronounced success. If any hon. gentleman here desires to secure concrete proof of what is happening in this regard to-day, it is easily obtained. There is not a high school in the Dominion but is pouring out every year scores of boys of brilliant attainments who go to assist in developing a country that is the principal trade rival of their own.

To-day, Mr. Speaker, we are waiting for some statesman to solve the problem, not of bringing in more immigrants, but of keeping our sons and daughters in the land of their birth. It is no small problem and it is not to be passed over lightly. It strikes at the very vitals of our national life, and upon its solution hinges the future of Canada. We are told that Canada's one great need is more people, and we know that she is entitled to and can sustain a great population. But, Sir, before we invite more immigrants to make their homes with us we must make conditions such that those who have already settled here may be able to continue on their farms. We are not doing this at the present time, as I shall point out in regard to my own constituency. To-day, while Holland is spending large sums of money in reclaiming land from the sea, while Italy is spreading out to acquire new territory, and while in the eastern and southern countries the population increases as regularly as ocean wave follows ocean wave, we with an empire of fertile land are wondering how we shall fill up our great open spaces. That is something to be taken to heart by those who have an interest in the progress of their country.

Coming to my own constituency, by way of supplement to what I said regarding the reason for my being here, let me read a very short extract from the Province of September 17, 1926. This is a telegram sent by the Prime Minister of Canada to the Premier of British Columbia. After thanking Mr. Oliver for his congratulations on the result of the federal campaign, the right hon. Prime Minister said:

> I will look to see British Columbia come gradually into line.

If I now read a quotation from the Daily News of Prince Rupert of the tenth of this month, I think the House will agree with me that the hopes of the government appear to be bright and rosy. The late member for Skeena on this particular occasion, in addressing a public meeting, said:

> There is no doubt in my mind that I am still the member for Skeena. The only difference is that I draw no salary and am privileged to stay at home and enjoy my family.

Is there any other constituency in Canada to-day that has the great privilege of being represented by two members, one in the House on the opposition side, pleading the cause of that constituency, and one at home, the real member, who has the interests of the constituency at heart? I give to him whatever honour he deserves, and I add this, that if through his instrumentality the dream of Sir Wilfrid Laurier comes true and the port of Prince Rupert develops into one of the great ocean ports of the world, I shall not feel in the least envious. If my predecessor is still the member for Skeena, then surely this House as well as myself can support him in his demands for better transportation and greater development. And if, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) declares, Skeena is to come into the fold, supposing that thereby the development of Skeena and the happiness of the people who live there will be furthered, I offer no objection.

I have here a little clipping from an American newspaper which is pregnant with meaning:

> The government estimates that the present population of the United States is 118,628,000. The country has gained 12,917,380 people in the last six years, and 1,500,000 in the last year. All this is encouraging, although it is too slow. We need 50,000,000 more people now to eat up the surplus products of farms, buy new automobiles and our used ones likewise. The people are the real wealth of the country.

According to this editorial the United States requires fifty million more people to absorb its surplus products; yet at this very hour we find in various parts of Canada settlers of the finest type, who have made our empire what it is, struggling in despair and quite often ready to leave a country which should be to them a very paradise.

I am not here to-night to advance any adverse criticism. I do not blame the government for the fact that settlers to-day, in the most fertile valleys of the world, are suffering untold hardships through lack of the things they need. It is an old grievance. I do affirm, however, that it is the duty of the government to listen to the voice of a representative who submits to them matter for thought, and who states the facts, which they can easily verify as it is their duty to do.

I come now to the constituency which I represent. An hon. member asked me why it was that my predecessor was not here to-day. I can reply to him convincingly: the electorate of that constituency by their vote on September 14 gave the answer, namely, that he was not satisfactory to them because he was not placing their needs as they ought to be placed before the government of the country. You need go no further than that. If I thought for one moment that in coming to this House I might in any way interfere with the laudable ambitions and the future prosperity of Skeena I would not be here. I feel that the government of the country is endowed with a wisdom, or at least a judgment sufficiently grounded, to enable it to rise above party politics and to view Canada's needs in a non-partisan, national spirit.

I want to bring to the attention of the government now a few points in connection with the harbour of Prince Rupert and generally of the riding I represent. As this House knows, in 1911 Sir Wilfrid Laurier visited that port, taking a deep interest in its development. He prophesied that one day Prince Rupert would become one of the ocean ports of the world. To-night, it seems to me, this prophecy is well on the road to being fulfilled. To-day the port of Rupert is an ocean port, and before the next few months will have passed, over fifty tramp steamers from Britain and the orient will have loaded grain for every port in Europe, and for the orient as well, at the local elevator. This, Mr. Speaker, is the thing I would like to dwell on for a few minutes. I believe there were many members in this House who did not believe it was advisable that an elevator should be built in Prince Rupert. No one should find fault with a man if his convictions are honest and if he believes that it is not advisable to put a large sum of money into an elevator or into a new railway line. But now that the elevator is a success, now that it is functioning to the extent of one hundred per cent, now that wheat from Alberta is flowing into it steadily, the government must undertake to see to it that that port continues to function and to develop, not for the sake of Rupert but for the sake of Canada and the development of Canadian ports. In that port we have wonderful facilities of all descriptions for an ocean-going trade. When the port of Montreal and the great lakes were frozen up and scores of steamers were ice-locked round the Christmas season, there were at the port of Prince Rupert—which never in the memory of man has been ice-bound, and I believe never will—five or six vessels ready to take grain to the orient or the old country. I would ask the government to remember that it is their duty now to interest capital in continuing the work that they commenced, and that other elevators should be built as well as the present one. For Prince Rupert is the natural outlet to the Peace river country. Rupert is 480 miles nearer the orient than any other port of Canada, and as the orient is annually increasing its imports of wheat, the evidence is conclusive that that port will become a great ocean port. But there is one thing, Mr. Speaker, I would urge the government to consider and it is this: The development of the hinterland of Prince Rupert has been sadly neglected. The transportation facilities are of the very worst. The great Buckley valley, which produced that timothy seed that won, I believe, the first prize at the Chicago exhibition, lies in the very place where to-day people find access to the market for their products very difficult. I shall read a few words from a statement by the Lieutenant Governor of British Columbia regarding the hinterland of Prince Rupert, to which I am going to refer for a few minutes: "A dominion within British Columbia", is how the Hon. Randolph Bruce, Lieutenant Governor of British Columbia, described the interior of central British Columbia after taking a trip through it in the fall of this year. His words were:

> I was amazed at the vastness of the rolling country. It is a wonderful mixed farming country, and the settlers are of the type that go to make a wonderful land.

Would you believe that for five years the people of Francois lake and the Ootsa lake country, one of the most fertile, one of the most beautiful and one of the richest both in its soil and in its mineral production, have asked this government to put in a little spur line of eight miles that would open up two thousand miles of country where a thousand British families could live in peace and comfort? The people of this country consider, perhaps unjustly, that the government of Canada are more concerned in building up hotels for the tourist trade than providing the necessary facilities to get their goods cheaper to market. I do not believe the government are as hard-hearted as that. I believe that the government, when these matters are placed before them, will be willing to do what is right, namely, give those people these facilities which will permit of the development of a fine type of settler. In the north country of Atlin, where we have thirty-two producing mines, what do I find? An immense area, rich in its soil and in its mineral production, with thirty-two placer properties, including hydraulics, and a great prospect of further development. What assistance has this country received from the federal government for the last twelve months? None, except an increase in the postmaster's salary, although its people have for years asked federal aid through the provincial members and their federal member that they might get a very necessary thing—simply a road that would enable them to bring in their goods and not have to pay a rate of $65 a ton as they are paying to-day. It is no wonder that men turn aside and lose faith in governments when governments seem to be heedless of their wants. We have likewise in the south of that constituency a great valley rich in resources and in population; but what do we find? The same thing prevails there. The people there, just because there is no road, pay $60 a ton to bring their food supplies into the valley. Therefore I would urge the government to consider the advisability of reëstablishing federal aid for highways. I believe that British Columbia exhausted its quota, but last year the federal government spent more than $18,000,000 in the upkeep of our highways.

Another matter that has caused annoyance and disappointment to the people of my constituency is the fact that from the port of Prince Rupert to Canada outside there is not a road nor even a pathway. You may search the geography of the world and you will not find a port as important as Prince Rupert that has not a highway leading from it. I know the government cannot do everything, but I do know that unless federal aid for highways is reëstablished, the port of Prince Rupert will still wait for many years before those ninety miles of road are built to connect with the great Canadian highway.

It is all very well for hon. members from highly organized and artificial city life to look askance at pleas made by representatives from rural districts, but the happiness of those people, yes, their very future, depends upon things of this nature. When the Hudson Bay railway problem comes before this House it may give me far more thought and doubt than I had before to decide the question: Is the government doing right when so much necessary work is required in settled places and districts where the people are waiting for that little help?

Another matter that I would like to touch upon is this. I am no pessimist; I am not an extreme optimist; but I am one who believes that we are living in a great period in the history of Canada, and that the one thing which we need to-day is a policy of development which will bring together and relate closely the maritime provinces, the industrial provinces of Ontario and Quebec, the prairie provinces, and British Columbia. There is no value in an isolation policy, and the government will be doing a great work if, in the diamond jubilee of confederation year, they inaugurate a policy whereby every place, every province, in Canada will participate justly and equitably in federal government.

The port of Prince Rupert is the greatest fish producing centre in Canada. Figures after all are very dry, and I notice that last week when members speaking began to cite figures, many took no notice. But nevertheless no one can realize the wonders of Canadian commerce if he does not take an interest in figures. In the season of 1926 just closed, what do I find as regards the port of Prince Rupert, which is district No. 2 of the three great fishing districts of British Columbia? I find that the whole salmon pack for British Columbia in 1926 was 2,605,000 cases of salmon, and of that the Prince Rupert district alone produced 1,376,300 cases—in other words, nearly 60 per cent of the total export of salmon. We have a great fishing industry; we have in the port of Prince Rupert alone nearly $2,000,000 invested in salmon boats and halibut boats. We have contiguous to Prince Rupert a district so rich in its mineral wealth that one mine fifty miles from Prince Rupert in the last six years paid in dividends alone the sum of $8,600,000. We had a new mine opened up a few months ago called the Topley mine. It is bonded for $200,000 cash, and it is the belief of those who understand mining properties that in a few years it will be a second Premier mine, and probably a rival of the great Trail smelter. Then we have within sixty miles of Prince Rupert the great Anyox Copper Smelting Company. We have everything in that district that the people of Canada should be proud of, and yet the people are disappointed at the way they have been treated. What they need is transportation. That is the outstanding need in central British Columbia to-day, and if the Canadian National management, who are so anxious to make their line successful, would only realize that an expenditure in this territory would bring them a good return on their capital investment, I am sure they would not delay in coming to the aid of these people.

I have little further to say. I may have erred somewhat in my presentation of these matters, but I am a new member and perhaps I am not advanced enough to be able to cloak my thoughts. I say with Shakespeare in Macbeth that "Security is man's chiefest enemy." There is no government, I care not where they are or how strongly entrenched they may be, that can continue to turn a deaf ear to the aspirations of the people; for if they do the day will surely come for them, as it came for Macbeth, when the hopes they built upon will dwindle away. I am not saying this in any personal way, but it does seem to me that the hour has come, Mr. Speaker, when at least the two great parties in this House, though they may choose to differ on major questions, should at least agree on minor ones and unite in putting through good legislation and in giving good progressive government for the good of the people as a whole. Mr. Speaker, the people are thinking to-day, and they are wondering why it is that in an era of such great prosperity for Canada, many sections of this country are not participating in that prosperity. May I express the hope that 1927 will be for Canada a year of progress and prosperity in which every part of the country will share. May we see in our Dominion a great and a happy people without many problems, and leading the way in good, sane and progressive government.

Miss AGNES MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): Mr. Speaker, I wish to comment briefly upon the budget which was brought down this year on the 17th of February. It was an early, if not a promising, product of the new year. In that budget very much was said about the buoyant spirit that is prevalent in Canada to-day, about the good crops that we have been blessed with and the reduced debt, and I am glad to say that in a measure these things are true. Conditions are better than they were, possibly a good deal better than they were three or four years ago, but when the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) goes further and says that all traces of war depression have disappeared, my personal opinion is that that is a misstatement of fact. Many papers have picked this up and are carrying it across Canada, but personally I think it is very far from the truth. Possibly the government feels it needs some excuse for already making preparations for the next conflict and increasing to such a great extent the estimates of the Department of National Defence. I want to speak on that subject for just a moment or two, and to quote from one whose name is familiar to the members of this House, the Hon., possibly the Right Hon. Arthur Ponsonby. He is a very respectable fellow. When he was a little chap he held the queen's train. He has blue blood, but he thinks. He has written many pamphlets and many books, one recently, Now is the Time, from which I quote. At page 102, in speaking of war, he has this to say:

> I maintain that by far the most tragic thing about war, is not its immorality, nor its cruelty, but its manifest and colossal futility and imbecility. I maintain that war achieves no single object of advantage in the high sense to anyone, nor does it attain any of the supposed aims for which it is waged.
> The sight of the Allied Powers first making a supreme physical effort to destroy and annihilate their foe, and then making a far more prolonged, yet still unsuccessful effort to set that selfsame foe on his feet, in their own interest, is in itself a striking epitome of the inanity of war.

Again, at page 112, and I would refer this to the profound consideration of the government, he says:

> As to the settlement of grave international disputes, war is obviously the very worst method. Agreement, not force, is the only possible method of settling any dispute.

It is evidently the one that has been arrived at by the two major parties in this House. He goes on to say, at page 114:

> The spirit of militarism in governments is far more rampant now than before the war, although it may have shifted its abode. The expenditure on armaments in the victorious nations is far greater than it was before the war.

Just one other quotation, and I am through He comes, near the end of the book, at page 166, to this conclusion:

> That the causes declared by the government for the declaration of any war are, and must be based on lies, and;
> Second, that war however fiercely waged and however successfully terminated, can accomplish nothing at all.

If that is even in a measure true, surely we, in such a splendid country as ours, so very free from attack or the fear of attack, so very blest in being far removed from the conflicts of Europe, should consider very seriously the opinions of a man who has been so close to international affairs as the Under-Secretary of State in the British government, led by Ramsay MacDonald. Here is a way money can be saved.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) stressed the fact that we had had good crops. Possibly he is so far removed from agriculture at the present time that he does not know that in the province of Ontario this year we did not have a good crop at all. In fact, I consider that the farmers in the northwestern part of Ontario, from which I come, have had this year one of the hardest years that they have passed through for some time. The crop was almost wholly a failure. The harvest season was very wet. The farmers are doing the best they can to tide themselves over until next year. Preceded as it was by several years of depression, they are finding it a most difficult year.

Coming again to the budget, I observe that there is a twenty-five per cent reduction of the excise tax on matches. If you say it that way it sounds a good deal, but I have in my hand a little box of Eddy's matches, sold at two for five cents, I believe, and the tax on that was one cent. If the full benefit of the tax is passed on to the consumer, they will have to charge four and three-quarter cents for these two boxes. I have never seen a retail merchant do business in that way, and I do not expect that he will. I do not expect that the cut in the excise tax on matches will make any difference to the consumer at all. I am not sure whether the manufacturer or the retailer will get the money. The federal treasury will lose it—of that we may be sure —the consumer will lose it; and therefore I am not enthusiastic in reference to the twenty-five per cent cut in the excise tax. I was reading in the Calgary Albertan to-day that the tax brought in last year produced a revenue of $2,403,924, and it will bring in one-quarter less next year.

The reduction in sales tax will be welcomed, but again there is little likelihood of the consumer getting the full benefit. I think all of us are glad of the removal of the excise tax on overdrafts. I approved of that reduction and do not mind saying so. To me it seems stupid to tax people who are in debt and unable to pay, and since I have been there I understand it very well.

I appreciate the provision in regard to the stamp tax, making everything below ten dollars free of tax and over that a uniform rate. I think that is a good thing and I commend the Minister of Finance for it.

Then we come to the income tax. There I must differ with the Minister of Finance. I believe that the income tax should be based on the ability to pay. That is a sound principle and I think it should be maintained. I never felt a bit badly about paying an income tax. I was thoroughly glad that I had an income on which to pay the tax, and there are so many people in Canada who have not an income on which they can pay a tax that I believe those who have incomes should pay income tax. I think I am right in saying that a man having a family of four children is entitled to an exemption up to $5,000. He would have to be receiving $6,000 before he would have to pay a tax, and if a man is receiving $6,000 I see no excuse for not paying the tax. If the government could have found a way to plug leaks and get the higher up people, those with large incomes, to pay the income tax, it would be a much wiser step than the one they have taken, because inasmuch as we do not raise the revenue from direct taxation we will have to raise it from indirect taxation. But if the protective tariff is used for the thing it was instituted for it will raise no revenue at all, because in the protectionist heaven there would be no revenue; there would be nothing imported except the raw materials and they would come in free. Manufacturers are always keen about protecting everything but their raw material. I consider the move from direct to indirect taxation a reactionary one. It is no credit to any Liberal government, and it is not in the best interests of the Canadian people. Direct taxation is a splendid lesson in civics. It leads to better citizenship. People want to know what the government do with the money they get. The system leads to economy and to the elimination of pork barrel methods and campaign funds. In fact if direct taxation is persisted in long enough, until the people are bearing directly the whole taxation, it must lead to a very honest method of carrying on governmental affairs. Moreover it is a business-like method, I think all these things are good, and if for no other reason, this tax should be maintained at its previous level.

The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Glen) asked why the income tax was lowered, I said it was because they who paid it raised a big enough holler. I should have said the people who pay control the government, or have a great share in controlling the government. In looking for the government when I come to this question of the tariff I find that I cannot see any of them; there are many big men there, but they are all hidden behind the tariff board. I recall that when the Canadian Council of Agriculture was asking for a tariff board the object of it was to have a method of preventing people from obtaining a higher tariff, or establishing tariff for the first time, until they had proved to the tariff board that there was an absolute necessity for the imposition of duties or the raising of the tariff. That, I think everybody in the House will agree, was the object of the tariff board, but it seems to me—I believe that most of the members on the government side will agree—that the tariff board is used as an excuse for the stagnation of the government in regard to this matter.

Has the government learned nothing from the experience of last year? In the face of a dire necessity for support they brought down a budget that was true to the alleged principles of the Liberal party, a budget that made at least some very substantial cuts in the tariff. It was called the Robb budget, but I think the man whose name it bears was the least enthusiastic in regard to it. Great disaster was predicted after this budget came down. The manufacturers were to leave the country, the workshops were to be closed and the people out of work. Everything disastrous was to follow. This year has proven what the results are, and the manufacturers have not suffered at all. Their sales have increased. The demand for their products has increased. The motor companies manufacture more cars and sell more cars. The best evidence of the effect of last year's budget is the fact that the price the consumer pays has been substantially lowered, yet the government has not the courage this year to take one more step along the path it set for itself last year. The people of Canada approved almost to an astounding degree the Robb budget of 1926. As a matter of fact the Robb budget of 1926 was so powerful in the country that even the customs scandal did not prevent the people from taking what they considered was the best chance of getting another budget of the same kind. Of course, the constitutional question had something to do with the result, but I do think that more than any other factor the Robb budget was responsible for sending the Liberal party back to power on September 14. You know, you got the low tariff west, you gained in the low tariff sections of Ontario —and now your answer to the low tariff people is that having got back you are not going to do a thing about it. Well, I am not worrying; it is your funeral. But it is poor tactics. The people ask for bread and the government gives them a stone.

Often I have heard people say of a certain man, "He is a nice man," or of a certain woman, "She is a sweet woman," and I always think that ends either as far as I am concerned. That is the way with this budget—it is a nice little budget. I consider that the government have missed a wonderful opportunity of expressing in action the alleged ideals and principles of the Liberal party. But they say, "Oh, we could not reduce the tariff because the tariff board had not investigated the thing sufficiently, had not recommended it. Since we have a board we do not need to use our brains, we are resting them." When reading the speech delivered yesterday by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) I notice he stated that bath tubs enjoyed a protection of 35 per cent; white lead, ground in oil, 37½ per cent; wall paper, 35 per cent; window shades, 35 per cent; umbrellas, 35 per cent; door mats, 35 per cent; artificial silk fabrics, 35 per cent; silk fabrics, 35 per cent. Well, one does not need a very powerful brain to know that the manufacturers of those articles are enjoying too much protection, to know that they are not merely charging 35 per cent but even 37½ per cent and more than that to the consumer, while they themselves are very comfortable, having summer homes where it is cool and winter homes where it is warm.

I am not one of those who think that the tariff is the only thing that makes the cost of living high. I think the control of credit, cost of transportation and international conditions also have something to do with the cost of living; but the tariff has a great deal to do with it, and those articles that I have enumerated are in everybody's household, everybody buys them. Everybody does not buy an automobile, nor does everybody buy a new automobile every year, but everybody does buy some of these things every year, and it was the business of the Liberal government to reduce the cost of living in so far as they were able to do so and thus acknowledge the confidence that the Canadian people reposed in them last September. This they could have done by reducing the tariff. If any proof is wanting that these articles can stand a reduction of tariff, even although the tariff board has not said so, let me recall to hon. members the speech delivered yesterday by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm), when he was not speaking as Minister of Trade and Commerce, but as an apologist for enjoying 30 per cent protection on his very excellent furniture. He said, referring to the rapid rise in the value of stocks, that Penman's had risen from 152 to 186, Dominion Textile common stock from 68 to 107, Canada Cement from 92 to 131, and then he said he would not burden the House with further examples, of which he had a long list.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In which his own company would have appeared.

Miss MACPHAIL: I suppose so. It would have been better had he not said that, but I am glad he did. It really does not need any argument at all to demonstrate the necessity of further tariff reductions. You do not need a tariff board to tell you that, and if the tariff board is to be made an excuse for never reducing the tariff, why, the sooner we get rid of it the better for everybody concerned. In the course of his speech yesterday the member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) gave the proportions of our exports, 56 per cent being agricultural and 44 per cent representing other exports, partly manufactured goods.

Well, the policy of this government apparently—and the policy of both parties—is just the same so far as I can see, with the exception of last year; and honestly I take quite a bit of credit for people who were not in the government's party for last year's budget—the policy of the government I say is to impoverish the 56 per cent in order to make the 44 per cent prosperous. That is not a good national policy.

I do think that to-day Canada stands more in need of holding her people on the soil than of any other one thing. We want the people on the soil to stay there if they are getting a good return for their labour and investment, if they are having a satisfactory social, intellectual and economic life. If they are, then all is well with Canada. But that is not true. There is not any use our sitting in this comfortable chamber trying to fool ourselves with the idea that the people are staying on the land; they are not. I have not the figures under my hand, but I was reading yesterday that the public school population of Ontario in the last ten years has shifted almost wholly from rural to urban. It used to be that the vast majority of the public school children were in the country, the minority in the towns; it is the other way around now. To-day the educational system which we have in the province of Ontario—assisted by this government it is true—is draining the people from the land just as rapidly as possible, while the government spends a great deal of money on an immigration policy to bring in newcomers to settle on the land where the native born cannot o· will not stay. It is an insane policy, but I suppose one might as well save one's breath and say nothing about it.

We are simply put in the position where we cannot do anything else but move an amendment to the budget. As a matter of fact we are very glad to do so. Somebody must stand for liberal principles if the Liberal party will not. With all due respect, I would suggest that if the Liberal party really want to move along low tariff lines they had better put people in the cabinet who believe in low tariff. If they do not do that, and keep in the cabinet people who are high tariff—very excellent people, of course—it is equivalent to declaring, "We are not a low tariff party at all, we are just a branch of the Conservative party." And just now that looks to be exceedingly true. Why not say so during elections?

I want to quote what Mr. Bayard, at one time the United States ambassador to the Court of St. James, said in regard to protection:

> In my own country I have witnessed the insatiable growth of that form of state socialism styled "protection", which, I believe, has done more to foster class legislation and create inequality of fortune, to corrupt public life, to banish men of independent mind and character from the public councils, to lower the tone of national representation, blunt public conscience, create false standards in the public mind, to familiarize it with reliance on state aid and guardianship in private affairs, divorce ethics from politics, and place politics upon the low level of a mercenary scramble than any other single cause.

I regret that I am not able to stand in my place to-night and say that I agree with the whole budget. I am glad to be able to acknowledge that there are a few things in it that I do like, but they are so small as to be almost insignificant. When I remember that in this budget the Liberal party have departed from the sound basis of direct taxation for the unsound basis of indirect taxation, and that they have hidden themselves —with apparent success—behind the tariff board, I feel that I cannot give my voice in approval of the budget. Therefore, for those of us who believe in low tariff, there is nothing left for us to do but to fight for low tariff and the very many other reforms that go hand in hand with it, because, as I said before, I am not one of those who believe that low tariff is the cure-all. I think that when people get a single track mind like that—well, it seems to me they are off the track, if you know what I mean.

Mr. H. E. LAVIGUEUR (Quebec-Montmorency): First of all, Sir, I wish to congratulate you upon your reëlection as Speaker for the third term. Your reëlection by unanimous consent is certainly a great honour both to yourself and to the House of Commons of Canada. This high position you have occupied since 1921 with such dignity and impartiality that in 1926 the House unanimously reëlected you to the chair as it has done again in this the first session of another parliament.

I consider it an honour to follow the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail), the only lady in the House of Commons, although I do not share her views generally, and particularly so far as the tariff is concerned. She has told us she is absolutely in favour of a low tariff; let me assure her that neither the province from which I come nor I myself can sympathize with her in that regard. We are in favour of protection for industry; we do not believe in a low tariff.

I am glad to have an opportunity to-night to state my views on the tariff question. I am pleased to see that the budget this year contains no items of reduction.

Let me congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) on the splendid budget he has presented to parliament on this occasion. It is the right sort of budget and every business man I have met, whether Liberal or Conservative, acknowledges this. Only the other day I was speaking with one of the chief organizers of the Conservative party in the province of Quebec, and before a large company he told me that in his opinion the Robb budget this year was in every way satisfactory. He did not find anything to complain about in it. It was, he said, undoubtedly a step in the right direction. The budget this year gives us a reduction in the debt of $31,000,000 and a reduction in taxation of $27,000,000. The reduction in income tax is not as considerable as we should like to see it, and the sooner this tax disappears the better. It is one means of retarding trade and industry in this country. Certainly, however, the improvements that were effected last year, and those that we have this year, give us every reason to believe that, as soon as the finances of the country will permit, the first thing the government will do will be to reduce the income tax still further. Reductions in other directions—the business tax, sales tax, tax on cheques and promissory notes—are also welcome, and it is encouraging to think that the government has been able to effect these reductions and at the same time administer the affairs of the country as economically as they have been administered

Just a word now about the Civil Service Commission. We have heard a good deal about the commission recently and this year's estimates include a sum of $318,525 for this body. The commission costs this country an enormous amount for upkeep, and I am bound to ask myself whether it has rendered the services which we have a right to expect from it. In many instances, it is felt, the commission has not done justice and has not exercised its powers in the way they ought to have been exercised. The Civil Service Commission has control over the appointment of employees and it controls patronage. I do not believe in patronage but I certainly do think that the member who represents a riding is the best judge of the fitness of a candidate. He ought to be allowed to nominate as postmaster this or that man in the village, because he is in a better position to make the selection than are the commissioners sitting here in Ottawa. Moreover, when a member recommends a candidate for appointment he is bound to take the responsibility for his recommendation, and this being the case he must take care to see that the appointee is possessed of the proper qualifications. The function of the commission should be to examine candidates, and the head of the department, in conjunction with the representative elected by the people, should be responsible for the ultimate appointment. It seems to me that we could save three or four hundred thousand dollars by a reorganization of the Civil Service Commission, and the administration would be just as effective. I hope that steps will be taken to improve the commission by withdrawing from it certain powers which, in my opinion, experience proves the commission unfit to exercise.

I wish to place before the House once more some of the needs of the district, comprising the city of Quebec and the county of Montmorency, which I have had the honour to represent since 1917. The citizens of Quebec have been asking for some time for the construction of a roadway on the Quebec bridge, and I urge the government to grant substantial assistance towards the project. I hope they will take the question into consideration and vouchsafe that measure of assistance which the conditions justify.

I observe with pleasure that a vote of $100,000 was placed in the estimates for repairing and putting in order the quarters of the Governor General at the Quebec citadel. That old citadel, as well as the old fortifications of Quebec city, to which so many historic memories are attached, should be placed in the best possible condition so that they may be objects of pride to future generations. I take this opportunity of asking the government to grant a substantial amount towards the worthy object of restoring the old fortifications.

A few days ago I had occasion to remind the government that while they were voting millions of dollars to take up bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway belonging to people in England, they should at the same time take up the bonds subscribed by the city of Quebec for the construction of the Lake St. John railway, and a portion of the Canadian Northern now merged in the Canadian National railways. I repeat my demand on the present occasion, and I ask the government to do for the citizens of Quebec what they have done for the citizens of London, England.

The government has adopted a very wise policy in providing for the building of post offices in different places. I notice that one of my hon. friends from Prince Edward island has obtained an appropriation for this purpose. May I ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr.

Elliott) and the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) to grant the amount necessary to provide a post office in Beauportville, a municipality possessing a population of some six or seven thousand people? The necessary site for this purpose was acquired by the Public Works department some years ago. The time has now come when the money necessary to carry out this project should be made available, seeing that Beauportville is one of the most important parishes outside the limits of the city of Quebec. I would make the same demand for the municipality of Saint Grégoire de Montmorency, a rapidly growing municipality with a population of over five thousand.

I would suggest to the government that the election act be amended in some way in order that it may operate more satisfactorily than it does at present. The existing law was the cause of a great deal of misunderstanding at the last election. Everybody interpreted the act as they thought fit and great injustice was wrought. In my opinion the election law should be carefully amended so as to avoid a repetition of some of the mistakes which were witnessed in the fall of 1926.

I notice that the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) is in his seat, and I would urge that he establish a demonstration farm on the island of Orleans. This island is situated only a few miles from Quebec but agriculture flourishes in its several parishes and the people there are producing fruits of all kinds in enormous quantities. They are asking for a demonstration farm on the island, and I would urge the Minister of Agriculture, who devotes so much time to the agriculture of this country and who is always so anxious to do anything he can for this class of people, to establish a demonstration farm on the island of Orleans.

During the last year everybody has heard about the customs investigation and enormous sums of money have been spent in endeavouring to find out if smuggling is going on in Canada. What has been found out, however, was known before the investigation began. To-day I ask this government, which is desirous of economizing and which very often refuses, on grounds of economy, to vote money for demands which are most reasonable for urgent public works, if the time has not come to stop this investigation and to endeavour to find some way of putting an end to smuggling in this country. We know that smuggling has been going on, not wholly in Quebec or the port of Montreal, but on an equal basis in all provinces of the Dominion. Let us stop this extravagant expenditure and use the money in satisfying the most legitimate demands which are from time to time made upon the government.

There are in this House seventy-one French-Canadian members, including six ministers. I know that the French-Canadian element in Ontario has been asking for representation in the cabinet, and I would view with pleasure the nomination of one of our nationality to represent in the cabinet our people in Ontario. I would also like to see a seat in the Senate given to some one of French-Canadian nationality in Ontario. This would only be justice, on account of the six counties with a purely French-Canadian population in northern Ontario and six other counties the population of which is partly composed of French-Canadians. I hope that the government will take my suggestions in good part and that our brothers in Ontario may soon have the representation for which they have asked.

On motion of Mr. McGibbon the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe the House adjourned at 10.15 p.m.

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, reports of engineers or other officers, with regard to the

IMPORTATION OF SCOTCH MINERS

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour or the Minister of Immigration a question along the lines of the one which I asked on Monday last in reference to the importation of miners from Scotland into Nova Scotia by the British Empire Steel Corporation. I read in this morning's papers that the men who have come here are now asking to be returned to their country because they have been brought out here evidently under false pretences. Has the minister made any inquiries and, if so, what is the result?

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Minister of Labour): No direct grievance from the men has been brought to our attention, but from inquiries I have made through the employment bureau, I find that we have plenty of labour available in Canada for mining, and I have asked the Minister of Immigration to notify our immigration agents in the British Isles to that effect. Other than that, we have no information except what we read in the newspapers.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Along that very line, may I ask if the Labour department has no way of protecting, on the one hand, the workers who are already in this country and are in danger of having their work taken away from them by a new supply of labour, and, on the other hand, the workers who are being induced to come to this country under false pretences?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Do I understand that question is out of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Surely. It is an argument.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is a question which requires consideration, and the minister is entitled to notice. The question should be put on the order paper.

GERMAN REPARATIONS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): About ten days ago—I cannot find the exact date at the moment—the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) promised that within a week he would lay on the table a complete statement of reparation claims, and so forth. He is not in his seat, but would the leader of the House be good enough to make inquiries and expedite the tabling of this return?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I will bring my hon. friend's request to his attention.

DISTRIBUTION OF CIGARS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (Toronto West Centre): May I ask the Minister of Justice whether all these cigars that are laid on the tables are a contribution to the bonne entente with Quebec?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): All I know is that we owe these cigars to the generosity of a colleague of my hon. friend on the other side of the House.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE.

The House resumed from Tuesday, February 22, the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of ways and means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Coote.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I think that in common with many other members on this side of the House I can congratulate the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) on the fact that he has been able to present his fourth budget to the House of Commons of Canada. I would also like to congratulate him upon his method of presentation of that budget.

As to the contents of the budget, I think I can also say that I very heartily agree with some of the minor changes he has made. The reduction of the sales tax from five to four per cent is something which will be welcomed in this country; it is something which is long overdue. Had the Minister of Finance been looking after the interests of this country he would have removed the sales tax altogether from many articles, such as clothing, which contribute very materially to the high cost of living in Canada to-day. I am very sorry to say, however, that in my judgment the budget is not what the country was looking for. My greatest criticism of it, and I think this would be the criticism of the country, is that in this budget the Minister of Finance is shelving his responsibility as a minister. To-day the people of this country are looking for tariff revisions in many items. There are no less than fifty-two applications, I think, before the tariff board, seeking a revision of the tariff. Of these, thirteen have been reported on to the government, yet in his budget, brought down nine or ten days after the House reassembled, he has not considered even one of those applications. I say that it is a hardship to make these industries carry on for another ten or twelve months, and probably longer, without having the redress to which they are entitled.

But unsatisfactory as these things may be, when I look behind the Minister of Finance and see gathered there high protectionists, low protectionists, free traders and independents, I feel like adding a prayer of thankfulness to heaven for the budget we did not get. When we see behind the Minister of Finance men like the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke), and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm), all gathered into the fold of the present government and bestowing on this foster child their blessing, I wonder what state governments are coming to in this country. It may be, as Mr. Harry Sifton said a few weeks after this government was formed, in an interview which appeared in one of the Toronto papers, that the Liberal party had the halter upon nearly all the Progressive members and would have it on the remainder in a little while. I remember how, one year ago, when the late leader of this party accused the present Minister of Immigration of being a Liberal, and said he would not even shoot a rat if it was labelled Grit, the hon. gentleman rose and, white with rage, repudiated the suggestion; yet to-day what do we find? We find him sitting serenely upon the treasury benches, swallowing a policy which for years he and his party have denounced, and giving his calm support to a budget which is protectionist in principle at least. When I look at this great change that has come over the Minister of Immigration I cannot help but wonder whether the flesh pots of Egypt have had anything to do with it.

I criticise this budget under a number of heads. In the first place I say to the Minister of Finance that this budget is an evasion of his responsibilities to the people of Canada. The Minister of Finance, I want to emphasize, has been derelict in his duty to the people, especially to the industries of this country, which are looking and have been daily looking for some tariff revision at this time. I would refer him particularly to the woollen industry, which is now and has been for a number of years in dire straits due to the lack of adequate protection. I would refer him also to the boot and shoe industry, toy industry, and many others. I say that it was his duty as Minister of Finance of this country to take the needs of these industries into consideration, and provide some redress before he brought down his budget to the House.

The government have, first of all, failed to give this country proper markets, which is the great need of to-day. Wider markets is our pressing need, and the government have failed in every effort they have made to get a fair bargain for the people of Canada.

Under another head, I criticise this government for having failed to get into this country the people that we must have if we are to make progress. The immigration policy of the government, in the past and up to the present, has been and is absolutely sterile in results. We have not been able even to keep our natural increase in population. So I say to the government that they have failed in their immigration policy.

I say that they have failed also because they have made no adequate provision for retiring the national debt, and it is something that must be done before we can have real prosperity.

They have failed also in that they have done nothing to bring down the cost of living in this country, which is now at the highest point it has attained for a number of years. They have done nothing to relieve this burden upon the poor. I am going to point out to the government, and I hope they will take these facts into their consideration, the methods and means that have been employed along these lines in other countries, and the results that have been achieved. I am going to refer the Finance minister to the American republic to the south. Whether we like it or not, an easy comparison can be made between Canada and the United States. We have a larger territory than they have. We have similar lands, similar climate, similar natural resources, water-powers and everything of that description, and when we study their methods and see their results we get a fair idea and can make a proper comparison. I am going to quote, for the benefit of the Minister of Finance, a sentence from President Coolidge's address to congress in 1925, as follows:

> The collection of any taxes which are not absolutely required, which do not beyond reasonable doubt contribute to the public welfare is only a species of legalized larceny.

Along with that hypothesis I am going to tell him what the United States has done towards reducing the debt and the expenses of the republic, which is of more importance. I have in my hand statistics given by the president in an address which he made a short time ago. I find that the budget in the United States in 1919 showed $6,000,000,000 as the receipts. In 1921 that amount was reduced to $5,538,000,000, with an expenditure of $5,624,000,000. In 1922 the receipts dropped from $5,538,000,000 to $3,795,000,000 while the expenditure had dropped from $5,624,000,000 to $4,109,000,000. In 1923 there was a further reduction to $3,697,000,000; the expenditure had also dropped, and it has dropped until in 1926 the expenditure is only $3,529,000,000, almost half of what it was six years ago. Looking up the figures of the expenditure in Canada, I find that in 1922 the first year this government came into power, they collected in taxes $381,952,387, the next year $394,614,900, the following year $396,837,682, and the year following that $346,834,479. This year the minister tells us that in spite of his reductions he is going to take out of the pockets of the people of Canada some $390,000,000. Then we have the further fact, which is more significant, that the expenditure has run almost hand in hand with the taxes. As I pointed out, not only have they decreased taxation in the American republic, but the expenditure has decreased along with it. Then I point out a further fact which to my mind is going to be of considerable significance to this continent in the future. After the war, in the year 1923, the United States had a debt of $23,000,000,000, and it has been reduced yearly until twenty-five per cent of it has been paid off. The taxation has been reduced from $50 to $30 per head. The taxation in the American republic to-day is $6,000,000 a day less than at the close of the war. That is the record, and that is the example that I point out to the government to-day to follow. To my mind, before we can have real prosperity in this country the debt of the country must be reduced, and taxation must be lifted off the shoulders of the people in order that their purchasing power may be increased.

I want now to show what we have done compared with what they have done in the American republic in regard to agriculture. I find that out of $1,550,000,000 worth of goods on which duties are levied more than half are levied for the protection of agriculture. The United States farmer is protected on imports of over $700,000,000, or over fifty per cent of the imports of that country. What has been the effect of that? One effect has been to increase the prices of farm products in the American republic. I do not wish to cumber the record with the figures, because one year ago I placed on Hansard the results that were obtained after an investigation by a special committee appointed by the President of the United States into the workings of the Fordney-McCumber tariff. I placed figures on Hansard showing that practically every article of produce on the farm, including live stock, had gone up in value in a few months after the Fordney-McCumber tariff had gone into operation. I have to-day the figures of the net increase in the agricultural products of the American republic in the last five years, and I find that in 1920-1921 the net value was only something like $375,000,000, and in 1925-1926 it had risen from $375,000,000 to $2,665,000,000. I do not say that that was all due to the working of the Fordney tariff, because it was not, but I do say that it helped to increase the value of farm products for the American farmer, and it put hundreds of millions into their pockets that would not have been there if that law had not been placed on their statute books.

What has this government done for the farmers of Canada? They have left them alone with their markets almost wide open to the world. We have a duty of twelve cents on wheat where the American republic has a duty of 42 cents. We have a duty of $2 a ton on hay, where the Americans have a duty of $4, and a duty of 50 cents a barrel on flour where the United States has a duty of $2.04. Hon. members know the Australian figures as well as I do. They export their butter to Canada under a duty of a cent a pound, and let eggs come in free; whereas Australia charges 18 cents on butter, and my hon. friend tells me that twenty-five thousand boxes of butter from New Zealand arrived in Halifax this week. That is the way this government is attending to the wants of the Canadian farmer.

Now, Sir, I make this further charge—and I have proof here of it and can back it up if necessary—that this government has not made a treaty that has not been detrimental to the markets of Canada. I have the figures here from the Bureau of Statistics. I put them on Hansard last year, and my hon. friend from West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) placed them on Hansard the other day. The government has failed to retain the population in Canada, and has failed to provide the people with markets or to reduce their taxation in order to build up the country. Why have we not been able to retain our population in this country? Why, Sir, when we look over this Dominion, when we realize that we have the largest water-powers and the greatest mineral resources in the world, and that our wheat belt, our forests and our pulpwood are among the greatest in the world; and when we think of the advertising that we got during the war, Canada to-day should have a population of at least 15,000,000 or 20,000,000. Why has it not? Simply because this government has been derelict in its duty to give such protection to our industries as would allow our workingmen to earn their living at home. So I say that in every major operation this government has been found wanting; it has failed to reduce the national debt, it has failed to reduce taxation, it has failed to secure markets for our products, and it has failed not only in attracting new population but in retaining our native born. Until this condition of affairs is changed, until we get greater population, until we get wider markets and until adequate protection is given to our manufacturers and our farmers so that we can utilize our great water-powers and turn our natural resources into finished products, thus providing ample employment for our workingmen,—I say, until we do that our people are not going to reap the reward to which they are entitled.

I wish, Mr. Speaker, to compliment the Minister of Finance on the stand he has taken in providing another $500,000 for the Home Bank depositors. I think he has been fair and just in this regard, because two sessions ago, whether rightly or wrongly, parliament decided to contribute up to 35 per cent of what was needed to reimburse those unfortunate people. If I understand the matter aright, the Exchequer court has passed favourably upon a number of claims, but the amount originally granted is not sufficient to meet them.

I want to say in as forcible language as I can that the action of the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) who in dismissing postmasters who have been giving satisfactory public service at practically no cost should be severely censured. Some of these postmasters I know have been dismissed although they were drawing less than $100 a year and were giving good service to the public. Why were they dismissed? Simply because some party heeler asked for their dismissal. To my mind, whether such a course is taken by Grit or Tory, it is beneath the dignity of any man who is supposed to be big enough to be the Postmaster General of Canada. But presumably the Postmaster General was too intimately and too long associated with Moses Aziz to be capable of a national viewpoint. So far as I am concerned I want to register my emphatic condemnation of his conduct.

In conclusion, Sir, now that the Minister of Finance is freed from the shackles that hampered him and his government in the preceding parliament by the substantial majority now seated on your right, I am going to ask him to bring down, not this session because it is too late, but next session, a policy that will give the people of the Dominion a chance to remain here. If a proper policy is formulated, a policy that will enable our people to use our great water-powers and develop our immense natural resources to the fullest extent, I believe that in the next few years Canada will become one of the greatest countries upon which the sun ever shone.

Mr. THOMAS McMILLAN (South Huron): Mr. Speaker, my first expression must be one of congratulation to the hon. Minister of Finance upon his tact and shrewdness in bringing down his budget within ten days after the reassembling of parliament. This shows that he, at least, has no desire to prolong the session to any undue length. I congratulate him also on the clear, concise and optimistic statement which he has presented to this House and to the country.

Mr. HOCKEN: And a stable tariff.

Mr. McMILLAN: We have heard a good deal about a stable tariff from across the way. Before I get through possibly my friends of the Progressive party may exclaim, "Why don't you come across here! We are the only Simon-pure representatives of agriculture in this country." Allow me to say, as I have often said, I do not believe any great political party can ever be successfully established and permanently maintained in this Dominion on any class or sectional foundation. And it is not in the public interest that it should be so. While farmers should organize and coöperate socially, economically and otherwise, as other classes do, yet, Sir, when we enter the political field I believe we should enter it as citizens of our country, rather than as members of any particular class. I may be told by my friends that they are not a party and have no intention of becoming a party; that they are only a group and believe in group government. Well, I am not going to discuss that matter at present further than to say if we cannot agree, we must agree to differ. I am not in favour of group government. Not because such a system may not contain men and women of probity, of wisdom and of character, but because I know—if I have read history aright, and if we are to be guided by the teachings of history—that we have long since passed that stage in the onward march of human progress.

I may tell hon. gentlemen opposite when I hear them harping continually, for high and higher protection, that that is not the mandate which the electorate gave on September 14 last. We hear much respecting industry and as to what ought to be done to protect it. When we speak of industry I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, and through you the members of this House, to consider what is our greatest industry. Is it not the pursuit of agriculture? In the full sense of the term farmers are more than a class of our population; farming is more than an industry. The significance of agriculture in the life of this nation is far deeper than this. Employing as it does about one-third of our gainfully occupied population, it touches something really vital and fundamental in the national existence. It involves the national prosperity, the economic welfare, the racial character and the social progress of the Canadian people. We must as a people determine deliberately and wisely the role which we wish to have agriculture play in our national economic life. As city population has grown and its economic life has become centered in the factory, the office, the store, and the bank, public opinion has become somewhat urbanized and popular attention concentrated more and more upon problems of city industry, trade and finance. This has been so to the comparative neglect and the comparative detriment of the requirements of agriculture.

It has been said that as agriculture is the oldest of the arts, so it is one of the most recent of the sciences. A perfect agriculture is the true foundation of trade and commerce; the foundation of the riches of the state. It is more, it is the one great uncontaminated seed bed of our population. It is therefore the business of public men to see to it that agriculture receives just consideration at the hands of the governments of this country. You may ask me, wherein is agriculture not receiving economic justice? I refer you at once to a study of the customs tariff in which we find that at almost every convenient turn those engaged in other lines of industry are able to obtain their requirements either free or at the lowest possible rates of duty. That is right; we have no fault whatever to find with that provision. But why should agriculturists be deprived of this privilege which producers in various other industries are allowed to enjoy? Farming is largely a domestic industry in that it produces many of the requirements of the home. It is peculiarly situated in this country. While those engaged in other lines of industrial activity are enabled largely to buy wholesale and sell retail, the farmer in many instances is compelled to buy retail and sell wholesale, and the tariff does not do justice to him. Take agricultural implements, machinery, building materials, food, clothing and other household requirements: these comprise over 60 per cent of the entire cost of our agricultural life. It is to the credit of the government of the day that in regard to implements and machinery we have been enabled to get some of our requirements down so low that the tariff is no longer a great consideration in the price of these necessities. But, Sir, when we have some of the industries which are vital to the success of the country, such as those represented by my hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Goodison), down to from 6 to 10 per cent, and when men like Henry Ford are crying out and telling us that they would be satisfied with free trade, why should the people of Canada be compelled to submit to a tariff of from 25 to 35 per cent which bears down on the primary producers as well as upon the consumers? Why are such regulations so drawn? Mark you, this is not to be attributed to the government of the day; it is due to the fact that all through the years, to too great a degree, the favoured industries of the country have enjoyed a special privilege and have had the ear of the governments which have been in office from time to time. Why is it that these regulations are so drawn, I ask? Simply to benefit special industries at the expense of the primary producers and the great body of the country's consumers. If agriculture is ever to prosper as it should, and as I believe it can be made to prosper, this sort of thing must stop; if not, then the efforts of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) and of the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) in their respective departments will be futile. They may work their heads off for the comparative economic welfare of the farmer on the one hand, and for the retention of the people on the soil on the other, and it will be all of little avail. The great bulk of the people of Canada are beginning to realize this: they are no longer terrified by the bunk which we have heard all through the years from our high protectionist friends. Well may we pray, "Let in the light." And that is what this tariff board is doing. As the result of its investigation the light is beginning to shine to such a degree that it is piercing the true situation and exposing it.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It has not reached the government yet.

Mr. McMILLAN: It is, I say, exposing the situation, so much so that I believe in the near future there will be a general demand to have this economic evil hit and hit hard. It is a species of economic slavery which we have had to endure too long. My hon. friend (Mr. Chaplin) says that the light has not yet reached the government. Why does he make such a remark? Does he think that this government, in a year in which it has been making history, in a year in which liberalism has been doing things which will go down to posterity as constituting one of the brightest pages in our political life,—does he think that in the strenuous life of our honoured leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his first lieutenant, the government should be expected to turn its attention to player piano rolls, epsom salts, and blue foxes? That is the only inference possible from his remarks. When I said that this high tariff was a species of economic slavery, it calls to mind the resolution made by Abraham Lincoln when standing on the banks of the southern Mississippi and viewing the dreadful conditions of human slavery. He then made a vow that if he ever had the chance to hit that kind of thing he would hit it hard.

Mr. HOCKEN: But he was a protectionist.

Mr. McMILLAN: This tariff burden which was placed on the primary producers by our Conservative friends and their friends in the days gone by is the result, and should be done away with. We hear much talk of the condition of the people of the United States; I was rather glad to hear that mentioned this afternoon, because while agriculture in this country does not approach the condition of American agriculture which is largely due to the high tariff system of that country over a long period of years, yet we should do everything humanly possible to save Canadian agriculture from any such condition.

Last year I made some startling statements regarding American agriculture, so startling that in the interval I decided I would either substantiate them or make amends by withdrawing them this year. I hold in my hand the latest publication on the agricultural problem of the United States, issued in April, 1926, and published as the result of the findings of the National Industrial Conference Board of that country. In as few words as possible I would like to place the condition of American agriculture before this House, as it is recorded in this report. The American farm population in 1920 is placed at 31,614,000, in round figures; five years later, the Board of Agriculture places it at 30,655,000, or a decline of almost 1,000,000 in that period; during the same time the entire population of the United States increased by over 10,000,000. The personal indebtedness of American farmers has risen from one thousand million dollars in 1910 to 3,250 millions in 1925, including only bank indebtedness; in addition to this, the miscellaneous indebtedness of farm operators as of July, 1925 is put at an additional $500,000,000. During that same period, from 1920 to 1925, the entire capital invested in American agriculture, including land, implements, buildings and live stock, dropped from $79,607,000,000, to $59,154,000,000, while the total indebtedness including mortgage, bank and miscellaneous, remained at the figure of $12,250,000,000, or 20.7 per cent of the entire agricultural value, and it takes 6.2 per cent of the entire gross income of the American farmer to pay the interest. During these five years the interest charged upon the owner-operators' debt not only required 1.2 per cent more of the gross income, but his equity in his property declined from 47 billions to 32 billions; during the same time the owners of rented farms appear to have lost five and three-quarter billions of the equities in their property. The final result is that forty per cent of the land in the American republic is now in the hands of renters, a most unsatisfactory condition, while the other 60 per cent is mortgaged to over forty per cent of its value. Of young farmers twenty-five years of age and under only ten per cent own their own farms free from encumbrance.

Mr. McMILLAN: My friends laugh at that; that is what they think of agriculture, and that is the reason they have tried to laugh at it all during the years they were in power. More than that, when their friends were in power they continually tried to get more favours and then walked away in all their manhood and called this a scientific tariff. Of the farmers sixty-five years of age and over, only 64 per cent own their farms free from encumbrance. What are the reasons for this condition and for the wholesale desertion of American farms? Another interesting fact is that the per capita production of crops in the United States, which during 1910-14 stood at the index figure of 100, in 1921-25 dropped to 93.2, or a reduction of 6.8 per cent. The report presents figures to show that the real net annual earnings of American farmers in 1925 were 3 per cent below the level of 1914, while those engaged in other lines of employment earned 22 per cent more. In 1924-25, the most favourable year of the five year period, the net earnings of the average farm operators, including owners and tenants, is placed at $804. This figure includes food, fuel and shelter, which the Department of Agriculture values at $634, leaving only $170 for other requirements. The report goes on further to say that the owner-farmer appears to have been in a less favourable position than the average; his net return was only $573, or less than the value of his food, fuel and shelter, in fact only about the amount they are paying their hired labour and less than one-half the amount earned by ordinary workers in other occupations. These figures are the most favourable that can be secured from the available data, and they go far to explain the exodus from United States farms since 1920 and the unrest of the American agricultural community. They show that the average owner operator is able to earn less than two per cent on his investment. He is receiving for labour and superintendence about the wages of the average office boy, less than one-half of the wages of railway workers and less than one-third of the wages of skilled mechanics such as plumbers and electricians. During the last fifteen years farm bankruptcies in that country have increased over 1,000 per cent. In spite of the much vaunted era of prosperity there which my hon. friend (Mr. McGibbon) told us about, the plight of the United States farmer is much as it was when the post-war depression set in. So serious is the situation that in the language of Mr. Evans Clark, writing in the New York Times:

> It constitutes a serious menace to the future economic welfare of the country. In the midst of an era of prosperity for trade and industry which has made the United States a croesus among nations, says the writer, the American farmer stands on the edge of bankruptcy, the bubble of his values burst. The manufacturers, the bankers, the railroad men, the mine owners of America, have reached a dizzy pinnacle of financial well-being. The industrial and transportation wage workers never had more money to spend. But the American farmer, one-third of the country's population, is worse off than he ever was before. Not only is be unable to make a decent living on the farm, but he cannot sell his property without serious financial loss. Farm failures have reached record breaking levels and the general collapse of agricultural values has brought down with it a growing number of banks in the middle west.

That is the history of United States farm conditions in a highly protected country, and I say again, as I said at the commencement of these figures, that while Canadian agriculture does not approach such a condition, it is the duty of every government to do everything possible to save it from any such calamity.

Mr. HOCKEN: Why are United States farmers protectionists?

Mr. McMILLAN: I am glad my hon. friend brought up that point. Just a few days ago the McNary-Haugen bill received its final reading in the United States Senate, setting apart amongst other things $250,000,000 to purchase the surplus of six staple farm products in that country in order to stabilize the price. It was carried by a majority of either seven or eight, about the same majority as it was defeated by last year.

Mr. HOCKEN: That does not answer my question.

Mr. McMILLAN: Just wait. Take your time. A few of the men who defeated the bill last year voted for it this year, and I believe in my heart there is method in their madness. They see a presidential election two years ahead, and feel that this is the last straw in the last effort of the high protectionists of that country to hand out a sop as a recompense for the miseries of the farmers as a result of the highly protective system in that country. If you are watching conditions throughout the United States republic you cannot say that the farmers of that country are strongly in favour of a high protective system. Although I happened to say to my desk-mate the other day that I believe the McNary-Haugen bill would be passed and it would be the last straw, the latest reports are that President Coolidge will refuse to sign it. I understand it has not come before him yet.

Mr. HOCKEN: Why is it that the farmers in the United States, suffering as my hon. friend says they are, because of protection, are not asking for free trade?

Mr. McMILLAN: Let my hon. friend take my word for this. I am neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet, but if in two years we do not see the most strenuous fight in the United States republic for a reduced tariff, I am very far mistaken; and that will show the wisdom of which they are possessed.

Mr. HOCKEN: That is a prophecy, not a fact.

Mr. McMILLAN: My hon. friend has often been in the habit of making prophecies and he has many times made prophecies that have not turned out true.

Mr. HOCKEN: Well, we are both in the same boat.

Mr. McMILLAN: It is now realized that the great requirement of this country is to get more people, and particularly to obtain and retain more people on the soil. Our government insists that only agriculturists and domestics shall be encouraged to come to this country. To too great a degree under present conditions the farm has been only a roundabout way for them to get into the towns and cities. Do not think for one moment that it was the efforts of the Liberal government that sent the people of this country to the United States between 1878 and 1891.

Mr. HOCKEN: That is a long time ago.

Mr. McMILLAN: Yes, but that was when the trek started, as a result of high protection being put into force. One or two elections went by; but when the first ten-year period came between 1881 and 1891, what did it record? It recorded that although 860,000 people had come to this country as immigrants, only 36,000 of them remained, and that over and above that, 980,000 of our Canadians had found their homes across the line.

Mr. BIRD: Would the hon. gentleman go a little further in regard to the scope of the McNary-Haugen bill?

Mr. McMILLAN: Not at this time. Those figures are the result of a highly protective system, and when the people of this country began to realize what effect it had, in 1896 they consigned the Conservative government to the oblivion from which it should never have emerged. Even at the present time we are suffering from the effects of its having so emerged.

Mr. HOCKEN: Were things better under Sir Wilfrid Laurier?

Mr. McMILLAN: My hon. friend does not seem to realize that the period under the Laurier government was the golden period of development in this country, and that when Laurier went out of power in 1911 after fifteen years of rule he increased the ordinary expenditure of this country by less than $4,000,000 per annum, whereas the political friends of my hon. friend opposite had not been in power for three years before they had increased the ordinary expenditure by $37,500,000—to such a degree that even the press of their own party all over this country were crying out, "Extravagance! Extravagance!" That was even before the war. God help the administration during the war.

If the government and the people of this country can only cause the farm boy and people generally to realize that there is a sufficient margin of profit on the farm, you will not be able to keep the people off the farm; they will be falling over each other to get there. High protection will never keep them on the farm. High protection to too great a degree is what has taken them off the farm. It took the people off the American farms to the number of 479,000 in 1925 alone.

Mr. IRVINE: Why do you not lower the tariff then?

Mr. McMILLAN: This government, since it came into power in 1921, under the conditions it has had to face has done everything that any government could be expected to do along that line. It did everything it could to get us free access into the world's best market for our surplus agricultural production. True, we have not been able to secure satisfactory access to the American market, although that is to-day, and will continue to be, the world's best market for our agricultural production, but there is this satisfaction: we have at all events completed the first milestone by the establishment of the position, and the appointment of the Hon. Vincent Massey thereto, as representative of this government to the government of the United States. I believe I voice the sentiments of the great majority of the people of this country when I say that that was a wise appointment, like the appointment of the Hon. P. C. Larkin to the post of Canadian High Commissioner in London, and I believe the Hon. Vincent Massey will make a record for himself of which this country may well be proud. He has the opportunity, and more than that, he has a friendly government behind him to back him up in any efforts which he may make. We know that if Canada only had the benefit of freer trade relations with the United States it would be of wonderful assistance to the farmers of this country, not only to the live stock men, but to all sections of our country. While we defeated the reciprocity agreement in 1911, yet during that same year the American government put cattle on the free list with a nominal tax of one-quarter of a cent a pound on fresh beef, and that continued for eleven years. In 1915 they opened their markets to our Canadian cattle and to our fresh beef. As the result of free access into that great market our trade grew to such an extent that it reached a wonderful volume during the last two years, 1919 and 1920.

In 1919 we shipped 303,000 cattle, valued at $29,857,000; in 1920, 500,000 head, valued at $42,995,000. Compare those figures with our trade to the British market, of which we were all so proud. For the year ending March 31, 1926, we shipped to Britain 117,000 cattle, valued at $12,432,000. During that same year, in the face of the high tariff wall when it cost two cents a pound to get into the American market, we sent 290,000 cattle, valued at $17,813,000. If we had only been able to hold that market up to the present time it would have made a wonderful difference to the live stock farmers of Canada. Consider the prices—and these are taken from the official returns, the Canadian Monthly Bulletin of Agricultural Statistics. It shows that the prices in July, 1926, were as follows: Toronto, $7.96 per hundred pounds; Chicago, $10,13. Now I will just give you the spread during the different months: July, $2.17; August, $2.34; September, $3.57; October, $4.06; November, $5.52. I have not the figures for December. The figures for January, 1927, taken from the daily press, show a spread of from $4.50 to $5 per hundred pounds. In those five years, between 1915 and 1920, I was able to get in my own barnyard within fifty cents per hundred pounds of the highest quotations on the Chicago market. If we were able to get a spread of only $2 per hundred pounds, and it averages between $3 and $4, it would be a godsend to the live stock industry of Canada.

We are often told—we were told by the new leader of the opposition, in the debate on the address in December last—that the United State would not take from Canada her annually recurring agricultural crops. What are the facts? During the two months, October and November, 1926, the total export of our agricultural products over the high tariff wall of the United States amounted in value to $17,390,000, and for November and December, $24,000,000, even jumping over that high tariff wall. During the twelve months ending March 31, 1926, Canada exported to the United States agricultural and vegetable products, animal and animal products to the value of $129,000,000. During the same twelve months we imported from the United States $131,000,000 worth, showing a mutually beneficial trade. During the same twelve months our imports from the United States of a kind grown in Canada amounted to $65,000,000. During the same period our exports of farm products of the same kind to the United States amounted to $105,000,000. In other words, we exported $40,000,000 more than we imported. Of farm products of a kind not grown in Canada, during the financial year ending March 31, 1926—and these figures were put on Hansard yesterday—we imported from the United States $131,826,562. When such a business is done in the face of a high tariff wall we might well imagine what the trade would be if those handicaps were removed. In the face of such figures, when the hon. member talks about no trade and that they will not take any of our products, we do not take him seriously. I am sorry the hon. member has left the chamber, but I can well remember, and it is not so long ago, when the hon. gentleman came up to my own constituency and held forth in eloquent terms in favour of reciprocal relations with the American people, I can well remember also that at the close of that particular meeting he grew so enthusiastic over the argument which he considered that I as a humble citizen was able to put up, that he fairly pleaded with me to come down to his constituency and help him in his campaign. I went and he was elected, but it was Liberals who elected him then. It is Tories now. Since that time I have not changed my opinion regarding reciprocal trade relations with those two countries. Neither have I changed my opinion with respect to the principles of Liberalism, or as to the duty which Liberals owe to this young country. Therefore you will be surprised when I tell you that I was amazed to hear that on a more recent occasion he returned and told his audience that he could not understand what kind of conscience the member for Huron had when he would come down to Ottawa and support the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King the way he was doing. Seeing it has become a matter of conscience, Mr. Speaker, the time is now ripe for a full and free confession, and if I might make a suggestion, we might possibly be able to bring in some sort of revival budget. The hon. member might inform us just how and why his radical change of mind and heart has come about.

I am sorry the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) is not in his seat, but hon. gentlemen will remember what he told us the other day, that we must not establish a channel of trade with the American people; they are our commercial enemies. What is the situation? The great advantage of more favourable trade relations with that country are so clear, so apparent, so self-evident, that it is a surprise that any reasonable individual would take any other stand. Let us analyse the conditions between these two countries. Here we are, two friendly nations, not commercial enemies but commercial friends.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Hear, hear.

Mr. McMILLAN: Trade is not an enemy, but a friend. Here are two friendly nations, lying beside each other, with not a barrier, not a military obstruction over the whole course of the boundary line. Nor is there any financial barrier between us. There is invested in this country upwards of $3,000,000,000 of American capital, which is flowing into Canada at the rate of $200,000,000 a year; we are told that upwards of $150,000,000 came in last year by way of American tourist traffic alone. And yet the hon. member for West Calgary tells us we must not establish a channel of communication in trade with the American people. In the face of the fact that out of an entire trade for the twelve months ended November, 1926, of $2,324,000,000, almost one-half, or $1,148,000,000, is done with our friends across the American boundary line. When that is the case, with two high tariff walls built up by these respective governments, what would be the situation if those walls were lowered to a very reasonable height? So that I feel it is the duty of this government, more particularly in view of the report of the maritime claims commission, which has urged the government to institute trade agreements with the American government in the matter of forest products from New Brunswick and fisheries products from Nova Scotia and the Atlantic coast, to include the whole farm products of Canada. It would not only be of benefit in live stock, but it would be a boon to the Canadian fruit and vegetable growers. It would be the means of solving the maritime problem overnight. The same benefit would accrue to British Columbia. It would break down one barrier to their success which is the absence of a sufficient market.

We know that Canadian fruit and vegetables are comparatively late in maturing. The market opens in cities like New York and Boston early in the season, with vegetables coming from Florida. As the months go by they are supplied from nearer sources. In June and July they are supplied from their own locality and there is no competition to speak of. The trade is complimentary rather than competitive. It would be the same if these economic restrictions were removed. Canada is in the situation of being able to produce better products, because we know it is a maxim in every country that the further north you can mature products the better their quality, and we would be able in the latter part of the season to supply the American market, which would give higher prices to our fruit and vegetable growers. The vegetable growers are now sending much more to the American market than we are bringing from that country, so that I say it would be a benefit all round.

Mr. GOTT: I ask the hon. member his authority for the statement that the Canadian farmer is sending more goods to the United States than we are importing from the United States?

Mr. McMILLAN: The following are the figures for the year ending March 31, 1926: On fresh vegetables the imports from the United States were $3,815,159 and the exports were $6,193,518. With respect, not only to fruit and vegetables but also live stock we should have free access to that market, and if a democratic president were elected in the American republic the door would be open to us. With a Conservative government, we could not expect the door to be open to us for the establishing of favourable trade relations from which this country would benefit. We cannot reasonably expect that a Conservative government would really consider the true interests of Canadian agriculture. Conservative governments and leaders of the Conservative party in the past have never shown any pronounced desire to take care of the basic industry of agriculture. They have always been too busy looking after their friends, the representatives of the big interests, and on each recurring appeal to the electorate they counted on the lack of interest and of information among the people and the heat of party feeling to tide them over. That day has gone by. They can no longer terrify the electors with their high-protectionist arguments. Our people are beginning to think for themselves, and they feel as they expressed themselves on September 14 last, that so long as the Liberal party manifests a real, live, vigorous, progressive policy, this young country cannot afford to drop back under Conservative domination.

The Liberal party was returned to power at the recent general election for two reasons. First, because the people know that the Liberal party has as its leader one who is a real friend of the common people, a leader who in the face of all the epithet, slander and falsehood which was hurled against him and his brilliant leading lieutenant was able to conduct his compaign and place the public issues before the country in such a convincing and masterly way as not only to arrest the attention but to command the confidence and support of the electorate. Secondly, the Liberal party was returned to power because during its brief regime in the last parliament it did not forget the primary producers and the general consumers—the men and women who do not importune tariff boards and ministers with deputations, not because they are not vitally interested, but because in the general nature of affairs they cannot afford to do that kind of thing; it must be done for them. I am satisfied from the record of the past that I voice the feeling of the government of the day when I say they are entitled, more particularly after two years of such strenuous conditions, to receive reasonable consideration, and in due time when the information can be presented the government will carry out the mandate given by the people last September. The golden opportunity for the government to act has come.

The Dominion enjoys comparatively good times. This is the only occasion when tariff adjustments can be properly made, and if that is done—as I believe it will be—agriculture will be given simple justice under our tariff laws. Agriculture asks no favours, it asks no protection. All it wants is a fair field and no favour, and if given that the cost of production of the necessaries of life will be substantially reduced, the purchasing power of the people will be correspondingly enlarged, and as a consequence they will enjoy a degree of prosperity such as they have never experienced.

Now I have under my hand the information which the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Gott) asked me for:

Total value of exports to the United States of Farm Products such as are produced on Canadian Farms

$83,000,000	$76,000,000	$105,000,000

Total Imports of these Products from the United States

$63,000,000	$57,000,000	$61,000,000

Favourable Canadian Balance of Trade

$19,000,000	$18,000,000	$43,000,000

I have given the round figures. But I think this is not entirely the question which the hon. gentleman asked. He inquired particularly about vegetable products, did he not?

Mr. GOTT: That is what the hon. gentleman was speaking of. I hold in my hand a return in reference to that, which is the reason why I put my question.

Mr. McMILLAN: For vegetables?

Mr. GOTT: All kinds of farm products.

Mr. McMILLAN: These figures relate to all kinds and are already on Hansard. The information was given to-day.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, allow me to say that I believe the Liberal government will in the future as it has in the past do its duty not only to the great producing classes of this country and to the general consumers, but also will endeavour in so far as possible to do justice to all sections of the people.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, when I came into the House I was interested to hear the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. McMillan) make some criticisms of group organization. His remarks, I believe, were pointed towards the group to which I have the honour to belong. His speech has been made very largely, if not entirely, in support of the agricultural interests of Canada. He no doubt has the honour of representing an agricultural constituency, and therefore he is absolutely in order in taking that stand. That is also the stand we take; we believe in representing the viewpoint of our respective constituencies. But he criticises the stand we take in regard to our organization. I do not suppose there has been presented to this House since 1921 a budget that will give as little relief to the agricultural interests as this particular budget does. That being so, I cannot imagine how the hon. member will be able to stand in his place—probably to-morrow night—and support this budget. Yet when the vote comes I have not the slightest doubt that he will do so.

Mr. McMILLAN: There is no question of it. If I did not make it clear enough I want to do so now.

Mr. SPENCER: If the hon. gentleman, whom I hold in the highest esteem, cares to come across to this side we will at least give him his freedom.

The budget, Mr. Speaker, is one over which there will be very little controversy as far as the two larger groups in this House are concerned, mainly because it is a very conservative budget and naturally will be supported by the members of the group holding that name. It is not a liberal budget, with a small "l", and yet no doubt it will be supported by every single member to your right, Sir, because it reflects the government's policy. I wish, however, to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) on the very businesslike and concise way in which he presented the budget to the House. As the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) remarked the other day, however, the budget probably was a little too concise as there were many things that should have been mentioned in it which were not referred to at all. The minister is to be congratulated upon being in office at a time when Canadian trade happens to be on the upward trend. I say that, because I contend that governments have very little to do with trade; trade will boom or be depressed irrespective of the government which is in power. I was glad to see that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) made a similar statement the other day. This would not be the case, however, if the government exercised its prerogative in regard to our monetary system.

I want to refer for a moment to the Finance Act of 1923, section 2 of which reads:

> The Minister of Finance may make advances to the chartered banks, and to the savings banks, to which the Quebec Savings Bank Act of 1913 applies, by the issue of Dominion notes upon the pledge of securities hereinafter mentioned:
> (a) Treasury bills, bonds, debentures, or stocks of the Dominion government, the United Kingdom, any province of Canada, and of any British possession.

And so forth. This discounting by the Canadian banks is carried on to-day to such an extent that the banks have discounted securities through the Treasury board since July 1 last to the amount of $123,850,000. For these services the government makes a charge of 4½ per cent. You will notice that some of the securities that can be lodged with the Treasury board are treasury bills, bonds, debentures or stocks of the Dominion of Canada. If the Treasury board can discount these securities for private institutions, the Canadian banks, why cannot they do the same for the Dominion?

I am one of a growing number who believe that inasmuch as the government has supreme power over all assets of the country on which credit or money is based it should be its own banker. The government should loan and not borrow. In other words, we should be master in our own house. At present we do not exercise that function.

The Minister of Finance early in his remarks on the budget mentioned the fact that money was plentiful. That being so, and in view of the fact that we have been fortunate enough to have a surplus, I should like to submit certain suggestions to the government with regard to federal assistance of highways. This is of particular interest to the province of Alberta for various reasons. We have as you know, a big development in southern Alberta in the oil field, in regard to which I have a few particulars, which, because of their importance I should like to bring to the attention of the government and of the House. I refer to the case of the Turner Valley oil field which is situated twenty miles west of Okotoks, which is the nearest point on the railway. Over two years ago, what is known as the Royalite well No. 4 was brought in with such a high pressure of wet gas that the well could not be capped. This well has been producing ever since, averaging nearly 600 barrels of naphtha per day. At that time all this naphtha had to be handled in steel drums and hauled over a country road twenty miles to Okotoks. The mineral rights in Alberta are not taxable owing to the fact that the federal government about three years ago disallowed the Alberta Mineral Tax Act. I want the government to note this particularly, because it was through the action of this House that the province of Alberta was prevented from securing a revenue in this direction. I would remind the House therefore of the expenditures that have been forced upon that province.

The assessment roll of the rural municipality in which this district is situated was not increased by a dollar as a result of this oil discovery, although there was immediately thrust upon the municipality the burden of keeping this road in repair. Not only was this quantity of oil hauled out, but all the material for about fifty new oil derricks and well drilling rigs had to be hauled over this road. When application was made to the federal government for assistance for this municipality, their reply was to this effect:

> The building and maintenance of provincial highways is altogether the responsibility of the provincial government. The granting of federal assistance in any one case would create a precedent that would be bound to prove embarrassing and costly.

The provincial government received no revenue from this oil discovery and yet they had finally to come to the assistance of the municipality. I would call the attention of the government to the fact that we have great prospects of a similar oil industry being developed in the constituency of Battle River north of Wainwright and Ribstone, which industry in a very few years will, we trust, attain equal proportions. We shall then be faced with exactly the same problem of this huge cost of road making.

The Canada Highways Act was passed in 1919 for the following purposes: (1) To encourage the construction and improvement of highways; (2) it provided for the payment of grants to the provinces to an amount of $20,000,000 over a period of five years; (3) it was extended to 1927. The sums paid or authorized to be paid totalled $18,429,107.73, of which Alberta received $625,959.94. Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, and I believe, one other province, have still some funds available from the $20,000,000, provided it is earned before the act expires on March 1, 1928.

There should be an amendment to the act to provide for the continuance of highways construction, and I sincerely hope that the government will give their favourable consideration to this matter, because it means a great deal to the province to which I have the honour to belong.

There are other reasons why the grant should be given to the provinces. Many of the parks are situated in Alberta and it is necessary to have good roads leading to them; and inasmuch as the federal government has the absolute right to send new settlers in great numbers to the provinces, very often settling them in localities where there are no good travelling roads, the provincial government is forced to assume a liability in connection with road construction notwithstanding that they have no say with regard to federal immigration.

Referring back for a moment to the statement of the Minister of Finance that money was plentiful, I wondered at the time what was his impression of money, because the opinions of people vary a good deal on the meaning of that word. I would quote a well-known authority on that question in the person of Right Hon. Reginald McKenna, Ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer of Great Britain. He says:

> The amount of money in existence varies annually with the action of the banks in increasing or diminishing deposits. We know how this is effected: Every bank loan creates a deposit, and every re-payment of a bank loan destroys one.

Again in this connection I would quote from Elements of Banking, by H. D. MacLeod, where the following language appears:

> The essential and distinctive feature of a "bank" and "a banker" is to issue credit payable on demand, and this credit may be put into circulation—and serve as money.

Another equally good statement by the same author is as follows:

> When it is said that a great London joint stock bank has perhaps £25,000,000 of deposits, it is almost universally believed that it has £25,000,000 of actual money to lend out, as it is erroneously called. . . . It is a complete and entire delusion. These "deposits" are not "deposits" in cash at all; they are nothing but an enormous superstructure of credit.

Money should be a means of exchange, or good's tickets, to enable goods to be transferred from the producer to the consumer. Unfortunately to-day money is looked upon as a commodity, and those who are in control of it necessarily find it worth while to make that commodity scarce, because in that way it brings more profits to them. I might further quote from Henry Ford's My Life and Work, wherein he says:

> The poverty of the world is seldom caused by a lack of goods, but by a money stringency.

That is something we must recognize to-day; the problem of production is solved, and the problem now before us is one of consumption.

I was very glad to hear some of the suggestions made by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) with regard to refunding our national debt, and I was pleased to see in the daily paper the next day the following statement, with which I fully agree:

> The plan submitted by Mr. Bennett would have many advantages. It would help to save Canada from passing into the hands of foreign money lenders. Conversion loans would be arranged in Canada instead of in New York. Intelligent use would be made of the Treasury board. Purchasing power would be retained in Canada, instead of being shipped abroad as interest payments. It would relieve the government of paying heavy commissions to private dealers in financial credit. As much as $2,500,000,000 is taken as commission on a loan of $100,000,000.

If the minister does not care to give consideration to what he may consider a radical suggestion, from a Conservative member, I hope he will at least study the very orthodox recommendation brought forward by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), which I have advocated in this House on more than one occasion. His suggestion was that we should increase the number of our post office savings branches throughout the Dominion and pay say from 3½ per cent to 4 per cent interest; in that way I am absolutely sure that with the guarantee the people know to be behind the savings collected by the Post Office Department, he would get all the money necessary to meet his coming obligations.

Needless to say, Mr. Speaker, all Canadians will be pleased to learn that we are making a start in the reduction of our national debt. We are told by the Minister of Finance that during the last four years we have been able to make a reduction of $95,000,000, and I believe this will also cover the last six years because if I remember correctly there was a deficit in the two former years. If these figures are correct, with our national debt of some $2,500,000,000, we may look forward to the day 150 years from now when that debt will be wiped off! With regard to the customs duties, I notice that last year they amounted to some $14,000,000 more than the year before. Such an increase will not be appreciated by those who realize that an increase in the customs duties is an increase in the cost of living. This will be felt particularly by the family men who are handicapped by the extra they have to pay for the housing, clothing and food of their families. I particularly regret, also, that no reduction in the tariff has been suggested or recommended by the minister in the present budget. I had hoped that he would make some reductions in the necessities such as footwear, clothing, and kitchen utensils, but this has not been done. For whatever the tariff may be, it is a license to steal to that extent, and in saying that I am using no stronger language than was used by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in dealing with the same subject.

All I have to say with regard to the stamp tax is that I appreciate very much the elimination of the tax on overdrafts, which was a tax on debt. But in reducing to two cents the stamp tax on cheques over $10 the minister has released the moneyed man who makes his cheques for very large amounts, which is a very direct benefit to those who can better afford to pay such taxes. I appreciate the cut in the sales tax, however; that is something which should help a little in reducing the cost of living. Probably the greatest criticism I would make is to deprecate a tendency on the part of the Minister of Finance to favour indirect taxation as against direct taxation. This is the more surprising because I surmise that the majority of the members on the government side of the House owe their seats to the fact that the people of this country expected further cuts in the tariff. In view of the fact that the income tax as it formerly was, did not penalize men of small incomes or wage earners, the cut made will directly benefit those people who can afford to pay such a tax. This cut means that the revenue will be reduced and the deficiency will have to be made up from those people who cannot well afford to meet the amount.

The minister reminded the House that under the revaluation of live stock, et cetera, to the soldier settlers, we had to meet the amount of $2,900,000. I am not complaining of that. I think further cuts will have to be made. But I would like to point out the fallacy of the whole scheme. In my opinion it was not a soldier settlement scheme, it was a land settlement scheme. So little did those who promoted the scheme in the first place realize the economic conditions of the farmer that they encouraged a number of soldiers to go on the land to their detriment. This scheme is going to be a tremendous loss to the country before we are finished with it. Certain rebates have been made; certain others will have to be considered. I am making no comments on that because I know the condition of the soldier farmers; but if it was not a land settlement scheme, I want to ask: Why were the rest of the soldiers who preferred to go into some other kind of business not given some help in a financial way?

With regard to tax-free bonds that the minister informed the House were coming due to the extent of $63,000,000 and which he said he would have to renew this year, he did not tell the House whether he intended to renew these exempt from taxation or whether they would be taxed.

Mr. ROBB: The policy is that bond issues will be taxable.

Mr. SPENCER: I am glad to hear the minister make that statement. I was also pleased to hear the minister's observation in connection with the statement that had been offered to the public, regarding governor general's warrants, and that there was in this way no saving in government financing.

I have heard some criticism from our friends to the right of the fact that our imports have increased at a greater rate than our exports. In my opinion that is nothing to be worried about. Imports, when all is said and done, are payments for our exports. The fact that we have $228,000,000 of a favourable balance means, if I understand it, that we owe large amounts in interest, etc., to other countries. Some hon. members would encourage exports to get rid of our goods. Others would bring in settlers to consume our surplus goods. Neither of these schemes is essentially correct. If the present population had the proper consuming power which, I hope, some day it will be made possible for it to have, we could, in this country, as we are, consume huge quantities more than we can purchase at the present time.

We were told that some fifty-two cases had been brought before the tariff board. The minister, however, did not say how many of those cases were asking for a higher tariff and how many for a lower tariff, or whether they were all asking for a higher tariff. He also did not tell us whether the criticisms were so great against an increase in the tariff that the government had seen fit not to grant it. At the same time we would like to know why there is not some reduction in the tariff.

Towards the end of his speech the minister referred to the fact, as he understood it, that "Canada to-day was enjoying wholesale prosperity." I only wish I could agree with him in this respect; but any one who has his hand upon the pulse of the great agricultural industry knows full well that this is, to say the least, a very exaggerated statement. A like criticism might be made of the use of another expression, namely "that all traces of depression have disappeared". Again I would say: If you want to see a contradiction of that you have only to look at agriculture. You have only to look at the efforts we have been making for the last six years to bring people into this country and settle them on the land. From 1922 to 1925 we spent no less than $11,200,000 in endeavouring to people the land, with the result that in those four years we actually lost some of our population. We lost all the settlers who came in and a certain percentage besides. That in my opinion is a proof that what the minister says, namely, "that all traces of depression have disappeared," cannot be true. We have to do more than just make flowery statements in budget speeches to bring agriculture back to the standard where it belongs. Everybody in this House knows that if agriculture were placed on a paying footing there would be no need to spend a single dollar on immigration to bring people to this country, because you could hardly keep them out. Everybody knows that if agriculture were on a paying basis, every other industry would also be successful. Therefore I am sorry that this budget does not give more relief to that great industry.

In looking over the balance sheet that the Minister of Finance placed on Hansard, I was particularly drawn to the one entitled "Principal expenditure attributable to the war." It reads:

Interest on public debt—

I would like to emphasize the fact that this is interest and not principal.

Interest on public debt (increase over 1914)	$116,607,000
War pensions	36,650,000
Soldiers' civil re-establishment	7,200,000
Soldier land settlemant (administration)	1,300,000
Imperial War Graves Commission.	810,000
Battlefields memorials	200,000
Adjustment of war claims	155,000
	$162,922,000

Or more than 45 per cent of our annual expenditure. I think every hon. member is against war from a humanitarian point of view, but here is an economic reason why we should do every single thing we can to remove the causes of war. When it costs a young country, with a small population such as Canada has, the huge sum of more than $162,000,000 a year for the last war alone, let alone previous wars, it is about time we faced this problem in earnest and endeavoured to find out the real causes of war and to eliminate them.

The hon. member for Macleod, before taking his seat, moved an amendment to the budget, in which he regretted——that the budget as presented by the hon Minister of Finance contains no effective provision for the reduction in the high cost of living in so far as such is due to the protective tariff.

I think he was perfectly justified in making that statement, because if there was one thing more than another that helped to elect this government it was the expectation that they would reduce the tariff. He says further:

That the budget shows a further departure from the principle of direct and visible taxation based on the ability to pay.

I think that statement is more than justified. With the huge war debt that we have and the slow rate at which it is being eliminated, the one tax that should be kept on is the income tax. Several hon. members have said that the war was paid for as it proceeded. It was to this extent, that the cost of the war eventually found its way into the pockets of a very small minority of the people of this country. That wealth should be taxed to-day to help pay for the war. It should not be allowed to be passed on from generation to generation, with accrued interest, when the wealth is there for us to tax. The amendment continues:

And further that no systematic effort is being made to reduce our national debt, the interest on which absorbs so large a proportion of the revenues of the Dominion.

I am very glad to see that clause put in the amendment. We have not faced our liabilities represented by our national debt as any commercial institution would be expected to face its debts, and I say that we should make a definite start to pay off this debt. We are probably not agreed on the various methods by which the debt might be reduced, but at the same time I would like to see the government make a start and bring down any recommendations they like, which could be discussed in this House, and as a result of our deliberations we should no doubt be able to find some means of making a proper start to reduce this great liability. I shall therefore take pleasure in supporting the amendment.

Mr. FINLAY MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I shall take up the time of the House but a very few minutes; in fact, I would not have taken up any time at all were it for the belief that we in the maritime provinces might be considered as approving this budget if we allowed it to pass in silence.

We have before this parliament the Duncan report, which we in the maritime provinces regard as a maritime bill of rights. It is the most important document from our point of view that has ever been laid before this parliament. It contains a number of recommendations, some of which must be fulfilled by tariff legislation. One recommendation in particular has reference to an industry in the constituency which I have the honour to represent, and that recommendation, if implemented at all, will have to be implemented by tariff legislation. The Duncan report will come up for special discussion after we have closed this budget debate, and therefore I do not propose to discuss the report at any length now. I wish simply to refer to one recommendation in that report that should be implemented in the budget if the government of the day honestly desire to carry out these recommendations.

The recommendation to which I refer is found on page 37 of the Duncan report, and has reference to steel and the customs tariff. It says:

> It was submitted that the tendency of the tariff, as affected by successive alterations, has been to lessen the protection upon the primary products of iron and steel and to encourage their importation from other countries as being the raw materials of iron and steel-fabricating and finishing industries in Canada.
> In respect of this matter, we do not conceive it to be our duty to express any opinion, since the question is, as we were informed by the chairman of the Tariff Advisory Board, who met us at our request, at the present moment under the consideration of that board. But we do regard it as our duty to record that the significance of this industry to the maritime provinces was forcibly brought home to us, not only in the manufacturing towns we visited in the maritimes, but also throughout the agricultural districts of the maritimes. We record this in order to emphasize the need for prompt action.

I call the attention of the government to those words—"prompt action." There are a number of other recommendations in that report that will require considerable time if they are to be brought into force as they should be, and we are not unreasonable in that respect. There are a lot of matters brought up in the report that will repuire to be discussed in the House, and as a result some legislation may have to be brought in this session, but there is none of the same urgency as this question of a tariff on steel. The matter has been before the tariff board. I think we are all agreed on the wisdom of having a tariff board, but if the tariff board is to serve simply as a wall behind which the government of the day can hide itself, if it is to serve simply as an excuse for the government taking no action at all, the tariff board is not going to serve the purpose for which it was created.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Has the hearing been completed before the board?

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): If it has not, it should have been completed. There has been ample opportunity to have the hearing completed. That is the point I am making. The urgency of the case calls for an early hearing and an early determination. This concern down there is on the brink of bankruptcy, and it is bound to go into bankruptcy unless it gets some tariff protection. It is now in the hands of the trustees for the bondholders, who have been carrying the industry on for the last eight or nine months, hoping from day to day that some assurance would be given that they would get from this government what the industry has been seeking, some reasonable protection in the Canadian market. The matter was brought to the attention of the government last year and again this year, and the board have had ample opportunity to gain all the knowledge that was necessary—if it was necessary to relegate this matter to the tariff board at all. That is the only recommendation in this report that I intend taking up at this time, because the report will come up later for discussion. The question now is this: Is the government going to do anything to save this industry or not? If it waits another year it will be too late, and that is the reason why I say this question is urgent now, if the government of the day intend to act on this recommendation and not let the industry go down. They must remember that this is the only industry of the kind that draws all its raw materials from a purely British source. All other industries in Canada of a similar kind draw their materials from outside sources, either from the United States or from countries outside of Canada and the empire. This concern in the event of war or anything of that kind, is purely within the British Empire and can be depended upon. It is an imperial necessity. I am not going to enlarge on the matter at all. As one of the members from the maritime provinces, I simply express my disappointment at the budget. The budget may be very good in some respects; I have not the least doubt that it is, but from a maritime viewpoint it is a distinct disappointment, and I for one will raise my protest against it.

Mr. H. B. ADSHEAD (East Calgary): Mr. Speaker, the question of the budget and various other matters have been discussed almost ad nauseam during the course of this debate, and I do not intend to take up the time of the House at any considerable length. I propose, however, to review briefly the addresses that have been given by two or three hon. members as they relate to our policy and to the questions on which I was elected, and as they relate to the Liberal and Conservative policies.

I was elected myself on a policy of low tariff. On account of my platform the Liberals in the constituency that I contested refrained from putting a man in the field, because they believed I would be true to what I had stated and that as a member of this House I would support a low tariff. I was amazed, Sir, when I listened to the speech of the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Lavigueur). He said he was a protectionist, and that not only was he a protectionist but that all of his party in the province of Quebec were protectionists. That statement is in Hansard to-day, and as I listened to it I wondered what Sir Richard Cartwright would have said upon hearing a statement of that kind. I came to this country when I was fifteen years of age. I heard public addresses by Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Richard Cartwright, and my hon. friend from Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken) will know that I am one of the "imported" kind; I am not what he would term a real Canadian. I happen to have done fairly well in this country but I do not assume self-righteousness and say that I am better than other men. However, I wonder what Sir Richard Cartwright would have thought upon hearing a speech of that sort coming from a Liberal member? What would Edward Blake or Sir Wilfrid Laurier have thought of it? I wonder what Doctor Michael Clark, whose funeral I attended last year, would have thought of a statement from the Liberal side of the House that the hon. member and his colleagues of Quebec were protectionists, and not low tariff men? Well, if the Liberals want to stick to their policy they must follow the principles laid down by Sir Richard Cartwright, or they must come over and join the Conservative party. One thing in the speech of the hon. member reminded me of what took place a few years ago. I know now exactly what happened to Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1911. At that time there were numbers of members in the Liberal party who were high protectionists, and when Sir Wilfrid attempted to put in force the principles for which he stood so long, they deserted him and crucified him on the cross of protection.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend is making a sad mistake.

Mr. ADSHEAD: In what way?

Mr. LAPOINTE: In making the assumption he has.

Mr. ADSHEAD: What is the assumption? I do not wish to assume anything.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That some of the members from the province of Quebec were elected in 1911 against the policy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in reference to reciprocity. It was not the point at issue at all in that province.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I made the statement that when I heard the speech of the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency I knew the reason for the defeat of Sir Wilfrid, and it was just this; that there were inside the Liberal party, men who were strong protectionists as well as low tariff men, and the strong protectionists defeated him. Their policy was high protection and they left him when he tried to put into effect the policy for which the Liberal party had stood for so long. So far as I am concerned I stand by the low tariff policy, and I hope my friends on the other side of the House also will stand by their colours and support it.

The effect of the low tariff policy in the west was very clearly seen last year. Throughout the length and breadth of the province of Alberta there were no Liberal speakers who did not advocate a low tariff policy, amounting almost to free trade. I do not know what my hon. friend from Quebec did, but I think he must have advocated a high tariff policy, because he is a protectionist. There is an old maxim that you cannot run with the hares and hunt with the hounds. It is also said that you cannot serve God and mammon. You must either redeem the promises which have been made and become a low tariff man, or ally yourself with the side which advocates a high tariff policy. The west stands for a low tariff policy, and last year when the government announced a reduction in the duty on motor cars, it was largely due to my hon. friend from Macleod

(Mr. Coote). Last September I happened to stray into an automobile shop and talk to the proprietor. Looking over his files I got two letters which were not written with a political object in view. I will put them on Hansard if the House will permit me. The first letter reads as follows:

To Chevrolet Dealers:—

Owing to existing conditions caused by the tariff reduction proposals on finished cars in the recent budget, the following new retail delivery prices will apply for Chevrolet cars in your territory, at the opening of business April 16th, 1926, and including all charges, taxes, full Canadian catalogue equipment, motorstat, dealers handling charge, full tank of gazoline and freight to your territory:

Model	Retail Delivery Price Your Territory
Roadster	$ 844
Touring	844
Coupe	1,058
Coach	1,058
Sedan	1,178
Landau Sedan	1,238
Commercial Chassis	664
Utility Express Chassis	924

Dealers will be protected as per contract on new undelivered cars in stock, not demonstrators, as of the close of business April 15th, 1926. Complete new price lists showing billing prices, etc., together with affidavit forms covering such stock will be forwarded within the course of a few days time.

That was not written with any idea of an election; it had nothing at all to do with an election. It should satisfy my friends on this side of the House that a reduction of the tariff means a reduction of the price, and that as you increase the tariff you increase your price. The prophecy was made at that time that we were going to ruin the automobile industry. The hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) repeated the statement time and again, and said that he had seen four thousand men out of work. I suppose they were the men who came here protesting against the reduction of the tariff on automobiles. Later on this same gentleman got another letter, as follows:

Dear Sirs,

We received yours of the 28th ult. in connection with your order for carload of Chevrolet cars.

Beg to advise that we are doing everything in our power to hurry along your shipment of cars but so far have not been successful, although expect same will be shipped any day. We appreciate very much that our dealers are losing a certain amount of business this year but you are no doubt aware our factory is operating at capacity at the present time and during the past few weeks we have not been able to keep up with our orders, however, we hope that within the next week or ten days to get entirely caught up with our shipments and you may rest assured we will do everything in our power to rush this load along to you.

That should be sufficient evidence, Mr. Speaker, of the fact that when you lower the tariff you lower the price and you increase the purchasing power of the people; and increasing the purchasing power results in greater sales, and business in that particular industry is stimulated all along the line. That applies to other things exactly in the same way.

With regard to the income tax, the 10 per cent straight reduction affords the greatest relief to those who are most able to bear the tax and the least relief to those who are least able to pay. In other words, it is a direct inversion of the true principle of taxation—that the tax burden should be in proportion to the ability to pay.

With the permission of the House I will place the following statement on Hansard:

Federal Budget 1927

Who will benefit by the reduction in the income tax rate of ten per cent? Mr. P. H. Veale, assessment commissioner of the city of Ottawa, made public a report of income taxes paid in Ottawa for the year 1926. This was pubished in the Ottawa Journal of January 25, 1927. The following table is taken from the report:—

Amount of assessable income	Number of of income tax payers	Average assessable income of each class
Under $1,000	4,972	$ 354
$ 1,000 to $2,000	975	1,398
2,000 to 3,000	399	2,454
3,000 to 4,000	202	3,471
4,000 to 5,000	99	4,016
5,000 to 10,000	216	6,761
10,000 to 15,000	60	12,383
15,000 to 20,000	29	17,384
25,000 to 30,000	10	29,821
30,000 to 35,000	6	31,809
35,000 to 40,000	3	36,396
40,000 to 45,000	3	42,933
45,000 to 50,000	1	45,870
Over $50,000	20	132,426

It will be noted that 20 taxpayers pay on an average income of $132,426 and Mr. Veale remarks:—"It will also be noticed that 4,972 income taxpayers equal 14 per cent of the total income assessment, while 20 income taxpayers equal 23 per cent of the total income assessment." He might have added that there are thousands who have not enough income to qualify them to pay income tax and they get no relief as there is no reduction in the tariff.

According to the last Income War Tax Amending Act chap. 10, 1926, an income of $130,000 is assessed at the rate of 40 per cent or $52,000. 10 per cent reduction on $52,000 is $5,200. This answers the query as to who will benefit by the reduction in the income tax rate of 10 per cent.

4,972	70.8	1,760,088	14.
1,674	23.9	3,437,451	29.
216	3.1	1,460,376	13.

There are over 36,000 wage earners, male and female, in the city of Ottawa. Of these only 7,013 have sufficient income to qualify them to pay income tax. Thus 28,987—or 80.52 per cent—of Ottawa wage earners are not living but merely existing on a pittance.

My hon. friend from Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Lavigueur) said, if I remember correctly, that he would do away with the Civil Service Commission and return to the old discredited system of political patronage, under which he and other members would have in their hands the appointing of postmasters and other civil servants. Speaking as a labour man, I say that my party will support the continuance of the Civil Service Commission and endeavour to have all civil servants kept free from political interference and rewarded on merit alone.

Let me refer for a couple of minutes to what the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie) said yesterday. After expressing his confidence that the men of the prairies appreciate the fact that they are Canadians, he continued:

> There is no reason why, even if those gentlemen are penalized because of our protective tariff, we cannot repay them in some other way by subventions or by lowering railway rates.

I want to tell the hon. gentleman that we do not desire any subventions or freight rate reductions in repayment of the penalties we are subjected to by the tariff. We simply want our own particular rights.

Mr. DICKIE: Don't you care for the rights of the rest of Canada at all?

Mr. ADSHEAD: You acknowledged that the west was penalized. I say you shall not sit on our backs.

Mr. DICKIE: You will penalize the east?

Mr. ADSHEAD: We do not wish to penalize any section of the country. All we ask for is fair treatment and no favours. We are going to see that these penalizing effects are removed, and then we shall be able to pay our freight rates. We do not ask for charity from anybody. That is the view of the west. My hon. friend said that he knew of some shanty men who were good Canadians, who could scale the walls of Troy before breakfast, throw Paris and Hector into the ash can, and send Helen back to her folks on the farm, and that they could put up a good stiff fight if they only had a couple of glasses of whiskey in them. So far as we in the west are concerned, we are good Canadians and we are going to put up a good stiff fight for our rights, for the removal of tariff duties, and we shall not need a couple of glasses of whiskey to do it either.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Would you like it, though?

Mr. ADSHEAD: Well, I do not need a couple of glasses of whiskey anyway. The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) in the course of his speech yesterday commented upon the amendment and said he did not agree with it. Well, Mr. Speaker, I want to say to him that we in this quarter of the House will uphold him in everything else he said yesterday. He asked that the tariff board have a Hansard report of its proceedings. He asked that all the information given to that board be laid before every member of this House. When my friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) asked the hon. Minister of Finance for reports of the evidence that was given—not only copies of the briefs submitted by the manufacturers who wanted more protection, but reports of all the evidence submitted for and against their applications, the minister said that it would be too costly to have the proceedings reported fully, and that if my hon. friend wanted certain evidence he would have to ask for it specially. That is not the position we take. That is not the position the hon. member for Weyburn takes. He urges that this House should decide tariff questions and should be in possession of all the evidence upon which the tariff board bases its recommendations. I support my hon. friend in that request, and I hope he will have sufficient influence with his party so that the members of this House and the country at large may know exactly what goes on before the tariff board by being supplied with a Hansard report of all the evidence upon which that board bases its recommendations.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Hear, hear.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I have been present at several sittings of the tariff board, and I want to say that no gentleman was more carefully prepared and more thoroughly looked after the interests of the consumers of this country than the hon. member for Weyburn, absolutely to his own loss. Unlike the boot manufacturers for instance, he was not concerned in the few thousand people that make shoes; he was interested in the nine million people that wear those shoes. I am of the opinion, Mr. Speaker, that the suggestion of my hon. friend from Weyburn ought to be put into effect, and I can assure him that he will receive all the help we are capable of to that end.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (Toronto West Centre): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Adshead) says you cannot run with the hare and hunt with the hounds. If he sits in this House for any length of time he will discover that that is quite possible, because the government of the day is running with the free trade hare and hunting with the protectionist hounds of Quebec. My hon. friend is surprised that a man should get up on that side of the House and say he is a protectionist. It gives him a shock. Why, Sir, we have had members from all parts of Quebec stand in their places and over and over again declare themselves protectionists. We had a member from that province condemn the Prime Minister, his leader, because he reduced the tariff duties on that celebrated occasion which was "the first crack out of the box." Mr. Marler stood in his place representing a constituency in Quebec—

An hon. MEMBER: Where is he now?

Mr. HOCKEN: He is now replaced by a rather superior man. He stated on the floor of the House that he had been authorized by the leaders of his party to go to the manufacturers of Quebec and tell them that the tariff would not be reduced, notwithstanding the free trade clause in the platform of 1919. Well, the tariff was reduced afterwards because the free trade hares had—

An hon. MEMBER: Scared the hounds.

Mr. HOCKEN:—a little more influence with the government than the protectionists, and the government stood up most bravely and declared they were going to reduce tariff duties. My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) said "This is the death-knell of protection". My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) said, "This is the first crack out of the box". There was loud applause from our Progressive friends all of whom were then on this side of the House. But that was the only time it ever was done. The government discovered that that policy was not going to get them support in the province of Quebec.

Mr. STEVENS: The hounds caught up with the hares.

Mr. HOCKEN: Yes. The death-knell of protection was not sounded. My hon. friend need not be surprised if he finds men getting up on that side of the House and declaring themselves for protection. Quebec needs protection as much as any part of the Dominion —perhaps a little more—and she is not going to submit to any radical reduction in duties. True, Quebec did consent most cheerfully to the reduction in the automobile duties because her manufacturers do not make automobiles.

Mr. LAPOINTE: They do not want to.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): Does my hon. friend presume to be the spokesman of Quebec?

Mr. HOCKEN: I have been charged with a great many things but I hope Providence will preserve me from that. I want to tell my hon. friend from East Calgary what the truth is about the automobile duty. The duty was reduced but the sales tax was taken off and other advantages were given to the automobile industry that left it as fully protected as before the duty was reduced. That is the fact.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Did not automobiles cost less to the consumer?

Mr. HOCKEN: The reduction materially affected the revenues of the country.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Did it not affect the purchaser?

Mr. HOCKEN: It affected the revenues of the country, which is pretty much the same thing.

Mr. BROWN: Has my hon. friend the figures from the Bureau of Statistics to show in what way the revenues were affected?

Mr. HOCKEN: I do not think we need to get the statistics to prove this fact, that if there is a sales tax of five per cent on a certain article—which five per cent goes into the coffers of the country—if that sales tax is removed, that much revenue is cut off. The reduction in the sales tax to that extent necessarily means a reduction in the revenue.

Mr. BROWN: Is the hon. member aware that the revenue from passenger cars was $570,000 greater in the period of nine months ending in January than it was the year before?

Mr. HOCKEN: I am talking about the sales tax; my hon. friend is talking about the volume of trade.

Mr. ROBB: There was no change whatever in the sales tax. My hon. friend is conflicting the sales tax with the excise tax. As a result of taking the excise tax off cars—

Mr. MANION: Canadian cars.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, Canadian cars. As a result of taking off that tax, more cars were sold and we got more revenue from the sales tax.

Mr. HOCKEN: I did get twisted on the sales tax and the excise tax, but there are so many taxes under this government that it is pretty hard to keep track of them.

Mr. ROBB: These taxes were imposed by the previous government.

Mr. HOCKEN: My hon. friend from East Calgary is very much opposed to the reduction of the income tax. We had some figures given to us recently which would make it quite reasonable to understand this opposition. The west does not pay any income tax that is worth while. The two provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta pay $2,317,000 in income tax and this amount is all paid by the cities. On the other hand, the province of Ontario paid last year $26,539,000 in income tax and the province of Quebec, in round figures, $18,000,000. So that these two central provinces pay the vast bulk of the tax, and it is not to be wondered at that my hon. friend should want to have the tax maintained. The farmers of Saskatchewan and Alberta who pay no income tax naturally say, "Certainly, let us soak the provinces of Ontario and Quebec and make them pay the revenues of the country." There is therefore no reason why my hon. friend should rejoice particularly in any reduction of the income tax.

On motion of Mr. Hocken the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, February 24, 1927

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORTS PRESENTED

Second report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Parent.

First report of the select standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Hay.

ST. GEORGE'S CHAPEL AND WESTMINSTER ABBEY CHOIR

CONCERT IN PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received a special invitation for the House to hear to-morrow in the parliament buildings the famous choir of St. George's Chapel and Westminster Abbey. The choir could sing either in the morning or at 2.30 in the afternoon. I will leave it for the House to decide which hour would suit them best. Shall it be in the morning or at two-thirty?

Some hon. MEMBERS: In the morning.

Some hon. MEMBERS: At two-thirty.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think "two-thirty" has it, and the choir will be notified accordingly. They will sing either in the Hall of Fame or in the railway committee room, according to the number present.

REPORT ON AGRICULTURE

Mr. W. F. KAY (Brome-Missisquoi) moved:

That the report of the Minister of Agriculture for the year 1926-1927 be referred to the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT, 1918, AMENDMENT

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 108 to amend the Civil Service Act, 1918.

He said: This bill provides for the setting up of machinery for consultation between civil service employees and the officials of the government. It is designed to provide means for the hearing of grievances and for the promoting of efficiency. I believe it is quite in harmony with the idea recently put forward by the Prime Minister when he said:

I think that in the relations of the civil service and the government a council on which there would be representatives of the civil service to speak directly to members of the government, or to take up with heads of departments matters of interest to all government departments could be of the utmost service to all concerned.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT, 1918, AMENDMENT

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 109 to amend the Civil Service Act, 1918. (Director of Civil Service).

He said: I may say that the object of this bill is to carry out in part certain recommendations and suggestions made to parliament in 1922 by the special committee appointed to inquire into the Civil Service of Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SENATE BILLS—IRREGULARITIES

On the order: First reading of Senate bills:

Mr. SPEAKER: The four bills mentioned on the order paper are irregular in some particulars and I call attention to the fact that these irregularities ought to be cured before the bills are given the first reading. I shall therefore pass to Questions.

GERMAN REPARATIONS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) was not in his seat when I put this question yesterday: Is he prepared to lay on the table the report of the reparations commission?

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, an interim report has been sent to my department by the commission containing schedules showing a tentative apportionment of a great number of claims, but as that apportionment may be changed by the final report I do not think it advisable to lay it on the table now.

AUTOMOBILES—REFUND OF DUTY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct the attention of the government to a communication I have received recently from an automobile dealer pointing out that the automobile retailers are having difficulty in securing the refund promised to them by the government last session.

Upon the government's announcing that such refund would be made, the dealers had no alternative but to reduce immediately the retail price of the automobiles which they had on hand, and they are accordingly, and have been for the past six months, out of pocket the total amount of their refund claims.

Has this matter been drawn to the attention of the government before? If so, what do they propose to do about it?

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Customs and Excise): Mr. Speaker, I might say for the information of the hon. gentleman that last year an item was placed in the estimates to reimburse automobile dealers on claims which arose in 1920. The refunds will be made as soon as the rate of interest is worked out, which will be at no distant date.

IMPORTATION OF SCOTH MINERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Minister of Immigration if he is in a position to give to the House any information with respect to the recent importation of miners from Scotland into Nova Scotia.

Hon. ROBERT FORKE (Minister of Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I cannot say anything that will convey any further information to the House in regard to this subject. I might repeat what I think was said yesterday, that any British subject who is physically fit and has sufficient funds to maintain himself until he secures work is free to enter the Dominion. Consequently we have no jurisdiction in the matter. It has been the policy of the department whenever it has been notified of a surplus of labour in any industry to advise its agents on the other side so that they can convey the information to parties interested.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Might I ask the hon. Minister of Immigration if the Scotch miners referred to paid their own fares? Is it not a fact that their fares were paid by the British Empire Steel Corporation?

Mr. FORKE: I have no information as to that. I do not see what difference it would really make.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. minister another question? Whether any application was made by the British Empire Steel Corporation for permission to bring these men in?

Mr. FORKE: Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to believe that at some previous time a requisition was made by the British Empire Steel Corporation to get miners from Great Britain. I cannot definitely say how recently that requisition was made, but I can find out and let the hon. member know at another sitting of the House.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Thank you.

TELEPHONE RATES CASE

JUDGMENT OF DOMINION RAILWAY COMMISSION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): I should like to ask the Minister of Justice a question based on an order or judgment of a majority of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada, effective March 1, granting a substantial increase of rates to the Bell Telephone Company. An appeal is being taken on questions of both law and fact to the Supreme court and Governor General in Council. As the case is still sub judice will the Minister of Justice, as Attorney General of Canada, or the government under the Railway Act, grant a stay for thirty days of this order, or request the commissioners so to do before these new schedules of rates are sanctioned, especially as one of the board in a dissenting judgment holds that both the law and the facts were against the company's contention?

This would be a reasonable application of the doctrine of sub judice. Section 56 of the Railway Act defines the powers of the Governor General in Council as follows:

> The governor in council may at any time, in his discretion, either upon petition of any party, person or company interested, or of his own motion, and without any petition or application, vary or rescind any order, decision, rule or regulation of the boards, whether such order or decision is made inter partes or otherwise, and whether such regulation is general or limited in its scope and application; and any order which the governor in council may make with respect thereto shall be binding upon the board and upon all parties.

I would suggest that the minister might answer this to-morrow.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman has put his question.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I may say meanwhile that we have not received any information in the matter except what has been published in the newspapers. If an appeal is taken and an application is made as suggested by my hon. friend, it will be considered and dealt with on its merits.

CUSTOMS COMMISSION—ITINERARY

Mr. W. G. ERNST (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Customs if it is the intention of the government to have the customs commission sit again in the Maritime provinces? I put the question because at the time the commission was there last year the chairman intimated that its work could not be completed owing to the imminence of the general election, and I have since seen it stated in the press that the commission did not intend to again visit either Nova Scotia or New Brunswick.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Customs and Excise): Mr. Speaker, I might say that the commission of inquiry is not in any way under the control of my department. I will direct my hon. friend's question to the proper quarter.

Mr. ERNST: May I ask the hon. minister under whose control the commission is?

Mr. EULER: It is not controlled. It has authority to go wherever it pleases. For the information of the House I may say that I understand it is the intention of the commission to proceed again to the Maritime provinces, but I am not saying that with any authority. My hon. friend's inquiry should, I think, be directed to the commission itself.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE.

The House resumed from Wednesday, February 23, the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker, do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of ways and means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Coote.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (Toronto West Centre): Mr. Speaker, having regard to the pledges of the government and to the large support that the government gets from the free trade element in this House, I presume that we on this side who believe in reasonable protection for the industries of the country ought to feel more or less satisfied that this particular budget does not further reduce tariff duties. It will be a disappointment to my hon. friend from Rosetown (Mr. Evans), who predicted last session that there would probably be a reduction in the duty on boots and shoes. But boots and shoes is a very tender spot in the tariff with many hon. gentlemen opposite. The rosy picture which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) paints of present conditions in Canada are not at all in accordance with the facts. I am prepared to admit that there is some slight improvement in trade, but it is more a hopeful spirit than any actual advance in conditions of trade and industry throughout the country. I judge, from what we have read from the general managers of our banks, that a concerted effort is being made by them, which perhaps is very laudable, to cultivate a spirit of optimism in the country, and in that desire they have gone much further than the facts would warrant. I do not think any person who has a knowledge of the industrial situation to-day can claim that this country enjoys that abounding prosperity referred to by the minister. The only class that is fully employed in Canada to-day is the farming community; and of course the farmer has always a job. But if you get into general industry you find a great many factories working half time, a great many closed down, and a general state of anxiety on the part of those who have the management of these enterprises under their charge.

I am not surprised to learn that the unemployment index is better now than it was last year. This is due, not to a larger number in employment, but to the fact that there are fewer people to be employed. When our people are leaving the country at the rate of 100,000 a year, there are inevitably fewer unemployed left at home. And that is exactly the situation so far as general industry is concerned. There may be an industry here or there enjoying special favours, like the implement industry which is doing very well, but if you take the whole range of industrial activities throughout the country you will find that the conditions are not at all such as are described by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. McMILLAN: What special favours does the implement industry enjoy?

Mr. HOCKEN: Free materials and freedom from the sales tax. If we had in this country to-day all the Canadians who have gone to the United States, unemployment would be as great here to-day as it has been in the past few years, or greater.

I fancy my hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Coote) will not expect the members of this party to have any particular sympathy with his amendment. Speaking for myself, at any rate, I must say I have no sympathy for it. It comprises two things: first, a demand for lower duties, and secondly, a protest against the reduction in the income tax. Now, we are not going to get any lower duties this year, and I think the explanation given by the government, as indicated by my hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan) yesterday, is quite reasonable. He points out that the ministers have been so busy that they have been unable to prepare a budget providing for lower duties. That is a fair explanation; it is one that any free trader on the other side of the House may find it easy to accept. There appear, however, to be one or two over there who do not accept it, although the hon. member for South Huron, at least, does. And, as I say, it appeals to me as a reasonable explanation. The protest against the reduction in the income tax, embodied in the amendment, comes properly from a section of the country that does not pay any income tax worth speaking about. Take the province of Saskatchewan for example: the total payments of income tax there work out at an insignificant fraction over one dollar per head of the population. If you take Ontario, on the other hand, you will find the per capita income tax given at $8.66. So that hon. members from the prairies who pay no income tax—

Mr. EVANS: Give a reason for that statement.

Mr. HOCKEN: I am not prepared to explain how it is they escape the tax. Certainly the people of Saskatchewan and Alberta have been more prosperous than the people of any other province in the Dominion during the past year or two; and if they have not been paying income tax it is not because they have not the means of doing so. It strikes me as a somewhat selfish attitude for the members of the prairies to take in refusing to allow reductions to the central provinces in the enormous taxes which they pay to keep up the revenues of the country. I shall refer to this question later on.

Let me now refer for a moment or two to certain statements made by the hon. member for South Huron yesterday. The burden of his speech was that agriculture in Canada does not receive from government the consideration that it deserves. I should like to know wherein agriculture is denied consideration by this government or by the government of any province of the Dominion. I agree with the hon. member that it is the basic industry, and at the present day the largest in Canada. But there is no industry in this country which receives so much consideration from every form of government as does agriculture. In the first place there are special freight rates for the western agriculturist—the lowest freight rates in the world, rates which the railways tell us are not adequate to meet the cost of transportation. If that is the case, that low rate must be made up by the central provinces and by the taxpayers generally. Agriculture in the west enjoys, therefore, a special subsidy in the low freight rates which it gets and which the taxpayers of Canada at large must pay.

Mr. EVANS: What authority has the hon. member for the statement that the railways have declared the rates unequal to the cost?

Mr. HOCKEN: My hon. friend knows very well that it is by an act of this House that the west gets the special freight rates which it enjoys to-day; and he knows very well that those rates would be higher if they were placed on a parity with the freight rates throughout Canada. There is no doubt about that. These freight rates are in effect a subsidy, a bounty to the grain growers. But it is not only in that respect that agriculture is considered. Travel throughout the country and you will find in every province experimental farms conducted for the benefit of the agricultural industry; a central farm adjoining this city and farms in every province in the Dominion. These institutions are comparable with the laboratories of great industries. An industry that wants to improve its methods, to find more efficient plans to carry on, has to engage experts at large salaries and maintain large staffs in order to improve and reduce the cost of its product. I am not objecting to that. That is an expense which all other industries have to meet, but which in the case of agriculture is met by the Dominion government and all the provincial governments. Surely that is a consideration that should be taken into account. Not only experimental farms but agricultural colleges exist everywhere for the special training of agriculturists and for improving their plans.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Might I ask if that is not an admission that all other industries in this country are largely dependent upon agriculture?

Mr. HOCKEN: I think agriculture depends upon other industries as much as other industries depend upon agriculture, and if my hon. friend will allow me I shall have a word to say about that later.

My hon. friend enlarged upon the decreasing agricultural population particularly in the United States. I do not know how much he has read on the subject; but I have done some reading on it and the best information I can get is this, that in the United States and in Canada too, agriculture has become big business. The 100 acre farm in the western states and, I think, in western Canada too, is pretty nearly a thing of the past. By the use of improved machinery men are now farming one, two or three thousand acres, and they bring into operation machinery by which one man will do as much work as eight, ten or perhaps a dozen men used to do some years ago.

Mr. McMILLAN: Might I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. SPEAKER: I have noticed there has been a general cross-examination this afternoon, and although it is done good-naturedly and the hon. gentleman who has the floor has been kind enough to give replies—

Mr. McMILLAN: I was interrupted freely yesterday.

Mr. SPEAKER: —I may remind hon. gentlemen on both sides that it is not fair to an hon. member speaking to be interrupted every moment. I would ask hon. members to adhere to the rule.

Mr. HOCKEN: Agriculture is very different from what it was a few years ago. The farmers have now a machine that reaps and threshes the grain so that all operations in between reaping and threshing are avoided. Under those conditions farms of thousands of acres can be and are being cultivated, and the reduction in the number of people employed in agriculture in the United States is directly attributable to the enlargement of farms and the improvement of machinery. If we went back to the old days when we had a reaper with men following it to bind the sheaves and shock them up, in order to produce enough food for this country we would require on the land five times as many people as we have to-day. Agriculture is keeping pace with all other industries and on the farms things are being accomplished to-day that were not dreamed of a few years ago. These things account for the lessening of the population on the farm. While the agricultural population of the United States may have decreased somewhat, the general population of that republic has increased and that country has gone through the most astonishing period of prosperity that it has ever experienced. There is a higher standard of living for all classes of people; the country is prosperous in the highest degree, and I venture to say the farmers there are sharing in that prosperity. If there is any indebtedness it is probably attributable to the purchase of these costly machines, costing $4,000 or $5,000 a piece, but enabling the farmer to produce that much more and to reduce the unit cost of his product.

My agricultural friends deliver in this House and fill the newspapers with arguments in favour of free trade. But they do not examine the whole question; they do not take into account many factors that ought to be taken into account in arriving at the best policy for this country. As Canadians we ought to ask ourselves this question: Am I desirous that this country shall be a great country, have a large population and be prosperous? Starting from that point I contend that no country can be truly great on one industry. If my hon. friends had their way and absolute free trade were adopted as the trade policy of Canada, we would get down to one industry.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Not at all.

Mr. HOCKEN: There is not in any city in Canada an industry to which my hon. friends would desire to give any protection. If they had their way and absolute free trade were put into effect, this would be solely and only an agricultural country. The greatness of a country depends not on one industry but on a diversity of industries. It depends on many different lines of industry being established and carried on profitably. There is no country of any consequence in the world that attempts to live on agriculture. Admitting that agriculture is the basic and most important industry in the Dominion of Canada, yet I think if those who are engaged in agriculture would look at the question all round, they would discover that if they were going to do their whole duty as Canadians they must give some consideration and some reasonable protection in order to allow other industries to live. There is not in Canada to-day a farmer who has children reaching up to the age of maturity and self-support who does not profit in his family by the existence of a variety of industries. I wonder how many of my hon. friends opposite who have children who have gone out to make their own way, have children who are engaged in industry or commerce that is due to the existence of those industries in our cities. Let me take the case of a farmer in Ontario, because I know more about that, although I do not know much about farming.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HOCKEN: I think I know a little more about farming in Ontario than some of my hon. friends opposite know about the industries in our cities, and I have more regard for the farmer than my hon. friends who would argue in favour of Simon-pure free trade have for those engaged in those industries.

Miss MACPHAIL: Do farmers in Canada ask the industries of which the hon. member is speaking to tax themselves for the benefit of agriculture?

Mr. HOCKEN: Whether they ask or not, they do undoubtedly. The taxes that go to support this government are drawn from industry—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HOCKEN: —and the concessions that the farmers get for the small amount they pay per capita in the way of tariff duty more than compensate them for what they have to pay. I say, Sir, that it is in the interest of every farmer in the country that we should have prosperous cities. These cities create openings for those members of the families of farmers who are not adapted to agricultural pursuits and have no taste for agriculture, and if you take a farmer with a family, of five or six children, we will say, more than half of them leave the farm; they are not adapted to farming.

Miss MACPHAIL: They all leave the farms do they not?

Mr. HOCKEN: Not while they are as prosperous as they are to-day. So that if we are going to have an all-round country here, we must have cities as well as rural districts.

Miss MACPHAIL: Is the hon. gentleman arguing that without protection there would be no cities at all, no industries?

Mr. HOCKEN: I think I can say that there would be very few cities and those would be of very little account. If my hon. friend had her way and brought free trade into effect—and I think she believes in free trade—the cities of this country would shrivel up.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HOCKEN: Yes, they would shrivel up. If we were buying our implements and buying our manufactured goods from the other side, as my hon. friends would have us do, what would there be to keep the cities alive? I say that it is much better for the farmer that there should be some communities of considerable size within his reach.

An hon. MEMBER: They constitute local markets.

Mr. HOCKEN: Not only that, but they make a vast difference to his social position. The prairies to-day are better districts to live in than they were forty, or thirty, or twenty years ago, because there are cities.

Mr. DONNELLY: Has not England's fiscal policy made her great?

Mr. MANION: No, protection—protection up to 1846. That is what made her great.

Mr. HOCKEN: My hon. friend from Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) has not read far enough back; he has only read back to the time of Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright. Let him go farther back and he will find that Great Britain was made preëminently an industrial nation by protection.

An hon. MEMBER: And she is coming back to it.

Mr. HOCKEN: Yes, with the Safeguarding of Industries Act and similar legislation. It was only when England gained that position of industrial preëminence and had control of the commerce of the sea, that she found it to her advantage to adopt free trade in order to sell her products abroad and bring raw materials in free. In my judgment England will never recover the preëminence she enjoyed in industry under a free trade policy because every nation in the world is straining in all possible ways to build up its industries and is putting into effect protective policies in order to do that.

Where in history can my hon. friend point to a growth equivalent to that of the United States which has been built up and maintained by protection? And the farmers of that country are stronger protectionists than any other class of people.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. HOCKEN: I predict that the day will come, Mr. Speaker, when my hon. friends who sit to my left, or their successors, will be just as keen for protection as the farmers of the United States. I venture to say further that if the agriculturists of Canada, and it is certainly true of the agriculturists of Ontario, study the whole question of building up a great nation in Canada, they will come to the conclusion that a reasonable measure of protection is as necessary for them as it is for the cities and the towns.

I have only one song to sing as a rule—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. HOCKEN: —speaking on the budget, and what I have said is purely incidental to what I want to say. I wish to say a word for one industry in this country that is perishing because of the disfavour in which it finds itself with the government of the day. I want to bring to the attention of the House the condition of the publishing industry in Canada, and when I say that it is perishing I speak absolutely by the book, for within the last five or ten years the number of publications that have suspended because of inability to meet competition—foreign competition—runs into the hundreds. I submit that the publishing industry is a great industry, and it is not failing in Canada because of any fault of the men that are engaged in it. I can name to you men who have invested large sums, and who have done their best in trying to produce Canadian magazines teaching Canadian sentiment, trying to further that Canadian spirit of which we have all talked so much and for which we do not seem to feel inclined to do very much. Sir, the blame, in my judgment, lies directly upon the administration, an administration that will not enforce the laws now upon the statute books, will not apply the items which are in the tariff. If the items already in the tariff schedule were applied there would be some hope for Canadian periodical literature, and it is with the "hope that springs eternal in the human breast" that I want to present the case for the publishing industry again to-day.

I would like hon. members first to consider the character of that industry. It is not like the manufacture of a machine, or of wearing apparel, or of anything that is in general use. This industry is one upon which Canadian sentiment must be built; it goes deeper than the manufacture of any goods that are in general use. It goes right into the minds and hearts of the people, and if we are going to develop a country with a sentiment of our own, and to inculcate a real Canadian spirit in our young people, then we must have some kind of a vehicle for the purpose, and the best vehicle that I can think of is a periodical press.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): Would not the daily newspaper meet that need to a very large extent?

Mr. HOCKEN: I think not. The daily newspaper gives us the news, and contains an occasional political article or a neutral article, but it is essentially a presentation of the news of the day, of the happenings of the world. It does, of course, express Canadian sentiment, but not at all in the way that a periodical press does. The man who writes for the daily paper writes of the hour; his articles must be composed in an hour, or in a few hours at most. The man who writes for the periodical press takes weeks or months, takes whatever time is necessary to prepare his article to his own satisfaction, and he produces a form of literature that is much more effective in developing a national sentiment than anything a newspaper man can write. My hon. friend in the chair will see the force of the statement I make. I say, Sir, that that is the only agency we have for contributing to the education of the masses and building up a strong national sentiment among Canadians, and for stimulating that sentiment. Surely it must be admitted that this is desirable from every standpoint. If we are going to remain Canada, we must be Canadians. We must have some special idea in our heads as to our own nationality. We cannot imbibe the ideals of a foreign state without suffering in our own sentiment, and that is the situation in which we find ourselves to-day. All that is best in this periodical literature that floods our country is pro-United States. There are 70,000,000 copies of American periodicals coming into this country every year, not one of them telling the Canadian story, all of them leaving the impression that God's country is the United States, and putting into the minds of our young people the idea that the land of promise is over the border, not here. It is one of those agencies that have done so much to attract the best we have.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Unfortunately, one of the difficulties is that the Conservative party have been trying to make everybody believe that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HOCKEN: I did not quite get what the hon. gentleman said. I am free to admit that there are a great many admirable magazines coming in here from the United States, but at the best they teach United States: they do not teach Canada. They stimulate the idea in our young people, and in some of our middle-aged people, to seek for those green fields far away, and it is one of the means that has been effective in attracting so many of our young Canadians over the border. From every province in Canada they slip across, and while it is very flattering to us to know that almost any Canadian can get a situation in the United States, it is not very encouraging to those of us who want to see a great country built up here, populous, prosperous and powerful, as it can be, and as I hope it will be. But the day is being delayed, and the attractions of the United States are being presented to our people by this flood of literature that comes in.

And at the worst, Mr. Speaker, we have admitted to this country to-day the most pernicious literature that is published on this continent, perhaps on any continent. Certainly nothing could be much worse than what is published in the United States and sent in here free. I am going to read to you what the Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Sun said about this class of publication in the United States. Writing to the Independent, of Boston, he said:

> And not only have we produced a great smut crop of a coarseness peculiarly our own, but the more obscene of the French papers have now been translated into English and appear on the news stands along with the originals. When you stop to analyze, scrutinize, and check up, there is here presented more reason for apprehension as to the future than any other single symptom in America to-day.
> The place to fully appreciate its proportions is in the smaller cities and towns, with populations ranging from 20,000 up to 100,000—towns, for instance, like Fairmont, West Virginia, where one news dealer sells 2,200 copies of every issue of a single monthly, exclusively devoted to stories of sex experiences and the nude in art; or like Steubenville, Ohio, where out of 110 periodicals on sale in a single store, 60 were either out-and-out a prurient type or bordered on the libidinous line.
> It is not the cheap and sexually suggestive fiction magazines, although these are many and rotten, that constitute the real shock troops of these paper battalions of literary indecency, so much as the smaller and more compact nonfiction affairs frankly and exclusively given over to obscenities. Some of these are published in Chicago, some in Philadelphia, but most of them in Newark, New Jersey, and are issued by the same individuals under different corporate names. They mainly contain a rehash of the dirty stories and jokes told in the smoking rooms of pullman cars or hotel lobbies.

Some of my hon. friends may say: You are talking about the United States. Well, Mr. Speaker, I went down to Sparks street during the lunch hour, and I went into only one store, but I picked up a few samples of the kind of stuff that is coming into this country from the United States. Here is one of them—Sea Breezes. Shocking, isn't it? Any member of this House can go down to Sparks street and buy this magazine. I do not suppose any member would buy it, unless he had a purpose, but the truth is that the youth of the city are buying it. Young people are going through the pages of a thing like that.

Then I picked up another one, and the title itself, I think, condemns this one—Sex Stories. That is admitted free, contrary to the very item of the tariff. I wish my hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Euler) were here. There is a book unfit to be sold in any store in the city of Ottawa or anywhere else for that matter, but it is Canada we are concerned with.

Here is another—True Experiences—another of the sex story magazines. This kind of stuff, bound, as you see, in different sections, comes into this country free, in violation of three different items of the tariff.

So, at its worst, Mr. Speaker, it is about as bad as it could be. I could get you sixty other magazines of the same type, only I did not want to spend that much money, and I thought these three samples ought to be sufficient to convince the House that a kind of literature is coming in here with the approval of our customs officials and of the government that ought to be excluded.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Would the hon. member advocate barring that class of magazine from the country?

Mr. HOCKEN: I certainly would.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Thank you.

Mr. HOCKEN: In the United States, Mr. Speaker, they do everything they can think of to stop this flood of literature. They suppress a magazine, and the next week it appears under a different name.

Mr. BROWN: I am heartily in sympathy with some of the views expressed by the hon. member, but would it not be well to take this up as a single problem, rather than complicate it with questions of the customs tariff?

Mr. HOCKEN: I would think, Mr. Speaker, that the present laws against obscene literature would exclude this kind of stuff. It is within the power of the Customs department to exclude these magazines now, on the ground of obscenity, but they come in free, and are part of that great flood of literature to which I object coming in in the way it does, to the destruction of our own periodical literature, and to the destruction of a very important industry in this country. The voice of Canada, as it can be expressed in a periodical press, is stifled because our magazines are absolutely unable to compete with those in the United States serving a community of 120,000,000 of people.

The conditions which are maintained at the present time render it quite impossible to establish a distinctly Canadian periodical press. We have in our customs tariff three items; one that provides that on all advertising matter coming into this country from the United States a duty of fifteen cents a pound shall be charged. That is not enforced. I have before me a magazine of 204 pages, mostly advertising, all of which ought to pay fifteen cents a pound under our own tariff, but this comes in free, not only competing with our own magazines, but by the advertising competing with every paper in Canada through the great volume of advertising they put in. I submit further with regard to this magazine and others of the same class that the dumping duty should be applied. This magazine weighs a pound and a half. I weighed it myself. The raw paper in the rolls is worth nine cents, and it is sold in the stores of this city for five cents. The dealer buys it for three cents. Here we have nine cents worth of white paper beautifully printed and bound, the type set up, and articles paid for, and it comes into Canada at three cents to the dealer and five cents to the purchaser.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): What does it sell for in the United States?

Mr. HOCKEN: Five cents.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Then how can you apply the dumping duty?

Mr. HOCKEN: Nine cents' worth of paper is sold for three cents, and if that does not come within the dumping clause, then the act should be amended so that it will come within it. No Canadian can advertise in this magazine. It has a circulation of about 80,000 in Canada, but it has a total circulation of over a million, and the Canadian advertiser who would pay for a million circulation would get only 100,000, or less. Canadian advertisers, therefore, are excluded from this publication; they are excluded from the Saturday Evening Post and the Ladies Home Journal, because they cannot get more than 100,000 circulation, or 130,000, I think, in the case of the Saturday Evening Post. But if they advertise they have to pay for a circulation of a million. In the first place we have a duty of fifteen cents a pound that should be applied to magazines of this class, because while a certain amount of reading matter which is admitted free is mixed up with advertising, these periodicals are essentially advertising publications. They are not published primarily as literature, but as advertising mediums and should be treated as such by the Customs department of this country. Now another item in our tariff says:

Books, viz, novels, works of fiction or literature of a similar character, unbound or paper bound, or in sheets:
British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; Intermediate, 22½ per cent; General tariff, 25 per cent.

I submit that all the magazines that come here should pay the twenty-five per cent rate under that item. There is the item in the tariff; they do not enforce it, but they fall back upon another item, No. 184, which reads:

Newspapers, and quarterly, monthly and semi-monthly magazines, and weekly literary papers, unbound, free.

You will notice it says "unbound". Here is a magazine, a very decent one too, and the Customs department says that is unbound. It has sixteen sections. These sections have to be collated and stitched, the cover put on, and more work is done in the bindery than is done in the pressroom on this magazine, and yet our Customs department says it is unbound. I do not know how that can be defended. But if this publication were treated as it should be instead of being admitted free under item No. 184, it would pay twenty-five per cent, and if it paid twenty-five per cent, it would be something of a discouragement to the American magazines in their effort to capture the whole of the Canadian market. I do not say this magazine ought to be kept out but if we have an item in the tariff providing that it shall pay twenty-five per cent, it should pay that amount, while the British magazines would come in under the preferential tariff of fifteen per cent. I am not asking for any special or further protection for magazines. I say apply the tariff as it stands. I suggested last year that, instead of charging fifteen cents a pound on advertising matter, a general rate of ten cents a pound on the whole magazine should be applied. I did that because the customs officials state that it is impossible to separate the advertising in a magazine like this from the reading matter. Of course that is not impossible at all. It is done in the United States for postal purposes, but it means a certain amount of work for every one that comes in; so last year, instead of sticking to the demand for fifteen cents a pound, I suggested ten cents a pound as being easier to collect. I want fifteen cents on the advertising, or I want twenty-five per cent, according to item 169 in the tariff.

If we have a tariff that can be interpreted exactly the opposite of what it says, what is the sense of it? It does not accomplish anything at all.

While these publications are admitted free into Canada, the Canadian publisher has to pay duty on everything that he uses. He has to pay on his paper, he has to pay on his machinery and he has to pay on his electrotypes. I have ninety-one items here in the tariff that enter into the publisher's business which are dutiable, and he comes then into competition with people who pay no duty. He is forced up against the free list of American magazines. I have the record here of one periodical published in the city of Toronto. This publisher could go to Buffalo, buy his paper, print it, get all his electrotypes and everything, and he could save $490 on every issue, as compared with the cost of publishing in the city of Toronto. He could save $5,583 dollars a year if, instead of doing his printing in Toronto, he took it over to Buffalo. In the first place, he has to pay a duty of twenty-five per cent on his paper. Paper is cheaper there than in Canada. He can buy paper in Buffalo and lay it down in Toronto, and when he gets it in Toronto it is exactly the same price as the cost of the paper in Buffalo, with the duty and the freight added, and that is about a cent and a half a pound. That is a very heavy impost upon the publisher of that magazine—$490 an issue, besides all his equipment. I have a list of ninety-one different articles entering into the business of the publisher. The tariff runs all the way from 10 per cent to 35 per cent, everything the man uses is taxed, and then he comes into unhampered competition with the American publisher.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Is my hon. friend complaining of that tariff?

Mr. HOCKEN: No. I say the papermakers and other manufacturers ought to enjoy enough protection to keep them alive; but I say further the publisher ought to get some protection too; he at least ought to get the protection that is now contained in our own tariff.

How the Minister of Finance can justify the present interpretation of the items in the customs tariff is absolutely beyond my comprehension. I am confident that if the government took a fair and reasonable view they would at least say: We will adopt item 169 of the customs tariff and charge 25 per cent on all these magazines. That would not exclude a single American magazine; but it would do this. The Saturday Evening Post has started a subscription campaign in order to get a circulation in Canada of 200,000 copies. A tariff of 25 per cent would simply discourage that campaign and would leave the publishers of that paper to take the natural circulation that they may get. At the present time they are spending enormous sums of money in forcing the circulation of the Saturday Evening Post—all to the detriment of existing Canadian publications, and it is a most unfair position in which to put our publishers.

I can conceive, Mr. Speaker, that if the publishing industry were given a fair deal we would have more ink-makers, perhaps we would have another paper mill or two, and the general industry surrounding and cognate to the publishing industry would benefit correspondingly. Of course, the automobile manufacturers get their raw materials free, so do the implement manufacturers, but the publishers get nothing. The publishers are not asking particularly for free raw materials, they are willing that those with whom they deal should have reasonable protection—what Mr. Marler used to call "a cost of living" tariff; but they claim that this country should be protected against the flood of 300 different magazines that come in here every time they are issued.

It may be interesting to the House to know that 25,000,000 pounds of advertising printing comes into Canada from the United States free of duty every year. If we applied our tariff on that 25,000,000 pounds we would get in duty $375,000 at the 15-cent rate which I have mentioned. That indicates the handicap under which our publishers are working. It is equivalent to this government paying a bounty to the American publisher to compete with the Canadian publisher. That is exactly the position. If conditions were reversed, if Canadian periodical literature was going into the United States in anything like a comparable volume, the United States government would put on a tariff over night. They would not stand for that, they would not permit their people to be fed up with Canadian literature as we permit our people to be fed up with American literature. It must be borne in mind that if we put on a duty of 25 per cent the price of the Saturday Evening Post would not be increased at all; its publishers would absorb that tax. Hon. members may be surprised to hear that the total weight of the Saturday Evening Post sent into Canada in 1926 amounted to 8,978,944 pounds.

A tremendous volume of this paper is also sent in here through the mails and is carried by the Canadian post office for nothing; we get nothing at all out of the postage. Altogether 659,275 copies of American magazines are carried by the Canadian mails for which our government gets nothing at all—not a cent. The total circulation per issue of these magazines is 1,468,886 copies. Some of them are weeklies, some monthlies, but per issue we have a million and a half copies of American publications coming into this country free, in defiance of our own customs tariff. In other words, we buy eight American magazines for every Canadian magazine bought in this country.

Every person who knows anything about the publishing business and certain newspapers have taken notice of this state of things, and they all agree it is about time that something was done by the government to at least give sufficient protection to our Canadian publishers to enable them to live and build up a Canadian literature. The Kitchener Record, the paper of the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Euler)—I am sorry he is not in his seat—says:

> Acting upon the contention that the Canadian publishing trade is suffering from outside competition, the delegation suggests the imposing of a tariff of 10 cents a pound on all periodicals and week end magazines entering Canada. It is estimated that the consequent revenue would be approximately $5,000,000.

I should like to read to the House what the Globe says on this subject:

> Sooner or later the Canadian government will be obliged to take cognizance of the vast circulation of United States publications in this country. They are strangling the publishing industry here, depriving Canadian workers of millions of dollars' worth of employment; they are "Americanizing" Canada by means of the reading material offered; they must have a very grave effect on Canadian industry in general, owing to the tremendous amount of advertising of United States products carried in their columns.

The Globe puts into a paragraph practically my whole argument, and I think it should be considered very carefully and sympathetically by the government. The Orillia Packet, which is a very well edited weekly paper, says:

> By all means let us have a duty on the American publications that are flooding Canada to the extent of more than a million copies a week. It is one new tax to which no objection can be taken.

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, that I can have any influence with my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, but I have pleaded with him, I have beseeched him, and I have said everything I can think of to convince him of the justice of what the publishers are asking for. All I am requesting him to do now is to see that his colleague the Minister of Customs applies the tariff we now have against these magazines. I ask him to suggest to his colleague that item 169 should not be interpreted as classing as unbound a magazine of the kind I am now holding up for him to look at. I do not know whether the minister saw this magazine. It contains sixteen different sections, all collated, all bound. There is more work in the bindery than in the printing. Yet that is classed by the Customs department as unbound—manifestly an indefensible interpretation. If the hon. minister would take enough time to go into this question with reasonable care I think he would discover that what the magazine publishers are asking for is not only reasonable, but something that cannot be evaded and the evasion defended.

I submit, Sir, as I have done on former occasions, that this is one industry that should receive consideration at the hands of the government. It is not asking much, only what is on the book; and if my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) will grant this request, he will do something at least to support a movement which will make for a better and a more prosperous periodical press in Canada than we have at the present time.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): For once I find myself in complete accord with my hon. friend from Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken) in the desire to protect the youth of the country from the filthy literature—is it literature?—which at present comes from the United States and is sold throughout Canada in the cities and towns, in the stores, at the street corners, everywhere. I think, however, that the hon. gentleman might have addressed his remarks to the House generally rather than to one particular quarter. Last year partly at my request, the late Minister of Customs excluded the filthiest and most obnoxious of these American magazines, and the first thing that was done by the short-lived government, which was put into power, in the name of virtue, in the month of June, was to admit again those very undesirable publications. I do not bring this as an argument against any party. I simply join hands with the hon. member in requesting the Minister of Customs to take steps to keep out literature of this sort. If the minister does not do so of his own good will he will hear more about the matter. He should apply again the regulation or, as I believe, the order in council, or the order of the Customs department, which was put into force by the late Mr. Boivin.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Can my hon. friend give us some information regarding that order in council of which he speaks? On whose recommendation was the publication in question banned? I never heard of the matter before, and I should like to look into it.

Mr. BOURASSA: I am not sure that it is an order in council; but I know that last year the late Mr. Boivin, then Minister of Customs, issued orders to prohibit the entry into Canada of such filthy rags as the Daily Mirror and publications of that nature. And these publications were stopped. The moment the succeeding government came into power, however, the publications in question were allowed in again. That is all I know about the matter.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Are they still coming in?

Mr. BOURASSA: Yes, you will find them at every street corner in Montreal and Ottawa; and the school children are buying them every afternoon. They are the filthiest and most degrading kind of reading. As every hon. member knows, I do not believe in promoting virtue by means of laws; but I may point out that in England, where more than anywhere else in the world, personal liberty in these matters has been preserved, parliament has passed legislation prohibiting the dissemination of such reading matter. Lately, one of the Labour representatives in the British parliament was in the United States, and he made the sensible observation that before the American people attempted to make men sober by law, they should see to it that the minds of the youth of the country were not degraded to the degree they are to-day in the United States. In that respect I am absolutely in accord with the sentiments of my hon. friend, and I am prepared to support any movement that tends to protect the youth of Canada against the influence of such publications.

With regard to the other aspect of the question, with which the hon. member has dealt in a very interesting manner, that of protecting the publishing industry, it should be brought to the attention of the tariff board. I do not think this is the proper time to discuss that question from the various points of view that can be advanced. Again I entirely agree with the hon. member that everything should be done to foster a national sentiment, but I fear that in many ways we are not adopting the right means. You will not build up a national sentiment by means of a protected literature. If you take other means to that end, if you direct the minds of the youth, to whatever race or province they belong, to the fact that Canada is their country, and not France, not England, not the British Empire, then in a generation or two you may have something like unanimity among Canadians in regard to their common nationality. Thereafter a literature with a national sentiment will develop. I do not know that a national sentiment has ever been created anywhere by literature, nor that literature has ever been fostered by means of tariff protection. If in the school, in the family and in all our social and political activities, we appeal to the one sentiment of devotion to Canada as our common country, we shall create the mental and moral material upon which a national literature will grow. I do not know how it goes in the English-speaking provinces; but according to the hon. gentleman himself, as he spoke here last year, similarity of language with the United States makes the people more open to the penetration of American ideals and thought. I can say however that, so far as our own province is concerned, more or fewer papers coming from another country would not affect in the slightest degree our conception of Canadianism. This may suggest that something else is wrong with the English provinces in the matter of fostering a national sentiment. I will not however dwell on that point now. The hon. member is to be congratulated upon having raised the subject, and I trust that this is not the last occasion on which he will have brought it up.

Mr. HOCKEN: Not unless we get relief.

Mr. BOURASSA: There is another point of view from which the question may be discussed. American publications, and Canadian as well, which take advantage of the low rates offered by the Post Office Department to disseminate throughout Canada what are practically advertising catalogues, are a detriment to the ordinary trade of the towns and villages. The spread of this advertising matter throughout the country has had something to do with the crisis through which local trade in the small towns and villages has been passing for many years.

With regard to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), I find myself in this position, that while agreeing almost entirely with the opinions expressed by the hon. member as well as by the member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail), I cannot bring myself to the point of supporting the amendment, for the simple reason that the first paragraph censures the government for not dealing with the tariff at this session, notwithstanding that it was unanimously agreed last session that the whole question of the tariff should be submitted to a commission of inquiry. On this question, therefore, I take exactly the same ground I took a few days ago on another subject. The House, in the exercise of its supreme jurisdiction, has seen fit to create a body to gather data and secure information to enable us to deal with the tariff in a satisfactory manner and with some measure of expert knowledge at our disposal. I hope that the tariff board will not rest content with receiving petitions from certain industries for more protection and, therefore, with looking at the question from a purely industrial point of view. Last year I ventured to suggest that it was not only the tariff question that should be studied thoroughly from an expert and economic point of view, but the whole problem of taxation as connected, not only with paying our debt and meeting our fixed charges, not only with the balancing of our budget as between revenues and expenditures, but mainly with regard to the situation of the various communities, the different classes of people in Canada who contribute to the prosperity of the country, and to find out whether they suffer or not from the systems of taxation that we have adopted from time to time without much thought, I am afraid, being given to the interlocking of the various parts of the fiscal machinery.

When that is done, of course the government will have to take their stand. I have much personal friendship and sympathy for our Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb). He is a canny Scotchman, and next to my race and my province, the Scotch people and Scotland are very close to my heart. But a canny Scotchman must not push diplomacy too far. The time is soon coming when the hon. gentleman and his colleagues will have to choose whether they belong to highland or to lowland. In his native country there were a few highlanders and a few lowlanders who, after having stolen each other's cattle, found a new country, no man's land, which separated the lowlands of Scotland from England. There they changed somewhat their patriotic occupation, and they alternately plundered the highlands and lowlands, and the land of the southron or the Sassenach.

After the inquiry has been completed, the government will have to make its choice as between—I do not say no tariff: nobody, I think, advocates that at the present time—but as between tending towards low tariff and freer trade, or stability of tariff as upheld by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) for example, and a stiff increase in the tariff as recommended by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett).

I could leave the matter there, and logically I should not discuss the tariff, since I consider the House is not in a position to pass judgment upon it. But in view of certain declarations that have been made in this House by members of all parties this session, last session, and during the two election campaigns through which we have passed, I wish to place myself on record emphatically—and I will do it upon every occasion—against the idea that the province of Quebec stands for a high tariff. It has never done so in the past. It is less so favourable to-day, and the time is, I think, soon coming when not only the rural population of Quebec, but a fast growing number of thinking people in the cities will realize that the protective system, as applied so far, has done just as much harm to rural Quebec and eventually to the whole of that province as it may have done to the west or the maritime provinces.

When the government make their choice, if they are in need of scientific argumentation against the principle of protection, against the application of protection, they will find ample argument in that extraordinary address which was delivered to us a few days ago by the hon. member for West Calgary. With the little knowledge I have of economics, I admit I remain dumbfounded. I greatly admire the talents, the brilliancy and the versatility of the hon. member. In fact, he found it possible within the scope of one oration to bid fairly and boldly for leadership either of unalloyed Tory imperialism or of Simon-pure Liberalism, and he ended practically with an offer to socialism. The hon. gentleman is quite fit, I admit, to lead any and every party. Was it a warning to the future convention to be held in Winnipeg, that if the perpetually renascent Conservative party do not take advantage of the shining lights they have at their disposal, some of those shining lights may find their way elsewhere? I do not know.

But not only did the hon. gentleman base his very interesting and convincing argument with regard to the principles of taxation upon that prophet and precursor of the Manchester school which gave free trade to England—Adam Smith—but he out-Heroded Adam Smith. He added two principles to the famous four principles once enunciated by the father of free trade. Those two are that taxation, to be properly laid down, to be beneficial both to the country and to the individual, must be universal and visible. This stands as the most direct condemnation of the principle of protection that can be imagined. If there is one form of taxation which is not and which cannot be universal, it is a customs tariff, at least as we have applied it. If there is one form of taxation which the ratepayer cannot measure, cannot count, so that to him it is not visible, it is that form of taxation which he never pays himself, but which he reimburses to the government or to the protected manufacturer through the retail dealer to whom he goes to get all his necessities of life.

I think I could discern, in listening to and reading that very excellent address, that perhaps the hon. gentleman thought that we could combine, as it has at all times been held, although somewhat paradoxically, I think, the principle of free trade and the principle of protection, just as the United States have done. I know it has been an argument frequently used in the past and sometimes used in the present by upholders of a protective tariff. Strange to say, that argument and that example have been mostly, if not exclusively, used by members of that party which, for the last twenty-five years at least, have been posing before the people of this country and the people of the empire as the staunchest upholders of all British institutions. Its stand always is: We should do as the United States have done; if we imitate the United States we will reach the same result.

I do not want to dwell at length upon that. But if we reflect a few minutes upon the differences in conditions—climatic, geographical, economic, ethnical—we will realize that even if we should copy to the letter, in every item of our tariff, or in any other part of our fiscal legislation, the policy of the United States, we could not reach the same results. Because we are not similarly situated; because there are many raw materials required by our protected or non-protected industries that we must perforce and for all times import. Therefore the idea that Canada can be a self-contained and a self-sufficient country is nullified at the beginning by the very conditions of the country itself—conditions which no government, no party, no policy, can change or will ever change.

With regard to the effect of the tariff on the peopling of this country, I have heard that question discussed for the last thirty-five years at least. I remember my old friend Sir Wilfrid Laurier telling me that in making his maiden speech in the legislature at Quebec, in 1872 I think it was, he had denounced the Conservative government because of the migration of our population to the United States. I remember well the time between 1891 and 1896, when this country was passing through very dire commercial, agricultural and industrial crises, when we Liberals were denouncing the Conservative party because protection had ruined this country, because protection had uprooted the rural population of our provinces and brought them to the large industrial centres; and because, when the crisis came, if they did not go back to the country they took the road to the United States. There are many causes for the migration of our population from Canada to the United States. There are those permanent causes to which I have just alluded with regard to our fiscal policy, permanent causes which it is absurd to ignore. The climate of Canada as compared to that of the United States is of itself an impediment. The geographical division of the country is in itself an impediment. I once defined Canada, as it has been carved by diplomats, by politicians, on both sides of the ocean, without any regard to the future, without any regard to the national exigencies of the country, as "a geographical absurdity." But that is done. Does it mean that we cannot face the issue and remedy it? No; but it means we have some obstacles to vanquish; it means that we should exercise more patience, it means that we cannot hope to see this country grow to the same degree of amplitude as the United States have grown during the century that has passed. It means also—and for many, many years to come, probably for all time to come—that vast portions of our country, especially the western portions, will always have to export an immense quantity of farm products for which they have the right to demand the easiest market, the largest and most varied number of markets, in the easiest and cheapest manner; and we, as Canadians, have the duty to help them in getting them as much as we can.

With regard to the maritimes, well, one of of the late colleagues of some of the hon. gentlemen sitting on the other side, a true old Tory, Mr. McCurdy, in several articles and lectures, endeavoured to prove, and I think did prove somewhat successfully, that the application of the protective policy had practically ruined all the small industries of his province; that Nova Scotia had suffered from protection and by protection, because the application of protection to the conditions of our country had concentrated the large industries mainly in the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec—I would go further and say mainly in some of the large centres of Quebec, and more so in various centres of Ontario—and had ruined all the small local industries of the maritime provinces. I am not a judge as to that, but here surely is testimony that cannot be allowed to go by the board without being examined. So that taking into account the conditions of all parts of the country, taking into account those permanent conditions to which I have referred—the configuration of the country, as well as the lack of population which we cannot hope to remedy in a few years—Canada must for a great number of years look to foreign markets to export the vast surplus of her farm products. And if we want to get foreign markets, and many of them, we must be prepared to deal fairly with those countries where we will find such markets. The hon. member for West Calgary made an argument which I think is sound. He said we should look rather to those countries where our products are needed than to those that will take them simply on account of some treaty we may make with them. As a general proposition that is quite true, but it has to be scrutinized. All our surplus products, either agricultural or industrial, will not be needed all the time in one country or in a few countries. Conditions change elsewhere as they do here. The conditions of production differ; the wage-earning power of various countries changes; the value of the money of a foreign country changes, and has changed tremendously since the war. But the hon. member for West Calgary said that if we relied upon foreign markets for the exportation of our products, we may find ourselves—by a stroke of the pen or in a single night—deprived of those markets and thereby our trade and industrial conditions will be entirely upset. I think this is an argument in favour of looking for as many markets as we can get, because we cannot suppose that if we export our wheat to ten countries instead of four we shall be in more danger than if we look only to one market. You cannot suppose that a country will agree to trade with us, either by treaty or by necessity, and then change its policy just as a matter of caprice as the hon. member said. You cannot reasonably anticipate that if you deal with twenty countries instead of ten, those twenty countries will gather together and arrive at a decision to close their markets to our product just for the sake of making good the argument of the hon. gentleman.

But where I could not follow the hon. gentleman was the application he made of that argument to the policy pursued by the government in trying to make treaties. The argument applies to a certain degree to countries that take our produce of necessity—precisely the contrary of what he said—and which by a change in their tariff, if they see fit, may change our conditions. But I have always understood that, all the world over, the purpose of trade treaties was precisely to create and maintain for a certain number of years certain conditions of stability between the two parties to the treaty. When we made the reciprocity treaty with the United States in 1854, it was made for ten years with the proviso that it could not be terminated except on two years' notice; so that for at least twelve years we knew with what conditions we had to deal, so far as the United States was concerned; and the very proof of the unsoundness of the argument of the hon. gentleman is, that enumerating a number of countries with which we have trade treaties at the present time, he mentioned the fact that the United States at a certain time adopted a stiff tariff against our products. Precisely; we had no treaty with the United States.

But there is one point which has been touched upon by the hon. gentleman, and I think neglected by most other speakers, upon which I want to put myself on record once more, and that is with reference to our preferential trade. The hon. gentleman grew enthusiastic on that point. He let us see the dawn of the day when the whole British Empire would be a self-sustaining and self-contained empire. He reminded us of the patient gathering of figures by Lord Long. Lord Long was a very able man; but as a practical politician able to get a policy through, there was one man connected with that idea who was far stronger than Lord Long, and that was Mr. Joseph Chamberlain. It does not mean, because the famous trade reform campaign turned so stiffly against the Tory and Unionist party in England that tariff reform will never come about; but I think some facts that came out then prove to us that if there is an unrealizable policy, or one absolutely uncertain, it is that idea of an inter-imperial trade union. Always as in the United States, the hon. gentleman said. Again I repeat, if Canada cannot expect in the application of a protective policy to reap the same results which the United States have reaped, because of the differences in conditions between the two countries, to a far greater extent is it futile and idle to think that the British possessions scattered over the five continents, separated by the seven seas, composed of all climates and races, can ever come to a common policy in any matter whatever that can be conceived. You may say that precisely because of the diversity of conditions which exist between the various countries of the British Empire, the British Empire can be self-sustaining. Theoretically, yes, if you can bring all those countries together and make them stick together as do the fifty states of the American union. Quite so, but precisely because each of the countries of the British Empire has closer neighbours than other British countries, has trade relations, and intellectual relations, good or bad, such as those that have been described this afternoon by the hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken), it is idle and futile to think that you will ever get them to agree upon one empire policy. Therefore, we have to fall back upon the somewhat lame and, I may say, absurd policy which we have been practising for the last thirty years.

One very curious thing about that policy, Mr. Speaker, is to find that the three parties at present dividing public opinion in Canada are agreed upon it. The high protectionists are in favour of maintaining the British preference; the freer trade party, as the Liberal party is supposed to be, are also in favour of maintaining that preference; but to my astonishment, gentlemen on the other side who are bent upon the ideal, which they may reach one of these days, of absolute free trade are also in favour not only of maintaining but increasing the British preference. Have they never thought that the strongest argument in fact which they can leave in the hands of the protectionists of this country is the maintenance and increase of the British preference? Do they know how it was originated? I can tell them.

I was then a young member of this House. In 1896, as in some years previous and some years after, the Liberal party had denounced protection as organized theft and robbery. At the same time, some of the organizers of the Liberal party had received subscriptions from the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and had pledged themselves that the program of the party would never be applied. So the poor leaders of the party were divided between their public utterances and the private engagements that had thus been made. Something had to be done. That is always the argument used by party leaders in those circumstances—'something must be done'—and they adopted that device of the British preference. They said: We will grant a preference to British goods, and not only to British goods, but to the goods of all countries that will offer us terms equivalent or as nearly advantageous. There was some sense in that. It was based on a policy of reciprocity. It was a policy inspired by the idea of looking for markets everywhere.

Three years later, under the excitement of the South African war, it was decided to put the stamp of patriotism on that policy. Not Canadian patriotism, no; but the stamp of imperial patriotism. The old policy of Sir John Macdonald, that of a true national policy for the benefit of the people of Canada and the protection of Canadian industries against British as well as foreign competition, was discarded, of course, by the newly formed and inspired Tory-Imperialistic party; and the Liberals who then and later had a disposition to follow suit weakly, the Liberals —partially Tory, partially protectionist, partially imperialistic, partially everything—thought they would go about half way between the attitude of the Tory party and their own past promises, and thus we went on.

Now what has been the result? The maintenance of the British preference is practically the only cause for the agitation for a higher tariff, so far as our large industries are concerned. Take the woollen industry, or the boot and shoe industry. Talk with those men in private. I know a good many of them. I took up this question twenty-five years ago when I was in this parliament, and I know several of the most important manufacturers of boots and shoes in the province of Quebec. Privately they all tell you that if the British preference were done away with they would not demand a higher tariff, as their present protection would be sufficient. But in order to keep in line with the false sentiment that was at the basis of that policy they say: We have no objection to the maintenance of the British preference provided you raise the general tariff. The same with the woollen industry.

But if you intend to maintain that British preference, why not apply it honestly and in a practical manner? I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce mentioned the other day that the Australians—and quite properly —in the application of their treaty with us demanded, for example, that automobiles, in order to come under the treaty tariff, should be manufactured in Canada to at least fifty per cent of their value. If I am not mistaken, in the application of the preference, they exact 75 per cent of British value, either in raw material or in labour, before they consider the goods as being imported from Great Britain and entitled to the preferential tariff. Here we do not follow that principle. A personal friend of mine, interested in a very large business, travelling in France, Belgium and Germany a couple of years after the war, saw there in foreign factories woollen goods stamped in advance "British made goods". They were made in Germany, they were made in Belgium and they were made in France and shipped to England. A little surplus work was done upon them in England and they were reshipped to Canada as British-made goods. I think that kind of competition is unfair and dishonest. If we wish to have a British preference, let it be a truly "British" preference; but let us not permit the British trader, at the expense of both the English and Canadian labourer, profiting by the cheaper labour of the continental countries, to impose upon us under false pretences merchandise which is neither British nor Canadian, but foreign made.

But I go further. The time will soon come when, recovering our senses, we will do as all other countries have done, and make our choice either for a protective tariff pure and simple, as Macdonald and Tupper conceived it and applied it—a purely Canadian protective policy—or we will make up our minds that, considering the conditions of our country as they exist and the need of a larger market from year to year for our farm products, we are not going to sacrifice those advantages for the maintenance of a few artificial industries, and at the same time enforce upon our people the necessity of buying at a higher price goods which they could get elsewhere, especially those goods which are made of raw material not coming from the soil of Canada, and which the soil of Canada will never produce. That is all I have to say upon that question for this year, but I want to place myself on record and protest once more against the assertion that Quebec stands as one with Ontario on that question. I will go further and say that I believe that there is an increasing number of people in Ontario who realize that the protective policy has not given to the country at large what it promised.

As far as the province of Quebec is concerned, I pledge my word in that regard. I have known my province for many years. I have carried on not only political campaigns but various campaigns of education on many subjects. I know rural Quebec perhaps better than urban Quebec, but I know the people of the cities also; and I say the number of people in the province of Quebec who realize that the so-called national policy has not given to us yet what it has promised is growing. I do not say that we are prepared, by a stroke of the pen, as the hon. member for West Calgary has suggested, to upset our policy. No. Sensible people must take account of facts and of created—I will not say created rights—but industries developed, giving employment to a large number of people. I think I can fairly claim for the people of my province that they are pretty sensible on the whole. They may not agree with the member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken) upon many aspects of the national spirit, but I think on the whole we have proven that in matter of economics and matters of financial administration we are pretty sensible. We are not so apt to jump at every new idea that is proposed. We are very careful before we accept clap-trap. On the whole the province of Quebec is the best situated of the whole Dominion, financially, economically and socially speaking. From that point of view the province of Quebec is not prepared to jump one way or the other, but it is prepared more than ever, to listen to good reason whether it comes from Saskatchewan, Alberta or Nova Scotia, when we are asked to revise our fiscal policy in order to suit the needs of the whole of Canada. The province of Quebec is more convinced than ever that from a French Canadian point of view, or an all Canadian point of view, agriculture is the important industry of the country. We feel that the spirit of the rural population is certainly the safest for the country to rely upon.

I am not so sure of the argument that we must create by artificial means more industries in our country. We have already too many. What we want is an adjustment of industries. What we want is an adjustment of the capitalization of industries, an adjustment of wealth as between industrial interests, tradesmen, farmers and various classes. In other words, what we want is the introduction of certain principles by which we can arrive at a proper adjustment in matters financial, material and economic. If I could revise the utterances of Adam Smith I would say that, over and above the four principles enunciated by Adam Smith a hundred and fifty years ago, and the two principles enunciated by his successor in this House, I would say that the main thing in view in our whole dealings in the fiscal and financial field is that we should not think of the wealth of any class, but of the maintenance of the family. That was the great fault of the Manchester school. They thought of the individual. They were essentially individualists. They rendered great service in freeing the individual from the yoke of monarchy, from the yoke of autocracy, from the yoke of aristocracy; but, unfortunately, they did that with a view of bringing in the individual considered by himself, either as a ratepayer or as a citizen. But we must come to the right and sound view that the maintenance of the family, of the family spirit, of the family prosperity, is the basis of all sound society. If we do that, if we maintain what we have, especially in the province of Quebec, of the social spirit, created and developed in a well-organized family, we will have done more to resist the spirit of American absorption, of American imperialism, of American mentality, than by any rate of customs tariff applied to this quantity of magazines and newspapers.

Now, with regard to the rest of the budget, I must confess that there I stand, I will not say in glorious isolation, but in noble minority with my friends opposite on almost every point. Had it not been for that premature paragraph contained in the first portion of the motion of the hon. member for Macleod, I would vote with them with my two hands. I entirely agree with them that the war debt should be paid by war taxes. I entirely agree with them that we should not diminish the war taxes as a whole, and that we should keep them before the eyes of our people as the price we have to pay for our criminal follies accumulated from 1914 to 1918. At the same time, I should not like to go too fast. I would not advocate paying off too rapidly our debt, because if we want to preserve future generations from the calamity which a blinded public opinion, conducted by public men whose motives I will not qualify, but who sacrificed the present and the future interests of our country in order to serve foreign ends on another continent, I should like our descendants when the next war comes to have something before their eyes that will cause them to say: Let us wait before we attempt to commit suicide once more. I think we should continue to bear a pretty heavy war debt and heavy war charges until the world's atmosphere has cleared and until Canada has decided whether it belongs to itself or whether it is to be in the future, as in the past, the instrument of an imperialistic policy in the Pacific or the Atlantic, in Europe, Asia or elsewhere. Morley once said: The tax gatherer is a good school master. The present generation has listened to the lesson. Let the member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) endeavour to launch a crusade for an expedition to China, and he will find out that the present generation, in Ontario as elsewhere, has learned something of the lessons of the war. But twenty years hence? I do not know. Therefore until we have made up our minds what our duties are, what our national entity is composed of, what our obligations are to ourselves or to somebody else—until that time I think it is a good object lesson for us to keep before ourselves a pretty stiff war debt.

But I think our war taxes, as all other taxes, need readjustment. I expressed that view last year; I still hold it. Something was done towards attaining that end last year. I am sorry to say that I do not find the same spirit in evidence this year. I do not think there was any necessity for the 10 per cent reduction in the income tax. It will give nothing to people with small means—they do not pay it—and very little to people who pay, let us say, $100 of income tax. The real beneficiaries will be the people with large fortunes and large incomes, that is, the people who are most responsible for the creation of that debt, and a large proportion of whom built up fortunes in the four years of war at the expense of our population—fortunes dipped in the blood of our sons. Instead of making that reduction, which will curtail the financial means of the government to meet our war charges, I think the government should have implemented the promise made last year by the late Minister of Customs, that if any change was made this year in the income tax it would be to exempt all children under 21 years of age and in charge of their parents. I repeat—it may be a hobby with me; I admit I am interested—we should always think of the family in these matters. We pretend to be one of the most advanced countries on earth, we pretend that our civilization, our literature, our system of education may stand on a par with those of the most enlightened countries. Well, what encouragement do we give fathers of families to endow their children with a complete education? We punish them for having children, we punish them for keeping their children at home in order to educate them. I say that is wrong, socially speaking. Better maintain the 10 per cent all round and make the fathers of large families benefit by the further exemption which was promised last year by a then member of the government.

Now with regard to householders, they also have much to do with the family. Last year my friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) and myself joined hands with respect to this. I think we should put all householders on the same footing. At present the man who owns his house is exempt from taxation on its yearly value. An employee with moderate means who pays $500 or $600 rental is not allowed to deduct that as a charge against his income. I think we should all be put on the same footing, that there should be a deduction, which could be calculated as a fair average, let us say, in cities of $500 a year, and in rural districts of $300 a year; and whether a man owns his house or pays rental he should be allowed to deduct that amount; but that if he owns a house worth $200,000 or $300,000 he should pay something on the yearly value over and above what is necessary for providing the average class of habitation for a family. To show you the spirit, Sir, in which those things are considered, I was talking over that point last year with one of the highest officials of the department, a very honest and capable man. Here is what he put forward in objection to my proposition: "Well, that is pretty stiff. A man who owns a house worth $200,000 ought to be a useful citizen. I don't see why we should go for him." Surely if a business man, or a man with acquired or inherited wealth, has the means of living with his family in a house that has cost one-fifth of a million dollars, he is capable of contributing a little more to the exchequer of this country than the man who has to pay $40 a month to live in a rented house—with the danger of seeing his rental raised, as was done during the war by some of those people who pay nothing on the yearly value of their palaces —but doubled the rentals of their tenants during the war—other patriots!

Let me mention a small matter, though I was told that it might be pretty important as far as the amount of money collected is concerned. I was given this information by someone closely connected with the making and operation of this income tax. I have seen myself in the American law and in the circulars issued by the American government to their various officials engaged in the application of the law, that the object of the American income tax law is to tax all revenue at its source. With regard to the very large companies employing a considerable number of individuals you thereby reach the income not only of the companies themselves, but of all the individuals connected therewith, in so far as these incomes are represented by salaries, profits, bonuses and so forth. On the other hand, I am told that the government, quite properly, has made arrangements with a number of foreign governments, the American, the British, the Belgian, I think, and several others to this effect: nationals of any of these countries living in Canada pay income tax in Canada only beyond and above the amount they would pay in their own country; and if our tax is lower they pay the difference to their own country. Canadian employees living in foreign countries and employed by Canadian companies do not fall into this category. The company deducts from its receipts all the salaries paid to the foreign employees, and these private incomes are not reached by the Minister of Finance. Their income tax is paid, for example, to the United States in the case of Canadians living there. If we applied the principle which is in force across the border, we should reach the income at its source and in that way we might reap a pretty fair surplus of taxation.

With regard to the sales tax, I am not competent enough to offer any comments, not having had enough experience in that branch of taxation. I will say this, however. Last year I called the attention of the Minister of Customs to the situation of what I may call small rural industries, such as sawmills, sash, window and door factories, and so on. The minister informed me that he had already the power to exempt some of these and that he would secure the means of exempting others who had only a small trade. Let me give an illustration. There is, in my constituency—I am sure there are many similar cases elsewhere—a first rate labourer, a good intelligent fellow who grew up in his trade until he was able to put up a small plant which he operates with his son. Last year he brought me all his sales tax returns, the monthly sheets which he is obliged to fill up to meet the exigencies of the Customs department. In the whole year he had manufactured and sold no more than $2,200 worth of goods, out of which he had to purchase his raw material and keep a family of twelve; and he was exacted $110 in sales tax! Here is the father of a family of twelve paying $110 as his contribution towards the redemption of our war debt—for which I can assure you he was not responsible—out of a gross revenue of $2,200. Surely there is no sense in that. It may be asked, could he not have passed the tax on to the purchaser? Well, you know how it is in the country. Here is a very small factory and about a mile away there is a small mill where the individual gets his work done. The farmer, rather than pay the sales tax to the so-called manufacturer, purchases his lumber, goes to the mill, gets his work done there and so escapes the tax. Some consideration should be shown to such small traders.

I come now to the stamp tax, which has been called a nuisance tax. I fail to see that it is more of a nuisance to put a $10 stamp on a large cheque than a two-cent stamp on a small cheque, although I think it was a good thing to raise the margin from five to ten dollars. In my opinion, however, we could have required the use of stamps of denominations in keeping with the value of the cheques issued, without causing injury to anyone. I have already suggested, and I make the suggestion again, that there should be a stamp cheque on all coupons on debentures presented to the banks. I have been told by very well informed people that a large number of our patriotic millionaires are evading the income tax through holding a large portion of debentures that are not inscribed, being anonymous and "payable to bearer." They do not declare these coupons and there is no possibility of the inspector ascertaining where they are. Dividends can be reached; the names of shareholders can be discovered; but the names of bondholders cannot be got at. I suggest that a two-cent stamp on each coupon presented to a bank would not be much of a charge on debenture holders, and it would bring a comfortable revenue. That would be visible taxation; it would be equitable taxation; and it would be convenient and cheap taxation—cheap, that is, from the standpoint of the government. That brings in four of the principles of Adam Smith No. 1 and Adam Smith No. 2.

With regard to postage reduction, I voted last year for this measure, and while I cannot censure the government in this regard I think we were perhaps somewhat hasty. I do not want to compromise anyone, but I may say that I had an interesting conversation with a person in authority in the Post Office Department. I assure the minister at once that he was not criticising either the minister or the government, but he made the simple observation that had we kept that one-cent tax on letters we could practically have rural mail delivery all through Canada to-day, provided by the amount represented by the postage reduction. There, again, I think a little thought would have led to a more satisfactory outcome. It is true, as the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) observed, that the burden of that tax fell on large companies carrying on a heavy correspondence. Certainly the reduction means practically nothing to the farmer or to the labourer, being merely a matter of a few cents a year, and it would have been a substantial contribution to the improvement of the postal service, while being easy to bear.

I do not want to detain the House much longer, but in closing I desire to say a word or two regarding the redemption of the debt. His discussion of this question constituted the most interesting part of the speech delivered by the hon. member for West Calgary. It is this particular part of his address which I bear in mind when I say that the hon. gentleman, having qualified to lead the Tory imperialistic party as an advanced protectionist party, and having qualified further to resurrect the old Manchesterian Liberal party, apparently has qualified also for the leadership of socialism in offering what is perhaps the most advanced socialistic proposition I have so far heard in this House. Of course, I would not discard it on that account. I was reminded while listening to the hon. gentleman of his propensity for quoting great Englishmen. Have you noticed, on political and parliamentary questions involving matters of precedent, how frequently the hon. gentleman resorts to Gladstone, while in economics Adam Smith seems to be his source of inspiration? I fancy a good Liberal conscience is haunting the powerful brain of the hon. gentleman. There I was reminded of an utterance of Sir William Vernon Harcourt when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer. One day he was introducing a measure, I forget just what it was, and someone interrupted saying: "That is socialism." He said: "What of that? Are we not all more or less socialists to-day?" In a sense that is true. If by socialism we mean that we must have regard to the interests of society, to the interests of the state, as covering and protecting the interests of the family and the individual, I am quite agreed on many socialistic ventures. No doubt society has been too frequently in the past sacrificed to individual interests and appetites or even grievances.

The plan proposed by the hon. gentleman is interesting but it is just as well to see it as it is. He was interrogated three or four times by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Railways, I think: Well, is that not enforced borrowing? No, no, was the answer. Of course it is. I have worked in insurance companies; that is, I have endeavoured to create and to put on a pretty fair footing a small company in my province, and I know how this goes. The inspector comes every year, looks up the books of the company, finds out what are the outstanding policies and what is the amount of the reserve. He comes there with the law in his hands and he tells the company: You must present me with a certain value of certain investments in order to respond to the requirements of the law. There is a list of investments that serves to cover the reserve. But if the state comes in and says: The first thing I do is to impose upon you 4 per cent national debentures which must form part of your reserve, then I say: You force the company to lend you money at 4 per cent. There is no use in playing with words. I do not say it is wrong but it must be examined into carefully. In the case of large companies that have been operating for years I do not think there is any harm and, indeed, there may be much good in such a policy. But if you enforce upon small companies at the beginning certain values and thus restrict their earning capacity, you may put them into a rather difficult position to start with. I admit however that is a detail that will have to be studied. What interests me is the advancing of the idea and it has to be taken up. We must not start with the idea that some of those things are repugnant to past traditions. We have broken all traditions. We have put upon the shoulders of the people of this country a war debt of $2,500,000,000 for a quarrel in which Canada was no more concerned than Greenland.

Mr. GEARY: Oh, nonsense.

Mr. BOURASSA: That is my view and the view of many Canadians.

Mr. GEARY: I beg pardon. I was rather thinking aloud.

Mr. BOURASSA: I have no objection to people thinking otherwise. I respect all opinions, especially of those gentlemen who have sustained their opinions at their own risk and expense, as the hon. gentleman did.

Mr. GEARY: I am sorry I interrupted the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BOURASSA: I have much less respect for those who have taken the best advantage possible of that sincere sentiment in some and of the imposition of that war burden upon the rest of the country, to enrich themselves. The sooner we reach them in the most practical manner the better. But unfortunately I am afraid that the further we get away from the war, the more difficult that will be. I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) that the honest, equitable and sensible manner in which we should have provided for the reimbursement of our war debt would have been a capital levy during and immediately after the war, would have been to follow up the growth of capitalism during the war, in order to find out the source of prosperity of many of the industries and individuals who gathered wealth during the war, while masses of the people were shedding their blood and paying out their money. But of course the further we get away from the war, the more difficult it will be to apply this principle of justice, because at the present time, with the system in vogue not only in this country but all the world over, a vast proportion of that infernal wealth, acquired by theft and crime, by the exploitation of the good sense, the patriotism and the blood of the masses of the people, is in the hands of other parties who are innocent of its origin. That is one of the results of the system of modern capitalism. The creators of immoral, unreal wealth, soon find means of getting so many people to partake of the titles upon which their wealth reposes, that they create a community, I will not say of accomplices, but of associates who cry out, "socialism," "communism" and "spoliation" the moment the state comes out and challenges the validity of their titles or endeavours to tax them. That is the great difficulty.

But at least let us see things as they are; let us confess the reality of things. Let us instruct the people on that very situation and by all means let us endeavour to readjust our fiscal policy. Let us try to impose the burden of taxation, I will not say so much against the rich as for the relief of the poor. I partake of the views of the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) to this extent, that everybody must pay something, but I end with these words: All people must pay according to not only their means but their social usefulness to the nation and to the state. The father of a family who bears for twenty or twenty-five years the material and moral burden of raising the proper kind of children for this country is the best contributor to the material as well as to the moral wealth of that country, and I think that must be taken into account when you raise taxation and speak of the power of paying. The tax is not always paid in money although it takes a great deal of money to-day to raise a family. It is paid with mental effort, with moral dignity, with all contributions to the development of those young men and girls who will be the people of Canada to-morrow. I think everything we can do to help fathers of families to bear the social burden of taxation as easily as possible is the best contribution we can make to the prosperity of the country.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

Mr. THOMAS CANTLEY (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, in continuing the debate on the budget I have no intention of tendering any lengthy or profuse compliments to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb); his native honesty is apparent to and his courtesy recognized by all members of the House irrespective of party affiliations. His ideals as to the best fiscal policy for this country naturally do not meet with the entire approval of hon. gentlemen on this side. Speaking for myself, I was disappointed, greatly disappointed, that the Minister of Finance made no provision looking to any relief or protection for the iron and steel industry of Nova Scotia, or for any encouragement to the coal-mining industry of either eastern or western Canada. Providence has been exceptionally kind to the agricultural industry of this country during the past three years, and probably the great majority of hon. members will agree that whatever amount of prosperity we may have had in this country, be it great or small, is due almost entirely to the bountiful harvests which Canada has enjoyed during that period.

Before dealing with the budget I wish to refer to a statement made at the last session by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), and which is reported at page 550 of revised Hansard for 1926. Speaking on January 29th last year respecting our exports of raw materials, and replying to the then hon. member for South York, Mr. W. F. Maclean, he made some reference to the export of nickel from this country and its entry into Germany. The hon. member for Labelle had spoken of our extracting the mineral and sending it to the United States to be converted into the various forms for which nickel is adapted. Mr. Maclean interjected the remark "And to England", to which the hon. member for Labelle replied:

> Not only to England, too, if my hon. friend will allow me. I should not like to open up that vista upon our so-called imperial policies, but I suppose my hon. friend knows that not a German warship could have been finished, not a German cannon could have been hardened to the point of usefulness, had it not been for the Canadian nickel controlled by the international company—

The hon. member for Labelle made some reference to the various armament firms of Great Britain, Germany and France, and then stated:

> —so that every German cannon which was hardened with Canadian nickel and loaded with shells similarly hardened, which helped to kill sixty thousand of our sons, brought tremendous dividends to the numerous bishops, lords and members of parliament of England, who drew their dividends from the German weapons as well as the Germans did from English weapons.

These statements were commented on by the then leader of the opposition, Right Hon. Arthur Meighen. Replying to him the member for Labelle again referred to the matter and stated:

> I should not like to develop this theme at too great length now, as I hope to have occasion to do so at a later date. I may say, however, that all my information was secured in London from high officials of the Naval department, from gentlemen connected with the Department of the Chancellor of Exchequer and from people who have traced the capitalization of the armour trust under which all those companies drew their dividends.

I was interested, surprised and amazed at the statements the hon. member for Labelle then made, and I awaited with interest his further reference to the matter, which he intimated at that time he would make. However, the session ended without the matter being developed as my hon. friend had intimated. In dealing with the subject of nickel as an alloy with steel he evidently suffered from the disability incident to reliance on second-hand information, and that most defective. Probably I am seeking trouble when I venture to criticise any statement made by a gentleman so vastly abler in debate, indeed, one of the most exuberantly eloquent and idealistic debaters of this or any former parliament. Still the matter is, I deem it, of importance, and I think should not pass without some attempt at correction. The statement which I have already quoted, "Not a German ship could have been finished, not a German cannon could have been hardened to the point of usefulness, had it not been for Canadian nickel," is far from accurate as to the idea obviously sought to be conveyed. The property of nickel as an alloy with steel is not primarily hardness, but rather toughness and ability to resist shock. To illustrate, a large proportion of the steel used in the Quebec bridge is steel having say three per cent nickel. Here hardness was not the end sought, but toughness and ability to resist shock, due to the impact of rolling loads.

The largest consumption of nickel alloy steel to-day is in the automobile trade. In automobile construction during the year 1924, 4,800,000 pounds, or 2,400 tons, of nickel were used in the form of nickel steel in the construction of the 3,600,000 cars made in that year. Probably it is safe to say that on the average, nearly two pounds of nickel are used for each automobile built, due to the increased fatigue strength and toughness of nickel-bearing steel. In locomotive construction, side rods, and nickel cast-steel side frames are replacing those of ordinary carbon steel, the nickel steel castings testing up to a yield point of 56,000 pounds, and with a tensile strength of 90,000 pounds per square inch, and giving elongation of 27 per cent in two inches with a reduction of area of 47 per cent—material undreamed of even as late as five or six years ago. Heat-resisting and corrosion-resisting alloys of nickel are now also widely used.

Getting back to the point stressed by the hon. member for Labelle, that of the property of adding hardness to rolled or forged steel plate, sheets, structural steel or ship armour plate and ordinance, I would point out that the Brinell hardness test shows this with even as high as 5 per cent nickel to be but 12 per cent, or from 241 to 270 while the improvement in toughness was almost 100 per cent; in other words, toughness is imparted to the steel, rather than hardness. The fact is that as a hardening agent nickel is unimportant and is far surpassed by several other metals —notably manganese, vanadium tungsten and chromium.

As demonstrating the relative values of nickel and manganese as hardening agents in steel, I have here, and will, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, place on the table of the House a piece of quarter-inch steel plate, of nickel alloy, heat treated, which analyses as follows:

Phosphorus	.28
Manganese	.48
Nickel	3.01

The bullet hole seen in this plate was made by regulation standard ammunition, fired at New Glasgow some little time ago from a German army service rifle, at a distance of 25 yards, the plate being backed by a six inch block of well seasoned oak. The block of wood was penetrated to a depth of fully 3 inches by the bullet after its passing through the plate as here shown. This will show you, Mr. Speaker, how much effect three per cent nickel has as a hardening agent.

I have here another piece of plate of the same thickness, one-quarter inch, which analyses as follows:

Carbon	.45
Phosphorus	.022
Manganese	1.51
Nickel	none

The analyses, apart from the percentage of manganese and the total absence of nickel in the second plate, are practically the same for both plates. This second plate was tested with British VII cordite ammunition with a muzzle velocity of 2,400 foot seconds. The bullet was nickel jacketed, and sharp pointed, weight 175 grains, equal to 427,000 impact energy. I then further tested this plate with German Spitzer ammunition, .311 calibre, weight 154 grains, which chronographed at 2,915 feet per second, equal to 510,125 impact energy, when fired from a German army service rifle. Six shots were fired at this plate, one at 40 yards, two at 5 yards, and three point-blank, at one yard. None of these penetrated this plate, which you can see remains still unbroken and unpierced.

The behavior of these plates under ballistic test proves, I submit, that nickel has little virtue as a steel hardening alloy in the case of battleship armour plate or ordnance, or in the hardening of German cannon and shells, as the hon. member for Labelle put it.

As to the metals useful as steel alloys, Canada produces manganese and chromium. We have also tungsten, vanadium and molybdenum all available, and were the Germans entirely deprived of nickel they could still put ships in the battle line and confront our armies with all types of artillery. The lack of copper gave the Germans much more concern than did the lack of nickel. Nickel is of much more importance in industry than it is in war, and it really seems silly to get excited over its distribution either to the Germans or to anyone else.

I now wish to refer to the unfortunate position in which the steel trade of Nova Scotia is left by this last budget. Sir Charles Tupper in 1887 gave Canada the first scientific iron and steel tariff we ever had. Ten years later, the Hon. W. S. Fielding brought down his budget, which reduced the duties generally from say $13 per ton on steel bars to $7 and $8 on different classes of steel products, but made up the difference by a system of bounties which continued for five years, or to 1902. In 1903 the bounties were continued until 1907 when a further revision was made by which they were gradually reduced until they ran off in 1910. When introducing his resolution in 1902 Mr. Fielding intimated that as the bounties were reduced, or at least as and when they expired, the steel manufacturers might reasonably expect that the scale of duties on iron and steel would again be revised to the end that the steel trade protection then existing would be maintained. Unfortunately for the industry and the country, such was not done. Following 1905, under the stimulus of the Tupper tariff and bounties of 1887, and those of the Fielding policy of 1897 and that of 1902—about which date the production of steel ingots first exceeded 200,000 tons—the production in the main steadily increased until 1913 when it had reached 1,168,993 tons. During the last years of the war the average output was 1,682,536 tons, that of 1918 being 1,873,708 tons. Since that time the production has greatly lessened, until in 1926 the total output is put down as 737,000 tons, or but 44 per cent of the last war year and about 65 per cent of the best pre-war year, namely, 1913.

In Canada we have to-day fifteen modern blast furnaces capable of producing 1,800,000 tons of pig iron, yet our production of pig iron for 1925 was but 570,397 tons—33 per cent less than that of 1923. During 1926, while the official figures are not yet obtainable, the output was probably about 725,000 tons, or nearly 20 per cent below that of three years ago. So that nearly 60 per cent of our blast furnace capacity and associate equipment and plant remains idle and unproductive.

I should like to refer, Mr. Speaker, to what the protective tariff policy has done to foster the industry and to put us in a position to meet the conditions arising out of the great war. During that period our annual gross value of manufactures increased from $1,407,137,140 in 1915 to $3,520,731,589 in 1919. During the war period Canada made 75,000,000 shells, of which more than one-fifth were forged in New Glasgow, Nova Scotia. Total munition contracts, apart from shipbuilding and aviation contracts, authorised and carried out in Canada were $1,014,000,000. Canada also supplied to the United States munitions to the value of $32,785,806.

Canada produced in 1918:

Open hearth steel	1,684,317	tons
Electric..	115,854
	1,800,171
Steel castings..	73,537
Total..	1,873,708	tons

Of which 1,001,308 tons were rolled steel. That we were able to engage in this trade and increase the trade and exports of Canada so enormously as was done during the war years, which did so much to put us in a position to meet the expenses of our participation in the war, was due to the fact that years previously we had embarked upon the manufacture of open hearth steel and when the war broke out we were able to demonstrate to the War office authorities of Great Britain that in this country we could make steel which was eminently suited for producing the munitions of war, in short that our basic steel was for their purposes fully equal to acid steel, which they formerly used. The result was that we built up an enormous trade in munitions which went far toward enabling us to meet our extraordinary expenditure during the war period.

The rated capacity of the Nova Scotia open hearth steel furnaces is 44,000 tons per month. The coal required for the full production of these furnaces would be over 200,000 tons per month, or say 2,500,000 tons yearly, a quantity as great as the largest tonnage of Nova Scotia coal sent into the St. Lawrence market during the entire season of open navigation in recent years. And as nearly half of this would be consumed in the winter months after the close of navigation in the St. Lawrence, such an outlet would go far to furnish employment to our miners during this—under present conditions—season of unemployment.

I should like to point out further that, as to the reductions made in the agricultural implement duty and the relief afforded the automobile manufacturers last year, the great bulk of the cost of doing so fell on the iron and steel trade of this country, and largely on that of the maritime provinces. To illustrate that point I would like to take one item as given in the returns, which shows that the importation of these items in 1924 reached a value of $2,211,000. In 1925 it was slightly less, $2,035,000, while for the year 1926 it rose to $3,463,287, an increase of more than fifty per cent. Owing to the provision that one-half the value of the automobile had to be manufactured in Canada our manufacturers of cars imported billets from abroad—chiefly from the United States, the balance from Germany—and from such steel billets and bars forged the automobile axles. That provision did not help the steel industry of Canada one iota, because Canadian steel was not used in the production of automobiles; it was all imported.

The iron and steel trade has had to bear all, or nearly all, the reductions made in duties on agricultural implements. Under the tariff exceptions covered by items 445, 446, 446b, 447b, 448 and 591, the imports of steel from the United States in 1925 represented a value of $767,706; in 1926 that value had climbed to $2,037,000. But that is not a fair statement of the case, because prior to 1925 this class of steel enjoyed a rebate of 99 per cent. Allowing for this, however, the fact remains that over $2,000,000 worth of steel was imported free from the United States last year for the making of agricultural implements. The Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company at one time supplied a considerable proportion of the agricultural steel used by the implement makers of Ontario and Quebec, but due to putting practically on the free list most of the material used in the manufacture of agricultural implements, the Scotia Company have been forced to scrap fully a quarter of a million dollars' worth of plant, designed, built and installed solely for the purpose of producing steel for the manufacture of these implements. That capital has been lost and that portion of our trade wiped out. Therefore I say that the steel industry has had to bear the brunt of all the concessions given in recent years to both the implement and automobile manufacturers of this country.

The tariff board has functioned for about a year, and so far as the public is aware has accomplished very little of a constructive nature, and so far, as regards the coal or steel industries, simply nothing. The Minister of Finance this afternoon gave us more information than we have had hitherto in regard to what has been done by that board. I rather think that his statement of what it has achieved was not such as to greatly impress the House with its value.

I am sorry the minister is not in his seat, because I should like to point out to him what the situation is in some of the towns of the maritimes as a result of the condition of affairs that I have attempted to describe. On the hillside above the Scotia plants at Trenton, also at New Glasgow, are hundreds of steel workers' houses. Many of them are empty; others are lost to the owners who, having invested the savings of a lifetime, are now being foreclosed and sold out by loan companies. The builders of these houses and hundreds of others of our best steel workers, mechanics and fitters, able to take their place alongside the best mechanics on the continent, are to-day in Detroit and other United States cities, solely because the steel trade of Nova Scotia has been the victim of a defective tariff policy.

I have before me a copy of the Canadian tariff. It contains about seventy items which are on the free list or under the 99 per cent rebate clause. This Canadian iron and steel tariff is the most irrational, illogical and mixed mass of out-of-date items that it is possible to imagine. We have in this tariff items that have stood unchanged since the first iron and steel tariff was formulated in this country. Some of these items refer to classes of goods and materials that are not made and have not been made in Canada for twenty years. I refer to Swedish rolled iron and rolled steel nail rods for horseshoe nails. No Swedish iron horseshoe nails have been made in Canada for years, and still that item remains as part of the tariff. There is another item referring to the small spindle that goes into the knob of a door lock. It has stood on the free list for thirty years, although there is not a mill in Canada that could not roll in a few shifts all of this material consumed in Canada in the past ten years. I could also refer the House to a lot of other items that are just as objectionable and just as ridiculous.

The iron and steel pipe makers of Ontario and Quebec are favoured by the present tariff to an extent that probably is not realized by many hon. members. They are able to import iron and steel skelp from the United States or from any other foreign country at a duty of five per cent, while they have a tariff on their own product running from 27½ per cent to 30 per cent. There is no reason why the furnaces and mills of Nova Scotia generally should not provide that skelp, and would if we were given an equitable proportion of the protection on pipe. Surely, Sir, we are entitled to the same protection on steel skelp as the manufacturers enjoy on their pipe. I go further. We have a very much greater right to protection, because the capital employed in the production of the steel embraced in the skelp is infinitely greater than the capital employed in the manufacture of skelp into pipe. In addition to that, the volume of labour employed in turning skelp into pipe, which is a very simple operation, is very slight compared to the labour involved in the production of the skelp. Now, why should we have a tariff which discriminates against an industry in which large volumes of labour are employed and large amounts of capital are invested as compared with one in which the capital investment and the labour employed are trifling.

I should like to refer now very briefly to the question of coal. During the war years Nova Scotia bunkered the warships, battle cruisers, and converted liners, which kept the Atlantic trade route free to national and neutral commerce. With Nova Scotia coal was also bunkered thousands of British, allied and neutral steamers, liners and freighters, which put in for examination at both Sydney and Halifax en route to British and allied ports, being freighted with men, munitions and army supplies. Nova Scotia was then all-essential to the successful prosecution of the war. Now the war is over and our miners must remain idle during most of the winter months because of defective trade, tariff and transportation policies. To obtain the maximum output from our Nova Scotia collieries as now developed and equipped we must have more men during the active shipping season than are now available. At the present time, during the winter season, thousands are idle. This condition must be remedied and I ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) and the government to now provide that remedy. This lack of men during the shipping season will explain some of the difficulties to which our friends at the lower end of this side of the chamber have been referring in the last two or three days. It is imperative that we have more miners in the summer months in Nova Scotia than we have to-day if we are to attain our maximum output. What happens when the St. Lawrence is closed to navigation? We provided two and a half million tons of coal for the St. Lawrence last summer. It is indeed our only market. During the winter months that market is closed by ice. The result is that a considerable proportion of the miners in Cape Breton to-day are idle, including some of those who recently came from the other side, although their condition is no worse than that of our native mining population. This condition is altogether due to the fact that we have not a sane, reasonable, workable tariff policy in regard to fuel. Why should we buy from sixteen to twenty million tons of coal a year from the United States when there lies in Canada, in the east, in the west and in the central provinces, one-seventh of the entire coal supply of the whole world? If we were sensible we would so regulate our affairs as to be independent as to fuel of any nation on the face of the globe. Why do we not do so? The time will come, and it will not be long deferred when the people of Ontario and Quebec will be unable to obtain American anthracite, which to-day they think indispensable. I have here some fifteen resolutions presented to the House of Representatives in the United States during the years from 1923 to 1926, memorializing congress to enact laws to prevent the exportation of anthracite to any country whatever. This for the reason that the people of the United States realize that within a very few years their supply of this coal will be entirely exhausted. I wish it were exhausted now, because there is no reason why we should buy one ton of anthracite coal from any source, especially when those who have it do not want to sell it to us.

Mr. PERRAS: What was the difference between the price of coal in July and in October of last year?

Mr. CANTLEY: Where?

Mr. PERRAS: In the maritime provinces.

Mr. CANTLEY: There was no appreciable difference so far as I am aware.

Mr. PERRAS: Give us the figures.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CANTLEY: This national fuel question is not a laughing matter; it is a serious question in the province of Nova Scotia and it should be regarded in the same light by every member of this House, no matter from what section of the country he may come. I trust that the Minister of Finance when he comes to consider the Duncan report will so approach the question of coking plants that we shall be able to dispose satisfactorily of our fuel problem, with a view to replacing American anthracite. If this were done it would not only be satisfactory to Nova Scotia but it would cheapen the cost of this form of fuel for the people of central Canada.

I have already made a slight reference to the tariff board and I want to offer the Minister of Finance a suggestion. The customs tariff as it now stands and has stood for several years is grossly unfair to the maritimes, and instead of a board of inquiry who, during a year's labour, have produced nothing tangible, the minister should himself investigate the matters affected, as did his predecessor, who took the trouble to go over the whole of Canada, holding sittings in various industrial centres and familiarizing himself with the actual conditions. He did not rely on any commission to supply him with information which he considered it his duty to obtain at first hand. The Minister of Finance is a level headed business Scot, and I hope he will appreciate the importance of the suggestion I make and act upon it. If he does we shall be delighted to see him in Nova Scotia, and to do what we can to give him all the information he wants which will be of benefit to him in his capacity of Finance minister as well as to the province of Nova Scotia and the Dominion at large.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Before I discuss the budget I desire to refer for a few moments to the address delivered by the hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken). I was amazed at the extraordinary presumption of knowledge of farming displayed by that hon. gentleman, and the most astonishing statement he made in the course of his speech was that as a result of the introduction of certain improvements in farming implements, the farmers had nothing whatever to do between reaping and harvesting. That may be true in one or two instances where the farmers can grow their crops under dry conditions which enable them to use what is known as the combined harvester and so thresh as well as cut about the same time. But if the hon. gentleman knew anything at all about farming he would know that the number of these machines in Canada is quite limited, the cost being so very high; and he would know also that a good part of the price of these machines is due unquestionably to the protection which the implements still carry. Further on in his remarks, the hon. gentleman rebuked the farmers of the west, who he said were more prosperous than any other class of the population. I hope I quote him correctly. He thought that the farmers in the prairie provinces were in a more prosperous condition than any other class, and he gave as the reason the fact that they received more privileges from governments than anybody else. He cited amongst other matters the Crowsnest agreement and pointed out that the country suffered because of the application of these rates, which were, he said, unfair. Further, that the railway companies did not profit by these rates; and so on. I do not wish to go at any length into a discussion of this question; I do not need to. The answer is clear and simple. Hon. members in all parts of the House who were members of the committee investigating the Crowsnest pass agreement, know very well that under oath before that committee the unrefuted statement was made that even if the whole Crowsnest pass agreement were restored, rates under it, excepting in one instance, would still be higher than rates on the same commodities over similar distances in eastern Canada. That is my answer to the hon. gentleman who alleges that we are profiteering, so to speak, at the expense of the railway companies and also of the general population of this country.

Furthermore, quite recently Mr. Vien, a member of the Board of Railway Commissioners, made this statement to the Canadian Pacific railway counsel:

> The Crowsnest rates are very, very profitable.

Subsequently Canadian Pacific officials under cross-examination agreed that the rates were very, very profitable. Where then does the argument of the hon. member for Toronto West Centre stand? The hon. gentleman should also remember this fact, that on all the products we ship from the western provinces outward for sale anywhere else we secure special rates only on export commodities. Our products when sold are sold subject to a deduction of transportation rates from the price. The hon. member should get into his mind this fact, that on the other hand manufacturers add to the price of their commodities the total freight to the destination, so that not only are we as primary producers compelled to have deducted from our price the transportation rates on what we sell at the time we sell it, but when we buy commodities from the hon. gentleman's friends in eastern Canada—and we are very glad when we can buy them; they are sometimes very good—we have to pay transportation charges upon them all the way out. We are thus caught both ways, and still he alleges that this is a special privilege to us.

There are many other questions which might be taken into consideration but I do not wish to dwell too long on the hon. member's speech. Let me take up briefly just one other point at this stage. He suggested that to-day, owing to the introduction of labour-saving devices, we were becoming very prosperous. Of course we know that is ridiculous. We know that the same labour-saving devices are applied in eastern Ontario and farming conditions there are anything but prosperous. Although in western Canada we had last year a relatively large crop, the grade was very low and the net result to the farmer was not high. On account of the quantity of grain reaped by most of us it was a year in which we did not lose as much as we lost in other years and some districts made gains. On the whole conditions were little better than those of the last five years so far as agriculture was concerned. It is only fair to make that statement. But for hon. gentlemen to suggest that we are amongst the prosperous classes is ridiculous.

About the time, let us say of Lincoln, out of every one hundred persons seventy were engaged in agriculture. This meant simply that seventy farmers or farming people produced enough food supplies for themselves and thirty others and, in addition, they may have had a little for export. To-day, as a result undoubtedly of labour saving devices and improved farming methods, roughly thirty out of every one hundred persons are engaged in agriculture. This means that thirty persons are supplying themselves and seventy others with food supplies and, in addition, have a vast surplus for sale in foreign markets. On that basis, if on no other, agriculture should be the most prosperous industry in this country, instead of being amongst the most depressed. The proposition is so simple that one need not worry about it any longer.

May I say to the Minister of Finance, a man for whom I have the deepest respect and affection, that he has succeeded at least in introducing into this House a rich man's budget. It is a triumph for the rich man in this country. It is disastrous for the poor man in this country. It offers nothing to the great working classes, the great masses of the people, except what they can secure on what may through good fortune be passed on to them through possible reductions in the price of commodities as a result of the reduction in the sales tax. It is problematical whether retailers and wholesalers will pass on that reduction except in the case of high-priced commodities; but as regards articles of low value there is very little possibility that any of the reductions will be passed on to the common people. Therefore let me sum the budget up at the opening of my remarks; let me give it a title, we will say. It is a rich man's budget. You will like Robb if you have a big income; you will not like Robb if you have not a big income. Some hon. members belonging to the august Conservative party to my right say that they do not like him; that they hate him. I think they do politically speaking; none of us does, personally speaking.

The Minister of Finance appears to have taken a good deal of his policies from Mr. Mellon. Mr. Mellon is a very astute man, but he represents, as no other man does in the United States, the big interests of that country. Far be it for me to say that the Minister of Finance represents the big interests of this country, but certainly he is doing his best to assist them. There have recently come to us some despatches in which it is indicated that Secretary Mellon's triumph in the enactment of the new tax law means that he has saved to the richest individuals and corporations in the United States more than $3,000,000,000 in federal taxes. We have not enough people in this country to enable the Minister of Finance to do that; but if we had, no doubt he would do it. Twenty millionaires were listed, showing the amounts they saved by the 1926 tax law over their tax of last year. For example, Mr. Rockefeller Junior, who gave $10,000 to the Republican campaign fund in 1924, saved, as a result of the introduction of that law, $2,762,000 of the payment of $6,277,669 he made in 1925. Mr. Henry Ford, who does not seem to have contributed to any campaign fund, is said to have saved $1,147,875, and Edsel Ford saved $949,544. Strangely enough, Mr. Mellon himself comes next—I do not know whether the Minister of Finance is in the same position; perhaps he can inform us later—with a saving of $828,348. He too gave $10,000 to the party campaign fund in 1924. Far be it from me to suggest that there is any connection between the income tax reductions of this year and the campaign funds of either party, but the time is now come in this country when the fullest possible examination into the sources of campaign funds is overdue, and on that point I intend to dwell at some length a little later on.

Before I get to that stage let me take up the budget items in sequence. It is proposed to make a reduction of 10 per cent in all rates of the income tax. Last year's reduction was swallowed—well, reluctantly by some of the members of this corner of the House, because we were convinced, or had been convinced by specious argument, that it meant an increase in taxation of the richer people and a saving to those who did not have big incomes. However, we unwillingly swallowed it. The situation in the House may have justified us to some extent in so doing. We had an extensive program of legislation to carry into effect, but notwithstanding the plausible argument that the rich were being taxed more and the poor less it would not have taken much for us to have opposed it. But this year no longer does there exist any excuse for supporting a budget which proposes to reduce the income tax all the way round. I say so because in this country the great majority of the people, by far the great majority of the people, pay no income tax, nor can they pay it. The income tax, indicated this afternoon, is a war tax. That is, it was introduced during the war years for the purpose of assisting in meeting the cost of the war. It was introduced into Great Britain, about the time of the Crimean war for a similar purpose, but its advocates have always insisted on the introduction of the income tax in order that amongst other tax reforms it may be used by steadily increasing stages to replace unfair indirect taxation. Hon. members to the right of the Speaker, who are fairminded men who sincerely and conscientiously believe in low tariff and think that the future of this country depends upon the development of her natural resources rather than on the fostering of artificial industries, will certainly have some difficulty in explaining the position which they have taken so far on this point. They should not overlook the fact—I do not think they are overlooking the fact, they are simply blinding their minds temporarily to it; but it will be brought subsequently to their attention with great force and strength that every step taken in the direction of reduction of income tax takes them further and further away from tariff reduction. Not only that, but it takes away from them the ability to tax those who can pay and are able to pay because of the war, because of the profits made in the war, because they were the people who accumulated during the war vast sums, vast fortunes, as a direct result of the war. It is true some of it has been distributed through death, inheritance, distribution of estates, and so forth, but the bald fact remains that the people who now are in a better position than any others to pay income tax are those who have profited, either directly or indirectly, from war conditions. It is not fair to the public, it is not fair even to hon. members opposite, that a Minister of Finance should introduce into this House a budget in which I say to hon. members opposite they had no part. I challenge hon. members opposite to tell me if they were ever taken into consultation upon this budget. The public does not know it. The public assumes —always has assumed, I am sorry to say— that the Minister of Finance before the introduction of the budget at least consults the party that sits behind him and is supposed to support him. I do not believe a single member opposite saw the budget, had it read to them, or knew anything about it before it was brought into the House. They are in the position that I am. It is not until after its delivery that they are able to form any idea with respect to it or are in a position to criticise it. Is that fair? It is in my opinion a most ridiculous position in which to place hon. members. That the nation's annual statement should be prepared by one man without consultation with anybody else is bad enough, but that he should budget for the nation's future, for the business or finances of the year, without consulting any of his party other than possibly the Prime Minister, is a most ridiculous situation, and one which still further emphasizes the necessity for the private members in this House, on all sides and in all parties, to do what they can to strengthen their own hands, and to take away from the executive council the steadily increasing usurpation of the control of the House.

Now I am going to come to another stage in this discussion. The Minister of Finance in his budget statement indicated that the war depression had passed. There is not a man in the country believes that—that is a man who thinks. There may be some who simply read headlines and will swallow such statements wholesale. There may be thousands in the country, aye millions, who, reading the headlines, "Twenty-seven million dollars tax reduction, twenty-seven million dollars savings to the people," will think that that is actually the case. It is so absurd to put the thing in that way that it would be hardly worth while answering if it were not for the fact that so many people will believe it. So will people believe that there has actually been a doing away with, a destruction of, post-war depression. There may have been some abatement, but if the Minister of Finance had only turned to the statistics he himself placed on Hansard without reading them to the House he would have seen that fifty per cent—no less than fifty per cent—of the annual expenditure is still directly attributable to the war. On page 390 of Hansard a table, placed there by the Minister of Finance, shows that interest on the public debt, the result of war, amounts to $116,607,000 and there are these other figures; war pensions, $36,650,000; soldiers' civil re-establishment, $7,200,000; soldier land settlement (administration), $1,300,000—and by the way it does not take into account the tremendous losses that are going to follow that unfortunate scheme; Imperial War Graves Commission, $810,000; battlefield memorials, $200,000; adjustment of war claims, $155,000; or a grand total of $162,922,000, directly attributable to the war. And yet the minister says that the war depression is over. Yet the minister says: "Let us get rid of nuisance taxes and war taxes." It is all right for my hon. friends to my right. They have always been supporters of indirect taxation and in opposition to direct taxation, but my hon. friends opposite have certainly nothing to be proud of in a budget of this type. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning), who comes down here from Saskatchewan surrounded by a galaxy, a veritable squadron, of low-tariff men, now finds himself in the pitiable position of having to swallow a budget which has not a single tariff reduction in it but worse still represents action directly opposed to the whole principle of direct taxation and opposed to the very principles he himself has very frequently advocated. I admit that political exigencies may require him to adapt himself to conditions, but I cannot believe for a moment that the Minister of Railways is comfortable; even now he scratches his eyebrows with uneasiness and with worry.

Mr. DUNNING: I would ask my hon. friend to explain, while he is on the subject of direct and indirect taxation, the gasoline tax of three cents a gallon imposed by the United Farmers government of Alberta. It may be interesting to reconcile the principles.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I should say the gasoline tax was a direct tax. It is applied to the cost of the article and we know dashed well when we are paying it. Its visibility is unquestioned, and it ought to appeal to the hon. member for West Calgary. There is no doubt about its visibility, and if that is the best answer the Minister of Railways can make to my suggestion it simply demonstrates to its utter and complete conclusion the unfortunate position in which he finds himself.

Mr. DUNNING: I may have something to say later on.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): One of the most eminent professors probably in this country, Dr. J. C. Hemmeon, of McGill university, recently gave a very illuminating and interesting address to a group of individuals in this city, and among other things said by him was this:

> Income tax accounts for only eighteen to twenty per cent of the total federal taxation in Canada, while in the United States income taxation raises fifty per cent, and in Great Britain a still higher proportion.

Yet the Liberal government, Liberal with a large "L", is getting further and further away and collecting less than ever before from direct taxation. How under heaven is the party in power at the moment going to justify to the electorate, so badly deceived, the position they have taken on this question? The professor goes on:

> It is a little strange that when our income tax was the same as the United States, they raised 30 times as much from this tax as we did in Canada.

Now wait for the question: Was not the population larger? Yes, but by how much? Twelve or thirteen times. There is the answer. I do not think we have had in Canada a more inefficiently conducted department than the department in charge of the collection of the income tax. My hon. friend from Toronto West Centre criticised the farming class to-day so bitterly on this question and charged that we were self-interested in our position with regard to the income tax, implying that the position we were taking as a group on this question was directed purely by self-interest, that we were not paying income tax as a class, and we are not I admit except for a very small proportion. Let me just give the House some figures, and still further assist the hon. member for Toronto West Centre by quoting from an article which appeared in the Vancouver Province a short time ago:

The federal income tax for the last fiscal year yielded $56,197,056, according to a report made by the Department of Finance at Ottawa. The various provinces paid as follows:

Quebec	18,281,878
British Columbia	4,150,852
Manitoba	3,423,623
Alberta	1,445,075
Saskatchewan	872,761
New Brunswick	712,187
Nova Scotia	693,403
Yukon	40,503
Prince Edward Island	37,428

The returns show that Ontario paid nearly half the tax, and that Ontario and Quebec together paid four-fifths of it. British Columbia, the third province, paid something over 6 per cent. It is worth noting that British Columbia paid nearly as much income tax as Manitoba and Saskatchewan together, though our population is not much more than half theirs, and that we paid three times as much as the three maritime provinces, whose population greatly exceeds ours.

If these figures mean that our prosperity here on the coast was proportionately greater than the prosperity of the prairie provinces or the maritimes, we should have no complaint to make. But it scarcely means that. It means, on the contrary, that we, being more highly industrialized, have larger payrolls and therefore more people who are shining marks for the shafts of the income-tax collector. As a matter of fact, the income tax of Canada is paid almost entirely by the people of the cities whose incomes are easily ascertainable. The farmers, even in prosperous years, escape.

I do not think a more unfair statement could have been made. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer a challenge to the government and to my hon. friend from Toronto West Centre. If the farmers are not paying income tax it is only because of one of three reasons, or a combination of them: (1) They have no income on which to pay the tax; (2) the income tax collectors are inefficient in collecting, are not looking after their job; or (3) the farmers are crooked and are deliberately defrauding the income tax collector.

Mr. CAHAN: Or fourthly?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I do not know of any other reason. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would suggest it.

Mr. CAHAN: Or fourthly, that the income tax provisions as they are now applied bear less heavily upon the income of the farmer, who raises the products of his own consumption and for the support and maintenance of his family, than upon those engaged in industrial occupation, to whose income the tax applies without any such deductions.

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I will read that over to-morrow.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I do not like hon. members to laugh at that, because I do not intend to be discourteous in any way. I am simply thinking of my own line of argument, and I find it difficult to get my mind off it and concentrate on some other point that may come up.

This is what I say to the hon. member for Toronto West Centre and the members on this side of the House, and to the press that has deliberately calumniated the farmer, and to any members on the other side of the House who may have been deluded by that propaganda: I challenge a full investigation into farm incomes. I challenge it with a full knowledge of what the results will be. We do not have to go very far back. We have only to go back to 1923 and study the evidence that was given under oath before the special committee on agricultural conditions to find out if the statements made on this side of the House and in the press are accurate. No, Mr. Speaker, as a class we have nothing to fear from the fullest investigation into our incomes in recent years. We are not evading the tax. We are willing to pay the tax, and always have been, and we only wish that we had an income that was large enough to be taxed.

I do hope, Mr. Speaker, that this will put some kind of quietus to this unfair propaganda which has deluded people who sincerely believe it—labourers in the cities, the working class, artisan, even the professional classes. In cities like Toronto and Montreal, many of these people firmly believe, as a result of this wretched stuff, that the farmers, especially in western Canada, are deliberately evading the income tax. I deny it, and I challenge the fullest investigation into it. I ask the hon. members who believe it, the hon. member for Toronto West Centre, for instance, to move a resolution for a committee, and he will get my whole-hearted support, and I am satisfied the support of this corner of the House, and members on the other side as well.

Mr. CAHAN: Why don't you move for the committee yourself?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Because I am so convinced that the thing is an utter mistake, a most ridiculous misstatement, and that only insensible persons or people who have no knowledge whatsoever of the facts would believe it.

Mr. CAHAN: It might remove a very erroneous impression, then.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I would be delighted to do it. Mr. Speaker, may I ask that the government establish such a committee? Let me offer it to them as a recommendation. I am afraid, however, that the Minister of Finance will find himself in a difficult position.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. gentleman knows that an investigation into the incomes of a class would produce no results. The question is as to the income of the individual in every class as distinct from every other individual and that is the difficulty of arriving at an accurate conclusion.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If the minister wants a clearer and a surer way to get at the facts, let him publish the income tax returns of the farming people in Canada. I offer that information as to myself freely. I am quite satisfied that if the department will only publish the income tax statements of the farming class, hon. members will get a good deal of information.

Mr. DUNNING: I agree. My hon. friend appears to think I am attacking his line of argument. Not at all. I am simply stating that the method of investigation he proposes would be futile, so far as results are concerned, as applied to a whole class. I think that the great difficulty with regard to the income tax is the fact that a very great many farmers have not the accurate means of ascertaining their own income which other business men have.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): As a representative of the farming class, I ask that in justice to us, and in justice to the public generally, the whole veil of secrecy over income taxation and income tax returns be removed. Let us have the truth. Let us have the whole situation put frankly before the people, and we shall see then who it is that is defrauding the administration.

Mr. CAHAN: Would it not suit your purpose just as well to make a clear distinction between the assessable income of the farmer and the assessable income of the industrial worker? The industrial worker pays rent. He is not allowed for it. He pays for every single article of food that enters into the consumption of his family. There is no deduction. But the farmer to-day has rent free, and he has the products of his own farm for the support of himself and his family, which the income tax does not touch.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It is simply another demonstration of the unfortunate position in which armchair farmers sometimes get themselves. Let me tell hon. members that we have to build our houses. We have that capital investment to make. If we do not have to pay rent, all right, I agree with you that we do not; but one would imagine from what you say that we do not have to build our houses, that the food we consume and the lands on which we raise produce came to us simply by waving a little wand. The fact is we have to dig in, and we have to build our houses, and if our labour is not equivalent to the wages paid artisans, then what about it?

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): We have to show these things in our returns too.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes, we have to. We place on our returns an amount for every chicken consumed by the household. We make a return for all of them. For every egg produced. We do not have many eggs that spoil.

In a further analysis of the situation I would like to point out to the House that out of a population of something over 9,000,000 people only some 71,000 people were totally relieved from income tax returns last year. I am not sorry these people got some relief: but I believe the tax is based on a correct principle; I am completely in accord with the principle, as the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) pointed out, that every man should pay some tax. But it is absurd for any hon. member to believe that when a man buys anything he is not paying a tax, because there is not a thing which we consume, there is not a piece of clothing we put on our backs, there is not a household utensil, carpet, basin, soap or towel, upon which we are not paying a tax which goes into the pocket of either the manufacturer or the merchant. The hon. gentleman need not snort. It is a fact, and all the snorting in the world will not get us away from it. An ex-Minister of Finance, Mr. Fielding, stated in a budget speech that for every dollar that came into the revenue of the country as a result of customs tariff taxation three dollars went into the pockets of the manufacturers. He had charge of the administration of these things, and should really know what he is talking about.

Mr. CAHAN: But my hon. friend does not know.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): He was not challenged. My hon. friend did not challenge him and cannot challenge him.

Out of the total population of Canada last year there were 3,173,169 people gainfully employed, and one-fifteenth of that number were subject to income tax. Fourteen-fifteenths of the population gainfully employed—not of the total population but simply of those gainfully employed—did not pay any income tax. That means that their incomes were not high enough to pay taxes, or that the tax was not efficiently collected.

Let us pass to another stage, and ask who profit by the Robb budget this year. Take the city in which we now reside, and, applying that question to the city, find out just the exact position. Mr. P. H. Veale made a report of the income taxes paid to Ottawa in the year 1926, and this was published in the Ottawa Journal on 27th January, 1927. I will not read it all, but will ask permission to place it on Hansard.

Mr. DUNNING: Is that the federal income tax?

Mr. GARLAND: Yes.

Federal Budget 1927

Who will benefit by the reduction in the income tax rate of ten per cent? Mr. P. H. Veale, assessment commissioner of the city of Ottawa, made public a report of income taxes paid in Ottawa for the year 1926. This was published in the Ottawa Journal of January 25, 1927. The following table is taken from the report:—

Amount of assessable income	Number of income tax payers	Average assessable income of each class
Under $1,000	4,972	$ 354
$ 1,000 to $ 2,000	975	1,398
2,000 to 3,000	399	2,454
3,000 to 4,000	201	3,471
4,000 to 5,000	99	4,016
5,000 to 10,000	216	6,761
10,000 to 15,000	60	12,383
15,000 to 20,000	29	17,384
25,000 to 30,000	10	29,821
30,000 to 35,000	6	31,809
35,000 to 40,000	3	36,396
40,000 to 45,000	3	42,933
45,000 to 50,000	1	45,870

It will be noted that 20 tax payers pay on an average income of $132,426 and Mr. Veale remarks:—"It will also be noticed that 4,972 income tax payers equal 14 per cent of the total income assessment, while 20 income tax payers equal 23 per cent of the total income assessment." He might have added that there are thousands who have not enough income to qualify them to pay income tax and they get no relief as there is no reduction in the tariff.

According to the last Income War Tax Amending Act (chap. 10, 1926), an income of $130,000 is assessed at the rate of 40 per cent or $52,000. Ten per cent reduction on $52,000 is $5,200. This answers the query as to who will benefit by the reduction in the income tax rate of 10 per cent.

Federal Budget 1927

4,972	70.8	1,760,088	14.
1,674	23.9	3,437,451	29.
216	3.1	1,460,376	13.

There are over 36,000 wage earners, male and female, in the city of Ottawa. Of these only 7,013 have sufficient income to qualify them to pay income tax. Thus 28,987 (or 80.52 per cent) of Ottawa wage earners are not living, but merely existing on a pittance.

It is not satisfactory to know that a person with an income of $130,000 would be able to buy a couple more limousines or build an addition to his house, and it is not right to encourage the rich man to spend a little more money on luxuries while the great burden of the war debt still rests on the backs of the poor man. It is with regret that I find the Liberal party adopting a policy of this kind.

On the question of farmers and the income tax, let me indicate to the hon. members for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) and Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken) one of the reasons why the farmers have not paid income tax as a class generally. The total capital invested in agriculture in the year 1925, according to the Canada Year Book, was $7,508,645,000 The value of all agricultural produce in that year was $1,453,368,000. Note that the investment of $7,500,000,000 gave a return value on the produce raised of $1,453,000,000.

Now let us come to the capital invested in manufacturing. The amount is $3,380,000,000. The manufacturing production, less cost of raw material, was $1,311,000,000. In other words, with a total capitalization of a little more than twice as much, agriculture receives approximately the same amount of return as the manufacturers do. Is it not a ridiculous position for a manufacturer to rise and claim for one instant that the farmers are defrauding the country in regard to the income tax, that they are evading it, getting rid of it, and dodging it, while they,—the manufacturers—have placed upon their shoulders the full burden of it? You cannot convince the farmer that that is the case.

Now I come to one other question. For the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1926, the excise tax collected on matches, a pretty useful little article, was $3,991,999. On the basis of these collections the reduction the income tax made by the Minister of Finance this year will amount to roughly $548,000, over half a million dollars. Now, let us see who is going to get it. In the pre-war years if you went into a store you could buy one of these small boxes of smoker's matches for a cent. Taxation was imposed and the price went up to two boxes for five cents. These two boxes carry half a cent excise duty apiece, the two together one cent. The minister cuts off 25 per cent of that one cent—one-quarter of a cent. I ask any hon. gentleman in this House to indicate to me how the retailer is going to pass on to you or to me as consumers that quarter of a cent saving. So much for that. The housewife goes into a Dominion store and buys three boxes of matches in a single carton costing 25 cents, each box holding 300 matches, or 900 in all. The total saving on that carton as a result of the tax reduction will amount to 2¼ cents. Who is going to pass that on to the consumer? The fact is clear, Mr. Speaker, that not one cent of that $580,000 will go back to the consuming public; but it is a direct loss in revenue to the country. Who get it? Well, I hesitate to suggest that the hon. member for West Calgary Mr. Bennett) will benefit in any degree from it. It might enhance the value of his stock—but that is his own business anyhow. The fact of the matter is that the match companies in this country will have to pay to the government $580,000 less this year than they did last year, supposing the consumption of matches is relatively the same. They may pass the saving back to the wholesaler, being very honest and altruistic.

Mr. DUNNING: They must.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): All right, we will grant that they must. The wholesaler might pass it back to the retailer. But the hon. gentleman who has just interrupted me, the Minister of Railways, himself knows that as far as the western part of this country is concerned we do not deal in fractions of five cents. He knows that all over western Canada you would be laughed at to suggest that you could go into a store with 4¾ cents to buy two boxes of matches, or that the retailer is going to deduct 2¼ cents from 25 cents, the price of the 900-match carton. The fact of the matter is, and I challenge contradiction, that not a dollar of this tax reduction will be passed back to the consuming public; but the treasury is absolutely out of pocket $580,000.

Far be it from me, Sir, to suggest that this is the result of any peculiar situation that may have developed, but it is significant to note that there appears to have been established during this session an understanding of some nature or other in which the public certainly are interested, and upon which the public should be informed—an understanding between both the old parties.

An hon. MEMBER: No, there is no understanding at all.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Well, perhaps my hon. friend had better wait a moment before he becomes too voluble about it. I read with considerable interest, after indeed listening to it previously, the speech of the hon. member for West Calgary. The whole tone was so placatory, so mild, so unlike the usual form of criticism that we have had in so able a manner from Sir Henry Drayton and other financial critics in past days, that one at least suspected there might be an ethiopian dodging around somewhere in this old woodpile. I was not surprised then at the speech by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) delivered some time previously, and I began to understand it. It was an amazing speech for a member of this House who has in the past been one of the bitterest critics the party opposite ever had, and one of the most able, a man who prepares himself with the greatest care, but tinctures with the bitterest gall the criticism he pours on members opposite.

Mr. JACOBS: He may have seen the error of his ways.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): He may have, but one wonders, and is justified in wondering, what sudden and extremely illuminating light came upon him to show him the error of his ways. It might have been a match—it might have been the striking of a whole box of matches. I thank the hon. member—I am not sure what constituency he comes from—for the suggestion, coming as it did from my hon. friend's own party. In his speech the member for Vancouver Centre intimated that the Conservative party had expedited the passing of certain measures. They certainly have. He continued:

This afternoon we advanced several important bills for the Minister of Finance with scarcely any comment,—

It is quite true—and so different from last year!

—and I must say that the ministry have been very prompt in making brief statements and explanations.

The ministry certainly have.

I am exceedingly anxious that we should expedite the business of this session. We have had a couple of years of pretty hard parliamentary duty, and I think both the country and parliament will be the better for a little surcease from bitterness and controversy.

No doubt about that whatever.

I can say on behalf of my colleagues on this side that we have tendered to the House our hearty coöperation.

Now, to whom does he refer by in "the House?" Well, there is only one group of individuals to whom it would be necessary to extend coöperation. I cannot imagine the party to my right extending much coöperation to us. They had their opportunity last year—and did not take it. I assume therefore that some coöperative understanding has been reached with hon. members of the government, and I should like to ask hon. members opposite what is the understanding, when this year the Liberal party, having gone to the people only a short time ago and having been returned by a fairly large majority as the result of, in part, a low tariff budget and low tariff pledges. come down to the House with a strong phalanx from western Canada, all of them I presume honest and sincere low tariff men. Western Canada sent down one Conservative—one protectionist. Well, so far as the public can judge, so far as I can judge, that one man has more influence in the councils of the Liberal party than the whole phalanx from Saskatchewan, than all the members on that side of the House—and hon. members on this side of the House now assure me that is right.

An hon. MEMBER: Absolutely.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What further evidence can you, Mr. Speaker, ask? I leave it to their conscience. I leave them to the people.

An hon. MEMBER: They have none.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I do not doubt that a bit either. I do not think there is much conscience in a coöperative understanding between two political parties, each alleging itself to be opposed to the other, and inevitably putting up the same sort of sham battle to delude the people. It is another case of dear old Tweedledum and Tweedledee. Let me predict, Mr. Speaker, that during the remainder of this session you will see just one little scrap. It will be the pleasantest little session you ever saw so far as both the old parties are concerned, and only will they make one little mock battle, to interest the public and delude them, on the Duncan report. When the maritime question comes before the House, oh yes, my friends here will have to raise some sort of noise, unless they get all it recommends; and if they get it all, in what position are the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke), the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) and all those other ardent low tariff spirits going to be? Under heaven what sense is there in the formation of a cabinet before a party of low tariff supporters in whose personnel there is almost an even break between protectionists and low tariff men? What under heaven is the use of it? If the Liberal party is sincere, if it believes in low tariffs and wants to have them, the only thing the Liberal party can do is to rid itself of the protectionists in the cabinet. Certainly the Liberal party can never adopt a low tariff policy nor carry such a policy into effect so long as the Minister of Finance is the person who now occupies that position, and so long as he is backed by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm) and others as well. And there are many others. What a pretty spectacle it must be to see the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) and the hon. member for North Bruce, together with the Minister of Finance—I hardly think he worries the rest of them very much—sitting on one side, three of them, against the Minister of Railways, the Minister of Immigration and the Minister of Agriculture on the other side. A pretty spectacle indeed, and almost as ridiculous as the present railway commission; three men sitting on either side and blocking the proceedings whenever the need arises.

The hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken) interrupted the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) during the course of that gentleman's speech with a question as to why the farmers in the United States did not advocate free trade if they were in such wretched circumstances. And a further question was asked the hon. gentleman in regard to the McNary-Haugen bill. The hon. member for South Huron was asked to explain that bill. Put the two together and you have the answer. The McNary-Haugen bill is a bribe to agriculture in the United States to accept protection; it cannot be interpreted as anything else. It is a bribe of the worst type and the farmers there will suffer for it, if they accept it. Do not let hon. members delude themselves. I heard the proceedings some time ago of one of the rural conventions in the United States —the Master Farmers' annual banquet in Nebraska. As hon. members who study agricultural conditions in the United States no doubt know, the master farmers in the United States are an organization of the more reactionary farmer class; they are the wealthy farmers, the men who have made a supreme success of their calling. One would therefore expect a measure of reaction from that group, and any bearings in the direction of shall we say, anti-protection would come from them as somewhat in the nature of a surprise. Yet only in January of this year at their annual meeting in Nebraska they loudly and apparently unanimously applauded the idea of complete free trade in pure bred stock. They suggested further that so far as they were concerned they would not be hurt by a lowering of the tariff barriers against our cattle. Nor would they be hurt. If, therefore, anyone suggests that the farmers of the United States are heart and soul protectionists, he is asserting something that is quite erroneous. The farmer of the United States is just as wise and astute in business matters as we are, and so long as the United States exports to the world at large so vast a quantity of its products as it does to-day, the farmer there cannot be anything else than a believer in a lowering of the cost of producing what he raises. Canada certainly leads at the present time in export, and to those who suggest that within a few years we shall become protectionists I would mention this fact that we export now, roughly, 300,000,000 bushels of wheat a year while the United States exports 186,000,000, a comfortable figure, almost 200,000,000. All other countries who are heavy exporters fall so far below that mark as to be almost insignificant: the Argentine 48,000,000, India, 11,000,000, and Australia, 8,000,000.

I regret this coalition that has been formed, this coöperative understanding or working arrangement that has been reached, and for this reason: the people were appealed to not only on the question of the tariff but for the purpose of establishing a stable government. The people did return a stable government. They answered the appeal of the politician to establish such a government, and not only did they provide the stable but they put a Forke in it. The unfortunate thing is that so far as this budget is concerned, the fork is either blunted or the handle is broken. There is the hon. member for Neepawa (Mr. Milne) opposite, who from his physical appearance would seem to be able to wield a fork, but unfortunately the handle of the fork is in the grip of two powerful hands—that of the hon. member for North Waterloo and that of the hon. member for North Bruce. I doubt therefore whether we shall see any moderation in tariff protection so long as the government is formed of its present personnel.

I would remind hon. gentlemen opposite that in the session of 1922-23 the Liberals had a majority in this House, and that in that year they did nothing in the way of reducing the tariff. That was the year of Mr. Fielding's "stability" budget. And how that budget was applauded by hon. gentlemen to my right! How they liked its stability! In 1924, however, the Liberals had no majority because of the situation that had developed. What happened then? They reduced agricultural implements materially. They came a little step nearer to the ideal which we and they have advocated, and the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) rang upon the dear old bell the deathknell of protection. In 1925 the government had again a majority of one or two as a result of some by-elections in the east, and again they did nothing. But in 1926 they were a minority group, so small that they had to depend for their existence entirely upon the support and coöperation of the groups in this corner of the House. In that year, when they were in the most precarious position that any government has been in in Canada, they did the finest work, they brought in the finest budget. They proceeded some distance in the direction of implementing their pre-election pledges and keeping their platform. In the year in which they not only had no majority but were in such a condition of abject minority that they had to depend utterly on the coöperation and counsel of the groups which surround me and with which I am associated, they achieved the most. That rather talks loudly for coöperation between those expressing similar principles. It ought to be an indication to my hon. friend from South Huron of the usefulness of some form of coöperation between groups, not for the purpose of merely expediting the business of the House, but of getting the best legislation enacted for the country. That is the thought that commends itself to me.

This year the party is restored, and with the assistance of the Liberal Progressives it had a majority over all. And this year a budget is brought down in which nothing of real merit is proposed. The tariff is not touched at all. What is the excuse? The tariff board. How my hon. friends from Saskatchewan have rung the changes on the creation of the tariff board. Nothing should be done they say until the recommendations of the board are before us; that is what we are told. But there is not an hon. member on the other side from western Canada who does not know that while everyone who advocated the creation of a tariff board did so for the known and avowed purpose of preventing further increases in the tariff until an examination had been made, There was never at any time any conception in the minds of low tariff people in Canada that the board should be used as a shelter behind which politicans could hide in order to avoid keeping their pledges. Yet that is the position in which my hon. friends find themselves. I do not believe they will all support the present budget; I do not believe they can. Certainly it will amaze me if the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Spence) and the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young), splendid low tariff advocates, who I am sure are absolutely sincere, can find it in their hearts to support a policy which withholds from them that ideal situation which they seek to realize. No, Mr. Speaker, the thing is ridiculous. And when we make an appeal for the publication of the reports of the tariff board we are met with the astounding reply that it would not be wise to publish the evidence taken before the board for the reason that if we were to broadcast every report made to the minister it might result in drying up many sources of information. My answer to that is that it would certainly dry up a great deal of the present crying for tariff protection. Let me lay this down as a principle in which I firmly believe. That no tariff protection should be granted to any industry in this country until that industry has submitted to the public who must pay the cost, all information needed with respect to its profits, its general business management and all matters in connection with the industry. That is only fair. If the public are going to be taxed in order to extend to an industry a special privilege, then the public are entitled to the fullest information in regard to that industry.

I come now to the sales tax. I applaud the reduction in the sales tax because I believe in a measure it does assist the common people, not to a material extent, not to $27,000,000 worth, but slightly. Let me, however, suggest that it would have been more in keeping with the pledges of the party opposite if they had taken steps first to reduce the tariff instead of reducing the sales tax. Both are evil taxes because they are taxes on consumption, but the sales tax does not lend itself to such complete pyramiding as the other. There is not such a complete exploitation of the people under it as there is under the customs tariff, and so of the two the sales tax is preferable. Therefore there should have been a reduction in the tariff before a reduction was made in the sales tax.

I come now to a portion of my discussion which I approach with some hesitation. It again touches the question which I mentioned a moment ago, that of the corruption, the complete and utter debasement of both the old parties. I wait for a challenge. I have in my hands some of the evidence given before the royal commission investigating the Customs department. I remind hon. members of the evidence given in the committee of this House last year when amongst other witnesses we had Mr. Nash testify under oath that Mr. Hiram Walker had stated to him that some hundreds of thousands of dollars had been given to the campaign funds, not of one but of both political parties. We now find—and I read the heading in one of our western papers, the Western Producer, published in Saskatoon—

Mr. DUNNING: Is a heading evidence?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I will read the evidence in a moment.

Mr. DUNNING: But the heading is not evidence.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No, but the hon. member will not like the evidence when we come to it.

Mr. DUNNING: I know all about it. I have read it.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The heading reads:

> Is it possible to have moral, efficient or democratic government in Canada while members are elected to parliament and to legislatures through the use of huge sums of money subscribed by wealthy corporations or individuals.
> That campaign funds are subscribed and spent, is admitted.
> In order to refresh the memories of our readers on this point, we print the following extract from the Vancouver Province, under date of December 14, last year. Mr. Russell Whitelaw, a director of the Vancouver Breweries, was on the witness stand before the royal commission investigating into customs irregularities.
> Mr. Russell Whitelaw, recalled, denied the suggestion of Mr. Rowell that the consolidated exporters had liquor put up in tins, for shipment abroad.
> Mr. Rowell examined the witness at considerable length respecting the now famous cruise of the motor vessel Truscilla, which cleared for a Central American port and was arrested a short time later at Tumbo island while the cargo was being transferred from cases to sacks.

The witness denied that he had anything to do with her sailing orders, or clearance papers. He had paid the harbour dues and the captain gave him the receipt he obtained for the payment.

Continuing, the witness said, in answer to questions by Mr. Rowell, that he was aware that the Truscilla had been arrested by customs men.

Mr. Rowell: You know that her bond was to be cancelled, and that collector Allen had instructions to go ahead and collect from guaranty company that had put up the bond, and that after four or five months he got orders from Ottawa to release the bond. What do you know about that bond being released?

The Witness: I had heard that the bond was released.

"Who told you?"

"The solicitors."

Counsel now produced a cheque made payable to "Cash" for $10,000. He asked the witness to explain to whom and for what it had been given.

He was reluctant to answer, and turning to the commissioners asked if he must do so. He was instructed that he must answer the question.

"It was for campaign funds," he replied.

Mr. Rowell: To whom did you pay this?

Witness: To F. R. Anderson.

Mr. Anderson, who was in court, asked permission to make a statement from the counsel table. This was granted. He stated that the money came to him as a contribution to the Liberal campaign fund for the federal election of 1925. Following the election, it was found that a number of the bills had not been paid. The Consolidated, having promised some time before to make a contribution, and not having done so, prominent Liberals came to him and sought his assistance in getting the promised contribution. This he had done, and the $10,000 was turned over to the proper officials of the Liberal party charged with the collection of campaign funds. He added that the payment of the money had nothing to do with the stopping of the effort to collect the Truscilla bond.

Then Mr. Rowell made a very significant remark:

Mr. Rowell: They simply synchronized.

Mr. Anderson: It had nothing to do with the bond.

Then the editorial comment on this is:

Here is a bond to be forfeited! Here is a government in power at Ottawa with authority to release the bond! Here is an interested liquor man, subscribing $10,000 to the funds of a political party. There is the government at Ottawa under the control of the party to which the interested liquor man has made his generous contribution! Here is the bond released. Here is Mr. Anderson saying that the secret passing of the boodle has nothing to do with the bond! Perhaps Mr. Anderson may be right.

That was Mr. Anderson. Now we have Mr. Hyatt. This extract is taken from the columns of the Vancouver Province, under date of December 17, last year:

"Light was shed at Thursday afternoon's session of the royal commission investigating the customs department, on some of the recipients of the unvouchered cheque of Mr. Henry Reifel, head of the Vancouver Breweries. Glen C. Hyatt, Vancouver broker, informed the commission that he had received in all from Mr. Reifel the sum of $42,000, which he handed over to the Liberal party.

Mr. Hyatt appeared before the commission as a voluntary witness, and although his counsel, Mr. J. W. de B. Farris, asked the protection of the court for him, as was done in the cases of other witnesses, he scorned to accept it."

He scorned to accept the protection of the court although he had committed what, under the election act, is an offence punishable.

"The total amount received was $42,000, said Mr. Hyatt, 'and I desire to say that the cheques were taken to be turned over to the Liberal party. The purpose of the cheques being made payable to me was that they might be kept on record without giving publicity to the fact that they were funds for political purposes. It may be noticed that three cheques were made out on the one day. That was done at my suggestion for the same purpose. One went to my personal account, perhaps more, but they were all for the same purpose.'"

Mr. Hyatt and Mr. Anderson were not candidates in that election, but they were agents for other parties. The question the public must inevitably ask is: Who were the parties for whom they were the agents? Who benefited by this form of corruption? For it is corruption and nothing else. Men and corporations nowadays are hardly altruistic enough to contribute to the campaign fund of any party unless they expect ultimately to get some form of privilege, some reimbursement. Let me suggest to the government that if there is one duty that is clear now, it is that not only the government but its partner this year, the Conservative party, should agree to have the fullest investigation into this whole question with the view of punishing the offenders. How evil this thing is, how opposed to law it is, how utterly indifferent to the laws are the people concerned, is best evidenced by the following. If you will read section 10 of the Election Act you will find the following very clearly set out:

No unincorporated company or association and no incorporated company or association other than one incorporated for political purposes alone shall, directly or indirectly, contribute, loan, advance, pay, or promise or offer to pay any money or its equivalent to, or for, or in aid of, any candidate at an election, or to, or for, or in aid of, any political party, committee, or association, or to, or for, or in aid of, any company incorporated for political purposes, or to, or for, or in furtherance of any political purpose whatever, or for the indemnification or reimbursement of any person for moneys so used.

Subsection 2 of section 10 reads:

Every director, shareholder, officer, attorney, or agent of any company or association violating the provisions of this section, or who aids, abets, advises, or takes part in any such violation and every person who asks or knowingly receives any money or its equivalent in violation of the provisions of this section, is guilty of an indictable offence against this act, punishable as in this act provided.

Now the penalty clause is section 84, and it reads as follows:

Any person who is guilty of an indictable offense against this act is liable on indictment or on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding $2,000 and costs of prosecution, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labor, or to both such fine and costs and such imprisonment,

And so on. I can imagine some of our brewers doing hard labour; it would be somewhat interesting. But let me say Mr. Speaker, that this is a clear disclosure now exposed before a government which has acclaimed itself from time to time as being free from the influence of these interests. Why I have heard ministers rise in this House and declare the freedom of the Liberal party from the dictation, control, or domination of interests in this country, while the public, has now had before it evidence under oath showing that not the Liberals alone had been the recipients of large sums of money, huge sums of money, from brewers, but the Conservatives also. Who knows how wide the ramifications may be? We know very well that all the campaign funds did not come from brewers only. The public are entitled to the fullest information as to all the sources of campaign funds, and I now ask this administration to take immediate steps to punish the offenders in this matter. It is true that many of the witnesses, individual witnesses, were given the protection of the court, but the law is clear as to incorporated companies giving moneys to this purpose. The brewers themselves, who are now clearly convicted by the evidence of giving contributions, are equally liable, and they should be prosecuted and penalized to the fullest extent of the act.

Now let me remind hon. gentlemen to my right that they have in their party a very eminent gentleman, one of the most able spokesman they have. Some years ago, on May 14, 1914, that hon. gentleman made an excellent speech in this House in which he spoke of railway promoters having left——a long trail of parliamentary corruption, of lobbying of degradation of parliamentary institutions, of the lowering of the morale of public life and the degrading of those standards by which public life should be truly measured.

That is what the hon. member for West Calgary thought of the lobbying and corruption that went on at that time in this country when railway construction was one of the principal questions before this parliament. The hon. gentleman went on to say:

Both sides of the House have been to blame. Just a few days before a general election, one party proposes and the other acquiesces. They are bound to ask a few questions in order that the contribution to party funds may be large enough. Let us look the business squarely in the face.

And then he continued on the subject he was discussing. There you have placed before you the opinion of a man now the financial critic for the opposition, a man who is heralded throughout the country as the possible leader of the Conservative party. I appeal to him to coöperate with other members in the House in getting this investigation. His words are clear; the evidence is clear. If his sensibilities are still as delicate —and I believe they are—if his ethical code is still as high—and I believe it is—I ask that he and other hon. members in this House do what they can to induce the administration to institute an investigation. But I will tell you frankly, Mr. Speaker, that I doubt very much, knowing the influence that can be brought to bear on individuals, my power to induce either party to start an investigation or to punish the offenders. Political parties to-day depend too materially upon campaign funds, upon huge contributions from special sources, to assist each other in disclosing the source from which these funds come. I cannot for the life of me imagine the Liberal party, for example, consenting to a committee investigation or an investigation by a commission which would, in order to prosecute the inquiry effectively, have power to call before it every member of the Liberal party, every member of the Conservative party and every member in this corner of the House, and compel them to give evidence under oath as to the sources of their campaign funds. Senator Borah in the United States recently suggested that very plan. I suggest it now to the Minister of Railways who is temporarily leading the government in the House to-night. I ask him to take the matter up with his colleagues so the public can depend upon it in the future that their representatives in this House are not in some secret form or other controlled and nominated by outside interests which can afford to contribute to their campaign funds. Mr. Speaker, it is a disgrace that is now becoming apparent to a greater extent than it ever did before when for so long it was merely a matter of suspicion. We have never had the evidence so clearly before us as we have at this moment, and if public confidence in parliamentary institutions and in our representatives is not to be undermined, I ask that this government shall undertake to have some efficient form of investigation into the sources of campaign funds of both parties, and bring about the total and complete elimination of secret campaign funds in the future.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there are many other questions I have desired to discuss to-night, but the hour is late and I do not intend to delay the House any further; I simply wish to state my position. The amendment appeals to me because it represents the expressed viewpoint of the people I represent. It represents that viewpoint clearly and distinctly, but that alone might not convince me of the necessity of supporting it. In addition I am satisfied that the future of our whole country is involved in the adoption of the principles in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote). I do not believe that a country of this vast size, depending as it must for generations to come upon the basic industry of agriculture for its greatest wealth, for its healthiest development, can afford to continue the shackling of agriculture and the hampering of other natural resources by increasing costs.

I accept with pleasure the correction of the amendment made by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young). I would have been glad to have seen him move an amendment in which the words were inserted "to reduce the high cost of living and production." I agree with the hon. member. It was an excellent suggestion, but it does not remove the validity of the statements in the amendment. If that is the sole excuse of the hon. member for Weyburn for failing to vote against the amendment, I am afraid he is in a weak position. If the existence of a tariff board, and the fact that the amendment does not aim specifically in words at the cost of production, is the excuse of the hon. members from Saskatchewan, then they are in a weak position also; but I feel satisfied that the old members of the Liberal Progressive group are not going to go back on their pledges. They cannot go back to their people and say, "We accepted, deliberately accepted, a policy of indirect taxation, as the abiding policy of this year's budget." We accepted a policy which defeats our avowed principles and ideals; we accepted a policy which tends to prevent reductions in the tariff. They cannot do that; they will not do it, and so I suggest that on this vote any man pledged to the low tariff doctrine, any man pledged to the principle of direct taxation, as opposed to indirect, will be keeping faith with himself and his people if he votes in support of an amendment whose purpose it is to establish the direct principle in budget making in this House.

The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) this afternoon, in a very eloquent speech, indicated that he took exception to one clause in the amendment, that referring to the reduction in the national debt. I am afraid he misunderstood or misread the amendment. I agree with the hon. member for Labelle that any immediate and substantial reduction in the national debt would be unfortunate. It would place too heavy a burden upon us at a stage when we need all our resources to recover from the war depression. I agree with him also that it is an excellent policy to leave the national debt as long as possible standing before the people as a monument to the foolish madness of war. But let me submit to the hon. member that in asking for a systematic method of meeting the national debt and of attempting to reduce it, we are not asking for an immediate and substantial reduction in the debt. Far from it, but if the Minister of Railways and the cabinet are generally agreed that some reductions are going to take place in the debt every year—and they are, and I know my friends to my right are—is it unfair to ask that the reduction take place on a systematic basis instead of in the present haphazard, hit-or-miss fashion? That is all the amendment asks in this connection, and as such it should appeal to reasonable thinking men on the other side, even to the hon. member for Labelle.

I have pleasure, Mr. Speaker, in supporting the amendment. I dislike intensely the budget, for the reasons I have pronounced, and I sincerely hope that the government will find it possible to accept the suggestion that it should strike out of the resolutions the one introducing the reduction in the income tax. If that were done, I feel satisfied that it would gratify the mass of the people in Canada, not the mere rich, but hon. members in this portion of the House as well.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to take only a very short time in this debate on the budget, as there are only a few points of importance that I desire to make.

I think, first, I should express the appreciation of the government of the very fine compliment to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) which is involved in the great numbers of congratulatory messages from all classes and all parts of Canada which it has been my privilege to see, addressed to the Minister of Finance, on the budget which he brought down the other day. The one thing which is noteworthy in that connection is that, unlike the hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Garland), many of the citizens of Canada, having regard to the very hectic period through which government in this country passed so recently, and to the fact that following the election on the 14th of September last and the swearing in of the present government early in October, ministerial by-elections became necessary, express their surprise and gratification that in such a short space of time, it now being only the month of February, the Minister of Finance has been able to get a sufficient grasp of the situation and mature his judgment sufficiently to enable him to present the kind of budget and the kind of proposals which he brought down to the House the other day.

I always enjoy listening to the eloquence of my hon. friend who just sat down (Mr. Garland). There are advantages in occupying a position in the House which involves no responsibility for policy.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I suggest to the hon. minister that we are prepared to accept positions of responsibility? There is nothing would give us greater pleasure than to assist the hon. minister and the cabinet.

Mr. DUNNING: I asked a question or two, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of enlightenment, of my hon. friend when he was speaking. I sat and listened while he cast reflections upon the motives of every hon. gentleman in this House, and said not a word. I think now I might be entitled to proceed. having suffered as the rest of us have suffered from his accusations of a complete lack of sincerity, for that was the whole tenor of my hon. friend's address as relating to every member of this House who did not belong to his peculiar little provincial class group in that corner. While I am on that subject, may I say, without taking too much credit to ourselves on this side of the House, and without in any way offering any apologies or excuses for my hon. friends opposite, that I have sufficient confidence in the judgment of the people of Canada as a whole to believe that the people of other parts of Canada as well as Alberta are just as likely to send honest men to this House as is that province.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I suggest to the minister that he does me an injustice? Far be it from me to suggest that honest men do not come from other portions of Canada. It was political parties I was speaking of.

Mr. DUNNING: I have no quarrel at all with my hon. friend's statement of his opinions. It has been suggested from both sides of the House during the course of this session, and previously, that the tone of debate is not elevated by casting reflections on other men's motives, and my hon. friend's speech was replete with reflections upon the honesty of the motives of other members of the House. I am content in that regard to abide by the record of Hansard. That is all I desire to say with respect to the very admirable address to which we have just listened, except to emphasize that it is a comfortable position to be in where one has no responsibility whatever for the policies of government, to be in no danger, as the members of an official opposition are always in danger, under our British system of government, of being called upon to assume responsibility as a government for putting their policies into effect. My hon. friend speaks from a position where there is no danger at all of the people of Canada entrusting him and his friends in the near future with the responsibility of putting into effect the policies which he advocates. Such a position has great advantages indeed, and my hon. friend with his eloquence is fully capable of making the most of them.

So far as those of us who sit on this side of the House are concerned, the people of Canada on the 14th of September last placed upon us a very great responsibility. We had to go back to our constituencies for re-election, and then we were compelled in the nature of things immediately to call the House together in other to have as soon as possible the authority of parliament for the expenditures which were being made in carrying on the public business of the country. In addition, many of us, being new ministers, were compelled to take the necessary time to familiarize ourselves with the workings of our departments so far as that was possible in the short space of time available, and now we are expected, to paraphrase all that my hon. friend says, to bring about the millennium less than one month later. It is not possible.

My hon. friend could not do it. He is in a much happier position to-day than he was last session. My hon. friend does love to rock the boat when it is perfectly safe to do so.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I might suggest that last year I did not hesitate to rock the boat in favour of my hon. friends.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is not quite as shrewd in appreciating a point as I thought he was. Last year he was very careful—and I do not suggest any improprieties—to do all he could to prevent the parliamentary boat from upsetting. This year he is quite aware that any boat rocking indulged in on his part will not upset the boat anyway, and therefore he is perfectly free, and has taken advantage of his freedom to rock the boat as much as he possibly could.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The hon. member knows quite well that I have been—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): If that is hon. members' idea of fairness, all right.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not call the hon. member to order because I thought the hon. minister was permitting the interruption. If it is a question of privilege he may be allowed to state it; otherwise, I hope there will be no more cross-examinations.

Mr. DUNNING: I am merely offering good-humoured raillery in return for my hon. friend's speech, which consisted of an impeachment of motives of hon. members on this side, and I suggest that my method of debate is infinitely preferable to that favoured by my hon. friend.

With reference to the statement made, not only by my hon. friend, but by another of the group in that corner of the House on this question of responsibility, may I point out that if I understand it correctly there are three groups in that corner of the House. I find no fault with it, but when my hon. friend speaks for the people of Canada, I am reminded of the story of the Three Tailors of Tooley Street, who issued that famous manifesto headed "We, the People of England". On very many subjects my hon. friend cannot speak for all the three groups in that corner of the House.

Mr. DUNNING: But we must have in this country a group of men large enough to command sufficient majority in the House to enable them to put through a common policy. We do not believe that every one of us at all times can get his own individual way. We from Saskatchewan do believe that Canada is bigger than Saskatchewan. I may tell my hon. friend in that regard that on the election platforms from east to west in the last election, discussing this very matter of fiscal policy, to which he paid so much attention—in my own province of Saskatchewan, in the province of Ontario, in the provinces by the sea and in British Columbia—I used words to this effect: that complete free trade might possibly be the best thing for Saskatchewan, and it might be the best thing for Alberta, but neither Saskatchewan nor Alberta is the whole of Canada, and I wound up by saying, neither is Ontario. I said then what I say now, that we must regard this matter of tariff as an intensely practical matter affecting every individual in this country. We should treat it and endeavour to make it the servant of the whole people, having due regard to the interests of the whole country. I will come to my Conservative friends in a few moments.

Mr. STEVENS: You are doing fine.

Mr. DUNNING: Hon. members in that corner of the House say that this is a Tory budget.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Hear, hear.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend says "hear, hear",—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): And the Tories accept it too.

An hon. MEMBER: Not yet.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) says, not yet.

Mr. STEVENS: I said nothing.

Mr. DUNNING: Then I mistook the hon. gentleman who made the comment. I should like to tell my hon. friend (Mr. Garland) now, with all the authority of my colleagues, that the impression my hon. friend sought to create to-night throughout Canada, as he knows his words will be reported, that there was some sort of coalition or understanding this session between the Conservative party and this government, is absolutely and completely false. The fact that my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre made some remarks with respect to expediting the business of the House, which could have come with the same propriety from my hon. friend (Mr. Garland) himself does not justify the statement. Those remarks, I apprehend, did not intend to convey the existence of some sinister plot between these two larger parties against the best interests of Canada. I can say that so far as the government is concerned, and so far as the men who sit on this side of the House are concerned, there is no such understanding, coalition, legislative or executive, or in any other way whatsoever and my hon. friend well knows it. He is scattering a suspicion abroad which does not do him very much credit.

Replying to those who say that this is a Tory budget, I would ask them to imagine what sort of budget would have been brought down if my hon. friends of the Conservative party had been occupying the treasury benches to-day; because however much I may disagree with the tariff policy of the Conservative party I will give them this credit: If they sat here to-day and were charged with the duty of bringing down the budget they would bring down a budget in conformity with their principles, in conformity with the arguments they have used throughout three election campaigns—that the tariff schedules of Canada should be increased in very many important particulars.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friends say "hear, hear".

An hon. MEMBER: Quite right.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend believes that is right. I am merely answering the charge that this is a Tory budget, and why? Because it increases the tariff? No. There is not a Tory in this House who will not admit that if the Tories were making the budget they would materially increase the tariff. This is charged with being a Tory budget because it neither reduces nor increases the tariff. I might ask who, after reading the past budget debates, particularly the more recent ones, can have any doubt whatever as to which is the high tariff party and which is the low tariff party in Canada? Or imagine again—and I commend this especially to my hon. friends in the far corner of the House, particularly those Progressives from Saskatchewan—how high the tariff wall round Canada would have been to-day had my hon. friends of the Conservative party been in power from 1921 to the present time. They have consistently proclaimed their belief throughout the whole of that period that the tariff should be increased. Throughout the whole of that period indeed the tariff walls surrounding almost every other country in the world have been increased. Had the Conservative party been here to-day and honestly carried out what they led the people of Canada to believe is their policy, we would have a tariff as high as the tariff now existing in the United States. Will my hon. friends say "hear, hear" to that?

An hon. MEMBER: No, no.

Mr. DUNNING: Evidently the "brick for brick" policy has been abandoned recently.

An hon. MEMBER: It never existed.

Mr. DUNNING: Evidently it has been abandoned in view of the much-heralded attempt to capture votes in western Canada by holding a big convention in Winnipeg next October.

During the period since 1921, so far from increasing the tariff, it has been lowered in many important particulars and the British preference has been increased at a time, as I have stated, when tariffs in other countries were being increased. Even had we not touched the tariff in a downward direction since 1921, still Canada's tariff would be very much lower to-day as compared with that of other nations by reason of the tariff increases they have put into effect. I should like some of my hon. friends in the corner, who have access to so much information apparently, to find out for me how many countries to-day have a lower general average of tariff than the Dominion. It would be interesting information and would lead the way to much fairer criticism than we have listened to in this regard. We are between the devil and the deep blue sea. On the one hand we are accused by the Tories of ruining Canadian industry by tariff reductions—

Mr. MANION: Which is the devil?

Mr. DUNNING: Well, if I have to define the term I am afraid I shall have to say that the Tories are.

Mr. MANION: Talking politically now?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, nothing personal at all. We are accused by the Tories of ruining industry by our tariff reduction. Oh! think of the debates of last year! Think of the great delegation which my hon. friends were so pleased to see come here, to which they referred in such moving terms! Think of the empty factories and empty homes and ruined people of Oshawa! It never happened.

Mr. McGIBBON: Think how anxious the government were about fixing them up.

Mr. DUNNING: It never happened. On the other hand our radical friends in the corner accuse us of introducing a Tory budget. The fact of the matter is that neither is right. We have not ruined industry, and we do not intend to. Our tariff reductions have actually helped the industries to which they have been applied. The Minister of Finance naturally will not attempt to forecast in this budget what may be contained in future budgets. It would be unreasonable to expect it of him.

May I here digress to state to my hon. friend who has just spoken (Mr. Garland) that he has enunciated—I hope with the responsibility of the group to which he belongs —a new policy with respect to the duty of a finance minister in regard to the presentation of his budget. He says the Minister of Finance should discuss all his proposals with all of those who sit behind him before they are presented to the House. That surely is a new proposal and one to which I am confident my hon. friend has not given the thought which he gives to most questions he discusses in this House. Why is it that from time immemorial, both in the British House and in every other House conducted according to the British plan, the contents of the budget are kept secret until the moment when the minister delivers his pronouncement? Why is it that tariff reductions and other things of a like kind become effective immediately upon the minister's pronouncement in regard thereto? It is because, if my hon. friend's method were followed, some people would have advance information, and there would be leaks, there would be speculation, and there would undoubtedly be an increase of this talk of scandal— which my hon. friend is so fond of referring to—in the public life of the country. I venture to say that even in the government which is controlled by partisans of my hon. friend, and which is a provincial government where the necessity for secrecy in connection with the budget cannot be so great as in the federal House, where fiscal and other matters of greater importance are dealt with,—I venture to say that even there the provincial treasurer does not acquaint the whole world, not even the whole of his own party following in the House, with the contents of his budget before he presents it to the legislature. My hon. friend is silent. Silence gives consent. Again we are asked in this House, as we were once before by my hon. friends in that corner, to adopt a principle in the federal parliament which they themselves in the legislature which they control have not adopted.

While the Minister of Finance naturally will not budget for future years, he does authorize me to say this, in reply to the insinuations from the far corner regarding the fiscal policy of this party and those who support it, that the Liberal fiscal policy is unchanged. We shall move forward cautiously with the aid of knowledge of the facts secured by the Tariff Advisory Board toward the goal of making our tariff structure bear as lightly as possible on production, industry and the people generally, having always in view the greater prosperity of all the legitimate industries of Canada. The tariff must be made to serve the best interests of the Canadian people as a whole. It must be adjusted from time to time to meet the needs, not of one class or group or industry alone, whichever one that may be, but of our whole economic structure

Mr. DUNNING: This does not mean—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That is good Tory propaganda all right.

Mr. DUNNING: It is to my hon. friend's perverted mind.

Mr. McMILLAN: It is true Liberalism.

Mr. DUNNING: This does not mean tariff-tinkering so called, but it does mean a continuous expert examination and adjustment whenever the facts so revealed warrant.

Now, my hon. friend smiles and says that is true Tory doctrine. I should like right here to ask Tory endorsement of this, "Toward the goal of making our tariff structure bear as lightly as possible on production, industry and the people generally."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. DUNNING: They agree. Well now, Mr. Speaker, the millennium has come indeed. I have been listening during this budget debate to pleas for increased protection, at least three to-night, the arguments for which did not take into account the people at all,—

An hon. MEMBER: Oh yes, they did.

Mr. DUNNING: —but which took into account merely the people engaged in a particular industry.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh no, no.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the fault I have to find, and that is the distinction I draw between our attitude on this side of the House and the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite. Why, we had a plea for the onion-growers. There are three hundred of them in Canada. And my hon. friends opposite want to tax all the people of the Dominion for the benefit of those three hundred onion-growers. Will they deny it? There is no denial. I could go on and cite a list as long as my arm of special privilege tariff increases demanded by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, not at all in conformity with the principle that I have just been endeavouring to enunciate.

Mr. EVANS: Will the minister inform the House who put 47a on the statute book?

Mr. DUNNING: Frankly, I cannot answer that question. I do know, however, that while my hon. friends may find in this, which I regard as a fair, moderate statement of the tariff policy of the Liberal party—

Mr. DUNNING: More than a chart.

Mr. MANION: Not too specific.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps my hon. friend would be more specific as to what he would do if he were charged with the duty of preparing a budget. We have no doubt at all about our friends opposite. Every one of them has some pet industry for which he wants to have higher protection. That is the policy of the Tory party, but it is not the policy of the Liberal party.

With regard to the farmers and the income tax, I might, with all due deference to the hon. gentlemen in the far corner opposite, who always speak for all the farmers, be permitted to express the view of a farmer. I will not attempt to speak for them all. I will give the views of a farmer with reference to the income tax problem. The income tax is an ideal tax, in so far as it conforms to the standard of making every citizen pay something towards the conduct of public affairs in his country upon a reasonable, equalized and graduated scale in proportion to the wealth of the individual. Unfortunately, like so many ideal things, this tax presents very serious difficulties in the way of administration. One of the earliest difficulties in connection with the income tax in this country, a difficulty to which hon. gentlemen in that corner have frequently called attention, is the problem of successfully applying it to the farmers because of the nature of the farming business. The difficulties that were encountered in the earlier years, when the exempted amount was much lower than it is to-day, are well known to every member of the House. Not one farmer, not ten or a hundred, but thousands have complained to me about the nuisance of having to keep the kind of returns which were necessary in order to enable the Income Tax branch to determine whether any tax was due from them or not. As more than one man has put it, "We go to forty dollars' worth of time and trouble to find out that we owe the government ten dollars." I know my hon friends would say it is the fault of the system.

Mr. KENNEDY: Is not that due to the fact that the average farmer must work from twelve to fourteen hours a day, and so cannot possibly keep books?

Mr. DUNNING: Taking my hon. friend's statement at its face value, if there is a class in the community who work from twelve to fourteen hours a day conducting their own business, and on that account are unable to keep books, I should like the hon. gentleman to tell me how he could possibly levy an income tax on such a business? That is the whole difficulty, and I will be frank enough to say that one of the reasons why I personally favoured an increase in the exemption from income tax to the present level was my conviction that it would automatically eliminate from the sphere of operation of the tax a very large proportion of the farmers of Canada. I did so, not because I wanted to give them any special privilege, but because, from the operation of the law in the past, I knew that it really resulted in men going to all sorts of trouble, yes, and of being persecuted as in the nature of things they must be, besides incurring a good deal of unnecessary expense out of proportion to the amount they owed the government. I had in mind, too, the fact that the farmer does pay in the form of indirect taxation a greater amount proportionately than the rest of the population. I do believe that, although I have no scientific proof of the statement. If my hon. friends object to the ten per cent discount provided for in the budget on the present graduated scale of income tax they should in all fairness get back to what I described in the first place as an ideal income tax, one which is levied on the whole of the people who have incomes and which shall be proportionate to those incomes, however small. If they do that, however, they will get back to the point where they will have to solve the very problem which has baffled every one up to now, and that is, how to apply the system successfully, equitably and reasonably to agriculture. We have never succeeded in doing it, and our hon. friends who criticise us have never put forward any constructive suggestion as to how it could be done. The question which the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) asked a moment ago admits the impracticability of the whole scheme as applied to farmers who, according to him work from twelve to fourteen hours a day and therefore cannot keep books. If that is true, it is impossible to levy an income tax on such a business. Now, if my hon. friend has any scheme whereby the tax can be collected in that case, he will earn the thanks of the people of Canada in submitting it.

Mr. KENNEDY: I suggest that they go on the eight-hour day.

Mr. DUNNING: Do I understand my hon. friend to suggest that there should be a compulsory eight-hour day for agriculture in Canada?

Mr. KENNEDY: I offer it as a suggestion to the farmers.

Mr. DUNNING: But this is a legislative body, and what we are looking for in this connection is some legislative suggestion. Unless, therefore, my hon. friend is prepared to offer some proposal which can be incorporated into the law of the country, the difficulty which I am seeking to point out still remains.

Mr. KENNEDY: We might have legisation along the lines of the Liberal platform of 1919.

Mr. DUNNING: This is the first time I have heard it suggested that the Liberal platform of 1919 devised any method whereby farmers who work fourteen hours a day might be enabled to keep books.

Mr. GLEN: I take it from what the minister said, in reply to my address of yesterday asking for some assurance from the government in the matter, that the policy of the government is in the direction of lower tariffs and that it is not the intention to abolish the income tax as a permanent fiscal instrument. Am I right in assuming that?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend must not put words in my mouth. The words I used were explicit and they were words behind which every member of the government will stand. I may remind the hon. gentleman of what my hon. friend the Minister of Finance has himself said. Some people tried to hold a pistol at the head of the Minister of Finance last year, we all know with what success; and those who try the same thing again, whether friend or foe, will find the same result.

Mr. GLEN: On a question of privilege, I did not on Tuesday present any pistol at the head of the Minister of Finance. All that I stated was that a number of us were returned to this House on low tariff principles; that we were faced with a budget which seemed to meet with the approval of the Tories and of which we were somewhat suspicious that we were anxious only to know what the government's studied policy was with regard to the fiscal policy of this country and particularly in regard to the income tax.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. DUNNING: I can only say this. My language a few moments ago was explicit and I will read it again for the benefit of my hon. friend, although it was not directed at him especially, because it is absurd to ask the Minister of Finance to budget to-day for next year. That cannot be done. I say this to my hon. friend again and on this he must make up his mind and take his responsibility. I want to be fair to my hon. friend because it has been suggested by speakers during the course of this debate that my hon. friend did put a pistol at the head of the Minister of Finance. To all who suggest such I make the same reply, and I make it on behalf of the Minister of Finance who has already spoken and with his full authority. I will read the words again because they are the words of the whole government, not my words. I cannot amend them of my own volition and my hon. friend will not get me to amend them of my own volition.

> We shall move forward cautiously with the aid of knowledge of the facts secured by the Tariff Advisory Board toward the goal of making our tariff structure bear as lightly as possible on production, industry, and the people generally.

If my hon. friend is still suspicious after that statement, I can only leave him with his suspicion, remembering as I am sure he does—

An hon. MEMBER: Read the rest of it.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, I will read it all. Unlike some of the documents that some of my hon. friends have produced, it will bear reading twice. The Hamilton speech never was read twice. I will read the rest of it:

> Having always in view the greater prosperity of all the legitimate industries of Canada.

Does my hon. friend quarrel with that?

Mr. GLEN: Does the hon. member wish me to reply to that?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend has made his speech. He asked me certain questions.

Mr. GLEN: I thought the minister was asking me if I was satisfied with that.

Mr. DUNNING: I have permitted a great deal of latitude. I enjoy this, I think, almost as much as anyone else in this House, but there is a tendency rather to take advantage of my good nature on this occasion. Suffice it to say that the tariff board has been in operation, as hon. friends well know, for less than a year. Some fifty-two applications for increases and reductions have been placed before it. It has inquired into some of them and reported upon thirteen. I feel sure that my hon. friend who spoke last (Mr. Garland) would not desire to proceed to slash the tariff without knowing the facts; or maybe like no one else in Canada, he knows all the facts now. We must in that regard as members of the government confess our ignorance; we must confess our need of enlightenment with respect to these specific items under examination by the tariff board. That is what the tariff board was created for.

Mr. STEVENS: Reductions were made last year.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend refers to last year. There are some things that stick out so plainly as to be clear to the average citizen. Until we had a tariff board, we had been endeavouring to cure them by the aid of such machinery as was in the possession of the government. Last year we reduced the tariff on automobiles in the face of the strongest opposition across the way, as my hon. friends know.

Mr. CAHAN: And then gave the automobile manufacturers a bonus.

Mr. DUNNING: I wonder if my hon. friends opposite were in power now if they would increase the duty on automobiles!

Mr. CLARK: We would not be deceitful.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend says: We would not be deceitful. He is suffering from the same disease as the hon. gentleman who spoke last—always impugning the motives of other people.

Mr. CLARK: No, we never could get at your motives.

Mr. DUNNING: I agree that my hon. friends never can get at us.

Mr. CLARK: No, at your motives.

Mr. DUNNING: I would like to know if my hon. friend would have been satisfied if, without time to study the facts properly, we had introduced amendments to the tariff this session on the basis of the recommendations of the tariff board with respect to these articles. I would like him to think how the cost of living would be affected by action upon the reports we have so far received, by action upon flake calcium chloride, by action on pumps and pump parts, by action on nail keg cooperage, by action on Epsom salts, by action on gabardine, by action on invalids' wheel chairs, by action on invert sugar, by action on oil tops, by action on objects of art, by action on tin—as regards which, by the way, the application was for an increase; by action on tops for gloves, by action on the duty on foxes and canaries imported for breeding purposes, or by action on the tariff on player piano music rolls. These are the items upon which we have a definite report of the facts found by the Tariff Advisory Board and on no others.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is the House to take it as the declared policy of the government that it will not reduce the tariff until after the board has reported favouring a reduction?

Mr. DUNNING: That is not the declared policy of the government.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): That is the inference to be drawn from the hon. member's last remarks.

Mr. DUNNING: I have allowed my hon. friend to make at least six speeches and I think he has had enough opportunities. At the present time, having regard to the facts I have stated in respect to the period through which we have passed, we do not intend, as the Minister of Finance has indicated, to bring down any tariff changes this session and we have none to propose. If my hon. friend is here in the future, I am quite sure he will find some other ground on which to criticize us even if this vanishes, because the kind of political appeal my hon. friends in that corner always make is the kind of political appeal my hon. friend has made to-night. He says: We are the only honest men; everybody else is actuated by motives of self-interest, by inference is the servant of some big interest! That is the only kind of political argument my hon. friends in the far corner present to the electorate. True, they do think about matters of economics as the rest of us do. We could debate these matters like gentlemen, but it is pretty difficult to debate like a gentleman with men who consistently take the ground that your motives for differing with them are unworthy motives and objects of suspicion. It was because of that whole note running through the address of my hon. friend—and a splendid address it was otherwise—which caused me to rise to-night. I had no intention of doing so; in fact, as the House can see, my address was not properly prepared because I intended not to speak until to-morrow. My object is merely to set forth as clearly as possible what the tariff policy of the Liberal party is. It has been expressed much better by our leader, who is not in his seat to-night, and there is no reason for anyone in the House or the country to have any doubt what it is. It is clear cut. Our actions throughout the last period of years since 1921 are the best evidence as to what our policy is: We stand by our record in that regard. We intend to pursue that policy in the future.

On motion of Mr. Stevens the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Robb the House adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

LOAN TO CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved:

That the order of the House referring the estimates for 1927-1928, respecting loans to the Canadian National Railway Company and the Canadian Government Merchant Marine Limited, laid on the table on Tuesday 15th, February, 1927, to the committee of supply, be discharged, and that the said estimates be referred to the select standing committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government.

Motion agreed to.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE OF THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed from Thursday, February 24, the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of ways and means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Coote.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Just a moment or two prior to the opening of the House, we, the members of the House and others, were favoured with a very brief, all too brief, exhibition of singing, a rendering of the sweetest of music by the visiting choir from the old land, and I thought that, as the first member of the House to speak following that interesting occasion, it would not be out of place to express my personal appreciation of the splendid manner in which they rendered the various numbers on their program an expression which I am sure will be shared by others, and to extend to Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson, the organist, and the Rev. Edmund H. Fellowes, the director of the choir, our sincere and cordial felicitations.

It might properly be hinted to me that the atmosphere created by that pleasing incident is not quite fitting to a debate upon the hard and material facts which are supposed to be dealt with in a budget. Indeed one of my very good friends from the other side of the House, knowing that I was about to speak, intimated to me very kindly that there should be no bitterness left in my soul. I wish to assure the House that there is no bitterness in my soul now or on any other occasion when I am dealing with subjects such as we have before us this afternoon pertaining to the business of the country. After all, it is the business of members of the opposition to take up government measures or proposals and subject them to the most critical analysis that we are capable of, and if there are weaknesses in them to expose those weaknesses. On the other hand it is our privilege, if not our duty, to differ from those who differ from us, and, in so far as the views we hold are honest and honourable, to advance those views with all the vigour and force of which we are capable, and to-day I intend to follow the course which I have followed in the seventeen sessions I have been in this House by dealing with this subject, I hope fairly, but with that degree of energy with which a kind Providence may have blest me.

We have immediately before us a resolution that this House shall resolve itself into a committee of ways and means, with an amendment thereto moved by my hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Coote), making one or two suggestions. With this amendment I find myself able very largely to agree. I certainly do not agree with all of it. I would not have worded it in exactly this manner, but with much of the sentiment in the resolution I find myself in accord. I will just briefly deal with the amendment, but as the major part of my remarks will be directed to other subjects, I shall not spend more than a moment or two on the amendment. I may say that the last clause of the amendment is the only explicit and clear statement. The balance of the amendment is more or less of an expedient, a grouping of words, calculated, I think, to embarrass some, and to give expression to certain views not too clearly, indeed somewhat ambiguously. But the last clause reads as follows:

And further that no systematic effort is being made to reduce our national debt, the interest on which absorbs so large a proportion of the revenues of the Dominion.

I intend to deal with that question in a moment, and I find myself entirely in accord with this: that the government should be brought to task for not having dealt with the question of the public debt in a little more definite and efficient manner than they have done. In regard to the balance of the resolution, it refers to the reduction in the high cost of living. This is a term that is used very, very frequently in this House, on the hustings and elsewhere. It is a popular cry, it has a strong appeal on the hustings, politicians like to use it, and I have no particular criticism of it. But I would point out to the House that the high cost of living, according to our view, is not merely the price of goods. It involves also whether or not a man can make a living at all, whether or not he has an opportunity to work. It is of infinitely greater importance to our people that they shall have an opportunity to earn rather than to be given the cost of living figures of to-day as compared with those of a month or a year ago. So I find no great difficulty in facing that clause, because the policy I stand behind to-day and have been standing behind for years is a policy calculated to give Canadians a maximum of employment within the bounds of their own country and the highest standard of living. So I repeat, I have no difficulty in satisfying myself that we are able to offer to the people a policy which will give them the maximum of comfort in so far as it refers to the cost of living.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to turn my attention to the main subject, namely, the committee of ways and means. I think it was Sir Robert Peel who, on one occasion when facing an exceedingly difficult and perplexing crisis in the financial affairs of the old land, said that half of the task was accomplished when you frankly faced the question. That is, if this House will consider and study the problems with which the country is faced and frankly look them in the eye, half the solution is arrived at. And so this afternoon I shall address myself very largely to bringing to the attention of the House three major problems. These major problems I intend to analyze in some degree, and for this purpose I am going to take five-year periods. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) is not in his seat. Last night he invited us to consider the five years of Liberal rule, and in doing so he suggested that there had been a progression of events leading to some definite conclusion. I propose to examine this five-year period, and to place it in juxtaposition with the five-year period preceding, so that we may get a clear vision whether or not this country is progressing, as some claim, and to what degree that progress is of value or may be measured.

Among the institutions that we have inherited from the old land is the parliamentary system of government. A subdivision of that is the budget system, generally, I think, admitted by all to be the most effective method of dealing with the financial, trade and other affairs of the nation. This budget system is supposed to give to parliament certain information. For instance, it is supposed to deal with our financial condition, that is, our debts to our own people and to other nations; it is supposed also to deal with the question of taxation, that is, the revenues secured during the past year and the proposed methods of raising those revenues in the future, together with whatever taxation changes may be contemplated; in addition to that, it usually outlines for the information of the people the conditions of industry and trade, both internal and external. It is my intention to deal with these three phases of our country's affairs.

In the first place, I wish to say to the Minister of Finance that much as I appreciate his geniality and all those fine qualities that we so much admire in him, in my opinion his budget fails adequately to reflect the real conditions of the country. This budget does not budget for the future; it offers no new ideas; it is a static budget, it is dormant, it is stationary; it shows no progress, it offers no hope, it does not look into the future or give to us any idea that the government has the slightest appreciation of the rapidly changing world conditions, or that there are certain conditions in this country calling for new or different treatment from that of the past; it offers nothing in the way of suggestion as to the replacement of our depleted natural resources; it does not indicate that the government is giving that problem the slightest consideration, the necessity of which I hope to demonstrate in the course of my remarks. I say to the minister also that it is a misleading budget. It is full of equivocations. It announces, for instance, a reduced duty—there is no reduction in duty; it announces lower taxation—there is an increase of taxation; it announces a surplus—this surplus is a myth; it also states that there is abounding business—this is only partially true.

The budget, however, is consistent in one respect—it reflects a complete abandonment of the pre-election pledges of the Liberal party. I have only to call the attention of the Minister of Finance and his colleagues to the remarks of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) yesterday afternoon, when he unfolded the inside secrets of the Liberal party and reminded us that some years ago when that party went to the country with certain views that it persuaded the people to adopt, it carried on the old fiscal policy, slightly modified here and there, but in principle the policy of Sir John Macdonald, and that secret assurances prior to the election were given to the business interests of the country that the public utterances of the party would not be given effect to afterwards should it be successful at the polls. And so I say now we come to a very similar condition: the pre-election pledges of the Liberal party are not reflected in the budget. Not that we ask that they should be; but we do ask, Mr. Speaker, with some degree of right, that a party which led the people to believe that a given set of results would follow from a given set of actions should at least carry out its pledges on the faith of which it has received a mandate from the electorate, whether those principles are right, or whether other principles adopted in the place of those abandoned are not really the right principles.

Last night the Minister of Railways was very fulsome in his praise of the Minister of Finance for having brought down his budget so early. To my mind this suggests just a little clever political strategy. The Minister of Finance smiles, but he knows it is true. He had the Duncan report on the maritime provinces before him. The government had it in their sanctum over in the east block. They studied it and they divided on it, and they are divided on it to-day, as everybody knows. They are in a dilemma regarding that report. It calls for certain things which ought to be in this budget but the government dare not put them in this budget.

Mr. ROBB: What, for instance?

Mr. STEVENS: Amendments to the tariff to give effect to certain recommendations of the report. The government do not dare to deal with that report, Mr. Speaker, because they are divided on it. So they said: Here, let us get this budget in, and then after it is out of the way we can make some promises to overcome the demands of the maritime provinces.

Mr. FORKE: The hon. gentleman is as good as the Ottawa Journal.

Mr. STEVENS: If the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) will possess his soul in patience I will deal with him in a few moments. This budget has been heralded throughout the country as highly satisfactory.

Mr. RINFRET: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: The Secretary of State says "hear, hear".

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: Another minister says "hear, hear." You will observe they are ministers who say that. Well, the budget has been welcomed throughout the country, because it was feared that following on the pre-election declarations of the government, particularly in western Canada, there would be drastic changes in the tariff when the budget was brought down. But that apprehension has been allayed, for there are no great changes in the tariff, and so a sigh of relief has gone up from one end of the country to the other. A safe hand, it is felt, is at the throttle. There is no danger to industry. Everything is promising because the tariff has not been tampered with. Let me read the words of the Bank of Montreal issued in their official private bulletin of February 23:

> The early delivery of the budget speech by the Dominion Minister of Finance, and the announcement that no tariff changes are to be made, should be helpful to business by removing that uncertainty and hesitancy in mercantile transactions which sometimes wait upon the late pronouncement of government fiscal policy.

Yes, the budget was welcomed for what it did not do, not for anything that it did. We welcome it in so far as in it the government has stayed its hand in further reductions of the tariff. The government announces in the budget that it is not its intention this year utterly to destroy the remaining fragment of a protective principle in the tariff. In other words, they have given the protective policy a tentative reprieve from the hangman's noose.

This is called a Robb budget, and I use that term without any personal reference to the minister. It is indeed a rob budget in the sense that it robs Peter to pay Paul. It is a budget which announces a reduction of taxation while as a matter of fact there is just a slight shifting of the burden of taxation. The taxation may be lowered in some small respects here and there, but the net result is an increase, as I shall well demonstrate in a moment. Let me deal with the budget, or rather the budget subject, because the budget itself would not require very much treatment. I pointed out a moment ago that the ways and means committee would have under its consideration normally the question of debt, the question of revenue, or the levying of taxation, and the question of trade conditions; and I intend to examine the whole subject in that order.

In the first place, I will discuss the debt. The minister announced that there would be a reduction in the debt, and in this connection I desire to bring to the attention of the House a singular fact. I have here the figures from each of four speeches delivered by the present Minister of Finance, and I will read them all to the House. On April 10, 1924, he said our surplus would be $20,750,000, to be applied to the reduction of the public debt. On March 24, 1925, he said that the public debt had been decreased by $35,900,000. On April 15, 1926, the minister informed the House, there had been a reduction in the debt of $22,350,000. On February 17, 1927, at page 387 of Hansard the minister made the statement that there would be a reduction of $31,000,000 in our debt.

The individual reductions indicated in these four announcements total $110,000,000, so that there should be a reduction in the debt to that extent from the year 1922. Each year this government has officially announced a reduction to the amount I have quoted, the total being $110,000,000; and bearing that in mind I would ask hon. members to follow me in an analysis of the public debt. There are two terms used in referring to the debt: one, the net debt, is the popular expression; the other is the funded debt, or, as my hon. friend from West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) described it, the dead weight debt. I myself prefer to call it the mortgage debt of the country. Now, the term "net debt" is a misnomer; it is meaningless. I hold in my hands the Public Accounts of the years between 1922 and 1926. I take for purposes of illustration the latter year. In the Public Accounts, on page 3, will be found the balance sheet of the Dominion of Canada, and I would invite every hon. gentleman who has any knowledge of accountancy to examine that statement. What do we find in it? We find among the assets certain sums mentioned under various headings. For example, there is "cash on hand." What does that represent? It means simply current cash that happens to be in the hands of scores of the representatives of the government throughout the Dominion, and so far as it has any relation to the reduction of the debt, it does not amount to the snap of the finger. It may be needed to-morrow; it is simply cash in the till carried from day to day, and represents no resources from which the funded debt may be paid. We might term it "petty cash" Then there is "specie reserve;" that is the gold reserve kept in the treasury in Ottawa against Dominion notes. That is something that cannot very well be used for the reduction of the fixed debt. Again, there are advances to the banks under the Finance Act; that merely refers to the fluctuating loans to the banks under that act to help the business of the country.

On the other side you have a certain amount of liabilities, including various items such as trust funds, post office money orders, outstanding Dominion notes in circulation, and so forth. The point I make is this: after subtracting the liabilities from the assets there is a net balance shown which is referred to as the net debt of the country, but which I submit has no relation whatsoever to the real debt. It is merely a balance between your assets and your liabilities, merely a bookkeeping sum; it is nothing more nor less than a means of keeping a double entry set of books in order. Now I take the funded debt, schedule (t), which gives the sum of $2,471,000,000. However, before I discuss the funded debt I will make a further reference or two to what is called the net debt. I find that the net debt on March 31, 1922, was $2,422,000,000 and on December 31, 1926, including the amount paid off last fall, it was $2,343,000,000; that is to say, we have a reduction in the net debt of $79,000,000, in a period of five years. That is nothing for this country to be proud of. I ask, where is the $110,000,000 of a reduction in the debt as announced by the Minister of Finance officially year by year? It is not reflected in these figures; it cannot be found in the blue books; it is not there. It is a myth. But stranger still, I find that as between the 1922 reports and the Public Accounts of 1926, there has been a reduction in the circulation of Dominion notes of $58,880,000, which forms a part of this $79,000,000 reduction in the net debt. Let me put a question to my friends from the west who for the last ten years have been quite serious in their economic studies. Do they consider that a reduction in the circulation of Dominion notes is of any great advantage to the business of this country?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. STEVENS: Here are the figures, and this is part of the $79,000,000 of which they boast; I will come to the funded debt in a moment and show an even more deplorable condition there. In 1922 the Dominion notes in circulation amounted to $241,000,000 in round figures, while in 1926 they amounted to something over $182,000,000, or a reduction of $58,880,000. What does this mean? We have a Finance Act which in Canada corresponds to the federal reserve system of the United States, in a somewhat modified form, and hon. members will recall that in the revision of the Bank Act in 1923 this point was advanced as the reason why we should not establish a federal reserve bank in Canada. I took that view then and I still hold to it, but I ask that the Finance Act should function; I ask that the advantages and powers of that Finance Act be put into operation, and the figures to which I have just referred indicate that under the Finance Act the circulation of Dominion notes is less by $58,880,000 than it was in 1922, with a corresponding retardation of current business in the country.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Might I ask a question, just for information? Does the hon. gentleman attribute that decrease to the disposition on the part of the banks to refrain from offering for discount their own particular securities?

Mr. STEVENS: Perhaps that may be so, but I claim that it is the duty of a government to influence the movement of business and trade; I do not say the government should get into business and control it, but I do say the government should influence the movement of business and trade for the benefit of the whole country. They can very readily attract attention to this facility and encourage the banks and others to utilize this accommodation which is at their disposal.

Mr. ROBB: Before my friend leaves that point, I suppose he will admit now that Canadian currency is on a sounder basis than it was during the earlier period to which he was referring, when Canadian funds in New York were at a 16 per cent discount?

Mr. STEVENS: No one has more regard for the minister than myself, but with all due respect to him that is not an intelligent interjection, and the minister knows that it is not; he is simply drawing a red herring across the trail. The discount to which our money was subjected was due to extraordinary world causes entirely, and not to Canadian causes. Now I will give the minister a further answer: I was just looking for further figures when he interrupted me. The situation is that we needed this money to bolster up our credit. In 1922 we had $241,000,000 of Dominion notes in circulation, with a specie reserve of $85,000,000; to-day we have a specie reserve of $99,000,000 with a Dominion note circulation of $182,000,000. In other words, we have now a specie reserve of about 54 per cent as against about 35 per cent in 1922; I had the figures here somewhere but they have been mislaid. There is no excuse for that; we could very easily increase our Dominion note circulation without the slightest chance of jeopardizing the stability of our currency.

Now I turn to the funded debt, which is the real debt of the country, our inescapable obligations. These are the obligations this country has signed, sealed and delivered to the public of Canada or to the public of the world, and I want the House to examine this question for a moment with me. I have the figures from 1922 to 1926, varying from $2,420,000,000, in 1922, to $2,471,000,000 in 1926, or an increase in our funded debt in that period of $51,000,000. If you deduct from that the amount of $35,000,000 paid off last year, you have a net increase to date in our funded debt of $16,000,000. Where is the $110,000,000 which was announced as a reduction of the public debt? I saw great headlines in newspapers all over the country; I had not time to dig them up and bring them here, but they would have made interesting pictures: "Robb reduces the public debt $20,000,000," or $35,000,000, $22,000,000, $31,000,000! Every year this has been heralded throughout the country as a great accomplishment of this government, but here are the figures taken from the government's own books, the report of the Auditor General, showing a net increase in that five year period in our mortgage debt of $16,000,000.

That is not all; in addition to that amount of $2,471,000,000 there are the railway guarantees of $658,000,000. But someone will say, "Oh, we have great assets to offset that." Let us see if that is so. What are our obligations to the National railways, or let me put it in another way; what have we put into the railways of this country? According to the annual report of this government, Mr. Speaker, we have put into the railways no less than $1,113,590,000 in cash, plus the guarantees of $658,000,000 or a total of about $1,770,000,000. Do not say to me that in connection with this railway obligation we have a magnificent asset. It is true that we have an asset, but we also have an investment of $1,770,000,000. Now I will return to my starting point; in addition to the ordinary funded debt we have these railway guarantees of $658,000,000, just as serious an obligation on this country as any other. And what if it came to a revaluation? Where is the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) now, he who was so anxious to interrupt me a moment ago? He has fled the chamber. Where is the policy of the Minister of Immigration, which he announced year after year when he sat to my left; where is his policy of revaluation of the National railways, now that he is on the other side of the House? I say to him and to this House that if the National railways were revalued the result would in all probability show a difference between our investment and the revaluation of a sum approximating this item of guarantees, namely $658,000,000. So for all practical purposes this amount should be added to the funded debt of this country, which would give a total of $3,129,000,000 as our real debt, instead of $2,400,000,000 as given by the Minister of Finance.

Now I wish to turn my attention to the question of taxation, and before commencing I may say that I wish to address myself in some measure to the Minister of Immigration, who is not in his seat. I may say that I advised him a few moments ago before he left the House that I was going to do so, so that he has no excuse for saying later on that I attacked him in his absence.

An hon. MEMBER: He is the minister of migration.

Mr. STEVENS: I said a little while ago that one of the subjects that should have been discussed in this budget, as in all budgets, is the question of taxation. I hold in my hand certain announced surpluses claimed by this government. My hon. friends opposite in 1924 announced a surplus of $35,990,000; in 1925, they announced a surplus of $24,300,000; in 1926, they announced a surplus of $33,910,000; and in 1927, they announced a surplus of $34,-200,000, or a total of $128,400,000. I ask again, as I have asked in the case of that mythical reduction of the public debt, where are these surpluses? Oh, someone will say, they are applied to the reduction of the national debt. No, they were not. These are accountancy terms, bookkeepers' terms, to balance current accounts, and for the life of me I cannot see the justification of it. But the minister told us the other day—and he did it in that quiet, gentle way, which is peculiar to him and which I think won the hearts of a great many people in the last election; I hope they will have awakened from their sleep, the result of his seductive terms—"I am pleased to announce a further reduction in taxation of $27,000,000." He said the same thing before; he said it last year. My hon. friends from the extreme left to the right on the other side of the House have used this as one of the strongest arguments to support this government—"reduction in taxation".

Well now, what are taxes? Taxes are simply the various returns from certain sources of revenue which we have. My hon. friends from the west, who are of strong free trade tendencies, always refer to the customs duty as a tax. No one will deny that the sales tax is a tax; no one will for a moment say that the income tax is not a tax; no one will say that the various stamp impositions are not taxes. All of these are taxes. Indeed our revenue from top to bottom, and from one side to the other, is taxation. Now let us see what reductions we have had in taxation. I take the five years just past, from 1923 to 1927, and the average imposition of taxes of this kind by this government was $387,780,000. In the previous years under the Conservative government the average was $348,500,000, or an increase of $39,280,000 in the average of the last five years over the previous five years. In other words, it is a ten per cent increase of taxation taking the average of the last five years as against the average for the previous five years. Now what I want to say is this: We have been told year by year that taxes are being reduced. I said at the opening of my remarks that the Minister of Finance had not reduced taxes, he had merely shifted them, and that is precisely what has occurred. What did he do last year? Oh, they say, he lowered the tax on automobiles. Let us see if he did. He reduced the tax on automobiles when he introduced his budget. Then came three thousand workers from Oshawa to make representations to this parliament, and my hon. friend and his colleagues prayed earnestly day by day that the debate might be carried on, and they carried it on for five weeks. In the interim they revamped their budget, they changed the whole business. They shifted the burden of taxation round a bit first so as to drive certain industries out of business and save the industry which at first was threatened by the reduction of the tariff, and the automobile industry at the conclusion of the deal that was made, was better off than it was before. With what results? There was an increase in revenue from goods coming in from the other side whereas hundreds of persons in Canada were thrown out of business. But the point I am making is that the taxes imposed during the last five years are ten per cent higher than the taxes collected in the five years preceding their accession to office.

Now the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) said last night "They say this is a Tory budget. Does anybody doubt which is the high tariff party and which the low tariff party?" I did not hear very much noise on the other side in response to that. I think there was a good deal of doubt in their minds as to the wisdom of the Minister of Railways making that statement. The minister said, "No one doubts which is the high tariff party and which is the low tariff party." I purpose discovering this afternoon something regarding this high tariff party. The Minister of Railways said also that since 1921 the tariff has been lowered in many important particulars. There was a certain lowering here and a certain lowering there which I shall deal with, but these changes certainly did not result in a lowering of the taxation on the people of Canada. There have been three major changes in the tariff since this government took office in 1921. There was a change in 1922-23 in the woollen schedule; there was a change in 1923-24 in the iron and steel schedule, chiefly regarding agricultural implements and subsidiary industries; and the change last year in regard to the automobile industry. I intend to examine briefly the exact effects these changes have had on the industry of Canada, and I wish the House to follow my analysis with some care because I believe it will offer rather startling results.

Before doing that, however, I wish to deal with this high tariff—low tariff bogy. My hon. friend, the Minister of Agriculture, trots out the bogy of high tariff every once in a while. How he fulminated against this party a few years ago on account, as he said, of our high tariff tendencies, and how he declared, "Why, the Liberal party, the Mackenzie King government, were just making a beginning." But along came some skilful hand that turned aside his mad charge against protection, the skilful hand of the Minister of Finance, and left my hon. friend bellowing up a blind alley. Then we come to the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart). He had hold of the rope attached to the bell to toll it. He said, "I am sounding the death knell of protection," and he yanked away on this rope. Suddenly he woke up with the frayed end of the rope in his hand, and the bell stopped tolling. He found also that some mysterious hand had slipped in and cut the rope. It was the hand of the Minister of Finance that turned aside this other doughty warrior from carrying on his assaults. And then we have the Minister of Immigration. The Minister of Immigration came into this House after attending —he may not have attended but he approved their findings—a gathering which designed the farmer platform of the west. My hon. friend entered this House after subscribing to the solemn league and covenant of the Farmers party. He came here with tears in his eyes, assuring the House of the one Simon-pure object of the attendance here of himself and his followers, namely, to destroy this terrible thing known as protection. We still have them with us. I look yonder and I see my hon. friend from South Huron—

Mr. McMILLAN: I am listening. The hon. gentleman complains of the lack of noise on this side of the House. He is making sufficient noise himself.

Mr. STEVENS: We still have one Simon-pure free trader with us. But the Minister of Immigration came into this House pledged that:

—the protective tariff has been and is a chief corrupting influence in our national life because the protected interests, in order to maintain their unjust privileges, have contributed lavishly to political funds—and so on. Then he goes on to say:

Therefore be it resolved that the Canadian Council of Agriculture, representing the organized farmers of Canada, urges. . . . an immediate and substantial, all-round reduction of the customs tariff.

Then he goes on to say:

By reducing the customs duty on goods imported from Great Britain to one-half the rates charged under the general tariff, and that further gradual, uniform reductions be made in the remaining tariff on British imports that will ensure complete free trade between Great Britain and Canada—

Mr. FORKE: Mr. Speaker—

—in five years.

Mr. FORKE: As a matter of privilege, may I say that the hon. member in speaking is continually repeating: "He goes on to say." I would ask him to give his authority before he goes any further.

An hon. MEMBER: Does the minister object?

Mr. FORKE: No, I do not object.

Mr. STEVENS: I am referring to, and quoting verbatim from the Farmers' platform.

Mr. FORKE: The hon. member says: "He goes on to say." I do not say so.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, this is a sad spectacle—

Mr. FORKE: Be fair.

Mr. STEVENS: It is a sorry spectacle that the Minister of Immigration, who came into this House and sat for five years on this side, pledged to this platform, now says that he did not say it. I suppose he did not write it. Let my hon. friend go back to his farmer electors in Brandon. Let him go through Manitoba. Let him go through Saskatchewan where he went last election, and the previous elections too. Let him tell the electors there that he had nothing to do with this. Let him repudiate this platform before the electors who sent him here to carry it out. No apostate ever found the road afterwards a bed of roses. But I have the words of my hon. friend himself. He repudiates the Farmers' platform.

Mr. FORKE: I did not repudiate it.

Mr. STEVENS: He repudiates it. Very good. I find this reported in Hansard of May 14, 1923, at pages 2718 and 2719:

Moved by Mr. Forke seconded by Mr. Johnston.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Who is he?

Mr. STEVENS: Both of whom led their followers year after year into the support of the government, both of whom led a contingent over there who are surrounded to the left and the right, behind and in front, by Grits but who are there nevertheless, one of whom received a seat in the cabinet and the other the Deputy Speakership of this House for the valuable services they rendered. These are the men who moved this:

Whereas the tariff policy of the government, as indicated by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech, and particularly his pronouncement in favour of tariff's stability at existing rates, and the consequent intimation that the government contemplates no further appreciable tariff reduction, constitutes a repudiation of the tariff planks in the Liberal platform of 1919 and is inconsistent with the Finance Minister's statement last session that the changes then made were a step in the right direction.

He condemns the Minister of Finance for not carrying out his preëlection pledges. He himself stands condemned out of his own mouth for being an apostate to his own pledges. The resolution continues:

And whereas the fiscal policy of the government as now brought down is based on the principle of protection,. . . .

Therefore, be it resolved: That. . . . this House is of the opinion that the principle of protection as a basis for fiscal policy in Canada is unsound.

Mr. FORKE: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: Let him applaud this:

And, further, that the best interests of Canada will be served by an immediate and substantial reduction in the tariff.

Mr. FORKE: We got it.

Mr. CASGRAIN: It was made.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend sitting in a $14,000 seat has a change of heart. I imagine that this minister will not be very long in his office, and while I hope physically he will be long with us, I expect politically he will not be very long. Over his political grave will be this epitaph:

Here lies the body—

Political body, of course,

—of one who pledged to his electors his plighted word, entered into a solemn league and covenant with them to carry out some high principles, who, having attained office, later found that the attractions and emoluments of office conflicted so with his preëlection pledges that his conscience, strained to the breaking point, cracked and broke, and thus ended this illustrious political career.

My hon. friend a moment ago thumped his desk vigorously when I referred to that part of his resolution which dealt with the protective principles of the tariff. Will he say, or will any other hon. member on that side, say that there is any less protection in the tariff than there was six years ago or five years ago? I am going to examine, for the benefit of this House, the figures and facts in regard to this matter, and in this regard I take them from the government's own productions, which I have on my desk. I am not going to read all the figures, but I have a table showing the dutiable and the free imports, with the totals, the amounts collected, and the per cent dutiable and the per cent free. I have it over a period of ten years and it shows the following result. I will give the two five-year periods first.

The average rate of duty during the last five years of Conservative rule, 1918 to 1922 inclusive, was on dutiable goods, 22.1 per cent, and on dutiable and free goods, 13.2 per cent. During the last five years under Liberal rule, 1923 to 1927, the percentage of duty on dutiable goods was 24 per cent and the percentage on dutiable and free goods, 15.5 per cent.

In other words, during the last five years the rate of duty on dutiable goods was 2 per cent higher than it was during the previous five years, and the rate on dutiable and free goods was 2.3 per cent higher. But someone will say to me: Oh, but during the last year or two we have been lowering the tariff. Let us see. Let the House bear in mind the observation I have already made on two occasions, that there has been going on, not a lowering, but a shifting of taxation. In 1921 the percentage on dutiable goods was 20.6 per cent; in 1926 the percentage of duty on dutiable goods was 24.7 per cent; or in other words, it is higher this year than it has been in any single year in the last ten years with the exception of 1923. In other words the rate of duty charged by the tariff of this country has not been reduced at all. We do not quarrel with that. What we do quarrel with is that this government and its followers, the Minister of Immigration, the Minister of the Interior, the Minister of Agriculture, and others, when it suits their purposes, go to the country and declare that they have lowered the tariff, the customs duties, whereas as a matter of fact the cold figures show that if there has been any change at all, there has been a slight increase. Then they say that the Tories maintain a protective tariff but they eschew protection. There is exactly the same protection in the tariff to-day as there was prior to 1921; in fact a little more.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Will you admit that the general percentage of duties proves anything as to the actual duties paid on our most important imports?

Mr. STEVENS: I will admit to my hon. friend that if you want to escape from a dilemma the tariff and the trade returns will probably offer to you as many avenues of escape as you can find anywhere. I will agree to that, but I say now that in order to show in the main, general, broad perspective the trend of things, these figures are accurate and fair.

I turn now to another phase of my subject, and that is the question of trade.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): If the statement you have made this afternoon be a fair one, will you explain to the House all of the arguments that your party presented here last year about the ruining of industry by the reduction of the tariff?

Mr. STEVENS: I will deal with that if you will give me your attention. I have five or six pages of argument on that point which I think is very cogent. I turn now to an analysis of our trade, imports and exports. I will deal first with the imports, and I will ask the House to follow me and get the general trend of our business, for after all it is only by getting a broad perspective of affairs that we can properly judge the drift of the country's business. It is not an important subdivision, but it is a subdivision worked out by the officers of the statistical branches of the different departments. This trade is divided up under certain headings. I am going to give them very briefly, and I am going to compare the imports of 1922 with those of 1926 and give the various increases. Taking agriculture first, the imports in 1922 amounted to $173,000,000, increased in 1926 to $203,000,000, an increase of thirty million or eighteen per cent. Then the imports of animals was $46,600,000 in 1922 and $41,000,000 in 1926, an increase of $2,500,000, or five per cent.

Then I turn to textiles. Hon. gentlemen will remember that there were three main reductions in the tariff, one on textiles, one on iron and steel products in 1924, and one on automobiles and vehicles. The import of textiles was $139,000,000 in 1922 and $184,000,000 in 1926, an increase of $44,000,000 or 32 per cent. Then wood and paper is practically stationary. I observe there is an increase of 13 per cent. Then the imports of iron in 1922 were $110,000,000 and in 1926 $181,000,000, an increase of $70,000,000 or 64 per cent. Then I take non-ferrous metals which are largely composed of manufactured goods, copper, electrical apparatus, brass goods, tubing and wiring, and such like, and I find the imports were $29,000,000 in 1922 and $47,000,000 in 1926, an increase of $17,000,000 or 60 per cent, and non-metallic metals imports in 1922 were $137,000,000 and in 1926 were $139,000,000, an increase of over a million, or one per cent. Then we imported in 1922 $24,000,000 worth of chemicals and in 1926 $28,000,000, an increase of $3,000,000 or fifteen per cent. The complete table is as follows:

Analysis of Imports

Description	1922	1926	Increase	Per cent
Agriculture	$173,665,000	$203,417,000	$30,742,000	+18.
Animal	46,645,000	49,185,000	2,540,000	+ 5.
Textiles	139,997,000	184,761,000	44,764,000	+32.
Wood and paper	35,791,000	40,403,000	4,612,000	+13.
Iron	110,210,000	181,196,000	70,986,000	+64.
Non-ferrous	29,773,000	47,692,000	17,919,000	+60.
Non-metallic	137,604,000	139,033,000	1,429,000	+ 1.
Chemicals	24,630,000	28,404,000	3,774,000	+15.
Miscellaneous	50,485,000	53,232,000	2,747,000	+ 5.
Total	$747,800,000	$927,323,000	all imports	24.

I desire to bring to the attention of the House the fact that there are three classes where there has been a substantial increase; one was textiles where the increase was thirty-two per cent, and another was iron where the increase was sixty-four per cent. In non-ferrous metals the increase was sixty per cent, and it should be remembered that the average increase in imports is about twenty-four per cent. So that under these three headings we have an abnormal increase in imports. These are the items in which reductions were made in the tariff. I am going to sub-analyse these and bring them under three headings. Under textiles I find that cottons are about stationary—8 per cent, which is very small. The importation of silk is increased about 35 per cent, hemp and flax about 94 per cent and woollens 40 per cent. The complete table is as follows:

Textiles— Imports

	1922	1926	Per cent
Cottons	$52,500,000	$56,500,000	+ 8.
Silk	21,900,000	29,600,000	+35.
Hemp, flax	8,060,000	15,640,000	+94.
Woollens	35,200,000	49,350,000	+40.

The chief increases are in lines produced in Canada. We have been trying to develop hemp and flax in this country for many years. Certain government assistance was given, to a factory in Guelph if I recollect correctly, and there is a general desire to stimulate and increase the production of hemp and flax.

Mr. BROWN: Can you tell us the duty on those items?

Mr. STEVENS: I cannot give the duty. I will deal with the question of woollens now. In 1923 the duty on woollens was reduced, and following the reduction of the tax on woollens several mills closed down and many thousands of workers were thrown out of work, and furthermore that industry has not yet recovered. The other day one industry was picked out in the rise of stock, I think Penmans, and desks were thumped as a complete vindication of the government's policy, but as everybody knows, Penmans produce an article which is peculiar or unique in itself. They have developed a class of underwear against which there is very little competition and in which they excel, and everybody is glad of it. We would like to see all other industries as prosperous. But the knitting industry is only a branch of the woollen industry. Hon. gentlemen might follow me in some references to an address presented to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) on February 1, 1927, just before the budget was brought down, by the Canadian Woollen and Knit Goods Manufacturers' Association. I am not going to read this statement of their views but I will give some of the facts brought out by them. For instance, this manufacturing industry affects some 446 mills and factories in Canada employing 33,000 people with salaries of $30,000,000 annually. Included in these are the woollen goods industry which has 276 spinning, weaving and knitting mills, situated in 140 municipalities and employing some 22,000 workmen. This is an industry indigenous to Canada, one of the industries looked upon as the backbone of Canadian industrial life fifty, seventy-five or a hundred years ago, one of the basic industries of the country, superseded by iron and steel, but it is the industry which gave Great Britain her greatness. It is the industry upon which, prior to the introduction of iron and steel, other industries rested and it is now really a secondary industry, but very important. Now this is where it affects other branches of industry.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Can my hon. friend explain how it is that in spite of the fact that the tariff provides a duty on raw wool those same manufacturers import raw wool without paying duty?

Mr. STEVENS: That is the drawback system for export business.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Do they export all they manufacture?

Mr. STEVENS: I will give you the figures. In our system of customs duties we give all industries a rebate on export business, and properly so. Here are some figures which will answer my hon. friend's question. In the year 1922 there were imported into Canada 12,000,000 pounds of wool. There was a domestic production of 20,000,000 pounds, and there was retained in Canada 32,000,000 pounds. That is the amount of domestic and imported wool retained in Canada. In 1926 there was imported and retained a volume of 13,000,000 pounds; there was raised and retained 9,000,000 pounds—a total of only 22,000,000 pounds. In other words, owing to the reduction in the duty on goods comprised in the woollen schedule there was a reduction in the use of wool in Canada, imported and domestic, of over 10,000,000 pounds. The use of Canadian wool in these manufactures dropped from 20,000,000 to 9,000,000 pounds. I have held the view for many years that our agricultural industry would be infinitely better off if wool production was added to its general activities. It is admitted by all expert agriculturists, I think, that this is sound policy. And yet we have in vogue a tariff policy which is discouraging the production of domestic wool—a policy indeed which has resulted in a drop of the production of domestic wool for weaving in Canada of over 10,000,000 pounds, or more than 55 per cent.

Now I want to show another phase of this subject—wages. This affects the workers of Canada. My hon. friend asked: Why cannot Canada produce just as cheaply as Great Britain or any other country? And they add: If our manufacturers cannot do so then they are not entitled to any consideration. That, I admit, is a bald, crude statement, but it is really the argument that is advanced. I will give the House now the reason why our manufacturers cannot produce as cheaply as the manufacturers of Great Britain, and I challenge any hon. member seriously to attempt to controvert these facts as far as they relate to Canada. I have under my hand the whole list of labour engaged in the woollen spinning trade. Let me give the average percentages for the information of hon. members.

For this class of workers the average wage paid in England is $8.65 per week, in Canada it is $16.35. Fifty-five per cent of the cost of a woollen article is in wages. That being the case, it requires a duty of at least 27½ per cent before you put the Canadian spinner on an equal footing with the British spinner. In other words, if you put aside the tariff altogether you would give to the British spinner a premium of 27½ per cent. Someone will say: Well, cannot you lower the wages of the Canadian spinner? There are certain reasons why we cannot. First, we do not wish to lower the standard of living. I do not think anyone will challenge that. But there is another reason, which is obligatory in its character. The main provinces that are affected, Ontario principally, have what they call a minimum wage law. This law has been placed on the statute books of the provinces as the result of public opinion that the workers in these factories are entitled to a certain minimum wage. That minimum wage corresponds very closely to this $16.35—not exactly. But I say, if you reduce wages in Canada to a point equivalent to the wages of their competitors in Europe, then you would go below the scale provided by the minimum wage law.

Mr. HEAPS: Does the hon. member imply that the minimum wage in effect in our provinces applies to both male and female workers?

Mr. STEVENS: In some of the provinces it applies to both.

Mr. HEAPS: It does not affect the woollen industry at all.

Mr. STEVENS: I will follow my friend's argument. Those engaged in this industry are very largely women workers. But as a representative of labour will my hon. friend suggest to me for one moment that we should lower our wages simply because the law does not happen to protect these workers?

Mr. HEAPS: Absolutely not.

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly not. My hon. friend, I think will follow me in every step I take. We have an average wage in Canada of $16.35, in Great Britain of $8.65. Let my hon. friend follow me a step further, and he will see the absolute justice of our tariff—or the injustice at present; its justice before. Fifty-five per cent of the cost of production of goods is wages. Therefore in order that the Canadian workman may produce these goods and maintain his wages at $16.35, he must have a tariff of at least 27½ per cent. That is the point I am making. Canadian workers are placed under a handicap when you go below that figure—without giving to the manufacturer one atom of protection. Do not let us forget that.

Mr. WARD: Would the hon. member state that the Canadian tariff on woollen goods is less all round than 27½ per cent?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. WARD: Has he the figures?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. My hon. friend has in his mind the general tariff against the United States. But these goods do not come from the United States; they come from Great Britain and Germany. The German wages are more startling still. Italy pays $3.15, France $4.05, Germany—I thought I had the German figures, but I have not. The German wage is about half that of Great Britain.

Mr. HEAPS: Is the average wage which the hon. gentleman is now giving—$16.35—the average wage for both male and female workers in Canada?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: What about the English average?

Mr. STEVENS: The same thing.

Mr. HEAPS: Does not the average for Great Britain cover both male and female workers?

Mr. STEVENS: I did not wish to weary the House by giving these figures in detail, for I notice that overmuch detail tends to make hon. members lose interest in the trend of one's argument. But here they are:

	England	Canada
First drawer..	$7 21	$13 92
Second drawer..	6 99	13 92
Rovers and reducers..	6 76	12 96
Twisters..	6 99	13 44
Winders..	6 53	14 64
Reelers..	7 21	14 40
Spinners..	5 76	13 44
	6 38	13 44
Doffers..	6 73	9 28
Gill box minders.. ..	8 75	17 88
Weavers men.. ..	12 70	24 98
Weavers women.	8 75	16 80
Shippers or warehousemen..	11 18	19 50
	13 58	19 50
Firemen..	14 01	27 09

In other words, nearly the whole schedule is uniformly double, but the average, as I say, is $8.65 and $16.35.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Is the hon. member taking into consideration the increased efficiency of the Canadian workman with the machinery at his command?

Mr. STEVENS: I do not know whether my hon. friend speaks by the book or not. I have not investigated that phase of the matter, but I will say this: If he can show me any country in the world that can beat Great Britain in turning out woollen goods, I shall be glad to know it. I do not think he can. Let me give him another point. I was in a Canadian mill about a year ago where there was a huge machine that would extend across this building. Every wheel in it came from Great Britain. It was a machine modelled on the lines of the latest British weaving machine. I do not know the business, all the information I have in regard to it is gathered from these official reports, but I do know that in all this class of labour Canada pays double what they pay in England and three to four times what they pay in Italy, Germany and France. Therefore I say that if you make the duty lower than 27½ per cent you penalize the Canadian worker. You must concede that 27½ per cent before there is an atom of protection to the manufacturer. I shall not labour that point further.

Now let me turn to the non-ferrous metals, in regard to which one can make a very interesting analysis. Our imports of copper and the manufactures of copper, amounted to $2,800,000 in 1922, and $7,600,00 in 1926, or an increase of 171 per cent. This offers the most magnificent opportunity for Canada of any of the various industries, for we produce a considerable quantity of copper ore. The largest consumer is Great Britain, with 150,000 tons of refined copper per annum, while the next largest is Germany, consuming 94,000 tons yearly. Canada produces a lot of that copper but she exports it in the raw form as ore or ore matte to the United States to the extent of 82 per cent. That 82 per cent is exported in the raw state absolutely untouched, apart from its extraction from the ground. In the United States it is manufactured, and Germany buys 84 per cent of her total requirements of this commodity from that country, a substantial portion of which is Canadian copper sent across the border in the form of ore matte entirely unrefined. Last year we produced 111,000,000 pounds of copper and exported in the form of raw ore, at 12½ cents per pound, 109,000,000. Just imagine! Out of a total production of 111,000,000 pounds we shipped to the United States 109,000,000 pounds almost entirely raw, unrefined and unsmelted. Then take our imports, which consist chiefly of electrical apparatus. We dig the ore out of the ground, load it into scows by the thousands of tons, and that is all we do to it. Thereafter it goes to the United States to be refined, rolled and manufactured, and we buy it back in the shape of electrical wire, radio apparatus and electrical fittings of various descriptions, paying 36, 40, 50 and 70 cents a pound, although we sell it at 12½ cents a pound in the raw in the form of rock. The complete table of imports of non-ferrous metals is as follows:

	1922	1926	P.C.
Copper production, lbs..	111,400,000	15,600,000
Copper export ore lbs. and matte..	109,100,000	13,500,000
Imports—
Electric apparatus..	$11,000,000	$16,700,000	52
Copper, chiefly mfg..	2,800,000	7,600,000	171

Talk about the development of industry in Canada! Why, Mr. Speaker, all we are doing is acting as quarrymen for the United States. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) the other day made a passing reference to this matter, skating over it very lightly in a speech which in other respects was admirable. He referred to aluminum and declared that our imports were going up. Where are my Saskatchewan friends while we are discussing this particular question? Do they know that in the province of Saskatchewan there are the finest beds of aluminum clay that are to be found anywhere in the world? Does that signify nothing to them? Do they know that most of the aluminum on the continent is taken from certain beds in Kansas? Do they know that nearly all the aluminum manufactured in Canada is imported alumina, the metal form of the product, which we purchase to the extent of 95 per cent? Our imports of aluminum, the finished product, have increased 225 per cent in the last five years, nothwithstanding that in the province of Saskatchewan, lying dormant, there are millions upon millions of tons of alumina, or aluminum in clay form, which could be developed. I appeal to the Saskatchewan Coöperative Dairy, that splendid organization which is producing millions of pounds of butter a year. Would it not help them to have an industry giving employment to several thousand men right in their own province? Would it not be better to have these men working in the province and consuming their dairy products rather than having to compete in the markets of the world for the disposal of their butter? Is that not of some value? And in northern Alberta sodium and aluminum clay lie side by side, yielding all the ingredients requisite for the manufacture of the finished aluminum product. Yet we have increased our imports 225 per cent. In face of all this the government declares complacently that there is no problem; everything is lovely; business is prospering. Are these not problems which this House should be dealing with? Should we not look them in the eye and try to find some solution for them?

I come now to what I call the tragedy of the iron industry. If these figures do not bring the blush of shame to the face of every Canadian, then I say that Canadian is lacking in some appreciation of the possibilities of his country. Our imports of iron and steel products in the five years preceding the war —I take these five years because they represent a normal period, the interval during the war having been abnormal—amounted to $95,500,000 per annum. The average for the last five years is $169,000,000, or an increase of eighty per cent per annum. In other words, in the last five years, our average imports have exceeded by eighty per cent a corresponding period before the war.

Mr. BROWN: What would be the figures in tons instead of dollars?

Mr. STEVENS: I will give the figures in a moment, and I would ask the hon. gentleman to be good enough to study them carefully. Our imports in 1922 were $138,000,000 and in 1925, $166,000,000. It will be recalled that between these years there was a revision of the tariff downward on iron and steel products which ruined certain subsidiary industries. In 1926 our imports were $219,000,000, that is for the calendar year Now, what about the production of pig iron? In 1913, the last normal year before the war, we produced 1,008,000 tons of pig iron.

Mr. BROWN: My question related to imports.

Mr. STEVENS: This is more germane to the question, if my hon. friend will be good enough to follow the analysis. In 1913, I say, we produced 1,008,000 tons of pig iron while the average for the last five years has been 632,000 tons, or a decrease in production of 37 per cent. Just contrast the figures I have given. Our increase in imports has been 80 per cent, while our production has been 37 per cent lower. Will anyone tell me as a Canadian that this is sound business?

My hon. friends opposite shouted from the housetops their wonderful policy of lowering the cost of the implements of production. Those were attractive words. But I ask hon. gentlemen now, has it paid? No, Mr. Speaker; far from that it has been a tragedy for this country. Our imports of manufactures in iron include all rolled mill products, something which Canada can and does produce in every province, comprising bars, rods and so forth, and in 1922 the total was $20,000,000. There was a lowering of the tariff with the result that in 1926 this amount had increased to $47,000,000, or 135 per cent. Take machinery, not agricultural but implements generally. In 1922 our imports amounted to $24,000,000 and in 1926, $38,000,000, or an increase of 60 per cent. Imports of agricultural machinery, amounted in 1922, to $7,700,000 and in 1926 to $17,500,000, or an increase of 129 per cent engines and boilers, in 1922 $4,800,000 and in 1926 $13,900,000, or an increase of 190 per cent. Follow me again; rolling mill products show an increase of 135 per cent; machinery not agricultural shows an increase of 60 per cent; agricultural machinery an increase of 129 per cent and engines and boilers an increase of 190 per cent, and mark you the average increase of imports over the same period was 24 per cent. Do not tell me that this is healthy; we have a normal increase of 24 per cent in all our imports, but in these things which mean bread and butter to tens, yes, hundreds of thousands of Canadians there are increases of 135 per cent, 60 per cent, 129 per cent and 190 per cent respectively. There is something wrong. Sir, these things alone should command the attention of parliament; we could well afford to cast to the winds practically all the business of this session and turn our attention to these matters. Parliament should face these facts.

Now let us turn to the exports, and we will see an equally startling situation. Our exports under the same headings, which are fixed by the government officials and very wisely so, show the following:

Agricultural	$418,150,000	$464,000,000	*11.
Animal	218,500,000	156,000,000	†28.
Fibres and textiles	23,500,000	8,700,000	†67.
Wood and paper	190,000,000	265,000,000	*39.
Iron products	66,000,000	65,000,000	† 1.5
Non-ferrous	59,000,000	76,000,000	*30.
Non-metallic	28,000,000	25,000,000	†11.
Chemicals	32,000,000	16,000,000	†50.
Miscellaneous	.....	.....
Total	$1,185,000,000	$1,125,000,000

*Increase. †Decrease.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend is using war years now, is he not?

Mr. STEVENS: The minister very properly calls attention to the fact that about six months of the year 1918 was during the war.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The years preceding the war were quite as important.

Mr. STEVENS: What is the point?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am not making any point; I merely asked the question.

Mr. STEVENS: My point is this, Mr. Speaker; those who now argue that the way to get prosperity is to trade with the world willy-nilly should look at the fact that our imports of textiles have increased by 32 per cent while our exports decreased 67 per cent; there must be something wrong which should be corrected, and that wrong was done in 1923 when the woollen schedules were tampered with. And, Sir, the thing that is wrong is writ in the blood and in the tears of thousands of workers who were driven out of their homes in this country. The Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) smiles, but it is no smiling matter any more than the tragedy of the iron and steel industry in Nova Scotia is a smiling matter. Let us look at the exports of wood fibre and paper; these show an increase of 39 per cent, with which I shall deal a little later. It will be noticed that there is an increase in our exports of agricultural products of 11 per cent, which is a very small item in view of the crops we have had in the last three years, but it is all to the good. The other two increases are, in wood fibre and non-ferrous metals, and in connection with non-ferrous metals our exports are raw materials, chiefly ore. Take asbestos; we are selling $7,000,000 worth of asbestos to the United States to be turned into $70,000,000 worth of products. We are told that in Canada we have the asbestos of the world, but all we are doing with it is digging it out of the ground and sending it out of the country, most of it in rock form, with some worked up into the first process only. I think it is sold at something like $7 per ton, or some such ridiculous figure, instead of being turned into material worth from $100 to $200 a ton, which work can be done here just as well as it is done south of the line.

Then, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance referred to abounding business, and I am going to tell the House very briefly where the abounding business comes in. It emanates from three sources almost entirely; pulp and paper, in which there has been a tremendous increase; the development of electrical energy and in northern Ontario and Quebec the mining boom. Outside of these three, Mr. Speaker, I will show the House that in practically every line not directly dependent upon these you have a retardation of business instead of expansion. Of course, in the export of grain there has also been a huge increase in the last few years, but let us get a broad view of the situation. The Minister of Trade and Commerce referred to the way business was growing, so let us take the last four years of the Conservative regime, the calendar years 1918 to 1921 inclusive. The bank clearings for that period averaged $16,600,000,000 per year, with which we may contrast the last four years of the Liberal rule, with an average of $16,800,000,000. The difference is very small, in fact hardly worth mentioning. The point I am making is that business generally in Canada, other than in these three branches to which I have referred, is not progressing as it should. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that Canada has the greatest opportunity of any country in the world to advance; I believe that to-day Canada should be in a better condition than any other country in the world, but the facts do not bear this out, with the exception of these three branches to which I have referred, and which I will analyse briefly. Let us consider the development of electrical energy. Has it not been for the merely accidental discovery of a contract which this government was entering into with certain United States interests, the Carillon power would have been in the hands of those interests and delivered to the United States.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Speaker, last year the Prime Minister denied that statement, and on behalf of the government I again deny it to-day.

Mr. STEVENS: I myself brought the question to the attention of the House about two years ago, and the whole question was discussed on the floor of the House. It was found then that the government, through certain powers it had under the act which did not make it obligatory for them to report to parliament, had a contract with American interests, and that contract was not completed simply because—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Do not let him get away with that.

Mr. STEVENS: I can get away with it, simply because it is true. That contract was not completed simply because it was exposed in the House.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is not true.

Mr. STEVENS: I say it is true, and I say further that after I drew it to the attention of the House I went to Toronto and informed Mr. Howard Ferguson, Premier of Ontario. Mr. Ferguson took the matter up with Mr. Taschereau, Premier of Quebec, and between them these two gentlemen stopped the completion of that contract.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If my hon. friend will permit, and if hon. gentlemen opposite will get through clapping, I may say that I do not make a practice of denying statements made by the hon. gentleman, but this is an occasion on which the statement is absolutely untrue. There never was any such agreement entered into. I do not say that there were not plenty of offers, but this government never entered into any such agreement.

Mr. STEVENS: The agreement was laid on the table of the House. I admit that the deal was not completed.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Ah! That is very nice of my hon. friend but he should apologize.

Mr. STEVENS: I will apologize to no one. What? Apologize for having stopped a deal of that kind? Never!

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend cannot get away with a statement of that kind—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): —at least it cannot go unchallenged.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Order? I cannot understand why it is that when an hon. gentleman makes a statement of that kind and when one wants to put the truth before the House some one calls "order". Do hon. gentlemen not want to hear the truth? There was no agreement laid on the table of the House. If my hon. friend will ask for an order I will be glad to see it when it comes down.

Mr. STEVENS: Bring it down.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): All right, have the agreement that my hon. friend speaks of brought down.

Mr. STEVENS: I make the statement now, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The signing of such an agreement was never even contemplated by the government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. STEVENS: I make the statement again, Mr. Speaker, that an agreement was drafted and negotiated. It was aired in the House. It was fought by Mr. Ferguson, it was fought by Mr. Taschereau.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I take exception to the word "negotiated". It was never negotiated.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh tut!

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend is perfectly right when he states there were offers made to the government. There were offers made, innumerable ones, but no agreement was ever negotiated or ever signed.

An hon. MEMBER: By anybody?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): By anybody, or signed, or even the signing considered.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Take it back.

Mr. STEVENS: Take nothing back. Why, Mr. Speaker, the government were ready to permit the export and the then Minister of Railways now in the Senate, the Right Hon. George Graham, stood up in this House and defended it. They were ready to export this power to the United States, but Mr. Taschereau and Mr. Ferguson stood between them and the export of this power from Canada.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I should just like to ask my hon. friend this question: Does he now state that the Right Hon. George Graham stated from his place in this House that he was prepared to sign an agreement and defend it, for the export of power from Carillon?

Mr. STEVENS: I did not say that.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is the inference my hon. friend is leaving. What did he say?

Mr. ROBB: If my hon. friend will allow me we will come back to the question. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre declared that an agreement was laid on the table of the House.

Mr. STEVENS: A draft agreement.

Mr. ROBB: That a contract had been made to send power—

Mr. STEVENS: A draft agreement.

Mr. ROBB: A draft agreement or an alleged draft agreement. I say now, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the government, and I have been a member of the government of Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King since 1921, that there never was a contract signed. The government had always refused offers, had always refused representations made to us on behalf of Carillon. I say more than that. My hon. friend declares that Mr. Taschereau opposed to it. I say that a member of Mr. Taschereau's government attempted to get the government to put a contract through.

Mr. BENNETT: But not Mr. Taschereau.

Mr. STEVENS: Not Mr. Taschereau. Furthermore, all that is very nice but it is a case of making apologies after the facts.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No apologies at all.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Take your medicine.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I will make my statement when the hon. member gets through.

Mr. STEVENS: Had it not been for the fact that the thing was discovered and exposed on the floor of the House it would have been completed. That is my statement, and I say further—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I say to my hon. friend—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not propose to allow my hon. friend to make statements of that kind. I do not propose to allow such statements to go unchallenged.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is an absolute misstatement of facts.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I rise to a point of order. When the hon. Minister of the Interior rises to correct a misstatement, hon. gentlemen opposite shout "order". They object to any noise being made by members on this side but they make all the noise possible themselves. I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, to control the noise which hon. gentlemen opposite are making.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: There is a well known rule that when an hon. member has the floor he may not be interrupted without his consent. Is the hon. gentleman raising a point of order?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): As a member of this House I am appealing to you to prevent disorder here.

Mr. STEVENS: I wanted to discuss briefly the three points upon which I claimed there has been activity. One has to do with water powers. I have intimated already that there was an effort made to secure the export of Canadian power to the United States and this is what I desired to say further: The development of electrical energy is one of the most vital needs of the country to-day, in view of the modern methods of manufacture, when Canada is peculiarly blest with great water powers, and the one thing which Canada ought to address itself to is to safeguard these great water powers for Canadian use. Furthermore, I asserted a moment ago, and I reaffirm it now, that as a result of a discussion in this House a few years ago we prevented the export of power and that, in my estimation, is a very vital thing to this country. I say this House ought to put beyond all peradventure the danger of a government entering into an agreement with large interests south of the line for the export of our power for the purpose of developing industry there. There should go out from Canada this declaration of Canadian policy: Bring your factories to Canadian power if you want to utilize that power for the use of those factories.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have spoken long enough, altogether too long, much longer than I had contemplated. When the chief whip asked me how long I was going to speak I said I would speak about an hour if I were not interrupted, but that if I were interrupted I would probably take longer. These interruptions, which I welcome, usually result in the lengthening of one's speech. I will conclude with this statement: I have endeavoured to bring into survey before this House the actions of this government, deliberate actions which they affirm. I have endeavoured to show the effect of these actions upon the trade of Canada, and I have sought to impress upon the House that it was desirable and necessary that parliament should take cognizance of these things to, as far as possible, direct the policy of this country for the development of Canada, for the expansion of our industries within Canada, and the use of our resources for the benefit of Canadians, and not develop a foreign trade or foreign industries for the benefit of other countries.

Mr. C. R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of attention this afternoon to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) while he dealt with the budget as presented by the Minister of Finance a few days ago, and I noticed that he was labouring under special difficulties. The hon. member stated that the present budget was a static or stationary budget. A static or stationary budget can come only from a static or stationary party such as the one we have across the floor of the House. A budget brought down by the Liberal party is something different from a stationary or static proposition. It is a live-wire project. There is no doubt that at the present time in Canada the Liberal party, fundamentally speaking, stands for the same policy as the Liberal party has stood for in history. It stands for a policy of peace, retrenchment and reform; peace between one province and another in Canada fiscally, financially and every other way; retrenchment when it is possible to cut down the public expenditure and pay off the national debt, and reform—not stagnation. The party that stands for these three great principles of peace, retrenchment and reform in order to make a great Dominion, is the party that stands for a policy of action and not a policy of inaction such as that which has been handed down to us since confederation by the Tory party.

The hon. member tried to prove that our policy was one of inaction, of non-development. In 1868 the Tories were in power in Canada and our imports amounted to $37,000,000 and our exports to $17,000,000. How is that for inactivity, for a stationary condition of trade? In 1878 our imports were $37,000,000, practically "stationary," the same as in 1868, and our exports amounted to only $45,000,000, or an increase of only $8,000,000 over our imports for the same year to the motherland, as regards which our Tory friends are always fond of saying how loyal they are, how they stand for a greater empire, for greater imperial relationships and trade. That was the condition under their rule in 1868 and 1878. These are facts and I defy anyone to contradict them.

In 1883 our imports from Great Britain amounted to $51,000,000 and our exports to $47,000,000. How is that for tying up Canada with the mother country from a commercial point of view? Not very much connection there. In 1896 our imports amounted to $32,000,000 and our exports to $47,000,000. After that we get the value of the imperial preference. In 1911 our imports amounted to $109,000,000 and our exports to $136,000,000. They go over the $100,000,000 mark for the first time in the history of Canada. In 1922 our imports amounted to $117,000,000 and our exports to $300,000,000. In 1925 our imports amounted to $151,000,000 and our exports to $397,000,000, or nearly the $400,000,000 mark. That is action; that is not a stationary condition of trade; that is not inactivity. There is nothing static about that. That happened during Liberal rule under the leadership of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. The British preference was introduced by the Liberal party in 1897. The Tories talked about it for twenty-five years, and yet after all their talk about loyalty, patriotism and imperialism, they were afraid to concede the preference on certain goods in order to link up Canada with the empire.

The hon. member made another statement as regards which the facts are absolutely against him. He said that the Liberal party was divided on the Duncan report. I characterize that as an absolute falsehood. That is not true. No hon. member should rise in this House and make such statements. A member ought to size up his office honourably from the point of view of his riding, his province and the Dominion. When a man gets up and makes a statement of that kind that he knows to be untrue, that he cannot back up with the facts, he is doing something altogether out of place. The fact is that the Liberal party, when that question comes up in the House, will stand undivided; it will stand united. The hon. member in discussing this question before it comes up in the House, is endeavouring to make political capital out of a matter that deeply concerns the Dominion. I would deprecate that on the part of any hon. member, I care not whether he be on this side or the other, or from one group or another group.

He further stated that there was in the Duncan report a reference to dealing with the tariff. This is the way in which the Duncan report handled the tariff question. The hon. gentleman's statement was altogether out of place. On page 32 of the report there is an item dealing with a trade treaty that was asked for as regards forest products. The Duncan report is not asking anything as regards raising or lowering the tariff on forest products. It asks for a trade treaty to be arranged on those products between the maritime provinces and the states to the south. Our maritime friends know that is true. Further we must remember that that trade treaty will be a sort of reciprocity. My hon. friend opposite belongs to the party that in 1911 went out and defeated reciprocity, lost this country millions of dollars and tore it practically asunder from coast to coast. Yet he has the temerity, the audacity, to get up in parliament this afternoon and tell us that the Duncan report wants the matter dealt with in a tariff way when that report makes no reference to the tariff on those products. It speaks entirely about a commercial treaty which we can negotiate internationally and as regards which we shall get down to rock bottom facts and endeavour to heal the maritime situation as far as possible.

On page 33 as regards the fish trade, the maritime report is asking for a trade treaty between the maritimes and the republic to the south of us. That is practically the same proposition. If we go further we shall see just how foolish the hon. member's statements are. On page 36 we find something about coal, a customs tariff on coal, of which we have heard a great deal in this House. The Duncan report states that the coal question ought to be brought before the tariff board. When it is brought before the tariff board we shall get all the facts; they will investigate the proposition fully and lay the facts before parliament, and we as representatives of the Canadian people will decide on a policy in regard to the question of coal. What is wrong about that? I do not think there is anything wrong. On page 37 we get what the Duncan report says in regard to steel. The statement there is to the effect that the whole question of steel—and that is an important question in Canada and particularly important in the maritimes—in all its fulness should be placed before this commission. We should get the facts in regard to it as well as the facts in regard to coal and act accordingly. So that as far as the statement of the hon. member with reference to the Duncan report is concerned, that it deals entirely with the raising or the lowering of the tariff on certain materials, the truth is that the report makes no statement. There is to be no raising or lowering of the tariff on coal or steel until there has been investigation. On the other two items, forest products and fish, nothing is said about the tariff; it aims at simply dealing internationally with these difficulties.

My hon. friend admits that throughout Canada the Robb budget has attracted a great deal of attention east and west. The publications in this country, province by province and district by district, have told the people that this is a splendid budget. What are the facts? Will hon. gentlemen tell me that the average publisher of a daily or a weekly newspaper, after reading the budget, sizing it up and analysing the effect of it, will publish in his paper anything that he does not think is true? He wants to place before his readers the facts. If the budget is an encouraging one he will say so, and if it is not encouraging he will state to the contrary. I believe our newspaper publishers, irrespective of politics or irrespective of whether they are weeklies or dailies, take a presentation of this kind and analyse it carefully; after it is analysed they reach certain conclusions, and that is what they have done in this instance. That being the case we have positive proof that the budget is a proper one. It has received a splendid reception from east to west, and the Robb budget of this year is known throughout Canada, as was the one of last year, as a good budget, a budget that will be not only a cementing factor between east and west but a solidifying factor so far as the various provinces of the Dominion are concerned.

My hon. friend says that although there has been tax reduction we are taking more taxes from the people. The fact is that we have reduced taxation, and if we have taken more in taxation from the people it is not because the rates of taxation are higher; in fact they are lower, but we have done more business. It is a question in simple mathematics, and our friends cannot see through it. Last year the provisions of the Robb budget were presented to nine million people; the people went to the polls not long afterward, and we see the result in this House to-day. It is positive proof that so far as the people are concerned they know a good thing when they see it, and they know the 1927 budget is a good thing.

My hon. friend also, dealing with the national debt, states that we have not paid the amount we say we have paid; and he goes into a complicated discussion on the question of public accounting. The public accounts show us that last year we paid $27,000,000 off the national debt. I do not doubt that. We are going to pay off thirty or forty millions this year. Now what have we paid off since confederation? I have the figures here. Our Conservative friends are always anxious to make out that they are wonderful financiers, that they have done the right thing by Canada, and that if returned to office they will do it again. Since confederation the national debt of Canada has been a big question for finance ministers and parties to handle; it has been an even bigger question since the war and is going to be a big question in the future. What were the reductions of the national debt made by the party to which my hon. friend belongs, about which he waxed so eloquent this afternoon when referring to the national debt? In 1871 the Tories were in power and what did they do? They cut the national debt about half a million dollars. In 1882 they cut the national debt one million and three quarters—and at the same time they added ten million dollars to it. In 1912 they were in power and they cut the national debt $125,000. The public accounts show that, and I am taking the public accounts for one party as well as for the other. What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. In 1913 what did they do? They paid $25,000,000 off the national debt. In other words, they have been in power for over thirty years since confederation and all they have paid off the national debt on the whole is $27,000,000. What about the Liberal administrations? In 1900 the Liberals paid off half a million; in 1904 they paid off another half million; in 1903 they paid off $10,000,000; in 1907, $3,250,000; in 1924, $36,000,000; in 1925, $343,000; in 1926, $27,000,000, and in 1927, this year, we expect a payment of $31,000,000. In other words, since confederation the Conservatives, who have been in power longer than we were, paid $27,000,000 off the national debt as compared with a payment by the Liberals of over $100,000,000. There is the record, and I will leave it to anyone to say whether the record of the Conservative party can be characterized as an active one, or whether it should be regarded as "stationary". I would say it was a "stationary" policy and not designed for the benefit of Canada.

The hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) suggested that we ought to conscript the money of the insurance companies and the banks to pay off the national debt. Following that up he made this statement:

I am of course only elaborating a plan that has grown in my mind after some consideration.

We are glad he gave it some consideration.

And it does not follow that the plan is at all sound in detail.

Did hon. members ever hear such a confession before a national House of Commons—a man rising and claiming that he has a splendid scheme for paying off the national debt of Canada, and after he has told us his objective he says it does not follow that the plan is sound in detail! We all know that a plan or a policy that is not sound in detail is absolutely worthless; consequently he might as well have saved his breath, and if that is all he has to offer we had better go on as we are. The cutting down of the national debt is a splendid work for any party or any finance minister, and I believe our hon. Minister of Finance is entitled to the respect and admiration of the House of Commons as well as of all Canada for the introduction of his budget and the determination he has shown in trying to lower this debt from year to year since 1923.

Further, as a Liberal I have absolute confidence in the Prime Minister and in the Minister of Finance that during the next fifteen years—and we are going to be in power that long by the way things are going now—during the next fifteen years if we continue to reduce the national debt at the present rate—and I have faith that our Minister of Finance will enable us to do this—we shall have paid off about six or seven hundred million dollars. Then should our Tory friends get into office—

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. McINTOSH: I do not believe they will, of course; but suppose fate should so decree, we ought to pass legislation to compel them to pay off annually $40,000,000. That is the only way we shall ever be able to get them to reduce the national debt, otherwise they will never pay off a dollar if they can help it. During all their terms of office since 1867 they have paid off only a paltry $27,000,000, they have run the country into debt by billions of dollars, and then they boast that they are great financiers, great Canadians, great imperialists, and that they stand for the old flag, the old empire and a greater Canada.

This budget is a surplus budget. The hon. Minister of Finance shows a surplus of $31,000,000, last year he had a surplus of $33,000,000. That is conclusive proof that he and his colleagues are looking after national affairs pretty well. These recurring surpluses clearly indicate that trade is flourishing and that prudence is being exercised in the conduct of the country's affairs. If a man closes his books at the end of the year with a balance on the wrong side he is drifting towards bankruptcy, and the very fact that when the Minister of Finance closes our books at the end of the year he can show a surplus of $31,000,000 is ample evidence that Canadian trade is developing, that a buoyant spirit is abroad commerically and financially, that crops have been bountiful, that our transportation systems have been busy, that credit is good, that money is cheaper and easier to get, and that Canadians are awakening to the possibilities of imperial and foreign trade.

But, Mr. Speaker, we have not only a surplus budget, we have a favourable balance of trade. One of the great financial apostles of the Tory party in days gone by—it might be well if they had his peer to-day—was Sir Leonard Tilley, Sir John A. Macdonald's Minister of Finance. He was always telling his party: If you cannot show a favourable balance of trade you are no good; you will never get anywhere, you will never impress the people that you can govern the country, and you will not be returned to power for decades. His words are just as true to-day as when he uttered them—and the Tory party believes them, but it will not admit its belief. We have been going on from year to year showing a favourable balance of trade: this year $250,000,000; last year $401,000,000; the year before $284,000,000—an average for the last three years of over $300,000,000 annually. That is another reason why I am glad as a citizen of Canada to stand up in this House to-day and declare that I shall vote against the amendment and for the resolution. I believe this is a popular budget, I believe it is an accurate statement of facts, I believe that the country is satisfied with it, and considering what we have gone through politically during the last two years I believe that the people as a whole will say that the Minister of Finance has presented another outstanding budget that will demonstrate to the world that Canada is on the upgrade, and that in the years to come we are going to make history.

Some hon. members on the opposite side of the House find fault with this budget and ask: Why not reduce the tariff? According to their view the tariff board is an excuse for the government to delay action on the tariff.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. McINTOSH: That is not true. Last year in this House I declared that we should give the tariff board a square deal before we passed judgment on it. I say the same to-day. Every industry in all Canada that feels it has a grievance must bring that grievance before the board to be thoroughly analysed. Then let the members of this House from all Canada consider the facts on which the tariff board bases its report and act according to their best judgment. Let us do by every industry what in our opinion is honest and right. In that way alone shall we bring about a united Canada enjoying a constantly expanding trade from coast to coast. If we are going to continue our tariff, let it be a tariff fair to all. Do not let the impression go abroad that any industry can at any time go to the Minister of Finance and get the tariff raised or lowered without this House deciding exactly what that raising or lowering shall be. I still have confidence in the tariff board. I say, give it a chance to demonstrate its usefulness. Let the tariff board get busy and deal with every application that comes before it on its merits. Then we in turn will decide what ought to be done for the good of Canada as a whole.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that in my estimation this is one of the best budgets ever presented to the country. It will show the world that we have another surplus, that we have reduced our national debt, that public revenues are buoyant, that trade is active, and that our people from coast to coast are piling up big trade returns year by year. That is important from the standpoint of western and eastern Canada. It will be an important factor, a magnet, in bringing the right class of immigrants to this country, and I believe we want population. It is the general feeling throughout the country that we must have more people; we need more men on the land to increase agricultural production. It is the opinion on all sides that what is required is an intelligent colonization and agricultural development policy. We have a great opportunity now to develop the wonderful heritage which is ours, and we should do so rationally, with the interests of the people in view as well as for the benefit of those who are to come.

What about our population? In 1871 we had a population of 3,370,000; in 1900 this had increased to a little over 5,000,000 and in 1921 it was 8,800,000. In other words, we have brought into the country since 1870, 4,500,000 people. Taking the population of 1870 and working out the natural increase at two and a quarter per cent per annum we find, with a total increase of 4,500,000 from abroad that our population in 1921 instead of being about 9,000,000 ought to have been over 16,000,000. For that 4,500,000 people whom we brought into Canada, the government spent $24,000,000 or $6 per head. That seems to me to be rather cheap. Economists tell us that the capital productive value to the state of the average individual is $3,000, and we have brought in over 4,500,000 at $6 a head and have not been able to hold them. The natural increase has not been what it should have been. We have lost many of our people and our problem is twofold: we must first get the people, and in the second place we have to retain them. That is a vital question.

It seems to me that we have a lop-sided development in Canada so far as our population is concerned. The people are rushing off the land into the urban centres and to a large extent they are going to the United States. In 1925, in one month, over 8,000 Canadians crossed the border. That works out at the rate of 100,000 a year. During the last nine months 48,000 Canadians have come back, and with good times and increased prosperity in trade, together with a forward-looking policy on the part of this government, thousands more will return. These people will probably go on the land, and we should do our best to hold them with a view to increasing our agricultural production. In Russia 85 per cent of the people are on the land and 15 per cent in the urban centres; in the United States 72 per cent dwell in the cities and 28 per cent on the land; in Canada in the year 1870 we had 69 per cent of the population on the land. In 1901 our rural population was 63 per cent, but in 1921 it had gone down to 50 per cent. This proves beyond question that we need more people; there is no overproduction on the land. It proves further, as I say, that we have a lop-sided policy which we must rectify, and the problem for Canadians to grapple with to-day is to obtain the right class of people to go on the land, to balance agricultural production with our industrial activities and so bring about that happiness in the rural communities which will make for a unified industrial and agricultural life in Canada. The very basis of this problem lies in arriving at the proper equilibrium or normal balance between the country and the urban population, and with that end in view we should devise a policy whereby we may be able to develop our agricultural areas to their utmost, at the same time maintaining urban development. We have 358,000,000 acres of arable land in Canada. In 1870, 36,000,000 acres were occupied, in 1901, 63,000,000 acres and in 1921, 145,000,000. But what about cultivation? In 1870 we had 10,000,000 acres under cultivation; in 1901, 20,000,000 acres, and in 1921, between 58,000,000 and 60,000,000 acres. So that we have about one-sixth of the arable area of this country under cultivation, and the problem is to develop the rest of it, settling it with the proper class of people who will increase agricultural production. If some satisfactory policy were pursued in this regard, to balance agricultural life with industrial conditions, there would be a greater prosperity in Canada than this country has enjoyed in years.

Now what is the policy of the Liberal party in this regard? This is an important question to my riding of North Battleford. It is important to every member from the province of Saskatchewan or from Alberta or Manitoba. What are the Department of Immigration and the minister doing along that line? I am happy to say that after analysing that policy and procuring the facts relating to the work of the department, I believe the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) is on the right track and is carrying out a policy which will redound to the credit of the Dominion in the years to come. There are across the Atlantic, as well as in the United States, thousands of people who are anxious to come to Canada, and there is, as I have said, a vast extent of arable land awaiting development. The problem is to bring those people to the land, and we have an instrument by means of which that transition can take place, namely, the immigration policy of this government. The department is doing its best to bring farmers who have money to buy land, and its endeavour is to bring into the country agricultural workers to go on the farms and domestics to enter the homes of Canada. That is the policy in a nutshell. Further, the government will see to it that these people get employment and stay on the land. In other words, the policy of the government is not only to help them to get to Canada, but to do its utmost to retain them in this country after they have come. Before the war, an immigrant from Antwerp, say, to any eastern port in Canada could make the passage for $30. After the war, coming from Liverpool, he had to pay from $84.50 to $87.50, and from Antwerp, $112.50. The rates went up and something had to be done to bring them back to a level within the reach of the average immigrant, if we wanted to secure British settlers for our farming areas. The department, therefore, coöperated with the British government under the Empire settlement scheme, with the result that to-day an immigrant coming from the old country to Toronto pays £3.10 and to Winnipeg £4.10 That is the policy of the department, and I would say that it is only necessary to pursue that policy, because I believe we are on the right track. We have made up our minds that we want in Canada those people who will go on the land, develop our agricultural areas and help bring about greater production. We do not want anyone who will not fit into the conditions prevailing here, and I believe that following this course will bring great results during the next few years.

We do not want exactly the same results as we obtained after the Liberals were returned to power in 1896. The immigration movement started in 1904, when the Liberals went at the question in a public-spirited way. They looked upon it as a business proposition, and from 1904 to 1913 thousands of people came to Canada from all parts of the world; the door was practically wide open. We do not stand for that policy entirely to-day; some want the door absolutely closed; some will be satisfied if we never get another immigrant; some want just a certain number, but I understand the policy of the department now is to let into Canada those who will fit into our agricultural conditions and who are willing to dig in and work and help make a greater country. We want those who are clean in body and in mind, who will help develop the country, and I believe that to be the greater policy. In 1913 over 400,000 people came to Canada, although in 1909 it had dropped to 146,000 because of the depression. I believe, however, that following out the present policy of the department and getting all possible publicity from budgets such as the one brought down this year; getting in touch with those who want to leave their native lands and come to Canada, those who are willing to work, and seeing that they will fit into our complicated financial and agricultural structure, will bring a great benefit to Canada.

In Canada we have one mile of railway to every 178 people, while in the United States they have only one mile of railway to every 400 people; in other words, the railway problem in this country is twice as complicated and difficult as in the great republic to our south. What are we to do? We must solve the problem and one way is to get more people into this country so that more goods will be carried into and shipped out of Canada. In that way the railways will do more business and will receive a greater profit. It is estimated that the traffic value of every farmer to the railways is $750. In 1915 an estimate was taken of the three prairie provinces, giving a total grain tonnage of 163,000,000 for 219,000 farmers for eleven months. Dividing one into the other it will be seen that the traffic value of each farmer during that period was equal to $750. Furthermore, if you capitalize that $750 at five and one-half per cent you will get the capital value of every farmer to the railways of over $13,000, so you can easily see the value of farmers to this country.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask a question? If the immigrant is worth so much to the railways why should it be necessary for the Dominion government to subsidize the railways to bring immigrants to Canada?

Mr. McINTOSH: The Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) tells me there is no subsidization.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As I understand it, a certain grant is made for certain classes of immigrants; that is, a lower fare is granted, which is equivalent to a subsidy to the railways.

Mr. McINTOSH: The railways are supposed to pay that difference, as I understand it. There is coöperation between the government, the department, the railway companies and the British government.

Mr. FORKE: The railways pay £4 of it.

Mr. McINTOSH: The railways would appear to be doing their share.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But my objection still stands; the effect is to assist the railways to bring in these immigrants, and my point is that if the immigrant is worth so much to the railways why should we go out of our way to assist the railways to lower their rates to bring immigrants here?

Mr. McINTOSH: I think the railways are assisting us; it is a straight business proposition and they are coöperating with us and with the British government in order to get more men on the land. In Canada we have the land and in Great Britain they have the men, and the proposition is to bring the two together for the good of both countries.

I did not intend to speak so long, Mr. Speaker, but in closing I would like to repeat that I think this budget is important to every riding in Canada, and for the life of me I cannot see why there should be much opposition to it in the House. I know that the budget is already popular in my riding; I am satisfied it is popular all over Saskatchewan; I know it is popular in Manitoba and I am sure that the rank and file of the people of Alberta will accept it if they are given the facts in a clear and straightforward manner. I believe this budget is popular across the mountains as well as in Ontario and throughout the east, and for that reason I feel that it will have a unifying effect in bringing about a greater nation. I am going to support it not only as a representative of my own riding but because I am a western member and because of the fact that not only am I supposed to do my best for my own riding in this House but I am supposed to consider the interests of Canada, and I think this budget will link the sections of this country into a more splendid and united whole. I believe it will be a factor in bringing to Canada the people we want and in making our agricultural and colonization policy more successful than ever. For these reasons and many others, Mr. Speaker, I intend to support the resolution of the Minister of Finance.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

PATENTS OWNED BY ALBERT P. FRIGON

The House in committee on Bill No. 42, respecting certain patents owned by Albert P. Frigon—Mr. Mercier (St. Henri)—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Term of duration extended.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is there anybody here promoting the bill who can explain it to us?

Mr. MARCIL: In the absence of the member who is sponsor for the bill, I notice there is only one clause which permits the term of duration extended. The bill has been reported by the private bills committee with one amendment.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: What is the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment is clause 2, which reads as follows:

If any person has, since the thirty-first day of May, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-two or before the seventh day of November, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-six, commenced to construct, manufacture, use or sell in Canada the inventions covered by the said letters patent, such person may continue to construct, manufacture, use or sell such inventions in as full and ample manner as if this act had not been passed.

Mr. MARCIL: I think that provision protects the rights of parties who may be affected by this legislation.

Mr. ROBB: I am not sure whether this bill has been examined by the Commissioner of Patents. It seems to me that on general principles we should be very careful in granting patents of this kind which might add materially to the cost of construction in Canada. I think it would be well before proceeding further to have a report from the Commissioner of Patents.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Seeing that the promoter of the bill is not here, let it stand until the next sitting.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report progress on the bill?

Mr. MacLAREN: I think the committee will find there is a clause in the bill which safeguards anyone who has made any preparation for carrying on work with which the bill may interfere. The private bills committee went into this matter very carefully.

Mr. ADSHEAD: The bill has been considerably changed from the form in which it was introduced. I do not know, Mr. Chairman, that the bill as you have it there is the bill as it was amended. How are we to judge of what the bill contains if it is not before us in an amended form? The bill was to be reprinted and submitted to the House as amended. We do not happen to have it.

The CHAIRMAN: The Minister of Finance suggests that we report progress on the bill. Does that commend itself to the committee?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I think we ought to have a report from the Commissioner of Patents, as the Minister of Finance has suggested.

Mr. MacLAREN: Mr. Chairman, have you the amended bill, and if so will you read the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN: I have already read the amendment.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I am a new member of the House and I am not objecting on frivolous grounds. But is it the custom of the House to proceed with an amended bill when it has not been distributed to the members? I think the committee should have the bill before it in its amended form.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I support the suggestion of the Minister of Finance. In the preamble of this bill there is a long recital which gives to the patentee a valid patent on reinforced concrete beams. This is a peculiar bill in that there is so much predicated in the preamble. It would not hurt at all if the bill stood over until we had a report from the Commissioner of Patents, and if the commissioner reports in favour of the bill I shall be very glad to facilitate its passage through the House.

Mr. BROWN: In the committee the preamble was amended more than any other part of the bill, and I think the hon. gentleman has made the same mistake as most of us made in the committee, in supposing that the patent referred to steel and concrete beams. From the explanation that was given to us, it would seem that that is not the case, but that this is a special machine made in Switzerland, and imported into Canada, and designed for the manufacture of steel and concrete beams.

Mr. RYCKMAN: That is all the more reason why the bill should stand.

Mr. BROWN: In my judgment it is a matter that should not be dealt with hurriedly. We did give the bill a great deal of consideration in the committee, and it passed through the committee by a considerable majority, although there was some questioning in the minds of many of the members whether a bill of this nature was sound in principle. While I would not like myself to offer any particular objection to the passing of the bill, I agree that it is one that should be considered very carefully.

Mr. MARCIL: Was the Commissioner of Patents or his representative heard before the committee?

Mr. BROWN: A representative of the patent office appeared before the committee, and while he did not express any opinion as to the merits, he stated clearly to us the general custom of the patent office.

Mr. ADSHEAD: How does the hon. member know that the bill now before us is the same as the bill as it came amended from the committee?

Mr. BROWN: I think the objection is well taken. There should be a reprint of the bill before us because the amendments made in the committee were very important.

Mr. PETTIT: I was present at the meeting of the committee, and I may say that all the words after the words "Canadian patents" down to the word "numbered" in line 17 were deleted and the term was fixed at December 31, 1936. The amendment was very thoroughly discussed in the committee and unanimously agreed upon.

Mr. GUTHRIE: But when a minister requests that a bill stand until he shall have consulted the officers of the department, I do not think we have ever refused such a request.

Mr. ROBB: In the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who administers the Copyright branch, I think it would be well to let the matter stand.

Progress reported.

On the motion for third readings:

Mr. SPEAKER: In order to save time, if the House does not object I will give simply the numbers of these bills. They are: Bills Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40.

Mr. MARCIL: When first I came to this House none of these bills was ever passed except on division for the reason that a minority of the members did not favour them. Bills of this nature have been becoming gradually more numerous until we find at the present time some sixty on one order paper. I think we should return to the practice which obtained for many years after confederation and register the fact that they are allowed to go through on division. I ask that in this case this proviso be inserted in the proceedings.

Motion agreed to, on division, and bills read the third time, and passed.

COLUMBIA LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY

House in committee on Bill No. 41 to incorporate the Columbia Life Assurance Company (as amended)—Mr. Stevens—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Mr. Chairman, what are the amendments?

The CHAIRMAN: Clause 5 has been deleted, and in clause 9 the words "except as herein otherwise provided for" have been struck out.

Mr. GARDINER: And clause 3 was amended by deleting "two" and substituting "one" therefor.

Mr. STEVENS: That is right.

Sections 1 to 4 and 6 to 8 agreed to.

On section 9—1917, c.29 to apply.

Mr. GARDINER: As amended, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. STEVENS: With the amendments.

Mr. HEAPS: Is anything in this bill contrary to the law of the province of British Columbia, where evidently the head office is to be located?

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly not. The bill of course is under the provisions of the federal Insurance Act in all respects.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

MONTREAL, OTTAWA AND GEORGIAN BAY CANAL COMPANY

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa) moved the second reading of Bill No. 78 respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Company.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would ask the promoter of this bill to let it stand. It is only a few minutes now before the time for discussion of private bills expires and there are some members on this side who would like to discuss the bill.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I should like to oblige the hon. member although of course, Mr. Speaker, I am entirely in your hands. I admit that there are quite a number of members on both sides of the House who would like to take part in the discussion of the bill, but I submit that the proper place for the discussion would be in the railway committee to which the bill would be referred after its second reading here. No harm could result. The discussion would take place there as freely as in this committee, and as I have observed on both sides of the House a desire to expedite the business of the session I think considerable time would be saved if my hon. friend would allow the second reading.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I know it is not customary to speak at any length on private bills, but this is one occasion on which I certainly think we should discuss the principle of the measure before us. If we pass the second reading of the bill the House will be virtually assenting to the principle involved. It is true the bill will be referred to the committee on railways and canals, where its details will be discussed, and will then come back to this House for further consideration in our own committee. But, I repeat, the second reading of the bill is tantamount to an approval of its principle.

The project of a canal on the Ottawa and French rivers has been before the public for many years, the original bill for the canal having been passed in the year 1894, long before any of us were members of the House. One of the first things that came up for discussion in the House after I had the honour of becoming one of its members was this same Georgian Bay canal bill. At that time the whole of the Ottawa valley was very much interested in the project, from which we hoped many things. Many elections, if they were not run solely on the question of the Georgian Bay canal, had at any rate a substantial relation to it; the subject was a factor in all of the elections in this Ottawa valley during a number of years. We all hoped and expected that the canal would be built. What has happened, however? The charter has been renewed fourteen times. The matter has been on the statute books since 1894, some thirty-two years, and so far nothing practical has been done.

I want it distinctly understood that I am not in any way opposed to the building of this canal, if those who are behind it actually want to build the canal and are not asking for a renewal of the charter for any other purpose. I do not think we need this canal as much as it was needed years ago, because in the meantime we have enlarged the Welland canal and some day we may enlarge the St. Lawrence canal. While years ago we felt that this would be a new outlet for grain from the northwest, vessels now carrying grain on the great lakes have become so much larger and the depth of water provided by the Welland canal so much greater that as a practical matter it does not seem to me that this Georgian bay canal is quite as essential as formerly. At the same time, if any body of gentlemen are willing to put up their money for this canal I would not suggest that they be not allowed to do so, and I am quite sure no member of this House would not be happy to have this canal built for the benefit of the interior navigation of this country in bringing grain from the northwest and also in distributing the various products of the Ottawa valley. This is a rich valley and its resources have hardly been scratched as yet; not only is there timber and pulpwood, but minerals are being discovered continually, and it is possible that the Georgian bay canal might pay. So if any gentlemen wish to build it I have no objection whatever.

With regard to the promoters of this bill, I notice that in the copy on my file no promoters are mentioned, so I take it that the promoters are those named in the last renewal. My memory takes me back to the time when McLeod Stewart, who was a valued citizen of Ottawa, took up this idea with enthusiasm and tried to interest people in it. He did not have sufficient means to undertake the enterprise, and after some years Sir Robert Perks took up the matter. He was and still is a prominent English contractor who had built large works in various parts of the world and had made a success of his business, and a prominent man in the commercial life of London whom I often met when I had the honour of representing Canada there. Sir Robert Perks and his associates took hold of this charter and had it renewed, then employed a staff of engineers to make plans for the canal. I am not sure that they carried those plans all the way through, but certain sections of the Ottawa river were plotted out by a small staff engaged for that purpose. Then what happened? The money was not forthcoming, and they could not build the canal. They came to this House asking for a renewal of the charter time and time again; in fact this charter has become a hardy perennial. I think Sir Robert Perks came to Ottawa every year in those days to interview first Sir Wilfrid Laurier during his years of office and then Sir Robert Borden, and his energetic endeavours were only interrupted by the war. He wanted the Dominion government to guarantee the bonds of this canal, arguing that this was really a public work for the public advantage, and that therefore the Dominion government should guarantee the bonds of the company. The promoters claimed that if the government did that they would never have to pay a cent because the revenues would be sufficient to pay the cost of operation and also to cover the interest on the bonds issued.

My reason for stating these facts is that even Sir Robert Perks, who was known in London as the head of a powerful group of financiers and who had built with his associates large works in various parts of the world, did not find himself in a position to provide the money necessary to build this canal without a government guarantee. If that was the case with this powerful group of financiers in England, in the first place I would like to know where the money is to come from to build this canal now, because it is going to cost twice as much as it would have then cost. That is the first question I would like to bring forward for the consideration of the House, but it is by no means my main reason for bringing up these matters on the second reading of this bill. This is not a party question in any sense of the word, but we have three or more groups in this House and if a few businesslike words from me on the question of this renewal would enable those members from different parts of Canada to give careful consideration to this whole question, when the matter comes up in committee I will try my best to impart that information.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have to go into the matter of water power in connection with this bill and I would therefore call your attention to the fact that it is 9 o'clock. I would like to continue, however, when the matter comes up again.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed the debate on the motion of Hon. J .A. Robb (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of ways and means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Coote.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Rosetown): Mr. Speaker, the budget has each year come to be looked upon as a register of progress, or otherwise, regarding trade. It is also an indication of the policy of the government, and looking at it from this standpoint the government has evidently been careful in the present budget about one thing only. Its one concern has been for the payment of dividends on capital investments, rather than for easing the burden of the high cost of living on the worker of the nation.

In this connection I wish to say a word regarding a statement made by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) this afternoon. He says that the policy he stands for would maintain the very highest standard of living possible. But he would put the whole burden of the high cost of living and the decent standard of living on the primary producer of the nation who is already a national drudge; and I am wondering why the farmer who engages in the basic industry of this country has not received more attention in this House during the last few years, and why every other industry in the country is placed as a burden upon the basic industry of the Dominion.

But to follow the argument of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre a little further, not only is he inconsistent in his social ideas, but he is altogether astray economically. He said we need protection in Canada against England because their eight dollar a week wage is equal to a 27½ per cent protection which we have to get in Canada. Because of the lower wage the Canadian manufacturer is placed at a disadvantage, regarding woollens particularly. But when it comes to the case of copper produced in this Dominion the hon. gentleman says this goes to the United States to be worked up, and we buy it back again. It goes to the United States where wages are still higher than they are in Canada, and then we buy it back again for our own use. Well, why does not the same rule work in both cases? If the United Kingdom places Canada at a disadvantage in the case of woollens, how is it that in the case of copper going to the United States we cannot more economically work up our own natural products than the United States can, seeing that we pay a lower wage? But this is only one of the inconsistencies of the Tory mind, of the protectionist mind, and I have yet to hear of a logical argument being advanced in this House in support of the system of protection.

Now what is the reason for this? It is due to one or two causes. Either a want of confidence by the investors in our own country, or else a lack of enterprise on the part of our industrialists. I think myself it is a lack of enterprise, because it is only natural to think that enterprise in Canada is being destroyed year after year by reason of the fact that our industry has rested upon the politicians. I think that is a logical conclusion. Now the government is easing the burden of taxation on the man who amasses wealth by investments while the taxes on consumption have remained stable, with the exception of, say, matches. The main burden of the taxation in this country is the tariff, which is left in such a way that the workingman and primary producer must pay, while those who own and direct our industries set their prices as heretofore, and any part of the tariff which they nominally pay is always passed on to the worker, to the primary producer, and applied to what he is compelled to buy in the home market through the system of import penalties. I think it is a pity that the government has seen fit at this stage to recede from the principle of direct taxation to a more indirect method of taxation. The cost of living to the worker is to be kept up, while the amassing of wealth by the already rich is given another boost, because the worker is penalized if he imports, whilst taxation has been lowered at least ten per cent on the income of the rich.

Well, the Liberal government has again proclaimed itself in this budget as being in league with urban and capitalistic interests. Undoubtedly the country has had a prosperous year, but Canadian prosperity always depends on the primary production—chiefly of agricultural products—in fact the yearly development of this Dominion, the credit of the nation, its welfare in every way, is measured by agricultural production. Seeing that this is the case, one would have thought that the government would slacken on class privilege and make the basic industry more stable by setting the agriculturists free of combine exploitation. In the last election campaign a flood of literature went out from the Liberal side, in answer to the Conservative plea for higher import penalties, which led the people to expect some measure of freer trade on the part of this parliament. But the people are still left in bondage and their earnings are pilfered by the price-fixing power maintained by the government, and the opposition as well, for those who control capital investments, public utilities, urban industries, and politics.

They say the country is prosperous. The budget itself is one grand ring of triumph while the base of the prosperity of which it boasts is crumbling. Our farming population are in a more precarious state to-day than they were a year ago, and this is bound to continue under the present system. What evidence have we got to show that such is the case? Much as the farmer is looked upon as the national drudge, a mossback, or a hayseed, there comes a point beyond which you cannot load even the most willing beast of burden; and I have only to quote from one of the government reports, the live stock report, to prove what I am saying. The situation in regard to live stock is most serious. It is one that should cause alarm, not only to the government, but also to the opposition. We find from that report that in 1926 we moved to the public markets of the Dominion nearly 100,000 head less of stock than we did in 1925. Just let your imagination run upon what 100,000 head of stock means. Not only that; there is a worse feature catalogued in that report. The farmer during 1926 marketed 27,300 head of calves more than he did in 1925. I am sure the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) will appreciate the significance of that statement, and it is a fact for us to consider just now. This is something which is destroying the very basis of prosperity in this country. Why, it has come to the point when nothing is worth while doing well on the farm, and things are going from bad to worse. The cost of raising stock has got too high, on account of the high cost of living, and because through the laws of this country the manufacturing and distributing combines have arrogated to themselves the right to fix prices out of line entirely with world's prices. This is surely a simple economic law: Canada being an export country, even the manufacturer and the farmer depend on exports for the income of this Dominion. Then surely, to keep down the cost of living so as to come into line with world's prices is a necessary essential to our welfare.

Add to the facts already mentioned with regard to live stock the further fact that this report is emphatic in declaring that in 1926 it did not pay to finish stock as it used to, and consequently a number of inferior animals, inferior in grade and finish, passed on to the butchers of the country. I think this bespeaks a very serious situation, and when our protectionist friends have their eyes on immediate and large profits from industry, they must consider that the very basis of prosperity in this country is being destroyed in that way. It is a serious situation, and it was entirely overlooked by the government when this budget was under consideration. No relief from the price-fixing power of these combines has been given to the primary producer, and the cost of production has not been lowered. If it had, the future stability of the basic industry, and consequently the welfare of the Dominion, would have been ensured. Instead, the government relieves the rich man of ten per cent of his taxation as a regular thing, and places the worker and the primary producer under a proportionately heavier burden of taxation on the necessaries of life.

I want to say a word regarding a statement that was made yesterday by the hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken), whose speech, as well as that of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) I classify as unadulterated callousness regarding the rights of others. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning), too, speaking last night for the government, excused their action in this matter by practically using the same argument as the other two members I have just mentioned. Their plea for lowering the income tax is that the farmer evades paying it. Nothing is further from the truth, and I challenge anyone to prove otherwise; in fact, I think that the farmers of this country would welcome an investigation to-day regarding this matter. I say it is impossible for the farmer to evade it, at all events any more than any one engaged in any other line of business can evade it, and I think anyone who knows the form on which the return has to be made each year will appreciate that. There is no business in the country in which sales can be more easily checked up than the farmer's business. No. What, then, is the real reason why they want to abolish the income tax? I say that the real reason for the attack on the income tax is pure, plain greed. The manufacturer and the distributor who pass on all their taxes to the primary producer want the income tax abolished for one reason, and that is they do not want to show their undue profits each year. There is no other reason for it. The income tax is the fairest means of raising the revenue that we have ever had in this Dominion. Only a few years ago certain companies settled their income tax by giving to the government promissory notes, which have never been collected, and never will be. The hollowness of the whole argument is seen in the fact that privilege is dispensed regularly from this chamber in every possible form, and it is done at the people's expense. The tariff is not the only thing.

The Minister of Finance has also made a reduction of 25 per cent in the sales tax on matches. This again will place some tens of thousands of dollars in the pockets of the manufacturer. That 25 per cent will never be passed on to the consumer. In my opinion it was never meant to be; in fact, I do not think anyone was grumbling about the price of matches at all, and I do not think anybody in this country will thank the Minister of Finance for taking off that 25 per cent. I believe that too many matches are used anyway. I was going to qualify that statement by saying that people to-day are carrying around too many loose matches. About three-fifths of the farm fires in this Dominion are due to the careless handling of matches, and I am hoping to see the day, and that in the near future, when none but the safety kind of matches will be used. We are burning up too much of our property each year.

Mr. CHAPLIN: We shall have to go back to flints.

Mr. EVANS: I had hoped, as time went on, with the splendid opportunity that this government had of restoring its party to principle, that a greater proportion of taxes would each year be collected by the direct method; but the primary producer is still to be the beast of burden and the whole farm is to be directed from Ottawa.

I do not think I would have spoken on the budget to-night, but for one or two reasons. I want to voice my surprise and indignation that both in the budget speech and in the reply of the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) there is the boasted prosperity of the city and urban industries, while the great basic industry, agriculture, is simply bankrupt. I am mortified at the contempt with which the agriculturist of the Dominion is treated year after year. It is true there is some $380,000 increase in the estimates for agriculture this year. What will that be for? To create some white collar jobs and to duplicate the work of the provinces in research and so on. It will go for the winter fair in Toronto too.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The vote is not increased.

Mr. EVANS: But as to the man on the land, who finds the price of his product against the competition of all the world, there is nothing in this budget for him. Nothing is done to bring the cost of production in line with world's prices. I want to say to-day that manufacturing in Canada as it is carried on under a system of protection is a national canker which is eating at the vitals of true industry. It cannot either supply the home market or manufacture for export except as it leans on the politician. Politics is a screaming farce, behind which the legalized robbery is carried on. John Charlton, a member of this House a good many years ago, speaking in this chamber on March 18, 1879, said:

> I venture to say. . . that these monopolies which the government is now aiding to build up will not be easily removed.

He went further and said:

> It will perhaps take more than one verdict of the people of this country to unloosen that grip which will fasten on them with a death-like tenacity.

And now, after nearly fifty years have passed, the government in the presentation of this budget has thrown out a distinct challenge to the primary producers of this country and to everybody who has still left a little sense of liberty and justice.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Hear, hear.

Mr. EVANS: The Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) surprised me last night.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Surprised me too.

Mr. EVANS: It is not many years since I sat with the Minister of Railways on the board of the Grain Growers' Association of Saskatchewan. He and I together, and others helped to draft that clause in the Canadian Council of Agriculture platform calling for freer trade, demanding an increase in the British preference to bring about complete free trade with England in five years. What now? I want to say to this House that besides the economic feature of this question there is also another side to it, the moral side, and I want to quote no less an authority than George Brown, who many years ago founded the Toronto Globe. He used these words:

> If a public man avows certain principles, agitates those principles and seeks to establish those principles and when he attains power laughs at his professions and casts his principles to the winds, he is aiming a blow at political morality.

The Minister of Railways made an authoritative statement last night as coming from the government. They are going to work for free trade, but they are going to do it in a cautious way. He made exactly the same statement last night that Sir Wilfrid Laurier made in 1896. They proceeded cautiously. By 1904 the Liberal government had succeeded so far that they placed soft soap and false teeth on the free list.

Mr. CHAPLIN: And last year they put angostura bitters on the free list.

Mr. EVANS: And the same year they placed on the statute book of this country what is known as the anti-dumping act, the most diabolical legislation that had hitherto been thought of in any country. We were the first to enact that law. Canada has led the way in special privilege. She is still leading it, and I say this: that even in the United States alongside of us, with her high tariff, a country we are exhorted by a part of this House to emulate or to attain to the same privileged position, their people are not burdened by class privilege to-day as much as the worker and primary producer in Canada is. I hope that western Canada at least will take particular notice of the retrograde step the government has taken this year. Because of the reform which was foreshadowed in the fatal session of last year, and the promises of the Liberal government, only one protectionist was elected in the three prairie provinces, a fact that the government has treated entirely with contempt. Then, as if it were not enough to maintain the duties on the necessaries of life at the old rate, an order in council was passed on the 25th of November, 1926, which legalized the application of 47a of the Customs Act, which allowed a valuation on certain natural products in keeping with the seasonal and the regional importation, at the instigation of the fruit and vegetable dealers. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) last night did not know anything about 47a. I wonder who passed this order in council. It was placed on the statute book on June 22, 1922, during the first session that the Liberal party came into power after the war. Even the leader of the opposition at that time was startled by it; protectionist as he was, he was shocked.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Protection gone mad.

Mr. EVANS: Let me quote his words. He said:

> I do not know whether this is fully understood or not by the hon. gentlemen to my left,— meaning the Progressives.

> —but I admit that it is fully understood by me. This provision is protection personified. This is the last emanation from the government that denounced protection two or three days ago. For purposes of valuation the minister can fix the value where he likes, and any basis he likes, on any principle he likes, to suit any interest he likes, as low as he likes, as high as he likes, and when he likes. In a word, this simply puts into the power of the minister the whole elevation of the tariff of this country.

An hon. MEMBER: Whom are you quoting?

Mr. EVANS: The Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, speaking in this House on the sight of June 22, 1922. It is more than likely that 47a is applied according to the wishes of the Canadian packers and the needs of political parties. In fact I have looked on 47a during all these years as simply an advertisement for tenders. I say to you gentlemen of the House of Commons to-night that otherwise it is not conceivable that the duty would be increased by a false valuation on these natural products to as high as 156⅔ per cent as was the case this past summer.

Miss MACPHAIL: Adequate protection!

Mr. EVANS: The duty on a carload of tomatoes was raised from $150 to $385 by a false valuation. As I have said before in this House, I cannot understand even a protectionist trading on the rights of the consumers of Canada in this way without some consideration. I cannot. I have always spoken frankly on this question, and I cannot look on this in any other way. An increase of 156⅔ per cent by a false valuation! Just consider what it means on an article of diet that ought to be on everybody's table all the year around if possible. And there was no indication at the time that fruit was being dumped in Canada from the United States. No one could say there was. No evidence has ever been adduced to show that there was any dumping of fruit or vegetables at that time..

When the member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) was speaking a couple of days ago he informed the House that he took some trouble to get evidence regarding dumping, and went from one department to another. He is still minus the evidence. I knew he could not get it, I had been on the same rounds before. I say to-night, it is strange that even a protectionist would want to increase the cost of living to the worker in this way, seeing that it must inevitably entail a demand for higher wages. Why has it been done so long? Because the whole burden has been passed on to the farmers of this country, who are now bankrupt.

One of the chief arguments for protection is the necessity of preserving a high standard of living. But in this budget the government has retained all the taxes on the necessaries of life. Surely when the drop in revenue has been used to make the rich richer, we cannot be deceived as to the policy of import penalties and the purpose of those who control industry and politics throughout the Dominion. This 47a is one of the most pernicious pieces of legislation that has ever been enacted. I assert, Sir, that it is nothing but fraud and graft and intrigue and injustice. Yes, it was first invoked when two elections were called within one year. What does it mean?

There is another feature regarding this dumping clause. I say it is particularly annoying at this time when we are sending the Hon. Vincent Massey to Washington to bring about better trade relations with the United States. Especially is that better feeling desirable by reason of the live stock condition all over Canada to-day. But the Minister of Customs has seen fit to pin-prick Uncle Sam in this way, and thus he has forestalled for many years to come any good that we may expect from the Hon. Vincent Massey's ambassadorship.

I have said that manufacturing, as it is carried on in this country to-day, is a canker on our national progress, and I am wondering how long that part of the population engaged in primary production will see fit to pay tribute to a privileged class to concentrate the earnings of the workers and create an aristocracy in our cities. Manufacture is a canker for the reason that the manufacturing class admit that a protective tariff is needed to keep out foreign competition. This tariff is maintained chiefly for two reasons: The manufacturer must have the privilege of naming the price to the home consumer; and that price must be high enough to ensure a profit on the whole of his output, both domestic and export. And the tariff is being used for that purpose. Is it any wonder, then, that the farmers of this country at last are in rebellion against such a system? I have said before in this House, and it will not do any harm to repeat it, that the farmer is exploited on the finished products from the very farm itself. For example, the very grade of flour that we are buying to-day in Saskatoon, where the wheat is hauled into the hoppers of the big mills, and no tariff or freight rates are involved, is dearer by 20 to 30 cents for a 98-pound sack than it is on the other side of the Atlantic. That is what protection is doing for us.

Mr. SPENCER: On the same flour?

Mr. EVANS: On the same flour, yes. They tell us that it is not the same quality. I know that they do not ship poor flour to Britain; Britain gets the best flour that can be procured in the world. They cannot sell poor stuff there.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Nor in Saskatoon either.

Mr. EVANS: Perhaps not. Our manufacturers to-day will sell against all competitors in foreign markets the very goods for which they charge us so much higher prices, and the fallacy of protection was never better illustrated than it is in the fact that goods made in Canada are sold cheaper in the markets of the world than they are at home. When the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) was speaking the other day, he undertook to contradict what he considered a wrong impression. He referred to a list of goods quoted, I think, by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) at page 393 of Hansard. These things coming into Canada "for further manufacture" and on which no duty is paid represented a total value last year of $224,000,000. I want to point out in this connection what constitutes a real injustice. All raw material for manufacture, of the same nature produced on the farms of Canada, comes into this country free of duty. Not only have we to meet the competition of the world's markets in the sale of hides, but on the finished article, harness, boots, shoes and so forth, and all manufactures of leather, the farmer must pay an enhanced price because of the import penalty on these goods amounting in some cases to over one-third of their value. Wool, for example, is on the free list for manufacturers' use; but the primary producer, who has no protection for himself on anything he produces, pays at least 35 per cent of a duty in the way of enhanced price because of the import penalty on all woollen clothing. The same is true of other articles. Rubber, for instance, is free for the manufacturer. I have a list of such goods here, but I will not take the trouble of reading it to the House. All these things come in free for the manufacturers' use, and we do not get any advantage in the way of reduced prices. We are charged, I repeat, an enhanced price as a result of the penalty imposed on the imports.

It is impossible for things to go on much longer in this way. Under this system of class privilege in the United States agriculture has been reduced to a state of bankruptcy, and both here and across the border the one great problem for the agriculturist to-day is how to free himself from the compact that exists between the politicians and the manufacturers and distributors. This compact is responsible for the present impoverished condition of the maritime provinces, which must shortly be dealt with. Unless, therefore, the trade policy of the Dominion is rectified, no relief given in a direct way to those provinces will make them any better off than they are now. A feature of this system which is worthy of notice at this time, seeing that the maritimes are before us for redress, is that the concentration of wealth and industry is regional. Our problems and our grievances are regional. The density of population is a problem to-day in our cities, and the concentration of wealth and industry has eliminated the man whose capital is a little money and plenty of brawn and muscle. This type of man is reduced to the position of a wage earner. That is why I say that enterprise is being destroyed under the present system.

The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion), speaking the other day, cited the fact that we have already invested in life insurance $4,500,000,000; and he mentioned this to show how prosperous we are. I say that this is no sign of prosperity. It is simply the result of the concentration of wealth and industry. When the man in a small way is forced out of his little business and becomes a wage earner, all he cares to do is to keep up a life policy, thereby further forging the fetters in which he is labouring at present—the concentration of wealth and industry. Even life insurance to-day has become an evil in this way, and I want to warn the workers, who are using their earnings to concentrate wealth thus, that there will come a point where even this will be unsafe. Why? Because the base on which privilege to-day rests is giving way. The primary producer, who has to bring in most of the income of the nation, by marketing his products in competition with the rest of the world is facing ruin. Our capitalists to-day are seeking investments in foreign countries. Their surplus profits are going abroad instead of being kept at home to develop our own natural resources and to provide work for our own workmen.

One great sign of the times is seen in the fact that one of our leading economists, Professor Goforth of McGill University, the other day advocated the importation of some thousands of Chinese under a system of indentured labour for the purpose of developing our natural resources because the wages of our workingmen cannot be made commensurate with the cost of living, which has been steadily driven up. Whose fault is it? It is the fault of the system; and the professor's remedy, I know, is uneconomic and inhuman. But it is significant as showing that even the capitalists of the Dominion to-day are up against it. They are up against the problem which the agriculturist has felt for several years back.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Everybody is broke.

Mr. EVANS: The hon. gentleman says everybody is broke. His remark is intended to be sarcastic. Surely there is no need for us to have any great economist tell us the simple rules of economy. I tell the hon. gentleman we are digging our own grave. They say that protection is high in the United States and is a tremendous price fixing power for the manufacturer there. If that is so, why has smuggling from that high protectionist country become so popular? It is a most profitable business to-day to go to the United States and load up with silks and woollens for Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: Tell us how it is done.

Mr. EVANS: Perhaps if the hon. gentleman got on his feet sometimes he would know more about it than I do. I know what he is hinting at, that the smuggling is made possible by the nefarious trade in liquor from this Dominion into that friendly country, and I say again that therein we are defying the laws of the United States and also violating the spirit of the treaty entered into last year in regard to this matter. Senator Smith, of South Carolina, speaking in the United States Senate the other day, showed that agriculturists in the United States are in exactly the same condition as those in Canada. He said there had been much talk about prosperity, which members of the "old guard" were sure was unparalleled and due entirely to the Coolidge economy. When Senator Smith claimed the floor he spoke with much feeling, and after calling attention to the tremendous prosperity of Wall street and the huge volume of collateral loans of the federal reserve banks, he said that the prosperity of Wall street meant foreclosures on the farms of the United States. I have here a clipping from the Saskatoon Star of December 10, 1926, in which it is said:

> Herbert Hoover, Secretary of Commerce in President Coolidge's cabinet, issued a report recently in which he declares that the United States is enjoying a standard of living "far above that in most other countries of the world at this or any other time."

The clipping refers to a remark by Senator Brookhart, and goes on to say:

> According to the Senator, who is one of the insurgent party at Washington, one million farmers in the United States have lost their homes during the Harding and Coolidge administrations, which is to say, since 1920. An independent New York weekly, The Nation, commenting on his statement says the United States is "now seeing the fine flowering of the protective tariff system which has exalted manufacturing at the expense of agriculture." This is the system which has been advocated for Canada. The object lesson of the United States should not be lost on Canadians.

We are in exactly the same condition to-day, and these conditions are Dominion-wide. We have a beautiful country here, but equality of status as between classes and between provinces must be brought about. It does not take anyone with a gift of prophecy to say that it will not be long until confederation itself will go to pieces under this great system of class privilege.

Mr. E. G. ODETTE (East Essex): Mr. Speaker, I rise with considerable trepidation to make my first speech, if it may be so termed, on the floor of this House, and I crave the indulgence of Your Honour and of hon. members if I violate the rules of the House in any way. I can assure you that if I do transgress, my transgressions will not be wilful but due to my lack of knowledge of the time-honoured customs of this body.

At the outset of my remarks, which I will endeavour to make brief, I desire to compliment the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) on the budget introduced into this House last week. To be able to reduce taxation and at the same time announce a reduction in the net debt of this country is, I submit, no mean accomplishment. This afternoon the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) argued that the reduction in the net debt meant nothing and that the only thing which counted was the funded indebtedness or, as he put it, the mortgage debt. Looking at it from a business point of view may I submit that if a manufacturing industry finds it necessary to build an addition to take care of increased business and finds it necessary to issue bonds or place a mortgage on the new addition, and if at the end of the year the financial statement shows that the profits have been increased by virtue of this addition, although the mortgage placed on the assets may have made the funded indebtedness higher, the common stockholders will benefit because these increased profits are divided among the common stockholders of that company. So, Sir, I submit that when the net debt of this country is lowered and a reduction in taxation follows, the stockholders of this country, who are the people of the country, are given dividends in the shape of reduced taxation.

While on the matter of business, some of the hon. gentlemen across the floor expressed great fear of American domination through American investments in this country. I have no such fear. I hold in my hand a copy of the Detroit Free Press dated September 22, 1926, in which appears an advertisement which I did not see in any of the newspapers in Canada. This advertisement reads as follows:

> You insure your life, your house, furniture, automobile. Here is an opportunity to buy an insured investment.

This company is called the Manufacturers' Finance Corporation Limited, incorporated under the laws of the Dominion of Canada. May I ask the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, with his well known business ability and his knowledge of finance, what constitutes an insured investment? The hon. member is silent; he is a director of this company and his name appears in the directorate as Hon. H. H. Stevens, Minister of Trade and Commerce, Canadian government. Apparently that is thought insufficient and his name appears again as Hon. H. H. Stevens, ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce—and still he cannot answer what is an insured investment.

Mr. STEVENS: As you, Mr. Speaker, know very well, I have no right to make replies to questions across the floor of the House, but I can certainly tell my hon. friend all about insured investments if it would be of any interest to give that information.

Mr. ODETTE: I believe the time is opportune when this House should introduce and pass some legislation that would prohibit hon. members of this House from using their positions as members of parliament to go to the United States or to other foreign countries and solicit funds there for wildcat oil schemes in Canada.

Dealing with the reductions in taxation announced by the Minister of Finance, I believe that the abolition of the graded tax on cheques, bills of exchange and notes has been received with favour by all business men of Canada. My hon. friends in the south-east corner of the House argue that this reduction in taxation does not benefit the mass of people. Well, let me say this to them—that when the burden of taxation is removed from the shoulders of a business man, and when the cost of doing business is lessened, that man is enabled to sell his products to the consumer for a lower price, and when the price is lowered naturally the people in general benefit.

Coming to the reduction in the taxation on matches, I disagree with the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Evans) when he says that the people of Canada do not complain about the price of matches. I know that in my part of the country they do complain of the price of matches. In Detroit, Michigan, six boxes of matches, that is of the large size containing five hundred matches each, can be purchased for the sum of twenty-five cents, while across the river in the city of Windsor, two boxes of matches cost twenty-five cents. Now the lumber from which these matches are made comes to a very large degree from the forests of Canada, and the containers that hold these matches are made from Canadian pulp. Then why should we in Canada pay three times as much for our matches as do the people of the United States? I submit that if the manufacturers of the matches are hiding behind this tax, the tax should be removed in its entirety.

Mr. EVANS: Will the hon. gentleman permit a remark?

Mr. ODETTE: Yes.

Mr. EVANS: I did not say the cost of matches was sufficiently low. What I objected to was that the tax was lowered in such a way that the reduction would not be passed on to the consumer.

Mr. ODETTE: Well, I think time will show whether that is true or not. I sincerely hope that time will show that this reduction has been passed on to the purchasers of matches.

Certainly no one can find fault with the removal of the tax on bank overdrafts or advances by banks. It has always seemed to me somewhat of an injustice to tax the man or the industry that was forced to borrow money.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Your own party put it on.

Mr. ODETTE: Then I presume our party will take it off, because I believe they will be here for some time to come.

Referring to the reduction in the sales tax, I desire to compliment the Minister of Finance. I believe it is a step in the right direction, but I should like to suggest to the minister that the sales tax on all Canadian-made goods be removed in its entirety, but that the sales tax on imported articles be retained.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

An hon. MEMBER: Come over and join us.

Mr. ODETTE: Hon. gentlemen opposite applaud that suggestion. They may hurl at me the epithet that was hurled at the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce—that I am a protectionist. Well, if that enunciation proclaims me a protectionist I am willing to be called a protectionist or any other name that my hon. friends may devise. If, by the removal of this sales tax on Canadian made goods, the citizens of Canada would be enabled to buy goods at a lower price, provided they were Canadian made and would, at the same time be able to buy the imported article without having the price increased one cent, then I say it is a good policy.

Let me go further. I sat in the gallery when the Minister of Finance told hon. gentlemen opposite that he proposed removing the excise tax of five per cent on motor cars costing $1,200 or less, and that if the manufacturers did not pass that saving on to the buyers of motor cars he would immediately remove the five per cent excise tax on cars imported from the United States or other countries. By removing the sales tax on all Canadian made goods, but leaving it on the imported articles the Minister of Finance would have a club with which he could force the Canadian manufacturer to pass that saving on to the consumers in Canada.

The hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett), speaking the other afternoon, said this:

> My hon. friends opposite are more concerned with foreign trade, and we are more concerned with domestic trade.

As to that I would say this: In the year 1921, when the Meighen government was in power, the imports of manufactured goods into Canada exceeded our exports by $264,000,000, and in 1926 the exports of Canadian manufactured goods exceeded our imports by $23,864,000. So that in 1921 we did a foreign business but it was on the wrong side of the ledger. To-day that foreign business has been increased but the balance is on the right side of the ledger. Even if the Canadian manufacturers had the entire Canadian field to themselves they would still be behind according to these figures. Let me give you an instance of how this would work. The Ford Motor Company of Canada sell every Ford car they possibly can in Canada. Their arrangement with the American Ford company gives them the entire Canadian field, and so the potential demand here for Ford cars is filled by the Canadian Ford company. At the present moment the Ford Motor Company of Canada are employing 6,130 men, and 40 per cent of their production is exported. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite where 2,452 men would find employment if it were not for the export trade of that one company?

An hon. MEMBER: What is the argument?

Mr. ODETTE: The argument is this, that by making reciprocal trade agreements with other countries that are beneficial to Canada, but in a spirit of give and take, industry will be built up in Canada, and I submit that one of the most beneficial things to Canada at the present moment would be a reciprocal trade agreement with the United States. If hon. members across the floor of the House would only devise ways and means of convincing the Canadian people that they should buy nothing but Canadian-made goods, and should buy no imported goods whatsoever, I am sure the manufacturers of Canada would be very thankful to them indeed. Why, in the galleries of this House we find angle iron stamped "Carnegie, Pittsburg." I do not think this government was responsible for the construction of this building. I believe that any Canadian government, no matter whether it be Liberal, Conservative or Progressive, should set an example and buy nothing but Canadian-made goods wherever possible, buying imported goods only when Canadian made goods are not procurable.

The hon. member for West Calgary spoke of unemployment in Vancouver.

Mr. KELLNER: Just before the hon. member proceeds, I would point out that the pens on the members' desks were purchased in the United States. I believe the Liberal government is responsible for that.

Mr. ODETTE: If there are pens manufactured in Canada, I think this government or any other government should buy Canadian-made pens.

I was about to remark that I am not very conversant with industrial conditions in Vancouver, but I am conversant with employment and industrial conditions in my own constituency, and I desire to say that on December 31, 1926, there were 574 more men employed in the border cities than there were on the corresponding date in 1925—and that in the face of the employment situation in the city of Detroit, dynamic Detroit, a city famous the world over for its industrial activity. Let me give you the employment figures in the city of Detroit on the same dates. On December 31, 1926, there were 41,262 fewer men employed by the manufacturers and other employers in the city of Detroit than on the corresponding date in 1925. I have heard hon. gentlemen quote in this debate Adam Smith and Stephen Leacock, and I venture to say that if this debate continues long enough, some hon. gentlemen will be quoting King Tut. Allow me to quote an industrial leader in Canada, W. R. Campbell, vice-president and general manager of the Ford Motor Company of Canada. Speaking at a dinner given by the border chambers of commerce at Windsor on January 6, 1927, he said:

> I am most optimistic over the outlook for 1927. Having recently returned from an extensive tour of the Dominion, I find that financial, economic and industrial conditions throughout the country to-day are very encouraging. In every province there are indications of expanding business and prosperity. After completing this tour I am amazed at the potential buying power of Canada to-day. I have been through Canada on previous occasions, but was none too enthusiastic. This time, however, I saw improved buying and absorption power.
> The industrial situation in Canada shows a decided improvement. It is on the headway made last year, and from our internal research, that we are contemplating a 20 per cent increase in our production during 1927.

[Mr. Odette.]

I have given you the employment figures of the border cities. They speak for themselves.

Mr. PRICE: Is this not in your opinion simply a matter of advertising? This firm is in competition with other concerns selling automobiles in this country.

Mr. ODETTE: All right. The Willys-Overland Company of Toronto have increased their production by 30 per cent.

Mr. PRICE: Is that not advertising too?

Mr. ODETTE: I do not know that this is advertising particularly.

Mr. PRICE: Why, certainly, it is advertising.

Mr. ODETTE: All right. There are 574 more men employed in the border cities today than there were a year ago, so if advertising brings business to my constituency, I say let the advertising continue.

In conclusion, may I say to the hon. Minister of Finance that if he is able to bring down similar budgets providing for a reduction in taxation during the succeeding years of this parliament, he will have an augmented following behind him when the people of Canada are called upon for a pronouncement.

On motion of Mr. Young (Saskatoon) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Robb the House adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

BINDER TWINE INSPECTION

Mr. BANCROFT:

1. Since when has there ceased to be an officer of the government known as the inspector of binder twine?
2. By what department is the inspection of binder twine, under the sales and inspection act, carried on?
3. How many inspections were made in 1926?
4. What quantity of binder twine, if any, was confiscated?
5. Was any binder twine found to be improperly labelled or deficient in length?
6. Has the government given any consideration to the need of improving the inspection of binder twine?
7. Has the government considered raising the standard required under the sales and inspection act?
8. Does the government intend to fix the net weight of binder twine contained in a bale?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. Since August 1, 1924, the inspection of binder twine has been assigned to the forty-three inspectors of seeds, feeding stuffs, fertilizers, and commodities that are under the inspection and sale act.
2. Department of Agriculture.
3. 101.
4. None.
5. Yes. Imported twine was not released from bond until properly labelled as to weight and quality.
6. Yes. The system of inspection of binder twine was reorganized three years ago.
7. Yes. Because of the variability of the per cent of moisture and in consequence the length per pound of binder twine, it would seem desirable to change the standard from the number of feet per pound to the total number of feet contained in the ball, and to establish a minimum standard of breaking strength for binder twine.
8. In as much as length and strength of twine in a ball rather than weight of ball are the important considerations it would seem advisable to follow policy outlined in reply to questions No. 7 rather than fix net weight of balls or bales.

2. What evidence was in the possession of the customs department at the time of each enforcement, that dunping actually existed?
3. What was the number of cases between July 1, 1922, and January 31, 1927, in which the dumping act was applied after the value for duty had been fixed as provided in section 47a of the customs act, and the particulars in each case?

TRADE UNIONS AND CH. 125 REVISED STATUTES

Mr. BOUCHARD:

BRITISH COLUMBIA VEGETABLE GROWERS

ALLEGED PREFERENCE TO ORIENTALS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. S. F. TOLMIE (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw the attention of the government to a statement appearing in the press which has received wide publicity, and which casts an unfair reflection on the white producers of agricultural products in British Columbia. This despatch appears in our local papers and was sent from Vancouver on February 25 by the Canadian press:

Inability of white farmers of British Columbia to supply vegetables of quality available for shipment to China for consumption of troops stationed there, was given by R. G. L. Clarke, Dominion fruit inspector, here to-day, as the reason for their purchase from Chinese growers of the province. Twenty-five tons of potatoes and 14 tons of onions were shipped to the British authorities at Shanghai from here three weeks ago on the liner Empress of Asia, while ninety tons of potatoes and fifty tons of onions will be forwarded on the Empress of Canada which sails for China to-morrow. All of this produce is said to have been grown by orientals.

Mr. Clarke, who stated that he had purchased the supplies on behalf of the British government, said he was aware of their origin, but had been unable to secure other products of fit quality and that all his decisions in the matter had been approved by his superiors in Ottawa.

Protests against the alleged discrimination against whites have been forwarded to both the federal and provincial governments in Ottawa and Victoria by several Vancouver dealers.

This, Mr. Speaker, is a very serious and unfair reflection on our white growers of agricultural products in British Columbia. From years of experience out there I have found that they are capable of growing vegetables not only as well as but better than the orientals. I would ask the minister if he has any light to throw on the matter.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, some four or five weeks ago the High Commissioner's office in London entered into cable communication with my department with regard to certain supplies for the orient. Inasmuch as the liner the Empress of Asia was lying in Vancouver harbour at the time the order had to be filled immediately.

There were three outstanding considerations before us in filling that order: first, quality of goods, second price, and third, the despatch with which we could fill the order. If it was not filled in time, then of course the vessel would sail without the goods. I had a number of wires along the lines indicated by my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Tolmie); but inasmuch as the more important of the telegrams received were sent in code, I inferred that the High Commissioner's office deemed it advisable not to give any unnecessary publicity to the matter just at this time. Consequently I shall ask my hon. friend not to press me any further in the matter. If he will call at my office or see me in the lobby I will give him sufficient information to serve his purpose, while not betraying the confidence reposed in me by the High Commissioner's office. The office in London did not ask me to make inquiries as to who grew the potatoes; they simply required the three considerations I have mentioned, namely, price, quality and despatch.

Mr. TOLMIE: Is it the intention of the government, in the case of repeated orders, to give the white grower the preference if possible?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If the price and quality are right.

RABIES IN MONTREAL

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. L. G. BELL (St. Antoine): I would call the attention of the government to an item that appeared in the newspapers in Montreal on Saturday, to the effect that there would be an anti-rabies drive against all dogs found on the streets of that city. This is a very serious matter for all dog owners of Montreal inasmuch as they are unable to obtain the muzzles prescribed by the government officials. Furthermore, it is reported in the newspapers that the authorities have despatched inspectors and veterinaries, with the result that these dogs will be killed without the owners having any redress. I would ask the minister in charge of this particular branch of government what the intention is in the matter, and to make some official statement in view of the fact that the public of Montreal have received no information except what appeared in the papers on Saturday.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): My hon. friend, I gather, wants to know what we are going to do in regard to carrying out the muzzling order issued twelve months ago as a result of an outbreak of rabies in Montreal. The enforcement of this order is not easy in a city of such proportions. Dogs suffering from this affliction have been finding their way into other places and spreading the disease to such an extent that in some parts of the province of Quebec the situation is grave. Word has reached the foreign authorities and as a result the export of our foxes has suffered, one foreign country refusing to accept our live foxes. The time has come when we must enforce the regulation more strictly, especially as the provincial authorities of Quebec have drawn our attention to the fact that this has not been properly done so far. Instructions have been given to the officers of my department to round up all unmuzzled or improperly muzzled dogs not on the leash, for the purpose of destroying them, of course in a humane way, under the auspices of the Humane Society. That order will be observed, I trust. It is the only way to eradicate the disease. It took eight months to round up eight cases of rabies in the Ottawa district, and we have been at it twelve months in Montreal with the result that I have outlined; and unless we carry out the order more strictly, not only will the disease spread to other provinces, but it will affect human beings as well. A hundred and forty cases of human rabies are being treated at the present time, and from the disease two deaths have so far resulted. It is therefore incumbent upon the department to carry out the order as rigidly as possible.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): In connection with the Georgian Bay Canal bill which is to come up for consideration tomorrow evening, I would ask the government to let me have a copy, or place one on the table of the House to-morrow, of an official letter on the subject dated January, 17, 1925, from the Deputy Minister of Justice to the Deputy Minister of Public Works.

Mr. CAHAN: As a point of order may I observe that the bill in question was discussed on Friday evening, but was not disposed of. Does it take precedence of all other private bills until it is disposed of?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I will make the necessary inquiries about the supposed letter and let my hon. friend know.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: For the information of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), I may say that the bill will keep its place on the order paper as though it had not been debated on Friday evening.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): I would ask the government to table also a report, which I understand is now in the hands of the Department of Public Works, made by the engineers some time in 1925, I believe, with reference to this project.

CALGARY LIVE STOCK INVESTIGATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. S. F. TOLMIE (Victoria,): May I ask the Minister of Agriculture when we may expect the report with reference to the investigation of the Calgary Live Stock Exchange and Calgary stockyards? I understand that certain amendments are to be made to the Live Stock Act and we ought to have this information before that subject is taken up. The minister may inform us at the same time whether all the live stock interests will be given an opportunity to be heard before the agricultural committee or elsewhere before the amending bill is dealt with in this House.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): Just as rapidly as my staff can copy out the various reports and documents the order will be filled. I asked my deputy this morning what the prospects were and he thought we should be able to comply with the request some day this week. I expect that the amendment to the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act, referred to by my hon. friend will be submitted to the agricultural committee and of course, following the usual custom, any party interested will have an opportunity to be heard before the committee.

THE BUDGET

Continuation of debate on the annual financial statement of the Minister of Finance.

The House resumed from Friday, February 25, the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of ways and means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Coote.

Mr. A. MacG. YOUNG (Saskatoon): There is a matter of great importance to our province which I desire to bring to the attention of the House this afternoon; but before doing so I desire to make a few observations with reference to some of the speeches already delivered in this debate. I take this early opportunity of saying, as one member of the House, that I regretted very much indeed the speech delivered the other evening by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Brady) so far as it had reference to the late member for that constituency, Mr. Stork. I came to this House last year a new member, unacquainted with that gentleman, but during my stay of six months here I got to know him better and I always found him in every way honourable. Indeed, I think I may safely say that every member of the last parliament found Mr. Stork an honourable member of the House. It was unfortunate, I think, that the present member for Mr. Stork's riding, in the sermon he delivered some days ago in this chamber, should have seen fit to suggest that his predecessor had been dishonest in his representation of his constituency in parliament, and that he had not presented the facts to the House. I for one wish to place myself on record as being quite resentful of these remarks. It ill becomes any member of this honourable chamber to cast such aspersions upon a gentleman who enjoyed the confidence of those whom he represented here. Mr. Stork is not here to speak for himself, and when his opponent has already put him down it does not come with good grace from him to speak as he has done. I think perhaps if we were a little more careful in some of our imputations it would be better for the most of us. Referring now to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), I was very much surprised to hear him suggest that the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) changed his seat from one side of the House to the other and entered the government apparently for a consideration of $14,000. Again I place myself on record as being most resentful of that sort of imputation in this House. I do not believe any man belonging to any group of this House would change his allegiance for any monetary consideration of that kind; we do ourselves a great injustice by making statements of that character in this chamber. Too often we hear from the public platform that men in public life are crooked, and perhaps we cannot blame the public so much if we in this chamber suggest that hon. members of the various groups are not perfectly honourable. I believe the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Brady) is perfectly sincere in his views, and I also think I am quite safe in saying that the gentleman who preceded him as member for that constituency was quite as sincere. Because men hold opposite views is no reason for suggesting that their views are dishonest.

For a few moments now I would like to refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken), who spoke of a matter which I consider to be of very great importance, dealing with the class of literature coming to Canada from the United States. Again I wish to place myself on record as being in sympathy with a portion of his remarks; I am quite prepared to say with him that I wish to see literature of an immoral character kept out of Canada, whether it comes from the United States or from any other country, but there was one peculiar thing in the remarks of the hon. gentleman. He seemed to mix up immorality in literature with protection, all in the same breath as though he, being a man with a very systematic mind, wished to group together those things which should go together. He held up a magazine which he had described as being obscene and then said in effect, "It comes in free." What was the idea; did he want it to be just a little higher price, a little more expensive? Does he want a higher tariff, so that only the rich can afford to read that obscene literature? In my humble opinion he has taken the wrong ground altogether; he should have said such literature should be prevented from coming into Canada if it is obscene and immoral. I was also very much interested in his argument with respect to the difficulty of printing things in Toronto. He pointed out how difficult it was to do that work there, and took us across to Buffalo to show us how much money could be saved, but his argument at the same time was for protection on those works published in Canada. In developing his argument he said in effect that the price of paper in Toronto was the price of paper in Buffalo plus the duty and plus the freight, and for a few moments he made as fine a speech on free trade as I have ever heard. But he ended in this way, "I do not object to the manufacturer having that protection, but I also ask that the publishing houses should have additional protection." First of all he wants to give protection to the machines and paper and then to the men printing the paper; he wants the whole thing pyramided. And what is he to do with it? We who are the unfortunate consumers have to pay the whole bill; that is one of the difficulties in the argument of the hon. gentleman. If he had confined himself to the question of preventing that class of literature from coming into Canada I think he would have had the sympathy of every member of this House, but when he includes that with higher protection we must disagree.

I would like to go one step further; as a member of this House and a citizen of Canada I am sorry to see so many things on the front pages of our newspapers coming from the United States. There are many little items which seem to amuse the people of the United States very much, such as the troubles of Mrs. Aimee Semple McPherson. I assure the House that such things are not of interest to me, but day after day we take up the paper and find pictures of one or two half-wits together with the stories of the crimes they have committed. If the hon. member for Toronto West Centre would pay attention to the prohibition of this class of literature I would be very pleased to give him my support.

For a few moments now I wish to discuss the amendment moved by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), and first I would like to look at the amendment itself. The words are:

> Whilst recognizing the advisability of certain minor changes proposed, this House regrets that the budget as presented by the honourable Minister of Finance contains no effective provision for the reduction in the high cost of living, in so far as such is due to the protective tariff:
> That the budget shows a further departure from the principle of direct and visible taxation based on the ability to pay.
> And further that no systematic effort is being made to reduce our national debt, the interest on which absorbs so large a proportion of the revenues of the Dominion.

I particularly wish to refer for the moment to the last line of the first paragraph, ". . . in so far as such is due to the protective tariff." I wish to compliment the draftsman of that resolution in the selection of those particular words, which have a very definite purpose and perhaps some definite meaning, with which I will deal a little later. Then appear the words, "That the budget shows a further departure from the principle of direct and visible taxation based on the ability to pay." In other words, the suggestion is apparently made that there was regret because of the reduction in the income tax effected by the budget last year, and that now things are getting much worse and we are to have a further reduction. I want to tell the House that I found nothing which gave the common, ordinary people, for whom I stand and whom I represent in this House, greater satisfaction than the fact that they were relieved of that responsibility last year, and until recently I had understood that all hon. members in that particular corner of the House were in agreement with what was then done. I am rather surprised to see how the Robb budget of last year has been handled by certain hon. members in that corner of the House, because last year everyone was apparently satisfied. There are hon. members in this House to-day who were very glad to crawl or creep back to the House tied to the apron strings of that budget; last year they tried to shout from the housetops that they were supporters of that budget, and that it was an excellent budget. This year we have another such budget, but this year we have the amendment I have already read.

I would call your attention now to an amendment brought up in this House last year by the present Prime Minister, which was as follows:

> That the Speaker do not now leave the chair but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this House the fiscal policy of the government, as enunciated by the present Prime Minister when leader of His Majesty's opposition, would prove detrimental to the country's continued prosperity and prejudicial to national unity.

We had a vote on that amendment last year, and if we look at the result, in the "nay" column we find such names as Anderson, (Toronto High Park); Chaplin (Kent); Church, Coote, Garland (Bow River) Ryckman, and others. I take it that every hon. member who voted on that resolution was just as honest about the matter as I was. The attitude of those who voted against this resolution was that the fiscal policy of the government, as enunciated by the then Prime Minister when leader of His Majesty's opposition, would not prove detrimental to the country's continued prosperity, would not prove prejudicial to the national unity. At page 5201 of Hansard of last year, I find the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) reported as saying:

> On the point of order, by no stretch of the imagination can the hon. member who has just resumed his seat claim that the motion which has just been made deals with the fiscal policy of the country. It cannot deal with the fiscal policy of the country when moved as a political motion.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Hear, hear.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear". We are going to go here and here and there and there before we are through. Now it is very interesting indeed to read this particular resolution and the votes recorded on it and then to find that it was a political resolution. Of course it was a political resolution. What are we doing in this House? We are doing things political. That is why we are here. After all is said and done what is politics? It is simply transacting the business of the country, and I accept that definition of the resolution.

Now I want to get back for a very few moments to the amendment to the resolution which we are discussing this afternoon, and I want to find out what it means. Before doing so I wish to read one more quotation from a speech by the hon. member for Bow River last year. The hon. gentleman is reported at page 5207 of Hansard for 1926 as follows:

> That being the case, I say that we would be ill-advised indeed to fall into any trap that may be set for us by hon. gentlemen to my right just as we would have been ill-advised to fall into the trap set by the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Davis), or by any other hon. member who moves a political motion. So far as I personally am concerned, I will weigh every question on its merits, and if I detect in it a single trade of political motive, distinct altogether from the interests of the country, I shall have no hesitation in voting against it.

[Mr. A. M. Young.]

Now, we are going to apply that principle to the present day and generation, and I want to ask the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), if he is in his seat, if he expects his amendment to carry? I observe that the hon. gentleman is not in his seat, therefore I ask the hon. member for Bow River if he expects the amendment to carry?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Most certainly.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): That is very well. Now if the amendment carries what does it mean? It means that this government must necessarily resign, and the opposition will be called upon to form a government. That is what it means. It means that the hon. member for Bow River, if I understand him aright, would hike back to the province of Alberta and there hide himself at the very bottom of the deepest pit. There is no man here who does not know that this amendment is moved for one reason and one reason only. I myself have listened most carefully to speeches made in the west on the political platform, of the general policy of the members of the Progressive party and I have had very little disagreement with it. As a matter of fact we have seen so much eye to eye with regard to tariff policy that I never wasted my time discussing the matter. I am a low tariff man unquestionably and always have been.

An hon. MEMBER: Will you vote for the amendment?

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I will tell my hon. friend about that in a moment. Well, now, what is the purpose of this amendment? We have heard it said already this session: it does seem that the old traditional Liberal party is stagnant. The Conservative party have got some working agreement, some plan of coöperation with the Liberals, and they and the Liberals are working together. We are the only party that are standing true to our principles.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Hear, hear.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Yes, "hear, hear." Has that ever been said before? Was that ever said on the hustings in Saskatchewan, was it ever said on the hustings in Alberta, was it ever said on the hustings in Manitoba, that "We are a party separate and distinct from the Liberal party or the Conservative party. They are the parties that vote more frequently together than any other parties, and in order to show such coöperation we must have this kind of amendment." That is the sole purpose of this amendment. That is the reason my hon. friends have moved it so that they may get out on the hustings in western Canada and say that the Tories and Liberals are voting together more frequently than any other parties. We might as well tear off the veil of hypocrisy so that my hon. friends may not make this plea on the hustings in western Canada hereafter. Personally I am so entirely in agreement with the low tariff policy that I do not argue the question in western Canada at all. But I am not in favour of any man proclaiming such propaganda as I have described, from the housetops, and trying to make people believe that because members of different parties happen to vote with each other sometimes they are necessarily acting in coöperation with each other.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Is that all my hon. friend and his colleagues told their people in Saskatchewan with regard to the actions of two or three members on this side of the House last session?

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I had intended to spare the hon. gentleman but now that he has invited attack, let me tell him what I did say. There were certain times last year when certain hon. gentlemen—some of whom are absent to-day but most of whom are present—were voting—and I would say to the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) that, if one happened to notice, on the two occasions when the vote really meant the killing of the Liberal government there was no mistaking where he stood on those votes. It was perfectly safe for those hon. gentlemen to vote in the matter of the Robb budget, but there was no doubt at all as to where they stood when the votes meant the killing of the Liberal government.

I should like to say a word or two upon the subject of coöperation. I was very much surprised indeed to hear what my hon. friend from Bow River, always very genial and always very eloquent, said. He indulged in some very peculiar insinuations. In the first place he was awfully worried about this or that member from Saskatchewan, and how they were going to act with respect to this amendment. He was wondering what we were going to do with this awful budget, a "static" budget, I think he called it, brought in by the Minister of Finance. I am going to try and relieve the mind of my hon. friend a little bit on that question. In the first place personally I am never worried about identifying myself with some particular resolution. The people back home whom I have the honour to represent know how I am going to vote. I have spent twenty years of my life in that district, and I have always taken an honest, independent stand on public questions. What is true of myself is true of every other member from Saskatchewan. When we have something to say we are not afraid to say it.

Last year I said very frankly that I was not very enthusiastic over the tariff board. I am not now enthusiastic over the tariff board. I am going to tell you why. Please remember that anything I may say has no reference to the personnel of that board. The tariff board was not asked for by myself; it was asked for, I believe, by the Canadian Council of Agriculture, it was asked for by other bodies; and theoretically it seems to be an institution which would be of good service to all concerned. However, the tariff board was created, and I for one say that I am going to be sufficiently fair to this or any other board to give it every possible chance to function. We must be reasonable and fair, and we must do all in our power to use that instrument for the greatest good of the greatest number of the people of this country. I wish, however, to be on record as saying that if at any time that board is to be used as an instrument or agent to hide behind in order to increase the tariff, I would say: Get thee gone and give way to honest men. We can never give the functions of this House over to that tariff board or to any other tariff board that may be created. I want to be perfectly frank in that regard.

But what is the situation? Am I worried about the present budget? I want right now to compliment the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) on the budget which he has introduced. I think he has brought in a splendid budget. The tariff board was created last year; it started up its machinery, and it is gathering many facts. When anything is in its initial stages you must give it time to do its work thoroughly. Hon. members who were here last year know that last year's session was perhaps the most strenuous that this House ever experienced. What followed? We had an election on the 14th September and most of us were not idle from the time we left here in July until after the 14th September. In addition to that the ministers of the crown had to go back to their constituencies for re-election. Later on there was held in the old country an Imperial conference which was attended by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), two of the ablest men this country has produced. After their return from the conference the House opened before the end of the year and I am going to ask: Just what was the situation? Let me call to the defence of what I am about to say the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote). Last year he said in this House: I am tired and I want to go to bed, or some words like that. He said that it was beyond his physical endurance to remain here any longer. Nevertheless here is the hon. gentleman who is now moving this amendment, worrying about the fact that we are not going ahead a little faster in reducing the tariff.

What about the poor ministers of the crown? We have to work ten to sixteen hours a day. They are working about twenty-six—two hours overtime. They are working night and day. They were running the election; they were going to the Imperial conference; they are responsible for the whole government of this country, and yet after all the strenuous work we had last year up to the very end of the year, my hon. friend expects that we should be prepared with a large measure of tariff reductions. If we are going to give this tariff board a chance to function, we must give it ample time to gather all the facts. Surely for this year we can be sufficiently generous to the Minister of Finance if he wants a little rest and has not had time—

Mr. EVANS: Will the hon. gentleman state to the House exactly what the Canadian Council of Agriculture asked for in the way of a tariff advisory board or anything of that kind, and what duties and powers they would confer on that board other than what it has now?

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I am very sorry I have not all the details my hon. friend asks for. I did not think for one moment the Canadian Council of Agriculture was asking for a tariff board that would increase the tariff. I understood the reverse.

Mr. EVANS: The hon. gentleman has created a wrong impression regarding the Canadian Council of Agriculture.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I do not think so. I do not wish it to be inferred that I understood the Canadian Council of Agriculture were asking for a tariff board in order that the tariff might be increased. They were not asking for it for that purpose. Now that the tariff board has been created, it should be given an opportunity to make good.

Mr. BIRD: Is the hon. gentleman sure that the Canadian Council of Agriculture ever made that request?

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): That has been stated over and over again in this House and I take it that such is the case. After all the strenuous time we had last year, this amendment criticises the Minister of Finance for not bringing in further reductions in the tariff. We must be honest, fair and reasonable with the board and we must give it a proper chance to function. If it can demonstrate that it is really acting in the interest of the masses of the people of this country, I for one am prepared to be behind it.

Mr. BELL (St. Antoine): When the hon. member stated that we must be fair, honest and reasonable in regard to the tariff board, did I understand him to say that he was in favour of the tariff board as long as it did not increase the tariff?

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): So long as the tariff board is a fact-finding body, confining its work to fact-finding, and it is not persuaded and swayed by philosophers bringing in opinions of those who claim they know. That is one of the difficulties and why I am watching it carefully. Amongst the manufacturers each branch has an expert whose duty it is to find out in just what way they can get a little more protection. I ask: What representation on the tariff board has the great mass of unorganized opinion?

An hon. MEMBER: Nobody.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): What have my hon. friends in that corner done? The hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Spence) has assumed almost the whole responsibility on his shoulders up to the present time. He is the only man of all of us who has been really carrying the burden of endeavouring to represent the great mass of unorganized opinion. That is where my fear arises. These experts in all branches of manufacture are present. What for? With the idea of lowering tariffs? Not very much, except in a few cases where this is happening: Some of the manufacturers find that the things they have to buy are protected, and they want the protection removed from these things. It is the most selfish organization I know of.

I wish to say a few words to-day about grain rates which come under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners, and I desire to give a review of the situation as we find it operating in western Canada. In 1925 the parliament of Canada passed this statute which was assented to on 27th June of that year:

(5) Notwithstanding the provisions of section 3, the powers given to the board—

That is the Board of Railway Commissioners.

—under this act to fix, determine and enforce just and reasonable rates, and to change and alter rates as changing conditions or cost of transportation may from time to time require, shall not be limited or in any manner affected by the provisions of any act of the parliament of Canada, or by any agreement made or entered into pursuant thereto, whether general in application or special and relating only to any specific railway or railways, and the board shall not excuse any charge of unjust discrimination, whether practised against shippers, consignees, or localities, or of undue or unreasonable preference, on the ground that such discrimination or preference is justified or required by any agreement made or entered into by the company: Provided that, notwithstanding anything in this subsection contained, rates on grain and flour shall, on and from the date of this act, be governed by the provisions of the agreement made pursuant to chapter five of the statutes of Canada, 1897, but such rates shall apply to all such traffic moving from all points on all lines of railway west of Fort William to Fort William or Port Arthur over all lines now or hereafter constructed by any company subject to the jurisdiction of parliament.

(6) The board shall not excuse any charge of unjust discrimination, whether practised against shippers, consignees, or localities or of undue or unreasonable preference, respecting rates on grain and flour, governed by the provisions of chapter five of the statutes of Canada, 1897, and by the agreement made or entered into pursuant thereto, within the territory in the immediately preceding subsection referred to, on the ground that such discrimination or preference is justified or required by the said act or by the agreement made or entered into pursuant thereto.

That is an act of parliament that was assented to on June 27th, 1925. On the 5th day of June, 1925, an order in council was passed, No. 886, which with the permission of the House I shall put on Hansard:

Certified copy of a report of the committee of the Privy Council approved by His Excellency the Governor General on the 5th June, 1925.

The committee of the Privy Council have had under consideration the final disposition of the petition to the Governor in Council of the governments of the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba by way of appeal from a general order No. 408 of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada (hereinafter referred to as the "board"), dated the 14th day of October, 1924, under which certain tariffs of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and Canadian National Railways were disallowed and required to be withdrawn from operation.

In and by the said petition the petitioners seek to have the above-mentioned general order of the board rescinded and further to have the discrimination which would be created by the reinstatement of the tariffs disallowed by the board removed by lowering other rates to the level of the rates in effect on Crowsnest commodities, so-called, prior to the effective date of the said order.

Upon the hearing it appeared that the petitioners had appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada to have determined certain questions of law and jurisdiction of the board arising in connection with the board's general order abovementioned. The committee, being of the opinion that, whatever the power of council might be in the premises, it was essential that it should be advised as to the exact situation in reference to these questions of law and jurisdiction before finally disposing of this matter, and that the operation of the said general order of the board should be postponed pending the outcome of the said appeal to the Supreme Court, recommended in part that the said general order of the board be varied so as to provide that the tariffs therein referred to should again become operative and remain in effect until further order of the board following the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada on the said appeal to it. Effect was given to this recommendation by the issue of order in council (P.C. 2220) dated the 25th December, 1924.

It appears that the Supreme Court of Canada, after argument in which were heard not only counsel for the present petitioners and the railway companies interested but also counsel for the province of British Columbia, the maritime provinces, the cities of Edmonton, Alberta, and Saskatoon, Saskatchewan and Brantford, Ontario, and after reserving judgment, directed that the questions submitted to it be answered as follows:—

Question 1.—Whether, as a matter of law, the board is empowered, under the jurisdiction conferred upon it by the Railway Act, or otherwise, to authorize railway rates upon the railway of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in excess of the maximum rates referred to in the Crowsnest Pass Act, being chapter 5, 60-61 Victoria, statutes of Canada, and in the agreement therein referred to, upon the commodities therein mentioned.

Answer.—No.

Question 2.—If the court shall be of the opinion that the Crowsnest Pass Act or agreement is binding upon the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada, then, according to the construction of the Crowsnest Pass Act, section 1, clause (d), and the agreement made thereunder;

(a) 1. Are the rates therein provided applicable to traffic westbound from Fort William and from all points east of Fort William now on the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's railway?

Answer.—No.

(a) 2. Are such rates confined to westbound traffic originating at Fort William and at such points east of Fort William as were, at the date of the passing of the act and (or) the making of the agreement, on the company's line of railway?

Answer.—Yes.

(b) Are such rates applicable to traffic originating at points east of Fort William which were, at the date of the passing of the act and (or) the making of the agreement, on any line of railway owned or leased by or operated on account of the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Answer.—In order that the traffic provided for by clause (d) should fall under that clause it must originate at Fort William or some point east thereof which at the date of the agreement was "on the company's railway".

(c) Are the rates therein provided applicable to traffic destined to points west of Fort William which are now on the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's railway, or on any line of railway owned or leased by or operated on account of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company?

Answer.—In order that the rates prescribed in clause (d) should apply the destination of traffic otherwise within that clause must be a point which was, at the date of the agreement, "on the company's main line or on (some) line of railway throughout Canada owned or leased by or operated on account of the company".

(d) Are such rates confined to traffic destined to points west of Fort William which were, at the date of the passing of the act or the making of the agreement, on the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's railway, or on any line of railway owned or leased by or operated on account of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company?

Answer.—Yes.

Question 3.—Whether, as a matter of law, the board is empowered, under the jurisdiction conferred upon it by the Railway Act, or otherwise, to authorize rates upon the Canadian Pacific Railway on grain and flour from all points on the main line, branches or connections of the company west of Fort William, to Fort William and Port Arthur, and all points east beyond the maximum rates specified in the Crowsnest Pass Act and agreement, and referred to, in chapter 41, statutes of Canada (1922).

Answer.—No.

Upon the hearing before Your Excellency in Council it appeared that the re-establishment of the rates provided for in the Crowsnest pass agreement upon the limited list of commodities and between the points specified therein had brought about considerable variations in the rates applicable thereto prior to the 7th July, 1924, and it was urged on behalf of a large section of the Dominion, and in particular by counsel for the cities of Edmonton, Alberta, and Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, and the maritime provinces, as well as representatives of responsible trade organizations in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec that the establishment of these rates would disrupt the rate structure built up under the control of the board since its creation, with consequent serious injury to trade relationships throughout the Dominion.

It was also urged that sources of supply had changed since the agreement was made and that certain commodities which were formerly shipped in large quantities from eastern Canada to the prairie provinces are now largely supplied either by local industries or from British Columbia, which latter province, it was alleged, would be cut off from a large part of its natural market by the permanent restoration of the Crowsnest rates.

It was further urged that the continuance of the Crowsnest rates (so-called) would compel the Canadian National Railways to make similar reductions from all competitive points, and thus involve a serious loss in revenue to them which would have to be made up from other government sources and further postpone the time when it would be possible to make any general rate readjustment or to solve satisfactorily the problem of the National Railways.

The committee observe that the agreement in question was made at a time when the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was the only company having a through line of railway extending through the prairie provinces and British Columbia, and before the creation of the board for the control of railway rates under the provisions of the Railway Act of 1903 and subsequent acts; and further, that the underlying purpose of the rate control inaugurated by the Railway Act of 1903 was to do away as far as possible with all unjust discriminations and undue preferences, and to secure a fair and reasonable rate structure, which, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions would be equal in its application to all persons and localities.

The committee are of the opinion that the policy of equalization of freight rates should be recognized to the fullest possible extent as being the only means of dealing equitably with all parts of Canada, and as being the method best calculated to facilitate the interchange of commodities between the various portions of the Dominion, as well as the encouragement of industry and agriculture and the development of export trade.

The committee are further of the opinion that to give effect to this policy, and considering the submissions made by counsel and important trade organizations representing different provinces and localities in the Dominion as to the disadvantages that would be suffered by such provinces and localities by any partial or incomplete consideration of the freight rate structure, a thorough and complete investigation of the whole subject of railway freight rates in the Dominion should be carried out by the Board of Railway Commissioners, the body constituted by parliament with full powers under statute to fix and control railway rates.

The committee are further of the opinion that as the production and export of grain and flour forms one of the chief assets of the Dominion, and in order to encourage the further development of the great grain growing provinces of the west, on which development the future of Canada in large measure depends, it is desirable that the maximum cost of the transportation of these products should be determined and known, and therefore are of opinion that the maximum established for rates on grain and flour, as at present in force under the Crowsnest pass agreement, should not be exceeded.

The committee are further of the opinion that, before such investigation is undertaken it is essential to ensure that the provisions of the Railway Act in reference to tariffs and tolls, and the jurisdiction of the board thereunder, be unfettered by any limitations other than the provisions as to grain and flour hereinbefore mentioned.

The committee therefore advise that the board be directed to make a thorough investigation of the rate structures of railways and railway companies subject to the jurisdiction of parliament, with a view to the establishment of a fair and reasonable rate structure, which will, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, be equal in its application to all persons and localities, so as to permit of the freest possible interchange of commodities between the various provinces and territories of the Dominion and the expansion of its trade, both foreign and domestic, having due regard to the needs of its agricultural and other basic industries, and in particular to:

(a) The claim asserted on behalf of the maritime provinces that they are entitled to the restoration of the rate basis which they enjoyed prior to 1919;

(b) The encouragement of the movement of traffic through Canadian ports;

(c) The increased traffic westward and eastward through Pacific coast ports owing to the expansion of trade with the Orient and to the transportation of products through the Panama canal.

The committee further advise that legislation be introduced at the present session of parliament, making it clear that the provisions of the Railway Act of 1919 in respect of tariffs and tolls shall, save in the particular above mentioned, be operative notwithstanding any special acts or agreements and removing all doubts to to the validity of tariffs heretofore filed.

The committee submit the same for Your Excellency's approval.

E. J. LEMAIRE,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

That was an order in council directing an inquiry into the general freight rate system throughout Canada. When I came to this House last year as a member, I said something about this extension of the Crowsnest pass agreement. I had interviewed some of the members of the Board of Railway Commissioners, and before coming here, as a member of the executive of the Saskatoon Board of Trade, I along with other members of the board had sent out many inquiries to all the boards of trade in the province, and later we made representations to the Board of Railway Commissioners with regard to what we believed was a discrimination in the rates as between the northern part of the three prairie provinces and the southern part; in other words, we believed that the board had not made a proper application of the statute which I have just read. On December 12th, 1925, I wrote a letter to the chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners, and on December 22nd, 1925, had a reply from Commissioner Vien, which reads as follows:

In the absence of the chief commissioner, Mr. Burpee his secretary, has handed to me for reply your letter dated December 12th in reference to Crowsnest pass rates. I find that you have put to the chief commissioner the following questions:—

1. Does the Crowsnest pass agreement, as enlarged, order that railway rates on grain and flour, eastbound, shall be the same at all railway points equidistant from Fort William?

2. Have schedules been filed with the commission by the railway companies?

3. Do they show that the rates are equal?

4. If this is proven to the commission, will the board order the railway companies to refund to shippers, all overcharges?

In answer to question No. 1, it will be remembered that Crowsnest pass agreement, as regards grain and flour eastbount, provided only that there would be a reduction in C.P.R.'s then existing rates and tolls of .03 per 100 lbs., and that no higher rates than such reduced rates would be charged after the dates mentioned in the agreement.

It will be readily seen therefore, that it does not necessarily follow that railway rates on grain and flour eastbound shall be the same at all railway points equidistant from Fort William.

You speak of the agreement as enlarged. Please note that the only enlargements are those contained in 15-16 Geo. V, c. 52, s. 3, ss. 5-6.

By subsection 5 it was provided that the rates of the agreement would thenceforth apply to traffic moving from all points on all lines of railways west of Fort William or Port Arthur, over all lines then or thenceforth constructed by any company subject to the jurisdiction of parliament.

The rates were not altered, but they were made to apply over a wider field.

Subsection 6 provides that a charge of unjust discrimination shall not be excused by the board, even as regards the Crowsnest rates, on the ground that such discrimination is justified or required by the act or the agreement.

I will read that again:

Subsection 6 provides that a charge of unjust discrimination shall not be excused by the board, even as regards the Crowsnest rates, on the ground that such discrimination is justified or required by the act or the agreement.

If the board were not at the time, it became by this subsection empowered to compel the railways to cease unjustly to discriminate against shippers, consignees or localities, if any such unjust discrimination were satisfactorily established before the board.

In answer to question No. 2, I may state that the schedules have been filed with the commission by the railway companies, on the 7th of December instant. In answer to question No. 3 I may state that these schedules do not show the rates are equal—

Even at that date there was no question in the minds of the board. They say that the schedules do not show that the rates are equal. The letter goes on:

—at all railway points equidistant from Fort William. They show the contrary, and as you are aware, the board issued its general order No. 420 of July 18, 1925, directing the railway companies to file such tariffs as were necessary to implement the provisions of s. 325 of the Railway Act, 1919, as amended by 15-16 Geo. V, c. 52. The railway companies are on record as stating that their tariffs are in compliance with the legislation.

Subsequently, there were complaints that the rates are not in all cases the same from stations equidistant from Fort William.

This matter was to have been spoken to at sittings of the board at Ottawa, September 29th, 1925, but, for the reasons mentioned at pages 1983 et s. of vol. 444 of the record, it was agreed not to go on with the complaint, pending the production by the railway companies of the tariffs in effect prior to and at the time of the coming into force of the Crowsnest agreement.

This information has now been received, and is being furnished to counsel for the provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia. It is understood that there will be a hearing to receive the submissions of all parties interested, after which the board will consider the same and reach a decision.

As to question No. 4, it is not quite clear in my mind whether the commission has jurisdiction to order the railway companies to refund to shippers overcharges; this question can be determined only upon hearing of all interested parties on this matter.

I hope that this covers specifically what you had in your mind in writing to the chief commissioner.

The next thing that happened was that the province of Saskatchewan and the city of Saskatoon had legal representatives appointed in order to press the claims of that portion of the country. I may say here that Saskatoon is in the centre of the northern portion of Saskatchewan which is affected by these rates, and as such we felt that in so far as we in the city could do anything to help in this situation, the duty devolved upon us to do it. The city believes that its interests are so inextricably interwoven with the interests of the country districts that we are simply one and the same thing; we cannot take any other viewpoint. So we had counsel appointed to represent our interests before this board. They appeared before the board and presented their whole case.

On August 25, 1926, I was in Ottawa, and again I visited the Board of Railway Commissioners, and made representations on behalf of that section of the country, begging and praying that the time would not be let slip by and another crop be moved without getting the benefit of the reduced rates to which we felt we were entitled in that part of the country. On September 27, 1926, I sent the following wire to the secretary of the Board of Railway Commissioners:

Please advise when we may expect decision re inequitable rates under the Crowsnest pass agreement as extended. One crop has been moved without the farmers of northern Saskatchewan getting benefit under said agreement. Is the railway commission going to permit another crop to be moved before final action is taken?

On October 12th, 1926, I received the following letter from the secretary of the Board of Railway Commissioners:

I am directed by the board to confirm the deputy chief commissioner's telegram to you of the 7th instant, which read as follows:

"Your telegram to secretary of board, dated September twenty-seventh brought to my attention to-day. Board unable to state definitely when final action can be expected for various reasons set out in letter that follows."

THOMAS VIEN.

I am also directed by the board to add the following:

That in your telegram you state—"one crop has been moved without the farmers of northern Saskatchewan getting the benefit under said agreement. (Crowsnest pass agreement.)"

[Mr. A. M. Young.]

That if you are under the impression that last year's crop moved under the present rate through inaction on the part of the board, this impression is mistaken and somewhat erroneous.

That the Railway Act was amended by parliament at the session of 1925, and the amendments were assented to on the 27th of June, 1925, extending the application of the Crowsnest pass agreement to grain and flour moving from all points on all lines of railways west of Fort William to Fort William or Port Arthur; over all lines now or hereafter constructed by any company subject to the jurisdiction of parliament.

That on the 8th of July, the board issued its general order No. 420, directing that "the railway companies, subject to the jurisdiction of parliament, file such tariffs, effective within fifteen days from the date of this order, as may be necessary to implement the provisions of the said section of the Railway Act, 1919, as amended."

That rates were thereupon put in by the railway companies which they claim, are in compliance with the order of the board, and the provisions of the amendment of 1925.

That such rates are claimed by interested parties, to be an evasion of the legislation in question and, it is contended that they do not carry out the provisions of the amendment or the order of the board.

That the complaints of the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan were received by the board in the form of the two following applications:

"Application of the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan that rates on grain and flour to Pacific coast ports within Canada for export as published in C.P.R. tariff C.R.C. No. W. 2788 and C.N.R. tariff C.R.C. No. W. 432, be corrected to basis of equalization proportionate to distance as such grain and flour would carry if moving eastward for export as provided for in order No. 36769, dated 2nd September, 1925, and,

"Application of the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan that the Board set a mileage scale of what rates on grain and flour to Pacific ports within Canada for export should be based on a reduction of three cents per hundred pounds from C.P.R. main line rates as same existed immediately prior to enactment of 60-61 Victoria, ch. 5, being an act to authorize a subsidy for a railway through the Crowsnest pass and that such rates shall apply to all such traffic moving from all points to all lines west of Fort William either to Fort William or Port Arthur or to Pacific coast ports within Canada over all lines constructed by any company subject to the jurisdiction of the board."

That these two applications were set down for hearing at Ottawa on the 29th of September, 1925, and were listed on the docket under letters N & O.

That for the reasons mentioned at pages 1983 and following of volume 444 of the record, at the request of counsel appearing on behalf of the western provinces, it was agreed that these applications would not then be proceeded with, but that they would be spoken to at a later date.

That at the request of the same parties, these applications were again set down for hearing at Ottawa on February 16, 1926, and they were then heard by the full board.

That even if a decision had then been rendered, most of the 1925 crop had already been moved, and therefore up to that time, if any delay took place, it was at the request of the western provinces.

That your telegram then continues—"Is the railway commission to permit another crop to be moved before final action is taken."

That on the 23rd February, 1926, the board rendered an oral judgment in open court.

That three commissioners held that those applications should be dealt with independently of the general rate investigation, that the applicants had made a prima facie case, and that, under section 319 of the Railway Act, on the railways was the burden of proving that the lower tolls charged on C.P.R. main line did not amount to unjust discrimination against shippers located on C.P.R. northern branches and C.N.R. lines.

That the other commissioners held, on the contrary, that those two applications should not be disposed of independently, but should be dealt with as part of the general rate investigation, and should be spoken to in the course of the then impending western trip of the board.

Vide record, vol. 453, pp. 2132 and following.

That the board being evenly divided, no order could be issued upon these two applications, independently of the general rate investigations,

That after several weeks being taken up in April and May by the Bell Telephone enquiry, and—

I wish to say a few words about that in a moment.

—other matters, the board undertook its western trip, and spent the major part of June and the whole of July in western Canada.

That at the various sittings held, counsel appearing on behalf of several western interests and of the western provinces, filed with the board a mass of documentary evidence, and undertook to give copies of same to counsel appearing on behalf of the railways.

That when the question arose of fixing a date for the final hearing in the general rate investigation, counsel appearing on behalf of the railways complained that they had not received as yet (and as late as the 10th instant), several of the exhibits above mentioned, and that they could not complete their preparation before such exhibits were furnished to them.

That no date can be fixed for the final hearing until such time as such exhibits are received by the railways, and steps are being taken to urge counsel representing western provinces to expedite this matter.

That the board is presently engaged with the investigation of the Bell Telephone Company which is likely to last for another period of four or five weeks.

That a date will be fixed at the earliest possible moment, for the final hearing, and all matters involved, including the two applications above mentioned, will then be dealt with in due course.

Yours truly,

A. D. Cartwright,
Secretary, B.R.C.

Dr. A. M. Young, M.P.,
Saskatoon, Sask.

I replied to the secretary of the board, thanking him for his letters and said—

Mr. GUTHRIE: Before my hon. friend reads that letter, might I ask him a question for my information? Is the discriminatory rate as against northern Alberta and northern Saskatchewan in force to-day?

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): It is still in force. I will come to that later. The letter which I wrote to the secretary of the railway board was as follows:

I thank you for your letter of 12th inst., I wish to protest in the strongest manner possible against the unwarranted and unnecessary delay in having the orders issued with respect to rates on grain and flour under the Crowsnest pass agreement as enlarged. I have read your letter very carefully and regret to say that it does not contain a reasonable excuse.

The Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada was brought into being for the purpose of having such matters as this dealt with expeditiously. It is well known that the board had the necessary power to hasten this decision had it so desired. The people of this part of the country cannot be expected to suffer this injustice to continue without offering a most vigorous protest.

I wish to urge that this matter be given immediate attention and that judgment be delivered at the earliest possible moment.

On the same date I wrote to the Hon. J. G. Gardiner, Premier of Saskatchewan. Let me say here that the government of Saskatchewan has been doing everything possible, and I may add that the premiers of Alberta and Manitoba too have been urging on the railway commissioners that this matter be dealt with and finally decided. This is my letter to Mr. Gardiner:

I have been in correspondence with the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada with respect to the delay in issuing judgment in connection with railway rates on grain and flour under the Crowsnest pass agreement as enlarged. The following paragraphs appear in their reply:

"That at the various sittings held, counsel appearing on behalf of several western interests and of the western provinces, filed with the board a mass of documentary evidence, and undertook to give copies of same to counsel appearing on behalf of the railways.

"That when the question arose of fixing a date for the final hearing in the general rate investigation, counsel appearing on behalf of the railways complained that they had not received as yet (and as late as the 10th instant) several of the exhibits above mentioned and that they could not complete their preparation before such exhibits were furnished to them.

"That no date can be fixed for the final hearing until such time as such exhibits are received by the railways, and steps are being taken to urge counsel representing the western provinces to expedite this matter."

It is scarcely understandable that counsel for the prairie provinces should delay one day in furnishing whatever exhibits were necessary. I would be glad if you would give this matter your immediate attention and have instructions issued to counsel for this province that the matter be attended to.

So far as I can see it, there is not the slightest justification for the delay which has occurred with respect to this whole matter. Farmers in northern Saskatchewan are being penalized two cents per hundred pounds on grain in comparison with those who come under the old agreement.

Please do all in your power to see that this matter is speeded up as much as possible.

Under date of October 21, 1926, Mr. Gardiner wrote me as follows:

I am in receipt of your letter of October 20 referring to your correspondence with the Board of Railway Commissioners with respect to the delay in issuing judgment in connection with reducing rates on grain and flour under the Crowsnest pass agreement. This matter has been under the direction of Honourable J. A. Cross, attorney general. I can assure you that everything that this government can do in the matter has been done.

I am forwarding your letter to Mr. Cross and suggesting to him that if he can do anything to prevent any delay by making requests to other governments, it be done as soon as possible. I agree that this matter should be cleared up at the earliest possible date.

Yours sincerely,

James G. Gardiner.

I have also a letter from the Hon. J. A. Cross, Attorney General, Saskatchewan, dated October 23, 1926, in which he expressed himself to me as follows:

Premier Gardiner has just passed to me your letter to him of the twentieth instant relative to freight rates on grain. The information which you have received from the railway board has recently come to our attention, and so far as I am aware, is without foundation. The matter of equalisation of freight rates on grain and flour in this province was argued before the Board of Railway Commissioners at Ottawa in February last, and since that time we have been pressing for a decision. The board is now evidently attempting to make this application a part of the general rates inquiry. We have, like yourself, become very impatient and extremely annoyed at the delay in connection with this matter. I am passing a copy of your communication to W. H. McEwen, Esq., who has been acting as counsel for the province. I am asking Mr. McEwen to write you more fully on the subject.

Yours faithfully,

J. A. Cross.

Mr. McEwen wrote me and this is his letter:

Copy of your letter of the 20th of October to the Hon. J. G. Gardiner has been forwarded to me by the attorney general, with a copy of his letter to you in reply. If you should happen to be in Regina at any time in the near future I would consider it a favour if you would call to see me so that I could explain this situation to you personally. It is somewhat difficult to tell the whole story by correspondence.

However, briefly the situation with regard to alleged unjust discriminatory rates on grain and flour to Fort William is as follows:

Following the amendment to the Railway Act in 1925 the board issued its order requiring the railway companies to file tariffs on grain supplementing the provisions of that statute. Both railway companies took the position that their present tariffs complied with the provisions of the statute, and published Crowsnest rates on grain. Considerable correspondence followed between the Hon. Mr. Cross on the one hand, and the Board of Railway Commissioners and officials of the railways on the other. Nothing could be obtained by correspondence and finally the situation developed to the point where the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta made an application to the Board of Railway Commissioners at its sittings at Ottawa on the 16th of February for the removal of the discrimination complained of.

You are aware that in the meantime the board had been directed to conduct a general investigation into freight rates. On the hearing at Ottawa in February the complaint of the provinces was fully developed, but at the conclusion three members of the board took the position that the matter of discriminatory grain rates could not be dealt with apart from the general rates enquiry. The three other members of the board took the opposite view, namely that our application was properly before the board, and that the question of proper grain rates could, and should be disposed of apart from the general rates enquiry. Under these circumstances it was obvious that our application could not succeed apart from the general rates investigation, and what we asked for and hoped to obtain was a decision of the board refusing our application, as the board was evenly divided. This order was not made immediately following the application, and although we have been trying to obtain such a order so that we might appeal therefrom to the Governor General in Council, up to the present date the board has simply refused to deal with the application at all, and I am lately informed that they take the view, with the exception of Commissioner Oliver, that our application will be dealt with as an application in the general rates investigation, and disposed of at that time. This is very unfortunate. We are still considering what we can possibly do to secure a judgment from the board one way or the other, but at present it looks as though no judgment will be available until after the, argument in the general investigation, and the decisions in that matter.

Now I desire to refer briefly to the paragraphs quoted in your letter from the communication you received from the Board of Railway Commissioners. These paragraphs were doubtless intended as the board's excuse for having failed up to the present time to fix the date for the final argument in the general rates matter. You may possibly have seen a letter of the 13th of October written by the secretary of the board to Mr. J. M. Stevenson where a somewhat similar attitude is adopted. In that letter, however, you will see that the board states that since early in June it has been continuously engaged, and that the Bell Telephone enquiry will take four or five weeks yet.

It is true that during the western sittings numerous exhibits were filed. I desire only to speak for the province of Saskatchewan, but I think this statement is also true with respect to the board of trade at Saskatoon represented by Mr. Stevenson. At the hearing in Regina I filed a considerable number of exhibits and at that time furnished all persons who were present at the hearing with copies of the exhibits in question. Each railway got at least two copies of each exhibit which I filed. This statement is subject to qualification. The Western Canada Live Stock Union had made a submission in the general rates investigation and three or four witnesses appeared at Regina in support of that submission. I assisted in the presentation of this case for the stockmen in conjunction with a somewhat similar case which had been submitted by the province of Saskatchewan. Some of these witnesses, however, in giving their evidence, filed certain graphs, of which they had only one copy, and of which I had received no previous notice, and had no copy myself. These graphs are all on file in Ottawa where they can readily be seen by counsel for the railway companies who appear to spend a large proportion of their time at Ottawa, and in or around the board's quarters at that place. It is quite impossible for me to supply railway counsel with copies of these exhibits for the reason that I have no copies of them myself. I have notified the secretary of the board of this fact, and have told him that if he will return these exhibits to me at Regina, I will have photographic copies of them made, and supply these to the counsel in question.

It is quite possible that the railway counsel are making this an excuse for being unprepared to go on with the main argument in this case, but I have noticed that throughout the inquiry the railways have always been anxious to find some excuse for putting off the conclusion of this hearing as far as possible. I personally have no apology to offer in this connection.

Yours faithfully,

W. H. McEwen.

On November 3, he sent me this short note:

Dear Sir:

Re General Rates Inquiry—Grain

For your information beg to state that on the 1st inst. I wired the Secretary of the Board of Railway Commissioners as follows:

"Refer to your letter ninth ultimo file 34123 my reply 22nd ultimo. If you prefer not to forward exhibits 8 to 22 inclusive here authorize you to have photographic copies prepared our expense furnishing to us and for railways and board."

Yours truly,

W. H. McEwen,

Counsel for the province of Saskatchewan.

I have taken a long time to read from the documents, but the matter is so important that I want all the facts to be on record. In order that there shall be no misrepresentation of anything that was actually done I have taken the trouble to have everything set down in black and white. I want to be fair to the commissioners because I shall have something to say about the present board before I am through. I have here a record of the Board of Railway Commissioners dated Ottawa, Ontario, Friday, 22nd October, 1926. It bears the names of the commissioners present at the particular hearing reported herein. The commissioners were all present but one. I read:

[File 34123.13]

Re General Freight Rate Investigation

Submissions of the Harbour Commissioners of Quebec, Que. L. A. Cannon, K.C., for the Quebec Harbour Commission.

Mr. Cannon: Mr. Chairman, if I may have the leave of the commission? I appear on behalf of the Quebec Harbour Commission, and beg leave to address the board for a few minutes on a question that we think of vital interest to my clients. It is concerning the submission made on behalf of the Quebec Harbour Commissioners, and which now forms part of the investigation in the general investigation of the freight rates question:

The board knows that this matter has been in abeyance now for quite a while. It was started under an order in council of June 1925. We were heard here last March and we all had hopes early last spring that we might get some result from the submissions made by the Quebec Harbour Commission. Unfortunately, the leaves are now falling, the fall has come and we have not even been able to have a date fixed for the final hearing. As far as that goes, and as far as the Quebec Harbour Commission is concerned, you will recollect that we practically closed the case in Winnipeg last June and that the only thing that remained to be done was to cross-examine or to re-examine Mr. Mallory, the witness of the Canadian National Railways. Now I notice that we may not expect a date to be fixed now. I understand that in the general freight rate investigation some exhibits have to be filed, but in this matter of the Quebec Harbour Commission we would like, if possible, to have a rate fixed for the transportation of grain that would apply—we have not been able to apply it to the 1925 crop and our chances with the 1926 crop are that it will not be moved under the new conditions, but we would like if possible to have something that would work in 1927. On behalf of the Quebec Harbour Commissioners I would feel obliged, and I would respectfully submit, that a date may be fixed for the final hearing of that application, at the same time, if it is possible, for the date to be fixed for the hearing on the merits of the general investigation of the freight rates.

The Chief Commissioner: Mr. Cannon your observations to the board are of course quite properly made, and they are somewhat in line with other communications that the board has lately received. It might be well, I think, if we review for a moment the condition of affairs as far as this board is concerned.

You may remember that the procedure under the general freight rate investigation was started by an order in council, but the matter in which you harbour board is more concerned seems to be the rates upon grain moving eastward under legislation of last year by an amendment to the Railway Act. That amendment was assented to in the latter part of June, 1925. Early in July following, within ten days from the date such assent was given, this board held a formal meeting and issued an order directing the railways to conform to the provisions of that legislation. I have not the order before me, but the board as a precaution took upon itself to direct the railways to conform with the provisions of that amendment, although it was their duty, apart from such order, to recognize the legislation and to govern themselves by it. The board ordered that within fifteen days the railways put in tariffs to comply with that legislation. Certain tariffs were put in, and it was objected by parties interested, principally the province of Saskatchewan and Alberta, that the rates which were so put in and which have special reference to the interests which you are appearing for, did not comply with the order of the board, nor with the amending legislation.

Thus there was a straight issue between the railways and the provinces mentioned. The board did not hestitate in having that matter brought before it, and in September—on the 29th of September, my brother Commissioner Boyce recalls to my memory—the parties appeared before the board, and the representatives of the western provinces commenced to develop their case. It transpired almost immediately that they were not in a position to proceed because they had not before them the tariff schedules of 1897. It will be remembered that there is no particular yardstick whereby one may measure all Crowsnest pass rates, but these rates were fixed under agreement following legislation at a reduction of three cents per hundred pounds from the rates which prevailed on the C.P.R. main line before that date. It therefore became necessary to find out what the rates were which previously prevailed. In order to do that, the tariff schedules of that year had to be considered. Tariff schedules since the formation of this board in 1904, are filed here, but tariff schedules in existence prior to that year, are not filed here, and therefore the applicants were not able to turn to the records of the board and to avail themselves of the necessary information but had to ask the railways to furnish it. When it was apparent that this information was a part of their case, they asked the board to direct the railways to produce that information and the board so directed. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company, through their representative, Mr. Flintoft, expressed doubt as to whether the tariff of 1897 could be obtained; he said that it was long out of date, but he thought there was in existence a copy of such tariff somewhere in the west. We directed that all possible efforts should be made to find it, and that when found it should be submitted at once to our traffic officer. It took some time to do this, but such delay, I am anxious to suggest to you, was not by any means the fault of the board. However, the tariff schedule 1897 was eventually found, and as soon as the parties were ready again, the board entertained their motion. It was not until February that the necessary data had been gathered. On February 16 the parties came before the board and they then developed their case. It was soon apparent that in considering the amending legislation which was the basis of the application, different ideas prevailed, and the members of the board by no means hesitated to express their opinions. As I say, it was on the 16th of February that the case was resumed, and on the 23rd of February, having listened to all the parties, the board immediately expressed its view as to whether it was competent under the legislation and under the order in council to develop and decide the case apart from the general freight rate investigation.

It is a matter of common knowledge that the members of the board did not see eye to eye in that matter. Three members thought that it was so inextricably bound up with the general freight rate investigation that it should not be separately dealt with. The other three members took the opposite view. The members of the board did not hesitate for a moment—I want to emphasize this to you—to express their views, and the parties concerned had immediate advantage of those views. In the circumstances no judgment could be given, because the board being equally divided, the opinion of one section is equally as effective as the opinion of the other. The board found itself in such position, and that being so, no order could be made and no judgment could be delivered, there was nothing else to do but to go on with the matter under the general freight rate investigation.

While you have not intimated that the board has delayed judgment, that view has been expressed elsewhere, and I am taking the present opportunity to make it plain that the board did not delay judgment. The members of the board immediately made public their views in the matter, and left the parties to take whatever remedy they might be advised.

Now with reference to the conduct of the general freight rate investigation. Hearings began in January and continued with all speed. Besides this, the board has been extremely busy in other matters. Later a section of the board went west and began the western hearings under the general freight rate investigation. It carried with it a docket consisting of twenty-five to thirty cases involving the general freight rates, and thirty-five to forty cases of ordinary motions. On the 14th June the board faced that docket in Winnipeg, and then rapidly proceeded across the country from city to city. It sat in Vancouver from Friday the 9th July until the 14th, in New Westminster on the 16th, Chilliwack on the 17th, Victoria on the 19th, and again in Vancouver on the 22nd. From the 14th June until the 22nd July, there were 39 days, including five Sundays, leaving 34 working days. Edmonton was fixed for hearing on the 28th June, but that being election day in Alberta, that date was not open to us, thus leaving only 33 days. Now in those 33 days, the board heard over 50 cases, sitting continuously 28 out of the 33 days, and travelling clear to the coast, including the journey up and down the Okanagan lakes, forcing the lawyers to sit long hours in the courtrooms, and working to the limit of their endurance. The board did, I assert, make all possible speed having regard to the importance of the inquiries, and to the necessary time that the representatives of different interests required. In addition to that, the board sat in Prince Rupert on the 29th July, and then hurried home to join the other members of the board, who had been equally busy in routine matters, which are at the present moment piling up in almost dismaying proportions. When all the members of the board came together again, and as soon as was possible, having regard to the disturbed conditions prevailing, the hearing of this telephone case was begun, and it is over a month since we started this last part of the case. Notwithtanding all that, we have not lost sight of the freight rates investigation. On the fourth of October, we summoned the representatives of the railways for discussion with a view to coming to an undertanding, and giving specific directions as to what further details they must furnish, and to fix a date for final hearing. We then learned that many of the exhibits of the western provinces had not been filed. Orders went out immediately from the board to all parties to file the exhibits by the 25th October.

As soon as these exhibits are filed—I am speaking now as an individual member of the board, and any other member can add anything he thinks should be added to what I am now saying,—and the records closed, and the issues joined, a day will be considered for final hearing.

The time of the board has been fully occupied.. This telephone case has not by any means been completed. Those who are interested in the coal inquiry are asking the board for an appointment, and if our consideration is to be of any advantage to Ontario and Quebec in connection with the movement of coal to these provinces, surely the board ought to get at it before the cold weather takes its grip over the whole country.

Not one member of the board has taken a vacation this summer—I do not urge that any notice should be taken of that—but the amount of work the board has had to go through is some justification, if any justification is needed, for the condition in which many applications are now found to be.

Letters are coming to the board from various sections asking why their applications are not being given attention. We are naturally anxious that people should understand why matters which undoubtedly are of importance have not yet been determined. Many things pressing upon the board at the present time, have rendered it impossible for us to give attention to these important matters, although it would have been pleasing to the board to have been able to do so.

As soon as exhibits referred to are filed, or as soon as the time has expired in which we have directed them to be filed, the board will take up the question of settling them and fixing a date for the final hearing of the freight rate investigation and other matters involved.

In some quarters it has been said that the board has delayed its judgment in this case. There is not the slightest foundation for such statement. It is clear that no judgment as such could be issued since the board was evenly divided, and that the opinion of each member was expressed without delay.

It has also been remarked that the benefit of the reduced rates on the movement of grain, as provided by the legislation of 1925, was not available for last year's crop. It must be remembered that the board without delay directed that such rates should be put in, and that the dispute as to whether the railways had complied with such order was not at issue before the board until February. And, as before stated, the opinion of the members of the board was expressed without delay, with the result that an order was impossible and will be impossible until the general freight rate investigation is completed.

The Assistant Chief: After the very clear statement of the chief commissioner, I do not know that I can add anything. Whatever considerations weighed with regard to the fixing of the general hearing must weigh in regard to this.

I appreciate the very clear manner in which Mr. Cannon always puts forward his position. At the same time I can not see how the hearing of this application can be disassociated from the general hearing of the freight rates investigation.

The Deputy Chief: I have nothing to add to what the chief commissioner and the assistant chief commissioner have said. I fully concur with the reasons that have been given, the absolute statement of fact made by the chairman of the board, which will be revealed by the files of the board.

If the representatives of the western provinces had been able—I do not blame them—but if they had been able to comply with the undertaking that they had taken in the west and filed these exhibits and given a copy of them to the railways concerned, I think they might have helped us in saving a few weeks' time. Having received the promise that these exhibits would be filed, they appeared before us on the 4th of October and complained that they had not received these very voluminous and bulky statements, and that they were unable to come to a final hearing until such times as the exhibits had been filed with them. Orders have been issued for them to immediately comply, and after October 4th, whether these exhibits are filed or not, speaking only as an individual member of the board, I would feel very strongly against another postponement.

Mr. Cannon: That is what I was going to suggest.. We are not in default in filing exhibits. Our case is practically ready for hearing. If the Quebec Harbour Commission's case is to be postponed indefinitely, as long as these very numerous exhibits have not been filed, we are afraid that we can not be heard before next year. Nobody can tell when these exhibits will be filed.

The Deputy Chief: This far, even if the exhibits had been filed it would not have affected the situation very much, because the time of the board has been fully taken up. Thirty days notice has to be given to all concerned.

Mr. Cannon: I quite understand that, sir.

The Deputy Chief: And that thirty days' notice must of necessity postpone the hearing for another thirty days from the date on which it will be set for hearing, and therefore I was in hope that on the 4th of October, when the railways would be summoned, they would be in a position to accept a date on which to proceed and thirty days beyond as the final date when the hearing would be proceeded with.

Unfortunately we have not been able to set a date, and we shall be unable to set a date until after the 25th of October, but after that date I am strongly of the opinion that the earliest possible date should be set.

Commissioner Boyce: I am in accord with the facts and with the spirit of the observations made by the learned chief commissioner.

Commissioner Lawrence: I have nothing to add to the statements already made. I think they are correct and that they properly explain the situation.

Now we come to the viewpoint of the only representative on this board who comes from western Canada. I want you to listen to this:

Commissioner Oliver: I am very sorry to say that I have to disagree entirely with the view expressed by the chief commissioner. It would appear to me that the line of argument taken assumes to place the responsibility for the delay in handling the general freight rates investigation upon the delays which have occurred in connection with the special inquiry regarding western grain rates.

There is, in my opinion, no such connection. The general freight rates inquiry was authorized by an order in council of, I think, June 8. On June 27 an act of parliament was passed, which applied solely to east-bound grain rates from the prairie provinces to Fort William, and so far as the terms of the order are concerned, did not apply (with all due respect to the chief commissioner)to the rates between Fort William and Quebec.

That act of parliament being passed after the order in council for the general freight rates inquiry (if parliament is the superior authority) must have taken the subject of grain rates east-bound to Fort William out of the general freight rates inquiry and placed it for consideration as a subject separate from the grain rates inquiry, to be dealt with as a separate subject.

In regard to the hearing which took place on September 29, 1925, with respect again to the statement made, that hearing, in my understanding. was not a hearing in regard to grain rates east-bound, but a hearing in regard to grain rates west-bound, following upon an order of the board which had been passed upon the previous 2nd of September. As a matter of fact the hearing of September 29 was an appeal from the order of Septembr 2, passed by the board, and had no relation to the general freight rates inquiry; it had no governing relation to the question of east-bound freight rates. The question of east-bound freight rates came before the board at a full hearing beginning on the 16th of February. The hearing was very full, there was a representation by the two provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, the railway companies were represented, the argument was made, and the solicitors for the provinces moved for judgment, urged judgment being delivered, demanded that judgment be delivered, but judgment was not delivered. Had judgment been delivered in that case at that time, that case would be off the records, and it would not now be considered to be interfering in any way with the general freight rates inquiry or with the rates on grain from Fort William to Quebec.

Because it was not disposed of then, it is still of course cumbering the record and interfering with the transaction of other business.

I submit, with all respect to the deputy chief commissioner, that the failure to give judgment at that time was not the fault of the western provinces in any way, shape, manner or degree. Nor was the failure to give a decision dependent upon or resulting from a tie on the board.

If the business of the country is to be tied up by a tie on the board, certainly the usefulness of the railway commission is decidedly limited. Because there was a tie on the matter, or if there had been a tie on the essential question before the board, that does not say that there should not be a decision. The decision might be one way or it might be the other, but a decision was what was demanded by one of the parties to the case who are to-day blamed for not having had their case ready, or being reseponsible for the present postponement.

To that I take the most decided objection.

Now, sir, I have taken a great deal of time in reading these documents into the record and for the reason that I want these matters to be published in proper sequence in such an authoritative manner that no one shall have any doubts hereafter as to what actually took place.

Now I want to go back to some rather ancient history and to give some quotations from Hansard of 1902. First of all let me quote from a speech delivered by Hon. A. G. Blair, Minister of Railways and Canals at the time, as set forth at page 2437 of Hansard, on the occasion of the creation of the railway commission:

We have thought it necessary, in constituting a commission of this kind, that it should be so constituted as that we will be able to secure the very best material which our country affords for this purpose. We feel that we ought to afford the widest possible opportunity within it to make the choice, because, Mr. Speaker, as this question impresses itself upon my mind, the character, the capacity, the wisdom and the selection of the men is everything. Unless this country can afford us men of the right stamp, men of independence of character, of firmness, and of fairness, men who have experience in business, experience in railway operations, experience in law, unless the country can afford us these conditions, then, we cannot look with any reasonable hope to find that the operation of the commission will be successful.

We think it is desirable; indeed we think it imperative on us to prevent the possibility of persons who feel they may have grievances against railways not being able to have their cases determined within a reasonable time. We have therefore asked parliament to say that the decision of this tribunal shall be final, subject only to revision by the privy council, and that there shall be an appeal to no other tribunal.

In the same volume of Hansard, at page 2453, Mr. T. O. Davis, formerly representative of Prince Albert, later Senator Davis, now deceased, spoke as follows:

As I have stated before in this House, it is a well known fact that the trade and business of this country have grown at such a rate that it is impossible for the railway committee of the privy council to handle the business it should handle in connection with matters of this kind that come before it. As a matter of fact we know, from our own experience in the west this year,—

That was twenty-five years ago:

—that the people there have lost a great amount of money from the fact that we have had no body of this kind to regulate the railways of the country.

We want a body appointed that will see that there is no discrimination in rates.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have given these two quotations with the object of showing what was in the minds of those responsible for the passing of this legislation. And who was more capable of passing an opinion on a matter of this kind than the late Hon. A. G. Blair? He recognized that there must not be delay, that when a matter of this kind comes up before some body that body must be a capable one, it must be trained in the law, it must be trained in business. But the thing on which the statesmen of that time were unanimous was that there must be no delay in giving out decisions. What have we got in this particular case? Here we have a board and it is now investigating grain rates. I want to differentiate this afternoon very clearly between the general freight rates inquiry and the statute making the Crowsnest agreement rates apply over a wider territory. The order in council passed on the 5th of June directed that there should be a general freight rate inquiry and to that, of course, I take no exception. But on 27th June, 1925—and if you notice it is now over twenty months since that was done—the parliament of Canada by statute said that the rates under the law of 1897, the Crowsnest pass agreement, should apply to all the other sections of Canada, and to-day, after a lapse of twenty months, those rates do not apply. It is true that several hearings have taken place. The hearing of the Bell Telephone Company's application for an increase in rates has taken place. That hearing was started on January 26th, 1926, and we already have the decision by the Board of Railway Commissioners with respect to telephone rates in this part of Canada. What is the difference between the two? The statutory provision in connection with the Crowsnest pass agreement removes a burden from the mass of primary producers in western Canada. The application of the Bell Telephone Company deals with an increase in telephone rates of subscribers in eastern Canada. The Bell Telephone Company application has been heard and decided and the company has been granted permission to increase its rates. The statutory provision based on the Crowsnest pass agreement has not been carried out, and I want to say that when this parliament passes a statute no three members of the Board of Railway Commissioners or any other body has any right to set that statute at nought. The board before whom this hearing took place consists of six members, five of whom come from eastern Canada and one from the west. They divided on a fifty-fifty basis, and because of that the will of parliament is set at nought. Everyone knows that there is at present a discriminatory rate on grain in the northern part of Saskatchewan, the northern part of Alberta, the northern part of Manitoba. But we in Saskatchewan are affected to a greater degree than the other provinces because we ship more grain. It means the application of an additional two cents per hundred pounds on grain moving eastward to all that northern country. This represents to the primary producers, the farmers of that section of country, a loss of between one and two million dollars a year. Why are they suffering this loss? Because the Board of Railway Commissioners have not seen fit, apparently do not wish to do so even at this late date, to permit a statute of parliament to apply to these railway rates. But the Bell Telephone Company have been given permission to increase their telephone rates although there is no specific statute of parliament behind them. If we were now, Mr. Speaker, in the throes of a campaign to raise a victory loan and the farmers of northern Saskatchewan, of northern Alberta and of northern Manitoba were being asked to subscribe to the loan and took, we will say, $2,000,000 of victory bonds, their action would be regarded as most patriotic and the investment would be looked upon as an excellent one. If they subscribed to that—and the farmers in my part of the country subscribed for and took $2,000,000 of those debentures which were splendid, paying debentures—they would then be regarded as most patriotic people for taking an excellent investment. To-day, what do we see? We have the same farmers in that same portion of the country from whom is being taken annually unjustly and unfairly, the sum of about $2,000,000, just because the Board of Railway Commissioners will not see to it that the railways put into operation the statutory rates as passed by the parliament of Canada.

Perhaps if I speak with some heat I may be pardoned. I am always very happy when I am speaking for the primary producers of this country, and all they ask is that they be given what the parliament of Canada said they should get. I am not arguing that the rates should be higher or lower. That is not the question at all. That question has been settled. We have been waiting for twenty months for these rates to be put into operation and for all we know we may have to wait for twenty months more. We have had two crops move under the discriminatory rates. Is that fair?

I come now to another matter and I want to quote just one more section from the Railway Act. Section 44 states:

> The governor in council may, at any time, in his discretion, either upon petition of any party, person or company interested, or of his own motion and without any petition or application therefor, vary, change, or rescind any order, decision, rule or regulation of the board, whether such order or decision be made inter partes or otherwise, and whether such regulation be general or limited in its scope and application; and any order which the governor in council may make with respect thereto shall be binding on the board and all parties.

Further, section 45 states:

> The governor in council may at any time refer to the board for a report, or other action, any question, matter or thing arising, or required to be done, under this act, or the special act, and the board shall without delay comply therewith.

I understand that an appeal from the Board of Railway Commissioners has been made to the government that the Crowsnest pass agreement as extended shall be made to apply. I am now going to appeal to the Minister of Finance, to every other minister in the House at this moment, and, indeed, to all ministers of the crown that due consideration be given to the appeal made by counsel on behalf of the western provinces. I do not, as a general rule, approve appeals from the board to the government on matters of fact. If we get into a situation of that kind, it will be unfortunate. I do not blame the government for refusing appeals of that character. But here we have an appeal in which all that is being asked is that a statute of the parliament of Canada be lived up to, be adhered to. I am going to urge again that this government give consideration to the appeal made, and that it direct that the Board of Railway Commissioners render judgment accordingly and see that all discriminations are removed.

What is the situation? We have before the Board of Railway Commissioners all the tariffs filed. We have gone to the limit. We have an array of counsel in the city of Ottawa before the board and all they are doing is bringing up all kinds of technicalities. This board should be primarily a business organization with some law in it. On the contrary it is, as at present constituted, a legal institution with practically no business in it. We want to have this condition of affairs reversed. I have always had and I hope I shall always have the greatest respect for the legal profession, but at the same time we have too many technicalities creeping into this board, which has too many lawyers on it. This board was created for the purpose, not of bringing in all kinds of technicalities, but of hastening decisions.

What is required to be done with regard to the statutory rates is simply this. Every schedule of the railways was available to the Board of Railway Commissioners and the statute said: There shall be no excuse for discrimination. Surely it was not necessary with those schedules before them to have all the counsel from western Canada come to Ottawa and have the board examine them. Some good might have been accomplished by their sitting down without any counsel and finding out whether discrimination existed. They cannot say that the trouble is that they did not have counsel, because, heaven knows! we sent enough counsel down. The counsel are here, but what are we getting? I have taken a long time to place these facts on the record, but I believe they should be on record and every one should know what has taken place, namely, nothing but unwarranted delay. Before I sit down I again ask the government to request, to demand, from the Board of Railway Commissioners that judgment be issued immediately, or we may have to wait so long that another crop will have to be moved under these discrminatory rates. If we cannot get speedy enough action from the present Board of Railway Commissioners, we must have a new board that will act with promptness.

I am going to make two or three suggestions and the first one is this. The board tell us very frankly that if they divide fifty-fifty, they cannot come to a decision. We must see to it that they cannot divide fifty-fifty, and we must therefore have an odd number on the board. In the second place—and I want to insist upon this as far as I have any power to insist upon anything—I want to see one-half of the board come from western Canada. To-day we have on the board six men, five of whom come from the east and one from the west, and at this very moment from Fort William and Port Arthur west there are more miles of railway than there are in eastern Canada. Third, I want on the board rather than men of legal minds, men of business capacity who will deal with matters expeditiously, men who will not deliberately set aside an act of parliament.

Unless we get those things, the unrest which we have in western Canada in regard to this matter will not subside, but will increase. We cannot afford to allow a thing of this kind to delay any longer, and I am going to plead once more with the government to see to it that at the earliest possible date the defects that now exist in the Board of Railway Commissioners are removed.

In closing let me say that I am a very staunch admirer of the institution of the Board of Railway Commissioners. I do not know of anything which can replace it; but I have observed, and I am not alone in observing, that during the last several years the board has been getting farther and farther away from being a board and closer and closer to being a court, the very situation it was created to obviate. I remember hearing one of the chief commissioners some time ago, when a poor unfortunate widow came before the board and a lawyer was sent up from one of the big corporations, saying to him: Stand aside; I want to hear what the poor woman has to say. We want more of that spirit on the board, and if we have it, the primary producers will not have to have their representatives in this House taking up the whole afternoon in laying their case before the House, because they will receive prompt justice. Let me again urge the government to take prompt and effective action.

Hon. J. D. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): The hon. member who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Young, Saskatoon) took up the early part of his speech in reading several lectures to different members of the House, particularly the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), because of the fact that he put on the order paper a resolution which the government finds somewhat embarrassing. He referred to this resolution as a political resolution, and he deprecated the fact that anybody, and especially anyone from the west, should do a thing of that kind. He forgets that at the last session of parliament, almost during the dying hours of the session, one of the very things that was done was to introduce a similar resolution, and just for a moment I intend to refer to it. On the 30th of June, after the Mackenzie King government had been defeated, a resolution was brought in for the purpose of disturbing my friends to my left who had helped to defeat that government. Here is the resolution:

> That the Speaker do not now leave the chair, but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this House the fiscal policy of the government as enunciated by the present Prime Minister when leader of His Majesty's opposition would prove detrimental to the country's continued prosperity and prejudicial to the national unity.

That was the resolution that was brought in, and moreover the hon. member who has just spoken, and who talks of political resolutions, voted for that resolution, as is shown by the division list in Hansard. So he deprecates in others the very thing he did himself only a short time ago.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Did the hon. member ask me a question? I would like to say, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. CHAPLIN: Mr. Speaker, I object. The hon. gentleman asked a question, and then he starts out to make a statement. He has taken up two hours of the time of this House, and surely he can keep quiet now for a minute and take a little of the medicine I am going to give him.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I thought you asked me a question.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I never asked you a question at all. It was you who started to ask a question, and then went on to make a statement.

The hon. member had something further to say about the tariff board. Oh, he says, we will give them lots of time; we must be fair and reasonable. Now I make this statement: My hon. friend, and many other hon. members for years have been telling the people of the northwest what they could do in fifteen minutes in respect to the tariff; it would not take more than that length of time to decide the whole thing. Give the board a fair and reasonable time? The leader of my hon. friend's party, in a pronouncement made at the Liberal convention in 1919, a good many years ago, told us definitely what his party were going to do. But they are still there; they never did it.

My hon. friend does not always get his own way with respect to the railway board, and he took up a lot of the time of the House this afternoon in reading at length from the records, and he threatens that if this and that is not done there is going to be trouble with the northwest. "We are going to get the same number on that board from the west as from the east," he says, "because of the mileage in our part of the country." Did you ever hear a more preposterous proposition? "We are going to have half the membership of the board." Is that fair and reasonable? I will leave it to the House to decide how fair and reasonable the hon. gentleman can be. For my part, the tariff board can take all the time they find necessary. I do not mind if they never make a report. They can postpone making their recommendations for ever, so far as I am concerned. One of the things I find fault with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) about is that he had this board appointed which looks like an effort to avoid making a pronouncement on tariff matters by the government, and more than that, after the board is appointed the budget is brought down early so that the government will not have a chance of doing anything about the tariff this year anyway.

Before I say what I have to say on the budget, I want to refer to an address made here a few days ago by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), and to some statements that he made. I regret very much that the hon. member is not in his seat to-day; I would much prefer that he were here. A few days ago he placed on Hansard several statements, and right here, Mr. Speaker, let me say that I notice a growing disposition on the part of members to have statements and papers handed to the reporter so that they can be put upon Hansard, contrary to the rules and usage of the House. I have expected the ministers to stop that practice. It is not my place to do it, but I call attention to the matter, and point out that statements have been repeatedly put on Hansard without being read, and some of them are not correct. The one that I am going to refer to is an instance of that.

I looked up Hansard the day after the hon. member for Macleod spoke, and found the statement that he had placed on Hansard without reading it. The statement is not correct. It is very incorrect and irregular; I might use a very much stronger word, Mr. Speaker, but knowing the gentleman as I do, knowing that he has always been fair, I attribute this inaccuracy to his want of knowledge of the subject. I will just quote from page 501 of Hansard what he had to say:

> I have a table here, compiled from the statistics of the Department of Trade and Commerce for the year 1925, and which I will place on Hansard, if I have the permission of the House, showing that our agricultural, vegetable and animal products amount to 56 per cent of our total exports. The table is as follows—

Then the table follows. I had naturally expected, Mr. Speaker, that when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) followed the hon. member for Macleod, he would correct those figures, but of course the minister was under the disadvantage of not knowing what they were. I will take the figures in the statement one by one, giving only the round numbers.

It shows that our exports in 1925 of agricultural and vegetable products amounted to $443,000,000. Now on examining the returns I find that the items bulked under the heading of animal and vegetable products total $443,000,000, but the hon. member never looked to see what those items consisted of. I am just going to show from another page, for the information of the House, just exactly what those items consisted of that make up this $443,000,000, and which with the animal products comprise, according to the hon. member for Macleod, 56 per cent of our exports.

The first item in this total of $443,000,000 is $78,000,000 of milled products. True, milled products come from the farm, but I submit, Mr. Speaker, that probably three-quarters, or at least two-thirds of the worth of milled products come from the manufacturing; that is plain. I would be willing to concede—just for the sake of argument, although it is not so—that one-half the amount of the milled products be considered as products of the farm—the manufacturing, the barrels, and so on, representing manufactured products. But, Mr. Speaker, there are a whole lot of other items that I do not want to allow the hon. gentleman to consider as products of the farm.

The next item I refer to is canned fruits, nuts, canned, dried or otherwise prepared, $7,800,000. The hon. member takes that as a product of the farm.

Let us take the next item, vegetables, fresh and dried, or canned, $5,400,000. All the sugar made in Canada and exported to the value of $9,000,000 has been taken by the hon. gentleman in order to make his fifty-six per cent.

Mr. KENNEDY: Can the hon. gentleman show where the member for Macleod refers to that as a product of the farm?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Mr. Speaker, the whole basis of his argument was that fifty-six per cent of the total exports of Canada came from the farm. What else could this mean?

Mr. ROBB: I am sure that my hon. friend does not mean to be unfair to the hon. member for Macleod. His criticism should be directed rather against the statistician who prepared these figures.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Not at all.

Mr. ROBB: I think they are quoted as prepared by the department.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Yes, but the compiled figures are given clearly, positively and plainly on page 1464, where all these items are classified, so that anyone that wanted to be absolutely fair, and knew anything about the returns at all, could not help but see the truth.

But that is not half of what I intend to lay before the House. It seems to me, Sir, that a gentleman who puts himself forward as the critic of a party, and quotes from a trade return, should know a little more about that return before making use of it as the hon. member for Macleod did. Besides the items which I have already cited the hon. gentleman has taken all the beverages (alcoholic, brewed, distilled, fermented wines) to the value of $16,000,000, and included them in his fifty-six per cent.

An hon. MEMBER: What about home brew?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Home brew does not get into the returns. He has also included rubber and tobacco to the amount of another $44,000,000 in order to bolster up his argument that fifty-six per cent of our total exports come from the farms. He has taken all the prepared foods and all the bakery products, amounting to another $1,000,000, and miscellaneous items representing another $1,000,000. So the total amount that he has taken under the head of "vegetable products" as coming from Canadian farms and figuring in our exports amounts to $164,000,000. That is a mere bagatelle! In other words, if you assume that all the milled products are manufactured articles, then the percentage of exports of farm products drops to thirty-two per cent. On the other hand, if you allow that fifty per cent of the milled products properly belong to the farm, the percentage of farm products in our export list runs to a shade over thirty-six per cent. That is a fair basis.

Now I come to another line. The hon. member for Macleod includes in the statement that he presented to the House animals and animal products to the value of $163,000,000. Under that head he takes all our fishery products that were exported, amounting to $33,000,000; all the furs that come from the Arctic ocean right down to the lakes, to the value of $17,000,000; all leather and the manufactures of leather amounting to $8,000,000; all oils, fats and waxes, amounting to $3,000,000; all milk and its products, such as cheese, condensed and powdered milk, to the value of $44,000,000. If you divide this latter amount by two and allow fifty per cent to the farm and the other fifty to manufactures, then our total exports of products of the farms amount to thirty-six per cent.

Mr. GARDINER: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. gentleman has charged the hon. member for Macleod with making certain erroneous assumptions in the course of his speech on the budget. Sir, I should like the hon. gentleman to read what the hon. member for Macleod said when he placed the statement on Hansard. This will make it clear that the hon. member for Macleod did not assume what the hon. gentleman is imputing to him.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Mr. Speaker, I have read what the hon. member for Macleod said when he placed the statement on Hansard, but I will read it again:

> I have a table here, compiled from the statistics of the Department of Trade and Commerce for the year 1925, and which I will place on Hansard if I have the permission of the House, showing that our agricultural, vegetable and animal products amount to fifty-six per cent of our total exports.

Mr. GARDINER: Will the hon. gentleman go back a little further in order to get the gist of the discourse of the hon. member for Macleod? Then I think the House will see that the hon. gentleman is mistaken in thinking that the hon. member for Macleod made any such assumptions.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I read his speech.

Mr. GARDINER: Will the hon. gentleman read the earlier portion?

Mr. CHAPLIN: When the hon. member speaks he can make the best case he is capable of. I am not going to read the whole of Hansard for him or anyone else. I know what the hon. member for Macleod said, and know likewise on what he based his argument. What was the object, I would ask, Mr. Speaker, of claiming fifty-six per cent of our exports as coming from our farms on the strength of a statement that shows on its face that the hon. member did not understand what it meant? I know where he took this table out of the book. Unfortunately for himself he did not take the trouble to turn over two or three pages in order to get at the facts. The trouble is that my hon. friends rather than be told the facts of the case would like to show that I am wrong in my argument. I am not making any charge against the hon. member for Macleod. I did not say that he made the mistake deliberately. I simply say that his statement is not correct. It does not mean what he purported to say it meant, and surely I have a right to correct it. And what is more, Mr. Speaker, a table of that kind should not have been put on Hansard without the permission of the House. It is against the rules to do so, and in future whenever it is attempted, and I happen to be here, I shall object.

I have now a word or two to say in reference to the speech of the hon. member for East Essex (Mr. Odette). The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) will be delighted, I am sure, to have the testimony of that hon. gentleman as to how business is in the automobile trade, and no doubt he will like the compliment paid him in that regard. The hon. gentleman, now a member of the House, spent a good deal of time around this building when the Minister of Finance brought down his last budget. I must of course differentiate between what I term his first and last budgets, that is to say, between the first automobile budget and the last automobile budget. When the first automobile budget came down, the member for East Essex came down too. He frequented these galleries. As he himself said in his speech on Friday evening, he was often in the galleries, and as a matter of fact we actually saw him. He was in the corridors also; he was everywhere. Now, I was around myself.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Yes, I was around and I had the pleasure of meeting the hon. gentleman. I had been asked by a deputation of manufacturers to introduce them to the minister and I was of course around, as was also the hon. member for East Essex. Most hon. members are no doubt familiar with the type of advertisement that used to appear in the older newspapers extolling the virtues of various remedies, and giving pictures of the patient "before" and "after". I could describe this gentleman before treatment. He was pretty pale and haggard; he was stooped in the shoulders and his mind, quite evidently, was distracted. There were copious tears in his eyes. But you saw him in his seat the other day pretty jaunty. He had come through in fine shape after the treatment; after the first, second and third budgets had come down he began to improve. He was feeling decidedly better. But, as I have said, I saw him when the tears were in his eyes and when he was short on utterance. Now? Why, now he compliments the minister on the wonderful results that have ensued. I can assure the House that he is hardly recognizable as the same man.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, yes.

Mr. CHAPLIN: If you had seen him at the time I did, at the time of his distress, you would not say that.

Mr. ODETTE: May I ask the hon. member a question? If his company supplied all the wheels for motor cars imported into Canada and had that increased volume of business for his factories, and if he did not export any wheels at all, what position would his industry be in?

Mr. CHAPLIN: That is a pretty involved question. I should be very much inclined to copy the Minister of Finance and advise the hon. member to put his question in writing, for it is so complicated that I do not think anyone on top of this earth could answer it.

Mr. ODETTE: When I was down here last year and made representations to the government, did those representations assist the hon. gentleman's industry as well as my own?

Mr. CHAPLIN: I do not know anything about what representations the hon. gentleman made to the government. I do know, however, that I never asked the government for anything, nor did I sit on the minister's doorstep like some others I know. I did not hang around the corridors week after week with tears in my eyes hoping that something would turn up.

Mr. ODETTE: May I ask another question?

Mr. CHAPLIN: The hon. gentleman has asked enough questions for once.

Mr. ODETTE: This is a question of privilege. I was asked to come to Ottawa by the Minister of Finance and other ministers of the government for the purpose of assisting them in any way possible in the matter of automobiles.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is an explanation. It is not a question of privilege; it does not affect the character of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I fancy there are a good many who might have been asked to come down. I know that when I happened to meet the hon. gentleman there were between forty and fifty manufacturers who had met, no doubt for a legitimate purpose. There was no fault to find with that at all, but I do not think that these other manufacturers hung around here for weeks as my hon. friend did.

The hon. member for East Essex calls upon the minister now to adopt the same principle in regard to these other people as he did in connection with the automobile business. In his speech the other day he said in effect, "Mr. Finance Minister, it worked fine with me. Try it with someone else." We could observe while the hon. gentleman was making his speech that it was a good protectionist utterance and I would recommend to the hon. member who has recently spoken (Mr. Young, Saskatoon), that he get in touch with his friend from East Essex and see which of them will convert the other. In the early stages of the first automobile budget we heard a good deal about the Minister of Finance standing by his guns. I should like to know whether the hon. member for East Essex assisted the minister in doing so. If the truth were known, he rather helped the minister to lie down, instead of standing by, his guns.

The extract from the hon. member's speech to which I referred a minute ago, reads:

> Let me go further. I sat in the gallery when the Minister of Finance told hon. gentlemen opposite that he proposed removing the excise tax of five per cent on motor cars costing $1,200 or less, and that if the manufacturers did not pass that saving on to the buyers of motor cars he would immediately remove the five per cent excise tax on cars imported from the United States or other countries.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is quoting from a debate that took place this session and I submit he is out of order.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I have a perfect right to quote from a current debate. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that you send one of the pages down to the hon. gentleman with a set of the rules. Referring to the reduction in the sales tax, the hon. member said:

> Referring to the reduction in the sales tax, I desire to compliment the Minister of Finance. I believe it is a step in the right direction, but I should like to suggest to the minister that the sales tax on all Canadian-made goods be removed in its entirety, but that the sales tax on imported articles be retained.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I would like your ruling on the point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: If it were not permissible to quote from the present debate, no debate could take place. The rule to which the hon. gentleman refers is one which provides that reference may not be made to another debate which has already taken place during the same session.

Mr. STEVENS: And a debate, Mr. Speaker, which has been closed.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Now I wish to make a few observations directly connected with the budget, but I have no congratulations to offer the minister on anything contained therein.

Mr. ROBB: I am not disappointed, of course.

Mr. CHAPLIN: That does not mean that I have no word of commendation for him at all, because we all know him to be a very fine, decent fellow. I will say that for the short time he took in delivering the budget he should be congratulated, and I can also congratulate him because he left out a lot of political propaganda which appeared in his other budgets. Although in this budget there are several columns of it, but nothing to be compared with what appeared in his previous budgets.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Then he is improving?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Certainly, an improvement for which I have no hesitation in congratulating him.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have found the reference which confirms the ruling which I have just given. If the hon. gentleman will look at Beauchesne, Rule 19, paragraph 234, he will find the following words:

> Besides the prohibitions contained in this rule, it has been sanctioned by usage both in England and in Canada that a member, while speaking, must not:
> (a) Refer to any debate of the same session on any question not then under discussion.

Mr. BIRD: What about paragraph (k), Mr. Speaker?

Mr. CHAPLIN: I am glad that at least industry is to be free from further attacks this session, that for the time being we are to have no more such affairs as took place during last session when the tariff on automobiles was under discussion. I presume the reason for that may be the entrance into the cabinet of such gentlemen as the Minister of Customs (Mr. Euler) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm), ably seconded by my friend the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke).

I notice this year, as I noticed a year ago, that the minister made no reference to an improvement in the cattle trade, and neither did he say a word about the tremendous decrease in that trade. In the year 1924-25, at page 1529 of Hansard, the Minister of Finance stated when submitting his budget that he was short in revenue, as compared with the previous year, by some $50,000,000, and he made a virtue of necessity at that time by telling the people of this country and the members of this House that he was taking $50,000,000 less from the people, saving them that much in taxes. I say that that particular year as compared with this year shows very similar results in taxation as between that year and the year previous, except that the taxation revenue this year is greater by $50,000,000. I submit that if the minister lost $50,000,000 in revenue and said he had reduced taxation to that extent, when he increased that taxation by $50,000,000 he should say the same thing, namely that taxation has been increased. But he does not do that, and no one will admit it; we are still told that there is a reduction in taxation. Of all the years since this government have been in power, this year there has been the most taxation revenue, yet the government say, "Cheer for us, boys; we have reduced your taxation." All that has been done, Mr. Speaker, is to shift the burden to somebody else. The taxes have been collected, but the money has been spent by this government. Before taxation can be actually reduced in this country the expenditure must be reduced; that is the whole crux of the situation. According to the minister the revenue this year will amount to $343,000,000, the largest amount since this government assumed office.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): There is more business this year.

Mr. CHAPLIN: And more taxes; I am talking about taxes. I have not noticed any great change in business; there may be a change in connection with wheat but there has been no change in my district. There is more unemployment to-day in my county than there has been in any year during the past ten, and that is saying quite a lot. There are more vacant houses in my district than ever before, and that is also saying something. In saying these things I do not want to deprecate my district but I do not think it does any harm to tell the truth, and I know the same thing has occurred in other cities near me. What is the use of fooling ourselves, when we know the conditions at home? General business may be improving; I do not know whether or not it is, but in my own district I have not noticed any particular increase.

Mr. ODETTE: Is that advertising?

Mr. HOCKEN: That is the truth. You do not want to hear the truth.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Well, I am just doing what the hon. gentleman himself did the other day. I would suggest that seeing he is a new member, one of the pages should go and tell him, that it is forbidden to put advertisements in front of his desk. For a new member he has been advertised about as well as anybody that I know of.

In 1921 the taxable revenue amounted to $368,000,000, but in that year there was $40,000,000 of delayed business war profits taxation. Outside of that one year this is the heaviest taxation year since 1920. And yet hon. gentlemen opposite say that taxation is coming down. There has been a little shifting of income taxation, a lightening of the load here and a putting on a greater load in some other direction. That is all that has occurred.

An hon. MEMBER: The taxation is easier.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I do not know whether it is easier or not. It certainly is easier for members of parliament with an income of $4,000. The taxation was made easier also for those in receipt of smaller salaries. It was made easier also for the salaries that were supposed to be earned by ministers of the crown; they took mighty good care that they came under the lower category. But the widow living on the earnings made by her husband years ago is paying more taxes than she did before. That is how the load has been shifted.

An hon. MEMBER: Three dollars and sixty cents.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It does not make any difference whether it is $3.60 or any other sum. I made the general statement that people of the class referred to paid more and that is true. I repeat, it is simply a case of transferring the load from one set of people to another. The total taxation is $50,000,000 higher than it was two years ago, and yet we are told the taxation is being decreased.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to refer for a few minutes to statements made by the Minister of Finance with respect to imports for Canadian industry as set forth at pages 392 and 393 of Hansard. The minister is there reported as saying:

> A detailed classification of the imports is published in the monthly reports of the Department of Trade and Commerce, but, broadly speaking, it may be said that commodities imported for further manufacture show the most pronounced increases. The following table gives the quantities imported of certain goods, classified for statistical purposes as goods imported for further manufacture—

And so on. The object of putting this on Hansard is to carry out a little political propaganda with a view to showing that more raw materials were being utilized, and more goods in process of manufacture, were being consumed by the people of Canada. Let me refer to just a few of them.

First let me take the case of wool as an example. The Minister of Finance says that the raw wool imported in the nine months of 1926 under review amounted to some eleven million odd dollars.

Mr. ROBB: No, eleven million pounds.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Yes, that is true, eleven million pounds as compared with 9,121,504 pounds in 1925. He did not say that during the same period in 1923 the importations amounted to 13,800,000 pounds. So far as the past two years are concerned we have not gone ahead in the importation of raw materials. What is the position with respect to the total woollen imports? This year they amounted to $36,000,000. In 1922 they were $31,300,000. In other words there has been a falling off in the importation of raw wool, but there has been a gain in the importation of the finished article. I do not know if the minister wished particularly to bring that fact out. At any rate he did not do so, but there it is.

Now let us take another item—I shall refer only to a few of the principal ones—and that is iron ore. The minister told us that our imports of iron ore have increased from 643,043 tons in 1921 to 1,443,874 tons in 1926. Well, all I can say is that for a country which is supposed to be a manufacturing country and where there are millions upon millions of tons of ore lying unutilized, it is a queer commentary for the minister to make that it has increased its imports of iron ore from 643,043 tons to 1,443,874 tons. This government has an invitation from the province of Ontario before it to do something to help the iron industry but it has refrained from doing anything. In that matter this government resembles the seven sleepers, it is still asleep.

The minister also referred to rolling mill products, and he says that the importations have increased enormously. He states that whereas in 1921 the importations amounted to 4,289,497 hundredweight, in 1926 they had increased to 13,780,928 hundredweight, or to put it in tons, from 214,000 tons to 689,000 tons. Now we have rolling mills, I suppose, in almost every province of Canada with the exception of Prince Edward Island, and yet there has been an increase in the importations of rolling mill products of over 400,000 tons as compared with 1921.

Now let us take pigs and ingots of iron. The importations of these have increased from 47,641,400 pounds in 1921 to 81,012,900 pounds in 1926. That is a queer state of affairs in a country where the raw material exists and the necessary facilities for doing work of this kind, are to be found. The minister himself put it on Hansard as something to be more or less proud of.

Another item is copper. Of copper, in the matte or in the raw, we exported practically $10,000,000 worth. We imported of copper products and brass and its products nearly $9,000,000 worth. In other words, we ship our raw product to the United States where it is manufactured, and we bring back to this country about the same quantity of goods, perhaps more, because there may be electrical supplies and matters of that kind, which I have missed.

Another item is zinc which is closely allied to copper. We exported in ore and spelter, some $6,500,000 worth. This is exported principally to the United States and we imported again quite a considerable quantity of spelter zinc in blocks, bars and sheets. Our exportation of the finished product was practically nil. After shipping away our raw material we bring back the finished product.

Another item that appears on the minister's list is automobile engines, and he cites that as a case where goods are imported in order to help in the manufacture of goods in this country. What a commentary, what a statement for a minister of finance to make! He tells us that 7,000 automobile engines were imported into this country in 1921, and 59,000 in 1926. We can make engines in Canada. The minister knows also that in 1921 or since that date a factory to make engines was built in the district from which the hon. member for East Essex (Mr. Odette) comes. Probably $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 were spent on that factory and for the last several years nobody but a caretaker or two has been employed there. This is due to the fact that 7,000 engines were imported a few years ago and now the importations have increased to 59,000 engines. Nearly every one of those engines imported by the concern that owns that factory could have been made there. It is in the power of the Minister of Finance to have those engines made in this country.

Mr. ODETTE: Has the tariff been reduced on automobile engines since 1921?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Most decidedly.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Why not? But the Minister of Finance will not say that, and I will give the reason.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): On automobile engines? On finished cars, yes.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Automobile engines. If the factory that is making the car can comply with the condition requiring 50 per cent to be made in Canada, then the manufacturer will get a further rebate and that rebate is a reduction in duty. The Minister of Finance will not say what my hon. friend has said.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is correct as regards the finished product.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I repeat that the Minister of Finance has it in his power to make that factory run. All he has to do is to require a slightly greater percentage to be manufactured in Canada. I am not afraid to say to him that I give him credit for having put that manufacturing requirement into effect. I said that to him one day in conversation, and I said further: I will not tell you that on the floor of the House. But I say this now, that when you believe a thing is right, you are entitled to say so. I am neither afraid nor ashamed to tell the minister that he is going in the right direction. I will tell him further that he can have more of these engines manufactured in Canada if that is what he wants, and that without increasing the price to the consumer.

Mr. ROBB: I know my hon. friend is well posted in this subject. I had an idea that the 50 per cent clause of last year would compel the manufacture of engines in Canada. I should like to know if it has had that effect.

Mr. CHAPLIN: As the minister probably knows, the 50 per cent clause has not yet come into effect and we have to wait until we see what actually happens. I am not going to prophesy what will happen.

Mr. ROBB: It comes into effect to-morrow, does it not?

Mr. CHAPLIN: It was 40 per cent last year and that continues until April 1. After the first of April, for the following year the 50 per cent clause comes into effect. I shall be able to tell him better a little later whether it has the desired effect or not. I am not at present able to say, but I hope it will have the desired effect. Evidently the manufacturers are not all figuring that it will, or they would probably have started to get ready at their plants to do something. That is the only thing I have to say in reference to it.

It is almost incredible that a country such as Canada, with the facilities we have, should have to import goods of this kind. I know how the people of the United States feel about this country, and how they feel about using it as a market for their wares. In a report published by the United States Department of Commerce there appears on page 279 a statement, a brief extract from which I should like to read:

> Since 1920 a considerable increase has taken place in the amount of industrial capital invested in Canada, and the largest part of this increase has been absorbed by American investors. This is especially true of certain industries, notably pulp and paper. In addition, the nickel and asbestos production of Canada, as well as many of its timber products, are now controlled by Americans.

In the same edition there is another paragraph that I should like to quote:

> Economically and socially Canada may be considered as a northern extension of the United States, and our trade with Canada is in many respects more like domestic trade than our foreign trade with other countries. The movement of industrial raw materials from Canada into the United States and the return flow of a miscellaneous assortment of partly or wholly manufactured goods is not unlike a similar flow between the west and south, and the most industrialized northeastern part of the United States.

That is what the United States people want. They want to buy our raw material and to sell us the manufactured product. If we are ever going to build up a country worth while, we must have diversified industries. We cannot have one thing alone. We are separated from the United States by a border line which our workers can pass by easily. We in this country who employ labour must pay approximately the wages that are paid in the United States because, if our factory is within ten or twenty miles of the border line and we do not pay those rates, those men will simply move across the line. Consequently you have to pay approximately what they pay there. Now I ask this question: If you have to pay wages that approximate the wages in the United States, how can you allow goods to be imported into this country from Germany or France, or even from England—from Germany, where the wages are one-quarter of what they are here, from France, where they are one-third, or from England where the wages are one-half of what they are here? It simply cannot be done. Then it is a question for us to decide whether we should do away with our manufactures and simply buy in the cheapest market. That might suit certain parts of the country; it undoubtedly would suit certain parts of the country.

Mr. MILLAR: What parts?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Is the hon. gentleman asking that question for information or just to be talking?

Mr. MILLAR: I want information.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Surely he would know that in places where there were no manufactures that would be likely to happen.

Mr. MILLAR: Name one part where they have that desire.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Right in my county I have nine townships of farmers, besides the city, and I know what the farmers there want.

Mr. MILLAR: They would like to see the manufacturers go?

Mr. CHAPLIN: No, indeed, they would not; not at all.

Mr. MILLAR: Name one that does.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I do not say that anybody desires such a thing. What I say is that that would happen if my hon. friend who has just spoken were to carry out to the letter what he has signed and sealed in a pledge given to his party before he came here.

Mr. MILLAR: Oh, no.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Oh, yes.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Mr. Speaker, before recess I had about concluded my remarks as to what would happen if we had an all-round reduction in the tariff according to the farmers' platform. Undoubtedly many of our manufacturers would be put out of business. My hon. friend who interrupted me just as I was closing (Mr. Millar) said that nobody on that side of the House desired such a thing to happen. I believe him. But I say that that is what would happen if the farmers' platform were put into effect.

An hon. MEMBER: Make it higher.

Mr. CHAPLIN: If you made it higher you have the assurance that more American factories would come into this country, with the net result that the price of the goods they manufactured would be cheaper to us.

Mr. DIONNE: Will you allow me a question? If you make the tariff higher, when you fall down you will fall correspondingly lower.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Mr. Speaker, that is a wonderful question! It is very much like some other questions with which the time of the House has been consumed to absolutely no purpose. Naturally, Mr. Speaker, if the people who are now engaged in industries are deprived of employment they will have to seek some other work. Probably my friend from Saskatchewan who interrupted me just before recess would object to their going on the land.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. CHAPLIN: When there was a much larger representation of the Progressive group on this side of the House than there is today I very well remember how hon. members from Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba year after year advised the Minister of Immigration not to bring in any more immigrants.

An hon. MEMBER: We had a good Liberal government.

Mr. CHAPLIN: That was when the advice was given.

An hon. MEMBER: It must be getting better.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I am glad my hon. friend was not here at the time. I know the advice then tendered to the government by gentlemen of the Progressive group was: Do not bring in any more immigrants because we have enough on the land now. But my friends would like to see Canadian workmen taken out of our factories and put on the land, otherwise they would have to seek a living in the United States. A good many of our people have left the country owing to the reductions that have already been made in the tariff, and if any further reductions are made more of them will have to go across the line. If the farmers' platform or the Liberal platform of 1919 were put into effect the same thing would happen. My hon friend from Saskatoon (Mr. Young) said this afternoon that those two platforms were pretty nearly alike, and the Liberals and Progressives in the West do not argue about them. They reserve their argument for this House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to refer to what some of my friends had to say this afternoon anent my remarks respecting the member for Macleod (Mr. Coote). They seemed to think that I had not been fair in my criticism of him. I suppose they will not question what the member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) said about the speech of the hon. member for Macleod. In the course of her address last Tuesday she referred to that speech and built an argument upon it. These are her words:

> In the course of his speech yesterday the member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) gave the proportions of our exports, fifty-six per cent being agricultural and forty-four per cent representing other exports, partly manufactured goods.

Now, I should like to know from my friends who do not entirely approve of my criticism of the hon. member for Macleod whether or not the hon. member for Southeast Grey correctly interpreted what he meant. That is all there is to that. I do not want anybody in this House to think that I have made a charge against any member which is not proper, and if it can be shown that I have done so I shall be the first to get up and apologize.

In closing I want to say just a word or two regarding the result of some of the treaties that this government has put its hand to. We have discussed the treaty with France which we have had on the statute books for a number of years, and I want to direct attention to some of the latest consequences of that agreement. Of the nine months of the present year ending December 31 we bought from France $17,346,000 worth of goods, whereas during the same period we sold them around $7,000,000 worth. During the full fiscal year 1925 we bought from them $18,500,000 and sold them $10,500,000. When this treaty was entered into, imports and exports were practically on a level; to-day our imports from France have increased except for a few items, while a long list of goods we formerly sold them has vanished from our export returns. To-day we sell them wheat and sugar, wood pulp, salmon, lobsters and a few ores such as lead and cobalt, as well as asbestos, coal and tar. In addition to these we sell them two items of manufactured goods, rubber tires and, to some extent, agricultural implements. But goods that we formerly supplied to France, goods that were embodied in the treaty, enumerated by the hundreds, we no longer sell to that country. We are selling to France only the purest raw material while we are buying from them an increased amount of goods, chiefly luxuries, on which we deliberately reduced the duties in order to facilitate the importation of them into Canada. This reduction in duty is now costing the treasury of the country between three and four million dollars, counting in the goods from other countries that came in to take advantage of the French treaty. That is what the treaty with France has cost us. If it is a matter of sentiment and not of business, by all means let us trade with France on that basis; but if we have an eye to business, then I contend that the treaty is bad. I so described it at the time the treaty was drawn up. I said before it came into effect that it would be harmful and it has turned out that way without question. The then Minister of Marine, now Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), who made the treaty, told us at the time wonderful stories about the butter and other commodities we would sell to France. But there has not been a pound of butter sold. At any rate, we have not sold enough of that article to make a smell in a pan. Our trade in cheese is gone and the milk we used to sell to France in canned form we are no longer selling.

We have the latest treaty, the one with Australia, which deserves a comment or two. A year or so ago we taxed ourselves on raisins and currants to the extent of two and a half or three cents a pound. Our friends from the west seem to think it an awful thing as they say, to tax ourselves for the benefit of the manufacturers at home, but in this case we taxed ourselves for the benefit of people in Australia. That is the difference. We pay taxes on four million pounds of currants, and with an advantage of three cents or nearly three cents Australia last year sold us, out of this quantity, 561,000 pounds. During the same period we imported 34,000,000 pounds of raisins, taxing ourselves for the benefit of Australia, and that country sold us less than 1,000,000 pounds out of that enormous quantity. My hon. friends who kicked about this country paying a tribute as they call it, to manufacturers at home do not object to our taxing ourselves for the benefit of Australia. And that is precisely what we have done. We made a treaty in order to facilitate the entry of Australian butter into this market. For the year 1926 there came from Australia nearly 3,000,000 pounds of butter and from New Zealand a little over that quantity. In January of this year we imported from New Zealand 729,000 pounds of butter. I have not the figures for Australia for this month—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is none from Australia.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I could not get the returns. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up any more of the time of the House, but I desire to thank hon. members for the courteous attention with which they have followed me.

Mr. JACOBS: Before the hon. member sits down, will he explain how it is that two members of the administration of which he was a member voted last summer for the Australian treaty?

Mr. CHAPLIN: I find it difficult enough to answer questions regarding myself without having to answer for others.

Mr. JACOBS: My hon. friend knows something about the joint and several responsibility of governments.

Mr. CHAPLIN: We do not see anything of it over there.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): From appearances the debate on the budget is drawing to a close, or at any rate is on the last lap. The government, to the best of its ability, has defended its inaction and its reaction, and the party to my right has criticised the budget in the usual manner and put forward its ideas. The group with which I am associated has done likewise. All that I would wish to say on the budget has therefore been already said by my colleagues in this section of the chamber, and I regard the repetition of arguments about as tiresome when it comes from a number of persons as when it comes from an individual. For that reason it is essential for me to make some explanation as to why I venture to speak at all at this time. My object in rising is mainly to reply to an attack which was made by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) on the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) in respect of the speech he delivered the other evening. Not only did the minister attack the hon. member in a more or less personal way, but he also attacked the entire farmers' movement, and particularly the group to which I belong. That speech was made on Thursday night last, and it was of such a character that it did not do justice to the argument of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland); it did not add much credit to the minister who made the attack nor did it reflect much credit on the government in the defence of which he spoke. I think the attack was regrettable, not only because we expected something better from the minister but also because the minister was very well qualified, if he had so chosen, to defend the government and answer the arguments of the hon. member on a much higher plane than he selected. I am bound to concede at the outset of my remarks that in natural gifts as well as in long experience in public life the Minister of Railways is one of the outstanding men in Canadian public life to-day. He was elevated from that obscurity with which I think most immigrants find themselves surrounded to the position of premier of his province, and after serving with considerable distinction in that honoured position he was called to take charge of that most important department which he now directs. These facts emphasize the ability of the hon. gentleman and also mark the fact that his fellow citizens have recognized that ability. With his great gifts and his opportunities to gain knowledge, together with his long experience in public life, we expected a great deal from him when he rose in his seat to explain the budget and to give the reasons for the inaction on the part of the government in implementing their program of promises to the Canadian people. His failure to so much as refer to some of the questions of public importance, after his attention was drawn to them by the hon. member for Bow River, is to be regretted, but the nature and spirit of his reply is even more to be regretted. I was personally very much astonished at the attitude the minister took, the more so because of the exalted opinion of the minister held by the public generally.

First of all I think he escaped from the argument under cover of a smoke screen of his own creation; his flight from the field of argument was anything but dignified, and will not enhance his reputation as a statesman. His smoke screen consisted of a charge, the words of which I want to read. Speaking of the hon. member for Bow River he said:

> . . . my hon. friend's speech was replete with reflections upon the honesty of the motives of other members of the House. I am content in that regard to abide by the record of Hansard.

I am not sure about the imputing of motives; I think it is a rather delicate line to draw, because I notice that in most criticisms of one party made by another, if one should analyze them carefully motives would be found imputed in most cases. Indeed, there may be times when motives are so obvious and so pernicious that they should be pointed out. On the whole, I think a very good rule to observe in this House is to refrain as far as possible from imputing improper motives to any hon. member, and I am certainly in agreement with the minister in attempting to maintain that position. I have read very carefully the speech of the hon. member for Bow River, however, and since the minister said he would call Hansard to witness I wanted to ask him a question. I am sorry he is not now in his seat, but perhaps some of his colleagues will find a single sentence in the speech of the hon. member for Bow River which can be said to impute a motive to any hon. member of this House. I think when the minister was speaking he imagined that he was dealing with the Liberal platform and he spoke in the most general and all-comprehensive terms. When we come to examine Hansard, however, which he called to witness, we cannot find a single statement which would justify the speech he made. On the contrary I point out to the minister that he did the very thing with which he charged the hon. member for Bow River. I am not going to make a blanket charge; I will make it specific, and I will quote the actual words used by the minister. At page 637 of Hansard, referring to the hon. member for Bow River, he says:

> My hon. friend does love to rock the boat when it is perfectly safe to do so.

Not content with that, a more or less ambiguous statement, the minister enters into a thorough explanation and points out that last year the hon. member for Bow River refrained from rocking the boat because he was afraid he might rock it over, but this year he is attacking the government and supporting an amendment against the government budget because he feels certain that no matter how much he rocks the boat it will not go over. That is imputing a rather base motive to the hon. member for Bow River, more particularly when that gentleman assisted to rock over two boats not a year ago. But let us proceed to the next statement of the minister, at page 638 of Hansard, when he was dealing with the alleged brick for brick policy of the Conservative party. This is what he said in that regard:

> Evidently it has been abandoned in view of the much-heralded attempt to capture votes in western Canada by holding a big convention in Winnipeg next October.

Is not that imputing motives to the Conservative party, of abandoning its policy in order to get votes through this convention. Then on page 640, in answer to a question of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) and referring to the Conservative party, the minister said:

> Every one of them has some pet industry for which he wants to have higher protection.

I am rather surprised that hon. gentlemen to my right stood so quiet under that charge, directly imputing that every individual member of the Conservative party had the basest motives which could be attributed by one man to another. Yet the minister had the temerity to charge the imputing of motives in the same speech in which he said these things about another hon. member of this House. In concluding his speech the Minister of Railways, as reported at page 642 of Hansard,—I think he had a sort of feeling that he had gone a little bit too far—said:

> We could debate these matters like gentlemen, but it is pretty difficult to debate like a gentleman with men who consistently take the ground that your motives for differing with them are unworthy motives and objects of suspicion.

I have only one reply to make to that, Mr. Speaker, and it is that a gentleman does not usually find it difficult to be a gentleman no matter how ungentlemanly his opponents may be. As a matter of fact it is only under those circumstances that we find out who the gentleman is.

There is one reason why I take the trouble to answer the minister, and it is to draw to the attention of this House and to the attention of the country the reply which a statesman made in defence of the present government. I want to re-present the arguments which were so eloquently put forward by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), and to draw to the attention of the House the reply which the minister gave. Then I want those outside of this House, as well as those inside of it, to read these speeches and see whether the Minister of Railways actually answered the argument or not. Meanwhile I hope the Minister of Railways will never adopt similar tactics again in reply to the hon. member for Bow River or any other hon. member.

I want to follow the main points of the argument made by the hon. member for Bow River in order to show that the reply given was not satisfactory, that the points the minister did attempt to reply to were unsatisfactorily answered, and that his eloquent silence on other points is something worthy of note. The hon. member for Bow River opened his remarks by charging that the present budget was a rich man's budget, and he also referred to the reduction in income tax as the reduction feature of the budget. He went on to argue that since the income tax is paid only by those who have sufficient income to come within the scope of the act, it goes without saying that the reduction in the income tax will favour those who are most wealthy, and indeed it does not affect the poorer classes of the community at all. That was the basis of his charge, that it was a rich man's budget. But what did the minister reply to that? It is an extremely interesting reply; it is worthy of contemplation and profound study. His first argument was that it is very difficult to apply the income tax, so difficult to apply indeed that it is an unsurmountable problem. He quoted, I think, from some individual farmer whom he did not mention and that individual farmer went on to say that "we go to forty dollars' worth of time and trouble to find out that we owe the government $10." Now let me refer the minister to the propaganda of the Liberal party. What does that propaganda say about the tariff tax? Does the hon. minister mean to say that the tariff tax is more easily imposed, more easily and more cheaply collected than the income tax? I think I have read somewhere in Liberal propaganda that it takes $3 to collect $1 of revenue from the tariff tax. If the minister wants to get away from that difficulty of collection he had better abolish the tariff entirely. But if he really wants to find out how easy it is to collect the income tax, I would advise him to go over to Great Britain and have an interview with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I imagine that he will get some very sound advice on that question.

But the next reply that he made to this argument is even more fantastic. On page 640 of Hansard the Minister of Railways is reported as saying that they revised this income tax in the interest of the farmers, and he went on to observe:

> I will be frank enough to say that one of the reasons why I personally favoured an increase in the exemption from income tax to the present level was my conviction that it would automatically eliminate from the sphere of operation of the tax a very large proportion of the farmers of Canada.

Now I appreciate this conviction which the minister had, but I would have appreciated it very much more if he had acquainted us with the process of reasoning by which he arrived at it. He says that under the present tax a farmer spends $40 worth of time in discovering that he owes the government $10. The minister now proposes to reduce the tax by ten per cent which will mean that the farmer will spend $40 and find out that he owes the government $1. And then the hon. gentleman tells us that this reduction was made in the interests of the farmers. The minister did not wipe the thing out so that the farmers would not come under its operation. They have got to make a report to the government officials to discover whether they owe anything under this ten per cent reduction or not, just as they did before. Therefore the reason the minister acted in the interests of the farmer is so obscure, to say the least, that I am unable to detect the hon. gentleman's reasoning. I think he could have done better by increasing the amount of exemption and then increasing the amount of taxation upon the amount fixed. In that way perhaps he would have helped the farmers to better advantage.

Now if the finances of the Dominion warrant tax reduction, a reduction should have been made first of that taxation which falls more heavily upon the mass of the people, that tax which is a decided burden to the agricultural population at the present time—that of the tariff. More especially should this have been done when to accomplish such reduction is one of the professed policies of the Liberal party. The tariff question is the hobby-horse of Canadian politics. I have never ridden that hobby; I refuse to straddle that antiquated mechanism. But in the interests of political honesty we are bound to insist that the present administration either implement the promises that they have made to the Canadian people from time to time. and justify their adherence to a policy of tariff reduction, or else frankly admit that it cannot be done or that they will not do it. The Liberal party surely will not deny that it has committed itself, in the eloquent words of the Prime Minister, to "a downward revision policy." I think that that right hon. gentleman also drafted the chart which led down gradually from the high tariff of the Conservative party to the free trade policy which is peculiar to the Liberals. That chart they started to follow, but through some strange, unexplained reason, they have suddenly abandoned it. It is true that under pressure of the Progressive group in the last parliament they attempted an experiment by reducing the tariff taxes on automobiles, and indeed it was that reduction of automobile taxation that enabled the present party on the right of the Speaker to come into power. During the last election whenever a Conservative candidate mentioned anything about Customs scandal, the Liberal candidate jumped into one of these automobiles and scurried for his life, and the Liberals thereby got into power. I am not, however, overlooking the charge of the Conservative party that the tax reduction on automobiles reduced the revenue of the country, which reduction had to be made up by taxing everybody else that much more; nor am I forgetting the charge that the automobile industry obtained certain concessions which offset the tariff reductions. That is another part of the question which I am not addressing myself to now.

I am content for the present to take the words of the Minister of Finance on this question. He very clearly pointed out that the direct effect of that reduction was that the government collected more revenue and that the automobile industry flourished. That is what the Liberals always contended would happen when they reduced taxes. The minister was, I imagine, very glad to be able to report that what they had anticipated was so in fact. They gained more revenue by reducing the tax and the automobile industry flourished. Does the Minister of Finance know that there are in Canada a number of industries that would like to get some of that prosperity? Does he not know also that the finances of this country could stand a little more of that revenue coming in so handily and that the people of Canada would be pleased to get at a lower price the goods which these industries are manufacturing? That is the question that I want the government to answer, the question which the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) ran away from when it was placed before him by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland)? I want any member of the government to answer that question now or to answer it some time before this debate closes.

If they were telling the truth about the automobile business—and I am not for one moment doubting their word—that by the reduction in the tariff on automobiles more automobiles were sold, the business flourished and the taxes collected amounted to more than previously, what is the excuse which the government offers for not repeating that in regard to other industries? That is a reasonable question. It grows out of the professed policy of the government itself; it actually flows out of the philosophy of the Liberal party, and we want to know why they have retarded this prosperity by their inaction. That question still remains to be answered, and I hope the Minister of Railways, when he speaks from now on regarding any question relating to the tariff, will do what he did not do the other day, and answer it to the satisfaction of the House. Now I ask that the government either follow the chart towards the lower tariff goal or frankly state that such a policy cannot be followed.

Some hon. members speaking in this debate said that the present budget was a Conservative budget. I disagree with that. I think this is a typically Liberal budget. It has been defended by a typical Liberal and the policy which the minister announced is also typically Liberal. The budget is typically Liberal becauses it does not do one thing that can be defended from the point of view of Liberal philosophy. If this had been a Conservative budget brought in by Conservatives, I will give them this credit at least to say that they would have defended it on the ground that the industries of Canada required such protection, and rightly or wrongly, very probably wrongly, they would have defended that to the last ditch. But when we ask a Liberal government to defend this budget, what do they say? The last speaker on the Liberal side (Mr. Young, Saskatoon) said that the Minister of Finance was too tired to lower the tariff. The Minister of Railways said that they did not have time to lower the tariff. They had time to leave it alone, did they not? These are petty excuses, unworthy of the history of Liberalism, unworthy of great Liberals, and I think if hon. gentlemen opposite had an eye to the future, they would thank us for endeavouring to press them to be true to their own philosophy. Those are, I say, unworthy subterfuges, unworthy of the hon. gentlemen advancing them.

But a more characteristic excuse even than these was advanced by the Minister of Railways. In reply to the hon. member for Bow River, he said that the second reason why the tariff had not been reduced in this budget was that they did not have all the facts. He charged the hon. member for Bow River with being the type of man who wants the tariff reduced whether he has the facts or not, and he charged this whole group with being of a similar character. We do not mind the minister's raillery, if I may use his own word; but I ask the minister and the government this question If that is the reason why they have not altered the tariff, would it not have been far better if the Liberal party had taken that attitude fifty years ago? It is a fine time now to tell us that they cannot alter the tariff because they have not the facts. Would it not have been better if they had secured the facts before they formulated a policy?

If we look at the literature which their publicists issued in the last election, did they tell the people of Canada: Oh, after we have all the facts we shall see what we can do with this tariff business? Did their candidates say to the people of the west: Oh, after we have all the facts, we will sit down, scratch our heads for a while and see if we can take a little bit off here and add a little bit on there? They did not do that. They went out on a low tariff policy. They did not say: Our tariff policy will depend on the facts and we have not gathered them yet. I am not objecting to the facts being secured; I think it would be a splendid thing to get the facts, but I am simply pointing out to the minister that if he is going to get stuck on facts now, it would have been better if he had got stuck on them a long time ago because far less misrepresentation would then have followed the course of the Liberal party.

Let me now turn to the master apologia of the minister. With that characteristic flourish of his he said: What would have happened if we had actually taken action on flake calcium chloride, nail kegs, Epsom salts, foxes and canaries? He said: Hon. members of this assembly, what would have happened if we had taken action on those things? Well, what would have happened? What is going to happen now that the hon. gentleman did not take action on these foxes and canaries? The foxes have holes and the canaries have nests, but the farmers of Canada are unable to pay anything on income tax because their incomes are not big enough. Therefore I think it would have been wise if the minister had not made that remark, which is rather unbecoming and which would seem to indicate that either he took the subject less seriously than a man in his position should, or perhaps we may have overestimated his ability. We are left to guess at the policy now to be followed by the Liberal party, and my guess is as good as anybody else's. I want to make three guesses as to what is going to happen to this Liberal policy henceforth, and I am going to guess so comprehensively that I do not think I can be wrong.

My first guess is that this government, when it came to make up its budget for 1927, discovered that the tariff as left by the Conservative government some years ago was the best kind of tariff for the people of Canada. They discovered that they could not disturb that tariff without disturbing the industries of Canada, and so in the best interests of industry, and in the best interests of the people, they refrained from touching the tariff at all. But having discovered that, they would not come to parliament and so state, because if they had done so they would have openly acknowledged the virtue of the Conservative policy, and would have given hostages to their enemy with a vengeance. That is my first guess. I do not know whether it is right or not, and so I am going to cover the field of guessing as to what the government's policy is.

My next guess is that the government, when it started to make up its budget for this year, was convinced that the policy of the Liberal party, that of a revision downwards of the tariff from time to time, was the best policy, and that they sincerely desired to put it into effect; but when they actually came to make up the budget and to implement their policy by tariff reduction they found they could not do it for one of two reasons; one being that they had so many high tariff men in their ranks that they did not dare to lower the tariff, or else this is my second guess —there was so much influence outside the party as to prevent the government taking the action they had promised to take. If that be right, then I argue that the government of the day should have risked its policy on a vote in parliament, should have gone out of power honourably, if need be, and come back with renewed strength to carry out its policy, rather than sit quietly and do nothing but make apologies to the people of Canada for having failed.

I do not know whether the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) or the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Lavigueur) is speaking for the government in this matter, but I rather suspect that the latter gentleman was giving the true policy of the Liberal party when he spoke, and I think his opening remarks are very significant. I wish to quote them in support of one of my guesses. The hon. gentleman says:

> I consider it an honour to follow the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail), the only lady in the House of Commons, although I do not share her views generally, and particularly so far as the tariff is concerned. She has told us she is absolutely in favour of a low tariff; let me assure her that neither the province from which I come nor I myself can sympathize with her in that regard. We are in favour of protection for industry; we do not believe in a low tariff. I am glad to have an opportunity to-night to state my views on the tariff question. I am pleased to see that the budget this year contains no items of reduction.

I think you will agree with me that my guess number two is a good one, but if that is so, the Liberal party cannot expect to go on forever in that position. There will come a time when they will have to make a break, and they might as well make it now. If the Liberal party has so many high tariff men in its ranks, let them go to the high tariff party, and let the Liberal party, if it is going to stand for anything, come out and stand for it.

There is another possible explanation, although the Minister of Railways denied this emphatically in answer to a question put by the hon. member for Bow River. This guess is that the government intends henceforth to leave tariff adjustments to the advice of the Tariff Advisory Board, and to abandon the policy of downward revisions of the tariff, because if they leave it to the advice of the tariff board there might be an upward revision; we do not know what kind of revision the board will recommend. There is my third guess.

Personally—I am speaking purely for myself, and not for my group at all in this matter —I think that the latter course would be preferable to the one that is now being followed. I do not think that there can be any less hope of a tariff board finding a solution of the tariff question than we can have in either of the old parties finding it. Personally, I have absolutely no faith in either the Liberal party or the Conservative party finding a solution of the tariff problem. They have had sixty years to do it, and will any hon.

gentleman in this House say that we are any nearer to a solution of it now than we were then? We are more hopelessly lost now than ever before. Not one step of real progress can be said to have been taken. Therefore I say, optimistic as I usually am, I am not optimistic enough to continue having faith in the parties in this regard.

May I take the opportunity here, Mr. Speaker, to point out what appears to me to be a very grave danger indeed to Canada, arising from the historic conflict between the Conservatives and the Liberals over the tariff? We are beginning to reap to-day the fruits of the propaganda and of the historic struggle between the two old parties on this matter. We have developed undoubtedly what is known to-day as a west and an east. That is not a geographical division; it is a division of sentiment; it is a division of the people more distinct than could be effected by geography. That division has largely come about through the propaganda of these two parties which I address to-night in this House. Canada, I say, is divided between east and west. The farmers and manufacturers are at loggerheads. We have a struggle between what has been called by some hon. member of this House the robbed and the robbers. Whoever the robbers are, I am not supposed to know, but that is the type of propaganda. Rightly or wrongly, the manufacturers of Canada have been represented in a very bad light by the Liberal propaganda. No later than this afternoon I heard an hon. gentleman opposite stand up and make a charge against the manufacturers of this country. That is the kind of thing that the farmers of Canada have been told for a great many years. They have been told that the manufacturers of this country are interested only in making huge profits at the expense of the farmers, and that the tariff is the means by which those profits are made. The farmers to a very great extent believe that. The farmers say, to use a word that the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans) is rather fond of using, that the tariff is a diabolical outrage and an imposition. The farmers regard the tariff as it was characterized in the motion of non-confidence that was moved by the Liberal party in the last session of parliament when the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen took office, as being prejudicial to national unity. I wonder whether the party of the hon. gentleman who this afternoon castigated the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) for the attitude which he took at that time now believes what was then put in that resolution? If the tariff is still prejudicial to the unity of Canada why is not my hon. friend protesting?

[Mr. Irvine.]

Mr. SMITH (Stormont): Would the hon. gentleman be good enough to tell me whether he or any other member of his group have laid before the tariff board any cases for consideration?

Mr. IRVINE: No so far as I know. That is not our business.

Mr. SMITH (Stormont): Why not?

Mr. IRVINE: We are not sent here to lay cases before the tariff board. We are not here seeking to prejudice the board in arriving at a decision on the facts presented to it. We are prepared to lay before the board any information that it may call upon us to furnish.

The Conservative party espouses more or less the cause of the manufacturers, and has regarded the farmers, in the words of one of the Toronto members, as narrow and selfish. The result of this propaganda is that we have political enmity where there should be friendship. We have class war where there should be coöperation. Now that this class war and these east and west factions are beginning to take form, I note a tendency on the part of certain gentlemen outside of this House to make long after-dinner speeches on unity. I think the House will agree with me that it will take more than a few after-dinner speeches, inspired by choice viands and a glass of champagne, to offset sixty years of the type of propaganda to which I have referred. Ever since the days of Sir John A. Macdonald up to the present time the propaganda of the Liberal party has been such as to lead the agricultural population in Canada to believe that our manufacturers are just so many profiteers who use the tariff as an easy way to make money. On the other hand, the Conservative party has taken up the cudgels on behalf of the manufacturers and has spoken of the farmer as being selfish and narrow—more inclined to look after his own class than to regard the welfare of the nation as a whole.

Frankly, I believe that the tariff as now imposed falls more heavily on the agricultural population than on any other class of the Dominion, nevertheless the two old parties have failed to bring any relief or to settle the question in a satisfactory way. In fact they have proved their ability to unsettle rather than to settle it. For this reason I believe that the tariff board could not possibly do worse than what the Liberal or Conservative parties have already accomplished. But if the tariff board is not the proper body to settle the problem then let me suggest to the organized farmers of Canada outside of parliament and to the organized manufacturers of Canada outside of parliament that they take this matter in their own hands and settle it as it should be settled. There is no doubt about it that our farmers and manufacturers must learn to work together if Canada is ever to amount to anything, and while we leave this major grievance as a football for political parties we are only inciting strife and driving these classes further apart. Therefore I say to the farmers and to the manufacturers of Canada that if the two historic parties will not take the tariff question out of the field of political conflict they themselves should do so and settle it as their own affair. I believe that it can be done, I believe that it must be done. In this connection I want to quote briefly from Wells' latest book, The World of William Clissold:

> I believe that if we can sufficiently develop the consciousness of contemporary business and associate with it the critical coöperation and the coöperative criticism of scientific and every other sort of able man, we can weave a world system of monetary and economic activities, while the politicians, the diplomatists and soldiers are still too busy with their ancient and habitual antics to realize what we are doing.

If that can be done in international affairs, I am sure it will be much more simple to achieve in Canadian affairs, and so I hope that the Conservative party and the Liberal party will cease this old meaningless bickering over the tariff question. Let them place it in the hands of the ablest committee or board that can be formed, and let those men approach it from the point of view of science, let them cease dividing east and west upon this question. The tariff question is prejudicial to national unity only so long as it is made a matter of conflict between our major political parties.

Now let me come to the next question which the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) dealt with. He presented this query direct to the minister:

> Is the House to take it as the declared policy of the government that it will not reduce the tariff until after the board has reported favouring a reduction?

Immediately the Minister of Railways denies that that is the policy of the government. The hon. member for Bow River thereupon presses his question. Instead of answering it the minister says:

> I have allowed my hon. friend to make at least six speeches.

That is his answer to a most important question. Following this up, the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Glen)—a new member in this House, and apparently very anxious to treat the government fairly, at the same time seeking to pay due regard to the principles upon which he was elected—asks this question:

> I take it from what the minister said, in reply to my address of yesterday asking for some assurance from the government in the matter, that the policy of the government is in the direction of lower tariffs, and that it is not the intention to abolish the income tax as a permanent fiscal instrument. Am I right in assuming that?

The hon. Minister of Railways replies:

> My hon. friend must not put words in my mouth.

Of course, I think he was trying to put some ideas into the minister's head. Heaven knows he did not need anybody to put words in his mouth; he has lots of them! But that is the answer that a minister of the crown gives to one who is very anxious to lend his support to the government. Is there any assurance in that answer that the government is going to continue its tariff reduction policy? Surely the hon. member for Marquette will not be so easily gulled as to think there is any such assurance.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Was that the only answer that the hon. Minister of Railways made to the hon. member?

Mr. IRVINE: So far as I know. Here is Hansard if the hon. gentleman can find a better answer.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): If the hon. gentleman will read Hansard he will soon find other answers.

Mr. IRVINE: Will you give them to me?

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): The hon. member should read the full statement of the Minister of Railways if he would be fair to him.

Mr. McMILLAN: You look only for what you want to find. You are not trying to find facts.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. IRVINE: My hon. friend is talking as a Liberal. Now I want to move to another stage of the argument. The member for Bow River said that the income tax was a war tax and he argued that as such it should not be reduced, and certainly should not be abolished so long as we had not paid the war debt. That at least is a reasonable suggestion. He went on to show that $162,922,000 is called for annually as an expenditure due entirely to the war, and while we have to spend that vast sum each year on account of the war surely it is reasonable that the income tax, which takes more from the people who are able to pay than from others who are not so well off, should have been maintained towards the payment of that annual charge. What answer did the minister give to this? I hope my hon. friend who asked the question a moment ago will look up Hansard and see whether he can find the minister's answer, because I have not found any answer to that question at all. The minister does refer to Epsom salts and canaries and foxes, but a little item like $162,000,000 as an annual expenditure due to the war does not come within the purview of the hon. gentleman.

Again, the member for Bow River attempted to defend the farmers of Canada against the charge of evading the income tax, and he advanced the explanation that the only reason the farmers did not pay as much in the way of income tax as other people paid was that the farmers did not receive incomes large enough to come within the scope of the act. Which is one of the best reasons I can think of. In this connection the member for Bow River challenged the minister to make an investigation and to give publicity, if necessary, to all the details, and to reveal the whole truth of the matter with a view to exonerating the farmers from this charge, which has been so generally made by the press and by hon. members. Again the minister is eloquently silent.

Next, the member for Bow River charged that the party system is corrupt, and in support of that charge he referred to the evidence taken before the commission appointed by the Liberal party, from which evidence he quoted. The hon. member hight have referred, if he did not do so, to the recent scandals in Athabaska and Peace River. He did, however, allude to the significant words of the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) who on one occasion discussed the question. Then the member for Bow River demanded an investigation into campaign funds, pointing out that, according to our Election Act, corporations were not permitted to make contributions to party expenses, although, in face of this provision, certain corporations, as disclosed in the evidence to which he referred, did make very heavy contributions to funds of the Liberal party. He asked the minister to have that matter investigated. Indeed, he went further than that; he desired to have all campaign funds investigated, including of course those of the farmer members as well as of the rest. Again the minister has nothing whatever to say.

[Mr. Irvine.]

The minister proceeds to state his real object for rising to speak. I quote his words as they are found at page 642 of Hansard:

> My object was merely to set forth as clearly as possible what the tariff policy of the Liberal party is.

That is exactly what we wanted the minister to do. I suggest that it is just possible that the people of Canada know what the Liberal party's policy is about as well as the minister does; and perhaps one of his difficulties some of these days will be the discovery of that fact. There is no doubt in the minds of the Canadian people as to what the Liberal party's policy is: the whole trouble is the inaction of that party. What is wrong is the failure of the Liberal party to implement its policy. The minister goes on to advance the new policy of the Liberal party. I think it was the great Francis Bacon who remarked once something to this effect, that it is of the nature of the mind of man to revel in specious generalities even to the prejudice of truth. And if ever there was a time when that saying was true, it is today in relation to the new policy of the Liberal party. Let me read the statement of that policy:

> We shall move forward cautiously with the aid of knowledge of the facts secured by the Tariff Advisory Board toward the goal of making our tariff structure bear as lightly as possible on production, industry, and the people generally, having always in view the greater prosperity of all the legitimate industries of Canada.

I do not think hon. gentlemen to my right would mind voting for that policy. It is an all-inclusive principle, a typically Liberal platform. It is propaganda, not practical policy. It will read well on the prairies and many people will say, "What splendid statesmen we must have in Ottawa. No doubt this year they will reduce the tariff very materially." Well, anybody could make a statement like this; it calls for no specific action. I would, however, observe this about it; it will have the effect of allaying any fears which might arise among those who are alleged to enjoy protection, for they are assured here that there is not going to be any great hurry in removing tariff barriers. It is going to be done very slowly. I have no objection to moving slowly and cautiously, but I certainly have a great objection to standing still when we ought to be moving. And the present government is not moving; it is quite stationary.

Let me recast the policy of the Liberal party as given to us by the Minister of Railways, as I understand its meaning, and as I venture to predict it will ultimately be understood by the people of Canada. This is it: We shall stand cautiously, ignoring many facts presented to the tariff board, with the telescope of Liberal principles set firmly on our blind eye. Our policy when in power shall be a carefully drawn verbal string of specious platitudes to which no party in the House can take serious objection, ignoring the protests of the agricultural population, which we are fully aware during election times bears the brunt of the fiscal policy now in vogue, and having in view the continued prosperity of those in whose interests, our propaganda has alleged, the tariff was designed.

That is my reading of the new policy of the Liberal party. There are other political implications of the budget itself to which it might be profitable to make some reference, but I shall not detain the House longer by entering into any prolonged discussion of the budget as a whole. I merely remark however that I notice, inferentially at least, that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) did not hesitate to claim a very great deal of credit for the prosperity which he says now reigns throughout Canada. I do not think we can be said to be really prosperous at present, although we are all glad to admit that there are at least signs that we are emerging from the depression which followed the war. Certainly no one would say that this or any other government should be thanked very much for that. As a matter of fact we do not look to governments to-day, as a general rule, as the source of industrial or commercial well-being. It is true that they can hinder a bit and it is possible that to the same extent they may assist in facilitating trade, but to a very limited extent in each case. However, I notice that in the Liberal propaganda these so-called periods of prosperity are always associated with Liberal regimes. If those who assert such political superstitions were as jealous of their intellectual reputations as they obviously are of their political standing, they would not give voice to such arguments. I am glad that someone pointed out that perhaps the big crop in western Canada and in fact throughout Canada had something to do with this so-called prosperity, although on the other hand while we cannot have prosperity without big crops it is true that we can have big crops without prosperity, as experience has shown. There are two great factors of prosperity, the ability to produce goods and the ability to consume goods, and these are equally important; as soon as we hamper the consumption it is immediately reflected in the industrial stagnation which follows. But a government can have very little direct effect upon prosperity, because in connection with the purchasing power of the nation the government has entirely delegated its powers to others and so can claim absolutely no credit for any prosperity which we may be experiencing.

In conclusion let me say that I am supporting the amendment, and am particularly interested in the last clause which calls the attention of the government and of the House to the failure to make in the present budget any provision for a systematic reduction of our national debt. In that regard I think the only constructive suggestions made so far during this debate came from the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) and the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote). The suggestions of these gentlemen met with a fairly good response in the House, although it is true that many members asked for details right away. I think in that connection perhaps the statement of William Lloyd Garrison might be of interest. He said:

> One who tries to make plain a new reform is quickly made to feel the impatience of those who would master in an hour a subject that has for years taxed the brains of its advocates.

To work out in detail such a proposal at a moment's notice is impossible, of course, but I believe that these suggestions hold something worthy of our consideration, and I believe the time will come when they will be adopted. These suggestions are far more modest than those which I would make, but they are in the right direction and look towards the systematic removal of that burden of debt which at present is intolerable upon the whole industrial life of Canada. I am glad the House has received these suggestions so well, and I trust that in the near future some really serious thought will be given them, that action may be taken thereon.

I would like to see Canada finance herself, because she can do it. The Minister of Finance told us that there was lots of money in Canada, and I do not doubt it; if there is not enough money he will make more, because the Treasury board is making more money every day, with no limits. There is lots of money in Canada, and the banks, the insurance companies and the loan companies have control of it, while we should be able to use it. The greatest advantage in the proposal of the hon. member for West Calgary, so far as I can see, is that we will gradually get out of the clutches of foreign people by paying off those debts, which we will assume ourselves so that all interest will be paid within the borders of Canada, which will increase our purchasing power by that much and so tend towards the prosperity of the country as a whole.

There is the answer to the argument of the Minister of Railways. I regret that I should have been compelled to speak for so long to deal with so little, but unfortunately I had not the making of the text, nor indeed had I the selection of it. The text was thrust upon me by the minister himself, and he is entirely responsible for its content.

Mr. GEORGE SPENCE (Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I rise to say a few words in connection with the amendment, and I wish to express a little surprise and disappointment at the source from which this amendment came. I think it ill-advised and unfortunate; ill-advised from the fact that if the amendment carries this government will undoubtedly be defeated, and if the government is defeated it will either give an opportunity to hon. gentlemen opposite to form a government or will necessitate another general election, and I do not think the country wants any more elections just now.

It has given me much pleasure to see the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Irvine) back in the House; he is a countryman of mine and naturally I have watched his career with a great deal of interest; this is not the first time I have heard his philosophy. During his remarks I made a few notes, but I have not had time to analyze his speech and I will only deal briefly with a few of the points he brought out. The thing which struck me most forcibly at the outset was that he is a great economist, because he has given voice to great economic principles here to-night; he is a great political economist, and he is also a great financial wizard. We heard him express his rather faint-hearted belief in our tariff board, and he also said he did not think it was the responsibility of any particular member of parliament to do anything to assist that tariff board. I am sorry, but I must disagree with him there, and I am not the only one to do so. Members of this House have found it not only necessary but desirable in the public interest to make representations both indirectly and directly to the board, but I will deal with that in detail later, and pass on.

My hon. friend said that the tariff has been the subject of political warfare; I agree with him to a certain extent, but he thinks this war may be eliminated by organizations outside of politics, which is rather a strange philosophy. If governments are here for anything they are here to give a square deal, to strike a balance between the various economic or industrial groups in the country. That is one of the functions of government; to see that everybody gets a square deal and that nobody is unduly injured.

Now with regard to the splendid advice which we received from my hon. friend (Mr. Irvine) who has just spoken, his desire to see everybody get together, and his criticism of the Minister of Railways, I am not going to deal with his remarks at very great length. He found fault with the political philosophy of hon. gentlemen on this side, and gave his reasons for thinking that the budget we are considering was not a Liberal budget, and he called upon the government to implement their pledges. I am rather surprised to hear such observations from my hon. friend. I can remember the time when he campaigned against myself in the interests of the Non-partisan League. Afterwards I understand he became a great exponent of the Labour party in this House, and now he sits here representing the United Farmers of Alberta. Wherever you look to-day you can see in the windows of Conservative committee rooms the notification "Wanted, a leader." I have not the slightest doubt but that my hon. friend would make the supreme sacrifice of his life and become a Tory. Then the only thing left for my hon. friend to do in order to box the compass completely would be to walk into a booth on election day and spoil his ballot.

Mr. Speaker, some hon. members in the present and in other debates have put the west, the part of the country from which I come, in somewhat of a false position, in somewhat of a false light. I speak as a western Liberal in saying that we are not here for the purpose of placing our section of Canada in political and economic isolation. We are here for the purpose of meeting in conference with our friends from other sections of this Dominion, of laying our cards upon the table face up, of examining the various problems that arise from time to time in connection with different parts of Canada, and of reaching a solution based on a principle that will be for the good of our country as a whole and not merely for one particular section. It is true that we come from an agricultural section of Canada, and I want hon. gentlemen to remember that when we speak of agriculture we refer to the greatest single economic factor in the Dominion. We have been branded as free traders, sometimes even as annexationists. There is a school of thought, by the way, that would argue to-day that our views on the tariff represent occupational selfishness purely and simply and nothing more. From that view we heartily dissent, with that view we entirely disagree. We believe in freedom of trade as a principle because we know that the whole trend of modern times is towards the great field of internationalism—not nationalism, not narrow provincialism, but a magnificent economic union of the whole world.

An hon. MEMBER: Where do you get that?

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): Where do I get that? Has my hon. friend been asleep all these years? It dates from the invention of the steam engine. The inception of this world movement dates from that time, and it has been gaining in magnitude all the time. The great inventions of the telegraph and wireless and radio systems, the enormous combinations of capital throughout the world, the inauguration of great transportation systems and improved means of communication, and of the great movements in social work—all have helped to speed it along. Why we read to-day of an occurrence in the city of London or the city of Shanghai with almost the same degree of interest that we do of an event in Montreal or Vancouver.

Not only that, but consider the influence of our great economic bodies. Take for example our labour unions. They no longer recognize provincial or national boundaries; heir field of action extends throughout the entire world. The same thing is true of our great agricultural bodies, which are being drawn more and more into the field of internationalism. Why it was only quite recently that some of the foremost agriculturists in the world met in the city of St. Paul. They had met for the purpose of doing what? For the purpose of establishing an organization that would have no boundaries but world boundaries. These are the forces that are tending more and more to break down artificial boundaries. That is why we believe, as we do, in freer trade and wider markets. Every trade treaty in the world that has been negotiated is an argument for freer trade. And let me say to my hon. friends opposite that every article that is smuggled in or out of Canada is a protest against our tariff.

But to get back to my subject, I want simply to establish the point that we believe in certain principles because it is natural to do so. It is a natural condition that you can no more fight against than you can swim up Niagara. You may dam the current for a time at one point, but it will break out at others. I repeat that we are learning more and more the value of conference. Only recently one of the greatest gatherings that perhaps the world has ever seen met in Europe. And for what reason? To consider the problem of world economics. And that conference resolved unanimously that protective tariffs were among the things that were retarding the peaceful settlement of European problems, and preventing the rehabilitation of those nations that had been engaged in the world war. But I am not going to dwell on that phase of the question.

I wish to deal with the situation as we see it here. And what do we see?? Hon. gentlemen opposite charging hon. gentlemen on this side with being high protectionists. They are doing this time and time again in spite of the fact that election after election a solid block of men comes down here to oppose my hon. friends and their protectionist principles. We know why this is done. It is done for the deliberate purpose of driving in a political wedge between the east and the west. Mr. Speaker, on a recent occasion when we had the honour of enjoying your hospitality at a magnificent luncheon you gave voice to a great truth and it made a tremendous impression on my mind. You said, Sir, that we are all members of a great household. You called it "the Canadian family". What a splendid thought that is! If we could just bear that in mind, how much easier it would be for us to solve some of those knotty problems that engender so much heat and friction.

We use machinery or organization for various purposes. We maintain a police force in our cities for the purpose of preserving order. Recently we have set up a body for the purpose of correcting certain things which we think are working to the detriment of Canadian progress: we have set up an advisory tariff board. That tariff board met for the first time on the twenty-second of April, and had its first public meeting on the twenty-sixth of May. I want you to remember that that board was set up as a result of the unanimous judgment of this House. All those hon. members who are now supporting this amendment voted for that tariff board and lent their support to its creation. Now what is that tariff board designed to do? It is designed to get the facts. Whatever may be said against the tariff one sure thing is that our Conservative friends fastened it on the body politic of Canada. It has been here ever since and has established itself in our economic life. As a result a balance has been created which cannot be disturbed in any particular part without occasioning some injury unless you have intelligent investigation. The tariff board has been set up for the purpose of making that intelligent investigation. That is the task which has been assigned it, but it cannot fulfil that duty without the support and help of the people who are interested.

I am going to read this amendment. It is moved:

That all the words after the words "That" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:—

"whilst recognizing the advisability of certain minor changes proposed, this House regrets that the budget as presented by the honourable minister of Finance contains no effective provision for the reduction in the high cost of living in so far as such is due to the protective tariff;

"That the budget shows a further departure from the principle of direct and visible taxation based on the ability to pay;

"And further that no systematic effort is being made to reduce our national debt the interest on which absorbs so large a proportion of the revenues of the Dominion."

For the purpose of the few remarks that I propose to make to-night, I am going to use only a part of this amendment and I will read it again for the sake of emphasizing it:

No effective provision for the reduction in the high cost of living—

Where did we hear that phrase "the high cost of living" before?

—in so far as such is due to the protective tariff.

That is a very general and what I would term a very evasive statement. What are the things that enter into the cost of living? There are three—food, clothing and shelter. What would my hon. friend do? What are the specific things upon which he would reduce the tariff? What article of clothing, what article of food, or what article of shelter? If he is sincere, as I have no doubt he is, why is he not more specific? If he is such a great authority, he should know the things upon which he would have the tariff reduced. But in this amendment he makes no such demands. Ah, Mr. Speaker, the reason is not far to seek. He does not make any such demand, because he cannot. He does not know. Why does he not know? He does not know because he has not shown the slightest interest in the investigation as it has proceeded so far before the board. If the hon. member were in his seat to-night, I would ask him what he has done in the way of giving this board coöperation. The Good Book says: "Ye shall know them by their fruits", and that is the standard by which I am going to measure hon. gentlemen to-night. He does not know and he cannot guess. Was he in his place in this House when this tariff board was created? He was; he supported it. But where was he when the great consumers' question of boots and shoes was before the tariff board? If he is such an advocate of this board, if he has such a devoted allegiance to this principle, why was he not before the board when this question of boots and shoes, which is of tremendous interest to the consumers, the common people, was before the board? Why were not some of his party there supporting the interests of the common people?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Was the hon. member there?

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): Yes, I was there.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Did the hon. member give evidence?

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): I did not give evidence in person but my representative gave it. Just wait, and I will tell the House all about it. The hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) is laughing; he thinks this is quite a joke. It is easy for him to laugh, but we are not all in the happy financial position that the hon. member for West Calgary is in.

I want to examine some other applications. I have under my hand the briefs that have been presented before the tariff board in connection with the various applications. As a proof of the things whereof I am going to speak, I will read a letter which is on top of the file. It is addressed to myself, and it is signed in the handwriting of the secretary of the tariff board, Mr. H. B. McKinnon. It reads:

Dear Sir:

At the request of Mr. R. J. Deachman, I beg to forward herewith copies of the briefs filed before this board by the Canadian Horticultural Council, and various sections thereof, in requesting a seasonal duty on fruits and vegetables.

My hon. friend who has moved this amendment and his friends who sit with him and who support it—where were they on that occasion? An item of fruits was being discussed and the blame was being laid on the system of distribution. The question of fruits and vegetables is a very important one to the consumers of Canada. Were they before the board examining witnesses? They were not.

Some very interesting matters came up on that occasion; for instance, we learned that the onion men had come to Ottawa looking for some measure of protection. The onion is a very strong vegetable. By the way, somebody tells me that the member for onions is not in the House. When this case was being heard before the board, the fact was brought out that it would be cheaper to send these onion growers back home and tell them to grow no more onions—that we would pay them a salary of $3,333.33 a year out of the public treasury—than to give them the protection they asked for. That is one case, and there are many others. I have a list of the various items brought up by the fruit men. I could read them, but the hour is late and I am not going to take up the time of the House.

Let me run over some of the briefs. There is one in connection with the boot and shoe application, another in connection with doors, another in connection with lock bar steel, another in connection with hand sprayers, and another in connection with gloves. There is a vast quantity of material that requires study in order that it may be properly analysed and dissected. While an hon. member may not be doing anything very spectacular or anything that attracts people's attention, he is doing something very useful in appearing before the board in the interests of the common consumers of this country.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): What action has the government taken on that?

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): I am coming to that. There are fifty-two applications before the board, some of them for reductions, some for increases, and some merely for readjustments. Of these, forty-six applications have been heard. I will give the list:

Reference No.—		No. of Hearings
1	Calcium chloride	1
2	Steel and iron	1
3	Coal and coke	1
4	Pumps and pump parts	1
5	Player piano music rolls	1
7	Nail keg cooperage	1
8	Epsom salts	1

That is another very interesting case and I was present when it was being heard. Now that hon. gentlemen have interrupted, for the purpose of illustration I am going to use it in order to show this House how much gall these people have in seeking protection through the customs tariff. A couple of men came here from British Columbia who had discovered a salt lake and who actually wanted protection on Epsom salts. When they were asked for an argument in support of their application for protection, they said: We have a factory that employs nothing but Canadian labour. We asked them: How many labourers do you employ? They admitted that they were employing only six but they said that at their maximum capacity they would employ ten. Another argument which they used was that they had nothing but Canadian capital. We have heard that term "Canadian capital" before. We asked them how much stock they had authorized and they said: $75,000. Then we asked how much of that was paid up, and they admitted that only $50 was paid up. All they had was their gall, and their salt lake in British Columbia.

The cases that have been heard before the board are as follows:

Reference No.—		No. of Hearings
1	Calcium chloride	1
2	Steel and iron	1
3	Coal and coke	1
4	Pumps and pump parts	1
5	Player piano music rolls	1
7	Nail keg cooperage	1
8	Epsom salts	1
9	Magazines	2
10	Gabardines	1
11	Unbleached cotton	1
12	Beeswax, candles, etc	2
13	Lockbar steel pipe	2
14	Invalid's wheel chair	1
15	Pine doors	2
16	Confectioners' supplies	1
17	Oil tops	2
18	Cordage twines	2
19	Canadian wool goods
20	Objects of art	2
21	Tin	2
22	Fruits, vegetables, nursery stock	2
23	Wool tops (gloves)	2
24	Corn and cane syrups	2
25	Water wheel governors	2
26	Blue foxes	1
27	Unbound book sheets	1
28	Small hand sprayers	1
29	Embroidered cuffs for gloves	1
31	Vegetable parchment paper	1
32	Rope for deep sea vessel fishing	1
33	Electric light and power	1
46	Boots and shoes	1

A very interesting situation developed with regard to tin. We had on that occasion 57 manufacturers who had banded themselves together to oppose a duty on tin. These 57 manufacturers, mind you, members of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, were greater friends of the consumer than was my hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Coote) who moved this amendment. Altogether there have been 46 hearings, and members on this side of the House have been represented at 43 of them—members on this side of the House from one coast to the other who have paid out their good money and given freely of their time to bring evidence before the tariff board and lend their coöperation so that the facts relating to these cases might be brought out.

I have in my hand a very interesting volume. It is the proceedings before the tariff board in a case which occupied one hour of time. It cost a member on this side of the House $14.70. At the same rate, if that hon. member had wished to purchase the evidence before the board for one day, he would have had to pay about $100, and I raise my voice now in support of the suggestion of the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) that the evidence taken before the board should be printed and distributed free to members of parliament.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Hear, hear.

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): I hear my hon. friend say "hear, hear". I know there might be a little difficulty in connection with confidential information that is volunteered to the tariff board. The strange thing about this matter, Mr. Speaker, is that these fellows squeal on themselves, that one man's raw material is the other man's finished product, and when it comes to raw material they are all like I am—free traders. There may be, I say, some confidential documents that should not be printed. That sort of information is, in my opinion very valuable, and if it was printed the result would simply be to dry up that source of information, but so far as the public evidence is concerned, I think it should be printed and distributed free to members of parliament, because there are some members on this side of the House who read the evidence.

Of the 46 cases heard by the board, 13 have been reported on to the government. Those 13 cases were not all for decreases. Some asked for an increase in the tariff, and they did not get it. About half were for decreases, among them being pumps, invalid chairs, and so forth.

I have had the opportunity to examine the evidence taken in many of these cases, and what do I find? I find a most bewildering interlocking of interests, which brings me back to the point I made a few minutes ago, that whatever the faults of protection may be, it has been the policy in this country for a great many years, and conditions have adjusted themselves to the policy of protection, and therefore any adjustment of the tariff must be gone about intelligently. If you lower or raise any item of the tariff, you immediately interfere with something else, and no worth while revision of the tariff can be made until all the related cases have been heard. That is my point. I state it again: No worth while revision of the tariff can be made until all the related cases have been heard.

Mr. ADSHEAD: How does the hon. member suggest that the expenses in connection with the rebuttal evidence should be met? I know that the hon. member and other members have put up a good deal themselves.

[Mr. G. Spence.]

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): If I am trying to do anything here to-night at all, it is this: I am putting hon. gentlemen of this House on their honour as men, to volunteer their help if they are interested in tariff reductions. So far as expenses are concerned, some of us have been able to keep a man before that tariff board to represent us at 43 different hearings. The money has been contributed by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) and by other members all across the continent. No man has done more before the tariff board in the way of giving evidence than the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan); the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden) has also given his support, as well as all the members from Saskatchewan, on this side of the House, without a single exception, as have also members from Alberta in the last House, including the member for Wetaskiwin in the last parliament, Mr. Tobin, also the late member for Skeena, Mr. Stork, and last, but not least, my good friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), who has taken cases before the board in the interest of lower duties.

Now what of the future? An application has already been prepared and will shortly be handed in asking for a reduction in the duties on sugar, so if the sugar interests of this country have had no warning before, they have it now. I am told that the sweetest morsel in the mouths of our protectionist friends is sugar. It may also be news to some hon. members to know that beans are also coming up, not before the board, but under item 47a, or behind it. We are indebted to our good friend from Weyburn (Mr. Young) for this information, not to those hon. members who are moving the amendment. That is my point. And if they want to know anything about it they will have to ask a member on this side of the House.

Mr. JELLIFF: Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the hon. member long enough to say that I left my farm home and came to Ottawa to appear before the tariff board in a case where a reduction was applied for?

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): I humbly apologize to the member for Lethbridge. He did appear on one application.

Mr. SPENCER: If I may interrupt the hon. member for a moment, we have been the means of getting in touch with every farmers' organization throughout Canada to secure representation before the tariff board.

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): It is not my nature to disclose confidential conversations, but I am sure the hon. member will recall a conversation which I had with him just before

I left Ottawa last session. The point I make is this. Those who charge us to-night with breaking our pledges to the people, with not doing anything to give relief to the people, have not given us credit for helping the people in the most practical way . I listened to the speech of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) with a great deal of care. He is an able speaker and I always like to hear him. By the way he has not been done full justice by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) and I must come to his rescue. It is a matter of historical record that the hon. member for Bow River did not rock two boats; he rocked only one. True, he rocked that quite dangerously.

Now, Mr. Speaker, faith without works is dead. What we are interested in to-night is results, the money that has been spent in bringing the necessary information before the tariff board so that it may be in a position to base an intelligent judgment upon it, has been furnished by members on the Liberal side of the House. What have my hon. friends who are moving this resolution been doing in the meantime? I think I can indicate pretty clearly by a homely story. You have a fine large substantial house on blocks, and you are anxious to get it down firmly on a solid stone foundation before any storms blow up. You send for an architect. He looks at the house, examines the blocks and ascertains which part of the structure is bearing most heavily on this or that particular block. With this information before him he carefully withdraws a wedge here or inserts a wedge there and gradually lowers the house on to its foundation, where it will stand as a monument to his professional skill. But what are my hon. friends doing over in that corner of the House while this delicate operation is in progress? They are dancing on the roof, they are knocking out a prop here and a prop there, shrieking at the top of their voices, not two of them in agreement, and running the risk of tumbling the whole structure over and killing one another.

In conclusion, Sir, I want to say that this tariff board is one of the most important fact-finding tribunals that has ever been set up in this country, but it can only serve the purposes for which it was created by the facilities which it offers to the great mass of the common consumers of this country to present their views before it; and the extent to which those views are so presented will determine the board's ultimate usefulness. So far those hon. members who are sponsoring this amendment have lent no assistance whatsoever to the tariff board. While professing true allegiance to the cause of a lower tariff, they have done nothing to assist in bringing it about. Are we to believe now that their interest in the great principles for which they have fought has dwindled, and that it finds expression only when the purpose is to embarrass a Liberal government? It looks to some of us to be purely politics, and it may be cheap politics at that. If my hon. friends can extract any kind of satisfaction for their political conscience from such political shadow dancing as that, they are welcome to it as far as I am concerned.

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac- Addington): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Spence) objects to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) because he says that if it carry this government would be defeated; and, he adds, the people do not want another election. I am very sure he is correct—the people do not want another election. I am equally certain that members on both sides of the House and of all parties do not want another election right away. But the people want something of far more importance, even if the amendment should carry and the government be defeated. The people want a government which will fulfil and carry out the promises on which it was returned to power.

The hon. gentleman says that the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) has belonged to several parties, at one time to the Labour party and now to United Farmers of Alberta, and he intimates that possibly the hon. member might make a supreme sacrifice by going over to the Conservative party. Well, I am sure, the hon. member for Wetaskiwin will forgive the hon. member for Maple Creek in that he forbore to charge him with ever having been a member of the Liberal party. That is something which I do not think the hon. member for Wetaskiwin would have been disposed to forgive on the part of the hon. member for Maple Creek.

The hon. gentleman says he is a free trader, that he believes in the principle of free trade. Yes, we have heard that frequently from a number of hon. gentlemen on that side of the House—they believe in the principle of free trade, but not in the practice of it. Might I ask the hon. gentleman if he thinks protection is such a vicious thing for this country that it should be done away with? If that is the case, and if free trade is a virtuous thing, why does not my hon. friend, who says he is an out-and-out free trader, take the only logical course—wipe out protection altogether and thus get rid once for all of the vice in favour of the virtue? He will not take that position now. Evidently he prefers a measure of political vice rather than complete political virtue—and in that respect, of course, he is not alone; he is sitting among those who take the same ground.

The hon. gentleman referred to the tariff board as having been appointed by the unanimous consent of the House. I think he is correct. But, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that if the Liberal party to which he belongs, and of which he is such a shining light, had kept the pledges that it has made from itme to time in its platforms declared before each general election, there never would have been any need for a tariff board. The Liberal party, which has denounced protection root and branch, admitted the principle of protection the moment the Liberal government constituted the tariff board. Every member of the House, no matter how much he may call himself a free trader, so soon as he agreed to the principle of a tariff advisory board gave his recognition and adherence to the principle of protection and of a protective tariff for Canada. There is absolutely no doubt about that.

The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) has introduced an amendment, the first paragraph of which declares that there has been no effective provision for reduction of the high cost of living in so far as this is due to the protective tariff. I should think that the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Spence, Maple Creek), and who announces himself a free trader, would at once be willing to subscribe to that particular clause or to any clause the object of which was to reduce the cost of living. If the hon. member for Macleod can show me that the protective tariff does unjustly and unfairly increase the cost of living, I will coöperate with him in an endeavour to have the tariff adjusted in that regard. But I do not agree with the hon. member in what I think he has in mind so far as that is concerned. I believe I can show that the cost of living has been enhanced in this country because the protective tariff has not been followed as it should have been. We have an advisory board to suggest ways and means of adjusting the tariff.

The hon. member for Macleod puts forward another suggestion whereby he thinks the government may reach conclusions in respect of tariff adjustments. His suggestion, I think, is unique. Referring to the tariff on silks and particularly on silk stockings he says that ladies now like to wear silk stockings and that the gentlemen like to see them worn, and he suggests this as a principle to guide the government in framing its tariff. The shorter the ladies wear their skirts, he says, the lower the government should make the tariff. I hope that if the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) is at all disposed to be influenced by that particular line of argument he will do his adjusting of the tariff in the winter season, because otherwise some lady politician, very enthusiastic for free trade, might try to influence the government to take the tariff off altogether by appearing in nothing but her bathing suit. I can well understand the uneasiness of gentlemen of the group to my left, as well as of certain gentlemen on the government side of the House.

The Minister of Finance says that we have now a stable government because there is a Forke in the stable, but it has been suggested by someone that the fork is not of very much use because the prongs are broken and the handle is very much twisted. I am interested, and I am sure the House will be interested, in following the political career of the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke). It is illuminating. I think it was in 1922 that he replaced the Hon. Mr. Crerar as leader of the Progressive party. On that occasion the hon. gentleman said that the Progressives would plough their own furrow; they would play an independent role. And in an amendment to the budget he suggested slashing the tariff, advocated reciprocity, and so forth. I am reminded of what took place in the year 1923, I think it was, when Mr. Hammell, the member for Muskoka, left the Progressive party and went over to the Liberal side. The member for Brandon, now Minister of Immigration, and those associated with him were not very well pleased with the action of Mr. Hammell. The Farmers' Sun said:

> His going will leave the farmer group smaller in number but much improved in quality.

On reading this recently I wondered what would be the state of mind of hon. gentlemen of the Progressive party now sitting to my left, since the Minister of Immigration decided to quit them and join the other side of the House. Certainly they have lost in numbers, but without wishing to be discourteous at all I do not think the quality of the group has depreciated by the loss sustained. In 1924, under the leadership of the member for Brandon, now Minister of Immigration, a number of Progressives withdrew from caucus, complaining that their leader was not maintaining a clear-cut distinction between their group and the Liberal party in power. Speaking on April 8 of that year the member for Brandon, addressing the Montreal Board of Trade favoured wiping out all protective duties. I wonder whether he now favours such action.

Mr. FORKE: What are you quoting from?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I am quoting from a speech which the hon. gentleman made, but which no doubt he has forgotten. It was delivered on April 8, 1924, and reported in the press.

Mr. FORKE: What press?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The newspapers of the day. Does the hon. gentleman say it is incorrect? He does not say it is. He does not deny that he said at that time he favoured wiping out all protective duties.

Mr. FORKE: I never said that.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Did the hon. member never hold that view?

Mr. FORKE: I never said so.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): In the budget debate of that year—this will be interesting to him—the minister said:

If anybody in this House thinks the Progressive movement is done, he is vastly mistaken. We of this group see brighter things ahead.

The hon. gentleman has on several occasions repudiated prophetic vision but I do not think he has done himself justice in that regard. He at least of that group saw brighter things ahead; he saw the cabinet portfolio of Minister of Immigration or something else in the government. That bright vision has materialized. In 1924 the hon. gentleman opposed the Woodsworth amendment as a mere gesture without any meaning, notwithstanding that it was drawn along the lines of an amendment he had himself moved. Addressing the United Farmers of Manitoba in convention assembled, he made the statement that the Progressive party would keep the banner flying. He said:

Whatever changes may take place in the cabinet the Progressive group will remain intact and carry on as in the past.

That was only in 1924. In 1925, speaking in this House, as reported in Hansard at page 3967, the minister said:

I want to compliment the leader of the opposition—

That was Mr. Meighen.

—also upon the definiteness of his statements. He nailed his colours to the mast: there is no question about that. I do not know what will come of it. In looking over the history of Canada during the last twenty years we find that when a party was in opposition—

He was referring to the Liberal party.

—it advocated a low tariff, and when it got into power it might go a little way but not very far in that direction.

Here we see the difference that office has made. We know how strong the hon. gentleman was in his advocacy of a low tariff while he was a member of the group to my left, but now he is in the seats of the mighty his views have changed, just as the views of others have changed in the past. He says now:

Now we have the opposition advocating a high tariff.

Which was not correct.

But I venture to say that if my hon. friends of the opposition got into power they would not make the tariff very much higher than it is at the present moment.

I commend that particular sentence to the consideration of the Minister of Railways, in view of what he said the other day.

In fact, the only possibility I can see of a definite settlement of the tariff question on a low tariff basis will be for the members in this part of the House to take up the reins of government and to put things right in Canada for some time.

He is over there now; I do not know whether he has any of the reins of government but he has landed in the government now and we will have an opportunity of seeing just how strongly he talks along that line in the future.

Another matter to which I might refer and to which the hon. gentleman referred is the matter of the tariff board. Speaking in this House in 1925 the minister said:

. . . if we are going to get a tariff commission that will settle the question of tariffs in this Dominion, it is going to be some task. I have no faith in any such proposition.

He is now a member of the government; is that his opinion to-day? Speaking at Winnipeg on September 16, 1925, note what he says at the meeting of the Progressive executive:

The removal of protective duties upon all necessaries of life and instruments of production is indispensable to the growth of population and development of natural resources.

He also advocated the retention of the income tax without reduction, and he is now a member of the government which is doing just the opposite of that. He was also in favour of an elective Senate, but I venture to say we will hear nothing from him on that score this session.

Here is another matter which is worth calling to the attention of the hon. minister, and which I know he will enjoy. Referring to rumours of a Progressive-Liberal election pact, the hon. gentleman said:

> Absorption of the Progressives by the Liberals under whatever guise effected would postpone for a generation attainment of necessary reforms, the re-shaping of national policies and the infusion into Canadian public life of that moral courage and idealism which slavish partisanship has well nigh destroyed.

Now they have him over on the other side of the House, drawing the emoluments of office and willing to postpone for a generation or for a life time the attainment of necessary reform; willing to throw to the winds all this idealism, this moral courage which is so important to the country; willing to come under a slavish partisanship which he formerly condemned very strongly.

Speaking at Shoal Lake on behalf of one of the candidates a few days later, the hon. gentleman challenged Prime Minister King to say definitely what he was going to do with transportation, immigration, the tariff and Senate reform. He has an opportunity now to put the same challenge up to the Prime Minister and to back it up with the greater force he now has as a cabinet minister. He viewed with alarm the inclusion of Hon. Herbert Marler in the King cabinet, that gentleman being a protectionist. What does he think now of the inclusion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm); what does he think of the inclusion of the Minister of Customs and Excise (Mr. Euler)? These gentlemen have expressed time and again their protectionist views; their views were expressed no more strongly than were those of Hon. Herbert Marler. These gentlemen are now colleagues of the Minister of Immigration, and I venture to say that whatever view he held in the past as indicated by his words, he will swallow all those principles and those words; he will eat crow three times a day if necessary, to be in line with the party with which he is now associated. In another speech the hon. gentleman declared that there was no observable difference between the policies of the two old parties; hence the Progressive movement, which he has now left and which he said represented a popular determination to break the bonds of blind partisanship. He has quit all that work now; you can be as blind as you like and as partisan as you like. That movement was also to—> —secure from any government willing to carry them into effect, those reforms which are essential to the well-being of the primary industries of the people generally.

The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat referred to the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) as possibly making the supreme sacrifice and joining the Conservative party at some time. Let us see what the Minister of Immigration thought of such a thing. He said:

> I would favour any coalition to get us out of the troubles which face us.

This is what he said about a year ago.

> If the Conservatives are in power and are willing to form a coalition to forward the principles for which I stand, I am quite willing to go with them.

Here is the Minister of Immigration willing to make the supreme sacrifice for the good of his country and join the Conservative party, so long, I presume, as there is a cabinet portfolio waiting when he makes the jump.

I want to make a few references now to the Minister of Railways, who, I regret, is not at present in his seat. The minister accused the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) of rocking the boat this session. Last session, he said, the hon. member for Bow River was careful not to rock the boat when the Minister of Labour and his colleagues, the Liberal party, were in it. He now says, "We are in a position where we do not care whether or not you rock the boat, you can't upset it anyway." Mr. Speaker, have you ever seen such a manifestation of political ingratitude in your life? Some person has defined political gratitude as a lively sense of favours to come. The attitude of the Minister of Railways to the group to my left last session was very meek and mild, and he was very careful then not to say anything which would disturb their feelings; he was making a bid for their support at that time. On the present occasion, however, he feels more secure, more safe in the saddle, and he says to these gentlemen to my left, "We are quite safe now; you cannot upset the boat anyway and we are going to forget the good service you did us a year ago. We do not need you now, and you can go hang somewhere, so far as we are concerned."

The Minister put the question to the members of the House and said, "How high would the tariff wall around Canada have been if the Conservatives had been in power from 1921?" I might let the Minister of Immigration answer that; he said that if they had been in they would have made no appreciable difference in the tariff. The Minister of Railways said, "Had the Conservative party been here to-day and honestly carried out what they led the people of Canada to believe is their policy, we would have a tariff as high as the tariff now existing in the United States." I would just say in that regard that, with all due deference to the hon. gentleman, I do not think he believes anything of the kind. I do not think for a moment he believes that if the Conservative party were in power they would copy the ways of the United States, which has the highest tariff in the world. However, he does pay a tribute to the Conservative party when he says:

> We know this at all events, that if the Conservative party was in power they would carry out the pledges they have made to the people.

That is a tribute he pays to the Conservative party. Their record is in marked contrast to that of the party to which the hon. gentleman belongs, because they have never kept their pledges.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What about the "brick for brick" platform?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I do not think the brick my hon. friend refers to is any harder than my hon. friend's head or any more impenetrable. There has never been any "brick for brick" policy enunciated by this party as my hon. friend would imply; it has never been enunciated by any member of the party at any time.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Then my hearing is very defective.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I do not think it is a defect in the hon. gentleman's hearing, I think it lies in the character or quality of the grey matter that does his thinking. The hon. gentleman should be fair. That policy was never enunciated by the leader of the Conservative party or by any person else in the party. The Conservative party through the mouth of its leader—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Oh, oh.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): It is an easy thing for the hon. gentleman to laugh.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): You are making the speech.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Yes, I am making the speech and my hon. friend is laughing—laughing at himself I suppose, at his own silliness or nonsense. That is the only way in which I can account for his actions. I say that the Conservative party, through the mouth of its leader, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, said that the farm schedule was the most unfair of all the schedules, and that the Conservative party stood for a policy that would give even justice and fair play to the farmers of this country.

Mr. PARENT: "Brick for brick."

Mr. MILLAR: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Surely.

Mr. MILLAR: Did the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden, in the campaign of 1911, promise that if he were returned to power he would return their natural resources to the western provinces, and did he keep that promise?

Mr. PARENT: He did not do it.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I think he did. May I tell my hon. friend that he started negotiations at once in that direction, but the war came along and put an end to that and a great many other things.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): That, I think, is a reasonable answer to give. It is a better reason than any member of this government could give for not returning their natural resources to those provinces.

But to return to the question of a high tariff. The Minister of Railways says there is no doubt which is the high tariff and which is the low tariff party in this House.

Mr. DUNNING: Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The minister says "hear, hear." Very well. I should like to quote a statement made in this House by the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen. It is contained in Hansard of 1920, page 2708, and is to the following effect:

> We never can have a high tariff in Canada. We cannot have a high tariff in Canada for the most obvious reasons. In the first place, a high tariff is unsound in principle—

Mr. DUNNING: Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The Minister of Railways says, "hear, hear" to that.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, unsound in principle.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): All right, we are in agreement there.

Mr. PARENT: We all say that.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac):

> —in that it tends to eliminate one of the factors of competition, namely, foreign goods.

Mr. DUNNING: Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac):

> Foreign goods should be allowed to enter into competition under fair conditions in this or in any other country. But the conditions under free trade or without protection are such that the foreign competitor has every advantage.

In the face of such a direct and explicit statement as that how can my hon. friend make the charge, or insinuate as he does, that the Conservative party stands for a tariff wall as high as that of the United States? But let me give some further evidence. I do this because of the references made to this matter by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning), in his speech the other day. He had a good deal to say along that line, trying to influence the people of this country to believe, as he and others associated with him have tried to do for many years, and with too much success I must say, that the Conservative party is historically the party which stands for high, unreasonably high, protection, while the Liberal party is the party whose history proves it to be the party of low tariff. Let us examine the matter for a while. Under the Liberals in 1911 the tariff on dutiable goods averaged 28.25 per cent. The tariff on dutiable goods under the Conservatives in 1921 averaged 23 per cent. Which was the high tariff in so far as those figures are concerned?

Mr. DUNNING: What are the years?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The years are 1911 and 1921. The last year before the change in government in 1911, and 1921 before the Conservatives went out. On all imports, dutiable and free, the tariff in 1911 under the Liberals was 16.50 per cent. On all imports, dutiable and free, under the Conservatives in 1921 the tariff was 15 per cent. On farm implements under the Liberals in 1911 the duty averaged 20.18 per cent. Under the proposed reciprocity pact the changes would have brought the duty down to 17.33 per cent. Under the Conservatives in 1921 the average duty was 14.64 per cent. I might just interpolate here that under the operations of the United Grain Growers of the west their profits on the same machinery averaged 20.18 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: May I ask my hon. friend a question?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: Will he tell us what reduction in farm implement tariffs were made by the Conservative government during the period of years to which he is referring, and which produced the result that the tariff was lowered?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Yes. My hon. friend has asked a question which I shall be pleased indeed to answer, and to give him any other information I can, because I realize, and I am sure the members of this House are beginning to realize more and more every day, that the Minister of Railways, notwithstanding his assurance, stands in need of information—badly in need of it. He has asked for information and I will give it to disprove the position which he took when speaking here the other night. My hon. friend asks what the Conservatives have done. There were no tariff changes made in 1912. In 1913 they reduced the duty on cement from 12½ cents, as it was under the Liberals, to 10 cents per hundred pounds.

Mr. DUNNING: That is not a farm implement.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): If you will just hold yourself in patience I will give you the information you are longing for.

Mr. BENNETT: And which he needs. If anyone needs it he does.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Of course if my hon. friend cannot take it all in, if he cannot take in the extras that I will give him, I will be thankful if he will take in what he can. Ditching machines come under the head of farm implements, do they not?

Mr. DUNNING: Do they?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Yes, I should think so.

Mr. BENNETT: Not on his farm.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The Liberals had a duty of 20 per cent on ditching machines. The Conservative government took the duty off and made them free. Now as for the duty on sugar, to which my hon. friend referred. Under the Liberals it was $1.24½ per 100 pounds and under the Conservatives it was reduced to $1.07¾. Type-setting and type-casting machines under the Liberals bore a duty of 20 per cent. The Conservatives took the duty off and made them free. Binders and mowers under the Liberals were carrying a duty of 17½ per cent. The Conservative government reduced the duty to 12½ per cent; and in that connection I should like to give my hon. friend another bit of information. Until this change was made the duty was 20 per cent; a binder was valued for duty purposes at $80 and therefore paid a duty of $16. The Liberals did nothing from 1896 to 1907. In 1907 they reduced the tariff on binders, reapers and mowers to 17½ per cent, but they immediately placed on the binders a valuation, not of $80 but of $100, so that they collected $17.50 whereas formerly under the Conservative regime the amount collected was $16. That is the way the Liberals had of dealing with and fooling the people of this country.

Mr. RINFRET: And still they vote for us.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): That is the remarkable thing about the matter, partly explained in the case of the hon. member who made the interruption, by the fact that he is of course irresistible, especially with the ladies' vote. In 1915 the war revenue tax of 7½ per cent and 5 per cent was imposed, but the Conservative party showed consideration for the farmers in that they made an exception of wheat, binders and so forth, while at the same time a special tax was imposed upon banks and trust and loan companies. In 1916 the business profits tax was imposed, and again the farmers in that respect were not hurt, as I am sure every hon. member will agree. The Conservative party showed consideration for the welfare of the farmers of this country by raising—and this was the only tariff item they changed—the duty on apples to 90 cents a barrel, where it has remained ever since and where, I venture to say, the free traders on the other side of the House will leave it.

In 1917 there were no changes. 1918 the excise duty was increased on cigars, cigarettes and so forth, and a duty was placed on tea and also changes were made in the duty on coffee and chicory. In 1919 the war revenue tax of 7½ per cent and 5 per cent was removed from British goods and practically repealed as regards the general tariff. The duty on tea was reduced by five cents a pound; the duty on coffee was reduced by three cents a pound, and wheat and potatoes were made free. The duty was lowered from 20 per cent to 15 per cent on cultivators, harrows, horse rakes, seed drills, weeders and manure spreaders. That is something I am sure the hon. gentleman wanted to know about.

In 1919 the duty was reduced from 20 per cent to 17½ per cent on ploughs, windmills, portable engines, horse powers and traction engines for farm purposes, threshing machines and separators. I suppose the Minister of Railways recognizes those as farm implements, and he will probably, without straining his grey matter too much, recognize the following as farm implements. The duty was reduced from 25 per cent to 20 per cent on hay loaders, potato diggers, feed cutters, grain crushers, fanning mills, hay tedders, field rollers, farm wagons and post hole diggers. The duty on cement was further reduced from ten cents to eight cents a pound, a reduction of 36 per cent from what it was under the tariff of the low tariff party, the Liberals.

The sales tax was raised by the Liberals to 6 per cent and it is, of course, higher than it was under the Conservatives. The two cent cheque tax was raised by the Liberals to one dollar on larger cheques. There was no receipt tax under the Conservatives. The Liberals imposed that; subsequently they removed it, and they shouted their heads off in order to try to secure a great deal of credit for removing it. The amount collected in sales tax, cheque tax, receipt tax, transportation tax, and so forth during the last year of the Meighen government amounted to $73,000,000. In 1923 this party which believes so much in relieving taxation collected $106,000,000; in 1924 they collected $120,000,000; in 1925, $85,000,000, and in 1926, $95,000,000. That is the party of low protection, the party that believes in relieving the people of taxation.

Mr. DUNNING: I am still thirsting for information if my hon. friend would answer another question.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The hon. gentleman's thirst is indeed commendable.

Mr. DUNNING: The question is this: In connection with the reductions of duty on farm implements during those years to which my hon. friend has been referring, will he now give us what he gave us formerly in connection with one case, and that is the value for duty purposes, during each of the years to which he has been referring, of the farm implements he dealt with.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): As my questioner is a man of more than ordinary intelligence—and I am sure he will not dispute that for a moment—

Mr. DUNNING: I do.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): While I have not the whole list of the values for duty purposes on all the articles, again having regard to the fact that my hon. friend is a man of superior intelligence, I am sure he can arrive at this from the figures which I give him and add further to that knowledge for which he has such a thirst, which I am very anxious to satisfy. He can arrive at it somewhat in this way. For instance, under the Liberal government in 1911 the tariff on a binder was 17½ per cent and they collected $31.92 on a binder. Under the proposed reciprocity pact of 15 per cent they would have collected $27.36. If my hon. friend will get out his pencil he can work that out and find the value for duty purposes. I know he can do it because he is a very clever man. Under the Conservative government the duty was 12½ per cent and the Conservatives collected $22.80 in duty on a binder, whereas the Liberals collected $31.92.

Mr. DUNNING: What years?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I am giving the rate of duty in 1921 when the Conservatives went out of power, the rate of duty in 1911 when the Liberals left office, and the rate as proposed under the reciprocity pact of 1911. For the benefit of some hon. gentlemen from Saskatchewan I might say that the Grain Growers' Grain Company exacted a profit of $38.80 on the same binder when they found fault with the Conservatives for collecting $22.80 in the form of duty.

With the permission of the House I will place this list on Hansard, and I am sure the government will give me permission in this case, because this is along the line of the information that the Minister of Railways was asking for. The minister can study the list at his leisure and I am sure it will do him good. The list is as follows:

I have referred to the reciprocity pact. That is something to which my hon. friends opposite frequently refer. On various occasions they have bewailed the result of the election of 1911 when the reciprocity pact was defeated by the people of this country. I wonder if there are any hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who would say to-night that they think it would be advisable to put into effect in this country, in this year 1927, the reciprocity pact of 1911.

Mr. BROWN: Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Did I hear "Yes"? Could I get it from somebody higher up? Is there a minister sitting in the front row or in the second row who will say that he thinks this country would be the better for putting into effect the reciprocity pact of 1911?

Mr. DUNNING: Sure.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Does the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) say that?

Mr. DUNNING: Sure.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Does the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) say that?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, sir.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Well, I guess that will do for the whole list. Now let us see what they have committed themselves to. They say that they think in the interests of this country this reciprocity pact ought to be made effective.

Mr. RINFRET: You would not need any Duncan report if you had reciprocity.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): This is the point I want to bring to the attention of hon. gentlemen. If they were to put into effect to-day the reciprocity pact of 1911, they would have to raise the duty on very many, nearly all, of the farm implements used in this country at the present time. That is what the Minister of Railways says he is willing to do; that is what the Minister of the Interior says he is willing to do. I ask them to look over the schedules and see the rates of duty imposed in the agreement of 1911. I say that in half the instances those rates were higher on farm implements than the Conservative tariff was, and the same rates in the other half, and I say that if they were to put that agreement into effect to-day they would be raising the duty on farm implements coming into this country. That is exactly what they say they are willing to do.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I am glad to have these two ministers on record because it will be very useful in the days to come.

Mr. DUNNING: But that is not what we said.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, yes, it was.

Mr. DUNNING: We will leave it to the record.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Oh, no, the Minister of Railways will not leave it to the record. The Liberal's party record in so far as keeping promises is concerned is very well known to the people of this country.

Mr. DUNNING: Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): It is very well known that the Liberal party has never kept its promises that it made before election, never on any occasion, never since away back of 1896, never from 1878 down to 1896, and never from 1896 down through the other years when they were in power. But they would put into operation the reciprocity pact. What effect would that have upon the farmers of this country? They say that the farmers of this country, under that pact, would have free entrance into the United States for their farm products. That is true. But the United States would also have the opportunity to send their products into Canada. Is that all? No, that is not all.

Under the reciprocity pact, as soon as we opened our doors to the farm products of the United States, we also opened our doors to some twelve other countries, very many of them large producers of farm products, and to all the British possessions in the world. That is what we had to do under the reciprocity pact, and that is what these hon. gentlemen are willing to do now. This is perhaps some information for my hon. friend the Minister of Railways. Under the reciprocity pact we opened our doors to the farm products of the United States, and at the same time, and without any return at all, we opened our doors to Japan, Argentine, Russia, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Austria-Hungary, Spain, Switzerland, Bolivia, Colombia, Venezuela, and all the British possessions.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) the other day put on Hansard a list of the countries showing whether our trade balance with them was favourable or unfavourable. Now our imports, according to that statement from those countries which under the reciprocity pact would have a free entry to our market for their farm and agricultural products, amounted to some $44,000,000; our imports from the United States to over $485,000,000, and from the United Kingdom, to $163,000,000. Of course, the $44,000,000 does not all represent farm products by any means. I merely give those figures as indicating the extent of the trade. The point I am making is this: The manifest unfairness of the reciprocity pact, which the farmers of the country understood sufficiently well to enable them to defeat it, was that while we were getting entrance to one market, that of the United States, we were opening the doors of Canada to the surplus production of the principal agricultural countries of the world, a thing which would be very disastrous, in my opinion, to the future of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Strange how we have to sell against them in the open markets of the world!

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The hon. gentleman does not surely confine himself to one product—wheat.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): A good many products.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Very true. Now let us follow this a little further and see just what it would mean. I will refer to just a few countries—Argentine, Denmark, Russia, New Zealand, South Africa—every one of these countries comes in under the reciprocity pact, which the hon. gentlemen say they think ought to be put into operation, but have not the courage to propose as a measure emanating from this government. Now these countries exported to Great Britain last year 235,733 tons of butter. Hon. gentlemen say that an arrangement by which these countries might send that butter, if they so desired, into Canada, is all right. They would take the duty off entirely against these countries, while these countries maintain their tariff against us. Why, the thing is preposterous. It is even more ridiculous to-day than it was in 1911, because of the improved transportation facilities that we have to-day as compared with 1911. The Argentine is one of the greatest dairy and meat-producing countries in the world to-day, as well as being one of the greatest producers of wheat. Russia undoubtedly, in the course of time, will get back to normal, and will again become as she was in former days, one of the great competitors of Canada in the markets of the world. Yet my hon. friends opposite say that in their opinion this sort of thing ought to be introduced into Canada, that putting the reciprocity pact into operation would be in the interests of the people.

I would like to refer for a few moments to the vegetable growers of Canada, who have made application to the Tariff Advisory Board for relief, and who have placed their arguments before the board. I have in my hand here the argument which was advanced before the board by Mr. Cecil Delworth, of Weston, Ontario, in which there are a few points that I wish to bring to the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite. To begin with, let me say that in Cleveland a few months ago, last fall I think it was, the United States offered prizes in an endeavour to find out the champion state and the champion grower of two varieties of vegetables, celery and cauliflower. They threw that competition open to Canada, and Canadian growers came home with both championships. It shows that we have efficient producers in this country. But what I particularly wish to draw attention to is that in the United States the gardeners and vegetable growers have three markets, two high priced and one low priced. The gardeners and vegetable growers of Canada have only one market, and that low priced. What are these markets? The United States growers have first the early market in their own country, which is the high priced market. Then they get our early and high priced market. They have also of course the later market in the United States, which is the low priced market. We permit this dumping of American produce, for it is nothing else. The Canadian grower has only one market, the low priced market. This gentleman says that the situation in ten years has had the effect of driving 85,000 of our people from their fruit and vegetable farms. He refers to one or two things which I should like to mention as I think they have an important bearing upon what I said in the beginning, that the lack of protection may be the cause of the high cost of living. He says:

> During 1925 we imported into Canada during the months of April, May, June and July approximately 264,000 bushels of tomatoes, valued at point of shipment at $904,000. This represents only a fraction of the money Canada paid for these tomatoes. You have to add freight rates, brokerage, icing charges and dealers' profits. It is quite within reason to assume that we paid a bill to the United States of nearly $2,000,000 for tomatoes that could have been produced in Canada.

He continues:

> If only one-half of these tomatoes had been produced in Canada it would have given employment from February to May to 1,200 men here.

I want for a moment to show how this works, and I am doing so because I have, in common with many other members, a number of market gardeners in my constituency. Let me quote the exact words of this gentleman:

> Allow me to tell you what happened in the tomato business this year. At the opening of the season the crop in the south was almost a failure and southern tomatoes sold in Ontario at exorbitant prices, Hot house tomatoes went up in sympathy, bringing as high as 70 cents per pound wholesale. A clear case of the public paying through the nose by depending on foreign supplies. Canadian producers, however, soon remedied this situation by large shipments of hothouse tomatoes from British Columbia. The price was cut approximately in half, which is a clear case of domestic production protecting the consumer from extortion by foreign countries. I would point out to you that every dollar paid for those tomatoes remained in Canada, and the brokerage, the freight, the tomatoes and the crates that held them. The Canadian grower, the railroad and the package manufacturer were all made more prosperous by that stroke of business. I would further point out to you that this gave visions to British Columbia growers of an expanded market for their product. It is an item in interprovincial trade which is undoubtedly one of the great factors in linking a country together and insuring its prosperity.
> As time elapsed a crop of tomatoes in a more northerly district of the United States began to ripen. This crop was not a failure. A few warm days and a huge surplus of southern tomatoes existed. Brokers in a frantic effort to save domestic markets re-shipped and re-shipped; trainloads of tomatoes began to crowd closer to the border. The invoice value was ridiculously low, the duty therefore was negligible, the additional freight rate on such a long haul was very little, so into Canada they came. Toronto in one week received seventy-three carloads. British Columbia had more tomatoes en route when this happened and they found a glutted market. Someone lost money. All dreams of interprovincial trade were shattered. We were all forced to sell tomatoes below cost of production for weeks. This is not healthy competition.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): What was the date when British Columbia could not sell tomatoes and they were coming in at 70 cents a pound from the States?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): This refers to 1925, I think.

That is not healthy competition. It is dumping, it is strangulation. We do not ask you to strangle trade with the United States. We merely ask you to prevent United States growers from strangling our industry by using Canada as a dumping ground for their surpluses. We ask you to insure life for our industry, which is perfectly capable and willing to supply Canadian consumers with a high grade article at a reasonable price.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is just the position which the Conservative party takes and has taken for years. We say that we should have a protective tariff, not to create monopolies, but to ensure that Canadian tomatoes, Canadian potatoes, Canadian meat, and so on, will be used on Canadian tables and not the surplus products of other countries produced under cheap conditions, for down in the southern states they have cheap negro and Mexican labour; they have not the overhead charges that we have. Surely it would not be the attitude of this government and of this parliament to say: Because some people think we shall have to pay a cent or two more for tomatoes, or some other fruit or vegtables, we do not care where these things come from, we are interested only in the producing of wheat; we are not concerned if our fruit growers are put out of business and lose their capital investment. That may be the attitude of some people, but I think it does not express the attitude of the men of the west. I believe they are too broad and liberal-minded to adopt such an attitude.

An hon. MEMBER: Liberal is right.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I was not using the word in a party sense. I would be very sorry to accuse the men of the west of being Liberals in view of the record that my hon. friends opposite have.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a great deal has been said as to whether tariffs are right or wrong. In this connection there is just one phase that I propose to deal with. Back in 1910 a large delegation representing the farmers of the country came down to interview the government of that time. One of the gentlemen on the deputation was a Mr. R. Mackenzie. I think he was secretary of the Manitoba Grain Growers' Association. I am going to quote one of the statements that he made, because it is a statement which has been repeated in this House, and I do not think it should be. He said:

> It is now conceded that the manufacturer adds to the selling price of his commodity the total amount of the protection granted him by the customs duty.

He proceeded to illustrate that statement by referring to boots and shoes manufactured in Canada in 1907 to the value of $20,264,686. In that year we imported boots and shoes to the value of $1,178,749. He said:

> On the imported we paid $353,600, and we also paid because of that duty on the boots and shoes manufactured in Canada just as much as we did on what was imported, we paid to the manufacturers $6,079,405.

That, he says, went into the pockets of the manufacturers. That argument, if I may dignify it by such a description, has been used in this House. It was used here by Mr. Crerar. I want to know if there is a gentleman here to-night who will subscribe to that doctrine that, as stated by Mr. Mackenzie, the total protective duty is added to the selling price of the commodity. Will anyone subscribe to that? Will any farmer representative subscribe to that?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I believe that is what is done in this country to a large extent.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Well, this is an experience meeting to some degree and I am glad to have the hon. gentleman's testimony. Let us consider it for a moment. We produce in Canada large quantities of wheat and we consume within the borders of the country, for seeding and food purposes, from eighty-five to ninety million bushels a year. We have a duty of 12 cents a bushel on wheat. This argument, therefore, if it applies to boots and shoes, applies to wheat.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Why not?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Because there is an exportable surplus of wheat; and furthermore the farmers are not organized.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): So that, according to my hon. friend, the argument applies only where there is not an exportable surplus. I shall have to leave the hon. gentleman to work that out. If that argument means anything it means that the farmers get over $10,000,000 a year extra on wheat because of that 12 cent duty. Take butter: we produce about 300,000,000 pounds of butter a year and levy a duty of 4 cents. We had an exportable surplus last year of about 24,500,000 pounds. According to the argument of Mr. Mackenzie, the 4 cents duty is paid by the people on all butter that is made in Canada as well as on all that is imported.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): According to my hon. friends the argument does not apply to eggs or anything that the farmer produces; it has reference only to things that are manufactured. Very well. I have stated my position and I leave it to my hon. friend to wrestle with the question at his leisure.

Even Adam Smith has acknowledged that a protective tariff may result in cheapening production. A common free trade fallacy is that the duty raises the cost irrespective of the volume of production not affected by the duty. That is the free trader's commonest fallacy. Price is determined by supply and demand and the duty can affect it only so far as the untaxed supply does not meet the demand. There are two cardinal errors free traders fall into: one is that the burden of the import duty must fall entirely on the consumer, and the other is that the tariff must increase the cost of the article taxed. Both these assumptions are fallacious; they are wrong, as time and history have demonstrated hundreds of times.

There are two distinct classes of import duties. There are the free trade duties imposed on such things as we do not and cannot produce in this country, such, for example, as tea and coffee. In such cases the whole amount of the duty is paid by the consumer. There is nothing to come in competition with such commodities, because they are not produced within our borders. There is another kind of duty also—protective duties levied on articles which are or can be produced in the country. Here the primary object is to increase home production and give employment. Here only a portion is subject to duty while a greater or lesser portion is free. Here there is active competition between the dutiable and the duty free portions, and obviously the importer cannot pass on the whole duty to the consumer. The extent to which he can do so depends on two things: the extent to which he will be able to pass the tax on depends, first, on the amount of competition between the home producers of the article, and, secondly, the amount of competition between the dutiable and the duty free supplies.

Mr. Bonar Law, discussing this point, used these words:

> The consumer pays the duty they say and I suppose most of them believe that this is an axiom of political economy. It is an axiom only of the platform; it is not an axiom of the study. No economist living or dead ever made such a statement. The extent to which the import duty will be paid by the consumer depends entirely on circumstances, and the chief circumstance on which it depends is the amount of the competition between the duty paying and the duty free supply.

I have heard the question asked, if the duty does not raise the price what is the use of it to the producer? I want to give the words of a political economist in answer to that question, because they enunciate the principle on which the Conservative party stands. The purpose of protection is not to raise prices but to defend and develop the purchasing power of the nation, one of the most important duties of government, and thereby maintain and improve employment, wages, and the standards of living of those dependent directly or indirectly on the nation's producing industries, which means, in effect, the entire population of the country. John Stuart Mill has said:

> The only mode in which a country can save itself from being a loser by the revenue duties imposed by other countries on its commodities is to impose corresponding duties on theirs.

Throw away that weapon and what have you left to protect yourself with? Lord Balfour on December 5, 1923, said:

> I have always been in favour of using our power of putting on taxation on foreign goods where it seemed desirable for the purpose of enabling us to negotiate arrangements with foreign countries upon basis favourable to our own manufacturers.

There is just one other matter to which I want to refer, and I do so because there was a reference made to it in the speech of the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) the other day. The hon. member gave a number of interesting figures to prove his contention that the farmers of Canada were more prosperous than the farmers of the United States. He quoted figures in regard to the decrease in the number of farms, and so on—all this with the purpose of showing that the farmers here were better off than those across the line. With that statement I have no wish to disagree, but I should like that hon. gentleman to carry his study a little further. I can assure any hon. member who wishes to spend a few interesting days considering this subject that he will find it very enlightening indeed to examine, as I have done, the census statistics of the United States for the year 1910 as compared with the year 1920. If he does so, he will find that in 1920 there were 191,073 fewer farms and 3,726,527 less improved acreage in twenty-four of the forty-eight states of the union. And in every one of these states there was an increase in the mortgage indebtedness in relation to land value. There are still twenty-four other states to be accounted for. Examining the figures, I found that these states that show an increase in the number of farms in 1920 as compared with 1910, and an increase in the improved farm acreage, together with a decrease in the mortgage indebtedness in relation to land values, are the southern states. What do we learn from that fact? We can get a lesson from it. The twenty-four states that show a decrease in the number of farms and improved farm acreage, together with an increase in the mortgage indebtedness, are northern states which, with one or two exceptions, have the same sort of climate as we have in Ontario and Quebec and the west. The people in those states which have to contend with climatic conditions similar to those in Canada have to spend large sums of money in providing for their families and stock.

Where the figures are unsatisfactory the farmers have to cope with such climatic conditions as the farmers in Canada must contend against, while those states which show an increase in prosperity are in the south where there is no winter, where capital investment is not high, and where in many instances the farms produce two or three crops annually. In the southern states, in addition, there is the advantage of cheap labour as compared with what our farmers have to pay in this direction. The farmers of the south raise their crops under more favourable conditions and they invade the markets of the north. The twenty-four states in the north ought to be more prosperous from the standpoint of population, for I venture to say that 75 per cent of the population of the United States is located in this northern territory. Take the cities of Chicago, Buffalo, Detroit—they are all situated in that area. Yet the states in which those cities are located are going backwards. Why? As the member for South Huron pointed out—and he was correct in what he said—these farmers are not getting on so well as the farmers in Canada and the reason is that they are bound to submit to the competition of the farmers in the southern states, where there is a warm climate and where there is every advantage to aid them in competition.

An hon. MEMBER: Would the northern farmers improve conditions by shutting out the southern agricultural products?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Yes, undoubtedly they would improve their condition if they could do so, but they cannot. They have to put up with that competition also, and that was the very point taken by the deputation of farmers representing the northern states who went to congress and said, "These are conditions which we are up against; you cannot protect us from the competition of our fellow farmers to the south, but you can give us protection against the farmers of Canada and the other farmers of the world." That is what was back of the Fordney-McCumber tariff; that is why it was put in force, because the farmers in the northern states demanded that protection. Some one will say, "Oh well, the competition of the south does not amount to anything." It amounts to a great deal; it is not merely competition in early vegetables, either. The state of Texas ranks second in the number of sheep, and has over 6,000,000 head of cattle, while in Canada we have about 9,000,000. Texas and Oklahoma together have almost as many cattle as there are in Canada.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They are not comparable with the northern cattle, as my hon. friend will admit.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): That I will at once agree to, but I am sure the hon. gentleman will also agree that if you have a piece of beef from a Canadian steer and a piece of beef from a Texas steer and a limited supply of money in your pocket, you will chew Texas beef. That is one thing I wish hon. gentlemen across the way would appreciate. Of course it is hard for ministers, drawing large salaries, to appreciate this fact—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend must not think that the ministers have always drawn large salaries and know nothing about lower salaries.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): No; my hon. friend has not always drawn a large salary and will not always draw one.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We are succeeding fairly well.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): That is all my hon. friends are succeeding in doing; drawing their salaries.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend forgets that we had an election recently.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): That is so, and I venture a prophecy, something I have not done before.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend did that before the last election, if he will look up his speeches at that time.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Then I will do it again. Before the next election comes around that genial smile will disappear from my hon. friend's face.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Never; I have carried it for twenty years.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The point I am making is that the hon. gentleman and others who sit with him do not need to worry about the prices of such things, and there are lots of men who are not ministers who do not need to worry. But I would impress upon hon. gentlemen that the high cost of living is a matter which must be considered. Meat is dear at one cent per pound if you do not have the cent; the cost of an article depends upon the ability to pay, whether or not the price is high. It does not make any difference to a millionaire whether or not beefsteak is a dollar a pound, but it makes a difference to the ordinary man. Hon. gentlemen opposite want to get it into their heads that they must adopt a policy which will enable workmen in Canada to secure employment at a wage which will permit them to buy decent food and decent clothing.

Mr. JACOBS: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question as a matter of information? To what does he attribute this sudden development of opposition on the part of the northern farmers to those of the south? They were there all the time, were they not.?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I do not think the word "sudden" is quite well placed there. I think it has been developing for years but it takes some time for people to learn wisdom; we have had that exemplified here, as my hon. friend must admit when he looks about him on the other side of the House. He must see how long it has taken hon. gentlemen over there, who are supposed to be intelligent, to really grasp these things; they do not seem to have time to study them and to get at the basic principles of economics. How much less then, should we find fault with ordinary people in the country to our south? But no matter whether the time was long or short it is indisputable that the Fordney-McCumber tariff was placed on the statute books of the United States because of the demand of the American farmers that they should have the American market for their produce, particularly as against the farmers of Canada. I say that is the policy of the party on this side of the House.

Mr. JACOBS: The hon. gentleman admits that the competition from the southern states is more serious than from Canada?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Let me tell my hon. friend this: If the reciprocity pact had gone into effect the farmers of Canada would have been up against competition from the south just as the farmers from the northern states were. We have a measure of protection but in my humble judgment it is not sufficient in many respects to give the farmer in this country the protection to which he is entitled. That is the point I make. I say that if the Liberal party had carried the reciprocity pact into effect and allowed the door to this country to be opened, then the farmers in Ontario who, according to the member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) are more prosperous than those in New York and Pennsylvania, would be in the same position as the farmers in the northern states—they would be subjected to competition from the southern farmers who are raising their produce under more advantageous conditions than the farmers to the north.

Mr. MILLAR: Will the hon. member explain why the Fordney-McCumber tariff has not fulfilled its purpose, and has not given satisfaction?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): My hon. friend has asked me why the Fordney-McCumber tariff has not produced the results desired. I think you can find the reason for it in the volume of importations as compared with the amount produced on the other side of the line. Do not forget the fact that the people of the United States do not all live in cities. The United States is still a great farming country with an immense surplus of farm products. They are up against, and must continue to be up against, the competition of the farmers in the southern states who have a milder climate. You cannot give protection against the climate, but the farmers over there do enjoy a certain amount of protection. They certainly enjoy an amount of protection by reason of the duty imposed against Canadian products, there is no question at all about that. They must enjoy protection or they would not have asked for an increase in the tariff rates such as they asked for not very long since.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The hon. gentleman will admit that a duty of 42 cents a bushel on wheat does not raise the price of wheat in the United States for the simple reason that they have an exportable surplus. The hon. gentleman laughed a moment ago when I gave him that argument

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): That is all very well but I wonder why that explanation has not occurred to the statesmen of the United States. What did they put a duty of 42 cents on wheat, a duty of 12 cents a pound on butter, and a duty of 8 cents a dozen on eggs? Why do they do these things? Is it because the statesmen in the United States, as well as in Japan, Germany and every other country on the face of the earth —who are raising their tariffs, especially since the war, with the idea of protecting their people against depreciated foreign currencies and low rates of wages, and to make good the loss of money which resulted in the war —have no intelligence; that the only persons who have intelligence are the gentlemen sitting on the treasury benches of Canada? This country is the only country in the world that I know of which, notwithstanding the economic and other changes which have taken place since the war, has lowered its tariff.

There are several other matters I should have liked to discuss for various reasons, but one reason has left the chamber—I refer to the Minister of Railways. There are a number of matters I should have liked to talk about, because I think there is room in that hon. gentleman's head for information. There are still some things he should know that he does not know, and that he particularly ought to know because he occupies an important position in the country. He is woefully deficient in the very elements of knowledge which he should possess as a minister of the crown.

Mr. JACOBS: Why not give him a few private lessons?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I will do that, but I will not say how many I will give him. It all depends, however, upon his acquisitiveness as a pupil. An hon. gentleman suggests that he should have these lessons as long as he lives. I suppose one would need to give him lessons for a long time in order to fill up the aching void in his brain?

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I submit this on behalf of the party of which I have the honour to be an humble member: The Conservative party does not now and has not in the past advocated a high tariff which will exclude foreign competition. We do not believe in that and we never have believed in it. But we do believe in developing Canadian industries which will employ Canadian workmen. We do believe in a policy which will keep our boys and girls employed in Canada rather than drive them to the United States. That is the policy we believe in, and I think it is one which should engage the attention of every man in this House no matter with what party he is affiliated. Let us give employment to our own children within the bounds of Canada, let us build up this Dominion. We can only do that by creating living conditions in this country such as will induce our young folks to stay here. Let us give reasonable, just and fair protection and not one fraction of a cent more. Above all let us give the basic industry of agriculture what it has never had in my judgment under any party in Canada, a square deal amongst the industries so far as the tariff is concerned. That is all I have to say in regard to the matter.

I have some information here which I obtained in answer to questions of mine in regard to the importations of butter from Australia and New Zealand, but I will not take the time to go into that matter to-night. We shall have an opportunity perhaps to bring the subject up when we are in committee. I will simply say that the figures which have been given to me in answer to questions which I put on the order paper show conclusively and beyond any shadow of doubt the disastrous results to Canada which have followed the action of the government in making a treaty arrangement with Australia something over a year ago. I am sure the government is convinced of that, but it is proved by the figures in my possession.

On motion of Mr. Arthurs the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Stewart (Edmonton) the House adjourned at 11.40 p.m.

Tuesday, March 1, 1927

The House met at three o'clock.

REPORT

Third report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills—Mr. Parent.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

Mr. A. M. YOUNG (Saskatoon) presented the first report of the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines as follows:

Your committee have considered Bill No. 75, an Act respecting the Essex Terminal Railway Company, and have agreed to report the same without amendment.

Your committee have also considered the following bills, and have agreed to report the same with amendments, viz:

Bill No. 74, an Act respecting the Canadian Transit Company.

Bill No. 68 (Letter Q-2 of the Senate) an Act to incorporate The Detroit and Windsor Subway Company.

Mr. SPENCER: I do not know whether I am in order or not, but I understood that at the first meeting of the railway committee a request was made that the minutes be kept of information obtained with regard to the Peace River railway. I did not observe that anything was mentioned to that effect in the report just read.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): That matter has not yet been disposed of. As soon as it is it will be incorporated in the report.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill No. 110, to incorporate the President of the Lethbridge Stake.—Mr. Jelliff.

SPRAY LAKES DEVELOPMENT

Mr. H. B. ADSHEAD (East Calgary): With the leave of the House, and for the information of hon. members, I beg to table a number of photographs in connection with the development of the Spray lakes power project.

DOMICILE OF MARRIED WOMEN IN DIVORCE PROCEEDINGS

Mr. W. J. WARD (Dauphin) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 111 respecting the domicile of married women in proceedings for divorce.

He said: The House will recall that this identical bill was presented a year ago, but owing to the turmoil of the session it did not receive its first reading. In spite of all our social legislation of the last twenty-five or thirty years there is one phase of the status of women that still remains somewhat antiquated. The legislation governing the domicile of married women in Canada is based on a bill which passed the British House of Commons in 1856, and that in itself should be evidence that something further is required in Canada to place women more on an equality, in the matter of divorce proceedings, with the rights they enjoy in other respects. If the House will allow the bill to get its first reading it can be fully explained on the second reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DEPARTMENTAL SUPPLIES AND SURPLUS GOODS

Mr. W. J. WARD (Dauphin) moved for leave to introduce a bill respecting the purchasing and disposal of departmental and other supplies and surplus goods.

He said: I have prepared a short statement respecting this bill which will give the House sufficient information for the first reading. The purpose of the bill is to provide machinery for central purchasing of all supplies, materials, goods, stores, and articles required by the government throughout the country, and for the disposal of surplus goods and junk, the property of the government. This bill simply proposes the re-grouping in a special department of all personnel engaged in this work now under the control of the several departments. There will be no increase in the present cost of performing the duties concerned. On the contrary, there will be a saving, which, it is estimated, will be ultimately about 40 per cent on the aggregate amount of the salaries at present paid. Under the present system each department has an organization to attend to purchasing, and I submit that the number of employees engaged in this work is too large. By bringing them all together, and by not filling vacancies occurring in the process of time the suggested saving of 40 per cent will be accomplished. Therefore, the usual objection of expense in the formation of a new department has no weight in this case, as there will be a decrease and not an increase in the amount chargeable to civil government. Moreover, in addition to the estimated saving in the payroll, office space, and so forth, a greater economic benefit will result from the obtaining of more advantageous prices because of the fact of centralization.

After careful consideration of conditions prevailing before the war, the salutary effect of the operation of the War Purchasing Commission and its successors, I am convinced that there is a general difference of 20 per cent in favour of centralized purchasing to the best possible advantage, as against independent departmental purchasing under political patronage.

With this short statement, Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will be willing to allow this bill to pass and I will endeavour more fully to explain its value when its second reading comes up.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Ward that the bill be read the first time:

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): I do not know what the bill contains, Mr. Speaker, but judging by the title and the explanation just given I would like to point out that it may be in conflict with the rules of this House.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. gentleman state why? Is it because it involves expenditure?

Mr. GUTHRIE: And the disposal of government property as well.

Mr. SPEAKER: Under the supervision of the departments. There is certainly a doubt, however, which I had in mind when the hon. gentleman was giving his explanation. We will let the matter stand.

Motion stands.

GERMAN REPARATIONS

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): Referring to an answer given yesterday to a question of mine regarding claims for losses sustained by the civilian population in the war, and to an article on the same subject which appeared in the newspapers this morning, I would like to ask the government when we may expect a declaration of the policy they intend to submit for the consideration of the House in dealing with these claims.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): I am only responsible, of course, for the answer given in the House yesterday, and can accept no responsibility for the article appearing in the press this morning. I regret that I cannot satisfy my hon. friend with a definite reply until I receive the final report of the commissioner.

POST OFFICE BOX RENTALS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. F. WELLINGTON HAY (North Perth): Might I ask the Postmaster General whether throughout Canada or Ontario or any particular section of the country he has increased the rentals of post office boxes in public buildings? I may say that when I was home on Saturday I found on my desk a notice that the rental of my box in the post office had been increased 100 per cent over night, and I was wondering if that was generally effective throughout Canada?

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): In answer to the hon. gentleman I would say that the rates in some sections have been raised in order to establish uniformity. In grades 4, 5 and 6 west of the great lakes the rate was higher than in those grades east of the great lakes, and to ensure uniformity the rates east of the great lakes have now been raised to equal those in the west. In large offices, grades 7 to 11, the maximum has not been raised but there has been a slight increase in the minimum rate according to the sizes of the boxes, which are graded A, B, C and D. In grades 2 and 3 there has been a slight increase where the free delivery system is in practice in order to discourage as much as possible the double service which we are compelled to carry on, but in no case does the increase reach the cost of administration in keeping up that service.

Mr. HAY: Will the minister say whether that applies to all rentals or just to public buildings owned by the government?

Mr. SPEAKER: There can be no discussion in matters of this kind.

Mr. VENIOT: That applies to public buildings owned by the government. not to buildings the rentals of which are paid by the postmasters.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the Postmaster General say whether any steps are being taken—

Mr. SPEAKER: No discussion may ensue.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This is another question. Are any steps being taken to collect the arrears due from the people of the east?

Mr. VENIOT: There are no arrears due from the people of the east.

Mr. McGIBBON: I would like to ask the Postmaster General if it is the policy of his department to dismiss postmasters throughout the country without notice?

Mr. VENIOT: An answer will be given to that in good time.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT LOANS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): I would like to direct a question to the government and more particularly to the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke). I received a letter to-day from a returned man in the Fraser valley in which he states that he is the owner of thirty acres of land, to which he has a clear title. He applied to the local supervisor of the Soldier Settlement Board for a loan of $2,000 for the purpose of building a barn on his property, and was advised that no further loans would be granted. I would like to ask the minister if it has been decided to grant no further loans to the returned men, and if so, when that decision was made?

Hon. ROBERT FORKE (Minister of Immigration): I am not exactly sure, but I think all loans have been stopped. However, I will make inquiries and will be prepared to give a definite answer to-morrow if my hon. friend will repeat his question.

RURAL MAIL BOXES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): I would like to ask the Postmaster General if he can give the House any idea as to when his department will secure a new supply of boxes for rural mail routes, as several routes are being held up at present?

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): There are no routes being held up at present, because even if we had a supply of boxes we would not undertake to distribute them in winter. I expect to have the supply of boxes in ample time to establish whatever routes may be agreed upon in the proper season.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE.

The House resumed from Monday, February 28, the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of ways and means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Coote.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in rising to offer a few observations on the motion of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) that you do now leave the chair, may I observe at the outset that the discussion in which this House has been engaged during the past ten or twelve days is always considered one of the important debates of a session of parliament. I think the House will agree that in the present instance the debate so far has been maintained upon a high level of excellence. Much information has been given, much information has been received, and the discussion which has taken place will prove profitable to all sections of the House, and I trust also to all sections of the country. I am glad to say also, that during this debate the amenities of public life and the amenities of parliamentary debate have been well maintained. It is a good thing for the House and a good thing for parliament that this should be so. But having said so much I must point out that when we tender to hon. members opposite our felicitations, or our congratulations upon their efforts, it must not be taken that in so doing we commit ourselves in any degree to their proposals or acquiesce in their program. I state this because during the course of the present debate observations have been made on several occasions from various sections in the House to the effect that as we do not more vigourously attack our opponents there must be something in the nature of coöperation between the two old, long established parties in regard to the present budget proposals of the Finance minister. That idea seems to have become prevalent in some sections of the House. Now our regard for the amenities of parliamentary debate must not be taken as acquiescence, nor must our congratulations to our opponents upon a clear business statement or a finished oratorical performance be considered as an endorsement of their proposals. My desire is to make this point as clear as possible because, on more than one occasion the suggestion has been made by hon. members who should know better, that in some way or other the official opposition was intriguing with the government in regard to the present budget proposals. I fancy that when my remarks this afternoon have been concluded hon. members in all sections of the House will agree that one matter is clear, and that is that His Majesty's loyal opposition in this House does not countenance, does not approve, and does not endorse the budget presented by the Finance minister.

But before entering upon a discussion of the question raised by the speech of my hon. friend the Finance minister, may I look for a moment at the amendment which has been offered to the House by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) representing a section of this House, called, I think, the Progressives of Alberta. My hon. friend from Alberta has moved an amendment to the motion that you, Mr. Speaker, do now leave the chair which amendment is in some respects a sort of curiosity. Let me read the first clause of that amendment in order that my remarks in regard to it may be understood. The first clause reads:

> That all the words after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> Whilst recognising the advisability of certain minor changes proposed, this House regrets that the budget as presented by the hon. Minister of Finance contains no effective provision for the reduction in the high cost of living, in so far as such is due to the protective tariff.

The House will note that there is no direct averment in the amendment that the protective tariff has anything to do with the high cost of living. At most there is only an implication or a suggestion that possibly it may have or might have such an effect. The draughtsman of the amendment had no confidence in it himself or his resolution would not have been framed in such uncertain, almost meaningless language. I shall I think be able to demonstrate as I proceed with my remarks, that the present high cost of living in this country is not attributable in any degree to the protective policy in Canada, but is attributable to three main causes: First, to the burden of taxation; second, to high freight costs; thirdly, to the profits and commissions of middlemen, wholesalers and retailers. These are the three controlling factors in regard to the high cost of living, and the question of a customs tariff enters into the matter very, very little, if at all. Now as soon as I noticed that particular clause in the amendment of my hon. friend from Macleod the thought at once struck me that it was probably put there to prevent the official opposition agreeing with his party and himself in this amendment. With that clause we express our dissent, our positive dissent. We believe that it is not a genuine assertion of political principle by the hon. member who moved it. At most it is only a gesture, it is not a positive declaration on the part of his colleagues and himself. But if it were such we would equally reject it.

In regard to the other clauses of the amendment I have not very much to say, but what I have to say may be gathered as I proceed with my remarks upon the main motion. We as an opposition, Mr. Speaker, do not object to everything that is contained in the budget statement. We are able to congratulate the government and the minister upon some things. We congratulate him upon his lucidity, and upon his conciseness. We join with the government in rejoicing that Providence has once more blessed this country with an abundant crop. We join with them, and with others, in rejoicing that the financial effect of that crop has been reflected in every corner of this Dominion and in the trade of this country. These are matters upon which we can all agree, but there are other important matters in the budget to which we offer substantial and formidable objection, and I will try to deal with them this afternoon as briefly as possible.

In the first place we have a most unsatisfactory statement in regard to the finances of the Dominion. We have again it is true the perennial claim of the present Finance minister that this government has greatly reduced taxation in Canada. When speaking of it as a perennial claim I do so in light of the facts laid before the House in the very able speech of my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) a few days ago, and my desire is if possible to emphasize the contentions of my hon. friend for the purpose of drawing them as forcibly to the attention of the House and the attention of the people of Canada as is possible, and particularly for the purpose of inviting the Minister of Finance, before this debate closes, to give this House some explanation of the apparent irreconcilability between the various statements in his budget address and the statements contained in the Public Accounts of Canada which have been laid before this parliament as true statements of our national finances.

The Minister of Finance announced a day or two ago that he had had the pleasure of delivering four budget speeches in this House. That is so, and I have under my hand now the four budget speeches which he delivered. It is my intention to read an extract from each of them in order to give the House exact knowledge of what the minister said and of the impression which the minister, by his statement, created upon parliament and the country. Take his statement as delivered in 1924 in regard to the finances of this country. The minister said:

> These two amounts, totalling $9,622,760.37, together with $20,786,349 surplus of revenue over total expenditures, reduce our net public debt as of March 31, 1923, by the amount of $30,409,109.37.

That was the statement made by the minister in his first budget speech. I pass now to his budget speech of 1925 and find the following language:

> The public debt was decreased by the amount of $35,993,593.86. Since confederation decreases of debt have occurred in only nine of the fifty-seven years completed; $35,993,593.86 is the largest decrease of any of those nine years. being $10,375,758.83 greater than that for any previous year since confederation.

Those are two reductions. Before passing from this last budget let me refer to that part of his speech where the minister indulges in what one may call another prophecy. He predicts that for the next year, that is for 1925, he will have a deficit of $13,703,000. Actually that deficit did not occur because the public accounts show that he closed that year with a bare surplus of $353,000. I now take the third speech of the minister delivered on the 15th April, 1926, and quote from it as follows:

> To obtain the net debt as of March 31, 1926, of $2,395,084,685.59, the excess of $11,557,000 of these special expenditures over these special revenues should be deducted from the surplus of $33,910,000 mentioned above, which will give a reduction of debt during the year of $22,353,000. May I again emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that this reduction of debt is net, clear of everything?

That is the third reduction announced by the Minister of Finance. The last, of course, was announced in the budget speech delivered a few days ago, as reported at page 387 of Hansard, where he said:

> We estimate that at the close of this year there will be a further reduction of some $31,000,000 in our net debt.

As that is merely an estimate, I am not going to hold my hon. friend closely to the figure stated because the present financial year will not be closed until the 31st March next. I will therefore deal with his statements in regard to the other three years. What do we find? This government entered office originally on Decemer 29, 1921, so that for the year ended 31st March, 1922, it could not be fairly held responsible for more than three months of the financial operations. Therefore we will take the first year of operation by the present government, not the year ending 31st March, 1922, but the year commencing 31st

March, 1922. According to the Public Accounts, page 46, we find that the net debt of Canada then amounted in round figures to $2,422,000,000. From the Finance department we find a statement issued showing that on the 31st December last, the net debt stood at $2,343,000,000. By the simple process of subtracting one from the other we find that there has been a reduction of $79,000,000 in the net debt as between the 31st March, 1922, and the 1st January last. This is what the public accounts of Canada disclose.

But there is another side to the story. As pointed out by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) a few days ago, we have in this country another debt, a debt which is secured by the bonds of the Dominion of Canada, a debt which is always set forth in the balance sheet of the Dominion of Canada. If hon. members will turn to page 3 of the Public Accounts, they will find the balance sheet as it stood on the 31st March last, and it shows on the liability side of the ledger:

Funded debt, per schedule T, $2,471,000,000, in round figures.

If hon. members will turn to the public accounts for the year 1922, they will find that the funded debt of this country at that time stood at $2,420,000,000 odd. There has therefore been, during the last five years, an increase of $51,000,000 in the funded debt of Canada, that is the debt for which we have bound ourselves to the purchasers of our bonds and securities, a debt which at maturity we must pay, principal and interest. It stands on the government books as of 31st March, 1926, at precisely $51,000,000 more than it was when this government took power in 1922.

Let us take the $79,000,000 reduction in the debt of Canada shown by the public accounts and then let us see how the balance really stands in regard to the issue of treasury notes in this Dominion. We know that the treasury of Canada from time to time issues large amounts of Dominion notes. This is done for the convenience of banking and commerce. It is done upon the principle of the operation of the federal reserve banks in the United States in order to assist the financial trade requirements of Canada. Every Dominion note issued is a debit obligation of this country. True, that note can be handed about from bank to bank and from person to person, but it is merely a promissory note of the Dominion of Canada unless that note is backed to the extent of one hundred per cent by gold or specie in the vaults of the Dominion of Canada. Now what was the circulation of our Dominion notes, and what was our cash reserve, in the year 1922?

In March, 1922, the circulation of Dominion notes—a debt of this country—was $241,000,000. Against this amount we held in gold and specie, $85,000,000, only, or 35 per cent of our note circulation. The other 65 per cent of that circulation was a direct debt of this country. Now turn to the present time. In the year 1926 the note issue of the Dominion was $182,800,000, against which we held in gold and specie $99,000,000, or a reserve of 54 per cent. The other 46 per cent of the issue of Dominion notes was a debt of this country, just as much as the bonds and other securities of the country are a debt. The government in the intervening years had withdrawn from our note circulation $58,000,000, which consequently disappeared from the indebtedness of Canada Of the $79,000,000 reduction in our net debt, $58,000,000 of that reduction was achieved simply by recalling Dominion notes. Now $58,000,000 from $79,000,000 leaves $21,000,000 as the net reduction of debt at the hands of the government of this country during a period of five years. What then becomes of the announcements of the Finance minister in his four budget speeches? Where has that money been applied? Let us take his announcements again.

On April 10, 1924, he announced a reduction to March 31, 1923, of $30,409,000; on March 24, 1925, a reduction from March 31, 1924, of $35,993,000; on April 15, 1926, an estimated reduction of $22,353,000, which actually became $27,706,000. Leaving out altogether the announcement made in February this year, the payments on the public debt announced by the Minister of Finance for those three years totaled $94,108,000. Yet this government has actually reduced the debt of this country by a sum of only $21,000,000. It has been instrumental in paying off only $21,000,000 of net debt and during the same period has increased our funded debt by $51,000,000.

What I request of the Minister of Finance, in closing this debate to-day, is that he explain to this House what we cannot explain to ourselves, why his budget statements do not agree with the financial statements of his department placed upon the table of the House. I cannot reconcile the two, nor do I believe any one in the House can, and I therefore think it is the duty of the Minister of Finance to give a clear and definite statement as to what has become of these payments which he says have been made in reduction of the debt. Any one can take this volume of Public Accounts and figure it out as we have figured it out; and he will come to the same conclusion. I do not suggest for one moment that the money has been misappropriated or misapplied. What I say is that it never existed, that it was mythical, that the debt reductions were purely mythical, purely imaginary, the purest kind of sham. But these mythical reductions have been announced for electioneering purposes throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion of Canada upon many occasions, although as a matter of fact there has been little actual reduction in the national debt of Canada in five years of Liberal rule, nor in the four years of Liberal rule during which the Finance department has been in charge of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance.

Take another instance of these misleading announcements which have been heralded throughout the country and have been imposed upon this House of Commons from time to time—the so-called reductions in taxation. Let us look at them for a minute. In his budget speech in 1924 the Minister of Finance announced a reduction in taxation of $24,000,000. In 1925 he was much more wary. On that occasion he said there would be a "substantial reduction." In 1926 he announced a reduction in taxation of $25,000,000, but he said that was only "estimated". In 1927, that is this year, he announced a further reduction of $27,000,000. Now why is it that these reductions are not reflected in the taxes paid by the people of this country. Why are these reductions not shown in the public accounts of this country?

Mr. ROBB: They are.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I submit they are not, and anyone can take the public accounts and satisfy himself in regard to the matter. On page 44 of the Public Accounts you will find a statement showing all the receipts of the Dominion government from every source from the year 1868. I will grant, Mr. Speaker, that the total receipts mentioned in this table do not represent the actual taxation of the people. All one can say is that the great bulk of these total receipts on page 44 represent actual taxation. Now turning to the statement of receipts and expenditures for the last year, 1926, the total revenue for that year, as shown on page 45, was $382,000,000, and 95 per cent of that amount was made up of taxes imposed upon the people of Canada. I am assuming for the purposes of argument that the House will agree that the customs tariff is a tax, and if you will agree to that, then 95 per cent of the whole amount contributed to our treasury through the revenues of the country was made up of taxation. Now what do the figures show in these interesting accounts?

Let us take the last five years of this government's operations, and we find the average return from taxation to this government in the last five years to be $387,780,000. Was that great or was it not? We can judge only by comparing this statement with the figures in the five years preceding, under another government. You will find that the average taxation for the five years previous was $348,500,000. So during the last five years this government has raised by taxation from the people of this country $39,280,000 more per year than was raised by its predecessors. Now what becomes of these wild statements of the Minister of Finance made annually in his budget speeches to the effect that he has reduced the taxation by $24,000,000, $25,000,000 and $27,000,000, when the truth is, according to the public accounts laid before this House by his own department, he has taken well nigh $40,000,000 more per annum out of the pockets of the people by taxation than did his predecessors in the previous five years? What does that mean to the people of Canada? It is the burden of taxation that counts in regard to government financing; it is not the bulk amount of the tax, but the burden which that tax imposes upon the individual, that counts.

Now I take for the purposes of this illustration the statement made in this House by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr Malcolm), in a very excellent speech which he delivered here last week, and for which he is to be complimented by the whole House of Commons. I take his statement of population for the year 1926, because he gets it from the officials of his own department. The population in that year was 9,390,000, and I find that the increased taxation during the last five years was $39,280,000 per annum Divide one by the other, and you find that for every man, woman and child in this country there has been a positive increase of taxation to the extent of $4.18 per annum For a family of five it would mean $20.90 per annum of increased taxation imposed by this government on the people of this country, over and above the taxation which was imposed for the five years before this government came into power. In making that statement I must make the further reservation, that five per cent of the amounts I have mentioned should come off, because 5 per cent does not represent taxation, but 95 per cent of the amounts which I have stated is derived from and represents actual taxation

So that, instead of saying $4.18 per head, I should possibly say $3.98 per head. However the burden is enormous whichever way you take it, and these annual announcements of the Minister of Finance that he has greatly reduced the taxes of the people of this country are again purely imaginary. I object on the part of those who sit around me in this section of the House, to financial methods of this kind. We object that the financial statement laid before this House by the Finance minister in his budget speech was not a clear, fair and open presentation of the actual finances of the country. Where the minister's statement does not agree with the public accounts, we are bound to accept the statement contained in the public accounts, and I ask the Finance minister, before this debate closes, to explain to the House these very evident and serious discrepancies. We object to this budget because it has positively increased the burden of taxation on the people of the Dominion. These burdens should be lower, and they should have been lowered years ago. I have never yet heard a minister in this House, nor a Liberal speaker on a political platform in this Dominion, admit that the Liberal government itself has been the cause of much of the increased taxation. The other day a cheer went up in this chamber by government supporters when the minister announced a 20 per cent cut in the sales tax. Now it sounds as if he had done something substantial when he says, "I have reduced the sales tax by 20 per cent." The sales tax was five per cent, and he has taken one per cent from it, but for years he retained that sales tax upon the necessities of life at the rate of five per cent in spite of our protests. What Liberal speaker in parliament or out of parliament ever told the people that Liberal government had increased the sales tax? The Liberals placed that burdensome imposition on the people of Canada. When my hon. friend and his government took office in December, 1921, it is true we had the sales tax. It was a war measure imposed as a war tax, but it was only a tax of three per cent. At once upon taking office this government increased it to four and a half per cent; then they increased it to six per cent, despite our protests and objections. Then they found what we pointed out they would find, that they had actually created a hindrance to the commercial business of the country and they had to reduce it to five per cent. Now, with a great flourish of trumpets, the announcement is made that the sales tax has been reduced to four per cent. That sale tax forms one of the heavy burdens upon the common people of this country. It is one of the direct causes of the high cost of living in Canada. Does the government not realize that when the ordinary citizen of Canada goes out to buy a hundred dollars worth of the necessaries of life for himself, his wife and children, on every hundred dollars worth which he purchases—I do not mean foodstuffs but other necessaries—the treasury of Canada exacts five dollars from him or did so last year? This year it is going to exact from him four dollars on every hundred dollars' worth of purchases. In future when he buys a hundred dollars' worth of goods he can say to himself, "Well, I saved a dollar this time because this good Liberal government has taken one dollar tax off every hundred dollars' worth of purchases." He will now pay $4 of taxes instead of $5 upon every hundred dollars of purchases. That is the only relief the ordinary citizen of Canada has obtained through the budget. It has been called a rich man's budget, and so it is in every sense of the word.

I do not offer objection to the cut which has been made in the income tax. I say this reduction has been long delayed. This government has taken a long time to make up its mind to reduce taxation, but having decided to do something, it has certainly had regard for those who are best able to pay money into the treasury, and has had little regard for the ordinary man or woman, the ordinary citizen of Canada. To the ordinary citizen it hands back one dollar on every purchase of one hundred dollars' worth of the necessaries of life, while to the rich man it says again this year, as it said last year, "There is a plum for you in the budget reduction."

I had this matter figured out in the government department of taxation, and I find that in the case of the man with an income of $60,000 a year—and there are many in that class—the government has granted a reduction of $1107 on income tax, to the man with an income of $40,000 a year there is a reduction of $589; to the man enjoying an income of $20,000 a year, the government has granted relief to the extent of $154; to the man enjoying an income of $10,000 a year the reduction is $29, but to the great mass of the people of Canada the reduction is a single dollar on every purchase of a hundred dollars' worth of the necessaries of life.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I think it would be only fair to state that the business profits tax has been abolished.

Mr. STEVENS: That is not the question.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have not discussed the business profits tax. That was a war tax put on for the purposes of the war. I think it was taken off by the government that preceded the present Liberal government.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My recollection is that it was, and there are some accumulation and arrears still to be collected, but the tax was taken off some years ago. However, it was a war tax when it was put on and was not intended to be permanent. The sales tax was similarly put on as a war burden and not intended to be permanent. It should at least have been cut in two this year and wiped out entirely next year. I can assure hon. members that the people of this country would have appreciated such a reduction although the rich men might possibly have had to wait a year or two longer for their relief. There is a tremendous number of people in this country who would have been cheered by the news that five dollars had been taken off every hundred dollars' worth of purchases of the necessaries of life which they might purchase from month to month throughout the year 1927. We object to the principle upon which this reduction of taxation has been arranged by the government. We do not think it is a proper one. We do not think the government has followed the principle of the greatest good to the greatest number. These reductions emphasize much more than any words of mine the fact that the present budget is in reality a rich man's budget and not a budget in the interests of the whole people of the Dominion.

Something has been said about the high cost of living; I think I said something myself at the beginning of my remarks on that subject. Is it not astounding, as pointed out by my hon. friend from West Calgary (Mr. Bennett), that the cost of living in this country in the month of December last, 1926, was higher than it has been since the year 1922 when this government came into power? The figures submitted to the House by the hon. member for West Calgary are not such as the government can quarrel with, for they are prepared by this government itself for the information of the House and the people of Canada. The officials of this government have established that the cost of living to-day is almost at the peak since the year 1922. It costs the average family of five to-day, for the supply of the actual necessaries of life, $21.41 a week. If taxation has been reduced, if conditions have in any way been made easier, why is the reduction not reflected in the cost of living in Canada? Why has the cost of living almost reached its maximum to-day? With a knowledge of the fact that the cost of living was about at its peak before the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and before the Minister of Finance, why could not the minister have been sufficiently courageous to relieve the situation by abolishing the 5 per cent sales tax altogether and so give the ordinary people a chance?

Another thing to which we object is the fact that the budget gives no intimation whatever that the government is disposed in any way to economize in the management of the affairs of the country. This year in the main estimates the government proposes to spend $6,500,000 more than it did last year. We have not yet had the supplementary estimates, but no doubt they will be very substantial. But, as I say, in the main estimates alone we have a proposed expenditure of six and a half millions more than we spent last year. What I have to say about the estimates is this. If the government had any real desire to economize they could take that blue volume of estimates and, sitting around a table with the Minister of Finance and a blue pencil, they could go over the estimates page by page. If this were done it would be found that large items on every page could be blue pencilled. A vast sum of money could be saved this very year and no public service in the country would in any way be hindered or embarrassed.

An hon. MEMBER: Militia?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, I have a word to say about the militia. If there is one respect in which this government has been tardy—yes, careless—in the performance of its duties, if there is one respect in which it has absolutely failed, it is in the maintenance of a proper militia force in Canada. The most hopeful sign I have seen in regard to the present government in many a long day is the fact that to-day we have a gallant soldier (Mr. Ralston) at the head of the Department of National Defence, and his presence in the government must mean something, for we see a very substantial increase in the vote for national defence this year. We have been a long time waiting for this, and we are not here either to challenge or to criticise the increase, but to support the government in respect of it. But apart from that there are many other things in this blue book of estimates for 1927 that might still receive the attention of the government. Go over the harbours and rivers vote; go over the public buildings vote; take the estimates page by page, and you can eliminate millions upon millions of dollars. If that were done the government would have some money to spend on some real development work in the Dominion.

I went over the estimates the other night, and I found what I have found in them every year since this government took office. One thing they have never failed to do, is to increase the public service of Canada. There has never been a year that has not shown a substantial increase in the number of civil servants, with a correspondingly large increase in the amount of taxation thereby necessary. Save only three departments every department shows an increase of civil servants this year. I have them all tabulated, and I think there are only three departments that do not show an increase. The total number of new civil servants for whom salaries will have to be provided, if these estimates go through, will be 168, and the additional salary list amounts to $317,000, including, of course, statutory increases. But it has been so every year since this government assumed office. In regard to one thing, I think, we are all of one mind: the public service of Canada is overmanned. That being so, why further increase the number of civil servants? Those hon. members who were in the House when the late Frank McCrea was here must at that time have been convinced that the departments of the civil service were overmanned, not only the inside service but the outside service as well. Frank McCrea made it very clear. Why, therefore, increase the number? I am not asking the government to displace people who are now in the service, but there is no reason why the list should be increased every year by new appointments, when the government must know in its heart that the departments are overstaffed, as they have been for the last twenty-five years. Can we not call a halt in this matter? Can not a large sum of money be saved in this respect as well as in other respects in the present estimates?

In one respect the Minister of Finance has been fairly cautious in his predictions in regard to his financing during the current year 1927. This, I think, is the only occasion on which he has presented a budget when he has not given a fairly good forecast, based of course on estimate, of what would happen financially during the ensuing twelve months. For some reason only a very slight reference is made to such matters in the speech the minister delivered on February 17, although he did say that he estimated that the revenues for the next twelve months would be equal to those of the last twelve months, placing the revenue of the last twelve months at $393,000,000. But in announcing his reduction of taxation he had to point out that the figure just quoted would have to be reduced by $27,000,000, leaving him an estimated revenue of only $366,000,000 for the ensuing twelve months. Now the government has brought down estimates for $354,000,000 odd, besides railway estimates for $22,518,000 odd, making a total of some $376,000,000. Then we will have to deal with the supplementaries as well. I assume the supplementaries will be fairly substantial this year. Would I be right in placing them at $20,000,000, or is that too high? This year we expect that something will be done in the estimates for old age pensions, and we anticipate as well an inclusion in the supplementaries of a substantial sum to take care of maritime rights legislation. Is it therefore too much to say that the supplementaries will amount to $20,000,000? I do not think so. Well, if they do, then we have a program for expenditures in the next twelve months amounting to $396,000,000, while we have an estimated revenue of only $366,000,000.

In face of these facts the Minister of Finance comes to the House and declares that he expects to finance a good deal of the maturing obligations of the country next year out of ordinary revenue. The thing is impossible on the face of it. His estimates may be wrong, and I must say that they have been very vaguely placed on Hansard in the budget speech; this is the first time he has not given us a really concise statement as to the future financial operations of the government. What is next year's financing to be? On November 1 next, we have bonds maturing to the extent of over $29,000,000; these should be met. On November 15 next we have more maturing bonds amounting to about $8,000,000, which should be paid. Then again on December 1, we have further obligations maturing amounting to over $63,000,000 making in all, as the minister says, about $100,000,000. His statement in this House a few days ago of his expectations in regard to government financing this year, if it means anything at all, means that he will be met with a deficit of from $20,000,000 to $30,000,000 on the program which has been laid before parliament, and will have nothing on hand out of which to pay maturing loans.

Is it not time, as suggested on this side of the House, for some settled policy to be adopted by this government in regard to the national debt of Canada? Some very constructive suggestions have been made during this debate. The hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) elaborated a plan which will require grave consideration and examination; he has offered a most constructive suggestion to this government, but will they do anything in regard to it? The hon. member for Toronto East Centre (Mr. Matthews) also brought this matter definitely to the attention of the government in a very carefully considered proposal; hon. members in other quarters of the House have made constructive suggestions also, but will the government act upon any of them or will they continue this go-as-you-please sort of financing in which they have indulged for the last five years? Will they continue this happy-go-lucky policy in regard to these maturing obligations, or will they themselves suggest some definite scheme, either by the annual appropriation of a fixed amount, or by some manner of conversion, or by some device of a sinking fund, or by some other definite plan, whereby we may take care of the enormous national debt of Canada as it matures and whereby this debt may not be spread over too many future generations? Why, Sir, if this government had shown the least anxiety; if within the past three years it had displayed a little business sagacity and had prevented that raid upon the treasury which robbed us of anywhere from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000 as disclosed in the customs and excise scandal, we might have had something substantial with which to discharge our obligations. We could probably have taken care of the whole one hundred million dollars maturing this year. These are some of the reasons why we who sit to your left, Sir, are opposed to this budget, but there are other matters, and if I do not weary the House too much I would like to dwell upon some of these.

We object that during its whole career the Liberal government has failed to initiate or suggest any real progressive policy for the development of Canada. For nearly six years this government has simply rested upon its oars; it has closed its ears to the appeals of our citizens east, west and centre, and we stand to-day after six years of rule by this Liberal government so far as the development of Canada is concerned practically where we started. Does the government realize that for four or five years at least appeals have been made year by year and almost month by month by the people of the three maritime provinces, asking for the redress of their grievances and for the righting of the injustices under which they are suffering? Does this government realize that year after year it has turned a deaf ear to these appeals? Never a hand turned, and never an action of any kind until on the eve of a general election, Sir Andrew Duncan was called upon to make an investigation. Why did not the government act of its own motion in these intervening years? Simply because of its supineness, its lack of initiative, its incapacity to deal with the big problems which confront this Dominion. This lack of initiative has had just as baneful an effect in western Canada as in eastern Canada. Why, Sir, let me refer to a famous speech made by the leader of the government in the constituency of North York in September, 1925, when he acknowledged to the electors that the country was practically stagnating. He said, "I cannot go on any longer in this way; I am not able to deal with the great problems which confront the government of this country." He made that confession to the people of Canada, and said, "This is the time to march forward." The people have given him a new lease of power and have placed him firmly in control of the government of this country, and the people will expect from now on that he and this government will do something substantial towards the development of Canada.

We hear criticism from the west in regard to railway rates. I listened very attentively to a very able speech on that subject delivered last night by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young). The situation in western Canada with regard to railway rates is a disgrace to this country, and has been for some time past. Cannot the government suggest a remedy for the existing situation in that regard? Parliament declared in June 1925 that a certain line of action should be taken in regard to railway rates, but nothing has been concluded in the interval. The whole of northern Saskatchewan and northern Alberta are suffering from an unjust discrimination in connection with grain rates. Until yesterday my impression was that this discrimination had been removed a month or two ago, but I learned from the speech of the hon. member for Saskatoon last night that discrimination still exists. What is the government going to do? We have a Board of Railway Commissioners; are they not capable of dealing with this problem? I make no reflection upon the members of the board; they are human and one man can only do the work of one man. The applications which have come before the board are applications requiring very grave consideration; they have great ramifications, but if we have not enough railway commissioners to promptly deal with these important questions, let us change the system; either let us have more commissioners or let us make two boards out of the commissioners we now have. I never could understand why it was necessary to have six commissioners dealing with one case. In the province of Ontario we suffered in the same way in the appellate division of the Supreme court, and there we simply divided the judges into two courts, which removed the difficulty at once. Could this not be done in regard to the railway board? It is a scandal that in this country a great question like that of the freight rates of western Canada should be held up for a year and a half—yes, well on to two years—that it is still under consideration, still under argument, and the people of northern Alberta, northern Saskatchewan and northern Manitoba still overcharged two cents per hundred in respect of their grain shipments. Can the government do nothing with respect to that situation? We can bring it to their attention, we can force it to their notice, but we as an opposition have no power to move in the matter. I said that the government have little of initiation about them. I am afraid it is too true. I have suggested a solution; will the government even examine my suggestion, or will they be content simply to twirl their thumbs, to pursue their happy-go-lucky course—the course they have pursued up to now—dreaming away their time, neglecting their opportunities, enjoying the sweets and emoluments of office, and allowing the people of the three prairie provinces —at least in the northern sections—to pay two cents a hundred extra on the grain that goes out of that country? This is a sleepy government. I suggest a motto for this government; it occurs to me now. I do not suppose any members of the government will recognize this motto save my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) as it occurs in the Book of Proverbs. The motto of this government should be:

> Yet a little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep.

If we can, we are going to awaken the government with respect to various questions. One question is the freight rates question. Another question is the development of the new territory in that western country. To most of us it is a revelation to know that we have still a perfect western empire ready for settlement. All we require is railway facilities and people to settle that country. I regret to say that I feel humiliated when I come to the question of settlement in western Canada. I believe the government will feel humiliated also. I do not blame, I cannot blame, the present Minister of Immigration for the sad condition that now exists. He is not responsible for it, nor can the staff of the Immigration department be blamed; it is a well-run department, well staffed with capable men. But I blame the government. The whole policy of the government with regard to immigration has been a policy of exclusion. There is nothing we want in Canada so much as people, and the government has done nothing so definitely as excluding people from Canada.

What, Mr. Speaker, is the result of the efforts of this government in regard to immigration in the three prairie provinces? It is a sad commentary on the efforts of this government to settle these great provinces. We know that a census is taken in the three prairie provinces every five years. One was taken in June, of last year. What does it disclose? It discloses that the five year effort of the Liberal government to bring settlers to the province of Manitoba has resulted in an increase of population in the province of 28,938, or a four and a half per cent increase in five years. We know that the natural increase is one per cent per annum. That increase is obtained by reason of the fact that there are more births than deaths. In five years we should have had an increase in population in Manitoba of about 32,000 people, the natural increase without a single immigrant coming into that province. We have an increase shown by the census returns of only 28,938 all told. What has become of our natural increase? What has become of the eighty or ninety thousand people which this government has brought into that country annually? At the opening of this session I said that I thought there was a considerable exodus from western Canada to the United States, but I was checked up by the Minister of Immigration who said such people were only going away to spend the winter in California or the like.

Mr. FORKE: I said they might be going there.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think on hearing these figures my hon. friend will revise that statement. What have the former increases been in Manitoba? In 1906, the population of Manitoba was 365,000. In 1911, it had risen to 461,000, an increase in five years of 94,000. From 1911 to 1916 it rose to 553,000, an increase in the five year period of 92,000. From 1916 to 1921—war years too—it rose to 610,000, an increase of 57,000; and from 1921 down to 1926, the increase was 28,938 souls, some three or four thousand less than the natural increase should have shown. I am sorry to say that the figures disclose something else. Four of the constituencies in that province have actually lost population. I do not know that I had better name them; anybody who gets this return from the Bureau of Statistics, the preliminary report of the census of Manitoba for 1926, can find these things out for himself. Take the province of Saskatchewan, a great province offering such fine opportunities for settlement. The increase during five years was 63,532, or nine per cent. They evidently retained their natural increase and got four per cent more. But listen to the figures: In 1906, Saskatchewan had 257,000 people; by 1911 the population had jumped to 492,000, an increase in five years of 235,000. From 1911 to 1916, under the Conservative regime, the population jumped to 647,000, an increase of 155,000 in five years. Under the Liberal government during the last five years the population has increased from 757,000 to 821,000, a paltry increase of 63,000 or nine per cent. And some of the constituencies in Saskatchewan have actually been reduced in population since the census of 1921.

Mr. FORKE: I do not want to interrupt, but my hon. friend will remember that during that period the great question of re-establishing the returned men was dealt with, and those figures were included.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That ought to make the population greater.

Mr. FORKE: I thought my hon. friend was counting the returned soldiers as immigrants.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am not talking of immigrants, I am talking of the total population. The point I am seeking to make is that the population is not by any means what it should be.

Now, take the province of Alberta. In 1906, that province had a population of 185,000. By 1911 it had jumped by 179,000 and reached 374,000. Then under the Conservative government from 1911 to 1916 it jumped again to 496,000, an increase in five years of 122,000. From 1916 to 1921, even in the war years, it jumped again by 92,000. For the last five years, under the present government, it has gone from 588,000 to 607,000, an increase of only 19,000 in the population in the great province of Alberta in five years. That is an increase of just 3½ per cent, or 1½ per cent less than the natural increase in that province. Where, we ask, have the people gone? We hope they have come to eastern Canada or gone to British Columbia. Certainly they are not to be found in the prairie provinces. The statement issued by the government itself through the Dominion Bureau of Statistics is a sad commentary on the efforts of this Liberal government to develop western Canada in the way of bringing in new population.

Before concluding my remarks I desire to touch on only one or two other matters. This House was pleased the other evening to hear a new declaration of policy uttered by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) on behalf of the government. It was not an utterance made upon the spur of the moment; it was a carefully considered statement in writing said to have been prepared by the Minister of Finance himself and handed to the Minister of Railways for delivery to the House of Commons. We on this side noticed that my hon. friend was somewhat nervous during the delivery of that statement to the House. He seemed to be out of place, to be very nervous. At times he seemed almost to choke over it. Perhaps he found that he had some hard swallowing; but nevertheless he got through it, and now we have reason to know, if we can place any dependence upon the formal pronouncements of this government that we have in power, a government favourable to the policy of protection, favourable to the policy which since 1879 has been the established fiscal policy of the Dominion of Canada, notwithstanding the efforts of this present Liberal administration during the last five years to render that policy useless and innocuous by continually tinkering and tampering with it. We take some satisfaction from the statement that has been delivered by the Minister of Railways upon behalf of the government, upon that subject

There never has been a moment's doubt as to the position of the Conservative party upon the question of protection. We look upon it as one of the corner stones in the foundation of our national structure. We believe that when the policy of protection was established in 1879 by the great Conservative leader of that time, it actually saved this country from bankruptcy, and from that day down to the advent of the present government in 1922 the policy of protection has remained practically intact in this country as the guiding principle of fiscal policy under every government. I have heard many a Liberal speak of the prosperity of Canada under the Laurier-Fielding regime. I have heard many a Liberal speak of the Laurier-Fielding tariff and praise it to the skies. I was one of its supporters. In its day it was a good tariff; and it was the tariff of the Conservative party inaugurated by Sir John A. Macdonald in 1879, and the moment the present Prime Minister of Canada, the head of this government, undertook to interfere with the principle of protection in the customs tariff his interference was immediately reflected most adversely in the trade and industry of this Dominion.

It is some relief to know that further assaults on the system of protection will not be made in the future. It is some relief to know from the lips of the Minister of Finance and his colleague, the Minister of Railways, that they too believe in the stability of the customs tariff founded upon protective principles. This principle is now and will continue to be an outstanding plank in the policy of the Conservative party. There is no mistaking that statement. We do not advocate the policy of high protection which is attributed to us by ministers in this government. We are not high protectionists; we do not seek "higher and higher and higher protection." Nobody in the Conservative party seeks or desires any such thing—nobody suggests it. We ask for reasonable, adequate protection, protection that will protect, protection that will give fair and equal advantage and opportunity to every class and condition in this country, bearing equally and fairly upon all and harshly upon none.

Mr. MILLAR: May I ask a question?

Mr. GUTHRIE: If my hon. friend is asking for information, yes. If it is only a catch question, I prefer not.

Mr. MILLAR: If the hon. member were returned to power, would he increase the present tariff?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I cannot answer that question without first making a full examination of the whole situation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Anything like an examination of a situation or a considered judgment upon an intricate question always raises a laugh on the other side. I am sorry to say that this government is lacking in many respects. In the first place, it lacks in examination and consideration; in the second place, it lacks in initiation, and in the third place, it lacks courage. During one of the hectic days of last session, one of those occasions when the Minister of Finance thought his government was in danger, although it actually pulled through, he said while shaking his fist at that corner of the House: You know what it means if you defeat this government; it means "protection and higher and higher and higher protection." I know the Minister of Railways deals in language of that kind, both in the House and on the platform out west, and I know moreover he uses it simply as a bogey to frighten and to threaten the people of those western provinces. He uses it as the nurse did to the children in the old nursery rhyme, which says:

The goblins will get you if you don't watch out.

I believe enlightenment will come to those provinces in the near future as to the real attitude of the Conservative party, upon the question of protection. I believe the time will come when they will appreciate and endorse our attitude. We are not selfish in regard to the policy of protection. We do not ask for any "brick for brick" tariff. We do not ask for higher and higher protection as attributed to us by our opponents. We ask merely for a reasonable, adequate tariff measure, and if we get it, we believe it will redound to the advantage of every class and of every part of the Dominion.

I can appreciate just as clearly as can the Minister of Railways that with an agricultural community such as we have in the western provinces, who produce mostly grain and cattle, it is difficult, if not impossible, to confer any direct benefit by a customs tariff. I realize that; it needs no demonstration; but I realize just as fully that it is absolutely necessary to the life of industry in eastern Canada that protection be maintained. Under such circumstances is it beyond the realm of statesmanship to equalize conditions in a country such as this? We have to recognize either now or some day in the future that we have a long straggling country, of great length and narrow breadth. We have many different interests and different communities. Our activities in life are greatly diversified, and some day we shall have to meet upon common ground in order that equal benefit and advantage shall be conferred by this Dominion of Canada upon all sections and classes of the people. The proposal of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen last fall, when he was leader of the Conservative party met the situation better than any other proposal I have heard. He proposed to meet it on the basis of preferential freight rates.

One thing we must realize is the question of transportation costs in Canada. We cannot settle that question upon the basis of a single rate for all parts of Canada. Such a plan will not work out; it will disrupt this country. We have to recognize the special claims of the maritimes, so well pointed out by Sir Andrew Duncan, in respect of railway rates, and we on this side of the House are prepared to meet that recommendation.

But we shall have to apply the very same reasoning to the people in other sections of Canada. The raising of grain, the raising of those wonderful crops in the three prairie provinces, is a matter of the greatest interest to the people of Canada; it is a matter of interest to our trade and commerce, it is a matter of great national concern and if the present railway rates bear too heavily upon those basic commodities, then it is in the national interest that relief be given. Such in brief was the doctrine enunciated by the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, and I am sorry to say that the west did not respond to his proposal. We shall have to come to it in the near future. Will the government initiate some policy of that kind? Is it utterly devoid of any power of initiation? Does it not realize that the question of preferential freight rates has to be settled? We in this country must learn to offset geographical conditions in the matter of freight charges. Already in our railway tariff mileage is disregarded, and we shall likewise have to disregard geography. We have done so in many cases already. We have given special rates over our railways to special industries to enable them to market their goods profitably, and so we shall have to do in regard to the grain and cattle growers of the west, and the time to do it is now, not to wait. We invite the government to make suggestions, and to propound a policy in regard to this great question. Grain and cattle being the staple productions of those three prairie provinces, and being vitally essential to the success and prosperity of the Dominion of Canada, can we not afford to give a preferential rate on the transportation of these products in the general interest of Canada. And I say the same with regard to coal, fish lumber and the like, from the maritime provinces. Already we have established a preferential rate in regard to certain products of British Columbia. Salmon has a preferential rate. Apples from the Okanagan come to the city of Montreal almost as cheaply as apples from the city of Toronto, because of the preferential rate they enjoy. Pulp and newsprint have preferential rates. Why not adopt that principle in regard to grain and in regard to live stock in the west, in regard practically to all the basic productions of this country, which by reason of geographical conditions are now too remote for profitable marketing? That brings me to another point.

It is an odd thing to me that from the city of Calgary to the city of Vancouver, which is so near at hand, only 642 miles distant, the farmers should be called upon to pay a rate of 21 cents for transporting their grain, while all they are charged if they ship it to Fort William is 26 cents. The distance from Calgary to Fort William is 1,251 miles, and the rate is 26 cents; the distance from Calgary to Vancouver is 642 miles, and the rate is 21 cents. Why cannot that rate be placed upon a fair basis in order to give the farmers who ship from Calgary or Edmonton the advantage which should be theirs by reason of their proximity to Vancouver? Why impose upon them a higher rate than is imposed upon the traffic that goes eastward? For my part, I cannot see any reason in it. That is another matter which this government will have to settle, and it should be settled when the question of preferential rates is being settled in this country. I am satisfied it will have to be done at some time in the near future.

Then look at the coal problem, so dependent upon that very question. The coal problem has been pressed upon this government for the last five years, session after session, time and time again. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) who is in charge of the coal matter is not at present in his seat. It was said of him in this House by my hon. friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion) the other night that no man could be as honest as the Minister of the Interior looked. I say that no minister should be as dilatory as the Minister of the Interior has been for the last five years in regard to this coal problem. Now he seems to take the ground that the matter cannot be settled at all, that it is economically impossible. Why, Mr. Speaker, if our coal supply was cut off to-morrow by the authorities of the United States, we would settle the coal question in Canada in twenty-four hours. But again, this government lacks initiative. Again, it lacks resolution. Again, it lacks courage. It has failed in every development scheme that it has undertaken. The Peace river scheme is as dead now almost as Julius Caesar. The settlement of the railway rate question has not been advanced since 1925. Immigration and settlement in the west has been a complete failure during the last five years. The question of transporting Alberta and Nova Scotia coal to central Canada is just where it was five years ago, except for the effort of the Honourable Howard Ferguson, Conservative Premier of Ontario. These great questions all await a solution, and yet all my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, says in his budget speech in regard to them, is: We must have faith. I will refer him to the Second Epistle of James, to look up a text for himself: "But wilt thou know, O vain man, that faith without works is dead?" This government protests that it has faith, but it does nothing to justify that faith. It has been deplorably lacking in works. We have had no progressive action in the past and we want action in Canada in all these respects. Your financial program has resulted in nothing. Your efforts to reduce taxation have resulted in increasing it. Your efforts to reduce the cost of living have brought the cost of living to the highest peak to-day that we have reached since 1922. Your theory that tinkering and tampering with the tariff would reduce prices is the purest kind of fallacy. Just apply a test now and see what has been accomplished in regard to prices under your tariff tinkering propensities.

It has been argued in this House that if you reduce the tariff, you decrease the price to the consumer. A greater fallacy was never uttered. Let me premise my remarks with this statement: The government did not touch the customs tariff on furniture, and the price of furniture in the last six years has been reduced from 25 to 30 per cent. How? The reduction in price has been brought about by internal competition among furniture manufacturers. You allowed the furniture men reasonable protection, and competition among themselves has reduced the price from 25 to 30 per cent below the price of six years ago.

This government did not alter the customs tariff on boots and shoes, and the price of boots and shoes to-day is 40 per cent lower than it was six years ago. Internal competition, again, has reduced the price.

You did tamper with the woollen schedule, and with baneful results. The duty was 30 per cent net on woollens when you took power and you reduced it to 27½ and subsequently cut off another 10 per cent more on the British preference. What happened to the woollens? There was little or no reduction in price. In some cases there was an increase in the price of woollen goods in Canada over six years ago. You took the duty off fertilizers, I think 10 per cent, and the price of fertilizers has been increased appreciably since. Twenty years ago you experimented and took the duty off binder twine and it has been doubled in price ever since.

But the outstanding feature in tariff tinkering is your operation in regard to agricultural implements. That was a major operation on the part of the King government when it took power in this country. Agricultural implements had a modest protective duty. The duty on binders was 12½ per cent, and it was cut down to six per cent by this government. All kinds of special privileges were granted to manufacturers of agricultural implements in regard to free material. Sales taxes were taken off and the like, and the government proclaimed to the farmers of this country that a reduction in price would follow. The cut was wiped out and every advantage was given them. What was the result? I am speaking according to the book. Take binders and mowers. First I will give the prices of McCormick, Deering and International binders and then I will give the Massey-Harris prices afterwards. A six-foot binder with carrier in the year 1921, the last year of the Meighen government, sold at $235. In 1927, effective now, the price for the same six-foot binder with carrier is $239.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Any improvement?

Mr. GUTHRIE: None, none of a major character. I have this from a reliable authority; the tariff was taken off and free materials given them. The sales tax of five per cent was taken off, and a binder to-day is just four dollars higher than in 1921. Then take a six-foot binder with carrier and a tongue truck. These are the net cash prices. In December 1921 the price was $252. The price to-day is $254, and the country is out the revenue and the workmen have had to leave Canada. The price of a seven-foot binder with carrier and tongue truck in December 1921 was $258, and the price to-day is $260. The price of an eight-foot binder with carrier and tongue truck in December 1921 was $266, and to-day it is $268.50.

Let us try Massey-Harris prices and see how they agree.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): What point does my hon. friend take when he gives the prices?

Mr. GUTHRIE: These prices were all based on Ontario. In the case of Winnipeg it would be the same price but the freight would have to be added.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The retail price?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am quoting from the retail price lists.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): At the factory?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not know whether it is at the factory or at the station, but I am giving enough information to let the House know that prices have not been decreased but have been increased. I have not the 1921 prices for the Massey-Harris, but the 1919 prices. The 1919 price of No. 5 seven-foot binder, three-horse, was $233, truck, $9, sheaf-carrier, $8, total $250. The cash price to-day of a seven-foot three-horse binder is $260, truck $11, sheaf-carrier $9, total price $280. The difference between the 1919 price and the price to-day is $30, and in the interval the tariff has been reduced and sales tax cut off, and the market thrown open for the free importation of raw materials. The farmers of Canada are paying an increased price for binders to-day and the treasury has lost all the revenue. Now I go a step further.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Would my hon. friend be good enough to give the House the cost of binders and mowers and that class of goods immediately prior to the last reduction of taxation?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Tell me the year you want.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Immediately prior to the last reduction of taxation.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Tell me the year you want and I will give you the price.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I want the years 1923 and 1924.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have the years 1923 and 1924, but not in my hand. I will get them.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Will you be good enough to let us have them?

Mr. GUTHRIE: What has been the effect of that reduction in duty upon the trade of Canada, the industry of Canada, and the employment in Canada? Why some of us were shocked in the years 1918 and 1919 to know that the importation of agricultural implements into this country was between three and a half and four million dollars. We believed then, and believe now, that practically all of these goods could have been made just as well by Canadian workmen in Canadian factories, but when the customs tariff on agricultural implements was reduced by the King government when it came into power our friends in the republic to the south of us were not slow to take advantage of the situation. The trade figures received yesterday from the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) are very illuminating on that point. They show the importation of agricultural implements for the years ending January 31st, 1925, 1926 and 1927. In the year 1925, which would be the first full year under the operation of the cut in the tariff, the imports of agricultural implements rose to $6,367,877. In 1926 that figure had risen to $11,632,231, and during the last twelve months it has risen to $17,731,516, almost all of which goods could have been made in this country, and a large percentage of which are now being made at Buffalo and Chicago by Canadian workmen who formerly had employment in Canada. That is a serious matter for the industry of this Dominion. It is a serious loss in implements and wages, and it is a serious loss to the treasury of Canada. We have lost the revenue which would have been received under the higher rate of duty and from sales tax but that perhaps is the least of our losses. All of this time our farmers have been dreaming away in a sort of charmed slumber, imagining they were getting cheaper implements. They have been deceived by the idea throughout eastern Canada and western Canada that the reduction in the tariff on agricultural implements was actually giving them cheaper implements. They will awaken from that slumber some day, and realize the real situation. The day will come when this protection bogey cannot be paraded by the Minister of Railways in the west against the Conservative party. I hope that when the hon. minister goes west next time he will tell the people the actual situation, and I hope he will tell the people of the western provinces that the Conservative party is not a high protectionist party.

Mr. DUNNING: I certainly will not.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well, then, if I am for the time being the leader of this party, I state it on my responsibility as leader that high protection is not the policy of the Conservative party of Canada. Although I have no doubt the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) will stick to his statement that he will not so admit. However, that is only one of the planks of our platform.

I read the other day, or someone told me, that about seventy or eighty years ago Benjamin Disraeli, at that time leader of the Tory party in England—I use the word "Tory" out of deference to the Minister of Railways, and because we are proud of the name—had but one motto, namely, that the Tory party would always resist revolution and assist progress—one of those neat, epigrammatic statements for which the late Benjamin Disraeli was famous. And, Mr. Speaker, the Tory party in Canada is a party that will always resist revolution. We stand, Sir, for the maintenance of law and order in every corner of the Dominion; and we stand also to assist any progressive movement even though a Liberal government may initiate it. Anything which contributes to the progress and development of eastern or western or central Canada will have our full support. I do not mean, of course, that we are prepared to support everything without examination or consideration, as my hon. friends over there would seek to have us do. We will examine and investigate, but every meritorious proposal for the development or the advancement of the country, whether in the west, in the east or in the central part of the country, will have our support. That is a leading principle of this party.

This party has a record for progressive legislation second to none. It is a party whose record goes back to confederation year and beyond it; a party which was the first to establish and maintain the fiscal policy of this country upon a sound basis, under which policy Canada has made great measure of progress; a party which first started settlement and development in the west; a party which aided the construction of the first transportation line, in spite of opposition from every quarter of the Liberal ranks; a party which in the dark days of railroading in Canada had in the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen a leader bold enough, courageous enough, confident enough to grapple with that mighty problem which was bequeathed as a legacy from a former Liberal administration—a man who took hold of scattered lines of railway in Canada which were on the point of bankruptcy, some of which indeed were actually bankrupt, and who so arranged matters that we have to-day evolved a great national transcontinental railway system under the ownership of the people of Canada. These are steps in the record of the Conservative party so far as the progress and development of the country are concerned. And we propose to go ahead. We propose to insist that this government shall do likewise and that there shall be no lagging behind in the next few years during which the government may be in office. The last five or six years, so far as any real progress has been concerned, have been nothing short of a disgrace to any government. Hon. gentlemen opposite have done nothing; they have got nowhere. The country to all intents and purposes is just where it was six years ago. We intend to see to it that in the future there shall be no more standing idle, but that the march forward, heralded by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) at Richmond Hill in 1925, shall now begin. The command to march is going to be given and the trumpets are going to sound, and we shall insist on going forward. And if the government goes forward on reasonable, logical and progressive grounds it will have our assistance at every step.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): The budget delivered on February 17 was so well received in this House and throughout the country, by the press friendly to the government as well as by the opposing press, that I had made up my mind not to offer any further observations upon the motion and the amendment thereto, and this not out of any disrespect to my hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Coote) who presented the amendment, but simply because I felt that hon. members were anxious to get on with the business of the House and also because I knew that every Monday and Wednesday occupied in debating the budget were so many days lost to private members who had certain resolutions which they desired to have discussed. Not until yesterday did I come to the conclusion that I should add a word or two to what I have already said on the motion now before the House; and I wish to assure hon. gentlemen who are anxious to speak before the debate closes that I shall take up but a very few moments of their time.

The official leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) has this afternoon maintained his reputation for eloquence as well as for adroitly skating round the question. I have been associated in public life with my hon. friend for many years. Listening to him this afternoon, I could recall one day down in the old museum where he and I conspired to make some trouble for the then government, and he was, if anything, more eloquent then than he was to-day. The hon. gentleman has said that the debate has been worth while inasmuch as it has brought out some new ideas. With that I agree. Indeed, early in his speech, I had made some notes of points on which I felt inclined to agree with him; I was prepared to agree with him on most of the questions he was discussing, apart from the balance sheet. But as he proceeded to his peroration it occurred to me that my hon. friend should this afternoon be clothed in sackcloth and ashes and should be weeping for his own attacks on that great Conservative party which he has been so loudly praising; because in former days we had no more violent champion in the Liberal ranks than my good friend the official leader of the opposition. I remember how sound he was in 1911 when we appealed to the country on the question of larger and wider markets for western Canada.

I shall not enter into any lengthy discussion of the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) and the leader of the opposition regarding the balance sheet. The budget as presented to the House calls for no defence. In 1924, as I remember, I was subject to attacks of the same nature as those that have been made in this debate, and they did not come from that side of the House either, but from gentlemen on this side who, the following year or two years afterwards, admitted that I had been right. I fancy that when the public accounts come down a year from now my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre and the leader of the opposition will have to admit that on this occasion too I have been in the right. After listening to the speech of my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre I sent word to the department inquiring how it was that Mr. Stevens had arrived at the figures he had presented to the House. The reply came back, "The member for Vancouver Centre has made the mistake of adding together your estimated surpluses with an actual reduction." That would be all right to an ordinary layman like myself, but not to a well posted chartered accountant, so I will have to ask my hon. friend to come down and talk it over with the Auditor General.

Mr. STEVENS: Of course that is not what he did.

Mr. ROBB: Both my hon. friends have also, I believe quite sincerely, overlooked in their calculations the fact that in 1922 we had $144,000,000 of temporary loans which since then have either been paid off or entered in the funded debt.

With the observations of the last speaker in regard to the reduction of expenditure in carrying on the affairs of the country I am quite prepared to agree. The Minister of Finance is never in favour of additional expenditures, but my hon. friend has had experience as a member of a government, and indeed showed this afternoon that in one particular department with which he was once associated, he was not very much in favour of economy. That is the experience of the Minister of Finance; every day for weeks before the presentation of the budget deputations from all parts of Canada come to see him; they come from as far east as Halifax and Prince Edward Island and from as far west as Vancouver. These deputations are about evenly divided between those who desire increased expenditure and those who want economy or a reduction in taxation, and in that way it is rather hard to balance your budget. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition in criticizing our expenditure was very careful not to say what particular expenditure he would reduce. I submit it to the judgment of every hon. member of this House who took part in the last campaign, that while my hon. friends were always in favour of economy they wanted that economy practised in the other fellow's country. Will any person say that the official leader of the great Conservative party in the last campaign was opposed to the construction of the Hudson Bay railway, or that his party opposed the continued deepening of the Welland canal? Those are the two large expenditures which enter into our increase in the estimates as presented.

Before I proceed, Mr. Speaker, if I may be allowed a personal word I would like to thank all hon. members of this House, my hon. friends opposite and hon. gentlemen in the far corner as well as those who sit behind me, for the altogether too kind words used towards myself. I desire particularly to thank my friend who immediately preceded me, speaking as official critic of the opposition.

My friend the former Minister of Finance (Mr. Bennett) tried to represent to the country that our reductions in taxation were pure myths, that they only existed in the imagination of the Minister of Finance, and he submitted a well thought out and carefully prepared statement of percentages to show that the taxes were actually greater than they had been prior to the reductions; he built up a story to show that these reductions, so stated, were but will-o'-the-wisps, to lead the people along. But, Mr. Speaker, the reductions presented to this House in the budget for the year 1926, when a long list of reductions in the income tax was introduced, were not myths to those who had to pay. The man who was called upon to pay $100 in 1925 but who discovered the day after the budget was presented that he only had to pay $30 did not consider it a myth; he had enough money left to buy an additional suit of clothes for himself or for some member of his family. The man with a revenue of $3,000, who formerly had to pay $40 but who in 1926 did not have to pay one cent, did not consider these reductions a myth. The reductions in taxation presented last year gave a wide measure of relief to a large section of Canada. Hon. gentlemen have complained that in some cases the income tax was increased, and I admit frankly to-day as I did last year that in preparing these revisions in the income tax the policy was to make it easier for people with earned incomes rather than for those with unearned incomes, and I admit that the latter class have to pay a little more. I will deal with that in a moment, however.

My hon. friend said that the reductions in the sales tax did not amount to anything, and he submitted a list of percentages to show that there was an increase this year as compared with last year. No person knows better than does the ex-Minister of Finance that the reductions in the sales tax were very real. As a matter of fact the reductions in that tax this year are not the only reductions which have been made by this government since it assumed office. In 1924 we made sweeping reductions in the sales tax, exempting altogether most of the agricultural machinery and the implements required for the other basic industries of mining, lumbering and fisheries. At that time hon. gentlemen opposite opposed those reductions, which in that year amounted to $24,725,000, in round figures. In 1925 we made further reductions in the sales tax amounting to $400,000 and in 1926 we again reduced that tax either by exempting certain articles altogether or by reductions which brought about a loss of $300,000, while this year it is estimated that the reduction will amount to about $16,000,000. Altogether since this government has been entrusted with the responsibilities of office we have made reductions in the sales tax totalling over $41,000,000.

My friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) said, "Yes, it is very true that you have made certain reductions in the sales tax but you increased the sales tax," and he quotes certain figures to show that that sales tax at a certain period of 1922 was 2½ per cent, and that we had increased it to 6 per cent. What are the facts? In 1923 that tax was increased by Mr. Fielding to a maximum of 6 per cent. The average under the old tax enacted by my friends the Conservatives when Sir Henry Drayton was Minister of Finance was 2½ per cent. But that tax was capable of pyramiding; in many cases, notably boots and shoes, it was pyramided until the actual tax was 8½ per cent. Boots and shoes were taxed from the hide right through the leather and from the wholesaler to the retailer, and instead of that tax amounting to 2 per cent, as is the case this year, it was 8½ per cent under the administration of my friends opposite.

The same statement would apply to clothing; the leader of the opposition found some fault with me because I did not altogether wipe out the sales tax on clothing. That is not original with my hon. friend; we had delegations coming to the office representing different industries, among them gentlemen who said they represented the clothing industry, but at the same time we had letters warning us to be careful of these representatives, who were urging that we altogether remove the sales tax from clothing. Now I had an experience of that in 1924, when I reduced the sales tax on boots and shoes from six per cent to three per cent. And what was that experience? There are widely scattered throughout this country, for instance, many clothing merchants with small capital. At the present they buy a stock; they pay the sales tax. But the next day the Minister of Finance presents his budget, and he wipes out the five per cent sales tax. Well, when that is done it takes away five per cent of that merchant's capital. That is a hardship upon him, and I say frankly to my hon. friends opposite —as I said to this delegation, and they agreed with me—that the proper method of reducing this sales tax—and I agree with my hon. friends that as fast as possible the sales tax should be taken off—is to take it off gradually so that it will do no harm to anyone.

I said a moment ago that I was not going to follow my hon. friend in his attack on the balance sheet as presented, but one conclusive proof that this government has reduced the funded public debt of this country and reduced also the charges which the people are compelled to pay for carrying that funded debt, is the fact that the interest charges upon that funded debt have been considerably reduced. If a man with a mortgage on his farm pays $100 in interest this year and only has to pay $80 next year, he knows that the mortgage has been reduced to that extent.

Mr. BENNETT: Or the interest rate.

Mr. ROBB: But the reduction in the interest does not account for all the reductions that I would show here. In 1921-22 the total interest charges amounted to over $135,000,000. In 1922-23 the interest charges amounted to $137,000,000. My hon. friend made a reference to the public accounts. Well hon. gentlemen opposite can refer to the volume for themselves and on page 46 they will find additions that were made to the public debt during their administration. What was the total interest on the public funded debt last year? It amounted to $124,000,000, as compared with $137,000,000 in 1922-23. That, Sir, is the answer I give to my hon. friend.

Now let me deal briefly with the amendment of my hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Coote). I can quite understand the necessity of keeping a party together by proposing an amendment that they can all get together on and vote for, but I think my hon. friend will find himself in rather an embarrassing position when he goes back to his electors, because I wonder if he will not find on the platform opposed to him—none of us are elected by acclamation; I have never had that experience and I imagine my hon. friend will be no better off—some person who will get up on the platform and quote Hansard to show where this hon. gentleman asked me to do some of the very things that I am doing to-day, that is, making reductions in the taxation. Now my hon. friend in his attempt to defeat the government—because the motion if carried can have no other effect—will be accused of putting into power a gentleman who this afternoon made a speech indicating that if he and his friends got into office the tariff on some articles in this country will be so high—as said by one of their supporters in my hearing in the last election—that the sun could not shine over it on St. James street, Montreal, until half past eleven in the morning.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure the minister will agree that is not what the leader of the opposition said this afternoon.

Mr. ROBB: I admit that my hon. friend the official leader of the opposition, speaking this afternoon, made, with his customary ability, a speech that could be read both ways. I thought at first that he was going to enunciate a new policy and that we were not going to be so very far away on questions of tariff policy. I thought that when he was advocating a policy for the great west he was recanting somewhat his own attitude in 1924 when we brought in a tariff policy we thought was of great advantage to the west.

Mr. BENNETT: Let the hon. gentleman speak for the Liberal party, not for the Conservative party.

Mr. ROBB: I discovered that my hon. friend had not introduced any new tariff policy, but simply the old tariff policy of 1908 —adequate protection with a new turn to it, so that hon. gentlemen opposite could use it in any part of the country.

Now I come to the observations of the hon. member for Macleod regarding the income tax, and I am going to remind my hon. friends again of the reductions that were made last year as applied to the earned income, the reductions that wiped out the income tax altogether as regards many people throughout this country. My hon. friend was in the House and he will recall that I was attacked, as I have been in some degree this year, for having increased the taxes on many; and it is true we did. But my hon. friend argues that the income tax in all cases is a direct tax. I admit that to a considerable degree the income tax is a direct tax, that impression prevails throughout the country; but when you look carefully into the figures, as I have had the opportunity of doing, and look carefully into the sources from which we get this taxation, it will be discovered that it is not altogether direct tax. When I say that I want hon. gentlemen to keep in mind that what I am going to say now applies to all the provinces of Canada. In the year I am quoting we received something over $55,000,000 of income tax. Hon. gentlemen may be surprised to know that of that $55,000,000 over $31,000,000 was paid in by 5,738 corporations. Now you may argue as you like, but the corporations will pass that tax back to the consumers somewhere. In Prince Edward Island there were 42 of these corporations, in Nova Scotia, 220, in New Brunswick, 220, in Quebec, 1,159, in Ontario, 2,397, in Manitoba, 481, in Saskatchewan, 226, in Alberta, 282, in British Columbia, 702, and in Yukon, 5. These corporations contributed in the aggregate over $31,000,000 of the $55,000,000 collected.

Mr. MATTHEWS: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I presume the tax of which he is speaking, namely, the income tax upon corporations, is a tax imposed on profits that have been earned and declared.

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. MATTHEWS: Will the minister kindly explain how such a corporation, paying that tax after its profits have been made and declared, passes that tax on to the consumer?

Mr. ROBB: Every corporation, like every business man, plays safe, and takes profits enough to provide for insurance, wear and tear, and the general conduct of the business. That is my answer.

Mr. MATTHEWS: Is not that answer based on theory and not on practice?

Mr. ROBB: I am not disposed to enter into an argument with my hon. friend. I have simply stated the fact that out of the $55,000,000 of income tax collected more than half of it was paid by corporations and not by individuals.

Mr. MATTHEWS: Should not the minister be careful not to make the statement that a corporation necessarily passes that tax on to the consumer without knowing the facts?

Mr. ROBB: If my hon. friend thinks that the corporations are philanthropists he entertains a different view from what I do.

Now, my hon. friend the official leader of the opposition did give some reasons this afternoon for the opposition which he and his party presented to the budget brought down in 1924 when we made such sweeping reductions, particularly on agricultural implements and on the implements and tools required by the farmer, the lumberman, and the miner. He told us this afternoon that there were many members on that side who were now astonished at the size of the west. We on this side were not astonished at the size of the west. We knew of the size of the west, and it was because we believed that a really national policy for Canada was one that would appeal to western Canada, that in 1924 we braved the opposition of hon. gentlemen opposite and reduced the duties to such an extent on agricultural implements. This afternoon my hon. friend argued first that there should be greater immigration into this country. Then he proceeded to tell us of the great harm we had done to the producers on the land because we reduced the duties on agricultural implements. The inference was that if he was returned to power, he would increase the duties and so he would induce people to come to Canada by charging them more for the agricultural implements which they required to purchase.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely the minister will agree that the leader of the opposition pointed out that before this government reduced the duties, the prices of agricultural implements were lowered.

Mr. ROBB: I know the hon. gentleman argued that by our reducing the tariff the price of implements was increased. The only conclusion possible is that if you want cheaper implements, you must put the tariff up higher.

Mr. ROWE: As a purchaser of farm implements I would ask the minister if he can name one implement of the farm to-day that can be purchased cheaper because of the minister's reduction in the duty on farm implements?

Mr. ROBB: That proves that my hon. friend was voicing the sentiment of his subordinates in that they desire a higher tariff in order to get cheaper implements.

Mr. CLARK: A tariff that will protect.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend said that we took good care not to reduce the duty on boots and shoes—

Mr. LADNER: Mr. Speaker,—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LADNER: An hon. gentleman who is held in such high esteem in this House as the Minister of Finance is expected to answer questions so as to enable members to understand the situation. Is it not a fact that the real argument of the leader of the opposition was that the tariff was not the determining factor in the fixing of prices, but that prices were fixed by other factors? Is the minister fair in stating the matter in the way he did?

Mr. ROBB: Why then should my hon. friend have devoted, as he did, twenty minutes of his speech to attacking this government for having reduced tariffs? The official speaker for the opposition said that we took good care not to reduce the duty on boots and shoes. Was that intended as a preparation for the next campaign, or was it an attack on his former leader and on all speeches made on that side of the House during the past two years? Because we have been accused in this House by hon. members opposite of having ruined the boot and shoe industry of Canada. I can recall when we spent long days and nights here listening to speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite who accused us of having reduced the duty on boots and shoes and of having thereby ruined the boot and shoe industry of this country.

I must keep my promise not to detain the House at any great length.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister, before he concludes, be good enough to allow me a question?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister kindly explain his announcements: first, of April, 1924, of $20,000,000; second, of March, 1925, of $35,000,000; third, of April 15, 1926, of $22,000,000, and fourth, of February 7, 1927, of $31,000,000, a total of about $110,000,000, in each case announced as a reduction in the public debt? Will he be good enough to explain how he harmonizes those officially announced reductions in the public debt with this fact that the funded debt in 1926, as officially reported in the public accounts, was $2,471,000,000 and, in 1922, was $2,420,000,000, in other words $51,000,000 higher in 1926 than in 1922, from which must be taken the reduction of $35,000,000 that was not shown in these figures, there being left a net increase in the funded debt of $16,000,000?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend has very skilfully put into Hansard alongside of my speech a part of his own speech. That is my hon. friend's own statement. I answered my hon. friend when I rose by saying that in the department they had said that Mr. Stevens had made the error of adding estimated surpluses to actual reductions, and I leave him to settle that with them.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. STEVENS: I rise to a question of privilege, and I will state the question of privilege well within the rules. My hon. friend, for whom I have a high regard and who usually is absolutely fair, has stated that in my speech I have wrongfully added certain figures, and he has also intimated that I have wrongfully presented them to the House now. The question of privilege is this, that I have quoted precisely from the Finance Minister's previous budget speeches officially given in this House and not from any other records. I have not wrongfully added those figures. I have quoted them precisely as he gave them to the House.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend will admit that I did not say that he had wrongfully done so. I said the department claimed that he had made the mistake of adding the surpluses to the actual reductions.

Mr. STEVENS: I state again that I did nothing of the kind.

Mr. ROBB: I leave it to my hon. friend and the Auditor General, who audits the public accounts, to straighten this out. This is not the first attack I have had as to balances. I had the same attack in 1924 from an hon. gentleman on this side. I am accustomed to that and my hon. friend will probably next year make the same admission as my other hon. friend made, namely that he had been in error in his calculations.

Mr. STEVENS: That is not a fair representation.

Mr. ROBB: Maybe not, but I am concluding. The issue before us now, if I understand it aright, is that my hon. friends opposite will be able to vote for this amendment along with my hon. friends in yonder corner, because my hon. friends in that corner say that we have not gone far enough in tariff reductions. Surely they have short memories. Surely this ministry has been attacked often enough and loud enough for them to know where we stand on the tariff. We are recognized throughout Canada, and we are proud of it, as the low tariff party. We ran the risk of taking our political lives in our hands in 1925 to go to the country and appeal on our policy—a real national policy that would appeal to all the provinces of Canada, not merely to any one particular section, and knowing, Mr. Speaker, that we are right and sound in our policy, and knowing that the people back in the concessions are with us, we await this vote without any fear.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

PRECEDENCE OF MOTION UNDISPOSED OF ON EXPIRY OF HOUR FOR PRIVATE BILLS

On the order being called:

Further consideration of the motion of Mr. Chevrier for the second reading of Bill No. 78, an act respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): I wish to raise a point of order. I have no objection, so far as I know, to bill 78 or its discussion in this House, but I wish to call Your Honour's attention to the fact that the votes and proceedings in this House on Friday the 25th contain the following:

Mr. Chevrier moved,—That the bill No. 78, an Act respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal company, be now read the second time.

And a debate arising thereon;

The hour devoted to private bills having expired; ;

The House resumed the Debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Robb: That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to resolve itself again into committee of ways and means, and the proposed motion of Mr. Coote in amendment thereto.

I desire to point out to Your Honour that the debate was not adjourned. No motion for adjournment was put to the House by the Speaker. I further call Your Honour's attention to rule No. 25, which reads:

Fridays.

(From eight o'clock p.m.)

Private bills for the first hour.

Then I refer to rule No. 33, which reads:

Motions not disposed of.

If at the hour of six o'clock, p.m., on a Wednesday, or at the time of the adjournment of the House, a motion on the notice paper be under consideration, that question shall stand first on the order paper of the following day, next after orders to which a special precedence has been assigned by rule or order of the House.

That rule applies solely to motions not disposed of at six o'clock p.m. on a Wednesday. With respect to a motion not disposed of at nine o'clock, on Tuesdays and Fridays, dealing with a private bill, there is no rule of the House to the same effect, namely, that if it is not disposed of it shall have preference on the order paper of a following day, and I submit to Your Honour that in order that it may continue to have precedence a special rule is necessary. Paragraph 322, discussing rule No. 33, provides:

It is more favorable to the progress of a motion on the order paper that the debate should not be adjourned on Wednesday at six o'clock, because the motion shall then stand on the order paper for the next day as stated in this rule; if debate is adjourned, the motion goes to the foot of the orders.

That is on Wednesday, but a further note under rule No. 33, paragraph 323, in the last sentence, says:

On other days,—

That is other than Wednesday.

—if debate is not adjourned, the question is superseded.

The debate not having been adjourned on a Tuesday at nine o'clock, the question is whether the order that this particular bill, No. 78, should be moved a second time and go to the standing committee, was superseded, and the bill improperly placed by an official of the House on the order paper in the position in which it now stands; the official not being authorized to place it on the order paper in that position except by resolution of or by consent of the whole House. I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that there are precedents where a private bill has been discussed on the second reading up to nine o'clock, and resumed on a following evening at eight o'clock, but I have looked through these precedents one after the other and in no case was the objection ever raised. I submit that when the objection is raised the ruling must be in accordance with what I suggest is the proper interpretation of the rule.

I disclaim any desire to interfere with this bill. I have my own opinion as to the procedure sometimes taken to talk out bills until nine o'clock, but if the preference with reference to this bill is to be continued on Tuesdays and Fridays for one hour, as now seems likely, it precludes the orderly progress of the business of the House and prevents other private bills from going before the proper committees where they can be disposed of in due course. It is with a view simply and solely of facilitating the business of the House and the business before the committee on private bills that I raise this objection.

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa): I quite appreciate the position in which the hon. member finds himself. During the afternoon the hon. member asked me if I would consent to this bill standing over. I pointed out that it would have been with the greatest pleasure—

Mr. CAHAN: Only for fifteen minutes or half an hour.

Mr. CHEVRIER: —that I would have met his desire, but the situation in which I find myself now is not of my making. When I introduced this bill last Friday I was particular, Sir, in pointing out to the House the advisability of allowing it to go to the committee to which it should have gone, namely, the committee on railways and canals. For some reason best known to the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) the discussion was protracted past nine o'clock. At this moment I cannot say whether it is the desire of those who oppose the bill to make use of the usual tactics, reprehensible as I believe them to be, of talking the subject out. I have never had any use for such a practice. Possibly it is well within the rules of the House and it may be in accordance with British practice; but I do not think, Sir, that it is in keeping with British fair play. Since Friday evening last I have been interviewed by a number of gentlemen who practise at the Ottawa bar and who have represented that a large number of bills were being tied up. But I cannot recede from the position in which I find myself, through no wish on my own part. If the hon. gentlemen who desire to talk the bill out intend to continue doing so, those who come after us must suffer.

It is for you, Sir, to decide the point of order. But the practice of the House as I have always understood it is that when a bill of this kind has been discussed until the hour of nine, then automatically, without any motion to adjourn the debate or otherwise dispose of the subject, the debate stands adjourned until the next hour for the consideration of private bills. So well understood is this practice that the hon. gentleman most interested in talking the bill out, the member for Argenteuil, who evidently is anxious to have the discussion postponed, failed to make the motion himself. And no one in this House will tax the hon. member for Argenteuil with a lack of knowledge of the rules. The hon.

member has mentioned two rules. First he has referred to rule 25, which provides:

The ordinary daily routine of business in the House shall be as follows:—
Presenting reports by standing and special committess.
Motions.
Introduction of bills.
First reading of Senate bills.

That rule may apply to what the hon. member has said, but I would refer the House to rule 33. If my hon. friend (Mr. Cahan) will read that rule I think that with his long training at the bar he will admit that he was skating on thin ice. The rule reads:

If at the hour of six o'clock, p.m. on a Wednesday, or at the time of the adjournment of the House—

The day in this case was not one of those contemplated in this rule, and nothing that the hon. gentleman has said is relevant. It was not six o'clock, nor was it a Wednesday.

—a motion on the notice paper be under consideration—

This was not a motion in the ordinary sense of the word; the bill in question simply came up for second reading in the ordinary course of procedure. No one can possibly construe the motion for the second reading of this bill as a motion in the ordinary sense, such as is to be found on the order paper. In the event of such a motion being made, the rule provides that the debate shall be superseded.

I submit that the point of order is not well taken. I understand that there are a number of hon. gentlemen who have bills that are to come up subsequently to this; there are probably between thirty and forty such bills. If the disposition of this particular bill is to be retarded in the manner threatened I am sorry for other hon. gentlemen. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that in this particular instance it was not necessary that a motion to adjourn the debate should have been made. Following the practice which has always prevailed in this House, I contend that the discussion of Friday night was automatically continued over to-day. If not, why should the hon. gentleman complain? I submit, Sir, that Bill 78 should be again considered.

Mr. SPEAKER: On Friday evening at nine o'clock the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) was discussing the bill respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company, and the hour for the consideration of private bills expiring then, he resumed his seat without making a motion to adjourn the debate. Nothing in the rules of the House, nor in the precedents, usages and customs of parliament, required him to make such a motion. My attention on that evening was directed to the fact that the hon. member had made no motion to adjourn the debate. I thereupon consulted Bourinot and the precedents cited by him at the foot of page 227 of the fourth edition. I discovered to my great surprise that many years ago, possibly twenty-five years since, I piloted a bill through the House when the same situation arose. That bill related to the Hull Electric Railway, and on the hour for the discussion of private bills expiring, it automatically went over to the next day allotted to such bills, no motion having been necessary for the adjournment of the debate in that case. The circumstance is cited by Bourinot at the page I have mentioned. Bourinot says:

If a private bill is under consideration on Tuesday and Fridays, after eight o'clock and the debate is not concluded thereon at nine, a member may call the attention of the Speaker to the fact that the hour allotted to such subjects under the rules has expired, and the question will thereupon go over until another day, when it will be taken up at the same stage where its progress was interrupted.

The cases cited under that dictum of Bourinot are to be found in Canadian Commons Journals, 1896, second session, 105, 112, Hull Electric Railway, and also in the year 1899, 106, 118 and 119, Ontario and Rainy River Railway. The same point presented itself in the year 1898.

Of course, I perceive the anomaly of the situation, and I cannot help wishing that there were a positive rule governing such cases. Every hon. member will readily understand that one contentious bill arising in this way might obstruct the passage of a whole series of others following it, and that is what is happening in this instance. The only thing I see to be done, as has been done to my knowledge before, is for the House to favour an agreement between the contending factions in order to let the business of the House proceed regularly, or take upon itself to let unopposed bills pass first. When there is a conflict of opinion as between the various parliamentary authorities, the Speaker may seek the judgment of the House. In the present instance there is on one side Bourinot and the precedents cited by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) when the question was not raised in the House but was decided by the Clerk. Then, as against Bourinot, there is the present Clerk of the House of Commons, who, in paragraph 323 under rule 33, says:

This rule seems to apply to Wednesday only, the words "or at the time of the adjournment of the House" referring to that day, according to the interpretation given by Bourinot, third edition, pages 336-337. Its purpose is to keep the motion on the order paper though on Wednesday the House may rise without debate being adjourned because at six o'clock on that day the Speaker adjourns the House without question put. On other days, if debate is not adjourned the question is superseded.

That is to say, according to Beauchesne, the question under discussion loses its place and goes to the bottom of the list. In the present case I think I am only doing justice to all parties in asking an expression of opinion from the House as to whether or not, in view of the conflicting circumstances, the bill should not head the bills which are opposed. In view of the opposition raised, this bill will block the whole list of private bills. If the House thinks it proper the unopposed bills might be called first. Is it the pleasure of the House that Bill No. 78 should give way to unopposed bills and should take precedence over all other opposed bills? I will judge the consensus of opinion of the House by the yeas and nays.

Hon. LUCIEN CANNON (Solicitor General): Before the question is put, Mr. Speaker, I would like to understand it as it is placed before the House. How are we to know which bills are unopposed? We do not know in advance.

Mr. SPEAKER: From my experience, generally the bills are called and those who have some opposition to voice do so.

Mr. CANNON: When should that opposition be voiced? Supposing we should decide to give way to other bills, and find the first bill called to be an opposed bill?

Mr. SPEAKER: In the present instance I do not propose to put this bill at the bottom of the list. I suggest that the House first deal with the unopposed bills, of which I believe there are a great many. Otherwise the situation will be as has been very clearly pointed out by the senior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier); the whole hour will be taken up in the discussion of this present bill, and the same will apply on Friday. Under the circumstances I believe that the House should express its opinion and thus declare if this bill shall have precedence. Is it the pleasure of the House that Bill No. 78 should give way to unopposed bills?

Upon the yeas and nays being taken:

Mr. SPEAKER: In my judgment the nays have it and the present bill must keep its precedence.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

MONTREAL, OTTAWA AND GEORGIAN BAY CANAL COMPANY

The House resumed from Friday, February 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chevrier for the second reading of Bill No. 78, respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): May I say in opening that the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) is an old friend of mine, and I am rather surprised to have him accuse me of not playing fair. I do not suppose he really meant it in the strict sense of the word, but it seems to me that those promoting the bills which follow this might accuse even my hon. friend of a lack of fair play. I do not consider this a private bill in the ordinary sense of the word. Private bills come here in large numbers at every session, and in most cases they deal with incorporations or alterations of charters of companies really of a private nature, but in actual practice this is a public affair having to do with the building of the Georgian Bay canal. Although it is classified as a private bill, my reason for speaking now is because I consider this actually a bill having very much to do with the public. I therefore think it only right that hon. members of this House who live far away should be informed of the facts in regard to this matter. So far as I am concerned I have no expectation or idea of trying to keep this bill from going to committee; we all know very well that cannot be done and we have no wish to do so. We do wish, however, to have it fully discussed here before going to committee in order that it may be thoroughly understood by everyone.

When speaking the other evening I gave the House a brief history of the Georgian Bay canal according to my memory, and I was in Ottawa during that time and in the House for many years when this was then under discussion. I desire to say now, Mr. Speaker, that conditions in Canada have changed tremendously in the last thirty years; we have a new generation, and in many ways it is not the same world at all that it was in 1894. At that time the first bill having to do with this canal was promoted and passed in this House, and at that time very few of us had any idea that water-power would become of such great value. I know more or less about the various waterfalls of the Ottawa river, and it is fifty years since I saw some of those above Pembroke, and at that time the only thing in our minds was how difficult these waterfalls made the bringing down of our logs and timber. No one had any idea whatever, and there was no suggestion, that these water-powers would some day become a vast source not only of wealth but of comfort to the people of Canada. Now everything is different. There has been a tremendous development in water-power since discoveries have been made as to how best to use electricity or the power that is generated. In fact I may say without exaggeration that water power and the electricity generated from it constitute really the lifeblood of this country. We have many industries here that could not exist without water-power, and it is specially valuable in this northern country where we have a cold winter, and particularly in the centre of Canada where there are no visible supplies of coal. These water-powers provide us with our white coal, and I do not think I am exaggerating when I express my honest belief, in view of the progress of electrical development, that we or our children will see the time when we shall use it not only for power but for heating our houses thus taking the place of those vast quantities of coal that we import from the United States every year and pay for with our good money

Now the Georgian Bay canal charter gives to the company certain water rights. I am not a lawyer but I find these rights ill defined and their meaning very difficult to grasp, and there are certain contingent rights provided for. The question of the relationship of the Dominion and the provinces with regard to water and water-powers has been under discussion off and on during all the years since confederation. I believe it is generally conceded now, that the provinces own the land under the water and the water that runs down the streams, with the sole exception that the Dominion has a paramount right for navigation purposes and for navigation purposes only. In building a canal, which the Dominion government has the right to do, they have to use a certain amount of water, and they are entitled to take that amount of water but no more. I think that if this charter is to be continued it should be made perfectly plain what water rights it purports to grant, and to confine them entirely and strictly to water that is required for canal purposes.

I notice that when the newspapers and individuals also have discussed this question of late they are apt to refer to Carillon power; they talk about the Carillon problem and the Carillon question as if that were the only one at issue. I have heard people say: Why this is a matter between a company in Montreal and the Georgian Bay Canal Company. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, the site of the Carillon water-power is in the county of Argenteuil which I have the honour to represent, and we want that power developed as soon as possible. People down there have been looking forward for years to the development of this power in order to bring industry there and to afford employment to the residents. They are tired of waiting for its realization, and I do not blame them. I may say that to my surprise in the election of 1925 one of the gentlemen from Montreal who was interested in the lease of the Carillon power given to them by the Department of Railways and Canals came into the county of Argenteuil and opposed me very strongly on the ground that I had not done enough to help on the development of this water-power. Now that all originated from the fact that at that time there was a lot of discussion as to whether the power, after being developed, could be exported or not. I am not going to go all over that question because it has nothing to do with the point I am trying to make this evening, but I want to say that people down there are not much interested as to what company develops the Carillon water-power. They simply wish the development to be carried out and carried out as quickly as possible, but on the distinct understanding that there shall be no authority to export the power after it has been developed. I mention this because the reference in the newspapers, and by individuals, to the Carillon water-power is very misleading.

I want the House to understand that although the Carillon water-power is a large one it is only one of many. There are a dozen or more water-powers on the Ottawa river as large or nearly as large as the Carillon water-power. So that the Georgian Bay canal project, although discussed as having reference solely to the Carillon water-power, really refers to all these water-powers on the Ottawa river and on the Mattawa and French rivers as well. The Ottawa river has an immense capacity for water-power; It has been estimated at well over a million horse-power. That is the quantity of power which we are considering to-night if the Georgian Bay Canal Company has any authority in regard to developing the same. The Ottawa river is practically a succession of lakes and rapids, so that a good head can be obtained at eight or ten different points on that river at each of which a very large quantity of horse-power can be developed. In addition to the Ottawa river there are the Mattawa river and the French river. They are not as large streams as the Ottawa but still up towards the height of land the fall is great and consequently they are valuable also from the point of view of power development. I only mention these facts to show to you that in considering this question we are not considering merely one water-power, or any dispute there may be between two companies. As to the latter point I have nothing to do whatever, but I do say that if the charter of the Georgian Bay Canal Company is going to be extended it should be definitely stated in it that the company have no right to any water except what is required for canal purposes.

Some people say: Why, we can get the canal without any cost if the power rights go with it. The canal can be built and the water-powers developed without any cost to anybody if these rights go together. I claim that that is a confusion of ideas: it is not a fair way to put it, and the argument cannot be maintained. No one can build a canal without cost, and if the power rights are to be used for that purpose, and the value of the power is to be used to pay for the cost of building a canal it means that the power developed will bear the cost of the canal and the power users will have to pay for it. If this canal is going to be built, either by this company or by any other company, the project should be considered on its merits. If the canal is still required in the interests of the trade of this country, it should not be mixed up with the power development, nor should users of power in Ontario and Quebec be called upon practically to pay for the canal. Moreover, if the idea could be carried out, that is if the power development and the canal scheme were combined, and the profit on the power used to build the canal, that would to my mind infringe upon provincial rights and deprive the people of those provinces of the cheap light, heat and power which they so much need. If the water-powers were developed on their merits without any reference to the canal, our people would secure this cheap light, heat and power which, as I said before, is so vital to their prosperity and comfort.

If the power and the canal scheme were to be developed each on its own merits, this could be done only with the coöperation of the provinces and by arrangement with them. Last Friday evening, when I was discussing this matter, I said that I had no objection to any group of men spending their money to build the Georgian Bay canal if they saw fit to do so. I did not mean by that that they should use the profits from the power development to build the canal. If they are going to build the canal they should build it at their own cost, and my contention is that under present conditions this is something they will never do.

[Sir George Perley.]

I said the other evening and I reiterate that I do not consider this in any sense a party question, and I hope it will not be taken up in any such spirit. As a matter of fact I have looked over the list of directors, the last named in this series of fourteen different bills renewing the charter of this company, and I find there are five gentlemen, two of whom are old friends of mine and Conservatives, one is a Liberal and I do not know what the politics of the other two are. Those are the men who are put down as directors. As to who at present controls the charter, I do not know and I have not been informed. Rumour is busy regarding this and perhaps I may be allowed to read an extract from an article in the Citizen of the 7th September last, dealing with this subject. The article reads:

> The situation must be frankly recognized, however: there would be no economic justification for building the Georgian bay canal at this time. There is no lack of transportation lines for the grain movement. There is congestion in the port of Montreal when the harvest begins to pour down from the west, but another canal would contribute nothing towards the solution of Montreal's problem.
> The Canadian people own a magnificent railway line from Winnipeg to the port of Quebec, the National Transcontinental, which is far from being adequately used. It would be more economical to fix a rate for grain transportation on the National Transcontinental to compete with lake shipping rates, than to build another competitive canal.
> There is no remote likelihood that the interests behind Mr. Sifton would put money into the construction of any such canal. But it is quite likely that money would be forthcoming to set up a great hydro-electric power monopoly, privately controlled, along the route of the Georgian bay canal.
> Mr. Sifton might as well realize that the day has gone by in Canada when public opinion would allow that monopoly to be established. The people of Ontario have reason to know the value of hydro-electric power resources. Public ownership has given this province an unrivalled electric service. People in other parts of Canada are similarly awakening to the advantages of public ownership of public utilities.
> Private enterprise on the Georgian bay canal is just about twenty years behind the times. The canal may be built some day. It would contribute to the industrial development of the country of which Ottawa is the commercial hub. But no government could long survive the storm which would properly rise in Canada if it were to fall in with the plans of Mr. Sifton.

That is from the Ottawa Citizen of September 7, 1926, a paper that is certainly not considered as supporting the Conservative side of politics. I am sorry the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) is not in his seat. Last year the question of the St. Lawrence canal project was being discussed in this House for quite a length of time, and I was pleased at that time to find the Minister of the Interior so frank in his statement of the situation. If I may be permitted, I wish to read a couple of extracts from what he said on that occasion. This is what the minister said in April, 1926, as reported on page 2192 of the revised Hansard:

May I say that there is no dispute so far as this government is concerned with respect to the ownership of the water-powers, or no dispute as to the ownership of the bed of the streams out to the point where the international boundary intervenes. So far as I know this government have never raised any question as to ownership. Nor does this government raise any question as to the right of Ontario to develop that particular power or any power along that reach.

That acknowledges the right of Ontario in the water as fully as anybody could acknowledge it, but there is more. On page 2194 of the revised Hansard the Minister of the Interior says further:

I wish again to emphasize the fact that we are in entire agreement with the Ontario government. There is no dispute about their ownership of the power or the land to the international boundary. If they want to develop there would be no holdup, so far as the federal government is concerned. I should like to see the hydro development on the Ottawa river.

Mark you, the Ottawa river.

It seems to me there is a great opportunity for such development there. However, they have set their hearts on the development of the St. Lawrence, and it is the business of this government to do everything they can to facilitate that development.

From that I take it that it would be impossible for the Minister of the Interior to support this Georgian Bay canal bill. I appeal to him on the basis of his words of last year to support those of us who do not think the Georgian Bay Canal Company should receive any rights to water except what they require for canal purposes. The other day the minister waxed quite indignant with the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) when the old problem about the export of Carillon power was under discussion. Therefore, if the minister were in his seat, I would say to him: I take it for granted that you will support those who are opposed to the renewal of this charter in its present form. Further than that, I take it that the government cannot support this bill without violating the resolution which they agreed to last year. This is the resolution which was being debated and regarding which the minister made the remarks that I have quoted:

That in the opinion of this House, the government of Ontario and the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario should be given leave forthwith to develop and generate power on the St. Lawrence river at what is known as the Morrisburg dam, and should also be given power to use an increased flow of water from the Niagara river—

And so forth. That will be found in Hansard of 1926 on page 2182. The resolution goes on to say:

—and that this House will support the government in taking such immediate action as herein proposed without further delays in accordance with the application of the Ontario government.

I am very happy to find, Sir, these quotations of what was said by the minister, and also the views of the government as expressed in this resolution. But, Mr. Speaker, I would like to know whether the promoters of this bill really intend to build a canal or not. The reason I ask that is that I find at the end of the first section of the proposed bill the following words:

—or if the said canals are not completed and put in operation within the said periods respectively, the powers granted to the company by parliament shall cease and be null and void, as respects so much of the said canals and works as then remains uncompleted.

In other words, if the government were dissatisfied with the way the company was carried on they might develop a water-power and not build a canal at all, and all the government could do would be to say: Well, that is not satisfactory; it is not in accordance with your contract. Under the clause as it is worded here the company would then claim that they had a right to keep the works they had already developed. I cannot see the object of putting that in at all. It seems to me a most dangerous clause, and I think it should be altered when the bill is taken up in committee.

But that is not all. Apart from the important question of water and water powers, I would ask this House, what about public ownership? In 1894 public ownership was not a vital question in Canada, but it is today. We have embarked upon two of the greatest public ownership enterprises in any country in the world. We have our national railways, and we have a free system of canals. Thirty years ago tolls were charged on the canals, but there are none now on the government canals. Is there any member of this House who is a believer in public ownership who could vote to renew this charter for the Georgian Bay Canal Company, which is empowered to charge tolls on the canal on the Ottawa river? Is that consistent with the feeling of those who are in favour of public ownership? Are we going to have the Dominion government canals, built by the people of Canada, free, and at the same time have tolls charged on the Georgian Bay canal, built by a private company? It would simply mean that our railways would have a competing water system, run by a private company, and authorized to charge tolls. If this matter of building a canal is going to be considered, it seems to me that the work ought to be undertaken by the Dominion government itself. They ought to consider the question on its own merits.

Furthermore, if this charter is going to be renewed I submit to hon. members that it should be entirely redrafted to suit modern conditions. Here is a charter thirty-three years old which has been amended fourteen times, so much so that it is very difficult for anybody to go through it and find out just what powers are being granted. I take it, in view of the development of water-powers and of public ownership at the present time, that parliament would not consider the granting of a charter such as this, giving the company control of an enterprise of this huge size with all the water-power on the Ottawa river. Why should they suggest that we renew a charter by means of this simple bill? If the company think they should have their charter extended, why do they not bring in a new bill, with clauses to meet present-day conditions, so that parliament may consider it as it would the bill of any other company that comes here for legislation?

This Georgian Bay Canal Company has no rights on account of what they have done, for they have done nothing. They spent some money on surveys and so on, but they have not done any work for all these thirty-three years, and my own feeling is that this charter should not be renewed at all. But if it is going to be renewed, care should be taken to see that it is brought up to date, and particularly that clauses are inserted confining the use of water to canal purposes alone.

There is a clause in the charter, which will be found in chapter 128 of 6 Edward VII, assented to on July 13, 1906, under which the works may be taken over by the government. It reads as follows:

> His Majesty, his heirs and successors, may at any time assume the possession of, and the property in, the said canals and works, and of and in all the rights, privileges and advantages of the company on giving to the company one week's notice of intention to do so; and thereupon all property in the said canals, works, rights, privileges and advantages shall become, and thenceforward shall be, vested in His Majesty, his heirs and successors, and by way of compensation His Majesty shall pay to the company the value of the work actually done by the company up to the time of the giving of such notice in surveying, and in the making of plans, and otherwise upon the ground, together with the value of all tangible property of the company of which possession may be so taken,—such values to be fixed by three valuators, or the majority of them, one valuator to be chosen by His Majesty, another by the company, and the third by the two so chosen.

In my judgment the proper way to deal with this question is for the government to allow the charter to lapse and then deal with the matter under this clause. I cannot see that it would do any harm to the shareholders, and it would give the government a free hand to work together with the provinces in this matter on a reasonable basis. I may say—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am afraid the hon. gentleman will have to say it on Friday, as the hour for private bills has been exhausted.

Mr. LAPIERRE: May I ask the hon. gentleman if he desires to continue this debate on Friday night? If not, I wish to move the adjournment of the debate.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I have not quite finished.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The House resumed the debate on the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of ways and means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Coote.

Mr. L. G. BELL (St. Antoine): Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I was about to bring to its attention a case of discriminatory taxation which has prevailed in the province of Quebec for now some ten years. A great number of the citizens, not only of the province of Quebec, but undoubtedly many others throughout Canada who have the interests of just taxation at heart, desire that a remedy should be provided in this case. I have reference to section 5 (c) of the Income Tax Act of 1917, which provides that:

> The income of any company, commission or association not less than ninety per cent of the stock or capital of which is owned by a province or a municipality, —shall not be liable to taxation under the act. It so happens, Mr. Speaker, that in the province of Quebec we have followed the rule of having our public utilities conducted by private companies. In that regard we differ to a great extent from the other provinces, and it is a well-known fact that ninety-five per cent of the public utilities in the province of Quebec are private corporations. In order that this matter may be brought to the attention of the government and that the government may have a full record of the campaign that has been taking place for a number of years, I intend to burden the House to-night by putting on record extracts from different newspapers in that province, Liberal, Conservative and Independent, and also from different associations which have no politics, such as boards of trade and chambers of commerce, in order to bear out the assertion that some remedy is required immediately regarding this unjust taxation.

It was stated by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) this afternoon that the corporations of this country pay some fifty-five per cent of the income tax, and it was further stated that a great amount of the income tax is in the final stages paid by the consumer. On that point especially as to public utilities, I think the facts will bear him out and will prove that that assertion is correct. For instance, the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company, which owns the public utilities of heat and power in the city of Montreal paid an income tax last year of $783,000, and also the Montreal Tramways Company, another public utility paying a tax of almost $125,000, all of which in the end is a burden upon the consumers of gas and electricity and in the second instance, upon those who use the street cars in the city of Montreal.

I quote first of all from La Presse, which is well known to be a French newspaper, independent in politics, and having one of the largest circulations of any newspaper in Canada. La Presse of February 10 publishes the following:

A flagrant injustice is committed in the distinction that is drawn by the federal treasury in the matter of the income tax levy between private corporations that produce electric light and energy and companies of the same kind that operate under provincial and municipal control. This difference of treatment creates a prejudice against the customers of the private companies and concedes a favour to consumers who obtain their service from government-controlled concerns. If a company has to pay $700,000 or $800,000 a year in income tax, the price of the products of that company must necessarily be calculated in a manner that will repay that sum. The customers, therefore, will be charged from $700,000 to $800,000 a year more for what they buy than they would otherwise have to pay, whilst the clients of companies under government control are liberated from this surcharge. In the province of Quebec we have refused to submit to the municipalization system which has infatuated certain other provinces, and all things considered there is no need to regret our attitude. In any event, it is our incontestable right to prefer the system of private ownership of our electric light and power services, and the federal government has no right to favor one system more than another. Its absolute and strict duty is to put everybody, every enterprise and every province on one and the same fiscal footing. At the present time, however, as regards the income tax, the federal administration, ceding to strange considerations, has failed to obey this rule of elementary justice. Well, let us leave out the past. Let us pass the sponge over the influences or considerations that have been responsible for this denial of fiscal justice, insupportable by the consumers in the province of Quebec who have been obliged to pay into the Dominion treasury for electric light, and energy surcharge, which their neighbors in Ontario do not have to pay. Let us overlook what is past and simply say that this denial of justice cannot continue. The government ought to apply the remedy without further delay; and we hope that parliament will take up the question.

We pass now to the Montreal Gazette, a leading English daily, and it also calls for redress of this unjust taxation. In its issue of February 11 that paper says:

The inequitable incidence of the income tax as between publicly and privately owned public utilities is again a subject of discussion, and the consideration that is being given to it is timely and proper. It would be a good thing for the Dominion, and by no means a bad thing for the government, if this tax were abolished altogether; but, if that is not to be done, there should at least be such revision as will prevent discrimination as between one group of citizens and another, or between one province and another. Equity is, or ought to be, a first principle in all taxation measures, and economists have always agreed that a tax which is not levied impartially is vicious and cannot be successfully defended.

Under the present system, the income tax is collected from private companies which sell electrical energy for lighting and power purposes, while similar services, when provided under government or municipal ownership or control, are not taxed. The tax, when imposed, is collected from the companies, but is paid in the last instance by their customers, the consumers of light and power. It so happens that this discrimination places the Ontario consumer in one class and the Quebec consumer in another, power and light services being publicly owned in Ontario and privately owned in this province. Parliament did not set out to differentiate in this way as between one province and another, but that is the way it works out, and it is a matter of some importance in considering the principle involved. The consumer in Quebec is affected adversely in that the income tax, when added to the actual price of power and light, lessens the advantage which private enterprise and efficiency confers upon its customers. This is a matter of first-rate importance from the standpoint of the community as well as from that of the individual, since cheap power and cheap light have become determining factors in the field of industrial expansion. Light and power costs, nowadays, attract new industries or encourage the extension of existing industries, when these costs are low; and, this being so, it is clearly necessary to the economic progress of Montreal that light and power costs should not be burdened with charges that are not imposed upon similar services in other parts of Canada.

The remedy is simple. Either parliament should tax all light and power services equally, whether they be publicly or privately owned, or all should be exempted. Consumers in Quebec ask for no favors in this respect, but they are entitled to fair treatment and should have it. If the government and parliament come to the conclusion that the tax cannot be collected from publicly-owned services, owing to the conditions of financing and bookkeeping that are peculiar to this field of public ownership, there is still the alternative method of making the exemption general. The existing situation is grossly unfair to consumers and consuming communities in this province, and it calls for redress.

La Presse of about the same date again states:

We consider it to be of urgent importance that public opinion should be couvinced of the disadvantages which, economically, result from this vicious practice. We have already called attention to its evident consequences to the consumers, clients of the private companies, who must necessarily reimburse the amount levied upon the corporations. In this way the consumers lose part of the natural benefit that otherwise would come to them from the economic results of private administration, which assures the lowest cost price. But this is not the only disadvantage that is caused by this fiscal injustice, particularly in Montreal. However important may be the private interest of each consumer, we must not forget to take into account the general interest as well, the higher interest of the community. Indeed the one cannot be separated from the other. Everybody knows that whatever will aid the industrial and commercial development of a city, will also advance the welfare of the citizens. The question of the cost of light and power is one of capital importance in all industrial and commercial matters. Whoever proposes to set up a new industrial installation must calculate with great care the expenses that will have to be incurred under this head, and, all other things being equal, he will instal his industry in the city where light, heat and power are to be obtained at the lowest rates. Consequently, we all, as citizens of Montreal, have the greatest interest to protest against a fiscal injustice which risks injury to the economic development of the city.

We suggested the other day that, as a means to end the actual inequality of treatment, the government should either tax the municipalized and provincial government-controlled enterprises on the same basis as the private companies, or else exempt the latter as the others are already exempted. But, as a matter of fact, the first alternative does not appear to be practicable, for the good and sufficient reason that the municipalized and government-controlled enterprises, having either the province or the municipality as their money-lenders, and consequently not having to trouble about meeting the interest charges on the capital—the people pay this piper—matters can be so arranged that there is no apparent balance at the end of the fiscal year. Having, therefore, no apparent revenue they as it were, automatically find themselves exempt from the tax on revenue. It is a piece of legerdemain too easy to perform. The only practical solution, then, would be to exempt private corporations from the income tax just as the municipalized, government-controlled enterprises are exempted to-day.

I also quote an extract from La Patrie another French Conservative newspaper in Montreal, in its leading editorial of February 14 last, complaining of this million dollars taken unjustly in the way of income tax from public utilities privately owned in the province of Quebec. It says:

A tax which is unjust because of the inequality of its application is the income tax on private companies of public utility whilst similar enterprises under municipal or provincial government control are allowed to go scot free. In this way the distribution of electric light and power in Montreal, and the tramways service in the same city are heavily taxed—the amount being about $1,000,000 a year—but Toronto and towns and cities in Ontario pay no contribution under this head. Montrealers are not opposed to the tax, but they do protest against its inequality. The government at Ottawa has for several years past remained deaf to the supplications from Montreal and the province of Quebec asking that this injustice shall come to an end.

I also direct the attention of the government to a letter addressed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) by the Montreal Board of Trade under date of March 22 last, as follows:

The council of this board has the honour to remind you of the injustice involved in the present application to Public Utilities of the Income Tax Act in that citizens served by privately owned utilities are made subject to a federal tax from which citizens served by publicly owned utilities are free.

The council wrote you on this subject on 25th September, 1924, but we have heard of no action to remove the grievance. That letter made special reference to the discrimination against the citizens of Montreal, customers of the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company. That company will pay into the federal exchequer as income tax on its profits for 1925 the sum of $783,000, all taken out of the pockets of its customers. All other citizens of the Dominion served by privately owned utilities are similarly penalized but, since about 95 per cent of electrical energy in the province of Quebec is produced by privately owned companies, the discrimination against the citizens of this province, and in favour of those of provinces where public ownership is the rule, is as serious as it is indefensible.

The council realizes the need for federal revenues and does not ask relief for the citizens of this province, but it does wish to renew its protest against the existing discrimination.

The council respectfully renews its suggestion that the income tax on public utilities be based in future, not on profits but on gross revenue, and that it be applicable alike to all utilities, whether publicly or privately owned.

Mr. HEAPS: Can the hon. member assure us that the privately owned companies charge no more than the publicly owned concerns do?

Mr. BELL (St. Antoine): I will come to that in a moment.

The council ventures to urge that this matter is of sufficient importance to call for remedial legislation at the present session of parliament.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

J. STANLEY COOK,
Secretary.

That is from the Montreal Board of Trade, a body composed of representative business men of that city, without any political axes to grind, and who take a very lively interest in the progress of the city. Naturally they want to see Montreal given equal treatment with any other city in the Dominion.

I come now to the Chambre de Commerce, a body similar to the board of trade but composed principally of French citizens from every walk of life in Montreal. On February 23 these representative men accepted the following resolution from the legislation committee:

Whereas public utilities in some provinces are directed by private companies;

Whereas those companies pay high income tax;

Whereas those taxes always fall ultimately upon the consumer;

Whereas public utilities in other provinces are not taxed because they are publicly owned;

Whereas this discrimination is an encouragement for the installation of new industries in sister provinces, but is a hindrance to Quebec;

Whereas, if more equally applied, the tax would bring greater returns;

It is resolved that the federal government be asked to refrain from imposing income tax on public utility companies and that, if need be, the tax in question be replaced by another tax which would be applicable to all public utilities without discrimination for any province.

Next I have here a resolution passed at the fourth annual convention of the Canadian Tax and Civil Service Research Conference of the Citizens' Research Institute of Canada, held in Winnipeg on September 28 and 29, 1926. This is a Dominion-wide institution with head offices in Toronto and branches in all the important cities in Canada from coast to coast. Resolution No. 5 as passed by them reads:

Be it resolved that this convention urges the taxation of all public utilities on the same basis, irrespective of ownership, public or private.

I come now to the question asked by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) as to whether privately owned utility companies charge the same rates as those charged by publicly owned companies. Let me quote from the ninth annual report of Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated:

The taxation of your company is excessively heavy and openly discriminatory, as our operations are subject to heavy federal income taxes, whereas the provincial and municipal undertakings of Ontario and other provinces, although on a similar commercial basis, not only enjoy immunity from provincial and municipal taxation, but under the federal law are exempted entirely from income taxation.

Incidentally your company will this year pay the federal exchequer approximately $783,000 for income tax on its business for 1925, which, of course, is included in our rates for service and suggests if there were no income tax to pay our present retail rate of 3½ cents per k.w.h. for electricity could be reduced to 2.88 cents per k.w.h., or, if applied to our gas business, the present retail rate of $1.10 per thousand cubic feet could be reduced to 91 cents per thousand feet.

It is significant, as stated, that consumers of electricity in Ontario and other provinces where utilities are publicly owned are exempt from this taxation. Our consumers, we are sure, do not object to paying their proportion of the running expenses of the country; they do, however, object (and rightly so) to paying the proportion of Toronto, Winnipeg and other cities where the utilities are publicly owned and operated. Our protestations, as well as the able and well defined representations of the Montreal Board of Trade to the federal government, anent this question have so far been without avail, and your directors feel that the consumers of electricity in this province should take some more effectual steps to correct this discrimination. Meantime this open discrimination in taxation undoubtedly handicaps Montreal and the province of Quebec.

The continued increase in the disbursements for taxes—municipal, provincial and federal—reflect the national situation with re[illegible] the present habit of lavish expenditures by governmental agencies. It is a question that calls for serious individual thought when a business such as yours, furnishing public necessities, is called upon to disburse in taxes the sum of $1,274,655.56, upwards of 19 per cent of the company's net income.

These are the points I wished to bring to the attention of the House with reference to the taxation of public utilities in the province of Quebec and particularly in the city of Montreal. As I have already pointed out there is an extra charge levied on the consumers of both gas and electricity which would be considerably reduced if it were not necessary to pay this federal tax.

There is an even more serious aspect than that, however; in the development of the province we must at all costs be protected from competition with our sister provinces, particularly in the securing of industries. As the public utilities are at present discriminated against, we often find that we have lost industries from our provinces because of the fact that cheaper power can be obtained in neighbouring provinces. I wish it made perfectly clear that we in Quebec and in the city of Montreal are not asking that taxation be increased in any other province; we are only asking for fair play to the public utilities in our own province. For example, it has been pointed out by some of these newspaper reports that there should be a tax levied upon the gross revenue. That appears practically impossible in regard to the public utilities of Ontario, and therefore we would ask for the same treatment accorded to other municipalized and government controlled utility companies; that this tax be removed and the income tax be not applied.

It may seem rather strange that a member of the opposition should take up this matter on behalf of the public utilities of Quebec, because one would think that the interests of that province would be well looked after by those on the government benches. We on this side of the House from Quebec number only four as compared with sixty-one on the opposite side, including a number of outstanding ministers of the crown who know of this unjust taxation. One might have expected them to pass some remedial legislation to correct this abuse, which has undoubtedly been drawn to their attention in different ways, but that has not yet been done. I hope it is not too late for this corrective legislation to be passed this session and I trust that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) whom we know to be a native of Quebec, will take the course which is undoubtedly open to him in order to remedy this grievance. I am sure those from other provinces are fairminded in these matters, and that they wish taxation to be at least fair; I do not think they want to see one province discriminated against in the matter of taxation or placed at a disadvantage in the securing of industries.

That, Mr. Speaker, is all I had intended to say, except to mention the fact that I am sorry that it was not possible in the present budget to make some amendment to the income tax laws in favour of those who contribute to charities. In the very large cities as well as in the towns there is a constant call for funds for charitable purposes, and I trust that in the next budget some consideration will be given to this question. We find it extremely difficult to finance our great charitable institutions which relieve distressed people; people are continually asked for contributions, and I think they might well be exempted for the amount they contribute in that way.

Before closing I would like to refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young), who unfortunately is not in his seat, having particular reference to his remarks regarding the tariff board. I trust that whatever may be the personal views of different members of this House, we can all take a large national view of this matter, more so than the view I understood the hon. member to express. I will repeat what he stated:

> I wish, however, to be on record as saying that if at any time that board is to be used as an instrument or agent to hide behind in order to increase the tariff, I would say: Get thee gone and give way to honest men. We can never give the functions of this House over to that tariff board or to any other tariff board that may be created. I want to be perfectly frank in that regard.

I think it would be of very little use, as an hon. member urged the day following, for any of us to attend the meetings of this board if that is to be the attitude of the board; we might as well stay at home and not try to present the case for an increase of the tariff. I am sure the hon. member was not in earnest when he stated that the tariff board has been created by this government to decrease the tariff only; we would rather look at it as a board which will see to it in all cases that justice is done, whatever the issue.

I also wish to refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Spence) in which he says:

> We believe in freedom of trade as a principle because we know that the whole trend of modern times is towards the great field of internationalism—not nationalism, not narrow provincialism, but a magnificent economic union of the whole world.

I wonder if the hon. member for Maple Creek was quite in earnest when he made that statement. I am sure he is a close student of economics and of the tariff, and I fail to see personally where this trend towards internationalism is taking place, so far as the tariff is concerned. In the matter of freer trade, of which he speaks, when we look to England we find the Safeguarding of Industries Act. If we look to the example of our neighbours to the south and study the Fordney-McCumber tariff which was enacted there, or if we refer to the German tariff, or to the tariff brought into force in any other country in the world since the conclusion of the war, we will find that all these countries —including England in the matter of her Safeguarding of Industries Act—are increasing their tariff. Therefore I hope the hon. member for Maple Creek will do us the favour of showing at another time where this trend of internationalism or freer trade is taking place.

Speaking of the visit of the Saskatchewan members to the Dominion Textile plants at Montreal, I only hope that these gentlemen, coming as they do from the west, have been enlightened as to the true industrial situation. I trust that as Canadians, looking over those plants and seeing the number of men employed, they realized then, if they had not realized before, that in the interests of our industrial life the manufacturers of this country must be protected. I was rather nonplussed at the attitude of the hon. member for Maple Creek. I was surprised that after seeing what the industrial life of Canada meant he should come back and immediately upon taking his seat start on the rampage with respect to free trade and this movement towards internationalism which he says is taking place, but which is not taking place; free trade, he knows, is a myth. I trust that these Liberal members not only visited the factories and saw the industrial life there, but that they also took occasion to visit some of the men who were not at their places in the factories but were out of employment. I hope they felt in their visits to those homes that these men are patrons of Canadian industry and Canadians at heart even as the hon. gentlemen themselves are. I hope that the hon. gentlemen will also bear in mind that even if the farmers of the west have had hard times at intervals, there are times in the industrial life of our cities, especially when men are out of work and cannot get employment in the factories, that we look for some consideration in the matter of a protective tariff, and that they will see their way clear to coöperate with us and not be so scared, as they seemingly appear to be on that side of the House, of the word "protection." There is nothing to justify the view that there is anything to be afraid of in that connection.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Was the trip to Montreal planned with the idea of having us give more protection to the textile industry?

Mr. CAHAN: It was planned by one of the leading Liberals of the city, who is identified with the factories you visited.

Mr. BELL (St. Antoine): If it was so planned I am sure nothing was known of it as far as this side of the House was concerned, as we only read about it in the newspapers the following day. We are only complimenting my hon. friends on seeing that industrial life for the maintenance of which we are fighting.

I believe these are the only remarks I have to make with reference to the budget, and I have only this to say in closing. Many comments have emanated from this side of the House with respect to the hon. Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke). If there is one member of the government who carries a burden on his shoulders and upon whom I should like to pin the rose of hope, it is the Minister of Immigration. I sincerely trust that in the exercise of his duties and the discharge of the responsibility that rests upon him he will do his share in bringing to this country a great number of immigrants who will find in Canada a country worth while and who will remain here. I hope the minister will be able to stop the migration out of this country which has been so often debated here and which I will not weary the House by referring to at the present time. I think if one minister in the government deserves some consideration and some praise, or it may be, help from the opposition, we should at least give that minister the preference. In closing may I express the wish that he will be able to show us in the near future that he is meeting success in his arduous duties and accomplishing all that the situation demands.

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, the observations which I have to offer to the House this evening will be of the briefest kind. The country is waiting for the vote which will decide the fate of this government, and I do not want to keep it in suspense a moment longer than I can help. In order to relieve their minds, my remarks will be noted for their brevity if for nothing else.

The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) introduced an amendment to the budget which if carried will mean the defeat of the Liberal party. I wonder if the hon. member when he drafted his motion thought what that would mean for the party to which he belonged. Does he not believe like every sensible man that "half a loaf is better than no bread?" We are standing between him and this awful, wicked Conservative party. He does not give us credit for that. I wonder if he has read the history of Charles II? When the king's brother, the Duke of York, counselled His Majesty not to expose himself so freely on the street as it might entail his assassination, Charles II, who was a very wise and very witty monarch replied: The people of England are too sensible to murder me in order to put you in my place.

The amendment of the hon. gentleman is what is known technically as "eye-wash." It is not to be taken seriously, yet here it is and we have to deal with it. But within the next few minutes we shall be all out of our troubles when the vote is taken.

The hon. leader of the opposition to-day delivered a most eloquent and instructive address. It was noted for its eloquence, for his abnegation of Liberal principles, and was in effect a bid for the leadership of the Tory party of which he is now one of the shining ornaments. Within the last few days we have had the spectacle in parliament of three or four aspirants to the leadership of the Tory party, standing up, saying what they had to say eloquently, and well, and leaving it to their party to indicate who is to be selected. It reminded me of the judgment of Paris. There were three ladies who presented themselves to Paris. He examined them as to their beauty—and there was a great deal to be seen—and after he had given his decision in favour of one—because there was only one to be selected, provoked the great Trojan war, and you know the catastrophe that happened after that. Well, I hope no such event will happen after the leader of the Tory party has been permanently named. I admire the leader of the opposition. I remember when I heard him first on May 29, 1912, in the city of Montreal. The bloom of youth was then on his cheek, and I remember well the florid complexion of the young man who sat close to the great chief of the Liberal party. He thundered in tones so eloquent against the Tories that I thought to myself: "Methinks the lady doth protest too much." I could not at that time believe that he was making a bid for the vacancy which has been occasioned on the other side by the retirement of Mr. Meighen.

We spoke yesterday in this House about the exportable surplus of wheat. We have an exportable surplus of Liberalism. We have so much of that commodity on this side of the House that our cup of joy is overflowing and we are willing to divide it with our friends on the other side. Some wit in this House remarked last fall after the election and after the appointment of the leader of the opposition to his present position: "Well, this is a great year for the Liberal party. We have a Liberal Prime Minister; we have a Liberal leader of the opposition, and we have a Liberal leader of the Progressive party. Everything seems to be coming our way." How true is the saying of the Psalmist:

> The stone which the builders rejected, the same is become the head of the corner.

[Mr. Jacobs.]

The hon. gentleman is a great lawyer. He would have made his mark had he remained at the bar. After listening to his eloquence to-day and after comparing it with his eloquence before 1917, I can see what a great lawyer he is. He talks on both sides with equal facility, I wish the time would come when I could do likewise. Perhaps if a vacancy on the other side occurred, I might—

An hon. MEMBER: Consider it.

Mr. JACOBS: —consider it. He argued to-day that there is no surplus; that it is all camouflage; that it does not exist. Notwithstanding the fact that there is no surplus, the Minister of Finance is in a position to cut down the sales tax by 20 per cent, to cut down the income tax, to make a substantial reduction in the national debt and so on, all, mark you, without any surplus. I ask myself: If the Minister of Finance is able to do that, what could he really do if he had a surplus? He is a miracle worker and as such we want him. Moses struck the rock and produced water. It flowed freely. Moses is not a patch or circumstance on the present Minister of Finance who is able to do these wonderful things.

Altogether I think the Conservative party is very fortunate in having a man of the ability of the leader of the opposition. He talks intelligently, cogently, with lucidity, and he has tasted of the tree of knowledge and of good and evil—he knows both sides. The old saying is true:

> And still they gazed, and still the wonder grew,
> That one small head should carry all he knew.

I wonder where all these apologies of Conservatism, all these high-minded utterances which we heard to-day respecting the Tory party and its glories, were hidden during the years from 1900 to 1917 when the hon. gentleman was one of the ornaments of this side of the House. He disguised them very well, but I am glad now that he has scope for his abilities and I hope the Tory party will keep on with the hon. gentleman as its head.

We had some discussion in this House a little while ago about the appointment to Washington. The appointment has at last been made and the Hon. Mr. Massey is the first minister from Canada accredited to any country. I think this country is to be congratulated on the appointment of Mr. Massey to that high and honourable position. Mr. Massey fits the position admirably. He is a man of education, of culture, with the necessary resources to keep up a position of that kind, and he is bound to make good. It is only right that we should have a representative at Washington. After all $1,000,000,000 or one-half of the entire trade of this country is with the United States. We have 115,000,000 people on one side of the border and 10,000,000 people on the other side, with tens of thousands of people crossing this border every day. Every possible kind of trade is transacted daily between the two countries. We have questions to discuss as regards railway bonding privileges, smuggling, narcotic drug traffic, white slave traffic, and matters of all kinds, which are of the highest importance, and the surprise to me is that we have remained so long without a representative at Washington.

There are many things that the Hon. Mr. Massey can do while he is at Washington. For instance, he can point out to the authorities there that we resent the discrimination that exists with regard to Canadian citizens who go to the United States. As hon. members know, the United States divides the Canadian people into two classes; those who were born in Canada and those who came to Canada from foreign parts. Those who were born in Canada can go freely into the United States either to visit or to reside permanently. Those who were born outside of this Dominion are permitted to enter the United States only on what is known as the two per cent quota of the country of their origin. What has been the result? Within the first six months of last year 50,000 Canadian citizens crossed the border by the high-road. I have not the figures for the last six months, but I fancy that an equal number left here for that country. Therefore we have 100,000 Canadian-born citizens who went to the United States within one year. I know what hon. gentlemen on the other side are thinking, namely, that if we had a high protective tariff, they would not have gone. But that is not the point I wish to make. The point I wish to make is that the United States of America is discriminating between native-born citizens and foreign-born citizens of this country, both British subjects, mark you. They take the certificate of naturalization of a foreign-born citizen who wishes to enter their country and pay no attention to it; they treat it as a scrap of paper. They discriminate. We do not. After all, when we give a certificate of naturalization to a foreign-born after he has remained here for a certain period, after he has behaved himself like a respectable citizen, he is treated by us in the same way as if he were born in this country. But when he goes to the United States boundary, they, forsooth, would make a distinction. Why is that? I will tell the House why it is. The United States for some time have put into force this immigration quota because they want in that country people coming from what they call the Nordic portions of Europe. They do not want anybody except the Nordics. The basis of the population in Canada is Nordic. Consequently they insist upon having what they call the best element in this community —the Canadian-born, the man who understands American conditions, and who does not require to become Americanized, and so on. They are draining this country of the best element we have, and are leaving us the foreign-born. Mark you, I am not making any objection to the foreign-born. We welcome them and are glad to have them, but, everything being equal, I think it will be admitted by everyone here that the Canadian born citizen is perhaps the better for this country than the foreign-born. He is not obliged to unlearn anything and adjust himself to a different environment.

Why is it that so many of our people are going to the United States? The reason is this: That under their quota law, they take in between 100,000 and 150,000 immigrants every year, and no more. Before this quota law went into effect, they were taking in from 1,000,000 to 1,500,000. How are they going to make good the wastage in their country? By draining off our native-born Canadian citizens, bringing them to the United States and absorbing them with their own people. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, is it right that we should stand by and see a thing of that kind done without making some protest to the American government? Is it right? I do not think it is. When we give a person a certificate of naturalization, we have to protect him in every way possible in which a government can protect its people, but as soon as he begins to use his certificate of naturalization, he is told that it is of no use to him at all in the United States.

The United States claim to be a country of freedom, of liberty, and so on. In the year 1910 discrimination was made by the empire of Russia against American citizens entering that country. Russia declared that people of a certain religious persuasion could not enter the empire of Russia although they were American citizens; I have reference to Jewish people. There were only two classes who were allowed to enter. They had either to be bankers—I ask my friends of the Progressive movement to listen to that—or they had to be people of high social standing.

After all, all the people of the United States who travel are not bankers or people of high social standing, and it was the Russian police who had to decide whether they were bankers or people of high social standing. If the American citizen desiring to enter Russia handed over a sum which was sufficient to indicate that he was a banker, he entered freely, and no doubt the same was true with regard to people of high social standing. President Taft took this matter up with Russia. There was a treaty between these countries which was entered into in 1832, and representations were made to the Russian government, through the American ambassador in St. Petersburg. The Russian government was then tottering to its fall, and no action was taken. The treaty was denounced, and since 1910 there has been no treaty between Russia and the United States, because they felt, and rightly so, that no such discrimination should be made against United States citizens. When a United States citizen presented his certificate he was able to say "Civis Americanus sum", and that was sufficient. To-day the United States are practising the same thing which Russia practised up to 1910, and it seems to me the part of wisdom for our government, through our minister, to point out to the American government that they are not giving us a square deal. If they want our people, we cannot hold them back, but at least we ought to ask the American government to take what is known in Nova Scotia as run-of-mine.

I suppose a good many members of the Progressive party are unaware of the fact that they could not enter the United States except under the quota law. My good friend from Red Deer (Mr. Speakman), the member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy), the member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), and the members for other creeks and rivers—I cannot remember them all—would not be permitted, not one of them, to enter the United States except under the quota law, and in some cases they would have to wait ten years, and in other cases fifteen, before they could get in. So what can these poor people do? They have to run for parliament and be elected to this House.

Although we have not got a quota law in this country, we have something which is so near unto it that it would take a Philadelphia lawyer to decide what the difference is. We do not put a quota law into effect, but we have drawn a line across the map of Europe and we say: These people from the northern part may come in, but these people from the south and southeastern part shall not come in. I do not suppose that it is generally known—I do not think the Minister of Immigration is aware that he is keeping out the entire Latin race from entering this country, with the exception of the French. Naturally they could not keep the French out, because they would hear about it in this House. The French are permitted to come in, but no other members of the Latin race, except under special permit and privilege. Now that is a rather serious thing. After all, there are decent people among the Latin race who make good citizens. The test of a man's ability to make good in this country is not the country from which he comes; it is the character of the man. The whole of southeastern Europe is in what is known as the non-preferred class. Asia Minor is in the non-preferred class.

I am going to say something which will probably surprise my friend the Minister of Immigration, and that is that under the rules of the Immigration department the founder of Christianity would be debarred from coming into this country. He could not come in, and none of the apostles could enter this country. None of the founders of the early Christian church could enter Canada under the present regulations of the department. There are in the case of Jesus of Nazareth,—I am saying it with all respect—four orders in council which would prohibit him from coming in here. There would be first, the order relating to the non-agriculturist class. Carpenters are not permitted to enter this country coming from that district. And then he would not have a proper passport; he would not be travelling by a continuous journey; and he would have no relatives in this country. Those are four orders in council which would prevent him from coming in. Michael Angelo, although he built St. Peter's at Rome, could not enter this country, because we do not want architects or carpenters from Latin countries. If he came from Iceland and could build an icehouse, we could use him. If Mr. Mussolini wished to come over and make a bid for the leadership of the Tory party, he would be debarred by the Minister of Immigration from coming in. We heard it stated in the last election: Canada wants a Mussolini. But my friend the Minister of Immigration stands like an angel with flaming sword at the gate, and would not permit him to enter. And so all along the line.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this country is not in a position now to make distinctions between people as to the countries from which they come. A man may be a scoundrel and come from Scandinavia; a man may be a genius and come from Italy. I have dinned this thing into the ears of the Department of Immigration for the last ten years. I have been a voice crying in the wilderness. I have not been able to make them see the light. My friend the Minister of Immigration made some very interesting and satisfactory speeches before he came down here to take the department in hand. In Winnipeg I remember he made a speech which made us believe that at last there was a Daniel come to judgment; he was going to do wonderful things. He pointed out that hitherto the department, unfortunately, had had so many temporary ministers and so many ministers who had not had time to get acquainted with conditions before they moved on that they were unable to do justice to themselves and to the department. He was going to do it justice. Well I hope he will. He is a new man and certainly is not lacking in intelligence and has many qualities which go to make a splendid administrator, and I hope that when he takes hold of things, all this red tape which seems to embarrass the immigration department will be cut away and flung into the waste paper basket. It will be a good thing for the department, a good thing for the minister and, best of all, it will be a good thing for the country.

May I say a word or two about the question of the maritime rights which will be before the House very shortly? It would appear that the maritimes have rights. I have not read the report yet, but I have no doubt they have rights. A commission was appointed by the government to investigate and ascertain what those rights were and are. The commission sat during last summer and the early part of the autumn. They made their final report. A curious thing about the commission, which I think should be brought to the attention of the House, is the fact that although the commission consisted of three worthy members, men who are looked upon as of first class ability in their respective avocations, no counsel was appointed to represent the Dominion government. Do hon. members not think that an extraordinary thing? Here were gentlemen from the maritimes who were interested in seeing that adjustments were made of conditions in the maritimes which they thought had been brought about by forces over which they had no control. They were making claims for tens of millions of dollars. They were to have adjustment of freight rates, and they were to have coking plants to stimulate the coal business in Nova Scotia, and dozens of other things which involved large expenditures on the part of the Dominion government. Can hon. members tell me why no person was there to represent the government, to cross-examine them and find out the basis of their claims? In the customs inquiry, which is being conducted so efficiently, we find two legal gentlemen who are drawing, in addition to their breath, $300 a day from the coffers of this country. There never was a commission in which the party who is going to have money extracted from him is not represented in some way. After all, there must be some person to see that they do not walk away with the parliament buildings. And yet the fact remains that in this case nothing was done. The report was prepared and handed in without any examination at all of the witnesses by the federal authorities. The reason of it was, I think, that when the commission began its sittings we were in the throes of a general election. Both parties—and I may say the three parties—were so busy saving their own political lives that they had not time to consider the way in which this thing was being conducted, and the result is the maritimes walked away with practically everything they asked. I think that when the case comes before the House we should bear in mind that this was what is known as an ex parte judgment. The Dominion government was not represented, and we should scrutinize very carefully indeed any sums of money we pay in a case where we are not represented. In Quebec certain proceedings are taken in cases where the party is not represented. We make an opposition to judgment. We take out a petition in revocation of judgment. We say we have not been justly treated, and the case is thereupon opened upon the necessary affidavit being made, and the party who complains has an opportunity of placing his case before the court. I cannot absolve the Meighen government from responsibility in this matter. After all, the commission functioned at the time the Meighen government was functioning. They were both functioning concurrently. Surely there must have been in the Tory party, who had been out of office for such a long period of time, some lawyer who could take up the brief for the Dominion government, and yet nothing was done. We are now faced with a situation of that kind, and I think the people of this country will demand some accountability from the parties responsible for what I would call a denial of justice.

With regard to the suggestion made by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) I say that to my mind it was the most constructive suggestion that has been made in the House this session. It seeks to reduce the interest charges on our public debt; and with a sinking fund, it seeks also eventually to abolish our debt altogether. Of course that will not come in my day or in the day of any gentleman listening to the sound of my voice to-night. But it seems to me to be a step in the proper direction, and it would be well if this suggestion were sent to the banking and commerce committee and thrown to the young lions of the Progressive party so that we could see what they would make of it. It is something well worth considering, and the fact that it is not taken very seriously by the banking community of this country is proof to my mind that it is a pretty good thing. I think the bankers can be induced to see that it is in their interest to have something of that kind done. It is proposed to let them have four per cent upon their money, and as the hon. member for West Calgary said they have hundreds of millions lying idle, in some cases bearing not more than two or two and a half per cent, when they are helping the government they are helping themselves, because after all they are the largest taxpayers in the country. They are the people who will benefit first when we get our finances on an even keel, and I think it is only necessary for us to charge the hon. member for West Calgary, not professionally of course but what is known as amicus curiæ, to go down and visit his friends in the Sodom and Gomorrah of unrighteousness in Toronto and Montreal, pointing out to them the feasibility of the project and that it would enure as much to their benefit as to the people at large; something tangible would come of it. I am always very wary of suggestions from my friends on the other side. Beware of the Greeks bringing gifts. Something good may come out of Nazareth, and the hon. member for West Calgary is too big a man to put forward something of this kind as a cat's paw, and I know he would be able to convince other people that the scheme is workable and would bring to the country tens of millions of dollars in due course.

I have no feeling that the government is going to be defeated. I do not think they will be, but if they are we will meet again at Philippi. We have trounced the Tory party successively three times now, and I think we are able to do it a fourth. At any rate, we are willing to try and let the best man win. I think the Minister of Finance ought to be congratulated upon this splendid budget of his. I think he deserves a great deal of credit for the brevity of the budget speech. In the olden days budget speeches used to take three and four hours and one could not understand what was being said because of the abundance of words. This is a business man's speech delivered by a business man in thirty-five minutes, a speech which everybody could understand and which raised the parliament of Canada in the estimation of the whole country. I only hope that we shall have the present Minister (Mr. Robb) for many years to direct the finances of the country. I support the main motion.

Mr. R. K. SMITH (Cumberland): It is not my intention to unduly delay the House this evening. I did not intend making any reference to the Duncan report at this time, but after listening to the hon. gentleman who has just concluded (Mr. Jacobs) I am bound to say that we are surprised to learn that any hon. member of this House could have been tempted to treat that subject in the humorous manner in which that hon. member has. The order in council creating the Duncan commission was passed last year when the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was in office, and the instructions conveyed in the right hon. gentleman's letter to the commission were given during the month of April last. I understand that my hon. friend who has just sat down is a man of outstanding ability, learned in the law, and I should think that the Prime Minister, if he wanted to appoint counsel to assist the commission, could not have made any better choice than the hon. gentleman himself. But there was no necessity for counsel in connection with that investigation for the reason that there was not involved any question of law of a technical character such as would warrant the employment of a legal man. The matter for investigation had reference to certain unfair conditions there, and the object was to ascertain what remedies could be applied to alleviate those conditions, which have existed in the maritime provinces ever since confederation. I trust that the party opposite will not generally treat the subject as humourously as my hon. friend has.

Mr. JACOBS: In what sense did I treat the report humorously? I pointed out that there was no counsel, and that is no laughing matter.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): I listened carefully to the hon. gentleman's whole speech, which was full of a delicate humour at the expense of the report, and the tone he adopted in relation to the investigation is in keeping with the rest of his remarks. His reference to the fact that no counsel had been appointed was presumably ironical; it was altogether unnecessary.

I want to put myself on record as being disappointed, as all of us from eastern Canada are bitterly disappointed, and indeed properly perturbed, that the budget contains no relief for the two basic industries of Nova Scotia. We are particularly disconcerted at this, in view of the information which we gave this House and the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) during the last session of parliament. If our words, our pleas and our testimony have no weight with the minister, if he is inclined to be sceptical of the seriousness of the situation and if he takes this position because of the policy of the party to which he belongs, surely there is reason for him to have some regard not only for the pleas of the people generally, and of all political parties in Nova Scotia, but also for the recommendations of the royal commissions appointed by this government and by the province as well. The royal commission appointed by Nova Scotia in 1925, in an addendum to its report, suggested an increased duty on coal and steel, and the royal commission appointed last year by this very government also recommended, at least by implication, further protection on coal. Let me read from the Duncan report the paragraph regarding the customs tariff on coal.

> Several phases of the customs tariff in its relation to coal were brought to our attention both by the government of Nova Scotia and by the operators of the coal mines. These we feel ourselves precluded from dealing with since they are a matter properly to be considered by the Tariff Advisory Board, but we may be permitted to say that we are impressed with the need for reconsideration of the customs tariff in its relation to coal and anthracite coke and recommend that the Tariff Advisory Board should be asked to give immediate consideration to the subject.

Let me stress some words of that paragraph: "We are impressed with the need for reconsideration of the customs tariff in its relation to coal." There can be no reconsideration of the customs tariff on coal in a downward direction; such reconsideration must have an upward trend. Still, notwithstanding the fact that an application was presented to the government in 1924 by a delegation headed by the then Premier of Nova Scotia, Mr. Armstrong, asking for increased protection on coal; notwithstanding that in an addendum to its report the royal commission appointed by the government of Nova Scotia in 1925 recommended the same thing; and notwithstanding that the royal commission appointed by this government itself now urges a higher protection in this direction, we have in the year 1927 a budget brought down by the Minister of Finance in which this important industry and all the recommendations are totally ignored.

Mr. ROBB: How will increased protection on coal improve the steel industry in Canada?

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): The steel industry is linked up with the coal industry, particularly in eastern Canada, to such an extent that it is almost impossible to separate the two. We have information to the effect that in Nova Scotia—and this applies to the rest of Canada—it takes four tons of coal to produce a ton of steel, so that whatever you do for the benefit of coal will assist steel, and vice versa.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is the hon. member aware that the member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacDonald) at a meeting in Sydney a few weeks ago said that his experience on committees of the House and in the House itself had convinced him that the members representing central Canadian constituencies were solidly against an increase in the duty on coal?

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): I am not aware of that; I am surprised to hear it.

Mr. ILSLEY: He was so reported.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): People are often misreported. The hon. gentleman is here in person and can correct the statement if it is wrong.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton): What I said was that it was doubtful whether we could hope for an increased duty on coal, as Ontario and the west would probably be against it, but it was not at all hopeless.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): That is quite a different construction from the one placed on those words by the hon. member for Kings-Hants (Mr. Ilsley). I was going to say, Mr. Speaker, that possibly the Minister of Finance might say that this is properly a question for reference to the Tariff Advisory Board, and in connection with that board let me say a few words. I know nothing of its personnel but I do know that it has no power; in my opinion it has not even enough power to be self-respecting. There is a saying which I used in the House last year which seems to me particularly applicable to this board; it has powder in its canister but no shot in its locker. It has no power to make a finding, can only make a recommendation, and it appears to me to be a vehicle for the shelving of troublesome questions when they are such. Last year, however, after the Tariff Advisory Board was constituted, a tariff matter was absolutely taken out of its hands in connection with the reduction of duty on automobiles. If this board is to be something worth while is it the policy of the government to place before it questions of a troublesome nature in order to escape responsiblity, and on the other hand to take any political advantage possible through a popular reduction in the tariff by using their own judgment without referring the matter to the board at all?

Mr. ADSHEAD: Was the tariff board inaugurated at the time the automobile duty was removed?

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): The tariff board was properly constituted before the duty on automobiles was dealt with last year, and I do not believe that to be a fair proposal to the industries of this country. If the board is to be made something worth while and something which will function properly, certainly it must be used in a proper way and not as a means of sidetracking troublesome questions. It should be used to secure all the information available and forward it in their findings to this House.

The question has arisen, Mr. Speaker, as to whether or not the coal industry in Canada is worth while. Last year in Nova Scotia we produced 6,300,000 tons of coal, slightly more than in the year previous; one-fifth of the population of that province is directly dependent upon the coal and steel industries and one-twelfth of the revenue of Nova Scotia is secured from royalities on coal. In the Dominion of Canada we have invested about $150,000,000 in coal mining, and the coal business in Canada has attained a value of as high as $80,000,000 in one year. I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is an industry which we must protect. If the coal industry in Nova Scotia is allowed to go by the board and disappear, there will also disappear from the province of Nova Scotia one-fifth of its population and one-twelfth of its revenue, and chaos will be created in the business of that province. But someone will say that there is no danger of the coal industry in Canada disappearing; I say there is a very grave danger unless something is done to properly protect it. Last year we imported from the United States about 17,000,000 tons of coal, of which 13,000,000 tons were of the very grade we produce in Nova Scotia. It has been said that some day anthracite coal in the United States will be exhausted, and when that time comes we must look elsewhere for our hard coal, or for a substitute. We should be independent of the United States with regard to bituminous coal as well as anthracite, because we do not know when we may be cut off from this supply. A war, a strike, or any other contingency may at any time stop the importation of American coal into Canada, and we have no way of looking ahead and guarding against these things, except by developing our own industries. We should be prepared to meet such conditions, and that can only be done by becoming independent of that country in relation to coal.

On the Canadian National railways last year we used 5,000,000 tons of coal, 3,000,000 tons of which came from the United States. It does not seem to me that we are treating our coal industry fairly; it certainly deserves something better than that. We are not asking for high protection, as some hon. gentlemen opposite would like to make people believe; we are asking for a moderate, adequate protection, something that should be granted readily because the duty to-day is practically the same as it was in the eighties while the protection is less than half as much, for obvious reasons which need no elaboration. We are asking for an adequate duty to protect this industry, and as soon as it is found that proper protection is given, the duty if need be may be very readily lessened. Some may say that this will have a tendency to increase the price of coal in Canada; in that connection I have here some of the remarks of Mr. Cronyn, which are very pertinent, but with which I will not weary the House. It does seem to me, however, that if the output of coal could be doubled in Canada there would be an appreciable difference in the cost of production, more than enough, I believe, to offset the increased duty. I believe that duty should be $1 per ton, and I believe if that duty is granted, with the coking plants which we hope to see established and with the freight reductions which are promised, we can establish an all-Canadian coal supply for an all-Canadian market.

Mr. ILSLEY: Has the hon. gentleman given consideration to the statement of the fuel board that it would take a duty of $6 instead of a duty of $1 to make us independent of foreign supplies?

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): The other evening I listened to the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) when he read the report of the fuel board. It appeared to me then that it was a theoretical treatise, a sort of historical document dealing with the deposits of coal in the world, with no practical application to the coal trade of Canada. The question was not treated in a practical way, and I am not aware of the information which the hon. member has just stated, whether it came from the fuel committee or whatever its source; and it sounds absurd.

Another thing, Mr. Speaker, is that we have a reserve of coal in the province of Nova Scotia to the extent of ten billion tons. It seems to me that this government should protect this basic industry in one of the old struggling provinces of this Dominion.

Mr. NEILL: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): Yes.

Mr. NEILL: Is he aware that a duty of a dollar a ton, which is double the present duty, would practically put out of operation all the coal mines in British Columbia?

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): Put out of operation all the coal mines in British Columbia?

Mr. NEILL: Yes.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): Why the total Canadian export of coal to the United States and to all foreign countries is only slightly over a million tons annually. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say it will work hardship to the coalfields, or the coal miners or coal operators of British Columbia? It may work hardship to the extent of a million tons but the rest of Canada would be relieved to the extent of the hardship represented by sixteen million tons.

Mr. NEILL: I hope the hon. gentleman's Conservative friends from British Columbia will note that statement of policy on their behalf.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): It is not a statement of policy. I am not claiming that action taken to properly equalize things might not result in some slight disadvantage to the rest of the Dominion. There might perhaps be a slight increase in the cost of coal until the question could be properly adjusted and worked out on a fair business basis. It might work some hardship to the coalfields of British Columbia—I am not maintaining that, nor am I admitting that it would—but I say the question is one which will have to be further developed by those who are more familiar with the coal trade in British Columbia than I happen to be.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am going to leave the question of coal and speak about two other industries in the province of Nova Scotia that are very severely affected by the customs tariff. Last year I brought to the attention of the House and of the Minister of Finance a languishing shoe industry which happens to be located in the town from which I come. That shoe industry was languishing last year. This year it is dead. It has gone into liquidation and is now in the hands of a receiver, due to unfair competition coming mostly from the old country. That industry was established away back in the year 1867. It has progressed almost every year down until about 1921. But to-day it is in the hands of a receiver. Why we should allow unfair competition to interfere with any legitimate industry in this country is more than I can understand. The Prime Minister has made the statement in this House and out of it, that no legitimate industry in Canada would suffer through his fiscal policy. This industry is certainly legitimate and it is surely suffering from the policy of inadequate protection. This applies not only to the shoe industry in the province from which I come but to the industry all over the Dominion to a very marked degree. Why, Mr. Speaker, the boot and shoe manufacturers have to pay from fifteen to thirty-five per cent duty on the raw material that goes into the manufacture of some of our boots and shoes in this country, whereas in the old country, they get their raw material free. Last year there were imported into the Dominion 809,483 pairs of shoes to the value of two million odd dollars. We exported from Canada during the same period —these are figures for the year ending January, 1927—110,337 pairs. I have a lot of figures here but I am not going to weary the House with them. It is sufficient to note that we are steadily increasing the importations of boots and shoes, and leather goods manufactured and unmanufactured, into the Dominion. It certainly is not a healthy sign. It shows very positively that there is something radically wrong with the tariff and its application to this business, and the government at least should recognize the fact that it requires a little more consideration and a higher degree of protection.

I spoke also last year with regard to the woollen industry. We have a woollen mill in the town whence I come which is boarded up, due to unfair competition from abroad. The textiles and fibres which were imported into this country during the year ending January, 1927, amounted to a little under $200,000,000—$184,000,000 odd. We imported in 1926, $181,000,000 odd, and in 1925, $163,000,000 odd, showing a steady increase in the importations of textiles and fibres into Canada. Look at our exports. During the same period of 1925 when we imported $163,000,000 odd, we exported nine millions odd. In 1926 we exported but nine millions odd, and in 1927, a lesser amount of seven million dollars odd. We imported from the United Kingdom last year to the extent of $72,000,000 odd, but we exported to that country only $844,000 odd. These figures are for the year ending January, 1927. We imported from the United States $69,000,000 odd, and exported to that country $3,000,000 odd. I think these figures speak in no uncertain tones as to the position of the textile industry in this country and what it requires. It has been said in this chamber that Penman's are doing much more business than they did previously, that their bonds are high. Penman's may be progressing, but the smaller mills in the Dominion are the ones that are suffering. The smaller mills all over the Dominion are unable to meet that unfair competition; they are unable to compete with the wage rate, lower to the extent of one-half, that is paid in the old land, and with other unfair conditions. They certainly cannot meet that competition on anything like a fair basis unless some further tariff protection is granted.

I am going to conclude by stating that in the maritimes to-day there is one matter transcending all others in importance, and that is the implementing by legislation by this government of all the recommendations contained in the Duncan report. We have passed the stage of trifling in connection with this matter. We will discuss the issues dealt with in the report later. It will not be amiss, however, for me to state now that all the people of the maritime provinces are of one mind on this report, namely, that it should be speedily implemented in toto by legislation by this parliament at this session. Anything short of that—any delay, amendment or mutilation—will meet with such hostility from eastern Canada that I hesitate to mention in this House what sort of revolution will take place.

Mr. JOHN MILLAR (Qu'Appelle): We have listened, Mr. Speaker, during this debate to a great flow of oratory, and a great many figures which would lead to the conclusion that one could prove almost anything from figures. Some of the arguments which I have heard do not seem to be very sound—in fact there were a number which appeared to me to be very absurd.

I take the Hansard of yesterday and I find in the remarks of the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) as reported on two pages not very far apart, an argument in one place that the imposition of a duty increases the price of wheat, and in another that the effect of the imposition of a duty is not to raise the price of a protected article. On page 736 of Hansard the hon. member is reported as saying:

> The purpose of protection is not to raise prices but to defend and develop the purchasing power of the nation.

Those are very plain words. On the next page the hon. member for Moose Jaw made this statement:

> Mr. Ross (Moose Jaw): The hon. gentleman will admit that a duty of 42 cents a bushel on wheat does not raise the price of wheat in the United States for the simple reason that they have an exportable surplus.

The hon. member for Frontenac-Addington proceeded to demonstrate that in the United States they have a duty on wheat, a duty on eggs, and a duty on butter, and he asked: Are the legislators of the United States all deceived? No other conclusion can be drawn from that than that he believes and they believe that the imposition of a duty raises the price of those goods in the United States. Thus we find contradictory remarks on two pages, one immediately following the other. The hon. member for Frontenac-Addington is entirely wrong in regard to wheat. He stated that if the imposition of a duty on manufactured goods raises the price, it must follow that the imposition of a duty on wheat in Canada raises the price, because he said, as we have a duty of 12 cents a bushel on wheat —I think he is wrong in that; I think the duty is 8 cents a bushel—the farmers must have reaped, because of that duty, a profit of $10,000,000.

This is what really takes place. He made the statement—and on the other side of the House a goodly number of members applauded it—that if it were true that the imposition of a protective duty raised the price of manufactured articles, it would also have the same effect on wheat. Why does it not? On the surface it seems rational that it should. This is the reason: The price of our wheat is fixed in the old country market. You have to bring your competition to bear on the governing market and our governing market for wheat is in the old country. I think the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) was partly right and partly wrong when he stated that the duty placed by the United States government on Canadian and other wheat going into that country did not raise the price of the wheat in the United States. In the United States they have an area that grows strong, hard wheat, of which they have not sufficient, of which they are very short. The imposition of a duty against Canadian wheat does protect that wheat and does raise the price of it. On the other hand they have also large areas that grow soft wheat of which they have a surplus. That wheat is not greatly in demand. They require perhaps more of it than they do of hard wheat; but still they do not require all of it, and they export part of it. Thus we have an example in the one country, the United States, of a protective tariff raising the price of a part of a commodity and not affecting the other part. The governing market for the soft wheat is the old country, the same as is the case with us. The governing market for the hard wheat is in their own country, and that is where you can protect and where you can raise the price. But you cannot do that with Canadian wheat. Our price is governed by the price in Liverpool.

The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), who is not in his seat at present, and a few other hon. members have directed some attention to the group that sit in this row of benches where I sit, and I wish to make some comment upon their remarks. If one is charged in a court of justice one wants to know what the charge is and what is the proof of his guilt. There were others in this row who were elected on an arrangement somewhat similar to the one on which I was elected. I was elected as a Liberal-Progressive, and I wonder if the charge is made because I have joined up with another group that has a very similar platform. I would not mind being accused of that. In fact if I were to be charged with anything of that nature, joining another party, crossing the floor to or linking up in any way with another party, I would suggest to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre that two of the judges might be the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) and the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion). Perhaps they would know as much about how it felt whether or not they were apostates, whether they were criminals, whether they deserved to be treated as the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) has been treated. Some have laughed because the Liberal-Progressives have taken their seats on this side of the House.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MILLAR: An hon. member says: "hear, hear." To go back at little, let me ask: Is there any disgrace in being elected as a Progressive with Liberal support or as a Conservative with Progressive support? I do not think there is any reason why I should be ashamed when two groups in my constituency, whose views on the tariff and on other matters are almost identical, agreed to come together and to choose a candidate as they did, and I was elected. And when I come to this House, where is the logical place for me to sit? There are only two: one with the Progressives, and the other on this side of the House. I do not think there is any blame whatever attaching to me, no matter which I choose; I could be damned for doing either. Is there any good reason why the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, who perhaps has been dealing a little to much in mud of late and has become too handy at throwing it, should point to this group and say we have betrayed our principles? While his attention was directed chiefly towards the Minister of Immigration, it certainly must have included others as well. Is there any reason to believe that we are not doing our best to get what we consider to be in the interests of the country? Is there any reason to believe that we uphold evil? Is there any reason to believe that we are not as true as when we were elected in 1921? I do not think so.

The farmers' platform spoken of by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre was drawn up about 1912 and I believe it was revised in 1917. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre read over this platform and, referring then to the Minister of Immigration, he used the word "apostate", stating that there were those who had betrayed the people who trusted them. I would point out that many changes have taken place since then. We have had many reductions in the tariff. There have been very many changes that would cause one to take a different view. Besides, since I have been here I have not been standing still. I do not think one is necessarily to blame if he should change his views as he listens to arguments, comes into contact with other members, and hears them discuss their problems. If there is any member on the other side of the House who has not changed his mind in five years, I would like to see him stand up. The implication of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre was that because one did not act exactly as he did when that platform was drawn up, he was an apostate and a traitor. Well, if there is any member on the other side of the House who has not changed his mind in five years, though he may think he liveth, I think he is dead.

I am going to direct my attention now to some measures that it seems to me might help to improve the condition of Canada. I am inclined to think that perhaps too much attention has been paid to the tariff question. It is good fighting ground, and I suppose that is the reason why it is discussed at great length every session. But the tariff question is not all. I freely say that I am not entirely satisfied with the present budget so far as the tariff is concerned. I was elected, as many other hon. members were, on a low tariff platform, and I hope to get that low tariff as quickly as possible. I believe in a low tariff, but since listening to the remarks of other members I confess that I have changed my mind slightly in some particulars, though on the whole I am of the same opinion regarding the tariff as I was when I came here in 1921. We have had changes made in the tariff since 1921, some in 1924, but I would like to see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) go a little further.

I might have had reason to vote against the budget if it were not for the fact that we have had a tariff board appointed. I thought this matter over very fully. Last session was a very hectic one, and it was followed immediately by an election. Then came the conference of the premiers in London. I know that private members are very, very busy, and ministers are much more so, and I cannot see how it would be possible for the government to have the time necessary to weigh carefully all the data gathered by the tariff board in the short time that elapsed before the opening of the session. You know what it means to peruse the evidence taken down by a shorthand writer covering the proceedings of only one day. To sift that evidence and study it in relation to other matters is no small task, and I do not think any member who desired to be fair would say that it was possible for the government to consider that data properly and bring down any important tariff changes based upon it at this session. I have no hesitation in saying, however, that when next session rolls around I shall expect, if I am here, very radical changes in the tariff. I hope there will be reductions all along the line, but for the present I cannot severely criticise the government for not doing that which I feel it was physically impossible for them to do.

The hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken) referred to the income tax, as he does almost every session, and he pointed out that the farmers are paying very little income tax. I have been struck more than once with the nerve of those who, after they have grasped what belongs to themselves and three or four others will then stand back and pour ridicule and scorn on those who have not paid the income tax. If I have my share of the goods of this world and the share of three or four others as well, I have no right to ridicule the others if they do not pay their share of the income tax, and that is exactly what has taken place. The farmers are not paying income tax simply because they are not earning sufficient income.

A suggestion I would like to make is this. Looking into the future, I think what ought to be done is to endeavour to eliminate waste. During the years that have passed many blunders have been made. Going back as far as 1912, I think a gigantic blunder was made when the Welland canal was started. The first estimate of cost made by the engineers on this work was $50,000,000, but it has already cost more than $62,000,000, and the last estimate of the engineers is that the cost will reach $114,500,000. This with interest will bring the cost when completed to approximately $140,000,000. If you take a pencil and reckon the interest on that at four per cent you find that it amounts to $5,600,000 a year. This canal was built ostensibly for the three prairie provinces. We will suppose, just for the sake of getting an approximate reckoning, that each province pays its share of the interest. That would leave one-third, or $1,866,000 to be paid by the three prairie provinces in interest alone. In view of that charge, where are they going to make a gain after the Welland canal is completed? All the benefit they will get from the completion of the canal is that the larger ships carrying their grain will be able to go through the Welland canal, and about 150 miles further. If they save one cent a bushel —I think that is about the highest estimate one can make—and if 100,000,000 bushels passed down the canal each year, which I think is about the most we have reason to expect will pass eastward, that will mean a saving of $1,000,000 a year, so that the benefit to the three prairie provinces would be less than their share of the interest. If that is the case with the three prairie provinces, for whose benefit the canal was supposed in the main to be built, what is to be the experience of Ontario? What is to be the experience of Quebec? What is to be the experience of the maritime provinces and of British Columbia? I think a very great mistake was made in starting to build the Welland canal. We do not get any benefit from it until we have invested $114,000,000, and I omitted to mention that the interest on that would amount to probably $20,000,000, making a total of approximately $140,000,000.

Let me mention some other mistakes we have made in the past. We are considering at the present time various huge projects involving a large expenditure of money, such as the St. Lawrence waterway development, the building of the Georgian bay canal, and other enterprises, and in view of that I thought it might not be out of the way to refer back to some of the mistakes that have been made in the past. I have already mentioned the Welland canal.

The second mistake was the building of paralleling railway lines—wasteful duplication. We have in western Canada, and in some places in eastern Canada, railway lines paralleling each other for fifty, sixty or a hundred miles, only a mile to three miles apart, while in other districts the people are drawing their grain long distances to the railroad, in some cases doing their marketing forty miles away. That was one blunder for which we are paying dearly now.

Another costly error was the building at enormous cost of the National Transcontinental to Quebec, and then the raising of freight rates to such an extent that very little freight travels on that line. If hon. members would refer to the arguments advanced at that time they would see that the road was built to carry our grain to Quebec, to keep it in Canadian channels. For a short time after the road was built the rate was low, six cents a bushel, but I believe it is now about twenty-one cents. The result is that after an expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars the railway is not used for the purpose for which it was built. Hon. members may think lightly of that, but as a matter of fact Canada is paying for that blunder.

Mr. HARRIS: Would the hon. member be good enough to tell us what administration was responsible for the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific?

Mr. MILLAR: We spend too much time quibbling as to which party was responsible for this or for that. While important business of the country is to be transacted, and while we are here to transact it the best way we can, we have whiled away hour after hour and day after day quibbling as to who is responsible. I am sure my hon. friends on the other side have been guilty of blunders enough; for instance, the building of a dry dock at Victoria, where it should not have been built, in order to elect one of their members; and they have tried to build an hotel at Vancouver. That is another blunder.

Mr. McMILLAN: Was there a board of trade between Quebec and Vancouver that was not in favour of it?

Mr. MILLAR: This may seem irrelevant, but after thinking it over, I believe it is quite to the point to draw to the attention of hon. members what may be gained by watchfulness in this House. We sit here day by day and sometimes appear to take matters lightly, but there is a great amount of work being done, and large saving can be made by hon. members if they are watching. I am going to mention two circumstances. In 1923 Mr. Wallace, a member of the Progressive group and an electrical engineer, rose when the then hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George proposed a private bill for the renewing of a patent, and opposed the measure. I do not think there was another member in this House who knew there was anything dangerous being put through, and I do not think the member for St. Lawrence-St. George knew it himself. He probably had been requested to put this private bill through and was proceeding to do it. Mr. Wallace, whose constituency I have forgotten—

An hon. MEMBER: Elgin.

Mr. MILLAR: —arose in his place and in a twenty minute speech saved to this country $15,000,000 in six years. It was done in this way: He pointed out that this company had received a charter in Great Britain in about 1904, a charter in the United States about 1906 and one in Canada about the same year. They enjoyed the privilege in one country for seventeen years and in another country a little less, and they had applied in Great Britain to have the patent renewed and had been refused. They had applied in the United States, and had been refused, and this time they were before the Canadian parliament. It was all new to us. He pointed out that during the time they were protected in their patent the price of a little tube used in the radio was $9, then it dropped to $6, and after the expiration of the patent it dropped to $4. He said, "I believe that if this patent is renewed for seven years"—that was the time asked for—"the price will rise $2 on each tube." An estimate was made of the number of tubes used in Canada, and it figured out $15,000,000 in six years—one year had then expired. That is just one example of what can be saved by watchfulness. Probably not one person in Canada out of a thousand knew that this saving had been made, or how it was made, or anything about it.

I desire to refer to another instance. Those who sat in this House in 1921 will remember that a request was made for the renewal of a coal lease in Alberta which was known as the Hoppe Isenberg lease. I am not going fully into the details of it, but that bill passed through the House and everybody seemed to take it as a matter of fact. It went to the Senate and was checked up there. A conference took place between members of the Senate and members of the House of Commons, and the lease was refused. A later discussion in this House revealed the fact that the lease of that property, if my memory serves me rightly, was worth from two hundred million to three hundred million dollars. I believe the then leader of the opposition, Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, made the statement that a provisional sale had been made to English capitalists for that amount. That shows the importance of watchfulness and care.

I desire to make another suggestion. We have been discussing the tariff, and sometimes one is a little in doubt—I frankly confess that at times I am in doubt—whether we will ever be able to reach the point where we can do away entirely with the tariff, and, if you will, with protection. What I believe should be done is to lower the tariff all round, because it is a great inconvenience—injustice is the word I wanted to use—to those manufacturing in one line if the protection they enjoy is removed while other products are protected. It places them in the same position as that in which the farmer finds himself at the present time. The Canadian farmer cannot be protected, but he must buy in a protected market. If after we have thoroughly studied this matter, and after the data has been received from the tariff board, those of us who believe we should eventually have free trade find we must compromise with other parts of Canada, that we must carry a certain part of the burden of the cost of that protective tariff, then I think even in western Canada we could do so, provided the government would do more to help us in connection with agriculture.

Let me give hon. gentlemen some figures to show what has been the result of this assistance the government has already given. They have been fostering agriculture in all its branches. I need only refer to what has been done in the way of growing earlier and stronger varieties of wheat. Marquis wheat has revolutionized the industry in the west and is now being used largely in the United States and even in South America. Where would Canada be to-day as a wheat growing country but for that fostering care on the part of the government? No individual farmer could do that experimenting himself, for it is expensive work; but as a result of the assistance of the government we are very well to the front in the wheat growing industry. Perhaps it would be surprising to some if I were to say, what is a fact, that in sixteen years at the Chicago exposition Canada won the grand championship in wheat fourteen times. In the forefront among the provinces is Saskatchewan, but we are pleased to see that our sister province of Alberta has won the championship in the last two years; and as wheat growing is moving westward and northward, Alberta will probably become the banner wheat province of Canada.

What about oats? Twelve times out of sixteen Canada has taken the grand championship for oats at Chicago, and when it comes to another department of agriculture, horses, in nine years the Clyesdale horses of Canada have taken thirty championships at Chicago. There will come a time when we will ask for greater assistance for agriculture, and I point out these Canadian successes in order to show that the money is by no means wasted. Canada would not occupy the position she does to-day in regard to grain, cattle, hogs and poultry if it were not for the fostering care of the Canadian government. Perhaps the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) may suggest that I am overlooking the fact that the business of production is really a provincial matter. I do not forget that fact, but I have in mind also that while that is true the Dominion government has been doing a considerable amount of work along this line and there is no reason why it should not continue to do so.

We are sometimes advised to take up mixed farming in the west. In order that hon. gentlemen who have not had the privilege of visiting that part of Canada, and who therefore are not familiar with western conditions, may learn something about the west, I want to point out that we are rapidly following this advice. We are going into mixed farming more and more. I will give you the figures for Manitoba, and I take that province because it is in the lead in taking up mixed farming. You will be surprised to know that the wheat acreage in 1903 and the wheat acreage in 1926 were just about the same in Manitoba. But what about other industries? In four points in Manitoba they are shipping honey by the carload, and from forty to forty-eight per cent of the barley grown in Canada is produced in Manitoba. Last year that province produced $450,000 worth of turkeys while the vegetable crop in 1926 totalled $3,000,000 exclusive of potatoes. Here are some interesting figures: agricultural products in 1917, 1918 and 1919 in that province, amounted to $2,000,000; in the following three years they fell to $100,000,000 and in the next succeeding three years they went up to $150,000,000.

I intend to touch on one more matter before I sit down. I will pick out one department and discuss it in detail in order to show what progress is possible, and I am taking, not the grain industry, not cattle, horses, pigs and sheep, but one of the smaller activities. I do this for two reasons: first, because it has been most neglected, and secondly, because we are going to hold a poultry congress in Ottawa this coming summer. The industry to which I refer is of course poultry raising. It may seem like a small thing, but as a matter of fact it is not. One gathers a dozen eggs here and a dozen there, and this may appear insignificant. But when it is pointed out that the egg production of Canada in 1926 represented the sum of $66,000,000, and this from the farms alone, you will see that the industry is of some magnitude. Here is a remarkable fact about the poultry industry: Canada does not produce sufficient eggs to supply her own market. We exported in 1926 2,501,000 dozen eggs and imported 3,341,000 dozen. It is only some eight or ten years ago that the government of Canada took any serious steps towards improving the poultry industry. Now see where Canada stands in this regard. A year ago I listened to an address by a gentleman who stands at the head of the poultry work at the experimental farm and I heard him make this statement. He said, "we thought at one time that Canada's cold climate was a handicap to the poultry industry of the country, but instead of that it has proved an asset." This man took pens of poultry over to Spain last year and of twenty-five countries represented the Canadian exhibit stood up best, surprising the poultry raisers from abroad. Sixty-four countries hold egg-laying contests, and there is an opportunity of bringing them together and making comparisons between the achievements of Canadian hens and those of other countries. What has been the result? In 1925, out of 64 countries in which these contests are held, 39 hens laid 300 eggs or more each in one year, and of those 39 hens 19 were from Canada. Is not that a record? In 1926 the results were equally good. The pen that took the lead was also Canadian, giving an average of 296 eggs, while one Canadian hen laid the largest number of eggs of any bird recorded in any country since contests have been known—351 eggs. We do not know what hens may have done of which there is no record, but of those of which any record has been kept the Canadian hens have been foremost. The hen that laid these 351 eggs was owned by the university of British Columbia. The eggs from that hen are selling to-day not for 25 cents each but for $25 each, and the demand cannot be supplied. During that year that hen laid her weight in eggs each month, approximately.

I would like to say a word about the poultry congress before taking my seat. This year this congress is to be held in Ottawa; forty countries will be represented, and I fear that unless it receives more publicity and encouragement the benefit to our poultry industry and the advertising Canada may get from it will be lost. Last year this congress was held in Spain and there was a great fight between Canada and the United States to secure the meeting for this year; Canada won, and Ottawa has been chosen as the place of meeting. There will be present 8,000 delegates; on the program will be representatives from Japan, Russia, Germany, France and Persia, as well as a large number from the United States, from which country I believe 3,000 delegates are coming. This is a wonderful opportunity to advertise Canada. Why are they coming to this country? They are coming here because Canada has taken the lead in the poultry industry, and it has taken that lead simply because it has been given encouragement by the government. One of our representatives addressed a gathering in New Jersey some time ago; that state is well in advance in the poultry industry, and after his address was finished the gentleman at the head of that industry in New Jersey said, "Everything we have done in this state has been copied from Canada." Canada is now looked upon by the poultry raisers of other countries as the country which will supply the breeding stock of the future, because of our registration system, which I have not had time to deal with. It just comes to my mind now that recently a gentleman in Ontario sold a bird to someone in the United States for $125.

In order to point out just what progress is possible in this industry let me say that the poultry branch discovered that by mating one breed of laying hens with an excellent laying strain they were able to increase the egg production by forty per cent in one season. A short time ago I had occasion to go into the poultry department of the experimental farm near my home. It was thought that the cold in that part of the country would be such that the hens would not lay during the winter, but there I found that a pen of 95 pullets were laying 60 eggs per day with the thermometer between 40 and 47 below zero. So there is no reason why enormous strides should not be made in this industry. We have talked sometimes of subsidizing industries. We on this side of the House are not much in favour of that, but here is a way in which the agricultural industry could be assisted and enabled to lighten the farmers' burden. I think it would be well if, when grants are asked for agricultural purposes, those who are engaged in manufacturing and as merchants were very generous in these expenditures.

Mr. LADNER: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? In connection with the data he has given, does he not think that the application of the Egg Marking Act, as it exists in British Columbia, would be advantageous to the industry throughout Canada without bringing any ill effects upon the consumers?

Mr. MILLAR: I am not familiar with that act and cannot answer the question.

In closing may I say that we who reside in the western provinces and who are engaged in farming are sometimes urged to be broad-minded and to look at things from a national viewpoint. So far as I am concerned, and I believe others take the same attitude, I realize that there is a place in Canada for industries, and we do not want to crush them out. All we ask is that we have a fair chance also. Together we can develop Canada; together we should endeavour to strengthen the weak spots which are continually being found. The maritime provinces will and no doubt should receive some assistance, and it is well that we should take a national view in considering all parts of Canada. We ask no protection as growers of grain or stock but an opportunity to make a fair living; we do not want to carry the burdens of others and neither do we desire to load our burdens on anyone else. We are willing to listen to those from other parts of Canada who are engaged in industries of which we know little; we can learn from them and we want to understand them; we want to do the fair thing and to be generous when they ask for assistance, but we do ask the same consideration from other parts of Canada.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, the observations I shall make at this time will be much more brief than I had at one time intended; the debate is dragging along and I do not think it would be wise to take a very great deal of time now.

As I approach a discussion of the budget proposals let me say that I feel something like the Scotchman who was going to get married. As the time for the ceremony drew near it was observed that he was looking somewhat downcast, and he was asked by a friend if he had lost the ring. To this he replied, "No, but I have lost my enthusiasm." I say very frankly, Mr. Speaker, that I do not accept the budget as presented with a great deal of enthusiasm. In its two major parts, those referring to the tariff and to the reduction in the income tax, it is not my idea of what a budget should be. The reduction in the income tax, in so far as that might seem to indicate the intention or the disposition to further reduction with a view to the total elimination of the tax, meets with my entire disapproval.

The tariff has been discussed year after year, session after session, and it would seem to be maintained by some that there is no difference between those on different sides of the House. The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) in an address this afternoon that was listened to, I am sure, with a great deal of interest by every person in the House—and the hon. gentleman is to be congratulated upon the way in which that speech was delivered, in spite of the fact that as he proceeded we could here and there detect fallacies in the argument—maintained that the Conservative party is not a high tariff party. I think, however, we have reason to suspect that it is at least a higher tariff party. During the course of the election campaign I got hold of a certain document which I do not think was intended by those who circulated it to get into the hands of the anti-Conservative candidates. However, I got it; it was given to me by one of the retail merchants in my constituency. It was a circular letter issued by Bates and Innes of Carleton Place who, I understand, have close relations with the Hawthorne Woollen Mills. The Hawthorne Woollen Mills, which were the subject of discussion some two or three years ago, are located, as those of you who were here then will remember, in Carleton Place, a short distance from Ottawa. In this circular letter there were three interesting paragraphs. One was to the effect that a protectionist government was going to be elected. That was a prophecy and, as it proved, a false one. It went on to urge the argument upon the retail merchants that when this protectionist government came in the tariff would be increased, that in consequence of the tariff prices would be higher—that was the effect of the argument—and consequently they urged upon customers that this would be a good time to buy. I think you may be sure, Mr. Speaker, that I did not neglect to make use of that circular letter in the course of my election campaign in trying to prove that hon. gentlemen opposite were in favour at least of a higher tariff, if not what they are pleased to call a high tariff. That I think affords us some justification for at least trying to distinguish between the two.

I may say frankly in regard to the income tax that there are some respects in which I recognize that there are anomalies. Is there any system of taxation that has been or can be proposed that can meet all the requirements laid down by Adam Smith, or those who have sought to add to the principles which he has formulated? There is no system of taxation that can be applied with absolute equity. We recognize some anomalies in the income tax system. I listened with a good deal of interest to the argument put forward by the member for St. Antoine (Mr. Bell) this evening; it is a speech worthy of the consideration of every member of the House. But speaking generally the income tax, to my mind, is the fairest tax in principle, for the principle of it is that it is levied upon those who are able to bear the burden. Now, as I have said, there may be anomalies in its application; there may be inconsistencies; at times it may not be equitably applied, but in principle the tax is sound.

Unfortunately we have in politics, as we have in theology, men who are not able to distinguish between fundamentals and incidentals, and the evils or the anomalies of the income tax are incidentals. The principle is that men shall bear the burden in proportion to their ability to bear it, and that is a principle which we must maintain. That principle does not hold in connection with the customs tariff tax, or in connection with the proposal of the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett), a tax on turnovers. Those taxes are laid not upon those who are best able to bear the burden but upon those who cannnot escape from the burden and must bear it. You will remember that the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) a year ago introduced into the debate a hypothetical widow who was getting an income of three or four thousand dollars a year from shares that her husband had left her, and he professed great sympathy for women in that position. I also have sympathy with widows, but I have a good deal more sympathy for the widow who has to rear a family of children and provide them with food and clothing, and has not the amount of income on which she can claim exemption—a good deal more sympathy for those who are placed in that position.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that though in some respects the income tax as applied may be open to objection, it is in principle the fairest tax that we have. The objection is raised that it is not fair because the farmers do not pay it. Well, they do not pay it, as has been asserted again and again, because they have not the income upon which to pay. I know it is hard to convince hon. members opposite, some of them at least, that the farmer is not in a position to pay his income tax. One hon. member opposite made a remark about the 400,000,000 bushels of wheat that was raised in the west. Four hundred million bushels of wheat is an immense amount, but those who are acquainted with the facts know that the overhead cost of raising that wheat is enormous, and that the amount in the hands of the farmer after he has paid all the costs is a very small proportion of what that wheat brought upon the world's markets.

The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) seemed to be under some misapprehension in regard to the farmer and the income tax, but I want to point out to him one feature that he did not consider, and it is this: the place of the farm woman in the production of revenue. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) has been dealing with the poultry industry. He referred to the fact that some $450,000 worth of turkeys had been raised in Manitoba during the last year. I believe the total amount of poultry produced in Manitoba during the year 1926 would run very close to $5,000,000. That amount of wealth, Mr. Speaker, was contributed to Canada by the work of the women, in very large measure, and when we farmers make our returns to the income tax branch we are not allowed to take account of the work that is done by the women—it all goes into the one pot. I want to say further that the woman on the farm is doing much more in contributing to the wealth of the country than the woman in other walks of life. I am not speaking of those women who are engaged in industry, I am not speaking of the wives of those men who are in a position to claim an exemption, we will say, to the extent of $3,000. Those women may be doing their work and doing it well. I have no criticism to make against what they they are doing, but they are not contributing to the wealth of the country in the same way that the farmers' wives are contributing. The latter are doing the work of their household just as other women are doing it, and besides, they are adding to the wealth of the country; yet there is no recognition of that when we make our income tax returns. That is a feature that I think ought to be considered by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, and I think it is a feature that has been very frequently overlooked.

The hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken) had something to say on this question. He spoke of the farmers of the United States being protectionists, and instanced the McNary-Haugen bill as a proof of that fact. The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), commenting on that statement, said that the McNary-Haugen bill is a bribe of the worst type; that it is a bribe to agriculturists in the United States to accept protection; it cannot be interpreted as anything else—a bribe of the worst type, and the farmers there will suffer for it if they accept it. I do not take exception to what was said by the hon. member for Bow River, but I should like to put it in another form. The McNary-Haugen bill, which has been vetoed by the President in the last few days, was the result of the conviction that had grown up in the minds of the United States farmers that they could not be benefited by a protective tariff. They had for many years been deceived by a sham tariff; they found out that it was giving them no real protection, and they came forward with the demand that they should be given real protection in the shape of the McNary-Haugen bill just as the other industries were given protection. What did they meet with? They met with the most intense opposition from the interests which had benefited by protection. It was said to them: Oh, but if that bill passes, then the cost of living will go up. The cost of manufacture will go up and we will not be able to compete in the markets of the world. So the cost of living would go up and the farmers would not find themselves in any better position than they were in before. In the interest of the experiment I would perhaps like to have seen the McNary-Haugen bill tried out, but on the other hand in the interests of sound economics, it is well that the President of the United States saw fit to veto it.

I have been amazed at some of the fallacies to which utterance has been given during the debate by some hon. members opposite, from the first hon. member who spoke, the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett), almost down to the last. It was urged upon us that taxation had not been reduced and elaborate figures were produced to show that such was the case. Large numbers of percentages of taxation were brought to our notice. The one thing that hon. members seem to forget—and this is the fallacy that runs all through their arguments—is that a reduction in the rate of taxation does not necessarily mean a reduction in the total revenue. So long as our revenue is raised by a system of indirect taxation by a tax on the goods that we consume, just so long will it be impossible for any government to determine exactly what the revenue will be at the end of any year. All that any government can do is to fix the rate of taxation and to estimate on the basis of the last year's business that the revenue will be so and so. Therefore all that any government can do is to reduce the rate of taxation. When we went before tariff commissions, we used to urge a reduction in the tariff and we would be met by the objection: Yes, but where are you going to get the revenue? We would give the very obvious retort that it was quite possible to reduce the tariff and yet increase the revenue. Nevertheless hon. gentlemen opposite have not been able to grasp that very simple proposition and the fallacy appears all through the debate.

Let me give an illustration of that. A good deal has been said about the reduction in the duty on automobiles, and it has even been urged that the taxation on the people has been increased by the action of the government last session. What are the facts? More was collected in customs duties during the nine months ended December 31, 1926, than during the corresponding period in the previous year. I will give the House the figures. From April 1 to December 31, 1925, there were imported into Canada 853 commercial trucks at a value of $1,245,654 and the duty collected amounted to $429,392. During the corresponding period in 1926 there were imported 1,863 commercial trucks at a value of $2,291,674, and the duty collected amounted to $447,951. That is, the number of cars more than doubled; the duty was lower, but there was an increase in the total revenue in that particular line of cars of more than $20,000.

Let me deal now with the question of percentages. I am speaking of the nine-month period, because we have not yet had a whole year under which the new duties have been in force, and indeed it should be said that only part of the nine-month period was under the lower scale of duty. In the nine months ended December 31, 1925, there were imported 11,494 passenger cars at a value of $10,847,171, and the duty collected amounted to $3,776,665. In 1926 for the same nine-month period, 22,904 cars were imported, or practically double the number, at a value of $18,387,615, and the duty collected amounted to $4,346,869, or an increase in customs revenue from the importation of cars of $570,204. According to the logic of hon. gentlemen opposite the government increased taxation upon those cars because, as they argued, the total revenue from that trade was increased by $570,204. Yet the fact is—we well know it and every person throughout the country will testify to it—that a car could be bought cheaper during that period than during the corresponding period of the preceding year. These are facts of which the public is well aware, and yet hon. members opposite will confuse the issue by these fallacies.

The same is true in regard to the references made by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) to percentages of duty, the taxation being higher at one time than at another, because the percentage of the tariff was higher. When I heard the hon. member speaking of percentages in that way, I was reminded of the story of the darky porter. A traveller asked him what was the average tip that was given to him by people who travelled with him. The darky said: "A dollar". Well, the man wanted to be up to the average and so he handed the porter a dollar. "Thank you, sir," said the darky, "thank you, you are the first man that has come up to the average." Here again the same fallacy creeps in. There is nothing more misleading than averages. When we talk about average duties, we must remember that they will vary as the amount of free goods varies with the amount of taxable goods, and according as the amount coming in under a high duty varies in relation to that coming in under a low duty. One is almost ashamed to give utterance to platitudes and to discuss these very obvious things, but one is forced to do it.

Let us suppose that we have coming in $1,000 worth of free goods and $1,000 worth of dutiable goods, bearing twenty-five per cent. The revenue collected from that $2,000 worth of imports will be $250. Let us suppose that the next year there is still only $1,000 worth of free goods coming in, and that the duty on the dutiable goods has been reduced to twenty per cent. It would be quite possible to show by the change from one figure to another that the average on the whole had been increased, and yet the fallacy there is perfectly evident. I do not pretend, Mr. Speaker, to be an expert accountant. There are some realms into which I would not presume to enter, but when I hear hon. gentlemen giving utterance to these very obvious fallacies, though I would not presume to have any expert opinion, I cannot allow them to pass unchallenged.

The hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) also I think merits a little attention. He gave us one of his characteristic speeches last night, in the course of which he referred to the reciprocity pact of 1911. He wanted to know if any member on this side of the House would put that pact into force if he had the power to do it. He was not satisfied to take an answer from private members, and finally he got his answer from some members of the cabinet. Then he pointed out that in that pact provision was made for certain duties on certain lines of machinery, and then he asked: Would you put those rates into force to-day? I went to the library to-day to look at the pamphlet containing the terms of that pact, and I find that while the hon. member stated the facts correctly, his inferences were all wrong. It is true that the duties were as he stated, but there was nothing in that pact that would render it obligatory upon Canada to maintain those duties at those rates. Those were maximum rates, not minimum rates. The theory of the protectionist is that it is a bad thing for us to import goods, that we are doing a particular favour to our neighbour when we lower the tariff against his goods. In view of that theory held by protectionists, is it not absurd for the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington to say that we would be under any obligation to maintain the tariff on these imports at the rates that were agreed upon by those who devised the reciprocity pact? Were we to put that agreement into force to-day there would be absolutely nothing in it that would require us to raise our tariff on this list of imports to the level of the United States tariff. The whole argument as advanced by the hon. member was, like some of the other arguments, so absurd that it is not worthy of serious consideration.

There are many things that I might have said, Mr. Speaker, but I shall forbear at this time. The natural question is: How do we regard this budget, speaking of it in general terms? I have said already that we have no particular enthusiasm for the budget in itself. While the answer given by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) to the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Glen) is by no means as plain and specific as we would desire, yet we feel that we have possibly no warrant for assuming that the action taken in the Robb budget of 1926 is the last step to be taken in the direction of lower tariffs. On the contrary, we would like to assume that the minister intended to convey to us the idea that there was still to be a progress in that direction. That impression is, of course, confirmed by the statement of the Finance minister this afternoon, that the present government is a low tariff government, and is proud of it. With that in mind, Mr. Speaker, we have felt that we can give our support to the budget, notwithstanding the fact that in itself there is nothing that arouses any particular enthusiasm. I would like to add that the Minister of Finance must not assume that any support we may give the present budget will warrant his concluding that if next year's budget should not show some further inclination to go in the direction of the principles we have advocated, our support will be continued.

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, that I have anything further to say at this time. The hour is rapidly approaching when we are likely to take a vote, and in view of that fact I shall give way to those who are to follow.

Mr. MALCOLM McLEAN (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, the hour is getting late and I do not intend to take up very much time, but there are a few things I wish to say before a vote is taken.

In the first place, I think this House will agree with me that this is a budget to which there is no real, strong, sustained opposition. On the other hand, it may be that it does not arouse in some of us the enthusiasm that last year's budget did, but I think that throughout the country, from coast to coast, it has been received with a good deal of satisfaction. I have received many letters from western Canada, from my own constituency in particular, and in them there has been no word of disapproval or of criticism of the budget as it is. That is sometimes as a fair test of a budget, as it is of the work of a government official in any office when there is no great enthusiasm about what he does and no great objection to what he does. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) is to be congratulated that he has under all the circumstances produced a balance sheet such as the one we have before us.

There is one thing I do know, Sir, and that is that the people of Canada are able to-day to congratulate themselves upon having emerged from the position they were in five years ago to a much higher and safer ground financially. This budget is of value and is satisfactory to the country because it shows an undoubted financial strength. It is satisfactory because of the psychological effect of the reduction in the national debt. That is something worth while not only in Canada, but throughout other parts of the empire and other countries of the world, particularly those from which we expect in the future to get immigrants to fill our vacant spaces and develop the resources of this Dominion. We heard a great deal about immigration to-day from the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie). I would remind you, Sir, and this House, that five years ago it was pretty hard to find anyone here advocating that the government should hasten the work of encouraging immigrants to come to Canada. The sentiment against encouraging immigration has died down to a great extent since then, although it is not altogether extinct. But the fact that Canada is reducing its debt and its taxation, that Canada's financial position has been strengthened, and that employment is better, will help to bring to our shores the immigrants that we need.

I said a moment ago that this budget does not arouse in some of us the enthusiasm that the last budget did. A critic of the budget said the other day that it is referred to as the Robb budget, and he qualified that by saying that he did not use the word in the sense of r-o-b. I wish to tell hon. gentlemen that some of his friends were not so particular; they were fond of calling it a "rob" budget instead of the proper name, but the people of Canada did not pay much attention to that. After going home last year we found that the budget had occasioned great enthusiasm throughout the country. I found in western Canada that possibly the budget had a good deal to do with the progress being made in that country at the time. In nearly a quarter of a century in the west I had not seen so much new land cleared and broken and being got ready for crop in any one year, and I had never seen so many people flocking into the north country, so much new building in the towns and rural districts, and so much genuine progress in that part of the country with which I am most familiar.

I am glad that to-day we do not hear very much of the pessimistic talk we heard last year. I am not going to refer to it now because it would be unkind to do so. After the last election a good friend of mine said to me, "If you had power to inflict some punishment upon your opponents in the last election, what is the worst thing you could think of?" I said I did not feel inclined to do anything. He said, the worst thing you could do would be to ask them to read their speeches of last session in parliament, and I would not consider doing that. There is reasonable prosperity in Canada everywhere to-day, not perhaps as much as the people would like, but as compared with any other country there is reasonable prosperity. That did not come about solely on account of the good crop of last year. It came about as a result of careful work on the part of the producers for the past five years, and as a result of the extent to which the government took care of the financial resources of the country. But it is not all due to the past year. We are told that last year the crop was one of the largest on record.

Well, it was a fair crop but not particularly large. Last year Canada produced 406,000,000 bushels of wheat as against 411,000,000 bushels the year before. The figures are as follows: the total yield of wheat in Canada for the year 1926 is estimated at 406,269,000 bushels from 22,768,449 acres, as compared with 411,375,700 bushels from 21,972,732 acres in 1925 and with 386,864,525 bushels from 22,084,320 acres, the annual averages for the four years 1922-25. When it comes to oats we find the crop amounted in 1926 to only 404,000,000 bushels as against 513,000,000 bushels in 1925, and an average of 493,000,000 bushels in the four years. So that it was not entirely due to the good crop last year, because we had crops just as good previously, and sometimes a little better, and we had not the same prosperity in the country. Other products, such as pulp and paper, forest products, and the products of the mine and the waters had a great deal to do with the restoration of prosperity. The farmers of western Canada I am sure were helped by the crop of 1925. The crop of 1926 was a fair one and the prices received were also fair, but the crop was harvested under tremendous difficulties, and still the 1926 crop helped the country somewhat further on the way to better times.

In the past we have been told a great deal of the wonderful wealth in the country to the south of us. Some of us have been of the opinion that those gentlemen, whether they were hon. members of this House or outside of this House, who continuously told of the prosperity of the United States on account of higher tariff protection were not doing a service to Canada. I find that the great country to the south of us is not uniformly prosperous and is not growing very fast in population in certain states.

Referring to the statement of the hon. leader of the opposition that the prairie provinces had not increased in population in the last few years as much as they might have, I desire to read an item in an American paper which says:

> The Borough of Queens, one of the five divisions of greater New York, having doubled its population in the last six years—

Very encouraging, but it is the city population that has doubled in that time.

> —this means that 483,000 persons have settled in Queens since January 1, 1921. The growth in population of this one section of New York in that short period is greater than the population of many a state. At the last census, there were nine states—Arizona, Delaware, Idaho, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Mexico, Utah, Vermont and Wyoming—each of which had a population of less than 483,000. Delaware, Nevada and Wyoming all together have less than that number.

Nine states in that rich country, each of them with a population less than that of any one of eight provinces in the Dominion!

I have some figures which I am going to give to Hansard dealing with the question of prices of farm implements. I had thought that the discussion in regard to the price of implements in 1924 and other years had come to an end, and I was surprised to hear the leader of the opposition, in that otherwise very admirable speech, give us some figures on farm implements to show that prices had increased as a result of tariff reductions. I hold in my hand a statement with regard to the prices of implements sold by the International Harvester Company, dated October 16, 1925, showing prices of Deering and McCormick machinery at that time. The figures are as follows:

	1921	1925
Eight foot Deering & McCormick binders..	326 00	283 00
Four foot six inch mowers.	112 00	98 00
Twelve foot rakes..	67 50	64 50
20 disc seeders..	292 50	251 00
Fourteen inch gang plows..	192 50	155 00
16 disc (16″) harrow	91 00	76 00

Last year in Saskatchewan we did not have to discuss any of these figures during the general election, because the people of that province were satisfied that the steps taken by the government had been in the right direction; and they expect confidently—and I am sure they will not be disappointed—that further steps along the same lines will be taken in due course.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Could the hon. gentleman give us the reductions between 1924 and 1926, not between 1921 and 1926? Because a lot of those reductions came voluntarily from the companies before any reduction in duty was made.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I have not the figures. I think the hon. member for Mackenzie would be in a better position to supply the information. I am prepared to take his word for it that reductions were made prior to that time. When the policy of the government cutting the tariff on such implements was introduced, we remember the wail that went up from hon. members in this House about the ruination of the agricultural implement industry. I am glad my hon. friend asked me that question, because it reminds me that a few days ago we read in the newspapers about the great rise in value of the stock of a Canadian implement company, sale prices running up to $110 a share. This stock a few years ago was worth between $50 and $60. I am not sure of the exact figures, and I do not want to exaggerate, but it was a low figure a few years ago. They made those reductions; they stood for the cut in the tariff, and the farmers were placed in a better position to patronize them than they had been previously.

I wish to devote a little time to a speech delivered in this House last Friday evening and which in my opinion was very unfair in some respects. The speech referred to was delivered by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), and I am glad to see him in his place to-night. To my mind it was studded with unfair statements—probably worse than that, but we will come to that point later. The first thing I take exception to in this speech is the propagating of the idea that, the budget having come down so early, the people of this country have been more or less relieved of their apprehension lest the tariff be reduced. The hon. member referred to the statement of the Bank of Montreal in their official bulletin of February 23, as follows:

> The early delivery of the budget speech by the Dominion Minister of Finance, and the announcement that no tariff changes are to be made, should be helpful to business by removing that uncertainty and hesitancy in mercantile transactions which sometimes wait upon the late pronouncement of government fiscal policy.

I agree with the bank in that regard, but I do not think that, rightly understood, the statement necessarily conveys the meaning which the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) apparently was anxious to infer from it. He seemed to suppose that there was some fear that there would be reductions in the customs tariff, whereas it is just as likely that the country might be afraid that a long delayed budget statement might propose increases in that direction.

I come to the next point on which I disagree with the hon. gentleman. I will quote his own words:

> Yes, the budget was welcomed for what it did not do, not for anything that it did. We welcome it in so far as in it the government has stayed its hand in further reductions of the tariff. The government announces—

This is the point I want to emphasize.

> —in the budget that it is not its intention this year utterly to destroy the remaining fragment of a protective principle in the tariff.

Yet further on in the same address the hon. gentleman tells us that there has been no change in the tariff; it is the same as it was before. Here is what he says:

> There is exactly the same protection in the tariff to-day as there was prior to 1921; in fact a little more.

[Mr. McLean.]

I will go beyond the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) and quote the words of one who, many of us regret, is not with us to-night, the late leader of the opposition, Mr. Meighen. Let me quote what he had to say last year. Of course, there was an election at that time and he was appealing to the people for support, as we all do. Speaking at Owen-Sound on September 8, he is reported as follows:

> He pressed his tariff views, declaring his intention to revise the tariff basis of protection. The principle governing every schedule of the tariff would be the principle of protection. "That is the principle," he declared, "we intend to restablish in our country".

If it had not been disestablished how could it be reëstablished? However, I will not press that point. I will now consider some of the financial criticisms of the budget. I would not have undertaken to discuss the budget from this standpoint because I do not profess to be a skilled accountant, but as I listened to the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre the other night it occurred to me that he made certain statements which obviously were altogether erroneous. In particular he made a statement to which I shall refer later on regarding the resources of Saskatchewan, a statement so utterly absurd to me that I got the hon. gentleman's speech next day in Hansard and read it carefully to make sure that I had followed him. The more carefully I read that speech the greater the number of absurdities I discovered in it, and therefore decided to devote some time to a fuller consideration of it. Discussing the public debt the hon. member, after declaring that he was not criticising the Minister of Finance personally, made the following statement:

> On April 10, 1924, he said our surplus would be $20,750,000, to be applied to the reduction of the public debt. On March 24, 1925, he said that the public debt had been decreased by $35,900,000. On April 15, 1926, the minister informed the House, there had been a reduction in the debt of $22,350,000. On February 17, 1927, at page 387 of Hansard the minister made the statement that there would be a reduction of $31,000,000 in our debt. The individual reductions indicated in these four announcements total $110,000,000 so that there should be a reduction in the debt to that extent from the year 1922.

The hon. member then goes on to complain that there is no evidence of that $110,000,000 of a reduction. On the next page of the report of his speech he refers to the funded debt. He finds that the funded debt at the present time amounts to $2,471,000,000. Then he sets out the difference between the funded debt and the net debt. The net debt on March 31, 1922, according to the hon. gentleman, was $2,422,000,000, and on December 31, 1926, including the amount paid off last fall it was $2,343,000,000. To quote his words:

> That is to say, we have a reduction in the net debt of $79,000,000 in a period of five years. That is nothing for this country to be proud of. I ask, where is the $110,000,000 of a reduction in the debt as announced by the Minister of Finance officially year by year.

I do not know whether the House or the hon. gentleman has been able to follow these quotations from the speech in question, but certainly I could not understand, nor do I understand now, what relation the $2,422,000,000 in the shape of a net debt as of March 31, 1922, has to the funded debt of $2,471,000,000. I therefore made inquiries. I recollected that between 1922 and the year which the hon. member for Vancouver Centre took as his starting point there was another fiscal year, 1923, and in that period there was not a surplus but a deficit which had to be added to the debt. That was a reasonable deficit and not one of which we need be ashamed. It was not incurred during the regime of the present minister, but while his predecessor was in office. Instead however of a deficit of $91,000,000 or $92,000,000 as we had in 1921, and $81,000,000 as in 1922, we had in 1923 a deficit of $31,000,000. As the hon. member for Vancouver Centre strove to discover where the missing millions were, I thought this must be the money he had in mind. As he progressed in his speech and linked up the $2,422,000,000 of a net debt with the funded debt of $2,471,000,000 I felt it time to cry for help. Digging into one book after another, and asking those who knew more about the matter than myself for some explanation of the difficulty which the hon. gentleman had created, I found that on April 10, 1924, the estimated surplus for the year 1923-24 was put at $20,750,000 but that the following year it was announced in the House that the actual decrease in the net debt for that year 1923-24 was not $20,000,000 odd but $35,900,000, or $15,000,000 more than had been estimated the year before. The following year 1924-25 there was a surplus of only $345,589. Hon. gentlemen will remember—because the country recalls it—that in the year 1924 the minister brought in the first of those budgets that have made his name famous, and the reductions of various taxes in that budget were responsible for a decline in the revenue to such an extent that there was only the surplus of $345,000 odd just mentioned. In 1926 there was an estimated reduction in the net debt for that year of $22,350,000, but time afterwards showed that estimated reduction to be actually $27,706,586. That was the reduction last year. On February 17, 1927, the estimated reduction in the net debt for the year 1926-27 was placed by the minister at $31,366,260. These actual reductions totalled $95,412,029 and the various estimates in addition to the actual decreases made $110,000,000, it is quite true. But it is absurd to take the estimated surplus to-day, and six or twelve months from now add to that the actual reduction in the figures of the debt. You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that when the deficit for the year 1922-23 is deducted from the correct figures, $64,000,000 is left, and that is the amount of the reduction in the net debt between March 1922 and the present time. So far as the present Minister of Finance is concerned, his budgets have shown a reduction in the net debt of $95,412,029.

Then we come to another set of figures, and I am going to try to keep them apart because I have already admitted that I was somewhat confused in trying to study the speech of my hon. friend. He confused the $2,422,000,000 net debt and the $2,471,000,000 funded debt, and then deducted the annual surpluses from that funded debt. What do I find here? The funded debt as of March 31, 1922, was given by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), as $2,420,000,000, which is so close to the amount of the net debt that one may be excused for finding difficulty in understanding what was intended. He told us that on March 31, 1926, the funded debt amounted to $2,471,000,000, an increase in four years of $51,000,000, and giving the minister credit for the amount paid off during last year, $35,000,000, would leave an increase in the funded debt of $16,000,000. But what do we find? In addition to the funded debt of $2,420,791,260 on March 31, 1922, there were temporary loans outstanding to the extent of $144,535,000, a grand total of $2,565,326,260 due to the public. These temporary loans the colleagues of the hon. gentleman must have known to be outstanding at the time they left office. That $145,000,000 was left entirely out of the calculations of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. On March 31, 1926, the funded debt of Canada amounted to $2,471,965,018, with temporary loans outstanding of $201,000, giving a total of $2,472,166,018, a reduction in funded debt in four years of $93,166,018. In addition to that reduction there must be added the figures quoted by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, the reduction during 1926-27 amounting to $43,000,000, so that at the end of December last year the total reduction of debt as between 1922 and 1927 was $136,106,242. It would not be a fair argument to say that this should be shown, because doubtless the treasury had bills coming due on January 1, February 1, and March 1, 1927, possibly amounting to more than the revenue at its disposal and the reduction in the funded debt at the end of the fiscal year may not be so great. But I think, Sir, that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre should have been a little more careful in compiling his figures before giving the impression contained in his speech the other day, when he overlooked the fact that there were $144,536,000 of temporary loans outstanding at the time his government went out of office.

The hon. member was asked if he would admit that Canadian currency was on a much sounder basis now than it was five years ago, and he passed the question off very lightly. I wish to tell him, Sir, that those people who had liabilities coming due and moneys to pay in the United States or any other country whose currency was higher than ours, did not consider it so. Those who had to go to foreign hospitals for treatment, mostly in the United States, or who had to pay money for any reason in that country and had to pay it with our depreciated currency, knew that it was not a mere incidental thing to be passed off lightly. I noticed in that same connection that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre was rather critical of the fact that our gold reserve is about 54 per cent of our Dominion note circulation as compared with 35 per cent in 1922. He did not have the figures at hand, but we will accept his statement as correct. He said there was no excuse for that, that it would be easy to increase our Dominion note circulation without the slightest chance of jeopardizing the stability of our currency. Apparently the banks and the financial institutions generally have shown that they have sufficient funds to carry on the business of the country at present, so there is no advantage to be gained by reducing our gold reserve. It is true that a few years ago there were many demands for schemes of monetary reform of one kind and another, and I was very much interested the other day to read an extract from a speech by Mr. Henry Wise Wood of Alberta which bears on this point, I am not going to repeat much of it, but in part Mr. Wood said:

> I don't want to lambaste anybody's dogma, because I know how dearly we love dogma, and I hate to take anybody's beloved children from their parents, but one hour's operation of the wheat pool has done more towards the ultimate accomplishment of the right relationship of prices than all the resolutions regarding any kind of magic money systems that we have passed since the beginning.

I think we can quite agree with that, and I think it a good thing that our currency should have enough value behind it so that one dollar of Canadian money is worth one dollar or a little more of any other money in the world. On the question of taxation the hon. member for Vancouver Centre was rather critical; he told us a great deal about taxation and compared the five years from 1923 to 1927 with the five years previously, during which his party was in power. He said that in the last five years the average imposition of taxes by this government amounted to $387,000,000 in round figures, while the average in the previous five years amounted to $348,500,000, suggesting that this government had collected an average increase of $39,280,000 per year during the last five years. I think, Sir, if there is any one thing in the fiscal policy of this government for which they can take credit to themselves more than for anything else it is the fact that immediately they came into office they began to put the finances of the country on a sound basis. By increasing revenue they hastened the time when they might begin to pay off the debt or at least keep it from growing any larger. In addition to keeping the debt from growing and the fact as illustrated by the increase in revenue that the country was beginning to get more prosperous, there is something further to bear in mind. Deficits had continued to 1923; these had to be met by this government, and the only way they could be met was by an increase in revenue and reduction in expenditure.

The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) said that the government had not reduced taxation but had merely shifted it. There was a gentleman in my office the other day whose business is to sell, among other things, farm lighting plants. We have not heard very much about farm lighting plants, but last year the duty on them was reduced from 35 per cent to 10 per cent, and we heard considerable complaint at that time from hon. gentlemen opposite. The dealer in question assured me, and I have no reason to doubt his word, that the reduction in duty had effected a reduction of $127 in the price of popular sized farm lighting plants on an expenditure of something like $600. That is not a tax which has been shifted; that is a real reduction, and the people have benefited by it. The national revenues have increased, by reason of these reductions. It has always been true, that a lower duty on a larger volume of business would increase the gross revenue. It is for that reason that I am confident that the Minister of Finance will see his way clear to give us further substantial reductions in duty, and make his name still more respected and loved by the producers and consumers of this Dominion.

One statement made by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre that I wish most decidedly to protest against is that respecting the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Forke) and the Deputy Speaker of the House. I am quite aware, Sir, that there is no reason why another member should stand up in his place and defend the Minister of Immigration; he is perfectly capable of defending himself. But the name of the province of Saskatchewan was linked up with the accusation levelled at the minister. I can assure you, Sir, that the Minister of Immigration was always respected by his political opponents in the province from which I come, even when they were fighting him politically. As the leader of a party the minister was respected and his sincerity acknowledged. There never was a time when he was more highly regarded in the prairie provinces than he is to-day. I ask you what there is wrong in a member of this House, having been nominated at a Liberal convention in the city of Brandon, being afterwards nominated by a Progressive convention in full possession of the facts? An hon. member near me says that the procedure followed was the reverse of that—that the Progressive convention was held first and the Liberal convention followed. However, the order followed is immaterial: these two conventions supported the same gentleman with a full knowledge of what had happened. It was well known that in all likelihood the government of Mr. Mackenzie King would be restored to office, and in that case the province of Manitoba would be represented by the hon. member for Brandon if he cared to take a portfolio in that government. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre, referring to the Minister of Immigration said, "My hon. friend sitting in a fourteen thousand dollar seat has had a change of heart." I ask hon. members if the Prime Minister of Canada could offer a $14,000 seat to anyone in this House? Not if I know anything about the remuneration of the cabinet ministers. The hon. member for Brandon was offered and accepted a portfolio in this government. The people of Brandon endorsed his action, and I think it is mighty small potatoes for the hon. member for Vancouver Centre to indulge in such insinuations against the minister. I would not have expected such comment from a gentleman who was unfortunate enough himself to occupy one of these elevated positions for so short a period and without the endorsement of the people of Canada.

The insinuation directed against the Deputy Speaker is even meaner. He occupies a position where it is impossible for him to answer charges of this kind He was not placed in that position by the Prime Minister. Surely parliament has not yet got to the stage where it can have no say in the election of a Deputy Speaker, especially when the gentleman elected is the unanimous choice of the members of the House! I am reminded of an old Conservative friend of mine who made an admission to me. He had sat in this House and was a highly respected member of it. I met him not very long ago and he said: "Was I not foolish? If I had only voted for the Robb budget I could have been over with you fellows to-day, but I listened to that blank tragedy board and that is what defeated me." I may say that he did not use the word "blank".

Just at this moment and in this connection I should like to quote one sentence from a speech by the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen at a meeting at Owen Sound. It has a bearing on the accusations or insinuations made against hon. members of the House, that they were in a position to exact rewards for improper services to the government of the day —I think it is safe to use the word "improper" in view of the attacks upon these members. This is what the Conservative leader of that day said:

> "Don't believe for a moment," Mr. Meighen proceeded, "that there is any difference between the Saskatchewan Liberal and the Manitoba Progressive. Not a particle. No man in the last House could see the least."

I did not disagree with Mr. Meighen at all on this one point at least. As far as I am concerned personally I may say that I came down to the House anxious to coöperate with other members of like mind in promoting the interests of the people I represent, and found the Progressive members from Manitoba and a majority of the members from Alberta just as willing to coöperate as I was. What objection can there be to coöperation amongst members representing like-minded people, whose coöperation has been so valuable to the country?

I am reminded at this stage that the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) asked the member for Vancouver Centre, during the course of his speech, a question to this effect: If the statement he had been making that afternoon was a fair one, would he be good enough to explain the arguments he used last year. He promised to do so in a little while, but I found in his speech no explanation of the arguments so often advanced by hon. gentlemen opposite at the time referred to.

Like the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown), I received a circular during the election last year. I do not think it was intended for me; it came from a friend who is a merchant. The circular to which I refer was not sent out by the Hawthorne Woollen Mills but by a firm called Bates & Innes Limited, also of Carleton Place, Ontario. This is what they say in that circular:

—United States was shipping wool to London and was not expected to buy.

Imagine the country wedded to high protection shipping wool to London!

As the spring clip has now been largely sold, and the period of heavy consumption of woolens is approaching, it would appear natural to expect higher prices this fall and probably for next year.

Another feature affecting the Canadian market is the probable return of a protectionist government and an increase in the duty on woolens.

It would appear, therefore, to be good business to buy fully now of fall and winter woolens, and we enclose our price list of seasonable goods on which we can now offer good delivery.

We are busy, and, as the season advances, delivery will be more difficult. We are selling direct to the retailer and ask your coöperation in this up-to-date and economic method.

The foregoing circular illustrates how busy the woollen men were in the province of Ontario. We have no desire to see any part of this country or any legitimate Canadian industry suffer. It gives us a great deal of pleasure and pride to see other provinces, other sections, and other industries thrive as much as we would like to thrive ourselves. We know that if they are thriving legitimately it redounds to the good of the whole country.

We were advised during the same speech that a tremendous wrong was being done this country by the export of our raw materials. The hon. member said that a substantial portion of copper ore was being sent across the border in the form of ore and matte, entirely unrefined. He continued:

Last year we produced 111,000,000 pounds of copper and exported in the form of raw ore, at 12½ cents per pound, 109,000,000. Just imagine! Out of a total production of 111,000,000 pounds we shipped to the United States 109,000,000 pounds almost entirely raw, unrefined and unsmelted.

The hon. member for Vancouver Centre states that we sell it at 12½ cents a pound in the raw in the form of rock. Then he goes on to tell us that all we are doing is acting as quarrymen for the United States. In the northern part of the constituency which I have the honour to represent and of the constituency of the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird), there is a tremendous deposit of copper ore. The owners of that deposit at the present time are spending a great deal of money, as they have been in the past, in developing this deposit. They are building a refining plant now which they expect very shortly to be working. If the process is established they are going to invest many million dollars in transforming that copper ore rock into a condition in which it may be marketed. But if they are able to ship it in raw rock at 12½ cents a pound, hon. members can see what a tremendous profit they will be able to make, because there are 16,000,000 tons of it diamond drilled at the present time. I am not going to say that I disbelieve the statement of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre that this raw rock is being sold at 12½ cents a pound.

Mr. STEVENS: That is for copper content. It is a trade term.

Mr. McLEAN: The statement is that it is shipped in the raw in the form of rock and paid for at the rate of 12½ cents a pound.

Mr. STEVENS: Copper content.

Mr. McLEAN: I take it that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre was just a little careless in this as he was later on as well as earlier in his speech.

Mr. STEVENS: I was not careless. It is all right; it is a mining term.

Mr. McLEAN: I am glad the hon. member assures me it is all right, because there is another passage to which I am going to direct his attention. This is a portion of his speech that I listened to with astonishment. I was amazed to hear of some of the resources we have in Saskatchewan, because we had heard nothing about them in the past. This is what he said:

Talk about the development of industry in Canada! Why, Mr. Speaker, all we are doing is acting as quarrymen for the United States. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) the other day made a passing reference to this matter, skating over it very lightly in a speech which in other respects was admirable. He referred to aluminum and declared that our imports were going up. Where are my Saskatchewan friends while we are discussing this particular question? Do they know that in the province of Saskatchewan there are the finest beds of aluminum clay that are to be found anywhere in the world? Does that signify nothing to them? Do they know that most of the aluminum on the continent is taken from certain beds in Kansas?

If I had been in my seat and had been honourably free to ask a question of the hon. member who was speaking I would have asked him to tell me where these clays are in Saskatchewan, but being in a place other than my own seat I could not do it and so I had to listen to this:

Do they know that nearly all the aluminum manufactured in Canada is imported alumina, the metal form of the product, which we purchase to the extent of 95 per cent? Our imports of aluminum, the finished product, have increased 225 per cent in the last five years, notwithstanding that in the province of Saskatchewan, lying dormant, there are millions upon millions of tons of alumina, or aluminum in clay form, which could be developed. I appeal to the Saskatchewan Coöperative Dairy—

I could not understand what that dairy had to do with developing aluminum deposits.

—that splendid organization which is producing millions of pounds of butter a year. Would it not help them to have an industry giving employment to several thousand men right in their own province? Would it not be better to have these men working in the province and consuming their dairy products rather than having to compete in the markets of the world for the disposal of their butter? Is that not of some value? And in northern Alberta sodium and aluminum clay lie side by side, yielding all the ingredients requisite for the manufacture of the finished aluminum product. Yet we have increased our imports 225 per cent. In face of all this the government declares complacently that there is no problem; everything is lovely; business is prospering.

As I said a moment ago, I was astounded to hear this declaration. I knew the government of Saskatchewan had spent much time and money in looking into the question of the natural resources of that province. They had sent men into the far north and found there some splendid beds of almost pure silica sand bearing about 99 per cent pure silica. They found traces of coal, copper, water-powers. In Saskatchewan we know we have billions of tons of coal, but we had never heard of aluminum deposits of anything like the extent stated by my hon. friend. I was reminded of the old saying: "You have to leave home to learn the news." In view of this and other things which I could not understand I decided to make certain in regard to this aluminum deposit and where it was located. I made inquiry of the Geological Survey of Canada of the Department of Mines, and this is what they say:

The only ore of aluminum at present in use is bauxite, a hydrated oxide of aluminum. It is found as superficial deposits, rarely in veins, resulting from the weathering of syenite and other aluminous rocks. It is usually found in or at the edge of clay deposits and is sometimes very like clay in appearance; but oftener it has a pisolitic structure, that is, made up of small rounded masses like peas.

I would ask hon. members to pay particular attention to this sentence:

Bauxite has not been found in Canada.

And Saskatchewan is in Canada.

Clays somewhat resembling bauxite occur near Sooke on Vancouver island—

That is a good deal nearer the home of the hon. member who was making the speech than those of any of the members from Saskatchewan.

—but contain only 20 to 30 per cent of aluminum, whereas the best grades of bauxite contain 57 or 58 per cent of aluminum. Bauxite is found in Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, and Tennessee.

Not even in Kansas.

Arkansas bauxite is considered the best material in the United States and is practically the only bauxite used in the manufacture of aluminum in the United States. Aluminum is produced in Canada by the Aluminum Company of America at Shawinigan Falls, Quebec, from bauxite imported from the United States, the south of France and British Guiana.

The raw material is being imported into Canada; it is being manufactured in Canada, a certain quantity of the manufactured product is used at home and the surplus exported abroad. Then this memorandum goes on to say:

Since bauxite is believed to have formed under tropical or semi-tropical conditions, the chances of finding a deposit of bauxite in Canada are not very good, though it cannot be said that it does not occur.

There is the voice of the scientist speaking. He says: We do not know that any occurs in this country; it is not likely that any should be found here, but we do not know and we are not going to say. The memorandum continues:

Electrical power and the mineral cryolite (sodium aluminum fluoride) are required in the manufacture of aluminum from bauxite. Cryolite—which has been found in quantity only in one place, at Ivigtut, Greenland,—is used as a solvent. Aluminum oxide is made from bauxite by dehydration of the raw material and is dissolved in melted cryolite. The aluminum is then deposited by an electric current.

I leave you, Sir, to judge whether this was intended, as the statement regarding copper or whether it was a mistake. I would point out that there are apparently only four requisites missing for the development of an aluminum industry in Saskatchewan. One is bauxite; the second is the all-important mineral cryolite; the third is cheap electrical current close to transportation facilities, and the fourth is the large amount of water required at the same place for the dehydration of these clays. We are always anxious in our province to secure new investments and new industries, especially those based on the development of our natural resources. But I do not think we could term it a safe investment for anyone to take much stock in locating or developing these aluminum clays of Saskatchewan, and I take it that the same reasoning applies to Alberta.

We were told a lot about exports, in regard to which there was an attempt to show an equally startling situation. A certain group of exports from 1918 to 1922 amounted to $1,185,000,000, and the same group of exports, shown under the same headings by government officials, and very properly so, from 1923 to 1927 amounted to only $1,125,000,000, and this was used as an argument against the fiscal policy of this government. I would have you note, Sir, that not until the last day of this month does the fiscal year of this government end, and it will be some time after that before complete figures are available. The five years that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre took included two years that were almost entirely war years, a third that was practically a war year, and the fourth was very much affected by war and war conditions, with wealth being shipped from Canada in the form of loans. He took those years with their inflated prices as against the years from 1923 to 1927, when prices, part of the time, were very low and crops not very large, and he found that there was a reduction in our exports during those years of $60,000,000. I think that a fairer way than that could be found in which to discuss this question. The same argument was used in connection with iron and steel, but as the hour is late, I shall not use the figures I have before me in that connection.

We were also told that we are selling $7,000,000 worth of asbestos to the United States, to be converted there into $70,000,000 worth of finished products. It is lamentable if we are doing that, if any of that money could be kept at home under any fair fiscal policy. If our raw product worth $7,000,000 is finished in the United States into products worth $70,000,000, that means an increase of one thousand per cent in value. But a minute later we were told that this material, worth something like $7 per ton, was being turned into material in the United States worth $100 to $200 a ton. One minute it was $7,000,000 worth of raw material being converted into $70,000,000, an increase of 1,000 per cent, and a moment later it was an increase of 1,400 to 2,800 per cent.

In view of these mistakes that I have pointed out, I think that the House will agree with me that the statements made by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) and by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) with respect to the proposed export of power to the United States from Carillon falls are more likely to be reliable than the statements of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre.

There are one or two matters that I would like to bring to the attention of the Minister of Finance.

An hon. MEMBER: Write him a letter.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): When I wish to deal with the Minister of Finance I generally talk with him, and I want to talk to the House as well on this occasion. I noted that something was said about research, and somehow I got the idea—doubtless the hon. member did not intend it at all—that research was something to look down upon. I wish to say that the money that the government has spent in the extension of research and the results achieved are highly valued in western Canada. If it had not been for men like Doctor Saunders and other scientists, western Canada would not be in the position in which it finds itself to-day. I have in my hand an editorial from the Saskatoon Daily Star, a paper representing farmers, townspeople and all classes dealing with the need for further research. It says in part that some of the duties of the Research Council are:

> To promote the utilization of Canada's natural resources; to undertake researches with the object of improving the technical processes and methods used in Canadian industry; to investigate and determine standards and methods of measurement: to undertake the standardization and certification of scientific and technical apparatus; to investigate and standardize, at the request of industry, the materials or products of that industry.

It concludes by saying:

> Some inquiries under the Council's auspices have already been completed and with great profit to industry. A McGill professor discovered a way to prevent the spoilage of lobsters in cans, and thus saved the lobster packing industry of Canada $700,000 a year.

This paper points out that the Research Council does not get nearly a sufficiently large grant to carry on, and points out that the United States is spending $200,000,000 annually on applied science research, and an additional $10,000,000 on pure science research. In addition to that, a number of large American industries are spending their own money and time in research work. In comparison with what the United States is doing—of course, in view of its wealth it is very much better able to deal liberally with this question than we are—the $150,000 spent on the Research Council in Canada looks pretty small. This paper goes on to say:

> The Canadian Research Council's $150,000 a year looks pretty meagre when compared to sums like these. It is not, of course, the total amount being spent on industrial research in the Dominion. But it is the federal government's contribution, and as such it is a joke or a disgrace, or both.

Anyone who has read To-day and To-morrow, that great book of Henry Ford's—I admit that many of my hon. friends opposite do not think much of Henry Ford as a political economist, but they surely respect him as a money-making machine par excellence—will have noticed how much of the Ford estate and his prosperity and the quality and cheapness of his car are due to research work, by studying the best methods to get the best results from the material at his disposal, and to eliminate waste.

I have in my hand a press despatch telling of a new process by which a ton of straw may be burned to extract $250 worth of useful products from the smoke. This chemist has obtained 1,600 pounds of products from each ton of wheat or oat straw, the products including a new germicide favourably reported on by the Mayo Brothers of Rochester, a roofing and damp-proofing paint, and a fly spray. This scientist happened to be a Canadian who left this country and is now in New York carrying on research work. I am sure that for any money we spend in research work we shall be repaid manyfold.

Before taking my seat, I should like to refer for a moment or two to a sentiment I have heard expressed on one or two occasions in this House. I heard it during the past session also, and I have heard it throughout the country. It is the sentiment that hon. members from the province of Quebec are opposed to hon. members from other provinces sitting on this side of the House in matters of fiscal policy. I wish to say to any hon. member who has not been long in this House—I have not been long here myself and am not going to put on any airs—but I heard one hon. member on the other side of the House suggest that some of us to your right do not agree very well with the members from the province of Quebec in fiscal matters. I heard a new member on the other side of the House speak of Quebec. Because one hon. member here had given voice to a protectionist sentiment he took it that that was the opinion of the whole province of Quebec. Speaking of the members from that province I have been able to assure the constituents who elected me, and other audiences in western Canada, that they have been most fair, most reasonable, and generous to us, and all that we members could ask for. The position they took—and I think it was natural they should take that position—was that they were Canadians first, last and all the time, that they and their ancestors had made a living and had prospered to some extent in this great country for some three hundred years, and at a time when it was harder to make money than it is at present. In common with all Canadians they like to make money, yet making money through a high protective tariff was going to interfere with the amity and unity of Canada, and they were going to sacrifice some of that prospective money and do as their forefathers had done, namely, make a good square living and work for the interests of the Dominion.

In closing, I would say that the province of Saskatchewan is not desirous of injuring any legitimate industry in any other part of this Dominion, but is willing to co-operate with all other provinces which are willing to meet us half way and co-operate with us. The Dominion of Canada was referred to the other day as being one of great length and little width. I think the leader of the opposition in his splendid speech to-day referred to it in these terms. Canada to-day is widening and developing from south to north. We do not now hear the cry, "Go west and grow up with the country." The saying in Saskatchewan, and I assume in other provinces, is "Go north and grow up with the country." We are getting further away from the American line and from the influences of our friends over there. We are carrying civilization further, making Canada a wider, broader and deeper country, and Saskatchewan wants to do her part in development for the future.

I picked up a magazine and read in it the statement that an old philosopher said, "The thing that I feared most came upon me," In listening to some of the pessimistic remarks last year I thought of this saying. I do not think I should give the advice to anyone, but draw this to the attention of some hon. members in the hope that they will avoid fearing anything in this Dominion that is not likely to come upon them.

With the soil of Canada as fertile as it is, with a favourable climate and extensive natural resources, with those two great races side by side which have carried civilization forward, the French and the Celtic-Saxon races augmented by the Teutonic, the Slavonic and the Scandinavian; with the laws and the security of Canada what they are, there is no reason why we should be pessimistic; rather we should take the advice of the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and step out with greater faith and more assured confidence than we ever had before. I am satisfied that the people of Canada are at peace to-night regarding affairs of state, knowing that the budget of the hon. Minister of Finance reflects a sound state of affairs throughout the country, indicating as it does the tremendous improvement that has taken place in a period of five years.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Coote) which was negatived on the following division:

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

First report of the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization.—Mr. Kay.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. GARDINER

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege, arising out of an article appearing in the Montreal Star under date of Monday, February 28. This statement reflects upon the honour of a certain group in this House, and is supposed to have been made by the Deputy Speaker (Mr. Johnston). Before I read the article permit me to remind the House that it is necessary to have certain officers here in order that the business of parliament may be conducted with despatch; some of these officers are appointed while others are elected. Those elected officers, the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker, are responsible to the House alone, and not to any party or group in this House, because of the fact that it is absolutely essential that these officers be strict in their impartiality as between the different members and sections in this House. The article in the Star is as follows:

Western Visitors' Outlook Widened
Fred Johnston, M.P., Sees Benefit In Inspection of Plant

"The fifty members of parliament who viewed one phase of eastern industry Saturday, as the guests of Sir Charles Gordon, are returning to Ottawa with a better understanding of the problems that face the working people in a great city," Fred Johnston, M.P., Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons, stated before boarding the special train for the capital.

"No matter how broadminded a man may be potentially if he lives in one environment for a number of years, he is bound to become narrow and lose any faculty he ever possessed of seeing problems as they affect Canada as a whole," Mr. Johnston continued. "The members from the wide open spaces on the prairies spent the day studying the conditions under which workers in the manufacturing industry labour, and I am sure they all felt that a sixteen hour day behind the plough with a sunny sky overhead would not take as much out of a man as a nine hour day in a factory.

"I was particularly pleased that the U.F.A. members of parliament from Alberta saw the men and women at work earning their livings in the Dominion Textile Company plant. It would be a great thing for those gentlemen if they could be taught to see our problems from the national viewpoint.

"The U.F.A. members are selfish," Mr. Johnston asserted. "The prairies are getting four-fifths of what they asked for, namely: revaluation of soldiers' lands, farm loans, old age pensions, and there is an item of $5,000,000 in the estimates for the Hudson Bay railway. Now they are trying to befuddle the brains of the people they represent by raising a hue and cry for lower tariff. It is generally recognized that this is the only way in which they can justify their existence. It is good for the west to meet the east. Westerners are prone to forget that the east has pressing problems of its own, and that there must be compromise on the part of all if Canada as a whole is to progress and prosper".

Hon. Charles Stewart, Minister of the Interior; Hon. Charles Dunning, Minister of Railways and Canals; Hon. W. R. Motherwell, Minister of Agriculture, and Hon. Robert Forke, Minister of Immigration, who are in the party are all from the prairies, and like the Deputy Speaker are practical farmers.

The question I wish to bring before the House particularly Mr. Speaker, in regard to this article is contained in the following:

I was particularly pleased that the U.F.A. members of parliament from Alberta saw the men and women at work earning their livings in the Dominion Textile Company plant. It would be a great thing for those gentlemen if they could be taught to see our problems from the national viewpoint.

The inference in that statement is that the U.F.A. members in this House are the only ones who have not got a broad national outlook, but that all other members in the House, no matter from whence they come, possess that broad national outlook which Mr. Johnston thinks is essential. Now the statement that we take further objection to is that the U.F.A. members are selfish. We maintain, Mr. Speaker, that we are not more selfish than any other class in Canada, and it is not fair for any member of the House to make such a statement—that members here representing a certain group, or class, or organization are more selfish than the members of any other class or organization. The statement goes on to say further:

Now they are trying to befuddle the brains of the people they represent by raising a hue and cry for lower tariff.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that hon. members who have been in this House as long as the U.F.A. members, namely, since 1922, will admit that we have always stood very strictly for certain principles. We have never deviated from those principles and one of them is the principle of a lower tariff. The statement goes on to say:

It is generally recognized that this is the only way in which they can justify their existence.

We take exception to that statement also. Our position is justified by the organization that nominates and elects us. The program which that organization lays down for our guidance is the program which justifies our being in this House and no other.

I quite recognize, Mr. Speaker, that there may be some question as to whether this statement was actually made by the Deputy Speaker. It is true it is only a newspaper report, but I would say at this moment that I think the Deputy Speaker should be given an opportunity of saying whether this report is correct or not. If the report is correct it would mean that the Deputy Speaker is occupying a position that he has no right to occupy and the occupancy of which he cannot justify because he has not shown the impartiality which is necessary to that position.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GARDINER: I will be very pleased indeed for the Deputy Speaker to say whether he made the statement or not before I proceed further.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: This matter was brought to my attention yesterday and I rather expected the attention of the House would have been drawn to it then on the orders of the day. At that time I had the article in question before me but I do not happen to have it at the present moment. I can say to my hon. friend and the House that there are one or two statements in the article to which I did not give utterance. I did not term the U.F.A. members selfish. In speaking to the reporter I referred in general terms to western members and the western attitude. In no case did I term western members selfish.

With respect to the other matters mentioned by my hon. friend, all members of the House know that newspaper reporters take a statement and make it appear just a little different from the words actually uttered. My statements to the reporter were general.

Mr. HANSON: Blame it on the reporter.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Not at all. I in no way reflected on the honour of any member in this House or of the members of the U.F.A., or any other organization. I think, Mr. Speaker, that is all I have to say.

Mr. GARDINER: I accept the statement of the hon. gentleman with pleasure. But, Sir, I should like to call your attention again to the fact that this article reflects on the honour of certain members of this House, and I would ask you, Sir, to use whatever influence is within your power to see that such a statement is withdrawn and an apology made for publishing it.

PRIVILEGE—MR. BROWN

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Another question of privilege.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BROWN: I had not intended, Mr. Speaker, to refer to this matter publicly, but I think perhaps the present is a good occasion to do so. Some few days ago I made some remarks in this connection and I had thought that we were not likely to hear anything more of the kind. I refer to an article by one of the members of the Progressive group which appears in this morning's Citizen, copied from the U.F.A. weekly. With the first part of the article I shall not deal, but there is a sentence at the close to which I take exception. It is as follows:

> In the Dominion House we had an analogous incident when the Progressives bolted, jumped the fence and sought a hyphenated refuge in the Liberal fold.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HOCKEN: Why object to that.

Mr. BROWN: Like the hon. members from Alberta we also are responsible to our constituents. Our position here is absolutely endorsed by our constituents and therefore we have no apologies to offer in that respect. We do take exception to the implication in the statement that we sought a refuge. We have sought no refuge. The hon. members for this group have accepted their full responsibility. We have felt the responsibility that devolves upon us of carrying out the policies we had advocated, and at the same time striving to give to this country the stable government that we desire.

It has been suggested to me that I did not point out who wrote this particular article. You will find it by reading the Citizen; it is by one of the members of the Alberta group. We have heard a good deal in this House already about the imputing of motives. I would remind hon. members that it is possible for us also to impute motives, and if we look back over the history of the past five years, it is not just so clear that certain hon. members are entirely invulnerable.

Mr. SPEAKER: The House is generally very lenient in regard to questions of privilege, but the breach of privilege must be a real one. This is what May says:

> Libels on members have also been constantly punished: but to constitute a breach of privilege they must concern the character or conduct of members in that capacity, and the libel must be based on matters arising in the actual transaction of the business of the House.

I have listened to both cases this afternoon, and I may say, for the honour of the House and of all its members, I do not see any libellous interpretation to be given to either the interview supposed to have been given by the Deputy Speaker or to the article which has just been quoted by the hon. member for Lisgar. There is no question of privilege there and I think the House would do well to transact business.

Mr. BROWN: If there is no question of privilege in either case, I remain satisfied with having stated my case.

Mr. ROBB: I do not rise to take any exception to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, that there is no question of privilege, but I rise to say that it must be a great privilege to the Dominion Textile Company to have so much free advertising.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

REORGANIZATION OF DEPARTMENT OF CUSTOMS AND EXCISE

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Customs and Excise) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 113, respecting the Department of National Revenue.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. EULER: This bill provides for certain changes in the organization of the Department of Customs and Excise. It proposes to divide the department itself into three chief branches: Customs, excise, and income tax. Each of these branches is to be placed in charge of a commissioner who shall have practically the power of a deputy minister. It will also give authority to the minister to transfer some of the work now devolving upon him to these commissioners. This is done in the interest of the despatch of public business and efficiency.

There is just one other clause that is perhaps of some, although not of great, importance, and that is the one which deals with changing the name of the department. We propose to call it the Department of National Revenue, or possibly the Department of Revenue. The reason for that is not because of any particular prejudice against the department which has been under fire, but because the new title is more descriptive of the functions of the department than the present title. The department has charge of the collection of practically all the revenues of the country. The name "Department of Customs and Excise" does not imply nor include the collection of the income tax, nor of the sales tax, which of course may be regarded as an excise tax. Those are all the provisions of the bill that, I think, might interest the House.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DEPARTMENTAL SUPPLIES AND SURPLUS GOODS

On the order:

Mr. Ward—Bill intituled: "An Act respecting the purchasing and disposal of departmental and other supplies and surplus goods."

Mr. SPEAKER: As regards this bill standing in the name of Mr. Ward, the point of order raised yesterday by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) is well taken. I had not seen the bill because it was just printed and handed to me yesterday afternoon. It contains various clauses which involve a large expenditure of money. For instance, clause 3 reads:

> There shall be a department of the government of Canada, which shall be called the "purchasing department", over which the Minister of Finance, for the time being, appointed by the Governor General by commission under the great seal of Canada, shall preside.

Needless to say that the creation of a new department means the expenditure of a large amount of money. The bill would properly come under rule 77 which reads:

> If any motion be made in the House for any public aid or charge upon the people, the consideration and debate thereof may not be presently entered upon, but shall be adjourned till such further day as the House thinks fit to appoint; and then it shall be referred to a committee of the whole House, before any resolution or vote of the House do pass thereupon.

Therefore this bill should be introduced by one of the ministers of the crown. It should be preceded by a resolution as to all intents and purposes it is a money bill. Therefore I declare it out of order.

Hon. Mr. STEWART:

1, 2 and 7. Howard Colley and George Reid were reported by Gold Commissioner Dawson as possessing the required qualifications for the position of acting mining recorder at Mayo during the temporary absence of Recorder Gillespie.

3. No.

4 and 5. Answered by No. 3.

6. Howard Colley was engaged because he was considered to be the most suitable man for the position. He commenced his duties on October 2.

8 and 9. The department had no information as to whether either Mr. Colley or Mr. Reid were returned soldiers, and as engagement was only for short temporary period during absence permanent official, this point was not raised.

AERIAL MAP OF MONTREAL

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri):

1. Is it the intention of the government to make at an early date a map of the city of Montreal, Quebec, by aerial photography?

Hon. Mr. STEWART: As the result of a request from the city of Montreal to have an aerial photographic map of the island of Montreal made by the Topographical Surveys branch the officers of the branch are now negotiating with officials of the city in order to determine just what the requirements are and how the cost of the work may be apportioned, and with a view to having the work undertaken during the coming summer provided satisfactory arrangements can be made.

MARKING OF IMPORTED EGGS

Is it the intention of the government to bring down legislation this session to give effect to the resolution moved by myself on March 18, 1926, and carried, to the effect that it was desirable that the Eggs Marks Act of British Columbia be made applicable to the Dominion of Canada as a whole?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL: A resolution approving the principle of marking all imported eggs so as to indicate country of origin was accepted by parliament last session, and the government is naturally desirous of carrying out the wishes of parliament generally. It would not, however, seem desirable that action should be taken in this respect during the present session.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to oppose this motion, but as the matter is now before the courts, I would request my hon. friend to allow the motion to stand until the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is in his seat.

Mr. BIRD: The mover of the motion is not in the chamber at present, so perhaps the motion had better stand.

Motion stands.

THE CIVIL SERVICE ACT

PREFERENCE TO THOSE WHO HAVE A KNOWLEDGE OF BOTH OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. P. A. SEGUIN (L'Assomption-Montcalm) (Translation) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, in view of spreading the knowledge of both official languages in the public service and thereby rendering it more effective:

The Civil Service Act should be amended so as to give preference in future appointments to candidates knowing the two official languages.

The public employees having a knowledge of both the official languages, should, owing to this qualification, be better remunerated; and the superiority of the employees possessing both languages should be considered in all reclassification.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purport of the resolution which I have the honour to submit for the consideration of this House is entirely of an administrative character. Strongly impelled by a concern for the welfare of the public weal, I trust that no one will see or seek in this proposal any evidence of narrow-mindedness on my part, The wording of the resolution which I have moved, moreover, is so clearly worded that it may seem useless to further comment upon it. This resolution, Sir, rests on the constitution itself of our country which has placed English and French on an equal footing.

Whether we regret or rejoice over it, we are living in a bilingual country. This is the plain truth against which it would be useless to rebel. In fact, Canada is perhaps the only country in the world which is really bilingual and bestows through its constitution the same rights, the same privileges, the same honours to the two best known and widely spread languages in the world. It would be futile to sing the praises here of the English language or the beauties of the French tongue; on that score we all agree, and I am certain that among us, not a discordant note would be heard.

Since such is the case, Mr. Speaker, we are bound to act accordingly. If English and French are both official languages, it seems to me that we have a right to express ourselves equally in either one or the other, especially when we happen to call at any office of the public service. Since the population is bilingual so must be the administration. There exists in this country a large group whose language is French. These are actual conditions. There also exists another group whose language is English and they are in the majority. This is another state of things. Must we be called upon to choose between the two languages? Shall we subject one to the other?

In the province of Quebec, Sir, the French element, which is in the majority, has always shown its good will and impartiality when it was a question of affording to both official languages the same solicitude and favours, and all the head officials of the provincial government are bilingual; moreover, never have we neglected the occasion of publishing in English as well as in French all documents which might interest the two sections of our population. Do we act likewise in other provinces where the French element is as numerously important as the English element is in the province of Quebec?

There are, Sir, no two ways of governing a country, even if it be bilingual—there is but one: We must do our utmost in order that the administration be as equitable as possible. Is it so difficult a thing? There seems to exist people for whom difficulties crop up when it is a question of being fair to others. People have relied too much, within the last fifteen years, upon the Entente Cordiale between France and England, in order to ask for the same good feeling here, in this country, between English speaking citizens and those speaking French; the entente existing overseas has nothing to do with the good feeling existing among us, for the very reason that a conflict, even an armed one, between France and England might have nothing disloyal in itself, neither for the French nor the English, while on the contrary any conflict between Canadians of French extraction and Canadians of English extraction would be a fratricidal conflict, hindering the general welfare of the country and barring all aspirations towards further progress. We live, Sir, in Canada, under conditions which are not to be found elsewhere. Two races, equally at home, either owing to their origin or through various events or else owing to immigration, speak two languages that are not sufficiently alike to constitute a single vehicle of thought and action, and thereby meet the needs of the people. It is evident, that it is not a question of doing away with one or the other of these two languages, because it would also be doing away with one or the other of the two principal races that are here at home, and quite at home. This is not even possible among individuals in either their social or business intercourse. Modern conditions, those that events have framed, especially with regard to us Canadians of English or French extraction force us to adopt bilingualism. And those who forget this or repudiate it, find the wide avenues which lead to wealth, honours or to easy and agreeable life, closed to them.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, there is the influx of a foreign element. These people do not all speak English. Only the immigration coming from the British Islands—a large one if you like— speak and will continue to speak the English language. But the other, the one which comes to us from central or western Europe, the immigration hailing from France, Italy, Belgium, Poland, Japan, Czecho-Slovakia and South America, speak French or have a leaning towards it, because it is largely Latin or Slavonic in its connections. After having invited these people, after having brought them to our shores, by force of money, that has come out, let us not forget it of French as well as English pockets—would it be loyal, and on what grounds would it be loyal, I ask you, to keep them segregated by refusing them the means of communicating with the various services of the state? Nevertheless, Sir, that is what is done by obliging the whole of this group of our population, and not the least intelligent nor the least active, believe me, of making use of a language of which they know nothing or very little. Some will no doubt say: This is an English country, and English is spoken here—they are wrong: this country is Canadian; one must make the best of it, and the sooner individuals as well as the administration acknowledge this fact, the better.

This much said, Sir, how do we stand as a matter of fact? Are the servants of the state in a position to contribute what is expected of them, are they in a position to fulfil all the exigencies of a bilingual population? I am aware that the government so far as they are directly or immediately concerned are making laudable efforts in that direction. It is but fair to congratulate them, and I know that these congratulations have not been wanting. I may add that the first steps recently undertaken have created, a little everywhere, a feeling of satisfaction which is openly acknowledged. However, the government is not favoured with the gift of ubiquity. There exists an administrative system which, once created, must operate through its own resources. The government cannot be expected to start the wheel moving at each revolution. It must be admitted that friction exists oftener than there is reason for it, and that hinders good administration. It is necessary that this friction should disappear. I hold that it is an easy matter, that the means are within our grasp. This friction is caused by one of the most flagrant, serious and dangerous injustices that I know of: that of placing on the same footing the public officials who speak a single language with those who are bilingual. The Civil Service Commission does not seem to take into consideration whatsoever the fact that our country is bilingual, and therefore, that all candidates aspiring to any position—take note, I state to any position—should possess as the first qualification a knowledge of French and English. I must add, however, that the Civil Service Commission cannot be blamed for this state of things, simply because the act seems to have made no provision in this matter. Therefore, the first part of my motion as it is found in the Votes and Proceedings of the House, is as follows:

The Civil Service Act should be amended so as to give preference in future appointments to candidates knowing the two official languages.

I did not wish to be too harsh, I, therefore, made use of the word "preference" for I am aware that if at present, we rigorously stipulated that the two languages were necessary, there would be unavoidably too great a number of Canadians who would not be eligible for positions in the civil service. It is nevertheless certain that if our Civil Service Act did stipulate that preference which I am discussing now and if the Civil Service Commission undertook to insist as much as possible on this preference, it would not be less certain, I state, that it would have the immediate effect of forcing all candidates to familiarize themselves with both official languages, and, consequently of assuring a more effective service. It has, for ever so long, been acknowledged that "a man possessing perfectly two languages is worth two men," and it is a truth, because the study of a language, whether a dead language the usefulness of which is more or less contested, as for instance Latin and Greek, or whether a living language and thereby of an unquestionable usefulness, such as French and English, is the best intellectual exercise that can be given to a young mind. Such gymnastics is equivalent to that which is given to our children for their physical development.

Mr. Speaker, our civil servants constitute, I have no hesitation in stating, an intellectual aristocracy in the midst of our population and the services they render to our country, outside of their office hours, are precious and incalculable. Without entering into useless details, I may at least state that our employees are either medical men, lawyers, notaries, journalists, historians, writers, lecturers, inventors, at all events men given to research work and hard workers. A great number of movements of a national character have had their source in the heads and hearts of public officials and it is but right to congratulate them on that score.

If it is true that perfection is not to be found on this earth, it is equally true that it behooves each of us to do our best. But the best, in the present case, is the aptitude in the employee to interpret with ease the two official languages of this country.

[Mr. Seguin.]

If, Sir, in all countries, in France where they have set their soul and heart, in a very characteristic French manner, to the study of English, in England, where the French tutor is lodged as one of the household in the most exclusive families of the old aristocracy as well as among the middle classes; in the United States, where, especially since the war, French is spoken fluently among the political element as among people of social standing; if, in brief, people all over the world have set their hearts with enthusiasm to the study of languages, and here, I mean the French and English languages, I question if it be logical that, in a country essentially bilingual, and therefore must remain such—let us not forget—a large portion of the administrative staff should be deficient in one or the other of these two languages? I fail to see what reasons, what plea, what excuse can be invoked to persist in a state which, it is generally conceded, looking at it under various angles, constitutes an inferiority.

Mr. Speaker, French speaking candidates must be able to speak English if they wish to be admitted to our public offices. And what I have stated in connection with the rank and file, I state it more emphatically again as regards the heads of departments, the higher officials, those who have to meet the public at large, the educated people, the upper classes. This also applies to the English speaking officials. Let not the latter imagine that it is beneath their dignity to qualify in the use of French in their dealings with the public. Let them take their cue from the Mackenzie Kings, the Fosters, the Fieldings, the Meighens, the Draytons, the Manions and many others who at forty, fifty or sixty years of age buckled down to learn French. Let them inquire from the latter if they would consent to give up to-morrow what they have learned of this language.

How many talented men—we are all acquainted with some—who have been a total loss to the nation, and have not amounted to anything simply becauses they had neglected the study of languages and deemed it too late to make a start.

In the interest, Sir, of the whole country, it is indispensable that our public servants should know the two official languages. That is why the first part of my motion requests that the Civil Service Act be amended in order to give preference in future appointments to candidates possessing these two languages.

How are we to establish this preference? It is a simple matter: give the position applied for to the candidate who knows both languages, and should there be a number of candidates having a knowledge of the two languages, the position much necessarily be allotted to the one who seems most qualified to fill it. The knowledge of both languages has naturally required a greater effort on the part of the one who possesses them and this puts him in a better position to render greater services to the state.

The arguments which I have put forth sets me at ease in broaching the other part of my motion which reads as follows, as you will find in the Votes and Proceedings of the House:

The public employees having knowledge of both the official languages, should, owing to this qualification, be better remunerated; and the superiority of the employees possessing both languages should be considered in all reclassification.

In fact, Sir, it is but fair and logical to give a more substantial remuneration to the bilingual employee, than to the one who unwillingly or purposely confines himself to the use of one language, and expects a whole population or at least a good portion of the country to bow to his intolerance or ignorance, the two, after all, go hand in hand.

First is an official who makes use of the two languages of this country—I shall not say with equal facility but nevertheless with ease—in both cases—better situated to render more effective service to the state? The answer goes without saying. A bilingual official like a person forewarned is forearmed. In his dealings with the public, no time is lost, no waiting in vain, no quid pro quo, no uneasiness of the kind which forces, as a last resort, the ratepayer to prefer anything rather than knock at the door of a government office. This breeds discontent against the government itself which is charged with harbouring, at very high salaries, individuals whose greatest merit is arrogance and chief virtue idleness. Wherever there is but a narrow margin between the former and the latter and this is soon filled in. We, the members know something about it, we, that have very often to cover up mistakes of officials speaking but one language and furnish explanations which we must invent, thanks to an imagination well trained beforehand. If this be a fact—and it is so—is it necessary for me to argue that ten bilingual employees are worth twenty who speak a single language? I only request for the former, whosever they may be, and they are to be found among the English as among the French, a remuneration in keeping with the services rendered. All things equal, I consider that it is a formal duty to appoint to the higher positions, bilingual citizens.

Should it be found too difficult to grant them the salary to which they are entitled, let them at least be granted, in their present occupation, a salary in keeping with the services they render or may render, and I insist on that point. Furthermore, Sir, I wonder by virtue of what logic, the heads of departments, those responsible are released from the obligations which are imposed upon the humble, the lower grades? Does the salary they receive exempt them from such obligations, and does the fact of their being placed on the civil list constitute a right to neglect learning a language, an ignorance which would not be tolerated in a second class clerk, nay, not even in the third division? I understand that, at present, the work of reclassification of the salaries in the various departments is in full swing. The work is a serious and important one.

Let there be no haste, for once you have arrived at conclusions, there the matter will rest. And wrongs committed against certain classes of employees or certain officials, individually, will with great difficulty be redressed. On the other hand, I am aware that the government, which has already introduced reforms when the occasion demanded it, is anxious to deal fairly with everybody. That is the reason I ask that there should be no haste, that nothing should be done with full steam ahead, especially in such matters, because the government will naturally be forced to follow the recommendations made by its advisers, and it will necessarily shoulder all responsibilities, if I may express myself thus. The officials who will have prepared these lists will be cleared from all responsibilities towards the employees and the people. The scape-goat, as always, will be the government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, after having followed as closely as possible the line of argument which I had thought out, having been cautious to discuss the subject in a genial way, after having endeavoured to prove that it is more logical and fairer to be a bilinguist than to remain, in spite of everything, a man speaking but one language, may I ask you to glance over the situation existing outside the service; we may find there, perhaps, matter for edification. To-day, and ever since the war, nations that had isolated themselves within their boundaries, voluntarily or not, who only knew of other countries through what the press agents had allowed to leak out; in whose ears no sound unfamiliar to their surroundings ever penetrated, have now established commercial intercourse with people and corporations whose language previously was entirely unknown. Moreover, leaders of thought paved the way. Statesmen who never dreamed that some day they might have to express themselves in a tongue foreign to theirs, were carried away by events and forced to study English or French, so as to be ready for all eventualities.

Let us now see what is taking place in commercial life, where is, to-day, the business house, the shop, or the agency, even the most humble one, that makes use of one language only? I do not believe there is one. Furthermore, business houses go to considerable expense in order to retain the services of competent translators, previous to scattering to the four winds of publicity their prospectuses, price lists and catalogues. And this outside practice is also adopted indoors, in offices and behind the counters. One realizes that it is a matter of justice, and the making of large fortunes.

Bearing witness to a few of these facts, are we not aware that at a meeting of the Liberal Association of East Toronto, last year, I think, Mr. A. E. Kirkpatrick stated that the Canadian business men, in general, would be in a better position, if, like the business men of the province of Quebec, they could speak both English and French. On all sides the necessity and importance of bilingualism is felt. Did not Sir George Foster himself state on the occasion of the "bonne entente" between the two races in this country, that the use of the two languages would be the infallible means of bringing the two races to know and appreciate one another better. Should we not also congratulate General J. H. MacBrien, Chief of the Canadian Military Staff, who stated, some months ago, that lieutenants in the Canadian army in order to receive promotion must be bilinguists. As it is seen, bilingualism imposes itself everywhere. These surveys of the commercial and political life are evidence of this. Would it therefore be logical to reject bilingualism in the administration of public affairs? I leave it to those who have listened to me, to examine the question and answer it, and I have no doubt that the answer will be in perfect accord with all that I have said in this honourable House.

I therefore venture to count on the sympathy of the House in favour of the resolution that I have the honour to move.

Mr. J. J. DENIS (Joliette): In opening my remarks, I wish to congratulate very heartily the hon. member for L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Seguin) on the excellent speech which he has just made. If one would consider this matter with an unbiased and an open mind I think he would find that the resolution speaks for itself so clearly and eloquently that it need not be defended. There might be details which some hon. members would not be ready to accept, but I think the principle of the resolution is as solid as a rock in this country. I do not want to be called a nationalist, or to insist that every person must speak both languages or speak the French language. In dealing with this subject I have not in mind any particular race or any particular group; I am speaking only in the interests of Canada and in the public interest. I ask hon. members, is it not true that a public servant in this country who speaks both languages can render more efficient service? I do not refer to members of parliament or others in public life, but to those who are members of the civil service. Do hon. members not think that a man with a knowledge of both languages is in a better position to work in the public interest than the man who speaks only one language?

The soundness of the proposal involved in the resolution cannot be denied. One may like or dislike the fundamental principle of the resolution, but no one can deny the general proposition. Those who have lived in Ottawa for a few years and have had occasion to come in contact with the departments have found that in almost every department or branch the chief has two secretaries, one French and one English. Is that necessary? Who pays for that, if it is not the state? The state is paying two secretaries in many instances when only one should be employed. If this resolution were adopted it would mean that in every branch of a department one who could speak both languages would be employed rather than two, one for the English language and one for the French. We should have one employee, not French, not English, but bilingual. The resolution asks, therefore, that in all appointments candidates who understand both languages should have the preference. I submit that that is perfectly just and right. It is fair to the country that we should consider the public interest, and fair to the individual who has gone to the trouble of learning the two languages.

The resolution provides further that employees having a knowledge of both official languages should receive better remuneration. I suppose some people might object to that proposition. I would not commit myself to it, because it is a detail. The point to which I want to commit myself is that the bilingual employee should have the preference.

The resolution states also that the superiority of the employees possessing a knowledge of both languages should be considered in all classifications. I think if we accept the first half of the resolution we accept also the last part of it, because the moment you adopt the principle that the preference is to be given to those who speak both languages, you admit their superiority. I do not argue that all should speak both languages, but I want to give my humble support to the eloquent speech made by my hon. friend, and to announce to the House and the country at large that I am supporting the proposition.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): It is my misfortune that I did not hear all that the hon. gentleman said, but following out the thought that he has just expressed, will he apply the same principle to the members of this House?

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): My hon. friend was not in the House when I said that I applied it to civil servants and not to members of the House.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Why draw the line?

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): Because the civil servants are working in the public interest.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): That is a serious reflection on hon. members.

Mr. CHARLES B. HOWARD (Sherbrooke): Permit me to say a few words on the proposed resolution which has been placed on the order paper by the hon. member for L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Seguin); first, because last session I had a similar resolution in mind but did not proceed with it, because of the extraordinary session we went through, and I did not want to add to the troubles which we already had and secondly, because I believe that in the best interests of Canada as a whole parliament should adopt this resolution.

I am pleased to follow the proposer of this resolution who with that ease of diction which the French language permits advanced arguments in favour of the adoption of his motion; I have to content myself with the use of the concise English tongue, which we usually regard as the language of business. Canada is recognized the world over as a bilingual country. This government, of which I have the honour to be a supporter, realized that fact only recently when it sent to the Imperial conference not only the Prime Minister but the hon. Minister of Justice whom the entire Dominion is proud to honour. The business and the financial world recognizes the superiority of bilingual employees. I know that one of our cabinet ministers is having his sons educated in both languages; in fact they can already speak in either medium so fluently that it is impossible to tell from which race they trace their descent. The county of Sherbrooke also recognizes bilingualism to a great extent. Its electors send me to represent them in this parliament, and a French-Canadian to represent them in the provincial legislature. Furthermore, the city of Sherbrooke elects alternately every two years as mayor an English-Canadian and a French-Canadian, and both are bilingual. Then, Mr. Speaker, how many times do we hear hon. members in this House refer to the great coalition government of Cartier and Macdonald, one of the strongest combinations that has ever governed the Dominion.

When I contemplate the hardships and dangers endured by the pioneers who came to this country from France and from England, Ireland and Scotland, and realize the great nation which they founded on this part of the North American continent, I bow my head in honour to them. What greater heroism do the pages of history contain than the gallant stand of Dollard and his companions who in 1660 saved New France from ruin. We cannot read that heroic episode without a thrill. And we all honour the memory of those brave priests of the Roman Catholic church who risked death, and worse than death, torture, at the hands of the Indians in their zeal to convert them to Christianity. We also honour those equally zealous Protestant preachers, who are now known to us as "horseback preachers" from the fact that they went through the country on horseback—there were no roads in those days—to spread the faith of their forefathers.

It is difficult, Mr. Speaker, to realize that the 50,000 or 60,000 French-Canadians whom France cut loose from in 1759 have in the intervening period, less than a couple of centuries, increased to such an extent that today there are two million of their descendants in the province of Quebec, about one and a half million scattered throughout the sister provinces and nearly two million in the United States. Naturally we think of those hardy ancestors with the very highest respect.

I am pleased to live in the province of Quebec under a school system which recognizes the rights of the minority, where English is taught as the secondary language in the French schools, and where French is taught as the secondary language in the English schools. Sherbrooke is an ideal county, but like every other section sometimes we encounter a few fanatics. I think however, we have the minimum of this class in our county. The other day I was talking to one of them and was astonished by a remark he made, a remark, by the way, which proves the point I am trying to make. He said, "Charlie, I only wish I could speak French." That is an astounding statement from a person holding extreme views, but it simply goes to prove that bilingualism will be a distinct benefit to the whole Dominion. I remember that in my school days we were required to study, among other languages, German and Spanish. When we questioned the wisdom of this, realizing that we were never going to live either in Germany or Spain, we were told that those languages were included in the curriculum because the study of languages was one of the greatest mind-training agencies in the world. Not only have bilingualists an advantage over those of our people who are not familiar with the two official languages of Canada, but they are better equipped in understanding the other fellow's viewpoint. It is generally admitted that no translation, however true and complete it may be, can ever communicate to you the true feeling in the writer's heart; you can interpret him only by reading his works in the language in which they were written.

A few days ago an hon. member on the other side of the House stated he had been accused of lots of things in his time, but he did not want to be accused of speaking for the province of Quebec. Neither do I want to be accused of speaking for the province of Ontario, but I should like to say in all kindness and sincerity that the sooner the people in Ontario permit the study of French in their schools the sooner will there be a complete realization of the bonne entente spirit in this country. A certain newspaper in Ottawa not long ago gave me a very special advertisement in the form of a long critical editorial. I do not criticise the newspaper for doing so; I do not find any fault with the article nor do I blame anyone for that two-column editorial, but the fact remains that Ottawa is 225 miles away from my county and although I have many newspapers in my district not one of them made any such statements as were made in the Ottawa paper. Every word of that article was an absolute falsehood from beginning to end. No one can justly accuse me of being a fanatic on any particular matter.

Coming to this question of the civil service employees, according to circulars which I have received, they are asking for an increase in wages. I say frankly on the floor of this House that I do not consider myself able to judge whether that increase would be right or wrong, but in considering this increase I think other forms of labour should be taken into consideration as well. If the wages of the civil servants are found to be lower, in proportion, than are those of railway employees, farmers and labourers, the increase should be granted. But there is another point which I would like to deal with. I am absolutely opposed to a maximum salary in the civil service; I do not believe that in a young country such as Canada we should halt ambition and destroy initiative by placing a maximum on the salaries; if a man is worth an increase he should receive it.

In favouring this resolution I would not for one moment desire to work a hardship upon civil servants who were appointed years ago, and whose knowledge may be limited to one language or the other; I would not like to see them penalized, but I am strongly in favour of this resolution as it would affect those entering the service from now on. More than that, if hon. members representing the western provinces and western Ontario object to this resolution there may be some excuse, but I am absolutely convinced of the justice of the proposal as it applies to eastern Ontario, the province of Quebec and the maritime provinces. Our ancestors came from two great countries; the business interests of Canada admit that bilingualism is essential to good business; the financial interests recognize the fact that a bilingual employee is superior to one who has not that qualification, so why should not this government take the same stand in connection with civil service employees? I could go on as the hon. member for L'Assomption (Mr. Seguin) suggested, and quote extraordinarily striking cases where absolute injustice has been done through the fact that certain employees are not bilingual, in the province of Quebec and in my own county; but I do not desire to go into specific cases, and I only speak generally in support of the resolution.

There is just another point in passing. The next ten years will be recognized all over the world as Canada's decade. I am not too keen on reducing the national debt; I think that if we take our revenue and spend it in Canada to develop the country, to provide work for the immigrants who will come here during the next ten years and to bring back from the United States our own people who are anxious to come back in view of the present prosperity of Canada, we will be doing a great thing for Canada. Therefore with no further remarks I desire to place myself on record as being in favour of this resolution particularly as it would apply to eastern Ontario, Quebec and the maritime provinces.

Mr. DAVID SPENCE (Parkdale): I do not intend to take up more than a few moments of the time of the House, because I have only one or two observations to make. I am sorry that I do not understand French and that it was impossible for me to follow the hon. member who introduced this motion. I do hope, however, that he as well as those who are supporting him will not persist in putting it through. I think hon. members will agree that this will create more or less friction and will cause a great many difficulties, and the mover will be well advised to withdraw the motion. I do not propose to criticize the resolution at all, but we want peace in this House and in Canada.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I desire to pass just a few remarks with regard to this resolution. Unfortunately I was not able to follow the speech of the hon. member who presented it; I think perhaps some of us who have no knowledge of the French language are penalized very frequently in this House because of our inability to speak that language. It is quite unnecessary, I think, to emphasize the need and value of language training. But whether or not one could follow the speech I think perhaps it is true, as one member has already suggested, that the resolution speaks for itself; and quite irrespective of the argument by which it might be supported we can judge more or less of the merits of the case by the terms of this resolution.

I would express myself as being rather regretful that this resolution has been introduced. The changes proposed are put on the ground of efficiency, but undoubtedly there will be an appeal to prejudice. For that reason I am sorry that any matter that is liable to divide the House and the country should be introduced when there is so slight a probability of it ever coming into effect. Undoubtedly a knowledge of the two official languages is in many positions of very great advantage. I should say that in the large majority of the positions in the civil service it must be of very great advantage to have a working knowledge both of English and of French. In other cases it has no particular advantage. Some of us learned a little French when we were boys, and simply because we had absolutely no opportunity of using that language the little knowledge that we had readily passed from us. There are many sections in this country where a knowledge of French is of practically no advantage whatever. If the matter is put on the basis of efficiency, and as I understand it that is the case for the resolution—that is that it would render the public service more efficient—then I would say that in many sections of this country other languages besides French should be given the preference. We have some 300,000 to 350,000 Ukrainians in this country.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Four hundred thousand.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Four hundred thousand? Possibly the number has reached that figure.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: Do I understand the hon. gentleman to state that some other languages might be more useful in sections of our country than the French language?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: Would the hon. gentleman say what languages would be more useful?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I was about to deal with that point. Perhaps the hon. gentleman has not understood me. I said that some other languages than French as a second language would be of advantage in this country—in some parts of this country if you like. I am equally prepared to say that there may be some sections in this country where the first language would be French and the second language would be some other language than English. There are somewhere between three and four hundred thousand Ukrainians, for instance, in this country, and if the matter is to be placed on the basis of efficiency I can quite readily understand that a great many officials who have to do with that large group of immigrants possibly ought to have a working knowledge of the Ukrainian language.

An hon. MEMBER: The Chinese language.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There are other languages in the west besides the Ukrainian. There are the Scandinavian languages, there is the German language. Somebody suggests the Chinese language on the west coast. That is true. If we have to deal with the Chinese we ought to have officials on the west coast who have a thorough knowledge of both English and Chinese. I will go so far even with regard to an oriental language.

Mr. JACOBS: I hope the hon. gentleman will not overlook the Yiddish.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If it were a case of an official in the Immigration department I should say that certainly it would be an advantage to have a knowledge of Yiddish. But the point I want to make in this connection, Mr. Speaker, is simply this: That undoubtedly the language qualification is an advantage in certain positions and those who have a knowledge of the second language ought to receive the preference in the making of an appointment. Some appointments, perhaps, ought not to be made unless the man had a knowledge of two languages. But I do not like the introduction of a principle which will always give the preference to the man with a knowledge of the two languages and afford him a large remuneration. I do not think that the introduction of that principle will tend to the furtherance of good will among the very many peoples that constitute the population of Canada to-day, and I would say that it would have to be put on an altogether different basis than that of mere efficiency. We have, for example, the case of the Speaker, who has been reëlected on several occasions because of his knowledge of both the English and the French languages. I personally approve of that choice. I think it is no small advantage to have in the chair here a man who speaks both English and French, and I for one will be quite glad to accord that exalted position to the one who is best qualified to fill it. I understand that something like eighty per cent of the pages in this House are French bilinguists. I do not object to that because I presume it is an advantage that a page should be able to speak, whenever a member calls him, in whatever language that member may employ. That is all right because there you have a question of efficiency well founded and those who obtained the preference obtained it by reason of that fact. That is one of the inevitable advantages of the one who speaks two languages under the conditions that exist in Ottawa. But in other parts of Canada where conditions do not prevail that may prevail here or in the province of Quebec—from which the three hon. members opposite who spoke in succession on this question come—but other conditions entirely, then I say it would be very foolish indeed of us to adopt a principle which, while possibly related to certain historical privileges, would not tend to efficiency and might do far more harm than good.

Mr. St. PERE: It is not a privilege, it is a right.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I accept the correction. There are certain rights peculiar to the French language, but I do not believe that even the mover of this resolution would say that those rights necessarily involve any action along the line suggested by this resolution. It would seem to me that among the qualifications necessary for civil servants there are many others besides merely the knowledge of the French language, important as that is. There is, for example, a sense of fair play, there is a sense of what we call the actualities of the situation, there is a sense of proportion, and I would say that these qualities in a civil servant or a member of the House are equally important with the knowledge of a second language. I think perhaps I would venture to remind the mover of the resolution of those old lines from Shakespeare, which came to my mind as he was speaking:

> Vaulting ambition, which o'erleaps itself
> And falls on the other side.

There is no slight danger that we may overemphasize privileges or rights to the extent of antagonizing other people, and bringing about conditions under which it will be extremely difficult to retain those rights. The thought I had in mind when I first rose has already been expressed by the question from the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards). I would suggest that if this principle is of value in the civil service, it ought to be more widely applied. I wonder what we should think if a resolution were introduced into the House in these terms:

> That the policy of the House should be to give preference to members of parliament knowing the two official languages;
> That members of parliament having a knowledge of both the official languages should, owing to their qualifications, be better remunerated, and the superiority of members of parliament possessing both languages should be considered in all appointments to office and to positions on commissions, on committees, or in the Senate.

Mr. POULIOT: Does the hon. member not make a distinction between members of parliament who are elected by the people and members of the civil service who are appointed by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I fail to see why, if the principle is sound in the case of the civil service, it should not be given a wider application, and until I can be convinced of that, I feel I can not support a resolution of this character.

Mr. POULIOT: Does the hon. member think that the Ukrainian and Chinese languages have the same rights as the English and French languages in Canada?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not suggest that in the slightest, and if the hon. member is really sincere in thinking that is my position, I am glad indeed that he has called the attention of the House to the point. If he will recall my argument, it was simply this, that this resolution bases itself, not upon historical rights, but rather upon effectiveness.

I was arguing the case on the basis of effectiveness, and I said that in certain cases it would be more desirable to have a knowledge of Chinese than to have a knowledge of French or of English, and that in such a case the appointment ought to be made because of the special qualification. If we are going to go back and introduce historical privileges and rights, we are on another basis altogether.

Mr. POULIOT: There should be a difference between constitutional and historical rights.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have not been discussing either of them; I have been endeavouring to follow the terms of the resolution.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (Toronto West Centre): Mr. Speaker, like seventy-five per cent of the members of the House, I was unable to follow the remarks of the hon. gentleman who introduced the resolution. I would have thought, if he desired to impress the House, he would have spoken in a language that we could all understand.

Mr. SEGUIN: I might ask the hon. member: Why does he not speak in French so that the French-speaking members may be able to understand him?

Mr. HOCKEN: There is just this difference. The hon. gentleman can speak in English; I cannot speak in French. I may repeat that if he desired to be understood by all the members of the House, he might have spoken in English. But evidently he did not desire to be understood by all the members of the House, and so he spoke in a language which only twenty-five per cent of the members could understand and follow. I have no doubt that this resolution is introduced for electoral purposes.

Mr. SEGUIN: Not at all.

Mr. HOCKEN: I do not think for a moment that it is expected that this resolution will pass this House. The Prime Minister is altogether too astute a politician to allow a motion of this kind to pass the House, and his Minister of Railways is equally astute. It is indeed pretty hard to apportion the ability in that regard between those two hon. gentlemen. But there is, I think, enough good, sound common sense on that side of the House to prevent a motion of this kind from passing, and particularly from being implemented by legislation. I do not think the party could stand that. But the resolution is really a discrimination against English-speaking applicants for positions in the civil service.

Mr. SEGUIN: Not at all.

Mr. HOCKEN: I repeat: It is a positive discrimination, and I will proceed to explain why it is so. To discriminate against people who can speak only English in this English-speaking country, this British country, is little short of an outrage. After all this is a part of the British Empire; everybody here is a British subject. The English speech is the speech of Canada.

Mr. SEGUIN: There are two official languages.

Mr. HOCKEN: The English language is the official language of Canada, with a few certain privileges to the French language.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Rights.

Mr. HOCKEN: Put it that way if you will —with a few narrow rights to the French language.

Mr. SEGUIN: They are on the same footing.

Mr. HOCKEN: To put every English-speaking man or woman desiring a position in the civil service under the handicap of being compelled to learn another language, would be an absolute injustice. The way in which it would work out would be most disastrous to those English-speaking applicants for positions. This resolution proposes to give the preference in future appointments to candidates knowing the two official languages. That, I presume, removes the preference that now exists for returned soldiers, and it puts them under a handicap instead of giving them the privilege which they now enjoy. If there is in Canada any class of men who should receive a preference in government employment, it is surely the men who hazarded their lives and went through all the miseries of the war in order to preserve civilization in the world. It is in recognition of that extraordinary service which they rendered that they get this privilege, but my hon. friend would remove it.

Mr. SEGUIN: If we were prepared to give returned soldiers the preference above all others, would the hon. member be ready to accept a motion like this?

Mr. HOCKEN: I would not give a preference of this kind at all. I would not say that a man must be compelled to speak the two languages even in the province of Quebec, for a civil service appointment. But we are not dealing with a French-speaking province; we are dealing with the Dominion of Canada, and it cannot be contended that our French-speaking fellow citizens are not getting their share of civil service appointments. I think, on the other hand, if the government were brave enough to produce a return for which I asked at one time, it would be seen that the French-Canadians in this country to-day have very much more than their proportion of positions in the civil service.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. HOCKEN: Then let them get their Prime Minister to bring down the return. They will not do it. When I asked for it, I could not get it. I wanted to ascertain in one department after another how many were French and how many English. That information will not be supplied. If it were supplied, I think it would prove that the French applicants for office have not been discriminated against. On the contrary, they have been favoured, and very highly favoured, in the making of civil service appointments.

Mr. CASGRAIN: We are not favoured.

Mr. HOCKEN: I think that French applicants for positions are getting their fair share of appointments.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I do not think we have had it up to the present time.

Mr. HOCKEN: I think they have had more, and we have not protested seriously against that. But here is something that is entirely different. You are saying in effect that in the future nobody shall have a position in the civil service of Canada unless he speak the French language. Why, there are large sections of this country, probably eighty per cent of the territory of this country, in which you never hear the French language spoken at all. Are you going to insist upon knowledge of the two languages for positions in the city of Hamilton, or the city of Winnipeg, or the city of Vancouver? That is the effect of this resolution. I say that it would be impossible to get capable and efficient civil servants in these places if you insisted on this qualification, and that shows the absurdity of it. Not only that, but this resolution proposes that those who can speak both languages are to get ten, twenty or thirty per cent more salary than those who cannot. There is another very serious discrimination.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: Why not?

Mr. HOCKEN: Why should they?

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: Because they know both languages.

Mr. HOCKEN: That is not enough. I will venture to say this, that man for man the English-speaking civil servants are as efficient, if not more so, as the French-speaking civil servants.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. HOCKEN: You go and talk to the deputy ministers. There is no charge of inefficiency against the English-speaking employees who are unable to speak French.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Sometimes there are complaints, but they do not want to recognize them.

Mr. HOCKEN: Of course, this supposed necessity for French in all the departments greatly increases the civil service staff, as the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard) says. It makes many a place for a translator or some clerk to write a letter once or twice a week, or something of that kind, and that inures greatly to the advantage of those who are of French origin. There has not been any complaint about that so far as this side of the House is concerned, and so far as the English-speaking people of Canada are concerned there has been no complaint, or very little complaint, at all the extensions and pressing forward and advancement of the French language to bring it up to a parity in every relation of life with the English language. It is not on that parity according to the rights that were given to it at confederation.

They talk about members of the civil service being more efficient if they can speak both languages. I think the point raised by the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) is quite pertinent. Why should not the members of parliament be required to speak the two languages? We had a case in 1917, Mr. Speaker, when on the Union side of the House there was only one French-Canadian, and he refused to act as deputy speaker. An effort was then made to find some other man among us—and we then comprised two-thirds of the House—who could follow a debate in French, but it was impossible to find a man on the government side of the House who could do so, and so they had to take for Deputy Speaker a member from the opposition side of the House. On our side of the House at that time there were at least one hundred men who had gone through the universities, had studied French, passed their examinations, taken their diplomas, and all the rest of it, but after they had left college they had not been able to keep up their French, and consequently when the time came some years afterwards when it would have been of advantage to them to speak French, and be able to follow a French debate, they were unable to do it. A man in any other province than Quebec, unless it be in some of the colonies, though he studies French in the university and takes his diploma, cannot keep up a speaking knowledge of the French except by attending a night school or something of that kind.

Mr. POULIOT: Or by reading the Orange Sentinel.

Mr. HOCKEN: It would not do my hon. friend any harm to read it. It would give him some light, and he would read some of the truth that he does not read down in the province of Quebec. What I am pointing out, Mr. Speaker, is that it is impossible for people living in the English-speaking provinces to retain facility in the speaking of the French language. Any young man leaving the university and beginning his profession would have to spend two or three afternoons or nights a week studying French if he wanted to keep it up. That is impossible, and the result is that he never uses French, and all the French he learned at the university is lost. It is not that we do not speak French in the other provinces. In all the high schools, collegiate institutes, and secondary schools in the province of Ontario, French is an obligatory subject. All the children learn it, but they never acquire facility in speaking the language because they never hear it.

The situation in Quebec is entirely different. The French people in Quebec can speak English because they hear it on every hand. As a matter of fact, if they want to engage in the higher grades of employment, they have to speak English. Their parents recognize that, and they have the facilities for acquiring a speaking knowledge of the English language that we have not got in regard to French in the other provinces. That was the whole trouble about regulation 17. That good Irish friend, Michael Fallon, the Bishop of London, supported regulation 17 for one reason. He said: "I am not satisfied to see the children of my diocese fit only to drive a wagon, or a motor car, or a team, or engage in some of the lower classes of employment. I want my flock to be the equal of the flock of the other churches." That is the reason why he was strongly in favour of regulation 17, because it compels his children to learn English. They were not learning English before, and they could not speak it, and that was a great detriment to them living in an English-speaking community both on this side of the border and on the other. He was acting entirely in their own material interests when he insisted upon regulation 17, which was a great concession to the French language.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Thank you.

Mr. HOCKEN: It was a great concession, Mr. Speaker, and I do not think it would be hard to prove that. I could explain to my hon. friend what he no doubt knows, that under the constitution of this country no Frenchman in the province of Ontario has any right to have his language taught in any school. It is well within the power of the Ontario legislature to wipe the French language out of the primary schools absolutely, and there could be no dispute about it. Senator Belcourt has given a reasoned decision on that point. But we did not go that far. The legislature of the province, under Sir James Whitney, wanted to consider the sensitiveness of the French, as Sir James said, and so he put that regulation into effect, which gives to every French child in the province of Ontario ample opportunity to learn his own language.

Mr. BRADETTE: Was not the Ontario government aware, when it enacted regulation 17, that English was being properly taught in the bilingual schools of the province?

Mr. HOCKEN: My hon. friend differs from Doctor Merchant, who was the commissioner appointed by the Ontario government to examine into the French-English schools. He reported that in 267 primary schools of Ontario English was not being taught efficiently. That was the reason why regulation 17 was enacted. There were teachers in the schools who could not speak English, and they were supposed to be teaching both English and French. Doctor Merchant, I think, may be accepted not only as a great educationalist but as a man of high character, as a man who was anxious to deal with that thorny question from a pedagogical standpoint, and his advice was accepted by the late Sir James Whitney, who could not be called hostile to the French. He was the first premier of Ontario who ever had a French-Canadian in his cabinet and he thought when he put regulation 17 into effect that he was going to have peace and harmony in eastern Ontario, northern Ontario, and in Kent and Essex. It was a genuine desire to promote peace, but instead of promoting peace it stirred up the fiercest controversy we have ever had in this country, and that controversy was stirred up because the man whose duty it was to inform the people as to the real substance and character and legislation not only refused to do so, but misrepresented all through the province of Quebec for their own advantage, not only the provincial leader, but actually the legislature of the province of Quebec—

Mr. BOURASSA: I do not like to interrupt any hon. member when he is making a speech in the chamber, but I understood we were discussing a motion with regard to the civil service of the federal government. I cannot in any way, directly or indirectly, see how it can be connected with a certain piece of legislation enacted by the province of Ontario, called regulation 17. Without a complete transformation of the question before the House, and a departure from debate, I do not see how the question can be discussed under this resolution.

Mr. HOCKEN: The fact that my hon. friend does not see that my remarks are pertinent is no evidence that they are not pertinent. I submit I am touching the very heart of the question of the resolution.

Mr. BOURASSA: I rise to a point of order, and I want a ruling from the chair. In connection with a motion of the nature of the resolution which is now before the House, is it permissible to discuss regulation 17 of Ontario, or any other piece of provincial legislation?

Mr. HOCKEN: We are dealing with a question which requires a knowledge of English and French and I am trying to point out to this House that in the province of Ontario we did everything to give the children opportunities to acquire the knowledge of both languages. I think that is quite pertinent to the subject.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Marcil): The rule applicable in this case is rule 19, which reads:

> No member shall speak disrespectfully of His Majesty nor of any of the royal family; nor of the governor or person administering the government of Canada; nor use offensive words against either House, or against any member thereof; nor speak beside the question in debate.

In practice in my experience, certain latitude has been allowed in debate in the House by way of illustration, but in discussing questions of this kind the rule of relevancy must apply, and the hon. member addressing the chair must speak to the question before the House.

Mr. HOCKEN: I did not intend to say anything more on that point anyway. I think I have put the matter clearly before the House. Parliament is asked by this resolution to force English-speaking people who wish to obtain a position in the civil service—which many young men and women in this country think very desirable—to learn the French language. I do not think there is any escape from that. The idea is to put up some ten or twenty or thirty thousand positions paid for by the general taxpayers of Canada, and to say to those who want to get one of those positions, "You cannot get such a position unless you can speak the French language." I have never suggested anywhere that any barrier should be put in the way of people learning or speaking the French language, but I certainly think it would be most unfair to exclude from the civil service anybody who could not speak the French language. There are some positions no doubt, especially in the province of Quebec, where a knowledge of French and of English is desirable. They are all filled by men who can speak both languages now—at least they can speak the French language—but why this House should be asked to handicap every possible English-speaking applicant for Dominion civil service positions is absolutely beyond my comprehension, and I do not think it would be accepted by people generally for one moment. It seems to me there would be very great objection to it.

Another side of the question was touched upon by my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). The British race are not amenable to coercion of any kind, and anything that has that appearance will be resisted and resented by the people of that race; so that when an attempt is made as in this case, to say to the English-speaking people of Canada, "You must learn the language of Quebec or you cannot get a job in the civil service of Canada," that is a form of coercion, and I think you will find that it will react on the public sentiment of the whole Dominion against Quebec and the French language and the French race. I think it is an exceedingly short-sighted thing to attempt, and that is why I had the idea ever since I saw it on the order paper that it never was intended to be discussed. I was surprised to see it introduced; I thought my hon. friend would have been satisfied to put it on the order paper and send copies to his constituents and let it be seen what a brave and bold man he was; but he evidently is a little more serious than that.

I do not think it can be contended that the civil service of Canada should be made the preserve for any one race. I do not think Ukrainians should be excluded. I do not think the Yidds should be excluded, or the English, but the effect would be to exclude the English and keep the civil service as a preserve for those who speak French and are French. If my hon. friend will see the reasonableness of that statement I think we can persuade him to withdraw the resolution. He surely cannot defend such a situation as is presented.

I am prepared to admit, Mr. Speaker, that the French people learn English much more easily than the English learn French.

An hon. MEMBER: Why?
