Mr. HOCKEN: There are two reasons, one of which I have already stated. In Quebec English is spoken practically everywhere. There are some back parishes where you do not hear it spoken, but the parents of Quebec want their children to learn English,—

An hon. MEMBER: No, no.

Mr. HOCKEN: —because it is greatly to their material advantage.

An hon. MEMBER: Preach that gospel in Ontario.

Mr. HOCKEN: Did I not tell my hon. friend that all our children learn French, but have not the facilities to keep it up? We cannot get the correct pronunciation without attending school for a very long period. Another reason is this: whether we like it or not, one of the weaknesses of the English people is that they are not facile linguists. The French learn another language much more easily than the English; and it being difficult for the ordinary English person to acquire another language, he does not attempt it. The average English-speaking Canadian would have to study much longer to master French than the average French-speaking Canadian would have to devote to master English. That is one of the differences of the two races. This racial difference crops out in many other characteristics, Mr. Speaker, but it is not necessary for me to enter into them at the present moment.

I am not going to indulge in a prolonged controversy, Mr. Speaker, but my hon. friend from Sherbrooke said that this is a bilingual country. It is not so by any interpretation of the constitution. I would suppose that every member had read the British North America Act and knew exactly what rights the French language has in this Dominion. It is enjoying rights to-day which are much more extensive than those accorded it by the British North America Act. To remind hon. members, let me read section 133, which is the only provision in our constitution for the official use of the French language in the Dominion:

> Either the English or the French lagnuage may be used by any person in the debates of the Houses of the parliament of Canada and of the Houses of the legislature of Quebec; and both those languages shall be used in the respective records and journals of those Houses; and either of those languages may be used by any person or in any pleading or process in or issuing from any court of Canada established under this act, and in or from all or any of the courts of Quebec.
> The acts of the parliament of Canada and of the legislature of Quebec shall be printed and published in both those languages.

Mr. POULIOT: Does my hon. friend think that that section is right or wrong?

Mr. HOCKEN: I say to my hon. friend, these are the rights that the late Sir George Cartier solemnly agreed to. All the representatives of the French race at the time of confederation put their signature to this. It is the sum total of the rights of the French language in the Dominion of Canada. So it must be plain to any person who understands English that this is not a bilingual country. So far as I know there has never been a suggestion from any source that one tittle of these rights should be abrogated. The rest of Canada has loyally observed this section of the act. But the French language is used now in a hundred different places for which there is no constitutional warrant.

An hon. MEMBER: Where?

Mr. HOCKEN: You will find it on every door in this building. It is used in the post office. It is used on postal and money orders. It is used on the railways.

An hon. MEMBER: And in official documents.

Mr. HOCKEN: It is used in many places, Mr. Speaker. I am simply pointing out to my hon. friend what rights his language has. I am not discussing whether this section went far enough or not. I am saying that this is what is provided by the British North America Act, which was agreed to by Sir George Cartier, Sir Hector Langevin, Chapleau, and the other representatives of the French-Canadians of that time. If any more had been asked by them there would not have been any confederation. It was hard enough to get George Brown to agree to these privileges for the French language. So it cannot be said that in opposing a resolution of this kind any member of this House is showing hostility to the French language or to French rights. We contend that this proposal is an attack upon the rights of the English-speaking people of Canada, an attack on the rights of every English-speaking young man and young woman, for it forces them either to learn French or to keep out of the civil service. If they submit to this encroachment on their rights, why, they are to get extra remuneration.

Let me point out something else, Mr. Speaker. Suppose there are several applicants for a vacancy in the civil service, some of English, some of French, descent. They would be examined either by an English examiner or by a French examiner, and there would be a very marked tendency on the part of either to say that this one could not speak French properly or that that one could not speak English properly. There would be all kinds of disputes, and heartburnings, and controversies, and appeals to the ministers. As my hon. friend knows, I am not enamoured of our Civil Service Act, but at least it secures to the civil service a reasonably fair deal and a certain security of position. If that is to be abandoned and anything like this proposal substituted, then you are going to have the civil service degenerate to a point which it has not reached yet, and which I hope it never will.

I do not think that my hon. friend was exhibiting that boasted generosity to the minority, which we hear so much about from the province of Quebec. There is no spirit of generosity towards the English-speaking applicant for a civil service position in such a resolution as this. Mind you, Mr. Speaker —and I hope I am not offending, I am trying to state the case fairly and moderately— I should like to see these two races in a much greater state of harmony. And there is a way to achieve this. I have suggested before, and I repeat it to-day, that if the leaders of our fellow Canadians in the province of Quebec—and I suppose hon. gentlemen opposite may be regarded as some of those leaders— if they would live up to the British North America Act as closely as the people of Ontario have lived up to it there would be no necessity to organize a bonne entente; there always would have been a bonne entente. Not a man in Ontario wants to break the British North America Act in any particular. The whole trouble is that our friends in Quebec will not observe the act. Ontario and the other provinces are not aggressive against their sister province of Quebec. It is that certain leaders in Quebec are aggressive against the other provinces, and will not observe the conditions of the act of confederation.

I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that even those members of the House who are French would expect us to accept a motion of this kind; I think the hon. member who introduced it would have been very much surprised had I not said anything about it, as I regard it as a very grave injustice to the people I represent. If I did not protest against it, therefore, I would not be doing my duty. I say again that here is the charter of our liberty; here is the document framed by Cartier, Brown, Macdonald and the others, and if the people of Canada both French and English will live closely to that and adhere to it in every particular there will be no friction existing between the two races in Canada. But so long as there is a demand made for extra-constitutional rights and privileges it must be expected that these will meet with resistance, and as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) said, the further they are pressed the stronger will be the resistance and the greater will be the ultimate danger to those rights now enjoyed by the French people with the full consent and to the perfect satisfaction of all the other provinces.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we had better remain within the scope of this resolution and judge it on its merits. Naturally I will not take up the argument of my hon. friend with regard to regulation 17, because it was only through the indulgence of you, Mr. Speaker, that that was brought up. I simply desire to say to members of this House who respect the rules of debate that they need not expect me to touch upon that matter, although of course I do not accept the views of the hon. gentleman in that connection.

With regard to the motion just now before us, it seems to me that we must consider at once both its principle and application, as in any other proposed enactment. The principle, as I see it, is the assertion of a right connected with the constitution of the country. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat read article 133 of the constitution. I suppose in the reading of legislation, as in the reading of Holy Script, there are such things as the spirit and the letter. I will not oppose the view of any French-Canadian to that of the hon. gentleman with regard to the interpretation of our constitution, but rather will I give him the word of a man whose opinion still stands, I think, in the minds of a large number of Canadians, not exclusively Conservatives, as the one man who better understood and to a large extent better applied the spirit of confederation. I refer to Sir John A. Macdonald. Twenty-four years after this piece of legislation was enacted in London as giving effect to the will of the people of Canada, he made a declaration in the parliament of this country in regard to the status of both languages. The hon. gentleman has just said that there has never been an attempt made by any one outside of Quebec to do away with those rights enjoyed by French-Canadians under the constitution. Evidently his memory is short, because in those days there was a very strong attempt made to altogether do away with the use of the French language in the federal service. That campaign was conducted by Mr. Dalton McCarthy; in provincial affairs it was carried on by Hon. Mr. Meredith, and was also supported, I believe, by the organizations with which the hon. gentleman is connected. Exactly the same arguments were then made as were brought up by the hon. gentleman this afternoon: "This is an English country; Canada has been conquered by Great Britain and therefore must conform to the principles of English government. The English language should be the sole language of this country as well as of the British empire." Sir John A. Macdonald did not go beyond the boundaries of Canada and did not deal with the whole empire, its ethnical composition or historical development; he contented himself with the statement which I am about to repeat. I have not the book with me but it can be easily found, and I think I know the words almost by heart. He said, "Whether this country was conquered or ceded is à propos de rien", using himself the French words. "Under our present constitution both races", and by that he meant English-speaking and French-speaking Canadians, "enjoy exactly the same rights in matters of religion, in matters of language, in matters of civil and political rights as well as personal rights, and therefore the two races stand on a footing of equality." That was the spirit of the law. Sir John A. Macdonald had helped to frame the letter of the law, but he had kept also the spirit which had permitted the enactment of confederation. In those days it was not thought necessary to state in so many paragraphs of the constitution that a natural right which had been enjoyed for three centuries by the founders of the country, the pioneers of Canada, those who made it possible for England to keep Canada a British country, should be continued and should not be curtailed by a narrow interpretation of the text of the law by narrow-minded individuals. Therefore the spirit of confederation, the spirit of amity and good will which made confederation possible was preserved, although they did not recite those rights of nature, those rights of the spiritual soul of a nation, in so many articles of law. They did not expect that a time would come when groups or individuals claiming to be their political heirs would narrow it down to such a measure that, because the right of a national language is acknowledged only in one single article, you must not see that it is kept alive in the political activities of the nation.

In all civilized countries and by all civilized beings, Canada is considered to be a bilingual country, without question. It is a rest for me every time I go to London—and I go frequently—to get away from colonial narrow-mindedness and to see how the leaders of thought in England realize how far the British empire is from being an English-speaking community. What an absurd thing! The English race represents only about ten per cent of the population of the British empire. The English language is the one official language of only a very small portion of that empire. I do not know whether or not the hon. member is aware of the fact, but it is a fact that the French language was the only official language of England for about three centuries. Under the Edwards, the English language took form, became the language of society and finally the language of parliament, but not by enactment of law till the time of Elizabeth, if I remember rightly. The English language was first enforced upon Wales by a statute of the British parliament; I think it is the only portion of the British Empire in which that was done, except for a short time in Canada after the rebellion of 1837, when an act of the British parliament imposed the English language as the sole language of Canada. But the English, coming back to their best senses and their best traditions, repealed that act before ten years had elapsed. The Boer language is the official language of South Africa as well as English; the Irish language is to-day the official language of the Irish Free State with English as a secondary language, just as French is in Canada; but thank heavens! the men who rule Ireland, after five centuries of struggle against subjection, are broad enough to give to the English minority in Ireland a position which will never be disputed and to permit them to enjoy not only the use of their own language, but the other civil and political privileges or natural rights for which the French Canadians have still to fight in effect, owing to the narrow spirit which prevails in some quarters of Canada.

Now to consider whether this motion is opportune or not, we have to take the facts as they are. The hon. gentleman who preceded me himself admits that in the province of Quebec the use of French is necessary in the conduct of public affairs or in the administration of public departments. My hon. friend calls it a French province. I object to that statement, Sir. The province of Quebec is not a French province, and the reason why the provincial spirit is still being kept up in that province is precisely that attitude of mind on the part of a certain number of English Canadians who consider Quebec as apart from confederation, just as, for example, some Indian reserves are kept apart for the preservation of the remnants of our aboriginal races. The province of Quebec is one of the nine Canadian provinces. The vast majority of its people speak French, but they grant to the English minority the right to speak English freely, and they accord to them in the local administrations, municipal or provincial, which are entirely under our control, those facilities which we ask in federal affairs, not merely as a matter of right—I would never put the question on that narrow basis —but as a matter of common sense and true Canadian spirit, so as to spread out into every province of Canada the same spirit of Canadian citizenship which exists in Quebec and should exist everywhere in this Dominion.

This is not, in my view, a matter of sentiment, but of adhering to the principle of confederation, to the terms and spirit of the alliance between the two races who made confederation possible, the founders of the country and the newcomers who came later on and who, after a century of more or less struggle, agreed to bury the hatchet. I come back to the example of the Irish Free State. The descendants of the inhabitants in the English pale, who for centuries had thought that there was no possible destiny for Ireland until the Irish people had consented to become English, finding out that that was not possible, made up their minds to become Irish in their turn and thus have made possible the successful government of that country. We did that sixty years ago. Are we going to exemplify it in the ordinary activities of the state? This, after all, is the question. It simply means that we are willing to show to the people of this country and to the outsiders who come in—whether they stay with us or traverse our country and learn some of its lessons—that Canada is a different country from the United States. That is the main issue. It is somewhat surprising that certain groups of men who stand as the upholders of everything British are bent on Yankeefying this country as much and as fast as they can. They want to impose on us the Yankee system of education. They want to make of Canada—by language, by habit, by custom and by political administration—a weak and mean replica of the American republic. Well, I have more pride than that, either as a French Canadian, as a Canadian pure and simple, or as a Britisher.

[Mr. Bourassa.]

I want Canada to be different from the United States. And how are you going to keep it different? Not merely by proclaiming the king the head of the state. No, the whole of history has proven that emblems of sovereignty and systems of government are not sufficient to keep up the spirit of a nation. It is not by proclaiming in so many articles of law that we acknowledge ourselves British; it is still less by developing in the minds of one-fourth of the population of this country—the pioneers of the land, the only element in Canada which is absolutely and exclusively Canadian, and has been such for centuries—the notion that outside their "Reserve" of Quebec there is no place for them, unless they abide by the will, and the habits, and the language of the majority.

Now, in the public service, I do not hold, as a matter of practice, that every civil servant should be obliged to speak French. No, that would be absurd, and I am sure such an idea does not find a place in the mind of the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution. In that respect, his resolution can be somewhat changed in its wording. But let us take the spirit of it. It means that in this country, first as a matter of historical development, second as a broad interpretation of the constitution of the country, third, taking into account the country's present ethnological position, and fourth having in view the necessity of preserving all the mental, moral and social barriers which we can oppose to the penetration of Americanism, we must make this country bilingual as much as we can in order to preserve it as a country different from the American republic. That has always been the main object we had in view in the province of Quebec by demanding—if the hon. gentleman wants me to use that word—by demanding a greater recognition of French all through the country. My hon. friend can take my word for it, that not only when I have spoken before English-speaking audiences, but every time I have spoken on this question in my native province, when there were none but French people to listen to me, my main argument has always been this: It is not as Frenchmen that we should claim a proper place for the French language, and its official expression in all the activities of the state, it is not a mere narrow racial privilege that we ask, but a broad Canadian right, anxious as we are for the preservation of the Canadian soul, a composite one, in constant need of all the good elements and all the contributions which all races can give, but more especially the two main races that have created it.

Now with regard to the argument made by my excellent friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), of course the hon. gentleman is right in a way, and the resolution, as I read it, and would interpret it if I were a minister of the crown, would certainly include the possibility of putting at the disposal of any group of individuals all through the land public servants capable of understanding them. There must be a recognition of the situation to which the hon. member (Mr. Woodsworth) alluded. For example, in the United States they have grown wonderfully in that respect in the last twenty-five years. You can go into the Interior department, especially the Immigration branch, or into the large post offices of the United States, and there you will find expert linguists who will interpret almost any language of the world. They do it for the efficiency of their administration, but they do not acknowledge thereby that the Spanish, or the Yiddish, or the Portuguese, or the Chinese, are recognized official languages in the United States. Here we put the question on this basis: English and French are the two official languages of Canada. That cannot be denied, they are official languages. Some people may consider that one has more right than the other. In the minds of the men who made the constitution, and in my mind, they have equal rights. That is a question of degree which opens a fair door to debate. But French and English are undoubtedly the two official languages of the country, and that fact ought to be acknowledged in practice.

As regards the argument of economy, made by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Denis), I have frequented departments of state in this country for thirty years, either as a member of parliament or as a ratepayer, and I have found out exactly the same thing which the hon. gentleman has described, namely, that in many instances there are twenty employees where fifteen would do because such a large proportion of them, being incapable of responding to the needs of the French-speaking ratepayers or people who have to deal with the government, unable to answer them in their language, the service has to be duplicated.

Of course, a policy like this would have to be applied gradually and with common sense. It would not mean the exclusion of all employees who speak only English. It would not mean that possession of the two languages would be the sole or even the principal qualification. I would put the matter in this way: the first qualification for a public servant is honesty; the second is efficiency, expert competency; and the third, is the capability of dealing directly with the people of this country who have a right to be understood in their own language. It seems to me that is fair. The hon. gentleman says that there is no impediment of that kind in the province of Quebec. I can tell him that I myself have gone to the Montreal customs house and, just to find out, inquiring from one wicket to another of the customs, I have had to pass a good many before being able to get an employee who understood a word of French. In the largest French city in the world after Paris and Marseilles, the third largest French city in the world, I have myself been told by a customs officer in the Montreal post office, when I asked in French for some information—he answered me not in English, but in the American slang which is rapidly taking the place of English in this loyal British country—"Can't you talk English? Don't you know this is an English country?" I said, "Yes, sir, I can mumble a few words of English. I think I know English a little better than you do because it is the king's English I endeavour to speak; but I have a right to be understood in French." He said, "It ain't your right. Don't talk nonsense." That is the way I was answered in a public office in the city of Montreal.

Mr. HOCKEN: The hon. member would not receive such treatment in Toronto.

Mr. BOURASSA: Quite so. But reverse the situation. Supposing two-thirds of the federal employees in Toronto were unable to speak in English sufficiently to meet the requirements of the population of that city, would the hon. gentleman say that the efficiency of those employees is not greatly curtailed by the fact that they do not speak the language of the population with whom they have to deal? I repeat: all these things have to be taken, first, from a broad point of view of principle and, second, from the point of view of practical application. We should adopt the motion of the hon. member for L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Séguin) in that spirit, not with the idea that every minister should immediately set to work to put aside all those employees who speak nothing but English, but with the idea of opening the eyes and the minds of the present servants of the country, and of aspirants to the public service, in order to make them realize that French Canada is not a detached portion of this Dominion, that French Canada, or rather Canada, French in its origin, but thoroughly Canadian, is not to be kept solely and absolutely in the province of Quebec. That you cannot do; I cannot do it, nobody can—until the French-Canadians have learned that new form of American civilization, which unfortunately is spreading out in some of the English provinces, that the future of Canada is to be assured by the development of such families as are composed of a man, a woman and a pet dog. So long as the French-Canadians, thanks to that obnoxious, domineering church, and that horrible hierarchy which is so much denounced by the hon. gentleman, keep to the habit of giving to the church and state all the good children they can give, you cannot prevent the expansion of the French-Canadian. Are you going to receive them in Ontario and elsewhere as brothers, as fellow citizens, or as foreigners, as intruders? Are you going to receive them in this way, for example: some people wrote me last year from Manitoba—or Saskatchewan—that while they had been invited to go out and take up sections in the west, not being understood by the land agent of the Interior department of this government, they had to write to Ottawa to get a translation of their letter to the agent and a translation of the agent's letter to them, so that it took fifteen days for them to understand from the local agent of the Department of the Interior of this Dominion under what conditions they held their title, and so forth?

If you want to kill what remains in Quebec, though less than in the other provinces, of that sectional, provincial spirit; if you do not want to revive the spirit which existed before confederation; if you want the French-Canadians to feel as much at home in Ontario as in Quebec, you must deal with them as you would like to be dealt with. Supposing this country had been settled by the English and conquered by the French, a foreign power; supposing that French laws had been imposed upon you and that gradually, after a century of trouble, you had come to terms with a French majority. Endeavour to look upon questions of this nature from that point of view, inspired with the spirit of amity, of fair play, but especially of Canadian citizenship. Develop in the minds of all Canadians the idea that there must be concessions right and left, that there must be give and take, and that all the elements, but especially the two main elements of this country must put firmly, strongly, on the body of the Canadian nation the stamp of their peculiar genius; because the grandeur of Canada, if it can exist and develop by itself independently, I will not say separately or in enmity, but independently from the tremendous influences of the United States, will be in the measure in which will be preserved all through Canada that spirit of coöperation between French and English, in the measure in which you allow the French-Canadians and their descendants to imbibe some of your spirit, and you take some of theirs, although that may be regrettable from your point of view. Of course, at times, it would be more agreeable for us to live in a country where we would be all by ourselves, where we could enjoy fully our own institutions, speak nothing but our language, and learn a foreign language just for the pleasure of doing so. We have, however, come to realize that there is a direct benefit to us in getting from you what we lack; but more than that, we consider it is our primary duty as Canadian citizens to make it possible that the two races coöperate with each other to the grandeur and the strength of Canadian civilization. In the spirit of this resolution is to be found one method by which the government and the parliament of Canada can help us out in broadening that national spirit and making it a true Canadian spirit such as it was conceived by Macdonald and maintained as long as Macdonald lived.

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): Mr. Speaker, no person will deny for a moment that from a cultural standpoint two languages are better than one and three are better than two. The hon. member (Mr. Bourassa) said: This brings up not only a principle but the application of a principle. This resolution proposes to give preference in future appointments to Canadians knowing the two official languages. Such a resolution it is impossible for this House to accept. This House cannot put itself on record as being in accord with a resolution of that kind because by doing so we would place the English language in an inferior position to the French language in the Dominion of Canada, and it would be so regarded outside of Canada all over the world. There can be no question at all about that.

From the standpoint of efficiency, I presume that in conducting the affairs of this country, the various departments will take into consideration, when persons apply for a position, not only the French language but other languages that may dominate in that particular portion of Canada where the official is to act. It is quite conceivable to me that in certain parts of the northwest where you would have a strong German settlement, for instance, or a strong Polish settlement, it would be advisable in sending an official there to give preference among those applying for the position to the person who had a knowledge not only of the English language but of the language used in that particular locality.

That, I presume, is being done now. I am sure it is being done now, and that preference is being given, in order that the affairs of the country may be the better administered, to the French language in many parts of the country. I think we may depend very well upon the various departments to handle that matter from that point of view, and to consider the qualifications of those applying for a position, having regard to the place where the appointee is to act, and to give preference to those who can speak the kind of language or languages that are spoken there. I believe that is being done now to a very large extent. I believe it should be done in the interests of good service to the country.

But, Sir, while I think we may very well depend upon the various deputies to administer their departments along that line, that is a very different thing from passing a law saying that those people in this country who possess a knowledge of the French language as well as of the English language must and shall be given a preference over all others. That is something, I say, which this government and no other government dare place on the statute books of this country.

In regard to giving additional remuneration to such people, that argument might just as well apply to the members of this House, and a French member might demand that he be given an extra indemnity because he was able to speak fluently in French as well as in English. The thing is ridiculous. You might carry out that same principle with regard to the employees of the Canadian National Railways. The railways are owned by the country, and although its employees are not listed as civil servants, they are in a sense civil servants. Would you apply the same principle there and let it be known throughout the world that in this Dominion of Canada, a supposedly British country, employees not only of the civil service at Ottawa, but also of the Canadian National Railways, if they speak French shall be given a preference every time over a man who understands the English language only? I say that is something which it would be impossible to apply.

I am not going to attempt to take up regulation 17.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Six o'clock.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I am watching the clock, and the Speaker is in the chair. My hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) criticised the hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken) because in his judgment he was out of order in referring to regulation 17. With all due deference to the hon. member for Labelle, I thought very many times when he was going back sixty and a hundred and two hundred and three hundred and four hundred and five hundred years into history, as he always does in making a speech in this House, no matter what the subject is, that he was further out of order than the hon. member for Toronto West Centre.

Just before I move that this debate be adjourned, I want to say this: There is no desire in this country to treat those of the French race and French language harshly. For my part, I am free to say that I would like to see the English language the distinctive mark of our common citizenship in this Dominion of Canada. I say that that is something I would like to see, that all the races coming here would regard the English language as the distinctive mark of our common citizenship here in Canada.

I want to add, before moving the adjournment of the debate, this further word. I want to impress on the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite, and on no person more than on the hon. member for Labelle that, whatever he desires for the French language, the English language cannot and shall not and will not be ostracised or outlawed in any part of the Dominion of Canada.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, March 3, 1927

The House met at three o'clock.

MONTREAL, OTTAWA AND GEORGIAN BAY CANAL COMPANY

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): My hon. friend the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) the other day asked for the tabling of a certain letter sent by the Deputy Minister of Justice to the Deputy Minister of Public Works on January 17, 1925. I now lay it on the table.

WAR CHARITIES ACT

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 114, to repeal the War Charities Act, 1917.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. RINFRET: In 1917 an act was passed to regulate appeals for donations or subscriptions for the relief of persons suffering as a result of the war, and particularly returned soldiers. That act required that all such organizations should obtain a certificate from the Department of State, and make reports twice a year. A large number of organizations registered under the act, but they have gradually diminished in number and are now practically limited to the Daughters of the Empire and the Great War Veterans' Association. We find that this legislation has become obsolete because these organizations do not require such control, and therefore we propose to repeal it.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NATURALIZATION ACTS AMENDMENT

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 115, to amend the Naturalization Acts, 1914 and 1920.

He said: This bill proposes to do away with sections 19, 20, 21, 22, 23 and 24 of the Naturalization Act. These sections require the applicant to make his application before a judge or a court of justice. We propose to do away with that obligation, and return to section 2 of the act of 1914 directing the application to be made to the Secretary of State, under the conditions contained in the 1914 act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

MIRAMICHI RIVER PILOT COMMISSIONERS

Mr. HANSON:

1. What persons compose the board of pilot commissioners for the district of the Miramichi river, New Brunswick, when were they appointed and what is their remuneration?
2. Was J. W. Brankley, Esquire, of Chatham, New Brunswick, a member of the said board of pilot commissioners, and if so, when was he appointed, and when did he cease to be a member of the board?
3. Was Mr. Brankley dismissed as a member of the board; if so, when and for what reasons?

Hon. Mr. CARDIN:

Names of Commissioners—Address—

When Appointed.

1. David Ritchie, Newcastle, N.B., order in council 20th November, 1922, Leonard O'Brien, Nelson, N.B., order in council 8th March, 1924. J. Kerr Logie, Chatham, N.B., order in council 24th March, 1925, R. A. Snowball, Chatham, N.B., order in council 17th May, 1926, G. P. Burchill, Nelson, N.B., order in council 21st December, 1926. Remuneration—None.

2. J. W. Brankley, of Chatham, was appointed a member of the Miramichi board of pilot commissioners by order in council of 23rd September, 1926, and ceased to be a member on 21st December, 1926.

3. The order in council appointing Mr. J. W. Brankley a pilot commissioner was cancelled by P.C. 65/2118, dated 21st December, 1926, on the ground that the former was passed on the day previous to the resignation of the then government and after said government had sustained defeat at the polls.

BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY RATES

Mr. CHURCH:

In view of an appeal to the Governor General in Council by the municipalities or others from the recent judgment for an increase in tolls and rates by the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, effective from March 1st next, will the government under the general Railway Act postpone the coming into effect on March 1st next of the new schedule of rates pending the hearing and determination of such appeal?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE: There has been no appeal to the Governor General in Council as suggested by the question.

COAL ROYALTIES

EXPENDITURE ON NATIONAL PARKS

Mr. EVANS:

1. What revenues from royalties on coal have been received by the dominion since 1905?
2. What has been the expenditure, by years, of the dominion, for past 20 years, on so-called national parks within Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta?

Hon. Mr. STEWART:

1. $2,973,364.51.

Note:—Prior to the year 1924-1925 there were certain expenses at head office which had not been allocated to the different provinces. For the last two years these expenditures have been charged against the services in these provinces.

POSTMASTER AT GIBBON

Mr. JONES:

1. Was Edgar Finniss, postmaster of Gibbon, dismissed by the present government?
2. If so, who recommended dismissal, and why?
3. Were there any charges against the said Finniss?
4. If so, by whom were they made?
5. What was the salary of the said postmaster?

Hon. Mr. VENIOT:

1. Yes.
2. Postmaster General—in order to locate office more centrally.
3. No.
4. Answered by No. 3.
5. $60.

ADMISSION OF FARM LABOURERS

Mr. WOODSWORTH:

1. What applications, if any, have been made from the county of Wellington for permission for immigrants to enter Canada as farm labourers?
2. By whom were these applications made?
3. How many of these immigrants are now working on farms?

Hon. ROBERT FORKE:

1. Applications for the entry to Canada of immigrants are not classified by the Department of Immigration and Colonization according to counties and the information requested is not, therefore, available.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Answered by No. 1.

MUZZLING OF DOGS

Mr. BELL (St. Antoine):

1. Is the government enforcing without reserve stringent regulations for the killing of all unmuzzled dogs on the island and in the city of Montreal?
2. Has the government modified the regulations allowing owners of valuable dogs redress to recover them upon payment of a fine or penalty; and if not, is such action contemplated, and when?
3. Is a special or standardized type of dog muzzle demanded by the regulations and is a sufficient supply of the same now obtainable from the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals or other official source?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. Yes. (There were captured and killed yesterday 14 dogs. This morning up to nine o'clock, four more had been captured. Dogs are killed in the Humane Society's pound. by electricity or gas; none are killed by our men.)
2. The government has not modified its regulations in this respect as yet, but has the matter under consideration.
3. No, but an effective muzzle is required to be worn, safety wire muzzle cages fitting over dog's heads are considered the best. Such a muzzle fitting loosely over the whole head and fastening to the collar is the one we recommend.

Timothy Eaton Company handle such muzzles, and have we believe furnished them to many other vendors. This muzzle allows dogs to open their mouths and to drink water, but they cannot bite.

DISMISSAL OF POSTMASTERS—NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. JONES:

1. How many postmasters in the province of New Brunswick have been dismissed since October 1, 1926?
2. What are their names, the names of the post offices and the federal constituencies in which said post offices are located?
3. How many of said positions have been filled to date, and on whose recommendation were the appointments made?
4. Has one H. C. Ramsay of Bathurst, New Brunswick, been appointed a commissioner to investigate charges against government officials?
5. If so, upon whose recommendation was he appointed and what is the remuneration to be paid to him, (a) for services; (b) for expenses?
6. In how many cases has he made reports, who were the officials charged and who laid the charges in each case?

Hon. Mr. VENIOT:

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

CHANGES IN CUSTOMS DUTIES

Mr. PREVOST:

On what articles of any kind have customs duties been lowered since 1922, and on what articles have such duties been entirely removed since same date?

JUDGES ACT—AMENDMENT

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Judges Act, chapter 138 of the Revised Statutes, 1906, to provide:—

1. That a salary of $12,000 per annum be granted for one additional judge of the Supreme Court of Canada;

2. That on his attaining or having attained the age of seventy-five years, any judge of the Supreme Court of Canada or of the Exchequer Court of Canada may be granted an annuity equal to that which he would then have been eligible to receive if this legislation had not been passed and if he had at that time resigned his office.

3. That if the said judge be not then eligible for the grant of an annuity, and was appointed before the passing of this legislation, or if he was appointed after the passing of this legislation and has continued in office for at least ten years, he may be granted an annuity equal to two-thirds of his salary at the time he ceased to hold such office.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

BRANCH LINES CONSTRUCTION

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in measures to provide for the construction, prior to the 31st day of August, 1930, of the following Canadian National Railway branch lines:—

1. (a) From a point about three miles west of St. Felicien on the St. Felicien branch of the James' Bay and Eastern railway to a point on the Mistassini river, in the province of Quebec. Estimated mileage 27.5 miles; average expenditure per mile $53,589; estimated cost $1,463,000.

(b) Section (1). From a point near Hebertville on the Quebec and Lake St. John Railway to Ile d'Alma on the Saguenay river in the province of Quebec. Estimated mileage 9.5 miles; average expenditure per mile $56,526; estimated cost $537,000.

Section (2). From a point on Ile d'Alma on the Saguenay river to Savanne on the Peribonka river in the province of Quebec. Estimated mileage 25.0; average expenditure per mile $63,800; estimated cost $1,595,000.

Total (b). Mileage 34.5; average expenditure per mile $61,797; estimated cost $2,132,000.

The construction of these lines shall be subject to the following conditions:—

In the event of running rights being secured between near Hebertville and Ile d'Alma over the line of the Alma and Jonquiere railway, that part of the line authorized by this act between near Hebertville and Ile d'Alma shall not be constructed by the company, nor shall securities be issued or guaranteed in respect thereof.

2. From a point near Grand Mere on the Canadian Northern Quebec railway in the province of Quebec. Estimated mileage 7.9; average expenditure per mile $213,038; estimated cost $1,683,000.

3. From a point near Pilkington on the Canadian National railway to a point near Niagara Junction on the Canadian National railway in the province of Ontario. Estimated mileage 16.7; average expenditure per mile $69,700; estimated cost $1,164,000.

4. From a point near Weyburn on the Grand Trunk Pacific Saskatchewan railway to a point near Radville on the Canadian Northern railway, in the province of Saskatchewan. Estimated mileage 22.7; average expenditure per mile $25,110; estimated cost $570,000.

5. From a point near Willow Brook on the Canadian Northern railway to a point in township 27, range 9, west of the second meridian, in the province of Saskatchewan. Estimated mileage 22.0; average expenditure per mile $28,000; estimated cost $616,000.

6. From a point near Sturgis on Canadian Northern railway to a point on the Canadian Northern railway between Crooked river and Mistatim, in the province of Saskatchewan. Estimated mileage 100.0; average expenditure per mile $33,950; estimated cost $3,395,000.

7. From a point between Crooked river and Mistatim on the Canadian Northern railway to a point in township 48, ranges 11 or 12, west of second meridian, in the province of Saskatchewan. Estimated mileage 19.0; average expenditure per mile $30,000; estimated cost $570,000.

8. From a point on the Canadian Northern railway between Shell Brook and Kilwinning to a point in township 50, ranges 9 or 10, west of the third meridian, in the province of Saskatchewan. Estimated mileage 37.0; average expenditure per mile $32,432; estimated cost $1,200,000.

9. From a point at about mile 67 on the Turtleford Southeasterly branch of the Canadian National railway to a point on the Canadian Northern between Hafford and Richard in the province of Saskatchewan. Estimated mileage 35.6; average expenditure per mile $31,742; estimated cost $1,130,000.

10. From a point near Kindersley on the Canadian Northern railway to a point near Glidden on the Canadian Northern railway in the province of Saskatchewan. Estimated mileage 18.0; average expenditure per mile $35,555; estimated cost $640,000.

11. From a point near Spruce lake on the Canadian Northern railway to a point in township 53, range 25, west of the 3rd meridian, in the province of Saskatchewan. Estimated mileage 29.5; average expenditure per mile $33,559; estimated cost $990,000.

12. From a point near Hudson Bay junction on the Canadian Northern railway to a point in townships 39 or 40, range 5, west of the second meridian, in the province of Saskatchewan. Estimated mileage 32.0; average expenditure per mile $34,000; estimated cost $1,088,000.

13. From a point near Elk Point on the Canadian National railway to a point in township 55, ranges 3 or 4, west of the fourth meridian, in the province of Alberta. Estimated mileage 19.0; average expenditure per mile $39,210; estimated cost $745,000.

14. From a point near Ashmont on the Canadian Northern Western railway to a point at or near Bonnyville, in the province of Alberta. Estimated mileage 38.0; average expenditure per mile $37,237; estimated cost $1,415,000.

15. From a point near Bretona on the Canadian Northern railway to a point near Clover Bar on the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, in the province of Alberta. Estimated mileage 11.0; average expenditure per mile $29,000; estimated cost $319,000.

Motion agreed to.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT—AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the North West Territories Act, chapter 62 of the Revised Statutes, 1906, to provide that the Commissioner in Council may make ordinances for the levying of an export tax upon furs exported from the territories to any part of Canada, or to any foreign country.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REFUNDING OF FINANCIAL OBLIGATIONS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure respecting the Canadian National Railways to provide for the refunding of certain maturing financial obligations, and to issue substituted securities therefor guaranteed by the Dominion as to principal and interest, but not exceeding $20,000,000, the aggregate face value of the original securities.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I do not think the minister said that His Excellency had approved the resolution having to do with the branch line construction.

Mr. DUNNING: I must apologize. I communicated that approval to the Clerk a moment afterwards.

Motion agreed to.

PURE-BRED STOCK

DISTRIBUTION OF SIRES AMONGST BREEDERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOHN MILLAR (Qu'Appelle): Having received a telegram yesterday from a representative of the Cattle Breeders' Association I would ask the government if they have discontinued the policy of distributing sires among cattle breeders?

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): As my hon. friend knows, the federal Department of Agriculture has been under some criticism in the last few years because it has engaged in certain activities which have been looked upon as of a distinctly provincial character. As an evidence of this I might say that the first distribution of live stock was engaged in by the province of Saskatchewan as long ago as 1908. This was taken up by the adjoining prairie provinces shortly after, and in 1913 the federal Department of Agriculture began the same work and has carried it on up to the present. It has been thought advisable now to leave this field exclusively to the provinces, because it is distinctly productive work which lies within their particular prerogative, the idea being that we may engage in some new and more particularly federal work such as the question of marketing coöperative and otherwise.

PRIVILEGE—MR. EDWARDS (Frontenac)

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): As a matter of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call your attention to an error which I notice in Hansard of yesterday and which I have no doubt was quite inadvertent. Just before taking my seat I said:

I want to add, before moving the adjournment of the debate, this further word.

Then follows a very short sentence, which I concluded with these words:

I now move the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, you didn't.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): My friends sitting near me heard those words but possibly you, Mr. Speaker, did not. As I understand the rules of the House, if this matter should come up again I would be deprived of the very great pleasure of discussing it further if this is not understood.

Mr. SPEAKER: I heard the hon. gentleman when he was speaking last evening, but as it was just a minute or so beyond the allotted hour for the House rising, I did not think his motion was in order. The hon. gentleman in the course of his remarks had indicated his intention of moving the adjournment of the debate. Personally I have no objection, if the House gives unanimous consent.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that it is never six o'clock until you say so.

LABRADOR BOUNDARY DECISION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask of the acting leader of the government a question which I think is of very grave public importance. In view of the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council awarding to the Dominion of Newfoundland an immense area of the mainland of British North America which naturally forms a part of the Dominion of Canada, will this government forthwith take into its favourable consideration the acquisition by purchase from the government of Newfoundland of the territory so awarded to the Dominion of Newfoundland, so that Canadian citizens resident in that territory and their large financial investments and other interest therein may continue under the legislative and administrative jurisdiction of Canada?

Mr. POULIOT: Is that for the Bank of Montreal or the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I would not like to commit the government to any course at this early stage. The time has not yet elapsed during which unfortunate litigants have the privilege of abusing their judges, and I think the best thing to do is to wait until the text of the judgment reaches us, when it will be time enough to consider the suggestion of my hon. friend.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Perhaps, speaking ironically, it would meet the wishes of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), if the Canadian government at once mobilized and despatched the Canadian navy to the Labrador coast!

CALGARY LIVE STOCK INVESTIGATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (West Calgary): May I ask the Minister of Agriculture when we may expect a copy of the report in connection with the investigation of the Live Stock Exchange at Calgary? I have been telegraphed most urgently because it is conceived that a great injustice is being done by this report not being presented, and I should like it to be presented as soon as possible.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): In reply to a similar question in the early part of the week, I expressed the hope that I would be able to table the report before the end of the present week, and I am still of that hope. The staff is busily engaged now typing out the report.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): I would like to inquire from the government, and particularly from the Minister of Labour, whether it is the intention of the government to make any contribution, either jointly with the provinces or otherwise, to municipalities which have expended money during the winter months for the relief of unemployment within their borders.

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Minister of Labour): There have been only about two applications from the whole Dominion, from cities, asking for relief along the lines suggested by my hon. friend. I have communicated with them, and they have not insisted upon any relief being granted by this government. They will be able to cope with the situation themselves.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

The House resumed, from February 18th, consideration in committee of Bill No. 70, respecting old age pensions.—Hon. Mr. Heenan—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. HOCKEN: I would like to make a suggestion to the minister and to the government in connection with this bill which I think is well worthy of consideration. I understand that the annuity system that we have under Domnion government auspices is under the control of the Department of Labour. I am not opposed to an old age pension scheme, but it does seem to me, Sir, that if somewhat better conditions were attached to the annuity system it might be taken advantage of by many people who now do not think it is within their reach. For instance, why should we not endeavour to the utmost of our abilitiy to develop that spirit of self-help among the people of Canada? Why should we not encourage the sale of annuities, instead of placing so much stress upon old age pensions? Would it not be a reasonable policy for the government of Canada to add to the payments that are now being made to annuitants under the annuity scheme some further substantial sum, say 25 per cent? My belief is that that would make the annuities much more attractive than they are at the present time. Of course, neither this government nor any other have ever treated the annuity scheme as a serious proposition. They put the act upon the statute book and let it go at that. We cannot develop business, especially in a new line like this, unless some greater energy is applied to make the plan familiar to the people who ought to take advantage of it and give some advantages that will encourage them to purchase these annuities. I am not prepared to move anything in connection with this bill. I do not know that my proposal comes properly within the purview of the bill. I am merely throwing out the suggestion, as it seems to me I have reason to do in this connection, for the further consideration of this government, that they should make their annuities attractive, to encourage people of Canada to buy them instead of depending upon the $20 a month payment as an old age pension. Undoubtedly a great deal could have been done to increase the number of annuities purchased if greater publicity had been given to the scheme, and if further advantages had been given to those who might reasonably be expected to provide for their old age in that way. It is a form of insurance which I believe the insurance companies engage in. I think I am right when I say that the government established this annuity system before any of the companies adopted such a scheme. The companies came in afterwards, and if those companies are doing a big business they are taking it away from the government. It is a very proper thing—well, it might be described as public ownership—and it is a most advantageous system for men who have sufficient money to put away a little year by year to provide for their old age, and to maintain their self-respect as they certainly will, better than they can by taking an old age pension at the age of sixty or seventy. I hope the government and the Minister of Labour will go into this, figure it out and at the next session of parliament present some reasonable measure for the development of annuities.

Mr. HEENAN: We have already under consideration and under way an investigation on behalf of the department of the very matter which the hon. gentleman has spoken of, and I hope our annuity system will be extended so that it will do just what the hon. member proposes it should do and thus make it easier for the workers. I am trying to develop a joint contributory scheme in which employers, the provinces and the Dominion will have a part. It would bear very lightly on the shoulders of the workers, but the provinces, the Dominion and the workers would all contribute.

I do not know whether it will shorten the discussion on the bill now before us, but I may tell the House that the bill we have before us is to provide relief for those who have already reached the age of seventy. Last session the bill was defeated in the Senate. It was discussed during the last election, and I think I am safe in saying that if anything was prominently before the electors of the country the old age pension bill was. This was the bill that was before the electors at that time and we are now submitting it to you in the form in which the House and the people endorsed it. It is true the bill does not go as far as some of us might desire but no matter what proposition is offered it necessarily involves expenditure. The bill was thrown out by the Senate last year, because it entailed an expenditure of approximately $14,000,000. The suggestions which have been made are good and will be valuable for future consideration, but if adopted by the government, would mean an expenditure of between $60,000,000 and $70,000,000, and I hardly think that would be an inducement to the Senate to accept it, when they did not see their way to pass a measure which would entail a cost of $12,000,000.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): If I understood the minister correctly, he estimated that it would cost the Dominion treasury about $14,000,000.

Mr. HEENAN: About $12,000,000.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Will the minister please explain just how it is going to cost $60,000,000 if the Dominion bears the whole expense?

Mr. HEENAN: I do not think the hon. member understood what I said. The suggestions were to make it a purely federal bill, to reduce the age from seventy to sixty-five, and to give the pensioners a dollar a day or $365 a year, instead of $240. I said that if those suggestions were acepted by the government the bill would entail an expenditure of between $60,000,000 and $70,000,000 roughly calculated. I would ask the House to accept this measure, get it on the statute book, and then we can amend it as we see fit, in the light of our experience.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Has the minister made any calculation as to how much it will cost the provinces if this measure goes through? He states that $12,000,000 would be the approximate cost to the Dominion treasury. How much would it cost the provinces?

Mr. HEENAN: The same amount.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Hardly the same amount, because section 3 speaks of fifty per cent of the net cost. Who is providing the machinery? If it only costs the Dominion half of the net cost to the provinces, then manifestly it will cost the provinces much more than it will cost the Dominion.

Mr. HEENAN: We have taken that into consideration, and almost every province in the Dominion has some kind of social service work, such as workmen's compensation board, or mothers' allowance board, and this measure can be readily administered through those boards without any extra cost—probably the cost of one or two clerks. A bill has been introduced in the legislature of British Columbia which will give power to the Workmen's Compensation Board to administer the Old Age Pension Act, and it will not cost them anything additional.

Mr. ERNST: What I have to say perhaps would more properly come under the next section of the bill, but I will make my statement now, in view of the remarks of the minister. The reason he has given to the House for not going into a detailed consideration of the clauses of the bill is that it was before the electors at the last election. Doubtless most of us in this House are well aware that it was before the electors, but I believe in some quarters, amongst those who supported the bill last year, there has been a change of heart or a change of opinion. For instance, we have in Nova Scotia the Halifax Chronicle, the chief Liberal organ of the province. During the federal election the Halifax Chronicle extolled the old age pension bill as presented to parliament during last session, but I hold in my hand an editorial which appeared in the Halifax Chronicle, February 18, of this year, which reads as follows:

> While strongly favoring old age pensions, the Chronicle believes, for reasons set forth in previous articles, that the federal government would do well, in dealing with the old age pensions bill, to arrange itself to make the necessary provision for the payment of the pensions. Having in its possession the principal sources of revenue in Canada and having initiated the old age pensions scheme, it would seem to be the duty and privilege of the Dominion government to provide ways and means for carrying that worthy measure into effect.
> Most of the provinces are short of revenue. In fact, it may be impossible for some of them to respond to the terms of the present bill. Nova Scotia with a deficit of more than one million dollars might find it difficult to assume additional burdens. In this circumstance, then, it would seem only fair that in promoting the purpose of the measure, the federal government should also see to it that it provides the necessary money to carry on the work. It is submitted that if any province had passed such a bill, contingent upon the federal government providing half the funds, it would probably be considered inappropriate and ineffective if not offensive. The present bill of the federal government is in much the same category.

I draw that to the attention of the House, Mr. Chairman, in view of the remarks of the minister that the bill was before the electors at the last election.

I endorse the statements made by the member for Cumberland (Mr. Smith) when he spoke on the measure in committee two weeks ago. As far as Nova Scotia is concerned, it would not come into effect for many years. As the minister knows, this year the province has a deficit of $855,000. It is in the unhappy position of having had a great many of its young men emigrate, and there is probably a larger proportion of old people in Nova Scotia than in any other province. Taking what I believe to be a typical district in my own constituency, I reckon that one person in forty would come under the provisions of this bill. True, the majority of them have property, but they would be eligible for pensions. On that basis it would cost the province approximately $1,500,000 a year as its proportion of the pension fund. With the deficit of $800,000 facing it now, it would be impossible for Nova Scotia to put the measure into effect. I think the same applies to several of the other provinces.

I believe in the principle of old age pensions, but I do not believe in the present bill. It is nothing more than a political gesture and will never give pensions to our old people.

Mr. ADSHEAD: What do you do now with your old people, let them starve?

Mr. ERNST: We have poorhouses maintained by the municipalities. It has been pointed out that the bill would enable the municipalities to do away with their poorhouses, but I believe this to be a fallacy, because many of the inmates are under seventy years of age and feeble-minded. In neither case would the bill provide for those people.

Mr. ARTHURS: Mr. Chairman, last session when a similar bill was before the House I spoke strongly in favour of its principle. I am still in favour of the principle of old age pensions, but in this proposed legislation I see many manifest injustices to the provinces. On the introduction of the resolution preceding the bill the minister was questioned as to how many of the provinces had agreed to the principle. I think he said one. So only one of the nine provinces has agreed to coöperate in this legislation. In Ontario we have somewhat similar legislation in the Mothers' Pensions Act; and it has worked very satisfactorily. That work has been undertaken entirely by the province, and if it is deemed necessary to look after our people who are over seventy years of age, I believe Ontario will be equally willing and able to take care of them. In my own riding the position is pretty much the same as that described by the hon. member who has just sat down (Mr. Ernst). We have a home which is well sustained and very satisfactorily carried on to take care of old indigent people, and I do not think that the majority of my constituents would be in favour of this legislation.

In my view the bill is unworkable in some particulars. For instance, under section 10 if a pensioner moves from one province to another the province from which he is receiving his pension is entitled to recover from the other province a proportionate amount of that pension. But how is it possible to recover if the other province has taken no steps to put this proposed legislation into effect? Section 11 is also objectionable.

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, I am in favour of the principle of old age pensions, but I believe the Dominion government should bear the total cost. We have had several instances along this line. It will be remembered that the Dominion government provided $20,000,000 to assist the provinces to build good roads, but I think if the expenditure were scrutinized it would be found that an undue proportion of it represented administration costs. The same is true, I believe, in regard to technichal education. We have made a federal grant of $1,000,000 a year—

Mr. HEENAN: A little more.

Mr. ARTHURS: —and probably up to the present time only one of the provinces has taken advantage of that grant, but the act has to be administered and the cost of administration is entirely disproportionate to the amount of the grant. I think the same condition would apply in this case. I believe every member in this House is in favour of the principle of the bill, whether he sits on the right or the left of the Speaker; but we differ as to the manner in which it should be applied. Speaking for myself, I am entirely in favour of the Dominion either assuming the whole liability or leaving the matter alone.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, both last session and this I have listened to a discussion of the "principle" of this bill. It seems to me to be a bill without principle. The bill is a sorry political gesture, made for the purpose of creating confusion in the minds of those who would be entitled to pensions, those who are promoting the bill knowing full well that under existing conditions it is utterly impossible to carry the proposed legislation into effect throughout the Dominion. There is very strong ground why the government should take into consideration the necessities of those who are unable by reason of age to earn an ordinary living. But the same principle that applies to those who would be entitled to pensions by reason of old age applies to those who by reason of any physical or mental infirmity are deprived of the capacity of earning a living and have no private revenue for their support. During my last election contest in the city of Montreal it was not the question of old age pensions that caused me difficulty; it was certain promises made by the Prime Minister of this country (Mr. Mackenzie King) to a delegation, partly from my constituency, to the effect that all those who suffer from blindness would this year receive by federal measure relief on the scale suggested in this bill for old age pensions. In fact, so confident are some of those people who were led to vote for my opponent on that occasion, by reason of the promises made by the Prime Minister to that delegation, that I hold in my hand a letter dated February 10 of this year written by Philip E. Layton, president of the Canadian Federation of the Blind, in which he asks me, confident in his belief that this remedial measure will be introduced at this session, to give my support in its favour when the bill comes before the House.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does Mr. Layton in that correspondence suggest that the Prime Minister made the promise which the hon. gentleman has mentioned?

Mr. CAHAN: Let me read the letter:

Mr. C. H. CAHAN,
Parliament Buildings,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Sir:

Premier Mackenzie King on June 22, 1926,—

Note the date.

—received at Ottawa a delegation of 100 blind persons from all over the Dominion, who presented to him a petition asking that pensions be given by the government to the blind. . . . Premier King on receiving the petition kindly stated that he would be pleased to sponsor a bill for state aid for the blind at the next session of parliament. I am instructed by the council of the Canadian Federation of the Blind to ask if you will kindly give your support to this bill when it comes up in the legislature.

Mr. NEILL: I rise to a point of order. I do not wish to interrupt the thread of the hon. gentleman's remarks, and for that reason I have kept silent hitherto. But as he himself has said, he is discussing the principle of this bill and I would direct the attention of the Chair to the rule that the principle shall not be discussed in committee, but merely the particular section of the bill under consideration. With no ill-will to the hon. member, and with no desire to cut off his line of thought, which of course should have been given to us on the second reading or during the discussion of the resolution, I submit that this is not the time and place to go into a general and wide consideration of the principle of the bill. If we do so we shall never get anywhere. I would ask for the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. CAHAN: It has been frequently stated in this House in my hearing by the leader of the House that in order to avoid any lengthy discussion on the second reading of a bill hon. members might reserve their remarks for the committee stage, when the utmost liberty would be given.

Mr. NEILL: To discuss the details.

Mr. CAHAN: I was not discussing the principle but the utter lack of principle of the bill, and the unprincipled ground on which the legislation is being promoted. This objection will simply prolong discussion. We are facilitating the passage of the legislation and it is convenient that I should have five minutes now in which to state my position, rather than take five hours to state it later on. The bill has not received the consideration from the department which it should have been given. It should be a federal measure, because this parliament has no control over the provinces. This parliament is well advised that the provinces of Canada will not accept the measure in the terms in which it is now before the House, and the Prime Minister has promised a special measure for those who are suffering from blindness. For these reasons the bill should in my opinion be withdrawn to allow the government ample time to consider it in all its bearings. Thereafter the government could submit a measure of wider application, carrying out on the one hand the Prime Minister's promise to the delegation which approached him in June last, and, on the other, making due provision for those who are suffering from other physical or mental deficiency or infirmity which prevents them from earning a living. With regard to those who are now in a position to earn a living and who have an income, I think that such a general bill should provide that those, under the pension age, in that position, should contribute an amount, however small, towards the pension which they would be entitled to receive later in life. There is no objection anywhere in the country, on the part of those wage earners who are likely to participate in the pension provisions of a bill of this character, to making a modest contribution during those years in which they are earning a revenue, while there is a persistent opposition throughout the length and breadth of the country to the adoption of anything approaching the dole system, which has proved so disastrous in some other countries. I suggest therefore that the government should carry out its pledge to the blind delegation or withdraw this bill. We have ample time now for sober reflection, as we are not now on the eve of a general election. The government at a subsequent session could bring down a bill more thoroughly considered, more complete in its terms and one which would meet with the general approbation of the whole country and at the same time provide a basis for contributions, however small, from the wage earners towards paying the pensions to which they would subsequently become entitled if through infirmity of mind or body they should find it impossible to earn a living.

The CHAIRMAN: Rule 13, section (5), reads:

> Speeches in committee of the whole must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

I must rule in accordance with this provision that general remarks under the section now being discussed are not relevant.

Mr. ERNST: The minister opened the discussion.

Mr. HEENAN: So far as the government is concerned we have no desire to curtail discussion on any question relating to this bill. We did say that we would allow the fullest opportunity for its consideration in committee, but of course, we cannot prevent any hon. member from appealing to the Chair on a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN: It would expedite the passage of the bill if the committee would adopt section 2 and proceed to the clause relating to agreements with the provinces.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: Have any conferences been held with the premiers of the different provinces regarding this legislation?

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member would allow section 2 to pass his remarks will be relevant to section 3. Shall section 2 carry?

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Before section 2 is carried I point out to the minister that subsection (d) of the section reads:

> "Province" includes the Yukon territory, in respect to which "commisioner" shall be read for "Lieutenant Governor in Council".

There is no such official in the Yukon as commissioner as the word "commissioner" is used here; that position was abolished as long ago as 1918. Although the bill for many other reasons is not practicable but is unworkable, and will in all human probability never be put into force in the Yukon territory, and probably not in any of the provinces, for the reason alone which I have mentioned it would not be workable in Yukon, and the minister will have to find some other wording for the subsection than it contains now if he is going to make the law applicable to and workable in the Yukon territory.

Mr. HEENAN: My advice from the law department is that the term "commissioner" is quite correct and that it will not interfere with the proper working of the bill. If I remember aright the hon. member raised the same question last year, but since then the law department has advised me that the term is perfectly proper and that Yukon will be able to come in under the bill.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I can only say to the minister that I have warned him and although I do not think the effect will be very disastrous if he proceeds—because as I said before the bill in all probability will never be applied in that territory and therefore it does not matter how it is worded—yet in the first place to be of any use to the people up there a larger pension should be provided and the entire responsibility should be assumed by the federal government, because the local government in Yukon is in no position at all to carry out the requirements of this bill.

Mr. IRVINE: Is the government absolutely adamantine in regard to this bill? Is there no possibility of their considering a federal scheme?

Mr. HEENAN: I thought I had made it perfectly plain on two occasions that the government would like the House and particularly the labour men to accept this bill. We have had other legislation such as pension bills and mothers' allowance bills, and they have never been one hundred per cent perfect when enacted, but they have been amended afterwards in the light of experience. I think I have said enough without directly answering my hon. friend's question.

Mr. IRVINE: The point I have in mind is that when the principle of this bill was discussed I understood that the Alberta government fully intended to pass legislation complying with the federal bill, but since that time I understand the Alberta legislature has voted against the resolution asking the local government to pass enabling legislation. I should like to see the old people in my province get some relief under an old age pension bill, but if we can gather anything from the resolution passed by the Alberta legislature a few days ago the present proposal will bring nothing to that province.

Now a lot has been said about what the people expected from old age pensions during the last election. We are all aware that the people want old age pensions, but they did not know what kind of a bill was being talked about. They want an old age pension and they want it now, but I venture to say the present bill will not receive the endorsation of the people of Canada. I am not opposing the government in this matter, but I would insist that they give this bill reconsideration in view of the difficulties that seem to present themselves in carrying it out; and in view of the fact that the entire House is in sympathy with the government in introducing old age pensions, and is willing to support a proper scheme, I cannot for the life of me see why they should not reconsider the proposal.

Mr. ADSHEAD: The hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) has spoken of the resolution before the Alberta legislature on the subject of old age pensions. I hold in my hand an extract from a speech made by Premier Brownlee, and while it is true the legislature voted down the resolution, at the same time Premier Brownlee corrected Mr. White, one of the members for Calgary, with respect to some statements he had made, adding simply that they were not entirely satisfied with the proposed fifty-fifty arrangement provided for in the bill. He pointed out, however, that the bill had not passed the federal parliament, and they hoped to do some further bargaining by which the federal government would assume a little larger share of the cost than was involved under the fifty-fifty arrangement. So that the resolution failed to pass, I take it, in consequence of the representations of the Alberta government that there would be further negotiations in order to see if some better arrangement could not be arrived at. The attitude of the labour members of the legislature was not entirely antagonistic although they expressed themselves as not quite satisfied with the bill. For example Mr. White, to whom I have already referred said he was not quite satisfied with the bill. He believed that the age limit should be below seventy years. While the labour men in parliament asked the federal government to assume full responsibility, they would accept the present bill. The local member also said that amending legislation could be enacted from time to time, and he asked why the aged should be deprived of assistance because the local authorities could not get all their own way at this time. Mr. Parkyn member of the legislature for Calgary supported the view that half a loaf was better than no bread and the bill ought to be sustained. Mr. Smeaton, member of the legislature from Lethbridge, asked the legislature to commit itself to the enactment of the necessary legislation in Alberta as soon as the old age pensions bill passed parliament. Mr. Christopher, a member from the Crowsnest pass mining district, said that the federal government would put up $10 out of every $20 paid. In this connection he used rather peculiar language for he said "it would mean a large sum coming to the province and should not be sneezed at."

I just want to say a word or two with respect to the remarks of one of the members from Toronto. The hon. member in question referred to annuities, and said that everybody should, during his wage-earning period, lay aside sufficient out of his meagre earnings in order to provide for his old age. That is a very good principle and I only wish it could be carried out in its entirety. But in looking through the estimates I find that judges who receive salaries ranging from $5,000 to $8,000 are retired with an annual pension of $5,000 or $6,000. I have not learned that these gentlemen have made any particular provision for their old age during their tenure on the bench, but I am quite sure of the fact that they are just as well able to lay aside something out of their "meagre earnings," to use the language of my hon. friend, as a workingman who receives only from 50 cents to 75 cents an hour. I am not objecting to the learned judges being given pensions because they deserve well of their country and have served it faithfully. Military men who have served their country well with the sword have also received pensions without any inference being made that they should have saved money out of their meagre salaries to provide for their old age. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, just as emphatically as I can, that the man who serves his country with his spade is equally entitled to a pension without having it said that he should have saved something for his old age. I hope the House will pass this bill now, and if it needs some amendments in the future that can be done.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: I think hon. members on both sides of the House are in favour of this principle, but I think they would be better satisfied if the government would say whether the provinces have been consulted. We are laying a burden on the shoulders of the different provinces; they will be compelled to pay 50 per cent of the cost of operating this measure. If the government could tell us that after consultation the provinces are in favour of taking the responsibility of this measure I think hon. members would be satisfied.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The principle of old age pensions is right and good, but the principle of this parliament obliging provincial governments to add to their expenditures is wrong.

Mr. CANNON: We are not doing that.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): That is absolutely what the government are doing. You are placing the provinces in this position, that without any say on their part with regard to the terms of this bill they must pay half the cost and furnish the machinery for putting the act into operation or run the risk of being labelled as opposed to the principle of old age pensions. But perhaps that may be better discussed under another clause.

I rose to call the attention of the minister to the fact that in section 2 provision is made for the application of the act to the Yukon, but as the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black) has pointed out, there is no such person as a commissioner there. The minister has not attempted to get over that difficulty at all, so I would suggest that we finish section 2 before we proceed to the next part. What does the minister propose to do in this case? He gave no answer to the hon. member for Yukon. Does he propose to create a commissioner there at a certain salary, and to send a man from Ottawa or some other place to that part of the country? Why pass this section when, as it now stands, the act cannot be put into operation in the Yukon?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Might I say in answer to my hon. friend that the clause as it now stands was drafted by an officer of the department who came from the western provinces originally, where he was a very distinguished member of the profession. A similar objection was voiced last year and this gentleman gave it as his opinion that the clause as then drafted and as it now appears in this bill would meet the requirements of the Yukon.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Is there such an officer as commissioner in the Yukon? Of course if there is, that would meet the case, but if there is not manifestly something must be done in order to make this section workable. I do not care how close this distinguished gentleman lived to the Yukon; the whole thing is whether or not such an officer is there.

Mr. HEENAN: I would ask that section 2 stand for the time being, and I hope to have an answer in a few moments.

Section stands.

On section 3—Agreements with provinces.

Mr. HEAPS: I regard this clause as containing the crux of the whole bill, because herein it is stated that one-half the necessary funds must be paid by the provinces which come under the act. I contended last year and I take the same position again that the contribution from the federal exchequer should be considerably greater than 50 per cent. I am inclined to believe that if this act becomes law certain provinces will not take advantage of its provisions because they are being asked to bear too great a burden of the cost. It is all very well for the Minister of Labour to ask us to pass the bill as it is, but I think every member of this House has a responsibility both to himself and to his constituents, and in this case the government also has a responsibility. The impression has been created throughout the country that when this act becomes effective the old people of Canada will be entitled to a pension of $20 per month, but if the scheme goes into effect as it now appears probably the majority of the provinces will not take advantage of the bill and many of our old people will suffer a very cruel disappointment. I want to obviate that if possible, and one way in which that can be done is to impress upon the government the necessity of making a larger contribution so that none of the provinces will have any excuse for not coming under the provisions of the act. I think it no excuse to say that the bill may be passed at this session and then, if it does not work, it may be amended next session as may be necessary, because I think that pre-supposes that the provinces will not come under its provisions. I would far rather make one bite of the cherry than two.

Mr. HEENAN: If the hon. member is referring to myself, he is not interpreting my words correctly. I said that we could get the principle established and amend the bill in the future in the light of our experience.

Mr. HEAPS: That bears out the statement I made. If the provinces do not take advantage of its provisions we may have to come here next year and make some amendments to the bill. I do not want that to be necessary; I believe that we should pass the bill this year and see that it becomes operative in all the provinces without waiting for further amendments. I do not want to see the old people who I know expect this bill to be passed disappointed now, because that would also mean that every member of the House would have to make some sort of an excuse for having put a bill into effect which does not provide those old age pensions which the people have been led to expect. There is a tremendous difference between 1926 and 1927, due to the fact that in the meantime we have had a general election. Last year the very principle of the bill met with a certain amount of opposition, and there was some doubt expressed by members of this House as to whether the country would accept an old age pension scheme. These doubts have now been completely swept away, and to-day the principle of old age pension has been accepted by all parties in this House as well as by all shades of opinion throughout the Dominion. I think under those circumstances the government, which may have felt doubtful last year, can afford to be a little more generous. If they contributed three-quarters of the amount, say seventy-five per cent, it would add at the very most $6,000,000 per year to the annual expenditure by the Dominion of Canada. I think the government might very easily have foregone the reduction of ten per cent in the income tax this year, and provided for a federal contribution of seventy-five per cent towards the scheme, in order to make sure that the act shall become operative in all parts of the Dominion.

I would suggest that the government allow this measure to be shaped by the House itself, and let the House assume full responsibility. Let us get away from that custom which we very often follow in this House of the government assuming full responsibility. It is all very well for the government to assume full responsibility under certain circumstances, but in a measure of this kind, where the House can arrive at a certain degree of unanimity, I would like the House to be allowed to vote on this question of a seventy-five per cent contribution by the government. I do not know, Mr. Chairman, whether you can accept an amendment if I move it, providing for increasing the contribution by the federal government from fifty to seventy-five per cent. I am inclined to think it would be out of order, but I do not know that the House ought not to be divided on this particular question. I think there are quite a large number of members sitting on the opposite side of the House who would favour a larger contribution from the federal exchequer, so that they may be sure that the bill will become operative in their own province. Just now we are discussing this question as to the respective shares of responsibility that the provinces and the Dominion shall assume, and I am trying to impress upon the House that the government ought to assume at least seventy-five per cent of the cost of this measure, because although it says in the act that the provinces shall assume fifty per cent of the cost of the pensions, in addition to that they have to assume the full cost of administration of the measure. I do not know exactly what that is going to mean, but it will be a considerable sum per year in some of the provinces where they have not machinery of a similar character in regard to other social legislation.

The Minister of Labour has referred to other schemes that are in operation, such as the Workmen's Compensation Act and mothers' allowances, but those measures afford absolutely no parallel to the measure before us at the present time. They are entirely provincial measures, and are not affected by any action of this House. But this is a case where we believe that the federal government should enact legislation to give assistance to the aged people in this country, and consequently the reference of the minister as to the similarity between this legislation and legislation in regard to mothers' allowances and workmen's compensation does not apply. I am going to ask the Minister of Labour or the government if they will be good enough to tell the House what objection they have to contributing seventy-five per cent towards the cost of this old age pension scheme.

Mr. PECK: I fully agree with the principle of this measure. The old people of this country who are unable to earn a living for themselves are entitled to full consideration from the people of this Dominion. The same principle applies, of course, to all people who are helpless and unable to make a living for themselves. We apply this principle in giving assistance to widows and children, and in the Workmen's Compensation Act, and particularly should we consider the old people who have served their country in one way and another and are now unable to support themselves. I am glad, therefore, to find that the House is so largely in accord with the principle of this bill.

I regret that the government should not have seen fit to contribute a larger sum than fifty per cent towards the operation of this measure. I am not prepared to quarrel with the view that perhaps it would be better to leave the administration of this scheme to the provinces, because that might lend itself to economy and greater care in the distribution of the money, and on that account perhaps some contribution should be made by the provinces; but for this parliament to offer to contribute only fifty per cent seems to me unreasonable. It would certainly not be sufficient to ensure that the provinces would adopt the necessary legislation to give effect to this principle we all accept. I fully agree with the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) that the federal government should contribute at least seventy-five per cent towards the cost of these pensions. I for one am not satisfied to see the bill go through in its present form, but if the House sees fit to pass it in its present form, I shall accept it, because I accept the principle. I would like to see the House left free to determine whether or not we should contribute at least seventy-five per cent, and I think before this bill finally passes a resolution should be introduced dividing the House on that question, with a view to making the measure acceptable to the provinces. If the provinces cannot be persuaded to accept the contributions provided for here, and I do not think they can, the act is going to remain a dead letter, and the poor people of this country, of whom there are many in my constituency looking for relief in this direction, are going to be bitterly disappointed. I therefore trust that the government will see its way clear to increasing the amount substantially in order that the measure may become operative in all the provinces.

Mr. LADNER: In line with the suggestion that the federal contribution should be seventy-five per cent, I move, Mr. Chairman, and I do not think this is an infringement of the rules at all, that the words "three-quarters" be substituted for the words "one-half", in line 22. I make the point that this clause is simply giving authority to the Governor in Council to enter into an agreement. The government are not obliged to make the agreement; it is optional, and likewise they are not obliged to make an agreement providing for the proportion set out in this clause.

Mr. IRVINE: I do not know whether the hon. gentleman wants a seconder for his motion, but if he does, I shall be very glad to second it. I, of course, would rather see the Dominion government assume the whole responsibility, but if they will not do that, I would like to see them go as near as possible to it, with the sole object in view of making the act operative and ensuring its adoption in every province.

The argument of the hon. member for East Calgary as to what the provincial legislature had done was not a very convincing argument why this bill should not be altered. The argument he quoted was advanced in the provincial legislature, and if I were a member of that legislature, presumably I would be putting up the very same argument, but being here, where we have a chance of making the bill really operative, it is admissible to try and persuade the government to assume a greater share of financial responsibility. While it is true that as a rule it is better to have half a loaf than no bread, this is a case where the provinces may pay for the whole loaf and get no bread at all, for either this bill will increase the expenditure to the provinces, or it will compel the provinces to pay without receiving anything at all providing they do not adopt the act, or else we are passing a bill which will do nothing at all. One of these three things we are doing. I would very much rather see the government adopt the whole responsibility, but in view of the decision of the government not to do that, I would urge them to adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for North Winnipeg and increase the federal share by twenty-five per cent. I have therefore very much pleasure in supporting the motion of my hon. friend for South Vancouver.

Mr. McPHERSON: I regret that the hon. member for Vancouver South made that motion. It might be dangerous to make such a motion, however, when the result sought might be attained in another way without any risk of infringing on the rules of the House. If it is the purpose of the House to increase the amount of the federal grant, I would like to see the matter left in abeyance just now.

Mr. BROWN: With reference to the point of order, does the Chairman rule that this motion is in order?

The CHAIRMAN: Referring to May's Parliamentary Practice, thirteenth edition, page 544, I find the following:

> No augmentation of a tax or duty asked by the crown, as has already been explained (page 511), can be proposed to the committee, nor tax imposed, save upon the motion of a minister of the crown.

Therefore I rule that the amendment moved by the hon. member is not in order.

Mr. LADNER: Before you give a ruling, Mr. Charman, I think it is usual to have some discussion.

The CHAIRMAN: Beauchesne, page 43, rule 170, says:

> The committee of supply cannot increase a grant which has been recommended by a message from the Governor General. It is also irregular to increase any item in a resolution. But any motion to reduce a grant will be always in order.

Mr. LADNER: The point I wish to make, as a reason for introducing the amendment, is that this clause is merely permissive, that the governor general in council may enter into an agreement. It is not a tax or a grant of money. It does not become such until the agreement is entered into, and the governor general in council is not obligated by the statute. Although the applicant may fulfil all the conditions required to obtain a pension, the governor in council is not obligated by the statute to enter into the agreement.

Mr. CANNON: Well, we are. That is the point. We are not legislating for the lieutenant governor, we are legislating for ourselves. It is permissible for the lieutenant governor to accept or reject the proposition. The governor in council may enter into an agreement with any province. The point of order as put forth in my hon. friend's argument is very ingenious. It is true the word "may" occurs in the first line of clause 3. The clause reads as follows:

> The governor in council may make an agreement with the lieutenant-governor in council of any province for the payment to such province quarterly of an amount equal to one-half of the net sum paid out during the preceding quarter by such province for pensions.

And so on. The word "may" applies to the agreement; that is the will of the province to enter into an agreement, but the moment the province expresses its willingness to enter into an agreement, then this government is bound to pay. as provided in clause 3

Mr. LADNER: May I ask my hon. friend, how could it become a tax or imposition until a contract is made?

Mr. CANNON: There is no doubt about that. My hon. friend is perfectly right. We are not going to be bound to pay anything unless an agreement is entered into. The clause says "whenever an agreement is entered into;" otherwise we would not need any clause. As long as there is no agreement there is nothing for us to do. We are legislating now as to what will happen the moment the agreement is entered into, and the government suggests that after an agreement is entered into our liability or obligation will be to the extent of fifty per cent. The amendment proposes that it shall be seventy-five per cent. There is no doubt it is increasing our financial obligations, and, as the Chairman pointed out, it is out of order.

Mr. LADNER: Will my hon. friend relate the rule to this particular clause? The rule clearly is one that relates to a specific grant or tax. That is the statute creating it in itself creates the obligation. The statute creating this provision does not create the obligation, and to that extent I make the distinction between this case and the one contemplated by the rule. This clause is a permissive clause, permitting the government to enter into an agreement, the details of which are not even contained in it. Until the government enters into the agreement there is no tax or obligation.

Mr. CANNON: There is no doubt this parliament has no authority to force any province into this scheme.

Mr. ARTHURS: Or to make payment.

Mr. CANNON: Or to force the provinces to make payment. There is no doubt about that, but clause 3 which is now under consideration meets that situation exactly. In view of the fact that we cannot force the provinces into an agreement, we say the governor in council may enter into an agreement with the lieutenant governor of any province. We cannot say that he will, because we cannot force the provinces to make the agreement. There cannot be coercion. It can only be permissive.

Mr. ARTHURS: What does the word "may" mean?

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend says this legislation is simply legislation to allow for something that might happen; but the second factor of the clause is not to be lost sight of, and that relates to what happens after the agreement is entered into.

Mr. LADNER: Does the rule contemplate such a case as this?

Mr. CANNON: If the agreement is entered into the clause becomes applicable. Otherwise why should we have any clause?

Mr. BOYS: I rise to a point of order. This discussion is out of order. The decision of the Chair has been given and the only remedy now is to appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CANNON: The Chairman gave a decision and I understood he withdrew this decision to give my hon. friend the right to speak, I have the same privilege as my hon. friend from Vancouver South and if he admits a decision has been given, all right.

Mr. BOYS: I am appealing to you, Mr. Chairman. You gave your decision and the only relief is to accept the decision or to appeal from it.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman is perfectly right. I gave my decision and this discussion is out of order.

Mr. ARTHURS: I move that this clause be changed, that the Dominion accept one hundred per cent responsibility for the obligations under this act and that the expenditure be not more than $12,000,000 for the present year, the amount stated by the minister.

Mr. McGIBBON: I have much pleasure in seconding the motion. I desire to point out, as I said a year ago, that I am in favour of the principle of the bill—

The CHAIRMAN: I rule that the motion of the hon. member for Parry Sound is out of order for the reasons I have given.

Mr. ARTHURS: The minister stated that His Excellency had been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, and he also stated that $12,000,000 would be required. My motion is that the Dominion accept full responsibility for the $12,000,000. There is no increase—

Mr. CANNON: I understand the Chairman has given his decision.

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. McQUARRIE: While I do not propose to discuss your decision, Mr. Chairman, I may say that it is quite contrary to the view held by a very high authority, namely, the Premier of British Columbia, who criticised us very severely on the hustings because we had not put forward such amendments when the bill was in committee.

The minister has stated that this bill was endorsed by the electors. I do not think he is correct. Speaking for my own province, there was not a single constituency where this particular bill was approved. It is true that the principle of old age pensions met with approval; I do not contend to the contrary; I suppose that is true of the whole Dominion. However, so far as British Columbia is concerned, the people did not endorse the present proposal.

Mr. MILLAR: In what form did they show approval or disapproval?

Mr. McQUARRIE: I take it that my statement is justified by the electoral results in British Columbia. I attended a great many meetings where this bill came up for discussion, and the audience made it very clear that they did not approve of it at all. in fact at many meetings where the question was asked, is there any one present who is in favour of the old age pensions bill which was proposed at the last session of parliament, not one person stood up to say that he or she approved of it.

Mr. HEENAN: But, Mr. Chairman, let me point out to the hon. member that the legislature of British Columbia has accepted this bill.

Mr. McQUARRIE: And the premier of that province is the same hon. gentleman who criticised us for not moving amendments to the bill last session! As a matter of fact I think it is no secret that he hastened to bring in the bill because he expects an election very shortly.

Mr. HEENAN: If every other province takes the same course on the eve of an election, won't we soon have old age pensions throughout the Dominion?

Mr. McQUARRIE: I remember a few evenings ago the Minister of Railways when asked about his province stated that it would be very wrong for any legislature to bring in such a bill before parliament enacted this legislation. I understand from the minister that the government anticipates this bill will be adopted by all the provinces. The minister nods his head in approval. If that is so, it is quite clear that the government expects to pay 50 per cent of the cost of old age pensions, and if we pass this bill we admit our responsibility to that extent, which will mean about $12,000,000 annually. It may be that all the provinces will not come into the scheme, in which event the Dominion government will be contributing to some of the provinces towards old age pensions while to others it will not pay anything. Now, while I am entirely in favour of the Dominion assuming the whole responsibility,—

Mr. ARTHURS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McQUARRIE: —that is, paying 100 per cent, as suggested by my hon. leader, I feel that in any event we should live up to our responsibilities and in this bill, instead of stipulating for the making of agreements with the provinces, we should provide for the payment of 50 per cent. I regret very much that the minister has intimated that he will not consider any amendments to the present bill. I think the minister himself admits that the bill is not perfect.

Mr. HEENAN: That is right.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Well, how can it be improved if he will not accept suggestions, even from his own supporters? As I say, I am in favour of the Dominion government paying 100 per cent of the cost of the old age pensions; but if that is not done, let us provide in this bill for the payment of 50 per cent to all the provinces so that the old people throughout the country will at least receive ten dollars a month.

Mr. McGIBBON: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say, as I have said before, that I am in favour of the principle of paying proper old age pensions. I wish to say also that I am not in favour of this bill, I never was and I do not ever expect to be, as long as it remains in its present form, for the following reasons: In the first place, I claim that in this or any other country those who are responsible for collecting the revenue are responsible for spending it; in the second place, I claim that we have no right to pass on obligations to the provinces without consulting them; in the third place, I say we have no right to enact legislation which we know beforehand, and which it is quite evident on the face of it, is going to be a great disappointment to the people of Canada. There is no question about that. Under this bill some old people will get nothing unless their province comes into the scheme—that is inevitable; others possibly may get $20 a month, which of itself is insufficient. Then there will be that great disparity all the way from twenty to nothing, or from nothing to twenty. This is bound to create dissatisfaction and animosity between people living in the same province.

I think, Sir, we are to-day paying dearly for the lack of foresight on the part of this government in not calling the provincial premiers together and agreeing on some scheme before introducing this bill. It is quite evident to any man who reads the newspapers that the provinces are holding back, and will continue to hold back, leaving the full responsibility on this parliament and the country generally. In view of the Solicitor General's statement a while ago that this proposal is not being forced on the provinces, I would ask the minister how he is going to apply sections 10, 11 and 12. This defect in the bill of itself will put unequal obligations on the provinces. I think the bill has been ill conceived and ill drafted, and if it goes into effect its application will be unfair.

I would say to the minister that as he has passed through an election, and probably there is not another in sight for three or four years, this bill should be withdrawn in order that it may be reconsidered and redrafted, and that in the meantime he should get in touch with the provincial premiers with a view to coming to some common agreement whereby this parliament and the provincial legislatures could pass legislation which at least would be workable. I look upon this measure, Sir, with considerable anxiety. The old people of this country are undoubtedly looking to this parliament for redress, and I am just as certain as I am standing here that they are going to be bitterly disappointed in practically every aspect of this bill. It is essential that an old age pensions scheme should be uniformly workable in every province. Under this measure you will have some people getting nothing while others are getting five, ten and fifteen dollars per month. That condition of affairs prevailing from the Atlantic to the Pacific is bound to stir up dissatisfaction with this legislation. I am in favour of proper legislation, but this is both ill considered and badly drafted. How will the minister make sections 10, 11 and 12 applicable in view of the Solicitor General's statement a few minutes ago?

Mr. HEENAN: I prefer to wait until we get to those sections of the bill.

Mr. McGIBBON: The question is vital to the effect of the bill as a whole.

Mr. HEENAN: Those sections merely provide a method of arranging matters between the provinces in the case of removal from one province to another. It is an accounting problem as between the provinces and has nothing to do with the principle of the bill.

Mr. McGIBBON: But the Solicitor General admits that you cannot enforce it.

Mr. CANNON: A distinction must be drawn between the powers of the federal government to legislate and the ancillary powers which we are exercising in order to put into force legislation within our own jurisdiction. If my hon. friend will examine that point with a colleague of his who belongs to the legal profession he will find that I am right.

Mr. McGIBBON: How will one province collect the money from another without the machinery to collect it?

Mr. CANNON: The machinery will be organized under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. McGIBBON: But the Solicitor General admits that the province will not have power.

Mr. CANNON: Certainly the province will have power. The moment the province joins the scheme a law will be passed by the provincial legislature and it is to be assumed that the legislators in that province will have sense enough to see that their legislation is put into proper effect. As my hon. friend knows, in law, omnia rite presumuntur.

Mr. KAISER: I am certainly in favour of doing something for the aged. But I want to get clearly in my mind exactly why the government seeks to associate itself with the provinces in this matter. It has been suggested that the necessary machinery already exists in the provinces and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) has referred to the compensation board of Ontario and the mothers' allowance board, which organization, he says, might undertake to administer the scheme. I do not know whether the minister has ever had very much experience with the compensation board of Ontario, but having myself been associated with the workingmen of a great industrial city for a number of years I have had to follow quite closely the operations of this organization, and I doubt whether it could possibly handle a matter of this kind. Has the minister ever asked that board whether it would take on this additional work without having to set up just such machinery as this government would have to organize if the act were administered altogether federally? Without any desire to be discourteous I must say that the suggestion in regard to the mothers' allowance board is another absurdity. The work is entirely different. The nearest parallel I see to a proper administrative body under this law would be the soldiers' pensions board. Some central organization such as that would be simple and would cost less to the Dominion.

Mr. McPHERSON: I rise to a point of order. Half an hour ago I had the floor and was endeavouring to discuss section 3 of the bill, and a dozen or more hon. gentleman got up to ask questions. I have been waiting patiently for an opportunity to continue my remarks.

Mr. KAISER: I said I wanted to ask the government a question but I did not tell anybody how much more I had to say. I have already asked one question of the minister and there are one or two more that I want to put to him. It is said that we are going to contribute 50 per cent of the cost of the scheme; that is to say, if it costs $24,000,000 we are going to pay $12,000,000. If the government are really sincere would it not be better for them to make a start independently of the provinces? It would be infinitely better, it would be more satisfactory to the people at large, if this government said, "Instead of paying $20 a month and depending upon the provinces to join, we will inaugurate the scheme ourselves, put it into force at once, and pay $10 a month." Let us start somewhere. You could pay $10 a month the first year, if it were felt at the next session that we should pay more, then we could increase the amount, and if the provincess wanted to join there would be nothing to hinder them from coming in. The government are bringing in here a bill in which there are so many "ifs" and "ands" and "buts," so many qualifying conditions that it is the honest opinion of the people that they have no intention of putting it into operation. I really believe that to be the feeling of the country. There are a good many men in the government who would like to see the act operative, just as there are others on this side. I gave this matter my attention for many years before coming here and I still believe that the old people of the country should be taken care of. But I do think that the government ought to make a start independently from some point, however small the amount they might pay.

Mr. McPHERSON: If the hon. gentleman is through I will now resume my discussion of the section under consideration. I am not particularly averse to an increase in the proportion the Dominion should pay, if that is at all possible, but I am opposed to the Dominion paying 100 per cent of the cost. It seems to me that the most satisfactory results could be obtained by means of legislation such as is now proposed, whereby the coöperation of the provinces can be secured. The provincial government is in closer touch with those for whom the legislation is designed than a central body under the Dominion government could possibly be. For that reason I am in favour of the provinces contributing to the expense of maintaining the pensions administration. As to the amount that shall be paid, if more could be done along that line than we are able to do I should be glad to see it done. But on the other hand if that cannot be done, I do not think there is much reason for worrying in so far as those provinces are concerned. It would be good politics and good business on the part of those provinces who have identified themselves with social welfare legislation to intimate at this stage that they would not take the matter of old age pensions up unless a larger percentage was paid by the Dominion. I submit that several of the local governments will take up old age pensions even if they are only placed on a fifty-fifty basis, but they would be much more gratified if the House would increase the federal percentage.

The hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) says there is an absolute difference between paying fifty per cent of the cost of such a scheme and paying fifty per cent with the cost of operation added. But that could be met by the House increasing the percentage paid by the Dominion if it saw fit to do so.

As to the discussions with respect to this matter which took place during the last election, my opinion is that the public understood the question at issue was not the amount the Dominion or the provinces should pay but whether the federal House should pass this legislation and allow the provinces to come in under it, or whether they should wait until the several provinces agreed upon an old age pensions scheme which could then be adopted by the Dominion. I submit that the present plan of passing federal legislation and letting the provinces come under it one by one, if they feel so inclined is much speedier than the method of summoning the nine provinces together and getting them to agree upon anything. When we see how long it takes this House to agree upon even one section of this bill, you can form some idea of the task ahead of you when you seek to get nine provinces to agree upon any particular bill. I think it would be an almost impossible task. If any change is made in this section I submit it should take into consideration the cost to the provinces of administering this legislation.

[Mr. Kaiser.]

Mr. NEILL: I will not imitate the actions of other gentlemen as to whom I have complained that they discussed the whole principle of the bill on one section, a thing they should not have done. But I have here an amendment, Mr. Chairman, upon which I should like to get your ruling. I think it is in order, but if not I must of course submit to your ruling. However, I think it will give effect to the evident desire of the labour members of the House and perhaps of some hon. gentlemen opposite as well. I should like to test the feeling of the House as to whether it is prepared to go to the extent of fixing a greater proportion than fifty per cent in our contribution to the provinces. The amendment recently proposed by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner), and quite properly rejected, was rejected on the ground, the well known ground that it violated the rule which says that no private member shall introduce a bill or move an amendment to a bill which increases the public expenditure to any appreciable extent. It has been held that small expenditures involved, such as the payment of fees etc., would not be considered a violation of this well known rule, but the Chairman held that it was not in order for any hon. member to increase specifically the amount mentioned in this section. What I propose to do, however, is I think somewhat different. I propose to strike out the words "equal to one-half" in line 22, and insert the words "not exceeding seventy-five per cent." That will not be compulsory or mandatory at all, and cannot be held to increase the expenditure of the government because under such an arrangement they might give fifty per cent, seventy-five per cent or even forty per cent. As far as that goes I think the provinces would take care that it was not less than fifty per cent at least. The section would then read:

> The governor in council may make an agreement with the lieutenant-governor in council of any province for the payment to such province quarterly of an amount not exceeding seventy-five per cent of the net sum paid out—

And so on. I think that would cover the point of order. We are not committing the government to an expenditure of seventy-five per cent at all, but we are leaving it permissive for them, if they so please, to make such an arrangement with the provinces.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil): In view of the ruling given this afternoon by the Deputy Speaker, and in view of rule 170, as set out at page 43 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, I do not think the amendment is in order. Rule 170 reads:

> The committee of supply cannot increase a grant which has been recommended by a message from the Governor General. It is also irregular to increase any item in a resolution. But any motion to reduce a grant will be always in order.

Mr. NEILL: Before you give your decision, Mr. Chairman, will you take into consideration the point made that it is not compulsory but entirely permissive for the government to take such action? They might even lower the amount.

The CHAIRMAN: My opinion is that it opens the door to a grant of seventy-five per cent and that is beyond the intention of the resolution. Therefore, unless some other hon. gentleman wishes to speak, I shall have to declare the proposed amendment out of order.

Mr. LADNER: Why not overcome this impasse or difficulty? I would ask the Minister of Labour himself if he would not move that the words "one-half" be struck out, and the words "seventy-five per cent" be substituted therefor.

Mr. HEENAN: What I am afraid of is that the old age pensions bill may be killed through the kindness of its friends. The old age pensions bill was defeated in the Senate last session because of the fact that it was estimated that it would involve an expenditure of approximately twelve million dollars.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

An hon. MEMBER: No, but because the provinces were not consulted.

Mr. HEENAN: How does my hon. friend know that? I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the chances of this bill going through the second chamber this year will not be enhanced by adding one-third to the proposed contribution. If the bill is allowed to remain in its present shape it will have a better opportunity of passing the Senate because the people have pronounced on it. Furthermore, if anything should unfortunately happen to the measure in the other chamber it will raise the question as to how many times the upper house can throw out a bill which has been passed by the House of Commons. This is not going to be the last word in old age pensions legislation for Canada. If any defects are revealed in actual operation such defects can be cured by amending the law.

Mr. LADNER: Does the minister mean by that that the government might be disposed to consider the federal authority assuming the entire obligation?

Mr. HEENAN: I will explain what I mean. One hon. member stated, just as a member of the upper house did last session, that this scheme was going to cost Nova Scotia so much money. He seems to take it for granted that everyone in Nova Scotia who is over the age of seventy years will come under the bill. I submit there are quite a number of people over that age in Nova Scotia who will not come under the bill at all because they have a certain annual income. We can all guess, but no one knows just how many people will come under this scheme in British Columbia, Ontario or any other province, and after we get the bill in working order we can amend it in the light of the experience gained. Consequently I cannot agree with my hon. friend because of the fact that I am more desirous of getting this bill on the statute books than of doing anything else.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I would like to ask a question. The minister says there is a better chance of getting this bill through the Senate with the 50 per cent clause than if we made it 75 per cent. I see him nod his head in assent. I wonder if he will again nod his head when I say that there is a better chance of getting the provinces to come under this bill if the federal share is increased to 75 per cent.

Mr. HEENAN: Will you let me answer that question?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Certainly; that is what I want you to do.

Mr. HEENAN: I fear that my hon. friend as well as other members of this House have forgotten for the moment that this burden of caring for the old, indigent people is at present borne by the provinces alone. Surely if that is the fact the provinces will accept 50 per cent of these expenses in order to lighten their load to that extent. I take it for granted that, as good business men, the members of the provincial governments will welcome a contribution of 50 per cent of that cost which they now pay themselves. It may not be so welcome as a contribution of 60 per cent or 90 per cent, but if you ask a man to-day if he would like $40 a month for the rest of his life he will nod his head. If you ask him to-morrow if he would like $50 a month, he would say "Yes" again. But if you ask a man if he would rather have $20 than nothing, I think he would take the $20.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The minister does not see his way clear to assume a larger proportion of the cost, and possibly that is asking too much off-hand. It does seem, however, from the discussions which have taken place in this House that there is a very general disposition to advance the proportion, to be granted by the Dominion government. I think it would not be too much for us to ask the minister to allow this particular clause to stand in order to give the cabinet a chance to reconsider it, because we are all anxious that an effective old age pension scheme should be placed on the statute books. I do not want to reiterate what I said the other day with regard to this matter, but the minister has just suggested that some of the provinces would come in anyway, although they would rather have a larger contribution from the federal government. I recall a conversation which I had some time ago with a very prominent Liberal of Nova Scotia, a gentleman who was formerly a member of this House, and he was very keenly interested in the success of the Liberal measures presented to the House. He told me that if only 50 per cent were given by the federal authorities it would mean that his province could not possibly take up the measure, and I have had that situation presented to me by people from different parts of the country. Under these circumstances it does not seem unreasonable that we should ask for conditions which would ensure this becoming a successful measure. As I said the other day, the circumstances connected with this bill have materially altered since it was presented a year ago. The Conservative party is committed to the old age pension idea, and has promised to endorse this bill if it cannot get something better, while the other sections of the House feel the same way. Looked at from the standpoint of getting the bill through this House, therefore, the government is perfectly safe. While it may be technically correct that an amendment such as was offered may not be acceptable, there should be some way by which the House could give expression to its desire to increase an amount of this character, or at least to the idea that it would be well for the government to do so. That appears to be an impossibility and it only remains to us to urge upon the government that the matter be reconsidered.

Not only have conditions altered in this House, but they have altered in the country as well; when the government introduced the measure twelve months ago no one knew how it would be received. It was received with greater approval than anyone could have anticipated and, as has been said again and again, it was one of the main planks in the platforms as put forward in the hustings by both old political parties. Undoubtedly the public is ready for it. As to the Senate, if they are going to throw out a 75 per cent bill they will undoubtedly throw out a 50 per cent bill also. I do not think the percentage is the trouble; there was nothing to indicate that that was the fact last year, in fact as I recall the debate in the Senate it was the other way about, and many hon. gentlemen thought it should be a federal measure. I am not at all sure that it might not meet with a better reception from the Senate if the figure were made higher. So I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, as the only possible thing left for us to do in the circumstances, that this clause be allowed to stand until the government has a final chance to reconsider the matter in the light of the promised support from all sides of the House.

Mr. CANTLEY: It perhaps is needless for me to say that in company with practically all other members of this House I am in favour of an old age pension scheme for Canada, but I am in favour of a federal scheme, which I claim to be the only fair and honest way of dealing with this question. The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst) has pointed out that if this scheme now before the House were adopted it would mean a contribution by the province of Nova Scotia of probably $1,500,000. That may be excessive, but I am quite certain that the contribution would exceed $1,000,000 at least, and we in Nova Scotia are not in a position to-day to make that expenditure in conjunction with the federal government.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Are you not providing for these people now?

Mr. CANTLEY: We are providing now for several classes of our people in ways which cannot be abruptly discontinued if at all. We have homes of different kinds in practically every county, built at a very considerable expense, and in addition we have hospitals for the treatment of tuberculosis and other humanitarian institutions which are certainly not behind those of any other province in Canada. These impose burdens which are as great as we can bear, and we cannot add to them by $1,000,000 or $1,250,000 yearly, particularly in view of our last year's deficit of practically $1,000,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This will relieve you of part of that burden.

Mr. CANTLEY: No. The minister must give us credit for sufficient intelligence to know what is best for ourselves. If the government will bring down a federal measure we will be glad to have it and I would suggest that the bill be remodelled in that direction. If the other provinces care to participate with the Federal government, regulations looking to that can easily be made, and thus the pensions paid to the people of those provinces could be increased.

There are one or two other points to which I would like to refer. In Ottawa last year was held a meeting of all the premiers of the different provinces to deal with an altogether different problem. Might I ask why the government did not consult these premiers at that time in regard to this matter? They were all here; the bill was before the House and had not then gone to the Senate. The government could then have found out the will of the several provinces through their premiers at that time. I am not going to deal with that any further, but I want to point out that this bill as brought down if enacted will prove an absolute injustice to some of the provinces. Take Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, for instance. Those provinces will, I take it, not be able to take advantage of this scheme, but would be taxed to provide old age pensions for men and women in other provinces that are better off than they are. It is a clear case of coercion —nothing short of it. Talk about maritime rights—how can you defend that? I ask the minister to be good enough to withdraw the bill, and remodel it to meet the objections that several hon. members have pointed out.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): It appears, Mr. Chairman, that a great many members are concerned over what the provinces may say and do about this measure, but they have not yet given the provinces an opportunity of saying what they intend to do about it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): They have been talking about what the premiers of the different provinces said, but they are not willing to wait and see what the legislatures of these provinces will do.

If I read this bill correctly, there is nothing in it to compel any province that wishes to come in under this scheme to pay ten dollars a month for every person over seventy years of age. I do not like to take up sections before we come to them, but section 9 provides that the maximum pension payable shall be so much. It may be that some of the provinces would not desire to pay that maximum pension, and I submit to you, Sir, and to the House that it is better for the poor people in any province to get some help in the immediate future, rather than to have to wait for a long time until the provinces are able to give the maximum amount of assistance mentioned in this bill. When the federal government granted assistance to the provinces in the matter of building highways, they did not wait until all the provinces had agreed to all the terms of that legislation. They passed the measure and made the money available, and then left it to the provinces to come along and say: We are prepared to take advantage of this legislation, and we ask you now for a contract to enable us to spend the money. The principle is exactly the same. That policy depended on the provinces taking advantage of it, and it is so in this case. All that this legislation proposes to do is to assist the province in carrying some of its legitimate burdens. Some of the provinces may take advantage of it, and others may wait a while and see how the scheme works out, but sooner or later the people of each province concerned will have to decide whether to take advantage of it or not, and when the people of the province and their legislature have decided that point, they will then have to decide how much assistance they are going to take from this government on a fifty-fifty basis. I think these two points have been overlooked.

Furthermore, the old people throughout this Dominion are not going to thank their friends for the assistance they are given if that assistance is expressed in a form of delay that will exasperate and injure their prospects, rather than improve them.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): The Minister of Labour, like all other hon. members who have spoken in favour of this bill, has expressed himself as earnestly desiring that the old people of Canada shall get the advantage of an old age pension as provided for by this legislation. Then why not accept the suggestion made by the hon. member for New Westminster a short time ago, and amend the bill so that the federal government will pay in any event fifty per cent of the maximum provided under this bill. Then if the province chooses to come in and add an additional amount to that pension, the old people of the Dominion will be just that much better off. But if the bill goes through as it is, and the province does not see fit to come in under its terms, the old people get nothing. I think the provinces would be more apt to come in if the government set the pace by paying fifty per cent of the amount provided for in this bill. That is the test of the government's sincerity in this matter. Let them go on and give the old people in any event the amount they are prepared to give if the provinces coöperate.

Mr. IRVINE: I would like to urge upon the Minister of Labour and the government the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I really cannot see why we should be discussing a clause of this kind at all if, on the one hand, we cannot move to amend it in any way, and if the government refuses to accept any suggestions with regard to it. The Minister of Labour, under those circumstances, might just as well pass the bill in his own office and not bring it down here at all. In view of the very general agreement that the amount of the federal contribution should be increased, I would urge the Minister of Labour to allow the bill to stand until it can be redrafted in the light of the discussion that has taken place here both this afternoon and when the principle of the resolution was under discussion in committee. I hope that the government will see fit to increase the federal grant by twenty-five per cent.

Mr. ESLING: During the recent campaign I am quite sure that the Liberal speakers did not stress the fact that there would be relief for the aged provided only that the provinces agreed to the scheme. On the contrary, they all made it very clear that those over seventy were to receive a pension of $240 a year. The father of the bill, the Minister of Health, for instance, did not get up in his district and say: We are going to give you an old age pension provided British Columbia comes in under this scheme. No. He simply told them: Our government is giving you an old age pension. When the government brought down this bill, it evidently expected, or hoped at all events, that all the provinces would come in. If the government did not have that expectation, we are justified in concluding that they did not want this measure to become operative. I would ask the Solicitor General or any of the ministers from the province of Quebec if they are quite sure that Quebec would be willing to bear its proportion of the expenditure, which amounts to $3,069,000. Or take Ontario. Its proportion—I am taking these figures from the last census, which gives the number of people over seventy years of age—would be nearly five millions.

Mr. HEENAN: Does the census show that those people over seventy have not got an income of over $125 a year?

Mr. ESLING: No, the census does not show the number of people who would come under the benefits of an old age pension scheme, but in 1924 there was a special committee appointed by this government to go into the whole question of old age pensions, and that committee reported back to the House that about forty per cent of the people in each province over the age of seventy would come under the benefits of this legislation. It is on that report that I am basing my figures.

Mr. BANCROFT: Do you know how the Conservative party voted in the House at that time on the report of that special committee?

Mr. ESLING: It does not make a particle of difference what happened in the past. If this government had to answer for all its sins in the past, I do not know where they would get off. Prince Edward Island would have to contribute $256,000; Nova Scotia, $1,188,000; New Brunswick, $717,000; Quebec, $3,069,000. I would ask the ministers from Quebec, are they confident that Quebec will come in under this scheme? If they are not, we shall have to come to the conclusion that they are not sincere when they say they want this bill to pass. Ontario's contribution would be $4,904,000; Manitoba, $500,000; Saskatchewan, $500,000; Alberta, $330,000; British Columbia, $500,000.

Mr. VALLANCE: What are those provinces paying now?

Mr. ESLING: It does not make a particle of difference what they are paying now. We are discussing this particular scheme, and the government expects the provinces to come in and coöperate. The special committee that was appointed in 1924 not only discussed the advisability of bringing in an old age pension scheme in the Dominion, but it viewed the whole question from every phase, and considered similar legislation in force in other Dominions. That committee expressed the conviction that the only way to have a bill that would be uniformly acceptable would be to have the provinces coöperate. My opinion is that if you do not want the provinces to coöperate, then you do not want the bill to pass. The committee urged that there should be a conference of premiers to agree upon uniform legislation, and unless you agree upon such legislation you are simply postponing the day of the operation of the bill. Your own Prime Minister shares that view. On the receipt of this report he said:

> It is all important that before any action be taken by the federal administration we should understand very fully and finally the attitude which the several provinces will take on this important question.

I do not know that you could have anything plainer than that. Has the Prime Minister interviewed the province of Quebec or the province of Nova Scotia? If you are in earnest about this and do not wish to continue to fool the people, why not call the premiers together now—it is not too late—and get a uniform measure? The present course of the government will entail a lot of expense on the part of a few provinces which will accept the bill, in the shape of creating administrative machinery, all of which will have to be cast aside. When you have laid down the terms and conditions on which the provinces may accept this bill, if a province does not want to accept it has simply to meet the views of any delegation which holds other views. Take British Columbia; they will go to our premier and say, "We think you should have a sixty-five age limit", and the premier of that province, an old and tried politician, will say, "you are perfectly right, I am going to put in the sixty-five year age limit". What happens? The operation of the bill is deferred for another year. He is pleasing those who want the sixty-five year age limit, and he knows that he is not going to burden British Columbia with an expenditure of half a million dollars. Our leader has said that this should rather be a federal responsibility, and if you are in earnest and do not want a lot of discussion, which would mean the postponement of the measure, then you should make it a federal bill and expunge this clause.

Mr. HEAPS: We should not rush this discussion too rapidly. It is nearly six o'clock, and I think the government should have two hours to consider this question. I feel keenly on this matter, because I believe the whole operation of the bill hinges upon the clause we are now discussing. The government has been urged by several members of the House to amend this section. I know that there is a feeling among my friends opposite in favour of a larger contribution from the federal treasury. I fully realize the position of the minister when he says that the Senate may be an obstacle if we insert a provision in the bill that the government shall contribute seventy-five per cent, but I would like to impress upon him that whilst there is one obstacle in the Senate to the seventy-five per cent provision there are nine other obstacles in the country which will not accept the measure favourably unless that provision is inserted. I should like to have this percentage provided for in the bill, have the provinces coöperate with us, and take chances of trouble in the Senate. I am not afraid of the action of the upper chamber, because after the pleasant things which were said about them and the way they acted they will probably understand the situation. I think the Senate is to a certain extent susceptible to public opinion, and will realize that the whole of the people of Canada are anxious to have this measure placed on the statutes of the Dominion.

The situation in the House in regard to this measure is not altogether edifying, as far as parliamentary institutions are concerned. We have a majority of members in favour of amending the bill in a certain way, and yet these gentlemen cannot give expression to their views on this particular occasion. I believe if we had a vote on this question, and if every member were free of the whips and able to express a candid opinion, the seventy-five per cent provision would carry by an overwhelming majority. If that is the case, and if, as I suggest, the Senate is also susceptible to public opinion, why is the government not agreeable to test the feeling of the House on this question? I do not see why they should object to that. They have not said why they object to such a provision. The only reason given is that they would run the risk of the measure being defeated in the other chamber if this provision were inserted. I would urge the government to let it stand, because if they do not I think some ways and means will be found of testing the feelings of the House. I do not think it can be avoided. I believe with the lawyers we have in the Labour and Progressive groups we will be able to find some means of overcoming the difficulty which prevents the House giving a free expression of opinion. Can I be furnished with some reason why the government objects to seventy-five per cent as against fifty per cent. If I were a member of the Liberal party at the present time I would urge for a larger contribution, in order to make sure that the bill would become operative. I cannot understand why the government object to that. If the bill becomes law in its present shape, there may be many provinces in Canada where it will not be put into effect, and the government will be assuming a responsibility which might be very disastrous for them at the next election. During the last election nothing appealed more to the people of the country than the old age pensions. I do not think there was a constituency in Canada where the question was not discussed from every angle and where the proposition of an old age pension did not meet with the approval of the people of the Dominion. The government is coming forward with the same bill, and up to the present time only one province has approved of it. In the province from which I come I do not think that we are likely to have an old age pension bill put into effect if it is placed on a fifty per cent basis. I am anxious to see the bill go into effect, and that is the only reason I am urging my views upon the House. I think the least the government can do is to allow hon. members to express their opinions through a vote. If the motion cannot be made by a private member, I think one of the ministers should move to reconsider the measure, so that hon. members may have an opportunity of expressing themselves, and I feel sure under those circumstances the House would approve of a larger contribution than is proposed in this particular clause.

Mr. CANNON: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the hon. gentleman, I wish to say that it is not the intention of the government to curtail discussion in any way, but this parliament, like any other parliament, is necessarily managed according to certain well known rules, and according to those rules the motions moved this afternoon are out of order, and have been so declared by you, Sir.

This afternoon we have witnessed an extraordinary spectacle. On the one hand our friends who belong to the Tory party advance certain reasons why we should pay 100 per cent, and on the other our friends who belong to the Alberta party and the Labour party suggest that we should pay 100 per cent but for other reasons. Only a short time ago we had a vote in this House. The Tory party voted against the government because we had not reduced taxation sufficiently, and the Alberta Progressives voted against the government because we had not lowered the tariff sufficiently. Suppose we accept the suggestion made this afternoon, we would increase the obligations of the federal exchequer. Where would we get the money to meet them? Will the gentleman who are sitting opposite me contend, on the one hand, that we should increase the obligations of the federal treasury and, on the other, reduce taxation?

Mr. HEAPS: I suggested this afternoon that if the 10 per cent had not been taken off the income tax there would be ample funds to pay old age pensions.

Mr. CANNON: Exactly; and my hon. friend voted against the government because the cost of living had not been decreased—the tariff had not been reduced. How can we lower the tariff, thus reducing our revenues, and at the same time assume larger obligations? That is ordinary common sense.

[Mr. Heaps.]

How can this government pay millions of dollars to the people on the one hand, and on the other reduce the national revenues?

Mr. MANION: I thought the hon. minister and his party stated throughout the general election that by lowering the tariff they had improved the industrial situation throughout the country and increased the national prosperity.

Mr. CANNON: There is no doubt about that, but that is one angle of the question which I can discuss with my hon. friend on another occasion. What I want to make as clear as possible this afternoon is that we are asked to assume under this bill a larger liability, and we are asked to do so by two parties, one of which is insisting that we reduce taxation, and the other that we reduce the tariff. I say there is no logic in that attitude.

The opponents of this bill apparently are not voicing the interests of the federal government or of Canada as a whole, but the interests of the provinces. This is a federal parliament. Let us look after the interests of the Dominion as a whole. The hon. gentleman from British Columbia who spoke this afternoon asked me to express my views as to whether Quebec was willing to assume her liability under this project, amounting in his estimation to about $3,000,000 annually. I may say that the province of Quebec is spending vast sums of money to look after the very people for whom we are providing under this scheme. It will be for the provincial government to decide whether or not it will share in this scheme. If Quebec wishes to stay aloof, she has a perfect right to do so. But so far as I am concerned, I am not speaking here solely as a representative of Quebec, I am speaking as a representative of Canada. We will contribute to any social legislation, but within our means. An hon. gentleman from Nova Scotia, an experienced business man, told us that we should give everything that his province is asking for in the way of maritime rights, but that Nova Scotia is not willing to do anything to promote this social legislation.

Mr. CANTLEY: I did not say anything of the kind. I said we could not afford to. I said further that you could not put the bill into effect without compelling us to pay as taxes pensions to people in other provinces better able than we are to bear the burden.

Mr. CANNON: The stand I take, and I think it will be approved by the majority of the committee, is that as members of the federal parliament we should look after the interests of Canada, not after the interests of particular provinces.

Mr. CANTLEY: I am here to look after the interests of my own people, the people of Pictou, whose representative I am.

Mr. LADNER: What about the old people, are not they the ones primarily interested?

Mr. CANNON: Certainly. This is a social question.

Mr. ERNST: Mr. Chairman, in view of the hon. minister's remarks, I should like to ask him whether he considers anything which may be granted under the Duncan report as a dole to Nova Scotia?

Mr. CANNON: Certainly not.

Mr. ERNST: He speaks as if it were.

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend is not going to draw me into making any such statement. The Duncan report is one matter, the old age pensions another. The point I am making is that the financial situation in the Dominion, as a consequence of what happened from 1911 to 1921 is very bad. From 1921 to 1927 we have by proper administration managed to improve it. But as a government, notwithstanding what may be said from this or that corner of the House, we are not going to forget our duty towards the people whom we represent. We will promote social legislation, but within our means, and we will go no further.

An hon. MEMBER: With federal money.

Mr. CANNON: With federal money. We are to-day, as a government, expressing in this House a desire to help each and every one of the provinces forming confederation. These provinces have means of their own. Let them do their share in providing pensions, and we will do ours.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The minister argues that this scheme should be handled from the standpoint of Canada as a whole, as our duty—

Mr. CANNON: Here.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Yes, here. And he advances the argument that 50 per cent is all that we can take out of the Dominion treasury; therefore we should not ask for any more. Well, if he is right in arguing from that standpoint, surely he should not find fault with the representatives from Nova Scotia who say that the finances of the province cannot stand 50 per cent as its share of the scheme. The hon. minister says that the Dominion cannot stand more than 50 per cent of the cost, but he finds fault with my hon. friend who says that his province cannot afford to put up the other 50 per cent.

I say that every member of this House, no matter what province he comes from, has a double duty to perform. He cannot look at that duty from the standpoint of the minister and say, We will put through this or that legislation from the Dominion standpoint, regardless of our duty to the province from which we come. We have to consider the position in our particular province. I would point out to the minister that in recent years the provinces have more and more taken upon themselves obligations analogous to those which the government is undertaking in this bill. Higher and higher contributions to hospitals, charities and other social work has increased enormously the tax burdens of the various provinces, until to-day they are carrying about all they can stand. In this bill the government is simply making a bluff. I think that is the apt word to use. They made a bluff last year and they are making a second bluff now. They propose to go to the people and say, Here we were in favour of giving old age pensions, but the provinces would not back us up. The government places all the responsibility for administration on the provinces and says, We will hand you back 50 per cent of the net expenditure. Why not the gross expenditure? The fact that the responsibility will rest with the various provinces for the administration of the act, for providing machinery and so forth, is itself a sufficient argument for the Dominion government putting up a larger portion than one-half of the cost. Speaking for the Conservative party, we on this side have appealed to the government to make this a federal measure and to assume the full responsibility for the administration of the act from the federal treasury. Failing that, however, we certainly prefer to have a 75 per cent contribution from the Dominion government. The bill is of no use whatever on a fifty-fifty basis; you cannot get the provinces to co-operate. It would be much better to make the Dominion contribution 75 or 80 per cent, because in that event it is more likely the provinces would be able to participate. But the minister says no, and the Solicitor General has been equally pointed in indicating that the government is not prepared to increase the amount proposed. Indeed, they were not even prepared a little while ago to allow this particular clause to stand until eight o'clock so that they might have a few more hours in which to consider this suggestion. The minister shakes his head; I take that to be an intimation that the government will not give one cent more than 50 per cent. The provinces can take it or leave it. That represents the extent to which the government is prepared to go in granting relief to the aged. Judging from the contributions that have been made by my own county to the support of the poor there, I am sure that $20 a month will be inadequate. The government might very well pay a larger percentage of the cost, and in doing so they would encourage the provinces to coöperate, not only in passing legislation, but perhaps in adding to the allowance, so as to make it possible for the old people to live.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend has given evidence of a short memory. He and his followers—because it is not so long since he was a member of a government—less than forty-eight hours ago applauded the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) when he attacked this government for adding to the public expenditure and urged greater economy. My hon. friend has no longer the responsibility of office and can therefore be generous with the funds of the people. I am interested to know whether he is speaking for the whole Conservative party in this regard?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I am not obliged to give utterance to the sentiments of other people; I speak for myself. I can however suggest ways whereby the minister can raise money.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose we were considering section 3—agreements with provinces.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Up to now I have refrained from speaking on this bill this session. But last year it was my pleasure and honour to pilot the bill through this House. It received the unanimous endorsement of the House and then went to the upper chamber. That chamber did not see fit to accept the bill as passed by the Commons. It failed to pass the upper house, but since then the legislation has been before the electorate of Canada and the people have endorsed it. That has been shown by the return of the party which instituted and brought that legislation into this House.

I do not think the discussion on this occasion has been much wider in its nature than the one which took place last year. It is true that hon. gentlemen opposite, knowing the popular demand for this measure, are more anxious now to see that some form of legislation is put into effect. We find to-day an almost unanimous sentiment in its favour. Of course we have not heard yet from those who opposed the bill last year—and there were several—but we find an almost unanimous sentiment in this chamber in favour of old age pensions, and we also find those who are not responsible for the expenditure of the taxes collected from the people of Canada proposing to-day that the scope of the bill should be extended and further obligations undertaken by the Dominion. That seems to be the desire of hon. gentlemen opposite. Well, that is not a difficult thing to do; it is easy for hon. gentlemen opposite, who are not responsible for the expenditure of public money, to suggest that the scope of the bill should be widened. Personally I heartily endorse the principle of old age pensions, and I wish to point out that last year was the first occasion when a government of Canada undertook to bring in legislation dealing with this important question.

Mr. HEAPS: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Not just now; I prefer to continue my argument. To my mind the primary necessity at the present time is to have the principle of old age pensions endorsed by this parliament. But I can easily see that if the suggestions referred to, in view of the quarter whence they emanate, were accepted by the government the old age pensions scheme would be defeated in Canada for the present. I make that statement after mature consideration, and I hope that those who are in favour of old age pensions, if they mean what they say, will accept the present bill in order to have the principle which it embodies established in this country.

We reviewed last year the countries which had accepted the principle of old age pensions, and we were able to show that Great Britain had led in this matter. But from time to time even Great Britain revised and amended her legislation, and finally arrived at the place where they now have a dual system, one part of which is contributory and the other supported by the government. It would be very satisfactory if we could arrive immediately at the condition Great Britain has developed in her years of progress and legislative experience, but this is entirely a new undertaking as far as Canada is concerned.

As I said a moment ago, generally speaking this proposal has been endorsed by the electorate throughout Canada, and it is a well known fact that the sentiment in Canada is that the aged who have failed to provide for themselves should receive some assistance from the state. Hon. gentlemen opposite say we are wrong and that we should go first to the provinces and consult them. I think we dealt with that matter very fully last year; this problem is one which under our constitution rests primarily upon the provinces, and they in their turn have handed that responsibilty to the municipalities. I think it will be conceded by every hon. member of this House that those who have reached the advanced age of seventy, and through circumstances in many cases beyond their control find themselves without means, should be supported, and that the state should contribute to that support. What is the state as far as Canada is concerned? This country consists of nine provinces and the taxes are collected from the people residing in all nine provinces which go to make up this Dominion. If we keep to our constitution we must consider this as a provincial problem, but the government of which Mr. Mackenzie King is the leader considered this proposal to be of such importance that uniformity of legislation throughout Canada should be brought about. And how is that to be done? We cannot pass legislation telling the provinces that they must do so and so in this matter, but recognizing the fact that they are entitled to bear a proper share of this work we can say to the provinces that we, as the central parliament of Canada, will contribute from our resources fifty per cent of the cost of taking care of these people. I hear from the representatives of Nova Scotia and British Columbia that those provinces cannot undertake this burden, but is it not understood in this House and throughout the country that the aged are entitled to receive and are supposedly receiving support to-day? So those who say that this is not a proper bill and that the Dominion should assume full responsibility are entirely outside of their premises as Dominion legislators.

We have not followed a new practice; it has already been cited in this House that the governments of Sir Robert Borden and Right Hon. Arthur Meighen brought in proposals without consultation with the provinces, whereby contributions were made from the Dominion treasury in order to bring about better road construction in Canada, better technical education and better agricultural conditions. Were these offers refused by the provinces? In every case the provinces did exactly what any individual would do; they accepted the gift from the Dominion government and utilized these funds. The bill brought down in regard to good roads provided that the Dominion government would contribute 40 per cent of the cost of construction of the main highways, not 50 per cent. I was a provinical minister at that time; that gift from the Dominion government involved the province in a very large expenditure, and there was hesitation on the part of the various provincial governments as to whether or not they should accept. They did accept, however, because it was a gift from the central treasury of Canada. I want to make this point clear. My friends argue that the Dominion should accept the whole shot and that the provinces should be relieved of that burden. Is that a fair consideration if you look into it carefully? Who can better judge the condition of these people whom it is proposed to help than the local authorities? That is one reason why the Dominion government, even if they had an overflowing treasury, should insist that the provincial governments share in this responsibility. In addition to that we will have the advantage of the local machinery which exists in practically every province in Canada to-day, through which these conditions may be investigated and the truth made known.

As I said a moment ago, last year was the first time any government in this country was prepared to bring legislation of this kind into the federal House. In dealing with expenditures involving $12,000,000 to $24,000,000, the people of Canada and the government of Canada must consider where that money is to come from, and as the Minister of Finance stated just before six o'clock our friends have been very unfair even within the last few hours. We were subjected to criticism because we did not further reduce taxation, but to-day hon. gentlemen opposite say we should involve the Dominion in an expenditure of not $12,000,000 but $24,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: You could save it in the civil service in a year.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My friends were in power many years, and they did not save it.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I would like to ask a question. What difference will it make to the people whether this money is collected by the Dominion or by the provinces?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I tried to make that clear to my hon. friend a moment ago. The taxpayers of this country are situated in the various provinces and they have to pay the shot, but there is an advantage in involving the various provincial governments in this matter because they have the local knowledge and the local machinery for administration which would save probably $1,000,000 or $2,000,000 if carried on in this way. My hon. friend has the right idea; what is the difference? The taxpayers have got to pay it. They live in the provinces, but they have to pay either to the Dominion or to the province. But this being primarily a provincial matter, we claim that the provinces should accept their responsibility, and I am satisfied that public opinion is such throughout Canada that it will of necessity come about that provincial governments will gladly accept the fifty per cent contribution from the Dominion treasury.

I wish to direct the attention of the House to a paper I have in my hand giving the history of Australia in regard to old age pensions. In 1909 Australia brought in legislation to provide for their aged people. Under the constitution of Australia this is a dominion matter. In 1910, the first year of the operation of their act, they found within their population 65,492 people who were entitled under their legislation to an old age pension, and they paid out in that year £1,433,430. In 1911, there were 75,502 people eligible under their act, and there was paid out in pensions £1,844,848.

Mr. GARDINER: What was the rate of pension?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I will give that a little later. I am going to ask to be allowed to put this table on Hansard, so that we shall all be able to see the experience they have had in Australia.

§The Commonwealth commenced to pay Invalid Pensions on 15th December, 1910. *Includes payments to pensioners in Benevolent Asylums. ‡A general increase of 5s. per fortnight occurred in October, 1916, as a result of the Invalid and Old-age Pensions Act 1916. †A further general increase of 5s. per fortnight occurred in January, 1920, as a result of the Invalid and Old-age Pensions Act 1919. ‖ An additional general increase of 5s. per fortnight occurred in September, 1923, as a result of the Invalid and Old-age Pensions Act 1923. ¶A further general increase of 5 s. per fortnight occurred in October, 1925, as a result of the Invalid and Old-Age Pensions Act 1925.

It will be noted that the number of people eligible under their legislation had increased from 65,492 in 1910 to 90,892 in 1915, and there was paid out in pensions in 1915, £2,691,309. Now I will skip to the year 1926. In that year, under their legislation as amended from time to time, giving increases and bringing in the invalid and other classes, the number of persons had increased to 126,918, of which 48,803 were invalid and would not come in under the bill we have here; and they paid out in pensions in that year £8,146,636.

Mr. ARTHURS: That was purely a federal scheme?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes. I am quoting these figures merely to show to the House that as members we have certain responsibilities.

Mr. BENNETT: How much of that £8,000,000 was contributed?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not think any was contributed.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, there was compulsory contribution.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): What was the age limit, male and female?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It varies from sixty to seventy years, under certain conditions.

Mr. ARTHURS: Their scheme takes care of the blind too, does it not?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There have been amendments from time to time, and that portion of the act which authorizes payment to women on attaining the age of sixty came into operation on December 15, 1910. But what I am trying to make plain to the House, Mr. Chairman, is that Australia has had experience with old age pensions from 1909 to 1927, and they have amended their legislation from time to time to meet conditions as they arose. We are embarking on a new proposal in this country. We know the difficulties that were encountered by the proposals that were made by the government last year, which are the present proposals, and why should we jeopardize them by attaching conditions at the present time? I believe that every member of this House is interested, and favourably interested, in this legislation, and is it not better for us first to establish the principle of old age pensions, and then proceed from time to time to perfect our legislation as our revenues and conditions will permit?

[Mr. J. H. King.]

I have no hesitation as a member of this House in saying that the Dominion parliament should not, under our constitution, pay the whole shot. I believe it is to the advantage of the people of Canada that this responsibility should be divided between the federal and provincial governments.

Mr. ESLING: During the campaign did the minister ever refer to the fact that the provinces were to contribute half the pension? Did he not stress the fact that it was the federal government that was bringing in old age pensions, and that he was the father of the legislation?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): What was said in the campaign, Mr. Chairman, might be of interest to my hon. friend, but if I were to review what was said in the campaign and the misrepresentations that were made by my hon. friend and his friends, it would not be helpful to this discussion at all, and I refrain because I am really interested in old age pensions and not in what happened during the campaign. It is of no importance at the present time what my hon. friend or I said during the campaign. I know that anything I said was within the bounds and confines of the bill, and I know that what my hon. friend said was outside the confines of the bill.

Mr. ESLING: What was that?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am not going to be led away from the question before us by my hon. friend, further than to say that he represented that certain classes of women were ostracized under our legislation and would not benefit, when there was a special provision in the bill including them, and he knew it.

It is rather interesting to hear what our friends from Nova Scotia and other provinces have to say; in fact, we have heard members on the opposition side of the House say that the province of Quebec would not come in. The Solicitor General has already dealt with that, as a minister from the province of Quebec. I will say this for the province of Quebec: Through their organizations, family, church and otherwise, I believe they do take good care of their aged, and it might be that this proposal at first blush would not be acceptable to them. But in view of the history of old age pensions in practically every country in the civilized world to-day, is there any reason for supposing that any province in Canada will not come in?

Mr. ERNST: Is the minister aware that the chief Liberal organ in Nova Scotia, as I pointed out this afternoon, is opposed to the bill in its present form?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am trying to get hon. gentlemen to give consideration to this measure outside of its political aspects, but it is very difficult to do so. My hon. friend from Lunenburg would quote a Liberal newspaper, but after all, that is only a newspaper. We know, each and every member knows, that the people of Canada are in sympathy with these proposals, and what I am trying to impress on the House is that we would be better advised, and would be doing more for the principle of old age pensions, if we accepted this legislation, which is the same legislation that went through the last campaign. Then, after the scheme has come into operation and we have had experience with it, we shall be able to do as they have done in Great Britain, in France, Germany, Australia and the United States—amend our legislation from time to time to meet the conditions that arise. But let us at this time first establish the principle that so far as we are concerned, the parliament of Canada, is desirous of bringing into force a uniform pension scheme. If we do that, then surely we have accomplished our purpose, and I will say to my hon. friends opposite, who to-day are suggesting what they did not suggest last year, that they are endangering a principle which I know they are so anxious to establish in Canada.

Mr. HEAPS: Did I not suggest an increase in the federal allowance last year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: Am I not taking exactly the same attitude as I did a year ago?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not blame the hon. member. If I were in his position I would do likewise, but we have got down to cases on this thing. The government has been seriously attacked this afternoon for its want of liberality.

Mr. McGIBBON: Hear, hear.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend says "hear, hear." But what is in his mind at this time is to establish the principle, and although he may have advised, and properly so, that the government should be more liberal and should make it sixty-five or seventy per cent, last year the House of Commons did not accept that, and I do not believe the House will accept it this year.

Mr. McGIBBON: Put it to a vote.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That would be a political vote, and not in the interest of old age pensions.

Mr. McGIBBON: That is my hon. friend's opinion only.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That is the opinion that will be generally held throughout Canada, and my hon. friends opposite will realize it before long.

Mr. ARTHURS: Is that a desire or a threat?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Because the taxpayers who are interested in this proposal are desirous of passing a measure that will bring into existence a uniform system of old age pensions throughout Canada. The amount to be paid to the pensioners can be discussed next year or the year after. Let us establish the principle, and from time to time we can amend the regulation.

Mr. McQUARRIE: How can it be uniform if all the provinces do not go into the scheme?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In this respect we can only judge and make deductions from what has gone before. We know that in legislation of this character, where the Dominion government has given to the provinces from their treasury amounts of money which they did not require to give, the provinces have always been anxious to accept and have accepted.

Mr. ARTHURS: After a long period.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have no doubt that, if the bill becomes law, throughout Canada in every province there will be people who will see that the provincial governments accept their responsibility, and having accepted their responsibility then you will have what we are contending for, a uniform pension for aged Canadian people.

Mr. ARTHURS: How many provinces came into the various schemes which have preceded this proposition—that is the good roads scheme, and the technical education scheme—and when? How long did they delay?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Every one.

Mr. ARTHURS: Eventually.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They all came in; some debated the matter for a time, perhaps a year or two, but not longer than they should have, because public opinion is what controls provincial governments as it controls dominion governments, and I have no doubt that if this legislation becomes law public opinion in the provinces will be such that the provincial governments will accept what the Dominion government gives them for the care of those for whom they are responsible to-day.

Mr. McGIBBON: Upon what do you base that opinion, in view of the fact that nearly all the provinces have already refused it?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, I would say that, because when the premier of a province, or some other official, writes us and says he has not had time to consider it, or that the time is not opportune just now, that does not mean that the proposals will be turned down. We have the experience of the last election—

Mr. McGIBBON: What about Alberta?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): After this bill becomes law the province of Alberta will gaze upon the fifty per cent that we propose generously to grant to them to care for the aged within their boundaries, and having considered the matter I am satisfied that that province will do as British Columbia has done and will accept the offer made by the Dominion government of fifty per cent of the cost of taking care of these people, who are entitled to be taken care of.

Mr. McGIBBON: It is a wish.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, it is not a wish. It is a statement from experience, and we can only judge from the experience we have already had in regard to these matters.

Mr. SPENCER: What does the minister think will be the cost of administration?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Considering the fact that all our western provinces, as well as Ontario and New Brunswick, have organisations whereby they protect their workmen under the Workmen's Compensation Act, I would say that under the present proposal they will take over the administration of this act. It is the intention of British Columbia, if this bill becomes law, to hand over to the Workmen's Compensation board the administration of this act, and it will add very little to the expense of that department of government. There is undoubtedly a great advantage in having provincial coöperation in the matter of administration alone. If that were the only deciding factor, then this bill should become law, in order that we might have coöperation in administration from the local bodies who are next to the problem, more so than we are. The administrative expenses should not be very great, as hon. members will see if they read the bill. There will be a certain amount of checking between the various provinces and the Dominion government, and some money will be set aside from time to time to be paid out by the provincial governments.

Mr. SPENCER: Will the cost of administration be paid by the provinces?

[Mr. J. H. King.]

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, that is the intention under this bill, and I think it is an important provision, because they have machinery already established that will carry on this administration.

I am intensely interested in seeing that the principle of old age pensions is established in Canada. I conscientiously believe that it is to the advantage of the scheme that the various provinces should be involved and share in the responsibility, and for that reason I am heartily in accord with the legislation. I believe it will be the means of accomplishing very much good throughout the Dominion of Canada. It is true that the provinces have many responsibilities to-day and that they are doing much good work along these lines. We have been told that they have poorhouses and similar institutions, but we know in our hearts that this problem has not been touched in Canada, and there are many old people who would be entitled to contributions under this bill who at present are not being taken care of by the provincial government.

Mr. McGIBBON: Not by this bill.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, many of them would be taken care of by this bill. That is true; nobody would dispute it. We are making a start and a very necessary one, and it will relieve a great many people in this country. An idea seems to prevail that one can eat his pie and have it too. It is not possible.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is not possible. Our friends seem to think we can vote many millions of dollars and at the same time reduce taxation. I think now my point will be understandable to my friends opposite. When we talk of increased expenditures it means increased taxation.

Mr. CANTLEY: The minister who has just sat down appears to argue that as some of the provinces accepted the principle of coöperation in connection with the vote of $20,000,000 for good roads, therefore they will accept this scheme. But the two cases are not at all analogous. Take Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, they had already embarked on a project of improved roads before the $20,000,000 voted by the Borden government became effective, and naturally took advantage of it because it aided them in carrying on that project. I say so because I happened to be a member of the highway board of Nova Scotia which was created by the provincial government to carry on that work.

Mr. VENIOT: In what year did Nova Scotia appoint that board?

Mr. CANTLEY: The minister knows—1918.

Mr. VENIOT: In 1920; and in 1919 the money was voted by the Dominion government.

Mr. CANTLEY: I think the minister is in error as to the dates, and I do not see what his mis-statement has to do with my line of argument. The minister who has just spoken carried out that program for the New Brunswick government. We had already in 1918 embarked on a project of improved roads, and the two provinces were extremely glad to get the assistance of the federal grant. Now we are asked to embark on a totally different project which we have not the money to carry out—at least we do not think we have. The minister has not yet convinced me and, I think, some others that Nova Scotia is to-day in a position to take advantage of this measure. If he wants our people to participate in these pensions, let the government make the contribution $10 a month direct from the federal treasury. Then if the province of Nova Scotia can implement that amount by an equal provincial contribution it will, but if we cannot we will at least get the same proportion as the other provinces. As the bill now stands, the provinces which are not able to implement the amount voted by the federal government will have to bear their proportion of the pensions given those provinces which accept the scheme. Is that fair, is that just, is that reasonable? I leave it to the judgment of the committee.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend seems to have misjudged the whole situation. The roads vote was of a material nature. In this case we are dealing with the human element.

Mr. CANTLEY: Pure sophistry.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Not at all.

Mr. CANTLEY: A dollar is a dollar in either case.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): True; but I have sufficient confidence in the spirit of our people in the various provinces to believe that they will readily accept this legislation, which is of a human character, more readily than they accepted the roads legislation which my hon. friend speaks of.

Mr. McGIBBON: Mr. Chairman, it does seem to me that this is developing into a political scheme. If the government are as willing and anxious as they claim to be to help the poor, why do they not bring down a practical bill? This proposal is a subterfuge. The government are hiding behind the provinces. It is in the interests of the provinces—and I am speaking irrespective of party—to sit back and do nothing, leaving the federal government to foot the bill.

Mr. POULIOT: When the hon. member says that this is a political scheme, does he mean that only members of the Liberal party grow old?

Mr. McGIBBON: That is a joke. I am talking simply about this proposed legislation. It is not intended, and I say so advisedly, as a scheme to help the aged poor. If the government were sincere they would bring down a bill and take full responsibility.

Mr. DUNNING: That is what we are doing right now.

Mr. McGIBBON: I respect the judgment of the Minister of Railways in many things, but not in political things.

Mr. CANNON: That is where you may be wrong.

Mr. McGIBBON: I may be wrong from a political standpoint, but not from a national standpoint. I say that he and his colleagues are hiding behind the provinces. I need only refer to Alberta, which has already repudiated the scheme. If the government want to incur fresh obligations they ought to be prepared to put their hands in the treasury and pay the cost. I ask the Minister of Railways this question: Supposing the province of Saskatchewan from which he comes joins in this scheme, and the province of Ontario from which I come does not, and that a pensioner after living in Saskatchewan for ten years moves into Ontario, or vice versa, how is he going to collect under this scheme? I submit it is absolutely impossible. The result will be that hundreds of old people will be bitterly disappointed, and he knows it. Now, we may differ on political matters, we may differ on—

An hon. MEMBER: Prohibition.

Mr. McGIBBON: Yes, we may differ on prohibition and on many other things, but let me tell him this—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McGIBBON: Many fools may laugh. Let me tell him that this government in laughing at the old people who are depending upon this legislation for sustenance in their old age will not escape censure. How is the Minister of Railways going to harmonize such legislation on the part of the federal parliament with provincial legislation? It is an impossibility. That is why I oppose this bill. I support the principle of old age pensions, but I warn him that this bill will bring hardship and disappointment to tens of thousands of old people throughout the Dominion, as the Minister of Railways will find out before many years.

Mr. THORSON: Mr. Chairman, it is very unfortunate that there should be so much recrimination on so important a subject. This parliament is charged with the responsibility of carrying into effect the mandate which it received from the people last September. One of the issues before the electorate was that of old age pensions. I think the House should carefully consider the form in which that issue was placed before the people, and their verdict upon it. The Liberal party placed before the electorate this identical bill containing the principle of coöperation between the provinces and the Dominion in the form of joint contributions. I hope that I may not be charged with distorting the attitude of the Conservative party towards that policy during the campaign when I say that that party opposed this bill. I will not say that the Conservative party opposed the principle of old age pensions. I freely acknowledged on many a platform during the campaign that my opponent, the previous member representing this constituency, spoke in favour of old age pensions. I do not, therefore, consider it fair to say that the party as such went to the electorate in opposition to the principle of old age pensions. They did, however, oppose the present old age pensions bill, and their opposition took this form. They represented that first of all there should be a conference between the provinces, that the provinces should agree upon a joint policy, and that then, and not till then, should the Dominion embark upon this piece of social legislation. That, I think, fairly represents the attitude of the Conservative party during the campaign. The attitude which we took towards the proposal was this. We contended that if such a policy were adopted we would never get old age pensions. The policy of the Liberal party was to set up the machinery, and to say to the provinces, "We are prepared to contribute fifty per cent of the cost of the scheme. It will then be open to each province to take advantage of it or to stay out, as that province may deem fit".

That, I think, fairly gives to the House the attitude of both parties on the subject of old age pensions. The verdict of Canada was given in favour of the Liberal party, and, therefore, I suggest, it is that party's policy that ought to be carried into effect as largely as possible, I have no recollection that at any time during the recent campaign the leader of the Conservative party ever suggested that the Dominion should embark on a system of old age pensions on a purely federal basis.

Mr. McGIBBON: You had better read last year's debate.

Mr. THORSON: Both parties were agreed, I think, during the campaign that a policy of coöperation, between the provinces on the one hand and the Dominion on the other, should be adopted. I think it is generally admitted that it is safer and wiser that the administration of the scheme should be left in the hands of the provinces: the provincial machinery is closer to the people and is more adapted to their needs. There would be, for example, all sorts of investigations into such matters as proof of age and proof of income, demanding the presence on the spot of officers of the crown, and I think that it is generally agreed that it would be cheaper and more efficient, to have the administration of the act entrusted to the provinces. Furthermore, there is a considerable advantage in a policy of coöperation between the provinces and the Dominion; on this point there is, I fancy, a general agreement in the House. It is true that many members on the other side are now advocating a policy of old age pensions on a purely federal basis, but that was not the policy of the Conservative party in the election campaign, and it is upon the issue before the people that we must decide the question to-day.

As pointed out by many speakers, there is in this bill the advantage that, the provinces and the Dominion being both charged with the responsibility of finding revenues for the administration of the act, it will make for greater economy and efficiency inasmuch as there will be a double check on expenditures, and checks on national expenditures are sorely needed. Again, there is this advantage to be noted: our Dominion revenues are derived from various sources, such as customs duties, excise duties, war tax, income tax, business profits tax, and so forth; our provincial revenues are secured from many different quarters; for example, provincial revenue is derived from federal subsidies, from municipal levies, from the proceeds of natural resources in the case of those provinces that have their natural resources, from corporation taxes, license fees of one sort and another, liquor profits, court fines, legal fees, and so on. By a policy of coöperation between the Dominion and the provinces this great variety of revenue will be made available for the administration of the system, and taxation will be spread over as wide a field as possible. It will hit both rich and poor; it will hit the landowner as well as the tenant; it will hit the industrialist as well as the farmer. That is one great advantage which I see in this form of coöperation between the provinces and the Dominion.

Personally I should like to see the pensions increased, just as I should like to see the age limit reduced. But the state of the national purse must be considered. We are embarking for the first time upon a scheme of social legislation. Does anyone imagine for a moment that we shall not hear of further legislation for social purposes in the future? We shall have to consider in the very near future such schemes as pensions for the blind, unemployment insurance, and so forth; we shall have to see to it that our returned soldiers are properly treated in the matter of pensions and reëstablishment; we shall have to see to it also that our civil servants are properly paid. All these things will require national expenditures and it would be unfair to the various classes of persons whom I have mentioned that we should go too far at the present stage in this particular class of social legislation, lest other social legislation in the future should be severely prejudiced.

Much has been said in the course of this debate about the proportion which the Dominion government should contribute to the cost of the scheme. I take this position with respect to that: if it should be necessary to increase the percentage of the federal contribution to this scheme in order to make old age pensions a success then that percentage will have to be increased, because the state of public opinion is such that old age pensions will be demanded and must be granted. Personally I should like to see a greater contribution made by the Dominion government.

May I refer to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. McPherson)? I think he was the first person to allude to the matter in the course of this debate. He pointed out that under this proposed scheme the cost of administering the system would be charged to the provinces, and in view of that fact it would be only reasonable that the Dominion should pay a little more than fifty per cent as suggested in the present bill. But we are face to face with this very important consideration: I do not myself think that it is as important what percentage is contributed by the Dominion to the provinces, as that the legislation should pass. After all we must recognize that the cost of this legislation must be paid by the taxpayers of Canada, and it makes very little difference to them whether they pay it in one form of taxation to the province or in another form of taxation to the Dominion; if it should be necessary to increase the proportion of the federal contribution to the provinces, then that proportion must be increased. But we are face to face again with actual facts. A certain part of the Conservative party which was not concerned with elections did object to and did oppose the old age pensions bill. They opposed it not on the ground of principle but on the ground of cost, and I think it essential that we should now enact legislation that obtained the approval of the people of Canada in the last election, and that has some hope of passing both houses of parliament. I am therefore in favour of this proposal if the government does not, in view of the state of the national finances, deem it advisable to increase the federal contribution. I think it essential first and foremost that we should now enact legislation that will be sure to pass both houses of parliament.

Mr. ARTHURS: This debate, so far as I have heard the matter debated, was free from any political bias at all, until the Minister of Health introduced it to-night. He was the first man I think to bring the political factor into this discussion, and he was followed by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Thorson).

May I point out to the Minister of Labour a few facts, at least I deem them to be such. The minister says that if this bill is passed we can change it at any time we please. He admits that it is not perfect, and he admits that it is not along the line of the legislation passed by Australia. In the first place it is not along the lines of the Australian legislation because their legislation is purely federal. In the second place their legislation takes care of the sick and the blind. In the third place their age limit is much lower than ours, and their legislation generally is more effective than these proposals can possibly be. The minister will admit that, I think. On the other hand the minister says that if this bill passes we can change the legislation from time to time as we choose. In reply to that I call his attention to clause 4 wherein it is declared that if we enter into an agreement with the provinces there can be no change for ten years. What do my hon. friends think about that? The act is binding upon a province for ten years after its acceptance.

Mr. HEENAN: If the hon. member is going to interpret the clause he might just as well read the whole of it. The clause reads:

Every agreement made pursuant to this act shall continue in force so long as the provincial statute remains in operation or until after the expiration of ten years from the date upon which notice of an intention to determine the agreement is given by the governor general to the lieutenant governor of the province with which the same was made.

Mr. ARTHURS: That is so easy, is it not? That is to say that the province may repeal the legislation and go out of the scheme, but if it stays in it is bound for ten years.

Mr. HEENAN: If you read the next clause you will see that the governor in council must approve the scheme for the administration of pensions, and no change in such scheme shall be made by the province without the consent of the Governor General.

Mr. ARTHURS: Without the consent of the governor in council, but as a matter of fact if a province enters into an agreement it has two choices—either to remain in for ten years or to repeal the legislation which it has already enacted. There is no doubt about that in the mind of the ordinary layman when he reads clause 4.

Then if we turn to clause 10, what do we find? It reads as follows:

Where a pensioner has during part of the twenty years immediately preceding the date of the proposed commencement of pension resided in more than one province in which he would have become pensionable if he had continued to reside therein, the province in which the pension is granted shall be entitled to be reimbursed, by the other province or provinces in which the pensioner has resided as aforesaid, a proportion of the pension equal to the proportion which the duration of the pensioner's residence in such other province bears to twenty years.

How does the Minister of Labour propose to collect that from the other provinces that have not entered into this scheme? Is there any provision under the British North America Act, or under any other act, whereby you can collect this amount from a province which has not given its assent to a scheme of this kind? I might go on and deal with clauses 11 and 12, which are even worse than clause 10, but the minister will see readily that there is no manner of doubt that the government cannot enforce these clauses of the bill if it becomes law.

The Minister of Health has said something with respect to the Dominion grants for roads and for technical education. I think I directed the attention of parliament to that subject earlier in the day. There was a time when the various provinces, or some of them, did not take advantage of the grant for good roads. But the machinery was set up in this city of Ottawa for the administration of that fund of $20,000,000, and most of the provinces have already received from the government all that was coming to them under that act. The machinery is still in existence and we are still paying for the administration of the act, because certain of the provinces have delayed coming under the act as passed by the government of Sir Robert Borden. The same thing is true of technical education. Will the minister say that in any one year the grants for technical education have been assumed by the provinces?

Mr. HEENAN: I will say this, that every province—

Mr. ARTHURS: I have asked a direct question. Has there been any year since the Technical Education Act came into force that the whole amount has been assumed by the provinces?

Mr. HEENAN: I cannot answer that offhand, but I will say this in reply to a question my hon. friend put this afternoon: I think there are nine provinces that have taken part in the matter of technical education—

Mr. ARTHURS: That is not answering the question.

Mr. HEENAN: —and they have already met and asked that the system be extended.

Mr. ARTHURS: That probably is quite true, and the provinces are also asking for an extension of the good roads plan. I do not blame them at all. I think they are perfectly right in asking for it and I would hold up both hands in their favour in that regard. The point I am trying to make is that we are setting up expensive machinery here in Ottawa for the administration of these two laws. There is no doubt about it; the Minister of Labour knows that one-half of his department, or at least a great part of it, is engaged on this question of technical education and has been so engaged for years regardless of the amount paid to the various provinces. Not only that, but every province which did not enter into the good roads scheme or the technical education scheme in the first instance is now claiming the amount which they should have had if they had entered into the scheme at first. What guarantee have we in this instance? If one province comes in this year, as apparently the province of British Columbia is willing to do, or if two or three come in and the remainder stay out for a time, what guarantee have we that these provinces will not ask for the money which would have been due them from the first, saying, "We have taken care of our poor people since that time, and we should be recompensed accordingly." That has been the case with the other two grants and will be so this time, I believe.

One of the hon. members for Winnipeg, just before he sat down, practically annulled the argument he had made by saying that it made very little difference who paid in this particular case. He said it did not matter whether the Dominion or the provinces or the municipalities paid, because in the end the public had to pay for the upkeep of these old people. That is exactly the position I took last year and it is the position I take this year, in which I am supported by the great majority of hon members who surround me. We believe that it should be purely a Dominion scheme if it is introduced into this parliament at all; we can see no other way out of it. Otherwise it will mean a dual administration with added cost and nothing to be gained, because in the end the public have to pay. We are quite willing and glad to pay; no member of this House and no party in this House is more willing to pay for the support of the aged than myself and those members who sit around me, but we want to do it either by a provincial scheme entirely or by a Dominion scheme alone.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

The CHAIRMAN: The Minister of Labour wishes to make an amendment to this clause, and moves that clause 2 be amended by adding the word "gold" before the word "commissioner" in the second line of subsection (d).

Mr. HEENAN: This is to meet the wishes of the hon, member for Yukon (Mr. Black).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. HEENAN: The hon. member for Yukon raised the point that the word "commissioner" did not carry out what was meant by the act and we find that the person meant is the gold commissioner. We feel that the word "commissioner" covers what is intended, but in order to make it perfectly clear we are inserting the word "gold."

Amendment agreed to.

Section 2 as amended agreed to.

On section 4—Term of agreements.

Mr. BOYS: I would like to know from the minister whether under this section this act is binding for ten years, or whether it can be terminated at the end of any period prior to the ten year limit? The minister indicated some thought that that might be his opinion. I can hardly believe that, but I would like to hear his declaration.

Mr. HEENAN: Some of the provinces objected in the first instance on the ground that there was no assurance from the federal government that the act would continue for any length of time. This section is to ensure that the federal government will give at least ten years' notice before withdrawing from the scheme, and the next clause shows that no change will be made in any agreement unless by consent of the governor in council. In other words, we agree to continue this scheme for ten years with the provinces which enter, but surely any scheme entered into can be changed by mutual consent.

Mr. BOYS: The minister has entirely misapprehended the question, and I may say that I received my thought from his own remarks. Let me read section 4:

> Every agreement made pursuant to this act shall continue in force so long as the provincial statute remains in operation—

If we stopped there it would be perfectly manifest that at any time any provincial government could repeal its statute and, ipso facto, the act would be at an end. Is that the intention of the government or is it intended that this should continue for at least ten years?

Mr. HEENAN: No.

Mr. BOYS: Then are we to understand that if this legislation passes the House, at the end of any year at all any province coming under the provisions of this act can repeal the statute?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The Dominion must give ten years' notice.

Mr. LADNER: I wanted to inquire from the minister, following our discussion of the resolution, whether he has considered the advisability of making that ten years' notice work both ways?

Mr. CANNON: It cannot be done.

Mr. LADNER: You can do it by providing for it in the agreement. You can make a condition in the agreement that any province coming under the provisions of the act must give ten years' notice before withdrawing. The point I am making is that the people to consider under this scheme are the old folks who will receive the pension. They may receive their pension for a few years and make their plans depending on this revenue, and for some peculiar reason, either political or otherwise, one of the provinces may suddenly terminate the statute. Suppose the provincial statute were repealed without notice, the assistance of the federal government stops and the old folks find themselves with no pension. Should we not provide against that by saying under the agreement or by statute that both the provincial and the Dominion governments, once having entered into the project, must give ten years' notice?

Mr. BROWN: Objection has been raised to this bill—

Mr. LADNER: If the hon. member does not mind, I am asking the minister a question to which I would like to have an answer.

Mr. BROWN: I was going to speak on the same point before the minister answered.

Mr. McGIBBON: You are not a minister yet.

Mr. BROWN: I would like to point out that objection has been raised to this bill on the ground that it says to the provinces, "Take it or leave it." That expression has been used quite frequently by hon. gentlemen opposite. Would it be likely to make it any more acceptable to the provinces, say to the province of Nova Scotia which the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley) thinks is so hard up that it could not come under this scheme, if we put a clause in this bill compelling the provinces to keep the agreement in force for ten years?

Mr. LADNER: The main consideration should be the old folks, who will receive the pension. That is really the purpose of this legislation, and surely if the Dominion government must give ten years' notice the provinces should do the same.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We have no right to say that.

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend will perhaps allow me to reply. In this legislation we have to bear in mind the respective positions of the provincial and federal governments. So far as the federal government is concerned we can legislate as we wish; we represent this government and we have absolute authority as representatives of the people to bind the federal government. But so far as the provinces are concerned we cannot legislate here and bind them.

Mr. BOYS: That is what you are doing in section 10.

Mr. CANNON: No. We are here dealing with section 4—

[Mr. Ladner.]

Mr. BOYS: You are binding the provinces there.

Mr. CANNON: If my hon. friend will allow me, we are not binding the provinces for any period. Section 4 is divided into two parts. The first part provides that "Every agreement made pursuant to this act shall continue in force so long as the provincial statute remains in operation." We cannot go beyond that. Every lawyer in this House will admit that.

Mr. LADNER: Why can you not provide the term of ten years in your agreement?

Mr. CANNON: We cannot infringe on section 92 of the British North America Act. The provinces can pass legislation, and if they afterwards denounce or determine that legislation, that is the end of it so far as the province is concerned, and we cannot do anything else but what we are doing in this section.

The second part of section 4 deals with what we can do. We can bind the Dominion as a whole, and we are doing it in this parliament. We say that so far as we are concerned our agreement will last at least ten years. We can do that so far as we are concerned, but we cannot do it for the provinces.

Mr. LADNER: Can you not make it a condition to the entering into of this agreement that it shall contain a provision binding the province for a term of ten years? Surely that is within our powers.

Mr. CANNON: If my hon. friend will allow me, under section 91 of the British North America Act we cannot legislate on matters that are within the competency of the provincial legislature. We have to restrict ourselves to section 91. But when it comes to an agreement, the two governments meet, and they can make whatever agreement they are willing to enter into provided always that it is within the general lines of our constitution.

Mr. LADNER: Then why not put the ten years term in your agreement?

Mr. CANNON: The two parties are not represented here. We cannot enter into an agreement in this parliament, because there is only one party here; that is the Dominion. The provinces are not represented here, and how can we in this parliament, as representing only one party, enter into an agreement binding both parties? That is nonsense. Everyone, be he layman or lawyer, knows that you have to have two parties to a contract, and we have only one here. That party is the Dominion, and we are dealing here with what we can do as a Dominion. As to what the other party may do later, it is for that party to decide by passing a law, and then the two parties will meet and enter into an agreement.

Mr. LADNER: Just apply that same line of reasoning to the fifty per cent contribution. The reasoning is absurd.

Mr. CANNON: We are not binding the provinces to pay any fixed sum. We simply say that as far as we are concerned we will pay fifty per cent of what the provinces decide upon for the pension. If it is to be $100, we will pay $50. We will pay fifty per cent of whatever maximum is fixed, but the amount has to be fixed by the provinces.

Mr. LADNER: Why not apply the same process of reasoning so far as the ten year period is concerned?

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend is a very good lawyer, and he knows perfectly well that it is not within our jurisdiction as a federal parliament to bind the province for any period of time.

Mr. LADNER: Just as much as the fifty-fifty is within our power.

Mr. CANNON: We say that the provinces can enter into this scheme on their own volition, but if they do not wish to join in it they are not bound to do so.

Mr. BOYS: Does the minister say that if there is to be an agreement it shall not be binding on both Dominion and province—

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend—

Mr. BOYS: My hon. friend did not permit me to finish. I am aware of the acuteness of his mind, but he might allow me at least to finish my sentence. Does he suggest that there could not be inserted a provision which would be binding not only on the Dominion for ten years but on the province as well? And the moment the province accept that, it will bind them just as much as if they accept the agreement now to pay fifty per cent.

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend knows we have no law that says that an agreement entered into by the Dominion and the province shall be binding on both; everybody admits that. Why enter into an agreement if it is not to be binding on both parties? We do not need to put that in a law. It is an elementary principle.

Mr. BOYS: I agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. McGIBBON: It is common sense.

Mr. CANNON: It is common sense. The distinction that is to be drawn here is very simple. It is the distinction as to what we can do as legislators in this parliament, and we can legislate only within the four corners of section 91. As to an agreement, that is an ordinary contract, and when the two parties to the contract meet they can agree on whatever conditions suit them. But we cannot go into all the conditions of that agreement, because the two parties are not here. We have to wait until the other party can be present.

Mr. McGIBBON: Can this parliament not dictate the terms upon which the agreement will be made?

Mr. CANNON: Certainly not, because if I am to make a contract one of the conditions of its validity is the consent of the other party. How can I say that another party will be called upon to give his or her consent if beforehand I impose the conditions of that contract? I have no right to do it.

Mr. BOYS: Have you not just as much right to fix the duration of the agreement as the amount of the contribution?

Mr. CANNON: Certainly not; not by law. If my hon. friend will allow me, the distinction to be drawn is this: We cannot in a law say that the duration of the agreement shall be ten years, and claim that that law will be binding on the provinces. But when it comes to drawing up an agreement, if the province is agreeable to the period being ten years, then naturally that condition is binding on both parties.

Mr. BOYS: And does not the same argument apply absolutely with regard to the fifty per cent contribution? You cannot say to the province: You shall pay fifty per cent. But you can say: If you are willing to have an agreement, we will each pay fifty per cent. Similarly, you can say that if you are going to have an agreement, it shall be for ten years or not at all.

Mr. CANNON: Certainly not. I do not wish to detain the House, but so far as the amount is concerned, we are not fixing that. We simply say to the province: You fix the amount, and we will pay fifty per cent. One last point. My hon. friend asked: What if the province should change the law or abrogate the statute one year after it had been passed. That may happen; we cannot help it.

Mr. McGIBBON: You could prevent it.

Mr. CANNON: We cannot prevent it. We cannot prevent a provincial legislature from amending or abrogating its own laws. It is to be presumed that the provincial governments will always consider their legislation in the light of public interest; we can assume that none of them will bring in legislation without that consideration in mind. If they did, the constitutional check is there; there is always the electorate to see that any government that is derelict in its duty shall not remain in power.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The minister stated that it might be necessary or advisable later on to bring about certain modifications in this act. I should like to know what the procedure would be in case we find that modifications are necessary. Would it be necessary to obtain the consent of each province that was coöperating? Would there be any difficulty in obtaining such modifications as were found necessary within the next ten years?

Mr. CANNON: Section 5 says that no change in such scheme shall be made by the province without the consent of the governor in council. The proposition could be reversed, and it could be said that we would not be allowed to make any change without the consent of the provinces.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It will be like the laws of the Medes and Persians, incapable of change—at least for ten years.

Mr. HEAPS: We have to get the consent of the nine provinces.

Mr. CANNON: We can change the conditions of any agreement entered into, but the parties to the agreement would have to consent.

Mr. HEAPS: Suppose the government thought it desirable to make certain changes in the act, would it be necessary to call together the provinces which are party to the agreement? If six provinces are favourable to the change and three are not, what would be the position then?

Mr. CANNON: The whole basis of the act is section 3, which says:

> The governor in council may make an agreement with the lieutenant governor of any province.

So that we will have an agreement as between the Dominion and each province, and we cannot change the conditions of that agreement without the consent of the parties to it. There is no doubt about that.

[Mr. McGibbon.]

Mr. BENNETT: I am very glad the Solicitor General agrees more or less with the observations I made the other evening, that the weakness of the legislation is that it endeavours to impose upon the provinces the will of this parliament willy nilly, and I had not expected when I made the observations that one of the law officers of the crown would so soon agree with what I said.

Mr. CANNON: I do not see it.

Mr. BENNETT: Look at section 5, which says:

> Before any agreement made pursuant to this act comes into operation the governor in council shall approve the scheme for the administration of pensions proposed to be adopted by the province, and no change in such scheme shall be made by the province without the consent of the governor in council.

That is clear. Then look at section 8. Section 8 declares what must be in the agreement before it is made. So that antecedently the provinces are restricted and controlled before they are allowed to make an agreement. Section 8 says:

> Provision shall be made for the payment of a pension to every person who, at the date of the proposed commencement of the pension:—
> (a) is a British subject; or, being a widow, was such before her marriage;
> (b) has attained the age of seventy years.

And so on. Then subsection (2) says:

> The receipt of a pension shall not by itself constitute a disqualification from voting at any provincial or municipal election.

Neither the provinces nor the cities are any longer permitted to determine what shall be the qualifications of those who exercise the provincial or municipal franchise, and this Dominion has said antecedently that all those conditions must be in the agreement. What the Solicitor General has said I believe to be sound, namely, that it is not proper for the Dominion to antecedently determine what the provinces must do, and we have said here that the province must agree to these conditions or there will be no agreement and no pensions. We have gone so far as to say that although the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan may enact that certain indigent persons shall not have the right to vote, this parliament shall dominate the provincial legislatures and declare that the receipt of the pension shall not prevent the persons from having a vote, whatever the province may desire. I pointed that out last year. I now ask the hon. member from Winnipeg, who is an astute lawyer, if we have not declared antecedently that there can be no agreement unless a province consents to what we impose upon it as terms of that agreement which we now declare are conditions precedent to any agreement being made. That is the story; it is a simple one and does not, I think, admit of argument.

Mr. BOYS: There is one other feature I wish to speak about. I am in favour of old age pensions, but I want to see a scheme adopted that will be a success and not a failure, and I believe this bill will be a failure. I was informed in regard to section 4 that the provinces had the right, if they saw fit, to terminate the legislation. Look at section 5, which has just been read by the hon. member for West Calgary. That deals with the scheme. But as I presume the scheme in connection with pensions is part of the legislation. If there is not a contradiction there I would like the minister to explain how he can avoid it. Under section 4 each province shall be entitled to terminate the agreement, and section 5 says that no change in such scheme shall be made by the province without the consent of the governor in council. Well, if the scheme is part of the legislation—and I should think it would be—how can those two sections be consistently read together? In the first place, if what I am told under section 4 is right, the whole thing can be put an end to by a termination of the agreement, and that would mean the repeal of the scheme and everything connected with it so far as the provinces are concerned. Then if you turn to section 5 you find in the closing sentence, "no change in such scheme shall be made by the province without the consent of the governor in council". If the governor in council withholds his consent you cannot make a change in the scheme; the repeal of the provincial act would do the province no good, because they would still be responsible for maintaining the pension. Surely the minister will pay some regard to that. It is absolutely contradictory. If the power he advocates is there under section 4, there should be a change in section 5. If it is the intention that under section 5 no change shall be made without the consent of the governor in council, which means this government, then there must be a change made in section 4. Surely it must be manifest that it is contradictory. Let us get together if we can, and if this measure is to go through, let us get something that will be effective and binding. If a province is going to enter into the scheme at all it should do so for some set period and not with the right to cancel it at any time. Let it be binding for a number of years, so that old people may depend upon it for a certain period at all events, and not be at the will of any province at the end of a year. If that is the intention we must recast the provisions of section 5.

Mr. HEENAN: I have listened to the two members who have argued this matter from the legal standpoint, but from the point of view of the layman the matter is quite clear to me. The hon. gentleman is dealing with two different cases. One case is that when the federal government enter into an agreement with a province respecting old age pensions they are to continue their obligation for ten years; and it is provided, of course, that the provincial governments may drop it at any time they see fit. As to section 5, it is entirely a different thing. If an agreement is in existence and operating the agreement cannot be changed without the consent of both parties.

Mr. BOYS: Does the minister not see the contradiction there?

Mr. HEENAN: I cannot quite understand the position taken by different members on the other side of the House, because a little while ago they were arguing that we ought not to impose any expense on the province, and now they are arguing the other way, that when the provinces enter into an agreement we should bind them to ten years.

Mr. BOYS: Yes, if you are going to have an effective agreement .

Mr. HEENAN: I do not think so.

Mr. BOYS: The minister says in one breath that at the end of one year a province can repeal the agreement, but in section 5 we are told that once the scheme is approved it cannot be changed without the consent of the governor in council. If that is so, and the governor in council does not consent to the change, the agreement which has been signed by the province pursuant to the legislation must stand.

Mr. CANNON: Section 4 and section 5 do not cover the same thing.

Mr. BOYS: One is the agreement, the other the scheme.

Mr. CANNON: Section 4 says that when an agreement is entered into it is subject to certain considerations as to duration.

Mr. BOYS: Certainly.

Mr. CANNON: Section 5 deals with a different thing altogether. It provides that the agreement entered into in accordance with section 4 will be followed by a scheme of administration. That is common sense. If we want to have that agreement effective we have to work it out, and in view of the fact that the province and the Dominion is each contributing, we say to the province: Submit your scheme to us so that we may make any suggestions we think necessary for its improvement. After the scheme of administration has been agreed on, we say to the provincial authorities: You will not be able to change that scheme of administration without letting us know. I do not see what objection there can be to that.

Mr. BOYS: Then the suggestion is that we have this ridiculous state of affairs--legislation of the province declaring the agreement at an end, but the scheme continuing for years to come.

Mr. CANNON: Not at all.

Mr. BOYS: There is no alternative.

Mr. CANNON: The agreement is a binding contract, but the scheme of administration is purely a matter of administration.

Mr. McGIBBON: If the minister's argument is to be taken seriously, it seems to me to be the biggest piece of nonsense ever developed in this House.

Mr. CANNON: I am sorry my friend takes it that way.

Mr. McGIBBON: It means that two parties enter into an agreement but that the agreement is binding on one party only

Mr. CANNON: My friend did not get my argument.

Mr. McGIBBON: I got the common sense of it anyway.

Mr. BROWN: Section 4 says:

Every agreement made pursuant to this act shall continue in force so long as the provincial statute remains in operation—

So long as the provincial statute remains in operation.

—or until after the expiration of ten years.

Section 4 binds the Dominion government to continue the agreement for ten years. The question has been asked, What about the provincial government? Well, this clause simply says nothing about it. It seems to me that section 5 is misinterpreted because the thought has been injected into our minds that we say definitely that the provincial government shall have the privilege of withdrawing, but section 4 says the agreement shall continue in force—

—so long as the provincial statute remains in operation.

[Mr. Cannon.]

Section 5 assumes that the provincial statute has not been repealed, and it simply says that while that statute is in operation the provisions of the scheme for administration shall be approved by the governor in council.

Mr. BOYS: I should like to ask the member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) or the Solicitor General what is to happen to the scheme if the agreement goes by the board. Does not the scheme say how much the old man or the old woman is to get per year? I must be absolutely stupid or I ought to be able to convince the Solicitor General—at all events the Minister of Public Works—that there is something in the point I am suggesting. If the scheme is part of the agreement, and if it cannot be varied except by the consent of the governor in council, then what right can there be in the province to terminate the agreement? And if the agreement is terminated, does not the scheme go by the board with the agreement?

Mr. CANNON: The tail follows the dog.

Mr. BOYS: If that is right, are you not in conflict when you read section 5 with section 4? I see my friends on the front benches nodding their heads. Well, I am willing to be convinced. Let me again ask for an explanation from the Solicitor General. If the scheme is part of the agreement, and if the province can abrogate the agreement or the statute on which it is based, then the scheme goes with it, and how can you apply section 5, which says the governor in council must be a party?

Mr. CANNON: Section 4 is the cause, section 5 is the effect. The moment the cause disappears the effect disappears also. In other words, the tail follows the dog.

Mr. THOMPSON: How would it be to have section 4 read:

Every agreement made in pursuance of this act shall continue in force until after the expiration of ten years from the date upon which notice of intention is given by either party to the other to determine the same.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The answer, it seems to me, is exactly the answer that has been given before, that there is no intention to force the province to continue any agreement with the Dominion after it wishes to withdraw.

Mr. BOYS: Clause 5 does that.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No. Clause 4 says the province may terminate it at any time, that is by repealing its statute.

Mr. BOYS: The scheme too.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Everything. The agreement and the scheme are practically one thing. By section 4, if the province wants to terminate the scheme and the agreement, it repeals its statute; or if the Dominion wants to terminate it gives ten years' notice. In other words, under section 4 you can terminate by repealing your statute, but under section 5 you cannot change the scheme without the consent of the governor in council.

Mr. MANION: You cannot change. the details.

Mr. BOYS: Then if the province is not satisfied with the scheme, all it has to do is to terminate the whole business?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. McGIBBON: Does not the minister see that under a regulation of that kind a great hardship might result to pensioners? Surely he must see the absurdity of it.

Mr. IRVINE: I understand the minister explained just now that we could not fix a ten-year period for clause 4 that would be binding on the provinces because they might not want it. In subsection 3 of section 9 we are providing for the recovery of pension payments out of the deceased pensioner's estate. I am not sure that the province of Alberta wants to do that. But if we can legislate to compel the provinces to sell the effects of deceased pensioners and turn the proceeds into the general fund, why cannot we fix a ten-year period? Is there any difference in the two cases?

Mr. CANNON: All these provisions alluded to by my hon. friend can only become effective if the provinces give their consent to them. Otherwise we would be legislating outside our own jurisdiction. We are dealing with property and civil rights and this is a matter that comes within the purview of the provinces. By their consent, however, we can always legislate in this field and the clauses to which I have referred can, as I have pointed out, become effective only with the consent of the provinces.

Mr. IRVINE: Is not that true of clause 4?

Mr. CANNON: That is the point I am making. In clause 4 we are not imposing anything on the provinces.

Section agreed to.

Sections 5, 6 and 7 agreed to.

On section 8—What persons are pensionable.

Mr. MANION: I want to offer a suggestion which has been submitted to me by the Canadian Legion and which I think is fair. It is to the effect that returned soldiers who have served in any theatre of war—I am really adding the qualification "who have served in any theatre of war"—be pensionable at the age of sixty-five instead of seventy, in the event of their having become prematurely aged as the result of such service. I move in amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Burrard, that the following words be added to paragraph (b) of subsection 1 of section 8:

—or in the case of returned soldiers who have served in any theatre of war and who have reached the age of sixty-five years.

Medical men on both sides of the House know that a large proportion of these men who actually served in any theatre of war were subject to nervous shocks, from shells and other causes, which have made them prematurely old. In many cases they have been injured beyond remedy although they cannot physically establish the fact. They are incapacitated to a large extent from work of any kind, and while medical examiners may be convinced of the fact they are unable to recommend a pension under the pensions act simply for the reason that no demonstration is possible. It would be a splendid thing for this parliament to show its appreciation of these men who have fought for their country and I hope that the government will adopt this suggestion.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In such cases as the hon. member mentions, would not such soldiers be pensionable or be given a larger pension?

Mr. MANION: There are many men who would receive consideration from the pensions board because of such injury as I allude to.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They would draw larger pensions, would they not?

Mr. MANION: Yes, provided they could prove their injury; and in that case, of course, they would not come under this legislation. But, as I am pointing out, in many cases returned soldiers, although they may be genuinely incapacitated, cannot demonstrate their injury to the board. Every medical man who has had any dealings with returned soldiers knows very well that there are many such men who, to medical men, are obviously unable to perform their duties as efficiently as they formerly did. Unfortunately, however, they cannot demonstrate this to the board. Injuries of this description are known in medicine as functional; they are more or less imaginary. There is no organic disorder, the patient's condition being due to nervous weakness which cannot be demonstrated. There is no actual change in the bodily structure. There are thousands of men in this country—I say this advisedly—perhaps tens of thousands in this category who have a moral right to consideration under this legislation but who will not get it. It is that type of man I want to reach.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The amendment proposes a reduction in the age limit of five years in regard to a certain class of the population. It may be possible, and I hope it will be, for the minister to reduce the general age limit to that extent.

The CHAIRMAN: Before there is any further discussion of the proposed amendment I may observe tentatively that in my opinion this motion falls in the same category as some of those proposed this afternoon. The amendment moved by the hon. member for Fort William seeks to have the age limit reduced to sixty-five years in the case of returned soldiers who have served in any theatre of war. The general age limit fixed in this bill is seventy years. The amendment would widen the scope of the bill in relation to returned men and, if adopted, would conflict with section 170 of rule 13, which provides:

> The committee of supply cannot increase a grant which has been recommended by a message from the Governor General. It is also irregular to increase any item in a resolution. But any motion to reduce a grant will be always in order.

In my opinion the effect of this amendment would be to increase the grant contemplated and for that reason I am inclined to consider the motion out of order.

Mr. CLARK: Apart altogether from the question whether or not the amendment is out of order, I submit that it is quite in order for a member at this stage to discuss the proposed age limit. Before you rule on the admissibility of the motion, Mr. Chairman, if you have not done so already, I am going to ask the government to adopt the suggestion which has been made by the hon. member for Fort William and move it as a government amendment. I support it, not because I believe that it is going to meet the situation which is developing in this country to-day in regard to the prematurely old; I do not think it will do so. I took up this afternoon with the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Reëstablishment a case which is typical of a great many and which will have to be dealt with by the government sooner or later if this country is to do its duty. We feel very strongly that the ordinary man who served in any theatre of war has been incapacitated to such an extent that his life, so far as its usefulness is concerned, has been shortened by at least five years. Certainly the period during which he will be able to provide for himself and his family has been reduced to that extent. The typical case I want to submit to the government is the one which I discussed this afternoon with the Minister of Civil Reëstablishment. Here is a man who enlisted for service overseas and whose capacity apparently was one hundred per cent fit. He returns to Canada an invalid. After a couple of years his pension is commuted. He has been getting a small pension which is commuted to $300. But in about another year the man has become practically eighty per cent disabled, and I want to say this—that the pension doctors admit that his disability is due to his war service. They admit that, or they admit it to this extent: They say that he is disabled eighty per cent, but that his disability has merely been aggravated by his war service and that he is therefore not entitled to the full pension provided for by the Pensions Act, but they give him a pension for the aggravation only. Now in the particular case that I have before me there are numerous affidavits filed with the department to the effect that the man was one hundred per cent fit when he went overseas. To-day the pension doctors admit that he is one hundred per cent disabled. He is an invalid, in bed; he has ten children, and he is 56 years of age. Two of his sons were killed overseas, and one won the military cross. Two returned and one is engaged in looking after his own wife and family. Another I think is not married but is looking after his own reëstablishment. Of the other six one is dead, but the remaining five are young children. This man is on his back, and his wife has been obliged to keep a boarding house. She is breaking her health in an attempt to look after her invalid husband. This country says that man is only entitled to be paid a fifty per cent pension because his disability, as it is said, is only an aggravation of something that existed before. But the man was one hundred per cent fit when he enlisted, so far at least as his power to engage in his occupation was concerned. Now I say that that is not right; it is something this parliament should take into consideration. The case I have cited is of course an extreme case so far as the principle of old age pensions is concerned, but there are thousands of men in this country who are prematurely aged, who are not suffering from a disability admitted to be a disability due to the war at all. These men are incapable of earning a livelihood, and I say that this government might well to-day adopt the principle suggested, and give to these men a pension at the age of sixty-five. I make the suggestion now that the time has arrived when a survey of the conditions in this respect should be made and a provision introduced into the bill that will take care of this situation, which is becoming a very serious one indeed.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think my hon. friend's remarks would be proper under certain conditions. But he is interjecting into the old age pensions bill, which was never intended to cover such cases, matters relating to the pension act and legislation pertaining to the returned soldier. Other legislation has been enacted to meet such cases. If that legislation requires amendment to meet the situation my hon. friend speaks of, and I think in some respects it does, let us deal with it when we come to it and not involve such matters in a bill of this kind. That was stated two sessions ago, and I think last year, and generally accepted, and it would be a great mistake to deal with the soldier problem under such an enactment as is proposed here. Undoubtedly there is developing in Canada a problem in regard to returned soldiers, the cases of men who are becoming prematurely old on account of their services. That will be a problem this parliament will have to consider, but I do not think it should be thrust into such a discussion as we have had to-night.

As regards a survey of the situation, surveys are being made from time to time. There are various veterans' organizations throughout Canada that meet annually and many of them are making suggestions as to their conditions and requirements. Those are being presented to the Department of Soldiers' Reëstablishment and by that department, or by the government, are being brought to the attention of parliament. But I think it would be a mistake to inject into a bill of this character, matters which should be to some extent provided for by special legislation.

Mr. MANION: I do not think the Minister of Health is correct in suggesting that there would be an injustice to anybody if we injected, as he termed it, this matter into the old age pensions bill.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Not injustice.

Mr. MANION: Then if there is no injustice I do not see where there should be any objection to it. I do not see why we should not inject it into this bill as we have already done in the case of the Civil Service Act. In that act we give a preference to the returned soldier, and quite rightly, and I certainly see no reason why we should not do so in the present bill.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Is not the Civil Service Act purely a federal measure, and would we be justified in saddling this added responsibility upon the provinces?

Mr. MANION: I see no reason, if this legislation is saddled upon the provinces, why they should not have to deal with the returned soldiers also—I see no reason against it. The chairman stated that he was going to rule this out of order. I rather imagined it would be ruled out of order if he adheres to the letter of the law—I will not argue it is a question which should not be ruled out—but if it is ruled out I think the government will be taking not only a wise course and a proper course from the standpoint of the returned soldiers, but taking a good political course also—and they know how to play politics better than anybody else in the House that I know of. And so it might be wise to play a political part along this line and adopt the suggestion. The Minister in charge of the Department of Soldiers Civil Reëstablishment should be supporting my suggestion and not opposing it. The Minister of Public Works might adopt it and make it his baby. I will not object. He can take the paternity of it if he likes and make a motion on behalf of the government. What I am trying to do is to get the idea adopted. I do not care who gets the credit as long as it is adopted and put in force for the good of the returned soldiers.

Mr. LADNER: I rose just for a moment to answer the point which was raised by the Minister of Health. For myself I am heartily of the opinion that something should and must be done in connection with these returned men as to whom the hon. member (Mr. Clark) gave a very typical case. We are all getting scores of cases of that kind, and as time goes on there is being developed a real need for consideration on the part of those men whose health is impaired, but which impairment according to medical science cannot be attributed to military service, to use the language of the act. But as I understand the purpose of the amendment it is really within the realm of the general principle of old age pensions. It applies to men who have served in a theatre of war and whose health has to some extent been impaired. Whether it be through a sense of justice or whether it be gratitude for their services these men who find themselves in impecunious circumstances at the age of sixty-five should be entitled to an old age pension, but without regard to whether at an earlier stage of their life, through disabilities arising from military service, they should or should not have received military pension. I would ask the minister to consider that aspect. The purpose of this resolution is quite different; this is to provide for an old age pension, but the amendment would provide a pension for a class of men who have done a service to the nation and who, from the fact that they have seen service in the war, have attained old age at sixty-five where an ordinary man would not reach old age until seventy.

Mr. BROWN: The hon. member for Fort William has left. I wanted to ask him a question.

Mr. CLARK: He will be back in a moment; he has just gone to the telephone.

Mr. BROWN: Perhaps the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark) would be able to give me an answer. I would like to know whether in the view of those supporting this amendment its immediate effect would be to take in any considerable number of men. I imagine myself that such would not be the case. It seems to me that of necessity the number of men who would immediately benefit by such a provision would be very small, and would continue to be small during the next five or ten years.

Mr. CLARK: I might inform my hon. friend that it was surprising how many enlisted men, even in the early stages of the war, were over fifty years of age.

Mr. BROWN: I quite agree that there are large numbers of men who can show no wounds but yet are physically disabled as a result of the war. One of the worst cases I ever saw had no trace of a wound, yet he was a complete nervous wreck. The question in my mind was whether this would have any immediate value.

Mr. CLARK: That is the only answer I can give the hon. member.

Mr. McGIBBON: I would like to support this suggestion, which brings up the difficulty of trying to set an age limit. Any medical man like the Minister of Health knows that many men are older at fifty than others at sixty and seventy, due in many cases to inherent causes. For instance, the arterial condition has a pronounced effect on the length of life, and that condition runs not only through families but through generations. The mode of life would also make a difference, and there is no question at all in my mind that any man who went through the trying ordeals of the war, especially in the front line trenches, has had his span of life shortened by anywhere from five to fifteen years, and in many cases more. If this parliament is to do justice to these people who have reached that stage of their life where they can no longer earn their own living, the age limit should not be set at any particular period. The period at which this act should operate is that period when the man or woman can no longer, through physical or mental causes, earn a living. I raised the objection before and I raise it now, that seventy years of age is too late in life for this act to be of any material value. Speaking offhand I would say that from seventy-five per cent to ninety per cent of the people of this country who should benefit under this act will never do so if the age limit is left at seventy years, because dissolution will have set in long before that. If this is to be a humanitarian act we must put the age limit at such a time as will benefit the people concerned, and that must be the time when their conditions no longer allows them to earn a living. As one who served in the front line trenches and who watched the operations of the war I say that in the cases of these men the limit of their earning capacity will be reached anywhere from five to twenty years earlier than in the case of those who remained in civilian life. Consequently I think the point raised by the hon. member for Fort William is well taken and should be considered by this House. I do not say that the period should be arbitrarily fixed at five years; I do not know what period it should be fixed at and I do not think any member of this House knows. I do say, however, that if you are going to administer this act in the spirit of equity it cannot be so administered as presented to the House to-night. Consequently I have much pleasure in supporting the amendment.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: The point raised by the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Adshead) in this connection is a sound one, I believe. Premature old age is a war disability, as we are finding out more and more, and I believe it will have to be dealt with in the future through our pension act or through some form of assistance to old soldiers who are unable to carry on. I do not believe, however, that it is quite sound to incorporate such a suggestion in an old age pension act which is primarily a provincial matter, which must be administered by the provinces and half the cost of which must be borne by the provinces. In my opinion it would seem that the federal government would be passing off a part of its responsibility for war disabilities to governments which have no responsibility in that connection at all.

Mr. MANION: Why did not the provincial governments have as much responsibility for the war as the federal government?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: It has been generally admitted in this House and in the provincial houses that any disability arising from the war is the responsibility of the federal government alone.

Mr. McGIBBON: That is all nonsense.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I have looked the matter up, and that is what I find. I believe it would simply mean that when the time comes for the revision of the pension act to deal with these cases, that work would be handicapped by the fact that this legislation had already been passed. We in this House must not shirk our responsibility, and that responsibility must be carried out in a more generous way than is allowed under this measure. I think the objection is a sound one, not because I believe those men should not be taken care of but because I believe premature old age due to war service is just as much a war disability as wounds or gas or nervous troubles.

Mr. MANION: But these men are not being looked after.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: They will be looked after, and in my opinion this will only be passing the buck to the provinces and would in the long run prevent or delay the passing of such legislation by the federal government.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I think every member of this House has had men come to him or write him who have served in the theatre of war but who have been unable to get on the pension list; there are many such cases. I have no doubt whatever that generally speaking the ages of these men have been advanced by at least five years. That is to say, comparing a man who did not go to war at seventy years of age with a man who did serve in a theatre of war, we may take it as a general proposition that the second man is old at sixty-five. In regard to this matter, Mr. Chairman, I find myself very much in agreement with the Minister of Health. This old age pension scheme is one in which the federal government is asking the coöperation of the provinces, and the responsibility for the administration of the act will be placed upon the provinces. In regard to pensioning those soldiers who become old at sixty-five, or younger than that if you like—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Probably sixty.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Very true. I say that is a responsibility that primarily, and secondarily, and all the way down the line from A to Z, rests upon the Dominion of Canada as a whole. It is not the province of Ontario or the province of Quebec or any other province on which the responsibility rests for sending the men to the war. It was the Dominion of Canada that had that responsibility, and it is a duty devolving upon the people of the whole of Canada and the federal government to look after and provide for the soldiers who saw service in the war. It may be that there are not many of them at the present time who are nearing sixty-five, although I do believe that there were very many men who saw service overseas, who in their zeal to go across misrepresented their age, representing themselves as younger than they actually were. But apart altogether from whether you put the age limit at sixty or sixty-five, we have got to consider, and I think we ought to consider it now, the best ways and means of facing this problem. It is a solemn and sacred duty resting upon the government of this country to consider carefully how we can play the game and keep faith with the men who served overseas in the theatre of war and whose earning powers were thereby depreciated. It is our duty, and no part of that duty, as a matter of principle, should be placed upon any province. If you shift that responsibility or any part of it on to any province, it will bear more heavily on some provinces perhaps that it will on others. You avoid all that by the federal government assuming what is properly a responsibility resting solely in my judgment upon the federal government. The matter is one which in my opinion should be brought in separately, apart altogether from this old age pension act. It is something which ought to be dealt with, and dealt with speedily, in order that we shall not be disgraced, as all of us should feel we were disgraced, if in the years to come men in dire circumstances and in need of assistance were pointed to as men who had been forgotten by the country they served. We should provide against that by putting on our statute books at the earliest possible moment legislation which will make ample provision for any such cases.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I just wanted to say a word in answer to some of the suggestions of the hon. member for Fort William. I think we are all agreed that the fullest possible measure of justice should be meted out to the men in this country at the present time who find themselves impaired in health and efficiency on account of their war service. But may I just point out to my hon. friend, who put the question more or less to me, that it is not a new question. It was discussed last year at considerable length with regard to reducing the age limit for certain classes, and the most pathetic appeal perhaps that came to the government during the whole course of that legislation was the appeal that was re-echoed by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George this afternoon on behalf of the blind. There are several classes who feel, honestly and sincerely, that they should be entitled to come within the purview of this act, and at an age far below the seventy year limit. That matter was carefully considered last year, and it was thought to be unwise in the interests of old age pensions to attempt to make an exception on behalf of any one particular class. I think the House is fairly unanimous in regard to that at the present time.

I quite agree with what has been said by the member for Fort William, the member for Vancouver-Burrard and other hon. members. I know, having been Minister of Soldiers Civil Reëstablishment for a time, how interested these hon. members are on behalf of returned soldiers, who certainly are entitled to every consideration. But may I call attention to the fact that the special committee that considered this question did not recommend a pension for those under seventy years of age—

Mr. CLARK: That point was never considered by that committee.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That was in 1924, when the war had been over for six years, and if it were not considered by that committee, that is not the strongest evidence my hon. friend could adduce that it was a very live issue so far as this bill is concerned

Mr. McGIBBON: Nobody says that it is a live issue anywhere in Canada.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Perhaps my hon. friend will finish later on. May I call attention to the fact that in England up to 1925 there was no exception to the seventy year limit, and only after 1925 was the contributory provision introduced. Perhaps the strongest argument, and the one that must appeal particularly to those who have been looking after the interests of the provinces, is that raised by the hon. member for East Calgary and the hon. member for Red Deer, supported by the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington, that pensions for returned soldiers is a federal matter.

Mr. IRVINE: Is not that the very reason why it should be taken up here and in this bill? If we agree that service at the front has reduced the longevity of earning power of a soldier by five years, and he becomes indigent in Alberta at sixty-five, does it not fall upon that province to take care of him until he is seventy without any aid from the federal government at all? For that very reason I argue that we ought to provide for that class in this bill.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I cannot agree with my hon. friend, and I think on second thought he will agree he has taken an incorrect view of the situation. Whatever pension a man is entitled to on account of impaired efficiency due to war service must surely be a federal matter, and not a matter resting upon the provincial government. For the reasons given, I think that the bill will be in danger, and you are not assisting I believe the cause that we all want to assist, if you make any exceptions in favour of any particular class. The matter was considered, as I said, a year ago, and the best judgment of the whole House at that time was that it would not be wise at present to attempt to go further than to put through a bill that would give relief to those over seventy years of age.

Mr. McGIBBON: Would the minister seriously argue before this House that the qualification for a pension should be age limit rather than incapacity to earn a living? Surely the only justification for an old age pension is that a man's physical infirmities unfit him to earn a living. There is no other justification for it under heaven.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend is quite right if he is dealing with inefficiency pensions, but this is an old age pension. Age is the basis of limitation.

Mr. McGIBBON: Surely the minister will not seriously contend that a man who is physically fit at seventy and can earn a living should have a pension, while a man who is physically unfit at sixty-five and unable to earn a living is not entitled to a pension.

Mr. MANION: I cannot agree at all with hon. members, whether they belong to my own party or other parties, who claim that the provinces have no responsibility in regard to the returned soldier. I think it is not only a Dominion responsibility but a provincial, a municipal and a personal responsibility. I do not admit at all that these pious platitudes which we hear that we should treat the soldier the best we can is going to do the soldier any good, whereas a clause in this bill giving the right to the returned soldiers to have a pension at the age of sixty-five, when many of them are old men long before that, due to the war, would be of some benefit to them. I submit once more that the provinces should be very happy to take the attitude that they should help returned soldiers who require help. It would apply only to those who needed help, and probably only a small number would come under it. The argument that we should place legislation on the statute book to look after these returned soldiers seems to me to be a sound one. But we have not that legislation on the statute book, and thousands of returned soldiers in this country are incapacitated from earning their living because of services at the front, so that I look upon it as the duty of the government presenting this bill to make it apply to returned soldiers with some better advantage than it is applied to the ordinary workingman. I hope the government seriously consider this matter. The position taken by my good friend the Minister of Public Works every time anybody offers suggestions about the bill, that we are hindering the bill and going to do harm is, with all due respect, not well taken—I was going to say ridiculous, but I do not wish to be disrespectful. The different bills are brought into this House and submitted to hon. members in order that they may offer suggestions and propose amendments. The Minister of Health took three-quarters of an hour in presenting his argument, and the gist of his whole speech was that we should accept the principle of the bill. Well, we accepted it on the second reading, but I think we should endeavour to look after our returned soldiers a little better than we look after the men who did not go to the front, and I do not think the House would be doing any injury to the provinces or to the people generally by giving the returned soldier a little better benefit than we are giving the ordinary citizen.

Miss MACPHAIL: Why place the age at sixty-five? Many men much younger than that are totally or almost totally incapacitated on account of the war, and they are not covered by the provisions of the act. Why should we make the age sixty-five? I would be willing to include all soldiers who are unable to make a living under the pension act, no matter what their age may be.

Mr. MANION: I desire to express my gratitude to the hon. member for Southeast Grey for her supporting of my contention, and I will go as far as she will in that direction. But seeing how hard it is to get an acceptance of my suggestion as to sixty-five years, how much more trouble would I have if I proposed that the age should be placed at sixty? I am suggesting that sixty-five shall be the age. If the hon. member for Southeast Grey can convince the minister to go lower than sixty-five I will back her up to the last dollar.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It appears to me that the hon. member for Fort William has rather answered his own argument. We are all very much interested in seeing that the men who fought in the theatre of the war should have special consideration.

Mr. McGIBBON: Why do they not get it?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The act which was passed by parliament in that connection is being administered. If the act requires amendment, I suggest that we amend it. It has been well understood between the provinces and the Dominion that the Dominion government would shoulder first the responsibility of the war, and I think in that respect my hon. friend's position is well taken. If men who performed war service are under the existing pension act unable to receive consideration, the act should be amended. That is the direction in which we should move.

Mr. MANION: It has been amended very many times, but it has not reached many thousands whom it could reach.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Then amend it, and let this House do the amending. My next point is that I do not think the case of the returned men should be confused with those who will come under the provisions of the act for pensions for disability. All the people who reach seventy years of age are not going to receive pensions. It is only those unable to support themselves who will come under this measure.

Mr. MANION: It is true of the soldiers.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The same thing applies to them. But my contention is, that the provincial authorities should not have the responsibility of dealing with these cases; that it is purely and simply a federal matter and should be dealt with accordingly.

Mr. MANION: Does my hon. friend forget that all day the members on this side of the House have taken the attitude that this whole thing should be a federal matter? The minister was taking the opposite position, but now he is defending the provinces.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, you cannot put it in that way. The provinces and the Dominion should assume their own responsibilities. I am not suggesting that we should adopt my hon. friend's amendment, placing the full responsibility on the Dominion government, in a measure of this kind, but I am willing to go any length my hon. friend will go to amend the pension act to take care of the returned soldier.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the minister has not apprehended the point. If to-day a citizen in Calgary or Edmonton who served in the war is unable to support himself, he is a charge upon the municipality and not the Dominion.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I say he should not be.

Mr. BENNETT: And the Dominion has declined always to contribute to the municipality for the purpose of his support.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is my hon. friend not wrong in that statement so far as the returned soldier is concerned?

Mr. McGIBBON: No.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister is talking about war disability as distinguished from indigence. If a man of forty who went to the war is unable to support himself and his family, the municipality has to support him.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Where it was demonstrated that the indigent was a returned soldier, the full payment for relief was given by the Dominion.

Mr. CLARKE: Under what legislation?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Up until a year ago.

Mr. CLARK: No.

Mr. McGIBBON: Every medical man in this country knows, as I fancy every member of parliament does, that there are tens of thousands of ex-soldiers in this country who are incapacitated and unable to make a living, and who have not been able to attach that incapacity to the federal government and get a pension. In order to get a pension you have to attach yourself to a physical disability. Many men in this country are like a battery which has been discharged and cannot be recharged. They are physically and mentally incapable of making a living; they are a charge upon the municipality and you cannot fasten that responsibility upon the pension board. I have tried it, every member of this House probably has tried it, certainly every medical man has tried it. That is the case we are pleading to-night, the case of the man who cannot attach his disability to his war service in such a degree as to get a pension, and yet he is a charge upon the state. Those cases are existing in thousands. They were physically fit when they went to the war, but to-day they are physically unfit. The contention of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) is perfectly correct: those men should have consideration not only in this but in every other legislation of a similar character.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Mr. Chairman, I agree with some of the members on the other side that there are a great many returned men in this country who should have pensions. They may not be able to show that their disability is connected with the war, nevertheless it is due to the terrible trials they went through at the front. As a result their systems have become weakened and in some cases they have since contracted disease which had they been in a normal condition of health they would not have been subject to. Those men to-day are a charge upon the state, but I cannot see that putting the age limit at 65 in this bill will help them very much, because it will be twenty years before many of them can take advantage of it.

Mr. MANION: This government would not have anything to worry about then.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I think legislation should be enacted whereby any returned man who is unable to earn a living, whether due to his war service or not, should be looked after by the Dominion government.

Mr. CLARK: Mr. Chairman, I would draw the attention of the government to remarks that were made in this House nearly five years ago when this very problem was brought to the attention of the government. I well remember that the minister in charge of pensions at that time, the Hon. Dr. Beland, made the same statement that the present minister and several of his colleagues have made this evening, namely, that this is a federal responsibility which comes under the soldier legislation, the Pensions Act, and that if that act is not broad enough to take care of these cases it should be amended. I am in full agreement with that. But I ask, why, when this situation was recognized by the government five years ago and by the then Minister of Soldiers' Civil Reëstablishment, it has not been dealt with. That is why we make this suggestion to-night in order that, something may be done to take care of the situation.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): During all these years large sums have been paid out annually for this very purpose.

Mr. CLARK: Not to take care of these cases at all. They are not being dealt with and have not been dealt with by any legislation. They may have been dealt with spasmodically by some unemployment relief, more or less applicable to all classes in the community. This is an entirely different situation. The member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) said that this legislation will not help the returned men because it will be twenty years before they can take advantage of it. I repeat what I said a few minutes ago. I know of many returned soldiers who were over fifty when they enlisted, and who would qualify to-day if this measure were in force and the age limit were 65. In fact there are many who would qualify at the age of 60. I suggest that most of these men lost five years from their commercial enterprises and their lives have been shortened probably by five years. That in my opinion should make them qualify ten years younger than the average man. We are only asking that they qualify five years younger. That request, I think, is very fair and reasonable.

I agree that this is a Dominion responsibility, and that the pension act should be amended, but I do not believe that any province will object to do something towards alleviating this situation. The member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) made the point very clear. If at the age of sixty-five these men are indigent and unable to take care of themselves by their own labour, they become a charge upon the municipality and upon the province in which they reside, and the province must care for them anyway. Why not recognize that situation now, and if the responsibility is federal let the federal government say, We will contribute one-half of the amount that the municipality or the province is obliged to contribute by reason of that situation.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I agree with what has been said by the previous speaker. As a matter of fact, last session I made a similar suggestion to the House, and the present Minister of Health then took the same stand that he takes to-night. In answer to a question by myself he admitted that the government did not propose to bring in any legislation at that session to meet the situation. I suppose the same answer would be given to-night as to giving a preference to the returned men in this connection. I go a little further. In my opinion the age of 70 is too high, and the limit should be considerably reduced. I do not suppose the minister will consider any suggestion in that connection because he has said we must take this bill as it is, he will not entertain any amendments. My proposition is that if we are going to have old age pensions we should deal with them on a proper scale, and should not take the lowest scale prevailing in any other country. I have in my hand a pamphlet issued by the Department of Labour last session entitled, "Old age pension systems existing in various countries." It was published as a supplement to the Labour Gazette of March 1926. This pamphlet gives the age limit in England as between 65 and 70 years; in Australia pensions are paid to men at the age of 65 and to women at the age of 60, but a man who is permanently incapacitated may begin to receive a pension at 60; in New Zealand pensions are payable to men of the age of 65 and to women at the age of 60, unless the applicant is a parent of two or more dependent children under 14 years of age, in which case the age limit is reduced by five years; in Czecho-Slovakia the age limit is 65; in Denmark, 65; in France, 60; in Germany, 65; in Iceland, 60; in Italy, 65; in Luxemburg, 65; in Spain, 65; in Sweden, 67; in Switzerland, 65; in Uruguay, 60; and in several of the states it is 60. I must say in all fairness that in some of these countries contributory or insurance systems are in operation; but that makes no difference to my argument, which is that the age limit in this bill is too high. I suggest to the minister that notwithstanding his previous statement he should once more consider putting Canada on a reasonable basis in regard to old age pensions.

Mr. RYCKMAN: We have heard a good deal about the care which this government was going to take of the returned soldiers who could not obtain consideration under the Pensions Act, but up to the present time nothing has been done in this direction. There has not been even a gesture. Now we are considering old age pensions, and I will ask the Minister of Public Works where he would provide for old age pensions if not in the old age pensions bill itself. The marginal note to the section under consideration is, "What persons are pensionable", and the section enumerates those eligible. If there is a proper place to deal with old age pensions surely it is here. The amendment is a very simple one, for no legislation of the nature proposed in that amendment could be so conveniently dealt with as in this bill. That is obvious to anyone who will consider the matter. Oh, it is said, the amendment in so far as it relates to the returned soldiers is a wholly federal matter. We do not object to that of course, but it is not altogether a federal matter. These men are and have been a charge upon the municipalities, and if the amendment proposed by my hon. friend from Fort William is adopted it will give a certain relief to those who have been helping to take care of the returned soldiers. The municipalities would be only too glad to welcome the amendment. These men gave five years of their lives to their country in time that actually elapsed, while they have sacrificed much more in the physical disability they have suffered and which, because they cannot demonstrate it, prejudices them with the pensions board. Those upon whom the night of old age has come five years earlier by reason of war service should be recognized in this section. The amendment, literally, will not take up more than a line and a half, and this is the proper place to deal with the subject it covers. The House has said to-night that it wants to do the right thing by returned men of the class described, and we have heard from the government that it desires to take care of such men. Now the opportunity offers and the government declines.

Miss MACPHAIL: Will the government promise the committee to-night that returned soldiers who are not covered by existing pensions legislation, and who are not able to earn their living because of a breakdown in health due to the war, will be taken care of by amendments to the pensions act to be introduced at an early day? Will the government give us that assurance if we let this bill go through as it stands? Now that the government is going to ask for an increased vote for national defence it seems to me that we should take care of the results of the last war before we prepare ourselves for the next. For my part I should be willing to see Canada incur any debt within reason to make happy and contented those men who suffered so much in the last war. What has been said in all parts of the House to-night is quite true. Every one of us is receiving many requests from neighbours and friends of men who cannot earn their living because of injuries received in the war and who are not covered by existing pensions provisions. Will the government make a statement giving us some assurance in this regard?

[Mr. Ryckman.]

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This discussion is interesting and helpful and if it would meet the situation to fix the age limit at sixty-five I personally would not object. But I know that it will not have this effect, because there are many returned soldiers who become prematurely old at fifty, fifty-five, sixty and sixty-five. The problem raised by the hon. member for Fort William we shall be called upon to consider in a different manner from the way he proposes to deal with it. Since the war—this is true also of the actual war period—there has been a distinct understanding in this House between the opposing parties that soldier legislation would not be considered from the standpoint of politics. It has always been understood that there would be no politics in any provisions made for the soldiers. From time to time cases have come up before parliament for consideration of the interests of the returned men, and these matters have always been referred to parliamentary committees, who have ever been ready to hear the representations of the soldiers through their organizations. I do submit that it would be better for us to leave the question proposed in this amendment to be dealt with in that way rather than allow it to become a political issue. Do not let us have it said that the government or the opposition did not do this or that.

Mr. MANION: If the minister will agree to deal with the matter this year I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I will agree to this: The government will follow the practice, which has heretofore obtained and which I believe is the wisest one, of referring to a parliamentary committee such amendments to the soldier legislation now on the statute books as may be deemed advisable and such as will provide, if possible, more generous and more equitable treatment for the returned men who have served overseas. These matters can be best dealt with by such a committee, where they can be thoroughly discussed without political bias and with a view to obtaining the best judgment which careful consideration can suggest. It would be harmful, in my opinion, to adopt this amendment. As I have said, it will not meet the situation; it will merely serve as a barrier against many of these men who will be prematurely old at fifty-five and sixty. There is no question about that.

Mr. MANION: What sort of barrier?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend proposes in this amendment to deal with a certain section of the returned men; perhaps later on we may have to consider the case again. Why not keep the two branches of legislation separate and distinct?

Mr. MANION: That is the intention of the government—to keep it distinct.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Let us be fair. It is easy to start a discussion of this kind for the purpose for which it is begun.

Mr. MANION: What purpose does the minister imply?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): To draw the attention of the committee away from the matter under discussion.

Mr. MANION: Nothing of the sort. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the minister is imputing motives to me, and I demand a retraction of that statement. I rise to a point of order and demand that the minister retract that remark.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have not imputed anything to my hon. friend; I have merely suggested certain inferences that may be drawn and I do not think I have anything to take back.

Mr. MANION: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Nothing is imputed.

Mr. MANION: I rise to a point of order. The Minister of Soldiers' Civil Reëstablishment should be spending his time fighting for the soldiers instead of fighting against them.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That is unfair. I object to that statement and the hon. member should withdraw it because it is not borne out by the facts.

Mr. MANION: The Minister of Soldiers' Civil Reëtablishment made the statement a minute ago that I had introduced this motion—

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I did not refer to you at all.

Mr. MANION:—for the purpose of drawing the attention of the House from the old age pensions bill and I say he had no right to impute that motive to me. He had no right to impute any such motive to me and I demand that he retract it.

The CHAIRMAN: I followed the hon. minister very carefully and I did not hear him impute motives—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

The CHAIRMAN:—to the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion).

Mr. CLARK: Then may I ask to whom the imputation was directed?

The CHAIRMAN: I thought the minister's remarks were very generally applied.

Mr. MANION: He applied them absolutely to me.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend is too sensitive. There is no intention, as I have already said, to impute improper motives to him or to his party, but I do say that a moment ago my hon. friend did not make a fair statement.

Mr. MANION: I did make a fair statement and one that was a good deal fairer than your own.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend said I was fighting against the interests of the returned soldier.

Mr. MANION: So you have been all the evening.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I take exception to that. It is an unfair statement and one which would not be made by many members of this House.

Mr. MANION: Well, I make it.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): You make it?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): You are not accountable sometimes for the statements you make in this House.

Mr. McGIBBON: Mr. Chairman, I rise—

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not wish to continue this discussion. I merely tried to point out that the proposal of my hon. friend will not, in my opinion, bring about the desire which he has in mind and also those who support him.

Mr. McGIBBON: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. Are you going to allow a minister of the crown to cast insinuations against a member of this House? I ask for your ruling.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon) will have to explain what the point of order is before I can give a ruling.

Mr. McGIBBON: I can very easily tell you. The minister has just stated that the hon. member for Fort William was sometimes not accountable for what he said.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think the hon. member for Fort William can well take care of himself.

Mr. McGIBBON: I do not purpose allowing this to go without an answer.

The CHAIRMAN: My ruling is that there is no point of order.

Mr. STEVENS: A free-for-all.

Mr. MANION: Perhaps the minister will square himself by admitting that he is often unaccountable himself.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I will state this to my hon. friend, that if I said anything which caused him to be riled and stirred up I am sorry for it. But I have not made imputations in the same way that he has made them in regard to myself.

Mr. MANION: The hon. minister made an imputation first regarding myself. He made an absolutely unfair and unnecessary statement. I have sat here all the afternoon and all the evening, and I have taken up only about ten minutes time of the House. That is all the time I have taken up. And yet he suggests because I bring forward a resolution —a resolution which has been supported and ably supported by every other member on this side of the House but one—that I did it for the purpose of delaying this bill.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Oh, no.

Mr. MANION: The minister absolutely said it, and I think I am quite within my rights in defending the attitude I took.

Mr. VALLANCE: A great deal has been said here to-night that will be undoubtedly heard all over Canada to-morrow. The hon. member for Fort William made the statement that the government would not accept suggestions from this side of the House, the inference being that we on this side were opposed to the returned soldier getting a square deal. I want to say to my hon. friends opposite that we have got to fight as many problems with the department over returned men as they have. I want to say further, as one who has been attempting to get some recognition for those men, that I do not believe we can find it in connection with the present bill. I do not believe in confusing old age pension with the necessities of returned men. Some hon. gentlemen opposite have spoken of the returned soldiers becoming prematurely aged through war service. In my constituency there are returned men who are aged through their war services although they have not reached forty-five years of age. Still I do not think that the question of granting recognition to them should be confused with old age pensions. I am behind the returned men to the extent of one hundred per cent but even so I do not think I can give the suggestion from the other side my support.

Mr. HEAPS: I would not care to impede in any way the very important discussion which has been taking place on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Fort William. However, I understand that his motion has been ruled out of order and therefore it is quite proper to turn to other points. Before action with respect to this clause is finally taken by the House there is one matter to which I wish to draw attention, and I hope that my efforts will be rewarded with more success than has attended other suggestions for the greater part of the day. When the resolution, embodying the principle of this bill was before the House there was one clause which met with the unanimous condemnation, I should say, of members in all parts of the chamber. I am now referring to clause 8, subsection (f), the provision which limits the income of a pensioner to $365 a year, so that if a person has an income or annuity which yields $30 a month, or earns that amount, he is not entitled to a pension under the present bill. Now I think there has been a strong desire expressed by all parties that the maximum of $365 should be considerably increased. The proposal is to grant a pension of $240, and over and above that the pensioner is to be entitled to an income of $125 a year, or approximately $10 a month. That is one of the lowest pensions to be found in any pension act in the world that I know of. If the government would increase this $365 by a substantial sum it would help to meet the situation, because a good deal of difficulty is going to arise through having such a low maximum. I want to give you a case that came to my attention a few weeks ago. It is that of an aged widow in the city of Winnipeg. She happens to have a small piece of property from which she derives an income of $18 per month, but out of this $18 she has to meet the interest on a mortgage and pay her taxes and the general expenses necessary to maintain her home. Under the present bill that $18 would be regarded as an income and consequently the pension would be very small although she receives nothing out of the income referred to. This matter was drawn to the attention of the government about two weeks ago, and as there seems to be a desire on the part of members to increase the maximum I hope the necessary provision will be made. I do not suppose I would be in order to move that the amount be increased, but I believe the government should do something in that direction and at least let us go home with something to show for our day's work.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Before this clause carries I think the attention of the House should be directed to section 2, and I would like to ask who is the joker who puts things over the Solicitor General, the Minister of Public Works and other lawyers in the cabinet. Listen to this, and remember that the Solicitor General said that there was no thought of imposing anything upon the provinces:

> The receipt of a pension shall not by itself constitute a disqualification from voting at any provincial or municipal election.

Will someone kindly tell the House what authority we have, sitting here so solemnly and importantly, to legislate for provincial and municipal elections in any province of Canada? There is no use stultifying ourselves by inserting a clause which is plainly beyond the competence of this parliament in an act of this kind.

Mr. CANNON: My friend is referring to paragraph 2 of clause 8. We are not imposing anything on the provinces, and the argument I made while discussing clauses 4 and 5 still holds good. This bill is subject to the consent of the provinces to the conditions therein contained. In certain provinces of Canada a man is disqualified from voting if he is in receipt of charity from the government, and this paragraph simply means that this is not charity in that sense, that a man who is looked after under this scheme and who receives the pension mentioned is not to be disqualified for so doing. This is no imposition on any province but simply says that this is not charity but a pension scheme. A pension is not charity, and that is the only meaning of paragraph 2, which I am quite sure my hon. friend knows.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Is it not a matter for the provinces to declare that this shall not be called charity? We have no right to say whether or not it is.

Mr. CANNON: It is for the provinces to decide who will be the electors in provincial or municipal elections, without a doubt. But if under provincial law certain persons are disqualified if they are in receipt of charity, it is perfectly within our purview to interpret this bill as meaning that a pension is not a charity, and that is all we are doing.

Mr. GEARY: Surely that is wrong.

Mr. ADSHEAD: In connection with subsection (f) may I suggest to the Minister of Labour that the word "net" placed before the word "income" would clear it all up. If the person to whom my hon. friend referred as receiving $200 or $300 a year has to pay most of that amount out, it would hardly be fair to take the total gross amount off the pension. I think the insertion of this word would clear it up.

Mr. HEAPS: May we have a pronouncement as to whether the government are prepared to make the increase suggested?

Mr. HEENAN: I thought a pronouncement had been made some time ago. We do not want to take any chance of an excuse for the defeat of this bill. I am sorry I have not a little more coöperation in this bill from my friends of the Labour party, because like myself they supported this measure last session and we agreed that it was not the last word in an old age pension scheme. I thought my friends were blamed by hon. gentlemen opposite for fathering this bill, but notwithstanding that, the bill was defeated in another chamber. I am interested at present in having this principle established; we have the endorsation of a great many labour unions, and again I ask especially my labour friends to accept the bill and get the principle established.

Mr. BARBER: I would like the minister to explain subsection (a).

Mr. HEENAN: As the hon. member no doubt knows, a woman who marries an alien loses her British nationality, and if she becomes a widow she reverts back to that nationality under the act; that is all.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Since this bill was brought down I happened to read the report of the last Imperial Conference, which contains a clause to which I should like to call the attention of the government. In connection with overseas settlement the report says:

> The sub-committee agreed as to the advantages of co-ordination throughout the empire in social insurance schemes, such as health insurance, and widows' and orphans' and old age pensions, and they suggested that future legislation on this subject should be drafted in such a manner as to facilitate reciprocity. As a first step towards this end it was suggested that an endeavour should be made, if necessary with the aid of financial adjustments between the governments concerned, to ameliorate the position of migrants in regard to old age pensions.

It would seem that there should be inserted in this bill a clause making it possible for those who have not lived here for twenty years to receive some benefit. I recognize that, as suggested in this report, there would have to be certain financial adjustments as between Great Britain and this country. It is most unfortunate that we should urge old country emigrants who look forward to coming under the old age pension schemes in the old country to come to Canada where they would possibly be disqualified until after twenty years' residence. There should be some arrangement made by which an emigrant from Great Britain should receive credit, as it were, for a certain number of years which he was under the scheme in England, provided of course that the British government made certain financial arrangements.

Mr. STEVENS: I would like to ask the Minister another question. As he has just explained clause (a) I quite understand it. That is, provision shall be made for the payment of a pension to a person who is a British subject, or, being a widow, was such before her marriage. Take the case of a woman, alien by birth, say an Italian or German or any other national, who marries a British subject and lives in this country for fifty years as a British subject. Her husband dies. Is she still a British subject, because it says, "or being a widow, was such before her marriage." Before her marriage she was not a British subject. She becomes a widow, and under this clause she loses the right to a pension. It may be that is just a slip in the wording, but there is no doubt about the effect. When she becomes a widow, she comes under this clause. That widow before her marriage was not a British subject. You qualify the payment of a pension to a widow, the qualification being that she was a British subject before she was married. That may not have been intended, but there it is, and I think we ought to correct the wording of this clause to make the intention abundantly clear—and the minister will please take this suggestion in the spirit in which it is offered, and not as a captious criticism at all.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Might I just answer my hon. friend, and if there is still doubt about it perhaps it can be remedied. Clause 8 says:

Provision shall be made for the payment of a pension to every person who, at the date of the proposed commencement of the pension:—

(a) is a British subject—

That is disposed of. It goes on:

—or, being a widow, was such before her marriage.

Now if she were a British subject before her marriage, no matter what she became afterwards, she is a British subject and she comes under this act.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. STEVENS: That is perfectly clear, but what about the other case? My hon. friend has not caught my point. It says:

(a) is a British subject—

That disposes of that. Then you go on to put the widow in a separate category:

—or, being a widow, was such before her marriage.

So the widow must have been a British subject before her marriage, according to that clause. There is no question that it can be read that way. If you will make this clause to read—I have not the exact words in my mind—that it applies to the widow who had married an alien, that covers all that is necessary.

Mr. CANNON: If I understand my hon. friend aright, this is the case of the woman who acquires British citizenship by reason of her marriage. When the marriage ceases, what becomes of her citizenship? Is she an alien or is she a British subject? If she is a British subject, the clause as it reads now covers her case. If she becomes an alien, she is not covered by that clause.

Mr. STEVENS: Perhaps my method as a layman does not make my point quite clear. If she was not a British subject before her marriage, she obtains British citizenship by marriage. Her husband dies and she becomes a widow. Then this clause says, "being a widow, was such before her marriage." But in the case I mentioned she was not a British subject before her marriage, and therefore I reason that she would not be entitled to the pension. I admit that in the application that might be ignored, but it is desirable to make the language clear.

Mr. CLARK: The alien woman who marries a British subject is still a British subject after his death. But the widow is specially provided for here. If she happens to be a widow, she must have been a British subject before her marriage. The words are:

(a) is a British subject, or, being a widow—

The widow is dealt with in a different manner altogether from other people. That is the interpretation that could be given that sub-section.

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend says that if an alien marries a British subject she continues to be a British subject even after her husband's death.

Mr. CLARK: Yes.

Mr. CANNON: If such be the case the clause as it reads now covers both cases.

Mr. CLARK: No, she is also a widow.

Mr. CANNON: The alien woman who has married a British subject becomes a British subject, and she is a British subject after her husband dies. Her case is covered by the first part of paragraph (a) "is a British subject." The second part of the paragraph deals with something else, the woman who marries an alien and ceases to be a British subject during her marriage. She regains her British citizenship when the husband dies. Therefore the paragraph as it reads now covers both cases.

Mr. CLARK: I think the hon. gentleman is wrong. Widows are specifically named. British subjects are covered, but in the case of widows they must have had the status of British citizenship before marriage.

Mr. CANNON: If she had British citizenship before her marriage she is covered by the words, "is a British subject." If she is a widow and is a British subject, "is a British subject" covers her case. The other case is covered by the latter part of the clause

Mr. STEVENS: My only point was that it should be made quite clear. Every province will probably put that interpretation upon it, but we should put it beyond all peradventure of a doubt.

Mr. GEARY: Paragraph (f) of section 8 says:

> Is not in receipt of an income of as much as three hundred and sixty-five dollars ($365) a year.

We have had some very sympathetic expressions about the soldiers to-night. A soldier may have an income of $365 by way of a pension. He has earned that; it is coming to him for a definite permanent impairment of his value in the labour market. That persists after the age of seventy, but he is put in the position of practically losing part of it in comparison with other people when he is forced to give up any claim to a pension in this act because of having that $365 of a pension. It seems to me that as far as soldiers go their pension of $365, or whatever it may be, should be preserved to them, and not be used as a reason for depriving them of the $240 pension under this act.

Mr. HEAPS: I rise to protest in a very mild way against the remarks of the Minister of Labour. He has talked about receiving our coöperation. Coöperation implies two parties. You cannot have coöperation unless you have someone to coöperate with, and so far as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and myself are concerned, we are only too glad to coöperate with the government in putting through any legislation that we deem to be in the best interests of the Dominion. But if the Minister of Labour implies by coöperation that we have to accept everything that comes to this House, let me tell him that that is not coöperation. Secondly, the position that I am taking here to-night is exactly the position I took here last year. I have spoken on only two clauses of the bill—one dealing with the amount contributed by the federal treasury; the other I have dealt with and called to the attention of the House. These are the very same matters I brought to the attention of the government last year when the bill was introduced. My position has not changed one iota from that which I took last year, but the position of the Minister of Labour has changed.

Mr. GEARY: Would the minister tell me what he thinks of the suggestion in regard to clause (f)? It would mean the insertion after the word "income" of some such words as this:

> Not being a pensioner for war service.

Then the clause would read:

> Is not in receipt of an income, not being a pensioner for war service, of as much as $365 a year.

Mr. HEENAN: We have great sympathy with the returned soldiers, but there are requisitions coming from all sides, and we cannot make any exception in this bill to-night. I think every consideration for the returned soldier will be afforded in another bill.

Mr. CLARK: What is the bill?

Mr. HEENAN: A bill relating to the soldiers' pensions.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister accept a suggestion for which I am indebted to my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni, to make in paragraph (a) read:

> Is a British subject, or, being a widow, is such at the time of the application, or was such before her marriage.

Mr. CANNON: "Such" would apply to "widow". Well, she is a widow.

Mr. STEVENS: No, to "British subjects". My hon. friend should not joke.

Mr. CANNON: I am not joking. If you want to pick a fight, I will not accept.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not addressing the Solicitor General, but some of his hilarious colleagues. The section would read:

Is a British subject, or, being a widow, was a British subject at the time of the application, or was such before her marriage.

I offer that and have nothing more to say.

Mr. CANNON: I understand the idea of my hon. friend, but I do not think there is any necessity for such an amendment, because every lawyer in the committee will admit that the words "British subject" apply to both man and woman.

Mr. CLARK: But not to widows.

Mr. HEENAN: A widow is in an unfortunate position perhaps, but she is still a woman.

Mr. STEVENS: Some of us have the misfortune of not being lawyers.

Mr. CANNON: I submit that the words "British subject" cover the case of both a man and a woman, and the other case mentioned by my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre is looked after by the second part of the section.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I cannot say that I am in accord with the Solicitor General. I think this is a new interpretation. Clause (a) obviously means what we all understand, but we must remember that we have to consider the grammatical construction, and I say the proper construction of this clause as worded is this:

Is a British subject, or, being a widow, was a widow before her marriage.

The antecedent of "such", under the rules of grammatical construction, is the nearest noun to it, unless otherwise specified, and in this case the nearest noun to the word "such" is "widow". The strict interpretation of that clause therefore would be:

Is a British subject, or, being a widow, was a widow before her marriage.

Mr. STEVENS: It is obviously bad drafting.

Mr. BROWN: I thought there was nothing in it when the hon. member for Vancouver Centre introduced this point, but I think now it is worthy of consideration. I looked at it one way and I could see it one way, and I looked at it another way and I could see it another. It seems to me it might be made to read:

Is a British subject, or, being a widow of an alien, was a British subject before her marriage.

It seems to me that would make it clear beyond dispute. I think there is a good deal in the point raised by my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre. Certainly the words "British subject" would include the widow of an alien, if the clause did not proceed immediately to make exception of other people. The exception takes in more than intended, and in order to correct it you have to add a few words to the clause.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I suggest that the minister take the matter up with the law officers of the department and make sure that this clause covers these widows. It seems to me we have done a good day's work, and I suggest that we might adjourn.

Mr. CANNON: I think we ought to be careful to see that the interests of the widows are fully protected. Having listened to my hon. friends on this side and on the other side, I suggest that we might amend paragraph (a) so that it would read as follows:

(a) A British subject, or, being a widow, was a British subject before her marriage.

That would be very clear. "British subject" covers man and woman.

Mr. CLARK: No, that would not do.

Mr. McMILLAN: Or, being a widow of an alien, was a British subject before her marriage.

Mr. CANNON: It does not matter to whom she was married; if she was a British subject before her marriage and became a widow she regained her nationality.

Mr. CLARK: The amendment proposed by the Solicitor General does not cover the point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. I think we are agreed that the widow of an alien who was a British subject prior to her marriage is probably covered by the section as it stands. But I do not think the section provides for the widow who was an alien, but married a British subject who subsequently died.

Mr. COOTE: I do not want to interfere with the passage of this bill; I am much interested in it. But I desire to protest to the government that it is a quarter to twelve, and I think it would be the part of wisdom to allow the committee to rise and report progress and adjourn the House. Possibly by to-morrow the members of the committee will have settled in their minds just what they want to do with the widow.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall clause 8 carry?

Mr. CLARK: No, I understand there is an amendment before the committee.

Mr. MANION: Do I understand, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment I moved was ruled out of order?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I think the minister should consult the law officers on the wording of the clause and report to-morrow.

Mr. HEENAN: I consulted the law officers and heard as many arguments about the different classes of widows as we have had discussed to-night, and ultimately the gentleman who drafted the bill decided to leave the clause in its usual form. We feel everything is covered.

Mr. STEVENS: I think a word or two would make it perfectly clear. This is a late hour to continue such an important subject.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall clause 8 carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Subject to amendment.

Mr. MANION: That will only take a minute to-morrow when you have straightened it out.

Mr. CANNON: The clause could easily be amended on the third reading. It is a matter of very minor importance. Why hold up the clause? We have been discussing it practically all evening. I can assure my hon. friends that I will look into the matter, and if necessary I will bring in an amendment.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Maximum pension $240, etc.

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Chairman, I am proposing an amendment to this section which I hope will be carried before it is ruled out of order. My amendment is:

That all the words after the word "interest" in the fifth line of subsection 2, be struck out.

I do not agree with the principle that the property of anyone who receives a pension shall vest in the pension authority after the pensioner's death. We give pensions to judges and to military men, but we do not think of selling their houses after they are dead and transferring the proceeds into the coffers of the state. As this is not a charity affair, as was emphasized by the minister to-night, I do not see the reason for this subsection.

Mr. ERNST: Subsection 2 apparently provides that where a person qualifies for a pension his real estate must be transferred to the pension authority before the pension can be received by him. If that is intended, I want to voice an emphatic protest against the subsection. In my constituency I know a large number of people who own small homes that will not yield an income of $300, perhaps not even $100 a year. If they have to transfer their property to the pension authority they will be discriminated against in favour of those who live in idleness and have not accumulated anything. I see no reason why the industrious and thrifty person should have to transfer his property to the pension authority. This was one of the most viciously attacked provisions of the pension bill during the election, and on behalf of those in my constituency who would be affected by it I voice this protest, whether it will be accepted by the government or not.

Mr. COOTE: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I could not again appeal to the minister to allow the rest of this bill to stand over until to-morrow. There are still eleven sections to be considered. It is a very important bill. I think the minister will be well advised to postpone further discussion until to-morrow.

Mr. HEENAN: Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that before we adjourn we dispose of half the twenty sections. In answer to my hon. friend, I may say that the purpose of the bill is to give old age pensions to certain classes of people. One of its provisions is that they must not be in receipt of $365 a year. If living in his own home a pensioner might be better off financially than if in receipt of actual income. All that is intended is to equalize matters. When a pensioner dies the pension board will take over the property.

Mr. ERNST: That is just what I am protesting against, Mr. Chairman. Under subsection 3 of this section a debt due by the pensioner to the pension authority is simply a debt against his estate. In the other case the pension authority is a secured creditor of the real estate. Advantage is being taken of the fact that a person has real estate to appropriate it for the use of the pension authority.

Mr. CANNON: If my hon. friend will allow me, the principle underlying all these clauses is the same. Under clause 8 we say that if a person is receiving $365 a year he will not be entitled to a pension. In clause 9 we allow an income of $125, which with the pension of $240 brings the total income up to $365, the amount mentioned in the preceding clause. Would it be fair or just to lay that down as our guiding principle throughout the bill and then depart from it in this case? We cannot do so. What is fair in clause 8 is also fair in clause 9. I fully realize that it offers inconveniences. During the debate last year, I recollect distinctly, the leader of the opposition of the time pointed out numerous inconveniences and disadvantages which would be encountered in the working out of this clause. As I say, we realize all that. But as the Minister of Labour has pointed out on several occasions, this legislation is in the experimental stage.

An hon. MEMBER: Very much so.

Mr. CANNON: Of course; we do not deny that. But when the legislation is carried into practice and we have an opportunity of considering these difficulties as they occur and of suggesting means of overcoming them, it will be time enough to bring down amendments by way of improvement. When that time comes, I have no doubt, every member of the House will join with the government in an endeavour to make the law as satisfactory as possible. Having said this, I would urge the committee to pass this bill which is now before parliament for the second time. I make no claim, nor does the Minister of Labour make any claim, of perfection for the bill. It is not perfect; we know that. We have listened with great attention and much interest to the suggestions that have been made by hon. gentlemen to improve the bill and make it more workable, and certainly they will be considered by the government when it is deemed necessary to introduce further legislation along this line.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The Solicitor General has truly observed that there are a great many anomalies in the bill, and this is one clause that could be greatly improved. But the government are not willing to accept any suggestions from this side looking to the improvement of the legislation. They are fixed in their attitude towards the bill: we must take it as it is. Before we go any further I want to impress upon the government the advisability of adjourning at this point. We have a committee which has been charged with the task of amending the rules of this House, and one of the amendments proposes that the House, at eleven or eleven-thirty, as may be decided finally, shall automatically adjourn. But here we are still discussing this bill, although it is nearly twelve o'clock, and notwithstanding that we have facilitated the business of the House all through this session. I submit that the government will not make any headway by detaining the House under these circumstances. If we had had a long session and had obstructed business it might be different. We have not done so. I suggest that the government will gain nothing by compelling the House to sit after this hour.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If anyone had suggested adjourning before—

[Mr. Cannon.]

Mr. STEVENS: It has been suggested three times.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment moved by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine), that all the words after the word "interest" in the fifth line of subsection 2 be struck out, I must rule out of order. The effect of this amendment would be to widen the scope of the bill with a resulting increase in the cost of administration, and under the rules that is not permissible. The amendment is out of order.

Mr. HEENAN: If the committee will agree to section 9 I will move that we report progress.

Mr. STEVENS: No, we cannot do that. There are two or three important matters which I desire to discuss in relation to this section.

Mr. HEENAN: Under the circumstances I will move that the committee rise and report progress.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe, the House adjourned at 11.55 p.m.

Friday, March 4, 1927

The House met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 116, to incorporate "La congrégation de Saint-Dominique du Tiers-Ordre enseignant."—Mr. Raymond.

Bill No. 117, respecting a patent owned by The John E. Russell Company, Limited.—Mr. Chevrier.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES

Mr. A. M. YOUNG (Saskatoon) presented the second report of the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines as follows:

He moved:

Your committee have considered the following bills and have agreed to report the same without amendment, viz:

Bill No. 71, an act respecting the Alberta Railway and Irrigation Company.

Bill No. 76, an act respecting La Compagnie du chemin de fer de Colonisation du Nord.

Your committee have also considered the following bills, and have agreed to report them with amendments, viz:

Bill No. 73, an act respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Bill No. 77, an act respecting the Manitoba and Northwestern Railway Company of Canada.

A resolution has been referred to the committee in respect to a direct railway outlet from the Peace river country to the Pacific coast. Your committee recommend that 300 copies in English and 100 copies in French of the evidence to be taken by the committee in connection therewith be printed for the use of the committee and of the House of Commons, and that rule 74 be suspended in relation thereto.

He moved:

That, in accordance with recommendation contained in the second report of the select standing committee on railways canals and telegraph lines, 300 copies in English and 100 copies in French of the evidence to be taken by that committee respecting a direct railway outlet from the Peace river country to the Pacific coast, be printed for the use of that committee and of the House of Commons, and that rule 74 be suspended in connection therewith.

Motion agreed to.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

The House resumed, from March 3, consideration in committee of Bill No. 70 respecting old age pensions.—Hon. Mr. Heenan—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 9—Maximum pension $240.

Mr. CANNON: Before we consider section 9, with leave of the committee we might return to section 8 in order to meet the objection raised by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens).

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the desire of the committee that we return to clause 8?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

On section 8—What persons are pensionable.

Mr. CANNON: The hon. member for Vancouver Centre raised certain objections to the wording of paragraph (a):

Is a British subject, or, being a widow, was such before her marriage.

There was quite a discussion about it. Since the point was raised I have had time to examine the law, and chapter 44 of the statutes of 1914 covers the case of an alien woman who marries a British subject as to her status when she becomes a widow. Section 11 reads:

A woman who, having been a British subject, has by or in consequence of her marriage become an alien, shall not, by reason only of the death of her husband, or the dissolution of her marriage, cease to be an alien, and a woman who, having been an alien, has by or in consequence of her marriage become a British subject, shall not, by reason only of the death of her husband, or the dissolution of her marriage, cease to be a British subject.

Therefore the argument which I made last night that the clause as it reads now covers both cases holds good, I submit, but there is no doubt that the phraseology might be improved. My hon. friend from Toronto referred to the interpretation which should be given to the word "such". If the interpretation is to be restricted to the rules of grammar, my hon. friend would be right. I move, Mr. Chairman, that paragraph (a) be amended by inserting after the word "widow" the words "who is not a British subject."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. SPENCER: Referring to paragraph (c), which reads "has resided in Canada for the twenty years immediately preceding the date aforesaid," I would refer to those people who come here from Great Britain say at the age of 58, who in twelve years would be 70, and who would have to sacrifice any right to a pension they might have received from Great Britain. At the same time, under this clause, they would have no right to a pension in Canada until they had reached the age of 78 and completed twenty years' residence in this country. I would ask the minister if there is no way of meeting that situation, so that these people who come here from Great Britain and have been in this country twelve years by the time they reach the age of 70 may receive a pension.

Mr. HEENAN: That has been considered, but we do not want to load the bill up with any more provisions than it had last year. This bill may not be all that we require—and here I am taking the same ground that I took last year, and the same ground that was taken by my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre—but we feel that it is a step in the right direction, and we do not want to do anything to jeopardize its passage through the second chamber If the bill works any hardship upon any British subjects, there will be time enough to look after that once we get the principle established.

Mr. SMOKE: In connection with the same paragraph of this section, may I cite the case of a person born in this country and who fifteen years ago went to the United States, and then came back here in a couple of years. Under this clause he would be entirely deprived of any benefits under this bill until he had lived here for twenty years after his return from the United States. Surely it is not intended that the bill should not provide for a case of that sort. There ought to be some provision in the bill that exceptional cases of this sort should be treated as if the person had continued to live here for the twenty years.

Mr. HEENAN: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be bobbing up and down all the time answering questions, but I think my hon. friend will realize that we must draw a line somewhere. This bill is not intended to provide that the man who leaves this country for the United States and stays there until he gets too old to work shall come back here and then get a pension from Canada.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to have an answer from the minister to the question I raised last night in regard to certain immigrants from England who might be qualified under the old country scheme, who come to this country and forfeit any rights they have in the old country to a pension, and who would not have any rights under this scheme short of twenty years' residence in Canada. It was suggested at the Imperial conference that an arrangement could be made by which there would be some sort of reciprocity between this country and the old country, and in that case the old country could give a financial consideration to cover its proportion of the period. I would submit to the minister that this is not a matter that would interfere with the passage of the bill through the Senate. It involves no extra expenditure by this country in any way. It would simply mean the insertion of a clause in the bill providing that in the case of such immigrants it might be possible that the British government would advance certain amounts of money; that the time spent by the immigrant over there would be, as it were, credited to him. I think in view of the very large number of old country immigrants coming to Canada it would be wise to have a provision of this kind, and I would like to ask if it is not possible still to insert such a provision.

Mr. HEENAN: I think there is a great deal in my hon. friend's contention, but as I said before, we want to get the principle of old age pensions established before we load the bill up with further provisions. Let us get the scheme into operation and see how it works out.

Mr. IRVINE: If we cannot insert a single provision in the bill, why not just come here and say, this is an old age pension bill, and then let us pass it and send it on to the Senate, and then when it comes back here, we can make a bill of it.

Mr. HEENAN: Perhaps that is what my hon. friend would do.

[Mr. Smoke.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The proposal I am making, Mr. Chairman, would not involve one dollar of expense to this country. It is simply to insert a clause by which we could enter into an arrangement with Great Britain that, if they wished to do so, they could advance certain moneys, and the immigrant would benefit under that arrangement. This is not something that I am proposing. It is something that was proposed at the Imperial conference, and it is a suggestion that was accepted by the government of Canada at the Imperial conference. Now that we are drafting this bill, I do not think it is too much to ask that a clause along this line should be inserted, which would leave us free to enter into an arrangement of that kind in the future.

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend will realize that we have had a whole lot of trouble with this bill coming from the other side on account of our having to come to certain agreements with the provinces, and on account of our lack of jurisdiction over the provinces. His suggestion, which certainly contains a whole lot of good, immediately opens up another difficulty, that of our legislation having the effect of encroaching, so to speak, upon the imperial jurisdiction.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Oh no, not at all.

Mr. CANNON: Certainly. Here in this parliament we pass legislation which concerns us. My hon. friend suggests that we should have a clause saying that we are going to enter into an agreement with the Imperial government on certain subjects. My hon. friend has been very well disposed towards this bill both last year and this year, and has endeavoured to put the legislation through this House and through parliament, and if I might be allowed to suggest it to him, would it be wise to open up this question now of an agreement with the imperial authorities on certain subjects, when that matter could be taken up later?

Mr. SMOKE: The answer given by the Minister of Labour to my question is like many of the answers given to us on this side of the House—no answer at all. It is the duty of any country to take care of its old people. The point whether a person happens to have lived in Canada for twenty years makes no difference whatever. If a person over seventy is unable to provide for himself, the country has to take care of him. If a person lived two years in the United States fifteen years ago, and comes back here, why should he not be taken care of under this bill, the same as if he had lived here all his life. I think these cases should be given a little more consideration.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Maximum pension $240.

Mr. LADNER: Section 9 was the subject of very considerable adverse comment amongst the people at large during the recent election, and the objectionable feature is that the home of the pensioner can, under certain circumstances, be taken and used to reimburse the government for pensions paid. I am not arguing as to the merits or demerits of that point. It has been argued before, and I know the position the members of the government took at that time. But I should like to draw to their attention the fact that in some other countries, particularly New Zealand, they grant an exemption. In my judgment and in the judgment of all fair-minded Canadians, all old folks who have been thrifty, saved their money and own their home should not be penalized for owning that home. I think a halfway measure, or a compromise, which is the true viewpoint on this question, should be reached by following the provision which is now the law of New Zealand, and that is that this clause does not become operative, so far as the taking of the home is concerned, to reimburse the pension authorities, unless that property has a value in excess of $2,000. Would the minister not be favourable to consider an amendment in both subsections 2 and 3 which could be properly inserted—and I have worked it out—after the word "therein" in the twelfth line. I suggest that we insert the words in subsection 2:

In excess of the sum of $2,000.

In subsection 3, after the word "pensioner" I suggest that we insert the words:

In excess of the sum of $2,000.

What objection can there be to the granting of that exemption to the old folks for the homes and property which they have lived in?

Mr. NEILL: I think—

Mr. LADNER: I was asking the minister a question.

Mr. NEILL: I thought my hon. friend was making a speech.

Mr. HEENAN: I thought we discussed that suggestion very fully last night. In this bill we are not limiting the value of the property to $1,000, $2,000 or $3,000. In the case of an old couple living in a home, having reached the age where they desire a pension and apply for it, we do not say that if the property is worth $1,000, $2,000 or $3,000 they must give it up. We place no restriction on the value of the property, but we do say that if a person is making over $125 a year he is not entitled to the full pension of $240. In the case of those who have property and occupying premises, where no one is contributing to their support but the estate, we take the excess of what they have paid, after they die, over and above what the man would take if he was simply earning his wage, about $125 a year. Section 3 provides that if anyone has contributed in any manner whatever to the upkeep of those people the board has no claim whatever on their property. If they had a son in good circumstances we all agree that it is his duty to contribute to the upkeep of his parents, but if he fails to do so the pension board would not put that old couple out of their home; but on the other hand, when this couple die the board would not allow the whole property to revert to the son, but would take the excess out of the value of the building or the home. If they have contributed ever so little to the upkeep of the father and mother, the board has no claim whatever on the property.

Mr. LADNER: In the case of a man over seventy, having a wife of the age of fifty-five, where the husband leaves the home to the wife, who gets the home—the pension authorities or the wife?

Mr. HEENAN: Naturally, the wife would have contributed something towards the upkeep of the home.

Mr. LADNER: In my hypothesis she has contributed nothing. He has been supporting her, as it is his duty to do. The husband owns the property and dies. Does the pension authority take the property from the widow?

Mr. NEILL: May I reply to the hon. member's speech?

Mr. LADNER: Is the hon. member answering my question? I am asking the minister what I consider a very personal and important question.

Mr. HEENAN: I think that is right.

Mr. LADNER: I would like the minister to answer and I would like the hon. member for Comox-Alberni to permit me to have an answer.

Mr. HEENAN: I think the clause is wide enough to cover what my hon. friend has in mind. If anyone has contributed to any extent the board have discretionary power—in fact they have no claim.

Mr. LADNER: But in the case I have given the wife has contributed nothing and the husband has looked after the wife. As a still better example, let us assume that the wife is an invalid, the husband is looking after her, and they are living together in a house. He wishes to leave the house to his wife. My interpretation of that section is that unless somebody has contributed something in money—

Mr. ELLIOTT: Or otherwise.

Mr. LADNER: What would "otherwise" be?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Looking after his household. Surely that would be contributing.

Mr. LADNER: My understanding of that section as a lawyer—

Mr. BROWN: That does not matter.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. LADNER: I think the observation of the hon. member for Lisgar is quite correct—it would not matter to him for he would not have understood it. This in my judgment, Mr. Chairman, is a very important section, and if we can avoid doing a palpable injustice to unfortunate people in the future now is the time to do it. I think a proper reading of the section will disclose the fact that if the husband dies owning a house, and leaves it to his wife, and, let us say, she is an invalid, the pension authority takes the home and not the wife.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Perhaps they would prefer to have the house rather than the wife.

Mr. HEENAN: I think, Mr. Chairman, that this is as broad as it could possibly be drafted:

—regularly contributed to the support of the pensioner by the payment of money or otherwise to an extent which, having regard to the means of the person so having contributed, is considered by the pension authority to be reasonable.

Mr. HANSON: Is the minister aware that the words, "money or otherwise" must mean in ordinary judicial construction, "money or something equivalent to money?" The ejusdem generis rule will always govern in that case. I leave it to my friend the Solicitor General to say if I am not right.

Mr. CANNON: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Ladner) is perfectly right when he says that in case a pensioner dies and leaves a dwelling the pension authority has a right to recover out of that dwelling or the value of it whatever has been paid to the pensioner in excess of what he might have received from other people in money or otherwise. It is very easy for an ingenious mind like that of my hon. friend to make an argument which will appeal to the sympathy of his listeners by describing the unsympathetic action of the government in taking away in such a case the house from the poor widow. I do not blame my hon. friend for giving us that pathetic scene. I have some experience in politics, and I know that on the hustings it always has a good effect. But talking as a lawyer to a lawyer, that is, dealing with this matter according to the strict principles which underlie all our legislation, suppose a man owns a house in the city of Ottawa but fails to pay his taxes, after his death if his widow appeals to the city hall officials and says, "You are not going to take away that house from me?", what answer is she going to receive? When we pass a law imposing certain taxation and providing, in order to protect the rights of the exchequer, for a lien on the property of any defaulting taxpayer, in what position are his children or his widow? Are we to renounce our rights? If this argument of sympathy is to be invoked to cover these cases how are we going to collect our revenue?

Mr. LADNER: Why do you give old age pensions at all then? That is the very basis of this measure—consideration for the impecunious and unfortunate.

Mr. CANNON: This adds strength to my argument. We are dealing now with an exceptional case, a case in which this government and the government of any province through sentiments of humanity provide public moneys in order to relieve a person's poverty. In a word, this is relief legislation. We must not lose sight of that fact. We are not dealing with people possessed of sufficient means to maintain themselves; they do not fall within the compass of this legislation. We are dealing with people for whom this country is doing something out of a spirit of humanity.

Now, when the pensioner dies what will the government or the provincial authorities do according to this bill? They say to the heirs or whoever represents the deceased, "Although the pensioner had a house, and although that house was an asset, and although others who have not real estate but other assets see those assets deducted from their pensions, in this case we allowed the pensioner to remain in his dwelling, but now that he is dead we find he drew a greater pension than he was entitled to according to the law, and unless you prove that you contributed to his upkeep, we are going to reimburse ourselves that extra amount." This is not a case of sympathy if looked at in its true light. The only person who could complain would be one who had been so heartless that he did not do anything for the pensioner while alive and evinced sentiments of love only after the poor man's death. Therefore I think when this clause is looked at in its true perspective the very ingenious argument advanced by my hon. friend will not constrain members from approving it.

During the last election it was contended that that clause should not be approved because it would dispossess the pensioner of his house or dwelling Such is not the true interpretation of the clause. It is simply a means whereby the public authorities collect, so to speak, a certain amount of money to reimburse themselves after the pensioner dies for any amounts paid to him in excess of what he was entitled to.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Chairman, I think some confusion has arisen through considering these subsections together rather than separately, because their two aspects are entirely remote one from the other. To begin with, I would draw the attention of the committee to the fact that under subsection 2 the whole action is absolutely permissive on the man or on the government. That it is not obligatory will be seen by looking at the way in which it is worded:

> Where a pensioner is the owner of an interest in a dwelling house,— > and so on
> —and the pension authority "accepts" a transfer thereof.

The pension authority does not need to accept a transfer of the dwelling house, and undoubtedly the pensioner does not need to give it unless he likes. That aspect has been entirely ignored. The reason I think it is so phrased is to provide against cases where the pension authority perhaps would be importuned to take a house under unreasonable circumstances. It merely says that the pension authority has the option and, inferentially, that the pensioner has the option, because there must be an offer before there is an acceptance. That is a phase which I think is somewhat lost sight of. This section of the bill was much abused on the platform. It was said, "This bill is going to rob the poor old couple of their home. It is too bad. These wretched people are going to come and rob the widow and the orphan of the only home they have." I was asked on one occasion to go to see an old man who was too infirm to visit me. He lived with his wife in a beautiful little home, and this lovely old couple were of the very type that needed such assistance as is given in this bill. It was a nice little house, worth perhaps $10 a month. They were old and infirm and unable to work, and they had been told that if this bill passed or if the Liberals got into power their home would be taken away. They were much upset, and realizing that the pension was all they could look forward to, they asked me, "If our home is taken away from us, what shall we do?" No explanation should have been necessary had the matter been truthfully stated to the people, but I had to explain to this old couple that there was no danger of their losing their home. I pointed out that it would be rated, perhaps, at ten dollars a month, and twelve times ten being $120 that was less by $5 than the amount which the pensioner would be allowed without any reduction. So that this particular couple would have been allowed to live in their home and draw the full pension, and when they died the house would belong to their heirs. This was a typical case.

The intention of the section was to meet the case of the owner of a house worth, say, $30 a month, which he might not be able to sell or dispose of otherwise—this happens in the country—although he would be technically charged with that $30 per month by reason of the fact that he occupied the house. It was to meet such a case that the section was framed. If he wanted to do so, and if the board were agreeable he could turn the house over to the board on certain terms. It has been popularly stated, erroneously and even maliciously stated, that when a pensioner owning such a house died, the house would go to the government who would sell it to recoup themselves to the full amount of the pension that had been paid out. This of course is not so. The government will recoup themselves, not for the full pension but only for that portion which the pensioner would not have received had he not transferred the house. The pensioner cannot live on the proceeds of a house which he cannot eat, sell or rent, and it is to meet a case of this kind that the section has been drafted.

An hon. member has referred to the situation in New Zealand. I think he misunderstood it, for the situation there is more severe than it is in Canada. It is provided in New Zealand that:

> Any person otherwise qualified to receive a pension who owns property on which he resides, and which does not permit of the granting of a full pension, may qualify for the full pension by transferring the said property to the public trustee. The pensioner is permitted to reside on the property rent-free during his lifetime, but he must pay all rates and charges thereon.

The taxes there are considerable in many cases. In our bill we propose to carry these charges so long as it is necessary.

If a husband and wife, both being pensioners, are living together, and one dies, the survivor is permitted to continue to reside on the property. On the death of both pensioner and survivor, or where the pensioner is no longer entitled to a pension, the public trustee shall sell the property, and, after deducting from the proceeds of the sale the amount of pension paid as a consequence of the transfer of the property, together with his commission and interest at the rate of four per cent, shall pay the balance to the person or persons entitled thereto.

There is nothing wrong there although that provision is not so generous as the one in the bill before us.

Mr. LADNER: Either Australia or New Zealand has an exemption of property up to four hundred pounds, as my hon. friend will see if he refers to the book which may be obtained from the department.

Mr. NEILL: I am not talking about exemption; I can go into that question if necessary. The yearly amount in Australia is £65 or $325, which is a good deal less than $365, while the pension in Australia is £39 or $195, a good deal less than $240. But I am talking about the question of transfer, where a man desires to turn over his house to the board in order to get the advantage accruing thereto; because it is an advantage to him to be able to get rid of that white elephant. The government is prepared to take care of it for him until he no longer needs the house, and then it will recoup itself not, I repeat, for the full pension, but only for that portion which he would not have received under any circumstances. In that light this section is worthy of support. As regards subsection 3, that is a different thing entirely and should be considered by itself.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I have listened to the opinion given by the Solicitor General in answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver South, and I must say that I did not consider it an answer at all. I do not think the Solicitor General would disagree with the statement of law made by the hon. member. It seems quite apparent from the wording of subsection 3 that the contributing to the support of the pensioner would not apply to the wife at all. It is merely a question of law and I believe the Solicitor General will agree with the hon. member. Now if that is so—

Mr. CANNON: I do not agree.

Mr. McQUARRIE: —then the widow is not in the same position as was the deceased, and in this particular subsection provision should be made that she should have the right to continue to occupy the house so long as she lives, just as the deceased pensioner would have done.

Mr. CANNON: The opinion expressed by the hon. member for Vancouver South, with which I agreed, was to the effect that under certain conditions the pension authorities had the right to recoup themselves by the sale of the house. One of the conditions is that when any person has contributed to the maintenance of the pensioner, the amount so contributed shall be taken into consideration. How can one contribute to the maintenance of a pensioner? In two ways: in cash or otherwise. What is the meaning of "otherwise?" Obviously one need not be a lawyer to know what otherwise means in this act; it simply means, in other ways which are not directly pecuniary. My hon. friend (Mr. McQuarrie) suggests that this would not apply to the widow. If a woman has nursed her husband through sickness or old age and if she has acted also as housekeeper, I appeal to the common sense of the committee whether "otherwise" does not cover such a case. It certainly does; if it did not there would be no reason for including it in the bill. The bill would simply be restricted to the word "money," a pecuniary contribution. It was to meet precisely the cases pointed out by hon. gentlemen from British Columbia that the other words were added.

Mr. LADNER: In the case of the wife, so far as the legal interpretation goes, you have the words "payment of money or otherwise," and I admit that if food or clothing or something of value of that nature were furnished, something that might be exchanged for money, the contribution would fall within this category.

Mr. CANNON: Or services.

Mr. LADNER: A wife giving her services to her husband is not entitled to a salary or any payment in money, and therefore those services could not be considered as a payment of money or otherwise, and accordingly she would be dispossessed of her home by the pension authorities.

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend would be perfectly right if this clause were interpreted according to what was to be paid to the person giving those services, but that is not the case. We are not legislating now as to whether or not a wife is entitled to charge her husband for whatever care or services she may give him; we are legislating to meet another eventuality, the case of the wife who, after her husband has died, appears before the pension authorities and explains that while her husband was living she kept house for him, cooked his food, looked after his clothing and did all the household duties. In such a case, would the authorities decide that the word "otherwise" did not cover such services? I do not think anyone called upon to make a decision in any such case would decide otherwise than I am now pointing out To make my contention more clear, what are the words used in the act? The act says, "any person", so who is excluded? That is a general expression which means that any person no matter what his or her relation may have been to the pensioner is covered by this act and may make a claim before the proper authorities.

Mr. LADNER: But supposing the wife has been an invalid for ten years and was able to contribute nothing in services or otherwise; will not the minister agree that the pension authorities would then have a prior claim and take the house?

Mr. CANNON: There is no doubt about that. In discussing legislation it is always easy to point out extreme cases which are exceptional in their nature and very few in number, but this law applies not to these exceptional cases but to all cases. My hon. friend will admit that general legislation is to meet general cases and that special bills are introduced to meet exceptional cases. If we in this House are to consider general legislation to meet extreme and exceptional cases as indicated by my hon. friend the task of legislation becomes impossible and beyond the wit of humanity. These extreme cases are cases of hardship, but such things exist under any law. Last night, for instance, the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) pointed out exceptional cases of certain soldiers, which goes to show that with all the legislation introduced in parliament during the last six or eight years to meet the needs of soldiers, everything has not been done to meet all the cases which should come within the scope of that legislation. Again I say that we are now simply in the position we find ourselves in dealing with legislation of any kind. General legislation along general lines can very seldom, and as a matter of fact I may say never, include every case which might come to the conception of any member of this House. This is an extreme case pointed out by my hon. friend. it is a case of hardship but so long as we legislate generally we cannot legislate especially and particularly.

Mr. LADNER: Why not include a provision giving some discretion to the pension authority to exempt certain houses under these circumstances?

Mr. CANNON: There is a good deal in the suggestion of my hon. friend and evidently the author of this bill thought of that. In the last lines of subsection 3 of section 9 great latitude is given, and if I am not mistaken power is also given under section 19 to the governor in council to make certain regulations. I have no doubt that when these regulations are drawn up the governor in council will give to the authority dealing with these cases the necessary discretion to deal with them.

Mr. BOYS: As a matter of information I should like to ask the Solicitor General how it is proposed to transfer an interest in a dwelling house.

Mr. CANNON: I think the only way to transfer an interest in a dwelling house is to sell it.

Mr. BOYS: I do not believe the minister understands me to mean that. It cannot be done. I do not want to be too critical, but at the same time I suppose we should have things so they can be carried out. You can transfer land and chattel property by a bill of sale, but how to transfer an interest in a dwelling house is a new proposition, under the law of this province.

Mr. CANNON: This bill was drawn up by the parliamentary counsel, Colonel Biggar, who has given great thought to all of these clauses, and I may say without fear of contradiction that the ability of Colonel Biggar is fully recognized by every member of this committee. Furthermore as I stated last night, all these clauses offer difficulties of execution; this law will certainly offer a number of such difficulties and as my friend will fully realize, I am not prepared to give a ready answer to all the objections which might occur to the minds of legal members of this committee.

Mr. BOYS: Supposing in the province of Quebec you wanted to transfer an interest in a dwelling house. How would you do it? I suppose you could sell the land on which it stands, but I think there should be a change made here in order to have things as they should be. As this is now worded it is impossible to make that transfer. You can transfer the land on which the house rests, but you cannot transfer your interest in the house.

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend will admit that as a rule the owner of a house owns the land on which it stands. No man with ordinary common sense will construct a house on land that does not belong to him. If my hon. friend wants to point out difficult cases, it would be easy for him to point out the case of a man who erected a house on another man's property, with the consent of the other man. Again I must say that these are exceptional cases. In my own province we have the system of what we call emphyteutic leases, by which a man can lease his property for 99 years or for 999 years, and the lessee can build a house on that property. Strictly speaking he does not own the land; he has only a lease. When the lease terminates, the house remains on the property. These are very exceptional cases, and I do not think at this stage we need bother about them. The provinces will have the machinery in hand, and I have no doubt that these exceptional cases will be met as they should.

Again I repeat that it is very easy for any lawyer in this House to bring forward these cases that may seem to be difficult to meet. I may say in justice to my hon. friend that if I were sitting on that side instead of sitting on this side, I might also find certain cases that would embarrass my hon. friend.

Mr. BOYS: I am not making this suggestion in order to cause any trouble. I am suggesting to the minister that he should so word this that the intention of the clause may be carried out as I submit it cannot be at the present time.

Mr. CANNON: If I make that amendment, my hon. friend might find other cases that would compel me to amend it again.

Mr. BOYS: My hon. friend seems to have a high opinion of my ability. He has only to consider once again that what he has to deal with is the interest in the land, not in the dwelling house.

Mr. ELLIOTT: We have in Ontario, as the hon. member (Mr. Boys) well knows, a clause that corresponds almost exactly with the clause in this bill, that is a clause by which the county that helps an indigent person shall have a right to a transfer of the property belonging to that person and the county judge is resorted to for his decision whether or not under all the circumstances the transfer should be made. In that case they charge the full maintenance and six per cent instead of five per cent. I happen to have the Ontario act in front of me.

Mr. BOYS: Would my hon. friend read the wording? I am quite familiar with the act but I do not recall the exact wording.

[Mr. Cannon.]

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is chapter 290. Section 12, subsection (3), reads:

> Where an inmate of a house of refuge is or becomes possessed of any real or personal property out of which the cost of his maintenance or any part of it can be paid, if any sum is due for such maintenance and has not been paid, a judge of the county court of the county in which the house is situate may, on the application of the council of any municipality interested, and upon such notice to the inmate as he may direct, order that any part of such real and personal property be vested in the corporation or corporations by which the house was established for the purpose of securing payment of the cost of the maintenance so due, or which may thereafter become due, with full power to take or recover possession of, manage, lease, mortgage, sell and convey all or any part of such property in the name of the inmate, or may make such other order, limiting or extending such powers, as may be deemed proper, due regard being had to the value of the property, and as to what part, if any, of it is necessary for the support and maintenance of the family of the inmate.

And so on. May I call my hon. friend's attention to the fact that the clause in question provides for a greater safeguard to the widow about whom the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) was quite properly concerned?

Mr. BOYS: My hon. friend will agree with me at once that that demonstrates the point I am presenting to the committee. That deals with real property and personal property. Real property is the land; personal property is something that is movable. I am suggesting simply that the wording in this particular clause is wrong and that what we ought to have is what is in that very act.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The clause reads:

> Where a pensioner is the owner of an interest in a dwelling house.

That is an interest in a dwelling house, I do not care whether it is an interest which enables him to use it for one month or six months or a year or for life, or an interest in tenancy, or an interest in fee simple. My hon. friend knows quite well that if a house is built on a freehold, it becomes part of that freehold.

Mr. BOYS: Real property.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes. But any interest in a house covers every possible interest that he might have and he can convey it.

Mr. BOYS: In the house, yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT: There is no interest in a dwelling house which cannot properly be conveyed under the law of Ontario or of any of the other provinces even if that interest is only a weekly or a monthly tenancy. My hon.

friend will recall that under the maxim that has already been referred to, if you build a house on a piece of property that house becomes immediately affixed to the freehold and passes with the freehold, and the only way you can deed it is by a deed of the land. I submit that under the circumstances the clause in question has made the most ample and careful provision for the unfortunate widow. May I call my hon. friend's attention to the last clause which I think has been somewhat overlooked?

But no claim shall be made by a pension authority for the recovery of such debt directly or indirectly out of any part of the pensioner's estate which passes by will or on an intestacy to any other pensioner or to any person who has, since the grant of such pension or for the last three years during which such pension has continued to be paid, regularly contributed to the support of the pensioner by the payment of money or otherwise to an extent which, having regard to the means of the person so having contributed, is considered by the pension authority to be reasonable.

I think that meets what my hon. friend has in mind. If the widow was not able to contribute any more, what she contributed will be considered by the pension authority to be reasonable. If, having regard to her means, the pension authority considers that what she has done has been reasonable in assisting the pensioner, then no claim will be made.

Mr. LADNER: Those last few words refer only to the extent. The operating portion is the one which specifically states:

To the support of the pensioner by the payment of money or otherwise—

And then it goes on to say:

—to an extent—

Then of course the pension authority calculates the extent; but if there has been no contribution, if the widow has been an invalid or for any other reason has made no contribution, the Solicitor General will agree with me that she would not have consideration; the home would be taken from her on behalf of the pension authority to pay the pension.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Can my hon. friend conceive of any one case where there would be no contribution either by money or otherwise by the deserving widow of a deceased person?

Mr. LADNER: I can conceive of the most deserving of all cases, the sick wife, the woman who perhaps with a large family has been an invalid for years.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Then she did the best she could.

Mr. LADNER: Certainly she did. Providence did not give her a constitution strong enough to stand up to her ailments, and during, let us say the last five or ten years of her life, she finds herself an invalid contributing nothing in money or services or otherwise. Yet that most deserving of all cases is the very one which will suffer under this clause while others less deserving have the advantage of it.

Mr. GLEN: There are two different points of view, one with regard to the income of any two persons who might be living together. I think my hon. friend has omitted to look at the whole of the bill. If he will refer to section 19, he will see that power is given to the governor general in council to make regulations and among the regulations are these:

(e) The manner in which the income of a pensioner is to be determined for the purpose of this act, and in particular the mode of reckoning the income of either one or two spouses who live together.

Under paragraph (m) regulations can be made with regard to:

(m) The administration of a pensioner's property by a pension authority.

I have had some experience with the administration of old age pensions, because I happened to be the secretary of one of the committees that was in charge of the old age pension bill when it was first introduced in Britain, and I can remember quite well that all the discussion that has taken place here to-day and yesterday came up in Great Britain. The act as first drawn by the Imperial parliament was altered out of recognition almost after two or three years experience with its provisions, and I think the same thing is likely to happen here, because we shall find so many circumstances that will have to be provided for in the general act. The Solicitor General is perfectly right when he says that a general provision in the act giving power to the authorities to do certain things cannot take into account every exceptional circumstance that may arise, but we have that general provision backed up by the power that is given to make regulations, and we may assume that these regulations are going to take into account all the arguments that have been submitted here to-day and yesterday, and that they will be framed accordingly. But apart altogether from that, my experience has been that the committees and those in charge were always willing to give the very best possible view to a pensioner, and I think in common humanity no province will take away from the surviving widow of a pensioner the little piece of property which her husband had accumulated from his earnings. I think we may feel perfectly safe in leaving it to the authorities to carry out the regulations in conformity with equity and justice.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Will my hon. friend, as an expert in old age pension legislation, say that this act follows the act at present in force in the old country?

Mr. GLEN: This clause 9 was not in the act of 1904.

Mr. BRADY: I would like to ask the Solicitor General what is the connotation of the phrase "dwelling house?" In British Columbia many of the fishermen who possess land live habitually in a boat. That is their home. Would "dwelling house" include such a place?

Mr. CANNON: I do not think there is any doubt that the words "dwelling house" would include that.

Mr. BRADY: The dictionary definition does not cover it.

Mr. CANNON: Again that would be a question for the pension authority to decide, but notwithstanding the findings of my hon. friend in the dictionary which he consulted, I have no doubt that any person who would represent to the pension authority that his dwelling place was a boat would not be forced by the pension authority, notwithstanding any dictionary, to live anywhere else. It would be considered as the pensioner's regular dwelling place. I had a somewhat similar case in our city of Quebec, where it was decided that if a person lived habitually in a boat which was moored to a wharf within a certain constituency, he was entitled to vote as being a dweller in the constituency.

Mr. BRADY: I regret exceedingly, Mr. Chairman, that the Solicitor General should consider that every question asked has an ulterior motive. I had no intention of prolonging the discussion or objecting to the passing of this clause. I asked my question simply for elucidation.

Mr. CANNON: I may say to my hon. friend that I did not impute to his remarks any ulterior motive. His suggestion may be due to the instance which I quoted, but only when my hon. friend gave it that interpretation did it occur to me that he might have got that impression. I just quoted the instance as an experience I had had in my profession as a lawyer, and my hon. friend may rest assured that when he has known me a little longer he will realize that I do not impute motives to anybody.

[Mr. Glen.]

Mr. STEVENS: May I ask the minister in charge of the bill, as one layman speaking to another, a plain, simple question? Let us get away from some of this technical, legal phraseology. In the case of an applicant for a pension owning a house, irrespective of what it is—we will say it is a small home—can he receive the pension and continue to live in the house without either transferring the house to the pension authority or suffering any deduction from his pension?

Mr. HEENAN: Yes, it is intended that he shall get the full pension and still reside in his own home.

Mr. STEVENS: There is no question about that?

Mr. HEENAN: No question.

Mr. STEVENS: Then this transfer is purely optional?

Mr. HEENAN: Surely.

Mr. STEVENS: I would like that made perfectly clear so that no dispute can arise later.

Mr. HEENAN: If that is not perfectly clear, we will make it clear in the regulations.

Mr. McQUARRIE: It is meaningless altogether as it stands.

Mr. STEVENS: I do wish to keep away from a technical argument in this matter. Will the minister, as the one in charge of this bill, and speaking for the government, say that the intention is clear and definite that an applicant for a pension who owns a house may continue to live in that house without transferring it to the pension authority and without suffering any deduction from his pension?

Mr. HEENAN: Without transferring it?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. HEENAN: Oh, no.

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend asks, if a person owns a dwelling house and refuses to transfer it to the pension authority, will the value of his interest in that dwelling house be deducted from the pension he receives? There is no doubt it will be deducted. But this clause provides simply for the case where the owner of a dwelling house transfers his interest in it to the pension authority, and the pension authority recoups itself after his death. But if the pensioner refuses to transfer that interest, clause 9 does not cover that case.

Mr. STEVENS: Then it is not optional, as indicated by my hon. friend from Comox-

Alberni a moment ago? I was quite sure my hon. friend was in error there. I do ask that this point be made absolutely clear because there is a marked difference of opinion between the interpretation of my hon. friend and myself, both of us laymen, and consequently giving a common sense interpretation. I would like now to have the assistance of a legal adviser to make the intention abundantly clear. The point my hon. friend takes is that it is purely optional with the applicant whether he transfers his dwelling to the pension authorities or not, leaving the inference —I think he believes this—that the applicant will not suffer a deduction from his pension if he does not transfer. My interpretation is that if he fails to transfer to the pension authorities a deduction will be made from his pension.

Mr. CARDIN: That is right.

Mr. STEVENS: Then I am afraid my hon. friend is not correct in his statement.

Mr. NEILL: My hon. friend has not interpreted my remarks correctly. I was saying that it is absolutely optional. The words used must indicate that. The pension board may accept, but before they accept somebody has to make the offer.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Why should any person offer a dwelling house to the pension board?

Mr. NEILL: For some advantage to be gained.

Mr. McQUARRIE: What is the advantage to be gained?

Mr. NEILL: If he does not wish to transfer to the government he does not have to. If he does not transfer to the government, the rental value of the house will be deducted from his pension if it is worth more than $125 a year, but if only worth $10 a month he will suffer no deduction, and will be able to continue to live in the house. Where the house is of a greater value, for instance, a white elephant, worth $30 a month, of course the case is different. He does not want to live in such a house. Therefore he says to the board, "Will you take a transfer of this property from me"? Later, when the government sell the house, they recoup themselves not to the full amount of the man's pension but only for that portion in excess of what he would have received if he had not transferred the house.

Mr. McQUARRIE: That would necessarily be much more than the pension, would it not, according to your statement of fact —$30 a month for the house?

Mr. NEILL: He does not have to transfer, but if he does not transfer the rent of the cottage will be charged against him, if over $125 a year.

Mr. STEVENS: Deducted from his pension?

Mr. NEILL: Yes. But in the other case he does not require to have any deduction and he gets his full pension.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I do not wish to continue the legal argument with the Solicitor General and the Minister of Public Works, because I do not think we can ever agree. A feature in section 2 I desire to call attention to, is the provision for the payment of interest at the rate of five per cent per annum compounded annually. I do not see why we should charge this rate of interest, or in any event why we should charge compound interest.

Mr. HEAPS: This is one of the clauses to which I took objection last year, but I have no desire to prolong the discussion on the bill, as no doubt the clauses will go through as they are framed at the present time. However I have had a little experience in the city from which I come of a similar clause of an act in which they provided social relief, and I found that it worked out unsatisfactorily. In addition to that, as far as the pensioners are concerned there will be opportunity for evading this particular provision of the bill. If a pensioner at the age of sixty-eight or sixty-nine, who is about to receive a pension, has a certain amount of real estate, he may either transfer that property or sell it and retain the proceeds, in which case the government will not be entitled to take anything out of the proceeds of that property.

Mr. NEILL: He cannot do it.

Mr. HEAPS: There are always ways and means of overcoming these provisions. There are many lawyers in this House who could devise means of overcoming the provisions of the bill.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Winnipeg lawyers.

Mr. HEAPS. And New Westminster lawyers as well. The act works out very unsatisfactorily in Winnipeg. I hate to think the authorities could go to a person who is about to receive a pension, and say, "You own a piece of property, and you will have to sign the agreement or we will put a lien against your property." That would take away a good deal of the benefit to be derived by the recipient of the pension. Personally I would far rather see the bill go through without any clause of this particular character. It would be much better, and I think it would have the effect of giving a real pension to the pensioner. Under the present bill we give with one hand and we are likely to take away with the other. The average pensioner owns very little property. If a person happens to own a few hundred or a few thousand dollars' worth of bonds, his estate will not be confiscated by the authorities, but those who happen to own a home are likely to have it confiscated. I do not see why we should differentiate between the two cases, or why one should be exempt and the other confiscated by the government. I suppose the bill in its present form is going to be passed and anything I may say will not change the intention of the government.

In addition to this particular clause we have a clause which allows a petitioner to receive from wages or other forms of income a maximum of $365 a year only. He must be receiving less than that before he can obtain a pension. Where a person receives $125 per annum, the pension is deducted, and consequently I think the clause is rather harsh. It will work a great hardship on some people. One consoling feature I see in the measure is that a great deal will depend on the regulations which will be framed by the department. What appears harsh just now, might not, after the working regulations are framed, result in any hardship to the recipient of the pension. I hope when the government drafts the regulations they will see that the least possible hardship is imposed on the recipients of a pension and they will allow a wide latitude to the authorities who are to administer the act.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I hope, with the hon. member who has just spoken, that when the regulations in connection with this measure are framed considerable latitude will be given along generous lines. I rise for the purpose of stating what I stated when the bill was before the House last year, and I wish to place myself on record again. I stated, and I gave a reason for my statement, that in my judgment the amount of $20 a month was too small a pension. I made inquiries from the country clerk of the county municipality, as to what the municipal corporation was paying out for the poor of the county, who were taken care of in the two institutions in Kingston. I found that for food and clothing and such incidentals as tobacco it was costing the county of Frontenac more per head for each person cared for than is being allowed by this bill. It was costing more in short than $20 a month for each individual, and that did not take into consideration the overhead charges, such as heating and lighting the buildings and so on. The actual cost to the municipality for taking care of the poor in those institutions, for food, clothing and such incidentals as tobacco and so on, amounted to more, on an average, than $20 a month. I stated then, I repeat now, that I do not agree with those who think that the passing of this bill will relieve the municipalities of taking care of their poor. Allow me to repeat one or two of the reasons I gave on that occasion. At present an aged man or woman is taken care of in one of these institutions. The older the inmate gets of course the more care he or she requires, including medical attendance, all of which is free. But undoubtedly there would be a disposition on the part of an aged person to take the pension of $20 a month and stay in his or her own home, for there is a natural dread or dislike to go into a house of refuge or a poorhouse. But out of that $20 per month the pensioner must provide not only food and clothing but light and heat and also medical attendance whenever required. In the institutions I have mentioned in the various counties of Ontario it costs for maintenance and medical attendance more than $20 a month per individual. Therefore this pension of $20 per month will be inadequate to enable the pensioner to take care of himself or herself in the same manner as he or she would be cared for if in one of these institutions. I made this statement last year. I make it again now because I want to place myself on record as I did then in that regard, and to emphasize as far as I can what has been said by the hon. gentleman who preceded me and by other hon. members, that in framing regulations to make this measure do what on the face of it it is supposed to do there should be the most generous latitude possible in order that its purpose may be carried out and real relief given to those who are supposed to be benefited by this legislation.

Sections 10 to 20 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall said bill be read a third time?

Mr. STEVENS: Next sitting of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Now.

Mr. FORKE: Finish it.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall said bill be read a third time?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Now.

Mr. STEVENS: All right, go ahead.

Bill read the third time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall the bill be now passed and the title entered as on the order paper?

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, during the time this bill was in committee I took the opportunity of criticising it in several particulars. Now that it is about to be passed I wish to assure the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) that I hope to see it put into operation and that he will get my hearty coöperation in making it effective.

Motion agreed to and bill passed.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT ACT 1919 AMENDMENT

Hon. ROBERT FORKE (Minister of Immigration and Colonization) moved the second reading of Bill No. 61 to amend the Soldier Settlement Act 1919.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Revaluation of land sold to settlers, etc.

Mr. NEILL: As this bill consists of one clause only I suggest that we consider it by subsections.

Mr. STEVENS: This bill last year received a good deal of consideration and it was demonstrated fairly well then that in its drafting as well as in many of its provisions it was quite defective. We have also had some discussion of it this session, on the resolution. There is not much disposition on this side to haggle over the bill, and I gathered from the minister's attitude a few weeks ago that it was the intention of the government to put this legislation through practically as it stands. As the hon. member (Mr. Neill) observes, the bill consists of a single clause, but I do not think that any great purpose will be served by going into any detailed analysis of it. The government is determined to pass it in its present form, and the minister showed a very slight inclination to consider the suggestions offered on this side to make it somewhat clearer than it is at present. I do think however that the minister should make some statement to the committee indicating precisely what the government's plans are should the bill become law. We asked him to do so when the resolution was introduced and he said, "Read the resolution." I presume we shall get a more civil answer to-day. I hope the minister will be in a more communicative state of mind than he was on the former occasion and tell us what his intention is with respect to the bill. There are points in it regarding power of arbitration, and so forth, on which we should like to have some definite information.

Mr. FORKE: I am very sorry that the hon. member should draw the inference he has taken from the remarks I made when I introduced this measure. I can assure him I had no intentiol of doing anything but giving the fullest information in my possession; and that is my disposition to-day. I will give all the information I possibly can and I am willing to discuss the bill in detail if the committee so desires.

Since last year some changes have taken place in relation to soldier settlers, and while they are not extensive, the figures are different in many instances. Altogether 24,428 returned soldiers were settled on the land under the provisions of the act. Of these 4,250 were settled on free Dominion lands. This bill does not touch their case. A further 2,521 were advanced money to pay off mortgages, or to erect buildings, or to provide live stock and equipment on land which they themselves owned. This leaves a total of 17,657 for whom land was purchased, but of these 440 have paid off their loans in full and are no longer soldier settlers. The proposed bill does not deal with these cases at all. A further 6,098 men for whom land was purchased have sold their interest under assignment to other persons, or have abandoned the property, or have been foreclosed. In the main, this bill does not deal with these cases. There remain, therefore, 11,119 soldier settlers for whom land was purchased and who are still active settlers. These constitute the soldier settlers who are privileged to apply for revaluation.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Can the minister tell us how these men are distributed by provinces?

Mr. FORKE: I am sorry I have not the figures showing their distribution. The committee will understand that in the case of any soldier settler who is satisfied, who has no complaint to make in regard to his land, the property will not come under review.

Mr. STEVENS: In other words, you will not thrust your attention upon him?

Mr. FORKE: No. The advantage to the men who were advanced money to pay off their encumbrances was that they could get their money at five per cent, whereas in many cases they had been paying eight per cent. As I say, there is provision in the bill to deal with the 6,098 men who have abandoned their property or who have been foreclosed. There is a section providing that if the land is still available it will be possible, should he so desire, for the soldier to return under a revaluation.

A good deal of money has been spent in assisting soldier settlers in the way of reduced prices for stock and equipment and reductions in interest. In 1922 the soldier settlers then on the land were given a rebate in interest, in an interest exemption for four, three and two years, dependent upon the time they were settled. This interest rebate aggregated some $10,000,000. In 1925 they were given a further rebate, in that their capital indebtedness was reduced by cutting off 40 per cent or 20 per cent—dependent upon the time they were settled—of the cost of all live stock purchased for them before October 1, 1921. The cost of this measure of relief amounted to over $2,000,000. Altogether, therefore, in previous relief measures, soldier settlers have received a rebate amounting to more than $13,000,000. The present land revaluation bill provides for a further relief in addition to the two measures already referred to.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Was that done as a general policy or was it a matter of dealing with each individual case on its own merits?

Mr. FORKE: It was a general policy applying to all. Some estimate has been attempted of what this bill is likely to cost the country. This at best can be but a guess, but taking the figures I have mentioned and the number of men to be dealt with, should they all come under the act, and placing the average reduction at 25 per cent, the cost would amount to $10,000,000. It is manifest however that until the individual cases are dealt with it is quite impossible to make any estimate as to what the measure of relief given will aggregate in actual money. I think, however, it will be approximately $10,000,000 putting the average reduction at 25 per cent.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): That is, assuming that all are dealt with.

Mr. FORKE: Yes. I may be wrong but I am inclined to think that this will be the maximum. The committee will realize of course that I have no means of judging precisely. A certain percentage, it is to be assumed, will not apply, but with the reduction at the suggested percentage, the amount I have mentioned will no doubt cover the cost.

The question has been asked, what relief has been given to soldier settlers in the past? Their capital indebtedness was reduced by 40 per cent or 20 per cent, depending on the length of time they had been on the land and on the live stock purchased for them before October 1, 1921. The cost of this measure of relief amounted to $2,903,656, and altogether the relief received by soldier settlers on stock and implements and the rebates on their land has amounted to $13,000,000. The proposed measure does not include the granting of any further money by the Dominion government, but will bring about a reduction in the liabilities of the soldier settlers to the government.

I have been re-reading the discussions which took place in this House last year and I have noticed that hon. members were continually bringing up individual cases which they desired the bill to cover. It was a very natural thing; hon. members would think of someone near their homes whose case did not seem to be covered by the bill, but I think it will be found practically impossible to draft a bill to cover every individual case. There is no doubt that there will be a certain amount of hardship to some of the men who will not come within the provisions of this bill, but that cannot be helped.

There is another view which is sometimes left out of consideration. Perhaps one-half of the soldiers who went on the land never came under the provisions of the Soldier Settlement Act, making their own arrangements in different ways. Consequently those soldiers got no relief and no assistance at all. Others again have perhaps struggled along, just hanging on, and during the last year or two have been forced to leave and will not be provided for. To get the matter down to a working basis we must consider only the soldiers who are now on the land and actively engaged in farming, with the exception of cases where they have only recently left their farms and the land is still vacant. In those cases under the provisions of the bill an opportunity will be given them to try again, with a reduced valuation.

A good deal of discussion took place last year with regard to different methods of revaluation, and a considerable number of members at that time favoured a flat rate which, I think, would not be found practical. It does not follow that all the farms occupied by soldier settlers were over-valued or that they paid more than the land was really worth at that particular time. I have no doubt that some farms were well worth the money paid for them and I know some soldiers who would not sell their farms for what was originally paid for them. In New Zealand, Australia and Great Britain they have had their returned soldier problems, and in each of these countries the flat rate has been discussed and abandoned as impractical and unsuitable. It was perhaps unfortunate, although there is no use crying over spilled milk, that this plan of dealing with soldier settlers was brought up at a time when prices of land, stock and implements were inflated. That is past history, although I have no doubt a good many people think Canada has been particularly unfortunate in relation to the land settlement of her soldiers. A little inquiry into the facts in New Zealand, Australia and Great Britain will convince anyone that Canada has been after all more fortunate than any of these three countries in relation to this question. All these countries have made drastic reductions in the prices of land, stock and implements to the soldiers who have been placed on the land, so in this case we are only following what has been done in the other British countries in matters of this kind.

It is also unfortunate that this matter has been so long delayed and that many who might have been able to stay on the land and perhaps become prosperous and successful if they had received assistance in time, have been forced to leave. We cannot help that, and I may say that one reason why the bill has been introduced in its present form is because this is the form in which it passed the Senate last year. I am sorry the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) misunderstood me and thought perhaps I was not anxious to give all the information possible to the House when this resolution was introduced. I want to remind the hon. member that I am a new minister, and perhaps some of the replies I made were sharper than I had intended them to be. I remember making a reply in regard to a particular section, stating that it meant what it said. When I thought it over later it did seem a sharp answer, although I simply meant that it seemed to me to express the intended meaning.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister is making amends to-day.

Mr. FORKE: I think when the hon. member is a little better acquainted with me as a minister he will find that whatever my faults may be I am not extremely bitter or vindictive. I am not trying to apologize but am simply trying to explain.

Mr. STEVENS: And we are accepting your explanation.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The company you were in made you nervous.

Mr. FORKE: I do not know that I was exactly nervous. However, that was my idea introducing the bill in this form. There was a good deal of discussion in the House last year; almost every member had a different opinion of what the bill should contain, and I do not know that we were perfectly satisfied with the bill when we finally passed it. It went from here to the Senate where it received some overhauling and was finally passed. My idea was that if we could pass the bill in much the same form as it was passed by the Senate last year it would again go through the Senate with very little trouble and this revaluation would come into effect without further delay. If we change it again and cut it up in all directions it may be thrown out in the Senate, and if the bill is not passed this session the men on the land will lose this benefit, because it is not going to do them very much good unless it is passed right away. That does not mean that we cannot discuss the different sections of the bill as we go on, and I am prepared to say that if any real amendment is proposed which will be acceptable to the House as a whole, I will be quite willing to accept it. I want the House to think this over carefully however, and hon. members to be sure that by the amendments offered they will actually help the soldier settlers, because after discussion with the different members I am satisfied that each one has some particular case he wants the bill to cover, and that cannot be done.

I do not know that I should take up any further time just now; I will be glad to answer any questions that may be asked and to give any information in my possession.

Mr. McQUARRIE: As stated by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) and by the minister this bill was under discussion last session, when I took part in the discussion and offered certain criticisms. I did not oppose the bill then and it was not opposed by anyone on this side of the House, and I do not intend to oppose it to-day. In the meantime, however, and within the past few weeks, a very large and representative meeting of returned men from all parts of Canada was held. That was the Dominion convention of the Canadian Legion which was held recently at Winnipeg. I have received from one of the delegates a copy of a resolution which was passed unanimously by that convention and which contains its views. My informant was the secretary of a special committee which was appointed to consider soldier settler problems. That committee consisted of four delegates from each of the provinces. They were practically all farmers and eighty per cent of them were soldier settlers. A representative of the Soldier Settlement Board was present during the whole of that convention and took part in the discussions. As it is only right and proper that a resolution passed by that important convention should be laid before the House, I have undertaken to read it and I would ask that it receive careful consideration, representing as it does the views of many of the returned men of this country on this important problem. I will take the time of the House for a few minutes to read the resolution, which is as follows:

The Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League in convention assembled this 26th day of January, 1927, gratefully welcomes the announcement by the government that at the coming session of parliament legislation providing a measure of relief to the soldier settlers will be introduced;

The convention, however, is unanimously of opinion that the re-valuation of lands,—being the form of relief generally indicated by government speakers will be slow costly and inadquate; and the convention, knowing well the problems of the soldier settler calls earnest attention to the following minimum requests and requirements:—

1. (a) That pending the effective application of relief measures no settlers be evicted from their farms, and all distress proceedings be stayed;

(b) That all interest charges on loans be waived, and that all payments already made on account of interest be applied in reduction of principal; this provision to cover the entire contract period, and to include interest consolidated into loans.

(c) That a general reduction of twenty-five per cent be made to the settler on the original cost of the farm, the permanent improvements and the equipment.

(d) That, further, where special hardships have arisen from climatic disaster, ill-health or other cause beyond the control of the settler, provision be made to reduce the indebtedness to such a sum as the farm can fairly bear as a commercial investment.

(e) That after the foregoing adjustments have been made the total debt remaining shall be payable in equal annual instalments over the remaining period of the loan.

2. Be it resolved that the Soldier Settlement Board shall have discretionary power to relocate bonafide soldier settlers who are found to be located upon manifestly unsuitable farms; such re-location to be made without financial loss to the settler.

3. Be it resolved that the Soldier Settlement Act be extended so that returned soldiers may take advantage of it, and at least be given rights equal to those accorded immigrants under the Empire Settlement Act.

4. Be it resolved that the government should again open up school lands for purchase by ex-soldiers through the Soldier Settlement Board.

5. Be it resolved that where an ex-service man has not had a soldier grant but has paid his pre-emption dues, these dues be repayable from the Department of the Interior.

[Mr. McQuarrie.]

6. Be it resolved that on application by the settler the board release caveats filed by it where it already holds primary security.

7. Whereas in March, 1924, when the government instructed the Soldier Settlement Board to eliminate further loans to returned soldiers no provision was made for building, clearing and equipment advances to returned soldiers located on homesteads and soldier grants;

And whereas those men have been doing and are doing a real colonization service to the country in that they are occupying and developing raw bush areas and have proved their capacity and sincerity as land settlers;

And whereas the advances required by those returned soldiers are very small, involving no expenditure for land purchase.

Therefore, be it resolved that the Canadian Legion of the B.E.S.L. do respectfully urge upon the government that in fairness to returned soldiers settled on homesteads and soldier grants, in the interests of the development of the country, the provision of the Soldier Settlement Act, with respect to advances on Dominion lands should not be altogether curtailed and that the government instruct the Soldier Settlement Board to continue advances to soldier settlers on such homesteads and soldier grants.

W. A. IRWIN,
Chairman.

8. That the act of salvage be a complete quittance from all indebtedness to the board.

W.A.I.

Along with this resolution the secretary sent me a synopsis of the arguments which were advanced in support of it, and I would like to read a few quotations from those arguments:

The Winnipeg convention fully demonstrated the fact that the revaluation of lands scheme appeals only to the officials of the board and to a favoured few who had expectations of being on the re-valuation commission.

Then again:

As one of the board's provincial superintendents recently stated, "The scheme has its weak points, and we see that appraisers will probably be influenced by sympathy and by politics." It is now generally recognized that the re-valuation of lands scheme is not feasible. In addition to reasons enlarged upon in another article herewith, we claim there cannot possibly be any equity in it.

Then again:

A re-valuation of lands by a government commission will lower not only values of settlers' lands but will have an adverse effect on all lands.

Mr. NEILL: What is the hon. gentleman quoting from ?

Mr. McQUARRIE: From a synopsis of the arguments in support of the resolution which I read. I have received this synopsis from the secretary of the special committee which dealt with this matter. Then it said:

Re the reduction of principal. The government of British Columbia, having a similar problem to deal with, though on a smaller scale in the Merville soldier settlement scheme, recognized that a physical revaluation was impracticable, and granted relief by making a straight thirty-five per cent cut in all loans. This has been received by the people of British Columbia, as being the most equitable solution of the problem. A precedent has been established and the ex-servicemen of Canada have no hesitation in drawing the attention of the federal government to it, confidently believing that relief in similar form will be granted.

I would be very glad to put on Hansard all the arguments that are contained in this synopsis, but I am afraid the rules of the House would not permit me to do so. I would, however, direct the attention of the minister to these arguments. I presume he has received a copy, but if not, I should be glad to supply him with the copy I have.

In my constituency there are a great number of returned soldiers. I know what those men have had to contend with. I know that they went on the land in a great many cases without the necessary knowledge to enable them to make a success. I know that certain of those men got land which was not suitable for their purpose at all. I know this also, that those men with very few exceptions have done their very best to make good. They have had difficulties of all kinds to contend with, particularly on the brush lands, but they have done splendid work and in no case that I am aware of have those men got a fair return for their work. I say to the government that it is only right and proper that the opinions and recommendations of a convention such as the one I have mentioned should be taken into serious consideration. I do not think this bill is a perfect one. I think improvements can be made in it, and I was very pleased indeed to note that the minister was prepared to take suggestions into consideration, and in proper cases accept amendments to the bill. I am not going to take up any more time, but I do again urge that the recommendations of the returned men themselves at the Dominion convention of the Canadian Legion be given serious consideration.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I ask the hon. gentleman whether the W. A. Irwin mentioned as chairman of the special committee is W. A. Irwin of Edmonton?

Mr. McQUARRIE: It does not say, but I have a letter here which I shall be glad to show the minister from the secretary of the special committee, who sends me a copy of this resolution purporting to be signed by "W. A. Irwin, chairman." I subsequently received a telegram from the same gentleman dated Langley, B.C., February 25, 1927, reading as follows:

> Fraser Valley Milk Producers' Association over two thousand members in annual meeting unanimously endorse Canadian Legion convention resolutions regarding soldier settlers. Still oppose bill six one.
> (Sgd) PAYNE.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The hon. gentleman is familiar with the resolutions. Would he mind enumerating the salient points? I did not follow them all, but I noted one concerning the application of all interest payments against principal, and another suggestion of a 25 per cent reduction on top of that on the valuation of the land.

Mr. McQUARRIE: That is right. There are other recommendations here, but I do not want to go over them all again.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not ask that, but perhaps my hon. friend would summarize in his own way the salient points.

Mr. FORKE: I think the Canadian Legion might at least have sent me a copy of this resolution. This is the first intimation I have had that such a meeting was held and that such resolutions were passed. Surely the hon. member does not expect me to be able to pass judgment on them without a little consideration.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister will probably know that a representative of his department was there and took part in the discussion. Surely such an officer should have reported to the department.

Mr. FORKE: He did not.

Mr. McPHERSON: I notice that the minister agreed with my interpretation that revaluation would be given where the agreement had not been cancelled. Under the original clause, and under the last clause, where the land had not been disposed of, but the soldier had left and the agreement had been cancelled, the soldier could apply for reinstatement and re-purchase. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down mentioned, in drawing attention to the resolutions, an item that is of considerable importance, and that is that no action be taken by the government to evict those in possession of the land where agreements have been terminated.

The point I wish to make is this, and it does not change, I think, the intention of the House or of the minister: If this act receives the same strict interpretation by the officials in charge that they are used to giving in connection with other Dominion acts—the Pension Act, for instance—if they go by the letter of the law instead of the spirit, then the soldier who is on the land and whose agreement has been terminated cannot get the advantage of this act. There are a great number on the land to-day whose agreements have been terminated and cancelled, but out of sympathy, or because the department could not use the land anyway, these men have been allowed to remain on. I submit that it does not change the principle of the act at all, but if you wish to protect the rights of every soldier, and I think that is the intention of every hon. member, he should be in the position, although his agreement is terminated to come within the provisions of this amendment if he is still on the land. What I am afraid of is the system the officials of the department have in adhering so strictly to the letter of the law in the interpretation of these matters, if they can possibly do so. The officials seem to think the letter is of more importance than the spirit. Paragraph (j) speaks of any settler "who is desirous of returning to the land". I am not prepared to trust that to the interpretation of the officials. The words are reasonable enough, but the interpretation given to some Dominion acts, by the pension board, for instance, has been unreasonable and harsh, and I would suggest that we say, "Who is desirous of re-purchasing the land shall have the right to re-purchase".

Mr. ADSHEAD: The minister said in connection with that clause that it would apply if the agreement had been terminated recently. The word "recently" is very vague and paragraph (j) mentions no specific time within which this shall take place. I think that should be given consideration.

Mr. FORKE: It would be applicable only where the land is still available. If the farm had not been re-settled or taken possession of by any other party, if it was still available, the soldier would have the opportunity of going back.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Is there any time limit? The minister used the word "recently". I think we should have something more specific.

Mr. FORKE: I do not think there is any limit so long as the land is vacant.

Mr. GARDINER: What would be the situation with regard to the great number of farms you have contracted to provide for the British settlers? Would these be available in case this bill carries?

Mr. FORKE: Not in cases where the settlers have taken possession of the land.

[Mr. McPherson.]

Mr. GARDINER: I mean lands already on the list. You have thousands of farms listed for the British government.

Mr. NEILL: I think the answer given to the hon. member for East Calgary is not quite correct, because there is a limit to the time under the bill, which provides that any settler whose agreement with the board has been terminated or rescinded can apply for reinstatement; but he will be governed by the general regulation found under paragraph (d) which provides:

All applications for revaluation must be submitted to the board prior to the first day of—so-and-so. So that he will not be able to come in after that date. It is limited to whatever period we now insert in that section, I suppose.

Mr. ADSHEAD: It must be 1927.

Mr. NEILL: Yes, in section (d). I think there is a mistake in that section. Subsection (g) says that the board shall credit the settler's account as on the standard date in 1926. The act as passed last year gave the date 1925.

Mr. FORKE: Yes, that should be 1925. It is a misprint.

Mr. NEILL: Then in connection with the remarks of my hon. friend from New Westminster, I do not know that he lent himself to the statement, but he put forward the views of the Canadian Legion in Winnipeg, and they ask for a flat rate and some remission of interest. The soldier settlers I represent are absolutely against a flat rate, and while it may seem unreasonable to combat the views of a large body of men such as attended the meeting at Winnipeg, still there are reasons for it. After all, self interest governs most of us. The majority of the settlers throughout Canada would not get any rebate under the revaluation. Some of the lands are worth a good deal more than they were when they were bought; consequently these men have nothing to hope for by the revaluation which is suggested. But if they can get the government to change the policy into one of a flat rate, no matter what it is, it is so much money to them. But that is going to do a great injustice to the people who need the money most. The minister says that a rebate of twenty-five per cent all round, as asked for at the Winnipeg meeting, would mean $10,000,000. But a rebate of twenty-five per cent will not be sufficient in many cases. With the exception of the district of my hon. friend from Dauphin (Mr. Ward), there is no riding in British Columbia where the conditions are worse in that regard than the one I represent. The rebate of twenty-five per cent will not begin to do justice. The member for New Westminster has quoted a case where the British Columbia government gave a flat rate of thirty-five per cent, and in many isolated cases you would need a rate of fifty per cent. He cited the case of British Columbia giving a flat rate as an argument why a flat rate should be given all over Canada. But the reason for this is that the number of settlers are only forty or fifty; they are all congregated together, in one group, and it is reasonable that what you give to one of them you can give to all, because conditions are the same. But the same cannot be said of any other district. There is no other district in a similar position to that and a flat rate would not be fair. What would the government give as a flat rate? It would certainly be something not exceeding twenty-five per cent, and perhaps only ten per cent. If you granted a flat rate you would be giving men who did not need the money, and in their hearts did not want it, $200 or $300, and you would be taking away from men, who are up against it, their only hope of being able to stay on the land and you would diminish your chances of getting settlers on the land. The land in British Columbia, to which my hon. friend refers, and adjacent to which many of the settlers I represent reside, apart from the original cost, which in many cases was five times its market value, must be cleared, and the cost of clearing is heavy. I have cleared such land and I know that it costs from $200 to $400 an acre to clear it, and when it is cleared it is not worth half the lower figure, because it is poor land. When you have taken out a stump you have spent $20 and you have got a hole in the ground and nothing will grow there for four or five years, because the sub-soil has been brought up and it will not grow anything for years.

I went out there with the Premier and they showed us a place where the stumps were so close together that you could nearly walk across the lot by jumping from one stump to another, and this is the land for which we are asked to fix a flat rate, compared to the land on the Fraser river to which my hon. friend has referred.

That flat land has been made productive by the flow of the river through that section, and of course men will do well there. These men realize that they cannot get anything by revaluation, so they want a flat rate.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Does my hon. friend refer to cleared land or uncleared land in the Fraser valley?

Mr. NEILL: Cleared land.

Mr. McQUARRIE: That is not the kind we have.

Mr. NEILL: In many cases in the Fraser valley that is the class of land they have. I wish to explain to the House why this resolution was passed at Winnipeg. It was simply because the majority governed, and that is the only reason. If it is at all possible let us see that the valuation is based on the value of the land now, as compared with what the value was when they bought it.

Another important matter I want to allude to is this. The hon. member for Centre Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) said that this was practically the bill we had last year. So it is, with this exception, that there are one or two features of it we have not discussed, and the most important one is the change made by the Senate in the arbitration clauses. We never had an opportunity of discussing that in the House, because dissolution occurred before we had an opportunity to consider it, and that is one of the most important features of the bill. I know the government are anxious, as they were in the case of the old age pension bill, to pass the bill as nearly as possible in the shape it was when it left the Senate in the hope that they would be able to induce the Senate to pass it on this occasion, but hon. members must remember that there have been changes in the Senate. The personnel of the Senate has changed since last year considerably, and possibly there has been some change of opinion. Possibly some of the members have gone to their districts and are able now to realize the feeling among the settlers, and it may be that they will be disposed to accept another form of arbitration. At any rate if the government insists on it going through as passed by the Senate last year, well and good; we will have to accept it, but it is my duty to give an idea of how the men in my district look at this matter.

I have a letter from the settlers association in British Columbia which reads as follows:

> That we strongly urge Mr. Neill to use every endeavour to have all cases for re-valuation dealt with by an arbitration board as called for in original Bill No. 17, and not by Exchequer court judge.
> I trust therefore if at all possible you will obtain this amendment when the bill again comes up for discussion as our members consider it of vital importance.

The writer says he is writing to other members of the House whom he thinks might be helpful to him. Under the old act the board of arbitration consisted of three men, a county court judge, a representative of the board and a representative of the settlers. I know it is necessary when putting through anything of this kind not only to do what we think is fair, but to make it appear fair to the settlers before they are asked to accept it. There is a popular idea among the settlers—I do not agree with it, I think it is a mistake—that the officials of the Soldier Settlement Board are more or less antagonistic to the interests of the settlers. The officials are the vehicles by which the board's orders come to these men, and these officials put pressure on the settlers to pay up their indebtedness and carry out their obligations. As between the debtor and the pressing creditor, or the pressing creditor's agent, there is naturally a certain amount of ill-will created, and the settlers have an idea that if the Soldier Settlement Board has too much control in the revaluation it will be to their disadvantage, and that is one of the reasons why they wanted to have this board composed of a representative of themselves, the county judge and a representative of the board. In this bill it is put in a different form from that in which it appeared in the original act. It says that he can apply for a revaluation, and if he is dissatisfied with the decision of the board he may apply to the Exchequer court.

Now, applying to the Exchequer court under ordinary conditions involves an enormous amount of cost and very considerable delay. I understand that in proceedings before the Exchequer court all the evidence and other material must be printed. The soldier settler will have to do that. Then when the settler complains as to this he is told, under subsection (i) that:

> The governor in council may make such regulations as he deems fit for the procedure in appeals to the Exchequer court.

Yes, but that is where the suspicion between the board and the soldier settler is aroused again. The soldier settler says, "Well, I don't think I can get a square deal from the board" —I am only quoting the opinion very generally held by soldier settlers; I think they would get a square deal—"and when I appeal to the Exchequer court I shall have to do it under such conditions of expense and delay with all the inconvenience incident to the long distance between my home and Ottawa as will render it impossible for me to appeal. But I am told that somebody is going to modify those conditions in a way that will give me justice." Who is going to do the modifying? The Soldier Settlement Board.

An hon. MEMBER: No, no.

Mr. NEILL: Yes. The subsection says the governor in council. That means the board. So the soldier settler apprehends that if he does not take the valuation given him by the Soldier Settlement Board in the first place, he must appeal to the Exchequer court under conditions that to him are utterly impossible unless modified by the very party against whose decision he is appealing.

Mr. GEARY: That is unreasonable.

Mr. NEILL: I think in many cases the Soldier Settlement Board will do what is fair; but you have to settle with these soldiers on the basis of something more than legality—you have to satisfy them. Otherwise in years to come the matter will be brought up in this House again and again. And the appeal of the soldier settler for justice or even for leniency never can be denied. Therefore this will never be settled unless it is arranged in a way that is satisfactory to the soldier settler. I think that means of satisfactory settlement was provided for in Bill No. 17 of last session, under which the soldier picks his own representative to act with the representative of the board, and the third party is the county court judge.

There is another objection of my own conception against the Exchequer court judge. I recall that many years ago in British Columbia an industry was going to be wiped out, and it was felt that the United States should compensate those who would be adversely affected. The United States government paid about half a million dollars to the Canadian government under a treaty for the compensation of those people who were going to be deprived of their livelihood. The Canadian government appointed a judge of the Exchequer court to go out to British Columbia and sit on those cases very much as he would do under this bill. What happened? As my friend behind me says, that judge took a narrow, technical, lawyer-like view of his commission. He so narrowed down what he conceived to be his line of procedure that he gave justice to only two or three people and threw out the claims of 90 per cent of those who were entitled to compensation. Those claimants are without their money to-day. The Canadian government holds it in trust, I suppose, and does not know what to do with it. It is pretty certain that the United States government as a rule does not pay more than is strictly coming to any claimants, but 90 per cent of those entitled were deprived of compensation by a too legal interpretation. That is another reason why we want to have men who are not lawyers to act in combination with a lawyer to sit on these cases. The lawyer, of course, would give them the legal aspect of each case.

Mr. GEARY: Cannot you have that under this bill?

Mr. NEILL: No. For that reason I think it would be infinitely better for the government to go back to the system devised in last years bill, which met with the unanimous consent of the House. Hon. gentlemen opposite wanted the change made, and the county court judge was inserted to meet their views. That was the best form of arbitration that the House could frame. I do not think it would imperil the passage of the bill in the Senate, because after all it would be open to the other House to strike out the amendment and again insert its own. Anyway, I have no hesitation in saying that that is what is wanted in the matter of arbitration by the district I represent and by some of the adjoining districts.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Mr. Chairman, the remarks of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) justify me, I think, in reading to the committee another document which I have. It is as follows:

Memorandum from the Soldier Settlement Committee of the B.C. Executive Council of Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League for the Hon. Dr. J. H. King, Minister of S.C.R., with copy for the Hon. Mr. Stewart, Minister of the Interior, pursuant to interview with the Hon. Dr. King of General McDonald, President B.C. Command, Canadian Legion and members of the executive council on 27th October, 1926.

re Relief for Settlers under the "Soldier Settlement Act".

Reasons Warranting Relief from the Heavy Debt now on the Settler

The introduction by the government of a bill to re-value lands held under the provisions of the S. S. Act, the manner in which this bill was received by parliament and the favourable comment made on it by the people is evidence that it is recognized that some form of relief is necessary; we beg however to give a résumé of our views on the subject.

1. During the past several years there has been depreciation in all farm land values. The settlers' lands were acquired at the peak of prices in the short-lived post-war boom, causing a much heavier load of debt on the settler than would have been the case had normal prices prevailed.

2. The load of debt now on the settler is such that there is no hope that he will ever be able to get from under from earnings from the land.

3. To contract to pay off such debt entirely by the earnings from the farming operations was an experiment never before tried.

4. Our old established debt-free bush farmers have, in thirty-five years done little more than just keep free from debt, by the sale of timber that have been able to carry on. Few soldier settlers got merchantable timber with their lands.

5. In the majority of cases the settlers were inexperienced farmers. They have now had experience, to them costly though necessary and valuable now to both the man and the country. During the years in which they were gaining this experience they were unable to keep up their payments, with the result that arrears have accrued causing the demand now made on them by the board to be for staggering amounts: for instance $1,100.00 and $1,200.00 for the 1926 payment.

6. Not one settler on a bush farm in B.C. has been able to make his payments to the board from the earnings of his place, such earnings to make the payments have had to be supplemented from other sources. With reference to the Fraser valley this statement is made without fear of contradiction.

(10th February, 1927. This is now found to be applicable to practically the whole of the Dominion. Prairie farmers state that only by a miracle could it be done by them.)

7. In many instances payments are made to the board by men who are heavily in debt to local merchants, as well as being in debt to the friends and relatives for borrowed monies, borrowed in an endeavour to meet the demands of the board. Merchants are now obliged to refuse credit and many settlers with their families are forced to do without actual necessities.

8. The wonderful spirit with which the men were imbued when they undertook to reëstablish themselves, and to pay for it, is fast breaking. The continued hard grind early and late, the privations he, his wife and family have to face, the insistent demands for payment of debts, the almost forced from him assignments to the board of the monthly milk, or other produce, cheque, and now the knowledge just coming to him that after over seven years of struggle he can never be the owner of the home, into the making of which he has put all of what the ravages of war left to him of the best years of his life, and every dollar of his savings—are some of the forms of adversity which are causing this spirit to break—sufficient to break the strongest spirit.

9. The feeling that he may never be the owner of the farm has now changed his perspective. Whereas he has looked on the farm as his own, and has worked it as an owner, he now works it as a tenant.

10. Loss of live stock. On the Pacific coast in an area defined as from California north to Squamish in B. C., there is a peculiar disease prevalent amongst cattle known as "redwater". In this area veterinary surgeons will not guarantee any cow immune to this disease. Many settlers in B.C. have suffered very severe losses from this cause. Instance: one who during the past three years has lost six milk cows with two new cases showing at this date—another in a shorter period has lost seven animals. With few exceptions the only reimbursement the owner of the animals gets is the value of the hide. Many have had very serious losses in the recent T. B. tests.

11. Save the country from the ignominy of having to eject the soldier. With broken spirit his temperament is changing; ejectment in its literal sense may not have been carried out, but we know of settlers being threatened with it.

12. Save the lands from reversion to the Crown, becoming non-taxable and a burden on municipal tax payers. On an abandoned property improvements at once depreciate in value, and continue to depreciate until, and sometimes after, an inexperienced (in so far as the west and the bush is concerned) overseas farmer, who in the majority of cases is without money), has been placed on it under fairer conditions and circumstances than our own soldier settlers.

Finally: The relief—a full measure—is necessary to return to the men their spirit, the spirit which won the war, and to retain the men as farmers and as good citizens of the empire.

Why these men chose the Soldier Settler Scheme of Re-establishment

Though the scheme may have been conceived in a spirit of gratitude, is did appeal to the government as a wonderful and expeditious solution of the great problem of demobilization, when large members of men would be suddenly returned to civilian life, with, it was expected, a disrupting effect on the labour market.

The government did its work thoroughly. As early as the spring of 1918 Y.M.C.A. officers in France were busy expounding by lecture the merits of this marvelous scheme, and urging the soldier to go on the land, on his return, if ever, to Canada. Think of the effect of such a project dangled before the war-weary eyes of men who for years had trodden the wastes of the trench zone—peaceful home life instead of the crowded life of trench and camp; independence in place of a rigid, if necessary, discipline; privacy in exchange for the somewhat excessive society of his verminous, if heroic, comrades. He thought of the joy of his wife and children having the great open spaces to roam in, to play in, compared with the city flat. He thought of the milk, the honey, the fruit, all the good things his children could have. (In his past city life he knew that the farmer got all of the good things to eat, and always plenty of such good things.) Many a man, who until then had no thought of farming, had visions of all these; he saw the peaceful green fields pastured by herds of beautiful cattle; the appeal was too strong for him, and he determined that should he survive he would go on the land.

The man who had no such visions found, to his dismay on his return, that his war service was considered a detriment rather than an advantage in the eyes of most employers. He was told that his nerves could not be in shape to enable him to resume his former employment. and he was advised that the farm was the only place for him. After weary weeks walking the streets in search of employment, he found himself with diminishing funds and lessening assurance being inevitably drawn to the ever open door,—the Soldier Settlement board. There is thus a dual responsibility on the people of Canada as well as on the government.

Why, if not Successful, do they Stay?

The savings of their lifetime are gone. All have made payments to the board, some have made heavy payments. Those who owned other properties either in their own or wives' names had to give them as security to the board, chattel mortgages were taken by the board on privately owned stock and equipment.

Are they to lose everything? In plain justice it is not right that they alone should stand the loss.

[Mr. McQuarrie.]

They stay because the community wishes them.

They stay because the experience dearly bought is valuable to the country.

They stay because they have local debts which in time they are going to pay, and they are determined to redeem their good name.

The average age of the settler is forty years. It is well known that war service aged a man; it is conceded by the medical profession that according to the length of time a man had in actual foward area service, years have been taken from his life, in some cases five, yes and ten years. At his age, with the old spirit broken in his heroic but vain attempt to establish himself through the soldier settlement scheme, prematurely old, he has, in the matter of obtaining employment, placed on him a most severe handicap.

They stay with some hope that the government will in time give them alleviation.

Some reasons for British Columbia's Opposition to the Revaluation of Land Scheme

We do not believe it can be either workable or equitable. It will take too long to work out, and it will be very expensive both to the government and to the settler. Revaluation is impossible with a bush farm. No one can visualize the cleared, levelled, cultivated, drained, fenced fields of to-day as the bush, stumps and logs, both above and under the ground, roots, brush, stones and holes of seven years ago.

Provided the scheme was possible of execution, and it can only be possible where the lands, in a general way, appear to-day as they were when bought by the board, we fear there are many instances where relief afforded would be inadequate.

We fear prejudiced judgments where the board is both defendant and judge and we consider the idea of an appeal to the Exchequer court impossible.

In provincial convention held in May last, the form for relief asked was that there be a complete cancellation of all interest charges and reversion to principal account of all payments already made on account of interest, and that there be a straight reduction made in the principal amount shown in all agreements. This has been endorsed by new branches formed since the convention.

The cost of putting this scheme into effect would be very small, as would also the time taken to do so and to complete it. It would be entirely a matter of office work to be done by the staff already in the employ of the board. We venture to say that the cost of relief in this form to the country could be grealy offset by a reduction in cost of administration of the Soldier Settlement Board, which we believe will be made possible by the putting into effect of this scheme.

Mr. NEILL: May I ask a question? I quite agree with all the hon. member has said with one exception. Is it not obvious that in the sad and desperate case just laid before us more would be required than an average flat rate, and that that can be done by revaluation instead of taking a flat rate along with men who do not need the re-valuation?

Mr. McQUARRIE: I would like to finish this statement first.

The soldiers who are still on the land are recognized as some of our finest citizens. They are now established in the community, where the people desire them to stay in preference to the untried and "out-of-his-element" imperial settler. Out of the hundreds who took up land it is reasonable to expect a percentage of failures. There were failures, but the failures are long since gone, and the board is now satisfied that all are good settlers.

Recognition is fairly general of the fact that all farm lands are over-valued, over-capitalized. Surveys made in recent years by various bodies have proven this. Regarding our claim that it is impossible to pay for a farm from the earnings of the farm, may we mention that such surveys have shown that the farmer gets a return from his investment of two and one-half per cent, and never more than five. A survey made by the university of British Columbia showed a return of two and one-quarter per cent.

Some months ago one of British Columbia's best known, and most successful farmers, not an ex-service man, who for some time was chairman of one of the Soldier Settlement Board committees in the Vancouver office, and before whom hundreds of settlers and prospective settlers had to appear, was asked for a candid opinion of the soldier settlement scheme. His reply was, that it was "A fantastic dream which never could be realized."

This is signed by R. A. Payne, acting secretary of the soldier settlement committee, British Columbia executive council, Canadian Legion, British Empire Service League, and is dated at Langley, British Columbia, November 1, 1926. I have taken about twenty minutes to read this document; I noticed some hon. members who seemed to be getting uneasy, but I submit that it is only fair that the views of these men should be placed before this committee, particularly after the statement made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill).

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the House took recess.

PRIVATE BILLS

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS

Bill No. 44, respecting the Ottawa Gas Company.—Mr. Chevrier.

Bill No. 74, respecting the Canadian Transit Company.—Mr. Odette.

Bill No. 75, respecting the Essex Terminal Railway Company.—Mr. Robinson.

OTTAWA ELECTRIC COMPANY

The House in committee on Bill No. 43, respecting the Ottawa Electric Company—Mr. Chevrier—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Increase of capital stock.

Mr. HEAPS: What is the purpose of this increase in the capital stock? Does it represent actual cash or otherwise?

Mr. CHEVRIER: This bill is for the purpose of increasing the capital stock to allow it to be in keeping with the development of the company in the city of Ottawa. The money will be used for the purpose of constructing extensions which were contemplated last year and which are now being undertaken, and also for the purpose of completing the million dollar building which is already under construction in this city. The amount will be in cash. This bill has already been threshed out before the private bills committee.

PATENT OF ENOS HENRY BRIGGS

The House in committee on Bill No. 72, respecting a certain patent of Enos Henry Briggs—Mr. McDiarmid—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Commissioner may restore patent or dismiss application.

Mr. STEVENS: I want to do this year what I have done on previous occasions, namely, to draw attention to the increasing habit of persons coming back to parliament in order to revive patents that have expired. I do not know how carefully this bill was scrutinized, but I think all bills of this character should be very carefully scrutinized and a full explanation given to parliament. There is a great danger of some individual, without any real interest in the matter, securing control of a patent that has expired, coming to parliament, getting it renewed by parliament, and possibly doing a great injury to the public generally. I would like someone, who can speak with authority, I do not know whom—possibly the Minister of Trade and Commerce under whose department this comes —to give the assurance of the government that departmental officials have carefully investigated the reasons for this renewal. I have no knowledge of this individual case, but as a matter of principle I have always protested against the revival of these patents that have expired.

Mr. CANNON: Some bills concerning renewals of patents have been before the private bills committee. The atttiude taken not only by the government but by the members of the committee themselves has been, as my hon. friend has just pointed out, to scrutinize every bill with great care in order that no injustice may be suffered by any party. I notice that this bill has come back from the committee without amendment. Before the private bills committee officials of the Patents branch are always present to give all the information they require, and the committee also secure from the promoters any additional data or particulars which might be useful to them in reaching a decision. The remarks of my hon. friend are perfectly justified. Parliament cannot be too careful in examining these bills before passing them.

DETROIT AND WINDSOR SUBWAY COMPANY

The House in committee on Bill No. 68, to incorporate the Detroit and Windsor Subway Company—Mr. Odette—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. STEVENS: Has this bill received the approval of the Minister of Railways?

Mr. DUNNING: It has received the approval of the railway committee. As to the minister's approval, I do not think that matters so much in the case of a private bill.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, it is very important indeed. For many years now the railway committee and parliament have carefully studied all private railway charters in view of the large investment that we have in the national railways, and it is usual to have some expression from the minister as to whether or not the proposed railway conflicts with the national system.

Mr. DUNNING: This is not a railway charter, but a charter for the digging of a tunnel under the Detroit river, so that the conditions are different.

Mr. STEVENS: But it is for railway service, is it not?

Mr. DUNNING: It may be partly for railway service, but in any event the department has carefully examined the bill and has made suggestions with regard to it to the railway committee, and as we proceed through the bill the importance of those suggestions will be seen. Their main intention was to make this particular project subject to the general provisions of the Railway Act. The department concerned itself with the public interest in the matter. There is no conflict here with the Canadian National Railway System in any shape or form.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

On section 7—Capital stock.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Did I understand the minister to say that this comes under the railway commission and the Railway Act?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, and as we proceed through the bill the sections relating to the relevant portions of the Railway Act will become apparent. In the section now before us provision is made for the deposit by the company of $50,000 in the Dominion treasury, which shall not be withdrawn until at least 25 per cent of the proposed tunnel is constructed, and the whole amount is to be forfeited unless the project is proceeded with.

Section agreed to.

Section 8 agreed to.

On section 9—Amalgamation with other companies.

Mr. HANSON: I notice that the last provision in the original section, "Provided that no such amalgamation shall be valid or acted on until it has been approved by the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada," is not in the section as amended. It seems to me that in the public interest it should be retained. I mention that for the minister's consideration.

Mr. DUNNING: It is not necessary to use these words now, when we bring the company under the amalgamation provisions of the Railway Act. I may say that I am not the sponsor of the bill and am merely dealing with such matters as the minister might be expected to look after in the public interest.

Section agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Clause 10 has been struck out.

Mr. DUNNING: It is not necessary.

The CHAIRMAN: Clauses 11, 12, and 13 have been struck out and a clause inserted as clause 13.

Mr. STEVENS: That becomes clause 10, does it not?

Mr. DUNNING: It will have to be renumbered; the numbers can be corrected.

Section agreed to.

On section 14—Right of voting.

Mr. DUNNING: This section has been amended by changing the word "consolidated" in the first and second lines to the word "amalgamated" to bring it into conformity with the Railway Act.

Section agreed to.

On section 15—Powers, 1919, c. 68, R.S. 1906, c. 115—subways or tunnels.

Mr. EVANS: The powers of this company are almost unlimited. It can acquire any property which it wants and can secure any charter, license, authority, franchise, concession, and so on. I am surprised that a project of this size should pass the House without any comment or criticism. I criticised the bill in committee, and I still think we should be very careful in granting charters of this kind for public utilities which are used by the people themselves, and which should not be placed in private hands to be exploited by them. This company applies for a charter. We have no knowledge of the company and do not know whether they have money to go on with the work, or credit, or backing. I wish again to protest against the granting of charters for public utilities in this way, whether tunnels, bridges or railways. I think we are doing a wrong thing in giving away franchises in this manner, because the public may suffer. I am simply at present making my protest.

Mr. ODETTE: I explained this section while the bill was before the committee. It provides for the construction of a tunnel beneath the bed of the Detroit river from the city of Windsor to the city of Detroit. If the proposal to build a bridge across the river is all right, why should the promoters not be given a charter to build a tunnel? The people of the border city are not interested in the question whether it is a tunnel or a bridge. They are interested in rapid transportation across the Detroit river, either over or under it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Are the people in that district in favour of it?

Mr. ODETTE: We are so optimistic in that part of Canada that we believe the people are unanimously in favour of it. In any event it is an impossibility to interest the government of the United States in either a bridge or a tunnel. The people of the cities on the border believe this tunnel would not be of any advantage to Detroit, but would be an advantage to Windsor, Walkerville and other towns in that district. They care not whether it is a bridge or a tunnel, as long as it gives them rapid transit to Detroit.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think those of us who are not privileged to be on the Railway committee are entitled to some further explanation than that which has just been given us with respect to the principle involved in this case. With regard to roads and bridges generally, it has come to be understood that these are matters for municipal, provincial, in some cases interprovincial or interstate acts. Here we have a tunnel, a public service of a little different character from a number that have come before us. We have already in contemplation in this bill the necessity for entering into arrangements with the municipalities concerned. As the hon. member for Rosetown has stated, very wide powers are being granted, and, so far as I have been able to see, there are no corresponding safeguards. This House ought to have further information than has yet been given it with regard to the whole proposal. In the past we have had these private enterprises, even with regard to roads. Formerly we had toll gates. Now we have done away with the toll gates and the exploitation that went with them, and we are coming to the point where the public build and control these roads.

Here is another class of utility upon which we have not yet had a definite pronouncement by the House or the country. We should go slowly before granting a charter of this character.

Mr. DUNNING: I think my hon. friend is entitled to an explanation of the view of the Department of Railways in connection with these matters, in so far as the safeguarding of the public interest is concerned. With regard to construction, as I pointed out before, in order to guarantee the bona fides of those who are undertaking this enterprise a deposit of $50,000 is required to be made in the Dominion treasury, which cannot be withdrawn until 25 per cent of the work is done. That is provided for in one of the sections which has already been passed.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What would be the capital expenditure?

Mr. ODETTE: It will be $16,000,000.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is that deposit regarded as sufficient safeguard?

Mr. DUNNING: When the promoters put up $16,000,000 of their own money all we want is a guarantee that they are bona fide tunnel builders and not charter mongers; $50,000 we consider sufficient for that purpose. As we proceed with the bill it will be noticed by hon. members that the railway committee on the suggestion of the Department of Railways and Canals, given through myself, did bring this project under the general terms of the Railway Act in so far as they could be made applicable thereto. That means supervision by the Board of Railway Commissioners. It also means that in the public interest, as is set out in a later section, the tolls to be charged will be subject to the control of the railway commission in exactly the same manner as railway rates are now. That, I think, is as far as the Department of Railways and Canals could go in suggesting public safeguards around a project of this kind which, as my hon. friend states, is rather out of the usual run, being a tunnel not only between a province and a state, but between two countries. Apparently it is not possible to get such a project as this undertaken otherwise than by private capital. If that is acknowledged, then the duty of this parliament and of the Department of Railways and Canals is to see to it that the public interest is safeguarded in every possible way, and I think the railway committee in the amendments suggested bringing the whole project under the purview of the railway commission has gone as far as it is possible to go at the present time.

Sections 16 and 18 agreed to.

On section 19—Approval by United States.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Has the United States granted the requisite charter?

The CHAIRMAN: Section 19 has been struck out and the following substituted therefor:

The company shall not commence actual construction of the said subway or tunnel until permitted by the congress of the United States of America or other competent authorities of the said United States of America, but the company may in the meantime acquire land, submit plans to the governor in council, and do all other things authorized by this act.

Section agreed to.

On section 20—Consent of municipalities.

Mr. GEARY: I should think the proper phraseology would be, "along or under" any highway.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. ODETTE: I think that would be quite in order.

An hon. MEMBER: Should it not read, "along, under or over"?

Mr. GEARY: That will be right. You will have approaches and ramps somewhere without doubt.

Mr. DUNNING: It would be a queer subway that went over a highway.

Mr. GEARY: No. It may be a tunnel in one place and then come out to the surface and cross municipal highways. We have more than one of those in Ontario.

Mr. ODETTE: Then I move:

That section 20 be amended by inserting after the word "along" in the second line the words "under or over".

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 21 and 22 agreed to.

On section 23—Equal rights of passage to other companies.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Will the Minister of Railways say if this is a standard requirement?

Mr. DUNNING: A similar reservation is very frequently made in connection with a structure which is regarded from the point of view of its common use by a number of utilities. It is merely compelling those who are building the tunnel to allow a joint user by those interested in other means of transit.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That again is going a very long way.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend apparently does not quite get the point involved. Surely it is reasonable when a tunnel franchise is being given to say to those who are getting it that they shall accord equal rights to all transit companies, rail or otherwise, connecting with it. I thought my hon. friend would be supporting this view for equal rights.

MONTREAL, OTTAWA AND GEORGIAN BAY CANAL COMPANY

The House resumed from Tuesday, March 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chevrier for the second reading of Bill No. 78, respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): At nine o'clock on Tuesday evening I had practically concluded my remarks on this bill, but I shall take this opportunity again to make plain my position as I am anxious not to be misunderstood in the matter. It is not my intention to prevent the bill from being referred to and considered by the committee on railways. Unfortunately, under the rules of the House, I have been obliged to extend my remarks over three different evenings; but it will be found that altogether I have spoken for less than an hour. It cannot be said therefore that I have in any way endeavoured to talk the bill out.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Some hon. gentlemen over the way laugh at this but they speak sometimes for two hours. I do not inflict my remarks on this House very frequently and, I repeat, I have no desire whatever to try and talk this bill out. I thought it best to discuss the bill on the second reading inasmuch as it is one of great interest to the public of Ontario and Quebec although it appears nominally on the list of private bills.

As I pointed out before, I want to have hon. members as fully informed as possible of the facts regarding this bill before it goes to the committee, where I hope it will be very thoroughly considered. I am not opposed to the building of the Georgian Bay canal. Indeed, I would favour the project if it were carried out on its own merits. I do not think, however, that it should be financed from the profits of power development at the expense of the power users of Quebec and Ontario, nor do I think that the immense power possibilities of the Ottawa river should be tied up in any way to a private company.

We may as well face the facts of this situation. The Dominion and each of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario have certain rights regarding the Ottawa river. My impression is that no one knows exactly what their respective rights are, but I do not intend to discuss that phase of the matter. As they each have rights, however, the only sensible thing for them to do would be to meet around a table with a view to finding some reasonable and satisfactory way of dealing with the problem. That is what individuals would do under similar conditions. Even if the Georgian Bay canal charter were renewed, that company could do nothing in the way of distributing power in either Quebec or Ontario until they made arrangements with the provinces. All this being so, I urge that the Dominion government take over the enterprise under the powers given them by section 5 of chapter 128 of the statutes of 1906, which I read into Hansard last Tuesday evening. Such action would not hurt the shareholders of the present company as they would be recompensed for their expenditure, while it would place the whole problem in such a position that it could be dealt with on a common sense basis by the Dominion and the two provinces, in the best interests of all concerned.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that after all, whether we are members of provincial legislatures or of this House we represent the people of Canada and should do our best to see that these great properties are used entirely in the public interest. By retaining possession of and developing these water-powers the three governments, the Dominion government and those of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, will not only be receiving a large annual revenue but will be ensuring for all time a supply of electricity for light, heat and power at a reasonable rate for the people of these provinces.

Mr. GLEN: Before the hon. gentleman resumes his seat I would like to ask him, just for information, how it is proposed to separate the development of the water-power and the construction and operation of the canal, having in view the paramount need of navigable waters?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I do not think there is any great difficulty about that. If the representatives of these three governments will meet together at a common table they will find a way to solve that difficulty.

Mr. MANION: I was waiting for the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Lapierre) to speak; I will give him the floor if he wishes, because I know he is very much interested in this question.

Mr. LAPIERRE: Go ahead.

Mr. MANION: I was going to say that the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) rather apologized for having kept this question open, and he also took his seat a moment ago when but six more minutes of speaking on his part would have kept the question open until Monday. He did that, I know, in that spirit of fair play which is absolutely characteristic of him, but at the same time I believe he would have been treating the House better if he had carried on until nine o'clock. That is what I intend to do, and the reason I am going to carry on until nine o'clock is this.

Mr. CANNON: You are very frank about it, anyway.

Mr. MANION: I always believe in being frank. I am not killing time, because I have some facts to present, but the reason I am going to carry on until nine o'clock is because this is too important a question to decide in fifteen or twenty minutes, as might have been the case this evening.

I was not in the House either of the other evenings when this question came up. I come from a part of the country, like my good friend from Nipissing, which is vitally interested in the question of water routes, but while I have a great deal of sympathy for any attitude he may take I will likely disagree with him ultimately. I must look at it from my own standpoint, and I can look back well over twenty years during which the Georgian Bay canal question was being discussed in my section of the country, upon this very charter which we are discussing to-night. That charter was granted in 1894, thirty-three years ago; not before I was born, I will admit, but back in that direction. Though it was granted so long ago, I made it my business to look up the original charter, and I find that those originally named in it are almost all dead, but the charter is still alive, gasping for breath it is true, but still gasping.

Mr. LAPIERRE: Going strong.

Mr. MANION: Possibly. I am not going to argue too strongly against it to-night, but I am going to show, until nine o'clock, some of the reasons why I think the charter should have been allowed to expire with a lot of the original charter holders, and probably I will continue on Monday and give some others.

Mr. HANSON: Who were originally named?

Mr. MANION: There are too many to read, but most of them are dead. I have not had time to-night to look through the list, and there are no doubt a few of them still living, but I believe the greater majority have passed away. This charter was then carried on by Sir Robert Perks for many years; then he got tired of it and handed it over to other interests.

In all sincerity, Mr. Speaker, and not particularly speaking of this charter at all, when I heard the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) objecting to a charter to-night, one with which I was not familiar at all, I found myself more or less in agreement with his remarks when he said that we are, or certainly in the past have been, too prone to grant charters for all kinds of projects. I made it my business to glance through the volume of 1894, and I found many charters are not alive now, charters which had been renewed many times but which were finally allowed to expire quietly. I should say that more than half and probably two-thirds of this list of 1894 were charters which never served any useful purpose at all, and many of them were grabbed off for the purpose of holding up some legitimate progress. They were secured in order that those who got them might take some group of men by the neck and say, "You cannot do this because we secured the charter first, and you must pay us before you can go on."

Mr. LAPIERRE: They were granted under Conservative governments.

Mr. MANION: That was true in 1894, but I can tell my friend that this has been going on since 1896 as well, and even all through the ten years that I have been here. I can frankly say that no matter whether it was a Liberal government, a Unionist government, or a Conservative government, much the same process has been carried out; and I have come to the conclusion that unless there is really some good reason for charters to be granted it is time to call a halt to a great many of these applications.

Mr. McPHERSON: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? If such is the case, why not allow it to go to committee before further discussion, to see whether those asking for the renewal can give some good reason for their request?

Mr. MANION: I am not trying to block it from going to committee, but now is the time to discuss the principle of the whole business.

Mr. McPHERSON: The principle of the bill or the principle of granting charters?

Mr. MANION: The principle of granting this charter; that is the principle we are discussing to-night and that is what I am speaking of. Until we decide that the principle of granting this charter is good, it is our duty to discuss it and come to some decision in this House.

Before my good friend, the Hon. the Speaker, tells me it is nine o'clock, may I point out that the premier of Ontario has come out flatly against this renewal. Prophecies are very dangerous things for politicians to make, especially before elections, I know, but I am going to make a prophecy

now. I believe that the premier of Quebec will in all probability also take a stand against this renewal, and because I think that a likely thing to happen, I feel it should go over till Monday.

Mr. LAPOINTE: How can you tell?

Mr. MANION: I am only guessing. But now I will ask you, Mr. Speaker, to call it nine o'clock and let us proceed on Monday, although if you do not wish to call it nine o'clock just now, I am ready to go on.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT ACT, 1919, AMENDMENT

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 61, to amend the Soldier Settlement Act, 1919—Hon. Mr. Forke—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Revaluation of land sold to settlers.

Mr. FORKE: When the committee rose, Mr. Chairman, we were discussing the matter of appeal, and I would like to say a few words in regard to that aspect of the bill. Part of this section reads as follows:

—and if any applicant is dissatisfied with the decision of the board he may, within such time as is prescribed by regulations made by the Governor in Council, appeal to the Exchequer court of Canada and the decision of that court shall be final.

There seems to be a good deal of objection to an appeal to the Exchequer court. Some seem to think that this would be expensive; that it would entail quite a long delay, and in fact that it would be altogether too cumbersome a procedure for the soldier settler. It may, however, not be so cumbersome or difficult as it appears on the surface. Section 42 of the Exchequer Court Act, chapter 140 of the Statutes of Canada reads:

The court may, for the purpose of taking account or making enquiries, or for the determination of any question or issue of fact, refer any cause, claim, matter or petition to the Registrar or any other officer of the court, or to any official or special referee for inquiry and report, and may also, if it thinks it expedient so to do, call in the aid of one or more assessors specially qualified, and try and hear such cause, matter or petition, wholly or partially, with the assistance of such assessor or assessors.

In a case of appeal I suppose the procedure would be this: An appeal would be made to the Exchequer court, which would nominate some individual, probably the county court judge in the district from which the appeal was made. He would make an investigation and report to the Exchequer court which would then render a final decision. I am not sufficiently acquainted with all the procedure, but I know of certain cases where individual matters have been referred to the Exchequer court and where they have been settled quickly and decisively, without delay. What may take place as regards many appeals I am not in a position to say. Some of the lawyers in the House will be better acquainted with that phase of the matter than I am.

I do not believe there are going to be as many appeals as some members seem to think. I believe there are more satisfied soldier settlers than we commonly imagine. I have been in the department only for three or four months, and I have signed quite a number of transfers of land where the people buying soldier settler lands have been paying higher prices than the soldier settlers originally paid for them when they purchased them from the Soldier Settlement Board. That shows that a number of these lots, if they were put in the market now, would be worth more money than the soldier settlers paid for them originally.

Mr. MILLAR: Does that take into account any improvements such as the soldier settler makes on the land?

Mr. FORKE: I am not in a position to say. Generally when cases come before me, the price at which the land was originally sold to the settler and the price offered for it at the present time are stated; I am advised by the Soldier Settlement Board that this is a fair value for the land, and the transfer is usually made. I do not want the impression to go abroad that this is taking place in many cases because it is only in a few cases that it occurs. I cite this only to show that land was not sold at too high a price to commence with. I am pretty well acquainted with the position in which soldier settlers find themselves having lived all these years in western Canada, and I am just as anxious as any other hon. member to help them. I know many of them find themselves in impossible positions, and something must be done if they are to be put on their feet and enabled to carry on successfully.

Many seem to think the money the Dominion government has spent in connection with soldier land settlement has all been lost. That is not the case. They have cultivated a great deal of land; they have produced a great deal of wealth, and many other things can be put to the credit of the work of the soldier settlers. I have mentioned just how I think an appeal to the Exchequer court will work out, but I will welcome any suggestions along this line in order that the legislation may be improved.

I have a suggestion to make, showing how an appeal can be made in another way. I will read the clause and then the committee can draw their own conclusions. The clause I would suggest, dealing with the value of the land, reads:

Upon the receipt of an application made in accordance with the terms of this section the board shall ascertain and determine the depreciation in value as set forth in paragraph (c) of this section; and if any applicant is dissatisfied with the decision of the board he may, within such time as is prescribed by regulations made by the Governor in Council, appeal said decision by notice in writing to the board who shall thereupon refer the appeal for final decision to district or county court judge of the judicial district or county in which the land is situate or in the province of Quebec to the judge of the Superior court having jurisdiction in the district in which the land is situate, and such judge shall fix a convenient time and place for hearing and determining such appeal.

Mr. CLARK: Is that a proposed amendment?

Mr. FORKE: I am putting it before the committee as a suggestion to think over, not as an amendment. I may say that in introducing this bill I am not wedded to any particular section. If the committee can suggest improvements I am quite willing to listen and to take the decision of the committee on the matter. It is simply an appeal to the county court judge.

Mr. NEILL: Alone?

Mr. FORKE: Alone, of course with a hearing given to the board and to the soldier settler himself or his representative.

Mr. ADSHEAD: What will that cost the soldier settler, or will there be any cost to him?

Mr. FORKE: The bill will cover that. By regulation of the Governor in Council it could be made so that it will not cost the soldier anything, or otherwise.

Mr. ADSHEAD: What regulation has the minister in mind?

Mr. FORKE: It says:

Expenditures necessarily incurred by or in connection with the administration of this act as may be provided by regulation, shall be paid out of monies appropriated from time to time by parliament to soldier land settlement.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Does that apply to the expenses of the soldiers or the expenses of the department?

[Mr. Forke.]

Mr. FORKE: I think it is intended to cover both.

Mr. GARDINER: The amendment which the minister has just read, it seems to me, would be much more preferable, so far as Alberta at least is concerned, than the section as it now stands. During the last few years, because of the conditions prevailing, largely due to deflation, our district court judges had a good deal of experience in the matter of land values. There have been many applications before the district courts for mortgage foreclosures, and by reason of that fact the district court judges know land values fairly well in their own particular district. I am satisfied that the returned men, in view of the fact that the court is right in their midst, would be better satisfied with judgments from that court than from anyone appointed by the Exchequer court for that purpose. If the minister could see his way clear to move that amendment, I think it would be in the best interests of all concerned. We should try and set up machinery that will be satisfactory to the returned men in order that we may get this situation eventually cleaned up.

The hon. member for New Westminster this afternoon brought before the committee resolutions passed by a certain organization asking for a flat reduction of twenty-five per cent, or something of that nature, on all outstanding accounts of the soldier settlers. I know something about this situation so far as Alberta is concerned, and I would emphasize very strongly that a flat rate reduction would not be acceptable in our province because of the injustices that would be created, and that would have to be met later on. In my own district, for instance, no doubt some soldier settlers bought at the right price and are to-day well satisfied with their bargain. Why should we give them a flat reduction of twenty-five per cent? They have received good value for the money they have expended on these properties. On the other hand, there are many properties that would not be satisfactory to the returned men even if you give this flat reduction of twenty-five per cent. In fact it would only keep the settler there a short time, and eventually he would leave the farm because the twenty-five per cent flat reduction would not be sufficint to meet his particular case. Under these circumstances I hope the minister will not consider any proposal for a flat rate reduction on all these properties. Let us have a proper valuation as set out in this legislation, together with the amendment put before the committee a few minutes ago by the minister, and then I think we shall settle this question in a very short time to the satisfaction both of the returned men and the people of Canada.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I came down this evening, Mr. Chairman, with the intention of making a suggestion in regard to this particular section and asking the minister to endorse it. I felt disposed, if the government wanted the Exchequer court of Canada to pass final judgment on any appeal, to suggest to them the advisability of the appeal being made to the county judge, who would hear the evidence and make his report to the Exchequer court, whose decision would be final. It was in my mind to make that suggestion to the minister, and I am therefore very much pleased that he is himself proposing an amendment which will enable the soldier to make his appeal direct to the county judge. I am sure that that will be much more satisfactory; it will give the soldier an opportunity which I am sure he will take advantage of if he thinks he has any grounds for appealing. But if we left this clause as it is, many soldiers who felt they had grounds for appeal would not go to the trouble of making their appeal to the Exchequer court. To begin with, many of them in the country districts—this might not appeal to the lawyers here as a very reasonable thing to say—would be terrified by the very words "Exchequer court." That would not frighten a lawyer, of course, but it would many country people who are not versed in the law. On the other hand, they know the county judge, and am I not right in saying that as a rule throughout the country the county judges are pretty well acquainted with the land values in the various parts of the county over which they preside, and in that way are better qualified, it seems to me, to pass judgment on appeals of this kind than some gentlemen, no matter what their ability may be, sitting here in Ottawa? For that reason I strongly endorse the suggested amendment, and I hope the clause will be changed along that line, so that by a proper arrangement of the wording it will mean that where the soldier feels he is not getting justice he can appeal to the county judge.

Mr. MacLAREN: I think the sending of the appeals to the Exchequer court would mean considerable delay. I do not think it is possible for it to deal with appeals, if they are numerous, in an expeditious way. It is much easier to submit the appeals to the county court judges. That will be much more expeditious and much more satisfactory to all concerned. I therefore take this opportunity of expressing a preference for the change that the minister is suggesting along this line. He has asked for an expression of opinion on this matter, and the opinion I would suggest would be that his amendment would improve the act.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: The suggested amendment of the minister is quite an improvement to the machinery that is proposed to be set up. But the minister stated that he did not imagine that many appeals would be made. I am rather of the opinion that there will be a great many appeals made by soldiers if the first revaluation is to be made as proposed in this bill. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that there could be an improvement made in the first step to be taken, and that improvement should be very much along the lines of the suggested amendment, which would also be along the line of the shape the bill was in when it left this chamber last year; that is, instead of the revaluating being done as between the soldier on the one hand and the settlement board on the other, it should be done by a party of three—the soldier, or his representative; the settlement board, or its representative, and the county court judge. The revaluation in the first place should be done in that way. If it is left to the discretion of the settlement board and the soldier to arrive at a valuation of these lands, scores, yes, hundreds of cases will never be satisfactorily settled. The reason I say that is because in many cases there is what you might call bad blood between the individual soldier settler and the board. I do not know whose fault it is. The board is evidently trying to do its best, and the settler thinks he is trying to do his best. But he is out on the land, a number of miles from town. He is thinking over his affairs and brooding over what he regards as an injustice, and when a soldier in that frame of mind is brought in contact with the board there is not apt to be a satisfactory settlement. We are proposing to amend the act in any case. We do not feel that it is wrong to amend the act, or that we must take it as it was turned out of the Senate last year. We seem perfectly justified in amending it, and since we have accepted the proposed change in regard to appeals, why not carry it further and make that proposed change in the first step by saying that the county court judge, a representative of the soldier, and a representative of the board, shall consider the valuation made in the first place, and that their decision shall be binding? We will then do away with the necessity for the two steps, and I am quite sure that it will be much more satisfactory to the soldier settler. Not only are there going to be cases where the soldier will not receive a fair measure of justice from the board, but there may possibly be cases where, I might say, the board will be over-lenient with the settler. After all the board has to be represented by some individual. That individual may be a gentleman who was doing business in that particular community, and may give a special favour to the soldier. Such being the case he might do what you might call over-justice in the case of a particular soldier; he might deal too favourably with him. There are those two thoughts: some soldiers will not get justice in one way and some will not get justice in another. I suggest to the minister that if he proposes to amend the bill it would be preferable to amend it in the first step.

Mr. THORSON: I wish to throw out one or two suggestions for the consideration of the committee. I am delighted to see that there is a desire on both sides of the House to make this bill as beneficial to the soldiers as possible. There are two principles we should keep firmly fixed in mind. First, if there is to be a right of appeal given to the solider settler, then that appeal should be as accessible as possible to him, and the procedure set up for appeal should be made as simple as possible. The second principle that I think we should keep in mind is that the revaluation which is proposed in this bill should not entail on the soldier settler a single cent in the way of cost to himself. We are fairly generally agreed that the provisions contained in this present bill providing for an appeal to the Exchequer court of Canada will not be looked upon favourably by the soldier settlers of this country. I hope that, when an application is made by the soldier settler to the Soldier Settlement Board, the board will appreciate the spirit of this act and be generous in any attitude they adopt towards the settler. I hope that a policy of that sort will be impressed upon the various supervisors in soldier settlement districts throughout Canada. If such a policy is adopted by the various boards, the number of appeals will not be as large as we are sometimes led to believe they will be. But there will undoubtedly be appeals, and the simplest and least expensive form of appeal should be established by this act.

Various suggestions in this behalf have been made by soldier organizations and by speakers on both sides of the House. It has been suggested that instead of providing for an appeal to the Exchequer court of Canada, we should provide for an appeal to the county or district court judge of the county or district in which the land is situate, or, in the province of Quebec, where there are no county or district court judges, that the corresponding judge should be charged with the duties of hearing appeals. With regard to that suggestion, I know something of the work of the county court judges in the province of Manitoba, and I can say that at present their energies are very severely taxed. I do not know what the situation is in other provinces but I do know it to be a fact in the case of the county court judges of Manitoba that they are overworked and if this additional burden is placed upon them I think it only fair that they should be remunerated for it.

There is another objection to entrusting appeals to the county court or district court judges. The judge in question will hear the case and will dispose of it according to the ordinary rules of law, will observe the ordinary rules of evidence, and the soldier settler, in order to get his case fairly before that court, will be called upon to employ counsel. There is that objection, I think, to the suggestion that the appeal should lie to county or district court judges. If that scheme of appeal is adopted I think it should be provided that any legal costs incurred by the soldier settler in placing his case before the appellate court constituted by this act should be met by the Dominion of Canada, thereby observing the second principle which I enunciated at the beginning, that the revaluation should not cost the settler one cent.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Did my hon. friend not hear the Minister of Immigration say that in clause (f) expenditures necessarily incurred should apply to the soldier's expense as well as that of the department?

Mr. THORSON: If that has not been clearly stated it should be definitely set out and provided for in the act—that there should be no cost whatever to the soldier settler in getting a fair revaluation of his land.

A further suggestion has been made that an arbitration board should be set up to hear appeals, this board to consist of three persons, one to be the county or district court judge, or the corresponding judge in the province of Quebec, and the other two to be representatives of the Soldier Settlement Board and the soldier settler respectively. That, I think, is preferable to constituting a judge as the sole person to dispose of the appeal. But that suggestion is also open to the objection which I mentioned when speaking of the county and district court judges. If it is true that these judges are overloaded with work, as I believe them to be in Manitoba, then if they have to hear a large number of appeals it will take too long to get the revaluations completed.

Still another suggestion has been made, namely, that an arbitration board should be set up consisting of a representative of the Soldier Settlement Board in the district involved and a representative of the soldier settler himself, and that these two should agree upon the third member. In a number of cases they would probably so agree, and that would take a good deal of work off the shoulders of the judges and, in my opinion, would expedite the work of revaluation. Where no agreement could be reached between the two representatives, I would suggest that either the county court judge himself should be the third member of the board or should appoint such third member.

I offer these suggestions to the committee for its consideration, and I should like again to emphasize that whatever procedure by way of appeal is adopted, the two principles that I enunciated at the outset should be kept in mind—the process of revaluation should be made as simple as possible, and no cost whatsoever should fall on the soldier settler.

Mr. DICKIE: Mr. Chairman, since I first attempted to catch your eye pretty nearly all has been said that I intended to say on this subject. I never before realized I was as small as I feel when I get on my feet to speak to the House. I perhaps have some right to speak on this question, and it would be expected that I should do so because in my district there are I believe more returned soldiers in proportion to the total population than in any other part of the Dominion. Those returned men, as the member for Frontenac said, would be appalled at the cost of appealing to the Exchequer court. I know personally that the amendment suggested by the hon. Minister of Immigration will meet the case ideally, with this exception: I think the dictum of the county judge should be final. Our county court judges, as the member for Frontenac has said, are very familiar with land values. This is particularly the case in my riding. If they are not so familiar, they know people who are, and I am sure they would arrive at a correct decision as to value.

With respect to the twenty-five per cent deduction, of course anything that comes from the Canadian Legion must be considered to have great weight. But speaking for the people I represent, I say it is absolute folly to talk of any such thing. I know very many men who have tried to make a living on property that is not worth twenty-five per cent of what they paid for it. Those poor fellows came from the battle-scarred, shell-torn fields of Europe, glad of any place that offered quietude, and they said: We will take this land and raise poultry or get along some way or other. The land at that time was too highly valued anyway throughout the district with which I am familiar. I know many men who have struggled hard to meet their payments, depriving themselves not only of the pleasures but the necessities of life to do so. I say to the government with respect to the people whom I represent: No matter what you write off those poor fellows will not be able to pay the balance; so write it all off as a loss; do not say anything about the cost, for you will never get the money anyway. Let us see that those splendid fellows who did so much for this country are dealt with fairly.

Mr. EVANS: Mr. Chairman, in my constituency during the past year I have come in contact with a number of soldier settlers and I think the member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has treated the question from a common sense viewpoint. I have a letter in my hand from one of my constituents, a soldier settler, which is very illuminating. After saying a good word for the officials of the Soldier Settlement Board, "by whom", he says, "we have invariably been shown consideration and sympathy in our problems," he gives a very interesting statement of his own affairs. He has a quarter section of land, of which one hundred acres is under cultivation, twenty is to be broken, and the balance of forty acres is rough land. This quarter section cost him $4,200, without a dwelling house or fencing of any kind. He has expended on permanent improvements $700, on stock and equipment $1,400, and on seed and feed another $250, or a total, including the price of the land, of $6,550. But he says:

When consolidation took place my indebtedness was $7,751.49.

I do not think that a flat decrease of 25 per cent would be of much use to this man. Knowing the circumstances as I do, I would say that the price of this quarter section was 50 per cent too high in the first place. He continues:

My payments due in years 1922 to 1926 inclusive	$310 04
Commencing this October they will be	497 61

I know very well he cannot make a living on that land, paying nearly $500 per annum. He points out that this will be recognized to be impossible. His total payments to date are about $850, an average of about $125 per year. He says:

Circumstances leading to above condition are deflation,—wheat in 1922 at $2.40 came down to 75 cents a bushel in 1923,—

Then there was a series of dry years. The years 1918, 1919 and 1920 were undoubtedly dry seasons. He goes on:

With an equitable adjustment I think circumstances will certainly be better. Since the advent of the pool we are practically assured of $1 per bushel for wheat. If I had received this amount in 1923, when I threshed 1,500 bushels, my financial statement would have been a great deal better. The figures I gave you respecting my payments in future will be a little lower as I have had a reduction of $240 on my stock, but it will not be more than $25 per year difference; otherwise you will find my figures are correct. If anything, I have understated a little my indebtedness.

He then goes on to offer a suggestion:

I have put all my capital into this farm, as I financed myself for a long time on my own money. When I started I had cash and assets, $500, and six months' gratuity to draw from. I sold my house in Perdue in the fall of 1920 and at present have nothing to fall back on. I owe no store bills but have hospital and doctor's bills for $150, taxes $250 and sundry creditors $250. Would it be possible to make some allowance for above condition? Amortization should be for a period of thirty-three or thirty-five years. The former is the term applied in Australia; the latter period, I believe, the Canadian Pacific Railway allows. Why not cut out interest altogether except on arrears? I know that the government has to pay interest on Victory bonds. But if it had not been for the soldiers there would have been no victory. We all sympathize with Britain and other European nations who are paying the United States for the privilege of fighting for them. But is this country any different? I am making this point of view to you personally; it is worthy of your consideration.

That, I think, is all that is to the point. Here is a case in which I should say fifty per cent at least would be needed to keep the returned man on the land. And there are other cases, with which I am acquainted, that are just as bad.

Regarding the assessment or revaluation of these lands, it seems to me that the amendment suggested by the minister offers the best way out. We must keep the valuation as nearly as possible within the ability of the settler to pay. Even with the most generous allowance in relation to the indebtedness of the settler, it will not be possible to keep all of them on the land. Had this assistance been given a year ago a good many of them would have availed themselves of it and would have been on the land to-day. I trust that the bill will go through without delay and that before the soldiers are ready to begin their spring work they will know exactly where they stand. Many of them are sticking to the land now, suffering a good many privations in the hope of having this bill go through. I sincerely hope that the provisions of this legislation will be sympathetically considered by the board, and that the soldier will be given every chance to stay on the land and make good.

[Mr. Evans.]

Mr. NEILL: I rise to support the views of the hon. member for Kindersley. It is generally agreed, certainly amongst the soldiers, and in this House as well, I think, that the appeal to the Exchequer court is not one that is to be desired. I do not think, either, that it would meet the wishes of the soldiers to have the appeal taken to the county court judge alone. While I would certainly approve of the county court judge as one of the board of arbitration, I do not think that it would be advisable to have him act alone. I have great respect for the county court judge in my own district and, indeed, I might call him my personal friend.

Mr. DICKIE: Could not the county court judge act as a referee in conjunction with a representative of the Soldier Settlement Board and a representative of the soldier himself?

Mr. NEILL: That is what I was going to recommend. But the amendment suggested by the minister makes the county court judge the sole arbiter; and that is what I am opposing. As I say, I have the greatest respect for the county court judge in my district, whom I consider a personal friend; but when it comes to having him deal exclusively with the determination of land values I certainly think his judgment would be better if he had the advice of a practical farmer. I recall a case years ago when before another county court judge I appealed the assessment, at I think $10,000, of certain land in which I was interested. I should have been satisfied if on appeal that assessment had been reduced by half, but when I took the matter to court, where I naturally made the best case I could, I was agreeably surprised to have the assessment cut down to $1,700. That gave me an idea of how the legal mind will sometimes view a matter of this kind which a practical farmer would handle quite differently.

Mr. GEARY: I understand that my hon. friend wants the board composed of the county court judge acting as referee, together with representatives of the soldiers and the Soldier Settlement Board respectively. Those two representatives would act virtually as counsel for the two opposing parties. It is well known that in arbitrations each party selects its own arbitrator and in some way the third man is selected, either by the courts or by agreement between the other two. And as a matter of practice such a board operates in this way: the representatives of the respective parties are in effect counsel arguing the matter and awaiting the decision of the third, the only impartial man on the tribunal. I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would take into consideration the fact that it is multiplying officials and making a big thing of it to have a board of three instead of simply allowing the two representatives to argue the matter out and leave the decision to the referee.

Mr. NEILL: There is merit in my hon. friend's suggestion, and I admit that there is a tendency to arbitrate in the way he suggests. Still we do find arbitrations proceeding in the manner I have suggested. I think it would be well to have the board of three. If this were a matter of litigation I would allow the county court judge to decide. It is not litigation but arbitration, and there is quite a difference of spirit between the two. Arbitration means conciliation, and the settlement of a matter in a way satisfactory to both parties, which is very different from a mere legal fight as between two contending parties. Last year the House passed Bill No. 17 which contained the procedure indicated by the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary). In that bill the arbitration was to be carried on by a representative of the Soldier Settlement Board, a representative of the soldier and the county court judge, with the further provision that if any individual settler did not like the arbitrator selected by his group of settlers he could appoint an arbitrator of his own. We threshed that out fully, and it was unanimously decided by this House that that was best, and the personnel of the House has not materially changed since then. The present bill changes and the matter is referred to the Exchequer court, which no one seems to want, so why not go back to the action we took last year and which was ventilated throughout the country in the ensuing six months? I think the majority of soldier settlers represented by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie) and myself are in favour of this provision, and I think it would be better to have the three-cornered board. I would suggest that the minister consider putting that amendment before us to test its popularity as against that of the amendment already suggested.

Mr. CLARK: Just dealing with the point raised by my hon. friend in his closing words, I was rather interested to look up the record of last year and I find that when the resolution was introduced in the House on March 25, 1926, the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) said:

> I suggest that the district or county court judge be the tribunal.

I knew that was my own opinion, and I find that on April 13, when the bill was before the House I stated:

> I strongly urge upon the minister that he leave this matter to a county court judge alone.

So we were not so unanimous as one might be led to believe by the remarks of the last speaker.

Mr. NEILL: Was a vote taken?

Mr. CLARK: I remember that the members on this side of the House were a unit in favour of this suggestion that it should be left to the county court judge, and I have read the remarks of two members from this side to indicate that fact.

Mr. NEILL: Did you not acquiesce finally?

Mr. CLARK: No, we did not acquiesce. The section as introduced to-day provides for an appeal to the Exchequer court, and frankly I must say that I cannot agree to that because an appeal to the Exchequer court is something which would not be readily understood by the soldier; it would be a very difficulty matter for him to undertake. Then the minister read a section which I understood to state that the Exchequer court could delegate its powers to a referee or other official. Even assuming that the Exchequer court could delegate its powers to the county court judge or to anyone else, it would still mean that the soldier would have to lodge his appeal first of all with the Exchequer court in Ottawa; so far as I know there are no rules laid down for that other than the Exchequer court rules, and in my opinion this would not be a satisfactory method.

The minister offers another suggestion to-night, which is contained in a proposed amendment under which the soldier may give notice in writing to the board, which shall thereupon refer the appeal for final decision to the district or county court judge. If I may I would like to draw the attention of the minister to a further fact, although I do not suppose there is really any use in doing so because the minister has not heard one word I have said. I am only making these suggestions because the minister invited us to do so, and said that the suggestions of hon. members might be of value. Therefore I took the trouble to secure the minister's copy of this amendment in order to fully understand it, because I am vitally interested in this question. I agree that the principle of referring the appeal to the county court judge is best, but I question the method outlined in this proposed amendment. In the first place, why should a notice in writing be given to the board, and why should the board be the body to submit this appeal to the county court judge? Why should not the soldier follow the same course taken by any other person, and prepare his own notice of appeal and submit it to the court? He should not have to write a letter to the board and request the board to prepare and submit his notice of appeal. I would not want a person with whom I could not agree to do that for me, and it must be remembered that first of all there is an attempt made as between the board and the soldier to get down to a basis of agreement. This amendment requires the soldier to give notice to that board with which he cannot agree, and in turn that board prepares and submits his appeal. I offer a suggestion there; I think the soldier is the man to prepare his own appeal and submit it direct. He would then be represented before the county court judge, but as this now reads it is open to the interpretation that the board itself will submit the appeal, and I do not think that is right.

Mr. McPHERSON: I noticed that myself, but do you not think that would be overcome by an amendment to clause (i) of the regulations, making the regulations govern the method of appeal to the county court judge instead of the Exchequer court? It is just a matter of detail, which I think this suggestion will overcome.

Mr. CLARK: I was just coming to that. If you leave this act as it is now, I think my friend will be the first to appreciate that no regulation can over-ride the wording of the statute. This will be in the statute itself.

Mr. McPHERSON: You do not get my point. The soldier would simply give notice to the board, and the board would have to carry that notice of appeal to the judge according to the regulations which the governor in council may fix in order to protect the soldier.

Mr. CLARK: I am simply offering the suggestion; it would be a very simple matter to have the appeal given to the district or county court judge direct rather than to have it referred to the board for submission.

Then there is another point in this amendment, which provides that "if an applicant is dissatisfied with the decision of the board he may, within such time as prescribed by regulations made by the governor in council", and so on. I suggest that the time for appeal should be fixed in the statute. I think I am correct when I say that every act relating to the establishment of courts provides for the time within which litigation may be appealed. This would force the attention of the soldier himself to the time within which he may appeal; he may see the act but he will probably never see the regulations. The statutes are available to the public and can be secured anywhere, but regulations by the governor in council are not available and are the most difficult things in the world to secure. I suggest that the time limit of the appeal be inserted in the statute itself. These are all the suggestions I have to offer in connection with the proposed amendment.

Mr. WARD: Would the hon. member not entertain the suggestion of the hon. member for Kindersley and avoid all this difficulty? I see very clearly the difficulties that will arise in appeals, but cannot they be overcome by adopting the suggestion of the hon. member for Kindersley and making the county court judge a member of the board and his decision final?

Mr. CLARK: The county court judge's decision would be final.

Mr. WARD: Yes, but we shall avoid appeals entirely. An examination would be made by a representative of the soldier, a representative of the board and the county court judge sitting together. Their valuation would be final and there would be no appeal.

Mr. NEILL: That would be an appeal from private negotiation.

Mr. CLARK: Does my hon. friend mean there would be no negotiations between the Soldier Settlement Board and the man, but that in all cases there would be this reference to a board of three?

Mr. THORSON: That is how I understood it.

Mr. CLARK: I will take them in order. First of all I do not see how you can preclude the reasonableness of a proposal that a man should negotiate first with the board in order to see if they can arrive at a fair conclusion. That is fair and reasonable. In the second place, if they fail to come to an agreement there must be an appeal, it does not matter whether it is to a board of three or a jury of twelve or a county court judge.

Mr. RALSTON: Not necessarily an appeal.

Mr. CLARK: It need not be an appeal. It must be a submission of a question for the decision of somebody. The procedure would be the same whether it was before a court of one or a court of three or an arbitration board or a jury. That would not matter. The question is one that would have to be submitted for a decision. In my opinion the simplest and most satisfactory method of dealing with the matter would be to submit it to the county court judge, and I will give the committee my reasons for saying so. With a board of three you will first of all have to get that board together. The result would be that the soldier would appoint somebody upon whom he knew he could rely to get for him the last possible cent of reduction. That man would be a partisan. If the board was like any ordinary arbitration board—I am not suggesting that the Soldier Settlement Board would be—you would have two partisan members.

An hon. MEMBER: Counsel.

Mr. CLARK: If counsel, then it would be far better to have the counsel appearing before the court and not sitting on the court. You never want counsel sitting on a court; that is one of the worst curses you can have in any judicial body. If you have a court of appeal of five and one of the members of that court becomes counsel for one of the litigants, you will not get justice, nor will you get justice if you have that feature in a board settling a question of this sort.

Mr. NEILL: Is that not a feature of all arbitration?

Mr. CLARK: Yes. I am arguing against arbitrations at the moment. In my opinion the result would be far better if the question were brought before someone who is trained in judging the merits of facts and law as well.

Mr. NEILL: But not of land.

Mr. CLARK: That does not matter. They are judging the merits of all questions; land, business, patents and every other conceivable thing. They are trained to adjudicate upon facts whether they relate to land or anything else.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Is not what the hon. member proposes exactly what occurs when appeals are made from valuations by city assessors?

Mr. CLARK: More or less. What we would have before a county court judge is perfectly clear. The soldier would have the soldiers' advocate representing him, a man trained to do his best to get justice for the soldiers. He would appear before the county court judge to argue his case. It is far better to have him there than on the court as one of the three judges. That counsel would be very sure that he would go before the judge with evidence of an expert nature as to the value of the land. After all, if the soldiers' counsel can bring before the judge evidence that the land has depreciated in value, he is pretty nearly sure to get a judgment, because, as I say, these men are trained to administer justice and to arrive at the fairest possible decision in a case.

As opposed to that we have three men. The soldier must find his man; the Soldier Settlement Board must find their man, and there is a judge as well. There is the additional expense of travelling and the difficulty of finding those men and keeping them together. If you have a court of three it is much harder to get them all together to adjudicate upon a case than if you have a court of only one. There is economy and convenience in the case of a judge sitting alone. I am convinced that from the soldier's point of view far more satisfactory results will be obtained from a county court judge sitting alone.

Mr. WARD: Does the hon. member mean that the county court judge sitting alone shall have the final decision?

Mr. CLARK: Why not? Yes, I mean that, because there must be some finality, and I have such confidence in the judiciary generally that I believe if you take a decent case before them, especially a matter such as this, with some expert evidence as to the depreciated value, you will get a fair decision. What other appeal could you have? You might if you like have an appeal in special cases on a point of law to a court of appeal; but it is dangerous to complicate the matter too much, and this will probably go a long way towards meeting the situation. Furthermore I do not think you would find that the Soldier Settlement Board would be exceedingly partisan and try to collect evidence to defeat a claim which is bona fide.

Mr. COOTE: Would there in some cases be a danger that the district court judge would set a higher value than even the Soldier Settlement Board had asked the settler to accept when they were trying to deal between the two parties?

Mr. CLARK: There is no question that that is always possible. Hon. members must take into consideration all these possibilities. Even at that the judge may arrive at the fair value of the land and that is what we want.

Mr. COOTE: He may, but there is that danger.

Mr. CLARK: He is going to base his judgment upon the evidence, and if the evidence justifies the higher valuation, we cannot direct it from here. The matter is one of evidence and a decision on the evidence.

Mr. COOTE: I asked the question simply in an endeavour to bring out the comparison between the different methods, having the three sit together as an arbitration board or having the two parties try to agree, and if they do not, having the matter sent to a judge who is the sole judge and final arbiter.

Mr. THORSON: I think that subsection (c) makes it clear that there will be no danger of any increase in the price.

Mr. CLARK: I regret exceedingly that although the Soldier Settlement Board apparently had a representative at the convention of the Canadian Legion recently held in Winnipeg, a very important convention presided over by one of the leading citizens of Canada, Sir Percy Lake, the minister has not only not taken their recommendations into consideration, but has never even heard of them. I would have thought that it was his business to find out—

Mr. FORKE: I think I ought to correct my hon. friend.

Mr. CLARK: I want to be perfectly clear on this point.

Mr. FORKE: Shortly after I got into harness in the department, Mr. Lapp and some other man did interview me on this matter, so I was mistaken this afternoon in saying that I had never heard of it.

Mr. CLARK: Then I am certainly forced to the conclusion that the minister did not give very serious consideration to the proposals made by the Canadian Legion; otherwise surely they would have made an impression on his mind. The recommendations of a convention such as this, representative of the returned men from all parts of Canada, and presided over by Sir Percy Lake, should carry some weight with the minister and with the government, and I should have thought this legislation would be drafted, if possible, with those recommendations in mind. I think it is a matter of great regret that they have not been considered.

There is another thing I observe about the bill, and that is it contains no provision for cases where the land—I will not say has depreciated—but is of no value whatever, and was of no value when it was first purchased by the settler. There are many cases, but not too many for us to take care of—in the aggregate the expense would not be great—where a man went to the Soldier Settlement Board in the various districts in Canada, and was settled on land which, no matter what value you place upon it to-day, would not earn a livelihood for the settler. There are many such cases, but not too many for us to take care of. This matter has been pressed in the House now since 1924. I have urged before, and I urge again now, that this matter be considered, and that bona fide soldier settlers who have purchased land that is of no value, and have put all their savings into it, be taken, just as we are taking the immigrant settlers under the empire settlement scheme, from this land that is worthless and put in a district and on land where they will be able to earn a decent livelihood. In the past I have instanced cases. I do not propose to do so to-night, because I know that the government is informed on this subject. I urge that they take this matter into serious consideration, and make provision in this bill for cases of that sort.

Mr. FORKE: I do not think the committee will accuse me of not giving them some choice in this matter. I have a third proposition to lay before the committee, on which I should like to have an expression of opinion from hon. members. It is very much along the line which has been mentioned already by some hon. members. The suggestion is to amend paragraph (e) by striking out all the words after the word "section" in line 16, and substitute therefor the following:

> and unless the board and the settler agree within one month thereafter on the amount of the depreciation in value, such amount shall be finally fixed and determined by an arbitration committee appointed by the minister and selected as follows: the chairman shall be the judge of the county or district court or in the province of Quebec the Superior court having jurisdiction in the judicial district in which the land is situate; one member nominated in writing by the settler, and one member nominated in writing by the board, and the members of the arbitration committee when appointed shall have all the powers and authority of a commissioner under the Inquiries Act.

That is to say, the county court judge will be chairman, and one member will be nominated by the soldier settler and one by the board.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: Has that member necessarily to be nominated by the settler or may it be the soldier himself?

Mr. FORKE: It should not be the settler.

Mr. MILLAR: I do not wish to prolong this discussion. I am deeply in sympathy with this measure, but there is a suggestion I would make. I would ask the minister if we cannot have the assurance that until this legislation becomes available the board will withhold their hand in regard to returned men who are now on the land and are having some difficulty in financing, and who otherwise in the meantime might be forced to give up their land. I know that to ask that in the case of all returned soldiers would perhaps work a hardship on the board. I know of at least one returned soldier who has not very much chance of making good, but there are also many others who have spent several years on the land, have worked hard and put their money into it, and if they are forced off at this time before this measure becomes available, there will be some heart burnings among them. I would therefore ask if the minister cannot give us the assurance that the board will refrain from taking action against any returned man until he has had the opportunity of having his land revalued under this measure.

I could read letters such as have been read in the House by the hon. member for Rosetown and others. I could point to many cases where revaluation is very much needed and will afford great relief. I know that a great many returned soldiers are looking forward anxiously for this legislation to pass through the House.

In regard to the amendment which has been suggested by the minister it looks to me as if we were again multiplying the machinery unnecessarily. I rather like the suggestion of the hon. member for Kindersley, which was supported by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, that the simplest and best way is to allow the returned man to negotiate with the board. If they can come to an agreement, that should be sufficient. I think that most cases could be settled in that way, but if they are unable to come to an agreement, and an appeal is taken to a district court judge with another member sitting with him, I suppose they would have to receive some remuneration. If that remuneration is not paid by the returned men—and I hope it will not be—it will mean the government is put to an expense which I do not think is necessary. The simplest way would be to refer the matter to a judge and let him settle any dispute that may arise between the returned soldier and the board. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre pointed out that the district court judges of that province were overburdened with work. I do not wish to cast any reflection on the district court judges, but I think in the matter of numbers the province is rather overburdened with district court judges.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. MILLAR: One hon. member thinks not, but I am quite satisfied that my statement is correct. I believe they do their work well, but there are more district court judges than are necessary, and I think they could carry out this task and still not be overburdened with work.

Mr. McPHEE: The last suggestion of the hon. minister is more in accord with what we agreed upon last year when this matter was under consideration. I agree with the sentiment expressed by hon. members that we should do everything possible to make it easy for the returned soldier settler to get his land revalued without any expense to him. Last year when this bill was under discussion we finally agreed that an arbitration board should be appointed consisting of three members, one selected by the soldier settler, another selected by the Soldier Settlement Board, and the third the district court judge of the district in which the lands were located. This arrangement met with the approval of every returned soldier settler in the district I have the honour to represent. I am opposed to the proposal that the Exchequer court should be the arbitrator. I am a lawyer myself, but I know the feeling of fear that the average layman has for such a body as the Exchequer court. Either the tribunal as agreed upon last year, or the district court judge as the sole arbitrator, would be acceptable as far as I am concerned. In our province the district court judges are continually dealing with cases in which the value of land comes in question. In the district from which I come we have the honour of having as our district court judge Brigadier General Ross, a man who is conversant with real estate values throughout the district, and whose judgment would be looked upon favourably by every returned soldier settler in the district. Whichever plan is adopted will be agreeable to me. However I think the agreement arrived at last year that the board should consist of three, one the nominee of the soldier settler, another the nominee of the Soldier Settlement Board, and the third the district court judge, would meet with universal approval so far as all sections of the country are concerned. I put myself on record as absolutely opposed to the Exchequer court having to deal with the arbitration in this matter.

Mr. JELLIFF: I do not wish to embarrass the minister by any extended discussion. I think he knows I like him too well for that. It was but a short time ago that he was my leader on this side of the house, and I entertain the hope that our loss will be the gain of the powers that be on the other side of the chamber.

Looking over the bill I must confess that I was very much astonished and disappointed. My notion was that the hon. minister would introduce the bill as it left this House and was approved by this House in the session preceding dissolution. The provisions creating machinery for revaluation of the soldier settlers land were thoroughly discussed for days and days during that session, and I think hon. members were entirely satisfied with the bill as it left this House. In view of the announcement in the speech from the throne I was anticipating that the bill would be introduced in the form in which it left this House. It seems to me that the important thing in this measure is not that a tribunal be set up for revaluing the lands, but that the tribunal shall be one with which the soldier settler will be absolutely satisfied; and I think he was satisfied with the machinery as set out in the bill as it left this House last session. We all want to do our duty to the returned men in fairly revaluing their lands, and the machinery set up in that bill I believe would have attained that end. I suggest that the hon. minister reintroduce those provisions exactly as they were in the bill as it left this House and went to the Senate. It provided for a commission of three, one to be the county or district court judge, another a member of the Soldier Settlement Board, and the third a member of the soldiers' association, if there were one in the district, and if there were no such association, that the soldier should be represented by someone chosen by himself. That is my recollection of the provisions of the bill as it left this chamber. What became of it afterwards I do not know, but when I looked over the bill we are now considering it appeared to me that those important features had been emasculated and something of an entirely different character had been introduced. This Exchequer court provision seems to be a very awkward one; I feel satisfied that it will never suit our returned men and that it should not be imposed upon them. The suggestion that the minister made in his last remarks is almost exactly in line with the provisions of the measure as it left this House and went to the Senate, and I think he cannot do better than reintroduce those features of the bill. I am going to plead with him to adopt my suggestion, and I know he likes me so well that he will probably do it.

There is another matter connected with this bill, and that is a confusion or an inaccuracy, as I look at it, in paragraph (c) of section 1. It will be recalled that a few days ago when we were discussing the resolution preliminary to the introduction of this bill a good deal of dissatisfaction was expressed with its wording, which is the same as in this subsection (c). I think the minister ought to clear up the ambiguity.

Mr. FORKE: What is the matter with it?

Mr. JELLIFF: I would amend the clause to read:

> The depreciation in value to be determined shall be the difference, not due to neglect or mismanagement on the part of the settler, between the present value of the land and the improvements sold to the settler and the price at which the settler agreed to purchase the said land and improvements from the board.

In its present form the clause does not mean anything at all. I offer this amendment, which is seconded by Mr. Coote.

Mr. DUNNING: Would not that wording mean a revision upward in some cases?

Mr. JELLIFF: I do not think so. If preferred, the word "diminution" can be retained. As the clause now stands, "diminution in the present value" means nothing to my mind.

Mr. MILLAR: Will the minister give some assurance that until this measure is available leniency will be extended to soldier settlers?

Mr. FORKE: I think as a rule that wherever there has been any prospect of their making good at all they have always been treated with a great deal of leniency. I feel perfectly satisfied that nothing will be done to endanger any man's chances while this bill is under consideration by parliament. I thank the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Jelliff) for his very kind references to myself, but I do not thank him for reviving discussion on subsection (c). I have consulted several eminent literary authorities—

An hon. MEMBER: Literary?

Mr. FORKE: —and legal gentlemen, and they all advise me that the wording is good English and the meaning perfectly clear. I do not think there was ever any real difficulty about the interpretation of the clause, but one hon. member got a good deal of amusement out of it.

Mr. JELLIFF: Even the minister himself a few days ago characterized it as silly.

Mr. FORKE: I do not remember having used that expression. I think we all understand what the clause means. I had prepared an amendment, but, as I said before, I was advised by the very best authorities—

Mr. JELLIFF: Well, read the amendment

Mr. STEVENS: Who are the authorities?

Mr. FORKE: I do not think it is necessary for me to name them.

Mr. STEVENS: We should like to know who they are.

Mr. FORKE: The law officers of the crown.

Mr. GEARY: Is it diminution in the present value that you are trying to get at?

Mr. FORKE: The present value will be determined by those who arbitrate.

Mr. GEARY: Then you take the diminution in that present value?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FORKE: Do not let us get into a discussion of that again.

Mr. STEVENS: It will be rather difficult to persuade us all to agree with these eminent authorities unless they are named.

Mr. FORKE: When we go over the bill again, if the House so decides, I will submit an amendment that I think will make the meaning plain, but I really do not deem it necessary.

I beg, Mr. Chairman, to move the following amendment to subsection (e) which we have been discussing, because I feel satisfied that when we have come to some conclusion in regard to it most of our difficulties with respect to the bill will be disposed of. This is my amendment:

To amend section 68, subsection (e) as follows:

Strike out all the words after the word "section" in line 16, and substitute the following: "and unless the board and the settler agree within one month thereafter on the amount of the depreciation in value, such amount shall be finally fixed and determined by an arbitration committee appointed by the minister and selected as follows: the chairman shall be the judge of the county or district court, or in the province of Quebec the Superior court, having jurisdiction in the judicial district in which the land is situated, one member nominated in writing by the settler, and one member nominated in writing by the board; and the members of the arbitration committee when appointed shall have all the powers and authority of commissioners under the Inquiries Act."

I beg to move this further amendment, Mr. Chairman:

Strike out subsections (h) and (i) and substitute the following:

"The governor in council may make such regulations as he deems fit for the procedure in constituting the arbitration committee and respecting the hearings before such committee, and generally to make effective the purposes of this section."

Mr. STIRLING: Very likely the soldier will want to appoint a lawyer on the board of arbitration. Who will pay that lawyer?

Mr. FORKE: That will have to be arranged by regulation. That was discussed some time ago. Let me quote subsection (f):

Expenditures necessarily incurred by or in connection with the administration of this act as may be provided by regulation, shall be paid out of moneys appropriated from time to time by parliament to soldier land settlement.

If the minister appoints the lawyer he will have to pay him. I think it is generally understood that the committee will not cost the soldier anything.

Mr. CLARK: Will the soldier be allowed counsel to represent him before the board of arbitration?

Mr. FORKE: I imagine that if he appoints a solicitor he will have to pay that solicitor himself.

Mr. CLARK: If it had been the county court judge alone, who was to pay for the soldier's representative to present his case?

Mr. CANNON: Mr. Chairman, this bill was discussed last year—

Mr. CLARK: I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if I could have that question answered?

Mr. CANNON: I will answer it. My hon. friend took a very lively part in the discussion last year, and it was the desire on both sides of the House to try to evolve some sort of system under which the expenditure would be as low as possible, and to keep the lawyers out of this—if we could.

Mr. CLARK: If I may interject the remark, by the surest method in the world you have just brought them in.

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend is a lawyer and he knows that a party before court can plead his own cause if he wishes to do so. He can plead for himself in any court, including the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. CLARK: If he is foolish enough.

Mr. CANNON: Well, I do not know that he would necessarily be foolish. I might be inclined to say he was only cautious. Now the minister has introduced an amendment which establishes in cases of appeal a tribunal of three.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Instead of one.

Mr. CANNON: Instead of having only one, a judge, there will be two other persons on the board, one representing the soldier and the other the Soldier Settlement Board.

Mr. McQUARRIE: All to be paid.

Mr. CANNON: They will have to be paid, acting as judges or advisers. Is it reasonable for anyone to ask the government to introduce, besides these three competent men, lawyers who will charge a fee in order to say what those three men sitting on the board already know? That would be absolutely unreasonable; and if a soldier wishes to have a lawyer, let him pay for that lawyer. I am quite sure that after some of the lawyers had appeared before the board, and the board had exercised its jurisdiction for a while, everyone would realize that there was no need for lawyers.

Mr. CLARK: I should have thought that the Solicitor General would be the one man in this House who would appreciate the fact that in ninety-nine out of every hundred arbitrations that take place, if not, indeed, in one hundred per cent of them, parties appearing before such tribunals are represented by counsel.

Mr. CANNON: Certainly not.

Mr. CLARK: They certainly are, and the Solicitor General knows it only too well. Other lawyers in the House know that this is so, and when the Solicitor General speaks as he has just done it brings home to us how ridiculous his observations have been to-night.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is offensive.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Just like him.

Mr. CLARK: The Solicitor General says that if the soldier wants counsel to appear before the board he must pay for such representation. "If he wants a lawyer to represent him let him pay for the lawyer:" that is a nice tone to adopt in regard to the soldier, the man whom we are trying to help in this bill.

Mr. CANNON: You are working for yourself now, not the soldier.

Mr. CLARK: We are trying to help the returned man, and if he has to pay his own counsel to represent him there will not be very many soldiers who will submit cases for arbitration, for the simple reason that they will not have the money to employ counsel. If we are to deny the returned soldier the right of representation by counsel—and that is what is being done here—he will certainly not get full justice. The Minister of Justice knows only too well—he knows it probably better than any other man in this House—that it is the height of folly for any man to be his own advocate in any case that is submitted to a tribunal for adjudication. It is written in history, as clearly as it can be written, that the man who attempts to be his own advocate, be he lawyer or layman, is unwise and knows not how to go about securing justice. The Solicitor General declares that we want to save money. I agree with him in that regard and that is why I endorsed the suggestion put forward by the minister to-night, that there should be one county judge, a trained man well versed in the administration of the law, to adjudicate upon the facts in any case requiring his judgment. If you are really thinking of the interests of the soldier, it is far better to have his counsel appear independently before the court than to have him sit on the court itself; for a man cannot be a member of a tribunal and act as advocate for one of the parties at the same time. That is contrary to all the principles of justice. The Solicitor General, I am sure, knows that perfectly well. If you have a court of appeal of five, you cannot have one of those judges, while sitting on the court, act as advocate in behalf of one of the litigants or one of the parties who have submitted the matter which is being adjudicated upon. And just as surely as we have these boards of appeal composed of three members you will find that every soldier will want to have counsel, whether he can afford it or not, in order that he may have his case properly presented to the court. If therefore we deny him that representation we shall crtainly not do him full justice. I repeat, if we are going to pay the members of the arbitration board it will be far better to let one man, the county court judge, render the decision and pay counsel to represent the soldier interested.

The CHAIRMAN: Before there is any further discussion it might be as well to get the amendments properly before the committee and have them disposed of in order. The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Jelliff) has moved an amendment which is now before the committee.

Mr. GARDINER: I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we take these amendments ad seriatim.

The CHAIRMAN: That is precisely what I am doing now. The amendment at present before the Chair is that first submitted, the motion of the hon. member for Lethbridge.

Mr. NEILL: I suggest that we adjourn so that we may have the printed amendments before us.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): My sympathy is entirely with the returned man. In my own constituency many cases of hardship have occurred, and while it has been said to-night that there has been friction between the soldier and the board, my experience has been that the friction was due not so much to any misunderstanding between the soldier and the board as to the fact that the board had not sufficient latitude under the regulations to deal with particular cases. In my opinion it would eliminate ninety to ninety-five per cent of the difficulties that have existed heretofore if we provided that the soldier settler and the board should have the power to settle their differences between themselves. Beyond that I should not be very much concerned whether the dispute went before the county court judge or a board of arbitration. I hope we have not been kept up here for a good many hours to determine whether or not we will provide legal fees for some legal gentlemen. I am not concerned about that at all and I am not in sympathy with what the last speaker has said in that regard.

Mr. CLARK: I don't want your sympathy.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): And you certainly are not going to get it.

Mr. CLARK: I hope I never will.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I do not believe for one moment that the soldier is going to be helped very much by a discussion of that character. I thought everyone was sincerely interested in getting justice for the returned soldiers, but I do not believe they will get any more justice by our stating that legal counsel is to be employed in every case.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I suppose if they were medical fees it would be different.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): That gives me a good chance to say something which I did not want to bring up; the medical profession throughout Canada has not forgotten its obligation to the returned soldiers in any case, and I believe that to be generally true of the legal profession as well.

Mr. McQUARRIE: You never find them working for nothing.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): They do so in a very large number of cases; perhaps I might say they do more work for nothing than any other class on top of the earth.

Mr. CLARK: Blow your own horn hard.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Some of them are not worth anything.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): If we leave it to the soldiers and to the members of the board to remove their difficulties ninety-five per cent of the trouble will disappear, and the small proportion remaining will not give much trouble if left to the board suggested by the minister.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment (Mr. Jelliff) negatived.

Mr. MILLAR: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I am not opposed to the amendment, but I have been at sea regarding some of the rulings, and I think this is a splendid opportunity to find out just where I am. When we considered the resolution before this committee I moved a similar amendment which was ruled out of order because I am a private member. At a later date, either yesterday or the day before, we discussed the point of order, and the point seemed to be that if the amendment dealt with the expenditure of money it was out of order and if it did not do so it was in order. In order to understand the rules better I raise this point of order, not because of any objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: This amendment may have been out of order in strict accordance with the rules, but it is now out of court because it has been defeated, so I think we will not have any trouble with that.

Mr. BANCROFT: I would suggest that as the hour is getting late we now adjourn.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Let us get through.

Mr. FORKE: This bill was discussed pro and con last year, and everyone is familiar with it. A few changes have been made in regard to the board of arbitration but otherwise the bill is the same and I do not see why we cannot carry it through.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. RALSTON: I would like to say a word in regard to the amendment moved by the minister. I agree with one of the hon. members who spoke previously that the provision in the amendment that the board and the settler may negotiate and come to an agreement is a very important feature of the legislation, as it seems to me to establish at the start a relationship which will make for good and which will make it possible that there will be no appeal at all. I think I may be taken as speaking with at least some sympathy for the ex-service men. I have considered the relative merits of the two tribunals and it seemed to me at the outset that the establishment of the Exchequer court as an appeal tribunal was undesirable because of the fact, in the first place, that the court appears to be so far removed from the soldier and he is always faced with the delay and inconvenience which would attend an application to that court. An appeal by submission to the county court judge, while very much better than the Exchequer court, would at the same time bring up in the mind of the soldier the idea of formality, with the usual procedure known very well by the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Clark) of having to call expert witneses to the stand and all the rest of it. I suppose the Soldier Settlement Board would bring expert valuators and the soldier would do the same; there would be a battle of wits, with the result that at best the soldier would not feel very well satisfied with the decision. The parties would be at arms' length and there is a formality about it which, it seems to me, is wholly undesirable.

This legislation is to endeavour to correct the situation which has arisen to some extent by reason of the conditions which have come into effect since the former legislation was passed and to some extent through mistakes in valuation which may have been made and contributed to not only by the Soldier Settlement Board but perhaps by the soldier as well. We are trying to meet that situation now, and it seems to me that the most friendly relations possible should be established and maintained. I do not think an appeal to a judge of the county court is the best way to do that, and as the minister was reading the amendment it seemed to me that an arbitration provision something the same as that incorporated in every insurance policy and something the same as we have in every charter party is desirable. With all due respect to the hon. member for Burrard, legal gentleman very seldom take part in these arbitrations; assessments are made under insurance policies all over this country by arbitrators appointed under the terms of those policies and I only know of two cases in my experience in such matters in which lawyers were engaged. As we all know charter parties contain arbitration clauses and legal talent is very seldom engaged. What happens is just what I hope will happen here, that the county court judge, the representative of the Soldier Settlement Board and the representative of the soldier will sit around a table and discuss the matter informally, instead of having a judge get up on the bench and don a wig and gown; they will probably hear statements from people of the vicinity as to the amount paid by the soldier for the land in the first place and as to the conditions which have existed since and which have resulted in the depreciation, and they will in all probability come to some decent, moderate and reasonable conclusion without the necessity or formality of legal proceedings or the intervention of legal gentlemen. Possibly, of course, some ex-service men will desire counsel. Perhaps this will find some approval in the minds of hon. gentlemen who have suggested that members of the legal profession are not always what they should be, but it may be that sometimes a member of that profession will be found going about the country endeavouring to urge ex-service men to appeal. At the same time, however, it seems to me that that will be very much more likely if the appeal is before a county court judge alone and if the lawyer has an opportunity of exercising all the arts and wiles of the legal profession before a county court judge rather than before a tribunal composed as suggested in the amendment, and if, as my hon. friend the Minister of Railways suggests, he is not paid by the government.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Will the department then undertake not to have counsel representing the board?

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot speak for the department, but I would think there would not be very much danger of the Soldier Settlement Board having counsel if the soldier does not have counsel. I think the Minister of Immigration would be willing to give that undertaking.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Can he give it?

Mr. FORKE: Yes, I can.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think the suggestion helps very much in this discussion. We are trying to find some reasonable way out; we are trying to constitute a tribunal which will be close to the soldier and in which he will have confidence, and it does seem to me that the proposal embodied in this amendment will produce that result. That is why I think the amendment might find approval at the hands of the committee. The soldier can feel pretty well satisfied that he has not to come to Ottawa nor even to go to his county town. Perhaps he will be able, somewhere near the corner grocery store or in the hall in his particular village, to meet the tribunal which will decide his case. They may go and look over the farm. I do not know what is done in the west, but I know they look over the farms down east and try to come to some conclusion as to what the diminution or depreciation in value is. Therefore I support the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment moved by Mr. Forke is as follows:

To amend section 68, subsection (e) as follows:

Strike out all the words after the word "section" in line sixteen, and substitute the following: "and unless the board and the settler agree within one month thereafter on the amount of the depreciation in value, such amount shall be finally fixed and determined by an arbitration committee appointed by the minister and selected as follows: the chairman shall be the judge of the county or district court, or in the province of Quebec the Superior court, having jurisdiction in the judicial district in which the land is situated, one member nominated in writing by the settler, and one member nominated in writing by the board; and the members of the arbitration committee when appointed shall have all the powers and authority of commissioners under the Inquiries Act."

Mr. McQUARRIE: How are they to be appointed by the minister and why are they to be appointed by the minister if they are appointed in the other way?

Mr. RALSTON: If I may answer, because I know there is an amendment following with regard to the regulations, someone has to see that the board is actually constituted and working, and the minister must follow the provisions in the statute, which are that one is to be a man nominated by the soldier, another to be nominated by the board and the county court judge is persona designata.

Amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Forke moves to strike out subsections (h) and (i) of section 68 and substitute the following:

The governor in council may make such regulations as he deems fit for the procedure in constituting the arbitration committee and respecting the hearings before such committee, and generally to make effective the purposes of this section.

Mr. NEILL: Before we go on with that, I would point out that we have left paragraph (d) uncompleted and there should be an amendment made to paragraph (g).

Mr. FORKE: All right. I intended to move that as soon as this one was passed, but I will move it now. I move this amendment to paragraph (d):

That the word "October" be added after the words "day of' in the blank in line eleven.

The paragraph will then read:

All applications for revaluation must be submitted to the board prior to the first day of October.

Mr. COOTE: Mr. Chairman, I would like a little information if I may have it from you. We have not yet adopted anything in connection with this bill except one amendment. As a rule we take up different clauses of a bill and pass them one by one. I should like to know, before we go any further, whether we can amend a clause or a subclause preceding one which we have already amended.

The CHAIRMAN: In answer to the last question I will say no, but I think the custom in committee in handling a bill is to deal with clauses. There happens to be only one clause in this bill.

Mr. COOTE: This will not preclude us from moving amendments to former subclauses of this bill, I take it. I would like to be sure of that.

The CHAIRMAN: According to the rules that is not permissible.

Mr. COOTE: Is that not what the minister is doing at the present moment? If we are going to do it for one clause of the bill, we should be allowed to do it for others.

Mr. CANNON: At the very outset of the discussion on this bill it was suggested by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that we should discuss the one clause, taking it one paragraph at a time. I think that at this stage if the chairman would read each paragraph we might make some progress.

Mr. FORKE: All right, we will go back.

Amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the desire of the committee that we start at paragraph (a)?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Paragraphs (a) and (b) agreed to.

On paragraph (c)—How depreciation shall be computed.

Mr. COOTE: This paragraph should not carry as it is. After the time that was taken up in committee on the resolution covering this bill, over the word "diminution" as it occurs in the second line of this paragraph, the minister, if he is bound to get this bill through to-night—and it is not usual to compel the House to sit so late on a Friday—will surely be good enough to move the amendment which I know he has in his desk and which must be something more sensible than this. The words "the diminution in the present value" to my mind mean nothing. If any legal gentleman in the House can explain to those of us who are not members of the legal fraternity just how there can be any diminution in the present value of land, we would like to hear the explanation.

Mr. FORKE: I have a long brief on this word from a very eminent authority. I am not going to give the authority, but his conclusion is that it is a perfectly correct clause. I did not mean any disrespect to the committee in not considering an amendment. I am only repeating what I have said, namely, that I have been assured by eminent authorities that this is quite all right. I am sure every hon. member knows exactly what the clause means.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It will probably be all right if we can keep the lawyers out of it.

Mr. COOTE: This may carry, but I think if it does this committee will not be using as good judgment as it generally does. It was the considered opinion of the committee when the resolution was before it that this wording was not correct. There is no doubt that the committee would have accepted an amendment which was moved by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar), had not a point of order been raised by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie). The minister himself was quite convinced on that occasion that the wording as given in the bill was not right. Surely if we are going to spend all day on this bill, we might make this clause read so that it will be intelligible, let us say, to the soldier settlers. I am sure that many of them will read this and say: There is no diminution in the present value of my land; it is worth just what it is worth; I cannot find any diminution. Would it not be better to use plain English that will be understood?

Mr. FORKE: It says that it shall be the diminution in the present value as compared with the price at which the land was bought.

Mr. COOTE: It reads:

> The depreciation in value to be determined shall be the diminution, not due to neglect or mismanagement on the part of the settler, in the present value of the land and the improvements sold to the settler, as compared with the price at which the settler agreed to purchase the said land and improvements from the board.

Mr. FORKE: I do not see much difficulty about that.

Mr. COOTE: But the diminution is not in the present value. It is the diminution from the price at which he bought the land. We are taking it for granted that there is a depreciation, and that depreciation or diminution is in the value of the land when he bought it, not in the present value.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): If we said "shown in the present value," I think that would remove the difficulty.

[Mr. Coote.]

Mr. McINTOSH: It says, "diminution in the present value of the land and improvements sold to the settler." There is no comma after the word "land." Why stop there? The comma is after the noun "settler." If you substitute for the words "as compared with" in line 34, paragraph c, the word "and" making it read "and the price at which the settler agreed to purchase the said land and improvements from the board," the meaning is still more clearly expressed. But there is no ambiguity in the clause as it stands. The discussion from time to time in the House would lead to the conclusion that some hon. members think the paragraph in question about as plain as mud.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: The difficulty seems to be over this word diminution, which some of us do not know how to pronounce. The meaning of the word is, I think, a lessening or a decreasing. We can avoid all the ambiguity of this section by changing one word of two letters in the thirty-second line, the word "in" to "to". Then it would read "diminution to the present value."

Mr. COOTE: The minister has a perfectly good amendment on his desk, and I think he should at least suggest it to the committee for consideration.

Mr. FORKE: I am not going to move it, but I will give it to the committee for consideration, because I am no longer sure of the English language.

Mr. STEVENS: Give us Scotch. We will understand it better.

Mr. FORKE: I could use Scotch all right. It reads:

> The depreciation in value to be determined shall be the amount by which through no neglect or mismanagement on the part of the settler the price at which the board agreed to sell the land and improvements to the settler exceeds the amount representing the present value of the said land and improvements.

If that is satisfactory to the committee, I will move it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: That is all right.

Mr. FORKE: I move the amendment accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

Amendment agreed to.

Paragraph (e) as amended agreed to.

Paragraph (f) agreed to.

On paragraph (g).

Mr. FORKE: I move that in the thirty-second line the figures "1925" be substituted for "1926."

Amendment agreed to.

Paragraph as amended agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Paragraphs (h) and (i) have been struck out. There is a new paragraph (h).

Paragraph (h) agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Paragraph (j) now becomes (i).

Paragraph (i) agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. FANSHER (Last Mountain): I have listened to the discussion very attentively, but there is one point that has not been emphasized, although it was referred to by the member for Comox-Alberni. Is there any provision in this act whereby a soldier settler can be taken from land that is of no value and put on a farm where he will have some chance of making good?

Mr. FORKE: The board has actually been doing that in the past, and the passing of this act will make it much easier.

Mr. GARDINER: Is it the intention of the government to supply the board with sufficient funds to allow them to do that kind of thing? It is a question simply of money; the legislation is there.

Mr. FORKE: There has been no provision that I know of in that regard.

Mr. GARDINER: Will the government make such provision?

Mr. FORKE: That is a matter for the government to consider.

Mr. BIRD: Is there a provision in the act which allows the board to transfer a man from land that is of no value to another farm?

Mr. FORKE: I could not answer that with any degree of assurance, but they have been doing that.

Mr. BIRD: This is a matter of interest to the soldier settlers. I had a letter the other day inquiring about this very thing, and I just wanted to know from the minister if it is legal for the board to make such a transfer, or does the board do it just out of the goodness of its heart? What is the procedure?

Mr. FORKE: I know that the Dominion government has been in negotiation with the provincial governments in some cases to move not only soldier settlers but other settlers away from lands on which they were not able to make a living owing to their poor quality. But a difficulty arises. The province is quite willing to move a settler from one section to another within the province, but none of the provinces is very anxious to make any move to assist the Dominion government in moving a settler from one province to another. Hon. members will understand that between the Great lakes and Manitoba there is some very poor land and there are some very bad conditions, and the Soldier Settlement Board has assisted settlers to move to other lands in Saskatchewan to which they could be moved, but there is no regulation under which the expenses of that removal could be paid by the Dominion government. I do not think the Soldier Settlement Board have gone into that business, though they have been moving settlers from one place to another as a matter of accommodation where they had land available.

Mr. MILLAR: Did the government pay the expenses of moving.

Mr. FORKE: I do not think so.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think the minister has answered the question put by the hon. member for Nelson. The Soldier Settlement Board does not move ordinary settlers from one district to another. That has come under the jurisdiction of the federal government, the provinces and the railways. We have soldier settlers on lands that have no agricultural value. I am quite aware that the board may have in its possession lands to which these men could be transferred. I understand the legislation in force at the present time gives the board power, if they have the land and the money, to transfer these soldier settlers from one place to another. The question I desire to ask is this: will the government place in the estimates a sufficient sum to permit the settlers to be moved from places where the land is of no agricultural value to other districts where they can make a living?

Mr. FORKE: I am afraid that is a matter of government policy. I could not make a promise of that kind.

Mr. GARDINER: Will the minister lay it before the cabinet?

Mr. FORKE: Yes.

Preamble agreed to.

Mr. McPHERSON: I made a suggestion which was not opposed by anybody, and I think it is in the interests of a large number of soldiers, namely, that paragraph (j) should be amended to read, "who is desirous of repurchasing the land," instead of "who is desirous of returning to the land," so that it would cover the cases where the agreements had been cancelled and the men were still on the land. That would let them all in. If there is no objection I move that that amendment be made.

Mr. FORKE: That is all right, I accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: The motion is to strike out the words "returning to" and substitute the words "desirous of repurchasing."

Amendment agreed to.

Paragraph as amended agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. GARDINER: Better postpone the third reading for the next sitting of the House, because we want to look into the amendments.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The Senate sits on Tuesday and we would like to have some work for them to do.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am afraid it would break their hearts if they ever found some work to do.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe the House adjourned at 11.30 p.m.

Monday, March 7, 1927

The House met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill No. 118, respecting certain patents of James McCutcheon Coleman.—Mr. Jacobs.

EXCISE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Customs and Excise) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 119 to amend the Excise Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. EULER: This bill proposes no drastic changes. The amendments provide very largely for removing uncertainties which have been experienced in the way of interpretations of various clauses of the act. Beyond that, the other clauses are designed almost entirely to provide higher penalties for serious violations of the act. There is nothing else of importance in the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

[Mr. McPherson.]

BRITISH COLUMBIA VEGETABLE GROWERS

ALLEGED PREFERENCE TO ORIENTALS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. S. F. TOLMIE (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a letter from the firm of Hayward and Scott, wholesale produce and commission merchants, Vancouver, B.C., in connection with the export of vegetables to the British troops in China. I will not take up the time of the House by reading it all, but I wish to read this extract:

We notice Mr. Tolmie's inquiry and reply of Mr. Motherwell as to why white dealers and growers had no opportunity of quoting on potatoes supplied to the British forces in China.

We understand these orders were placed by Mr. Clarke who is the Dominion fruit inspector in Vancouver. The business was given to R. Robertson Company, and two shipments were made—R. Robertson Company shipping the first orders—buying both potatoes and onions from Chinese dealers. White dealers and growers had no opportunity of quoting on the first order. There were hundreds of tons of potatoes available in the hands of white dealers and growers, had they been given an opportunity to quote. The second order for potatoes which went forward on the last Canadian Pacific boat, Empress of Canada, sailing from Vancouver February 26, was also filled by R. Robertson Company.

The onions on the second order were supplied by Fraser-Wood Company. Some of the dealers heard this second order was being placed and called up Mr. Clarke, but received no encouragement from him—evidently it was a cut and dried proposition that Robertson Company was to receive this order—Fraser-Wood, however, brought a little influence to bear through Ottawa, and received the onion order.

This statement by Mr. Clarke and Mr. Robertson that it was impossible to supply potatoes and onions from white growers, is absolutely untrue, and also the statement that the time was too short to secure these goods, is also wrong. R. Robertson Company are brokers who do not carry any stocks. It may have been difficult for them to supply goods, but other dealers and growers who carry a stock on hand would have had no difficulty in filling these orders.

R. Robertson Company had the goods put up by Chinamen and these potatoes were grown by Chinamen. Messrs. Motherwell, Clarke and Robertson's assertions that white dealers and growers were unable to supply these goods is untrue.

There are thousands of tons of potatoes both in Vancouver and the adjoining districts grown by white growers and these could have been supplied, had they been given an opportunity of quoting. It surely does not look very consistent to have the Chinese supplying the ammunition to fight the Chinamen in China.

We are enclosing copy of a picture taken on the wharf showing these goods being delivered by the Chinese dealer in Vancouver.

I have also a picture of the dock showing a large number of potatoes in sacks, a truck loaded with potatoes alongside, with a Chinese chauffeur, and on the side of the truck appears the name Wong Fat. Has the minister any further information on this question?

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): If my hon. friend had given me an opportunity I might have had the documentary evidence with me. The first offer to fill this order for potatoes and onions was given, so far as my recollection goes, to a firm in the Okanagan valley, but they had not the goods and therefore we had to look for supplies elsewhere. We have not inquired into the colour of Mr. Robertson—I mean the colour of his skin, nor the colour of his politics, but I presume he is white. It never, however, occurred to me to inquire into the nationality of the growers who supplied these potatoes to Mr. Robertson. The second offer to have this order filled was given to Mr. Robertson as a responsible broker and I assume he got them where he liked as long as he complied with the conditions of the contract. There was only one thing upon which the British authorities, through the High Commissioner's office, insisted, and that was that all these goods would be examined carefully by the government inspector and that they must be of the proper quality. That condition was complied with. As regards the statement that some of these growers who supplied the goods to Mr. Robertson were Chinamen, that may be so. I do not know; I assume it is so; but when the overseas authorities were buying wheat from the western provinces during the war I do not think anybody ever thought of asking who grew the wheat or what colour was the skin of the man who grew it. I do not want to magnify this or to make light of it; but with the Empress of Asia lying in the harbour scheduled to sail on a given date seven or eight days after the first communication, if the goods were not supplied on time and up to quality, the boat would sail without them. That is all I have to say at the present time, except that if it was an inadvertence not to find out in each case just who grew these goods and what was the nationality of the individual, then I must admit I was remiss, but that question was never put up to me by anybody.

Mr. TOLMIE: I would like to ask the minister if he will be good enough to make every effort to have any further orders filled by white producers if possible.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We will surely give everybody, no matter what the colour of his skin is, an opportunity to supply these goods as long as the price and the quality are right.

MARITIME CLAIMS

PROPOSED LEGISLATION ARISING OUT OF DUNCAN REPORT

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I express the pleasure which we all feel upon seeing my right hon. friend the Prime Minister back in his place in the House of Commons to-day? He has returned in apparent health, strength and vigour, and we are all glad to see him back. During his absence we have done some serious business in this chamber under the genial guidance of the Minister of Finance, but we always like to have the head of the government present during our deliberations.

Could the right hon. gentleman give us some idea as to when he proposes to bring down to this chamber legislation in regard to the Duncan report? I do not ask him to give me the exact date, but if he could give us the approximate date it would satisfy a considerable curiosity on this side of the House.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: May I thank my hon. friend for the cordial welcome he has given me on my return to the House and also thank hon. members of the House for the hearty manner in which they have received his generous words? Replying to my hon. friend's question, I hope early next week to make a statement on behalf of the government as to the legislation which it is intended to introduce arising out of the Duncan report.

VERMILION WHEAT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. A further criticism was made by the Department of Agriculture a few days ago before the committee on agriculture in reference to the new wheat known as Vermilion. I ask the minister if the originator, Mr. Larcombe, was notified and given a chance to appear and to protect the license which was granted to him, I understand, on December 30 last year.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): I do not think he was notified to appear before that committee, but as my hon. friend knows, after Mr. Larcombe learned the result of the baking and milling test of this Vermilion wheat, both at the experimental farm and at an independent milling concern at Winnipeg, he voluntarily withdrew the Vermilion wheat from public sale as seed, believing that in the public interest, it would not be advisable, in view of the report on the milling qualities, to offer the wheat for sale as seed, although he would personally be at some loss. He did that voluntarily.

Mr. SPENCER: Is it the intention of the department to cancel his license?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The department has no authority to cancel his license.

PURE BRED STOCK

DISTRIBUTION OF SIRES AMONGST STOCK BREEDERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): I desire to draw the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to a telegram I received. I rather think the same telegram, or one similar to it, was brought to his attention the other day, but I am not certain. It is from the agricultural representative at Fort William, and reads:

> Understand Dominion Livestock branch discontinuing bull loan policy throughout Dominion. Fifteen per cent Fort William settlers will be deprived pure bred bulls. Will cause serious loss and discontent among pioneers. Strongly urge efforts reconsideration action. Writing.

I would like the minister to give whatever consideration he can to this.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): I think my hon. friend is unnecessarily alarmed. I may say that I intend to make a statement in the course of a day or two which I hope will allay the fears not only of my hon. friend, but also of the animals in question.

Mr. MANION: I would like to assure my hon. friend that this telegram did not come from one of the animals.

BOARD OF RAILWAY COMMISSIONERS

REQUESTS FOR EXPEDITION IN FREIGHT RATE HEARINGS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): Will the Minister of Railways inform me if it is the intention of the government to press the railway commission for a quick decision in connection with the case pending before that body, and which is sponsored by the Quebec harbour commission. I observe by the press that the government has made a similar request of the railway commission in connection with the case pending before them entered by the western provinces. I should like to know if they propose making a similar request in connection with the application of the Quebec harbour commission.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): The government has not found any reason for urging expedition in the matter which is now going on actively before the railway commission. The former request arose out of an appeal relating to a matter of procedure before the board and in the judgment the government called attention to the necessity for expedition. The government is of opinion that expedition is required with respect to the whole general rates case now before the railway board, and we have every reason to believe that the board itself is using every means possible to bring about an early conclusion of the case. But the Board of Railway Commissioners cannot restrain the legal gentlemen representing the provinces and other parties, either in their examination of witnesses or in their presentation of argument. Only a few days ago the board did request counsel appearing for all parties to expedite the work of the board by concluding the evidence and arguments as soon as possible.

SOLDIERS INSURANCE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): Has the Minister of Soldiers Civil Re-establishment come to a decision with regard to the extension of time for application for soldiers' insurance? Some inquiries have been made, and it seems to be a matter of concern.

Hon. J. H. KING (Kootenay, Minister of Soldiers Civil Re-establishment): No, the matter has not been thoroughly and completely considered. It is under consideration now.

Mr. LADNER: Could the minister tell us when a decision might be expected?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Within the next few days possibly.

Mr. LADNER: The next few days?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Possibly.

PRIVATE BILLS

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS

Bill No. 71, respecting The Alberta Railway and Irrigation Company.—Mr. Jelliff.

Bill No. 76, respecting La Compagnie du Chemin de fer de Colonisation du Nord.—Mr. Parent.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

The House in committee on Bill No. 73 respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company—Mr. Spencer—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Extension of time for completion of authorized line, etc.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I see this section has been amended, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: Yes. This clause has been amended by adding after the word "uncompleted" in the last line, the following words, "provided that for the purpose of avoiding duplication of construction of that portion of the line west of Lloydminster, the approval of the route map may be made subject to joint construction or operation with the Canadian Northern Railway Company on terms to be agreed upon by the companies or settled by the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada."

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Should not "Canadian Northern" read "Canadian National"?

Mr. DUNNING: The charter in question is a Canadian Northern charter. The Canadian Northern Railway Company is still a corporate entity.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 3 and 4 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

MANITOBA AND NORTH WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY OF CANADA

The House in committee on Bill No. 77 respecting the Manitoba and North Western Railway Company of Canada—Mr. McPhee—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Line of railway in Saskatchewan authorized, etc.

Mr. FANSHER (Last Mountain): Mr. Chairman, I notice that this bill has been amended. Possibly the Minister of Railways can explain the amendment, or perhaps you, Sir, will read it.

The CHAIRMAN: The clause has been amended by striking out all the words from the twelfth line to the end and substituting other words, so that the clause now reads:

The Manitoba and North Western Railway Company of Canada, hereinafter called the "company" may within two years after the passing of this act commence to construct the following line of railway, namely:—

Then comes the amendment.

from a point at or near Kandahar in or near township 32, range 17, west of the 2nd meridian, thence in a southerly direction, a distance of from 12 to 15 miles, thence easterly to a point in townships 28 or 29, range 12, west of the said meridian; or from a point at or near Foam Lake, in townships 30 or 31, range 11 or 12, west of the said meridian, thence in a general southerly direction, a distance of from 12 to 15 miles to a point in townships 28 or 29, range 12 or 13, thence in a westerly direction, a distance of about 30 miles.

Bill read the third time and passed.

MONTREAL, OTTAWA AND GEORGIAN BAY CANAL COMPANY

The House resumed from Friday, March 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chevrier for the second reading of Bill No. 78 respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Speaker, when the time for the consideration of private bills came to an end on Friday night, I was dealing with the inadvisability of this House granting charters to any companies that, in a sense, are not bona fide. I pointed out that in the past there had been probably too much of a tendency to grant charters for various purposes to companies which were thus enabled to hold up the progress of the country. True, at times it is difficult to judge of the bona fides of those who apply for a charter, but I submit, Sir, that when the promoters do not exercise the powers which their charter supposedly intended them to take advantage of, then the granting of such a charter does harm to the country, in that the grantees are in a position to retard progress along certain lines on the plea that it might infringe upon their charter rights.

The present question has this merit, that it is not a party question, and every member can take his stand upon it without being accused of injecting party politics.

It is important to remember that the charter which under this bill it is now sought to extend was granted as far back as July 23, 1894, practically 33 years ago. Within two years of that date the work was to have been commenced and $50,000 expended, and in eight years it had to be finished or the charter would become null and void. Let me supplement that by reading section 44 of the original charter:

If the construction of the canals hereby authorized to be constructed, or some of them, is not commenced and fifty thousand dollars are not expended thereon within two years after the passing of this act, or if the said canals are not finished and put in operation within eight years after the passing of this act, then the powers granted by this act shall cease and be null and void as respects so much of the said canals and works hereby authorized as then remains uncompleted.

Instead of that charter being cancelled it has been renewed thirteen times, and this is the fourteenth application to the parliament of Canada for the same purpose. Practically no work has been done except perhaps some surveys in the way of general investigation; but so far as the construction of the canal goes absolutely nothing has taken place. I pointed out on Friday night that many of the original charter holders are dead, and looking over the list this morning I find such names as Sir Henry Egan, George Cox, Dennis Murphy, Sir James Grant and Mr. Bergeron, who at one time was a member of parliament. Many of these charter holders have died in the meantime, and still the charter is being renewed, from time to time, although nothing has been accomplished in the interests of the country. The rights of many of the original charter holders passed at one time into the hands of Sir Robert Perks, and according to a letter which I received this morning, and which I presume other members are in possession of, those rights have now gone to other parties.

The original rights were mainly three. In the first place, they were empowered to build a canal nine feet deep, to use whatever water was necessary, to expropriate whatever lands they required, to build terminals, wharves, and so forth—the usual phraseology of such a charter. Secondly, they had the right to charge tolls on the use of the canal. In the third place—and this is the keynote of the whole matter—they had the right to produce, lease and supply hydraulic, electric or other kinds of power, and so on. The original purpose was to build a canal—the Georgian bay canal project which was much talked of in the old days—from the head of the lakes, whence I come, down along the Ottawa river. But I believe that to-day the real purpose behind the request for the renewal is to develop some of the million horse-power which exists on the river.

Let me deal for a moment or two with some of the rights given in the charter. In the first place, as regards the right of a private company to construct public waterways and to allow ships to use those waterways, for which use that private company levies a toll, I believe the majority opinion, not only in Canada but throughout the world, is opposed to any permission being given to any such corporation to own the canals or waterways of a country and to make a profit therefrom. It is a bad principle to permit the private ownership of any of the waterways of the country, and that is one of the principal reasons I have to advance against the company building this canal, if indeed it had any intention of so doing. I submit that the government of Canada should own and control its own waterways; those waterways should not be given to any private corporation.

Then in regard to the power question: I will admit that in 1894 when the charter was originally granted the power possibilities in connection with the scheme were not thought of, as they are to-day. Power development had not at that time reached any considerable proportions, and there was not the same speculation regarding its future as there is to-day generally, particularly in this province. Indeed, I notice that the right to develop power was added to the charter merely as a subsidiary clause at the tail-end of one of the main provisions. Perhaps I had better read it. It is to be found in subsection (g) of section 8. They shall have the right to:

—lay out and lease or otherwise dispose of waterlots, and use, sell, lease or otherwise dispose of water brought by or for the said canals or works but not requisite for the same, and produce, lease and supply, or otherwise dispose of hydraulic, electric and other kinds of power in connection with the works hereby authorized.

That, as I say, is really the tail-end of a paragraph. It is a subsidiary clause. And that more or less proves my contention that at the time the charter was given the real object in view was the building of a canal purely and simply, and not the development of power. The foregoing clause I have read, coming as it does as a sort of afterthought, shows beyond question that the power possibilities of the scheme were looked upon at the time as of minor importance. To-day, however, thirty-three years later, power development has become one of the supreme questions of the country. I made it my business this morning to ascertain what development there had been at Niagara since the granting of the charter; I wanted to find out if figures would not illustrate my contention better than any argument I could offer. I suspected that in 1894 there was little if any development of electrical power at Niagara falls, and so I rang up the officers of this government and asked them what development there was at the falls in that year. They replied, none. Yet to-day, thirty-three years later, there is being developed at Niagara, on the Canadian side, 1,000,000 horse-power, and on the American side 500,000 in round figures. So that there you have a total development of 1,500,000 horse-power of electrical energy at Niagara falls, and all this since the charter was originally granted. I need not offer further arguments to show how tremendously important power development has become to this country. The figures I have submitted amply demonstrate this.

One of the greatest factors in commercial progress in this or any other country to-day is the development of commercial electric power. In 1894 power could not be transmitted over any considerable distance. Since that time means have been devised whereby this can be done; power transmission over great distances is a matter of daily practice. That explains the rapid advance which power development has made. Take my own section of the country: Nipigon falls for very many years—I think I may safely say up to 1917—lay altogether idle. They were not developed at all. About the year 1917, however, Adam Beck decided to develop those falls, which have a potential hydro development of about 300,000 horse-power. As a result of the activities carried on there they have already developed 75,000 horse-power of that maximum, notwithstanding the fact that at the time the development there was proposed it was opposed by some people at the head of the lakes. That 75,000 horse-power is used to-day at Port Arthur and Fort William by the pulp and paper industry, and not only has it been a great blessing to that section of Canada, but the power development there will probably make for—this is not an exaggeration, for the facts substantiate the statement—one of the greatest pulp and paper industries in the world, if not, indeed, the greatest. That illustrates the importance of power in our country. The great province of Quebec to-day is a considerable industrial centre, and its importance in this respect is due very largely to the great waterways that exists there. Manitoba is in the same position; that province is gradually coming to the front in power development. The same is true in some measure of British Columbia and of the maritime provinces. A few months ago I happened to be at the opening of the Grand falls development in New Brunswick, and there I was struck with the possibilities of that enterprise, which is one of the great power developments in eastern Canada. I make these points only to emphasize the great importance of power to-day It seems to me to be our duty in this House to guard these power rights for the people of the country.

Mr. ARTHURS: Is my hon. friend aware that certain safe-guards already exist in the various supplementary acts relating to this scheme?

Mr. MANION: Of Ontario?

Mr. ARTHURS: No, acts passed by the Dominion parliament with regard to the various renewals of the charter.

Mr. MANION: No, I am not aware of that. My reading of the charter gives to the company very considerable rights with regard to the development of power on the Ottawa river. Of course, if ultimately it should turn out that they have no rights given them in the charter, I presume they would not object to having any supposed rights withdrawn. There would be no objection to their being confirmed in the right to build the canal, because I do not think they have any intention of building it anyway. My hon. friend the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Black) asks, how can the canal pay in competition with other waterways? I certainly do not believe the canal would pay without the power rights; it seems to me that the power development is what the company is after. It has been disputed that there is enough water to construct any large canals on the Ottawa river. I do not wish to be unfair; I am sure my hon. friend from Nipissing (Mr. Lapierre) has the facts ready to give the House, and I will admit that the government engineers who some years ago were asked to investigate the feasibility of the Georgian bay canal did state that they could develop a canal with a depth of twenty-two feet.

Mr. LAPIERRE: That has been generally accepted all over the country.

Mr. MANION: I am not disputing that in any way. I wish to read again section 44, because there is an item in this clause which, if this charter is renewed, gives this company a dangerous power. I will have to read the whole clause to get the sense of it, but it is very short:

> If the construction of the canals hereby authorized to be constructed, or some of them, is not commenced and fifty thousand dollars are not expended thereon within two years after the passing of this act, or if the said canals are not finished and put in operation within eight years after the passing of this act, then the powers granted by this act shall cease and be null and void as respects so much of the said canals and works hereby authorized as then remains uncompleted.

As one of my hon. friends says that last sentence is the joker in this charter. That might give this company the right to build a great power scheme developing one million horse-power or even more on the Ottawa river; it would give them the right at the same time to start the construction of a canal within the eight years, or within the nine years, since I notice that in the charter now presented nine years has been made the limit, and if at the end of that time the government decided that this company was not going to carry out the building of that canal which was originally proposed in the charter, the government would be able to step in and say, "You apparently are not going to build a canal, and must stop any future development." But in that nine years this company might gobble up practically all the power which could be developed on the Ottawa river. Therefore that is another very strong reason, it seems to me, why we should hesitate to grant this charter as it now stands, and confer these powers upon this company.

Mr. LAPIERRE: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Is he aware that there is a clause in that charter which allows the government to take over the work at any time?

Mr. MANION: Yes, and I am going to read that clause later, but I am going to suggest that now is the time to take it over; nothing has been done in thirty-three years, and I think before anything is started is a good time to take it over.

Then there is another question which was brought up by Mr. Howard Ferguson, Premier of Ontario, with which no doubt he as a lawyer will be very much more familiar than I, because some of us in this House are not lawyers. That point has to do with the legal rights. Mr. Ferguson has pointed out, and it has been so stated by other lawyers, that at present it is an understood legal fact that the power rights are in the hands of the provinces and that the navigation rights are in the hands of the Dominion. I do not believe any one will dispute the latter statement, and on the other hand it can probably be proved before the courts that the power rights are in the hands of the provinces. If that is the case, we should make sure that that right remains with the provinces, and we should not take the risk of having a lawsuit on our hands by giving those rights to outsiders. In other words, this company might be given the right to build a canal, although I doubt very much if they will ever do so, but the provinces of Ontario and Quebec should retain their right to develop this power. When this question goes to committee, that point will be for the committee to decide.

I have a great deal of sympathy for my hon. friend from Nipissing and I also have sympathy for other hon. members who represent constituencies along the Ottawa river; in fact I have a little sympathy for myself, because the Ottawa and Georgian bay canal has been mooted in my part of the country for many years. But in reply to the arguments which I know the hon. member for Nipissing will later put on Hansard, I would say that he is really losing nothing for his constituency if this charter is not granted, because after all there is very little chance that this canal will ever be built even if this charter is granted; otherwise I might support him. Therefore he would simply be avoiding the danger of not having this canal developed until it is carried on later, probably by the government of our country.

Just to show the danger which such a charter suggests, I am going to quote for a moment from the Montreal Star of Thursday, March 3, 1927. In glancing over the news items in the Star I saw an advertisement which struck my eye. It was inserted by The Great Lakes and Atlantic Canal and Power Company, Limited, and gave notice to the people of Canada that they are going to apply to the parliament of Canada at this session for a charter in which they ask for exactly the same rights on the St. Lawrence river between Montreal and Kingston as is asked for in the charter under consideration on the Ottawa river between Montreal and lake Nipissing. So if we grant the application of this Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company to go on with this work, there is no reason in the world why we should not grant the charter which is going to be requested by this other company. I have no idea who are the people represented by Mr. Harris, who signed this advertisement as secretary of the company, but without knowing who they are I say now that the proposition should be turned down just as I believe the charter now under consideration ought to be refused by this House.

I believe the St. Lawrence canal system will ultimately be developed; on that river to-day between Montreal and Kingston are some canals which are 260 feet long and which will allow the passage of a boat of 44 foot beam and 14 foot depth, but I believe that in the near future, using those words from a national standpoint rather than in their ordinary sense, the government will be able to begin the construction of canals which will permit larger boats to pass from the head of the lakes to Montreal, and possibly to cross the ocean. Even to-day there are boats which come across the Atlantic and proceed to the head of the lakes. As a boy, thirty years ago, I can remember a fairly large Norwegian boat, something over 240 feet in length, which came to the head of the lakes with a cargo from Norway and returned there with another cargo, and during navigation there are some small ships utilizing these canals on the St. Lawrence river. I believe that in the near future these canals will be enlarged in association with the development of the Welland canal, and that the grain of the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. McLean) and of the farmers of the House and their friends, instead of being carried to Port Colborne or Buffalo or Georgian bay ports, will go direct to Montreal where it will be transhipped to ocean going boats, and will be carried across the ocean with a saving to them of anywhere from five to ten cents a bushel. On the Welland canal we have already spent over $75,000,000, and ultimately our expenditure there will reach $110,000,000. Eighteen states of the union have declared themselves in favour of the development of the St. Lawrence river to a depth of 25 or 30 feet; these states have a population of 40,000,000 people, and are tributory to the great lakes. Herbert Hoover, Julius Barnes, the International Joint Commission and various other public bodies and public men in the United States have recently come out strongly in favour of the canalization of the St. Lawrence river. There is also on the St. Lawrence river some 4,000,000 horse power of potential electric energy to be developed, while on the Georgian Bay canal I believe there is something over 1,000,000 horse power. The estimated cost of developing the St. Lawrence canals, including the cost of the power scheme, is something like $252,000,000, and it has been recommended by the International Joint Commission that to this the cost of the Welland canal of which I spoke a moment ago should be added, and that the total should be divided between the two countries in proportion to the benefits received. In other words, if that were done and if the St. Lawrence canal scheme were carried through, the Dominion of Canada would not have very much to pay because of our vast expenditure in connection with the Welland canal. New York and Buffalo and some other centres which are opposing the canalization of the St. Lawrence will be to my mind ultimately defeated; they may delay the building of these canals but they cannot stop it. I submit that that canal would benefit not only the prairie provinces, by the lower rates on grain, but it would also benefit the city of Montreal. I do not believe, and in this I am supported by the opinions of shipping men, that ships would go across the ocean; they would transfer their cargoes at the port of Montreal or at some maritime port, and those cargoes would only undergo one transhipment instead of two or three, as is now the case.

To a certain extent the same argument would apply to the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian bay canal scheme if it were carried through. At the same time there is little chance of the canal feature of this project being proceeded with. I am pointing out merely the advantage, the ultimate advantage to Canada, of the other canals which I have no doubt will be built long before the Ottawa and Georgian bay canal and which will also put the maritime provinces in a more advantageous position in regard to the amount of coal which they could ship to the central parts of Canada. We imported last year from seventeen to eighteen million tons of coal, and of this amount some twelve million tons I think, of bituminous coal, most of which, or a large proportion of it, was used in the province of Ontario. The maritime provinces cannot reach the province of Ontario at the present time with their coal because of the high cost of shipment from the port of Montreal west. But with the St. Lawrence canals deepened, as I think they will be deepened, the maritime provinces should be able to supply a large amount of the coal which is now being used in Ontario and other sections of Canada and which is being purchased from foreign countries.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that this project should be given to a private corporation to develop; I believe it should be developed by this government. I believe that our waterways should remain in the hands of the government, and not be handed over to private corporations. In other words—and I have pretty nearly finished the argument I wish to make—I believe that both of these charters should be refused by this House; ultimately I believe they will be refused. I have noticed editorials in the Toronto Mail, Conservative; in the Toronto Globe, Liberal, and in the Ottawa Journal and Ottawa Citizen, of opposite sides of politics; and in the Montreal Gazette of this morning, all taking the same attitude, and all opposed to the granting of this charter. Mr. Ferguson, the Conservative Premier of Ontario, has come out and opposed it and he was supported in that attitude, as he is very rarely supported, by Mr. Raney. I believe that Mr. Sinclair will probably, although he has not announced himself so far as I know, take the same attitude as Mr. Ferguson and Mr. Raney. In other words there is almost a unanimity of desire to refuse to grant to these private people the right to develop electrical power and to develop the canal system on the Ottawa river. There will be no injustice, it seems to me, in cancelling this right at the present time. I have already read to you section 44 of the company's charter. May I also read section 43, which is as follows:

Her Majesty—

This was in the original charter and it is still in the charter.

—her heirs and successors, may at any time assume the possession and property of the said canals and works, and of all the rights and privileges and advantages of the company, all of which shall after such assumption be vested in Her Majesty, her heirs and successors, on giving to the company one week's notice thereof and on paying to the company the value of the same, to be fixed by three arbitrators or the majority of them—

This is still a part of the charter which the company originally received. They had eight years originally, they have had in all thirty-three years to do something toward the development of this right, and they have done nothing. Therefore, I submit, there would be no injustice to them if you took from them any further rights they possess, giving them, of course, whatever compensation they might be entitled to by justice and by right.

I believe, Sir, that now is the best time to stop any further interference with the canal system, with the waterway system, of our country. I believe it is the duty of this parliament to take that step, and to refuse in the future to any company the right to take possession of our waterways. In the second place I believe it is the duty of this parliament to protect the waterways and electrical powers of our country for the benefit of the people of Canada.

Mr. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): I wish to deal briefly with this very important measure. I think we are all indebted to the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) for having, at this stage, brought to our attention the very far reaching character of the proposed measure, and while in ordinary cases a private bill does not meet with very much opposition or very much discussion at the present stage, nevertheless this bill, while appearing as a private bill is really a public bill, and is of such great importance that we are entitled to deal with it fully on the present occasion. My reason for discussing this bill is because of its relation to two of our problems, first, transportation, and secondly our industrial development as it is affected by hydro electric power. This fact emphasizes the importance of the measure. We have heard a great deal about our transportation system and our transportation difficulties, and much has been done in the last few years looking toward the solution of those difficulties, and also a great deal has been accomplished in the promotion of our industrial growth through the development of hydro electric power.

The senior member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) who has the bill in charge rather thought that its discussion at this stage was in the nature of opposition to the measure. But bearing in mind the importance of the bill I do not think that is a fair contention. I think it might just as well be contended that the hon. member was perhaps endeavouring to rush the bill through committee as that we were endeavouring to obstruct it. What does this bill really propose to do? It relates to a charter that is thirty-three years old, to a charter granted in the year 1894, for the construction of a canal—or perhaps more correctly speaking a series of canals—on the Ottawa river. That charter, as has been said, has been renewed thirteen times. One would have thought that the company had had ample time to go ahead and undertake this work if it ever intended to do so. This great lapse of time should arrest and command the attention of the House. It makes it our duty to look into the situation now and compare it to the situation that existed thirty-three years ago. The situation, as has already been pointed out, is an altogether different one. We must look upon the matter as conditions exist to-day rather than as they existed thirty-three years ago.

A careful reading of the charter makes it perfectly plain that the main object was the construction of this canal or series of canals, and that the development of hydraulic or electric power was only incidental to the main undertaking. The charter provided that the company that constructed the canal should have the right to charge toll. Now I think it is absolutely sound to contend that all waterways, all canals of this character, should be built, owned and operated by the Dominion itself. That is the policy which we have been following in Canada with such success, and in pursuance of which we have made such enormous expenditures of money. The construction of the canal at an earlier period would have been much more feasible than at the present time except for the power question. The cost of construction thirty-three years ago and down until the time of the war would have been much less than it is now. We must assume that the company have made reasonable efforts to carry out the privileges, the opportunities, which this charter has granted them. Yet in this long period of thirty-three years they have not been able to finance the matter, to construct the canal, nor to do anything practical to show that the proposition is one that can be carried out.

As I have said, conditions have changed entirely and perhaps there has been no greater change than in connection with our canals. Since this charter has been granted we have enlarged the Soo canal; we have enlarged the St. Lawrence canal; we have undertaken the construction of the Welland canal, and surely all this work that has been carried out and that is in progress must have an effect upon the transportation question and upon the route which the grain will take. All these must operate to the detriment and disadvantage of the proposed Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian bay canal.

Before we engage in any further canal construction we should see how these improvements will work out and what effect they will have upon the transportation of our grain and commerce generally. We also have the fact that the Panama canal has been constructed and is exercising a considerable influence upon the movement of grain. The Hudson bay railway is under construction, and if this route is of any value at all, if it is practicable, it will have an effect and will divert traffic which might in the beginning have been expected to find its way by this proposed canal.

While there has been this very striking change in the canal situation, there has been an equally striking and important change in connection with the power situation. In the period of thirty-three years the whole hydro-electric system of Ontario and of the adjoining province of Quebec has grown up and has assumed an influence and place, the importance of which we can scarcely over-estimate, in the industrial development of those two provinces. We must consider this proposition in the light of this feature and if this charter is renewed, this company, while acquiring the right to construct the canal and to levy tolls as against free canals—and this in itself appears to be an unsound proposition—will have in its control the development of 1,000,000 or 1,125,000 horse-power. Not only Ontario and Quebec, but the whole Dominion of Canada is vitally interested in this proposition. I cannot think of anything that touches our life at more vital points than the development of hydro-electric power. It has much to do with our industrial development; it has a great deal to do with transportation on our railway systems; it will have much to do in solving our immigration problem, and is therefore one of the most important features of our industrial life to-day. Is it right or proper that by a side wind, as it were, we should hand over to this company, when such was not in contemplation in the original transaction, the control, the disposition of 1,000,000 horse-power? Such a proposition is so unreasonable, so contradictory to the public welfare, that it ought not to be entertained for a moment.

When we are asked to give this company a fourteenth renewal of its charter, surely the promoters of this bill must make out a very clear case. They must be compelled to show that it is in the public interest that this renewal should be granted at this time. Let us see what the effect of the renewal will be apart from what I have already stated. Supposing the company does nothing as it has done nothing for thirty-three years, the effect of inaction will be to tie up this 1,000,000 horse-power for eight or ten years longer and also to tie up the development of the canal system on this river. This surely was not contemplated and it cannot be favourably contemplated at the present time.

The next question which arises is this: Have we any jurisdiction to grant to this company the rights for which they are asking? It is admitted, of course, that this parliament is supreme in the matter of navigation; but we have had several decisions with respect to the rights of the provinces to surplus waters, the lands under the waters and the riparian rights, and I think I am safe in saying that there is at least very grave doubt whether the Dominion of Canada has any right to grant to a company the use of surplus waters or the right to develop hydro-electric power. The rights of the two provinces interested must be recognized. We should not do anything that will delay the possibility of their carrying out legitimate developments along these lines. We should not, with our eyes open as it were, do anything that will lead to conflict, to litigation, with these provinces, and surely if this charter is renewed we may expect that to be the result. Ontario is hungering for the development of hydro-electric power, and the two sources from which we are looking for this development in eastern Ontario are the Ottawa river and the St. Lawrence river. An obstacle has been placed in the way of development on the Ottawa river by the action of this parliament in granting this charter, and we think the time has now come when that obstacle can be removed, when at least it should not be continued, and when Ontario and Quebec, each being equally interested in this power, should be free to go ahead and make this development.

On the St. Lawrence river there are complications of a different character, but action again on the part of this government is necessary before we can get any relief. Let me as a representative of one of the constituencies of eastern Ontario urge this government to take every action possible for the early removal of these obstacles and for the coöperation which is necessary with the provinces for the development of hydro-electric power on these two streams. Let me suggest also to the government that perhaps this is an opportune time to clean up the Chicago water steal. Our friends in the United States are very anxious to enter into some arrangement for the development of hydro-electric power on the St. Lawrence, and it would be only fair and right to say to them that before we will enter into an agreement on this question we must have a complete clean-up and settlement in connection with the Chicago water steal.

This is not a party question and should not be. It is not a question of one or two provinces against the rest of the Dominion, but a matter in which we are all interested and for which we wish to find the best possible solution in the public interest. In support of my contention, I refer to two editorials in the Toronto Globe, the first appearing on March 2, 1927, from which I will quote a couple of paragraphs. The article is headed The Georgian Bay Canal, and reads:

> This is the measure which would have been endorsed in principle last week had it not been for the interference of Sir George Perley. It will come before the House again, and it will bear watching. The existence of this charter and of the vague hope that the canal will be built prejudices discussion of St. Lawrence development plans. If the canal were constructed and operated under the charter, a system of toll charges would be permitted, while tolls on all other canals in Canada have been abolished. Most serious of all, however, would be the handicap under which the development of negotiations of hydro would be placed along the route involved.
> In the public interest Parliament can hardly take this charter seriously any longer. The company has not even filed with the government working plans which have met with approval. Thirty-three years has been a long enough time to toy with a valuable public franchise.

Then, in the same paper, a very able editoral headed The Bill Should be Killed deals with the matter more exhaustively, and I quote from that editorial, as follows:

> When the charter was granted in 1894 the advantages of public ownership were not fully understood. Conditions are different to-day. The importance of water-power is appreciated. The people of the Ottawa valley and of all the territory contiguous to these rivers will profit immeasurably if they are given the full benefit of the "white coal" which now awaits development in that part of the country. If this power is permitted to become the property of private interests they will pay dearly for its use, while under public ownership they will have it in perpetuity at cost. It is their duty, no less than that of the rest of the province, to see that this advantage is retained.
> The building of a canal and the exploitation of power are two distinct matters. If the company wants to build a canal, this should not confuse the more immediate and more important question of power. It would be serious enough to give a private corporation the right to own and control what will be in time, no doubt, an important navigation channel, but to alienate from the public 1,000,000 or more horse-power of current for the purpose of public exploitation and to enter into competition with public ownership is something which this Province cannot tolerate.

So that we have the two objections. To sum it up, we have the objection that the canal should not be constructed by a company with the right to charge tolls, and the other objection that the immense power possibilities should not be handed over to any private company. I wish to make a few suggestions in connection with this matter, which I hope will commend themselves to the House. I submit that we should decline to renew this charter, and that the government should pronounce against any such renewal. In the second place, I think we should divorce—perhaps that is a good term—the canal proposition from the power proposition. We grant many divorces in this parliament and I think such a divorce would be more deserving than many that we do grant. The construction of the canal should be undertaken as a public work at the public cost, and the power proposition should be developed by the two provinces and the Dominion jointly. The share of the power to which the province of Ontario is entitled going to the Hydro-Electric Power Commission, and the share which the province of Quebec is entitled to going as that province may direct. Let us construct the canal as a public work, and let us divide the power. At present it would appear that the three jurisdictions have, as it were, a blocking right in connection with this development. This government may, in its jurisdiction with respect to navigation, obstruct the provinces from undertaking development, and the provinces may also obstruct the Dominion, a right which they undoubtedly have, which will prove very embarrassing. So that it seems to me that the Dominion and the two provinces should get together, that they should decide not to renew this charter, that they should agree upon a plan for the development of power that will not interfere with navigation, and if, in connection with the development of power, some portion of the cost should be paid for improvement in navigation, then a contribution in this direction should be made. All three, the Dominion, the province of Ontario, and the province of Quebec are equally interested on behalf of the public and in the public interest, and it should not be hard for the three authorities to get together and arrive at some solution which would be fair to these people who hold the charter. They have held this charter for thirty-three years. It has been renewed, and I would make them a reasonable and fair compensation for any work they have undertaken, as provided in the charter itself.

Mr. ARTHURS: Has there been any opportunity for this company to commence operations under the act? As I understand it, the Dominion government must approve of their plan before they could possibly start operations.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): As I understand it, they have never filed any plan calling for approval.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The plans were all filed and were submitted in 1926.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Surely, after a period of thirty-three years, they have had ample opportunity to file plans. I am told now that the plans were not filed until 1926.

Mr. ARTHURS: May I state that in the meantime, the Dominion government has spent about a million dollars on a survey of this proposition, the plans of which were accepted.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I hope they will spend a lot more money investigating before they hand this charter over to any private company again. I think I have dealt with this matter from the standpoint of our duty, and from the standpoint of the public interest, as it is represented by this House and by the provinces. As for myself, I am opposed to the renewal of this charter and I hope action will be taken to remove every obstacle that remains in the way of the development of this enormous block of power by these two provinces in the public interest.

Mr. E. A. LAPIERRE (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, it had not been my intention to speak at any length on this occasion, but as there has been considerable discussion and as the subject matter of this bill means much to us in northern Ontario, for on the construction of the proposed canal depends our future industrial development, and we have waited patiently for it for 30 years, I am going to ask the indulgence of the House while I treat this subject from the standpoint of the people in northern Ontario.

As has been repeatedly said, this project has been before the House for at least 33 years, and for 14 years its promoters have secured renewals of their charter. In 1921 and again in 1924 renewals were granted without any objection. In northern Ontario we do not look upon this as merely a power project. To us it is a project of national importance, for not only is the province of Ontario interested in its realization, but it is of vital interest to the farmers of the prairie provinces and to the coal miners in Nova Scotia. So great is the interest in northern Ontario and so consistently have the people there advocated the construction of this canal, that I propose to read a few telegrams that I have received from different parts of the province:

North Bay, February 25, 1927.

North Bay heartily endorses renewal of Georgian bay canal charter for immediate construction. Canada needs this undertaking at once, if spoken optimism for the future is to be realized.

D. BARKER, Mayor.

North Bay, February 24, 1927.

North Bay Board of Trade endorse bill for renewal of charter of Georgian bay canal on understanding that company will proceed with work immediately.

H. H. CHARLTON, Secretary.

Toronto, Ont., Feb. 24, 1927.

Heartily endorse granting renewal of charter for construction of Georgian bay canal.

THEO. LEGAULT.
A. V. WATTERS.

Englehart, February 24, 1927.

This community endorses renewal of Georgian bay canal charter and immediate construction by private interests.

J. CLARK, Acting Mayor.

Renfrew, February 24, 1927.

We endorse renewal of Georgian bay canal charter, work to commence at once.

C. McD. LOGAN, Mayor Renfrew.

Mattawa, February 24, 1927.

Mattawa is one hundred per cent behind you re construction of Georgian bay canal. We would impress upon you the wish that a portion of the first expenditure he made here.

JOHN LINDSAY, Mattawa.
Mayor.

Pembroke, February 24, 1927.

Have received telegram from Mayor, North Bay asking town to endorse renewal of Georgian bay canal charter. Holding special meeting town council to-night to deal with it. Please wire information that might assist us to arrive at decision.

J. P. DUFF. Mayor.

Cobalt, February 24, 1927.

Will strongly support your effort to secure renewal of charter for the Georgian bay canal.

FRANK LENDRUM, Mayor.

Parry Sound, February 24, 1927.

Parry Sound desires renewal of Georgian bay and French river ship canal.

JAMES LUDGATE.

Callander, February 24, 1927.

Callander and township of North Himsworth consider that the very life and future mercantile prosperity of the dominion depends on the construction of the Georgian bay canal. We see that the country has entered upon an era where route capable of floating oceangoing cargo vessels should be constructed at once. No other canal can be feasible. Therefore we heartily endorse the renewal of Georgian bay canal charter.

G. K. MORRISON,
Reeve Township North Himsworth.

Callander, February 24, 1927.

Township of East Ferris feels that the construction of the Georgian bay canal at once will be of great value to northern Ontario, and the Dominion. We heartily endorse the renewal of the Georgian bay canal charter.

JOHN DUFRESNE,
Reeve, East Ferris.

Cochrane, February 24, 1927.

Town of Cochrane heartily endorses Georgian bay canal charter.

F. C. IVEY, Mayor.

Pembroke, February 25, 1927.

At special meeting of council held last evening the following resolutions were unanimously passed:

Moved by Mr. Taylor seconded by Mr. Brook that a committee composed of Mayor Duff, Dr. M. McKay, D. A. Jones, M. F. Fellowes, W. H. Williams, J. D. L. Leitch, T. H. Moffatt, Dr. Cotnam, Alexander Stuart, M.P.P. and the mover be appointed for the purpose of calling a public meeting to discuss the Georgian bay canal and that this committee arrange to have some outside speakers, the council to pay any expense incurred by this meeting, and the mayor to be chairman.

D. W. BLAKELY, Clerk.

Mr. IRVINE: Does not my hon. friend think that if the gentlemen who sent these telegrams had been anxious to have this canal constructed they would have sent their messages fifteen, five, or even two years ago to the holders of the charter? Is it not late to send them now?

Mr. LAPIERRE: I am speaking for the people of northern Ontario. They have been desirous of having this canal built for 30 years. In 1923 a very large and influential delegation waited on Sir Lomer Gouin, then acting Prime Minister during the absence of Mr. Mackenzie King, and also on the Minister of Public Works, Mr. King. At that meeting representatives from every part of northern Ontario secured from the federal government an undertaking to expend $200,000 to retain the water levels in order to develop water-power on the French river.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Does not the hon. gentleman think that those who have sent these telegrams and those for whom he is speaking would be well satisfied if the canal were constructed as a public work and free from tolls?

Mr. LAPIERRE: The popular opinion in the northern country is that you cannot separate the power from the canal scheme, and that if you are ever going to have a canal it will have to be constructed along the lines laid down by the company that is asking for the renewal of the charter to-day. I will come to that a little later.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Might I be permitted to ask the hon. member a question? Does he really think that this company ever intends to build the proposed canal if the charter is extended?

Mr. LAPIERRE: I have information along those lines, and I hope to be able to satisfy the hon. gentleman before I resume my seat. I was trying to demonstrate the opinion of northern Ontario regarding the construction of the canal, and to show why the feeling prevails that if we are ever to have this Georgian bay ship canal, which, as I pointed out before, means more to northern Ontario than any other national work that could be undertaken, we must have it constructed by a company such as the concern which is now requesting an extension of the charter. It was stated the first night of the debate by the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) that the original members of the company had largely disappeared, and that in fact no provisional directors were mentioned in the application for the renewal of the charter. Let me inform the hon. gentleman that in 1905 the company reorganized with a subscription of $10,000,000 in stock of which $1,000,000 was paid up. This dispensed with the necessity for having provisional directors. It was also said that Sir Robert Perks and his group were no longer behind the charter, being unable to finance the construction of the canal. Further, the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) alleged that the charter, having been carried by Sir Robert Perks for many years, was finally handed over to other parties when Sir Robert got tired of it. I have in my hand two cablegrams which I wish to read in answer to the statements made by hon. gentlemen:

London. Winfield Sifton, Chateau Laurier.

Perley incorrect stating as reported to-days London Times that English company failed obtain money construction. Whole canal capital was twice offered government by responsible parties one at three per cent in 1901 and again in 1910 at three and a half per cent.

Perks.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Was that capital not offered solely on the understanding that there would be a federal guarantee?

Mr. LAPIERRE: Naturally. I will come to that later.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: It is easy to get capital if the government guarantees.

Mr. LAPIERRE: I want to quote another cablegram:

London, February 28, Winfield Sifton, Chateau Laurier, Ottawa. Sir George Perley is quite mistaken. All English shareholders including myself retain as much financial interest as ever. British shareholders sincerely trust Canadian parliament will not refuse renew charter especially now when company have stated intention immediately construct Ottawa-Montreal section.

Perks.

As I said before, this subject has been treated merely from the standpoint of power development.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Will the hon. member inform the House of the extent of the commitments to which he has referred?

Mr. LAPIERRE: I will come to that in a moment. We regard the question as one of transportation. Northern Ontario has become one of the largest wealth producing sections of that province. As so ably demonstrated by my hon. friend from Fort William a few days ago, northern Ontario is now one of the largest and most promising mining fields in the world. We have produced in that district within the last twenty-five years over nine hundred million dollars' worth of minerals. In the section in which I live we have produced over 85 per cent of the world's nickel, while throughout the north country, in all that great pre-Cambrian shield which blankets the whole of northern Ontario, there exists one of the greatest stores of Mother Nature's wealth, of which we have scratched only 5 per cent. This part of Canada has contributed more during the last fifteen years to the industrial development of older Ontario, to the development of the industrial centres of the province, to the trade of Toronto and many other cities, than any other factor in the commercial life of the province. To-day that section of the country, producing immense wealth, finds itself on the eve of seeing concluded a project which will mean a greater development than it has ever known. It means the canalization of the Ottawa river which will link us up with the great lakes and with the lower ports of the St. Lawrence. By the plans which were deposited with the government a few years ago, construction will take place a little above the confluence of the Mattawa and the Ottawa rivers which will render the great lakes navigable right into the mining country of Ontario, bringing Haileybury, New Liskeard and Ville-Marie, as seaports, into direct communication with the various ports of Canada.

This is the great scheme that has agitated northern Ontario for the last twenty-five years and it is to-day so near realization that the people are anxious to see it carried to a successful conclusion. What is the opposition to this scheme? We heard no opposition to the construction of the Georgian bay ship canal until there was a move to control the Carillon water-power. Now we find considerable opposition developing. On the upper Ottawa the agents and engineers of the International Paper Company have men investigating the great water-powers, and in a few days we shall see two or three great dams built on the upper waters of the Ottawa which will actually control 1,000,000 horsepower. This will come into the possession of a private corporation, as happened on the Gatineau. We in Ontario who have waited for the development of the northern country know that if we are to have a Georgian bay ship canal we must secure it through the means of power development. It must be carried by power, and any other scheme projected or suggested will not meet the requirements of the northern section of that province nor give the transportation facilities to which that part of the Dominion is entitled.

What are the promises of the company on which we base our hopes for an early construction of the canal? I have before me a part of the brief which has been discussed. We know very well that it became very difficult after the close of the war to obtain cheap money. As was stated by the hon. member for Argenteuil, Sir Robert Perks came to this House year after year, for many years, and attempted to obtain the assistance necessary to carry out a national undertaking of this importance. But to-day in view of this improvement and in view of the increased value of water-power, the holders of this charter find that if they are permitted to have the charter extended for two years more they can give northern Ontario these transportation facilities which have long been promised. Here is what they propose to do. Upon the granting of this charter they will immediately start the construction of that section of the canal from Montreal to Ottawa. This will take about three years and will produce 219,000 horse-power at Carillon and 4,100 horse-power at Ste. Anne's. This would give continuous navigation as far up the river as the city of Ottawa, and would make Ottawa a port; it would complete 120 miles out of a total of 440 miles, or 27 per cent of the whole project; the cost will be about $55,000,000, all of which will be new money spent in Canada and which constitutes roughly 20 per cent of the total cost of the project. Completion of this section will extend continuous navigation up the Ottawa river from salt water to above Arnprior. The next section, section 2, will take two years to complete; it will produce 158,000 horse-power, will be 54 miles in length or about 12 per cent of the total mileage and will cost about $40,000,000, or roughly 14 per cent of the total cost.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What is the hon. member referring to?

Mr. LAPIERRE: This is the brief of the charter company. These details can all be discussed in committee. At the end of five years a total of 174 miles will have been constructed at a cost of $95,000,000, or 24 per cent of the complete project in mileage and 34 per cent in money. Now, Mr. Speaker, we in northern Ontario who have waited patiently all these years feel that under the circumstances this government will be perfectly justified in extending this charter for another two or three years; we have already waited 30 years, during which no objections have been made to this power proposition. The situation as it is to-day would mean that the granting of separate power rights on the upper Ottawa river would remove the possibility of a canal for all time, and that accounts in a very large measure for the numerous telegrams I have received and for the anxiety which exists in the north country over this enterprise. According to the plans which are now on deposit with the government, an expenditure of $282,000,000 within the next ten years is called for, and under this charter the provincial rights are reserved. But we find ourselves in this position, that whilst the power development will be available for the government of Ontario, we have in the province of Quebec a government which is opposed to government ownership, which means that this water-power development will eventually come into the hands of one company, creating another great power monopoly on the Ottawa river and leaving the owners of remaining timber limits at the mercy of this corporation. That is what we in northern Ontario envisage in this situation.

The feasibility of the canal has long been conceded, and the plans have been before this government for a number of years. The engineering difficulties which were numerous in the early days of survey have entirely disappeared, and there is no longer any fear that these difficulties will be encountered. Furthermore, I would warn my friends from Montreal that the scheme which no doubt the large power corporations are going to put into effect on the waters of the upper Ottawa river will make a tremendous difference in the water levels of the St. Lawrence river. All engineers will tell you that under the modern system of constructing dams, where large areas of low lying lands are flooded and large bodies of water are exposed to evaporation, you will have a continual reduction in the water level, and that is what will happen if the waters of the upper Ottawa are dammed in order to create large units of electrical power. On the other hand, if you allow this canal scheme to be carried on along the lines called for by the plans, in order to maintain navigation it becomes necessary that you retain the water level at 24 feet. The plans as they exist to-day call for a canal 24 feet deep from the Georgian bay to Montreal, capable of accommodating the largest ships sailing the great lakes. It will be the most economical route for the shipment of grain, and this is a question which has been discussed before. All of our Progressive friends are familiar with the transportation costs on grain, but we know that once this canal is opened there will be a very great diversion of the grain now carried by the way of Buffalo; the route will be shorter by several hundred miles; it will be entirely within Canadian territory and absolutely under the control of the Dominion government, and grain will be carried for at least three cents a bushel less than it is carried to-day.

Now let us consider the situation in northern Ontario, where we use tremendous quantities of coal in our mines. There is a continuous demand for coal in northern Ontario, because most of our ores have to be treated. We are at present importing into the town of North Bay alone over 980,000 tons of bituminous coal and the saving on that coal alone if it were transported by water would be over $1,250,000. Just think for a moment what it means to that part of Ontario if the French river development is completed; North Bay, now a city with a population of 15,000, would be a centre of water navigation. To-day North Bay is the front door of this great northern country; it is gradually becoming a great commercial centre but until we have more power in order to attract industries, we must for a number of years remain at a standstill. We have an excellent proof of that in the fact that a few years ago the International Nickel Company, for want of electric power, was forced to go to Port Colborne and erect its smelters there. A few years ago also the British American Nickel Company, which has spent over $25,000,000 in the development of the Murray mine at Sudbury, was compelled to erect its refineries at a point within a few miles of Ottawa, where it could get large quantities of hydraulic and electric power at a very low figure. Now, Sir, within the last few years, near one of the largest nickel deposits in the world, a discovery has been made of lead and zinc and we are told to-day —in fact I have the figures here—by those interested in the enterprise that they have already blocked out 43,000,000 tons of these valuable minerals, possessing a value of $22 a ton. Here we are the centre of a mining industry producing some of the richest ores known to mineral science—which attract high salaried men of the most expert class, which brings skilled metallurgists and engineers who are the most advanced in their knowledge of the development of our ores—and yet we find these ores being carried miles away from where they are mined, creating new centres of industry elsewhere because we have not the water-power or electric power with which to treat them. That is the situation which exists in our northern country to-day. We up there are in favour of this project as it stands because we look upon it as our only salvation, if we are ever to establish industries in addition to those of farming and mining. At the present moment in the district of Sudbury we have developed all the available water-power, amounting to some 37,500 horse-power, which is being used by the nickel industry and by the pulp and paper industry, and we have practically exhausted all the electric power procurable. But what we lack can be made up by the construction of the Georgian bay ship canal. It would also help to solve our coal problem. Ships on the great lakes could carry grain to the maritime provinces, and bring back Nova Scotia coal at a rate that would make its transportation possible, and thus help a great deal to develop our fuel problem.

I have not entered into a discussion of the legal phase of the question, I leave that to those who are better posted on that aspect of the matter than I am. But I want to make it clear to hon. gentlemen that the people of northern Ontario, the red-blooded pioneers who have helped to develop that northern country, have their eyes focused on this question. This is a great national undertaking which has been promised to us by each succeeding government. I remember hearing Sir Wilfrid Laurier state in the city of Montreal many years ago, that when once the Grand Trunk Pacific had been completed the next great national undertaking upon which this country would have to embark would be the construction of the Georgian bay ship canal. Nothing has transpired, except perhaps the desire of certain groups to secure possession of these water-powers, which should be allowed to interfere with the granting of this charter and the undertaking and completion of a great national project.

On Mr. Ross (Kingston) and Mr. Heaps rising to speak at the same moment:

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Kingston. I wish to state out of courtesy to the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), that I have before me a long list of speakers and that I am following the old rule of alternating between the speakers of different parties or groups in the House.

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston City): At the outset let me assure the last speaker, the good people of northern Ontario, and all others who are interested in the Georgian bay canal, that I for one have no objection to its construction. So far as I am concerned I am in great sympathy with all my hon. friend has said concerning new or northern Ontario. We all recognise the vast resources of that great country, and we in the older parts of the province would be the last people in the world to place any obstacle in the way of its development.

One would be very foolish at this stage of our civilization to deny the importance of canalization, or to deny that water-borne transportation is not the cheapest means of transportation at the present day. All the essential factors have demonstrated the truth of that proposition. Therefore I am interested in schemes of canalization in this country, but I am also interested in seeing that the development shall proceed along proper lines.

In regard to the present scheme, I wish to say that there are three principal questions to be discussed: first, the attitude of the government or the state towards canalization: second, the importance of the power factor: third, the legal aspect of the case. The first and very important question, that of the attitude of the government towards the canalization of any or all sections of the country is an interesting one. History has proven that very rarely has any country handed over to private corporations or private companies the development of its canal system. Canal systems existed in the days of the Pharaohs and even before that time. Ever since 7000 B.C. we have evidence of the existence of canal systems. There was the canal of Babylon, built about 1700 B.C. and renewed by Nebuchadnezzar in 600 B.C. The present Suez canal had a predecessor which lasted from 600 B.C. down to 760 A.D The Romans built canals and I want to point out the fact that all ancient systems of canals were state built and state maintained. Coming down now to European systems we find that the Dutch built the great Amsterdam canal, in fact the whole of Holland is a network of canals comprising some 2,408 miles. These canals are all built and maintained by the state and no tolls are collected. Belgium, perhaps, has reached the highest state of perfection in canal development. She has seven or eight very important canals with a total length of 1,345 miles. All these canals are state owned and state maintained and are free of tolls. France has 3,030 miles of canals of which 2,860 are state owned and free of all tolls. In fact no tolls have been collected in that country since 1888. Germany has had a canal system since 1700. She has connected all her commercially stategic points by canals, but the fact is important that they have been built by the state and are free of tolls to the public. It is well known that German industrial life owes its great importance and development to the splendid system of canalization that exists in that country, and yet, not satisfied with that, Germany has developed a splendid system of canals for purely military purposes.

Russia under Peter the Great started her canal system connecting St. Petersburg with the Caspian sea, with the Artic sea, and in all cases these canals are state-owned, state-maintained and free from tolls. Austria-Hungary had 1,700 miles of a state-owned canal system. Going through this historical section of canal development we come to Great Britain and we find she is the only country with privately-owned canals. The railways own one-third of her canal systems. There is this significant fact that Great Britain was not so intensely interested as other countries were in building canals. The Thames and the Severn have a great watershed and this supply of water gave these rivers freer means of navigation than we find in other countries. As a matter of fact canals built by Great Britain have not done so much towards developing industrial life as have canals in other countries. The greatest canal in Great Britain is the Manchester ship canal and it really had its beginning in a privately-owned canal. Its beginning was due to the fact that the Duke of Bridgewater wanted to connect his collieries with Manchester, and from that beginning the local people became interested in building a ship canal with the idea of connecting Manchester with the coast, and avoiding the obstructions at Liverpool, dues and so on. It was due more to the interest of those local people, large interests around Manchester, Salford and other big cities in that district, that this canal has been the success it has. But the mere fact that many of these canals were undertaken by private companies is no argument for privately-owned canals, the private interests were driven to construct them, but many fell into the possession of the railway companies who put on such high tolls that the canal development and water transportation could not be made use of, and that the railroads received a greater amount of transportation than the canals, offsets any argument in this case in favour of the construction of canals by privately-owned companies.

This brings us from Europe to the United States, and their experience is very interesting. Shortly after the war of the American Revolution there arose a movement to connect New York with the great lakes. That began when two private companies were formed, one to build a canal to connect with lake Champlain and the other to build a canal to connect with lake Erie. The company that was to build a canal to connect with lake Champlain failed. The other company built about six miles of internal canals and that was as far as it went until a commission, with Governor Clinton at its head, was appointed by the state of New York. This commission kept at work for many years until finally the Erie canal was built from Buffalo to New York. We are told that on the opening of that canal a great celebration was held over the arrival at New York of the first boat from Buffalo. A famous picture called the Marriage of Waters has been painted of that event. Two bottles of water were taken from lake Erie and one was emptied into the Atlantic at Sandy Hook. At that celebration some very enthusiastic United States citizen conceived the idea of collecting water from rivers and navigable streams all over the world and these were also brought there and emptied. What I want to point out in connection with this historical section is the fact that in nearly all these cases the canals were built by the state, state-owned, state-maintained and free from tolls. So far as I know and can read, the only privately-owned ones in America have been failures. The Delaware and Hudson Company in the early days built a canal 108 miles long, but that canal has gone into the scrap heap. Those canals that have remained, that have been in any way a success, have been state-owned, state- maintained and free from tolls.

Let us judge the application for this charter by that historical fact. This is a company which wants to build a canal which, if built, will no doubt be of great benefit to this country, will help to develop it, will help in transportation in every way; but this company is going back to the old system of tolls, and I can assure the House that this system, in competition with railway transportation, will be a failure just as the canals about Liverpool have been.

Mr. McPHERSON: Does the hon. member know of any canal in the United States, England, Belgium or Germany that was developing power at the same time?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I do not know. I have divided my remarks into three subjects and I am coming to the subject of power. Canalization is the important factor. If canalization is not an important factor, then power is the only factor and I will deal with that as my second subject. I want to point out that if this canal is built to be used for transportation purposes and tolls are charged, it will be a failure.

I come to the second point which is that of power. I have been asked: Do I know of any canal that has been built combining power development with water transportation? I say no and I do not know where there ever was such a situation as will arise in this case. I do not think the power development on this Georgian bay canal will enable the canal to be completed. It was pointed out in this House to-day that the scheme in the past was a failure because government guarantees were not behind it. What is behind this is the power scheme, the question of deriving revenue from the power development, and before I am through with this second section I want to show that this will also hardly be possible.

Coming to the second factor in the granting of this charter, the development of power: This is a very pertinent question to the province of Ontario. It affects the people and the municipalities of Ontario in a very peculiar way. About the year 1900 the people of Ontario were seized with the great possibilities of the development of their industrial life. We had, as the last speaker said, great natural resources in mining, forestry and agriculture, but the one drawback to the development of these was the fuel situation. We felt that we were prevented from attaining our ideal through want of fuel. Looking for a solution of this difficulty, the citizens in various parts of the provinces began to study the possibilities of power on our many rivers, principally on the Niagara river. The possible replacement of power for fuel which we had to bring into this country appealed very strongly to the citizens of Toronto. I am in perfect accord with the last speaker that if by this means we can bring in fuel, then we are all willing to assist in the best possible way to supply it. From 1900 events quickly followed in the development of the scheme of power to replace fuel. In 1900 a committee of the Toronto board of trade made a report on the subject of hydro-electric power from the Niagara river. The large towns and cities, even the rural municipalities, quickly became imbued with the desire to reach some solution of the question and to bring about an increase in power. The matter became the subject of meetings, the subject of press comments and reference on the hustings, but no means of action was possible. No matter how much these citizens of Ontario would talk on this question, or how much it was discussed in the public press, there was no way of taking action to institute such a scheme, until in 1903 the legislature of Ontario passed an act providing means for the appointment of a commission to interest itself in the scheme and to harmonize the different ideas of the municipalities. The plan was to investigate the question of supply and distribution of hydro-electric power, and such municipalities as desired could form themselves into groups and take the matter up. The first commission was formed by the municipalities of Toronto, London, Brantford, Stratford, Woodstock, Ingersoll and Guelph, known as the Ontario Power Commission. Its report gave data on the resources of power from coal, gas, oil and water. In 1906 this report was published, but before the information it contained became very generally known throughout the province, action had already been taken, because in that same year, 1906, the legislature of Ontario passed an act for the creation of the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario. At first this commission was to receive appeals and requests from the different municipalities, but it soon became no longer a board of harmony. The demand became so great that it became a board of go-getters of power of Ontario. It became a central body representative of the municipality and acting on their behalf. In 1908 this commission made its first purchase of power—100,000 horse-power—from the Ontario Power Company of Niagara. The commission then began its first active work in the transmission of this power, and I would like now to refer to the efforts of the commission, first to solve the fuel problem, second to make available a supply of power, and third to transmit that power to the people of Ontario.

In 1910 the company started to distribute this power, having completed its transmission line, and still the demand grew. In 1915 that 100,000 horse-power was exhausted. In 1915 and 1916 it had to purchase an additional supply of 50,000 horse-power from the Ontario Power Company, and 25,000 horse-power from the Toronto Power Company. A new stage in its growth was now reached, when the supply from the privately owned companies failed or became exhausted. In 1917 the hydro-electric commission had to purchase the Ontario Power company, and in 1919 it increased the output from 160,000 horse-power to 200,000 horse-power. In 1920 the commission purchased the Toronto Power Company with its output of 125,000 horse-power. And so, with lightning speed, this commission has gone on from growth to growth, and almost every morning, in the words of a famous British statesman, one had to inquire what new development had taken place. Its last and greatest development, when all power from privately owned companies and from all possible rivers which were open to them were exhausted, was the Queenston-Chippawa proposition, which has developed 600,000 horse-power on the Niagara river. This was a scheme practically of turning a river and making it run in the opposite direction; because our allowance of power on the Niagara was exhausted. In addition to this, the commission has generated power on the Severn, at Wasdell's and the Eugenia falls and practically surrounded two-thirds of this province with its power scheme. In addition to that, they have taken all the power they could gather from privately owned plants on the Ottawa, the Rideau, in the Muskoka district, the St. Lawrence, and the Nipissing, and distributed it to the municipalities.

[Mr. A. E. Ross.]

I now wish to give a few figures to further show the usefulness and service of this great commission. In 1910 the commission distributed 1,000 horse-power to a number of municipalities in Ontario. In 1914 they had supplied 77,000 horse-power, in 1920, 356,000 horse-power, and in 1923, 650,000 horse-power, and to-day it supplies to the people of Ontario, 900,000 horse-power. The demand has come from factories, from farms, for lighting for the streets, for the roadways, from all parts and all sections of this country. The transmission line of this commission extends over 3,000 miles. The distribution of power varies from one mile to 250 miles, the greatest distance of distribution which is accomplished by the transmission of Niagara power to the city of Windsor. The commission is under contract to develop power at cost to the municipalities, which in turn distribute to its citizens at cost. In this way the hydro-electric commission is supplying 226 municipalities in the province of Ontario. The total assets of the commission amout to $250,000,000, and it supplies a population of 1,000,000. In the face of these facts, is there any reason for the granting of a charter to a private company for the development of power on the Georgian bay canal? My argument is this: That the citizens of Ontario have taken upon themselves the development of this great hydro-electric power, its assets are all owned by the municipalities and the province of Ontario; that it was undertaken at a time when there was a great need, a great hunger for power in this province; that at this very day that hunger has not been satisfied by any means, and that the commission is ready to develop on the Ottawa, on the St. Lawrence or on any other river where power is available if it is not checked and obstructed by legislation of this kind. Undoubtedly, by extending this charter the Dominion government would be doing a grave injustice to the people of Ontario and their public-owned hydro-electric undertaking.

The province of Ontario or the province of Quebec must supply the demand for power which would be available but for this charter, and consequently by renewing it we are virtually enabling a private company to enter into competition with or obstruct a people-owned scheme of hydro-electric power. It has been suggested to-day that Ontario and Quebec could not coöperate in this matter because while Ontario has developed a public-owned power system, the sister province has encouraged privately-owned projects for the generation of power. I cannot see that this of itself is any serious objection. I have no doubt that the two provinces can reach a common agreement for the development of the power on the Ottawa river. Certainly there is not the slightest excuse for leaving this development in the hands of a private company that in the course of 33 years has made no attempt to cater to the transportation needs of the people of Ontario and Quebec. Had this company made any effort to serve the people along this line there might be some reason for renewing the charter. The ostensible purpose of the charter is to build a canal, but nothing having been done in this direction since the granting of the charter, it is not unreasonable to assume that the promoters of the bill are more concerned now with the power features of the project. Once the charter is renewed they will be placed in a position to compete with a publicly-owned system in which the people of Ontario have invested two hundred and fifty million dollars, and which is serving over a million of the population of the province with light and power. Obviously it would be most unfair to submit that undertaking to such obstruction.

I have tried to show that canal development of the world has been altogether along the lines of state ownership. This of itself is a further argument against granting a renewal of the charter rights of the company to construct a canal, which undoubtedly would in any event be merely incidental to the development of power along the course of the canal, and, as I have already said, this would be grossly unfair to the Hydro Electric Commission of Ontario, which is ready and willing to still further serve the needs of the people in the way of power and light. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I submit that it would be a great mistake to put that publicly-owned scheme in competition with a private company by granting a renewal of this charter.

I think it will be generally agreed that in the past we have made mistakes in our transportation undertakings, both water and rail, and in the development of our harbours and rivers. I think the day is at hand when the government should appoint a permanent board of engineers to survey the whole dominion and report from time to time as to what harbours and rivers should be developed, and what canals should be built in the public interest. In a word, we should lay down a definite policy in dealing with our canals, railways, harbours and rivers, so that a system economical and efficient might be built up. We all know that the United States made many mistakes in canal building. I need only refer to one with which we are all more or less familiar—the Erie canal. On its completion there came demands for lateral and other canals, many of which were not needed, and, although they were undertaken, most of them became failures. We do not want to repeat our neighbour's mistakes. In support of my proposal that the government should appoint a board of engineers to deal with our canal and cognate problems, I may point to the board constituted by the government to report on the feasibility of the deepening of the St. Lawrence river. The board that I suggest the government should appoint could deal with our system of canals, and incidentally they could investigate the water-powers available in connection with any canalization projects, and report their findings to the government, which in turn, of course, would place them on the table of the House for the information of members.

I think we are at a stage of our national development that would warrant perhaps further canalization, but lest we repeat our Welland canal mistake, I think we should be guided by expert advice. I should like to have some report from a strong board of engineers on the feasibility of this canal and whether within say, three, six or nine years it will be constructed and in operation. I know no other country except China that has waited so long for a canal. China started a canal to connect her capital with the coast, but it was not completed for 600 years. If we are to trust to the company which is asking for a renewal of this charter, I fear even the Chinese record will be broken. Before the charter is renewed the government should come to the House and say, "We are satisfied and will take the responsibility of recommending its renewal."

Not being a lawyer, I shall not deal with the legal question, but the government must assume the responsibility of assuring this House that they are ready to meet the case of the province of Ontario. Very strong statements have been made by Premier Ferguson that provincial power rights in the Ottawa river will be upheld in the courts. Therefore, hon. members of this House who come from all over the dominion look to the government for advice. The government should be our advisers as to how we should vote—or at least, they should give us some advice.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear!

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I am waiting to see if the government will give us any advice.

Mr. MALCOLM: Will you take it?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): In the past their advice has been ninety per cent wrong, but in this instance they might perhaps be correct, and I would be able to support them. They certainly should make an effort to give us advice, or should seek some sound legal opinion, to guide members from all parts of the Dominion in their votes on this very important question.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): I trust the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) will not charge me with indulging in reprehensible tactics if I venture to discuss the subject before the House. I am a comparatively new member and I still have a great deal to learn with respect to matters of rule and procedure, but it seems to me a somewhat unusual situation to have such an important measure as this introduced into this House, a measure involving so many varied interests, without receiving any information from the sponsor of the bill as to what its purpose is. I had hoped when the bill was introduced by the senior hon. member for Ottawa that we might have been given some information as to what is contained in the measure itself. Personally, not being a member of the legal profession, I find it very difficult indeed to fathom the provisions of the bill as presented to the House. It has been contended by those in favour of the bill—as a matter of fact, so far, only one hon. member has spoken in support of it—that if it passes the House the people of northern Ontario will have the canal built for them forthwith. I presume that if I had been a member of this House thirty years ago, listening to the original promoters of this undertaking, I should have heard them say exactly the same thing as was said this afternoon by the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Lapierre). That is always the view put forward in this House by promoters seeking charters, and I for one am opposed to this parliament giving charters of this kind, particularly where so much is involved as is the case in the bill now before us. It is almost a third of a century since the charter was originally granted, and on thirteen occasions it has been renewed. I cannot therefore see the force of the argument advanced by the sponsor of the bill for British fair play in allowing the bill to go before the special committee previous to its discussion in this House. It seems to me that the promotors have had a good deal of British fair play in having this charter renewed thirteen or fourteen times, and now that they come to the House for another renewal I for one do not feel disposed to grant it unless good reasons can be advanced for so doing. So far we have had no reasons at all, except such as were given this afternoon in the address of the hon. member for Nipissing, an address which can be answered in a very few moments. That hon. gentleman dealt almost exclusively with the construction of the canal. If these people who are seeking a renewal of the charter would confine the charter solely to the building of the Georgian bay canal, I do not think they would experience that difficulty in getting the bill through the House which they are having at the present time, notwithstanding the fact that there are many members of this House who are committed to the principle of having canals owned and operated by the government rather than by private interests. I think it is almost too late in the day for people to ask this House to give them the right to levy tolls on ships which are to pass through canals built in this Dominion. Allowing private companies to develop such public utilities is entirely contrary to the past policy of governments of whatever party they may be composed. To me, however, the main principle involved in this bill, and which I feel bound to oppose, is the granting to a private corporation the right to own and control almost one and a quarter million horse-power on the Ottawa river. When the charter was originally granted there was no idea then of the value of electrical energy, but since then a tremendous development in this direction has taken place. Science has made enormous strides, so that what was impossible only five or ten years ago is practicable to-day. For instance, there was a time when long distance transmission as we now have it was almost impossible. To-day we transmit electrical energy over a distance of 100 miles with comparatively little loss in energy. I find in to-day's newspaper a small item which in my opinion has considerable significance in relation to this particular charter. I believe that these falls are situated about 300 miles from the large centres of population in Ontario. At present it would be almost impossible from an engineering standpoint to transmit that electrical energy over that distance, but, as I say, science is making rapid progress, and I myself expect to see in the next few years such an evolution in electrical engineering as will render possible the transmission of power from Georgian bay to the city of Toronto. In this morning's Ottawa Citizen I find this despatch by the Canadian Press:

Toronto, Ont. March 5.—A New York despatch to the Mail and Empire says: A new invention which makes possible the economical transmission of power from distant waterfalls and will soon permit scattered districts and farms, almost anywhere in the country to be supplied with power, was announced to-day by W. S. Rugg, vice-president in charge of engineering of the Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Company. Mr. Rugg said the invention by Frank G. Baum, hydro-electrical engineer, of San Francisco, was a complete solution of the problem of economical transmission of power over long distances.

With the imminent solution of the problem of transmitting electrical energy over long distances one can visualize the tremendous importance of the water-powers on the Ottawa river, when there is a million and a quarter horse-power there to be developed. Personally I am strongly opposed to this bill, particularly now when I find that the people of Ontario are themselves prepared to proceed with the development of this horse-power if they have an opportunity of doing so.

It seems to me rather strange that there should be hon. gentlemen in this House from the province of Ontario who would rather trust their destinies to people who, on thirteen or fourteen different occasions, have failed them, than to the provincial government who have built and developed one of the finest hydro-electric enterprises to be found anywhere in the universe. If there is in Ontario to-day approximately 600,000 horse-power available for development, the first people who should have an opportunity of using that horse-power are the people of Ontario themselves, and this House of Commons at least should do nothing in this matter before the people of the province have been consulted.

This morning, along with other members, I received a circular from the Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company in which I was rather interested. Unlike many other hon. members, I had no lobbyists here to see me on this particular question and when I received the circular I was interested to know what they had to say about the development of the potential horse-power on the Ottawa river. Yet in a three-page circular sent out by the company not a word is said about this power development; the circular is confined to the canal. It is somewhat strange that they should so completely ignore the power aspect of this enterprise and emphasize the future activities of the canal. It is my candid opinion that even if the charter is granted the people of northern Ontario will never have a canal if they depend on this company. There is a question, however, as to whether they are going to get something if the charter is not granted and the power rights are handed over to the people of Ontario. Personally I believe the Dominion government to be fairly well committed on this point, and in that connection I wish to read one or two extracts from Hansard from a debate which took place last year. The House will remember that last session the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) moved a resolution which read as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this House, measures should be taken to regain for the use of the people the coal mines and water-powers which are now being exploited in the interest of private corporations rather than for the needs of the people.

The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) was very sympathetic to this resolution and so expressed himself in the following words:

> The provincial governments, with the exception of the three prairie provinces, own and control their forest wealth. In my attempt to get uniformity of action I found a great deal of suspicion abroad in the minds of the provincial authorities, and I admit that the feeling is sometimes too prevalent that there is a desire on the part of the federal authorities to interfere with provincial rights.

The same thing would also apply to power rights, and the minister said further:

> One of the first difficulties is that under the Act of Confederation those public utilities which are mentioned in the resolution remain under the control of the provincial government.

If the speech of the hon. gentleman is read through several references will be found to show that the control and practically the ownership of these water rights are absolutely under the jurisdiction of the provinces. Consequently when the question of the development of this water-power is considered, I do not think this House has the absolute right to give away something which is admitted by many to be entirely within the jurisdiction of the provinces.

To go a point further, I find that in Ontario the Hydro Electric Commission has developed approximately 800,000 horse-power at an approximate cost of $240,000,000, and I think that when the people of Ontario have shown so much initiative in this development and when they have spent so much money in developing this tremendous asset, in giving lower rates than can be obtained in any other part of the continent, this House should not lightly pass a bill giving a private company the right to develop almost an equal quantity of electrical energy. There is admittedly a shortage of power in Ontario; the provincial government wants more power developed. If we look at the record of the speeches made when a resolution dealing with the shortage of power in Ontario was introduced by the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) and seconded by Mr. Maclean, who was then a member of the House, we will find further references by ministers of the crown to the right of Ontario to control and own whatever water-power may be developed in the province.

I think we should have a pronouncement on this question by the government; I think the matter too important to put the responsibility on one private member. In view of their past statements I do not think the government should altogether leave the responsibility to the House; I think they should take a stand on this question and let us know their decision. When the people of the largest province in Canada are applying themselves to the development of their water-powers, with all political parties united, I do not think this parliament can honestly give those powers away to any private corporation. Therefore I think the government should say where they stand on this question, and I hope they are in favour of giving to the people of Ontario that which belongs to them.

In the development of some of its public-owned utilities Canada has one of its greatest assets. Just the other day in this House the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Bell), in speaking on the budget, made a most pathetic plea on behalf of a private corporation, the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company, and at this juncture I would like to say a few words in connection with what was then said. His plea was that this poor company which is conferring such vast benefits upon the people of Montreal—and which incidentally earns such huge dividends—should be relieved of the payment of income tax amounting to approximately $750,000 yearly. In the remarks of the hon. member we find the difference between those who favour public ownership and those who believe in private ownership. The hon. member who spoke for the company probably thought the company could pay larger dividends if this income tax were not paid, as in the case of a publicly owned utility. We find that in Ontario they give a rate as low as can be found in the world, and this is in my opinion one of the greatest assets to our manufacturers. In Ontario I believe electrical energy can be bought for industrial purposes at three-quarters of a cent per kilowatt hour, while in the city of Winnipeg under our municipally-owned hydro-electric system electrical energy is sold for industrial purposes for as little as two-fifths of a cent per kilowatt hour. That is almost below the cost of production, but with the large off-peak load which exists there, we have been able to make that tremendous concession to consumers of large blocks of electrical energy. The other night the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) stated that the electrical heating of our homes would soon become possible through the further development of electrical energy. He was not looking very far ahead, because I can tell the House that at the present time electric heating is being done in the city of Winnipeg to a very large extent. I desire to mention these facts, Mr. Speaker, because it shows the great potential value of the power development with which the House is dealing at present. In Winnipeg we have a central heating system owned and controlled by the city, which was put in as an adjunct to a stand-by plant which is necessary to our hydro-electric system. During certain months of the year this central heating system does not consume one ounce of coal; the off-peak electric power is developed into steam through electrically heated boilers and by a high pressure system the steam is put through the mains and the larger portion of the business section of Winnipeg is heated in that way. During probably two or three months of the year, therefore, no coal at all is used to heat the central business portion of Winnipeg. Consequently the statement made here by the hon. member for Argenteuil that this is something not likely to happen in the years to come is met by the assertion that it is an accomplished fact so far as one city on this continent is concerned, and the example of that city will probably be copied by others. I am satisfied that before very long Toronto will establish a stand-by plant in connection with its own hydro-electric system, and when it does there is nothing more economical it can do than to combine that stand-by plant with a central heating system. We shall probably see in the near future a large portion of the central part of Toronto heated by the off-peak load of its hydro-electric system the same as is done in the city of Winnipeg.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Speaker, just before recess I was dealing with a question that was raised by the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) who had visualized the utilization of electrical energy for heating purposes. I had dealt for a few moments with the fact that in the city of Winnipeg that vision had already become a reality, and that we were now using electrical energy for the development of heat. During the recess I was asked by one or two hon. members to deal for a few moments longer with that particular matter, and without taking up too much of the time of the House, I wish, in order to satisfy the request made by the hon. gentlemen, to give a few more details in regard to that particular aspect.

In the development of any hydro-electric enterprise there is bound to be a large off-peak load which is like a by-product and is bound to go to waste. I do not think in the Dominion of Canada the average consumption over a twenty-four-hour period exceeds fifty per cent of the total quantity of electrical energy generated, the result being that there is a fifty per cent off-peak load that goes almost entirely to waste. It has always been a problem with electrical engineers how to utilize that waste in hydro-electric development, and in the city of Winnipeg we have come as close as any other city to the utilization of that off-peak load or the by-product of hydro-electric development.

That has been effected in this way. In Winnipeg we were bound by circumstances to erect a stand-by plant for our hydro-electric system. That stand-by plant became necessary, as I believe it will become necessary in all large centres where large quantities of electrical energy are used, owing to the fact that at certain periods of the year cyclonic storms would blow down the transmission lines or there would be a stoppage from other causes, with the result that there would be very little or no hydro-electric energy obtainable in the city to carry on essential public utilities and works in factories such as packing plants and so forth. Hospitals would probably be without electrical energy; elevators in hospitals would be unable to run and so on, and the commercial life of the city would be completely demoralized for the time being. With the creation of a stand-by or auxiliary plant, as some people call it, we are able to give to a large section of the users of hydro-electric energy in Winnipeg a guaranteed twenty-four-hour continuous service.

The erection of such a stand-by plant involves a very large capital outlay as well as a large annual outlay for upkeep. One of the methods used to keep down that expenditure was the creation of a joint utility by combining with the stand-by plant a central heating system whereby the boilers, which are kept in readiness to generate electricity in case of emergency, can be utilized for heating purposes. What we do now is to generate heat through these boilers in the winter time; but in addition to that we have certain electric boilers, which are made in Canada, which were made by Canadian engineers, and the off-peak power which is on tap for many months in the year and for many hours each day finds its way into these electrical boilers. These boilers, which have a capacity of 750 horse-power and are not much larger than one of the desks in this chamber, generate steam which is sold in exactly the same way as steam that is produced by the use of coal. That brings in a large revenue to the city by using hydro-electric energy which otherwise would go to waste.

We have partly solved another problem which I believe is seeking solution in many other parts of the Dominion. More than one hundred of the largest buildings in the centre of Winnipeg are now supplied with heat from a central heating plant, and in the milder winter weather such as we have at the present time and such as they had in Winnipeg during February, not one ounce of coal is used for the creation of heat. The result is that in months where in other cities they have vast volumes of smoke coming out of their chimneys, Winnipeg is almost a smokeless city so that the atmosphere there possesses advantages that are not possessed by other cities. Moreover users of electrical energy in Winnipeg who find it essential to have a twenty-four-hour continuous service receive that by the creation of the stand-by plant which was put into operation, I believe, in 1924. I have endeavoured to make these one or two points clear for the bnefit of hon. members who asked me the question during the recess; otherwise, I had no intention of dealing again with the matter.

Coming back to the direct question of the bill before the House, another objection I have to it is the fact that if the charter is granted to the people who are seeking it there will be established in Ontario something which I believe will not be to the advantage of that province. It would mean for the province a dual system of private ownership and public ownership. Whilst I know that many hon. members will say that competition is a good thing, I believe in monopolies in certain things. I think the control of electric energy should be a monopoly and already in Ontario, the hydro-electric commission have a monopoly practically of this service which they give to the people. I think it would therefore be unfair of parliament to establish another system to enter into competition to a certain extent with the already publicly-owned utility of the province of Ontario. I have no doubt in my own mind that such a corporation should not come into competition, although I have an idea that if the power were granted to them they might hold up this charter and try to bargain with someone who would give them a good price for it. What is likely to be the result if a charter is granted? I understand that they could tap a region already not tapped by the Ontario Hydro Electric Commission. If they put into operation a hydro-electric system in the province, and then started supplying the people of those areas with electric light and power, I am satisfied that they would have to charge a much larger price than is charged to the people who use the energy of the publicly-owned utility of Ontario.

The hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Lapierre), when speaking this afternoon, said the canal system would have to be carried by profits of the power operation. I noted that statement when he made it, and I think what he meant was that the promoters of the bill would charge the users of electric energy in the area they would serve, a much larger price than they would ordinarily charge, and would be able to put the canal system into operation by the profits they would make out of the hydro-electric system. I think, Mr. Speaker, that is a very false position for any one in this House to take. There is no canal system in this country which is now being paid for by any auxiliary company. There are no canal tolls in effect at the present time, and it would be a mistake for us to give a company the right, as we would be doing under this charter, to charge more for electric light and power in order that it might be able to subsidize a canal system which it has in contemplation.

Discussing the question of rates brings me again to the point raised by the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Bell) the other night when he was speaking about rates. I think I asked a question in reference to the rates as between a privately-owned corporation and a publicly-owned utility, and he was good enough to reply by quoting from the annual statement of the company in which they said that the average retail rate in the city of Montreal was three and a half cents a kilowatt hour. I think that statement will be found in Hansard. If we take the rate charged in other cities where they have hydro-electric enterprises under public ownership, we see quite a difference. The average retail rate charged in the city of Winnipeg, with which I am familiar, would not be more than two cents a kilowatt hour. Making all allowances, I think the rates charged in Montreal are fully fifty per cent higher than those charged in Winnipeg. I believe, without having before me the actual facts, that the same ratio would apply to Toronto and other large cities. In that same connection, the hon. member was urging that the company known as the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company should be relieved of its annual income tax payment, amounting to slightly over three quarters of a million dollars; that it was an injustice to the company, and that they ought to be relieved of the payment, on the ground that a publicly-owned utility is not required to pay income tax to the national exchequer. The people of the province of Quebec have a simple way of equalizing matters; all they have to do is to own the utilities, as they do in Ontario; then they will have no tax to pay. That is one way of overcoming the difficulty, if they wish to do it. I do not think they should penalize a public utility because in Quebec they have private ownership. In this particular regard I want to quote a very brief synopsis of the statement made in the annual report of the company. I am quoting from the Financial Times of January 28th, and hon. members will see in what poor circumstances this particular company is. The report says:

> Gross revenue from operations for the year 1926, is $18,907,382, compared with $18,346,806 for the year 1925, and $17,394,091 for the year 1924. A favorable feature is a reduction in operating expenses and taxes during the year.

My hon. friend from St. Antoine is not satisfied with the ordinary tax reduction, but he is willing to give them about three-quarters of a million in addition.

> The former being down at $7,109,918 from $7,349,243, and the latter down at $1,213,028 from $1,274,655, while appropriation for depreciation is up at $1,890,738 from $1,834,880.

But that is not all. I want to give the House a few more figures.

> Net revenue shows a gain of over $800,000, at $8,693,688 as compared with $7,890,026. Respecting the issue during the year of $30,000,000 of bonds is an increase in fixed charges to $1,611,121 from $1,213,650.

And I think we know what these figures are. They are a melon cut for the shareholders.

> Leaving net earnings available for dividends on the 2,041,837 shares of capital stock outstanding at $7,082,567, or the equivalent of $3.47 a share; this compares with net earnings of $6,676,376 for the year 1925, equal to 10.32 per cent. (or $3.44 per share figured on the basis of the recent 3 for 1 split).

I think we all have an idea what is meant by the three for one split, and this corporation split their shares three for one.

> Dividends absorbed the sum of $5,135,041 as compared with $5,119,091 in 1925, and surplus for the year at $1,869,482, compares with $1,537,285.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a public-owned utility does not publish balance sheets of this character, it does not split up shares three to one. Instead of paying cash dividends out of surpluses, the public-owned utility gives its customers reduced rates and better service. Therefore the people of Toronto and Winnipeg and other large centres where these publicly-owned utilities are operating get the benefit of rates which are about fifty per cent lower than those prevailing in, say, Montreal, and probably in other cities throughout the province of Quebec. But the communities where public-owned utilities are operating have a further advantage. Probably there is not a city on the North American continent where on the basis of population as much electricity is used as in Winnipeg. There we try to bring it into the homes of all the people. We try to make the lot of the housewife easier, and in the average household in Winnipeg you will find an electric stove and other equipment, all of which lightens the work of the housewife and improves the conditions of the home. I can say of my own knowledge that private ownership never displayed the initiative that is so conspicuous under public ownership in the city of Winnipeg.

I have another objection to the bill. As a layman, I take it that the bill gives to the company a perpetual franchise. I believe there is a clause somewhere, perhaps in the old bill, which gives to the government the right of expropriation. I have some idea of what expropriation proceedings are, and I can understand how much a private corporation would demand for surrendering a perpetual franchise; the amount required would be staggering. So I cannot for the life of me see why we should give to a private corporation these valuable privileges and at a subsequent period buy them back for millions and millions of dollars. Undoubtedly the safest course will be to see that the promoters do not get a renewal of this franchise, and thus save ourselves the expense of expropriating their franchise at a later period. But I am asked by those who are sponsoring this bill, "Why not send it to the committee and discuss it there?" I do not see the reasonableness of myself and others who are opposed to the bill being required to go before the committee with our objections. I believe it is the safer policy to express my opinion now on the floor of the house and show where I stand, rather than wait until the bill comes back from the committee after having received its second reading.

In dealing with this question I think we ought to take into consideration, Sir, the fact that the legislature of Ontario is to-day discussing this identical question and, according to newspapers, a resolution is to be framed in such a way as to meet the wishes of all parties there—the conservative party, the liberal party, the progressive party and the labour party. They will all unite on a resolution asking this parliament to preserve the rights which belong to the province. In view of this we ought to pause a long time before we do anything which would in any way infringe on the rights of Ontario and give to a private corporation something which really belongs to the people of that province.

It has been argued by those who are promoting this bill that the province of Quebec may give the water-powers on the Ottawa river over to private ownership for development. Well, if the government of Quebec favours private ownership development, that is the business of the people of that province. On the other hand, if the people of Ontario want to develop their share of these water-powers under public ownership, then they ought to be given the opportunity of doing so as part of their hydro-electric system. I believe that within the Liberal party there are quite a number of members who are in favour of the principle of public ownership, particularly those from western Canada. It is only quite recently that at a convention the Liberal party in Manitoba went on record as being in favour of the public ownership and operation of water-powers. I hope the Liberal members representing Manitoba in this house will follow the lead of the provincial party convention and help to uphold the principle of public ownership of utilities not only in Manitoba but in Ontario, for after all what is good in the one province is good in the other. I oppose this bill mainly on the ground that it is a complete violation of the principles of public ownership; further, I oppose it because I believe that the people of Ontario are anxious to retain these water-powers in order to develop them in the interests of the whole province. I believe, Sir, that when the interests of a small group of capitalists—of men who are attempting to exploit the people of Ontario and their rights—are opposing the interests of the people of that province, I as a member of this house must decide in favour of the people of Ontario.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this House ought as far as possible to conserve the rights of the people in the development of their natural resources, and when we find that Ontario, through its premier, through the members of its legislature, and through other authorities in a position to speak, has expressed in most emphatic terms that it would be a great injustice to the people of Ontario if we renewed this franchise, it seems to me that the only course open to us is to see that this bill is not allowed to pass. It has been before the house on fourteen different occasions, and for thirty-three years its promoters have enjoyed the privileges and rights which they now seek to have renewed, but during all that time they have done nothing to carry out the project for which in the first instance the charter was ostensibly granted them. Therefore, Sir, I think we shall be acting in the best interests of the people of Ontario by rejecting this bill and thus allowing the provincial authorities to develop their own natural resources.

Mr. J. T. THORSON (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) and the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) that it is highly desirable to have a full discussion of this measure before referring it to the committee. There are two questions involved in the renewal: first, the construction of what is called the Georgian bay canal, and second, the development of the water-power along the route, including the development of the power on the Ottawa river. I do not propose to discuss the various legal questions involved, nor to discuss the respective powers of the Dominion of Canada, on the one hand, and the provinces of Ontario and Quebec on the other. We have courts properly constituted and competent to decide questions of this sort. If Canada has no jurisdiction in the matter of granting this charter, then, I submit, Canada can do itself no harm in granting it. Let us assume that Canada has the power to grant it and let us endeavour to discuss the question from the point of view of the principles involved.

The hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Lapierre) made it quite clear, in my opinion, that the canal in question cannot be economically constructed or operated except in conjunction with the development of the water-power along the canal route. The two, in my opinion, ought not to be separated. But we should be careful to draw this distinction. The canal cannot be operated as a commercial undertaking without at the same time developing the water-power; but, on the other hand, it is possible to develop the water-power without building the canal. I think that distinction ought to be clearly kept in mind.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps). It might be preferable that this whole scheme should be undertaken by the Dominion. I should be inclined personally to favour such a proposal, but I do not believe that such a scheme would be undertaken. Water-power, we are frequently told, is one of our greatest assets and it should be jealously guarded by the people of Canada. But it is not an asset until it is developed. If we have to choose, in the development of our water-power, between Dominion control and private enterprise, then I think the remarks of the hon. member for North Winnipeg are well founded. But if it is not probable—and it does not seem to be probable—that the Dominion will undertake this project as a public ownership scheme, then I think we shall have to choose between two methods of water-power development: on the one hand, a scheme of water-power development that will bring with it cheap transportation and, on the other, a scheme that brings no transportation facilities at all. That point, I think, is worthy of the consideration of the House, and, personally, I should much prefer a scheme of water-power development that carries with it the possibilities of cheap transportation to a scheme that offers no transportation facilities at all.

I quite agree with the various speakers who have pointed out that great care must be taken by the House in transferring water-power sites to private individuals or even to provinces. As I understand it, under the statutes that have been passed, relating to the Georgian bay canal, since the year 1894 when this company was incorporated, the rights of the public are very fully protected. I understand that the Dominion will have complete control over the construction and operation of the canal, over the levying of tolls, and over the sale of water-power. Furthermore, I understand that it is competent for the Dominion to take over the whole scheme at any time. I fully agree with other speakers that our great assets should be adequately safeguarded, and if there are not adequate safeguards provided in the present statutes relating to this corporation, then those safeguards should now be set up as a condition precedent to the renewal of the charter.

Those who are in favour of the Georgian bay canal project point out its many advantages not only to western Canada but to eastern and central Canada as well. The Georgian bay canal will establish a deep waterway from Montreal to Fort William and Port Arthur and it will be an all-Canadian deep waterway. Those who speak in its support say that it will industrialize the whole Ottawa valley. They say that it will increase the development of the port of Montreal and of all the cities on the lower St. Lawrence. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) in his speech this afternoon emphasized the value of the St. Lawrence waterway. So far as I can see, all advantages which he pointed out as accruing from the St. Lawrence waterway scheme will flow from the Georgian bay canal undertaking. In addition the friends of the Georgian bay canal point out that it will provide cheap transportation from the maritime provinces as far west as Fort William. They argue that it will provide cheap transportation for Nova Scotia coal to Ontario, that it will open up the mining area of the latter province, and that it will enable ore to be carried cheaply to Cape Breton where the coal supply is situated.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What guarantee is there that the canal will be completed for navigation purposes?

Mr. THORSON: I am unable to answer that question. Possibly those who sponsor the bill in this House will give some information in that regard. I am simply at this stage pointing out the advantages which those who favour the scheme suggest.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Is there not lacking in the bill itself that very guarantee that we should require, namely, that the canal will be completed?

Mr. THORSON: On that point I cannot speak with authority. If the scheme has the advantages indicated, then it deserves the careful consideration of the House. Western Canada is particularly interested in the Georgian bay canal project and in this connection I may refer again to the remarks of the member for North Winnipeg. He spoke of the rights of Ontario and of Quebec. As I mentioned at the outset, I do not propose to discuss the legal rights of these two provinces as opposed to the rights of the Dominion at large. If this work is constructed as a canal scheme it will be a national water highway and western Canada will have as much right to it as will the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. It will be a transportation scheme then as well as a power development scheme; to that extent western Canada will be as interested and as vitally concerned as will the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But would the hon. gentleman say by whom the cost of the navigation scheme would be paid?

Mr. THORSON: I think that has already been indicated; it would be paid for by private enterprise and by tolls and by the sale of water-power. I think that is clear.

Mr. LAPIERRE: It would not cost the nation one dollar.

Mr. McMILLAN: Under proper safeguards.

Mr. THORSON: Western Canada is vitally interested in transportation costs. I am told that the Georgian Bay canal route will be shorter than the present all-water route via lake Erie and the St. Lawrence river by almost 300 miles; I am told that it will be shorter in time by 37 hours, and that it will result in a reduction in freight rates of from three to five cents per bushel. Whether or not that is true, and whether or not the construction of the canal will bring those results I cannot say, but if those results are to be obtained western Canada is vitally interested in seeing that the project gets a fair chance. There is also another consideration. At present a great deal of our grain is diverted at Buffalo, and goes down the Erie canal to American ports. If the Georgian Bay canal scheme is a success all of that wheat will go direct through Canada, through the port of Montreal. I think that consideration should be kept in mind.

Those are the advantages which the friends of the proposal bring forward for the consideration of the House. Whether or not the canal will bring about the various results suggested is a different question, and I think the committee will be entitled to receive full particulars on that point. Western Canada, so far as her farmers are concerned, is very sure of her economic position. The farmer of western Canada knows very well that the price of what he has to sell, his exportable grain surplus and the like, is fixed by world conditions.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he can quote a single expression of opinion by anyone representing the farmers of western Canada in favour of this project?

Mr. THORSON: Just allow me to finish my argument, and then repeat your question if you think it in point at that time. The farmer of western Canada realizes that the sale price of what he has to sell cannot be changed by any act of this Dominion; no tariff legislation and no fiscal policy which may be adopted by Canada can increase by one farthing the price of what the farmer has to sell. Therefore the farmer appreciates that if he is to increase his very narrow margin of profit he must do so in one of two ways; he must either have the cost of what he has to buy reduced or he must have his transportation costs reduced; upon these two issues western Canada presents a united front. This Georgian bay canal project does suggest the possibility of a decrease in transportation costs.

We in western Canada fought for a long time for the restoration of our Crowsnest pass railway rates and were finally able to have those rates guaranteed by statute. We have strenuously opposed, and will continue to oppose, any effort to remove that statutory protection which we now possess. So I repeat that western Canada is vitally interested in any project giving promise of a reduction in transportation costs. Those who favour this proposal do suggest that there will be a material advantage to western Canada in the construction of this canal, and, if that is so, I think western Canada would be in favour of a thorough investigation of this proposed measure. I think I speak for a large portion of western Canada in urging that this measure be sent to committee in order that the most full and favourable consideration be given to it.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I would like to ask the hon. gentleman a question. Why is it that he now proposes to support the Georgian bay canal, which will become a competitor of the Hudson Bay railway?

Mr. THORSON: I do not think that question deserves an answer.

Mr. J. G. ROSS (Moose Jaw): In regard to the question asked by the last speaker, I would suggest that if there are other ways than the Georgian bay canal and the Hudson Bay railway by which we can reduce our transportation rates from central Canada to the ocean we want to know about them and to look into them. I agree with the last speaker that this bill should go to committee to be thoroughly discussed; it is of great interest to all of Canada, and particularly to western Canada. One of my hon. friends opposite asked what guarantee we have. I say we should send the bill to committee and put our guarantees in it there.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I was just asking, in view of the clauses of the bill itself, whether there was any guarantee that this work would be completed.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I do not know what guarantees there are in this bill, but when it goes to committee it can there be amended and have proper safeguards placed in it. If the provinces of Ontario and Quebec have certain rights in the water-powers of navigable streams in Canada, those rights should be safeguarded, but I believe that the advantage of any canalization of navigable streams in Canada shou'd be kept for the Dominion as a whole. My hon. friend has said that if the canal is built it will do certain things, and hon. gentlemen opposite ask, "Will they build the canal?" Well, when the bill goes into committee, insert your guarantees and safeguards and provide that if the canal is not built the charter becomes absolutely null and void. My friend has said that this charter has been before the House on fourteen different occasions. They have said that the canal could have been proceeded with. I say that the government of the Dominion never allowed the company to go ahead with the construction of the Georgian bay canal?

Mr. MANION: Why?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Because they never approved of the plans put in by the company, and those plans were put in years ago.

Mr. MANION: How many years ago?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I believe the first were filed in 1907. In the first place the charter was for a canal of nine feet. Then it was raised in succession to twelve feet, eighteen feet, twenty feet and twenty-two feet, and to-day they are asking for a canal of twenty-four feet. The last plans I believe are with the department but have not yet been o.k.'d by it. Therefore a company could not go ahead and construct the canal until its plans have been o.k.'d by the government. Now my hon. friend (Mr. Thorson) has said that some 300 miles will be cut off the voyage of a ship to Port Arthur and Fort William by the construction of this canal. I believe that is correct. And as freight rates are based to a great extent on the time it takes to carry freight from one point to the other, that fact would naturally make a large saving in the cost of transporting commodities from central or middle western Canada to the ocean ports.

In connection with this point may I read a paragraph from a report issued by the United States Department of Commerce, entitled Great Lakes to Ocean Waterways. The paragraph in question is to this effect:

> For vessel costs a 7,600-ton, dead weight, oil-burning, cargo vessel may be taken for illustrative purposes. The fixed charges and operating costs of such a vessel are approximately $700 a day.

Now if the construction of the Georgian bay canal will cut off thirty-six hours between Montreal and Fort William on the return trip that means 72 hours or three days, or $2,100 on a cargo ship of 7,000 tons, which saving in time will materially reduce the freight rates.

I believe that we should have a full discussion at the present stage of the bill, a full discussion in committee, and a full discussion after the bill gets back to the House, because if this canal is built it will mean a great deal to the whole of Canada. As my hon. friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion) said this afternoon there would be some eighteen states in the adjoining republic affected by it. The report from which I have quoted gives the names of those states, and as a matter of fact I believe there are more than eighteen of the central and western states in the country to the south affected. In going through the report referred to I found that taking thirty-four of the export commodities and thirty-four of the import commodities of the United States, and if there were a great lakes to ocean waterway large enough to accommodate ships of from six to seven thousand tons, forty-four per cent of the trade of the United States would go out that way, and twenty-five per cent of its imports would enter by the same route.

Mr. MANION: Does the report from which my hon. friend is quoting support the Georgian bay canal?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The report says absolutely nothing about it. It was prepared by a committee of gentlemen, most of whom were from the United States, with some representatives from Canada, but they were mainly interested in the St. Lawrence great waterways, or in the Hudson ship canal. As a matter of fact they would not be interested in seeing Canada build a Georgian bay canal at all, because if it were built and in operation, a great deal of the commerce of the United States would come through Canadian ports and Canadian territory, including as I have already said forty-four per cent of their exports. That surely would be a big thing for Canada. We hear our hon. friends opposite every once in a while saying that we are being bled white because our wheat goes through Buffalo. Now if it cost from two to three cents less to carry that grain through the Georgian bay canal than it would via Buffalo, what would happen? All Canadian grain would go through the Georgian bay canal and most of the American grain also. The effect would be to build up cities such as Montreal and Quebec, to build up cities that would compare with New York, Boston, and other United States ports, because they would benefit by the trade of some forty millions of people whereas to-day they are only enjoying the trade of from five to ten million people.

There is one thing in connection with this canal project. My hon. friends opposite are much exercised over the fact that a private corporation is seeking to build the Georgian bay canal.

Mr. MANION: No, we are exercised because they will not build it.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Well, provide proper safeguards, and if they will not build the canal take away from them the right to do so.

Mr. MANION: They have had thirty-three years to start it.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): But remember there is an alternative at the present time, and that I think is what hon. gentlemen opposite are more exercised over than anything else. It is that at the present time, and lapsing on the first of May as in the case of the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian bay canal charter, there is a lease of the Carillon power on the Ottawa river, not owned by the public but by a company known as the National Hydro-Electric. They are in possession of some horse-power to-day, and if the Georgian bay canal bill is killed then in all probability the National Hydro-Electric will put forward its claim for the use of power at the point referred to. I submit that all power schemes —no matter whether it be the Ottawa and Georgian bay canal or any other enterprise— on navigable rivers in this country should be brought before this House and considered carefully in committee. We should not do what was done a few months ago when the government of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen gave a lease to the National Hydro-Electric of the Carillon power for, I believe, a term of eighty years at a very small rental. If my information is not correct I should like to be corrected.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I think the hon. gentleman is somewhat mistaken as to that. There was an old lease for the development of power down there which was given some ten or fifteen years ago, but which was extended from time to time. An endeavour was made last summer to effect an arrangement between this company, the Hydro Electric of Ontario, and the government of Quebec with respect to this power. The only way in which we can ever hope to get that matter settled and have the power developed is by an arrangement between the two provinces and the Dominion.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): My understanding is, and I happen to have read the sessional papers which were laid on the table, that this lease was renewed for eighty years. When this government came back into power I understand they cancelled the lease but recognised the old lease up till the first of May this year. Personally I do not believe that this government or any other government should be allowed, by order in council to hand over to any private concern the water-powers of this country. Therefore any such bill should come before this House, go before the proper committee, be looked into thoroughly and be passed by the House of Commons. That is why I say that this Georgian bay canal charter should go before this committee and if proper safeguards cannot be put into a charter for a private enterprise, we in this House should lay down the principle that neither the government nor anyone else can give away these powers until we have said so.

What will happen if we refuse to renew the Georgian bay canal charter now? If we do not grant the charter, in all probability the canal will never be built, because, as different hon. members have said, it is too costly a proposition if the sale of power is not included. Some people ask: Why should the sale of power help to carry the load? If you hand that power over to any private enterprise which has not built the canal, will it charge the people of this country one cent less than it can get for that power? Not if I know private enterprises in this country. They have never done so yet.

Why are the National Hydro Electric, the International Paper Company, the Montreal power people, worrying about this deal? I think I can give the House one reason. In the charter as it is now before the House and assuredly as it will come out from the committee, there will be certain safeguards. Someone—I think it is the railway commission in the present canal charter—have the right to fix the tolls that shall be charged on the canal and the price that shall be charged for power. The International Paper Company, who have a great deal of horse-power right across the river from where we sit, and the Montreal interests, have nobody at present fixing the price for their power. But if you establish in this country a charter in which is fixed by government control the price that can be charged per horse-power when sold to the consumer, then you fix a price with which these other companies must compete. That competitive price will hold the price of hydro-electric power at the price which the railway commission sets until such time as there is a greater demand for power than can be supplied by the Georgian bay canal proposition and the other power interests. Then let us say that the private corporations will raise their price. Does any one mean to tell me that after the railway commission have gone publicly into the cost of that power and have set their price on that, the consumers of that electricity in this country will stand for private enterprise securing an exorbitant profit out of natural resources which actually belong to us and which are only leased to them? That is one of the chief reasons why our friends from Montreal and some other parts of Canada are opposing this bill.

I want to see this bill go to the committee. I want to see the Dominion of Canada properly safeguarded as regards not only this canal scheme but all canal or power schemes in the future. We cannot to-day tell how far we may go with this thing. There may come a day when our canals will go much farther into the centre of Canada. Some people will ask: How? There are rivers, even the Saskatchewan, that some day may be used. I do not say that the Saskatchewan river will be. That is a far thought. But years ago in this country just after Laurier came into power one of the ministers of the government stated that in a few years there would be a hundred million bushels of wheat grown on the prairies of western Canada and there would be a hundred thousand people in the city of Winnipeg. He was practically laughed out of this House of Commons in 1897. Great things are possible with waterways in this country. If this committee does not see fit to grant a charter to the Georgian Bay Canal Company, they should certainly safeguard us so that nobody will be able to develop the water-power in the Ottawa river and in that territory through which the Georgian bay canal goes for private enterprises, thereby shutting us out from ever having a waterway that, when built, to my mind will be one of the greatest boons to this Dominion of Canada.

Mr. T. H. LENNOX (North York): Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the fact that I am wholly and unalterably opposed to this bill, I rise to speak with some degree of reluctance. I do this because the gentleman who was my opponent in the recent election is apparently very deeply interested in the passage of this particular bill, and I fear that some of my hon. friends might be so unkind as to suggest that my opposition to the bill is actuated by personal reasons rather than in the interest of the people of this country. I am glad to be able to say that my late opponent, Mr. Sifton, and I are very warm friends, and it is a pleasure for me to say to-night that at the consummation of the campaign we were greater friends than when the campaign commenced. I am quite sure that Mr. Sifton will entertain the same feelings towards me notwithstanding the stand that I take in my remarks to-night.

I listened with a great deal of pleasure to the observations of the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Lapierre) and I have no quarrel whatever with any statement that was made by him. The whole gist of his speech was in favour of the construction of the Georgian bay canal, and I do not suppose there is in this House or out of it anyone who is opposed to the construction of the Georgian bay canal. The hon. gentleman pictured to this House the tremendous benefits which would be derived by the northern part of this province if that canal was constructed. With that I entirely agree, and I sincerely hope that the day may come, perhaps not in the near future, when the Georgian bay canal will be constructed.

I wish to confine my remarks very largely to the bill itself and I promise not to detain the House at any great length. I will not, if possible, repeat what has been said by previous speakers. In the first place I notice that there is no obligation to spend any money before the expiration of three years and that upon the expenditure of $50,000 the company are under no further financial obligation for a period of six years. In other words, under the terms of this bill, if it be adopted, upon payment of $50,000, which will be returned if the canal is not constructed, this company is getting a charter to build the canal and to develop the water-powers for a period of nine years. The company has enjoyed that same option for thirty-three years without the payment of a single dollar. I ask hon. gentlemen here to-night what they think the hon. members who were responsible for the adoption of the bill would have done, how the bill would have been treated by them, if the company had asked for an option for forty-two years upon the payment of $50,000? Thirty-three years have passed in which nothing has been done and as far as we know not a single copper has been expended. Nine years more would bring the period up to forty-two years in which they will have held the option upon the payment of a mere $50,000. If we adopt this bill we endorse that principle. We come necessarily to the conclusion, then, that those members who in 1894 were responsible for the measure would have given an option to these people for forty-two years; and I submit that there was no one in the House or in any other house at the time who would ever think of tying up under those conditions the Ottawa river and these other waters for a period of forty-two years.

Mr. Sifton has stated in the press that it is the intention of his company to build this canal, and on that account he appeals to hon. gentlemen here to support it. I have no doubt that upon every occasion when the promotors of this company appealed to the House for an extension of time, the very same promises and the very same representations were made to hon. members in order to secure their support. Those who are prominently associated with the present company are new members of it, so far as we know. Their names were never associated with the Georgian Bay Canal Company until perhaps within the last year or two. They do not even possess the virtue of having spent a single dollar or made a single effort to carry on the construction of this canal. So that so far as they are concerned they are entitled to no consideration from this House, and I have no hesitation in suggesting that, having purchased an interest in this antiquated charter, shrewd, keen business men such as Mr. Sifton and those associated with him have made provision that if the bill be defeated they will suffer no monetary loss.

The hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Lapierre) read to the House two cablegrams in which it was stated that Sir Robert Perks and the original applicants or shareholders were still interested in this bill. If that be the case they are entitled to no consideration or sympathy from this House. For thirty-three long years these men—who, the hon. member for Nipissing said, were still associated with and are shareholders of the company—did nothing whatever to construct this canal. Having defaulted on thirteen different occasions over a period of thirty-three years, surely they cannot complain very much if the House now says to them, You have had thirty-three years in which to make at least a start with the construction of the canal; you have done nothing in that period, and you have suffered no injustice. I repeat that certainly no injustice could be done to them in view of their action, or lack of action, during that period.

Here we have a company which has received every possible indulgence from this House. Perhaps in no house of parliament has any company been treated with such generosity and fairness as this company has been treated with respect to the bill now before us. Are we going to encourage applications of this kind from time to time, not only from this particular company but from all companies who are in default? Are we going to put a premium on the company that defaults, that fails to carry out the obligation it undertakes when a bill of this kind is asked for? In my opinion, if the House adopt this bill, it is putting a premium on companies that default.

I said a moment ago that this company had no reason to complain. Whether they are members of the present company or whether they are the original shareholders, they have no reason to complain of the treatment they have received from the different governments during the last thirty-three years. Let us see just for a moment if they have any complaint. The charter was issued in 1894. This is the year 1927, and not a single dollar has been expended by or on behalf of this company during that period. They have done absolutely nothing; they come to us and have to admit that they are no further ahead to-day than they were in 1894, and they ask us, notwithstanding the fact that no development has taken place, that no construction has been made, and that until within the last year no plans or location were filed, to forget that they have failed to carry out the obligations which they assumed when the original bill was passed with its amendments; and they ask us now to give them a further lease of life.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I notice that in the letter from the secretary of the Company which appeared in The Globe a few days ago he tries to explain the cause of the delay and states that in 1907 certain plans were deposited with the department. For the moment let us assume that to be true. The charter was granted in 1894. Not until thirteen years later, in 1907, was the first step taken to carry out the purposes of that charter. That is admitted by the secretary of the company. From 1907 until 1914, the first year of the war, no effort was made to get in touch with the department and file plans. From 1914 to 1918 nothing was done, and there should be no censure for this inaction because those were the years of the war when it would not be expected that such an undertaking would be proceeded with. However, the war concluded in 1918 and nothing was done in the way of filing plans until 1926—a period of eight years was permitted to elapse without any action being taken. The company remained idle, did nothing whatever to give to the people, whom to-day they are so solicitous to serve, the canal which my friend from Nipissing, (Mr. Lapierre) says would be of such benefit to northern Ontario. I cannot understand his being deluded and beguiled by this company any longer. One would think that after a period of thirty-three years without anything being done towards building the canal, the very purpose for which the charter was granted, no man, certainly no member of parliament, could be fooled any longer as to the real intentions of the company. But apparently it does not make any difference to my hon. friend. To my surprise the member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Thorson) is still willing to give credence and support to the professions of the company, notwithstanding what has taken place in the past, although it is true that he appeared rather uncomfortable during the course of his remarks.

As I said, the first move by the company was in 1907, when certain plans were filed with the department. It is significant that that date synchronizes with the creation of the Ontario Hydro Electric Commission. When that commission began to function the company apparently realized that its franchise would become valuable by reason of the development of power along the route of the canal. But let us assume for a moment that the company really intends to build this canal, let us give it the benefit of the doubt, notwithstanding that the original members are still connected with it, notwithstanding the thirteen defaults that have occurred. Assuming that, do hon. gentlemen consider it good business to place in the hands of any private company or group of individuals the water-way along the Ottawa, the French and the other rivers? Can it be argued that it is in the interests of the people that a private company should have control of this canal and should be able in perpetuity to impose tolls for its use? Personally I do not approve of such a course. In the light of present day conditions no one can convince me that the people of this Dominion are in favour of, or will benefit by, placing this water-way in the hands of private individuals.

But, Mr. Speaker, supposing that the original bill with the amendments which have been made to it from time to time were now for the first time being introduced, would any hon. gentleman in this house have the temerity to support the bill? Well, we are practically in that position, and having the opportunity, why not regard this as an original application and deal with it from that standpoint? If hon. members are willing to do that, there is no doubt as to the destiny of this bill.

Going back to 1894, Sir, may I ask, what was then in the minds of the members of this house who were responsible for the adoption of the bill? Was it to build a canal, or was it to develop power, or to do both? I think I can safely say that thirty-three years ago such a thing as the development of power, on any large scale at least, was never within the contemplation of the members of this house or of the people generally. The whole object of the bill must have been to construct a canal. That was thought to be feasible at the time, and it was not until the Hydro Electric Commission of Ontario began to function that the members of this company, realizing what a valuable franchise they had, began to concentrate their energies upon the development of power. I have no hesitation in saying that the present extension is asked for solely for the purpose of exploiting the waterways of the country for private profit. I may be asked the reason for this statement. I say this, first, because of the very long delay that has taken place since the charter was granted in 1894. Furthermore, there was no obligation in the first bill for the building of the canal under a period of nine years, within which time the company had only to spend $50,000, all of which money might be devoted to the development of power; and if perchance the $50,000 was not expended in connection with the construction of the canal no loss would be sustained by the company, because under the terms of the bill that money would be refunded in case of default

Mr. ADSHEAD: Which bill is that?

Mr. LENNOX: The original bill. I repeat, I have no hesitation in expressing the opinion that the renewal now asked for is for the purpose of exploiting our waterways in order that this company may make money. Mr. Sifton and the gentlemen associated with him are not to blame if they are able once more to hoodwink the majority of the members of parliament. It is perfectly legitimate for them to secure if possible the passage of this bill; they are behind it to make money. But hon. members are here for one purpose amongst others, and that is to protect the public domain against exploitation by private individuals. If therefore the House fails in its duty, we cannot blame my good friend Mr. Harry Sifton if in the end he succeeds in getting the bill through.

Let me read an interview given by Mr. Sifton to the Toronto Star under date January 10, 1927. He says:

> If the government approves the plan of the canal company a start shall have been made to give Canada the Georgian bay canal. The water-powers on the Ottawa river will be developed and available. The immensely expensive and valuable canal will be constructed without the expenditure of one dollar of public money.

Then in reply to a despatch to Ottawa published on the morning of January 21, Mr. Sifton said, after telling about this expensive canal:

> In this connection I would say that in my opinion the profits from the power on the Ottawa river will not pay for the cost of the canal. The great cost of the canal will be a heavy load to the power company which may only be lifted by the completion of the canal from one end to the other, thus giving the company an opportunity to collect tolls.

What does that mean? Mr. Sifton admits that the cost of the construction of the canal is going to be quite excessive. He freely admitis that the profits derived from the water-powers will not be sufficient to pay for that construction and that it will be necessary for a time to collect tolls. Upon the latter part of his statement I am not going to dwell at the moment, but I want to call the attention of the House to the first portion of his remarks. Admittedly the receipts from the development of power will be very large but they will not be sufficient to enable the construction of the canal. It is admitted that from one million to one million five hundred thousand horse-power can be developed on the river. There are at least ten water sites that can be utilized by this or any other water company that wishes to develop power along this route. Just think what these people are asking for: they are asking us to give them the right to develop more potential power than is being generated to-day and used in the province of Ontario; they are asking us to give them, without charge, from one million to one million five hundred thousand horse-power. It may be contended that they will have to build the canal. and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) asked the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Thorson) what guarantee there was that the canal would be built. Let us see what guarantee there is. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre was unable to answer the question, but perhaps I may be permitted to do so. I repeat, if this bill passes, we are going to allow this company the right to develop more power than is generated in other parts of Ontario to-day. Is it possible for anyone to estimate the money value of the one million odd horse-power now under the control of the Hydro Electric Commission? Suppose the Ontario government became dissatisfied with public ownership and decided that in the interests of the people of the province it would be well to transfer this enterprise to the management of a corporation. How much money do you think the Ontario government would ask from a private corporation for the horse-power which is being generated in that province at the present time? It would be a fabulous sum beyond conception. It is of such value that no person could begin to estimate what that electric power is worth, but notwithstanding that we are asked to give this company for no consideration at all a quantity of electrical power which will in time bring in more revenue than is being collected in other portions of Ontario to-day from electric power generated there. This is a serious thing; it is not a question of politics; it is not a question on which we should divide along political lines. It is a business transaction, and if I am able to show before I conclude my remarks that there is no guarantee for the construction of the canal, it must mean that we are giving this corporation electric power which will be worth hundreds of millions of dollars to them in a short time.

If I may digress for just a moment, let us assume that a private company should take over the present hydro-electric system of Ontario; how would it affect the consumer of power in Ontario? At present every consumer receives his power for light and industrial purposes at actual cost, but the moment a private company took hold, if such a thing could happen, what would occur? Not only would the consumer not get his power at cost but he would have to pay the private company at least a legitimate profit. That is exactly the position in which the users of electrical power in eastern Ontario will find themselves if this power is developed by a private company.

Mr. MILLAR: May I ask a question? Is the hon. member equally opposed to granting this privilege to any private concern?

Mr. LENNOX: Yes, very much so, and with your permission I will deal with that very shortly. When my hon. friend asked the question I was pointing out, Mr. Speaker, that if a private individual secured control of the power generated by the Hydro Electric Commission it would increase the cost of that power to the consumer. It is admitted that in order to make money a private corporation must receive more than the actual cost of production, and it follows that if this power is developed by a private company there will be discrimination as between the users of that power in the eastern part of Ontario and those in the western and central parts. Is it fair; can it be justified to place the eastern consumers in that position? Can any reason in this world be advanced for that? Because I live in the eastern part of Ontario and because it is necessary for me to get my power from the Ottawa river, is there any justification for my paying more for that power than the man who lives in the western or central portion of the province? If there is no justification this bill should not pass, because being a private corporation it necessarily follows that power cannot be supplied at cost, and to whatever extent their profit goes the eastern consumer will suffer. But I see that Mr. Victor Sifton, in the Star of February 28, 1927, referred to this question.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I suppose he is of the same family?

Mr. LENNOX: Yes, a brother. In dealing with this question he pointed out that the charter of this company provides that the rates charged for the sale of power and the tolls charged for navigation shall be directly under the supervision of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada. That is all very well, but I ask hon. gentlemen now why we should put ourselves in the position of having to go before that railway board in order to fix the price that shall be charged for this electrical power. If an application is made or if any objection is taken to the price charged, what takes place? The company appears before the board and shows the amount of capital invested, the expenses which have been incurred and the cost of carrying on. They have that within themselves; these figures are known only to them and it must necessarily be upon that basis, upon the figures presented to the railway commission, that the railway commission will be forced to name the rate, and no matter what it is they must be allowed a reasonable profit. We give the company the right to develop; we say to them, "You shall have full control of the development of these water-powers along the Ottawa river." If this bill is passed we also say, "You shall charge for the power, but if there is any dispute or if any complaint is made that you are charging too much, you must go to the railway board."

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): May I ask a question? Would they not be in a better position then than they are to-day in regard to the power which they are buying for the Ontario government?

Mr. LENNOX: If my hon. friend will just permit me a moment longer, I will deal with that shortly. I say that the railway board will name the rate upon representations made by this company and whatever that rate may be, whether too large or too small, there is no appeal. As I asked a moment ago, can anyone advance a legitimate reason that will appeal to the people of this Dominion for putting ourselves in that position? What reason is there for it? We do not have to do it. We are in a position now where we can say to these people: We will not renew your charter. The moment we do that it will be quite unnecessary to trouble the railway board to fix the rates. My hon. friend from Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) asked if that was not more favourable than the conditions as they exist at present? Well, I am speaking for the province of Ontario and I am glad to say that by reason of the policy enunciated in 1906 by the late Sir James Whitney there is no necessity to go before the railway board to fix any rates for the consumers of Ontario. My hon. friend asks if it is not better to have them fixed. How in the world is it better to do that, when the law in Ontario provides that the Ontario Hydro Commission must supply electric power to the consumer at actual cost.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): My hon. friend did not understand me correctly. The Ontario Hydro Electric Commission is to-day, I believe, buying power from the Gatineau Power Company or the concern that controls the Gatineau power. Can my hon. friend tell me how they will fix the rates at cost there?

Mr. LENNOX: My hon. friend asks me how they will fix the rate there. Let me point out to him that the hydro policy was first inaugurated in 1906. Though it is a public ownership scheme it was found at that time necessary to purchase or lease the first 100,000 horse-power. The commission have the power either to purchase or to develop. They purchased that amount of horse-power, and that was the nucleus of public ownership with respect to power in the province of Ontario. My hon. friend asks what guarantee there is that they will get power at cost from the National hydro. I am glad my hon. friend asks the question. Just let me say this: Under the Georgian bay charter the Hydro Electric Commission has no power to do anything. It is contended by Mr. Sifton and his associates that under their charter, if it is extended once again, the province of Quebec or the province of Ontario would have nothing whatever to do with the water-powers on the Ottawa river. They take the ground that Ontario has no interest in the matter, and that the only way in which it may be protected at all is by reason of the provision made with respect to the railway board. Now let me point out to my hon. friend the distinction between the position of this company and that of the National hydro, and bear in mind that I am not here holding any brief for the latter company; I am just as strongly opposed to the National hydro having any concessions or any rights on the Ottawa river as I am to the Georgian Bay Canal Company having them. But there is this distinction: the Georgian Bay Canal Company got their right under an act of parliament. Such being the case they claim to be absolutely supreme and to act in defiance of either the Quebec government or the Ontario government. On the other hand—and I shall deal a little further with this point later on—the National hydro company have no such rights. They have only a lease which was granted to them many years ago, but subsequent to the passing of the bill of the Georgian Bay Canal Company in 1894. They have a lease from the government which was put through by order in council. Now the National hydro realize that they cannot develop power until they enter into an agreement or lease with the governments of Ontario and Quebec. With that object in view they have entered, it is said, into an agreement with the Quebec government. Negotiations have been going on between the Ontario government and National hydro for one moiety of power. Unless the terms are agreeable to the Ontario Hydro Electric Commission these men cannot develop one single horse-power—not a single horse-power. And the moment they begin to charge or to ask for excessive rates, then the Ontario government, or the hydro commission representing it, need not deal with them but may develop this power itself.

Mr. BRADETTE: Are you aware that the Ontario Hydro Electric Commission is not functioning in northern Ontario, and that ninety per cent of the water-power in that section of the province has been sold to private interests, including those on the Abitibi and Kapuskasing rivers?

Mr. LENNOX: That is a little too far north for me.

Mr. BRADETTE: But it is part of the province of Ontario.

Mr. LENNOX: I am speaking of the horse-power that is being developed under the Hydro Electric Commission.

Now let me refer to another phase of this question, and this has to deal with the question that was asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). My hon. friend asked what the penalty is for failure to build a canal. We know from the lips of Mr. Harry Sifton that the revenues from the development will not be sufficient, and we know that there will be very large revenues derived from the sale of power from these waterfalls. What will the government do? We will assume that in 1936 the company has expended $50,000, if you like, on the construction of the canal, and that during those nine years they have developed many of the waterfalls along the Ottawa river, the Carillon and many others—there are nine or ten of them. Assume that they do that and they can do it. Of that there can be no denial. They develop the water-powers and they spend $50,000, we will say, upon the construction of the canal which of course under certain conditions is returned to them. Now what can the government do in case of failure by the company to carry out its obligations? We find that in 1936 a large development has taken place in connection with the water-powers. We find that $50,000 perhaps, has been expended upon the canal, but there has been no construction work over and above that. What does the government do? What power has it under the provisions of this bill? All the power it has is to cancel the right of the company to go with the construction of the canal. That is the only power that is left. The government cannot interfere with the water-powers, there is no provision for that in the bill, but it can say to them in 1936: Here, Mr. Sifton, you have had nine years to construct this canal. It is true you have expended money in the development of water-powers, which are a source of revenue to you, but you have done nothing towards building the canal and therefore we will not let you do anything further in that direction. What a horrible punishment that will be! Really I would not like to be the one who would have to tell the company in 1936 that that would occur. It is a shame to think that in 1936, presupposing there has been no expenditure and no construction work done on the canal, that these gentlemen are going to be punished to the extent that the government will say to them: Put that surplus money in your pockets. You have not built the canal. You must keep that money and pay dividends on it. It is yours. We will not let you spend it. We are going to determine or cancel your rights under this agreement. That is the position; it makes no difference what any person says to the contrary, that is the interpretation of this bill and what that is, in my opinion, will result in 1936.

Let me ask this question: Supposing that this bill, instead of being passed as it is and has been for the last thirty-three years, were coming into this House for the first time and that this company was asking for the right to develop the water-powers of this country without the payment of a single dollar? Would anybody support it? Is there an hon. gentleman within the walls of this chamber that would give his support to a bill the whole aim and object of which was the development of power? Yet that is exactly what may and will happen if this bill becomes law. This is a private company; they are not particularly solicitous—and no one will blame them for that—for the welfare of the people of this Dominion. Like that of every other private corporation or company their whole aim and object is to make money out of this scheme. That being the case, does anyone for a moment suppose that the gentlemen who form this company are going to take the profits derived from the sale of the power which they develop and put them into the construction of a canal? They would be crazy to do such a thing when the only penality is the removal of the octopus that they will be so glad to get rid of.

I just want again to impress upon hon. gentlemen that there is no escape from that in connection with this bill. No excuse can be offered by hon. gentleman for supporting this bill in view of the fact that it has the same effect as if the bill itself asked us to give them all the water-powers along the Ottawa river, allow them nine years to develop those water-powers and not ask them for a single copper. That is a serious matter. It is bad enough to give this to them if there is any legal obligation upon them to construct the canal, but it is absolutely indefensible to hand over to any private corporation or company an asset, a franchise, the value of which cannot be estimated. Are we discharging our duty as trustees of the people of this Dominion, realizing as we must, knowing as we do, that the moment this bill becomes law there is no machinery in the world, there is no provision in or outside of the bill, to compel the construction of that canal?

Why then should we give to this corporation this valuable asset? What reason is urged by the company that we should do so? What inducement do they offer to us to hand over to them these water-powers of such fabulous value? It is true they say that they will build the canal, but they have said that for thirty-three years, and those of us who know these gentlemen know that they are not in this scheme for the good of their health or for the financial welfare of the people of this Dominion. Therefore I repeat that every hon. gentleman who gives his support to this bill gives to this company the right, without a single copper of cost, without any restriction, to develop the water-powers, and at the same time he relieves them of the construction of the canal. All the company has to do is to take advantage of its own wrong, its own delay, its own failure to carry out the terms of this agreement in order to be relieved of the construction of the canal. Surely no company, no man, should be allowed to benefit or to receive financial advantage by reason of failure to do what it was its or his duty to do.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Do I understand the hon. member's remark to mean that if they fail to construct the canal, they will still be in possession of the water-powers?

Mr. LENNOX: Absolutely. That cannot be denied.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Still, the hon. gentleman must admit that after his enlightening speech no committee of the House of Commons would allow the bill to come out from that committee without proper provisions, without a proper safeguard.

Mr. LENNOX: I do not know. It has gone through thirteen times and I prefer not to take any chances myself. I do not know what the hon. gentleman would do. In view, however, of what the hon. member has said, that is exactly what they are asking for. Under Bill No. 78 they have asked us to give them exactly the same powers, the same privileges, the same rights, without any change, alteration or restriction that they have received since 1894 in the different extensions.

Mr. MANION: Except that the period is nine years instead of eight.

Mr. LENNOX: Yes. It will probably take an extra year to develop these water-powers. I just want to say to my hon. friend that I have not heard of there being any suggestion of any change. The company are asking that Bill 78 be passed extending the time, but I sincerely hope that if in a moment of weakness we should allow this bill to receive its second reading, my hon. friend will attend the railway committee, of which I unfortunately am not a member, and see that we are amply protected.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I will guarantee that. I am a member.

Mr. LENNOX: I am very glad that my hon. friend has so much influence with the party to which he is affiliated.

Mr. VALLANCE: The hon. member said this bill went before the committee thirteen times. Was it not passed in the House without going to the railway committee?

Mr. LENNOX: Perhaps I made a mistake. I apologize. If it went before the committee thirteen times, I would not object, but it was before the House thirteen times. The House extended the charter without even sending it to the committee.

Mr. VALLANCE: The hon. member said it went before the committee thirteen times.

Mr. LENNOX: I apologize. I should have said it went before the House, and the House extended it without sending it to the committee.

I hope the House will bear with me while I deal with another phase of this bill—probably the most obnoxious and indefensible part of it. I refer to the fact that it overrides the acknowledged rights of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. Since 1894, when the original bill was introduced, the rights of the Dominion and of the provinces have been well defined with respect to the powers in connection with navigable streams. It is well known that the Dominion has paramount rights with respect to navigation, and I think it is equally well known, or at least it ought to be, that subject to the right of the Dominion with respect to navigation the provinces have absolute control over the water-powers of the navigable streams in this country. About a year ago the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) admitted that in a debate in this House when he stated that the Dominion government had no right to interfere with the provincial governments with respect to the water-powers of the streams and rivers in this country. If the minister was correct in that statement—and I quite agree with him—then, what are we doing, and what are we facing? It is true that if this bill be adopted it carries with it all the water-powers that are in the gift, or are supposed to be in the gift, of the Dominion government. But if the Dominion government has no control over the water-powers of these rivers, then so far as that section of the bill is concerned the act is ultra vires.

If we accept the statement of the Minister of the Interior, who was speaking as a minister of the crown and I assume on behalf of the government, and supposing it to be true that the Dominion has no right so to interfere, what is there to be gained by adopting this bill? What will it mean? We have heard the statement made by the Premier of Ontario that he will never consent to the Dominion government interfering with the waterfalls of the rivers in this province. He has given warning in the last four or five days that if this bill should by any chance become law the Ontario government, assisted by the government of the province of Quebec, will take whatever means they may deem necessary in order to have their rights declared. If that be so, what object is to be gained in passing a bill which will entail prolonged litigation, extending probably over years and years, during which time the waterfalls in the Ottawa river will be tied up and the people of eastern Canada made to suffer to that extent?

The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) referred to the National hydro. As I said at that time, I have no interest in the National hydro, and nothing will please me more than to see whatever rights they have rescinded. But I want to draw attention of hon. members to this fact: In 1894 this charter was granted. As far back as 1911 the government of the day leased to the National hydro a quantity of power for which they were to pay $2 per horse-power. The lease was to extend over a period of sixty-three years, and as has been stated in this House, that lease was renewed in 1921. I draw the attention of the House to that original lease for this purpose: if the government of the day thought for one moment that under this charter the Georgian Bay Canal Company had control and were possessed of the water-power, they never would have granted this lease. Bear in mind that no matter who develop the power—even the hydro commission—before they can do anything they must have a lease or agreement with the Dominion government preserving its rights. I say they could not have considered that clause in the charter with respect to power as of any value, or if they did, the conclusion that we are driven to is that the government of the day fifteen or sixteen years ago had no confidence in the sincerity and the ability of this company to carry out their obligations under their charter. It is a singular thing that if the government for one moment contemplated the rights that are being asserted by this company, and that are being supported, I regret to say, by certain hon. members in this House, then it is unbelievable that they would issue another lease to another company to allow them to develop the Carillon falls.

In conclusion, I desire to read to the House a part of an interview by my friend Mr. Harry Sifton. Before doing so I wish to state that in my experience as a public man, which has extended over a considerable period, I have never known the press of this country to be so unanimously opposed to a bill as they are to this measure. So far as Ontario is concerned, to my knowledge there is not, except perhaps in the extreme north, a single newspaper published in any village, town or city throughout the province that is not utterly opposed to parliament passing this bill. No matter what the merits or demerits of a measure may be, it is not often that we find such unanimity amongst both Liberals and Conservatives editing the newspapers of the province.

[Mr. Lennox.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to read a few extracts from an interview which my friend, Harry Sifton, gave the Daily Star on January 10th:

> Harry Sifton in these words explains the present standing of matters along the Ottawa in an interview over the week-end.
> Mr. Sifton said that the National Hydro-Electric Company of Montreal is striving to render ineffective the charter of the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company.
> On behalf of the canal company he replied to a special despatch from Ottawa published Saturday morning. Mr. Sifton stated that there is a group—

Now, I ask hon. members to listen to this.

> Mr. Sifton stated that there is a group of capitalists who have sought to control the government of Canada for the purpose of running Canada to suit themselves and, "having failed in political intrigues it appears that what they want now is not the right to govern Canada fairly but the right to exploit it."

That is a reference to the National Hydro Electric Company, which has interests only in a waterfall that will generate a little over two hundred thousand horse-power. In Mr. Harry Sifton's view that company is exploiting the people of this country by seeking to develop power at the Carillon falls; but the Georgian Bay Company, owned by capitalists controlling, as they hope, not only the Carillon falls but every other water-power on the Ottawa river, are not exploiting, they are looking after the interests of the people of Canada! Let me read further:

> Mr. Sifton thinks that a speedy investigation in the interests of the people is urgently needed.

I think so too, and we are here for that very purpose, to protect the people of this Dominion from such exploitation. The interview continues:

> The situation on the Ottawa river is simply this. The Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company is a company chartered by the government to construct a waterway from Montreal to the Georgian bay. Its charter is of very long standing and has been frequently renewed by various parliaments. The rights are therefore absolute and cannot be altered except by an Act of parliament. . . .
> The National Hydro-Electric Company holds a lease from the federal government of the water-powers at the Carillon section of the Ottawa river, but this lease was granted subsequently to the chartering of the canal company, and is in my opinion valueless as long as the canal charter is in existence.

May I ask hon. gentlemen to follow me while I read the next interesting part of this interview:

> Some years ago Ontario was threatened by a power monopoly in the hands of short-sighted capitalists. She very wisely grappled with the question and set up the Hydro Electric Commission to develop and sell electric power at cost to the people. The duty of the Hydro Electric Commission is to fight exploitation by narrow-minded and selfish private interests, who give nothing in return for the gift of public property which they acquire through the payment of trifling fees.

Here we have out of the lips of the gentleman who is vitally interested in the passage of this bill a statement to the effect that the Hydro Electric Commission was only doing its duty in grappling with these private interests, and that by reason of the action of that commission in defending the rights of the people these capitalists did not get hold of the public domain, and as a result the people of Ontario were getting their power at cost.

Now, I wonder whether there is any dissimilarity between the condition at that time and the condition to-day. Here we have a private corporation, a body of capitalists banded together for the purpose of taking from the people their water-powers. The very same thing, my friend says, occurred some years ago, and then it was incumbent on the Ontario Hydro Electric Commission in order to defend the rights of the people to take control and generate electric power. That is exactly what I am asking for to-night. I am asking that these two bills, both of which in my opinion are indefensible, both of which are ultra vires of the powers vested in the parliament of Canada, be rejected. In a word, I am asking you to-night to do what my friend Mr. Sifton says was done, and was necessary to be done, in order to prevent the exploitation of these water-powers by private capitalists. I am asking the house to do what he says is the proper thing to do—cancel both these alleged agreements or charters, and thus permit the Ontario Hydro Electric Commission, associated as it will be with the government of Quebec in dealing with these inter-provincial waters, to develop this water-power so that the people of the eastern part of Ontario may be put upon an equal footing with those in the middle and western portions by acquiring their power at cost.

Mr. J. E. FONTAINE (Hull) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I understand that in the near future amendments are to be moved in connection with the rules of the House. I hope that the first one will be to limit to twenty minutes the length of members' speeches, so that in future we shall not be forced to listen to speeches as protracted—although eloquent—as the one which has just been delivered by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Lennox).

The question of the Georgian bay canal is of such import to the people of the riding which I have the honour to represent that I would fail in my duty if I did not rise to state openly that I approve entirely of the bill which is under consideration by the House. I do not clearly understand the attitude of a great number of members, and particularly that of the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) who is directing the opposition to the Georgian bay canal bill.

As you have heard it mentioned, Sir, by a number of members, it is now thirty-two years since this charter was granted. It was in 1894. Thirteen times, or thereabouts—every second year, I think, the members of the Georgian Bay Canal Company have come before parliament in order to have their charter renewed. Each time it was done without practically any opposition, therefore, I fail to understand why the request of this company raises so much opposition on the fourteenth time. I presume that quite a number of those who are opposed to the renewal of this charter, would prefer that concessions be granted to private companies for the development of the water-powers on the St. Lawrence. It seems to me, Sir, that it is better to help this company, which beside developing the water-powers, as any other private concern would do, will give us a canal that will shorten the route between Montreal and Fort William by many hundred miles. This would mean a reduction in freight rates and allow Nova Scotia to ship its coal at more favourable conditions. It would also benefit the western provinces in the shipping of their wheat. On that score it is but natural that we should give preference to the Georgian Bay Canal Company, which will perhaps spend hundreds of millions in the dredging of this canal and thereby bring prosperity to the workmen of this country. I believe that it is better to favour this company than to grant a franchise to a private enterprise who would only develop the water-powers.

It is pointed out that the provinces have rights over the water-powers of the St. Lawrence. I understand that in the present bill there exists a clause which stipulates that the provinces may exact that their rights be protected, preventing thereby all encroachments by any company. For my part, I strongly support this scheme, and I trust that the House will sanction the second reading of this bill.

The opponents of this project may, in the committee on private bills, introduce all the amendments they wish; however in the interest of the country as well as that of all the provinces, I deem it absolutely necessary that this charter be renewed.

In fairness to the people I have the honour to represent, I wish to state once more that I shall support heartily this bill. I trust that the House will see fit to sanction it without opposition and that, in the committee on private bills, all the amendments moved to improve the bill will be accepted.

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): I have no hesitation in speaking on this subject, not only because of my length of service in this House, but for other reasons. I have had considerable experience with this particular bill. I came here in 1908 and at that time this was a burning question, not only in northern Ontario, as my hon. friend from Nipissing (Mr. Lapierre) knows, but throughout the Dominion. Shortly after that large delegations came down to Ottawa, some of them as great as the one that came here a year or so ago in connection with the automobile industry. One of the largest delegations that ever came to the capital and probably the most representative was concerned with this very matter, and it was drawn from almost every constituency in Quebec and Ontario. I am quite sure that it represented every constituency between the great lakes and Calgary, that is, as the constituencies then stood. They were unanimous in favour of the immediate construction of this canal.

The canal scheme as it was instituted by the Georgian Bay Canal Company has met with considerable criticism in this House to-night, but we must look at the state of affairs as it existed when the bill was first introduced in 1894. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) pointed out that this company in the first instance indicated merely a desire to build a canal nine feet deep between the mouth of the French river and Montreal. But shortly after the scheme had been initiated by the company the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were influenced to take a hand in it and they spent a good deal of money in a very intensive survey of that portion of the canal that lay between the mouth of the French river and North Bay. They proposed to build at that time a fourteen foot canal, and I believe that apart from the exigencies of their financial situation the Canadian Pacific would probably have built the canal then. Soon after, the Canadian government itself took hold of the matter. As has been pointed out, this bill has come before parliament repeatedly, and the government made a most exhaustive survey both between the mouth of the French river and North Bay, on the one hand, and between that point and Montreal on the other, a survey that cost Canada something like a million and a quarter. The report of that survey was distributed to the public at that time and, I believe, is now available to members in the library. The conclusion, as my hon. friend from Nipissing rightly points out, was that the scheme was perfectly feasible and there was no doubt that the canal could be constructed, very materially shortening the distance between the west and Montreal. The work could be done at a very low cost and it would enable ships of twenty-four feet draft to traverse that waterway without any difficulty whatever. This is practically the history of the case.

We have had frequent applications for a renewal of the charter, and when I came into the House first, and for many years after, every member from the west was in favour of the scheme. While this project, according to the engineers employed by our own government, was feasible as a waterway, we had various schemes which were really intended to develop the water-powers of the country at or about the same time that hydro-electric power began to give evidence of value. I remember in the old chamber of this House a gentleman, then the member for Thunder Bay and Rainy River, the late Mr. Conmee, bringing in a bill, which very nearly went through, the object of which was to construct a canal from the mouth of the Nipigon river, over to the Winnipeg river, thence to the Saskatchewan river and up to the Rocky mountains; and there was no question whatever that the object of that proposal was to acquire the power rights along the route.

Our friends, perhaps on this side of the House as well, who oppose the bill being sent to the committee, forget the fact that according to the charter as renewed from time to time—and we admit there have been many renewals from 1894 to the present date—if the promoters of this undertaking were anxious to merely develop the water-powers along the route, all they needed to do was to spend $50,000 to be on the safe side. They have not done so, nor have they taken any action such as would indicate that they have an eye to the power alone. In the meantime, parliament has made certain encroachments upon the original charter. The company at first were given shore rights, water rights, and so forth, but changes have been made and we find now that many of these rights granted to the company as originally constituted have been withdrawn by the railway committee. In the first place, the right of expropriation was taken by the Dominion. That is to say, at any time on one week's notice the Dominion could acquire all the rights which the company then held. This is provided for in section 5 of the act of 1906. This took from the company any privileges which the government of the Dominion might wish to abrogate, and this after one week's notice. The next change came in 1912, when another renewal was asked for, and at that time paragraph (g) of section 8 of chapter 103 of the revised statutes of 1894 was repealed and the following substituted therefor:

> Produce, lease and supply, or otherwise dispose of surplus hydraulic, electric and other kinds of power developed in connection with and for the purposes of the works hereby authorized, the rates or prices at or for which such hydraulic and electric power may be disposed of by the company to be fixed or determined by the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada. . . .

That put a stop to any exploitation in connection with the water-power or water rights outside of those directly connected with the works of the company. These powers were taken over by the Dominion, and the price was to be fixed by the railway board. Then we go further and find that in order to protect the provinces, in 1913, one year later, an amending act was passed which contained the following clause:

> Nothing in this act, or in any other act governing or affecting the company, shall be construed to authorize or empower the company to enter, or take, or use the public lands of the province of Ontario or Quebec without the consent of the lieutenants governor in council of the respective provinces, except to the extent necessary for the purpose of constructing the canal and necessary works incidental thereto, and for the purpose of developing power necessary for the operation of the canal.

I would ask the House to pay particular attention to the closing words. The company had the right to develop power independent of the provinces only to the extent necessary to the operation of the canal; in all other respects, according to the act as it now stands, they are subject in the first place to the control of the railway commission and they have no power to create or sell any power without the consent of the lieutenants governor in council of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. So far the argument against this bill must fall down. It is undoubtedly true that this bill has stood for many years, and that except in surveys this company has spent very little if any money in the development of the work. But we have in our hands to-day a bill which was passed renewing a charter originally granted in 1893 for the purpose of building a railway line, for which every hon. member of this House voted or against which by his acquiescence he did not vote, and we have many of these cases.

In regard to the actual construction of the canal we in northern Ontario feel it to be a perfectly feasible scheme. I spoke for hours in the old House and in the Victoria Museum in connection with this matter and I am sure hon. members can read the facts for themselves. We believe that through this canal we can be sure of a waterway entirely within Canada and entirely under the control of Canadians, which will shorten the distance and lower the freight rate on every bushel of grain shipped from the west and sent eastward. I have no doubt of that in my own mind. The argument of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) that the company proposes to collect tolls is very foolish, I think. If this canal were built from the mouth of the French river to Montreal and if tolls were collected, what is to be understood? It must be a cheaper means of carrying grain than the present route via the St. Lawrence, otherwise no sensible man would pay a toll to go through the canal. It is absolutely clear to anyone that if tolls are to be collected the canal must be of some benefit to the man who pays the toll.

I could go on for an hour or so, but I have no desire to delay the House. I simply want to say that in my experience in this House we have never refused to let a bill go to a standing committee. I am in favour of permitting this bill to go to committee, with the reservation that the public should be protected in every possible way and that before it finally passes this House, if it does pass, there should be a clause inserted more comprehensive perhaps than that already in the bill, giving the railway board power to adjust the rates. I would suggest that any power developed in the process of constructing this canal should be under the control as to prices, if in Ontario, of the Ontario Hydro Electric Commission, or if in Quebec it should be controlled by the government of that province. With that guarding clause I believe any reasonable man would say that this bill should take whatever fate may await it in the railway committee in the ordinary way.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): The hour is somewhat late, Mr. Speaker, and I would hesitate to delay my hon. friends longer. As my remarks will be somewhat extended I would beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Garland, Bow River) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. RINFRET: I rise to a point of order. I observe that the hon. member for Bow River intends to proceed with his speech, but it is a well known rule of the House that when a member moves the adjournment of a debate and the motion is negatived he loses his right to speak on the original motion. May I direct your attention, Mr. Speaker, to rule 21, paragraph 2, which says:

> A reply shall be allowed to a member who has moved a substantive motion or the second reading of a bill, but not to any member who has moved an order of the day (not being the second reading of a bill) an amendment, the previous question, an adjournment during a debate, or an instruction to a committee.

Beauchesne, commenting on the rule, says at page 71, paragraph 258:

> A member who has moved or seconded the adjournment of the debate which has been negatived cannot speak to the original motion.

I may add that I am very sorry I have to direct attention to this rule. I do not do it out of any disrespect to the hon. member for Bow River, but in order that the rules of the House may be observed.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): On the point of order, may I just say to hon. members opposite, who are usually exceedingly courteous to me at least and to most of my colleagues on this side, that I was perfectly well aware of the rule, and that I rose to speak presuming that hon. gentlemen opposite would not take advantage of such a rule at this time. My motion was not made, Mr. Speaker, for partisan purposes of any kind but simply out of consideration not only for my own physical well-being but for that of hon. members opposite, and I am sorry they have chosen to take advantage of a point of order of this kind. May I say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that I bow to the inevitable ruling which you must give in this matter, but I am sorry that hon. gentlemen opposite have not been as courteous as they usually are under the circumstances.

Mr. SPEAKER: As the hon. member submits to the rule I will not apply the axe. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle now has the floor.

Mr. JOHN MILLAR (Qu'Appelle): At this late hour my remarks will be very brief. An English economist once said that for commercial purposes the measure of distance was not the number of miles but the freight rate. In other words if the freight rate between two points is doubled the distance for commercial purposes is doubled also.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. There are too many members of the House speaking to each other whilst the debate is proceeding, and it is disturbing the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. MILLAR: I approach this question with a great deal of caution, yet I realize it is one of vital importanace. In western Canada we are at a great distance from the seaboard, and anything that will tend to lessen the cost of transportation lessens in a commercial way the number of miles that products have to be carried. I am also quite well aware that our experience with canals in the past, and the experience of the United States also, has been rather disappointing. Let me give the House some figures regarding an experience in connection with the Erie canal.

From a pamphlet issued in New York I quote the following figures referable to the year 1921:

	Bushels
Number of bushels of wheat carried to New York by rail	46,686,000
Number of bushels of wheat carried by water	7,315,000
Number of bushels of corn carried by rail	11,664,000
Number of bushels of corn carried by water	1,565.000

As a matter of fact, the experience of the Erie canal has been that ninety-one per cent of the grain going into New York goes by rail notwithstanding the fact that the rates are about the same as by canal. I will quote the showing of a few years to illustrate that. For the year 1900 the rate by lake and canal from Chicago to New York was 4.92 cents, and by lake and rail 5.5 cents. You will see there was very little difference. In 1901 the rate from Chicago to New York was 5.64 by lake and canal and 5.57 by lake and rail. Sometimes the rate by lake and rail is greater, and at other times it is greater by lake and canal. The experience in connection with the construction of the several Welland canals has also been disappointing. Each time we have built a new canal the expectation has been that it would carry a great deal of traffic but after construction the amount carried has been disappointing. I will give one exception to the general experience. The amount of freight passing through the Sault canal, both American and Canadian, has been exceedingly large. It has run from 66,000,000 tons to 91,000,000 tons during the last eight or ten years, or has varied between those figures. The question arises, why is that? It is simply because rail transportation cannot compete with open water transportation. There is open water competition through lake Superior and lake Huron, and it is utterly impossible for the rail route to compete with the open water route. A very striking illustration of this is given by Mr. S. A. Thompson, Secretary-Treasurer of the National Rivers and Harbours Congress, of Washington, D.C., before the convention of the National Waterways Association of Canada. In an address delivered at Toronto on March 8, 1921, he gives this remarkable illustration. He said:

> Let me give you a concrete illustration of the difference in the cost of transportation by water and by rail. Through the Soo canal, at the outlet of lake Superior, there were carried, in 1913, 79,718,344 tons of freight. This was carried an average distance of 820 miles, at an average cost of two-thirds of one mill per ton per mile. If this same quantity of freight had been sent an equal distance by rail at the average rate received by United States railways for that year it would have cost $445,555,488 more than was actually paid for its transportation by water.

Summarized, that means this: On the tonnage that passed through the Soo canal in one year and was carried 820 miles, the cost, if it had been carried at the average rate paid to United States railways, would have been $445,000,000 odd more than it actually was. That shows the great advantage of water over rail transportation. If we had open water navigation through the Georgian bay canal, or through the St. Lawrence, or through the Welland canal, the cost of transportation of wheat and other commodities would be greatly decreased. But I approach this matter with caution because I am aware that transportation through the canals is very expensive; that it approaches in many cases almost, if not quite, the cost of rail transportation.

One point of advantage which the Georgian bay canal possesses is that it is an all-Canadian route. If my memory serves me well, during the war the United States authorities wished to build a dam on their side of the St. Lawrence route. I may not be absolutely correct in all my details in connection with this matter and I stand to be corrected; but I believe they were given permission by the president, subject to approval of the details of their plan by the International Joint Commission. They proceeded to build that dam under the arrangement that it should be removed within one year after the close of the war. Yet that dam still remains there to-day. I mention that only to show the internal complications that may arise between Canada and the United States when they are operating a joint water route.

As Canadians we are in this position: we may not like the idea of giving this franchise over to a private concern; but if this canal is going to be constructed, if there is going to be any water transportation scheme, it is impossible to construct the navigation part of the scheme and make it pay without the water-powers. The right of navigation is under the control of the Dominion government. The right of water-power is under the control of the provincial government. The water-powers may be developed without the navigation but the navigation cannot be made to pay without the water-powers. The question is: What is the alternative? Is it worth while to stop and think of that?

Will the Dominion of Canada—which by the British North America Act controls navigation, which should have control of the navigation on this Ottawa river and through those lakes and rivers—transfer that right to the province? Will it give up that right without proper safeguards, and can that right be properly safeguarded? If it does not do that, will it permit the province to develop the water-powers without any consideration whatever for the navigation? Once the water-powers are developed, it will be utterly impossible to develop the navigation afterwards and the canal will be lost to Canada for all time. Is it not worth while to consider those matters? Is it not worth while to send this bill to a committee where the matter may be thoroughly investigated, where the details may be threshed out, where the engineers may be brought before the committee and questioned? I would be sorry indeed to see this charter granted without question, but I would also be sorry to see a transportation system that might be of great benefit to western Canada and to Canada as a whole lost to Canada simply because the committee were afraid to listen to the engineers, to listen to both sides and to judge for themselves. Why should the members of the railway committee be terrified to go down into the committee room and allow the engineers and others to speak in favour of and against the scheme, to hear the pros and cons? Is there any reason why the members of the committee should be afraid of themselves? I think the proper thing is for the bill to go before the railway committee.

During the discussion this afternoon the St. Lawrence waterways came up for consideration. Allow me to point out that once the Welland canal is constructed, the danger of Oswego taking a large part of Canadian freight and turning it to United States ports will be equally as great as the danger is now in regard to Buffalo. A large part of Canadian freight is passing through United States channels. We as Canadians wish to prevent that, but the House may rest assured that the completion of the Welland canal will not settle that problem. Oswego is nearer to New York than is Buffalo. Allow the large ships carrying large cargoes to pass through the Welland canal to the eastern end of lake Ontario and what will happen? Oswego will become a keener competitor than Buffalo is to-day. The advantage of this other route, if it should be found feasible for navigation purposes, means that there is no joint ownership. It is an all-Canadian route. As has been pointed out, it is a direct route with a saving of about 280 or 282 miles.

Some objection has been taken to the fact that if this should be completed by private enterprise tolls would be charged. I do not think we should object to paying a reasonable toll for the service, because the Dominion would be freed from spending one dollar on constructing the canal and developing the water-powers. There is not therefore any reason why those using those canals should not pay a reasonable toll. It would be necessary, of course, that this matter should be properly safeguarded.

There might be a danger that if this charter were granted as it stands now the water-power might be developed and the canal for navigation purposes might be delayed, might even not be built. If that cannot be safeguarded by legislation, I do not think it would be wise to grant the charter at all, but surely it is worth while to give it a fair trial and send it to committee where it can be thoroughly discussed.

It has been said by those who advocate this route that it will save from five to ten cents, per bushel on grain. I take that with a grain of salt. I also take with a grain of salt the statement of the advocates of the St. Lawrence route, when they say it will save from five to ten cents. I am very doubtful if that saving will be made on either route, but it is worth while studying it very, very carefully. If there should be a saving on either of these routes of anything like that to the people of western Canada, and the people of Canada as a whole, the people's representatives will make a grand mistake if they turn a deaf ear and refuse to study the matter, only to find out in later years that they had thrown away something that was worth while. One hon. member has asked, why build such a route to compete with the Hudson bay route? One might just as well ask, why build a branch line in northern Saskatchewan to compete with a branch line in southern Alberta? The Hudson bay route and the Georgian bay canal are about 1,500 miles apart. No one ever thought, when he advocated the Hudson bay route that the traffic passing out by the great lakes through Fort William and the St. Lawrence was going to dry up. We want a number of routes, the more the better, provided they do not cost too much.

I appeal for consideration of this question. If this proposition is referred to a committee I do not think there will be any inclination to be unjust or unfair. It can be sifted to the bottom, and those who advocate the Georgian bay route, and those who are opposed to it will have an opportunity to present their views. It may be possible that the lack of safeguards which has been complained of may be remedied. I believe the whole matter should be taken up and investigated from the start. Very many changes have taken place since this charter was granted thirty odd years ago. The need for deeper boats with a heavier draft has been very marked. I observe in a statement by a prominent authority that since 1914 the increase of draft of boats the world over has been thirty-three and a third per cent. The depth of canal that might have been sufficient thirty years ago would be quite inadequate now. Thirty years ago water-power was not considered as valuable as it is to-day, so that it would be wise to review the whole question, study it from the first, and look at it as though it had never been touched. I do not say that I would support it or that I would oppose it, but by the time it has been thoroughly threshed out it may look different.

I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the motion is put, according to the rules, when two motions for the adjournment of the debate or for the adjournment of the House are made there must be an intermediate proceeding. I would refer to Bourinot at page 323, where he says:

> In case there is a substantive motion of adjournment before the House, and it is negatived, some proceeding must be had in order to render a second motion to the same effect regular. A message from the governor general followed by other proceedings would be sufficient to render a second motion of adjournment valid. The rule applies literally to the adjournment of the House, and not of the debate, but it is usual and convenient to make an entry in the journal between two motions of the latter character.

If it is the desire of the House, by unanimous consent. I will take the opportunity to lay on the table two copies of the report of the by-elections held during 1925-26, pursuant to section 72 of the Dominion Election Act. This creates an intermediate proceeding, and now the motion for adjournment can be made.

Mr. CASSELMAN: I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member from Qu'Appelle concluded his speech?

Mr. MILLAR: I moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understood the hon. member had concluded his speech, and the hon. member from Grenville-Dundas has moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.35 p.m.

Tuesday, March 8, 1927

The House met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill No. 120, respecting Joliette and Northern Railway Company.—Mr. Denis (Joliette).

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the names of Messrs. Bancroft and Rutherford be substituted for those of Messrs. Glen and Roberge on the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS COMMITTEE

Mr. J. J. DENIS (Joliette) moved:

That the quorum of the select standing committee on privileges and elections be reduced from fifteen to eight members.

He said: I think I should give some explanation regarding this motion. Each year a striking committee is appointed to nominate the select standing committees and that committee has the power to determine what shall be the quorum of a standing committee of the House. In some cases that committee provides what shall be a quorum and in other cases it does not. The quorum was not fixed this year for the standing committee on privileges and elections; therefore a quorum should be a majority of the committee, and as there are twenty-nine members the quorum stands at fifteen. On the 2nd, 3rd and 8th March this committee on privileges and elections was called. Unfortunately we have been unable on each of these occasions to secure a quorum; therefore there is no report of the committee before the House, as we could not make a report until a quorum had been obtained. The members of that committee who were present at the different meetings suggested to me that I, as chairman, should move to have the quorum of the committee reduced, because the members of the committee were afraid that if the quorum remained at fifteen it would be very difficult if not impossible for the committee to sit this session. That is the reason I am making this motion. By way of comparison, I might draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines is composed of 129 members and the quorum has been fixed at 25, less than 20 per cent. The private bills committee is composed of 65 members, and the quorum has been placed at 10. The committee on standing orders is composed of 33 members and the quorum is fixed at 7.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not know whether I am right or not, but I think this is one of the motions of which notice should be given. I have not had time to consult anyone in regard to the matter or to consider the effect of the motion. The standing committee on privileges and elections is one of the important committees of the House. Matters which come before it as a rule are of very great consequence, and I think that a quorum of eight to transact the business of that committee is very small. I know in past years we have had great difficulty in getting a quorum in the committee on privileges and elections, we had the same difficulty the year before last, and four years ago we had great difficulty. If my hon. friend will allow this motion to stand for say two days, perhaps we can come to some arrangement in the meantime. I would not like to pronounce formally upon it without further consideration.

[Mr. J. J. Denis.]

Mr. SPEAKER: Under rule 40 notice of this motion must be given, therefore the motion will have to stand.

Motion stands.

NATURAL RESOURCES—WESTERN PROVINCES

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): I desire to present petitions signed by some three thousand electors of the provinces of Nova Scotia, Ontario, Manitoba and Saskatchewan, requesting that their natural resources should be transferred to the prairie provinces at the earliest possible moment, without restriction or limitation as to the complete control of their educational or other local affairs.

MARINE AND FISHERIES COMMITTEE

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysboro) moved:

That the annual report of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries for the fiscal year 1925-26 and the annual report of the Fisheries branch of the said department be referred to the select standing committee on marine and fisheries.

Motion agreed to.

WEST INDIES TRADE AGREEMENT

ORGANIZATION OF COMPANY TO PROVIDE STEAMSHIP SERVICE

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved,

1. That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide or arrange through a company to be formed under the Companies Act, for a mail, passenger and freight service, in accordance with the West Indies trade agreement, 1926.

2. That the securities to be issued by the company may be guaranteed by the Dominion as to principal and interest to an amount not exceeding, without the authority of parliament, an aggregate of $10,000,000.

3. That the proceeds of sale or disposition of the securities shall be deposited to the credit of the Minister of Finance; and the entire stock ownership of the company shall be issued to His Majesty in the right of the Dominion in consideration of the guarantee.

4. That any of the boats now operated by the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited, may be transferred to the company on a reasonable valuation and on terms to be approved by the governor in council, and if transferred to be operated by individual companies, such companies shall issue to the company all their capital stock to indemnify the crown against liability in respect of the guarantee.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

ALLIED INDIAN TRIBES OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

JOINT COMMITTEE TO INQUIRE INTO CLAIMS

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That a special committee of this House consisting of the Honourable Charles Stewart, Mr. F. W. Hay, Mr. E. A. McPherson, Mr. L. S. R. Morin, Honourable H. H. Stevens, Honourable R. B. Bennett and Mr. W. A. Boys be appointed to meet with a similar special committee of the Senate, if such a committee be appointed, to inquire into the claims of the Allied Indian Tribes of British Columbia as set forth in their petition submitted to parliament in June, 1926; and that such committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to report from time to time by bill or otherwise; and that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours therewith.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, under the guise of a simple resolution this is a matter of some importance to British Columbia—

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is not this just a notice?

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the hon. gentleman raising a point of order?

Mr. NEILL: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: This motion is not debatable.

Motion agreed to.

VANCOUVER HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS

PROPOSED LOAN OF $4,000,000

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorize a loan to the Vancouver Harbour Commissioners in an amount not exceeding $4,000,000 to carry on the construction of terminal facilities, upon the approval by the governor in council of detailed plans, specifications and estimates for such works and the deposit of debentures of the corporation to cover said loan.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

REPATRIATION OF ORIENTALS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, may I direct the attention of the Prime Minister to a despatch in the Vancouver Daily Province of the 25th ulto? The first paragraph reads:

Victoria, Feb. 25: A demand that the federal government should give serious consideration to the question of repatriating the orientials from British Columbia was made by the attorney general, Hon. A. M. Manson, in the legislature on Thursday afternoon.

Let me also quote another short extract from the same despatch:

"Although it would cost the Dominion of Canada many millions of dollars, the proposal should be seriously considered before it is too late," said the attorney general.

I would ask the Prime Minister if he is going to consider this demand of the attorney general of British Columbia.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think I should allow the attorney general of British Columbia to deal with the matter himself.

MONTREAL, OTTAWA AND GEORGIAN BAY CANAL COMPANY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, on February 28th I requested the government to table a report made by the engineers of the Department of Public Works in the matter of the Georgian bay canal, submitted, I think, in 1925. I do not know whether the government has taken any steps to table the report, but for fear it may be put to further inconvenience, I may say that I have been able to find the material I required in another report made some time ago. However, I would now ask the government to table a report made on the same subject by a special commission appointed by the Borden government in 1912, under the chairmanship of Mr. Sanford Evans. May I ask that it be tabled at the earliest convenient moment?

IMPERIAL GOVERNMENT SUPPLIES FOR CHINA

PURCHASES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Right Hon. Prime Minister if he would be good enough to give me certain information. I have a wire, and this is only one of several, from a business concern on the coast to the effect that they are advised from London that the Canadian authorities are purchasing supplies for the Imperial government for China, and they ask to be advised what department or minister of the government is handling this matter. This refers, I presume, to other supplies than those handled, I think, by the Department of Agriculture.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any supplies having been ordered by the Imperial government other than those that have already been referred to by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell). However, if any parties wish to get information, I think the appropriate department with which to communicate would be the Department of External Affairs.

CANADA GRAIN ACT AMENDMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) if he is now in a position to inform the House when he expects his bill to amend the Canada Grain Act will come before parliament? ?

Hon. JAMES MALCOLM (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I told the hon. gentleman recently in reply to a similar question that we expected to have the legislation ready in the very near future. I can assure him that we are a little nearer the time now, than we were then—probably inside a week.

IMMIGRATION PUBLICITY

ALLEGED MISLEADING STATEMENTS IN BRITISH NEWSPAPERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to call the attention of the Immigration department to the advertisements which are being used in the old country to secure immigrants. In the Galloway Gazette of Saturday, January 1, 1927, I notice an advertisement by the Anchor-Donaldson people saying that situations are guaranteed by the Canadian government. Let me quote a short extract from the advertisement:

Employment assured throughout the year.

With regard to boys, the advertisement has this announcement:

The Canadian government makes itself absolutely responsible for the welfare of the boys.

I would ask the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) whether the Canadian government does absolutely guarantee situations; and, if not, whether it will take some steps to prevent such misrepresentation in the old country papers?

Hon. ROBERT FORKE (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): It is rather difficult sometimes to justify advertisements. If I were to go along Bank street and make every merchant on that street justify his advertisements, he might experience some difficulty in doing so. I do not think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has quoted all the advertisement. I think it begins by stating that immigrants can be brought to Canada for £2, and it then proceeds to state that the government guarantees employment.* As a matter of fact, immigrants who come under the assisted passage agreement between the Imperial authorities and the Dominion government for £2, have their employment guaranteed. Assisted immigrants to whom this advertisement refers are guaranteed employment because they are sent over here under that agreement on the nomination of someone residing in Canada who has stated that he will give them employment. There is of course, no guarantee that they will remain in the employment in which they are placed. The department undertakes to see that they will be employed when they come to Canada and I think that is being done. Furthermore the department undertakes if possible to keep track of them for five years after they come to Canada in order to see what they are doing and how they are turning out after receiving that assistance from the imperial and federal governments. There is no guaranteed employment for any other class than farmers, farm servants and domestic servants. Any others who come to Canada come on their own responsibility, and the department assumes none for them.

The boys who come to Canada are perhaps in a different class. They are young boys under seventeen years of age who are brought out under the auspices of different associations or the provincial government who undertake to look after them. At the same time the department does not divest itself of responsibility, but also undertakes to look after them for five years and I think that is being fairly carried out so far as we have gone. Of course the scheme has been only recently entered into.

ST. REGIS INDIAN RESERVE

CONTROL OF ST. LAWRENCE RIVER ISLANDS BY SUPERINTENDENT GENERAL

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved the third reading of Bill No. 55, to provide for special control by the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs of certain islands in the St. Lawrence being part of the St. Regis Indian reservation.

Mr. STEVENS: I was under the impression that this bill had been still left in committee.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Third reading was suggested and it was held up.

Mr. STEVENS: There were some other points regarding which we wanted information and which I desired to discuss, but that cannot be done on the third reading. There seems to be a little misunderstanding. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) advises me that there was an arrangement that the bill might be recommitted.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have no recollection of that.

Mr. STEVENS: I was certainly under the impression that it had not been finally reported from committee.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I allowed this bill to stand over on two occasions in order that the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) might have an opportunity of examining it in committee, and I thought it received thorough discussion in committee. I have no recollection of any objection being raised except to the third reading.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I remember very well when this bill was left over in committee for further discussion and the minister brought down some information regarding these islands and the reasons given by him and the department for this bill. I do not propose to discuss the matter any further. It seems to me we shall simply have to let it go, but on the third reading I wish to register my protest against a special bill dealing with Indian lands. We have a general act dealing with Indians, and my impression is that it is up for certain amendments this session.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: It seems extraordinary that there should be any need of a special bill dealing with Indian lands or other property when a general act has been in force for years and years, and has been amended from time to time as necessity warranted and as the officials of the department advised was necessary. It would have been far better if the provisions of this bill, if they are required, could have been incorporated in the general act, because the question at once arises in anybody's mind as to why in any particular case there should be a special law with regard to dealing with Indian lands.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I explained that phase of the bill when it was in committee. There is just one point that requires a special bill and that is the jurisdiction of the Superintendent General or the department over the disposal of lands of this character unoccupied by Indians. The general act provides for control by the band itself except in the case of uncultivated land.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Are there no other unoccupied lands belonging to Indians in any other part of the Dominion?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not separated from the reserves, so far as I know, not even on Walpole island.

Motion agreed to on division, and bill read the third time and passed.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT ACT 1919—AMENDMENT

Hon. ROBERT FORKE (Minister of Immigration and Colonization) moved the third reading of Bill No. 61, to amend the Soldier Settlement Act, 1919.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

REORGANIZATION OF DEPARTMENT OF CUSTOMS AND EXCISE

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Customs and Excise) moved the second reading of Bill No. 113, respecting the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): There is a policy and a principle involved in the second reading of this bill, Mr. Speaker, and I do not think it advisable for the House to pass such legislation in view of the fact that a royal commission has been appointed to make recommendations in regard to the very matters contained in this bill. We were told by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) when leader of the opposition last June, at page 5133 of Hansard, that such a commission should be appointed in view of the very large revenue handled by this department, and he said that the commission should be composed of three judges, one nominated by the government, one by the opposition and one by the Progressive party in order to command the respect of the country. In order to show the policy of the then leader of the opposition on that occasion I should like to quote two short sentences from his remarks, as follows:

> We conferred among ourselves as to the manner in which that all important end could best be attained, and we came to the conclusion that the manner in which that end could best be attained would be through the appointment of a commission of judges, three in number, one to be named by the prime minister of the day, the second to be named by the leader of the opposition, and the third to be named by the leader of the Progressive party. I submit, Mr. Speaker, and I wish to say it as emphatically as I can, that I believe it is a commission of that character, and of that character alone, that the people of this country will be satisfied with on this all-important national problem.

That commission was never appointed, but another commission was substituted for it and they are simply continuing the work of the old committee of this House which brought out the facts in this connection. In view of this I think it due the House and the country that the Prime Minister or the Minister of Customs and Excise should explain why this roving commission is going about the country from one city to the other, finding out nothing which has not already been discovered by the committee of this House which investigated this department. For that reason I think this bill should stand until such time as we have the report of this commission, if it is ever received. There has been a right-about-face made by the government, and in view of that we should have some expression of opinion from the government as to when that report may be expected and as to whether it will contain anything along the line of this bill. Why is this commission spending hundreds of thousands of dollars of the taxpayers' money if they are not going to recommend the co-ordination of all these different departments in order that they may be administered with greater efficiency, as the public utilities of this country are not at present administered, in my opinion? For that reason I am opposed to the second reading of this bill; I think it should stand over until we have received the report of this commission.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. HANSON: I think we should have some considered statement from the minister before this bill proceeds any further, because it is a very important measure. The criticism levelled at the principle of the bill by the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) has some foundation in fact, I think. The minister is a new minister and should give the House some statement.

Mr. EULER: I am very much inclined to believe that my hon. friend just wishes to try out the new minister. I have very little to add to what I said the other day when the bill was given its first reading. Clause 1 proposes to change the name of the department as it is now constituted to the Department of National Revenue. As I explained the other day, it simply means that the new name is regarded as being more accurately descriptive of the functions of the department. As the title is now it implies only the collection of customs and excise duties, while the actual work of the department includes also the collection of income tax and sales tax. I do not know that I can add anything more. One criticism which was raised the other day was that some time we might possibly get rid of the sales tax and income tax, but even if that were to happen the new name would still be descriptive of the work of the department, so I cannot see that that should affect the matter in any way.

Mr. HANSON: Are we to understand, and is the country to understand that there is to be a continuation of the excise tax and income tax and sales tax in this country, or are we to understand that the income and sales taxes are to continue for only a short period and that we are then to revert to the collection of our national revenue principally from the customs and excise duties? If the latter be true there is no need for the change. I was in hopes that the minister would be able to announce to the House that the sales tax would soon be abolished along with the income tax and that the country would revert to the position occupied before the war, when we obtained our revenue from the two principal sources to which I have referred. I think such an announcement would be received with the greatest pleasure all over the country.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Why not abolish the customs duties as well?

Mr. HANSON: I did not include the customs duties. Does the Minister of Justice advocate the abolition of the customs duties, or is the government simply seeking to get away from a name which does not smell very sweet?

Mr. EULER: I think I have already answered the objection of my hon. friend.

Mr. HANSON: I am not objecting but I want a further explanation.

Mr. EULER: I am sure my hon. friend does not expect me to make any declaration of policy which would ordinarily fall within the purview of the Minister of Finance or the leader of the government. The bill deals with the situation exactly as it is to-day; it means nothing more and nothing less.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Is the department to be called the Department of National Revenue? Well, I do not like that word "national;" I think it might very well come out. The title Department of Revenue is good enough. You do not need the other word at all; it just clutters up the name and clutters up the section all the way through.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Department constituted.

Mr. STEVENS: This is one of the most important clauses in the bill. The minister undoubtedly has been faced with very onerous and important duties in regard to this department, and I should like to ask him, first, has the commission or body of auditors that has been working for some time in the department considered this reorganization, and is it in accordance with their views? Have they made a report upon which this bill is founded?

Mr. EULER: I am not quite sure what my hon. friend means. Is he referring to the temporary committee that was appointed by himself?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. EULER: That committee has made a report, and while it does not recommend the creation of commissioners such as are contemplated by the bill, it has made a recommendation to this effect—I am just quoting from memory now—that the duties of the department might very well be so arranged that a good deal of the work that formerly devolved upon the minister might be transferred to the heads of departments. Under the former act a good deal of this work that is now done by the minister, unnecessarily I think, would have been assigned to the deputy minister. The hon. gentleman will have noted that we have not provided for a deputy minister; we propose to have instead three commissioners. The work of the department is so extensive that it might very well be divided and a principle of decentralization, if I may so call it, entered upon in the interests of efficiency and the despatch of business. It is the intention, I may say, to transfer a good deal of the work that fell upon the minister —and I think my hon. friend knows just to what extent he was imposed on in that regard —to these three commissioners that are to be appointed.

Mr. STEVENS: I entirely agree with the suggestion that a lot of the work which formerly was performed by the minister should be placed upon the shoulders of responsible officers such as these commissioners. The commission to which I referred was a commission consisting of Messrs. Clarkson, Gordon and Dilworth, and I think the chairman of the Civil Service Commission, the commissioner of taxation, the chief inspector of customs, and one other.

Mr. EULER: One of the auditors.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, a representative of the Auditor General. Would the minister be good enough to lay on the table the report they have made up to the present because I consider that the report of that body is important and will be very helpful to us. I should like to refer also to the observation of the minister, in which I entirely concur, that over a great many years, in fact right along, some duties have been imposed upon the minister which are positively ridiculous. I recall very well that when I entered the department last July there were some eighteen hundred or more reports of seizures—most of them very very trifling ones, some of them relating to a value of three or four dollars, others $10, others $20—some of them of course important but others of the most trifling character; and there they were waiting for the personal signature of the minister. Whether it requires statutory power to remove these from the jurisdiction of the minister or not I am not sure. I know what I did, although my colleague who was acting in my place during my illness signed, I think, the most of these: I took the responsibility of instructing the acting deputy minister to dispose of these before they reached me at all, to make a final decision in the cases. It will be recalled that last year, when we were inquiring into the Customs department, one of the chief grounds for complaint, and the report of the special committee of parliament so found, was that seizures would be made and officers of the department would give them consideration, but before an official departmental finding was made, they would be referred to the minister; and if you will recall the wording of the report I think "an intelligent anticipation of the minister's wishes" was often secured before the finding was finally made by the department. I merely call attention to that for the purpose of emphasizing what in my estimation was one of the greatest weaknesses in the former practice and one which should be corrected in this bill—whether it is or not I am not sure yet—and that is that the responsible officers of the department should make a final decision before a matter is referred to the minister. I would go further and say that that decision should be the only decision called for, except that an appeal might be made to the minister after such finding was made. Then the minister would find himself in this position—which I think would be a much more happy one than under the former procedure—that if an appeal were made to him by business men, or by political friends, or by anyone at all, he would be able to present to those people the final decision of the department in regard to the case—a given seizure we will say—and then, whether he changed that decision or overrode it, he would have to superimpose his finding upon that of the department and would have to take the final responsibility. It is easy to see what would happen. In most of the cases the minister would, in all probability, stand by the department, except perhaps in extreme cases where he was warranted in the light of new evidence in making a modification. And so I say to the minister that in so far as this section of the bill places that responsibility upon the officers of the department it has my entire support.

In subsection 3 of section 2 the division of the department is outlined. I will read it in order to bring it to the attention of the committee:

> The governor in council may appoint three officers who shall be the chief officers of the department, and who shall be designated as follows,—commissioner of customs, commissioner of excise and commissioner of income tax, and an assistant commissioner of customs may also be appointed. Such officers shall have such powers and perform such duties as may, respectively, be assigned to them by the governor in council or the minister, including the powers which by any statute are vested in the deputy head of a department.

I am not sufficiently acquainted with the subsequent sections of this act to recall whether or not the matter which I have already spoken of is covered. Do we by statute fix the rsponsibility for making findings upon these commissioners—that is, findings of a departmental character before reference is made to the minister for ultimate decision? Could the minister tell us that?

Mr. EULER: I would say for the information of my hon. friend that it is not so specifically stated in the bill, but his question is answered by a sentence or two which he himself just read—"such officers shall have such powers and perform such duties as may, respectively, be assigned to them by the governor in council or the minister."

Mr. STEVENS: That is the weakness, and I want the minister, if he will, to please accept this criticism in a spirit of helpfulness; I am not criticising him at all. I think this is a matter that parliament ought to decide. It is a matter that was deeply impressed on my own mind as a result of the investigation last session, as well as from my own brief experience in the department. That is, it should be removed from the power of the minister or of the governor in council from time to time to assign or determine the duties of these officers. I think the duties which they perform are of such great importance that they ought to be fixed by statute; we ought to fix in this statute the responsibilities which these officers shall bear, and among them is the one I have mentioned. For instance, in connection with customs, a definite determination in the matter of the disposal of a seizure should be made by the department, and that should be conclusive except that an appeal might rest to the minister; I have no objection to that. but let there be a decision by the departmental officials before such an appeal is possible. The same thing applies to sales tax, and the same thing would apply, in a measure, I presume, to income tax and excise tax. The principle I am advocating is that the departmental officials should make a decision in all these cases, and if a change in their decision is made, it must be one that shall appear on these documents themselves, as being superimposed upon the department by the ministerial head.

Mr. EULER: I quite appreciate the goodwill of the hon. member in trying to assist us in working out something that will be practicable and in the interests of the department. I think we are both aiming at exactly the same thing. In the clause from which I have just quoted, the governor in council or the minister is given the right to assign certain duties to these commissioners. I may say for the information of the hon. member and of the committee that it is my intention to refer the very matter of which he speaks, that is the matter of seizures, to these commissioners for them to make a decision, but I do not think it would be wise entirely to take away from the minister the final responsibility in any particular case. I understood my hon. friend was in favour of the minister retaining power to make a final decision in case of an appeal.

Mr. STEVENS: Let me put it this way, power to make a revised decision, but let there be first a decision by the department. I shall have to go back over my argument of a moment ago, because I think this is the most important part not only of this bill but in our whole effort to bring this great department back to some proper standard of organization. This is the point: Hitherto decisions have not been made by departmental officers.

Mr. EULER: You are wrong. The officers make the recommendation now before the minister even sees the report.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not wrong; I am decidedly right; in fact, the report last year dwelt upon that, that before a decision would be made the matter would be referred to the minister and his wishes asscertained, and then the decision would be made. We had case after case of that kind before the committee last year, dozens of cases, not of vital importance, but still of such importance as to cause us some apprehension. The departmental officers on the evidence were prepared to make a decision, but did not make it until they had referred the matter to the minister, and then changes and modifications would be made. Now my point is that the officers of this department shall decide independently of the minister and according to law the seizure, or whatever may be the case that comes before them. Then if the party affected considers himself aggrieved, he may make an appeal to the minister, and the minister may review the case. He might say: "I think my officers have been harsh in this matter; I think a penalty of $500 is too high, that $200 should be enough." Very good, but let him then superimpose on the decision already made by the departmental officers and already recorded, his own modification, and then whatever happens in the future, whatever inquiry is made, the minister himself will have to take the responsibility for the change. As it is now, it was disclosed time after time in the investigation that the officer who was supposed to make a decision made a decision that, as the report says, was repugnant to the facts, and very often repugnant to his own views in the case. I do submit to the House that if that practice is not corrected we shall not have accomplished what we ought to accomplish in the light of the evidence that was given before that committee. I do not think it is enough to place in the hands of the minister the power to direct that that practice shall be followed; it ought to be set out in the statute; in other words, the opportunity to make decisions that are not according to law ought to be taken out of the minister's hands. I am very plain in this, and I hope that the committee and the House will in this act correct what I think has been in practice the chief weakness in the whole department.

Mr. EULER: To me it seems to be practically a question as to what method shall be followed. I am not quite sure just what practice was followed in the department prior to my assuming office, but I am quite willing to accept what the hon. member says, that in many instances the minister expressed a desire and the officers made their decision in accordance with that desire, although it may have been contrary to the law or the spirit of the act. I may say for the information of my hon. friend, though, that at the present time, and since I have been in charge of the department, all decisions on seizures are first made by the officers of the department. It may be true—I think it is true—that too many officials are concerned in the decision; that is, the case passes through too many hands before it finally comes to the minister. As a matter of fact, I question very much whether generally speaking seizures should come to the minister at all. As it is now, every seizure that comes to the minister has already been signed by the acting deputy minister. So far as I am concerned, as a matter of practice, it becomes a question whether you want to tie the department down hard and fast by a specific statute, in a matter that is now a matter of practice, so far as I am concerned. Everything in the way of a seizure that comes before me had already been decided by the acting deputy minister. It is quite true that in some instances I review the decisions, and I understand from the hon. gentleman's remarks that he still desires that power to remain with the minister, so it comes down simply to a matter of method. That is the practice that now obtains. The officials of the department make their recommendation, and those decisions come to the minister for final signature. I understand my hon. friend is willing that in any case the minister should still have the final say. That is the case now. But the hon. gentleman desires to go further and make it obligatory by statute that before the minister can take any action whatever the officer of the department shall have made a decision.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, there shall have been a departmental decision.

Mr. EULER: Yes, but he would leave with the minister power to make a change.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, but any change the minister makes, any decision he superimposes, should appear on the K-9. Let me go back a little. The decision now in the form of a K-9 report, drafted by the officers of the department, and recommended by the deputy, is presented to the minister, but that decision is not effective unless the minister signs it. It can be modified or changed before the minister signs it, and in practice frequently it has been changed. That was the main complaint as a result of the inquiry that was held last year, that decisions frequently were changed. My point is this, that the department should make a decision in all these cases without any reference to the minister whatever. If an appeal is made to the minister or any reference to it by the party affected, all right; let the minister have power to review it. He reviews it, but he reviews a signed and fixed document. If he changes it in any way he must assume the responsibility for making a decision opposite to that of the department.

Mr. EULER: Exactly what he is doing.

Mr. STEVENS: I gave instructions to the department to follow that course, and I am glad my hon. friend is adopting the same course. He will find that it will relieve him of a great deal of petty responsibility. I want to see that made obligatory in the statute. I think the present minister is a pretty strong man; I have no hesitation in saying that and I wish him well, but if a weaker minister came in, who might be inclined to play a little with the matter, we might get back to the same chaos as before.

Mr. VENIOT: What about the K-9 form?

Mr. STEVENS: It should be changed.

Mr. GUTHRIE: In glancing over the wording of the act, it seems to me there is some force in the objection taken by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin). Paragraph 1 of section 2 establishes a new department and fixes its name. It is to be called the Department of National Revenue. Why the word "national" is included I do not know. It should I think be called the Department of Revenue. We have the Department of Finance; nobody would ever think of calling it the Department of National Finance. We have a Department of Agriculture; nobody would ever think of calling it the Department of National Agriculture. We have a Department of Public Works and nobody would think of calling it the Department of National Public Works. The word "national" is wholly unnecessary, though in the case of the Department of Defence it might be proper to use the word "national" as distinguished from "imperial", or "local", but in this case I think it is out of place. I do not know why it is included. Is there any reason for retaining it? To my mind it is much better to have a Department of Defence, a Department of Agriculture, a Department of Trade and Commerce and so on. There is a reason for retaining the word "national" in the Department of National Defence.

Mr. EULER: I might say the suggestion made by my hon. friend and by the hon. member for Lincoln was considered, and there is considerable force in it. It was thought perhaps since the revenues that are collected by the department are national in scope the word might be retained. I have no very strong opinion with regard to the matter and ordinarily I think I am of the trend of mind which would like to deal with things in the simplest terms possible, but it was felt by the government that perhaps the term "national revenue" carried with it just a little more dignity, if you like, and conveyed the thought that it was national in its nature. For that reason the name was kept and is printed in the bill, although there was some talk of striking it out. I have come to the conclusion the word "national" is a little more suitable than the other, although I have no strong convictions.

Mr. MANION: How many more positions does this make, if any more? I know there was a commissioner of customs and a commisisoner of income tax. Does this increase the number of highly paid civil servants? I am not particularly criticising any part of it. As far as the gentleman who has been appointed is concerned, Mr. Breadner, I think the whole House has a high respect for his great ability, but is there an increase in these commissioners?

Mr. EULER: I cannot give the exact figures. I do not think there is any increase at all, so far as expense is concerned.

Mr. HANSON: Is there a commissioner of excise?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. HANSON: I think this means another deputy.

Mr. EULER: No.

Mr. MANION: That was the point that struck me. Then in regard to the assistant commissioner, perhaps there has been an assistant to the commissioner of customs. I presume that would not increase the number, but does the minister know if this is going to increase the number. Mr. Breadner has been in charge of the income tax. Are the other men who have been appointed officers who have been in like positions, or are they taking the places of men who have been in like positions?

Mr. EULER: Perhaps it is a little premature to speak of the personnel, because none of the men has been appointed, although I am quite willing to say that it is the intention to appoint Mr. Breadner as the commissioner of customs. He is now receiving a certain salary and will receive the same salary as commissioner of customs. When Mr. Taylor becomes commissioner of excise, he will receive a slight increase.

Mr. MANION: He was in the employ before?

Mr. EULER: Yes, as assistant deputy minister. The new commissioner of income tax will receive $3,500 less than Mr. Breadner receives as such commissioner.

Mr. MANION: I am not arguing particularly about the personnel, but taking the salaries, is there to be an increase?

Mr. EULER: Not an increase of salary.

Mr. MANION: Speaking collectively, in regard to the four positions, were the salaries paid to these men the same as will be paid after this bill comes into force; will there be increases in the salaries which we pay for the work being done?

Mr. EULER: Practically no new men have been added. As the reorganization of the department proceeds, and if we find it necessary to add other efficient men, I would not like to say we would not pay something more, because I intend it shall be done if advisable. I have not before me the exact figures of the salaries paid these men and I do not know whether it is going to mean a few hundred dollars more or less, but I am quite sure it will mean very little increase, if any at all.

Mr. MANION: That is really what I am trying to get at. I am not going to criticise the minister if he finds it necessary, in carrying out the work of the department efficiently, to pay a few hundred dollars more. But as I have pointed out before in this chamber, we have been increasing our civil service for very many years. When Mr. Crerar was in the House he took the matter up and discussed the figures for the different departments. I am not sure that the Minister of Customs did not back him up in regard to the great increase from year to year, going back twenty years. There was of course a gradual increase in the civil service, but I do not mean to criticise the civil service and do not wish to be put in that position. I have been here for ten years and I have noticed that every year there seems to be an increase. Instead of increases, I think, as we get away from the war, we should be cutting down the numbers in the service. I do not mean that officials should necessarily be discharged. I pointed out a way in which it could be done by not replacing men who had passed away, resigned, and so forth. In this way gradually we could lessen the civil service and bring it to a hunderd per cent efficiency. Formerly the income and sales taxes were being collected, and the customs and excise were being collected as at present. In other words, there has not been any increase in the duties.

Mr. EULER: Oh, yes.

Mr. MANION: I do not see why there should be an increase. We were collecting all these taxes formerly.

Mr. EULER: Not all of them.

Mr. MANION: According to the Minister of Finance, we are cutting down the sales tax and the income tax and there should be some lessening on that account. In my opinion, we should not go on year after year increasing the civil service of this country, and particularly highly paid civil servants. I think to-day we are plentifully supplied and over supplied with well paid civil servants. I think the minister, in carrying out the terms of the act, should keep in view the suggestions I make, because I may tell him frankly that I have a kindly feeling towards him. If after the act comes into force it means more jobs, or some new jobs for friends—I do not mean his friends particularly—I am going to criticise the department. I am not particularly blaming his government for doing it. Before the war all governments could afford to make positions, and they all did, but to-day it is the desire of the people to cut down the taxation that is pressing on them so heavily, and the only way is by keeping down the expenses of government. Fortunately we are improving and enjoying a reasonable amount of prosperity, due to a bountiful harvest and to other factors, which has made it easier for the Minister of Finance to collect large revenues, although he is always telling us that he is reducing taxation. But when we strike a period of depression we will find it doubly hard to pay for any increased staff. I submit again that the minister should make every effort to carry out the purpose of this bill in such a way as not to add to the public charges, because it is the desire not only of our business men but of the people generally to do everything they can to reduce the number of high priced officials, and to get along even without low priced officials where they are not necessary, in order that the expenses of government may be kept within bounds.

Mr. EULER: I assure my hon. friend and the committee generally that I welcome any criticism and any suggestions, but I am rather surprised that the criticism should take this form.

Mr. MANION: It is rather a suggestion than a criticism.

Mr. EULER: There is no disposition to add to the cost of the service. Let me draw the attention of hon. members to the clause under debate. We are proposing to appoint three commissioners and one assistant commissioner, who will be charged with improving the administration of the department, and assuredly it has been under severe criticism. I may tell hon. members, including my hon. friends on the other side, that I am earnestly desirous to have the department conducted in the most businesslike way that is possible.

Mr. MANION: Hear, hear!

Mr. EULER: That is my intention. I would be very glad if my hon. friends would criticise or make suggestions with regard to the scheme itself, that is, dividing the work of the department into three main branches, placing one commissioner, who is an expert in his own way, at the head of each of those branches, and an assistant commissioner of customs, investing each with full responsibility. Is there any criticism that in this I am adding too much to the expense of the department? I think not. It seems to me that the criticism might very well be confined to a discussion of what is actually proposed in the reorganization of the department. As I said before, if it becomes necessary to add other officers, and it may be, I shall have no hesitation in asking the Civil Service Commission for additional assistants, but I do not propose for one moment to permit the Customs department or the Excise department, or the Department of National Revenue if you like, to become a sort of refuge for politicians. What is proposed is entirely with one thought only—to put the department on a sound business basis. I repeat, there has been too much centralization, everything has been "funnelled" towards the minister, with the result that he has had to deal with a great many trivial things with which he should not be troubled at all. I propose that the work shall be divided with a responsible head put in control of each branch, without too much interference from the man at the top. I hope it is a good solution of the situation. I believe it is, and I should like to try to work it out.

Mr. HANSON: Will the minister give us similar assurance with respect to the outside service, because I observe in my province that that service is being made a place of refuge for political friends, and this has been done since the minister took office. If he wants concrete illustrations I will furnish them to him.

Mr. EULER: I should like to have them.

Mr. HANSON: I do not want to mention names across the floor.

Mr. EULER: I should like to know of any such cases.

Mr. HANSON: The defeated candidate in the county of Victoria-Carleton in the late election has been appointed to a position in the department. I am not criticising the appointment—he was an ex-sheriff and, I believe, will make a good officer.

Mr. EULER: That is the answer.

Mr. HANSON: But he was appointed because he was a defeated candidate.

Mr. CANNON: No, in spite of that.

Mr. CHAPLIN: In confirmation of the remarks made by my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) I want to say to the minister that owing to the action of a former minister it was impossible to have a suit brought against a delinquent for sales tax unless the minister prsonally agreed to such action being taken. Is not that so? Now, under this clause the minister is still left absolutely in control. My hon. friend in speaking about the matter said that when a man became delinquent in payment of taxation suit should be entered against him irrespective of the minister's authorization; the case should be proceeded with as a matter of right to the country. I happened to be in charge of the department for a time and I found hundreds and hundreds, yes, thousands of cases where people in arrears with their sales tax for months had not been proceeded against.

Mr. EULER: Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to embarrass the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin), but as acting minister of the department for a month or two he knows the difficulties in collecting the sales tax. I am not speaking by the book, but I suppose there are some 1,700 or 1,800 overdue sales tax accounts. If, as he says, the officers should be permitted in all cases to bring suit without reference to the minister whatever, I am surprised that he did not issue orders to that effect.

Mr. STEVENS: They were given.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I issued such an order and had it put on file.

Mr. EULER: Generally speaking, I think that course should be followed, and it will be in future; but my hon. friend knows there are many cases of arrears in which it is almost impossible to bring suit successfully, and these cases constitute a very serious problem.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I admit there are lots of cases where the accounts are absolutely outlawed, the delinquents having gone out of business.

Mr. EULER: The accounts are not outlawed.

Mr. CHAPLIN: They are outlawed because of the fact that those in default have gone out of business, and there is no more chance of collecting the arrears than there is of getting a snowball of last winter.

Mr. EULER: I am referring to those men who are still in business. He knows as well as I do that in such cases we are not always justified in bringing suit and putting men out of business.

Mr. STEVENS: I appreciate what the minister says, but he still—

Mr. EULER: I get the hon. member's point.

Mr. STEVENS: He gets my point, but he will not admit it. My colleague and myself both gave instructions to the officers of the department that, where in their opinion it was wise to take action, they should do so without reference to the minister. Let me read the report. I quoted it pretty accurately, but not the exact language. This is the report which was recommended to the House by the committee of last year. I am not going to refer to the reflections which it contains regarding certain officers. I will pass over that and come to the findings:

> The committee finds that this procedure—

That is the one outlined, which is cited in the report and which has been followed for so many years.

> —was not followed. Although, as a rule, the facts are correctly recited in the summary submitted to the minister, the opinion is not infrequently at variance with such facts, and the recommendation is so drawn as to elicit a decision to which such facts are repugnant. This discrepancy is accounted for by the fact that the report upon the evidence was in many instances preceded by a conference, and the recommendation was dictated by an intelligent anticipation of the minister's wishes in the premises.

Section 8 of the report goes on to say—and this is the point which I really wish to make:

> The committee is of opinion that the administrative duties of the Department of Customs and Excise should be left to the executive officers of the department.

Then it adds:

> Where the value of the goods or the amount in question is $200 or more the procedure should be automatic and not subject to ministerial interference or control.

What we are asking and what I am urging—and if this is not accepted by parliament I shall consider that the work of that committee of last year will be largely a failure—is that in all matters of routine procedure, such as dealing with seizures, the decision should be left to the executive heads of the department, and that the statute, which as a matter of fact does not permit this at present, should be amended so that the executive heads of the department shall make the decision. I have no objection to an appeal being made to the Treasury Board, the minister, the governor general in council, or a body of that kind, but such appeals would be very few if the department made the decision first. I was endeavouring to devise a suggested amendment but I have not yet been able to do so. It is a very complicated matter. What I was going to suggest to the minister was that in section 3 which designates the three commissioners and says that—

> Such officers shall have such powers and perform such duties as may, respectively, be assigned to them by the governor in council or the minister

—we should make clear the recommendation of the committee of last year, that is, that decisions in all matters of seizures and questions of prosecution for delinquent taxes should be made by the executive heads of the department. I do not mean that we should pass a statute legislating the minister out of any part in the matter, but I would have the appeal to the minister come after the decision and not before. That is the point I am making. Further, prior to the time that I entered the office, the practice was to undertake no prosecution without the specific instructions of the minister. Undoubtedly the practice over half a century had been that the minister would hear and allow himself to be approached by those affected, friends or otherwise, before he would issue authority to prosecute. My point is that that is too difficult a position to put any minister into where such a large number of cases are involved and that without reference to the minister action should be taken where the law is violated, if in the judgment of the executive it is desirable to take such action. Then if reference is made to the minister he can review the case after action has been taken.

Mr. EULER: As regards the effect, I think the hon. gentleman and I are in entire accord, because the clause states:

> Such officers shall have such powers and perform such duties as may, respectively, be assigned to them by the governor in council or the minister.

Under that power I propose to give the commissioners exactly that authority of which my hon. friend now speaks. I am rather surprised and disappointed that he is not accepting my suggestion. As regards the suggestion that the minister should divest himself entirely of the responsibility which should rest on every minister, I should not like to accede to that. It seems to me that with this provision and the intention—and there is the expressed intention to give to these commissioners the power which my hon. friend wants to have conferred specifically by statute—we should be content. It is a matter of opinion. I feel at the moment we should not carry it any further than that, because after all we have a responsibility in the matter.

Mr. STEVENS: I may say that instructions to that effect were given last summer in writing by myself and my colleague to the acting deputy minister, Mr. Taylor. That is all right, but the minister, I thought, would concede the point that it would be better to make this statutory than to leave it a question of the opinion of a minister. The minister must dissociate himself from this thing, because this is something we are going to carry on as a matter of policy in this country, whoever may happen to be minister. My point is that it should be made a part of the statute; that the appeal to the minister should not be removed, but should come after the decision and not before.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Does my hon. friend mean a decision in writing by the official?

Mr. STEVENS: Unquestionably.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Then what prevents the official, even if he has the statutory power, from consulting with the minister before giving his decision in writing?

Mr. STEVENS: Nothing whatever.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Sir EUGENE FISET: Then the statutory power the hon. member suggests is useless.

Mr. STEVENS: No. If my hon. friend will follow me he will see my point. First, the department or the commissioner will have to take the full responsibility of the decision. There will be no excuse as there was last year when we examined into scores of these cases, where the invariable answer was: Well I consulted with the minister and the minister instructed me so to do. If the matter were statutory, the official would have to assume full responsibility for his written decision. If the minister wished any other decision made he would have to put it in writing equally as clearly after the first decision by the departmental officer, and he would have to assume full responsibility for his written decision.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I quite realize that, but what prevents the official, before he gives his written decision, from consulting with the minister? Nothing whatever.

Mr. STEVENS: But if he is called in question he cannot hide behind the minister. He must stand by his written decision because the law would lay that responsibility upon him.

Sir EUGENE FISET: But his written decision may have been affected by his consultation with the minister. I have had some experience in the matter.

Mr. STEVENS: He cannot take refuge in the statement that he consulted his minister and the minister so instructed him. If I had my way the minister would have no right to instruct his officers. That is the point I am making. As the matter stands now I could go down to the Customs department and blindly pick out literally hundreds of decisions as regards which, if you cornered the official and asked him why he made the decision, he would tell you he made it after consultation with the minister.

Sir EUGENE FISET: How can you carry on otherwise? If you prevent an official of the department from consulting with his minister, I do not see how the work can be carried on. Two-thirds of the decisions given by deputy ministers or other high officials of any department, especially in important cases, are given after consultation with the minister. I do not see how you could possibly have it otherwise.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not trying to prevent that, but I would fix the responsibility. I would say further that when I went into that office there were some 2,200 of these documents piled on tables waiting for the decision of the minister. I became ill trying to catch up with them and my hon. friend took up the task while I was in the hospital.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Could you not account for that by the fact that the inquiry was proceeding at that time?

Mr. STEVENS: No, my hon. friend is wrong. These were ordinary routine seizures, involving trivial amounts such as $2, $5, a pair of silk stockings and I remember one seizure of a bonnet which was smuggled in. Yet the minister who happened to be there at the time was supposed to sign every one of those seizures before they could be disposed of. My point is that form K-9 should be changed so that all such matters would be disposed of by the signature of the commissioner, and the minister would never see them unless the decision of the commissioner was appealed.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I am not criticising the suggestion of my hon. friend, but that does not need to be fixed by statute. Surely you have sufficient confidence in a minister of the crown to allow him to give the necessary instructions, either through orders in council or by departmental rules.

Mr. STEVENS: I have confidence in this minister, of course, and I think so long as he is there that will be done. I am equally persuaded of this fact, though, that as we drift away from this controversy which arose last year, affairs in the department may revert to their previous condition. Let me read what the final report of the special committee contained:

> The evidence submitted to the committee leads to the general conclusion that for a long time the Department of Customs and Excise had been slowly degenerating in efficiency....

I want to try, by statutory arrangement, to minimize that tendency to slow degeneration, and I want to say very frankly that I have every confidence in the present minister. But he knows very well, as we all know, that like others he will leave that office and others will step in. They may come from this side of the House or the other side; I do not care what their politics may be; familiarity breeds contempt, and I want to surround that department from the experience of the past with such safeguards as will very largely eliminate that tendency. Let me state further that a high official of the government such as the commissioner of customs, and his immediate assistants, in handling these matters of routine day after day is more likely to be precise and exact than is the minister who is open to appeal from his friends all over the country, and to whom people believe they have a right to appeal. I am not even going to prevent that, but if I have my way the decision of the executive officers of the department, of the professional staff if you like, shall be definitely given before the minister has an opportunity to change it. That is my point.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Referring to subsection 4 of section 2 I would ask how this bill affects the status of the present employees of this department, because I do not see anything at all in the bill which maintains their standing. I suppose it is the intention of the government that those who are now employed shall continue to be employed by the new department, and that it will not be necessary to reappoint those officials who are in office at present. There is another matter, in connection with the salaries of the employees of this and other departments. If we can believe reports which appeared in the Ottawa papers, the Prime Minister stated the night before the election that there would be a salary revision and that it would be brought up at this session, but so far we have seen no evidence of it, and it is now suggested that it will be left over until a later time, I think that would be most unfair; the matter has been too long delayed already. In supporting the remarks of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) I would suggest to the minister that while it is necessary in the reorganization of the department to cut out all the dead wood, at the same time those men who remain in the service should receive a fair and adequate salary. I believe they should receive reasonable salaries in any event, which is not the case with some of them at the present.

Mr. RINFRET: The question now raised by my hon. friend has no direct connection with this bill, since it concerns the civil service at large. The salary revision is now under consideration and will be dealt with in due course.

Mr. EULER: I might say to my hon. friend that the passing of this act has no effect whatever on the officials now employed by the department; they remain in just the same position.

Mr. McQUARRIE: What section preserves their status?

Mr. EULER: There is nothing to change it.

Mr. McQUARRIE: The Customs and Excise Act is repealed; what act justifies their retention in office?

Mr. EULER: I do not know what reply I can make except to say that none of the rights of the officers of the department is assailed in any respect by this act. They remain members of the civil service, subject to its regulations, and they will receive the salaries they received previously. Their position is not altered in any respect.

Mr. KENNEDY: I would like to back up the suggestion made by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). After last session I cannot help but feel that a great many of the decisions made in the department for some years before the investigation would never have been made at all if the deputy minister had been responsible for them, and if the minister had to accept sole responsibility for any reversal of that decision. A great deal of the trouble seemed to arise because of the fact that responsibility was not fixed in that way. I do not see any reason why a minister should have to deal with the routine business of the department; I do not believe he has the time and I do not believe he is half so well qualified to do so as the deputy minister, I believe the minister would save himself a good deal of trouble if he would adopt that suggestion. It was perfectly obvious from the evidence last year that the minister was constantly bothered with people who were supposed to have influence with him in dealing with cases connected with smuggling. It appeared to be a regular thing for people who were influential in the party to which the minister belonged to plead with him in connection with these cases. I do not know why that consideration should obtain at all in a case concerning smuggling or a breach of the law. It was simply an effort to use political influence in order to have the fine or penalty made smaller, and for that reason I believe the routine business and the decisions so far as possible should be attended to by the deputy minister, who should take the responsibility. Then if the minister wishes to reverse that decision he may do so, and in so doing clear the deputy minister of all responsibility.

Mr. EULER: I do not want to prolong the discussion, but I would not like the impression to go abroad—which might happen from the remarks of my hon. friend—that it is not the intention of the department in future to have the decisions made by the commissioner of customs, we will say. It is the intention of the department that the minister shall make these decisions—in fact that these cases shall never come to the minister for decision at all.

Mr. CHAPLIN: You said it was intended that the minister should make the decision.

Mr. EULER: I meant to say it was the intention that the commissioner shall make the decision. It is not the intention in actual practice that the decision shall finally come to the minister at all. I think my hon. friends who were in office will agree that it is merely a matter of procedure. I should like to inform my hon. friend from Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) that as a matter of fact the words in the bill provide for that very thing:

Such officers—

That is the commissioners.

—shall have such powers and perform such duties as may, respectively, be assigned to them by the governor in council or the minister—

And so on. Those are exactly the powers that we propose to assign to these commissioners—that they shall make these decisions and that such decisions shall be final. There is, of course, an appeal to the minister, as is advocated by my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). I think after all there is very little difference between what he advocates and what is proposed here by myself: It is merely a matter of method.

The question was raised by the member for Rimouski (Sir Eugene Fiset) that there is nothing to prevent a commissioner, if he likes, from going to the minister and getting his opinion as to what sort of decision he wants made on a certain seizure. I should like to say to my hon. friend that if that commissioner can be influenced by his minister to make a wrongful decision he will not be very much afraid of what his minister may do, because after all he is entirely under the control of that minister. If that commissioner is of such a mind that he will do things wrongly asked of him by the minister he is not very apt to be very much concerned as to the right or wrong of what he does, because he has the protection, and he is entitled to it, of the minister who asked him to do that wrong thing. In connection with that point I should like to say that I think it is not unfair to ask, after all, that where there is responsible government we must place a certain faith and a certain confidence in the minister in charge of the department. There is a certain responsibility that ministers must assume, and if they disregard that responsibility, or if they violate the trust that is placed in them, they are responsible to the people and to the parliament of Canada, and will be dealt with. For that reason, and believing that the result we both aim at will be accomplished under this bill, I do not really feel inclined to accept any modification of the measure as it stands now.

Mr. STEVENS: I think I can see a very happy way out of this little difficulty, and I should not like to pass this clause with any feeling that either myself or any other members of the committee were not fully satisfied. Would the minister consider amending the Customs Act—I think the same thing would apply to the Excise Act—particularly such sections as 174, 175, 176 and 177 which deal with this very question? I have not the act itself under my hand, but there is a résumé of it in paragraph 7 of the report of the committee of investigation of last year. I will read this briefly and then the committee will see exactly what my point is.

Mr. EULER: What are the sections of the act?

Mr. STEVENS: I am going to quote paragraph 7 of the report of the special parliamentary committee, if the minister has it.

Mr. EULER: But referring to what sections of the Customs Act?

Mr. STEVENS: Sections 174, 175, 176 and 177. The paragraph which I desire to quote reads as follows:

> Upon making a seizure the collector or seizing officer forthwith reports the circumstances of the case to the commissioner of customs (section 174). Thereupon the commissioner notifies the owner or claimant of the thing seized, stating the reasons for the seizure, and calls upon such owner or claimant to furnish within thirty days any evidence he may desire to submit. (section 175). After the expiration of thirty days or sooner, if evidence is forthcoming on the part of the owner or claimant, "the commissioner may consider and weigh the circumstances of the case and report his opinion and recommendation thereon to the minister".

I pause here to suggest that instead of saying that it should be amended to say "he shall thereupon make his decision." That is, instead of the commissioner reporting his opinion and recommendations, he shall make a decision on this evidence. That is section 176. I continue reading:

> The minister thereupon either gives his decision and states the terms upon which the thing seized or detained may be released or the penalty or forfeiture remitted or refers the decision to the court (section 177).

Now my point is this. The minister should amend the act so as to impose the responsibility for the decision upon the commissioner, and then add a clause to provide that the claimant may make an appeal to the minister or to the governor in council—to whatever body he may choose. But if the committee can get my idea of this matter, and if the minister himself would appreciate it, I think it will save untold trouble in the future. That is let the officers of the department decide under the law and by the law what the disposition of the case shall be. Let there be an appeal to the government through the minister, or to the minister himself if he will, but let the officer make the decision. If the minister would agree to bring in an amendment to the act to give effect to these suggestions I think that would meet the case entirely.

Mr. EULER: Am I correct in assuming that the suggestion is that instead of making the proposed change in the bill under discussion it should be made in the Customs Act?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. EULER: I may say to my hon. friend that I introduced a bill yesterday dealing with certain amendments to the Excise Act. Another one will be introduced dealing with amendments to the Customs Act, and if he is content to let this bill pass in its present form I am willing to take his suggestions into consideration when the customs and excise acts are under consideration. Will that be satisfactory?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. I believe the minister is sympathetic towards my viewpoint and that he wants to accomplish the same end as I do.

Mr. EULER: Absolutely. I will give consideration to my hon. friend's suggestion.

Mr. MATTHEWS: Before the clause passes I should like to express my pleasure that a scheme of this kind has been drawn up, and that provision is now being made for the collection of the revenues of the country. The proposal brought in under this clause seems to me to be a business proposal such as we would expect from a man of the efficiency of the hon. minister, and I am very glad to see that he has made this provision for the collection of the national revenue. To my mind one of the great faults in our administration is the lax way in which these revenues have been collected. The machinery is now being provided for correcting that, and I believe that under the minister it will be put into force. I want to express my pleasure that this is being done because I believe it will result in greater efficiency in collecting the revenues.

Mr. EVANS: I am not satisfied that the point with respect to the exercise of power by the minister has been cleared up. It seems to me that the minister may give a decision and in doing so go entirely beyond a strict interpretation of the law. I think the inquiry conducted last year demonstrated the fact that a great many decisions made were of that character. Such a thing as that tends to weaken the whole act. I do not believe the minister himself would wish to have such a power. I think it is not too much to say that years ago ministerial decisions were made simply from the point of view of political expediency. In my opinion the point ought to be satisfactorily cleared up, instead of allowing something to be enacted which would have the effect of weakening the entire act.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Powers and duties of minister.

Mr. EULER: This is the same as in the old act.

Section agreed to.

Section 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Minister of National Revenue substituted for Minister of Customs and Excise, etc.

Mr. STEVENS: I have a suggestion to make to the minister. It will be noted that this and other clauses in the bill change the designation of the minister and of certain acts. The revising of the statutes is going on at the present time, and I would like to ask if any care has been taken to see that the revised statutes are made to harmonize with these changes? It would be rather ridiculous that we should have a revision of the statutes covering a long period of time if the revision did not take note of the changes made in nomenclature by this legislation; in that case, the revision would not be up to date. For instance, clause 5 substitutes "the Minister of National Revenue" for "the Minister of Customs and Excise", and it refers also to the Business Profits War Tax Act, the Income War Tax Act, the Customs Act and the Excise Act. These are some of our chief statutes, and I think immediate attention should be given to see that any changes made in the designation of these statutes are followed in the revised statutes.

Mr. EULER: The bill was drawn up by the law officers of the crown, and clauses 5, 6 and 7 are inserted specifically for the purpose of making them harmonize with related statutes.

[Mr. Matthews.]

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, but see the confusion if the revised statutes come down with the old nomenclature. For instance, the Minister of Customs would be referred to all through the revised statutes, and here we have a statute changing that designation.

Mr. EULER: I can assure my hon. friend that I will bear that point in mind and take the necessary precautions.

Section 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Acts repealed.

Mr. STEVENS: This repeals the statutes, I understand, creating the Department of Customs and Excise?

Mr. EULER: Yes, in accordance with the creating of new officials.

Bill reported.

Mr. STEVENS: I am going to ask the minister if he would be good enough to endeavour to bring down at the next sitting of the House, before the third reading is taken, the two amendments to the Excise Act and the Customs Act, and give consideration to the proposals we have made.

Mr. EULER: The Excise Act amendment was introduced yesterday.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, but would the minister give consideration to the proposals we have made and give an expression of opinion regarding them?

Mr. EULER: I will do that.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REFUNDING OF FINANCIAL OBLIGATIONS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure respecting the Canadian National Railways to provide for the refunding of certain maturing financial obligations, and to issue substituted securities therefor guaranteed by the Dominion as to principal and interest, but not exceeding $20,000,000, the aggregate face value of the original securities.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, this resolution precedes the bill which I hope to introduce immediately to provide for the refunding of $20,000,000 of three-year four and one-half per cent notes issued three years ago by the Canadian National and guaranteed by the government. There is no general provision for refunding Canadian National maturing securities, and hence it is necessary to come to the House and secure authority with respect to each issue as it matures.

Mr. STEVENS: Of course, these refunding securities will be issued in the name of the Canadian National and be guaranteed by the government?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, as are the securities which are being refunded. They are Canadian National guaranteed securities.

Mr. STEVENS: Is it the intention to issue notes or bonds?

Mr. DUNNING: That will be quite open under the legislation. We are hoping to refund in the form of bonds, but there is no obligation to adopt either form. It depends on which method of financing proves to be best under the circumstances, and it is subject to the approval of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. STEVENS: The government is not in a position to advise whether the refunding securities will be just temporary financing or bonds issued for a considerable term?

Mr. DUNNING: I am not in a position to advise as to that. These securities mature in the month of July, I think, at all events, in one of the summer months, and definite arrangements for re-financing have not yet been made, and cannot be made until the authority asked for by this resolution is given.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 121, respecting the Canadian National Railways and to provide for the refunding of certain maturing financial obligations.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DEBTS DUE THE CROWN

ADJUSTMENT OR DISCHARGE OF AMOUNTS DUE ON SEED GRAIN AND OTHER ADVANCES

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure respecting certain debts due the crown, to provide that the governor in council shall have power to make regulations providing for the apportionment and adjustment of indebtedness incurred for advances of seed grain, fodder for animals and other relief, and to discharge and release in whole or in part any moneys due to His Majesty in respect of either principal or interest or both, as may be considered equitable in the circumstances.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This resolution undoubtedly deputes fairly wide power to the governor in council, but the negotiations will be carried on with the provincial governments, the municipalities and the loan companies. It has to do with advances that were made for seed grain and relief over a long term of years. Of course where the security has been taken and registered the crown usually gets all the money that accrues from the sale of any of the properties. In many cases the matter of adjusting these old accounts is difficult because of foreclosure proceedings having been taken by loan companies. In the southern portion of Alberta and Saskatchewan we made a new experiment. We set aside a portion of the land in those provinces that was homesteaded, and upon which in many cases the patent was earned, and to the settlers on these lands a considerable sum of money was advanced for seed grain, for fodder and for other relief. But we are undertaking now, under a commission representative of the federal and provincial governments to induce the settlers on that area to discontinue agricultural pursuits and to go back to the old and tried business of ranching. This transformation has caused a good deal of trouble. I suppose seventy-five per cent of the settlers have abandoned the land, and it becomes a question of arranging an amicable adjustment of the indebtedness. There is indebtedness to machine companies, to banks, to mortgage loan companies, and indebtedness in taxation to the provincial government. The bill is intended to give the department power to deal with just such cases as that, to forego, should it be considered advisable, our right to the full indebtedness. In many cases the federal government does not get the full indebtedness and the whole thing is tied up.

Mr. STEVENS: At present has the government a prior charge?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In many cases we have. Some more recent advances since 1915 are not prior liens; the advances made since that time, by the municipalities particularly, rank with other creditors. The loans made in 1915, however, are prior liens. The object of the measure is to give us power to negotiate with the provinces, the municipalities and the loan companies, which are the three bodies that hold encumbrances against the lands in question. I would have preferred to have the act do what we will have to do largely by regulation, but on account of the difficulty of that we are asking for fairly wide powers. As we are not dealing with individuals but with municipalities and provinces, it is necessary to have this power without handicap in order that the indebtedness registered against these lands may be adjusted.

Mr. KENNEDY: How much money is involved?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am unable to say offhand. I think the last report we had placed it in the neighbourhood of almost a million dollars. There is, of course, in addition the indebtedness against the pre-emption land.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I understood the minister to say that this provision was made to take care of a condition in southern Alberta and southern Saskatchewan. Does it also apply to lands situated elsewhere in those provinces?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It would be general, yes. It would apply to all lands upon which loans have been made for fodder, relief, or seed grain, no matter where located, but they are principally in the southern parts of those provinces.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I had in mind land that had been taken over by the municipality under tax sale proceedings. I have had several cases referred to me for adjustment by the department, and the department said they had no authority under the act to do anything. Would such cases be covered?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, that is exactly the kind of case we are covering in this act.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Where does the government stand in regard to loan companies? I presume in all cases the government claim is prior to that of loan companies.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, in 1915 priority was taken by the act over all encumbrances, but there are some cases since then in which that priority was not taken, relief being issued jointly with the province. There are not, however, many such cases. Most of the cases that are difficult to settle are those in which by act of parliament a priority of lien was taken by the government for the advance.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I presume that in cases where the loan companies' claims are prior to those of the government they would hardly agree to surrender a share of their equity to the government; on the contrary, in cases where the government's claims have precedence this bill, it seems to me, proposes to give the loan companies a share in those prior claims.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In the case mentioned by my hon. friend from Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael), the government have priority of lien against all comers, so anything we are willing to forego is really a concession to the province or to the municipality, and in some cases it might be a concession to the loan companies.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the minister be good enough to have a statement prepared covering these different classes of obligations and lay it on the table before the bill is dealt with? I think with that information before us we could deal with the matter very much more intelligently.

Mr. EVANS: I should like to bring to the attention of the minister certain cases where tenants bought seed grain and fodder without the consent of the owners of the land, with consequent hardship to the latter. Will those cases be dealt with under this bill?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There are some cases where registration has been made against the property without the consent or knowledge of the owner. In 1914 or 1915 seed grain was issued fairly rapidly, and the security taken later, with the result that in many cases we found that the owners declined to assume liability. As the crop was growing we had to register a lien against the property. But I think it goes without saying that some owners were quite unaware of the transaction. However, having a registered claim against the property for the issue of seed grain, whether the owner was notified or not, we have no authority to give any consideration, but must collect the full amount if it can be obtained from the property. The provincial authorities now take charge of the distribution and make certain that the owner is cognizant of the fact that an issue is being made to the tenant for fodder or seed grain.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Is there any time limit?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This comes into effect only when there is an adjustment on the property. We do not make adjustments until the property is sought to be disposed of. We try to collect, of course, but it is rather a hopeless job.

Resolution reported, read the second time, and concurred in. Mr. Stewart (Edmonton) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 122, respecting certain debts due the crown.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT, 1920, AMENDMENT

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Health) moved the second reading of Bill No. 105, to amend the Food and Drugs Act, 1920.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Definitions—"Dominion analyst"—"Drug."

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, will the minister be good enough to give an explanation of these clauses?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is proposed to define the term "Dominion analyst." We have many officers in the department who under the civil service regulations are classified as chemists, or in some other way. Under this amendment it will be within the power of the lieutenant-governor in council to designate who shall be an analyst, including the chief dominion analyst and the assistant chief dominion analyst.

Mr. STEVENS: Would this place it within the power of the government to designate a druggist or chemist anywhere in the country as an analyst for the purpose of this act?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, it would give us that power.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister explain the reason for sub-clause (2)?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is proposed to extend the definition of the word "drug" to include the use of antiseptics and prophylactics, such as vaccines.

Mr. STEVENS: This is a technical subject and I am sure not many of us are familiar with it. What is the need or the demand for this?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The original definition read:

"Drug" includes all medicines for internal or external use for man or animal.

It is considered by the departmental officials that that definition is not wide enough in itself and we propose to amend it to read as follows:

"Drug" includes all medicine for internal or external use for man or animal; and any substance or mixture of substances intended to be used for the treatment, mitigation or prevention of disease in man or animal.

By the addition to the section of these words, antiseptics and prophylactics such as vaccines would be considered as drugs and I think it is essential that they should be included.

Mr. ADSHEAD: According to this definition a mustard plaster would be included.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): A mustard plaster would be all right.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): A better way would be to include all drugs as contained in some standard book.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That would not give the extent or width that is desired by the department. The British Pharmacopœia would not give you what you wish. Many drugs are being used that are not included in it.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Antiseptics are as old as the hills.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Under the present definition neither antiseptics nor prophylactics such as vaccines would be considered as drugs. At least that is the opinion of departmental officials who have been administering the act.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Regulations.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This is an important clause, dealing with the standardization of certain patent drugs. In the act as it exists to-day section 4 reads:

Recognized in the latest edition of the British Pharmacopoeia; or, recognized in the latest edition of any foreign pharmacopoeia; or which is not recognized in any pharmacopoeia but is found in some generally recognized standard work on materia medica or drugs.

It is proposed by this amendment to bring in a schedule and this would provide for a standardization outside of what is known as the usual pharmacopœia standardization. If the hon. member will refer to schedule B, he will find that the drugs mentioned there are very potent, such as strophanthus, digitalis, ergot and other vegetable preparations, pituitrin, thyroid, adrenalin and so on. It has been found in modern practice that in order to arrive at a proper standardization for these drugs certain biological tests must be made. It is the purpose of this clause to provide that standards will be set up through biological tests and that those who are engaged in the manufacture of these drugs shall be licensed, shall have proper laboratories, and shall be subject to inspection. It is further provided that each batch of the drugs made in those laboratories shall be subject to examination by the laboratories of the Department of Health. This, I think, meets with the approval of the profession, because it is essential that these drugs shall have a standard. It will also meet with the approval of those who are engaged in the manufacture of these drugs, and the people generally will benefit by having better drugs.

Mr. STEVENS: For the last fifteen or sixteen years I have been strongly in favour of strengthening the hands of the department in connection with this Food and Drugs Act. I am, however, aware that it is possible to abuse a good thing. I am not suggesting that this act does so abuse that privilege, but what gives me a little concern is this: we have an act at present that is exceedingly technical. I confess it is beyond my capacity to pass any reasonable judgment on the sections as we come to them. On former occasions we usually referred this act to a special committee of the House, drafting into that committee a number of medical men and others who had some technical knowledge of the subject. It occurs to me that unless some of our professional men are in their seats and have given some study to this legislation, most of us will be acting pretty much in the dark. Moreover, this legislation undoubtedly affects those who manufacture these various serums, drugs and so on, and I recall in the past some very bitter controversies over the drafting of some previous amendments to the act. Some of these amendments I supported, some of them I strongly opposed. I am not in a position to express an opinion now, but I really think it would have been better if this act had gone to a special committee where it could have been given that detailed consideration which it merits.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): While I would do anything to strengthen the hands of the department, yet I think on reading over certain clauses of this bill it is quite drastic, and abuses may easily arise. I cannot understand for a minute why under the first clause the word "antiseptic" cannot be considered as a drug. In any school or college antiseptic is a term as old as the hills. There may be some antiseptics, if that is what the minister or the department is getting at, that are not drugs. That is the reason I would have suggested the use of some definite volume such as the British Pharmacopoeia. It is kept pretty well up to date and I do not think it would leave out very much. The second clause leaves the door open for drastic action. It provides for the licensing of manufacturers preparing drugs and it requires that manufacturers of the drugs mentioned submit test portions of each and every batch of such drugs and so on. All that is very good in its way, but it leaves the door open to a very great deal of drastic action which may be taken by the department as regards food and so on. I am not saying that there is anything wrong with the bill, but it leaves the door open to drastic action and we should look into it a little further. I would favour the suggestion of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This act was passed in 1920 and it has been in operation since that date. This is the first occasion that it has been in the House for further amendment and these amendments have grown out of the experience of the officers of the department. I have no objection to letting the bill go to a committee of this House, but I think the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Ross) does not quite understand the object of the bill and the amendment. The object of the act is to protect the public against adulteration and against any deception in the quantity sold, and in the section to which I have referred I pointed out that the schedule mentioned at the back of the bill sets forth the drugs that are to be dealt with. They are limited in number; they are very potent drugs, and while we as practitioners strive to get the best possible, the standards vary in different countries. Standards vary even in different laboratories, and in dealing with potent drugs of this character I think we should have the highest quality as a standard; that is done to-day by physiological tests. I cannot see why the medical profession would take any exception to this amendment; in fact I know that nothing will please them more than to have these particular drugs standardized. If that is to be done and if this benefit is to be secured to the public then it is essential that the establishments be checked, that they be required to take out a license and to maintain a proper laboratory, subject to inspection. We are not amending a medical act; this is a food and drug act designed to give protection to the public. So I would suggest that we proceed with the amendments and leave the bill in committee; we can have our discussion here to-day and we can return to it if there are any further points which have not been made clear.

Mr. STEVENS: The difficulty I see is this. If this bill is sent to a special committee we will have the officers of the department who have had experience in administration, and they can tell us precisely why they are asking for certain things. Let me illustrate; and I may say that I take my position with very little precise knowledge of the needs we have to meet, but I see an illustration of the danger facing us. In subsection (d) it is provided that the premises, equipment and technical qualifications of the staff of manufacturers preparing drugs mentioned or described in schedule B shall be inspected, and further in subsection 4 of the same section it is provided that any drug mentioned or described in schedule B shall be deemed to be adulterated if it has not been manufactured, tested and labelled in accordance with regulations made by the governor in council under this section. That is going pretty far. Let us take for example the question of the label. Some of these terms are copyrighted, I have no doubt, and it is quite conceivable that the department may fix as a standard one of these drugs which has been patented or given some sort of protection; they may say that that shall be the standard. If some other firm manufactures an equally good article not in the slightest degree adulterated, but labelled differently from the standardized article, the product of the second firm would be deemed to be adulterated under this act. That is an extreme case, of course, but that is what we are facing, and I must say that under these circumstances I rather look askance at this act. I am going to suggest again to the minister that the most reasonable thing to do is to send this bill to a special committee before which the officers of the department may appear. Let me again make it clear that I am not criticising the effort of the government to establish a first class workable act. I have always been in favour of such an act and stand behind the general principle of it but I must confess that some parts of this act give me some alarm.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I have just another question, and I might say in passing that I do not think I misunderstand the purposes of this amendment. I would like to refer for a moment to the inspection of premises, equipment and so on. Supposing you are dealing with drugs manufactured in England, manufactured by a firm which I like very much, Burroughs, Welcome and Company; how will your department inspect their premises and set a standard for their products? If that is not done the drugs manufactured by that company will be labelled as adulterated, and it leaves the door open to drastic action. I am sure that medical practitioners have some knowledge of standards, and I agree with the statement of the minister that these standards vary, and in some cases are very low. But in Canada we practically accept the British Pharmacopoeia and the standards laid down by the ministry of health in England. Now the minister is going to introduce a system in Canada which will make it hard for us to accept an article manufactured in Great Britain.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Unless it comes up to the standard.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): In the meantime perhaps that drug will have been scattered all over Canada, and it will be quite a hardship to some of our practitioners who, notwithstanding that standard, would prefer to carry on with the same company.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think my hon. friend is entirely mistaken. If he will look at the schedule he will see that the list is very limited and that the drugs contained therein are very important. If the profession can secure a uniform standard of digitalis, for example, they will be glad to accept it. We are not entering a new field; it is known that the Council of Health of the League of Nations have already proceeded along this line, and are suggesting to the various countries that they standardize these preparations. The United States have gone even further, and have already set standards. This matter is one affecting trade and commerce and the protection of the public, and if it is the opinion of hon. members that this should go to a special committee I have no objection whatever because that would give an opportunity for further discussion which cannot take place in this House.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): How does the minister propose to inspect the premises, equipment and so on of firms not in this country?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They will manufacture to our standards if they propose to sell in Canada. My friend speaks of Burroughs, Welcome and Company; that company are prepared to standardize, and wish to do so, and I think that is true of all the better manufacturers.

Progress reported.

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Health): I beg to move, Mr. Speaker, that Bill No. 105 be referred to a special committee of this House, to be appointed at the next sitting of House.

Mr. SPEAKER: This is not regular, of course, but by unanimous consent the motion may be adopted.

Motion agreed to.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT AMENDMENT

EXPORT TAX ON FURS

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Northwest Territories Act, chapter 62 of the revised statutes, 1906, to provide that the commissioner in council may make ordinances for the levying of an export tax upon furs exported from the territories to any part of Canada, or to any foreign country.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Hon. gentlemen will remember that three years ago I introduced a similar resolution with a view to bringing down a bill to tax furs exported from the Northwest Territories. At that time, if my recollection serves me aright, all the provinces were not exacting a tax on furs. There was, however, a tax in force in the Yukon territory on furs for export, and principles embodied in the Yukon Fur Export Tax Ordinance will be included in the ordinance to be founded on this resolution. The provinces are anxious that we shall impose such a tax because furs are going out of the provinces very frequently, particularly from the northern districts of Saskatchewan and Alberta, and when the tax, or royalty as it is in Saskatchewan, is sought to be collected the provincial officers are told that the furs come from the Northwest Territories. We do not propose to tax fur used in the territories but only when it is exported therefrom, and the tax will be at the rate of so much per skin. I will give full particulars on the second reading of the bill. Its main provision, however, is embodied in the resolution.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Will the minister be good enough to tell us when the provinces asked for the imposition of this export tax?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have a letter signed by the Hon. Mr. Hoadley of Alberta asking us to take some steps to protect that province inasmuch as when they seek to collect the provincial tax they are frequently told that the furs come from the Mackenzie district in the Northwest Territories and are therefore not taxable in Alberta. Now it is proposed to apply this tax on furs exported from the territories, and no evasion of taxation on the ground stated will be possible in the western provinces.

Mr. ADSHEAD: When was the principle of this export tax on furs adopted, and why?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In the provinces all fur is taxed; there are no exemptions. But we propose to exempt the fur used by the natives as well as any fur used by whites in the Northwest Territories. Only when the fur is leaving the territories will the tax be imposed. In that way we shall not be creating any hardship for the whites or natives who make their homes in that region. This is to be an export tax, and the same provision exists in the Yukon territory.

Mr. STEVENS: By way of information how does the minister propose to ascertain where the fur comes from? Furs, for instance, are frequently brought into Edmonton by trappers from very long distances. How does the minister propose to follow the fur that is produced in the Northwest Territories beyond the boundaries of any province?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We have anticipated that difficulty and are arranging to collect the tax inside the territories. As my hon. friend knows, a considerable proportion of this fur comes out by way of the Alaska peninsula, also via Hudson bay, but the largest quantity comes down the Mackenzie river through the province of Alberta. The collection will be made by officers to be appointed by the government, either the northwest mounted police or officials who are already on the ground.

Mr. STEVENS: What quantity of furs, roughly speaking, is now being exported from the Northwest Territories?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): As nearly as we can estimate about $2,000,000 worth are exported annually.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I shall reserve the right to oppose or criticise this export tax when the second reading of the bill to be founded upon this resolution is moved. I never knew there was any export tax or embargo on furs going out of any of the provinces. I do not know what necessity there is for such a tax or why it should be imposed upon a trapper, if he is licensed and earning his living honestly.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am perfectly willing that my hon. friend should look into the matter. He will then find that every province in Canada, with the exception of Prince Edward Island, is imposing a tax on fur. The Northwest Territories have not been doing it, but as I have already pointed out the Yukon has had a tax for some years. We want the revenue to be derived from this tax and we are entitled to receive it. We have spent a good deal of money for the protection of the people who are dealing in furs up there, but we shall not collect the tax from the natives who use fur as clothing, nor do we desire to collect the tax on any fur that is utilized within the territories themselves. Therein lies the difference between the tax proposed to be collected under this resolution and that which is imposed by the provinces.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Do trappers pay a license?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Stewart (Edmonton) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 123, to amend the Northwest Territories Act, chapter 62 of the revised statutes, 1906.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WAR CHARITIES ACT, 1917, AMENDMENT

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 114, to repeal the War Charities Act, 1917.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Act repealed.

Mr. STEVENS: Are there any obligations outstanding, or is this thing properly dead and is this simply to bury it decently?

Mr. RINFRET: There were coming under this act 850 societies. That number has dwindled to 147, of which 10 are great war veterans' associations and 127 branches of the Imperial Daughters of the Empire, which leaves only 10 other societies. These societies have to report twice a year to the department. They come under our control, but we are now practically controlling things that do not exist or do not need to be controlled.

Mr. STEVENS: What are you going to do with the staff that has been looking after this?

Mr. RINFRET: We will put them at some new reform legislation.

Mr. STEVENS: Splendid.

PRIVATE BILLS

MONTREAL, OTTAWA AND GEORGIAN BAY CANAL COMPANY

The House resumed from Monday, March 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chevrier for the second reading of Bill No. 78, respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company.

Mr. A. C. CASSELMAN (Grenville-Dundas): After the many statements and arguments which have been advanced in this House during the course of this debate, anyone who attempts now to talk about the subject must in doing so lay himself open to the charge of obstructing the business of this House. It is not with that intention that I am taking part in this debate. If I must stand accused of obstructing the work of this House, I am perfectly satisfied to do so. I say that because it is a fact that the matter under discussion is of such great importance that I feel every opportunity should be taken to place the facts before the people of the country, in order that they may be stirred up, so that the ultimate result will be that this bill shall not pass.

It has been suggested from the other side of the House that the bill should be allowed to go to the committee at once. I do not favour that suggestion. There are the very best reasons for discussing the bill at length. I do not think there has been for some time a private bill before this House in which such great interest has been taken as in the present bill. I say that because of different articles which I have seen in the various newspapers, and the press publishing these articles are not of any one political faith. Yesterday's Ottawa Citizen, speaking against this bill, says:

> The Georgian Bay Canal
> Georgian bay canal promoters have been given ample time to do something to take advantage of the enormously valuable franchise granted first so long ago as 1894. They persuaded parliament thirteen times to renew the charter, but they failed to commence constructive work upon the canal. It is too late to expect this parliament to give away any part of the public domain.

On the same day the Ottawa Journal in an editorial says:

> Everybody knows that the value of the Georgian Bay canal charter to the interests who are behind it is not the value that attaches to the franchise covering a mere transportation project. It is the value that arises from the water-power clauses that the charter contains. In the light of that truth, one provision in the original act, and also in the act as it now stands, cannot be sanctioned. It is a clause under which it is open to the company to proceed, ostensibly, with the construction of a section of the canal, say, in the Carillon falls district, or at any other point along the route where there is a water-power, and then abandon the work. If this is done, or if for any reason the company fails to proceed after developing the Carillon falls power, or any other power, under the guise of constructing part of the canal, there reverts to the government only "so much of the said canals and works as then remains uncompleted."

In other words, the company could well afford to throw up the job after developing the Carillon power and selling it for a fabulous sum, as the obvious deduction from the language of the Act is that the completed part would belong to the company, while only the uncompleted parts would go to the government. It is inconceivable that parliament should pass such a clause.

With the indulgence of the House I desire to read a short article which appeared in yesterday's Toronto Globe. It is headed, "The Old Fight is On Again," and says:

For thirty-three years the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company has held a Dominion charter giving it rights to construct canals and develop water-power resources of the Ottawa and French rivers. In all that time no constructive work has been done.

The company is back to Ottawa again seeking from the Dominion parliament another—the fourteenth—extension of its charter. The application is sponsored by Sifton interests.

The charter for which another renewal is asked apparently does not obligate the company to do anything. It gives the company continued control over public resources of tremendous potential value and permits the company to develop only those resources which it may deem profitable, while "so much of the said canals and works as then remain uncompleted"—presumably the more costly and unproductive construction and development—return to the public.

The provinces of Ontario and Quebec are directly affected. The legislature of Ontario plans to record the protest of this province to-day. But the fight is at Ottawa. There a great principle is at stake. Shall the natural resources of this country—the property of the people—be handed over to private, profit-taking promoters, or shall they be conserved and developed in the interests and for the welfare of the public?

The old battle is on once more. The Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company's bill must be defeated. The charter must lapse. For the interests of the whole people come before the avaricious ambitions of a few.

Those three articles, Mr. Speaker, give the people of this country a good idea as to the way in which this charter is generally regarded, and in view of that I wish to make a suggestion to the government. I realize that this is a private bill and that possibly the government take no responsibility for it.

[Mr. Casselman.]

But may I suggest that they are laying themselves open to rather grave suspicion, for it is well known throughout the Dominion that the Sifton interests, the Sifton papers, and, if I may be permitted to use the term, the Sifton sons, strongly endorsed the present leader of the government in his last campaign. It is also equally well known that the Siftons are primarily concerned in the renewal of this charter. Therefore I would suggest, that this bill having already been before the House on four or five occasions, it is the duty of the government now to declare whether or not they are supporting it.

The first charter was granted to a company bearing the same name in 1894. It is not my intention to discuss the provisions of that charter, they having been already fully covered by other speakers. Heretofore this charter has, I think, been regarded as non-political; that is, those who have sponsored the bill from time to time for its renewal were supporters of both the old parties. In fact, the charter has been renewed by almost every administration since 1894. In all it has been revived thirteen times, but the present application is not in the terms of that presented originally. When the charter was first granted it contained no clause authorizing the promoters to develop hydro-electric power. It is significant that during the 33 years that the charter has been in existence nothing has been done to carry out the original undertaking to build a canal. To that scheme we now find added a power scheme.

What is the hydro-electric power situation in the province of Ontario at the present time? Since the inception of the Hydro Electric Commission of Ontario 15 or 20 years ago we have seen an immense development of our water-powers until to-day in western Ontario there is no further water-power available for the generation of electric current. During all these years the people in eastern Ontario have been clamouring for hydro-electric power because of the fact that the lack of it has prevented them from securing the establishment of industries in various centres. Eastern Ontario has to look, first, to the St. Lawrence and, second, to the Ottawa river as its only sources of power. It might be asked at this point, what government has jurisdiction over our water-powers? If hon. members will turn to Hansard of April 7 last year they will find a statement made by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) to the effect that the Dominion government recognized without question, first, that the water-power on the Canadian side of the St. Lawrence (international section) is subject to the disposition of the Ontario government, and, second, that water-power development may proceed independently of canalization. That is, the production of electrical energy and the consequent development of industry need not be held up pending a decision whether a comprehensive canal scheme is necessary and economically feasible. Let me quote the hon. minister's own words:

> So far as I know this government have never raised any question as to ownership. Nor does this government raise any question as to the right of Ontario to develop that particular power or any power along that reach. . . .
> If they want to develop there would be no holdup so far as the federal government is concerned. I should like to see the hydro development on the Ottawa river; it seems to me there is a great opportunity for such development there. However, they have set their hearts on the development of the St. Lawrence, and it is the business of this government to do everything they can to facilitate that development.

Now as to the development of power along the St. Lawrence. I realize that great difficulties have to be overcome. The matter has been under consideration for four or five years. Several committees have been appointed from time to time, and I am glad to say that on the 16th of November last the Canadian and American engineers who were directed to investigate the engineering possibilities of the deepening of the St. Lawrence made their report and it is now on file. I trust that within a short time the project will be undertaken.

How are we to reconcile the declaration made by the Minister of the Interior last year, to which I have just referred, with the fact that the government is virtually giving authority to a private corporation to develop hydraulic power on the Ottawa, for undoubtedly if this bill passes that is bound to be the result. And that will not be the only result. The people of eastern Ontario and other sections of the province who are desirous of securing hydro-electric power will be unable to get it, for the simple reason that its development will be tied up by court proceedings, and private interests will have acquired rights which will cost the country an immense amount of money to expropriate.

What position is taken by the Ontario government on the proposed renewal of this charter? And not only by the provincial government but by every member of the local legislature? Yesterday the Premier of Ontario moved a resolution protesting against the enactment of this bill, the resolution was seconded by Mr. Raney, leader of the United Farmers of Ontario in the provincial House, and before the resolution was carried unanimously Mr. Sinclair, the leader of the Liberal party in the local legislature strongly supported it. It is true that he objected to provincial governments sending recommendations to the Dominion government, but he declared that were he a member of the House of Commons he would consider it his duty to vote against this bill. This is the text of the resolution:

> That this House respectfully urges the parliament of Canada not to enact Bill No. 78 of the House of Commons respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Company for the reasons hereinafter set forth:
> That the bill proposes to renew a charter to authorize the construction of a canal and the development of water-powers on the Ottawa and the French rivers, which said charter has already been in existence for 33 years without any evidence of progress toward the accomplishment of the projected canal;
> That the application to parliament is an effort on the part of private promoters to secure through the federal parliament the control and ownership of a great and valuable public utility;
> That the water-powers in the Ottawa river in interprovincial waters are the joint property of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and that the powers in the French river are wholly situate within Ontario, and are the property of the province of Ontario, and cannot be rightfully legislated upon by the Dominion parliament;
> That the development of these powers is essential to the industry and the prosperity of the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and the only effect of federal legislation purporting to vest these powers in a private company will be to retard development, create litigation, and impair the public interest;
> That the water-powers of the Ottawa river, so far as they belong to this province, are an essential part of the public development and distribution of power in Ontario, in which the people of this province have already invested upward of $276,000,000;
> That this legislative assembly desires to record its most earnest and emphatic protest against the attempt being made, by means of a private bill in the Dominion parliament, to alienate valuable water-powers from the control and ownership of this province, and thereby deprive the people of Ontario of the advantage of one of our greatest natural resources for the benefit and advantage of private promoters;
> That the province of Ontario respectfully urges that the rights guaranteed to the provinces under the federal constitution should be at all times respected by the parliament of Canada;
> That this House believes that the occasion calls for a strong and conclusive pronouncement against the proposed legislation as being contrary to the spirit and the terms of confederation and prejudicial to the public interest.
> For these and other reasons this House directs that copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Prime Minister of Canada and to the Speakers of the two houses of parliament of Canada.

I do not know of any stronger resolution that could have been passed than that. I know that resolution was passed unanimously, and it should be a guide, if not to the government, at least to the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart, Edmonton), because he has already in this House admitted certain claims which are made in the text of this resolution.

If this charter is granted, what will the Sifton interests secure? I have in my hand, and I wish to place on record a statement of the various powers which will come under their control. The statement is as follows:

Lower Ottawa—	Horse-power
Forneau	42,000
Cave	42,860
Deux Rivières	40,060
Rocher Capitaine	79,220
Des Joachims	58,800
Culbute Chute	5,000
Paquette and Allumette	28,340
Rocher Fendu No. 2	37,350
Rocher Fendu No. 1	37,350
Grand Calumet	55,980
Chenaux	65,700
Chats Falls	109,340
Chaudière	97,420
This is now installed.
Carillon	213,180
Also installed.
Sault Recollet	65,030
Prairies	40,880
Total	1,254,499

That makes a total of 1,254,499 horse-power. That power, it is admitted, belongs to the provincial governments. It is on an interprovincial water and therefore the two provinces are entitled to share in it. But what do we find? We find, if this charter is granted, the Dominion government going over the heads of the provinces and giving away something which they must know to be of value and which is not theirs to give, with results that can only be detrimental to this Dominion. Is it possible to estimate the value that would accrue to those who secure this charter? I have before me a statement to the following effect:

> The parties interested in obtaining an extension to this ancient charter have played a long and persistent game, and every device and influence that can be obtained is being used in their endeavour to win the large stake at issue. The Ottawa river water-power stake is enormous. Under intensive development, it has been estimated that in excess of 1,500,000 horsepower may be available in the Ottawa watershed, which sold at a profit of $3 per h.p: would yield annually a profit of approximately —$5,000,000. If capitalized, this may be taken to be a profit on $100,000,000 capital.

If we grant this charter we are placing those to whom we grant it in a position that, without a further turn of the hand, they will have $5,000,000 annually as long as they continue to own the charter. Surely the members of this House are not going to be parties to the alienation of such an amount as this from this Dominion.

What about the navigation? The navigation prospect is something which must appear very bright in the eyes of those who live along this river, but why should it appear so? All they have to do is to look back to 1894 and they will see that from that time to the present the holders of the charter have been in such a position that they could have gone on and constructed the canal. I do not think the Georgian bay canal can be built without the aid of the power. Navigation is undoubtedly under the control of the Dominion; the power sites are not under the control of the Dominion, and what this company are asking the members of this House to do is to take away from the people of the provinces the very valuable water-powers which they own and with the money derived from them construct the canal. The matter would not be so bad if there was any assurance that the canal would be constructed; but we may be pretty sure that if the charter is granted, the power will be developed, and as soon as the power is developed under the charter, then the company can simply say: We have had enough, and having chosen the plums out of the basket, they will leave what is left, if anything, to the people.

The hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Lapierre) yesterday made a very straightforward statement when he said he was reading from the brief of the company, and he did not attempt in any way to suggest to the House that the company expected to carry on navigation unless they received the power rights as well. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) and the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) both said yesterday that western Canada is intensely interested in anything which will reduce the freight rates. I think that statement could have been made much wider; the hon. members might have said that all of Canada is intensely interested in anything that will reduce freight rates. But, Mr. Speaker, when we have spent such immense sums of money in developing the Welland canal, in connection with which our expenditures will amount to over $100,000,000 before 1930, with the object in view of providing a cheaper method of shipping grain, do you not think it would be wise to carry that system through as far as possible in order to find out if it will give the results which those who started it expected? It seems to me that that is the only logical thing for us to do; if we do not do so it means that we are simply throwing away these immense sums which have already been spent. When the Welland canal is completed, which I think will be sooner than 1930, we will have a deep waterway to the foot of lake Ontario. If any hon. member will look at the joint report of the engineers which was filed on November 16, he will find that the fifth division of the St. Lawrence canals, which runs from the foot of lake Ontario to Chimney Point, three miles below Prescott, can be made into a navigable water capable of carrying boats drawing twenty-four feet by an expenditure of only $1,100,000. Due to the fact that this is an international waterway that expenditure would not have to be paid by Canada alone, because undoubtedly before the work is started further negotiations will be carried on with the government of the United States and they will stand their share of the expense. With that work completed those who are interested in freight rates and in getting their grain to the markets of the world as cheaply as possible will have a complete waterways system with the exception of the distance from Prescott to Montreal, some 115 or 120 miles.

If hon. members will take their minds back to last fall they will remember certain articles which appeared in the Montreal papers. At that time there were ships in that port anxious to secure cargoes of grain which could not be secured because the elevators did not have what they required, and as a result wheat had to be brought from Fort William by rail to complete those cargoes. Would it not be better to have at Prescott, the eastern end of the fifth division, elevators capable of storing this grain? The fact must also be remembered that during the whole winter the harbour is open there, and it is the furthest point west where there is an open harbour. These boats going down the river could lay up there during the winter just as well as at any other port, and when the grain is required from them it could be transferred to the elevators and placed on the cars of either the Canadian National railways or the Canadian Pacific railway, because the main line of the Canadian National railways and a branch line of the Canadian Pacific railway run into that town.

To me, Mr. Speaker, this is one of the important questions which this government will have to decide, and I trust that they will use wisdom in doing so. I do not ask that they put these elevators at any particular point, but I do ask that the elevators be placed at the point where the grain may be transferred to the ships at the lowest cost to those owning or raising this commodity.

In his remarks the other evening the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) seemed to have a great fear due to certain facts which I presume were communicated to him in a letter under the heading of the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company. I have one of those letters in my hand, which goes on to show that if the Georgian bay canal is completed the distance will be shortened by some 350 miles. They even go beyond that, and oppose the development of the St. Lawrence waterway on the ground that traffic would be diverted at Buffalo. The hon. member could not have had the figures in his possession in regard to the distance from the head of the lakes via Buffalo to Liverpool as compared with the distance from the head of the lakes to Liverpool by the Canadian route, because if he had known those figures he would have found that the distance by the Canadian route is 524 miles shorter than by the American route which he feared so greatly. If the St. Lawrence waterway is completed, as I trust it will be, we must expect that a certain amount of traffic will be diverted and we must be prepared to compete with the facilities which will be offered by others. If we cannot compete with them we might as well sit down and say nothing about it. I would strongly recommend to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle that he look more carefully into the matter and I am sure he will lose whatever fear he has due to the fact that the Georgian bay route, if completed, would be a few hundred miles shorter than the present route.

Mr. E. A. McPHERSON (Portage la Prairie): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to take up very much of the time of the House on this question. I must confess that since the debate started my understanding of the matter has become a little more clouded than it was before. I understood when the question was first brought up that it was opposed more as a matter of principle than for any other reason, but just on what principle it was opposed I am not quite so clear as I was when the hon. gentleman who opened the debate in opposition finished his remarks. I understood from his remarks that he was opposed to it largely because there had been a considerable delay in starting work under the charter which had been already granted. Since then hon. gentlemen who have spoken have discussed the matter from practically every angle and a large part of the argument both pro and con is, so far as I know, personal opinion or facts gained here and there in a haphazard manner. Any information upon which I can base my attitude has been gained in what is not a satisfactory method to myself, namely, by listening to the various arguments advanced, and by hearing the gossip and rumour in the corridors, lobbies and different parts of this building. If I had to vote on this bill tonight, as to whether we should grant this charter or not, with the information I have as to the charter I would vote against it. On the other hand if I were to be put in the position where I had to close my mind and say, No, we will take no chance on this, we will not give even an opportunity of ascertaining the facts by having them brought out before a committee, I would vote against such a motion, because I think I should be just as much to blame for refusing to allow myself to get those facts in a proper manner before a committee of the House as if I voted against the bill offhand.

I am not satisfied with the bill in its present state. I should like to see it somewhat amended; but the more I have heard and the more I have looked into it, the measure does not seem nearly as bad to me as it did originally. I must confess, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, that my facts were collected, as I have suggested, from the discussion here and from hearsay. If I am wrong in any statement I may make I hope I shall be corrected, but I can only base my remarks upon the information which I have and give my vote in accordance therewith when the time comes to do so. I am told that this charter was granted originally in 1894, and the statute bears this out. I am told that the project has been enlarged from time to time, that in 1907 plans were made for a canal of nine feet, that the matter was taken up by this House, and that during the period from some time around 1908 till 1912 this government investigated the question of the Georgian bay canal and its feasibility, and a very lengthy report was prepared on the subject. That report is in the library, but I am not of a sufficient engineering turn of mind to avail myself of it; I do not think I would understand it even if I did try to peruse it. But the report is there, and I have not heard it stated that the route is not feasible. So matters were delayed apparently until 1912, and then it was decided that the project should take the form of a canal of twenty feet. The war broke out, and I do not think that any hon. member here will say that any company was remiss in its duty for not carrying out a large contract during a war period. Considerable time has elapsed since the war and yet nothing has been done. That I understand is true, but I also understand that plans were completed by the present holders of the charter for a canal of twenty-four feet, and 1924 was the date on which the company first filed the plans that are now before the government. Those plans were not accepted, but I find they were filed in sections up to 1926, which is not very long ago. I understand that the first plan filed in 1924 was for that portion of the river from Montreal north—the proper place to start a canal, at the outlet—but for some reason best known to the government approval of the plans was withheld until all should be received. Now I notice that under section 18 of the original act this company cannot take any steps or do any construction work on the canal until the plans that have been filed are approved by the government. If there has been negligence and delay it would therefore appear that it was not on the part of the applicants, but on account of their plans not having been approved they have not been in a legal position to turn a sod or start construction work. I want to point out that those hon. gentlemen who have dealt upon heinousness of the offence that would be committed in giving a further extension to this charter, and those hon. gentlemen who believe strongly in public ownership, put through yesterday four distinct bills which involved the extension of railway charters. The first charter was granted in 1900 but was renewed from time to time up to the present. The next two charters have not been for an unusually long period before the public, but the fourth one was originally given in 1893, one year before the charter of the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company. I am not justifying the extension of these charters, I am merely bringing the facts to the attention of the House.

Mr. HEAPS: Would you be good enough to tell the House the difference between the charters which were extended yesterday and the charter whose extension is now being sought?

Mr. McPHERSON: I am dealing now with the objection, which has been strongly urged, that the time which has been allowed to elapse since the charter was originally granted is a reason why the extension sought here should not be allowed. I am not saying that the charters to which I have just referred should not have been enlarged, but what I do say is that there was not half an hour's discussion in this House—so far as I know, and I think I was present all the time—in opposition to the extension of these charters on the ground that they have been renewed too often. Yet they are all by private corporations. That looks rather peculiar to me in view of the great interest that is being taken in the present charter and the agitation to allow it to expire.

I have dealt with the opposition to this charter on the ground of the delay that has taken place. Now there are one or two other reasons given by several members, the soundness of which I do not quite appreciate. For example they say that we have government canals which are operating without tolls, therefore why should we allow the canal to be built by private individuals on which tolls would be collected. I submit that argument would be much more logical if the conditions were reversed and you were putting a free canal in competition with a government canal charging tolls. But if the government canals are free and the private canal is charging tolls, what possible chance is there of the private canal doing business? How can they collect tolls unless the public are willing to pay them in order to avoid going the long way round and getting free transportation which would be more costly in the long run? I do not understand the logic of the argument which has been advanced in that connection by at least three or four members of the House.

There is also the question of the claim to the power. I am not going into the question of the legal ownership of the power, but I maintain that in so far as the navigable waters are concerned, and in so far as any waters are concerned which are apt to be now or hereafter of value to the Dominion as waterways, it is most objectionable to give any rights to private individuals which will close those waterways for navigation purposes in time to come, or in fact to give them under under any circumstances without protecting the public interest. Ontario says, in the language of its representatives in this House, that it is entitled to the water-power. It may be so. If it is so, the owners of this charter have nothing when they get it renewed so far as power is concerned. That question can be disposed of by the courts that are appointed for that purpose.

I would point out this, however. Although I do not live in Ontario I try to keep in touch with the doings of the various provinces, and I understand that Ontario has leased its water-powers in the north country to private corporations at every place in which water-power is now being developed up there. I understand further that the people in that district are getting after the Ontario government to have the Ontario Hydro Electric Commission protect them against overcharges, but that they are not being given any assistance in that direction by the provincial government. The province of Ontario at the same time, I understand, is purchasing power from a private corporation called the Gatineau Power Company. I understand that the province of Ontario were willing to give a lease of the Carillon falls to a private corporation for a consideration—a share of the rental. Now, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that all these arguments we have heard in favour of Ontario developing its own power do not look very good to the outsider in face of the fact that they are giving away their power in the northern section of the province and are buying power themselves from private corporations instead of developing their own power.

Mr. GEARY: Just what power should they develop?

Mr. McPHERSON: I understand that there is power at Smoky falls that was sold or leased. Am I right?

Mr. GEARY: I never heard of it.

Mr. RENNIE: Will the hon. member please name the places, each one of them?

Mr. McPHERSON: I cannot name them all, but I can read a short editorial that appeared in the Cochrane Northland Post. I generally object to listen to other people reading, and perhaps I can shorten it by filing this with Hansard.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Read it.

Mr. McPHERSON: The Cochrane Northland Post has a long editorial objecting to the Ontario government putting the power in that northern district into the hands of private corporations, and regretting that the Ontario government will not protect them through the hydro commission.

Mr. GEARY: You find lots of people talking against the Ontario hydro.

Mr. RENNIE: Where are these places?

Mr. McPHERSON: I am not just sure that I can see to read this very fine print, but I will try. It is an editorial from the Cochrane Northland Post—I am not acquainted with the editor, so I cannot be accused of being personally biased in his favour—in its issue of February 25, 1927. This paper presumably is published by the Cochrane Northland Post, Limited, Cochrane, Ontario. The editorial reads:

As was to be expected, the meeting of the special committee of council with the officials of the Abitibi Electric Development Company—

I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I cannot see to read this, so I will ask permission to place it on Hansard.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No. Read it.

Mr. McPHERSON: I cannot see to read this fine print. I again ask permission to file it with Hansard, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. In such cases it is permissible to have the article read by the Assistant Clerk.

The Assistant Clerk read the article, as follows:

As was to be expected, the meeting of the special committee of council with the officials of the Abitibi Electric Development Company was devoid of any result as far as the lowering of the rate charged by the company is concerned, not because of any neglect on the part of the committee but rather on account of the peculiar independence which the Abitibi people are able to assume under existing circumstances and will be able to maintain until such time as the government sees fit to interfere and decide to protect not only our own municipality, but all others now here and yet to come, who are at the mercy of powerful corporations as far as power supply is concerned, when such is developed from the abundance of our natural water-powers, more especially here in the north where water-powers belong to the most valuable of natural resources.

It seems inconceivable that the government should have given away these natural resources belonging in the last end to the people, to private corporations for the purpose of exploiting these very people to whom such powers should belong, and who live in the very shadow of their magnificence. As a matter of fact we feel sure that the government has no intention of permitting such big stick methods.

Premier Ferguson gave an intimation to a recent delegation from the northern Ontario associated boards of trade that in the leasing of lands and water-powers, the people's interest had been fully safeguarded and that the big corporations must watch their steps and live up to conditions exacted at the time of such leases being granted and that he would see that they do it.

While we therefore fully agree with the committee's finding that nothing further can be gained by way of conferences with the Abitibi Electric Development Company, we do not at all agree with the conclusion arrived at that the only way out is the acceptance of the contract on the company's terms for a period of five years, without first having the case submitted to the government in a proper manner.

We have always maintained and still maintain that the abortive attempt to seek the government's intervention last summer was a farce pure and simple, and the people through their decision to vote down the by-law emphatically showed that they hold to this idea.

There is no intention whatever to show hostility against the power people in our continuing to advocate the introduction of the Hydro-Electric Power Commission into the dispute over the rates. The Abitibi people are well able to look after their interest in any presentation of their side to expert opinion, and on the other hand the Hydro-Electric Commission has no selfish interest in this case as they definitely refused some years ago to undertake the development of the water-powers in this district.

[Mr. McPherson.]

The old stock argument of comparing the rates which we are asked to consider as fair and reasonable with those paid by other municipalities along the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario Railway is as fallacious as it is inapplicable.

In the first place, all the other towns in this district are at present moving heaven and earth to have the present rates reduced and are practically at the end of their patience and are preparing to take steps to press for government intervention.

Secondly, the position of Cochrane is far stronger to call for government intervention than any of the other municipalities along the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario. As far back as 1910 the government, through the then Minister of Lands and Forests, gave us the solemn assurance that the town of Cochrane would be fully protected if ever any of the surrounding water-powers would be leased to private corporations in the event of the Hydro-Electric Commission not taking up the development here. This was at a time when Iroquois falls was not even thought of, the advertising for tenders for that pulp concession appearing subsequent to the promise of the government to see the town fully protected with regard to future development around here.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hour for private bills having been exhausted, the House will now revert to government orders.

Mr. McPHERSON: I trust I shall be allowed to conclude my remarks when this bill comes before the House again.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

The House in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Public Works—Nova Scotia

Digby—Public building—general repairs and improvements	$ 1,200
Halifax — Bellevue building — repairs and improvements	4,000
Halifax—Immigration building—payment to Department of Railways and Canals for accomodation	25,000
Halifax—Quarantine station—repairs and improvements	5,800
Halifax—Rockhead hospital—repairs and improvements	2,000
	$38,000

Mr. GUTHRIE: We want some explanation about this matter. The largest item in this estimate is immigration buildings at Halifax, $25,000. I fancy it is a revote. The same amount was in last year's estimates. Has the work been started?

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Minister of Public Works): It is an annual rental.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Paid for the building?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. ERNST: In the supplementary estimates for the last fiscal year there was an appropriation of $10,000 for a post office at Mahone bay. I should like to know why it has been dropped from the main estimates for this year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The intention was that none of the items in the supplementary estimates which were being revoted en bloc would be included in the main estimates. Such portions as might be required and could properly be expended before March 31st would be expended, and it would be a question for consideration in future supplementary estimates.

Mr. ERNST: The answer of the hon. member is hardly convincing, because the next item, 133, which reads "Kensington public building, $12,000," was voted in the supplementaries which were recently passed and is being revoted in the main estimates.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, that is quite true. The Board of Audit thought at the outset that it might be possible to select certain items that were most urgent, but after a few items were passed it was decided that the supplementary estimates should be voted en bloc and they are all now voted. Instructions were given, as I recollect, by the Board of Audit that nothing in the supplementaries should be put into the main estimates, but that they should all be voted together, but apparently those that had been prepared for the main estimates—a few items, not very many—were inserted.

Mr. ERNST: Will the minister give me the assurance that the $10,000 voted in the supplementaries for Mahone bay will be revoted?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is a question for the House later on.

Mr. ERNST: If it was necessary in the supplementaries last year it ought to be just as necessary in the coming year.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That would sound reasonable.

Mr. HANSON: Can the minister justify having $12,000 in the main estimates for Kensington public buildings this year and leaving out the item for Mahone bay which was in the supplementaries last year? Surely Mahone bay is a more important place than Kensington. It has four times the population, four times the revenue and more than four times the need. Does it not come down to this; that Mahone bay did not vote right and Kensington did?

Mr. ERNST: I think Mahone bay did vote right.

Item agreed to.

Prince Edward Island—Kensington—public building $12,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Has this work been started?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Has the site been purchased?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No. Negotiations are under way, I understand.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is one outlay that I do not think is justifiable from any point of view, and in order to take the opinion of the committee on the matter, I am going to move that this item be reduced by $11,999.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I thank the leader of the opposition for his courtesy and am perfectly willing to take the opinion of this House to-night on this vote. The town has offered to contribute a site, and, as the minister has said, negotiations are in progress. The engineer in charge at Charlottetown has been authorized to look over the site, and preparations are well under way for the calling of tenders for the building. The surrounding country is just as large as when this vote went through the other night, and the people there are still just as desirous of having this building. I feel sure that my good friend the leader of the Opposition is merely treating us to a little amusement in moving for a reduction of the vote, and that he will be one of the first to support the item.

Mr. HANSON: The hon. member said that the town was donating a site for the building. Could he not have found a constituent willing to sell the government a site?

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): No, they are all so anxious to have the public building there that they are willing to contribute a suitable site.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What is the population of Kensington?

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Between 500 and 600.

Mr. ERNST: Will the hon. member kindly tell the committee the annual gross revenue derived from this post office?

Mr. ELLIOTT: To be exact, it is $3,135.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): A little over Mahone bay.

Mr. ERNST: No, a little under. I looked it up.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Guthrie moves that this vote of $12,000 be reduced by $11,999.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Chairman, I am going to say one word further. This is a little place down in Prince Edward Island with a population of between five and six hundred and yields a gross postal revenue of about $3,000, out of which all the expenses of the post office have to be paid. In my judgment this is an unjustifiable expenditure of public money. In the budget debate recently I pointed out that if the Minister of Finance would sit down with a blue pencil he could save this country millions and millions of dollars by crossing out items of this kind almost on every page of the estimates. I have nothing against the village of Kensington, but I protest against the expenditure of public money in this way. It is not called for, it is not essential. We have thousands of objects in this country upon which the $12,000 could be profitably spent at the present time. My object in moving this motion is to protest against the government's course, and I ask the committee to support my action.

Mr. ERNST: I would suggest to the Minister of Public Works that as this item has crept into the main estimates by mistake, and there are several others of a similar character which have not been so fortunate, if he wishes to be consistent he should withdraw it until the others are revoted.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): No, Mr. Chairman, I positively object to that. We took this matter up with the department in the proper way, and if my friend from Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst) has been negligent in regard to certain items in which his constituency is interested being included in the main estimates, that is no reason for withdrawing this particular vote. I want to tell the committee right here and now that this vote is going through. The site has been acquired, the engineer in charge has looked over the ground, plans have been prepared, and the work is proceeding. I am confident that hon. gentlemen opposite will not think of supporting my hon. friend's motion.

Mr. HANSON: Is the member correct in stating that this work is being proceeded with before the money is voted?

Mr. ELLIOTT: My information is that no work has been commenced and no expenditure made. There has been some preliminary investigation of the site, that is all. I might state to my hon. friend (Mr. Ernst) who is so greatly concerned about Mahone bay, and very properly so, that this is one of the items that appeared in the supplementary estimates of last year. It was submitted to the House by the government of which I was a member, and it was also submitted by the government that succeeded us, of which some of my hon. friends opposite were members. It seems to me that when the time comes we might very well consider whether or not the supplementary estimates to which both parties were committed should not be adhered to. However, that is a matter for subsequent consideration. The item of Mahone bay, I may inform my hon. friend, is now voted.

Mr. LUCAS: How it is that some of the supplementary estimates have been included in the main estimates while others have been left out?

Mr. ELLIOTT: In making out the main estimates the intention first was that as a great deal of the supplementary votes could not be expended before the 31st of March, when they would expire, it might be as well to put into the main estimates everything of an urgent character that had hitherto been included in the supplementaries. That course was adhered to for the first half year I think. Then it was decided otherwise and instructions were given to discontinue this course. I do not want to lay any blame on any one because the instructions were given when I was present, but apparently those instructions were not fully observed. Only a few items have crept in.

Mr. LUCAS: The minister's explanation does not altogether satisfy me because I find that a number of the supplementary estimates are now in the main estimates, while other supplementary items have been left out.

Mr. ERNST: That is just the situation.

Mr. LUCAS: Urgency does not appear to have been the sole consideration for including some of these supplementaries in the main estimates. One item that I refer to is in connection with a town where much more revenue is derived from the post office and the customs house than from some of the other places which have been fortunate enough to have their votes ieft in the main estimates. I agree with the hon. leader of the opposition that every Canadian is looking to the government to cut down expenditure.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Hear, hear.

Mr. LUCAS: If the government will adhere to a definite policy of cutting down expenditure, I am quite willing to withdraw any applications that I am making for expenditures in my constituency.

But if it is going to be a matter of expenditures here and there for certain individuals who may belong to a particular party, then it is a case of everyone getting into the scramble as much as they possibly can. During the first four years I was down here I did not make any effort to secure a post office for my constituents for the simple reason that we were all criticising the different governments for the huge expenditures contracted during the war and saying that we should get away from that sort of thing. But last year there seemed to be a disposition to loosen up a little, and I made representations to the government for a post office in the town of Camrose. My request was met and an amount of $15,000 was placed in the supplementary estimates. We all know what happened during what has often been referred to as the hectic days of last session. Those supplementary estimates were not passed; but they were presented to the House at the beginning of this session and they were then all passed. I took it for granted that when the item of $15,000 for a post office at Camrose was included in that first vote the government would have treated it as fairly as the other items in those supplementary estimates. But much to my surprise, when the main estimates were brought down, although there were only two items in the supplementary estimates for Alberta, one is left and mine is cut out. This item of $12,000 of the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean) is for a post office in a small village with only 500 of a population and only $3,000 of a revenue from that post office. The town of Camrose has a post office with a revenue of more than $16,500, and a sub-customs office with a revenue of more than $50,000 annually. We are renting two buildings in that town. The government owns a lot there and yet the vote for that post office has been thrown out, although we are going to expend money on a post office from which the revenue is less than one-fifth of that from the post office in the town of Camrose. I hope this has been an oversight, and the minister can assure me that when the supplementary estimates are brought down this year, this item will be included in time to take care of the post office at Camrose. The minister knows the town, and I think the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) will bear me out when I say that there is not a finer or more flourishing town in the whole province of Alberta and not a town which the citizens take a greater interest in developing and beautifying. It is a town with railways radiating out in eight different directions and with a large number of rural routes emanating from it. Outside of Calgary and Edmonton, it has the fourth largest revenue of the towns in Alberta. I feel sure that when this item was included in the estimates last year the government must have given it careful consideration, and I hate to think they cut it out for any ulterior motive. I hope the minister can assure me that when the supplementary estimates are brought down he will comply with my request.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is very interesting to hear about other post offices, but this is a concrete case which brings up the policy of the government in regard to these matters. We have the facts; there is no dispute. This is a little hamlet with a population of five or six hundred where there is a gross post office revenue of about $3,000 or, I suppose, about one-half that amount net. Is it the policy of the government to expend $12,000 of the taxes of the people of this country in establishing for political purposes a post office in that riding? That is the question before the committee at this moment. The hon. member for Prince says in the most emphatic manner that this committee will pass this item and now he nods his head. What arrangement he has with the government I know not, but it looks as though he had a fast and binding arrangement of some kind.

Let me ask the Minister of Public Works how he can justify this expenditure. Is this the policy he is going to pursue throughout Canada? Does he think it right to collect and expend the taxpayers' money in this way at a time when, if we believe the Minister of Finance—and we must believe him—every dollar we can collect is necessary to meet our obligations this year, and in fact we shall have to go out and borrow money to do so. Nevertheless without a pretence of excuse as regards public expenditure and the convenience of the people, the minister says; I want the committee to vote $12,000 to erect a public building in the constituency of Prince, not in a village, but in a hamlet. I protest that that is a wrongful expenditure, I do not care in whose riding it is. Ontario is full of hamlets larger than Kensington, and with greater revenues; so is the west, and I protest against spending the public money in these places. If we had a treasury that was full and overflowing; if we had no obligations maturing, different considerations might arise. But at the present moment it is improper to spend this money under these conditions. I protest as vigorously as I can, and I desire to have the sense of the committee taken on this question.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I am rather surprised at the insinuations that have been thrown out by my hon. friend as regards the town of Kensington, which happens to be in the county which I have the honour to represent. I wish to say emphatically that this is not given as a bribe to the people of that good county or to the town of Kensington, for their votes, because the people there are too intelligent to be bribed and they will vote as they please, irrespective of post offices or anything else.

An hon. MEMBER: Then the hon. member does not need this.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): The hon. member is right. There is no need of it for that purpose. The hon. member for Camrose stated that the government at the present time is renting a public building or two public buildings there for post office purposes. In the town of Kensington we had a disastrous fire which wiped out pretty nearly all the business portion including the Bank of Nova Scotia and I think the Canadian Bank of Commerce, and the town was practically depleted of buildings. This post office is in the outskirts of the town in a house where it has been for the last forty years. The town has been rebuilt very rapidly; it is growing fast. It is in the best agricultural section of the province and a large number of farmers are retiring and moving into it. As I pointed out, a large surrounding country is served by six or seven rural routes from that post office. At the present time the accommodations are not satisfactory; they are not what the town deserves; they are not what the surrounding country deserves, and this is being asked for only as a matter of justice to the town. I emphatically resent the reflections that have been cast upon the town of Kensington when it is said that this is done for political purposes. I again appeal to the committee to support the item and, in doing so, members will be doing justice not only to the town of Kensington, but to the surrounding country which is obliged to use that post office, and to the rural districts that are served from it. This vote was passed at a former session. It was in the supplementary estimates which were passed last year. The work was not proceeded with, and the item was passed again at the beginning of this session. I asked to have the item again inserted in the main estimates, because I knew that the building could not be completed before the 31st of March, when the other vote would lapse. I cannot see any reason in the world now why the House should attempt to cut out this item after it has gone so far. My hon. friends should have taken objection to this amount last year or in the early part of this session; I submit it is now too late in the day to cut down this item.

Mr. SHORT: I would suggest to the minister that since no site has yet been purchased in Kensington, there are a number of sites available in towns in my constituency upon which buildings might be erected. In the town of Bridgetown in my constituency a site was purchased for a post office, just before the election of 1925, but apparently the electors did not vote right and nothing has been done. I would suggest that this $12,000 be used on the site already owned in that town.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I recall that when the supplementary estimates were before the House there was some discussion on this same item, and I recall that the member for that constituency then admitted that $12,000 was too much money. He was honest with the House and he made that admission, which I find recorded in Hansard as follows.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I am sorry, but it is not permissible to read from or refer to a debate which took place during this session.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: Very well; I will not quote the words but will just refer to them generally. The hon. member made it quite plain that $12,000 was too much money for the requirements of Kensington. The sum of $12,000 did look to me like a rather large expenditure for a village of some 500 people, and the member for that constituency admitted that they were not seriously going to ask for that amount, but that they wanted enough to erect a suitable building there. That was the sum and substance of his remarks. Possibly the amendment of the leader of the opposition would not leave quite enough to put up a building which would suit the people, because the amount remaining would be only one dollar, but I would appeal to the minister to reduce this item by one-half at least, and possibly a little more. If it were reduced in that way it would leave plenty of money to erect a building suitable to the needs of that village of five hundred. The hon. member said there was a good country around that village, but you can drop into every town and village of this Dominion and find a fairly good country around it. I have a number of villages and towns in my own constituency around which there is magnificent country; there is one town with a population of 1,000 with the post office in an old shack of a building. I guess the people do not vote right; I am afraid after all that this is the real reason for this $12,000 expenditure, and I agree with the leader of the opposition that it is time to call a halt to this sort of political expenditure. We talk here about reducing our expenditures and taking care of our national debt and curtailing unnecessary outlays, yet we drift along regardless. This is just one small example of how thousands of dollars are squandered unnecessarily. I will certainly support the amendment, but I would like to see a compromise agreed upon reducing the estimate by about one-half. By so doing we would thoroughly satisfy the hon. member for that constituency in view of what he really asked the House to do earlier this session.

Mr. PRICE: It is not my desire to throw any cold water on an estimate for post offices or public works in the maritime provinces, because I believe the Dominion of Canada owes to the maritimes millions of dollars. But speaking of post offices I wish to say that in my constituency there is a post office which turns into the treasury of Canada a net revenue of $377,000 per annum. I refer to the city of Moncton, which has a population of about 20,000 or 21,000. In spite of the fact that that post office turns in a larger net revenue than any other city or constituency of the same size in Canada, we have not been able to get a new building. We have been endeavouring for some time to secure a new post office there, and the government have purchased a very fine property assessed by the city at $32,200. This property was purchased by the government for $49,000, but the tenant who previously owned the property was permitted to occupy the premises for $40 per month up until January 1. I think any city or constituency whose post office turns in such a large net revenue is entitled to consideration in so far as public buildings and post offices are concerned. I would like to see something done in that city, where the net return is more than double the expenditure on public works this year for the whole province of New Brunswick. I would draw the attention of the Minister of Public Works and the Postmaster General to these facts and ask them to consider seriously doing justice to the constituency which I represent.

Mr. BIRD: I am not opposed to the expenditure of money on public buildings, on principle; I think there has been altogether too little money spent in that way in recent years, and only the exigencies of post-war financing can excuse the Dominion government for its neglect of the public buildings in our small towns. The other day I was reading an account by an immigrant of his journey to his home in Alberta, in which he described the towns through which he passed as conglomerations of small wooden huts. I think there is something wrong when, after all these years of our prosperity, our prairie towns are deficient in substantial buildings. In my own town of Swan River we have a population of about 900 and our post office does a business amounting to probably $4,000 or $5,000 yearly. Yet for all these years the Dominion government has been carrying on its business in a building on one of our main thoroughfares which can only be described as a shack. Around that building we have other structures which are quite substantial; we have two bank buildings which are a credit to the town, and our provincial government has built for its telephone service, right next to the Dominion government post office, a building which puts the Dominion building quite in the shade. I am not finding fault with the government for not proceeding with the construction of a new building. I realize the circumstances that have been prevalent for a number of years, but I want to say it is rather hard on those of us who are not attached to the predominant party. In the last election my opponent managed to take quite a few votes from me because he was able to promise a new post office. The then Postmaster General during the election visited my home town. I do not know what he said to my opponent but after he had left my opponent immediately gave it out that a new post office was to be built in the town. Not being in the confidence of a predominant party I was not in a similar position to make a promise. I mention this because I think there is a good deal of insincerity in the amendment that has been moved. I mean that this is not a thing that is characteristic merely of the party in power. It was also characteristic of the party that wished to be in power. However, if I thought the Minister of Public Works had any consistent policy in regard to public buildings I should be most willing to give him my support. I think that such a policy might be possible —not a policy to favour constituencies that have been politically favourable, but a policy that would do justice to the status of the Dominion government in hundreds of our small towns throughout Canada. After all it might be a very good business proposition for the government to erect a public building in some of our small towns. For instance, the department in my town pays no less than about $800 a year for the use of three small rooms in which to transact their forestry business. It seems to me that a modest building, not a very big one, which would house not only the Forestry branch but also the post office branch, would be a business investment. I do not think that if it was wisely planned it could possibly be a loss to the Dominion government. But that is only one side of the situation. The side that appeals to me most is this: that when we have public buildings of a substantial character or of a more or less architectural success it lends an air of stability to any community in which they are placed, and that is one thing we lack sadly in the west. Surely the Dominion government, as times go on and its finances begin to look up, will enter earnestly into a policy of providing in our small communities some symbol of its own existence which people may look to and respect, and after all that is a good deal. Our Dominion government is a remote thing to most of our communities and some suitable public building in which its own business is transacted would I am sure—especially in a good many western communities where the Dominion government is a far-away, vague and remote thing—have the effect of begetting in the minds of the people, the young people, of those communities a new sense of respect and attachment to the central authority. I do not think we always ought to consider the material aspect and the political aspect of questions; we should consider the patriotic, the national aspect also. I have noticed that it is possible for a few thousand dollars nowadays to construct public buildings which when completed have a certain architectural appeal. Only recently in our town a certain dairy company built a dairy. Now you would think that a modern dairy company in placing a building in a town in which to carry on its business would not have any idea but that of utility. This company, however, came into our small town and built a structure which from the architectural point of view is all that could be desired. And yet our Dominion government is carrying on its business in the same town in a building which cannot be characterized as anything but a shack. I cannot find it in my heart to support the amendment, because of my experience in the election when the then Postmaster General came into my community and apparently gave my opponent to understand that if he were returned the community would get a fine postal building. That makes me disposed not to accept this amendment seriously. Moreover I do not know the needs of the community for which my hon. friend speaks. But if they compare at all with some of the western communities where the public building is so very poor, I have a great deal of sympathy for them. As to the building in this case I hope it is not political like the one that was to go up in my own town.

Mr. MANION: I should like to ask the hon. gentleman a question. If I understood him aright he said that I had promised a public building in his town if his opponent was elected.

Mr. BIRD: I never said the hon. gentleman promised a public building. I have more regard for the hon. gentleman's common sense than to think he would come into a community during election time and promise offhand a public building, but I do say that after my hon. friend's visit my opponent did give it out that if he were returned there would be a public building erected in my town. There were quite a number of other matters I have not thought worth while to bring up on the floor of the House because it has not been my custom to air election matters in that way. I only mentioned this because I thought it was an opportune occasion to do so.

Mr. MANION: I should just like to say that I am not responsible for statements the hon. gentleman's opponent may have made. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that I had promised a public building if his opponent was elected. I wish to state that I promised no public building in any place in this Dominion. Furthermore, although I was not going to take any part in this debate at all but simply vote with the leader of the opposition, I wish to say that I am entirely in accord with the leader of the opposition in this matter and I will tell you why: not only have all these sites been long in existence that have been mentioned here to-night, but there are sites all over this Dominion of Canada that were bought long ago for the purpose of putting up public buildings. For example, right in the constituency of the Minister of Labour, in the town of Fort Frances—which has a population not of five hundred people as in the case of this little village; but of 3,500 to 4,500; I do not know the exact figure—a site was bought before the war, and it is there still with not a public building in the whole town put up by any Dominion government. They were using a little ramshackle building until recently, when they rented other public offices. Fort Frances is one of the most prosperous little towns in all Ontario, a very fine little industrial centre. It has been trying since 1911 to get justice in the matter of a public building, but it receives no consideration at all, while a little village in Prince Edward Island gets $12,000 for a public building, which is more than was asked for. I took the attitude in the town of Fort Frances in the last election—I had the courage to do that—that no public buildings should be constructed until our taxation had been lessened and financial conditions improved, but that when a start was made, Fort Frances should get as early consideration as any other town. I believe that is the right policy to-day, and certainly if buildings are to be constructed Fort Frances should receive earlier consideration than this little village of five hundred people. In addition, Fort Frances already has the site. I have visited my good friend the deputy minister on different occasions in regard to Fort Frances and a number of other places that deserve a public building, and he informs me that there are some eighty or ninety places in the Dominion where sites have been bought for public buildings away back in the past, around 1910 or 1911, but where no buildings have been put up—I may not have given the exact number, but the minister will correct me if I am wrong. Under these circumstances, a vote such as this certainly should not pass the House.

Mr. ARTHURS: It appears to me that the question before us to-night is not whether there should be a post office building at Kensington, but rather a question of policy as to whether post office buildings should be constructed at all at this time, and if they are built, where are they the most urgently required. In other words, should these plums be handed around as political favours? The vote to-night will apparently decide whether or not the government is to go on with a program of simply placing these buildings wherever they choose for political purposes, or whether they intend to use the various votes that may pass the House for the benefit of the country at large.

I have no particular axe to grind. If I had, I could give instances probably much stronger than any that have been given to-night. I might mention my own town, for instance, where the post office revenue has averaged over $20,000 a year and where the customs revenue has averaged about $500,000 annually for many years, where there is also an Indian department under my genial friend the Minister of the Interior, and all of them occupying rented buildings. The government owns a site there, and there was a vote in the estimates year after year a long time before the war, but when the war came we were willing to stand back, and we are yet, providing that no such case arises as this building that is proposed to be constructed at Kensington in Prince Edward Island. We do not believe, no sane man believes, that these towns that stood back during the war on account of war conditions should be left in the background while buildings are constructed in other places for political purposes, and for no other purpose in the world. There is no question about that, and nobody knows it better than the Minister of Public Works himself. This is purely and simply a political vote. It has no other purpose, because otherwise every similar town throughout Canada should receive exactly the same treatment.

Mr. PETTIT: I quite agree that there should be a well settled policy on the part of the government in regard to the construction of public buildings. I would remind the House that in the county of Welland there is the town of Thorold with a population of 5,500, the post office is only a frame building 15 feet wide by 65 feet long, and the space for the public is only 15 feet long by 7 feet wide. Thorold has a net postal revenue of $15,000. Moreover, it is a customs port with an income of $500,000. They have been looking for a post office building in that town for a long time, but as yet there is no sign of their getting one. I would remind the government, which I think should have a well settled policy in the matter of construction of public buildings, that Thorold is better entitled to receive a public building than a number of these other places for which buildings are being asked.

Mr. VALLANCE: The hon. member for Kindersley said he thought the reason why his town of one thousand population was not getting a post office was because they did not vote right. If that is any reason why they should not get one, I would like to state right here on behalf of the town of Wilkie that as far back as 1913, when hon. gentlemen opposite were on the treasury benches, a site for a public building was secured costing some $3,200, and I have been pressing the Minister of Public Works for the last two years to put up a building there. I need not tell the minister that in the constituency of South Battleford and in and around Wilkie the people do vote right, and if my hon. friend from Kindersley is right in his reasoning, then I claim that we ought to have a public building because we did vote right.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I am very much interested in hearing the minister's reply to the questions put to him by my leader. Upon what underlying principle of public expenditure does he justify this vote, and in the second place, why was Kensington selected in preference to many other localities which have much stronger claims for a public building?

Mr. ELLIOTT: In answer to my hon. friend and other hon. gentlemen who have asked questions, I quite agree with a great many hon. gentlemen who have made claims for buildings in their respective ridings. The hon. member for Fort William was not very much above the mark when he said that there are sites now awaiting buildings in a large number of constituencies. There are not quite so many as my hon. friend said, but he was not far above the mark. The policy of the government is, and has been for a number of years, only to construct public buildings where the demand was urgent, and where there was no other accommodation that was reasonably satisfactory for the purpose, and even in these cases only to construct public buildings at an expenditure that would be reasonably commensurate with the saving that would be made in the way of rentals and otherwise to the government.

When hon. gentlemen speak about $12,000 being a large amount for a public building, may I call attention to the fact that the hon. member for Kindersley, who mentioned about half that amount, was much nearer the mark than those who mentioned $12,000 as being the expenditure in this particular case. The proposed expenditure of $12,000 includes $500 for a site. All that is being expended for the building is $8,000, and the fittings for the post office will cost $1,800.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The member for Prince said the site was donated. Where does the minister get the $500 for it?

Mr. ELLIOTT: If a site suitable to the postal authorities is eventually given, then the $500 will be saved. This is just an estimate of how the $12,000 is made up—site, $500; building, $8,000, and fittings $1,800. The fittings have to be furnished whether we rent the building or not. Then there are the gradings, sidewalks and so on. I think upon reflection the leader of the opposition will be one of the first hon. members in this House to agree that this is a very moderate expenditure, and that it is quite consistent with the practice of economy. In the whole of Prince Edward Island the total expenditure for public buildings is that item of $12,000, and only $8,000 of it is for the building. I quite agree that we must economise in public buildings.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Start here.

[Mr. Ryckman.]

Mr. ELLIOTT: There are different places where we require to have accommodation, and I quite agree with my hon. friend that there is a great variance in the kind of accommodation that the postal services in this country have at the present time. But as hon. members all know, since before the war very little has been expended on public buildings. I think we have kept well within the limit when in the whole of Prince Edward Island, we are expending only $8,000 on buildings and the remainder on post office fittings. These, as I say would have to be put into a building if one were rented, and we are only building because of the urgency of the demand and the necessity for giving some reasonably decent accommodation to the people there.

Mr. ARTHURS: The member for the constituency has stated that the post office has been in its present situation for forty years, and no change has been made.

Mr. SPENCER: I quite agree with what has been said by some hon. members on this side of the House in regard to the uncalled for expenditure made out of the public treasury from time to time. This expenditure might probably be laid at the door of both governments in past years, and I am not going to criticise one any more than the other. In a return I had furnished me on February 23 I find that in the year 1913 there were no less than forty-five post office sites purchased in Canada. I got the return because I found there were several post office sites that had been paid for by the government of Canada, but no buildings had been placed on them. I have in mind two sites particularly, one in the town of Vermilion, where the price paid for the site was $10,000, and the property to-day is not worth $200. The revenue being derived for the Dominion government is $10 a year. The price paid for the Calgary post office site was $312,465. To-day there is a hole in the ground, an unsightly place, and no buildings on it. I do not think the government is justified in running into large expenditures on sites if they do not intend to erect buildings on them. That site was purchased in 1913. With regard to the item before the House, I think if the revenue from that post office is only $3,100 and the population 500, it is a particular favour to that town in comparison to many of the other towns throughout Canada which have bigger populations and much bigger revenues. I think, however, the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the opposition is too drastic. For a small place of that sort we might put up a post office in keeping with the revenues received. The amount proposed to be voted is somewhat large, but the amendment makes it absolutely impossible to put any post office there at all.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That was precisely my object in moving my amendment. I appeal to every hon. member in this House, is there any justification in the present state of the finances of the country to spend $12,000 of the people's money on a post office in this little hamlet of five hundred people? I submit there is not. When people set out to find excuses for a particular line of action they usually succeed in raking up something. I am not talking of the records of former governments or of pre-war conditions, or of sites purchased ten, fifteen or twenty years ago. We are confronted with a concrete case. The government proposes unnecessarily to expend $12,000 of the people's money. What is their justification? Can we put our hands into the treasury and take out $12,000 worth of taxes and expend it here, there and everywhere throughout Canada. You have only to state the case to see its absurdity. I am asking hon. members of this committee and the House to stand upon some principle in this matter. I appeal to the minister to state the policy of the government. He discloses no policy whatever; he ignores the whole thing. There is no justification for this expenditure. This little hamlet may be the most beautiful place in Canada, but that is no justification for spending $12,000 of the taxes of the people of this country. I will protest and I will divide the committee on it, if it goes to a vote, and when concurrence is reached I will divide the House and take their opinion on it.

Mr. BRADY: As the hon. Minister of Public Works at the outset stated that he was not very sure that the money voted in the supplementary estimates which were passed by the House would be utilized, I am naturally interested to find out what will be the conditions in the district I represent. I find in the supplementary estimates there were items to the extent of $62,200. In the main estimates these items are eliminated, and the only items I notice in my district are two very small amounts, one of $2,300 and one of $1,300. I am rather more surprised than I can express at this omission, and I feel that something is wrong. If these items comprising $62,000 were considered essential last year, surely they are essential this year. The minister said a few moments ago that only urgent works had been included in the supplementaries. I am quite sure that the same considerations should govern the inclusion of these items in the main estimates. If I am in error, perhaps the minister will advise me whether these items will be included in the main estimates.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I think the object of this amendment is to prove that the party which our hon. friend leads is the party of economy. I would direct the attention of the House to the fact that some years ago the party which he to-day leads, but which at that time he opposed, purchased in the city which I represent two vacant lots from their Conservative friends for $22,000, and to-day they are not worth a thousand dollars. That, to my mind, is not economy.

An hon. MEMBER: It is bad policy.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): You certainly put that policy into effect when you return the Conservatives to power. I do not think the expenditure involved in this item is too high, especially when it is borne in mind that it is the only vote for the whole province of Prince Edward Island, and I agree that a proper post office building should be erected in the constituency of my hon. friend.

Amendment negatived; Yeas 61; Nays 84.

Mr. ERNST: Before the vote is declared carried, Mr. Chairman, I want again to ask the Minister of Public Works if he is prepared to make a statement in regard to expenditure at Mahone bay. Will he reinstate the item in question that appeared in the supplementary estimates last year?

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, when the supplementary estimates were before the House during the first part of the session I called attention to the fact that there seemed to be no policy behind the voting of money for the erection of public buildings, particularly post offices. I then pointed out that at certain points where the postal revenue was only two or three thousand dollars, $15,000, $20,000 and $25,000 were being expended on new buildings, while at other points where the postal revenue ranged from $12,000 to $16,000 the expenditure ran only from $8,000 to $12,000. I urged at the time that the Post Office Department should have some regard to the postal revenue when making expenditure on new buildings.

I voted against the amendment to reduce this particular item because of the fact that it looked to me very much like a political amendment, and I do not believe in voting for such amendments. On the other hand, I think an item of $12,000 for the erection of a new post office in a village yielding a gross postal revenue of only $3,125 is just as political as the amendment.

Mr. MANION: Why does my hon. friend say it is a political amendment?

Mr. GARDINER: It appears to me to be a political amendment. The minister's explanation of the omission of items in the supplementary estimates from the main estimates has not satisfied me at all.

Mr. ERNST: Nor me.

Mr. GARDINER: Nor do I think it satisfied any other member of this committee. We should have a better explanation before this item goes through as to why after this House has once passed certain estimates they should be discriminated against by being left out of the main estimates. If the minister has any reasonable explanation to offer I shall be glad to hear it. I think the committee should demand a satisfactory explanation because we, as the representatives of the people, should see to it that public money is properly spent. I do not think we are warranted in spending $12,000 on a post office at Kensington when the gross annual income is only $3,125, and therefore, Mr. Chairman, I move:

That this item be reduced to $8,000.

I think this would be a fair and reasonable amount under the circumstances.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend has moved an amendment that the item be not greater than $8,000. It has been known for years that in the matter of public buildings the usual vote is not less than $20,000 or $25,000.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, no.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That is proved and it will be found to be the case if my hon. friend will investigate. I know this from experience and inquiry. While it is very necessary to have public buildings in the large centres, there are in Canada rural centres of population which should be considered, and during my term as Minister of Public Works I had plans devised whereby there could be built in small rural centres, post offices that would give the people there the accommodation required, and also show them that the Dominion government representing the people of this country were prepared to give consideration not only to the large centres of population, but to the rural centres.

I had an opportunity of having very careful investigations made, and of having had constructed two such buildings in small centres. I do not believe it will be possible to-day to erect for $8,000 a building of a permanent nature sufficient to carry on government business in a community such as we are speaking of now. There will have to be a basement with a cement foundation, proper heating facilities, and the construction will be of either wood, brick or stone, it makes little difference which. Lighting facilites under modern conditions will have to be provided, because the day of the coal oil lamp is gone so far as public buildings are concerned. Post office fixtures, such as have been explained by the minister, will have to be provided. We know from experience in the department that a building suitable for small rural communities which I claim, in deference to the leader of the opposition, should be considered, and a building in keeping with, I hope, the views of members of this House and of the people of Canada, cannot be constructed for less than the amount mentioned.

How was it that Kensington happened to be considered? One reason was because the minister from that constituency continuously represented that that community should have proper facilities in a moderate way. I also had an opportunity of visiting that constituency, and if some of my hon. friends opposite have not visited Prince Edward Island I would certainly advise them to go to that province, and there learn conditions at first hand. In no other part of Canada have we as large a rural population, situated in such a small area. As one goes through that small province, one passes through one centre after another. The surrounding district is practically all cultivated, and there are these little centres such as Kensington of which the hon. member for that constituency spoke. He explained that there had been a fire in that community and that the postal facilities were not convenient to the residents in the district. These matters were laid before the departmental officials; inquiries were made, and it seemed fair that in the province of Prince Edward Island we should locate in at least one of these rural communities, a building that would stand for the postal and customs services of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. SPENCER: Was the post office burned in the fire?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No. I understand that the post office was a rented building, as is the case in most of these small communities. In the rural centres of western Canada they have had the advantage of better rentals than are to be found in the smaller eastern towns. I had an opportunity of visiting the town of Bridgetown in the constituency of the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis (Mr. Short). It is a nice centre of population, larger than but similar to that of Kensington. I was met by the mayor and other prominent citizens who took me for a tour round the town. Finally they said: We would like to show you our public building; we are rather proud of it, and I was driven up in front of this public building. What did I find? A little wooden shack of about eight or ten by twelve, a disgrace to the public service of Canada.

Mr. SHORT: That is a town of 1,300 inhabitants.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes. I realize that that is a disgrace, and I believe that community should have a public building of a reasonable kind. I proceeded to purchase property, and I hope my hon. friend will realize his hopes and wishes and the wishes of his people, because there should be a public building in that centre of population. But when the leader of the opposition undertakes to divide this committee on the question whether there should be public expenditures in these small rural communities, I differ with him.

An hon. MEMBER: He did not say so.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There are about 100,000 people in Prince Edward Island; there are 2,000,000 people in the west. Will the hon. member indicate what rural centres have been selected in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia for these buildings?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I cannot say offhand. I know in the last few years there have been rural centres selected.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Not in this estimate.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No. Public buildings have been placed in them. I know that, and my hon. friend will find it is true. These are the estimates for the coming year. As I said at first and say now, I regard this estimate of $12,000 for the town of Kensington, Prince Edward Island, as absolutely justified.

Mr. LUCAS: At the beginning of this discussion I asked the minister to explain why certain estimates had been left out that had been previously voted in this House in the supplementary estimates at the beginning of this session. Before we vote anything on these estimates, as the House has already passed the supplementary estimates, we should have some better explanation than the minister has given why some of the items have been left out.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have no further explanation. I thought that the explanation that was given was reasonably clear, but I will repeat it for the benefit of my hon. friend. The supplementary estimates are all now voted and the vote stands until the thirty-first March. A great deal of that money cannot be expended before the thirty-first March, and of course the government will have to consider later what attitude will be taken with regard to revoting. If the Minister of Finance and the other members of the treasury board were here, they would bear me out in the explanation which I made. In commencing to make up the main estimates, I think we started with Nova Scotia, and certain items that were in the supplementary estimates and that could not likely be reached until the end of this month, were inserted in the main estimates. But before they got along very far they decided that as the supplementary estimates had all been voted, and as there was a possibility that on account of both sides of the House having been committed to the supplementary estimates, they might be revoted en bloc, they should be left out of the main estimates. It was decided not to put into the main estimates anything that was in the supplementaries.

Mr. GARDINER: Why was not that done in this particular case?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This was done before we reached that decision.

Mr. GARDINER: Then will the minister hold this item until we come to the supplementaries?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No; it has been passed by the treasury board.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Might I ask if it is the intention of the government to vote the supplementaries that were passed en bloc.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That has not been decided by the government. I have certain views on the matter and I expressed those views privately this afternoon to the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Lucas). I cannot say what will be done, however, because it has not been decided by the government.

Mr. HANSON: I would like to have a further declaration of policy by the government on this question of public buildings, and while I am on my feet I would like to corroborate the remarks of the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Price) in regard to the postal facilities in the city of Moncton. I suppose Moncton has the largest per capita postal revenue of any city in the maritime provinces and there is no doubt that the postal facilities are wholly inadequate to the present business being done there. Just previous to the election of 1925 the government purchased an expensive but very good site, there was some difference of opinion as to where it should be, but the ex-Minister of Public Works (Mr. King, Kootenay) was always able to justify the selection which was made and with which I think he had something to do. The city of Moncton is paying into the treasury something over $300,000 in net revenue; the government have a fine site but they have not voted one dollar for the erection of a building. I think it is just as plain as the nose on your face that the city of Moncton voted wrong in 1925, according to the tenets of this government. Is Moncton to be punished for having turned down a political party? I do not think that is a good public policy, and I do not think the Prime Minister will agree to it. I can sympathize with my friend from Prince (Mr. MacLean) in his endeavour to get something for the rural communities and I can also sympathize with the ex-Minister of Public Works in the explanation he has made; most of those places never have a dollar of public money expended in them, although on the other hand it is fair to say that they produce very little postal revenue. But I think we should proceed on some proper policy, and it should not be the policy that these works go by favour. I think we should have from the minister to-night a declaration of the intention of the government. I could point out to him a town in my own county which is the most important railway centre in New Brunswick next to Moncton itself. The revenue is large, and the post office is located in a shingled shack. It is on the main street and in a good location, but the accommodation is very poor. Some day we hope to have a post office in that town but I have not asked for it because I did not think it was of such pressing importance that we should request it at this stage. But for Moncton I can make that request with a clear conscience; the people there do require increased facilities, and the revenue produced and the business done demand it.

Mr. VENIOT: Perhaps I may be permitted to add a word or two. The importance of a post office is not always judged by its revenue; in a great many cases it is judged by its location. If you take Kensington as an example you will find that it is the central point of distribution for five or six rural routes.

Mr. ARTHURS: And so are many other places.

Mr. VENIOT: No, there are not many such places.

Mr. ARTHURS: Yes there are.

[Mr. Hanson.]

Mr. VENIOT: Pardon me; I am addressing the committee just now, and I think I know what I am talking about. Kensington, with a population of 500, would never produce a revenue of $3,000 if it were not for the fact that it is the centre of distribution for rural mail routes some of which are twenty miles in length, and the same argument applies to the city of Moncton. Moncton is not a central distribution point, although I do not want to be understood as saying that Moncton should not have improved accommodation. I think the committee should know these facts, however. Previous to the establishment of the T. Eaton Company in Moncton, the revenue from that city only amounted to $167,000; after the establishment of that company the revenues of that office increased to the amount mentioned, but it did not increase by ten per cent the number of employees necessary to carry on the work of the office. To-day the T. Eaton Company have no direct connection with the Moncton post office or postal service; the service given the T. Eaton Company and the service they give to the public is carried on in the T. Eaton Company building, in which the postal department has thirteen clerks looking after the work. But allow me also to say that Moncton is deserving of and should have better accommodation than it has to-day; whether or not the government can see its way clear at present to grant an amount sufficient to build a post office there, an amount which would probably be in the vicinity of $200,000 or $250,000, I am not in a position to say. But it is not right to state that owing to the tremendous increase in its revenue Moncton is entitled to or requires this additional accommodation. It is not on account of the increased revenue at all, because there was no part of the Moncton post office accommodation taken up by the work of the T. Eaton Company.

Mr. HANSON: Is it not a fact that the T. Eaton Company was established there prior to 1925, and is it not also a fact that the government purchased an expensive site in that year?

Mr. VENIOT: No one denies that.

Mr. HANSON: Conditions were the same when the government bought the site, so why not build the post office?

Mr. VENIOT: A site was purchased in 1925 for $50,000, and the tenant is not in that building at present. He looked after it during the winter at a small rental and has now moved into other quarters. That site was not purchased because of the increase in the revenues, better accommodation was necessary before the T. Eaton Company opened in that city, and that company to-day have taken up no part of the public building in the city of Moncton and they will not take up any part of any new building which may be erected, under the arrangements which have been made.

Mr. HANSON: I think the Postmaster General has correctly stated the facts. I was not dilating on the increase in revenue as a reason why a post office should be built, except to show that it was a large revenue-producing office. I quite agree with what the minister has said, but I do say that in 1925 the government came to the conclusion that Moncton should have a new post office. If we are to believe the Minister of Finance, the condition of the country has so improved that now the government should fulfil the promise made to the people of that city.

Mr. VENIOT: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question, which he may perhaps be able to answer. What about the various promises made by the hon. gentleman's own party when they were in power? They bought sites and left them without public buildings, as in 1913 they bought a site in the town of Truro for $14,000; there it is to-day, and nothing has been done to it. There was no necessity for purchasing the site because the public building in Truro to-day has sufficient ground around it to provide for enlargement such as will meet the requirements for twenty years to come.

Mr. HANSON: I do not know anything about that.

Mr. VENIOT: I do because I visited the place not a month ago.

Mr. ERNST: I want to go back to this vote and the explanation of the minister as to how it came to be inserted in the main estimates. I understood him to say that in compiling the estimates concerning the province of Nova Scotia those supplementary estimates were included which had not been voted last session. In that way the vote of $12,000 for the Kensington public building was included in the main estimates. But I draw his attention to the fact that that explanation cannot possibly be correct because the vote of $10,000 for a post office at Mahone bay in my constituency, which is a necessary vote, has been omitted. In view of the fact that the Kensington vote appears in the estimates I want to ask why the vote for Mahone bay was omitted and whether it will be inserted in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. DUFF: No, it will not.

Mr. ERNST: The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough apparently does not judge the people by their intelligence but by their ability to be purchased.

Mr. DUFF: I may say for the benefit of the committee and the Minister of Public Works that the people of Mahone bay instructed me to see that that money was not put in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. ERNST: Will the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough give me the names of the persons in Mahone bay who gave him that instruction?

Mr. DUFF: I should like to rise to a point of order. The hon. member should address the Chair.

Mr. ERNST: Will the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough kindly tell me the names of the persons who so instructed him? I challenge him to do so.

Amendment (Mr. Gardiner) negatived: Yeas, 62; Nays, 79.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the vote carry?

Mr. ERNST: No, Mr. Chairman. Before it is carried I should like an answer from the Minister of Public Works. I may say that I represent the electors of the constituency of Queens-Lunenburg until the next general election.

Mr. DUFF: You have not got the patronage, I have got the patronage.

Mr. ERNST: Will the hon. minister answer my question? I should like an answer to my question as to whether this item was inadvertently omitted and whether it will appear in the supplementary estimate.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I cannot undertake to say at this stage what will appear in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough has just made the statement that he controls the patronage of a certain constituency, I think the Queens-Lunenburg constituency. Is it the policy of the government to permit that? Is there any truth in the statement that a member representing a certain constituency can control the patronage in another constituency? Is that correct? I think before we proceed any further we ought to have this matter cleared up.

Mr. KENNEDY: Are we to understand that estimates are prepared on the basis of how people vote? If that is the case we ought to know it now and it will largely determine our attitude in regard to other estimates. I know the plea is used at election time, but I sincerely hope that this government will not maintain that attitude with regard to public works and the expenditure of public money. If that is the basis on which estimates are made up, it is the worst form of patronage we could possibly have.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend can find an answer to his question on the very page of the estimates now under discussion. The vote which passed a little time ago, vote No. 132, does not contain a single item for a constituency represented by a Liberal. Vote No. 133, the one under discussion, is, if my memory of locations in the maritime provinces is correct, the one item in three votes which is in a constituency represented by a gentleman who sits on this side of the House.

Mr. GARDINER: That is no answer to the question I asked the minister. The hon. member who represents Antigonish-Guysborough stated very emphatically that he controls the patronage in the constituency of Queens-Lunenburg. The reply which the Minister of Railways has given is no answer to the question.

Mr. DUNNING: I was attempting to answer not my hon. friend's question but the question asked by his colleague the hon. member for Peace River, which related to an entirely different matter.

Mr. GARDINER: I apologize for the mistake, but I still put my question. Is it correct that the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough controls the patronage in the constituency of Queens-Lunenburg?

Mr. ELLIOTT: If my hon. friend will go through these estimates he will realize the fact to which the Minister of Railways has just called attention, that they show a fair regard for the requirements of the particular place to which they relate, irrespective of what the representation of the constituency may be in this House. The reports of the engineers and the other officers as to the actual necessities—that is the test.

Mr. GARDINER: I accept the explanation given by the minister so far as it goes, but it goes only a very short distance. I do not question at all that these estimates have been given very serious consideration,, and that in the opinion of the minister and the government as a whole the different provinces have been very fairly dealt with. But that does not answer the question I asked of of the minister: Does he support the attitude of the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough when he states that he controls the patronage of the constituency of Queens-Lunenburg—yes or no?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think the estimates are the best answer.

Mr. GARDINER: If the minister does not care to answer, I will address my question to the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not know that I caught the exact question of my hon. friend, but the purport of his remarks I think was as to whether the government in the matter of public buildings should be governed by party motives or public interest.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What was the question?

Mr. GARDINER: During some cross-questioning between the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough and the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg, the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough stated: "I control the patronage in the constituency of Lunenburg."

Mr. DUFF: I beg your pardon. I did not mention any constituency.

Mr. GARDINER: It was intimated that the hon. member controlled the patronage in the constituency. I asked the Minister of Public Works whether it was the policy of the government to allow one member representing one particular constituency to control patronage in another constituency. The Minister of Public Works has not thought it advisable to give a direct answer, and I therefore address the question to the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I imagine it must have been the modesty of my colleague, not wishing to take too much credit to himself. The government controls the patronage, and with respect to public works the government speaks through the Minister of Public Works.

Item agreed to.

Edmundston—public building, $2,000.

Mr. HANSON: What is that for?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is required to complete the building erected during 1925, 1926 and 1927.

Mr. HANSON: We have had a lot of buildings erected at Edmundston. Is this for the post office or customs?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The post office.

Mr. HANSON: The post office building was erected three or four years ago.

Mr. ELLIOTT: In 1925, 1926 and 1927.

Mr. HANSON: What has been the total cost of the Edmundston post office?

Mr. ELLIOTT: There has been so far expended $71,255, and the amount required to complete it is $2,000, making a total of $73,255.

Item agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS: We have had a pretty full day, and the government I think will agree that they have had no unfair opposition. It is now late, and I would suggest that the committee rise.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before the committee rises I would ask my hon. friend if he would have any objection to our calling one item in the Mines department, so that we can go into committee of supply on that department on Thursday, which otherwise we could not do except by unanimous consent.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not think there is any objection to that.

Mines and Geological Survey—for organization and equipment of the Explosives divisions, under the Explosives Act, Chap. 31, 4-5 George V, $10,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This is the same as last year.

MONTREAL, OTTAWA AND GEORGIAN BAY CANAL COMPANY

COMMUNICATION FROM LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO TRANSMITTING RESOLUTION

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received from the clerk of the Legislative Assembly of Ontario the following communication:

Toronto, March 8th, 1927.

The Honourable Speaker,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Sir:

At the session of the Legislative Assembly of Ontario held yesterday afternoon, the 7th instant, a resolution was adopted by the House dealing with the request contained in Bill No. 78 of your House asking for an extension of the charter of the Georgian Bay Ship Canal Company.

A properly certified copy of the resolution in question is being forwarded to you through the medium of the Lieutenant-Governor, as is proper in such cases, but as the bill is now before your House for consideration I am taking the liberty of enclosing herein a copy of the resolution duly certified by me in order that you may be advised of the action of the Ontario assembly.

Yours respectfully,

(Signed) ALEX. C. LEWIS,
Clerk of the Legislative Assembly.

On motion of Mr. Ferguson, seconded by Mr. Raney,

Resolved, that this House respectfully urges the parliament of Canada not to enact Bill (No. 78) of the House of Commons respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Company for the reasons hereinafter set forth:

That the bill proposes to renew a charter to authorize the construction of a canal and the development of water-powers on the Ottawa and the French rivers which said charter has already been in existence for thirty-three years without any evidence of progress toward the accomplishment of the projected canal;

That the application to parliament is an effort on the part of private promoters to secure through the federal parliament the control and ownership of a great and valuable public utility;

That the water-powers in the Ottawa river in inter-provincial waters are the joint property of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and that the powers in the French river are wholly situate within Ontario and are the property of the province of Ontario and cannot be rightfully legislated upon by the Dominion parliament;

That the development of these powers is essential to the industry and the prosperity of the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and the only effect of federal legislation purporting to vest these powers in a private company will be to retard development, create litigation and impair the public interest;

That the water-powers of the Ottawa river, so far as they belong to this province, are an essential part of the public development and distribution of power in Ontario in which the people of this province have already invested upwards of $276,000,000;

That this legislative assembly desires to record its most earnest and emphatic protest against the attempt being made, by means of a private bill in the Dominion parliament, to alienate valuable water-powers from the control and ownership of this province, and thereby deprive the people of Ontario of the advantage of one of our greatest natural resources for the benefit and advantage of private promoters;

That the province of Ontario respectfully urges that the rights guaranteed to the provinces under the federal constitution should be at all times respected by the parliament of Canada;

That this House believes that the occasion calls for a strong and conclusive pronouncement against the proposed legislation as being contrary to the spirit and the terms of confederation and prejudicial to the public interest.

For these and other reasons this House directs that copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Prime Minister of Canada and to the Speakers of the two Houses of Parliament of Canada.

The above is a true copy of a resolution adopted, without a dissenting voice, by the Legislative Assembly of Ontario on Monday, March 7, 1927.

(Signed) ALEX. C. LEWIS,
Clerk of the Legislative Assembly.

Toronto, March 8th, 1927.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

POINT PELEE LIFE SAVING STATION

Mr. GOTT:

1. Who is coxswain of Point Pelee life saving station?
2. What salary does he draw?
3. Is his wife on the pay roll of the department?
4. If so, what salary is paid her?
5. If not, how is she paid?
6. How many people comprise the entire crew?
7. What does it cost the country per month to maintain the station?
8. What provision is made for feeding the crew and what allowance is made for their board?
9. To whom is said allowance made?
10. Has there been any complaint regarding the food?
11. Is the system one that the cheaper the men are fed the more there is for the coxswain's pocket?
12. What was the total cost for maintaining the station for the year 1926?
13. When was the station first established?
14. What has been the cost of maintenance: (a) total cost; (b) each year since it was established?
15. What training or practice is participated in by the crew under the present coxswain?
16. What utensils are supplied by the government at the station, and is there any limit to expenditures?
17. Can a narrative be given of any service the crew under the present coxswain has been known to perform of recent date?
18. Following a gruesome tale of the lakes, in which nine lives were lost off Point Pelee on May 3, 1925, were there any complaints received by the department concerning the captain of the Point Pelee life saving station?
19. Was it ever reported to the department that the fishermen played a more prominent part in the rescue work than the crew of the life saving station?
20. Was the resignation of the present coxswain ever submitted to the department, or any district office? If so, when and what action was taken?

[Mr. Speaker.]

21. Has any person been recommended to take his place? If so, who?
22. Has the department received any application for the position?
23. Did the government receive the following resolution passed by the Pelee Park patrons on July 21, 1926:

"That we call the attention of the Department of Marine and Fisheries to the fact that though the tug Peter Pan 2nd was in distress and blowing continuously on the morning of January 21st, a short distance from the Point Pelee life saving station, no effort was made by the crew stationed there to reach her until after six in the morning, and then owing to inefficiency they were unable to do so in weather so moderate that all the fishermen were attending their nets as usual; and we ask that this matter be investigated at once to prevent another such accident as the Pelee Island mishap of a year ago."

24. If so, what action was taken, or will be taken?
25. Is it the intention of the government to retain in its service for the year 1927 the present coxswain of and at the Point Pelee life saving station?

Hon. Mr. CARDIN:

1. Lewis Wilkinson.
2. $100 per month plus $25 board allowance while station is in operation and $75 per year extra for his services as caretaker during winter.
3. No.
4. No.
5. No.
6. 9—Coxswain, cook and 7 boatmen.
7. $725. (Wages $500, board $225). (Repairs, supplies, etc., vary).
8. A cook is provided and each member of the crew is allowed $25 per month for his board.
9. The cheque for board allowance for the full crew is sent the coxswain.

10 and 11. No complaints have reached the department.

12. $7,378.76. (Up to date for fiscal year 1926-27) (covers: wages, board, repairs and labour supplies, clothing, etc.)

13. The station was first established in 1900 with a volunteer crew. Since 1910 the station has been manned by a permanent crew, that is, during the season of navigation.

14. (a) $112,244.43; (b) 1900, $224.29; 1901, $2.80; 1902; 1903, $730.44; 1904, $411; 1905, $439; 1906, $327; 1907, $427.10; 1908, $294; 1909, $361.50; 1910, $363.56; 1911, $1,838.25; 1912, $4,125.97; 1913, $4,449.42; 1914, $4,859.93; 1915, $4,878.51; 1916, $10,626.26 ($5,500 erection of boathouse); 1917, $4,948.69; 1918, $5,252.54; 1919, $4,052.88; 1920, $4,701.51; 1921, $9,322.71; 1922, $8,504.84; 1923, $7,126.80; 1924, $7,670.55; 1925, $7,513.25; 1926, $11,412.87; present fiscal year, $7,378.76.

15. Drills performed twice a week (include managing the life boat and other duties connected with the station and an exercise of four or five miles in the boat.

16. Household supplies (living room, dining room, bedroom and kitchen furnishings) uniforms, oilskins and rubber boots, and boathouse supplies. Only essentials supplied and articles replaced when deemed unfit for further use.

17. The coxswain will be requested to submit a report of the operations of the station covering the fiscal year ending March 31st.

18. No. (Extract from a letter received from clerk of the peace, Windsor, Ont.) "Although this took place within 3 miles of the life saving station no one there knew of it, although the boat could be seen floating bottom up quite clearly from the shore and the whistle was blown hard before the boat turned turtle."

19. The coxswain in his report of the accident states: "When the man on the beach reported ship aground made ready to go out. Saw fishing vessel "Flossie G." which had been lifting nets close by proceeding to assistance so waited their report. Survivors landed by fishing boat and taken care of at station. Survivors stated no danger whistle blown—engine room whistle blown by captain—two short blasts."

Captain Demers in summing up his evidence of investigation states: "Even if the lifeboat had been manned it could not have rendered any help as the turning over of the vessel was so sudden that the crew was trapped and perished within a few minutes. The distance from the station to the place of casualty is estimated to be 3 miles and when the crew searched the place on the following morning Sunday May 3rd, when the weather and wind had subsided, this distance was covered in one hour and ten minutes. In view of this I am of the opinion that the life saving crew would not have rendered help and saved other lives."

20. The department has no record of the coxswain's resignation having been received.

21. William A. Grubb, Jr., recommended by Eccles J. Gott, M.P., and others.

22. Yes.

23. The department did receive the resolution dated 28th June, 1926.

24 and 25. The department contemplates the complete reorganization of this station.

* NATURAL RESOURCES—ALBERTA

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Will the government lay on the table of the House the text of the reference to the Supreme Court of Canada of the Alberta resources question?

2. Will the case be argued before a special sitting or at the next regular sitting of the court, and if so, when?

3. What counsel will appear for the government or province?

4. Has the Alberta government agreed to this reference, and will Alberta be represented at the hearing, or not?

5. Will the government lay on the table any correspondence on the subject of this reference with Alberta's government?

6. Who were the persons who expressed "implied doubts" as to the validity of the Alberta Act, 1905, referred to in statement of the Minister of Justice in the House on reference to Supreme Court (1926)?

7. Will the government lay on the table of the House the opinions it secured or has received as to the validity of the Alberta Act, 1905, from the Alberta government?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. gentleman, the government has already laid on the table of the House all documents and given all the information concerning this matter. Argument was concluded last Monday on the reference to the Supreme Court of Canada. The Attorney General of Canada was represented by the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) and Mr. Eugene Lafleur, K.C. of Montreal; the case against the validity of the Alberta Act was presented by Mr. F. H. Chrysler, K.C. of Ottawa, who was appointed by the Supreme Court for that purpose; the province of Alberta was represented by Mr. George F. Henderson, K.C. of Ottawa, and the province of Saskatchewan by Mr. Harold Fisher, K.C., of Ottawa.

PENSION TO SOLDIERS

Mr. PECK:

1. Has the government received any requests to amend the Pension Act so as to enable the granting of pensions to soldiers who, when on active service, contracted venereal disease and as a result, partly or wholly, are under disability?

2. Will the government take steps to amend the act so as to permit issue of pensions in such cases?

Hon. Mr. RALSTON:

1. A resolution submitted by the Canadian Legion proposes that the Pension Act be amended to provide for recognition of disabilities from venereal disease contracted during service.

2. The recommendation is being considered together with some one hundred others recently submitted by the legion.

BELL TELEPHONE CO.—GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

Mr. GEARY:

1. Has the government a contract or contracts with the Bell Telephone Company of Canada for telephone service?

2. Have the Canadian National Railways a contract or contracts with the Bell Telephone Company of Canada for telephone service?
3. If so, may all such contracts be tabled?

Hon. Mr. RINFRET:

1. Yes.
2. Yes; covered by agreement between the Bell Telephone Company of Canada and the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada. dated May 1, 1913.
3. Copy will be tabled.

LENROOT TABER MILK BILL

Mr. BOIVIN:

1. Is the Department of Agriculture aware that United States government has adopted what is known as the Lenroot Taber Milk Bill, controlling and regulating the acceptance of milk and cream in the United States?
2. If so, when will this Lenroot Taber Milk Bill, as far as it affects Canada, come in force?
3. Will it prohibit Canadians shipping milk and cream to United States, and if not, on what regulation will Canadian products be controlled?
4. Has the Department of Agriculture taken steps so that Canadian producers of milk and cream will put in equipment to meet these regulations?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. Yes.
2. The Act itself comes into effect within ninety days after the date of enactment, that is ninety days after February 15th, 1927.
3. It is not anticipated that the new Act will prohibit Canadians shipping milk and cream to the United States, as provision is made in the Act for all applicants to receive a temporary permit at the outset, until the machinery incidental to the Act is put in motion. The conditions under which shipments will be permitted will not be known until the regulations are drafted and approved, and the Canadian Department of Agriculture is to have an opportunity of being represented at the public hearing to be held at Washington when these regulations are being drafted, probably late March or early April.
4. No, inasmuch as the conditions under which Canadian milk and cream will be permitted entry into the United States are not yet fully known, no steps have been taken, but the Department is keeping in close touch with day-to-day developments in Washington with respect to the subject in question.

WAR CLAIMS COMMISSION—REPORT

Mr. TOLMIE:

1. Has the royal commission for the investigation of illegal warfare claims and for the return of sequestrated property in necessitous cases made its final report to the government?
2. If so, when will the contents of same be laid on the table?

Hon. Mr. RINFRET:

1. No. An interim report covering 1,497 claims totalling $41,505,787.80 has been submitted by the commissioner. There still remains thirteen claims for assessment, and the commissioner reports that "there are in these cases such masses of documents, evidence, briefs, calculations by experts, accountants, etc., that it will take further time to deliver intelligent decisions."
2. Answered by No. 1.

TELEPHONE TAXES

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What federal taxes does the Bell Telephone Company pay per annum?
2. What federal taxes does the provincial government owned telephone systems pay per annum, (2) in Manitoba; (b) in Saskatchewan; (c) in Alberta?

Hon. Mr. EULER:

1 and 2. It is contrary to the practice of the department to give information which would disclose the business of an individual concern, except by resolution of parliament.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

PROPOSED SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER AMENDMENTS

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, in view of: (a) the constitutional developments of the last sixty years: (b) the dissatisfaction of certain provinces; (c) the changed conditions in industry, commerce and finance not contemplated at the time of confederation; and, (d) the action of the Senate in preventing the enactment of popular legislation, there should be appointed a special select committee to consider what amendments might be made in the British North America Act which, while conserving the principles of confederation, would enable us more adequately to cope with the complicated problems which now confront Canada.

He said: As will be observed, my argument is outlined in the terms of the resolution itself. I have called attention to the changes and developments in the constitutional relations of this country during the past sixty years. It is not my purpose to go into the rather complicated question of the Imperial conference and the changed status which has come, or is alleged to have come, through that conference. I presume that that matter will receive very full discussion at a later date when the report of the conference is under review. I would, however, venture to call attention to the fact that the conference itself recognized some of the changes which are becoming necessary because of the altered conditions in Canada and in the other dominions. From the report of the Imperial conference I quote the following:

The rapid evolution of the oversea dominions during the last fifty years has involved many complicated adjustments of old political machinery to changing conditions. The tendency towards equality of status was both right and inevitable. Geographical and other conditions made this impossible of attainment by the way of confederation. The only alternative was by the way of autonomy; and along this road it has been steadily sought. Every self-governing member of the empire is now the master of its destiny. In fact, if not always in form, it is subject to no compulsion whatever.

There is here very clearly recognized the evolution that has been taking place in the relations of the various overseas dominions, and now it is declared that Great Britain and the dominions are equal in status and in no way subordinate one to another, in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs. It seems to me, then, that the time has come when we must implement this statement by amending our constitution and our constitutional procedure in order that these may conform to our present status—whether that status was acquired at the Imperial conference or at that conference it was merely formally declared.

I do not think that for my purpose it makes very much difference whether we acquired a new status at the Imperial conference or whether, at that conference, declaration was made of a condition of things which was already in existence. The fact is that we are recognized as having a certain status to-day, and it is also clearly recognized that there are many legislative and constitutional anomalies in existence which ought to be removed in order that we may fully implement the declaration made at the Imperial conference. Among these anomalies, and in my opinion, of very great importance to us, is the fact that at the present time there is no way in which we ourselves can amend our constitution. I presume that we could pass an address in this House and ask that a similar address be passed in the Senate, praying the parliament of Great Britain to change our constitution. That may be the manner in which the change will have to be brought about. The fact is, however, that we ourselves have no means by which we can amend our own constitution; and in this respect we are inferior to Australia and South Africa. We talk about equality of status, but in this direction alone we are inferior not only to the motherland, but to others of the dominions. Decidedly we should bring our status up to that of South Africa or of Australia, whose constitutions happen to be more modern and therefore include the right of amendment. We have been rather accustomed to think of ourselves as the premier dominion, but it cannot be said that we have very much to boast of when these much less important and more recent confederations enjoy greater autonomy than we do. I quite admit that they may be right who say that this power of amending our constitution is already within our possession, and that in reality we have those powers; I fancy if we made a request to Great Britain, that request would be complied with. In that case, let us proceed to find out as a first step what modifications we really want to see brought about. The exact method by which that may be done may be a matter for subsequent discussion.

I would draw attention to the fact, Mr. Speaker, that there is dissatisfaction in certain provinces of Canada. I think I need not go into the question of the rights of the Maritime provinces, since that matter was before us last session, and will shortly be brought up again in connection with the report of the Duncan commission, but in certain quarters of the maritime provinces there has been distinct talk of secession. I am not in a position to say how widespread that sentiment may be, but I do know that it has been overtly expressed and, I am inclined to think, with considerable earnestness. It is stated that unless conditions are radically changed it may be necessary to advocate secession. Undoubtedly that feeling points very distinctly to the need for modification of our present relations.

Further I would say that our western provinces are far from satisfied with the conditions which have prevailed for a good many years in the public policies of Canada, and which we have found it very difficult to remedy. The other day, in the discussion of this resolution by a western gentleman of considerable political experience and, I think, of good judgment, he said, "What is the use of tinkering with the British North America Act? The west must break away, and then possibly we can coöperate on another basis." That is, he felt the case at present to be so hopeless that it was a mere waste of time to suggest that we should modify the British North America Act, and that the only possible thing for us to do was to let things go from bad to worse until the crash came, when the west might unite with the other provinces under some entirely new arrangement. That is not an extravagant statement by any means, but represents a feeling which is very widespread throughout the western country. It would seem to me a great deal wiser to recognize the economic developments which have taken place and which call for the adaptation of our political machinery. I know it is very easy for certain members of this House to jump up and say that those who talk secession or express dissatisfaction are traitors; that is especially easy for those who live in the central provinces, which are so very largely the beneficiaries of the present arrangements. But I would say rather that they are traitors—if that harsh term must be used—at least, that they are not working in the best interests of Canada, who deliberately refuse to recognize the actual conditions, and who refuse to allow these modifications which will do away with that dissatisfaction.

Of the many great changes which have come about in the last sixty years I would mention only two or three, and first I would take the opening up of the Canadian west. Sixty years ago the Canadian west was inhabited only by Indians. Now all that vast territory has been developed; great cities have been established and that part of Canada has become the source of a great deal of the production of this country. We have now nearly 2,000,000 people living in the three prairie provinces. I would submit that that in itself represents an entire change in the life of Canada, a change which has not been fully appreciated by those living in the older sections. I know from the casual contacts which one has with the people of the east that a great many of them think we westerners are very extravagant and have all sorts of queer notions. I would remind the House that a great many of us came originally from the east, and have had to face new conditions. So it would seem to me that when we present these conditions to the east our eastern friends might surely realize, that if we have reacted in a particular way because of our contact with conditions in the west, very probably they would react in a similar way if they were to face similar experiences.

Mr. COOTE: They would be a lot worse.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: My hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Coote) suggests that they would be worse, and that is possibly so.

In the next place I would refer to the great changes only beginning to be felt because of the opening of the Panama canal. I know that many of my fellow citizens of Winnipeg are only beginning to realize what that will mean, and some of them resent very strongly the diversion of traffic which has already taken place. All I desire to point out in that connection is that this means that our trade relationships must be placed on an altogether different basis, and that we may require modified policies. Again there is the development of trade with the orient, and I think hon. members from British Columbia would try to impress upon the House what that is going to mean in the days to come. Already that trade has a large volume, and here again this will mean a complete shifting of the trade routes in future, together with the modification of our trade policies. A further extension of that same line of thought is the wider world relationships in which we find ourselves, and which I think have become apparent to all especially since the war.

The mere mention of these concrete facts, should be sufficient to convince any member of this House that we have gone through very distinct changes, and that because of these changes we have experienced very considerable dissatisfaction with the old and inadequate political forms and policies. It would appear to be the part of wisdom to try to get at the real causes of this trouble, because there are real causes behind it which should be remedied.

Almost every day in this House we are confronted with difficulties arising from the conflict of jurisdiction as between the Dominion and provincial governments; only this morning in the banking and commerce committee we had another illustration of this difficulty. I suppose troubles of this kind may give our constitutional lawyers a great deal of work, but it would seem to an ordinary layman that instead of wrangling eternally about these matters and instead of having to refer one thing after another to our law officers, to the Supreme Court of Canada and to the Privy Council, it would be wise to clarify our constitution so that we would know just what is under federal jurisdiction and what is under the control of the provinces.

I have called attention to the changed conditions in industry, commerce and finance not contemplated at the time of confederation. At the time of confederation, as a matter of fact, Canada consisted of very little more than a series of pioneer settlements. The life of Canada was very largely agricultural. On the whole the communities were more or less self contained. Nearly all of us in going back to our childhood days can remember the little villages scattered throughout the country where there would be found at the corners a blacksmith shop, a carpenter shop, possibly a weaving establishment, a few simple industries that provided for the needs of the immediately surrounding country. We had those small country stores, while in the cities there were general stores that supplied the needs of the comparatively small populations of those centres. I can remember living in the city of Toronto when there were fewer than 100,000 inhabitants. Some of the Toronto people can hardly realize that Toronto was ever so small, but large as the city is to-day we must remember that its growth is of very recent years. These are some of the changes that have come about. Sixty years ago we had no highly concentrated system of capitalism such as we have to-day. There were a great many small industries, there were a great many small banks. To-day everything is changed. We have our huge factories, we have our developing trusts, we have our two great railway systems, and we have our banking systems representing a very highly concentrated system of finance. All is changed.

I note this particularly in connection with questions of legislation affecting labour. I come now to some very practical questions. Take the Industrial Disputes Investigations Act. We all know how difficult it has been to get anything of that kind established in Canada, and even to-day we hardly know whether the present legislation is intra vires of the Dominion or not. Take such questions as the eight-hour day, the minimum wage, old age pensions, unemployment insurance, the education of immigrants—especially the foreign immigrants who are coming to us—questions with regard to bonuses and subsidies and how far any particular undertaking ought to be declared for the general welfare of Canada. These are very important questions, and I find that with regard to such practical considerations we can hardly touch one of them without being held up over this question of jurisdiction. As far back as 1889 the Royal Commission on the Relations of Capital and Labour reporting said:

> Your commissioners cannot venture to determine where, in legislation affecting labour and capital, the authority of the Dominion parliament ends and that of the provincial legislatures begins.

That is the commissioners found themselves absolutely nonplussed when they came to run a dividing line between the jurisdiction of the Dominion and the provincial assemblies. Or again only last year in the report of our own select standing committee on industrial and international relations we find the same difficulty revealed. I read from the report:

> It was stated by the Deputy Minister of Justice that according to the British North America Act legislative jurisdiction in regard to minimum wages is vested primarily in the provincial legislatures. He also quoted section 132 as follows: "The parliament of Canada shall have all powers necessary or proper for performing the obligations of Canada or any provinces thereof as part of the British Empire, towards foreign countries, arising out of any treaty between the empire and such foreign countries." Commenting on this he said: "There can be no doubt that where Canada has entered into an obligation by treaty—and in that connection I mean an association with the empire of course—within the meaning of section 132, which I have just read—I do not think there is any doubt but that parliament has power to legislate for the purpose of carrying into effect the provision of the treaty." This opinion goes to show that the British North America Act by no means contemplated industrial problems of the kind and scope to which Canadians to-day must adjust themselves.

It is that kind of thing that has led me to introduce a resolution of this character. In one sentence we are told by the Deputy Minister of Justice that this matter is primarily the affair of the provinces; in the next, he quotes another clause of the act, and says there is no doubt but that the federal authorities have jurisdiction. It depends upon the clause of the British North America Act which you quote, and lawyers can argue themselves black in the face over the matter. It all depends on the emphasis that is given to one or the other of these clauses. I have no doubt that this confusion may be a very good thing for some of our legal friends who may be retained on one side or the other, but I would suggest that when the matter is viewed from the standpoint of the country as a whole it is better that we should know clearly just where we stand on these matters.

I have said that these changes were not contemplated at the time of confederation. I do not suppose it is necessary to say that in making such a statement I am not casting any reflection on the fathers of confederation. They did the best they could to meet the needs of their day, but I would say that we are truest to their spirit if we attempt in our day to meet the needs that concern us. The fathers of confederation could not have had any idea sixty years ago of the vast changes that were coming; they could not possibly have the prescience which would enable them to visualize them. Hence there were no suitable provisions in the British North America Act for these new needs. This summer we shall celebrate the diamond jubilee of confederation. I think it could not be done better than by showing that we at least are sufficiently the children of our fathers to insist that we will do in our day what they did in theirs—try to meet the real needs of the country.

Now I pass on to the next point I have mentioned in the resolution, and that is the action of the Senate in preventing the enactment of popular legislation. It is not my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to enter into any very lengthy discussion of the need for reform of the Senate. But I should like to point out that we have had in the last few years a splendid exhibition of the power the Senate possesses in nullifying the expressed will of the people. I have here a list of the measures rejected by the Senate since confederation, which was placed on Hansard in 1925 by Mr. Lewis, the then member for Swift Current. It will be found in volume 1, page 935 and consists of some one hundred and fifty measures. Whilst there may be some whose rejection a later and more mature judgment might justify, I think it will be recognized that on the whole the action of the Senate has been reactionary in character. We remember the measures that last year were rejected by the Senate. The amendments to the criminal code, the amendments to the Immigration Act, which had passed this House several times in succession in various forms were again rejected by the Senate. But above all I think of the old age pension bill. I am not going to characterize the action of the Senate in rejecting this bill. I think I could not do better than to refer hon. members to the speech of my friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), on his motion to ascertain the action taken by the Senate. You will find that in Hansard, page 4420. I do not know that that motion was ever put, I do not know that we ever had any report as to why the Senate threw out that legislation, I content myself with saying that it is intolerable that an irresponsible body should be able to nullify the action of the elected representatives of the people. Right across this country from coast to coast there has been felt and expressed a decided resentment on account of the action of the Senate in regard to that bill. We have been accustomed possibly to speak a little bit slightingly of that body, as if it were composed of elderly men, themselves in receipt of a pension. On the other hand there have been those who saw in the Senate the champion and the safeguard of provincial rights. I think there is another aspect from which we ought to view this matter, and that is that to no small extent the Senate is the champion and safeguard of what are commonly called the big interests.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): As soon as the Liberal party gets through reforming the Senate it will be all right.

Miss MACPHAIL: For the Liberal party.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: A few weeks ago, in a little labour paper published in Toronto, Canada Forward, I find this statement:

> In the Senate fifty members of that body control and direct the economic life of Canada. That is to say that fifty senators are directors of 334 commercial and financial institutions.

I wrote to the editor of that paper asking him on what data he based his statement, and he was good enough to send me a list of the companies in which some of the senators were interested. The editor is Mr. James McA. Conner, of Toronto. It is possible that there may be some inaccuracies in this list. It is quite true that it is not complete, as one can readily recognize that there are other companies in which these senators are interested that are not listed here, but I would like to run over a few of these companies briefly, in order that the class nature of the Senate may be clearly seen. I take them almost at random. I find the name of Senator C. B. Beaubien.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Not I.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No.

Mr. COOTE: Not yet, but soon.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I notice that he is interested in the following companies:

The Atlantic Sugar Refineries Limited.
The Frontenac Breweries.
The Mount Royal Hotel Company.
The North Railway Company.
Beaubien Limited.
The Ames Holden Limited.
The British Empire Steel Corporation.
The Dominion Steel Corporation, Limited.
Dominion Iron and Steel Company Limited.
Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Co. Limited.
Eastern Car Company Limited.
Acadia Company Limited.
Dominion Coal Company.
Nova Scotia Land Company.
Sydney Lumber Company Limited.
James Pender and Company Limited.
Halifax Shipyards Limited.
Cumberland Railway and Coal Company.
Sydney and Louisburg Railway.
Canadian Car and Foundries Limited.
Canadian Steel Foundries Limited.
Montreal Steel Works Limited.
Pratt and Letchworth Company Limited.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Does he happen to be a farmer as well as director of these companies?

An hon. MEMBER: Is that all one man?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, it is all one man.

Sir EUGENE FISET: What about the Levis Laundry?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Levis Laundry has been suggested. I am not sure of that. I said the list was quite incomplete.

I pass on now to Senator Casgrain, and I find he is a director of the following companies:

Canada Steamship Lines Ltd.
Northern Navigation Co. Ltd.
Tidewater Shipbuilders Ltd.
Davie Shipbuilding and Repairing Co. Ltd.
Great Lakes Transportation Co.
Midland Shipbuilding Co.
George Hall Coal Co.
Richelieu Ontario Navigation Co.
Inland Lines Ltd.
Niagara Navigation Co.
St. Lawrence River Steamboat Co. Ltd.
Thousand Island Steamboat Co. Ltd.
Merchants Montreal Lines Ltd.
Canada Cement Co. Ltd.
Montreal Cottons.
Montreal Life Insurance Co.

Reliance Life Assurance Co.
British Empire Steel Corporation Ltd.
Dominion Steel Co. Ltd.
Dominion Iron and Steel Co. Ltd.
Dominion Coal Co. Ltd.
Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Co. Ltd.
Eastern Car Co. Ltd.
Dominion Shipping Co. Ltd.
Acadia Coal Co. Ltd.
Cumberland Railway and Coal Co.
Halifax Shipyards Co.
Nova Scotia Land Co.
Sydney Lumber Co. Ltd.
Sydney and Louisburg Railway Co.
James Pender and Co. Ltd.
Montreal Tramways Co.
United Securities Ltd.
Montreal Life Insurance Co.
Montreal Herald.
Le Canada.

It is perhaps rather wearisome to hon. members to listen to my reading of all these names.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Read some more. They are fine.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I shall be glad to read a few more. I think that perhaps only in this way can we form any idea as to the interlocking directorates which we have in this country, and as to how far even one individual can control a vast range of industrial, commercial and financial enterprise. I come now to Senator N. Curry, and I find he is a director of the following companies:

Cuban Canadian Sugar Company.
Montreal Life Insurance Company.
Hattie Gold Mines Limited.
Rhodes Curry Company Limited.
Canadian Car and Foundries Company Limited.
Canadian Steel Foundries Company Limited.
Montreal Steel Works Limited.
Pratt and Letchworth Company.
Canada Land Company.
Bank of Nova Scotia.
Canada Light and Power Company.
Beatty Gold Mines Limited.

And to use the words of the official description, if I may call it such, that is given us in the Canadian Parliamentary Guide of 1926, he "is president of twelve companies and director of thirty." Let me complete the Guide's account of the well-rounded life of a Senator. At page 78, I find the following.

Altogether is president of twelve companies and director of thirty. A large contributor to educational, religious and charitable institutions, including $100,000 to Acadia University; $25,000 to McGill University; $5,000 to Dalhousie University; and so forth. Recreations: yachting, motoring, shooting, fishing, curling. A Baptist. A Conservative. Summoned to the Senate November 20, 1912. Clubs: Marshlands, Amherst, N.S., Rideau and Country Clubs, Ottawa; Mount Royal, St. James', Forest and Stream, Montreal. Business address, Transportation Building, Montreal; city residence, 581 Sherbrooke street west, Montreal, country residence, Tidnish, N.S. Winter house, Paget, Bermuda.

Miss MACPHAIL: Is my hon. friend suggesting that a captain of industry such as this man whom he has last quoted effected educational policies by giving large contributions to universities?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, I am making no suggestions; I am only stating facts. There are one or two others that I might give. I am not reflecting on these hon. gentlemen in any way whatsoever, but I am suggesting that we have here a state of affairs which ought to be known to the public generally throughout Canada; and whereas in this chamber we hear a great deal of criticism of the class groups—because a few farmers can get together it is said that they are indulging in a very reprehensible practice—and because a few labour people get together it is suggested that they are altogether a class group —I would suggest that it is quite obvious that these gentlemen who are sitting in the Senate are also very distinctly a class group, and that ought to be clearly recognized.

I will speak of one of the latest additions to the Senate, a gentleman who is highly honoured, I am sure, by the majority of the members of this House, Mr. W. L. McDougald. I notice he is a director in a number of corporations, as follows:

Hollinger Gold Mine Co. Ltd.
Ogdensburg Coal and Towing Co. Ltd.
Sterling Bond Co.
Canada Steamship Lines Ltd.
Tidewater Shipbuilders Ltd.
Davie Shipbuilding and Repairing Co. Ltd.
Great Lakes Transportation Co.
Midland Shipbuilding Co.
George Hall Coal Co.
Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Co.
Inland Lines Ltd.
Niagara Navigation Co.
Thousand Island Steamboat Co.
Merchants Montreal Line.
Century Coal and Coke Co. Ltd.
The Coal Co. Ltd.
St. Lawrence Realty Co.
Superior Sales Co. Ltd.
Labrador Pulp and Paper Co.

I have page after page of these, Mr. Speaker. but perhaps one or two more will be sufficient. I have selected them, frankly, just as I happened to see the longer lists of companies underneath their names, but I may say that these cases are by no means exceptional.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Read them all.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Here is Senator L. C. Webster. He is interested, a director, and no doubt working hard in all these various lines of industry:

Sun Life Assurance Co. of Canada.
Dominion Manufacturers' Ltd.
Travelers' Life Assurance Co.
St. Lawrence Sugar Refineries.
Hudson Bay Knitting Co.
Goodwins Ltd.
Montreal Tramway Co.
Webster Steamship Co.
Canadian Import Co.
Quebec Power Co.
Quebec Railway Light Heat & Power Co.
Dorchester Electric Co.
Quebec, Montmorency & Charlevoix Railway.
Imperial Trust Co.
St. Lawrence Stevedoring Co. Ltd.
Holt Renfrew Co. Ltd.
Canadian Salvage Association.
Canadian Fur Auction Sales Co. Ltd.
Quebec Apartment House Co.
Montreal Cottons.
Canadian Car & Foundry Co. Ltd.
Montreal Steel Works Ltd.
Canadian Steel Foundries Ltd.
Pratt & Letchworth Co. Ltd.
Dryden Paper Co. Ltd.
United Securities Ltd.
British Empire Steel Corporation.
Dominion Steel Co.
Dominion Iron & Steel Co.
Dominion Coal Co.
Nova Scotia Steel & Coal Co.
Eastern Car Co. Ltd.
Dominion Shipping Co.
Acadia Coal Co. Ltd.
Cumberland Railway & Coal Co. Ltd.
Halifax Shipyards Co.
Sydney & Louisburg Railway Co.
Nova Scotia Land Co.
Wassis Steamboat Co.
Sydney Lumber Co.
James Pender & Co. Ltd.

I will give one other. Here is Senator R. S. White. He is a director in the following companies:

Gazette Printing Co.
United Financial Corporation.
Montreal Trust Co.
The Steel Co. of Canada.
The Hamilton Steel & Iron Co.
The Montreal Rolling Mills Ltd.
Canadian Screw Co. Ltd.
Dominion Wire Mfg. Co. Ltd.
Canadian Bolt & Nut Co. Ltd.
Western Wire & Nail Co. Ltd.
Guarantee Co. of North America.
Canada Steamship Lines Ltd.
Northern Navigation Co. Ltd.
Tidewater Shipbuilders Ltd.
Davie Shipbuilding & Repairing Co Ltd.
Great Lakes Transportation Co.
Midland Shipbuilding Co.
George Hall Coal Co.
Richelieu & Ontario Navigation Co.
Inland Lines Ltd.
Niagara Navigation Co.
Mount Royal Hotel Co.

My correspondent makes the following comments and summarizes this information as follows:

There are 27 lawyers in the Senate, of whom 12 are Conservatives and 15 Liberal. Some 6 Conservative lawyer senators are directors in 52 financial and commercial institutions, while 6 Liberal lawyer senators are directors on 36 commercial and financial institutions, making a total of 12 lawyers in the Senate who are directors in 88 different concerns. There are 11 journalists, editors and publishers, 6 of whom are directors in 34 commercial and financial institutions. There are 11 manufacturers and capitalists who are directors in 131 commercial and financial institutions. There are 8 doctors who are directors in 22 commercial and financial institutions.

The House rather encouraged me to go on, Mr. Speaker, and read these long lists, and I did so even though it might somewhat interfere with the argument I was trying to present in as concise a form as possible. But in view of the character of the interests of the members of the Senate I think I am quite warranted in the statement which I made a few minutes ago, that it is intolerable that an irresponsible body such as this, so largely representing big interests, should be able to nullify the actions of the elected representatives of the people.

Now my resolution is as follows:

That, in the opinion of this House, in view of: (a) the constitutional developments of the last sixty years—

I think I have shown some of these main lines of development, how extensive they have been, and how much they demand some corresponding changes in our constitutional procedure, and generally in our legislation:

—(b) the dissatisfaction of certain provinces—

Here again I think it will be manifest to all that it is the wiser course to recognize the underlying difficulties that may prevent confederation from attaining all that it ought to attain, rather than simply and blindly to worship what was done sixty years ago, and refuse to be guided by the spirit of those who made confederation possible. And in view of:

—(c) the changed conditions in industry, commerce and finance not contemplated at the time of confederation, and (d) the action of the Senate in preventing the enactment of popular legislation—

I ask that there shall be appointed a special committee to consider what amendments might be made in the British North America Act which, while conserving the principles of confederation, would enable us more adequately to cope with the complicated problems which now confront Canada.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

I think that request is a very moderate one indeed. All I am asking for is a parliamentary committee to consider this question. There will be, I understand, this summer, a conference of the Dominion and provincial representatives. This conference has a number of things to discuss, among which is this very question of a minimum wage with regard to which I was reading a report to-day. This conference has been definitely promised, and I would suggest that the time is opportune for this whole question to go before such a conference. But before this conference meets, it would seem to be a reasonable thing that we should have some indication as to what changes this House thought might be advisable. What do we want anyway? It would be very easy for me personally to make suggestions as to certain changes that I think ought to be made. I think some of these changes might be inferred from my treatment of the subject, but I would much prefer to leave these definte changes to be considered in a committee, where a great many other members would be able to contribute other suggestions of possibly even greater value.

I would call the attention of the House to the fact that in this resolution I have provided an ample safeguarding clause; that is, "while conserving the principles of confederation," I recognize very clearly that there are certain minority rights which much be maintained. There is no desire on my part to take away any of those rights. In any modification of the British North America Act I think there would need to be incorporated a series of clauses equivelant to a sort of bill of rights safeguarding the rights of minorities, whether of language, religion, or civil status. The proposed resolution does not seek to trench on those rights at all. But on the other hand, I urge that we ought to have such modifications in the British North America Act as will enable us to meet the pressing and complicated problems which now confront us.

I am not here to make any impassioned appeal to hon. members from the various sections of Canada. I know that in the past some of the French Canadian members have been rather apprehensive of any change in the British North America Act. I know that certain sections of the French Canadian press take the ground that any alteration in the British North America Act, however slight, might imperil French Canadian rights, and that it is much safer to trust to the sense of justice of Englishmen in Great Britain than to the sense of justice of English-speaking

Canadians. I think that sentiment is unworthy of any true Canadian. We cannot have it both going and coming. All of us are coming to recognize more and more the need of a greater flexibility in our constitution, and the opportunity to control our own destinies. If we wish to attain that we must be willing to take certain risks in carrying out the details of any modifications we may make in our constitution. But I think the risks will not be very grave. We would incorporate into the very document by which the modifications were made—modifications, for example, allowing either for the abolition or the reform or, if you like, the drawing of the teeth of the Senate—I do not say of the senators—

An hon. MEMBER: There are none to draw.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not know about that. I say that in any modifications along that line the very document by which the modifications were made would contain these clauses which would adequately guarantee the rights of all minorities and in other ways conserve the fundamental principles of confederation.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that to-day, the government accede to my request. I am glad the Prime Minister is in his place. I do not think it is asking too much that in a preliminary way we discuss these things in the free and easy atmosphere of a committee. No harm could be done by doing so. Certain suggestions could be made and plans evolved, and when the conference of provincial premiers meets in the near future there would be something to discuss in the way of a definite recommendation.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the subject of this resolution is indeed very important, and my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) has dealt with it in his usual able and clear way. I am pleased indeed that he took the trouble to say that in any changes which he would like to see made in the British North America Act certain rights should be safeguarded, and I know that he is perfectly sincere in this.

The resolution is to the effect that a special select committee of this House should be appointed for the purpose of considering amendments which ought to be made to the British North America Act. This conclusion is based on certain premises, namely, the developments of the last sixty years, the dissatisfaction of certain provinces, the changed conditions in industry, commerce and finance not contemplated at the time of confederation, and the action of the Senate in preventing the enactment of certain popular legislation. For the purpose of my argument I do not think it is necessary for me to dwell upon those premises. But as far as the question of dissatisfaction is concerned, I think that after sixty years as a Dominion we may safely say that the work which the fathers of confederation accomplished, while it may not have been perfect, was certainly a great work, that the constitution then framed has worked successfully, and that Canada has been developing along lines for which we ought to be profoundly grateful.

I do not say that some changes might not be desirable, that some improvements might not be made, but I must confess I do not agree with my hon. friend that the way to reach the desirable end he has in view would be for this House, or a committee of this House, to deal with the matter in the absence of those who were parties to the pact of confederation. It is true, Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend has said, that we have not the right to amend our own constitution as has South Africa and Australia—subject in the latter case to certain restrictions; that is, any amendment must be approved by the states or by popular referendum—and some of the other dominions, and he asked, "Why should we not have the same powers?" But the condition existing in Canada is our own making, and this we must always remember in dealing with the question. It is not at all something that places Canada in a position of inferiority, because after all it was the will of the people of Canada that it should have been so in the past, and it will continue thus so long as the Canadian people will it. When the people desire a change the change will come about.

Mr. IRVINE: How?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It will come about by agreement on the part of those who agreed to confederation under certain conditions in 1867. In the words of that great statesman, who had more to do with the achievement of confederation than anybody else, Sir John Macdonald, Canadian confederation bears on its face the marks of a compromise. The country at that time was almost on the verge of civil strife, and during the two years that preceded confederation four different governments succeeded one another at the head of Canada's affairs. It was thought by men of the various provinces and by members of different political parties that the only way to secure peace in North America among the British possessions was through the means which was ultimately adopted, of a confederation of the provinces. This confederation was achieved by the colonies, as they were in fact at the time, getting together and reaching an agreement. The colonies, which were self-governing, had each powers of its own, and they agreed to relinquish some of those powers to a central authority. They kept under their own control those matters which were rather of a domestic nature, while others, more general in their scope, they relegated to a central government. Some of these matters they relinquished subject to specific conditions, and without this understanding it would have been impossible to reach the agreement which made for confederation. The Imperial government simply gave effect to the will of the provinces of Canada in enacting the British North America Act, and confederation has always been considered an agreement. Some call it a pact, others, a treaty; and if it is—nobody can dispute that it is—then I submit, what has been the contention of every writer and public man in Canada in the past, that this agreement or pact or treaty, whatever you care to call it, cannot be changed or modified without the consent of the parties to the agreement, or of those who come after them.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Do I understand the Minister of Justice to suggest that we can make no suggested changes?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, I do not suggest that. It is because we can that a body such as the one referred to by my hon. friend, an interprovincial conference, is going to be held for the purpose of getting together all those who to-day represent the original parties to the pact of confederation. It is for such a body to consider changes or amendments to be made, but I do not think that a committee of this House, any more than a committee of the legislature of Quebec or Ontario, should solemnly declare that the British North America Act ought to be amended in one particular or another. I do not think that would conduce to unity in the matter.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I observe that the very thing suggested by my hon. friend (Mr. Woodsworth) preceded confederation itself. The legislative assembly of Nova Scotia passed a resolution, just as this body could pass a resolution, recommending certain things. This House could pass a resolution submitting to the conference of provinces to be held such alterations as it might deem desirable. I see absolutely nothing against a committee of this House considering a resolution and making recommendations. I agree with the minister that the House has no power in the matter, but I would ask him whether, in his opinion, it is not possible to act in the way suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not think it is desirable. It is always possible for a committee of the House to consider questions which are beyond its province, but I say it would not lead to any desirable end to do so.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It did before.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not think so.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In the case of confederation.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Contrary proposals were brought forward at that time. I think my hon. friend made a mistake when he said, in reference to certain changes which he had in mind, that he would not like to mention them in this House but would rather wait until the committee was formed for the purpose. Why should not my hon. friend inform the House of the changes he desires to have made? Concrete changes might, in my opinion, be suggested, but they must be considered and studied by a body representing all the parties to confederation.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Changes might be suggested.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is a question of procedure, but I do not believe that the procedure suggested by my hon. friend is the one to be followed.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Suppose I had suggested that we should pass a resolution declaring our right to change the written constitution: would the Minister of Justice say that we should be competent to do so?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I should certainly say that the proposal would have to be submitted to an interprovincial conference, as I said two years ago.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But would not the minister say that we had a right to discuss such a proposal in this House before it was submitted to the conference?

Mr. LAPOINTE: So far as that goes, we discussed it two years ago and neither my hon. friend nor anybody else was committed for trial for having done so. I really believe, however, that it is not for a committee of this House to discuss the matter.

The suggestion now before us is not new. Two years ago I read an article by Sir Clifford Sifton, and I even had a conversation with him on the question. He suggested that we should have the right to amend our own constitution, but he agreed that the provinces had rights in the matter. His suggestion was that there should be a national convention comprising members of parliament, members of the legislatures of the various provinces, and important citizens elected by various classes of the community. Other suggestions were made, one to the effect that another form of committee or convention representative of various parts of Canada should be called together for the purpose. In my opinion, however, these suggestions failed in the fact that they did not take into consideration the parties to the pact as such: the provinces must be represented as provinces to the pact of confederation. As I said in this House in another debate, the provinces after all are not the children of the Dominion parliament; rather, parliament is the creation of the provinces. They existed before this parliament existed, and the British North America Act is just as much the constitution and charter of the provinces as it is the charter of this Dominion government and this Dominion parliament.

Mr. HEAPS: The statement of the Minister of Justice leaves just a doubt in my mind. Supposing the conference of the provinces is held during the coming summer, will all the nine provinces now in confederation take part on an equal basis?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Most assuredly. Let me repeat that the British North America Act is just as much the charter of the provinces as it is our charter; in all matters which are assigned to the provinces as being under their control and jurisdiction they are just as supreme as the parliament of Canada is supreme with regard to matters declared to be within the jurisdiction of the Dominion government. The provinces are self-governing within their sphere; they are free and independent legislatures just as much as this parliament is independent with its own limits, and you cannot change a charter which is common to them as well as to us by consideration in a committee of this House. The only way it can be done is by agreement between the various parties to that charter.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In regard to the final act.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And even in the deliberations.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No, no.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My friend does not agree with me. Two years ago we declined to sign a treaty because we had not been a party to the deliberations which preceded it. I say that those who are interested in this matter have the right to be there when it is discussed by those who desire to alter it.

Mr. KAISER: Have we not already made amendments to the British North America Act?

Mr. LAPOINTE: In small matters. There was the question of a change in the subsidies granted to the provinces, for instance.

Mr. IRVINE: Is it the intention of the government to call such a conference in the near future?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes. An amount has been placed in the estimates for that purpose. That conference will take place; it is the intention of the government to call the conference during the present year, at which conference will be discussed not only subjects such as are mentioned in the resolution now before us, but various other matters as well. These will be taken up by the provinces and by the federal government.

Mr. LADNER: I would like to ask a question with respect to the minister's statement regarding the binding effect of the British North America Act as between the provinces and the federal government. How would he relate such a policy to the carrying out of the provisions of the Imperial conference which, if made effective, must substantially affect the British North America Act?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not at all; that is where my hon. friend is making a mistake. The British North America Act is not at all changed, modified or altered as a result of the report of the Imperial conference.

Mr. LADNER: But if we make the report of the Imperial conference effective as a constitutional factor, how can that be done without affecting the British North America Act?

Mr. LAPOINTE: My friend must remember that Canada is a confederation. When the report of the Imperial conference says that Canada is an autonomous country and Australia is an autonomous country, it means Australia with the various states which compose that country, and it means Canada with the various provinces which compose Canada. As I said some time ago in the course of this debate, the provinces are just as free and autonomous in their own sphere as is this parliament in its sphere. This has not been altered; it can be altered only when the people of Canada desire that that be done, and this desire will have to be expressed not only by this parliament but by the provinces as well, who are interested in the matter.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I presume that at this conference the Dominion government will be represented?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Assuredly.

Mr. ADSHEAD: How will you be able to express the views of this parliament unless the matter is considered here?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Any change which may be agreed upon at such a conference must be accepted by the parliament of Canada, of course.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): I would like to offer a few remarks, Mr. Speaker, in regard to the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). He has not introduced a subject which is by any means a new question in this House; periodically during the last twenty-five years at least this question has been before parliament, but I can commend my hon. friend for his diligence and for his researches in regard to the matter. I do not think, however, that he has offered any very satisfactory solution of any difficulties which exist—if difficulties do exist, which I do not admit—in regard to what we look upon as the constitutional charter of the Dominion of Canada. I am inclined to think that taking it all in all, during the last sixty years we have gone on very satisfactorily, and I do not know that any considerable body of public opinion in this country is much concerned at present with any difficulties in regard to the constitution of our country. It may be that here and there throughout the length and breadth of Canada an individual or a few individuals may be found who are not satisfied with every word and every letter of the British North America Act, but in such a matter it is a hard thing to please everybody. I do state, however, that there is no considerable body of public opinion in Canada to-day which is dissatisfied with the terms of the constitutional charter of this country; I hear of no public demand for such changes and I see no articles in our newspapers or in our magazines demanding them. I must confess, however, that almost year after year in this chamber some one offers the suggestion that in some way or other we in this country are suffering from what I might describe as constitutional outrages, that we are carrying some unnecessary burden or that we have some pressing grievances which should be remedied. For my part I am unable to discover any of these grievances or any of these difficulties which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre seems to assume in the motion now before us. So in the first place I cannot see that there is any demand for serious constitutional changes in Canada to-day, and in the second place if there were such a demand I submit to the House that the only procedure to be taken is that outlined by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), through the instrumentality of a provincial conference.

One need not argue the question of our right to change our constitution; we know we have no such right. We have been permitted to change the constitution from time to time, but only in regard to matters of procedure and not matters of principle. As the Minister of Justice stated a moment ago, we have been allowed to amend our act in regard to the increase of subsidies, but only because that was viewed merely as a matter of procedure or detail. We have also been allowed to appoint a Deputy Speaker in this House, although by the terms of the British North America Act we are only entitled to appoint a Speaker. That likewise was considered purely a matter of procedure. Should we in this parliament desire at any time to change important parts of the constitution or any of the specific conditions contained therein, I submit that we are absolutely powerless to do so. We can pass an address of the House of Commons and Senate of Canada, present that memorial in Great Britain and ask for amendments. In certain instances amendments have been made in response to our address, but they have not in themselves been constitutional changes. On one or two occasions we prolonged the life of a parliament in that way without consulting the various provinces of Canada; but the moment we seek to go beyond the plain meaning of the constitution in important matters or in specific conditions the answer will come back from Great Britain, in the future just as it has in the past: No; the provinces who originally agreed upon this constitution must likewise agree upon any changes.

Mr. IRVINE: I understood the Minister of Justice to argue that it was the people of Canada who made their own constitution and the natural inference therefrom was that we could make a change. Does the hon. gentleman agree with that?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I agree that the people of Canada did make their own constitution originally. It was made simply by means of certain resolutions to which the representatives of all the then provinces agreed. Those resolutions were placed in definite form; they were made into a form of agreement. It is not correct to say that the British North America Act is the agreement. It is not the agreement, it is the act of the Imperial parliament which gave force to the agreement. The parties who made the agreement are the only parties to change the agreement; and if changes are desirable—and at the present moment I do not think there is any strong demand for changes—the opportunity will be offered in the near future when the meeting of the representatives of all the provinces of this Dominion takes place. Now how can the matter be advanced by appointing a committee of this House to consider questions of constitutional change? We have no power to act, and it would be purely an academic discussion on our part. We might spend a lot of time in idle consideration of a question as to which we have no power to do more than merely to discuss it. Why not leave the matter as it is now until the representatives of the provinces meet?

I am not one of those who consider that any very grave constitutional changes will be attempted in this country in the near future. Nor can I say that I wholly agree with the opinion expressed by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice in regard to the effect of the report of the recent Imperial conference upon the constitution of this country. It is true he became very emphatic in regard to his position but his position is merely the ipse dixit of a minister of justice in this House. I can tell him there are other opinions besides his in regard to this matter, and very substantial legal opinions, that there has been a serious modification of our constitutional situation if the report of the Imperial conference means anything. If it is a nullity then I grant there has been no change. But if the statements and declarations in that report are intended to be operative there certainly has been a change: the power of disallowance has gone. If it is an inoperative statement of course there has been no change; but it is either an operative declaration or an inoperative one. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice can take it which ever way he likes.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I should be like my hon. friend if I were to do that.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If the declaration was merely inoperative and not to be acted upon, then I agree there is no constitutional change. We have the declaration on the part of high authority that henceforth there shall be no power of disallowance, and if so then there is a constitutional change in the British North America Act in that that section has been repealed. I do not propose at this point to discuss that question further. There will be another opportunity during the session, I apprehend, to discuss fully the whole question. But at this moment, and in regard to the suggestion of my hon. friend, (Mr. Woodsworth) I am quite in accord with the Minister of Justice; I do not think he is going to advance his cause one iota by the appointment of a committee of this House who can only spend their time in academic discussion. A conference is to be held in the near future of all the provinces of this Dominion who see fit to attend—we cannot compel their attendance—and if any one desires constitutional changes, let their request be made known at that conference and let the discussion take place there; and if the duly accredited representatives of the various provinces will agree upon such changes, and their agreement is ratified by this parliament, I have not a moment's hesitation in saying that the home government will see to it that their agreement, whatever it may be, is carried out.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Will the hon. gentleman not agree that it is quite competent for us at least to discuss what we want, what changes we think are desirable?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Oh, I think we have power to discuss the matter, but that discussion would be largely a waste of time. As I said before it would be purely academic. There are dozens of questions which we discuss in this House which do not get us any further. Much time is taken up—perhaps I should say in regard to former sessions that much time has been actually wasted—in discussions which cannot advance the matters in question one bit. We cannot reach any conclusion, we cannot take any action. But the conference which is to sit in the near future can do that; then why not allow the question to go to that conference? If my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre has anything to urge, the time and the occasion will be when that tribunal convenes—the only tribunal which can take action in the matter. Why we should take up the time of the House in such a discussion as this I cannot see; and I for one, as I said before, do not think that in any part of Canada there is any very serious or general demand for a revision of the constitution of this country.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): I find myself somewhat in the position of agreeing partly with the Minister of Justice, partly with the leader of the opposition, and partly with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), so that I am able to act, so to speak, as a go-between in this case.

Mr. GUTHRIE: A mediator.

Mr. BOURASSA: First of all it seems to me that we should distinguish clearly between the right and the power to amend our constitution. The leader of the opposition is quite right when he says that if we take the constitution as it was framed in 1867, enacted by the British parliament, and interpreted ever since, we have not the legal power; but while he was making his able and interesting argument I was thinking of an opinion expressed by an authority surely as high as that of any member of this House on these matters—I was thinking of Lord Haldane's opinion, as expressed some thirty years ago. Speaking of the development of constitutional power and usages in the self-governing dominions he stated—I think I remember his words almost verbatim; they were published in some English legal review—that the time was soon coming if it had not come—and I add this much, that I think it has come—when the British parliament could act only as an interpreter of the will of the various selfgoverning dominions—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. BOURASSA: The time has come when it is acknowledged that these various self-governing dominions are just as completely masters in their houses as the people of Great Britain are in theirs; and although they may have chosen—they had to choose then—the medium of the British parliament to put into legal form the enactment of their constitution as framed by their own people, the time has come when no government in England would hesitate a moment in giving entire effect to the will of these various dominions. If this is true—and I think it is true, and I think we must make it more true from day to day if we want to show ourselves worthy scions, worthy descendants of the British nation—and if we take such pride in the principles of the government that they have in England, surely we must think of the day when we will outgrow the period of infancy and will consider that we are just as capable of dealing with all our questions, national or international, as the people of the United Kingdom are. Therefore in that respect we must look forward to the day when, I will not say in this parliament, but when in Canada our constitution will be dealt with by power arising from the will of the people of Canada, without the interference of the British parliament. It must come to that. The Minister of Justice has pointed out the outgrowth of the spirit and practice of self-government. The British parliament has followed that progressive course in acknowledging that the people of Australia should develop that principle, and that the people of South Africa should follow that example, and also that the Free State of Ireland should do likewise. Are we going to confess that, we, the pioneers in that march towards the goal of national liberty and equality, consider ourselves as being handicapped because our constitution was the first one enacted by the British parliament? Are we to remain in the shackles of that constitution, and not enter into the broad spirit of advancement in this regard, as it has developed in the other self-governing parts of the empire? Far from being time wasted, on the contrary, I think it is a move in the right direction, to assert on every possible occasion that we in Canada should advance in the direction of dealing with our own affairs.

The point on which I agree with the leader of the opposition and the Minister of Justice is that this parliament by itself has neither the right nor the power—and neither should it have it—to amend the constitution of Canada without the consent of the provinces. We stand in exactly the same position as the congress of the United States or the federal council of Switzerland, as the governing body of every federation; because the very fact that a confederacy exists, as differing from one united nation, means that it is a composite body in which various parts have more or less autonomous power, and in their sphere, as properly stated by the Minister of Justice, are just as sovereign to act as the federal body. For example, the Swiss cantons have more powers than our provinces in some respects and less in others. The states of the American union have more power than the provinces of Canada. For one thing, they have control of their criminal legislation, whereas in Canada the provinces have not. Does it mean that because there are limitations to the powers of parliament, this is not a body where we should discuss any amendment that ought or might be made to our constitution for the general benefit of Canada? During the argument of the leader of the opposition I was thinking of another opinion expressed by Lord Haldane, when acting as Lord High Chancellor. In delivering a judgment of the Privy Council in some case arising in connection with Australia, he made a comparison of the constitutions of South Africa, of Australia and of Canada, and dealt precisely with the point as to whether or not the constitution of Canada was a contract, whether it stood as a contract, and whether it should be amended without the consent, of all the parties to the contract. If I remember right his opinion was this, that as between the constitution of South Africa, which is much more centralized than ours, and the constitution of Australia, which resembles more that of the United States than ours, the constitution of Canada stood about halfway, which can be easily explained by the circumstances under which it was framed. As everyone knows, it was in the last years of the great struggle between the southern states and the federal government. Sir John A. Macdonald was very much impressed with the circumstance; and I think in a speech made by him in the House in 1865, when explaining the resolutions passed in Quebec, he showed the importance of strengthening the central power, in order to prevent in the future any such tendency arising and developing as that which had brought the American union nearly to the point of ruin and secession. But nevertheless the union remained, and whether the constitution stands as a contract or not I will not pretend to express an opinion, when there are so many enlightened legal gentlemen in this House. But morally speaking there is no doubt confederation is the result of a contract. Therefore if we want to preserve the principle of confederation, as the hon. member from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has said—and I know he is sincere in his statement—we must take means to ascertain the will of every one of the provinces which are the inheritors or the contractors of confederation. In that respect I agree entirely with the Minister of Justice, and also with the leader of the opposition. It would not be proper to attempt to amend our constitution upon each or any one of these points which affect directly or indirectly the rights of the provinces. On the other hand, in the sphere which is within the purview of this parliament, it must be remembered that it has been created for the general advantage of Canada. In many cases, when there were diverse views as between the jurisdiction of this parliament and the provinces, where there was a real conflict between the federal and the provincial legislatures, I think it has been held generally that anything done by the parliament of Canada for the general advantage of the country should prevail over provincial matters, matters dealt with by provincial legislatures for their own provinces.

Mr. GEARY: Not quite so far as that.

Mr. BOURASSA: Perhaps, but I think the hon. gentleman will excuse me if I do not express myself in legal language. What I mean is that in all those powers which are undoubtedly of federal jurisdiction, we should surely have the right and the power to suggest such amendments to the constitution of Canada as we think for the general advantage of Canada without being obliged to resort to interprovincial conferences. But as regards the Senate, this is a question which might be viewed from both angles. If you consider that body merely as one of the two chambers governing the people of Canada, then it is purely a federal matter; but if you concede that the Senate, as in the United States, was established primarily for the protection of the provinces and for the safeguarding of those minority rights which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre wants to preserve, then the moment you speak of a change in the composition of the Senate you raise the question of provincial rights, you raise a question upon which the provinces have the right to express their views.

I shall not dwell at length upon that question of the Senate. I rather differ from my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) when he says that he wants to pull some of the teeth of the Senate, though not of the senators. Judging by the long list he has given of the private interests with which many of the senators are concerned, I would rather say it is the teeth of the senators that ought to be pulled. In fact, many of the complaints that have been laid at the door of the Senate by the two parties alternately have not resulted from the constitutional composition of the Senate, but rather from the fact, which we have to admit, that all governments since confederation have made of the Senate a house of refuge for political friends or a sort of stock exchange for business men who pay large subscriptions to parties. At confederation, and it is indicated in the constitution itself, Sir John Macdonald, foreseeing the day when after a long period of enjoyment of power by one party it would be necessary for a new party coming in to command a majority of the Senate, provided for the addition of six senators to be appointed over and above the number fixed by the constitution, two from the maritimes, two from Quebec and two from Ontario. This was considered sufficient at the time, because it could not be conceived that any government would be so derelict in its duty as to fill up the Senate with its creatures and make it simply a party body. But unfortunately that has been the case, and the reform of the Senate is to be looked for in a practical way rather than in amendments to our constitution. This government and all future governments to come, for it would be difficult to ask this government to have all the virtues all at once after so many vices have prevailed for so many years, should think a little more of the functioning of the Senate and of the respect it ought to command before the whole public of Canada, instead of using it simply to serve party interests or to reward men who subscribe money for election purposes.

Another aspect, it seems to me, has been overlooked this afternoon. In Canada we have a state of things which does not exist in Australia, in the Free State, or in the Union of South Africa. The parties to the contract of 1867, what were they? Upper and Lower Canada, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. That was the confederation of those days; and the first thing they did—and to my mind it was a great mistake on the part of the fathers of confederation—was immediately to purchase the Northwest Territories, open them to colonization, and receive at the hands of the British parliament the power to govern those territories, and later on to grant them provincial charters. The result has been that we have created within the confederation of Canada a Canada different from the rest. I have been endeavouring for many years past to convince my friends in Quebec, and generally in eastern Canada, that confederation will never be a settled thing until we understand the people of the west, with all their defects, but also with their qualities. We must realize that the people of the west look upon us in the east as we in Canada looked for so many years upon the British parliament; I will not say as a foreign parliament, but as a political body escaping the influences of the people for whom it was legislating, passing laws and making a constitution, and imposing upon the people their policies in tariff, railway and all other matters. The result is, and it is useless to conceal it, that the people in the west do not feel at home in the confederation in the same degree that we do. Even we French-Canadians in the province of Quebec, in spite of all obstacles raised in our way since 1867, feel more at home in the confederation than a vast majority of the people inhabiting the prairie provinces.

Mr. COOTE: After the sentiments which the hon. gentleman has expressed, would he be willing that these new provinces which were formed by the old confederation should be given the same rights under the constitution as the older provinces have?

Mr. BOURASSA: Of course, in principle I am in favour of that, and always have been, provided that they respect the same engagements that have been taken by the other provinces. That has always been my view. I held it in this House when the charters of Alberta and Saskatchewan were granted twenty-two years ago. I held it in my own province, in writing and speaking upon many occasions, and I expressed the same view again in the last two elections, that the western provinces should be put on exactly the same footing in every matter as the eastern provinces, providing the western provinces will enter into the spirit of confederation and understand us as some of us are trying to understand them.

Mr. CAHAN: In what respect are they in a different position now?

Mr. BOURASSA: With respect, first, to their lands and natural resources; and that is a great thing. My hon. friend knows what the administration of the public domain means to the province of Quebec, the province of Ontario and the province of New Brunswick. All these things that have to do with the daily life of the people are in the hands of the government of these provinces, and as far as we are concerned we would never consent to see our colonization policy —badly managed as it is by our Tory government in Quebec—placed in the hands of this parliament.

Mr. CAHAN: The western provinces of their own option prefer to receive a cash subsidy.

Mr. BOURASSA: That is another point, and I thank my hon. friend for having suggested it, though it may lengthen my remarks for about five minutes. First of all, they were not consulted when the territories were organized, because there were no people there then. We passed the Northwest Territories Act when there was no population there. The federal parliament had to pass it and take its responsibility. The federal parliament laid down certain principles which it was bound to preserve; and later on, when population came in and the country grew, the time came to grant them provincial charters, and the federal parliament was placed in this position: It had to stand within the scope of the constitution and grant to these territories provincial rights and provincial privileges equivalent to those exercised in the east. At the same time they were handicapped by engagements, moral or material, taken by this parliament in the exercise of its responsibility so long as those provinces had existed only as territories. So we have not the same state of things, and I think we have to acknowledge it in this parliament. We have to make of this confederacy, not a uniform body, but we have to harmonize the conditions as between eastern Canada and western Canada, as far as they are dependent upon this parliament, before we can expect any agreement to be arrived at by the representatives of these provinces and of the federal government in any such conference as is suggested. At the present time it is impossible for the representatives of the various provinces of Canada to discuss any matter affecting our constitution or the administration of our country because there is no unity, because the situation is not the same.

With regard to the means of consultation, I do not quite agree with the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) that an inter-provincial conference is the only means by which we can have an agreement on these matters. I would not commit the constitution of this country to the care of twenty or twenty-five gentlemen, delegates of the various provincial governments. I would no more trust the establishment of an inter-provincial fascism than I would the setting up of any other autocratic power. Besides, they could only suggest, they could only do exactly what the mover of the resolution wants us to do—they could only agree upon certain modifications to be made in our constitution, and then report to this parliament and to the various provincial legislatures.

If this is the case, and I think the Minister of Justice agrees with me on that, why should parliament be deprived of making suggestions in the general interest of the country regarding certain parts of the constitution which concern only the Dominion as a whole? I think it would advance the work of the inter-provincial conference if a committee such as that suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre were formed, not to take too large a scope, perhaps, but to suggest a few changes, and then have those suggestions submitted to the conference. Thus we would have at once an expression of opinion on the part of this parliament, upon the findings of a committee composed of representatives from various parts of Canada interpreting the views of their respective provinces, and also—because whether we resist it or not, sitting together in this parliament we are bound to correct our provincial and local views—also evincing a certain spirit of Canadian unity, which you cannot expect from provincial legislators. The Premier of Quebec will stand for the point of view of Quebec, the Premier of Ontario for the point of view of Ontario, and so on with the other premiers, while two or three federal representatives will have to deal with all those provincial representatives. It seems to me that the parliament of Canada being the supreme body—not supreme over the provinces, but supreme over the general interests of the Dominion—ought to take the lead in a move of this nature, first, to assert the right of the people of Canada to do with their constitution what the people of Great Britain do with theirs. That would be the main point, and it would be a further assertion of the principle laid down in London last summer. Secondly, we should make it possible for the various representatives of the provinces to discuss those views that had been expressed by such a committee, and pass upon them their own judgment, so that at a future session of this parliament we would be in a position to compare notes and find out the views of the federal parliament and of the various provinces upon such changes as might be suggested.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Am I right in understanding my friend to suggest that the committee should be restricted to matters which come exclusively under the federal parliament and over which the provinces have no jurisdiction?

Mr. BOURASSA: I think a clear distinction should be made in the committee. It seems to me that the duty of the representative of the government in that committee would be, the moment a question cropped up affecting provincial rights or jurisdiction, to point out to the committee the uselessness of wasting time on its discussion. For example, if the question of the Senate were raised, I think it would be the duty of that representative and of every member of this parliament possessed of the spirit of confederation to remind the committee that the Senate is not to be judged only according to the good or bad votes it gives on this or that measure, but according to the spirit of the institution, according to those principles of confederation which my friend wants to preserve. But of course, once a clear definition were made, the whole matter should be submitted to the inter-provincial conference. I think it would clarify the situation and enable both the representatives of the federal parliament and the representatives of the provincial legislatures to accomplish some work.

As to the argument made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) that there is no need for any change in our constitution, I cannot agree. There may not be a crying need for radical changes; but let us remember that having to live under a written constitution is in itself a great inconvenience. We have not the advantage that the people of Great Britain have of being able to reshape their constitution from time to time according to their needs. The constitution of Great Britain is in a constant process of evolution and reshaping, and therefore grows with the people; while we have outgrown many parts of our constitution. As regards our relations with the British government, it may be that we still have in this House and in the country men with the colonial spirit of a hundred years ago who consider that we should make no change in those relations. For example, with respect to the power of disallowance. Well, I would respectfully give those men the same advice that I have given to certain Catholic friends of mine—not to be more Catholic than the Pope; I would advise those men not to take a narrower and more English view of these things than that held by all the leading men of Great Britain. When public men in England hear colonials saying that we do not want to grow nationally, they look upon us as inferior beings and conclude that we have not the strength of will and the power of mind to live out our own national life as they have taught us to do on the other side of the ocean.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Does not the hon. gentleman think that in view of the fact of our two jurisdictions, provincial and federal, we will always require a written constitution to define their respective limits?

Mr. BOURASSA: Of course. Even if we were completely independent—as I think we will be, one of these days—we will have a written constitution, just as the Americans have. But the Americans have made their constitution grow with their national growth. Take the role of the Supreme Court of the United States with regard to the constitution and compare some of its decisions in Washington sixty years ago with those rendered to-day, for example, that famous decision which held that under the constitution a slave-owner was just as much master of the body of his slave as he was of his ox or his ass. I do not think the Supreme Court of the United States would render such a judgment to-day. Then take the various decisions handed down by that court after the conquest of Porto Rico and the annexation of the Philippines, and you will find how the court enlarged the scope of the American constitution in order to deal with the new problems that had arisen with the growth of the American nation. So long as we do not assert our right to deal with our own affairs in our own way; so long as we do not regard the Supreme Court of Canada as the ultimate tribunal to interpret the constitution of this country; so long as we do not consider this parliament the supreme authority in giving expression to the will of the Canadian people, just so long shall we be handicapped by that narrow colonial spirit which renders us inferior to the people of Great Britain.

With regard to the other point raised by the leader of the opposition concerning minority rights, I entirely agree with the Minister of Justice. Just as, speaking as a Canadian and a British citizen, I cannot stand the idea of colonial inferiority, neither can I, as a French Canadian and a Catholic, tolerate the idea that we need have recourse to a foreign power to protect us. Of course I admit that there might be some risk, but surely we French Canadians have proven in three hundred years that we are manly enough to face risks. I must say, speaking my own mind, that I am unable to agree altogether with my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) in the view that English speaking Canadians generally are as broadminded as Englishmen at home. Unfortunately they are not, and we have had many proofs to this effect. But I believe that the more responsibility the people of Canada at large exercise, English or French, Catholic or Protestant, the less they rely upon outside authority to correct their misdemeanours or to prevent them from doing foolish things, the more will their sense of responsibility increase and the more broadminded will they become. We are absolutely the masters of our constitution; there is no doubt of that. But so long as we do not exercise the power that is ours in that respect, it remains dormant and circumscribed. We must exercise it, and no one will be more glad to see us assert ourselves than the powers that be in England, because they have enough to do to look after their own affairs without being obliged to settle our small quarrels in Canada. They do not care to adjust matters between Catholic and Protestant, French or English in this country. It is not their business to do so and they do not want to have the responsibility. The English had to deal with the Irish for seven centuries and they have had enough of that sort of thing. The Irish made it quite evident that it was absurd for Englishmen to want to rule a foreign people from the English point of view. It seems to me that both English speaking and French speaking Canadians, whether Catholic or Protestant, will settle their differences more satisfactorily when they confer solely among themselves, in absolute freedom.

As regards the federal pact, I have expressed the view, time and again in Quebec, and I repeat it on this occasion, that if that pact holds good, it holds good in Ottawa as well as in London. If it is broken in Ottawa, or Toronto, or anywhere else in Canada, the king will not send a regiment to this country to make the pact good in favour of French Canadians or of Catholics. It may be that some of the hon. gentlemen surrounding the leader of the opposition would be prepared to raise the banner of King William to save us Catholics from Protestant domination, but I do not quite expect that. I rather rely on the common sense of the vast majority of English speaking Protestant Canadians. I do not think it is the proper spirit to foster in this country, to make English speaking Canadians believe that if it were not for the maternal protection of Great Britain we could be wiped out. Do not let anybody remain under that delusion. We cannot be wiped out; and if the English speaking Canadians could wipe us out the vast majority of them would not do so. Of course, at election times, once in a while, a certain number of people are bound to talk that way—one flag, one language, and so forth. But when it comes to a matter of practice, every reasonable man knows that two and a half million French Canadians are not going to be turned into English speaking people. On the contrary, we are freely learning English because we want to communicate with the rest of Canada and we want to prove to them that we do not suffer from that incapacity referred to a short time ago, of not being intelligent enough to acquire a second language. Those English speaking Canadians who suggest that this opinion is held generally throughout Canada simply calumniate their own people.

The more we have to discuss between ourselves matters of the kind that are called burning questions, dangerous questions, the more we consider them together as between man and man, the more will there grow up in Canada a proper spirit of conciliation, and the more courage will evidence itself on both sides, however much prejudice there may be at times. And of course prejudices are bound to exist. The discussion may be heated at times, but finally difficulties will have to be adjusted as they were adjusted in 1867. Conciliation was the spirit of confederation. Cartier and Macdonald did not go to London to seek advice on how to deal with the school question or with the question of minority rights or anything else. They first secured George Brown and gagged him with a portfolio; they silenced him for a few years. He was the only man who raised any trouble in those days, for the good old Tory party was unanimous at that time for the protection of French Catholics. As I say, they gagged George Brown, and that was Cartier's masterpiece; because, as Macdonald said in some of his letters, "I cannot speak with the man." He therefore used Cartier as an intermediary; diplomatist as he was, he used a French-Canadian for the purpose. Thus it was that, after Brown was brought in, confederation was made possible.

What were the outstanding principles of confederation? In the first place, the whole of Canada in becoming a self-governing country was asserting its right to full fledged autonomy. As everybody knows, Sir John Macdonald wanted the Dominion to be called the Kingdom of Canada. We have evidence, not only in his letters but in his public utterances, that he wanted to entertain with foreign powers such relations as we are beginning to establish to-day. Everyone knows that he was absolutely opposed to any kind or form of contribution by the people of Canada to any war waged by England outside Canada. We have testimony to this effect all through his life, in all his actions. The second principle of confederation was that in every province of Canada, the minority, French or English, Protestant or Catholic, should enjoy exactly the same rights in matters of language and of schools. We have stood by the agreement on both points, and we are prepared to stand by it in complete amity with the other peoples of the Dominion. As Canadians, we are prepared to discuss the problems that confront us without the interference of a tribunal in London or of any body responsible to the electors of Yorkshire or of Midlothian. We are ready to settle our own affairs without reference to any such outside authority as to whether we should insert or omit a comma here or there in our constitution, or eliminate a sentence or half a sentence elsewhere.

It behooves us to assert—what was acknowledged unanimously this summer by representatives of all the self-governing countries of the empire—that Canada has the right and the power to deal with her own constitution just as freely as Great Britain can deal with hers. And inasmuch as ours is a written constitution, the result of a contract between two races, an agreement among several provinces; inasmuch as there are new provinces which did not exist at the time of confederation, and new problems which did not then present themselves: in view of these circumstances it seems to me that the two processes, advocated respectively by my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and by the Minister of Justice, instead of conflicting with each other, are rather complementary. I think my friends on the other side should acknowledge that anything done or said in this House cannot close the matter, and that the provinces must pronounce themselves as political bodies and political entities within the confederacy, just as the provinces have no right and no power to prevent this House from doing anything we desire to do in our federal affairs or from making such suggestions as we may think are for the benefit of Canada.

It seems to me that there would be no time lost, because our constitution cannot be amended as the English constitution is amended in fact from day to day. Once in a while we have to put it on the "métier", as we say in French, to see whether it has been outgrown, whether it should be added to or modified, and this should be done periodically. We should have a committee to look after the revision of the constitution let us say every ten years. Instead of waiting until there is discontent and until the various parts of the country begin to bicker, it would be a good thing to look after it from time to time. Therefore in that spirit and with those reservations, while agreeing entirely with the Minister of Justice in the main portion of his argument, it seems to me that the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre could be accepted in that broad spirit, with the desire to accomplish something more comprehensive and more practical than a mere inter-provincial conference could bring about by itself, without having received first of all an indication of the opinion of this parliament.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to enter upon this discussion, but I think it discloses the fact that once you begin to make shreds and patches of the constitution, either of Great Britain in her relations to the dominions or of the dominions themselves in relation to their separate provinces or states, you at once open a large field for discussion in which we may reach no satisfactory conclusion, and are indeed incapable of doing so. The constitution of a country is on an entirely different basis from the ordinary statutes and enactments of parliament; a constitution is made not for the present but for the far-reaching future. It must necessarily change and be subject to modifications, but the matter of modification or change must be approached in an entirely different spirit from that in which we would consider the amendment of a mere statute dealing with commercial, corporation or criminal law.

I do not suffer, and I do not think members of this parliament or the people of this country suffer, from any inferiority complex; I believe the electors of this country are as intelligent, if not more intelligent, than are on the whole the electors of Great Britain and Ireland. I know something of Scotland and something of England; and in my opinion the majority of the electors of those countries are not more intelligent than are the average of the electors of our own country. I do not think the lawyers of Canada suffer from any inferiority complex; I meet the best lawyers of London from time to time as well as those of New York and Washington, and I have never felt that I could not safeguard the interests of my clients in dealing with them quite as satisfactorily as I can safeguard the interests of my clients in dealing with the lawyers of Toronto, Edmonton or Vancouver.

I do not think we suffer in Canada from the colonial spirit; if that spirit exists in this country I do not know where it exists. I do not find it in the eastern provinces or in Quebec, and I certainly do not find it in the west; so that any discussion of the colonial spirit seems to me entirely apart from the question. If the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) has really made up his mind that the independence of Canada is necessary to the welfare of the country as a whole and that it should be achieved within a short time, I can understand why he should openly advocate our independence as he has done this afternoon. Unfortunately, he does not conceive that the members of this House or the people of this country may advocate the continuance of their political relations to the British throne and to Great Britain and Ireland and the other great dominions, except that it be advocated by reason of an inferiority complex or through being permeated with a colonial spirit. I take an entirely different view. I look to Canada to develop and to become one of the great nations of the world. If I or you, Mr. Speaker, could return to this country fifty or sixty or one hundred years hence, we would see a progress and development in Canada in every department of national life which would surpass the highest anticipations of the people of to-day. It is bound to come, but I believe it will best be achieved if we make no sudden break and have no sudden cleavage from the traditions under which we were born and bred, and which are an inspiration to the great body of our people both French and English. These traditions were not traditions of servility. They were never such in the province of Quebec even in the rural districts of that province, and are not such to-day; there is no spirit of servility there. Although the hon. member has had far more experience from his associations with the people of that province than I possess, yet I believe that though they have not a spirit of servility, and while they are not permeated with the colonial spirit, the great body of those people are willing and anxious to maintain those ancient and honourable liens which bind the people of Canada to the British throne, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the other great dominions beyond the seas. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that they are not ready to disrupt and tear up the ties or liens of the constitutional fabric which binds us to the rest of the British Commonwealth to-day.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask the hon. gentleman if there is anything in the resolution which looks to the tearing up or disruption of any such ties?

Mr. CAHAN: I am discussing the address of the hon. member for Labelle for the moment, and if I have an opportunity—

Mr. BOURASSA: If my hon. friend will permit me, he knows that I did not suggest disruption, and there has never been any such idea. I simply wish to go back to the principle of confederation that was asserted by Sir John Macdonald: complete equality as between Canada and Great Britain, that is all.

Mr. CAHAN: I accept that statement from the hon. member for Labelle, but I thought that some phrases which he used or statements which he made went beyond that. It seems to me that the great object of the people in Canada to-day, both of the east and west and of the centre, should be to develop a unity of national sentiment, to develop, if you will, a common speech in the use of both languages; because I believe that a knowledge of the French language is absolutely necessary to a thorough knowledge and appreciation of the mentality and high character of the great body of people of the province in which I represent a constituency. We must achieve that spirit of national unity before we will be in a position to discuss in the future any dissolution of those ties which bind us to the other British dominions and to the British throne.

Now, in connection with that problem, any proposal for a revision of the British North America Act, as suggested, will, I think, create a considerable degree of suspicion. It will meet a very considerable degree of suspicion in the eastern provinces of Canada; it will meet possibly, among the thoughtful men of the west, the same degree of suspicion and reluctance to enter upon any new constitutional arrangement of a radical character or quality. We must first apply ourselves to achieving that unity, and even those who look forward to the independence of Canada must for years devote their intellectual energies to preparing Canada for that breach if inevitably it is to come. We must —and I intend to discuss this under another resolution, namely, the matter of appeals to the Privy Council—we must perfect the machinery of our own courts of justice. We must give to our own Supreme court a higher standing, and create greater confidence in its decisions on the part of the people of this country before we can abrogate the right of appeal to the Privy Council. I think I have read most of the discussions as reported in shorthand of the arguments before the Privy Council dealing with our own constitutional affairs; and, as I said the other day in committee, it is only occasionally that we see glimpses of intelligence on the part of members of the Judicial Committee, when dealing with the local affairs of the Dominion of Canada, yet I confess that the people have not sufficient confidence in our own Supreme court to-day to abrogate entirely not only appeals in criminal cases, appeals in commercial cases, but appeals in constitutional cases; and, although the province of Quebec has met with many disappointments in respect of appeals to the Privy Council, yet I am persuaded that the great body of intelligent opinion in that province is, for the time being and under present conditions, that the right of appeal in constitutional cases should still be maintained. There is a feeling that, if the right of appeal in constitutional cases is not maintained, our people will not have the same confidence in the decisions of our own Supreme Court of Canada as at present constituted; and until you have, on the part of the people of all the provinces, implicit confidence in the ability, in the intelligence, and in the impartiality of our own Supreme court, you would introduce an element of discord, of suspicion and misapprehension into the minds of the people of this country, if you were to abolish at the present time the right of appeal to the Privy Council in constitutional cases.

And then where is the need to-day of any radical revision of the British North America Act? The moment you begin to revise the British North America Act in its essential particulars you place the whole structure, it seems to me, in the melting pot; and we are not prepared to-day to have it placed in the melting pot and to set about arranging a new contract or agreement between the provinces as a basis for a new constitution for this country. Our constitution is different, as the hon. member for Labelle has said, from the constitutions of South Africa, of New Zealand, or of Australia. We are in this country a people drawn originally from two races. It took from 1791 until 1867 to reach a compact or agreement between those two races as to the terms on which they were prepared to coöperate and live in unity for the future; and if you now wipe out that compact, if you now put it into the melting pot, you introduce into Canada an element of discord, which will prevent this country from giving the time and attention it should give to its material and social development. If there were any grave evils apparent I would say let us adjust those evils. Certainly there is no difference between the status of the three provinces of the middle west and that of the provinces of the east which calls for placing the whole constitution in the melting pot to-day. The sole difference between the constitutions of Saskatchewan and Alberta and the constitution of Ontario, is the one provision with regard to natural resources and subsidies; and there was a body of opinion in the territories in 1905, which was represented by some of the ablest and most thoughtful men that we had produced in Canada at that time. They became parties to an arrangement which was carried into effect by the constitutional acts of Alberta and Saskatchewan of 1905, and they decided then that it was to their advantage that the natural resources of those new provinces should be held by the crown in the right of the Dominion of Canada, and that those provinces should receive in compensation annual subsidies largely increased in amount. To-day, Mr. Speaker, if those provinces wish their natural resources back there is not a voice in this House that will be raised against giving them back, by transferring to the crown in right of the provinces these parts of the natural resources which are not yet appropriated. The sole issue is not with regard to the return of the natural resources to Alberta, but as to certain portions of the natural resources—of the lands, mines, and forests,—which have been appropriated by the parliament of Canada for the purposes of carrying out certain educational trusts. To-day not a member of this House, I believe, would stand up and vote against the transfer of the natural resources to Alberta or to Saskatchewan; but we simply ask, some of us, that with respect to those lands already appropriated for educational purposes, the terms and conditions of that trust should be maintained and carried out by the crown in the right of the provinces as it is now being carried out by the crown in the right of the Dominion. Therefore there is no serious consideration presented to us why we should put our constitution in the melting pot because of any grave difference of status between the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan on the one hand, and the provinces of the east on the other.

Is there any subject which for the general advantage of Canada should be dealt with by the parliament of Canada, but which parliament now has not complete jurisdiction to deal with? There may be some, but I do not know of any. There is a question arising in the province of Ontario which we have been discussing in the special committee, as to the powers of the provincial legislature and the powers of our own parliament respectively, in imposing restrictions and conditions upon the operations of loan companies. Why should not the province have the right to deal with and prescribe the conditions under which certain insurance companies or certain loan companies should operate within its borders? That is certainly not a matter which calls for the placing of the constitution of this country into the melting pot again. Those are questions which for sixty years have been successfully dealt with by the courts of this country, and which will be so dealt with again during the next sixty years. Therefore, it seems to me, without taking the time of this House, that the one aim and object of all of us who desire to promote the interests of Canadian nationality, as I do, should be to secure such conciliatory coöperation between the various parts of the Dominion that we, whenever an occasion may arise in future, may so understand the sentiment of each other and be so animated by the same purpose that we will work cordially together to promote and preserve the national interests of Canada in whatever form and from whatever source those interests may be attacked. That is not evidence of a colonial spirit. So far as the legislative control by the British parliament is concerned it is merely at present a convenient form through which the parliament and legislatures of Canada may give expression to their unanimous approval of certain projected changes or modifications in the Confederation act. It is simply a form of procedure, and before we abolish that form it is absolutely necessary that we should enter into a new compact, between the people of Canada on the one hand and the legislatures and people of each province on the other, that hereafter the constitution of Canada may be changed but may only be changed with the unanimous approval of the whole of the people, as represented by these legislatures.

Mr. BOURASSA: Hear, hear.

Mr. CAHAN: That would afford us the opportunity for saying that we control and are masters of our own constitution, and that we may make it or amend it or modify it as we see fit. But the fact remains that by the same approval of all the legislatures, and by the approval of the parliament of Canada, we may to-day amend it as we see fit, and therefore for the purpose of providing a new form of procedure which might be gratifying to our national pride, in the present condition of sentiment in this country, when there is lack of complete unanimity, we should not, I think, place the existing constitution into the melting pot for the purpose of arriving at a new compact which should provide the same necessary conditions, the consent of all the provinces to any proposed amendments or modifications. The time is not ripe for it. The time may come in twenty years, or it may come in thirty years or in a century. The main object of members of this parliament and of our people should be to prepare ourselves so that when that time necessarily comes we shall have such unanimity of political sentiment in this country as will enable us as a united people to go on and fulfil our destiny as a great Canadian nation on the northern half of this continent, prepared to stand for political rights, to fight our way, to maintain our liberty in spite of any aggression from any other part of the world. But do not let us be premature about it. Do not let us undertake the consideration of these grave constitutional changes until we are actually forced by circumstances to do so. Any country that has ever developed constitutionally has done so by producing men who are able, qualified and competent to deal with any such crisis as it arises. Then, when a crisis does arise, when you are actually forced into effecting these constitutional amendments, you have the men to solve the problem and to preserve and to maintain the high political destiny of the country of which they are citizens.

Mr. G. C. COOTE (Macleod): The sentiments expressed by the hon. member who spoke last (Mr. Cahan) seemed to me to be typical of the statesmen that we have had governing this country for many years—they do not want to deal with any problem until it is forced upon them. I think it is time we looked upon our problems in a different way and said, "We see this problem in the distance; we will start now to study it and perhaps we can reach a solution of it sooner and in a more satisfactory manner."

My only reason for taking part in this debate was to remind the House of the circumstances under which confederation was accomplished. There were several provinces in Canada—they were not really provinces, but each one was a colony. The representatives of these colonies came together, sat around a council table and considered the question: "Is there any agreement which we could enter into with the object of forming a dominion out of all these colonies?" Four of these colonies voluntarily entered confederation. They were the charter members. Prince Edward Island I think was a colony at that time by itself. It could have come into the union, but it said: "The terms offered to us are not satisfactory, and we will remain out." They afterwards came in of their own volition and on an agreement satisfactory to them. Later on British Columbia came in, on certain terms which were granted to her. She was not forced in, but I think Canada agreed to build a railway to British Columbia to induce her to come in. Then these provinces or colonies which were formed into the Dominion of Canada afterwards created other so-called provinces out of the great prairies lying in western Canada. I say "so-called," because if these colonies had been made into real provinces they would have been given the rights that were enjoyed by other provinces that came into the confederation. These western provinces, in my opinion, have been held by the rest of Canada very much in the same manner as Spain, Britain and other nations have held their colonies in the past. If these western provinces had been treated the same as the other provinces of Canada, after they had been formed into provinces, they would have been given the opportunity to say whether or not they wanted to come into confederation. There is no doubt that these provinces would have come in on terms that were satisfactory to them. But at the present time they are in confederation, and they never were given a chance to say whether or not they wanted to come in, and I think the time will have to come—

Mr. MARCIL: May I ask whether the hon. gentleman has read the debates in this House of 1905, on the Autonomy Bill, when the feelings of the people of western Canada were expressed through their representatives on that question?

Mr. COOTE: No, Mr. Speaker, I have not, and it seems to me it would not very greatly alter the facts with which I am dealing. I do not think those representatives were entitled to speak for provinces which were not then formed.

Mr. CAHAN: They were entitled to speak for the territories out of which the provinces were formed.

Mr. COOTE: My contention is that these provinces should have exactly the same rights as the other provinces which entered confederation, and the other provinces all had the right to sit down at the council table and say on what terms they would come in.

I want to conclude before six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, and before sitting down I just wish to say that I am heartily in favour of this resolution. I think, if the committee were formed and discussed this question, the government would know very well what was the attitude of parliament in regard to many of these questions which must be considered largely from a Dominion point of view, and our representatives would then enter the interprovincial conference with that opinion of the House to guide them in their deliberations.

On motion of Mr. Marcil the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, March 10, 1927

The House met at three o'clock.

COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS

Mr. RENE MORIN (St. Hyacinthe-Rouville) presented the third report of the select standing committee on standing orders as follows:

The select standing committee on standing orders beg leave to present the following as their third report:

Pursuant to the provisions of rule 96 (2), your committee have considered the nineteenth report of the examiner of petitions for private bills, which reads as follows:

"Your examiner has duly examined the following petition for a private bill. This bill was considered by the House last session; and while the requirements of the ninety-first rule were fully complied with last session, no notice has been published in regard to any proceedings which may be taken on the said petition during the present session af parliament, viz:—

Of Charles B. Hibbard of Montreal, Quebec and others; to incorporate Red Lake and Northwestern Railway Company."

In view of the fact that the requirements respecting publication of notice were fully complied with last session, your committee recommend that rule 91 be suspended in reference to this application.

All of which is respectfully submitted,

RENE MORIN,
Chairman.

Mr. MORIN (St. Hyacinthe-Rouville) moved that the third report of the select standing committee on standing orders be concurred in.

Mr. STEVENS: Might we know what the report is? I must confess that I overlooked it.

Mr. MORIN (St. Hyacinthe-Rouville): It might stand as a notice of motion.

Stands as notice of motion.

MONTREAL, OTTAWA AND GEORGIAN BAY CANAL COMPANY

COMMUNICATION FROM LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO TRANSMITTING RESOLUTION

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received from the Prime Minister and President of Council of the province of Ontario the following communication:

Toronto, March 8, 1927.

Dear Mr. Speaker:

On the direction of the legislative assembly of Ontario, I herewith enclose you copy of a resolution unanimously passed by that legislature yesterday afternoon, the seventh instant.

May I say that the resolution was not presented, discussed or adopted with any political motive or from any partisan point of view. It is an assertion by all the members of the legislature of the rights of the people they represent, in the water-powers that are involved in the application to parliament made by the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Company.

May I express the hope that through the proper channels you will see that it is made known to the members of the House of Commons over which you preside.

Believe me, with every respect,

Yours very sincerely,
G. H. FERGUSON.

Honourable RODOLPHE LEMIEUX,
Speaker, House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ontario.

BANKING AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier) moved:

That the select standing committee on banking and commerce be granted leave to sit while the House is in session.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before putting the motion I must observe that under the rules it should be preceded by a notice. It may be adopted at this stage only by unanimous consent.

Mr. CAHAN: May I ask the acting chairman, who has introduced the motion, to be good enough, if the motion passes unanimously, as we are all willing that it should, to give notice to some members of the House when the division comes, because some of us are anxious to place ourselves on record regarding certain matters coming before that committee.

Mr. JACOBS: I understand that if agreeable the committee will sit at four o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried by unanimous consent.

Motion agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE

Mr. W. F. KAY (Brome-Missisquoi) moved that the first report of the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization be concurred in.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): I wonder if the chairman of the committee would be good enough to advise the House what that report contains?

Mr. KAY: The report in question was made to the House on March 2, and is to be found in the votes and proceedings of that day. It recommends to the House that the Seeds Act, 1923, be amended to provide that the minister shall have power to refuse a license for a new variety of wheat on the recommendation of a board named, and that he shall also have power to revoke a license on the recommendation of the same board.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

PULPWOOD BERTHS—MANITOBA

Mr. BISSETT:

1. Has the government at the present time any pulpwood berths for sale in the province of Manitoba?

2. If so, where are they located?

3. What is the intention of the government regarding the disposal of any further pulpwood areas in the province of Manitoba, and will any disposal be on the same conditions under which a sale was made to the Manitoba Paper Company?

4. What is the policy of the government regarding the disposal of any water-power sites on any of the rivers in the province of Manitoba, and where are such sites located?

Hon. Mr. STEWART:

1. No designated pulpwood berths but two possible developments.

2. One on Nelson river, the other on the Saskatchewan river.

3. Applications will be given consideration as received and no awards will be made without public competition after due advertisement.

4. Water-power, so far as unalienated, appurtenant and essential to the development of new pulp and paper industries will be reserved therefor.

INSPECTION OF CARS OF WHEAT

Mr. COOTE:

1. How many cars of wheat have been inspected at Calgary and Edmonton from September 1, 1926, to December 31, 1926?

2. What is the number of cars of each grade?

3. How many cars have graded straight?

4. How many cars have been inspected "no grade" on account of moisture?

Hon. Mr. FORKE:

* WORK ON SUNDAY—CIVIL SERVICE

Mr. McQUARRIE:

1. Does the order in council No. P.C. 1537, dated 5th September, 1925, relating to the observance of the Lord's Day, include all permanent full time civil servants?

2. Is the government aware that full time civil servants are still required to work six days a week and on Sundays, without receiving one day off in the week as compensation as set out in the above order in council, or without extra remuneration for the Sunday?

3. Will the Prime Minister see that the contents of the above order in council are officially communicated to all full time civil servants through their respective ministers, deputy ministers and heads of branches as soon as possible?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this question refers to order in council No. 1537 dated September 5, but I think my hon. friend means an order passed on September 7, which bears that number. In answer to the first question I shall lay on the table a copy of the order. The answer to the next question is "no." With regard to the third question I would say to my hon. friend that I have asked the Clerk of the Privy Council to see that all departments are supplied with a copy of this order in council.

HARBOUR AT OSHAWA

Mr. KAISER:

1. When did the Dominion government purchase the harbour at Oshawa, and what price was paid for it?

2. When was the site purchased for the proposed turning basin, and what price was paid for it?

3. What estimate is placed upon the completed harbour improvements at said port?

4. How much has been expended thereon each year since 1921?

5. How much money is still required for the contemplated improvements?

Hon. Mr. ELLIOTT:

1. (a) April 8, 1901; (b) $7,500.00.

2. (a) April 15, 1914; (b) $3,529.20.

3. Approximately $244,000 for a 15-foot proposition.

1921-22	$ 968 13
1922-23	1,175 75
1923-24	800 99
1924-25	16,317 95
1925-26	94,670 54
1926-27	17,382 36
	$131,315 72

5. Approximately $112,000.

[Mr. Forke.]

STAFF APPOINTMENTS—CANADIAN LEGATION AT WASHINGTON

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington):

1. What positions have been established in connection with Honourable Vincent Massey's staff at Washington, D.C.?

2. Who have been appointed to such positions and how were the appointments made?

3. What salary is being paid to each of the appointees?

4. Are there any vacancies yet to be filled?

5. Do these positions come under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission, and if not, why not?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. First secretary, commercial secretary and third secretary.

2. Laurent Beaudry, Merchant Mahoney, and Thomas A. Stone, have been appointed to these respective posts, for the remainder of the present fiscal year, in accordance with section 23 of the Civil Service Act.

3. $5,000, $5,000 and $3,000 respectively.

4. Yes.

5. No, it was considered that the procedure of selection by the Civil Service Commission was not appropriate for these initial appointments to posts abroad.

LAND SETTLEMENT SCHEME

Mr. McKENZIE:

1. Has the government purchased or do they intend to purchase any lands in connection with their proposed lands settlement scheme?

2. If so, is it the intention to render such lands liable to all forms of municipal taxation?

3. Is it the intention to make lands now classed as crown lands and which have been sold to immigrant settlers, subject to the provisions of the municipal acts with reference to tax sale procedure, before the land has been fully paid for by the settler?

4. Is any change contemplated whereby Soldier Settlement Board lands are to be made liable to sale under the provisions of the tax sale proceedings of the municipal acts?

Hon. Mr. FORKE:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. No.

4. No.

JOSEPH H. CYR

Mr. CAHAN:

1. Has Joseph H. Cyr been dismissed from the office of postmaster of Ste. Sabine station, county of Bellechasse, province of Quebec?

2. If so, on whose charge or complaint was such dismissal made?

3. What was the nature of such charge or complaint?

4. Was the said postmaster, who was so dismissed, given an opportunity to present his defence against such charge or complaint?

5. If so, what was the nature of his defence?
6. What annual salary or revenue attached to said office?

Hon. Mr. VENIOT:

1. Yes.
2. Member for constituency.
3. That postmaster was guilty of active political partisanship to the member's personal knowledge.
4. Not the practice in cases in which a member is prepared to state that of his own knowledge an offence contravening the provisions of the Civil Service Act, respecting political partisanship, has been committed.
5. See 4.
6. Salary and allowances $171.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

BRANCH LINES CONSTRUCTION—AMENDED RESOLUTION

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the construction, prior to the 31st day of August, 1930, of the following Canadian National railway branch line:—

From a point on the Canadian Northern railway near Shellbrook to a point in township 50, ranges 14 or 15, west of the third meridian, in the province of Saskatchewan, estimated mileage 77.0; average expenditure per mile, $32,207; estimated cost $2,480,000.

He said: Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

I would like to say that this is an amendment to section 8 of the resolution already standing in my name, with which I hope to go on to-day, and in view of that I would ask that it be substituted for section 8 of the existing resolution in order to enable discussion of the whole program to-day.

Motion agreed to.

WELLAND CANAL—IMPORTATION OF TIMBER

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): I would like to ask my friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) with regard to some information which was given to me the other day. I was informed that large timbers needed for and being used in the construction of the Welland canal were being brought from Oregon or Washington via Vancouver. I want to ask the minister if he is aware of this and, if so, why we are using timber imported from the United States when there is an ample supply available in Canada. If the minister has not the information under his hand will he make the necessary inquiries and give an answer later?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I was not aware of anything of the kind, Mr. Speaker, and will be glad to make inquiries and let my hon. friend have the information at a later date.

CLAIMS OF BRITISH COLUMBIA—APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONER

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. S. F. TOLMIE (Victoria, B.C.): I would like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister if it is true that a commissioner has been appointed to inquire into the claims of British Columbia in regard to railway lands and other matters. If that is so, what is the name of the commissioner and what is the scope of the inquiry?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I will be pleased to lay on the table of the House a copy of the order in council which will inform my hon. friend of the scope of the commission. Mr. Justice Martin of Regina is the commissioner.

TRADE TREATY WITH GERMANY

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): Might I ask my friend the Prime Minister if there is any truth in the rumour which appears in the newspapers that a new trade treaty is being negotiated between Canada and Germany? If negotiations are taking place, could the Prime Minister give us an outline of the contents of the proposed treaty?

Hon. JAMES MALCOLM (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I might say that at the moment no trade treaty is being negotiated between the government of this country and Germany.

AUSTRALIAN INDUSTRIAL DELEGATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): I would like to draw to the attention of the government a despatch appearing in the Victoria Province under date of March 4, relative to the visit to this continent of a delegation sent by the Commonwealth of Australia to study trade conditions. The article will explain the point I am raising, and is as follows:

That the non-inclusion of Canada in the itinerary of the Australian industrial delegation to North America is entirely due to the neglect of the Dominion government is the only expression one gleans from the members of the delegation, numbering twelve, who arrived here by the Niagara to-day.

Public announcement in the press of Canada and the United States was made five months ago of the decision of the Commonwealth government to send the delegation to study trade and industrial conditions, but the authorities at Ottawa appear to have been quite indifferent to the desirability of their taking Canada in on their tour.

Thus it appears that what is evidently an official delegation which is making a visit to this continent will not include Canada in its tour. I should like to know why this delegation has not received any invitation from the government.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I do not know what credibility is to be attached to the representations in the article which my hon. friend has quoted; it is the first I have heard of the matter. I would say, however, that if any representations had been made to the government of Canada by the government of Australia with respect to any trade delegation that might have wished to visit Canada, a hearty and most cordial invitation would have been extended to it so to do.

NEW AUSTRALIAN PARLIAMENT BUILDING

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): May I ask the Prime Minister if it is the intention of the government to accept the invitation of the Australian government to send a minister to attend the opening of the new Australian houses of parliament? If so may I venture the suggestion that Canada's representative might take up with the Australian government the matter of amending the Australian treaty.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In answer to my hon. friend's question I may say that it is the intention of the government to be represented in Australia at the opening of the new houses of parliament in Australia. I hope this country will be represented by a minister of the crown.

PURE BRED STOCK

DISTRIBUTION OF SIRES AMONGST STOCK BREEDERS

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. HARRY J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): I have a telegram I wish to draw to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture. It reads as follows:

[Mr. Ladner.]

Chilliwack, B.C., March 7, 1927.

British Columbia Jersey Breeders' Association ask for your influence against discontinuing bull clubs. Great help to new settlers outlying sections.

I think the minister promised a reply to similar representations from other organizations.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): I have issued a communication in reply to a number of inquiries regarding this matter and I will send my hon. friend a copy of it.

QUESTIONS OF PRIVILEGE

MARITIME CLAIMS—MR. DUFF

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough): Before the orders of the day are called I wish to rise to a question of privilege. In that great family journal the Financial Post of March 4 there appears an article on the first page headed, "Maritime report keeps the government awake at nights." I do not know whether that is true or not, nor do I care, but there is a special heading which says, "Liberal members from the east said to oppose subsidy". Now, Mr. Speaker, on my own behalf, as a member from the maritime provinces supporting the Liberal party, and as president of the Nova Scotia Liberal Association I wish to state there is no truth in that statement and that we are in favour—

Mr. GUTHRIE: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no question of privilege involved in the hon. member's complaint.

Mr. DUFF: Mr. Speaker, as a Liberal member can I not say that I am in favour and that the Liberals of Nova Scotia are in favour of the Duncan report?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

DIAMOND JUBILEE COMMEMORATION—MR. KAISER

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. T. E. KAISER (Ontario): I should like to rise to a question of privilege, although I may be ruled out in the same way that an hon. member opposite has been. A statement is published in the Ottawa Journal this morning with which my name is connected, and one line contains a reference which may mislead the public and the House as to a suggestion which I made in connection with the jubilee. The newspaper in question states that the suggestion was advanced that a plaque carrying the portraits of the members of the House of Commons of 1927 should be placed in various counties of Canada. This is misleading. What I had in mind was that the plaque should display the portraits of the 181 members of the House of Commons of 1867. That is to say we should perpetuate in that way the memory of the members of the first parliament of the Dominion of Canada.

QUESTION BY MR. LADNER

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. LADNER: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has already spoken.

Mr. LADNER: I am rising to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. SPEAKER: According to Bourinot the putting of questions when the orders of the day are called, is a privilege which must not be abused. The hon. gentleman has already spoken. I do not wish to be discourteous to the hon. gentleman, but once he has spoken he has exercised his privilege.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Customs and Excise) moved the third reading of Bill No. 113, respecting the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. R. S. WHITE (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, it was my misfortune not to have been in my place in this chamber on Tuesday last when this bill was discussed. Had I been here I would have expressed my most cordial commendation of the character of the bill and of the proposal to create subdivisions in this department. I believe that the appointment of three commissioners will have the effect of expediting the business of the department, and of relieving the minister of an immense amount of routine which should not be saddled upon him. I would also have suggested—I observe there was a little discussion on the point—that the name "Department of National Revenue" should be altered. It was suggested when the bill was discussed that the title "Department of Dominion Revenue" should be substituted but that I think would not be appropriate. It will be within the recollection of hon. members that a few years ago it was thought advisable to change the name of the Department of Militia and Defence and it is now known as the Department of National Defence. To that alteration there could be no possible objection. The introduction of the aeroplane and the creation of an air force have made necessary an enlargement of the description of the department, and "national defence" now correctly describes its function. In that case the question of provincial administration did not arise at all, because the matter of defence is one wholly within the jurisdiction of this parliament. But when you come to deal with revenue it seems to me that without straining the point, without chasing a shadow but with some degree of substance, it can be said that the revenues of the province of Quebec are Dominion or national revenues. The suggestion therefore that I would make to the Minister of Customs and Excise is that instead of using the words "national revenue" he should use the words "federal revenue". By doing so a clear distinction is made between provincial revenues and what we call Dominion revenues. There is a treasurer in each of the various provinces. It is quite conceivable that at any time in the future the provincial treasurer might be called the Minister of Provincial Revenue. Is it not logical and will it not better answer the purpose of the reorganization of the Department of Customs and Excise if the corollarial terms be Minister of Federal Revenue in respect of the revenue of the Dominion and Minister of Provincial Revenue in respect of the revenue of the province? That is the suggestion which I throw out now and which I would have thrown out before if I had had the good fortune to be present when the bill was before the House on a previous occasion. It is a simple matter, a matter of a few minutes, to make the change and I think it would be more appropriate.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

WAR CHARITIES ACT, 1917, REPEAL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved the third reading of Bill No. 114, to repeal the War Charities Act, 1917.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

BRANCH LINES CONSTRUCTION—RESOLUTION

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in measures to provide for the construction, prior to the 31st day of August, 1930, of the following Canadian National railway branch lines:—

1. (a) From a point about three miles west of St. Felicien on the St. Felicien branch of the James' Bay and Eastern railway to a point on the Mistassini river, in the province of Quebec. Estimated mileage 27.5 miles; average expenditure per mile $53,589; estimated cost $1,463,000.

(b) Section (1). From a point near Hebertville on the Quebec and Lake St. John railway to Ile d'Alma on the Saguenay river in the province of Quebec. Estimated mileage 9.5 miles; average expenditure per mile $56,526; estimated cost $537,000.

Section (2). From a point on Ile d'Alma on the Saguenay river to Savanne on the Peribonka river in the province of Quebec. Estimated mileage 25.0; average expenditure per mile $63,800; estimated cost $1,595,000.

Total (b) Mileage 34.5; average expenditure per mile $61,797; estimated cost $2,132,000.

The construction of these lines shall be subject to the following conditions:—

In the event of running rights being secured between near Hebertville and Ile d'Alma over the line of the Alma and Jonquiere railway, that part of the line authorized by this act between near Hebertville and Ile d'Alma shall not be constructed by the company, nor shall securities be issued or guaranteed in respect thereof.

2. From a point near Grand'Mere on the Canadian Northern Quebec railway in the province of Quebec. Estimated mileage 7.9; average expenditure per mile $213,038; estimated cost $1,683,000.

3. From a point near Pilkington on the Canadian National railway to a point near Niagara junction on the Canadian National railway in the province of Ontario. Estimated mileage 16.7; average expenditure per mile $69,700; estimated cost $1,164,000.

4. From a point near Weyburn on the Grand Trunk Pacific Saskatchewan railway to a point near Radville on the Canadian Northern railway, in the province of Saskatchewan. Estimated mileage 22.7; average expenditure per mile $25,110; estimated cost $570,000.

5. From a point near Willow Brook on the Canadian Northern railway to a point in township 27, range 9, west of the second meridian, in the province of Saskatchewan. Estimated mileage 22.0; average expenditure per mile $28,000; estimated cost $616,000.

6. From a point near Sturgis on Canadian Northern railway to a point on the Canadian Northern railway between Crooked River and Mistatim, in the province of Saskatchewan. Estimated mileage 100.0; average expenditure per mile $33,950; estimated cost $3,395,000.

7. From a point between Crooked River and Mistatim on the Canadian Northern railway to a point in township 48, ranges 11 or 12, west of second meridian, in the province of Saskatchewan. Estimated mileage 19.0; average expenditure per mile $30,000; estimated cost $570,000.

8. From a point on the Canadian Northern railway near Shellbrook to a point in township 50, ranges 14 or 15, west of the third meridian, in the province of Saskatchewan, estimated mileage 77.0; average expenditure per mile, $32,207; estimated cost $2,480,000.

9. From a point at about mile 67 on the Turtleford southeasterly branch of the Canadian National railway to a point on the Canadian Northern between Hafford and Richard in the province of Saskatchewan. Estimated mileage 35.6; average expenditure per mile $31,742; estimated cost $1,130,000.

10. From a point near Kindersley on the Canadian Northern railway to a point near Gliddon on the Canadian Northern railway in the province of Saskatchewan. Estimated mileage 18.0 average expenditure per mile $35,555; estimated cost $640,000.

11. From a point near Spruce Lake on the Canadian Northern railway to a point in township 53, range 25, west of the 3rd meridian, in the province of Saskatchewan. Estimated mileage 29.5; average expenditure per mile $33,559; estimated cost $990,000.

12. From a point near Hudson Bay Junction on the Canadian Northern railway to a point in townships 39 or 40, range 5, west of the second meridian, in the province of Saskatchewan. Estimated mileage 32.0; average expenditure per mile $34,000; estimated cost $1,088,000.

13. From a point near Elk Point on the Canadian National railway to a point in township 55, ranges 3 or 4, west of the fourth meridian, in the province of Alberta. Estimated mileage 19.0; average expenditure per mile $39,210; estimated cost $745,000.

14. From a point near Ashmont on the Canadian Northern Western railway to a point at or near Bonnyville, in the province of Alberta. Estimated mileage 38.0; average expenditure per mile $37,237; estimated cost $1,415,000.

15. From a point near Bretona on the Canadian Northern railway to a point near Clover Bar on the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, in the province of Alberta. Estimated mileage 11.0; average expenditure per mile $29,000; estimated cost $319,000.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): Before the motion is adopted I should like to ask the Minister of Railways if this resolution goes as a matter of course to the special committee on railways and shipping in order to be finally dealt with there.

Mr. DUNNING: The procedure intended by the government with regard to it is to send the bills which will be founded on it, not to the special railway and shipping committee, but to the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. That was the procedure followed on former occasions and I think it will be more satisfactory, particularly as the special committee will be loaded with work as soon as the Canadian National accounts come down.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The bills go to the select standing committee?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING: It might facilitate matters if I made a brief general statement to the committee. As is well known, an effort was made three years ago to place Canadian National branch line construction upon a three-year basis in order that the management of the National railways might be able to enter more intelligently upon their construction work from year to year and not be held up depending upon the progress of an individual session of parliament. The last three-year program voted by the House has now been practically completed. Nineteen branch lines have been constructed, involving a mileage of 572 at an estimated cost of $14,964,000 under the last program completed this year. Two projects only were not proceeded with, one being Kingsclear-Vanceboro line which was rendered unnecessary by reason of running rights being secured over the Canadian Pacific, and the other being the Rosedale-Bullpound Creek line in connection with which I expect shortly to bring down a bill for an extension of time. With the exception therefore of one project the whole of the previous program has been or will be completed prior to the 31st August, 1927, when the three-year authority expires.

The program now presented by the management through me for the next three years is very comprehensive in character and it has been given wide publicity. It is recommended by the president and the board of directors to the consideration of the House. When this resolution passes, I hope to introduce fifteen separate bills based upon it, and later I hope to refer these fifteen bills to the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, in order that the details of the proposal may be examined by the committee and a report made thereon to the House.

Mr. HANSON: I was out while the minister was making his statement. Do I understand him to say that the proposed Kingsclear-Vanceboro branch has been definitely abandoned?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. HANSON: If a violation of the rule that seems to have been brought down is not involved, what is the arrangement with the Canadian Pacific Railway as regards running rights between Fredericton and Vanceboro?

Mr. DUNNING: I have not under my hand the details of that arrangement, but running rights have been secured over the Canadian Pacific. Thus in the opinion of the Canadian National management the construction of a further line has been rendered unnecessary. I know of no reason why the details of the arrangement should not be given to the House. I suppose it is the usual standard running rights arrangement, but I shall be glad to get the information for my hon. friend at a later date.

Mr. MANION: What is the total amount involved in these fifteen branch lines?

Mr. DUNNING: The amount is $20,400,000 spread over the next three years.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): What is the total mileage?

Mr. DUNNING: 510.2 miles.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall we take up the resolution clause by clause?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

On section 1.

Mr. DUNNING: With regard to paragraph 1, I should make a statement. The management of the road wish me to inform the House with reference to this district of lake St. John, as follows:

> While it is not believed that the construction of the lines enumerated above during the period will reasonably protect the interests of the Canadian National Railways, there is one notable exception. The rapid development of the lake St. John district of Quebec clearly indicates the probable future need for improved railway transportation facilities, to make it possible to handle the traffic economically. The situation in respect to the requirements of this region has been under consideration for some time, and while we are not yet prepared to make any further recommendation than the construction of the two branches included in the above list, it is altogether likely that we will find it necessary to make a further recommendation after our studies are completed.
> Of course, it may also be found desirable to ask later for one or two other extensions in other fields, as a result of developments not fully foreseen at this time.

Section 1 agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

On paragraph 3.

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton): Are these branch lines intended to connect up with the general scheme of operation of the Canadian National, and if so, what sections will they connect with?

Mr. DUNNING: Each of the branch lines proposed connects with the existing Canadian National System. I shall be glad to give details of the one under discussion if my hon. friend wishes. I am prepared to give details to this committee, or to the railway committee, just as this committee desires.

Mr. MARCIL: I think some details should be given now so that they will appear on Hansard, because we are all interested in this branch line development, and others, like myself, are not members of the special committee. Perhaps the minister would give us just a short synopsis of the recommendations made by the management, especially with regard to the lines in Quebec. I know there has been a scheme on foot in the lake St. John district for the construction of a circular line around lake St. John. Is there anything in the minister's notes regarding the construction of such a line?

Mr. DUNNING: The two branches which are dealt with in section 1 (a) and 1 (b), and in section 2 are both in the lake St. John area, one proceeding up the west shore of the lake, and the other going partly around the north shore.

Mr. MARCIL: The construction of this circular line is not contemplated at present?

Mr. DUNNING: Not completely around the lake. I read the president's note on that in order to make clear that the railway company is of opinion that they may require to come back within the three year period with respect to certain proposals in various parts of Canada, and particularly with respect to the lake St. John area.

Mr. HANSON: If I am not out of order, I would like to ask the Minister of Railways if the government is giving any consideration to taking over the Kent Northern railway, the last branch line in the province of New Brunswick which has not been acquired by the Canadian National system. Is it the intention to take it over immediately, or is it intended not to take it over? How does the matter stand?

Mr. DUNNING: I am afraid my hon. friend's information is surely not correct when he says that is the last branch in New Brunswick not taken over by the Canadian National.

Mr. HANSON: I think it is.

Mr. DUNNING: To commence with, my hon. friend would not describe the St. John Valley railway—

Mr. HANSON: I had forgotten that, but you are operating that road anyway.

Mr. DUNNING: I would prefer, of course, not to discuss at this stage a matter which is dealt with specifically in the Duncan report as a part of the maritime provinces' general problem. My hon. friend's question opens up a very wide field indeed in that connection. I think the committee will see the force of that.

Mr. KAISER: I notice that section 3 speaks of a cost of $69,700 per mile, and in Saskatchewan there is a branch line to be constructed at a cost of $25,000 per mile. Is this big difference largely due to the cost of the right of way?

Mr. DUNNING: I am sorry I have not that detailed information under my hand, but I will see that it is supplied in the railway committee. There will, of course, be a detailed estimate before that committee in the hands of the officers of the company.

Mr. McGIBBON: Are these branch lines simply to gather the local traffic, or are they a part of the main line system?

Mr. DUNNING: The lines fall into three general classes: (1) lines which offer economic and operating advantages to the system; (2) branches for the purpose of general development and colonization of the country which will constitute feeders to the system; (3) a branch which will link the Hudson Bay railway with the south lines of the Canadian National railway system.

Mr. McGIBBON: Is the department really undertaking to build more colonization roads?

Mr. DUNNING: Both the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific are reaching out into the newer parts of Canada very rapidly. Both railways have found it profitable to do so, the Canadian Pacific especially. One of the criticisms of this parliament which is being heard more and more frequently is that the Canadian Pacific is reaching out into new country at a faster rate than the Canadian National, and the object of this branch line program is to give the Canadian National the opportunity of reaching out into the newer developed sections of Canada, in order to build feeders for the Canadian National sytem.

Mr. McGIBBON: I do not think the hon. minister caught my point. Is it the policy to build purely colonization roads irrespective of the traffic available at the present time?

Mr. DUNNING: It is very difficult to know exactly what my hon. friend means by that term—"purely colonization roads." If he means lines which as they are built tend to open up the country and bring in settlers, and thus produce traffic progressively year by year, yes, that is the policy of the Canadian National, and it is supported by the Department of Railways and Canals.

Mr. McGIBBON: But are you building these ahead of settlement?

Mr. DUNNING: I would not say that we would adopt the policy of going in ahead of settlement, but, fortunately or unfortunately, there are many areas of Canada into which settlement has gone fifty and sixty and in some cases up to one hundred miles ahead of the railway, in varying degrees, and it is into that type of settlement that the railways, both the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National are being pushed. Always when a line is built into such a district the settlement increases very rapidly, and consequently the traffic increases rapidly also.

Mr. CANTLEY: I understand that this is a program covering three years. There is no doubt at all in my mind that such a policy is necessary due to the growth of the country, for to operate properly the system must have feeders. But I would like to ask the minister whether we are to understand that no branch line construction outside of this program now brought down will be considered during the next three years which it is supposed to cover.

Mr. DUNNING: I should again in that connection quote from the president's memorandum, which I read a short time ago. After dealing with the lake St. John district, as to which the president specifically stated that further studies were being undertaken in that neighbourhood which might make it necessary for the company to come back again to parliament, he says also:

> Of course it may also be found desirable to ask later on for one or two other extensions, as a result of development not fully foreseen at this time.

That is to say while we are providing for a three year policy of construction, our hands are not completely tied and we are not prevented from considering projects which may develop as a result of things which are not foreseen at the moment.

Mr. CANTLEY: That satisfies me in regard to something unforeseen at the moment, but I am referring to some branch lines in the maritime provinces which have been discussed in this House several times, and as a matter of fact I think have been authorized by this House on two occasions. The program, as the minister has outlined it, calls for an expenditure in the prairie provinces of $12,000,000 or $13,000,000 and over $5,000,000 in the province of Quebec. I should like to know if, in regard to branch lines, the door is closed to Nova Scotia for three years.

Mr. DUNNING: The door of the president of the Canadian National Railways is never closed with respect to branch lines. My hon. friend will have in future the same opportunity as he and all others have had in the past of attempting to convince the management of the Canadian National Railways that any given proposal should be recommended by them to the government.

Mr. KAISER: Many of us are not members of the railway committee, and here is an outstanding item which I think must have caught the minister's eye and in regard to which I should like some explanation. Section 2 speaks of seven miles of railway from a point near Grand Mere on the Canadian Northern Quebec railway, at an estimated cost of $213,038 per mile. Can we not get some explanation?

Mr. DUNNING: I am sorry I did not bring my estimates with me. I did not consider all the estimates would be required in committee, but I have here some indication of the motive for the line in question. I have a summary of the information later to be laid before the railway committee.

Mr. KAISER: Most of us are not members of that committee and we would like an explanation of an outstanding figure such as this.

Mr. DUNNING: This branch would leave the present line at Grand Mere and keeping in the valley of the St. Maurice river swing south of the present line into the town of Shawinigan Falls, then head generally northwest and rejoin the present main line at East Burrills about two and a half miles west of Glenada station. The present line from Grand Mere to East Burrills and the spur Aldred to Shawinigan Falls would be abandoned. This branch line will accomplish two things. It will reduce the present steep gradient westbound out of Grand Mere, which is now 1.5 per cent to 0.6 per cent and give direct main line connection to the town of Shawinigan Falls.

The big economy however, comes from the reduction of gradients on the main line. At Garneau Junction, three miles west of Grand Mere come together the line from Quebec and the line from the north, which brings business from the lake St. John district, as well as from the National Transcontinental railway. The westbound tonnage from Garneau Junction to Montreal is concentrated and therefore heavier than east of Garneau Junction. At present the westbound gradient immediately out of Grand Mere controls the trainload into Montreal. By the proposed gradient improvement at this one place on the main line, the westbound freight train tonnage can be increased immediately by 79 per cent and eventually when a few other changes have been made in the line west into Joliette, the tonnage of trains westbound can be better than doubled. This means that on completion of this line 45 per cent of the freight train miles can be saved on business moved, and, with the further grade revision into Joliette complete, the freight train miles can be more than cut in two for a given business.

This will give my hon. friend an indication of the reasons why it is necessary to spend a large sum of money. Without having the details before me, I may say in a general way that on the Canadian National system there are many places where, when the line was first constructed, a roundabout route and a heavy gradient were adopted in order to avoid the greater expense which would be involved in going more directly and on a lower grade. This is one outstanding case. It is very obvious that when the line was first built the cheapest possible route was adopted, producing heavy grade conditions. We are able, by spending a lot of money, as my hon. friend points out, to reduce the grade and double the trainload westbound into Montreal, and it will therefore pay for itself in a short time.

Mr. KAISER: I concede that that might justify the construction of the railway, but it does not give me any information as to why a mile there should cost $213,000, and other sections cost only $50,000 and $25,000 a mile respectively. Why should the railway cost this large sum of money?

Mr. BOYS: A question has been asked as to why this line should cost as much as $213,038 per mile, and I think we should have an answer.

Mr. DUNNING: I have endeavoured to say on at least three occasions, in reply to that question this afternoon, that I have not with me complete particulars of the engineer's estimated cost of every mile proposed to be built, because in the past I have found that such details have been gone into in the select committee, and I did not come prepared with that information. I would require to have a great volume of information on my desk in order to answer that question, and I have not the information at present. Any members of this House who are not members of the railway committee can attend the sittings of that committee, if it is convenient for them to do so, and I will be very glad indeed to have a complete memorandum for the information of my hon. friend in that committee. I cannot pretend to carry all the details in my head. I have not on my desk at the present time the large volume of information which necessarily accompanies these branch line proposals.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. GEARY: The line starts at Grand Mere and runs to what point?

Mr. DUNNING: Back to the main line again.

Mr. GEARY: But where to? If it ran through Montreal we could easily understand the reason of the heavy cost.

Mr. DUNNING: It is only seven miles long.

Mr. GEARY: Where does it begin and where does it end?

Mr. DUNNING: It runs from Grand Mere to Shawinigan Falls and back to the main line at East Burrills. Maps have been supplied for members of the committee indicating in a general way the details of each one of the proposals. I think my hon. friend has the map.

Mr. GEARY: That is all right, but paragraph 2 is a little short in its information and is not properly drafted.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is right about that but it is in proper shape in the bill itself.

Mr. GEARY: My hon. friend indicated that this program comprised all the work to be done within the next three years. I hope my hon. friend will be able to assure the House that during the next three years he will not permit any order in council to go through for the construction of a branch like the Rouyn railway. This was not included in the program of the last three years. It never came before the House but was put through quietly by order in council at a cost of $5,000,000. I hope this will not occur again.

Mr. McGIBBON: The minister is not quite frank with us. He comes to the House with a large order and is not prepared to give us any information at all. He practically asks us to delegate our functions and our ability to the railway committee, on which three-quarters of the members do not sit. There are many committee meetings to be attended, and these bills ought not to go through the House without adequate information. We are going to vote millions of dollars regarding the expenditure of which we shall be altogether ignorant. I repeat, the minister is not very frank with us.

On section 4.

Mr. JELLIFF: The mileage provided for Alberta is approximately sixty-eight, and the total expenditure on the different branch lines in Alberta is $2,479,000. The branch lines of Saskatchewan approximate 293 miles and involve an expenditure of $9,629,000. I want to commend the minister for making provision to meet the needs of the farmers of these two provinces, while at the same time bringing additional traffic to the national system. But I trust, in view of these figures and the large expenditure made in the province of Saskatchewan, he will keep the needs of Alberta in mind when he is urged later to provide additional mileage to serve the Peace River district, and to provide an outlet to the coast for the people there.

On section 5.

Mr. CAMPBELL: What is the objective of this particular branch? Are the railway officials aiming at any particular point in the extension of the Willow Brook branch?

Mr. DUNNING: The Willow Brook situation has developed as the result of a tentative arrangement between the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National to serve an area which lies between the Canadian Pacific Winnipeg-Edmonton main line and the former Grand Trunk Pacific main line of the Canadian National. There is rather a wide gap through there. The Canadian Pacific gave notice of their intention to ask parliament for a charter covering the territory in question, but it appeared that as a consequence of granting that charter the Canadian Pacific would parallel the main line of the Canadian National for a distance of between forty and fifty miles at not much more than ten miles. Naturally the Canadian National objected, but they indicated their willingness to extend the Willow Brook branch into that area and to serve part of it at the present time, and later on as much of it as might be necessary. Both railways came to me as minister and I suggested that if they were still in disagreement, the railway committee would deal with the matter and decide which line should serve the territory in question. I suggested, however, that they might possibly facilitate matters for parliament by discussing the subject and agreeing to some method of serving the territory without duplication. After they had reached an agreement with the Canadian National on the division of the territory, the Canadian Pacific's proposals were considered by the railway committee, and a few days ago a bill came before the House. This short line represents the extension of the Canadian National railway to serve that part of the area which it was agreed they should serve. This territory will be fairly well served as a result of the arrangement made. Possibly in the future some further mileage may be required in addition to the line now proposed, but we can best decide that after the details have been worked out as a result of construction.

Mr. CAMPBELL: It is important to avoid duplication which, whether the road be built by a private company or by the government, must hurt us nationally. In this instance I should prefer to have seen all that particular territory served by the Canadian National because it is a rich district and the revenue would be considerable. However, it is much more desirable to have an arrangement between the two companies so that there may be no duplication, rather than have the two lines closely paralleling each other, as they would have done had the whole territory been intersected by both.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the average distance between the present main line of the Canadian Pacific and the main line of the Canadian National?

Mr. DUNNING: It is hard to average the distance over the area inasmuch as it varies considerably, as hon. members of the railway committee will remember after having seen it illustrated on the map. Speaking offhand, however, I should think that the maximum distance between the two roads in a direct line would be about forty miles, which probably would narrow down in some places to about thirty-five miles. My hon. friend (Mr. Campbell) is fairly familiar with the territory and will confirm that statement.

Mr. EVANS: There are two areas there which need railway service, one north and one south of the Canadian National main line. One would have thought that the natural thing to do would be for the Canadian Pacific to take one territory and the Canadian National the other, but instead of that a ridiculous arrangement is made between the two companies. Both go into the same territory and encroach on each other, and the people are not served as well as they would be if one railway went right through. It seems to me that this is a problem which will become graver as time goes on, and I do think that throughout Canada, but particularly in the west, some arrangement should be arrived at whereby a committee of experts might lay out the territory for all new railways to be built from now on, indicating where lines are needed and wherein the service can be given most economically. Anyone taking a casual view of the matter must conclude that it is a childish thing for the two railways to be quarrelling over some small bit of territory when so much railway accommodation is called for in other parts of the country. I cannot see why the Canadian National should not have taken the territory north of the main line and the Canadian Pacific the part south. As I say, the people would have been better served and it would have been more economical.

Mr. CAMPBELL: There is a real difficulty in this district, as my hon. friend (Mr. Evans) has indicated. As one looks at the lines on the railway map it certainly seems ridiculous to allow the Canadian Pacific to get in a little loop there which appears to be directly in the route of the Canadian National branch line from Willowbrook, but I presume under the circumstances that the department must consider the interests of both railways and divide the territory between them accordingly. This again brings to mind the difficulties with which we are confronted and with which we will always be confronted until a solution is found. I know that the suggestion that the Canadian Pacific railway be nationalized will be laughed at in this House and almost everywhere throughout the country to-day, but to my mind it is the only practical solution of these troubles. At some time in the future, it may be twenty-five years from now, this House will have to face that situation.

Section agreed to.

On section 6:

Mr. CAMPBELL: In regard to this paragraph it would seem that the objective of this branch is the Hudson Bay railway, because it touches the Prince Albert branch at a point I would judge to be twenty-five or thirty miles west of Hudson Bay Junction. Is that on account of engineering difficulties, or is it not the objective of this branch to connect that country with the Hudson Bay railway and if so why does it not connect at the junction itself?

Mr. DUNNING: This branch will run from a point near Sturgis to a point between Crooked River and Mistatim, and is desired by the management of the railway apart altogether from the partial link it would provide with the Hudson Bay railway; it is desired for operating purposes largely. In fact it will have a three-fold purpose; it will be part of a line from Sturgis to Hudson Bay Junction, as indicated by my hon. friend, and will thereby open up a large area of good agricultural land; then it will provide railway transportation to the soldier settlement south of Prairie River. The main feature, however, is to provide a shorter and better through route for the business of the Melfort and Prince Albert districts to Winnipeg and the head of the lakes. It is estimated that the saving on through traffic by this route would amount to $48,000 per year in operation.

Mr. CAMPBELL: There is another difficulty which I might mention in connection with this branch. Hon. members will recall that in 1924 a bill passed this House providing for a branch from Kelvington to a point about Tisdale, on the Prince Albert branch. When the bill was thrown out by the Senate the Canadian Pacific Railway immediately started work on a branch from Sheho, running from ten to twenty miles west of the proposed branch of the Canadian National Railways. A lot of the country through which the Canadian Pacific railway line runs is a rather swampy and bushy district, and the villages contained therein are very difficult of access. To the east of that line, along the proposed route of the Canadian National branch line, there is an excellent farming country; I think it no exaggeration to say that there is no finer or more productive piece of agricultural country in western Canada than will be found in the district between Kelvington and Tisdale, and it is nothing short of a tragedy that this particular branch line was turned down at that time. Of course I hold the government partly responsible for this, because I think they should have gone on with that work by providing the necessary amount in the estimates. A great many people went into that district when the line was surveyed expecting the branch to be constructed in due time, and even after the resolution appeared on the order paper here a great many people moved in and took up residence in that particular district. The rejection of the proposed line has left these people in a very unfortunate position; hundreds of them have moved off the land while others are remaining and trying to farm under great difficulties, hauling their grain very long distances to the railway. May I refer particularly to the district around Perigord, and I think the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Beaubien) will endorse what I have to say, because he is familiar with that district. It is one of the finest districts that can be found in western Canada, and is an exceptionally rich agricultural country. People went in there, broke up large areas of land and built good houses anticipating that a branch line would be built. but to-day they are obliged to haul their grain from twenty to twenty-five miles. These people are left in a position where they hardly know whether to carry on or whether to move out. They are still hoping that at some time in the future this original branch line will be constructed, and are holding on in that hope. I may say that the branch line now under consideration will take in the northern part of that territory which would have been served by the original branch line, and will perhaps limit the chances of these people to get another branch line at some future time. Of course I am speaking without knowledge of the engineering difficulties and other conditions, but ordinarily if this branch had been built to connect directly with Hudson Bay Junction it would have served what I believe was one of its original purposes. That is, it would have opened up all that country south of the Hudson Bay railway and would have left a sufficiently large area to be provided with a further branch line at some future time. I do hope that when this line is built it will strike the main line at a point further east, if there are no engineering or other difficulties in the way.

Mr. DUNNING: I should say a word or two in connection with the matter my hon. friend from Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) has just referred to. This branch is in his own constituency, and he knows it very well. He also knows, of course, that for a number of years before I had the honour of occupying my present office it was my duty in a former capacity to make representations to the railway authorities with regard to the area which he mentions, more particularly the Perigord and Farmingdale districts. I am now in the position of putting before this House what the management of the Canadian National Railways recommends, after duly considering the very many branch line proposals from one end of Canada to the other. With regard to the line now under discussion, which does not serve the Perigord and Farmingdale districts, I might say that the management of the Canadian National Railways have been endeavouring for many years to secure a route across from the Melfort-Prince Albert line to the Swan river line, which would offer operating advantages superior to the route around the big loop by Hudson Bay junction. This line has been chosen largely because it offers these operating advantages which could not be obtained by a line running straight north from Kelvington. I would also point out that the soldier settlements south of Prairie River and Mistatim are at present in quite as difficult a situation as the Perigord and Farmingdale districts, and it was impossible to so plan this line as to serve at one and the same time those soldier settlements and the Perigord area; that proved to be impossible. I can only say with regard to the Perigord proposal that the management does not recommend it at present. I have here some notes respecting applications which have been made during the last two years; I am afraid it will take too long to place on Hansard the detailed information involved, but I will be very glad to communicate to my hon. friend, who is of course the only member directly interested, the report of the president with respect to the whole matter, which takes up some four pages of my notes. Perhaps my hon. friend would be satisfied with that.

Section agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL: May I ask with regard to paragraph 7 just how the railway contemplated there will run with respect to the C.P.R. branch line? I think there is a branch connecting with the next town of Tisdale. Would not the branch proposed here closely parallel the Canadian Pacific railway?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is in error when he says that Tisdale is the next station. He is not apparently as familiar with the area in question as I thought he was.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I might say that I was studying the Canadian National railway folder, but I realize there are flag stations in between that are not mentioned there. It is only the largest stations apparently that are mentioned on this map.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, the Canadian National railway does not want to run any chance of losing the Carrot valley area. That is a plain answer to the question. We are getting in there in what is deemed to be the most economic and satisfactory way, and the Canadian National will be some eighteen miles distant from the Canadian Pacific railway if my memory serves me correctly.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Would the branch run in a northerly direction?

Mr. DUNNING: Straight north.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I understand now. In that case it would not be paralleling the Canadian Pacific railway. In this particular instance I want to commend the minister, and the board of management of the Canadian National Railways for aggressively pushing the railway into this territory because the Canadian Pacific are trying to get there. They have been building into that territory, which is exceedingly rich in character, and branch lines of this nature will be very valuable feeders to the main line.

Mr. MacNUTT: Did I understand the minister to state that the only railways presented to the House in this three-year program are those railways recommended by the Canadian National Railway management?

Mr. DUNNING: With the single exception of item 12, which I will deal with when we come to it.

Section 7 agreed to.

On section 8.

The CHAIRMAN: This paragraph has been amended and in its amended form will read as follows:

From a point on the Canadian Northern railway near Shell Brook to a point in township 50, ranges 14 or 15, west of the third meridian, in the province of Saskatchewan, estimated mileage 77.0; average expenditure per mile, $32,207; estimated cost $2,480,000.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the explanation of the amendment?

Mr. DUNNING: I have a communication from the president, regarding this. It is to hook up with the Turtleford line.

Mr. GARDINER: To complete the road through?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: From Haffard through?

Mr. DUNNING: No, the Haffard proposal is another one which we will come to in a moment.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 9, 10, and 11 agreed to.

On paragraph 12.

Mr. CAMPBELL: May I ask the minister in what direction this line is running?

Mr. DUNNING: I will send my hon. friend the map right now.

Mr. GUTHRIE: As I understand it, this paragraph refers to a line of railway which has not been recommended directly by the board of management. Will the minister explain this proposal?

Mr. DUNNING: This is a branch in northeastern Saskatchewan to link up the Hudson Bay railway with the southern lines of the Canadian National railway system. I should like my hon. friend from Mackenzie to lend the map I sent him to the leader of the opposition.

[Mr. Campbell.]

Mr. CAMPBELL: When this particular line gets in there it will give direct communication with the Hudson bay to the south country.

Section agreed to.

Sections 13 and 14 agreed to.

On paragraph 15.

Mr. PRICE: Reverting to section 2, I should like to ask the minister what he expects to find at the terminus of this Grand Mere railway. It is to have a mileage of 7.9 miles, the estimated expenditure is $213,038 per mile and the total estimated cost $1,683,000. I should like to know if there is a gold mine at the end of the railway. I have heard and read of considerable expenditures for railways but I never heard of anything like $213,000 per mile unless it was through a flint cut or embodied something additional in the way of bridge construction. Cannot the minister tell us something with regard to the reasons for this enormous expenditure and also what will be found when the railway gets in there?

Mr. DUNNING: I do not think my hon. friend could have been in when we dealt with this matter before. There is a gold mine involved in this proposition but not the kind of gold mine my hon. friend has in mind. The gold mine involved is by way of reduction in operating expenses. Even if this expenditure is very large it will be more than justified by the saving in haulage costs. It makes it possible, as I indicated before, for us to double our westbound load coming into Montreal, on this particular short line cut-off. It is very expensive construction and I have already promised to get absolute details of how the cost is made up. But it reduces our gradients from 1½ per cent to 6/10 of one per cent in that area, and makes it possible for us to double our trainloads.

Mr. PRICE: Another point to which I should like to draw the attention of the minister is this: Can the treasury stand a program of such enormous expenditures? I wish to point out to the minister in all seriousness that this money which is being expended is being expended largely in one portion of Canada—you have nothing there for the expansion and development of eastern Canada. Surely you can devote a few hundred thousand dollars of the money which is being expended in colonization to expenditure in eastern Canada. Hundreds of thousands of dollars are being spent in the west for hotels that are losing enormous sums yearly. The minister may shake his head but I affirm that they are. Their operation is improving a little, and I am very glad of it, but in 1924 the Fort Garry hotel in Winnipeg lost $193,000 without allowing for depreciation or interest on the money. Other items of the same kind may be cited. I wish to remind the minister that people in eastern Canada expect some development and wish to see a portion of the money which is being expended in other directions spent in their neighbourhood.

We hear a great deal about summer resorts. The Canadian National spend enormous amounts of money on Jasper lodge and in other portions of western Canada. In my constituency in the town of Shediac there is one of the finest summer resorts in Canada to-day where everything can be had in the way of sea food, oysters, lobsters, and all kinds of fish during the proper season. There is an opportunity to build a hotel there. If money must be spent on hotels, let us have some of these expenditures in eastern Canada. Let us have an opportunity to develop along with the rest of Canada. Let us feel the pulse beat of development as it is felt in other parts of the country, and let our Canadian National railways be a credit to the people of the whole of Canada and have a tendency more than they have had in the past to develop our country and to make us all feel that we are going along, working together, to make an united Dominion.

This railway proposition is a mighty one; it is a hard thing to handle; but I believe it can be used as an agency for greater development in Canada than we have had in the past and for bringing about a much better feeling among the people, the east and the west. I would earnestly urge the minister to see to it that his department of colonization endeavours to make a more thorough investigation into maritime problems and to see if some way cannot be devised to remedy conditions as they exist there to-day. The maritime provinces are anxiously waiting for action on the Duncan report, and the government of to-day is on trial as to what is going to be done to remedy the disabilities of the maritimes. I trust the Minister of Railways as well as the other ministers of the government are giving serious consideration to the situation as it exists because the people of the maritimes are much in earnest at the present time. They feel that they have borne the burden more heavily than any other portion of Canada. They feel that they have spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in the development of other portions of the country with very little or no return. I would ask the minister and the other ministers of the government to consider the situation seriously and see if something cannot be done to improve conditions in the maritime provinces.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not want to drift into a discussion on maritime rights and I will not follow my hon. friend along that line. In so far as his remarks relate to this program, may I point out that it is recommended by the management and board of directors of the Canadian National as being in the best interests of the success and prosperity of the National system of lines; that on the board of directors and management there is a considerable majority of eastern Canadians, and to create the impression, as my hon. friend's remarks undoubtedly would whether he so intended or not, that some special privilege was being extended to western Canada through this program is, I can assure him, entirely wrong. The board of directors is composed very largely of men from eastern Canada. There are only two from west of the great lakes. As everyone in this House knows, the management is certainly not western in any sense of the word.

Mr. PRICE: There is one from the maritime provinces, Mr. Lodge. I do not know of any other.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps my hon. friend and I do not understand each other. Evidently when my hon. friend was referring to eastern Canada he was not using the term in the same sense that I am using it now. When I speak of eastern Canada I mean that broad division lying east of the great lakes. My hon. friend evidently meant the maritime provinces when he spoke of eastern Canada and therefore to that extent I misunderstood him.

While the criticism may be urged that this development program so far as it relates to branch lines is largely in western Canada, I would again point out to the committee that the great privately-owned corporation, who are certainly not playing favorites, who are looking after the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific at all times, are looking after this part of Canada which we are dealing with in this resolution. That proves that it is good business.

With respect to hotels, might I point out that last year during the hectic period which we had in this House, representations were made to me by the Hon. E. M. Macdonald, and I believe also by the present member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley) with respect to a hotel in the maritime provinces, at Pictou, if my memory serves me aright? That matter was investigated by the Canadian National management; they recommended its purchase, and to-day it is a Canadian National summer hotel.

Mr. PRICE: On a very small scale.

Mr. DUNNING: I presume so. But, like Jasper Park, if it pays, you can depend upon the management extending it in proportion to the patronage it receives. The Canadian National railway management is on the job as regards improving facilities which bring in revenue to the National lines.

Mr. MacNUTT: I very much regret speaking in a sectional way in dealing with this railway branch line program now before the House, but I confess I was disappointed when this project was brought down. This was largely the reason of my question to the minister this afternoon when I asked if only branch lines suggested by the management were submitted to the House. I had reference particularly to the Guysborough railway. While the representative from that constituency is not in his seat I am sure that railway has the sympathy of the present management of the Canadian National system. I was glad that the minister this afternoon stated to the committee that the door was not closed for the next three years in relation to additional railway lines.

Mr. DUNNING: And if it was, I can assure my hon. friend that the present member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) has told me that, if necessary, he intends to break the door open.

Mr. MacNUTT: I am glad to hear that. The minister made some reference to the new bungalow hotel system as it was introduced in that province. I can assure him that unless some change is made in the management there, that hotel will not show the government a profit. I know this is not the place to take that matter up and I merely make that remark in passing.

Mr. DUNNING: I wish my hon. friend would give me the information privately with regard to that and I will bring it to the attention of the management.

Mr. MacNUTT: Thank you. Having been a resident in the county of Guysborough for some eight or ten years and being thoroughly familiar with the topography of that county, I can assure the minister that from my knowledge, notwithstanding reports that have been made to this House in days gone by by some supposed engineers, that railway is going to prove profitable, and I am glad the minister has stated that the door is yet open for bringing down a bill in connection with it.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Is it not the case that when the branch line railway proposition mentioned by the hon. member was before the House, the Right Hon. Mr. Graham being then Minister of Railways, the only opposition to it came from the other side of the House; that with all that opposition the bill was passed in this House, and that it was thrown out by the Senate?

Mr. DUNNING: I think that is correct.

Mr. GARDINER: Before the resolution is reported I would like to make a few observations on the program and also to secure some information from the minister. I have no objection to any item in the program now before the committee. The greatest objection I have to the program is that it is not large enough. It is quite true the Canadian National board may think it is sufficient for the present time, but there are other railway projects very much needed in western Canada, and which should, in my judgment, be included in this program. First, I should like to get some information from the minister with reference to what is known as the joint section from Rosedale to Bullpound Creek. This passed the House three years ago. It is a joint section to be built by the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National. I understand that there is some agreement between these two companies with regard to this joint section, and that the appropriation will run out some time in June, I think. I would ask the minister whether any provision is going to be made for the payment of the half share of the Canadian National in the construction of this joint section.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps my hon. friend would postpone his question, because I expect to bring down a bill shortly providing for an extension of time with reference to that particular project. The agrement, as he says, expires this summer, but in August, not June. When the bill comes down I shall have full details of what it is proposed to do in connection with the matter, but I have not those details here now as this is not one of the lines now being dealt with.

Mr. GARDINER: Can the minister inform the committee whether the agreement between the two railways is completed and signed.

Mr. DUNNING: I have the following note:

The respective railways proposing to undertake this joint section concluded not to proceed with the work, and therefore nothing has been done up to the end of the year 1926. An extension of time for the completion of this line is being asked for at this session of parliament, and if granted it is estimated that the majority of the half cost, amounting to $915,000, will be expended during the year 1927.

I have no information as to whether the joint running agreement has yet been signed, but certainly negotiations are going on.

Mr. GARDINER: There are one or two other branch lines to which I should like to direct the attention of the minister. When the last branch line program went through this House, provision was made for the extension of what is known as the Biggar-Loverna line. I know that many petitions have come from the district concerning this railway, and they have been forwarded not only by the people directly, but through myself personally. We were naturally expecting that the short distance required to link this up with the Canadian National railway and make a through railway project would be provided for in this year's program. I should be very glad to know if the minister has any information that he can give to the House as to the reason why this particular construction is not going to be proceeded with. During the last few years many of the people left the district traversed by this particular railway, but since the portion was completed and put in operation last year many of the old residents have come back, and the development that has taken place there in the last two years is enormous. So this particular line at least is assured of a much higher tonnage than could have been expected when the line was first extended from Loverna westward. Does the management intend to ask for power to build this line in the near future, or what recommendations has the minister from the management in regard to it?

Mr. DUNNING: The line is not included in the program before the House, and it is not the intention to introduce legislation regarding it at this session, because it has not been recommended to the government by the management of the Canadian National Railways. I am afraid in that regard I cannot add anything to what the president informed my hon. friend under date of January 12. The people of this area and, indeed, in all the others—there are very many of them; I have here a whole file of requests for branch lines in all parts of Canada which have not been included in the program now before the House—to the people of each district I would say that they have the opportunity of convincing the management of the Canadian National Railways that the line in question is a sound proposition from the point of view of the Canadian National and should be recommended by them to the government. That is all I can say to my hon. friend, who I think is familiar with the position in that regard, and desires to have it as a matter of record.

Mr. GARDINER: There is another railway in that district further south, known as the Eyre-Acadia valley line. This was built in connection with the joint section from Rosedale to Bullpound. The grade was built in the year 1921, and only something like twenty miles of steel has been laid from Eyre to Acadia valley. There were from twenty to twenty-five miles of grade built in 1921, on which no steel has been laid. The people feel that once the grade has been built, in view of the smaller cost of laying the steel upon the line, the steel should be laid at an early date, in order that the people in that district may have the transportation facilities they have been expecting for some years. A problem has loomed up, however, in the last year or two. It was contemplated in 1919, when the joint charter was given to the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National, that the Canadian Pacific would proceed in an easterly direction from Bullpound towards Empress. I understand, however, that the Canadian Pacific have virtually given up the idea of building that particular line, and consequently the other question crops up, that in order to give the people close to the Red river the service that is very requisite, it might be desirable to re-survey the whole project from Acadia valley to Bullpound. I do not know whether the minister has any notes or recommendations from the management in regard to that or not, but if he has, I would like to know what is contemplated.

Mr. DUNNING: As my hon. friend knows, this matter is under investigation by the management at the present time, and there is involved in it also negotiations with the Canadian Pacific with respect to the Rosedale-Bullpound line. I should like to say for the information not only of my hon. friend, but of the committee in general that the assumption that the grading represents the major cost in building a line of railway is not correct. The steel and ties and labour, after the grading is done, are far, far more expensive than the cost of building the grade in the first place.

Mr. GARDINER: There is another matter. I have received many petitions from the western portion of Saskatchewan, from people in the Rosenheim district. There is at present in existence a Canadian National line from Edmonton to Alliance, and the people in the western portion of the province of Saskatchewan have been asking that this particular branch line be extended in an almost easterly direction to join up with the National system at Unity. When this line was first contemplated it was supposed to be a short route from Edmonton to the United States. I would like to find out from the minister what is the ultimate destination of the Edmonton-Alliance line in order that we may acquaint the people of that district as to what they can expect from this particular railway?

Mr. DUNNING: I regret that I cannot give any further answer on behalf of the management with respect to this proposal than I was able to give with respect to the former one. I would like to express appreciation of the readiness of members of the committee on both sides to accept fully the position that in matters of this kind it is necessary, for those affected, including members themselves, to convince the management of the Canadian National that their proposal is one which should be undertaken. I particularly appreciate that because I know there are many men on this side of the House, as well as the other, who should to-day be placing something on Hansard for the benefit of their constituents, but who are refraining from so doing, knowing full well that they must deal with the management of the Canadian National Railways in the first instance.

I regret that I cannot say anything more with respect to other branch line proposals. If I had the information as to the intention of the management I would be glad to give it, but I do not have it before me in any of these particular cases, because these matters are still under consideration by the management.

Mr. GARDINER: I suppose when the bill is before the committee some of the officials will be there to give us important information to clear up some of the matters upon which we have no information?

Mr. DUNNING: I will undertake to have before the railway committee all of the officials concerned with the operation of the road whose work would even remotely touch the matters under consideration. I would, however, point out to my hon. friend that under such circumstances officials of the Canadian National have not authority to commit the management, or the board of directors, but it may be possible to secure from them information with respect to projects which are not included in the present branch line program.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): The minister will recall, I think, that last year, when the railway estimates were under consideration by the committee, I called attention to a small line branching off the Canadian National railway at Maccan, in Nova Scotia, running to the town of Joggins on the bay of Fundy. It is owned by a private company, the Maritime Coal, Railway & Power Company Limited.

Mr. DUNNING: Is that Joggins?

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): Yes. This road and its equipment are in a deplorable condition. The road serves a country very rich in coal, agriculture and timber. The citizens living in this section have made repeated demands for better service and have not met with any success in that direction. The minister last year promised some consideration with regard to the proposed absorption of this line by the Canadian National Railways. It is very difficult to bring the matter to the railway board other than through the medium of this House, as I understand it. And considering the fact that there is to be an expenditure of $20,000,000 for a program of railway construction covering three years, most of which is going to other parts of Canada, I think that this is one railway service in the east which should be given some attention by the Minister of Railways, and I would ask him if he has investigated this project, and with what result?

Mr. DUNNING: I hope this is not a preliminary to what might easily happen; that is that members from other parts of Canada where there are some privately owned railways, or some lines of railway not now owned by the Canadian National, will endeavour to get us to take over their particular lines. One of the greatest difficulties in connection with the Canadian National system at the present time is the number of lines here and there over Canada, which are not now owned by the Canadian National system, but by the provinces in some cases, and in the majority of cases by private corporations, which are desirous of selling their property to the Canadian National system.

I do not want to enter into a discussion, of the problems in the maritime provinces and eastern Quebec which are involved in considerations of that kind. I can only say that the Joggins line is a small, small part of a very great problem, and I can assure my hon. friend that the Joggins line will not be lost sight of when we are considering means of dealing effectively with the much larger problem involved. I see that my hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) is chafing at the bit just now. He wants to tell us what should he done with respect to the Gaspe railway, and I say that the railway situation at Joggins is nothing compared to what may be said with reference to Bonaventure, or what the hon. the Speaker might have to say with respect to the situation in the Gaspe peninsula. These are not the only ones. This matter represents one of the problems we have not yet solved, I frankly admit it is difficult to deal with, and I do not think it will be helped by attempting to deal with one of the many smaller propositions. We must look at it as a general problem, as relating to a very large section of the maritime provinces particularly, and also eastern Quebec.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: Has the minister considered the Lake St. John railway proposition?

Mr. DUNNING: The Lake St. John proposition has already been before the committee.

Mr. BOWMAN: Is this the complete program for the next few years, or is it open to further extension? I desire also to ask, if this is the entire program recommended by the Canadian National Railways, or have some of the recommendations been turned down by the government?

Mr. DUNNING: None of them has been turned down. With reference to the three year program, we are endeavouring to so plan the addition to capital expenditure of the Canadian National as to keep well within bounds. Naturally in so doing it is advisable to endeavour to budget for a considerable period ahead and to hold down capital extensions to the system, except where they are demonstrated as being both necessary and good from the point of view of revenue. In saying that I do not mean to imply that we intend to come down each year with a new three-year policy of extension. As far as we can now foresee, this is our program for the next three years, but in connection with such a great system it would be absurd to take the ground that we will not at the next session of parliament introduce any branch line legislation, but broadly, this is our program for the next three years.

Mr. BLATCHFORD: Is there any possibility of the Canadian National Railways reconsidering the survey of the Ashmount branch? A delegation from the district has been in the city for the past ten days asking that the branch be built through and out of St. Paul de Metis. St. Paul is one of the oldest settled districts in northern Alberta, and they consider that this branch should be built.

Mr. DUNNING: That question and others of a like nature must be dealt with before the select standing committee on railways and canals. The parties to whom my hon. friend referred will have an opportunity of presenting their views before that committee, and my hon. friend as a member of that committee will have an opportunity of examining the officials of the road with reference to the route which they propose to take in connection with the proposed branch.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

BILLS PROPOSED TO AUTHORIZE THE CONSTRUCTION OF BRANCH LINES—ST. FELICIEN-HEBERTVILLE

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 124 respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line between St. Felicien and Mistassini river and between Hebertville and Savanne Falls, both in the province of Quebec.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, and referred to the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, and referred to the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

ASHMONT-BONNYVILLE

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 137, respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line between Ashmont and Bonnyville in the province of Alberta.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, and referred to the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

BRETONA-CLOVER BAR

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 138, respecting the construction of a Canadian National railway line between Bretona and Clover Bar in the province of Alberta.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, and referred to the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT

ADDITIONAL JUDGE, SUPREME COURT—RETIREMENTS, SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURTS

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Judges Act, chapter 138 of the Revised Statutes, 1906, to provide:—

1. That a salary of $12,000 per annum be granted for one additional judge of the Supreme Court of Canada;

2. That on his attaining or having attained the age of seventy-five years, any judge of the Supreme Court of Canada or of the Exchequer Court of Canada may be granted an annuity equal to that which he would then have been eligible to receive if this legislation had not been passed and if he had at that time resigned his office.

3. That if the said Judge be not then eligible for the grant of an annuity, and was appointed before the passing of this legislation, or if he was appointed after the passing of this legislation and has continued in office for at least ten years, he may be granted an annuity equal to two-thirds of his salary at the time he ceased to hold such office.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This resolution precedes the introduction of three bills; one to amend the Supreme Court Act, another to amend the Exchequer Court Act and the third to amend the Judges Act. The first clause of the resolution provides for the granting of a salary for one additional judge of the Supreme Court of Canada. The two other clauses of the resolution, which have been prepared by the officers of the House from copies of the bills which have been supplied to them, provide for the retirement of the judges of the Supreme Court or of the Exchequer Court of Canada when they have reached the age of seventy-five years. These are the financial arrangements to supply them with a pension to which they would otherwise be entitled.

Mr. BOYS: Is that voluntary retirement?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, they would cease to hold office at the age of seventy-five years. These two changes are made for the same reasons. The Supreme Court of Canada is the highest tribunal of the land and it is of the utmost importance that it should have and retain the confidence of the people and be maintained in the highest state of efficiency. When the Supreme court was established and constituted the number of judges was the same as it is to-day—six, one chief justice and five puisne judges. Since then the country has developed tremendously and the importance of the cases to be decided is much greater. While geographical conditions should not be considered in the appointment of judges, because the best possible men should be appointed to the Supreme Court of Canada, there is one exception, namely that two judges will always be members of the bench or bar of Quebec, familiar with the civil law and procedure of that province. Apart from that there is no geographical condition mentioned in the act. I must say, however, that since the creation of the court such considerations have been taken into account in making appointments; there is one judge usually supposed to be a member of the bar or bench of one of the maritime provinces; two come from Quebec; two have usually been appointed from Ontario and one judge is usually appointed from the bench of British Columbia. The prairie provinces were not then developed as they are to-day, and up to the present there has not been a judge from either the bar or the bench of any of those provinces. It has happened quite frequently that when one or two judges are sick or unable to sit, or when some of them are disqualified through having already given an opinion on the matter submitted to the court, the chief justice has been compelled to ask a member of another court, either from Ontario or Quebec or some other province, to sit as a member of that tribunal. It has been represented to me many times that that does not make for the full efficiency of the court, and that litigants who come from all parts of Canada and who spend a considerable amount of money to secure the decision of the highest court of the land are entitled to have their cases heard and decided by judges having the standing of the Supreme Court of Canada. This is also the practice prevailing in other countries; the Supreme Court of Australia consists of seven judges, the exact number we will have in Canada if this bill becomes law.

There is another consideration which applies to the provision making retirement compulsory at seventy-five years of age. Members of the bar come to argue cases before the Supreme court from distant parts of the country, and the court must be complete and well organized in order to hear these cases when counsel come to Ottawa for that purpose. Such cases cannot be adjourned except at considerable expense and to the disadvantage of the litigants and the members of the bar as well. These considerations apply as well to the other clauses of the bill making the retirement of the judges of the Supreme court and the Exchequer court compulsory at the age of seventy-five years.

Mr. BOYS: Does that mean the Supreme Court of Canada alone, or does it include the Supreme courts in the various provinces?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will come to that in a moment. I notice that my good friend from Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon) has a resolution on the order paper asking that all judges should be retired when they reach the age of seventy-five years. I believe that under the British North America Act we have not the right to do that in the case of the judges of the high courts of Canada. The sections of the British North America Act dealing with the judicature are 96, 97, 98, 99, 100 and 101. Section 99 states that the judges of the superior courts shall hold office during good behaviour but shall be removable by the Governor General on address of the Senate and House of Commons. According to the enactment the tenure of the judges of the high courts of Canada is really a life tenure, and this parliament has no right to retire them compulsorily at any time during good behaviour.

Mr. McGIBBON: I grant that the contention is right in regard to existing judges, but what about appointments in the future?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am afraid that we could not meet the wishes of my hon. friend unless we asked for an amendment to the British North America Act. We have the right so far as the Supreme court and the Exchequer court are concerned because of the provisions of section 101, which reads as follows:

> The parliament of Canada may, notwithstanding anything in this act, from time to time, provide for the constitution, maintenance, and organization of a general court of appeal for Canada, and for the establishment of any additional courts for the better administration of the laws of Canada.

The Supreme Court of Canada and the Exchequer Court of Canada have been created and constituted in virtue of section 101 of the British North America Act, which especially states that notwithstanding anything in the act, notwithstanding section 99 or any other section, parliament had the right, when creating the Supreme court, to state that the tenure of the judges should be a life one or only until a certain age. They did not make such an enactment then, but we have the right to do it now. That is why we are introducing this legislation. The provision does not go as far as my hon. friend from Muskoka would wish it to go, but I am afraid we have no jurisdiction to extend it to other courts than the federal courts, namely the Supreme Court of Canada and the Exchequer Court of Canada.

Mr. BOYS: While the minister is upon that point may I ask if there is any special provision in the British North America Act with respect to the retirement of county court judges? There was an amendment put through, if I remember correctly, in the year 1913 or the year 1914, providing for the compulsory retirement of county court judges upon reaching the age of seventy-five years. Is there any special provision in the British North America Act which provides for legislation of that character?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Mr. BOYS: Is it suggested that such legislation was ultra vires?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, not at all, but I would point out that section 99 applies only to the judges of the superior courts.

Mr. BOYS: And the Exchequer court?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, the superior courts. We have no right to deal with judges of the superior courts to the extent of restricting their tenure of office, but there is no such provision applicable to the county court judges, who have not been considered as members of the superior or high courts.

Mr. BOYS: What I thought was that their commission appointed them for life subject to good conduct but subject to removal as a result of impeachment.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There is nothing in the British North America Act preventing us from dealing with the tenure of office of the county court judges, but section 99 prevents us from dealing with the tenure of office of superior court or high court judges. That is where the distinction comes in.

Mr. BOYS: I have great respect for the views of the minister but I do not think that was the opinion of the Minister of Justice at the time I refer to. I remember this very matter coming before the House more than ten years ago, and I discussed that feature with the then minister, pointing out that if it was necessary to retire county court judges at seventy-five it was probably quite as necessary to retire judges of the Supreme court at the same age, because they would be just as likely to suffer from ill-health, infirmity or otherwise, as county court judges did and as they were required to deal with matters of far greater concern and importance than county court judges the necessity for compulsory retirement might be even greater. I recall that his answer to me at that time was that the matter was under consideration, and he hoped to deal with it. He did not say there was no jurisdiction.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Still the records of the department show that was the obstacle in the way of carrying the idea out with regard to the judges of the high courts or the superior courts. I was reading in the library that in the country to the south they have the same conditions with regard to their federal courts. The constitution of the United States enacts that the judges of these courts shall be appointed and remain in office during good behaviour, and the government has never been able, although it has tried in many instances, to make their retirement compulsory. The United States has endeavoured to deal with the situation by giving a pension equal to their full salary to judges who, having been in office at least ten years and reaching the age of seventy, desire to be superannuated. That was an invitation to them to retire, because they would have a pension equal to their salary; but experience shows that most of them preferred to remain on the bench, even though they were given the right to a full pension when they reached the age of seventy. Fortunately we have not the same obstacle to meet as far as our federal courts are concerned, and I have come to the conclusion, having not only consulted with but received suggestions from the members of the bar and I might even say from members of the judiciary themselves, that this is a good provision to enact. That is why I am introducing these bills.

Mr. McGIBBON: I desire to put myself on record as being opposed to all life appointments. I think they are bad—bad in substance and in fact. I might make the suggestion to the Minister of Justice that if the government is so anxious to reform the Senate it might put into effect an age limit just as in the case of the judges, and that would be something that would work to the benefit of Canada.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I would feel like agreeing with my hon. friend in that regard.

Mr. McGIBBON: Coming back to the subject under consideration I would say that the principle involved in life appointments is a bad one. There is no question about it in my mind. We could take any man in this House, place him in a position where he is responsible to no one, give him wide power, as we do, leave him there for twenty or twenty-five years, and then we should find in many cases that he was unfit to carry out the responsibility we had entrusted to him. In all kinds of life—animal, vegetable and human—there is a period of growth, development and decay. We cannot get away from that fact; and distasteful as the idea is to us, there comes a point in every man's life where he no longer has the maximum of efficiency. That is true not only physically but mentally. The Great war proved, for example, that people subjected to tremendous physical and mental strain were less efficient after the age of twenty-eight than before. They cannot come back, so to speak. That is true in all walks of life. It is true in the physical sphere. I have under my hand the ages of the men on the bench and they run 87, 75, and so on, for some six or eight of them. I say without hesitation, speaking as a medical man, that the time of maximum efficiency in their life had passed long ago. I know there are some exceptional men who are apparently brilliant at an advanced age, but if they are put to the test I say emphatically that they cannot carry out a sustained effort as they could some years ago.

All you have to do is to carry the knowledge a little further, to go into other spheres of life. For example, in this country there is hardly a university to-day that does not make it compulsory for its professors to retire at from sixty-five to seventy years of age. We have the same regulations in our civil service. In our railways men are retired at sixty-four or sixty-five years of age. We have the same thing in the army and in the navy. We have it also in business life for different reasons and causes. The people retire them and put younger men in their places. When the late Sir William Van Horne, I think it was, retired from the presidency of the Canadian Pacific railway, I quite remember reading his statement that he was retiring in order to make way for a younger man, the late Lord Shaughnessy. The latter in turn retired and we have Mr. Beatty who, I believe, is only forty-eight years of age and who has been for a number of years directing that large corporation. I have in my hand a list that I copied from the Toronto Globe giving the ages of men at the heads of the large institutions of this country. Sir Henry Thornton is only fifty-eight. I think the Prime Minister of this country is only fifty-two or fifty-three, and the oldest minister in the cabinet is fifty-eight.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No—sixty-eight.

Mr. McGIBBON: At any rate, the principle is that this is a young man's country; this is a young man's age, and when we stick to antiquated methods of leaving people in responsible positions, where they have great power such as they have on the bench, until they are eighty or ninety years of age, we are not doing justice to the country. Other countries are getting rid of this sort of thing. In Great Britain they are retiring county judges at the age of sixty-five. In the United States I believe judges are elected only for short terms. I would like to draw the attention of the Minister of Justice to this clipping—I do not know whether or not it is correct—from the Baltimore Sun of January 31. Speaking about the age limit for judges in the United States it says:

> Former Justice Charles E. Hughes, discussing the proposed seventy-year age limit for members of the Supreme Court of the United States—

So they must have a bill there to retire them.

> —agrees that a limit is proper, but he would raise it to seventy-five years for this court. Of course, any limit must be an arbitrary one, retiring at times judges competent to carry on their work; but there have been instances in this tribunal of the grave danger of permitting it to go on without any limit at all on the age of its members. Occasions have arisen not infrequently when justices who, everybody knew, were not in mental or physical condition properly to perform their duties were sitting in this court and, presumably, helping to frame opinions on questions of the greatest and most far-reaching importance.

This is something that is interesting the people not only of this country but of Great Britain and the United States. I would like to ask the Minister of Justice this question: Is there anything more absurd than to leave it to a man who is advanced in years to sit in judgment on himself as to whether or not he is fit to carry on? It seems to me that such a proposition is ridiculous. In the case of our judges we apply no age limit. We say to them that they may retire, but we allow them to decide whether they are fit or unfit to carry on. I recognize the difficulties which the Minister of Justice pointed out. I read the British North America Act and I thought section 99 would probably make this resolution unworkable. The proposition I want to make to the minister is this—

Mr. POULIOT: I rise to a point of order. In the orders of the day there is this notice of motion standing in the name of the hon. member:

> That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable in the interests of the Dominion of Canada that all judges be retired on reaching seventy-five years of age.

I think the hon. member is discussing his motion rather than that of the Minister of Justice. Is that right?

Mr. McGIBBON: I think my remarks have been quite in accord with the principle of the resolution. The Minister of Justice admitted that. The only difference between the Minister of Justice and myself is this: I quite agree as regards everything he is doing only he is not going far enough to suit me. I also realize the difficulties in his way. As a layman I read the British North America Act and I thought I was up against section 99. But what I ask him to do in the interest of Canada is this: He told us last night that an inter-provincial conference was going to be held. A subject like this is not very controversial; certainly it does not override any provincial rights. Cannot this be taken up on that occasion so that we may get the consent of the provinces in order that next year the minister can bring in a bill to make this legislation workable?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I would certainly be pleased to submit the suggestion of my hon. friend to such a conference.

Mr. MILLAR: At a later date, when we come to the estimates, I hope to have something to say on pensions for judges and others. In view of that I would like to ask the minister for his justification of what I admit has always been the practice, namely, of giving large pensions to those who have been receiving large salaries, not to all, but picking out certain classes to which judges belong. What is the justification for giving two-thirds of the salary as an annuity?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is the law at the present time, not only in Canada but in other countries. Prior to three years ago, apart from the section which gives a pension of two-thirds of their salary to judges who had been fifteen years in office or who were afflicted with some disability, we had another provision which gave them the right to their full salary as a pension after a certain number of years of service and after they reached a certain age. This provision we repealed three years ago and no such pension is now being paid to the judges of Canada, although such a provision, as I stated in my main remarks, still applies in the United States. I think we are far from being more generous to our judges than other countries are. I might show to my hon. friend the resolutions I have received from bar associations and various other bodies in Canada complaining bitterly that the judges are not receiving a sufficient salary or a sufficient pension, and that the best men at the bar decline a judgeship on that account; but I do not think that we will ask for an increase this session. However, I really believe that the present scale of pension, especially when you compare it with what is paid in other countries, is justified.

Mr. MILLAR: I am afraid the minister has not answered my question. The minister would not justify it because it has been done here, or because it has been done in other countries. The salary the judges receive is probably less than an efficient lawyer can make, but at the same time the salary is still sufficient to enable the judge himself to provide for his old age. There must be other ground that the minister must take if he wishes to justify this. Would he not go a little deeper and attempt to justify it?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I must admit I would have to change the law and reduce the pensions, and my friend has not convinced me that I should do that.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I expected to see the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George rise to protest in righteous indignation against this resolution, just as he and the member for Toronto did the other night on the old age pension bill. Then he spoke of the wrongfulness of paternalism; of the desirability that people in Canada should be taught the very good lesson of thrift, to save out of their very meagre earnings sufficient to provide for their own old age; that they should not come upon this country as paupers and ask parliament to provide for them after they had passed the age limit for work. But I did not notice the hon. gentleman rise and apply the same principle in this case that he applied in the case of the old age pensions.

Mr. GEARY: May I ask which member for Toronto the hon. gentleman refers to?

Mr. ADSHEAD: He sits here. I do not know his constituency, but it is Mr. Hocken.

Mr. GEARY: He does not sit there.

Mr. ADSHEAD: That is the gentleman, at any rate—Mr. Hocken. Both those hon. gentlemen rose and emphasized that citizens of Canada who were getting the enormous sum of fifty or sixty or seventy cents an hour should be taught the lesson of thrift, should save something out of their meagre earnings in order to provide for their own old age, and not become indigents and paupers upon the country. Here we have gentlemen getting $12,000 a year, and nobody rises to say that they should be thrifty and provide for their own old age. Nobody says that they should not be granted a pension. In the other case there was considerable difficulty in getting a provision for a pension of even ten dollars a month, and then after the old age pensioner died the authorities took power to take over his house to recoup themselves. I do not see anything in this resolution empowering the government to take over the judge's house in order to recoup the country for the pension he receives in his lifetime. I am not exactly objecting to this resolution, but I do point out that the citizens of Canada who wield the hammer and the spade should receive a pension, and a comfortable pension just as much as these others, for their work is just as honourable and just as needful to the country as that of the judges who sit upon the Supreme court bench.

Mr. BOYS: Will the proposed bill in any way affect the quorum of the Supreme court or the quorum by consent?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, it is not intended to affect that section of the act.

Mr. BOYS: I do not want to offer any observation which is going to interfere in any way with the efficient administration of justice in Canada. I realize the importance of the Supreme court, but I do not feel that the minister has made out a case for increasing the number of the members of the court. He has said very little to warrant an increase which is going to impose upon the country an additional burden of $12,000 a year. In my own province, and I presume it is the same in others, we have appellate courts. There are no extra judges for these courts, unless they are taken from the judges assigned to the trial courts, and if that is done, it has to be at the expense of efficiency in the trial court. At the present time, with a quorum in the Supreme court of five—and I certainly think the judges should sit in an odd number, instead of an even, because it is desirable to have a majority decision—if the quorum is not being altered, I do not think the addition of one judge should be required. I do not know who it is that has asked for this legislation, whether it is the judges of the Supreme court themselves, because of the amount of work they have to do, but it would seem to me to be in order for the committee to be enlightened as to the number of cases that come before the court, to indicate whether the judges of that court have more work than can be conveniently attended to and have not sufficient time to properly study, consider and dispose of the cases that come before them. It should be demonstrated that they cannot under present conditions do their work satisfactorily. I happen to know that in my own province there is a tremendous congestion of business at times, and I believe there is even greater necessity there for an increase in number. I am inclined to the view that there is greater necessity for an increase in the number of judges who now have to take care of the work of the Supreme court of Ontario, and probably the other provinces, than there is in the number of judges of the Supreme Court of Canada. With a court composed of six, with a quorum of five, and a consent quorum of four—and the work has always been done well in the past—you will always have one extra judge, and perhaps two extra judges, to do the work of the court. I think the minister should show the committee some very substantial reason for putting the country to the expense of another $12,000 a year for all time to come, and that we should be given some information as to the number of cases the judges have to deal with, and other facts to indicate that they are not able to discharge their duties efficiently without being overworked, before we are called upon to vote this money.

Mr. CAHAN: At this hour, Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to discuss the resolution. There were several matters I should like to have discussed, but as there will be another opportunity on the second reading of the bill, I presume—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes. Perhaps my hon. friend would reserve his remarks for the second reading of the bill.

Mr. CAHAN: I think so, because I shall not be here this evening and would be unable to continue after six o'clock.

[Mr. Boys.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: I can give to my hon. friend from Simcoe the information he asks for when the bill is in committee.

Mr. HEAPS: Would the minister consider putting clauses in this old age pension scheme similar to those in the old age pension bill that we dealt with last week?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I shall have to look into that matter also.

Mr. GEARY: Would the minister also give the committee information as to how often the court is reduced in numbers owing to illness, if that is the important thing. I happen to know that it has been of a good deal of moment in the conduct of the court, and perhaps it is on account of illness more than anything else that it is desired to increase the number.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, my hon. friend is quite right, as I stated in my preliminary remarks; but of course judges may be ill also in the future. It has happened in recent years that the court could not sit with its numbers complete. I may say to my hon. friend from Simcoe that the number of judges who have been requested to come in and assist has been considerable. My hon. friend says I have not made out a strong case. I think this is a strong argument—and I repeat—that litigants are entitled to have their cases before the Supreme court heard and decided by judges having the standing of Supreme court judges.

Mr. BOYS: I submit that is no answer. I am not speaking of the standing of the judges.

Mr. GEARY: The sickness to which I have referred may be counterbalanced by superannuation under this scheme.

Mr. BOYS: Dealing with the question of the restriction in the act, could it not be provided that future commissions should be issued on the basis of retirement at seventy-five years of age? I understand the minister says that under the provisions of the British North America Act there is no power now to compulsorily enforce retirement.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend refers to judges of the Superior court?

Mr. BOYS: Yes. In the commission appointing them a clause could be inserted providing that they should be retired at the age of seventy-five.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am afraid it would be interfering with the British North America Act if we inserted such a clause.

Mr. BOYS: Not if they accept appoint ment with such a provision.

Mr. LAPOINTE: However, we can continue the whole matter when the bill comes back.

Resolutions reported, read the second time, and concurred in. Mr. Lapointe thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill 139, to amend the Judges Act, Bill No. 140, to amend the Exchequer Court Act, and Bill No. 141, to amend the Supreme Court Act.

Motion agreed to and bills read the first time.

Mr. BOYS: Second reading at the next sitting of the House?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

EXCISE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Customs) moved the second reading of Bill No. 119, to amend the Excise Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Marcil in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Forfeited goods include vessel, vehicle, etc.

Mr. STEVENS: The underlined words are the only changes?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Penalty.

Mr. STEVENS: This is merely to increase the penalty from $100 to $200?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Section agreed to.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Vessels included in things seized as forfeited.

Mr. STEVENS: This is to meet the rum running epidemic.

Mr. EULER: It merely adds the word "vessels" to bring the section in line with other sections of the act.

Section agreed to.

Sections 7 to 13 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

WEST INDIES TRADE AGREEMENT

ORGANIZATION OF COMPANY TO PROVIDE STEAMSHIP SERVICE

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

1. That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide or arrange through a company to be formed under the Companies Act, for a mail, passenger and freight service, in accordance with the West Indies Trade agreement, 1926.

2. That the securities to be issued by the company may be guaranteed by the Dominion as to principal and interest to an amount not exceeding, without the authority of parliament an aggregate of $10,000,000.

3. That the proceeds of sale or disposition of the securities shall be deposited to the credit of the Minister of Finance; and the entire stock ownership of the company shall be issued to His Majesty in the right of the Dominion in consideration of the guarantee.

4. That any of the boats now operated by the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited, may be transferred to the company on a reasonable valuation and on terms to be approved by the governor in council, and if transferred to be operated by individual companies, such companies shall issue to the company all their capital stock to indemnify the crown against liability in respect of the guarantee.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Marcil in the chair.

Mr. STEVENS: This is a very important resolution, and one to which I personally must take strong objection. I will briefly outline my reasons for so doing, although when the minister brings down the bill it may contain safeguarding features which will in some measure meet my objections. With regard to the first paragraph, which states that it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for mail and passenger service and so on to the West Indies, to that I can have no objection; we certainly should implement our undertakings and arrange to take care of that traffic. But to the suggestion that it be done through a company to be formed under the Companies Act, and to the next paragraph which provides for a guarantee to such company in principal and interest to an extent of $10,000,000, I object. Naturally I am not in possession of all the facts, but I recall an announcement appearing in the press a few days ago to the effect that a couple of gentlemen, Mr. Raymond and Mr. McDougall, had organized a company to take over Vickers Limited in the city of Montreal for the purpose of building these vessels. Vickers Limited is an old, well-established firm; I presume that in recent years they must have had some difficulty in making a return on capital invested, since shipbuilding has certainly not been a very prosperous business in Canada, but these well known gentlemen could not be properly classified, I think, as eminent shipbuilders. However, they have formed a company for the purpose of building these ships and now we find the government coming forward with a proposal in which they guarantee the principal and interest to the extent of $10,000,000. I rather think I overhear the minister say it has nothing to do with this bill, but there is a rather touching synchronization, to put it mildly.

Whether or not that group is behind this venture, the fact remains that it is proposed to guarantee $10,000,000 of principal and interest of a company which shall do certain things. Then if you follow the resolution a step further you will find that it is also giving power to turn over some of the ships of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, on a valuation and terms to be approved by the Governor in Council; that is section 4. It is also stated that the capital stock is to be turned over to the crown as an indemnity against liability in respect of the guarantee. We have the Canadian Government Merchant Marine owning the ships and the government owning the company; now we propose to pass legislation which will turn those ships now owned by the government over to another company whose stock shall be guaranteed by the government. Thus, unless the resolution be explained in some manner certainly contrary to its present wording, an amazing situation is disclosed. How we can justify to the people of Canada the creation of a new company or companies and the guaranteeing of new stock and new capital for the purpose of taking over property which we already own is beyond me. I know there are those who criticize the present Canadian Government Merchant Marine and say that it was not a good venture and so forth, but the fact of the matter is that we have suffered all the loss a country can possibly suffer through a venture of this kind. That is history now; that is behind us. An opportunity presents itself to make the Canadian Government Merchant Marine pay by simply utilizing the machinery we now have; we can construct new ships if necessary or we can use the present ships to give this service without creating any new company and without guaranteeing capital for any private group. So without having the details of the bill before me I say I am absolutely opposed to this proposal and particularly to section 2 of the resolution. I hope the committee will become thoroughly seized of the significance of that section, which reads:

[Mr. Stevens.]

That the securities to be issued by the company may be guaranteed by the Dominion as to principal and interest to an amount not exceeding, without the authority of parliament, an aggregate of $10,000,000.

The plain and simple reading of that section is that the government is asking for the right to guarantee for principal and interest the capital of a new company to the extent of $10,000,000, and it is intimated in the words "without the authority of parliament" that they expect the company to come back later and ask for a further guarantee. That is, if the $10,000,000 is not sufficient the company may ask for a further amount to be guaranteed. In other words, certain gentlemen unnamed in the resolution, without the investment of one dollar, are to get $10,000,000 of Dominion government money, because a bond guaranteed by the government is just the same as money; any security guaranteed by this government is equal to the government's own security. We are dipping into the treasury of Canada and giving this company, whose personnel is unnamed in the resolution, $10,000,000 of the money of Canada to organize a new company to render a service which we already have an organization capable of performing. It is a most astounding proposal, and speaking for myself it is my intention as we proceed to scrutinize every step as closely as possible. At this time, however, I wish to register my opposition to the proposal as disclosed in the resolution.

Mr. ADSHEAD: May I ask a question?

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps my friend would permit me to make an explanation to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), which would clear matters up. I am pleased that my hon. friend said that if the resolution meant what he thought it meant he would oppose it; I can assure him that when he examines the bill based on the resolution, a great deal of what he describes as astounding will vanish. As to guaranteeing the bonds of gentlemen unnamed and thereby making them a present of $10,000,000 of the credit of this country, there is absolutely no such intention. The guarantee will be given and the shares will be held by the Minister of Finance in the same manner as the shares of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine and the shares of the Canadian National Railway Company are held. The $10,000,000 guarantee given to this institution will be in fact given to the Canadian National Railway System. The manner of dealing with it is rendered necessary by the nature of the business itself. My hon. friend is, I am sure, not aware of the fact that each one of the ships now operated by the Canadian Government Merchant Marine is operated by a separate company. A system such as this, I am given to understand, has proved to be the most satisfatcory way of operating steamships, so that criticism of the proposal from the point of view of extending the guarantee of the government of Canada to private interests entirely falls to the ground. There is no private interest involved in this proposal in any way, shape or form. A new corporation is being established—indeed it may be a number of new corporations, one for each ship—in order to deal specifically with the West Indies service, which is a new service demanding special types of ships and one which we desire to keep absolutely separate in operation and accounting from the ordinary Canadian Government Merchant Marine. It is desirable in view of the West Indies trade agreement that the shipping feature of it should be a thing apart from the general operation of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, especially as one of the stipulations of the treaty itself is that the colonies concerned, the various West Indian colonies, should themselves contribute a subsidy for the maintenance of this particular steamship line. Hence it is desirable to incorporate it separately from the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. I think that deals with the main objection advanced by my hon. friend.

As is well known, the government of Canada has for many years been paying a subsidy for the operation of a steamship service to the West Indies. The Minister of Trade and Commerce will be here—he has just come in now—and he will deal with the trade treaty and the subsidy features of this matter. Suffice it for me to say that the government has on two occasions, if not three, advertised for subsidy tenders from existing steamship lines for operation of the service called for by the West Indies trade agreement. The results of our call for tenders will be dealt with in detail by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I feel sure that when those facts are before it the House will agree that the best way of dealing with this West Indies situation is through the medium of our own Canadian National organization, and the financing of a government owned steamship service to the West Indies under the provisions of the trade agreement.

What is proposed is to form a separate company for operating purposes, for the reasons I have just outlined. In order to live up to the agreement it is necessary for us to put into operation to the eastern group of islands a fortnightly service, passenger, mail and freight, from Canadian ocean ports all the year round, calling each way at Bermuda, St. Kitts, Nevis, Antigua, Montserrat, Dominica St. Lucia, Barbados, St. Vincent, Grenada, Tobago, Trinidad and Demerara; and also a fortnightly freight service from Canadian river ports in summer and Canadian ocean ports in winter, calling at St. Kitts, Antigua, Barbados, Trinidad and Demerara. That is for the eastern group.

For the western group our treaty obligations call for a fortnightly passenger, mail and freight service between St. Lawrence ports in summer and such Canadian ocean ports in winter as may be designated by the Canadian government, calling both ways at Bermuda, the Bahamas, and Kingston, Jamaica; and also a fortnightly freight service between the said Canadian ports and Kingston, Jamaica, direct, alternating with the previous service; also a fortnightly passenger and freight service between Kingston, Jamaica, and British Honduras, to be operated by a small steamer connecting at Kingston with the passenger vessels. It is proposed to give these services to the eastern groups by operating three passenger, mail and freight motor ships of 5,800 tons deadweight, 14 knots speed, with accommodation for 100 first class passengers, 30 second class passengers, 100 steerage or deck passengers, and cold storage facilities. Freight services for the eastern group will be operated by four freight vessels of 4,300 tons deadweight, speed about 10 knots, and at present the property of the crown.

I may here dispose of another point that was troubling my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre. Any vessels which are disposed of by the merchant marine to this new company for the operation of the West Indies service may be paid for out of the proceeds of guaranteed bonds, and the amount so paid may be paid to the Minister of Finance and will constitute a reduction to that extent of the present liability of the merchant marine. Or the notes held by the Minister of Finance may be simply transferred to apply to the new company.

Mr. McGIBBON: Is it the intention to have new boats built, either directly or indirectly?

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will possess his soul in patience I will cover that point in a moment.

Mr. McGIBBON: Is it the intention to transfer these vessels at the ridiculous prices at which previous vessels have been disposed of?

Mr. DUNNING: I will deal with that point also in a few moments. For the western group it is proposed to provide two passenger, mail and freight motor ships, of 5,800 tons deadweight, of 14 knots speed, with accommodation for 100 first class passengers, refrigeration for 70,000 stems of bananas, and cold storage for Canadian and West Indian products. For service in the western group freight service the Canadian Fisher and the Canadian Forester will be converted into oil burners and be fitted with refrigeration for 50,000 stems of bananas. The speed of these two vessels is about 10 knots.

For the third service of the western group, connecting as I said a little while ago with the passenger service at Kingston which I mentioned previously, a steamer of about 1,000 tons deadweight will be required, with a speed of 10 knots, accommodation for about 20 first class passengers, and also cold storage facilities.

Now as to how these vessel requirements are to be met: A careful examination has been made of the estimated cost of building. The services to which I have just referred will require the provision of five new vessels. Five of the vessels to which I have referred will require to be new vessels, and vessels of a special type for this particular class of service. We find of course that these vessels can be built most cheaply upon the continent of Europe. Next in order of cheapness would come building in Great Britain; and building in Canada itself would be more expensive than building either in Great Britain or on the continent. I will not weary the House with figures respecting the continental costs, bu the costs of the five new vessels if built in Great Britain, including calculations for financing the bond issues, which are the same in each case, would be $8,186,500, and in Canada for the five vessels, $9,280,000.

Mr. STEVENS: Where does the minister get his figures for Canada?

Mr. DUNNING: The merchant marine gets approximations of what the cost would be from naval architects and those engaged in the shipbuilding business in Canada.

Mr. STEVENS: Have the different yards such as Wallace, the yard in Victoria, the Vickers yard and others been asked to give figures in connection wtih this?

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. MALCOLM: The compilation of costs is based entirely upon wage conditions and material costs on the continent as against the cost in Great Britain and material and labour costs in Canada as against the cost in Great Britain, the average increase being shown over the average British figure. It is an estimate.

Mr. STEVENS: I appreciate the answer, but it is not an answer to the question I asked. Have the various shipbuilding concerns of Canada been requested to give figures in connection with this matter?

Mr. DUNNING: We have not yet, of course, reached the stage of calling for tenders or anything of that kind. I am now endeavouring to give the committee the best information we have, based on the relative costs as between building all the vessels in Great Britain on the one hand and building them all in Canada on the other. I will in a moment come to what we base our calculations upon.

Mr. HANSON: The figures are estimates in each case?

Mr. DUNNING: Of course the figures are estimates. Under prevailing conditions it would be impossible to get a firm bid on building a ship. We have to secure authority from parliament to proceed and many other factors are also involved.

Mr. ERNST: I understood the minister to say that tenders would be called for at a later date. Have estimates been supplied by any of the Canadian shipbuilding yards, say for example the Halifax shipyard?

Mr. DUNNING: I do not think there has been any definite bid by any shipyard, but the Canadian Government Merchant Marine have, I believe, discussed the matter with all of those who might reasonably be expected to be affected in the preparation of the estimated figures for this work. I really wanted to be in a position to give the committee as close an idea as could be given, without actually calling for tenders, of what the relative costs would be of building these ships in Great Britain and building them in Canada, or partly one and partly the other. It will facilitate matters a great deal if hon. members will permit me to finish my general outline and then ask questions, because they are really anticipating things which I shall have to say during the course of my remarks.

Other factors which enter into this matter are those of time and also the type of vessel required which is a special type for this particular class of trade. Account being taken of the cost factor, the special type of vessel factor, particularly the special type of refrigeration and also the time factor, our present calculation is based on having two of these vessels built in Great Britain and three of them in Canada. We doubt if we can get sufficiently quick delivery of the whole five vessels from Canadian shipyards, and in any event it will take considerable time to have these vessels constructed either in Canada or in Great Britain. Regard being had to all these factors, the advice of the officers of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine to the government is that two of these boats should be built in Great Britain and three in Canada.

Mr. STEVENS: With all due deference to the minister's request of a moment ago, I think this is the time to ask this question: Will the government call for tenders from Canadian shipyards for the construction of these ships? If so, while one shipyard might not be able to make delivery of the whole five, it certainly is not reasonable to say that all the yards in Canada would be unable to make delivery of the five ships. So I ask the minister: Is it the intention to call for tenders from all the shipyards giving them an equal opportunity?

Mr. DUNNING: For all the ships?

Mr. STEVENS: And if in case of a diversity of building which there probably will be and which, we hope, there will be, will the other shipyards be given the refusal before the orders are sent out of Canada?

Mr. DUNNING: I do not intend at this stage to tie the hands of either the government or of the directors of the Canadian National quite as tightly as an affirmative answer to my hon. friend's question would do.

Mr. STEVENS: Perhaps the minister will give me an answer to this question.

Mr. DUNNING: I wish the hon. member would let me answer his previous one first.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister has answered that one. He has said no. Has any tentative arrangement or understanding been arrived at with any one yard as regards the construction of three ships?

Mr. DUNNING: Positively no, and there I want to refute as strongly as I can the impression given by my hon. friend in a previous question that there is some sinister arrangement between the government and certain interests that they will get the contract for building certain ships.

Mr. STEVENS: I said that it synchronized.

Mr. DUNNING: I have no knowledge whatever of any connection between any reorganization of the Canadian Vickers and the proposal now before the committee. My hon. friend to-night brought it to my attention for the first time. I should think it would be a matter of pride to Canadians that Canadians are themselves in a position to-day to get financial control of one of our great shipbuilding institutions rather than to have it abroad, even in Great Britain; but as regards this involving any arrangement, implied or of any other kind whatsoever, for building these ships, there is absolutely nothing in it. As regards myself or the government, there has not been in connection with this matter any arrangement with any special group or any shipyard anywhere as to getting contracts to build these ships. May I express the hope that if the Canadian Vickers or any other Canadian company are capable of building these ships economically and well and can demonstrate to the management of the Canadian merchant marine that they are capable of doing so, they will get the business?

Mr. ERNST: All five?

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot say all five. I cannot commit the government at this time.

Mr. ERNST: Why not?

Mr. DUNNING: I have already stated that in the judgment of those who are managing this business the best way, from the point of view of Canada, from the point of view of the shipping company to be formed, which is the Canadian people, having regard to the necessities involved in the special types of ships required, is to have two of them built in Great Britain.

Mr. ERNST: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. DUNNING: Well I am long-suffering.

Mr. ERNST: I do not wish to impose upon the minister, but I want to ask him if one were placed in each of five different yards, if they could not be built just as quickly in Canada as they could in Great Britain?

Mr. MALCOLM: Can my hon. friend tell me where in Canada he can find five shipbuilding yards that can handle ships of this type?

Mr. ERNST: I know three, and I know several that are capable of putting two ships on the stocks at once.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps to me, not being a maritime man, a ship is a ship, and I presume my hon. friend is trying to tell me that any shipyard can build any ship.

Mr. ERNST: No, I did not wish to say that.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister is not fair in that at all. We have very excellent shipyards in Canada. I can name some on the Pacific coast. There are two in Victoria. In Vancouver the Wallace shipyards are capable of turning out any class of ship you want. A year ago they built one of the most modern and up-to-date ships for the Canadian Pacific for their northern coastwise trade, a passenger ship, almost as large as one of these, and very similar to it.

Mr. DUNNING: I am not questioning that. What about the other yard on the Pacific coast?

Mr. STEVENS: There is one in Victoria, under Charles V. Spratt, which built ships during the war. Then there is the Yarrow yard in Victoria, a branch of the Yarrow shipyards in Great Britain, furnished with the very best equipment, and where the very best of workmanship is given. These yards are capable of building these ships.

Mr. DUNNING: Any of them?

Mr. STEVENS: Any of them, or any ship twice the size, if you want it; there is no question about that. What alarmed me was this: The minister said a moment ago: We have arranged to build three of these ships in Canada and two in Great Britain.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. STEVENS: Unquestionably the minister said that.

Mr. DUNNING: If I said that, it was certainly not my intention to convey the impression that anything had been arranged, but that on the basis of the examination made, this was the present view of those responsible for the management of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. If I conveyed the impression that anything was definitely arranged I made an error, because I immediately stated in answer to my hon. friend that nothing definite had been arranged.

Mr. STEVENS: I did not say definite; I said that impression was given.

Mr. ERNST: Might I interrupt?

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): I would say—

The CHAIRMAN: The rules of the House should be followed in committee as much as possible, and when a minister of the crown desires first to make a statement which will be subject to cross-examination afterwards, I think it is only fair to allow him to make his statement.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): I did not purpose cross-examining him. I merely wanted to make an explanation in regard to the shipyards in Canada. When the ships were being built in Canada which now form the merchant marine, the Halifax shipyards, I believe, turned out the best ships composing that fleet. Persons with knowledge of other shipyards can speak for them, but I can assure the minister that two ships can be built by the shipbuilding company operating in Halifax as quickly as one, and I think more cheaply than a single ship. That would dispose of two of the five.

Mr. DUNNING: Now, Mr. Chairman, I will try to get on. Apparently it is a mistake to be frank with the House in respect to such information as has been secured in connection with a matter of this kind, because it immediately raises all sorts of questions of local patronage, and so forth.

Mr. STEVENS: No, that is not correct.

Mr. DUNNING: Frankly I did not look at the matter from that point of view at all. I was attempting to get information upon which the best judgment of the merchant marine officials and of the government itself, which must pass on all contracts over $500,000 in value, could be exercised, having regard to the known cheaper construction in Great Britain and also to the desirability from a business point of view of getting these boats built as cheaply as possible consistent with other national interests. Consideration should also be given to the desirability—and this concerns all of us—of doing as much business in Canada as it is humanly possible to do.

I might point this out, however, in connection with all government undertakings of this nature, that we are entering into competition with institutions owning ships and which buy in the cheapest market! If we ignore altogether the necessity of keeping the capital cost as low as possible we shall have as a consequence higher fixed charges than a private company would have operating under similar conditions. I do not want to attach overwhelming importance to that side of the question, but I do say in all seriousness that it must be taken into account when we come finally to the point of deciding where these ships shall be built and have before us information as to what can and what can not be economically done in Canada.

I was merely giving to the committee—much to my own trouble, apparently—the best information that we have been able to gather up to now in regard to the whole program of construction. Of course I had to have something upon which to base figures to present to the committee in connection with the resolution we are now discussing. I wanted to know whether it would require to be eight, nine, ten or fifteen million dollars, and in order to get that information I requested the officers of the merchant marine to go into the matter very carefully and to give me their conclusions. I eliminate from consideration altogether continental-built ships, although a very considerable saving could be made in that direction because the continental cost is below the British building cost.

I have had so many interruptions that I hardly know how far I had proceeded with my explanation, Mr. Chairman. In concluding for the present, I can only say this, that so far as the building of the ships is concerned, we on this side of the House and the government are as much concerned as anyone else can possibly be in securing for Canadians all the work and all the business possible having due regard to all other proper national considerations. I repeat, there is no arrangement of any sort or kind at the present time existing, or in contemplation to give any or all of the shipbuilding work to any one or all of the concerns in Canada. I had no idea at all, save from the story I read in the newspaper to which my hon. friend refers, that there was any change in contemplation in the control of Canadian Vickers, but I presume, even although a few Liberals may be interested in Canadian Vickers, that this should not be a reason why that company should be debarred opportunity of getting some of this business on equal terms with any other company. So far as we are concerned at least, the Canadian Vickers or any other institution will be given every opportunity to demonstrate that they can do this work for the people of Canada economically and well.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend has drawn in the question of buying in the cheapest market, and the question, as he says, of local patronage. We did not raise the question of local patronage in regard to this matter at all.

The minister also said very distinctly that we had arranged or proposed or used some form of speech conveying the impression that the government were going to build three ships in Canada and two in Great Britain. Then we raised the question why they could not all be built in Canada. The minister said that he was not very familiar with maritime matters, and he questioned whether there were yards in Canada that could build these ships in time.

Mr. DUNNING: The particular type of ship required.

Mr. STEVENS: We then undertook to draw to his attention the fact that there are shipyards in Canada quite capable of building these ships. The question of price I am not discussing at the moment. But to say that we could not build these five ships in Canada is, I was going to say, sheer nonsense, because there are yards in Halifax, there is a yard in Montreal, and there are yards on the Pacific coast capable of building these ships—one, two, three, four or five of them. I do not think at the moment that there is a yard able to build five and turn them out all together. My hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Black) refers to a firm in that city which can lay down two at a time. We have the Coughlan firm in Vancouver which can lay down four at a time. We have yards which can do this work. It is not going to help the minister to insinuate that we are asking for local patronage. We are not asking for local patronage at all. I think all the yards in Canada should have the privilege of figuring on the cost of these ships.

Mr. DUNNING: I will see that they do, but they will have to demonstrate that they are capable of producing the type of ship required. I cannot take my hon. friend's word for that as a shipbuilder, any more than I would ask him to take mine.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not going to ask my hon. friend to take my word, but I am not going to be satisfied with this proviso that they must be able to build the ships to suit, or something of that character. I do not think that should be held over the shipyards of Canada. Many hon. members in this House know that these yards are capable of turning out any class of ship of this character. These ships are not very difficult to build.

Mr. DUNNING: Does my hon. friend know exactly what special type of ship is required?

Mr. STEVENS: If my hon. friend asks me to give him the specifications for the construction of the ships, I say no, I cannot do it. But I know enough about ships to know that this type of ship generally is a semi-coastwise traffic ship to carry a hundred or a hundred and fifty passengers and a cargo—part cargo and part passengers.

Mr. DUNNING: It is far more than that.

Mr. STEVENS: If my hon. friend should ask me whether these yards can turn out ships like the Majestic or the Leviathan, I say no, but they are capable of turning out this class of ship.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend does not correctly describe the type of ship.

Mr. STEVENS: How can I, if I have not the specifications? I know the general type. My hon. friend says that three are to be motor ships, and then some of them are to be changed into oil burners. What I want to know—and I think the committee is entitled to this information—is whether the Canadian shipyards will be given an opportunity to figure on the five ships before a contract is entered into for their construction outside of Canada. I submit that the bids should be open bids on the open market, called for without any strings attached. As regards buying in the cheapest market, that is another matter. The minister disposed of that by telling us that the decision was to build three in Canada and two overseas, so that he is not going to buy in the cheapest market. I will not enter into that question at present. Some of my hon. friends to my left applauded the suggestion as to buying in the cheapest market, but there is something more than that. Here we have the shipyards, the labour and the material in Canada, all idle. If the ships are built in Canada it is going to contribute something to the welfare of the country, and we would like to have the assurance that every shipyard in Canada will have the opportunity to make a bid for the construction of these ships.

Mr. MALCOLM: I think I can offer a word which might allay the fears of my hon. friends opposite. I was not in the chamber and did not hear the explanation offered to the House by the hon. Minister of Railways, but I may say that these boats are of a special type. Anyone who has followed the Canada-West Indies conferences knows that the question of refrigeration is an important feature in connection with the steamship service. It is necessary that ships for this service be equipped with a special refrigerator capacity, quite out of keeping with the ordinary ships of their size and type. In making the estimate which has just been given by the Minister of Railways, the officers of the merchant marine, after surveying the field and after consultation with Canadian engineers on naval construction and with British engineers, were surprised to discover that it appeared quite possible to build three ships in Canada and have them completed within the fifteen months stipulated in the treaty. They did feel however that two of the boats, on account of the expenditure which would be necessary for installing refrigeration, could be built cheaper in Great Britain. I may say that the government waived the point in regard to the cheapest construction, which was German construction, and said that the ships must be built in Great Britain or Canada. When the time comes for the tenders to go out, I think my hon. friends, who seem so zealous for some shipyards for which they are anxious to get business, will find that some of those shipyards will not be able to compete on some of the types of boats, and they themselves would not be willing to award the contract to such companies. When the specifications are submitted to all Canadian and British builders it may be found possible to build four boats in Canada and one in Great Britain. It might be possible—but I am inclined to think not, from what I am informed—for us to build the whole five in Canada, but I think the minister's figures are based on the best estimates obtainable as to the probable outcome of the tenders. I want the House to know that we are asking for a sum of money which we believe will be the probable amount, based entirely on estimates, but which amount may be somewhat in excess of requirements, or may be less than the requirements. In any event it is as close a figure as the government can arrive at now with the knowledge it has and the knowledge the merchant marine possesses.

Mr. PARENT: Is it not a fact that a contract has already been entered into with a firm in England for the building of two of these ships?

Mr. MALCOLM: No, the government has never discussed the question of the cost of the boats with any private company at any time. The Minister of Railways, the Minister of Finance and myself have turned over to the Canadian National Steamship Company the gathering of the information required, and their officers in Great Britain and their officers in Canada have surveyed the field, assisted by naval architects and marine engineers in different parts of Canada, and their estimates represent, we feel sure, the best information available. The tenders for the construction of the ships have not been called for. No firm has been asked to submit a definite estimate of cost. They are pure estimates based on the cost of the boats in the British yard, with the necessary increase added, based on the estimates of naval architects in Canada. Nobody has been promised that a tender would go to the Pacific coast or to any other place.

Mr. EVANS: This is perhaps one of the most interesting problems that has come before the House for some time. If we are going to be a nation engaging in the carrying trade of the world, carrying our exports to foreign countries, it is necessary that we buy in the cheapest market. My hon. friend to my right smiles at that statement, and of course the argument is advanced regarding the Canadian workman. Why, they say, even if it does cost more in this country let us give the work to our own workmen.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. EVANS: Yes, and some of these same gentlemen will at once give their approval to a scheme involving $10,000,000 in connection with immigration to defeat the very end of the workman himself, for whom they are pleading for better wages.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): When did we ever do that?

Mr. EVANS: You are doing it this year.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): When?

Mr. EVANS: You have done it.

Mr. HANSON: Speak for yourself, John.

Mr. EVANS: Yes, I will speak for myself. We shall spend that amount during 1926 before the accounts are all in, and that for the purpose of bringing workmen to Canada from other countries. Is not that calculated to defeat the purposes of organized labour itself? Our friends from the maritimes want to carry their products in the cheapest way possible down to the West Indies and other markets of the world, and now hon. gentlemen would load this scheme with $1,000,000 of overhead on which interest would have to be paid. This would spell failure for the whole undertaking from the very beginning.

This scheme must be carried out as economically as possible; we must do it in the cheapest way we can. If hon. gentlemen will read history, and only recent history at that, they will see how costly it has been to this country to follow the trade policy of driving out of line with world prices the cost of every enterprise we undertake. The United States some years ago determined to engage in the carrying trade. I remember they were in the market for some of the largest vessels afloat and they purchased the City of Paris, the City of York and similar ships and entered into competition with Great Britain. What happened? Before the Great war came on they were out of the running as a marine nation. Then during the war they subsidized or built a large merchant marine, hundreds of the vessels of which have already been scrapped as a result of that same policy we are following in Canada to-day, of driving prices up out of all proportion to world costs. These vessels have been scrapped and the United States is doing little in the way of transportation. I say this scheme must not be loaded with a million dollars of overhead which is not needed. If that is done failure is inevitable from the outset.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Would the hon. gentleman proceed to the logical conclusion of his proposition and invite the cheapest continental tenders for the purpose of saving the maximum of money?

Mr. EVANS: Certainly; I would go so far.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): And eliminate the English?

Mr. EVANS: Yes, eliminate the English and get the boats built in the cheapest market possible. The scheme can be a success only if we follow that policy. We have followed a false policy in this country all along, and I am glad that the question has come before the House at last in such an acute form as this. The farmers of the country have preached the other doctrine for many years, for they have been confronted with this very problem, and to-day agriculture is bankrupt because of the trade policy to which we have adhered. When brought face to face with a question like this we should consider our ways and be wise.

Mr. CANTLEY: Is it the intention of the government to have the Canadian merchant marine build the new fleet?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. CANTLEY: As regards the type of ships to be built, the minister did not give us sufficient information on which to base a reasonable judgment as to whether they could be built in Canada or not. The two larger motor ships, I understood him to say, would be of 5,800 tons deadweight, with a stated speed and certain accommodation for passengers, together with refrigerator space.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. CANTLEY: The Minister of Trade and Commerce rather threw out a challenge to us on this side to name five yards in Canada which could build the ships referred to. There is no difficulty in meeting that challenge because there are two yards on the Pacific coast, one in Halifax, one in Levis and Vickers, in Montreal. Leaving out of account for the moment the two ships which I might describe as capital ships, the other vessels are of a type of which we have built scores in Canada already. The two capital ships, the Minister of Trade and Commerce tells us, are of a special type that could not be built in this country, because of lack of refrigerating machinery. As a matter of fact, in the case of ships built on the Clyde or anywhere else in Great Britain, the installation of the refrigerating machinery is put in by the refrigerating company, and the same thing could be done in this country. That, therefore, presents no great obstacle. As regards the cost of ships built on the continent, the minister did not state the difference between such ships and those built in Great Britain.

Mr. DUNNING: I discarded the continental ships.

Mr. CANTLEY: Quite properly so. I might refer the minister to the experience of Newfoundland. The government there, about two years ago, bought a vessel which was built on the continent—the Cariboo, plying between Sydney and Port aux Basques. She was built at about 8 per cent under the cost of construction in Great Britain at that time, and the Newfoundland government have never ceased to regret having purchased the ship from a continental yard. There are various reasons for their dissatisfaction with the vessel, but one in particular I may mention. All the measurements in connection with the machinery are metric. There is nothing standardized about the vessel corresponding with the standards obtaining in this country or in Great Britain, and when a piece, be it valve, piston ring or boiler tube ferule, is wanted there is only one thing the Newfoundland government can do, and that is to send to the yard where the ship was built and wait until the necessary valve, ring or other part be made and brought overseas. We cannot afford to do that. We would not do it, nor would Newfoundland do it again.

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Mr. CANTLEY: The minister referred to single ship companies and some question was raised as to why it was desirable for vessels to be operated under this system. Single ship companies exist for the simple reason that the operation of vessels in this manner eliminates part of the obligation of the risk attendant on collision.

Mr. DUNNING: That information might be given to my hon. friend's colleague from Vancouver Centre who wanted it.

Mr. CANTLEY: I thought the minister was not quite sure about it himself. If I own half a dozen ships and one gets into a collision, should her value be inadequate to meet the damage accruing, the whole of my fleet becomes liable. If on the other hand I own ten vessels and they are individually operated and controlled, in the event of one of them getting into trouble she is solely liable for the damage; the others will not be called upon to contribute. With that object in view, practically all fleets are operated by single ship companies.

Now to come to the Fisher and the Forester, which I understood the minister to say would be reconditioned. I am not quite sure whether or not I understood the minister correctly.

Mr. DUNNING: In addition to the building program the Canadian Fisher and Canadian Forester would be reconditioned in Canada.

Mr. CANTLEY: That is what I understood. Now I would like to point out that the Canadian Fisher and Canadian Forester as originally built were not intended for the West Indian trade at all, but after they were completed they were reconditioned at a very considerable cost in order to fit them for that service. The passenger accommodation there installed on those ships was entirely inadequate, and the cost of reconditioning was out of all proportion to their capacity as passenger vessels. I doubt very much the advantage to accrue from reconditioning these ships again.

Mr. DUNNING: Not for passenger service but for freight service.

Mr. CANTLEY: Will the passenger accommodation be taken out?

Mr. DUNNING: It is not intended to use them for the passenger service.

Mr. CANTLEY: Will the minister be good enough to tell us what it is proposed to do with them? I am simply asking for information; I am not criticizing, but if I can I want to get a correct idea of what the government has in view.

Mr. DUNNING: They are to be converted into oil burners and fitted with refrigeration for 50,000 stems of bananas.

Mr. CANTLEY: Now am I to understand that the present passenger accommodation will be taken out?

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot positively say that; that will be after the new boats are put in service, of course.

Mr. CANTLEY: Getting down to the difference in cost of Canadian built over British built-ships, it is practically a matter of 12 per cent, or $1,094,000?

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Mr. CANTLEY: As the minister has explained, these are estimates; they are not actual figures and as a matter of fact we do not know what the difference will be, although I fancy his estimate is fairly correct. If that be so, I submit that it is not an excessive price to pay for having these ships built in our own country by our own men. I do not need to elaborate that; everyone knows exactly what I mean. I think we have some national pride still; we did splendid work during the war in the construction of vessels and did a great deal to save the situation at that time. The yards are already in existence, as I pointed out to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm); men are in this country who can do the work, and we can build just as good, able and serviceable vessels as can be built anywhere, at a reasonable advance over the cost of those built in the old-established British yards where they have many advantages. The senior member for Halifax (Mr. Black) referred to the possibility of building two ships at Halifax and the advantage in building two ships there rather than one, and he was correct; two ships can be built as readily as one, there being several berths available there, with the added advantage that the overhead would be cut in two, and in a matter of this kind the overhead is a very considerable item. I would also point out that I understand the Levis yard has a contract to-day to build two passenger ships which are to be fully equal in power, speed and accommodation to these vessels. True they are river boats; still as to cost and equipment, they will compare favourably with the two capital ships referred to. So far as these small boats are concerned there is not the slightest difficulty in building them in any of a half dozen points on the Atlantic coast of Canada, and I hope when the matter is finally dealt with by the minister he will take into consideration the fact that these boats can all be built in Canada with a very considerable advantage to us from various points of view. Those advantages will not only consist of the employment of so many men, but when the ships are in operation it will be found an enormous advantage to have them in close contact with the yards where they were built; if the minister had as much experience in operating vessels as some other hon. members of this House have had he would be glad when replacements and repairs are needed to have the contractors as close to the operating base of the ships as possible, and that for obvious reasons. I congratulate him on the program he has brought down; I hope he will be able to give us further information very soon and that the details in regard to the ships, their power and equipment with the other facts which must be put before any party tendering, whether in the old country or in Canada, will be made available to all builders as early as possible in order that they may have ample time to make their calculations and submit their estimates to the department.

Mr. MacLAREN: I do not think sufficiently definite information has been given, and naturally so, to form much of an opinion regarding where these ships should be built. If we had the contracts before us we might be able to say something more definite; if we knew how many Canadian firms were prepared to tender it would also help in forming an opinion. Of course the minister does not pretend to give us that definite information at present, but at a later stage I presume he will give the House the full details, when we may discuss the matter with more advantage. It may be that further investigation will show that the ships may be built here in less time and with greater skill than is apparent at present, but in any event I think it is clear that the desire of this House and the desire of the people of Canada would be that our own shipbuilding yards be used to the fullest extent. I believe many of us welcome the proposal of a new and improved West Indies service; it will aid in the extension of import and export trade of our country. There is however, one question I would like to ask the minister. Tenders were called for in connection with the West Indian service, and they were found to be too high to be considered. May I ask what is the estimated saving between the tenders for that service and the present proposal of building and owning the ships ourselves?

Mr. DUNNING: As I said before taking my seat last, I was not quite sure on account of the number of questions, just what point

I had reached in the statement I made at the outset. I now find that I have omitted to mention one very important factor. We drifted into a discussion, quite properly of course, on the question of building the ships in Canada or building them abroad, and so got away from what is after all one of the major questions in a proposal of this kind. That is, how do we expect it to pay? What is going to be the financial result of these operations so far as we can see it, regardless of where we build the vessels? Once the vessels are built the problem will be a matter of operation. After duly weighing all considerations and calling for tenders, on two if not three occasions—the Minister of Trade and Commerce will deal with that phase of the matter, because it is his department which handles subsidies—we have decided that this is a better method of dealing with the situation than paying subsidies to private corporations for giving the service called for under the treaty. In so doing it has been necessary to examine the probable results, and again I can only present estimated figures. Naturally as we are not in the business yet, we can only judge of the probable results from our experience in operating our present West Indies service, and such information as we can secure otherwise. On the basis of building two of the vessels in Great Britain and three in Canada, reconditioning the other two in Canada, and providing for a twenty year bond issue which would be retired through the medium of an annual sinking fund of five per cent, thus involving that the country would become the owner free of mortgage of the ships in twenty years, whatever value may be left in them at that time; allowing also for the subsidies to be paid by the various West Indian colonies, which amount to $227,950 per annum all told and which would of course be receivable by these Canadian National West Indies steamships which we are setting up by this legislation—allowing for these factors it is estimated that there would be an income deficit in the first year of $764,911, the fifth year, $664,911, and the tenth year $564,911 the reduction being brought about of course by reason of the accretions in the sinking fund provided for the retirement of the bonds at the rate of five per cent per annum. I will leave to the Minister of Trade and Commerce the discussion of the subsidy feature of the matter because the Department of Trade and Commerce has been dealing with that phase of it. A special committee of the cabinet consisting of myself, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and the Minister of Finance have been going into this matter for some months past with the officers of the Canadian National railways; it concerns of course both the Department of Railways and Canals and the Department of Trade and Commerce. I should say on the point which has been most discussed, that no one need have any fear that Canadian shipyards will not be given the fullest opportunity to demonstrate that they can build these ships, can build all of them, and at a price which would take into account all the factors which have been mentioned on both sides of the House, including the far corner, and would justify as a good business practice keeping the business entirely in Canada. The government does desire to keep the business in Canada.

Now, my hon. friend from St. John had a question which I have forgotten.

Mr. MacLAREN: My question was: Could the minister inform the committee what is the estimated economy effected by the proposed government service, as contrasted with the tenders for a private service?

Mr. DUNNING: I leave that to the Minister of Trade and Commerce to answer. He has that information.

Mr. MANION: What are the tonnage and dimensions of the boats?

Mr. DUNNING: I have not the exact dimensions.

Mr. MANION: Have you the length?

Mr. DUNNING: No, the length has not yet been determined.

Mr. ARTHURS: The minister has given certain figures as to the deficits for the first, the fifth and the tenth years. Has he based those figures on the present trade between Canada and the West Indies, or has he any reason to believe there will be any increase in that trade?

Mr. DUNNING: We have endeavoured not to be too rosy in that regard. We expect as a result of the operations of the treaty a considerable increase in trade, but we have endeavoured to be conservative in our figures because I for one do not want to come back to this House in future and say, I am very sorry but the deficit is three times what we expected. I would prefer to overstate the deficit at this stage rather than understate it, and the instructions given to the officials who were preparing the figures was to bear that in mind—to give estimates which could be relied upon as being conservative estimates. One would require almost the vision of a prophet to ascertain really how much the factor of increased trade would weigh in the reduction of the deficit, and we have endeavoured to be conservative in our estimates.

Mr. MANION: May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he has the dimensions of these boats? I understood him to say that he had.

Mr. MALCOLM: No, but there are specific figures available as to the tonnage and the number of cubic feet of refrigeration capacity.

Mr. MANION: But not as to the length?

Mr. MALCOLM: No.

Mr. GARDINER: Does the estimated deficit for the first year include the subsidy that will be received from the West Indies?

Mr. DUNNING: The figures which I gave took into account the West Indian subsidies before arriving at the estimated deficit.

Mr. HANSON: The net deficit.

Mr. DUNNING: The net deficit.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): I must say that I am very much surprised at the estimated deficit given us by the Minister of Railways in connection with the operation of this service. To my mind the estimate resembles the estimate given of the Transcontinental railway. Hon. members at that time were told that the cost of that railway was to be thirteen millions. I will not recapitulate what the project actually has cost. But as to the cost of operating these boats—having made some calculations myself and being familiar with the operations of steamships, and bearing in mind the calculations of others who have been operating steamships—I say that the annual deficit on the operations of this West Indian service and treaty will be at least two millions a year. I stand by that statement. I am satisfied that is the figure which will materialize, and I say that this contract, in connection with the treaty which has been entered into, will be very disastrous to this Dominion.

Hon. JAMES MALCOLM (Minister of Trade and Commerce): There has been so much cross questioning that I hardly know where to start my remarks and supplement what has already been said by the Minister of Railways. At the present time we are paying $340,000 a year for a service to the West Indian islands which is not satisfactory either as to frequency or as to capacity. At the time of the conference of 1925, a better service was arranged along the lines of the service which had been provided at the conference of 1920, but which had not been carried out. When the tenders were called for as mentioned by my colleague the Minister of Railways, no satisfactory tender was received—in fact no tender was received for the western service via the western islands and Jamaica. The government was not able to award a tender, nor was it satisfied at that time that it had exhausted the field of those who might wish to figure. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat spoke to me at the first part of this session before Christmas, and we again opened the tenders in order to let the company in which he is interested or others tender again, but without success. I have very carefully prepared estimates by the officers of the Canadian National railways who have submitted to us a set of figures which, if correct will save this country much more money than if we continue to pay subsidies.

I have taken the trouble to compile some figures as to what it costs to continue a steamship subsidy and I think it is worth while for the committee to know this. I think the senior member for Halifax will be glad to have this information. It is true the government is asking for a $10,000,000 capital outlay to provide a frequent service as called for by the treaty, and it is stated that the interest on a capital outlay of $10,000,000 is not a small amount. But if we continue to pay money in the form of subsidies for which we get absolutely nothing back and on which we lose the interest for all time to come, the amount involved runs into a considerable sum. Since 1889 and 1890 we have been paying subsidies for the West Indies service. The amount started at $49,942. It reached $73,000 in 1901. It continued to grow until in 1905 it reached $134,000. In 1910 and 1911 the subsidy amounted to $144 000. I will not weary the committee with the figures, but finally in 1925-26 it reached $318,000. The Dominion of Canada on this West Indies service has now paid out in cash $6,593,000. That, computed at 5 per cent interest annually since we have gone into this business, means that this country has now contributed to the British West Indies service $13,930,000.

Mr. PARENT: To what firm in particular were the subsidies granted?

Mr. MALCOLM: I have not the names to give to the hon. member. The Royal Mail Steam Packet Company have been the successful tenderers on the last few occasions. The point I wish to deal with is this, that while we have been paying out $340.000 for a service which is not satisfactory to the West Indian islands, our own officers now estimate that under the plan submitted by the Minister of Railways we are going to have an operating deficit of $764,000. That is much more money than we have been paying out in subsidies but it is not to be compared to what private firms would have asked for the same service. The senior member for Halifax is unquestionably a good shipping man; he knows what it costs to run this service and make money out of it. No man in this House is in a better position than he is to judge; but I am inclined to think that he is underestimating the possibilities of trade on the western route. His firm did not see fit to figure on that route. They did give us a figure on the eastern service for which they are now obtaining $340,000, but the figure which they gave us was $582,000 for that service, which is one-half of the service. The western service they refused altogether to figure on.

As to the prophecy of the hon. gentleman, I must admit that I am not sufficiently acquainted with the trade in the West Indies or sufficient of a prophet to estimate what may develop or to contradict the hon. gentleman, but I have sufficient faith in the officers who have compiled the estimate to make this prophecy, that the hon. gentleman's estimate of a deficit of $2,000,000 will be shown to be absurd in the first two years of operation and more absurd at the end of the five years. Those acquainted with this trade have a feeling that much business will develop.

The subject is such an old one that I do not think it is necessary for me to review the history of this service since back in 1890 when Sir George Foster made his first attempt to effect trade treaties with the West Indies. I think hon. members do not want to be wearied with a review of the whole series of events leading up to the 1920 conference.

Mr. HANSON: Will the minister give us the figures on which he bases his estimate of the net deficit?

Mr. MALCOLM: The hon. gentleman is asking me for something which I cannot give him. This is a prepared set of statistics given by the National railways to the government. We have not done the accounting or actuarial work involved in compiling it. The estimate which the National railways make is made in three ways. The first plan is that if the boats were all built in Canada there would be a higher capital cost and therefore a greater interest charge and a heavier annual payment for depreciation. Under this plan the estimated deficit the first year is $818,000. If the boats were all built in Great Britain the estimated deficit would be $675,000. The plan which the minister submits is an average plan with three of the boats built in Canada and two built in Great Britain with an estimated deficit of $764,000. I am inclined to think—and I believe hon. members will agree with me—that we are not prone to overestimate deficits. It is not very long since 1921 when we came into this House and we were told that the deficits on the National railways could not be improved and that the system should be sold.

Mr. McGIBBON: Who said that?

Mr. MALCOLM: It was stated by a good many hon. gentlemen on that side and some on this side of the House.

An hon. MEMBER: On your own side.

Mr. MALCOLM: I said some on this side. It was even said by one hon. gentleman that the system should be sold for a dollar. There is not a man now who would sell the National railways for a dollar; there is not a man who is not proud of the success of the National railways. This steamship system is going to give to the shippers, to the passenger trade of this country, to our sister dominions and colonies an opportunity to do more trade and more travelling within the British Empire. It is going to provide a passenger service which I believe the people of this country will appreciate.

The trade of the West Indies and the trade of Canada do not in any way conflict. It is needless to read a long list of commodites which are exchanged between these two parts of the British Empire, but they do not conflict in any way. We have further plans for the development of trade with the West Indies, which plans we will reveal to the House at a later date. They will not involve an expenditure of such magnitude as this. After going over the trade figures with the West Indian islands on commodities which do not conflict with our products, I am firmly convinced that the trade figures, when this service is instituted, will reveal a very marked increase inasmuch as we shall be buying through Canadian ports many commodities which now come to us through United States channels. When I was speaking on the budget I made the remark that it is difficult to rely on statistics. We do more business with the West Indies and Cuba than we are credited with because a good deal of it passes through United States channels. There will not be as great an increase of business between Canada and the West Indies by virtue of this service as some people might imagine; but there will be more direct business through Canadian ports and over a Canadian system, and that is the very thing that is going to make that service pay better than most people believe at the present time. If our freight can be brought direct from the West Indies, as we propose it shall be in these boats having the necessary cold storage capacity, we shall be diverting a certain amount of trade that now comes through the United States and is credited under Canadian imports as being of American origin, whereas in reality it is of West Indian origin. While I make that point, I want to be correctly interpreted. I doubt if the service is going to increase to such a great extent our business with the West Indies. It will to some extent, but there is only a certain volume of business that can be done there, and the increase is not going to be so much an increase in the volume of trade as in diversion of trade from American channels to Canadian channels and Canadian ports. To me, Mr. Chairman, that is the most important part of this service. According to our latest figures for 1926, in bananas, grape fruit, cocoanuts, spices, and so forth, we are buying from the West Indies somewhere about $15,000,000 worth of merchandise a year, but I firmly believe that actually we are buying over $20,000,000 worth of West Indian products. I believe that fifty per cent of our goods from the West Indies comes through American channels. We are selling to the West Indies about $17,200,000 worth of goods, but I believe that into the same territory goes a very considerable amount of Canadian export through American channels by reason of the scarcity of Canadian tonnage.

This service, Mr. Chairman, is designed to do two things. It is designed to give river trade in the summer to Montreal, and to divide the trade between Halifax and St. John in the winter, serving equally both transportation companies, the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National. We as a government feel that we have to keep faith with the agreements of 1920 and 1925. We feel this is part of our contribution to empire unity. We realize that the cost is not going to be small, but we feel that we would be very much less than honest if we did not put on this service, and I say frankly to the House, Mr. Chairman, that I do not believe, after two calls for tenders, that the service can be put on in any other way than we are offering to the House to-night. We searched the field and endeavoured in every way possible to give every private interest the opportunity to figure on this service. We considered a subsidy also before we finally arrived at the conclusion we arrived at, and which we are now submitting to the House. If the service is installed, I am as hopeful as I was in 1921 of the National railway. I believe the figures as estimated will be found to be practically correct. We have discouraged any super-optimism on the part of the Canadian National Steamship Company officials as to what their probable earnings would be. We have figured from a very careful basis so far as the government is concerned, and my colleague the Minister of Finance has been most insistent that no undue optimism should be used which would result in him being asked to come back and apologize for the estimate in five years. That is all as a government we could do in compiling the figures.

I sincerely hope that the estimate of the senior member for Halifax is quite wrong. I personally think it is. I believe that with the growth and development of the service, the estimates as compiled by the officials will be found to be very nearly correct.

Just one word more with regard to the question of building these boats in Canada or in Great Britain. It is not a very serious matter whether all these boats are built in Canada, or whether three of them are built in Canada and two in Great Britain. It is a matter of $100,000 annually. It is a matter of policy for this House to determine whether they are prepared to face about another $100,000 annual deficit on the plan we have prepared in order to have all the ships built in Canada, or whether they are willing to effect another $100,000 saving annually by having them all built in Great Britain. We have chosen the middle course. We have been informed by the officials, in making their estimates as to the advisability of building two ships in Great Britain, that two of them can best be built in British shipyards on account of the refrigeration system that is required. My hon. friend a moment ago said that the refrigeration system was installed after the boat was built. Quite true, but it is on the installation of the refrigeration system that the British builders' figures are so very much lower than the Canadian builders' figures. It may be quite possible to import from Great Britain refrigeration plants and install them here, but the National railway experts felt that the two boats with the heavy refrigeration could best be built in Britain, and that the other three boats could best be built in Canada. Speaking for myself—I am not speaking for the Minister of Railways—

I do not believe the committee in charge of this matter would have any objection, if the House is in favour, and when the details are asked, to having all these boats built in Canada if it can be shown that they can be built economically in this country. I have no brief for either plan. We submit this as a middle course on the recommendation of those estimating on the service, so that we may have some figure to come to parliament with. When the plans are ready, they will be submitted to British and Canadian yards, and we believe that about $10,000,000 will provide the service asked for. Further than that, Mr. Chairman, there is very little I can contribute to the debate.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce what increase in trade he anticipates as a result of this proposed steamship service, giving the imports and the exports separately, if possible?

Mr. MALCOLM: I would answer my hon. friend by saying, without speaking authoritatively, that the western service to Jamaica is based on the tonnage of freight now being brought by the Canadian Government Merchant Marine to Canadian ports, plus the tonnage which will be diverted from American channels to Canadian channels, plus an increase in passenger service in line with the estimates of the passenger traffic officers. It is not estimated that there will be a heavy increase in the freight traffic in the service to the eastern group. There could not be a very heavy increase except through natural growth, but the officials have estimated on an increased passenger service due to greater frequency of service and better boats.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): It seems to me that the estimate must have been a very, very conservative one, because I notice that there is only a difference in the twenty years of $200,000 in the loss which is estimated by the government to arise in the operation of the service. That would indicate to me that the increase in business would not be of any very great consequence.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend said twenty years. If I said twenty years in regard to income deficits, that was an error. The figures I gave were for the first, fifth and tenth year respectively.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): I should have said ten years.

[Mr. Malcolm.]

Mr. MALCOLM: In further reply to my hon. friend, I might give the tonnage of cargoes carried in seagoing vessels between Canada and the British West Indies for the fiscal years 1918 up to 1925:

Tonnage of Cargoes carried in Sea-Going Vessels between Canada and the British West Indies, Fiscal Years ended 1918-1925

(Compiled from the Shipping Report of the Customs and Excise Department).

	Inwards Freight Tons weight	Outwards Freight Tons weight
1918	130,928	120,002
1919	132,429	101,221
1920	135,864	156,045
1921	129,111	249,989
1922	161,851	183,353
1923	265,535	244,641
1924	178,491	245,176
1925	248,600	260,698

So in 1925, which is the last year for which we have the figures, the tonnage each year was exactly double what it was in 1918. In that short space of time, seven years, the total tonnage had doubled.

Mr. BROWN: The figures show a steady increase both inward and outward.

Mr. MALCOLM: Yes.

Mr. CANTLEY: In arriving at the suggested amount will the minister be good enough to inform the committee what arrangements are made regarding depreciation and interest charges?

Mr. MALCOLM: The estimate provides for the normal depreciation and interest at 4½ per cent.

Mr. CANTLEY: What is the normal depreciation in shipping property of this character?

Mr. MALCOLM: It is put in the form of a sinking fund at five per cent—four and a half per cent interest and the amortization of the whole amount.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I agree with the hon. member for Rosetown that a most important principle is involved in the placing of these contracts, whether we shall have the ships constructed in Canada at a considerably increased price, or whether we shall permit the officials of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine to secure them in the markets of the world and have the lowest possible capitalization. It is inconceivable that any private corporation, whether a railway company or a steamship company, would pay more for the construction of vessels in Canada than the amount at which they could secure a similar type of vessel outside of Canada, and certainly we must put our public enterprises in a position to compete. Not only that, but if the capitalization of the ships is increased by reason of the fact that they are constructed in Canada, then we are saddling an extra capitalization on that trade between the maritime provinces and the West Indies. That means increased rates and necessarily an interference with the freer exchange of goods. I have a good deal of sympathy with the viewpoint that our own Canadian yards should be given these contracts and that our own workmen should receive the wages that would be paid out. No Canadian can ignore that, but it seems to me that the difficulty can be got over in another way, without adopting the middle course, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce suggests. I do not think there is any justification for the middle course. I think the government should decide on a definite policy, whether they are prepared to pay the extra price and have these ships constructed in Canada, or whether they should permit the officers of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine to procure these ships in the markets of the world at the lowest possible prices. That is the question the government should decide and they should decide on a definite policy. I do not suggest that they should say to the officers of the merchant marine that they should secure the ships in the markets of the world as cheaply as possible, but there is another way the government can get round it. If the government considers it is worth while for Canada, for Canadian shipyards and for Canadian workingmen, to pay the extra price, I think we should vote in this House the necessary estimates to pay that difference and have the capitalization at the amount for which they could be secured outside charged up to the merchant marine. To my mind that is the only fair way in which it could be done, and as a matter of fact I think I would be inclined to suggest that the government should follow the latter course. As a Canadian I should dislike to see the ships constructed in the shipyards of Great Britain or Europe.

An hon. MEMBER: Or Germany.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I have no prejudice against Germany. Perhaps my hon. friend has, but that is not involved in this question at all. I would ask my hon. friend, if he were a wholesaler or a private trader of any kind selling goods and could secure them cheaper in Germany than he could get them in Canada, would his patriotism go so far that he would not buy in the cheapest market?

An hon. MEMBER: It certainly would.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Then he is a better patriot than I am. If they decide to build ships in Canada I would be prepared to support such a policy as that, and I think that the extra price should not be charged up to the price of the ship. Let the government vote that money in the House and I would support it and consider it the proper way to handle the situation, because it would give our own working men and our own shipyards the money which was involved.

Mr. MALCOLM: My hon. friend (Mr. Campbell) has called upon the government to announce its policy. Well, the policy has been announced. We are not going to buy continental ships. Another question has been brought up by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley) who says that probably it would be better to build all the ships in Canada on account of the equipment being standard in this country. I think that also applies to British-built ships. We as a government have offered to the House a program involving a certain amount. If we were to announce boldly in the House that we were going to buy all the ships in Canada they would probably cost a million more than they will under the present arrangement. As a government we want to buy them in Canada and we are asking for the amount of money we think the ships should cost. If the Canadian shipyards can construct the ships required for the amount of money we are asking the House to vote, we may buy them in Canada. The officers of the service have suggested that they believe two of them can be more economically constructed in Great Britain and that is why the estimate is as it is. If the hon. member wants an answer as to the government's policy I am prepared to give it to him. Possibly the volume of business coming to Canada by the construction of the boats in Canada will mean sufficient to pay the difference in cost. We might buy these ships in Germany for $2,000,000 less. It would be a saving of that amount, but I am not prepared to take $2,000,000 from Canadian shipyards and Canadian business to hand it to any foreign country at any time.

Mr. RYCKMAN: What was the lowest tender received for the service?

Mr. MALCOLM: There was none.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Could my hon. friend give me an estimate?

Mr. MALCOLM: No. On the eastern service, on which the Royal Mail Steam Packet tendered by virtue of the new treaty the amount of $340,000 was raised to $582,000. On the western service they have refused to give us a figure.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The actual money involved in this project, taking into consideration what money is worth, would mean at the end of the first year $750,000, with a capital involved of $10,000,000, and this would mean that in order to carry all the in and out freight you are going to involve just as much in dollars and cents as you have pounds in annual in and out freight. While I am not one of those who go down to the sea in ships, I cannot imagine how any business that is going to parallel in tons the dollars that are actually involved can possibly succeed. It means there are $30,000,000 involved in this project, to carry, as I understood the minister to say, practically 30,000,000 pounds in freight. It will mean therefore that if these deficits are not paid you are really paying through the nose, because money is always worth four and one-half per cent. It means you are going to lose in the interest on the capital invested, and the deficits will be more than the value of the service will justify. It means therefore that this country is committed to a treaty which constitutes a bad business bargain, and we are now making it worse in the manner in which we are implementing it. I am bound to join in the protest that has been made to-night, for I am sure that we shall come back here year after year only to find that we have been running into a great expense which we could have avoided had we exercised business sense.

Mr. ARTHURS: I understood the minister to say he had no intention of having the ships built in any continental yards. In other words, they are not to be built in Germany. I commend him in that regard. He also intimated that they would be built in Canada provided always, that they came within the estimate.

Mr. MALCOLM: I did not say quite that.

Mr. ARTHURS: Suppose the combined cost of the ships exceeds the estimate of $10,000,000?

Mr. DUNNING: That is not the estimate; it is not the figure I gave.

Mr. ARTHURS: Well, it does not matter precisely what it is. Suppose the cost comes within a reasonable sum of the estimate, whatever it may be, will the preference then be given to Canadian yards as against British or foreign builders?

Mr. MALCOLM: I had better leave that question to the Minister of Railways.

[Mr. Malcolm.]

Mr. DUNNING: We do not intend tc say to the Canadian shipbuilders, "Here boys, you are going to get this business" That is not our intention. It is not good business.

Mr. ARTHURS: We are not asking you to say that.

Mr. DUNNING: We intend to get prices from Canadian and British yards and on the basis of the tenders we receive we shall exercise our best business judgment as to what should be done, having due regard to the national interests as outlined by members on both sides of the House to-night.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 142, respecting the Canadian National Steamships and to provide for the establishment of a West Indies service.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REFUNDING OF FINANCIAL OBLIGATIONS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved the second reading of Bill No. 121, respecting the Canadian National Railways and to provide for the refunding of certain maturing financial obligations.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Marcil in the chair.

Sections 1 to 4 inclusive agreed to.

On section 5—Approval of governor in council.

Mr. STEVENS: This is the main clause of the bill. Is it an exact parallel of similar provisions found in other bills of this character or does it involve anything new? I have not had time to look it over.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not know of any other bill exactly of this character which has been passed before. This section, however, is a standard provision which we are introducing in all Canadian National bills having to do with the issuing of securities and with financing generally.

Mr. STEVENS: In what regard is it different from former bills of this character?

Mr. DUNNING: We have not to my knowledge had any refunding bills of this character before. It simply makes clear, what was formerly doubtful, that the terms and conditions with regard to securities are subject to the approval of the governor in council.

Section agreed to.

Sections 6 and 7 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

DEBTS DUE THE CROWN

ADJUSTMENT OR DISCHARGE OF AMOUNTS DUE ON SEED GRAIN AND OTHER ADVANCES

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved the second reading of Bill No. 122, respecting certain debts due the crown.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Marcil in the chair.

On section 1—Adjustment of indebtedness for certain allowances.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): When we were considering the resolution an hon. member asked for a statement of the outstanding accounts. I have a statement in my hand showing the total amount of securities taken for advances of seed grain and relief in the western provinces from 1876 to 1926 inclusive; the total repayments of principal to January 31, 1927, and the amount of principal outstanding as of January 31, 1927. From 1876 to 1926 the security taken amounted to $15,340,016.63, while the repayments of principal amounted to $12,005,353.77. The balance of principal outstanding as of January 31, 1927, amounts to $3,334,662.86. In connection with the joint loans, or loans made under the 50 per cent agreement, payments by the Dominion to the province of Alberta amounted to $875,108.09, and to Saskatchewan to $290,-913.52, while the total repayments from Alberta have amounted to $163,305.31 and from Saskatchewan to $37,514.20, or a total repayment of $200,819.51. That is the statement of the two provinces of the loans on this account. I went pretty thoroughly over the proposals of the bill the other day, but I omitted to say one important thing, namely that under the War Measures Act we had a similar provision for the settlement of these accounts, but on the cancellation of the War Measures Act of course our authority to compromise on these settlements disappeared, and that is what I am asking be now given us in order if possible to clear up these outstanding amounts.

Mr. STEVENS: The only criticism I would offer—or perhaps I would not put it so strongly—is that the bill is contained in one clause, and it gives a blanket power to the governor in council to make these settlements. I am under the impression that there should be some method outlined in the bill by which this settlement would be arrived at. For instance, I understand that it will probably be worked out in conference with the provinces and the municipalities, or probably the representative of the provinces who will represent the municipalities as well.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In some cases the loan companies, who are foreclosing.

Mr. STEVENS: In some cases the loan companies as well. I presume the minister has a plan which would satisfy the committee as to the wisdom of the government's course. I am not offering this in a critical spirit at all, but it does seem to me rather a wide power to ask.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I say for the information of the committee that it is rather difficult to lay down hard and fast rules of settlement, and that is one reason why we are not fixing the procedure by statute. Inasmuch as practically the whole of the settlement will have to be by compromise arrangements with the provincial governments, or particularly with the municipalities through the provincial governments, it is largely a matter of the allocation of the amounts, because the properties will never realize the full amounts of the liens and obligations against them. Therefore there will have to be an allocation of the amounts, and I would like to cite one instance. At the moment there is an arrangement which we are endeavouring to put into execution whereby we will take all the area around the Bow river, bounded on the south by Medicine Hat and on the north by the Red Deer river and going ten ranges westward; we are endeavouring to put that territory under range conditions once more, and our officers are allocating certain areas with water privileges which we hope to lease rather than sell to ranchers over a long term of years. In most cases it is true that the provincial governments have proceeded under the tax enforcement act and are now the owners of a very large proportion of this property, subject of course to our liens which have priority. We hope to get those lands down to a valuation on which reasonable rentals can be secured, to see whether we cannot transform that whole area back to the range conditions which prevailed before homesteading and settlement duties were permitted. So each individual case will have to be dealt with separately, and by that I mean every individual unit. We have a joint board which is advising both governments, and which will make an allocation of the amounts to be received by the crown and by the province for the taxation indebtedness; if there is any further creditor such as a mortgage company, a machinery company or a merchant having claims, the board will settle what proportion each creditor will lose in order to get an adjustment of that claim. That will wipe it off and get the land clear of any encumbrance once more.

That, I may say to the committee, is briefly one method of adjusting these claims. The other, of course, is where we are not endeavouring to do that, where there are scattered parcels of land which may be located anywhere in either of these provinces, in which the provincial government is interested with the municipality again behind the provincial government. In those cases representative officers of the two governments will try to arrive at an allocation of the loss to be sustained by each party. That is all the authority we are asking.

Mr. GEARY: Will this be a matter of dealing with individuals at all?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, unless you would call a mortgage company an individual.

Mr. GEARY: You will not deal with any individual owner?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No.

Mr. GEARY: These men who paid back the $12,000,000 are not likely to be heard from either?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend will note that some of these claims go back to 1876. This will only apply where foreclosure is taking place and the property is being cleared up; it is not a compromise arrangement with some individual who may be on the land and who wants to settle his debts.

Mr. GARDINER: Will this proposal apply also to farmers who are still resident in this area?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In the district I have mentioned, which we are endeavouring to transform from an agricultural to a ranching area, there are still some individuals on the land and they will be dealt with by the committee which has been named by the two governments.

Mr. GARDINER: What about the other areas where these liens are still in effect? I suppose it is proposed to deal with those areas also?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Oh yes, it is proposed to deal with other cases. My hon. friend will realize that unless proceedings of this sort are taken there is little or no hope of making an arrangement, because we cannot get all the interested creditors together.

Mr. STEVENS: You are not going to abandon claims in which there is any likelihood of payment being made?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No.

Mr. GARDINER: Let us presume for a moment that the farmer is still residing on the property. There are liens registered against that property and accrued interest to such an extent that it is impossible for him to pay them off. Will not that resident farmer have the opportunity of coming under the scope of this legislation?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If my hon. friend will stop to think for a moment he will see how impossible it is to deal with that particular case, regrettable as it may be. The best thing for that man to do if he is in such a position is to allow the sale to take place and buy in the property.

Mr. GARDINER: What will he buy it in with?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): He becomes obligated for any amount that may be considered reasonable, but in nearly every case as my hon. friend knows there are at least a half a dozen registered liens against his property. I wish there were some way of dealing with such cases but frankly I must confess there does not appear to be any. If I were in that position I would readily say: clean me out and let me start over again.

Mr. GARDINER: I think I might suggest to the minister a possible way out of that situation. But first of all let me say this: take the farmer who went into that semi-arid belt at the behest of the federal government. He was offered a homestead and a preëmption at $3 an acre. That land was represented to him as being good agricultural land. There is no question about that, and the district filled up very rapidly say from the year 1909 up to about the year 1912. That whole area was filled up in about three years time.

Mr. STEVENS: Does my hon. friend refer to that area south of Medicine Hat?

Mr. GARDINER: And north of it, north of the Red Deer river. There are many farmers there. They all went into wheat farming because it was represented to them that this land was good wheat land. Many of those farmers have stayed with that proposition through thick and thin. I will admit that when the dry years came it would have been far better for all concerned if they had got out of the district, but they did not; they remained with the property right up to the present time. Now I maintain that people who have faith in the country to that extent ought to receive some consideration. They have proven that they are the kind of people that we want for this country. The people who have gone out are those who could not stand the gaff, but the settlers who remained deserve some consideration. Therefore I suggest to the minister that some means should be found whereby their liabilities would be compromised to some extent. Under the amendments to the Bankruptcy Act a few years ago, and through the debt adjustment bureau in Alberta, they have been able to compromise many of the debts in those areas.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is no difficulty about that.

Mr. GARDINER: I would suggest to the minister that in drawing up these regulations that point should be kept in mind, so that a farmer now resident out there who has become embarrassed may come under this scheme and have his liabilities compromised so that he will be able to remain. Because after all the people who are there now have proven their worth and should be given some consideration.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There will be no difficulty at all about that, because the debt adjustment officer is an official of the provincial government and such a case would come within the purview of this act

Mr. GARDINER: You have received a report from the joint commission?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: Would it be too much to ask that you place a copy of the report on the table?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I shall be very glad to have a copy of the report placed on the table.

Mr. GERSHAW: I should like to point out a few facts as to the necessity for this legislation. The municipalities, the loan companies and individuals are all interested. As has been said, these liens date from 1876. About 1910, 1911 and 1912, a great number of people went in and filed on homesteads, and took up preëmptions on that land which was then thrown open for homestead purposes. During the years that followed many farmers found it necessary to give up, and in one year, namely in 1915, security was taken to the extent of $12,000,000 for the relief that was given out. There were good crops in 1915 and 1916, and a great part of these obligations have been paid off. Owing to the lean years which followed, however, many people have found themselves quite unable to pay their obligations. When the settlers went in homes were built and stock purchased; school districts were organized and small towns were built up. But as the result of a succession of dry years these small villages were almost deserted, and the school districts could not carry on. I know of one municipality where thirteen school districts were in operation but where now there is only one. In the Tilley area which the minister has mentioned there were formerly fifty-seven school districts in operation; now there are only thirteen. As the people moved out they left their debts behind, and of course the merchants, machinery companies, and others have suffered to a greater or less extent. Those people could do nothing else. It was impossible for them to pay their debts, and through no fault of their own they found themselves in that condition. Many of them have left, and the Tilley commission found that in one district in which they made investigation 85 per cent of the farms were deserted. In any case there is not sufficient security left to satisfy these relief claims. At the present time I understand there is no one who has authority to cancel those claims, so I think this legislation will help to improve matters to some extent. Those claims for relief were placed against the land prior to the municipal or school claim for taxes, and prior to any claim that the mortgage companies may have had and those having claims were not notified. Where mortgage companies have instituted foreclosure proceedings and taken over the land they find that these prior claims have rendered their equity null. One large insurance company has discontinued the payment of taxes on their extensive holdings, and this makes it very difficult for the farmers who have remained to pay the taxes for local purposes. In many cases the municipalities have taken over this land for the non-payment of taxes, but they found prior liens registered against the land, and in many cases the liens are of greater value than the land itself. For instance I know of one quarter for which the municipality was offered $500 but against which the amount of liens was more than $1,000.

This legislation is particularly important in the interest of those farmers who are remaining on the land, and who have struggled along through all the bad years in the effort to maintain their homes. If that land was made available at a low rate for grazing or for purposes such as that, it could be made use of. Rates should be regulated according to the number of acres required to care for so many head of stock. These people would thus be placed in a much better position to carry on and to maintain their homes, and we should try to keep them there because they are the greatest assets that we have. Their experience is of great value. It is necessary that some organization should have the right to reduce or cancel these claims. In many cases they should be cancelled outright. There is little security left. The men who are there have a debt that is twelve or fifteen years old, and I really believe the department should deal very generously with those claims and see that fairness is done to all parties.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

The House in committee of supply, Mr. Marcil in the chair.

Public Works—New Brunswick

St. John custom house—improvements and repairs	$15,000
St. John new post office building—repairs and improvements	4,400
St. John old post office building—restoration and repairs	4,000

Mr. MacLAREN: Does this complete the restoration of the old post office?

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Minister of Public Works): It is expected that this $15,000, which is a revote, will complete the following repairs to the St. John customs house:

Painting and glazing, exterior wood and iron work, etc	$ 2,200
Repairs to sheet metal and copper work	300
Repairs to carpentry work	400
Repairs to masonry	400
Interior painting	2,000
Remodelling plumbing, and toilet accommodation	8,800
Contingencies	900
	$15,000

This is being done as a result of a report from the chief architect which is as follows:

All of the above works are urgently required, and I would recommend that an item be placed in the supplementary estimates for 1926-27 as the amount required for these works is too large to be taken out of the general vote for the maritime provinces.

Item agreed to.

Maritime provinces generally — Dominion public buildings—improvements, repairs, etc., $43,000.

Mr. GARDINER: Are these for unforeseen expenditures?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is the general vote. It is about the same as the general vote for those purposes in the maritimes has been for many years.

Item agreed to.

Quebec—Baie St. Paul, public building, $20,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount of $20,000 is required for the purchase of a site and the erection of a building for postal purposes in the town of Baie St. Paul. Of this amount, $3,000 is for the purchase of a site, $12,000 for a building, $2,500 for fittings and lock boxes, $1,000 for grading and sidewalks, and $1,500 for contingencies and superintendence, making a total of $20,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What is the necessity for a building of this kind in this place?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The present facilities are not at all adequate for the purpose and the Post Office Department have stated that due to rural mail delivery routes starting from this point, the office as at present located is insufficient for the distribution of the mails. Baie St. Paul is the forwarding office for Rang St. Gabriel, Clairvaux de Charlevoix, Cap à la Branche, Ile aux Coudres, La Baleine, Point des Roches, Belley, St. Hilarion du Lac. St. Hilarion, La Mare, St. Urbain de Charlevoix, Bas de la Baie, and three others.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What is the size of the town and what is the revenue from the post office?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The population of the town is somewhere under 3,000 and the revenue for the last fiscal year was $3,867.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I suppose that is gross?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think so. The town has more than doubled in population in the last twenty-five years. It is a quite rapidly growing town now.

Mr. ERNST: What is the present population of the town?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Somewhere under 3,000.

Mr. STEVENS: That is a safe bet.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is very close to that.

Mr. CASGRAIN: It is the chief town of Charlevoix county.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is just another instance of the way the money of the country is being spent unnecessarily. Here is a post office in a small town of less than 3,000 people, with a gross revenue of about $3,500 and a net revenue probably of half that. It is now proposed to take the revenues of this post office for ten years to pay for a post office building. The last time these estimates were before this House we had another such expenditure proposed by the government, only the amount involved in that case was $12,000. The post office is not a mine of wealth at the present time. We have been reducing postage and giving the people cheaper facilities, and surely it is a bad principle to use the revenues of a post office for ten or twelve years to pay for a single post office building. That is what is proposed here. I call it wasteful, reckless financing. I wish the Minister of Finance were in the House. It was but a few days ago that he estimated his revenue for this year at $366,000,000. He has brought down estimates here totalling $356,000,000, and we have in addition railway estimates of $22,000,000, so that on his own showing, without the supplementary estimates, he is going to come short. He says also that he has $100,000,000 of maturing obligations this year, and he desires to pay off some of these out of revenue. On his own showing again he is going to be short. At the same time the government of which he is a member is unnecessarily spending money on public buildings. As I said before, if we had the money in the treasury, if our finances were in a flourishing condition, these buildings might be all right; they might be very appropriate in these places. But these places have waited for a long time without any very great public inconvenience that we know about, and I say there is no warrant whatever for the expenditure of $20,000 at this place any more than there is for the expenditure of $12,000 at Kensington, Prince Edward Island. If these places get these buildings, what about the other parts of Canada? Surely there are towns more important and with a larger postal revenue which need postal accommodation much more than this place. I would press on the government to drop these items. I do not suppose they will, but I am going to show my disapproval of them, just as I did the other night, by moving that this item be struck out.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil): The motion is out of order because it is simply a negative motion.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I then move to reduce the item by $18,000.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Does the government own a building at this place, or is postal accommodation being rented?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The information I have is that there is a very bad condition there on account of the number of offices that have to be served by this building.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): But does the government now own a building there, or are they renting one?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The post office occupies a small space in the town hall, eighteen by six feet.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): What rental is being paid?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not think rent is being paid. The accommodation is wholly inadequate for the distribution of mail.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): What I wish to point out, in addition to what the leader of the opposition has said, is that there will be a large sum for the maintenance of this building each year, thereby seriously decreasing the present revenue.

Mr. ERNST: In the supplementaries for 1926-1927 there was an item of $4,000 for a site for a public building in this place. Is that included in the $20,000?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Perhaps my hon. friend was not in when I gave the items which make up this $20,000. They included the site, estimated at $3,000, and the building, $12,000. I quite agree with what the leader of the opposition has said about a great many places needing additional postal facilities but it is quite impossible to provide it all in one year. What the government is trying to do is to proceed just as carefully as it can with providing accommodation only where it is urgently needed, just like the repairs at St. John. Nothing is being done under the vote asked for here that is not urgently required for the public service.

Mr. HANSON: Has any attempt been made to get increased accommodation by renting an office, or is this simply another payment of an election debt?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Not any more than the improvements in St. John are the payment of an election debt.

Mr. HANSON: The improvements in St. John are necessary.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I think it my duty to say a few words in reference to this item for a public building at Baie St. Paul, which has been criticized by the hon. leader of the opposition. It may be that when the House is informed of the condition there, and the reason for this vote there will not be so much opposition to it.

As has been well pointed out by the Minister of Public Works, this money is being appropriated for the construction of a post office building at Baie St. Paul, which is the chief town in the county of Charlevoix. The county of Charlevoix, including Baie St. Paul, is one of the largest districts below Quebec. The building in which the post office is located comprises the court house, the magistrate's court, which holds its sittings there, and the registration office, and to the post office a very small room is allotted by the county council. The accommodation is totally inadequate for the postal service in that district. The post office has been, I might say, sponging on the county council for the last twenty-five or thirty years. The post office has hardly as much space as the ordinary room allotted to members of the House here, and that is where the sorting and distribution of the mail has to take place for the whole district. Baie St. Paul is a distributing centre for the mails for the village, parish and the municipality of St. Laurent, as well as for the municipalities and rural routes such as St. Hilarion du Lac, St. Gabriel, Clairvaux de Charlevoix and Ile aux Coudres, with four post offices to serve.

[Mr. Elliott.]

I might point out to my hon. friend that it is not a new thing to construct post offices in other parts of the province of Quebec and elsewhere where the population is not so large as it is at this place, because the government that preceded the Union government in 1914, just at the outbreak of the war, when it was very necessary to economize, put up a post office building costing over $35,000 at Murray Bay, where the population was about the same size as at Baie St. Paul to-day. I say that if it was necessary for the Borden government of that day, on the outbreak of the war, when economy was very necessary, to spend that large amount of money, we can well afford to give to the district of Baie St. Paul to-day the same postal facilities that other parts of the province of Quebec and the country at large have been enjoying for years past. In view of these conditions I feel that the committee should not be reluctant to grant this vote.

Motion (Mr. Guthrie) negatived.

Item agreed to.

Chicoutimi public building—addition, $26,500.

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount is required for the construction of a two-storey addition 23 feet wide by 44 feet long along the east side of the public building at Chicoutimi, as a means of providing increased accommodation for the postal and customs service. The building is too small.

Mr. LUCAS: Is it a revote?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Item agreed to.

Drummondville public building—addition, $13,000.

Mr. ERNST: I should like to point out that this item was in the supplementaries, and while some of the items from the Conservative constituencies in Nova Scotia have been dropped, this item has been placed in the main estimates again.

Mr. ELLIOTT: In that regard, it is in exactly the same position as the St. John customs house and the St. John post office. It is not a question of its being a Conservative or a Liberal riding; it is a question of urgency. Only those matters that are absolutely urgent are put in.

Mr. ERNST: Does the minister not consider that a vote passed by this House last year in respect to a post office at Mahone bay should be just as urgent.

Mr. DUFF: No.

Mr. ERNST: I am asking the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have no doubt that my hon. friend feels that the requirements at Mahone bay are perhaps greater than in any other riding in the country.

Mr. ERNST: Not at all.

Mr. ELLIOTT: In common with many other matters, as soon as the government can see its way clear to do so this matter will receive consideration, but at the present time the government is trying to meet the requirements only of the urgent cases. My information in regard to Mahone bay is—there was a report and it was in the supplementary estimates—that the congestion is not so great there as in this particular case.

Mr. ERNST: Why was the vote in last year's supplementaries if it is not in the main estimates this year?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It was a mistake.

Mr. ERNST: Does the hon. gentleman admit the mistake?

Mr. HANSON: Is the statement of the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough correct, that he had it struck out of the estimates?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Ordered it out.

Mr. HANSON: Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I might say that there never was an interview between the member for Antigonish-Guysborough and myself in regard to Mahone bay. We have the reports from the officers, St. John is exactly in the same category. I saw nobody in connection with it. I go over the reports that come in from the officers, and we are trying to give the services which we cannot delay any longer.

Mr. MacLAREN: The post office at St. John was nearly destroyed by fire, and there was no way out of it.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is an absolutely urgent expenditure.

Mr. ERNST: I should like to point out that the word "interview" is rather an evasive word, but with regard to Mahone bay—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil): The hon. gentleman would not be in order to discuss Mahone bay.

Mr. ERNST: I am discussing it on the intimation of the minister that certain estimates which were in the supplementaries have been included in the main estimates, by reason of the fact that the Auditor-General's department, or whoever compiled the estimates, made a mistake. The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough made the statement that the people of Mahone bay had requested him to see that this item was not in the estimates. The next day, as soon as I saw it in the press, I had a telegram—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil): The hon. member is out of order. We are now on the item for the Drummondville public building.

Mr. ERNST: I do not think—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member is quite in order in referring to another item under Drummondville. He may make a comparison—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil): The practice is to permit discussion by way of comparison, but this is somewhat different—

Mr. GUTHRIE: It was only by way of illustration.

The CHAIRMAN: I think he is out of order.

Mr. GUTHRIE: He is well within his rights, I submit, to discuss Vancouver or any other place, by way of comparison.

Mr. ERNST: I am much indebted to the leader of the opposition for the opportunity he has afforded me. The member for Antigonish-Guysborough stated that the people of Mahone bay had requested him—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. ERNST: I say that the item concerning Mahone bay was not placed in the main estimates—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ERNST: The very next day I—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil): I cannot allow this discussion on the Drummondville item.

Mr. ERNST: I will abandon it—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. ERNST: —and will merely state—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Order yourselves.

Mr. ERNST: It is most extraordinary that estimates for buildings in certain constituencies that had been in the supplementaries were also placed in the main estimates, but items relating to other constituencies which voted Conservative were left out.

Item agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS: I think we have given the government very generous treatment to-day, and the exhibition we have witnessed in the last two or three minutes indicates that the committee is not going to have peaceful discussion. It is now eleven and I suggest that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I agree with my hon. friend that we have made fair progress.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend understands that the item respecting Drummondville has been carried?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Progress reported.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT, 1920, AMENDMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Before the adjournment of the House I move that the following names be added to the list of members comprising the special committee to which has been referred Bill No. 105, to amend the Food and Drugs Act, 1920: Messieurs Gervais, Howden, King (Kootenay), Totzke, Johnstone (Cape Breton North-Victoria), McQuarrie and Preston.

Mr. SPEAKER: This motion is made with the unanimous consent of the House. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

Friday, March 11, 1927

The House met at three o'clock.

ALLIED INDIAN TRIBES OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

JOINT COMMITTEE TO INQUIRE INTO CLAIMS

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received the following message from the Senate:

Resolved that a message be sent to the House of Commons by one of the clerks at the table to acquaint that House that the Senate hath appointed the Honourable the Speaker of the Senate, the Hounourable Messieurs Barnard, Belcourt, Green, McLennan and Taylor, as members of a special committee, to meet with a similar special committee of the House of Commons, to inquire into the claims of the Allied Indian Tribes of British Columbia, as set forth in their petition submitted to parliament in June, 1926.

WELLAND CANAL—IMPORTATION OF TIMBER

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) addressed a question to me yesterday with reference to the purchase of timber for the Welland canal. I find that there has been no timber purchased since 1924, so I presume my hon. friend must refer to that particular purchase. I have here a copy of an order in council relating to the matter which I will be pleased to hand to my hon. friend together with certain other information.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

The House in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Public Works—Kenogami public building, $31,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What is this for? Has the minister some explanation? We do not know anything about this.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Minister of Public Works): This amount of $31,000 is required for the construction of a public building in the town of Kenogami for postal purposes on a site situated at the corner of King George avenue and Ste. Famille street, purchased from J. O. Lacroix for the sum of $5,800.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What is the population and the amount of business done by the post office there?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The population in 1921 was 2,557, and is now somewhere around 3,000, I understand.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What is the revenue?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The revenue is $7,262.45.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is just another of these cases where, with a gross revenue of $7,000 it is proposed to spend $31,000 on a new building; our net revenue from that post office for the next ten years will go into that building. Is the building under construction, or has it been started?

Mr. DUBUC: In connection with this proposed post office I may say that the town of Kenogami is very close to Jonquiere, where Price Brothers have their large paper mill, and it is also very close to the large aluminum plant which is being built. Within the last year the population of Kenogami has doubled; there are now 5,000 people in that town with no postal accommodation whatever. The post office to-day is located in a store.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Cannot the government rent premises there?

Mr. DUBUC: Not in any place that we know of. It is a new village and even the population can hardly find the requisite lodging because of the tremendous development produced by the operations of the aluminum company and the paper mills at Kenogami.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is where Price Brothers have their big plant.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the explanation of the high cost of the lot? The sum of $5,800 seems to be a very high price for a lot in that village.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I assume it is the same reason that brings about high prices wherever a town seems to be booming. The population has doubled there within the last five years, and business seems to be very active. Not only have sites increased very greatly in value but buildings also.

Mr. GARDINER: When was this lot purchased?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The lot was purchased on the 21st October, 1925.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Was it purchased by private treaty or by public competition? Were tenders called for? I notice the purchase was made six weeks before the election. From whom was it purchased?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It was purchased from Mr J. O. Lacroix.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What officer of the government did the purchasing, or how was it done?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I assume the lot was purchased in the usual way. An officer of the department is usually sent down and looks over the lot. I may say to my hon. friend very frankly that my notes do not indicate what steps were taken towards purchasing it, but I assume it was done in the manner indicated.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Can the minister tell me the name of the officer in the department? There are some good officers and some that are not good ones.

Mr. ELLIOTT: They are nearly all good in the department.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Oh, no, they are not.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): Did you buy the land down there by the acre or by the foot? Tell us what the assessment is and we will find out what the value should be.

Mr. DUBUC: This is a corner lot and was bought by the foot two years ago, but it could not be purchased to-day for the price the government paid.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): How many feet are there in the lot? You have not furnished the information asked for yet.

Mr. DUBUC: The approximate dimensions are 75 by 125 feet. It is at the intersection of two important streets. It is the finest site in Kenogami being right in the very centre of the town.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): All I can say about it is that the whole business looks a little funny. I am not in a position to criticize the transaction in detail. If I had all the information—and I am sure some of the hon. members who live in the district must have—it might appear to me to be all right. Let me say, however, in closing this this matter as far as I am concerned at the moment, that I hope that next session when I come forward and ask for a post office building in a town of this size, or larger, and with far greater prospects of development than this—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes—

Mr. CANNON: You had better go and see what is taking place there.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): —I will not be faced with the difficulties that I have mentioned.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There is no Kenogami in your district.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Drumheller is likely to develop to as great an extent as Kenogami if not greater.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No doubt Drumheller is a progressive place and a fine town but my hon. friend should have more information when he talks of a subject like this. Kenogami is in the very centre of the district where the great developments are taking place on the Saguenay river. There is a town just near Kenogami which did not exist two years ago but where there will be 30,000 people next year. My hon. friend is really wrong when he says there are no prospects of development there.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The statement of the Minister of Justice as to my ignorance of conditions there would come with better grace from him if the minister handling the subject knew more about it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But my hon. friend is stating the facts as he does not know them.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): He has not got all the facts.

Item agreed to.

Limoilou—public building, $70,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will the minister give us pretty full information as to this item? It is a very big vote for a public building.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Tenders have been let, and we are asking for $50,000 instead of last year's vote of $70,000.

Mr. CANTLEY: Would the minister be good enough to speak up?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I will do the best I can and try to make my hon. friend hear. I am going to ask for $50,000 instead of $70,000. If one of my colleagues will make the motion we will have that change made. This amount of $50,000 is required for the erection of a public building on a site situated on La Canadierre road in the town of Limoilou. The proposed building will be a two storey stone structure 52 feet wide by 40 feet deep with a one storey annex at the rear 39 feet wide by 14 feet 6 inches deep. The building will provide accommodation for the postal service on the ground floor and will have offices and caretaker's quarters on the second floor.

Mr. MANION: What is the population?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Limoilou is part of the city of Quebec.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is hard to say what the population of the particular district served by the post office is, because Limoilou really forms part of the city.

Mr. MANION: Is it a subsidiary post office of the city of Quebec?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is on the other side of the St. Charles river.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well make the reduction and we will let it go.

Mr. DUNNING: I will move the reduction at the request of the minister.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

The CHAIRMAN: What is the reduction?

Mr. ELLIOTT: We are asking for a revote of $50,000.

The CHAIRMAN: It is moved by Mr. Dunning that the amount for public building at Limoilou be reduced by $20,000.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Maisonneuve—public building, $25,000.

Mr. MANION: What is the explanation of this item?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount of $25,000 is required for the fitting up of the old city hall building at Maisonneuve, which was purchased in 1926-27 from the municipal authorities for postal purposes. The purchase price of the building was $100,000, and the fitting up is estimated to cost $25,000.

Mr. MANION: When was the building purchased?

Mr. ELLIOTT: During the past year some time.

Mr. MANION: And what is the population of Maisonneuve?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is part of the city of Montreal.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The purchase price was $100,000?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That was the purchase price.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Last year there seems to have been a vote of $50,000 and this year we are asked to vote $25,000. How did we pay for the building?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That $50,000 I think is wrong. I have a note here which says that the amount of $50,000 in the 1926-27 column in the printed book was inserted by the Finance department. It is wrong; the correct amount is $125,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: $100,000 for last year and $25,000 for this year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Montreal general post office—reorganization, $50,000.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Explain.

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is required for the reorganization of the interior arrangements, fittings, installations and so forth as a means of providing improved facilities for the handling of mail. This reorganization has not been finally worked out, but tentatively it will include change of locations in the various branches of service in the building, and the installation of mechanical aids.

Item agreed to.

Montreal—ordnance stores building, $21,377.

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount is to provide for the seventh and final payment on the purchase of the Grant garage, No. 1 Hillside avenue, Westmount, together with possible interest charges on delayed payment from May 1, 1927. By July 1, 1927, the whole of the appropriation will be available. The total cost is $165,200.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is for the Department of National Defence?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Montreal—postal station in Outremont division, $50,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is a new vote?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, for the purchase of a site and the erection of a building thereon.

Item agreed to.

Quebec Citadel—Governor General's quarters —additions, alterations and improvements, $100,000.

Mr. HEAPS: Explain.

Mr. ELLIOTT: This vote is required for the remodelling of the Governor General's quarters in the Quebec citadel. The improvements embrace works of a miscellaneous character consisting of the remodelling and renovating of the quarters and the erection of a permanent addition for servants' quarters, kitchen and so forth. The work, it is estimated, will cost approximately $100,000. This was formerly the residence during part of the year of the Governor General, but the premises have fallen into disrepair to such an extent that the improvements will require the amount specified here, if the place is to be made habitable. It is Their Excellencies' desire to visit Quebec city twice a year.

Mr. HEAPS: Would it be possible to secure a suite at the Chateau in Quebec for the use of Their Excellencies, and so avoid this expenditure?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have no doubt it would be possible to get a suite there, but I can assure my hon. friend that the item has not been inserted in the estimates without the most careful canvass of the whole situation Even if satisfactory quarters could be obtained elsewhere for the accommodation of Their Excellencies, the government are of the opinion that we should not abandon this old historic building, a part of which was built over a hundred years ago. It is perhaps one of the most valuable historic monuments that exist on the American continent to-day, and is of interest not only to Canadians but generally.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I agree with the minister in regard to this vote. I think we ought to preserve this historic monument of past days for it is something in which every citizen of Canada should take a just pride. I have not visited the citadel since the Duke of Devonshire was here as Governor General, and even at that time the whole premises were sadly out of repair. If nothing has been done in the intervening years the place must be in a very dilapidated condition to-day. Possibly the amount asked for, $100,000, is large, but having regard to the fact that this is one of the outstanding historic sites in Canada I believe that the people of the country desire to have it maintained in a condition befitting our wealth and consequence in this land. While I am disposed to criticize much of the outlay proposed in these estimates, while I do oppose political expenditures throughout the country on post offices and other buildings for which there is no need at the present time, I am inclined to commend this vote, and I hope that the money we are now granting will place the Quebec citadel in proper shape, not only for the comfort of Their Excellencies, but also as a monument in which the Dominion at large is interested.

Mr. HEAPS: I have no desire to criticize any amount the government may spend to maintain historic buildings in Quebec or anywhere else in Canada. May I point out, however, that we have had no explanation so far as to how much money is going to be spent on the kitchen and how much will be devoted to the restoration of the historic portion of the premises. It is just possible that an inadequate proportion of the vote will be spent for the purpose indicated by the leader of the opposition, and in that case the grant will be altogether contrary to the views he has expressed. The minister might tell us how the $100,000 is to be apportioned.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am unable to give very definite details. The architect has been over the building but I may frankly tell my hon. friend that at this time of year it is quite difficult to estimate what it will cost to preserve a considerable portion of the existing structure. This vote is merely an estimate. The full amount will, however, be required and before the department is able to put the premises in that permanent shape which we desire, I rather think the amount will be exceeded. An attempt is being made to render the place habitable, as it is not now, both for winter and summer. Furthermore, a good deal of furnishing will be required as well as inside fittings. This is the estimate which the architect, after a careful survey of the whole place, was able to submit to us.

Mr. HEAPS: How long is it intended that the citadel will be occupied by Their Excellencies?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Of course, that depends upon the occupant. I should like to be able to give my hon. friend more information in regard to the matter, but I really cannot say how long they intend to keep up the old traditions in regard to retaining their headquarters at the citadel for a portion of the year.

Mr. BOURASSA: May I ask if the battlements, the walls, of the old citadel and everything connected with it are under the jurisdiction of my hon. friend's department?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The fortifications are under the Department of National Defence. I can give my hon. friend an exact description of the portion under Public Works, which is the part occupied for residential purposes.

Mr. BOURASSA: In case I may not be here when the National Defence estimates come before the House, I may say that I passed in front of the citadel last fall, and I observed that the walls and battlements were in a very bad state. Certainly there is urgent need of works and repairs for the preservation of that historic monument—I think much more urgent from that point of view than the object of the present item; I do not mean from the other point of view presented by the minister. The matter of the preservation of the monument has been neglected for some years past. I have observed, for example, in the moat surrounding the citadel and connected with the entrance to the internal courts, the wall is partly coming down and work is urgently required there.

Mr. POWER: I quite agree with what has been said by my hon. friend from Labelle. For the past seven or eight years, nearly every session, I have had a resolution on the order paper asking that the ancient walls and fortifications of Quebec be transferred from the Department of National Defence, in view of the fact that they are no longer useful for military purposes, to some historic commission, preferably to the National Battlefields Commission. When the hon. leader of the opposition was Minister of National Defence he received the resolution with great cordiality and took steps to transfer a portion of the ancient walls of the city of Quebec. The portion leading from Mountain hill over to Palais hill I think has been transferred in part to the city of Quebec. At the present time negotiations have been undertaken between the Minister of Justice and the Minister of National Defence, the mayor of Quebec, I think also Mr. Turgeon, speaker of the legislative council, and Sir George Garneau, with a view to having the three authorities, federal, provincial and municipal take the walls out of the control of the Department of National Defence, where they should not be, and preserve that historic monument for the future. With regard to this particular vote, in so far as it will help to build up the walls near where the Governor General's quarters are, it has my hearty support and endorsement. In order that the House may know that there is nothing political in this, I may say that the citadel is situated in my constituency, and I never knew until the estimates came down that there was any question of having a vote to repair the Governor General's quarters. I have made no representations to the Minister of National Defence or any minister with reference to this matter, but I may say that the repairs had been asked for by His Excellency, Lord Byng, and by other Governors General. Moreover it is, I understand, the intention of the government and of Their Excellencies to receive the Prince of Wales at the Quebec citadel next summer when he comes to Canada, and it is only fitting that the quarters should be put into proper repair and made fit to receive the prince.

Item agreed to.

Quebec—Savard Park hospital—repairs and alterations, $5,000.

Mr. MANION: What hospital is this?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Quebec Park hospital. This is for general repairs and improvements to the park hospital as requested by the deputy minister.

Mr. MANION: A marine hospital or a Department of Soldier's Civil Re-establishment hospital?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is one of the quarantine hospitals of the Health department.

Item agreed to.

St. Jacques L'Achigan—public building, $21,000.

Mr. ERNST: Is this for a postal building? I should like to know the revenue of the post office and the population of the place.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The annual revenue is $2,689, and the population is around 1,500.

Mr. MANION: I notice this is a revote of $16,000. Is it a new building entirely, or simply an addition to the old building?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is a new building now under contract. It is a revote.

Mr. KELLNER: Do public buildings mentioned in the estimates include post offices?

Mr. ELLIOTT: If it is merely a post office it is so described. If it is a building including post office, customs and armoury, it is then called a public building.

Mr. KELLNER: The minister has given the revenue from the post office, I understand, which has no bearing—

Mr. ELLIOTT: The postal revenue is supposed to have some relation to the business being done in a particular community.

Mr. SEGUIN: Besides the post office there is an excise office, there are five manufacturers of tobacco, and the revenue in 1920 was $18,000. I have not the latest revenue figures, but the offices are used for both post office and excise purposes.

Mr. BOYS: I should like to ask what is the policy of the department regarding the construction of post offices. The minister has given as a reason for the construction of this building the fact that the place has a population of 1,500, I think he said, and a revenue of $2,600. I think I could find quite a few places in my riding that I would like to bring to his attention, if that is to be the guiding consideration. Surely there must be some special reason for putting up a building in this place. If not, we may as well all get in on this. I have not made a request for the last ten or twelve years for an item of public expenditure in my riding outside of the town of Collingwood, which is an important harbour and has been for years and years, because I have understood right along that we were supposed to cut down and stop that sort of thing altogether. I have not heard a solitary reason advanced in this House for the construction of this building, or for that matter for the construction of buildings in a number of other places for which votes have gone through. I have no reference to the last item. If there is no other reason than a population of 1,500 and a revenue of $2,600, I would ask the minister if I come along with a proposal or two for public buildings in Simcoe county, in villages with a population of 1,500 and a revenue of $2,600, will he grant my request as well as the requests of other members of this House who have a similar situation in their ridings? If not, why is this item in here? Why is a building put up here and not elsewhere?

Mr. ELLIOTT: If my hon. friend comes with any request it will be very carefully considered, there is no doubt about that; and if the treasury had to depend for its protection on my generosity, it would not be as nearly as well protected as now when I have to get past the treasury board and council. But I think my hon. friend's question is a fair one in view of what is taking place. It is a matter to which I have personally given very serious thought. The policy of this government, as I stated the other evening, is not to construct public buildings for post offices or any other service except where they are very urgently needed. Various considerations enter into the question. Take the case of the public building that was being considered a short time ago at Kenogami, where the growth has been very rapid and it is impossible to get a store or other suitable building in a place of that kind. Take certain ridings, perhaps like my hon. friend's, which have received no public expenditure of any kind for a number of years, and there are a great many rural ridings in that category. Somebody asked, Why construct a public building in a place where the population is only so much and the revenue is only $1,500 or something of that kind? I would ask hon. members to consider the question in relation to a riding where there are no other public works, such as harbours, docks or anything of that nature, and where as a matter of absolute necessity, there has been no public expenditure perhaps for years, because in recent times there has been very little expenditure on buildings. The department is only constructing public buildings in places where the present facilities are inadequate, where the public are not getting the service to which they are entitled, where it is considered in the public interest to construct those buildings and where such construction does not involve a departure from a policy of rigid economy.

Mr. BOYS: The minister has not given us any special reason for this at all. He has only emphasized what I have tried to urge, that it has been the desire to economize, and that if there is going to be any expenditure it should be in ridings which have not had much public expenditure, and so on. But I have not heard a word to show that there is any special reason for the construction of this building. There may not be a post office there now, but surely one can be rented. I have in mind no end of places within a radius of one hundred miles of my own town where there is identically the same situation, but they are not getting anything. Let us hear from the minister why an exception is being made of this place. I know nothing about it personally, and I am not singling it out for attack; I simply want to know what is the general policy, and I want to be given some reason why this should be done in this case. If there is no special reason, I want the minister to give us all an invitation to pester him with applications in the future. He says that we may trust to his generosity. Well, I would like to feel that I could do that, and if he really means that as an invitation I shall be round to see him in the next year or two because I have two or three places already in mind. Let us see if we cannot get some reason why this building should be constructed.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend knows perfectly well that any visit from him would not be considered by anybody as pestering; I know my hon. friend too well for that. But so far as throwing out a wholesale invitation for everybody to solicit public buildings is concerned, I do not intend to do that, because I am endeavouring to carry out the policy that my hon. friend has indicated he is in favour of, of constructing public buildings only where they are urgently needed, and this particular building is only being constructed because there is no other building there that will afford adequate accommodation. The contract has been let and the building is under way.

Mr. MANION: I would just like to say to the minister that he is, consciously or unconsciously, throwing out the very invitation which he says he does not wish to give. I will admit that up to this year there has been a policy on the part of all governments since the war not to construct public buildings. I pointed out the other evening that there were some eighty or ninety places where sites had been purchased as far back as 1910 or 1911, when Canada did not owe two and a half billion dollars, with the intention of putting up public buildings. I gave Fort Frances as an instance. A site was bought there in 1910 or 1911, and there are from seventy-five to ninety other places where sites have been bought. Up to this present year the government, and our previous government, and the government before that, have lived up to the policy of not putting up buildings that were not absolutely necessary, but certainly this year when one looks through the estimates, one cannot fail to see that that policy has been absolutely departed from. I notice a number of public buildings for Ontario and Quebec, and we had a vote the other evening for a public building in Kensington, Prince Edward Island. I certainly submit to the minister that he is giving us all an invitation, by this departure from what has been the policy, to press for public buildings in various parts of the country, and I again draw to his attention the case of Fort Frances, which is not now in my constituency, but in the constituency of the present Minister of Labour, and which I pressed for a long time until I saw that the policy of both governments, ours and the previous government, was against public buildings of that kind. I think the minister would be well advised either to cut out a number of these items, or to make up his mind that he is certainly going to be pressed by members from all over the country for public buildings which are just as much needed as this one. Fort Frances, for instance, has a population of about four thousand. It is a prosperous, progressive, go-ahead little town with not a public building. They are right on the border, and they require not only a post office, but a customs office and an immigration office. Up until very recently they were in a rented office—

Mr. ELLIOTT: If my hon. friend will permit me, we have recently been able to get very satisfactory and commodious quarters in the Masonic temple at Fort Frances, and perhaps that is the reason why a new building is not being asked for there. If that building had not been available we would have been forced to erect a building as in these other cases.

Mr. MANION: I know the Masonic building and I do not agree that it offers very commodious post office quarters for a town of the size of Fort Frances, but it is much better than the former accommodation. However, the point I make is that when I was the member for Fort Frances I absolutely refused pressing for a building for that town because it was the policy of the then government and of its predecessor not to erect public buildings owing to the then state of the national finances. But now apparently the government is departing from that policy, and I fear the minister is laying himself open to pressure from all sections of the country for public buildings. During the last election I declared on the hustings at practically every place where I spoke that the government was making a mistake in departing from the policy of the two or three administrations of the past—the policy of renting accommodation such as we were doing in Fort Frances. This afternoon we have passed two or three items for public buildings, and while it is true that at Kenogami the aluminum plant is causing a rapid development of the town, that is all the more reason, I submit, why we should have rented a building temporarily so that we may be in a better position later on to judge of the ultimate requirements of the locality.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend must be perfectly well aware that where a town has doubled its population in five years you cannot rent buildings.

Mr. MANION: That is a very lame explanation. Does the minister mean to tell me that in such a progressive community there are no enterprising people who would not gladly put up a temporary building to rent to the postal department?

Mr. HEAPS: Why should not the government put up its own temporary building?

Mr. MANION: I have no objection if it is to be the policy of the government. This will only be a temporary building anyhow. But I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the government is making a mistake in departing from the policy of not putting up public buildings where suitable accommodation can be rented, and I certainly believe the minister as a result will soon find himself so importuned by requests for public buildings at one point and another throughout the Dominion that he will wish himself back in the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Where there are no troubles!

Mr. MANION: There are some, I admit.

Mr. FRASER: Mr. Chairman, I would direct the attention of the minister to another angle of this situation. I notice that the total expenditure for the province of Quebec this year is $635,027, while last year it was only $327,050. We are spending pretty nearly double in that province this year. Naturally, we come to the conclusion that the rest of the Dominion is entitled to an increased expenditure in the same ratio. In contrast to what is being done for Quebec, I turn to my own province of British Columbia, where I find that last year the expenditure on public works was $216,760, and this year it is $243,262—a slight increase, but not at all in proportion to the increased expenditure in Quebec. I submit in all seriousness that the demand for public buildings in British Columbia is equally as imperative as in Quebec. It is quite true that the latter province is going ahead at a very nice rate, but it is also true that important developments are taking place in my province. It seems to me if that is the excuse for the increased expenditure in Quebec, British Columbia should have been given more consideration.

Mr. MANION: Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, political developments in the province of Quebec were more satisfactory than in my hon. friend's province.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): The criticism of my hon. friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion) is perfectly sound. There is no need whatever for these new buildings to-day. He suggests a temporary structure, but there is no need even for that. Any store in that locality could very well provide accommodation for a branch post office, at a cost of practically nothing. In my riding we have several branch post offices, and I will guarantee that every one of them does more business than is transacted in any of these towns of 30,000 population. So it is a waste of money to buy votes in these little burgs. I should like to ask if any other buildings are required in the province of Quebec? Are you sure that you do not need a new city hall or an old one repaired?

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend knows that that is a municipal responsibility.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): I know, but several of these items appear to me to be municipal too. Is it the intention of the minister of erect all new buildings required in the province of Quebec as well as public buildings belonging strictly to the federal government?

Mr. POWER: Why not?

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): That is what you are getting.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Mr. Chairman, for a couple of days I have been waiting to hear the minister give the reasons underlying these expenditures on public buildings. Revenue apparently has nothing to do with the expenditure.

An hon. MEMBER: Population.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): No.

Mr. POWER: The good looks of the member.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The only requirement seems to be a beautiful surrounding country. Will the minister state what factors enter into the granting of these public buildings?

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend will see that in Quebec the greater proportion of expenditure is in Conservative ridings.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): Two wrongs don't make a right. If my party did wrong, that is no reason why yours should do wrong too.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It answers my hon. friend's argument absolutely. My hon. friend from Cariboo (Mr. Fraser) referred to what he termed the increased expenditure for public buildings in Quebec over that voted last year, but he has overlooked the fact that the total of $635,027 includes $100,000 for the Quebec citadel, $50,000 for a postal station in Outremont and $50,000 for reorganization of the Montreal general post office. Those three items make up the difference between last year's and this year's expenditure. In answer to my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Ross), reports come in from the departments, we study the information, and we select only the places where that information leads us to the conclusion that the expenditure is absolutely required.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): What department first recommended the expenditure that we have just passed?

Mr. ELLIOTT: We obtain our information from the records on file in our department as to the requests that are made for new buildings, and then inquiries are always made of the Post Office Department as to the necessity of any new postal buildings. With all this information before us we come to a conclusion. I may say to my hon. friend that none of this expenditure is avoidable.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The minister referred a moment ago to recommendations from departments. What department recommended this last expenditure that we have passed?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am going by the records in my own department. We look them over very carefully.

Mr. STEVENS: There must be a pile of them.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Who made the request for this item?

[Mr. A. E. Ross.]

Mr. BOYS: The member, of course.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I see that this particular matter is one of long standing; an order in council was passed as far back as October 21, 1925, authorizing the acceptance of a tender which had been received at that time for the construction of a public building there.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Will the minister tell us who tendered?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes; Albert Brouillet and Joseph Burgy. These tenders were for $10,450 and $11,675 respectively.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Will the minister then tell me who called for the tenders?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The Department of Public Works, of course.

Mr. BOYS: I am going to make one more effort to see whether I cannot get some special reason. I think the minister, whom I personally know to be very fair, will agree with me that there are from 50 to 100 towns and villages in the province of Ontario with a population of 1,500 or over from which the postal revenue is $2,600 or more, which are situated exactly as this place is situated. The post offices in these places are now in rented buildings, and if I can I want to find out why a building is to be constructed in this place while other applications are rejected. If my statement is wrong I am ready to be corrected, but I firmly believe that there are certainly over 50 places in Ontario with just as much right to a new building. I do not need to stick to Ontario because I live there; I would say that in the maritimes and in the west there are places of this kind as well. Why was this place selected? There must be some reason. I can appreciate the personality of the member and the generosity of the minister, but when we once pass over that there must be some basis on which this is done. Why did the minister finally decide to construct this building here when he must know that there are hundreds of places in Canada equally entitled to a new post office? The minister has given no reason other than the revenue and the population and the fact that there is no building in the town. Does he say he has anything on record to show that any effort has been made to rent a suitable building and to pursue the policy of economy which has obtained in this country for the last twelve or fourteen years? I think we should have some information along that line; if that is not the case we must come to the conclusion that this is the result of persistence, and perhaps one must consider whether or not the riding in question has returned a supporter of the government. I looked through the items for Ontario and found only two in constituencies represented by Conservative members. That in itself would be no answer, I admit, if a real reason for the construction of this building can be given, but it is a fact that as we look over the list we find that where these buildings are going up there are supporters of the government, and in places where there are no buildings to be constructed there are supporters of the opposition. For the moment let us forget that, but I would ask the minister to read from his record, if he has no personal knowledge, some good reason which can be advanced for the construction of this building?

Mr. ELLIOTT: If my hon. friend heard me correctly he would realize that while I am taking full responsibility for this item being in the estimates, the contract was let before I took charge of the Department of Public Works, and I give that as the reason why I am perhaps unable to say just what actuated the minister who called for tenders. I do know, however, from discussion with the former minister and from what other hon. members have said, that he only pursued the policy of erecting buildings where no other accommodation was available and where they were absolutely required in the public interest. I quite agree with my hon. friend that there are a great many places not only in Ontario but throughout the whole of Canada which urgently require public buildings just as soon as funds can be provided, but we do not think from the information at hand that they are so urgently required as those that have been put in the estimates. That is all I can say.

Mr. BOYS: Give us a reason in this particular case; that is all I am asking.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The reason in this particular case was that over a year ago, as I understand it, they came to the conclusion that because of inadequate facilities this was one building they were compelled to proceed with.

Mr. BOYS: What can be the inadequate facilities in a town of 1,500? If the minister could say that the post office was located in some miserable little building only ten by twelve or something like that with the floor all warped making it dangerous, and that there was no other place available that could be rented, that would be a good reason. I could refer him to the town of Bradford in South Simcoe; that is a very nice and very live town. I have been in the building there and I would say that in some places the floor is warped so badly that it is a foot higher than in other places, and in my opinion it is absolutely unsafe. I have been pressed to ask for a building there but I have not done so, because I understood the policy of the government to be as I have indicated. The minister has given us no reason for this building except the population and the revenue, he has not given a solitary fact to show that this is an outstanding case which requires special attention or consideration at the hands of the department.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It seems perfectly clear from what has happened with respect to these estimates that the policy of the government has been to relax the restrictions which have existed for many years in connection with the building of post offices in these smaller places. I would submit that in most of these places there is no difficulty in securing adequate quarters. In most of these small places you will find a merchant who will be very glad indeed to provide a building in connection with his store for the use of the post office, because the location of a post office in such quarters has the inevitable effect of drawing trade to that store.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does my hon. friend think that is fair to the other merchants?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I am not discussing that at the moment; they seem to be quite well satisfied. I wonder if the minister is directing his policy as to the construction of post offices on the question of what is fair as between the merchants of the particular towns? I wish to point out that in these smaller places there is really no difficulty in securing adequate accommodation, but the former policy seems to have been departed from at an enormous capital cost. I think it is an undoubted fact that when you consider the cost of construction as well as the cost of maintenance, in many cases it will be found in these smaller places that the whole of the revenue is consumed, and that instead of a surplus we will be faced with a deficit from year to year. I ask the minister if he has considered that, and if that is not the certain effect of this new policy which appears to have been adopted?

Mr. FARFARD: Mr. Speaker, if hon members of the opposition would overcome their prejudices against the province of Quebec and would look at the facts as they are, they would not offer so many criticisms of a vote so important to the village of St. Jacques l'Achigan. They complain that all the public works in the province of Quebec are being given to those counties which elected Liberal members. If our friends were a little better in arithmetic, they would understand that in a province which returned sixty-two Liberal members out of sixty-five, it is altogether logical that the proposed works should be given to those counties which returned Liberals.

Mr. PETTIT: In view of the information given here to-day in connection with public buildings I would remind the minister of the case I cited the other day in the constituency of Welland, that of the town of Thorold, Thorold has a population of 5,500. The post office serves a population all told of about 10,000. The building is a dilapidated two storey building 15 feet wide by about 65 feet long, and the public space for all that population is only 7 feet by 15 feet. I am instructed that the net revenue of that post office is $15,000 a year, and the rental paid by the government for that dilapidated building is $700. Moreover the town of Thorold is a customs port with a revenue of $500,000 a year, and the government pays $700 for another dilapidated building for the customs office. It strikes me that these two offices, the post office and the customs office, ought to be combined in one new building, and the rental of these buildings saved. I would suggest that the minister take these facts into consideration and see that a suitable post office is erected in that town. Surely if villages having a population of only two or three thousand, and a revenue of only from $2,000 to $5,000 can get a suitable post office, the town of Thorold is entitled to a building commensurate with its size and importance.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Is my hon. friend referring to Port Colborne?

Mr. PETTIT: No, to the town of Thorold.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Did my hon. friend not mention Port Colborne?

Mr. PETTIT: No, Port Colborne has a very suitable and necessary building as it is a large customs port and has a population of some 5,500, but I am now referring to the town of Thorold.

Mr. SHORT: I understood the minister to say that the needs of these towns are investigated and when urgent need exists for the erection of such a building one is erected. I want to call his attention to remarks made by his predecessor, Mr. King (Kootenay) the other night. The former Minister of Public Works mentioned the town of Bridgetown in Nova Scotia particularly, and he said there was urgent need for a public building to be erected there. Now I want to know if the Minister of Public Works will take into consideration the suggestion thrown out by his predecessor and have an amount placed in the supplementary estimates for a public building in the town of Bridgetown?

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): I understand the reasons given by the Minister of Public Works for this expenditure were as follows: that the postal services at this point are inadequate, that the public are not able to get the service they are entitled to, that it is in the public interest that a building should be erected in this town and that no other available or suitable premises can be secured to provide adequate accommodation. I also understood the minister to state that the town had a population of about 1,500, and that the revenue from the post office was $2,600 odd. Now in the town of Oxford, in the province of Nova Scotia, there is a situation which meets exactly all the conditions that the minister has laid down for the building of this particular post office. In addition to the reasons mentioned by the minister there is the fact that the revenue at the Oxford post office is upwards of $7,000 annually, also that it is a centre from which a great many rural routes radiate—in fact it is a very important industrial and agricultural centre in the county of Cumberland. Last year this matter was brought to the attention of the Department of Public Works, and plans were supplied showing the present deplorable service; the post office is located in a shack 21 x 24 feet and the postal service afforded the people of this town is disgraceful. The board of trade and the town council of Oxford have both passed unanimous resolutions requesting that a new post office building be erected there. Private citizens have also complained. It is not possible to secure a suitable building in any other portion of the town to be used as a post office and I hope the minister will include in the supplementary estimates this year an amount sufficient to erect a respectable post office building in Oxford which would also provide accommodation for the customs service.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I point out to the minister that he has authorized an expenditure upon this post office, and that the net proceeds from the postal services in this town will not be sufficient to pay the interest on the money required to erect the building. Therefore that building will be a loss to this country from the time it is put up. The minister seems to have established this as a practice, and when he is asked to give a reason for it he entirely begs the question. He may desire to get off by begging the question, by telling us that the post office is necessary, and saying that the erection of this building was unavoidable. But I ask him two questions: First, why is it necessary to build this post office in 1927 when we could get along with existing accommodations in 1926? Secondly, have there been any representations showing that it is more necessary to build this post office in 1927 than it was in 1926?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think my hon. friend could not have been present during the discussion because it has been already stated that this contract was let in 1925.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Why was it not proceeded with? If this contract was let in 1925 it was probably thought necessary to erect the building. Subsequently it was found not necessary and it was not proceeded with.

Mr. JELLIFF: There may be reason for the increased post office facilities in this particular place, but I am somewhat concerned about the very rapid growth which has taken place in this estimate. In the estimates for 1925-26, if I understand them, there was an item of $10,000 for this building. Last year that was increased to $16,000. Now we have an estimate, which I assume to be for the same purpose, of $21,000, an increase of $6,000 last year, and a further increase of $5,000 this year. This is over double the estimate of two years ago. I think the minister should explain the reason for that growth; it is entirely too healthy.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The original specifications called for a one storey building but that was found inadequate and later on it was decided to erect the two storey building for which this vote is asked.

Mr. JELLIFF: Even if a two storey building is put up, does it require a doubling of the estimate?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is not doubled.

Mr. JELLIFF: I am not objecting; I merely want an explanation.

Mr. STEVENS: Is the upper storey for the accommodation of the caretaker?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Partly for the caretaker and partly for other services.

Mr. CANTLEY: In the estimates now passed for Nova Scotia there is not a dollar for new construction in the whole province. Two-thirds of the whole amount of $38,000 is represented by a payment from one department to another for rental in Halifax. Other items are simply repairs to public buildings, of no particular consequence so far as these votes are concerned. In my own county of Pictou last year, we had some difficulty in connection with post office accommodation. In that incorporated town of about 5,000 people, the accommodation was unsatisfactory, but we did not ask for a public building, and the department was able to make a new lease for a suitable office at a rental of $50 a month the proprietor providing heat, light, water, and sewerage for the amount stated. On the item of $26,000 now before the committee the interest at 5 per cent will amount to $1,300 per annum, to say nothing of heating, lighting, sewerage, and other items that must necessarily be borne by the department. What can be done in one town in one county of Canada can be done elsewhere and I see no reason why the minister should not adopt that policy in small places in view of the financial condition of the country.

As regards the town of New Glasgow, the postal accommodation in the present building is totally inadequate to the actual business being transacted. The minister and the chief of his department know that. Plans were prepared by the department four or five years ago, and may still be referred to, calling for an extension or a remodelling of the building. In the busy season there are eighteen or twenty employees in that office, in which there is hardly room to move about. The building is crowded with mail matter which is piled over every available place, on floor, windowsills, on heating apparatus, and everywhere else. The people there have repeatedly applied to the minister's predecessor to take this matter in hand and have satisfactory arrangements made, and I understand that the postal authorities have also pressed for it. They are fully aware of the necessities of the case. Will the minister be good enough to give me an undertaking now that when the supplementary estimates come down he will do something in this regard? We have foregone a new building in the other town to which I referred a moment ago, and we got over our difficulty by paying a rental of $50 a month. What is the minister going to do regarding the New Glasgow office, the conditions in which are deplorable? We do not want a new building; we simply want to have carried out the arrangement proposed by the Public Works department itself, of which the plans are in the possession of the department.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am sure that any representations my hon. friend makes will have the best consideration we are able to give them, but he will readily understand that it is impossible for me—

Mr. CANTLEY: Oh! "The best consideration" means nothing to me; I am more than four years old. Will the minister give me a definite answer? Let him be manly enough to say yes or no.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I know my hon. frend wiill not misunderstand me.

Mr. CANTLEY: I do not misunderstand you at all.

Mr. ELLIOTT: But if the hon. gentleman thinks for a moment, he will realize that I cannot give him an undertaking of that kind.

Mr. CANTLEY: I do not realize any such thing. I know the minister can make me a promise if he wishes to do so, but he wants to avoid making a definite statement.

Item agreed to.

Waterloo—public building, $22,000.

Mr. FRASER: Some of this money was spent last year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Up to the 1st of March, we paid for the site $3,650 and for advertising $85.71.

Mr. FRASER: What is the total of the proposed expenditure?

Mr. ELLIOTT: $22,000, of which $19,000 is a revote.

Item agreed to.

Ontario — Dominion public buildings — improvements, repairs, etc., $115,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is the usual amount?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Durham—public building, $20,000.

Mr. BOYS: The reasoning I endeavoured to apply in connection with the previous item would apply here. Without my repeating it, will the minister enlighten the committee as to the necessity for this vote?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is one of those cases in which for years the necessity for a public building of this kind has been urged and recognized. The site was bought in 1912, and the erection of the building was requested by Mr. R. J. Ball M.P., on November 30, 1911, December 3, 1918 and April 29, 1919. It was also requested by resolution passed by the town council on January 10, 1921, and by Mr. J. Murdock, mayor of the town, by letter dated in March, 1926. This is a particularly active country business place the postal revenue amounting to $6,368. A site was purchased in 1912 for $4,600. The population is between 1,600 and 1,700.

Mr. BOYS: That was the information we wanted in connection with the other vote, and if we had received it we should have been able to pass the item in much shorter time.

Item agreed to.

Glencoe public building—tower clock, $1,700.

Mr. STEVENS: Is this an alarm clock for waking the caretaker up?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The public building is there and when it was constructed—

Mr. STEVENS: When was that?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I should think about fifteen years ago. A space was left for the clock, but it was never installed.

Mr. BOYS: I suppose you will get the bells later.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Is there any tower where this clock can be placed?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, the space is there awaiting the clock.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): How would it be if they used the clock in the tower of this building, which hasn't been running for two or three years?

Mr. CANTLEY: I would like to call the attention of the minister to the fact that the building in New Glasgow that I mentioned a few minutes ago has also a place for a clock, but we are not asking for a clock. What we do ask is that reasonable accommodation be provided in the building which exists there. The minister made reference to his having received resolutions from the town council and other bodies in regard to the situation. I could provide him with several resolutions that have been passed year after year calling attention to the condition of affairs in that building, and again I ask, will he be good enough to give me some assurance that he will have the matter attended to this year.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The word of my hon. friend and any representations that he may make, if he will discuss the matter with me, will carry more weight with me than any resolutions from any organization.

Mr. CANTLEY: Sufficient weight to ensure it being done?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Sufficient to ensure it being done if it is reasonably possible to get it done.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Might I ask for the same details on this item as on the previous one?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The postal revenue is $5,178 a year. It is a very flourishing town.

Item agreed to.

Haileybury—armoury, $11,000.

Mr. ADSHEAD: This is the second item for an armoury. I did not notice the first, and so did not have a chance to bring up this matter, but I should like to ask the minister what is the object of building these armouries? Are you increasing the militia, or is the National Defence department expecting a war or something of that kind?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The armoury was burnt down in the Haileybury fire, which practically wiped out the town, and this is the amount required to complete the reconstruction of the building, over and above the amount of the insurance.

Miss MACPHAIL: I am not sure that my question will come in its right place here, but when armouries are used for public meetings, as they are in my constituency, quite a large fee is charged, say ten, twelve or fifteen dollars, and meetings may be held in the armoury a dozen times during the year. Is this money returned to the department, or where does it go?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Apart from the small armouries which are constructed by the Department of National Defence, the armouries are built by the Public Works department. The rentals to which my hon. friend refers all go to the National Defence department, I think.

Miss MACPHAIL: I have been interested in finding out where the money paid in my constituency actually did go. It was not sent in to the National Defence department.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Is it the policy of the department to allow armouries to be used for public meetings? In the city of Calgary we granted a park site for an armoury, and it was understood that when the armoury was built the large auditorium in it could be used for public meetings, but after the building was put up, they refused to allow it to be used for that purpose.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend the Minister of National Defence can perhaps answer this question better than I can, but from certain experience I have had in connection with the renting of armouries over a more or less extended period, I know the practice has been, where there is no other public building suitable for the purpose, to allow the armoury to be used if the people of the community desire it for a public meeting, and are willing to pay the expenses of the caretaker, and the cost of heating, and so forth.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Before the armoury was built in Calgary they came before the city council, of which I was a member, and we came to a gentleman's agreement whereby we were to be allowed the use of the armoury auditorium for public meetings, but after they got the site they would not allow us to use the auditorium. I wish the minister would take this up with his colleague the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. RALSTON: I shall be glad to give the hon. member who last spoke any information he desires as to the practice of the department. It is true that the department permit the use of armouries for public meetings, and it tries to make the arrangement as fair as possible in order not to bear unduly. If there is any particular arrangement my hon. friend has in mind, or he knows of any organization that desires to use the armoury, I should be glad if he would let me know.

With regard to the question of the hon. member for Southeast Grey, I would be very interested if she would let me know of any instance in which moneys are alleged to have come in to the department or have been paid to any officer, and I shall have inquiries made at once. I remember that inquiries were made of the department by the hon. member in regard to a particular instance, and it was found that no such funds were received. Perhaps she would let me know to whom the payment was made, and I shall be glad to follow it up.

Miss MACPHAIL: I have no such information, but I wrote to the department, as the minister will recall. This is the policy that has gone on for years in the only armouries there are in Southeast Grey. I do not suggest that we are paying too much, but apparently that money does not leave the village in which the armoury is situated, and if that is true, I would like to know why the cost is so much as ten dollars, because it certainly does not cost that much to heat the building. We have had a most unsatisfactory condition in Southeast Grey, and I have tried on two or three occasions to have the thing cleared up, without any success at all, so I want to know what the policy of the department is in regard to this matter. When people pay their five or ten dollars a night for the use of armouries, where does that money go?

Mr. RALSTON: To the minister and to the department. It may be used immediately and automatically to repay the cost of caretaking expenses.

Mr. MacLAREN: It is necessary to cover the cost of insurance of the armouries against fire. I understand that the department does not insure these buildings, but when it loans the buildings for use for other than military purposes there is a sufficient charge made to cover the fire insurance, which I think is fair enough.

Mr. BOYS: I think this is a convenient time to have some statement as to the terms on which the various armouries may be secured. As far as I know, there is no rental at all. You have to pay the insurance, and employ two firemen of a local brigade to be on the job the whole time, and you have to pay the caretaker a certain sum of money. These payments may be considered as rental, but I do not believe there is any rental whatever which goes directly to the exchequer of the Dominion, and I think this would be an appropriate time to discuss this matter. I want to absolutely and thoroughly endorse the practice that has been in vogue. I think it is a splendid thing where those armouries are situated, that they should be put to some public use, and not be left idle and, of no service to the community at all. I hope there will be no curtailment of the present practice, and that if anything it will be increased. It is just as well that the community should understand that they could get the armouries more or less as a sort of right upon certain defined terms, which would apply to all the armouries throughout Canada. I think there is some variation in the practice; sometimes it takes a week or ten days to secure the use of these buildings, and there should not be this delay. There should be fixed terms and there should be an officer in charge; or better still, someone connected with the local militia in the town should be clothed with the necessary authority to speed up and make arrangements. I do not know whether I should ask for the information from the Minister of National Defence or the Minister of Public Works, but I am sure we are all interested in knowing what the terms are.

Mr. RALSTON: I think I can supply the information. The Minister of Public Works is quite right in saying that while the armouries are constructed by the Department of Public Works, they are operated by the department over which I preside, and I must admit there has apparently been some variation in policy with regard to terms. But I am endeavouring to get that down to a set basis, namely a basis such as has been suggested by my hon. friend, where there would be no such thing as rental. We want as far as possible to make the buildings available as community buildings, but I desire to warn hon. members that those buildings are built as armouries, for the purpose of training, for the use of the local units in training, and it is extremely discouraging for the officers and men of the local units who have endeavoured to arrange their training for after hours to find the armouries let for other purposes. In my own town there happened to be a poultry show, which one officer referred to as a "hen show", and he did not like the armoury to be used for that purpose. Nevertheless, the policy of the department is to permit these armouries to be used as freely as possible, particularly in cases such as mentioned by my hon. friend from Southeast Grey, where there is no other accommodation of equal size and capacity. As to the terms there has been, I know, a condition imposed in the past that the buildings be insured, or an amount paid for the insurance. I am inclined to overcome that situation by having reasonable precautions taken by those using the armouries, to have local firemen provided as has been suggested, and to take whatever precautions may be necessary to prevent fire without putting the applicant to the expense of paying for insurance. There have been set rates made, so far as caretaking is concerned. There was a fixed amount, I think $20 in some cases—

Mr. BOYS: I have paid $10.

Mr. RALSTON: —depending on the size of the armoury, on the number of caretakers and the amount of cleaning. No one attempts to account for the last cent to see whether that is the actual amount paid to the caretakers. I may say, for the information of the House, that these are the terms and that is the general policy. I am endeavouring to have this matter standardized, so that all will understand the terms on which they can get the buildings.

With regard to the time for application and the time it takes to put it through, these applications have been required by the quartermaster general to come to headquarters. I am not prepared to say that that policy will be changed, but everything will be done to expedite these applications, if it is necessary to have them sent in, so that as little time as possible will be taken up. Those who should know best whether the armouries are available would be the district officers commanding, who are on the ground. But there has been a certain policy in the past and I am not sure as to the reason for it. I cannot say that the policy will be changed, but I can only assure the committee that everything will be done to expedite the applications as far as possible.

Mr. LANG: With regard to the buildings in Haileybury destroyed by fire and which are being rebuilt, I wish to inform the House that in October, 1922, a fire swept a great part of the country up there and the town of Haileybury was wiped out. The people of Haileybury had been using the armouries at different times for public meetings of various kinds during the preceding summer, and they had put insurance upon the armouries to the amount of $33,500, to protect the Department of Public Works against fire loss if the building should be burned while in use by them. It was a great conflagration which wiped out the homes of many of the farmers for miles around and destroyed nearly the whole town of Haileybury, burning the armouries. This insurance of $33,500 was placed by the people of Haileybury on the building at that time. After that the town of Haileybury commenced to build up again, and it has been almost restored to the position it was in before the fire of 1922. At different times after 1922 the people of Haileybury conferred with the government in Ottawa for the purpose of having the armouries rebuilt and having the $33,500 expended as quickly as possible. They wanted the armouries built in preference to any other public building which the government might erect. There were many reasons for that. Thousands of our boys in the north country formed a corps for the first time in the armouries building in Haileybury and there was a sentimental reason for desiring to see the armouries rebuilt. Since war time they had been using the armouries for public meetings and other purposes for the benefit of the community. When the armouries are completed the people are willing to do their part in regard to repairs and insurance if the department so requires. We sincerely hope that there may never come another occasion when the building will be needed for the purpose for which it was utilized during the war years, but if the necessity should arise I can assure the House that the building will be used just as extensively to help forward the nation's war efforts. As I say, the old building was insured for $33,500 by the people of Haileybury. This money was collected by the department and expended on the new armouries, so up to the present the building has not cost the government one dollar. In addition to that, the government got the benefit of the interest on the money during the three years before they expended it. I am confident that this will be a very useful building when completed not only for use as armouries but also for holding public meetings, and the people are glad indeed that this accommodation will soon be available to them.

Mr. SIMPSON: Arising out of my hon. friend's remarks, was the insurance fund used for building an armory or a community hall?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The $11,000 is required to complete the construction of the armouries at Haileybury. It will furnish accommodation for military purposes and for the customs, but primarily it will serve the purpose of a community hall, the title remaining in the government.

Mr. SIMPSON: I recall distinctly that the original vote was for the purpose of restoring the $33,500 insurance to the people of Haileybury for the erection of a community hall. The old armouries were used for that purpose. At the request of the Department of Militia and Defence the people of Haileybury insured the building, and after the great fire they thought they were entitled to the use of the insurance money for the purpose mentioned.

Mr. LANG: We hope to use the building for community hall purposes, but it is to be turned over to the Department of Militia and Defence at any time when required as armouries.

Mr. PRICE: While this item is under consideration I should like to direct the attention of the hon. Minister of Militia (Mr. Ralston) and the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Elliott) to the fact that during the Laurier regime a site was purchased in the city of Moncton for an armoury, but none has ever been constructed. As the hon. gentleman is aware, we have in that city a great number of returned men. Recently an appeal has been made by the Moncton branch of the Canadian Legion for the erection of armouries, and I presume the Minister of Militia has been sent a copy of that appeal. Moncton is the headquarters of a squadron of cavalry, a battery of artillery, a company of machine guns and a company of infantry. Will the Minister of Militia state if steps will be taken to have suitable quarters provided for these units?

At the present time the accommodation is altogether inadequate, consisting of a poorly constructed wooden building. This does not provide sufficient room for training, nor proper protection for the supplies now stored there. The annual surplus from the Moncton post office of itself would provide the necessary funds for the erection of a new post office, which is very much needed, and new armouries, that surplus being in the neighbourhood of $377,000. Sites for these projected buildings were purchased by the government some time ago, and I would ask the Minister of Militia to see that work in connection with the armouries is proceeded with.

Mr. RALSTON: I am afraid, Mr. Chairman, that this is not a case where I can even talk about favourable consideration just now, and we might as well be frank about it. The situation in regard to armouries has been very forcibly brought to my attention during the short time that I have been in the Department of National Defence, and I intend to have a survey made with a view to seeing if any better accommodation can be provided in certain cases, but I am afraid I cannot hold out very much hope of constructing new armouries just now. Propositions have come to me from various parts of the Dominion offering capital and sites of considerable value in an endeavour to induce the department to forward these capital expenditures. As far as we possibly can we are providing accommodation for training purposes. As the hon. member is aware, many of our armoury buildings were erected during the war. I am sorry that I cannot hold out any hope of further capital expenditure at the moment.

Item agreed to.

Ottawa departmental buildings—fittings, etc., $60,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Where is that for, may I ask? Is it for any particular building?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is for all the buildings in Ottawa.

Item agreed to.

Public Works—Ottawa—greenhouse, $27,000.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): I would like to ask what particular use we have for a greenhouse except to provide flowers for the House of Commons and the Senate? Why should we spend $27,000 for that?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount is to provide for the construction of a greenhouse and potting shed either in Major Hill park or on parliament hill, to replace the greenhouse now located in Major Hill park.

[Mr. Price]

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): What is to be the size of the proposed building?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The estimated cost is $27,000.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): The building we have now and which has served the purpose for years seems to have been large enough up to the present time. I will admit that the present building is dilapidated and that we require a new one, but if the new one were of the same size it would be sufficient for all our business unless it is to be used commercially.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The building we are replacing is dilapidated, out of repair and practically falling down, and this estimate is for that replacement.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): I assume the present building to be about 20 by 80; I do not think it is any larger, and from what I know about greenhouses a building of that kind can be constructed and equipped with a good water heating plant for less than $5,000. Why is $27,000 required?

Mr. ELLIOTT: All I can say to my hon. friend is that this is the architect's estimate. It is proposed to construct a greenhouse for Major Hill park to replace the present greenhouse which is beyond repair, as the woodwork has become so badly decayed that to renew it would practically mean rebuilding the superstructure. This is a revote.

Mr. STEVENS: Is the structure to be gothic or romanesque?

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): I object to putting $27,000 into a greenhouse; it is too much for the purpose intended, and there is no need for it at all. I would suggest that the amount be reduced to $10,000, which would provide twice the amount necessary, and I make that motion, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I might say in that regard that on account of the location and the fact that it is here in the capital city, $10,000 would not be very much money for the construction of such a building. The amount placed in the estimate is considered by the architect to be sufficient to no more than replace the present building, so that I hope my hon. friend will reconsider his motion.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): I am quite well satisfied that there is not need for such an amount for that purpose. I know that you can build a modern steel frame greenhouse with a first-class hot water heating plant, larger than the present building, for $10,000.

Amendment negatived.

Item agreed to.

Ottawa—towards purchase of building for government workshops, $13,300.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): May we have an explanation from the minister on this item? Where are these workshops?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is the fifth payment on the purchase of the property.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): Is that the property on George street?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Rockland—public building, $25,000.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I have not been very long in Ottawa, but I would like to refer the minister to the ramshackle old building in which the Bureau of Statistics is located. The floors in that building are like the waves of the ocean, and I would like to know if there is to be an appropriation for a new building or if something can be done to make that building more suitable for the purposes for which it is used. If a fire should come along all those valuable records would be lost. Is there to be any provision made for that in the near future?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I might say that the building referred to is one of many in Ottawa entirely out of repair and unsuitable for the purposes for which they are used. It is the intention of the department to start upon a program of construction of departmental buildings as rapidly as the funds can be obtained; it is intended to make a start this year.

Mr. ADSHEAD: May I suggest that that is one of the most dangerous fire traps I have ever seen, and that such valuable documents should be transferred to some stone building which would be more fire-proof.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will the minister give us some explanation of this item for a public building in Rockland?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount is to provide for the purchase of a site and for the construction of a public building in the town of Rockland. It is proposed to pay $2,000 for a site; $18,000 for the building; $2,500 for fittings, lock boxes, et cetera; $1,500 for grading and sidewalks and $1,000 for contingencies.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Who has requested this building? Who has made the demand?

Mr. GOULET: I have. Surely my hon. friend is not so badly informed as not to know where Rockland is. It is one of the principal towns on the provincial highway between Ottawa and Montreal and one of the most flourishing towns we have in the county of Russell. The population is close to 5,000, and I think Rockland amply deserves a post office.

Item agreed to.

Toronto—postal station A, mechanical equipment, $50,000.

Mr. SMITH (Stormont): Is this a political vote?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I can assure my hon. friend that none of these are political votes.

Item agreed to.

Manitoba—Dominion public buildings—improvements, repairs, etc., $35,000.

Mr. BROWN: Would the minister tell me if the public building at Morden is included in the list of repairs referred to here?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I may say to my hon. friend that this is a general vote for the whole of the province, and I assume that if the needs at Morden are as urgent as at some other places they will receive consideration.

Mr. BROWN: I understand then that the details of this expenditure are not decided upon?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Item agreed to.

Winnipeg—grain inspection building, $13,000.

Mr. GARDINER: Is it proposed to include in the estimates any vote for the testing laboratory at Winnipeg?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is under the department of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I cannot say offhand what the intentions are in that regard.

Item agreed to.

Saskatchewan—Dominion public buildings—improvements, repairs, etc., $17,000.

Mr. EVANS: I wish to say a word about the needs of the town of Biggar in Saskatchewan. Provision has been made for new public buildings in a number of places where it is claimed conditions demand it. But it seems almost impossible to get decent post office accommodation in the town of Biggar. The present post office is located in a shack between a Chinese laundry and a pool room, and the fire hazard is tremendous. Biggar is a thriving place in Saskatchewan, a divisional point on the Canadian National railway, and the Canadian Pacific passes it at a distance of one mile. Railways also go north and south from Biggar, and it is a growing place. The present population is about 2,500, and the revenue from the post office last year was $10,054. Seeing that votes for public buildings in other places have already been adopted, some of which are not nearly as urgent as in the case of Biggar, and considering the needs of the town, I would ask particularly that the government place a sufficient amount in the supplementary estimates to give Biggar a suitable public building.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I happen to know the town of Biggar very well, and I take it from what the hon. gentleman says that he is in favour of the erection of a public building there. In that respect he disagrees with some other hon. members who do not think public buildings should be erected anywhere. The case of Biggar is very deserving no doubt and will receive consideration when more urgent cases have been provided for. I will be very glad to give the matter the best consideration I can.

Mr. EVANS: Does the minister not think that this is one of the most urgent cases? The business done there exceeds that of other places some of them only one-fifth the size and earning less than one-third the revenue of Biggar, and yet those places have been voted public buildings. I think the needs of Biggar should receive immediate consideration.

Item agreed to.

Moose Jaw—public buildings—improvements and repairs, $3,500.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I know one cannot ask the minister to increase this item but I should like to say that while this post office may not show as big a revenue as other post offices I think it does a lot more work than any other post office in the province of Saskatchewan seeing that the mails for a great many branch lines are sorted there, and it is the transfer office for practically all the United States mails that come into that country. I do not believe the present vote will cover the improvements and repairs that should be made in that office, and I want to ask the minister if he will not introduce into the next estimates brought down a sufficient amount of money to take care of all those repairs and improvements?

Item agreed to.

Regina public building—addition to site, $150,000.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I should like to ask what the dimensions of this site are and the other details concerning it.

Mr. MANION: The first question from that side of the House to-day.

Mr. ELLIOTT: This amount of $150,000 is required for the purchase of property having a frontage of 50 feet on Scarth street, south of and adjoining the post office property, as a means of extending the post office building for the purpose of centralizing all the government offices in the city of Regina in one building.

Mr. STEVENS: Do I understand the minister to say that they are paying $3,000 a foot for property in Regina?

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps my hon. friend will permit me—

Mr. STEVENS: Could the Minister of Railways give us some more accurate information?

Mr. DUNNING: The question of post office accommodation in Regina is not one of local patronage in any sense.

Mr. STEVENS: No, we quite understand that.

Mr. DUNNING: Regina is the fifth largest revenue office in the Dominion. It will I know astonish some hon. members when I say that in the middle west we have an office which is the fifth largest revenue producer, yielding as it did $802,000 of revenue last year.

Mr. STEVENS: I thought Moose Jaw was larger.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): It does more work.

Mr. DUNNING: I am not going to discuss the amount of work done. Usually the amount of money received has some relationship to the amount of work done, but I do not propose to quarrel with my hon. friends from Moose Jaw and Saskatoon.

Mr. STEVENS: This is the most costly; that is the point.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. Past governments have on various occasions attempted to remedy the undesirable situation that has existed there for a number of years, and the government of which my hon. friends opposite were members bought a site, not adjacent to the post office at all, intending to use it for customs purposes. This site was acquired a number of years ago. The great problem in that city with regard to the post office is lack of ground floor space, and consequently the erection of a building elsewhere would not solve the post office difficulty. Naturally, as representing the city, I should prefer to ask for another public building to house the various Dominion offices there, but I recognize that such a building would not meet the situation in regard to ground floor space and the mechanical appliances necessary to handle the great volume of business now being done. Several years ago a small building across the alley was purchased to give additional space. It is connected by an overhead passageway with the main post office, but it does not in any sense contribute to the solution of the main problem, which is one of ground floor space. There was some discussion a year ago with regard to the purchase of fifty feet immediately south of the post office, and some negotiations were entered into between the Department of Public Works and the owners of the property. The price asked was, however, deemed too high and the provision being made here is to permit expropriation proceedings to be taken. That is the method the department proposes to pursue in connection with the acquisition of this property.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the expropriation proceedings be taken in the Exchequer court?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. I may say frankly that the post office in Regina is located in a situation where, to add to it, would involve the purchasing of some of the most highly priced property in the city, nad it is a question to determine whether we can better deal with this very awkward problem by erecting somewhere else an entirely new public building or by adding to the present post office. Officers of the department, more particularly the officers of the Post Office Department, can see no solution to the post office problem in Regina unless the present floor space is extended; and the property which it is proposed to expropriate consists of a fifty-foot frontage, one hundred and twenty-five feet in depth, I believe.

Mr. STEVENS: With buildings?

Mr. DUNNING: There is a large restaurant on the property now, a single storey building. Frankly, my own opinion is that the expropriation should have been made many years ago, when of course the property could have been acquired at a lower price. Had that been done we should not be in our present situation. I think I am right in saying—the Minister of Public Works can correct me if I am wrong—that it is proposed to dispose of the small building to which I referred a little while ago, and this will in a measure offset the expenditure here asked for. Once the site is acquired, however, it will be necessary to come back to parliament for enough money to erect the addition to the post office, which is very urgently required.

Mr. MANION: What is the population of Regina?

Mr. DUNNING: About 40,000. The postal revenue of the city is $802,000, and Regina is unique among places in its revenue class in that this is the only post office building in the city which is government owned. All the sub-stations are merely rented premises.

Mr. McGIBBON: Do you expect to get any return from the building which is to be scrapped?

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot say what its salvage value would be, but there will be a revenue from the sale of the small building now owned by the government. It is a valuable property, but, as I say, it is across an alley from the present post office. Facing as it does, however, on one of the main streets in the city I think probably it will fetch a good price, although it is only twenty-five feet in width.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I am not objecting to this vote because I happen to know the situation, and these western cities have grown to such an extent that it is necessary to augment their post office facilities. I would point out, however, that in the city I represent, situate in the centre of the constituency, we have, unlike Regina, a very inferior building. The building in Regina, while not large enough, is a good structure. I would urge upon the government the importance of providing proper post office accommodation in the city of Saskatoon. We have there a site which is a water hole, about 140 feet by 140, and there is a good deal of complaint in the city about its condition. The authorities paid $135,000 for the site, which is one of the legacies bequeathed us by the Tories. It was purchased several blocks away from the centre of the city and is not at all suitable for a post office. We feel that the time has come when we should have a new public building in Saskatoon, and I am in hopes that in the supplementary estimates a sufficient sum will be brought down this year to provide us with a suitable building for both post office and customs purposes.

Mr. EVANS: I support the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Young) in what he has said. Would not the government consider it a fair suggestion to give the city of Saskatoon better accommodation than it has at present? Regina has a very fine public building, while the city of Saskatoon, nearly of the same size, is without even a public building that can be called such. What we have there is nothing more than a makeshift, and the government is paying between $23,000 and $24,000 in rentals for space. As the hon. member says, the present site, which was purchased for a new post office, is not suitable. The building should be erected where the post office business is now carried on. Some years ago a contract was let for a building, but somehow or other it was suddenly cancelled. I do not know what the reason was. At any rate, one would think it only fair at least to spend impartially the available money. Regina is very well supplied while Saskatoon, as I say, has not even a public building worthy the name.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not object to Saskatoon's claims, which I know are strong. What my hon. friend from that city has said is true. But the proposal now before the House comes, and has come for years, from the post office authorities to meet the demands of mechanical operation. It is true that the present post office is a fine looking building, but from the point of view of the immediate necessity for an extension it is not adequate. The revenue last year at Regina was $802,000, while that of Saskatoon was $285,000, not half as much. I can well appreciate the argument that if Saskatoon had a post office large enough and sufficiently well equipped mechanically to handle the many functions of the postal service which now must be distributed because of lack of facilities, the revenue in that city might be high. I merely make this statement to meet the view expressed by my hon. friend (Mr. Evans), that we should put first things first.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I repeat, I am not objecting to this vote; I support it. I say, however, that Saskatoon occupies a unique position. A great deal of its work is due to the transfer of mail, and better accommodation is undoubtedly required. I am not asking for a public building immediately, but I hope that something will be done in the supplementary estimates. The building has been there a great many years. It was built for a city of ten thousand people, and it is now serving approximately thirty-five thousand. I would urge on the government again the advisability of getting all the facts and bringing down an estimate as early as possible.

Mr. WARD: Does the Minister of Railways say that property in Regina is valued at $3,000 a foot, or will a portion of this vote be used for the expropriation proceedings?

Mr. DUNNING: When the offer was made a year or more ago to purchase this property, the owners asked a price, including of course the building on the property, in excess I believe of $3,000 a front foot. The department did not believe the value was in it, and decided therefore to proceed by way of expropriation in order that the Exchequer court should decide what was the proper value of a piece of property of this kind taken under the circumstances that prevailed. The sum in the estimates is not by any means to decide the matter, but in order to give authority to the minister to proceed to expropriate and pay whatever sum the Exchequer court may decide to be the value of the property.

Mr. STEVENS: I think it is rather unfortunate that the minister has put in the estimates $150,000 for this additional site and then says he is going to expropriate, because those who own the property will undoubtedly produce the government's own estimate of its requirements as evidence in support of their claim as to the price. The procedure is simple. The Exchequer court sits on the case, and the owners of the property produce witnesses to bolster up their case. They will claim a certain price, probably beyond this, and among the evidence they produce will undoubtedly be this official estimate of the government of $150,000. This is not final, as the minister says, by any means. It does not decide the case, but it is supporting evidence and it strikes me that $3,000 a front foot is an abnormally high price for property in the city of Regina. I am not disputing what the minister said a minute ago about the importance of the city of Regina and the business they do there. It is an important centre and a very handsome revenue is collected there. All of that is admitted, but it is the method of approaching this question that I am speaking of, and I would say that you lose your case before you go to the Exchequer court. Might I ask the minister whether in considering these expropriation proceedings the government have arrived at a figure which they will first offer to the property holders, and on the other hand, have the government received from the owners of this property an offer of a price at which they will sell, between which two prices the decision has to be made.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The department have been notified by the owners of this cafe that they would not sell their property at $3,000 a foot frontage, as they claimed the property had enhanced in value owing to the Canadian Pacific having decided to locate their hotel just two blocks south, on Scarth street. I say frankly that our reason for expropriating is that we could not get the property at what we considered a proper price. I do not admit that it is worth even $3,000 a foot, but they would not take that price.

Mr. STEVENS: Has the minister made an offer?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am informed there was an offer of $3,000 a foot front, and that they refused it.

Mr. STEVENS: The committee is faced now with the exact facts. An offer has been made of $3,000 a foot front, which the owners have refused, and the case is going to the Exchequer court. We can therefore very properly say that the price will be something in excess of $3,000 a front foot, or $150,000. I do not wish to draw any invidious comparisons, but take for instance the case referred to a moment ago at Saskatoon. I am quite certain that it would not cost anything like that amount, comparatively speaking, to purchase a site in Saskatoon; it probably would not cost $1,000 a front foot, but here in the city of Regina—the capital city, it is true—you are paying $3,000 a front foot. To my mind it is an excessively high price.

Mr. DUNNING: One of the banks paid more than that.

Mr. STEVENS: One of the curses of fixing the value of city property is the price the banks pay for selected corners. It is something scandalous. A bank will come into a town or city and pay an exorbitant price for some choice corner, but I do not consider that as an argument to support the government's action. I am not sufficiently acquainted with Regina to say whether it might not be better for Regina to consider another site altogether.

Mr. DUNNING: From the point of view of the member for the city, I would much prefer an entirely new public building, but unfortunately I am faced with the post office difficulty, and I must admit that the post office officials are right in their contention that they must have an addition more especially to the ground floor space of this building. I should say that the owners of the building are not political friends of mine—

Mr. STEVENS: I am not suggesting that. That would not make a bit of difference to me.

Mr. DUNNING: They are good Tories.

Mr. MANION: The minister admits that there are good Tories.

Mr. DUNNING: Sure, my hon. friend is a good Tory. I should also say that one of the reasons for the price being high is, of course, that the owners of the building will claim damage with respect to the business.

Mr. STEVENS: I understand that.

Mr. DUNNING: There will be business damages. I was informed that this vote was necessary in order to enable expropriation proceedings to commence, that before getting the authority of parliament it was very doubtful if any expropriation proceedings could be gone on with. I was not aware that an offer of any specific figure had been made by the Public Works department for the property, but I do know that the parties concerned refused to sell to anybody at $3,000 per front foot.

Mr. McGIBBON: What is the value of the present post office?

Mr. DUNNING: I have not those figures. It was built in 1912.

Mr. McGIBBON: Could it be sold for anything like its present value?

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, no. It is a big building, but it is useful for no other purpose than that to which it is devoted. While the building is large, unfortunately it is not large on the ground floor, and the great problem of congestion is in connection with the postal facilities which must be handled on the ground floor.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Although it is not usual for Moose Jaw to find a friend in Regina, I must say that the post office in Regina is on perhaps the most valuable piece of property in the whole city. During the last few years Regina in proportion to its population has grown perhaps more than any other city in Canada; it is going ahead very rapidly. The post office property is very valuable, and I do not doubt that the restaurant is also very valuable from a business standpoint. I agree with the Minister of Railways that added floor space is needed in the city of Regina. I have known the city and its business for some time, and there is great congestion in the post office. There is not room in that building for a post office for a city the size of Regina, and I do not think there is anything out of the way in this vote.

Item agreed to.

Tisdale—public building, $12,000.

Mr. HEAPS: Could we have an explanation of that?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is required to purchase a site and to pay for the erection of a public building for postal service at Tisdale. The proposed building will be a one-storey brick structure, 32 feet 6 inches by 29 feet 6 inches. The estimated cost will be $8,500 for the building, $1,800 for fittings, $800 for grading and sidewalk and $900 for contingencies, total $12,000.

Mr. GARDINER: Have you a site there?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, we are asking for money to purchase the site.

Mr. EVANS: The revenue at Tisdale is nearly $3,000 less than at Biggar.

Item agreed to.

Alberta—Dominion public buildings—improvements, repairs, etc., $17,000.

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is generally for the repair of all the public buildings owned by the department in Alberta.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I am not going to ask the minister to build a post office in Calgary, although we need one; but I want to place certain facts before him in that regard. The post office was situated in the centre of the city on a site 100 feet by 120. My good friends to my right pulled it down and instead of building a post office they put up a fine armoury. They were going to build a post office. I am not censuring my friends to my right for not doing so, because the war broke out and the post office could not be built. At the same time all that is left there is an unsightly hole in the ground surrounded by a board fence about eight feet high. We have never had a post office since. It has migrated to three different places. First it went to Second street east, opposite the city hall; then it went to the Lancaster building on Eighth avenue west, and now it is in the Southam building on First street west. We do expect that before the lease expires the government will take into consideration the advisability of replacing the post office and I suggest that the government should do something at least to beautify that spot, and take into consideration the advisability of replacing the building which was torn down. The fence is a hideous one and should be removed.

Mr. JELLIFF: Is there any provision in this estimate for neeeded repairs to the public building at Lethbridge?

Mr. ELLIOTT: It will cover that. Public buildings generally are covered by this vote.

Mr. JELLIFF: At the request of some of my friends I visited the building and I will tell the minister that the building is settling and it needs decorating and repairing very badly. The minister perhaps knows that this building houses the post office, the Dominion land office and the income tax office. I wish the minister would look into this matter.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am much obliged for the information. I was not aware of the settling of the building to which the hon. member refers. If it is something which is within reasonable limits it will be covered by this amount, and if not we will have to provide other means.

Mr. JELLIFF: The matter has been reported; it is within the knowledge of the government inspector at Calgary.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Will the minister tell me if there is any truth in the story that the government is considering purchasing the Southam building at the expiration of the lease instead of getting a new post office? I shall be glad to confer with the minister further in regard to this matter.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have heard nothing of it. The lease does not expire for a couple of years.

Item agreed to.

Wainwright—public building, $15,000.

Mr. LUCAS: Could the minister give us a better explanation to-day than he gave us a few days ago why the vote for the public building at Camrose, placed in the supplementary estimates last year, has been left out?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I am afraid I cannot give any better explanation to-day.

Mr. STEVENS: A cabinet secret.

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Mr. LUCAS: The policy as to the construction of public buildings was determined, I understand, on the question of urgency.

I do not deny the necessity of the building at Wainwright, but will the minister tell us that there is a greater urgency for the building at Wainwright than for the building at Camrose?

Mr. ELLIOTT: From the information I have, there is urgency for the building at Wainwright, and there is a site available there. The matter has been under consideration for a number of years—since 1913, I think. It may be assumed that at that time a public building was considered necessary, and since then it has been pressed upon the government very frequently. The postal revenue of Wainwright is $6,313, and the building that is proposed to be erected would cost only $10,500.

Mr. LUCAS: What is the population?

Mr. ELLIOTT: About a thousand.

Mr. LUCAS: Will the minister compare those facts with the facts in relation to the Camrose building?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. LUCAS: Will the minister give the committee the facts in regard to Camrose as to revenue and population, just as he has given them in the other case?

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend will readily understand that I have details only in regard to the items which appear in the estimates.

Mr. STEVENS: The Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) can help my hon. friend out.

Mr. LUCAS: The town of Camrose has a population of over two thousand. The gross annual revenue from the post office is $16,561, and from the sub-customs office over $50,000. The government still hold a lot which I believe was purchased in 1912 or 1913. The request for a post office was placed before the government last year, when they considered it of sufficient urgency to include a vote for it in the supplementary estimates, but I regret to say that the item does not appear in these main estimates for some reason or other. I should be glad to have the minister explain why the item has been cut out. Otherwise the idea will prevail that urgency is not one of the factors considered by the government in providing for new public buildings.

Mr. FRASER: I should like to ask the minister a question along the same lines as that which I asked him a few minutes ago. I notice that in 1926 there was spent in Saskatchewan $20,919, while in the present estimates the total expenditure is $205,450—ten times more.

Mr. DUNNING: Hear, hear.

Mr. FRASER: Oh yes, that is fine, that is the way the west is going all over. But contrast this with what the government is doing for Alberta. In 1926 the expenditure there amounted to $45,422, but in these estimates the total provided for is only $32,000—a decrease of 25 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: What about British Columbia?

Mr. FRASER: I will deal with British Columbia when we come to the votes for my province.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Surely the member for the constituency in which Wainwright is situated will stand up for his own post office?

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

MONTREAL, OTTAWA AND GEORGIAN BAY CANAL COMPANY

The House resumed from Tuesday, March 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chevrier for the second reading of Bill No. 78, respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company.

Mr. E. A. McPHERSON (Portage la Prairie): Mr. Speaker, when the debate closed the other evening the Clerk Assistant was helping me by reading a document, and I suppose the proper thing would be for him to continue. If for any reason he has mislaid that clipping or forgotten that he was my assistant on that occasion, with the permission of the House I will go on.

Mr. DUNNING: He has lost the clipping.

Mr. McPHERSON: I can assure hon. gentlemen that it was a very fine clipping, well worth inserting in the records of this House. At that time I was discussing the question of how the province of Ontario was handling its own power, and a certain amount of objection was taken to my statement that this power was being disposed of to private interests. The clipping then being read was for the purpose of giving some idea of the conditions which were said to exist in northern Ontario. If I am wrong in my contention it is all the more reason why the matter should be investigated by a committee, as I suggested, in order that the facts may be properly ascertained regardless of our personal opinions. I have here another clipping which is so printed that I can read it, and it is rather interesting in view of the argument which is going on. This clipping is taken from the Ottawa Journal of March 11, and is headed:

> Ask For Information Upper Ottawa Power
> Power Concession at Des Joachims May Be Sought
> That the running streams commission of the province of Quebec is anticipating a request for a report from the Quebec legislature on the power resources of the Ottawa river, with a view to dealing with a request for development, is the information given from an authoritative source close to the Quebec government.
> The announcement is in keeping with the trend of events along the river, particularly at Des Joachims, where gangs of men believed to be in the employ of the International Pulp and Paper, or allied interests, were busy all last summer, and where preparations are being made for another season's work.
> The informer volunteered the information that the running streams commission is hastening its task of securing all possible data as to power development at Des Joachims. He states that the Ontario government too, in addition to that of Quebec, is to be approached with the view to securing a power concession at this point and that just as soon as the question of the renewal of the Georgian bay canal charter is settled, action will be speedy.

That is just another indication of the fact that while public ownership and the protection of the public are largely discussed there are other people who are interested in this power development scheme on the Ottawa river.

The original act in connection with this project, I submit, is of very great importance in this discussion, and I note with considerable satisfaction that in one particular I agree with some of the previous speakers. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) in speaking the other night stated that the original charter in connection with this work was primarily for the purpose of building a canal, and later in the debate that opinion was supported by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart). I agree with the hon. gentleman in that statement; the original charter as drafted would indicate that the main purpose of the charter was the construction of a canal. The hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Casselman) remarked in the course of his address that the original charter did not authorize the production of electric power, but I would like to take a few moments to read the clause of the original charter of 1894 which has to do with that matter. The first clauses have to do with the construction of a canal, but there was a further clause inserted as follows:

> Lay out and lease or otherwise dispose of water lots and use, sell, lease or otherwise dispose of water brought by or for the said canals or works but not requisite for the same, and produce, lease and supply, or otherwise dispose of hydraulic, electric and other kinds of power in connection with the works hereby authorized.

That was the original clause (g), which received a rather substantial amendment in chapter 123 of the statutes of 1912, when the whole clause was repealed and the following substituted therefor:

> Produce, lease and supply, or otherwise dispose of surplus hydraulic, electric and other kinds of power developed in connection with and for the purposes of the works hereby authorized, the rates or prices at or for which such hydraulic and electric power may be disposed of by the company to be fixed or determined by the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada in accordance with the provisions of section 360a of the Railway Act.

My first comment on that clause, both as it was originally and as amended, is that I think there is no doubt that power is given the company to produce and sell electric energy. But I want to draw the attention of hon. gentlemen to this very important section which appears both in the original clause and in the amendment. That is, the company is allowed to produce these various kinds of power which are developed in connection with and for the purposes of the works authorized by this charter. I submit to the House that the only interpretation which can fairly be put upon that clause is that any power produced must be in connection with the canal. This matter is so serious that I would not ask this House to take my opinion as to the exact legal interpretation of this clause, but I suggest that if the charter is primarily for the purpose of building a canal, it is a fair interpretation for a reasonable man to say that in building power plants they must do so in connection with the works authorized by the charter. I submit that that would indicate that if they did not proceed with the work authorized their power under the charter would be exceeded. That may be open to debate, may be open to legal argument, and if so the courts are there to settle the interpretation. The company would have to go to the courts if there was any dispute on that interpretation and see what the exact conditions were—they would take that chance.

Now as to the canal itself: While a great deal of interest is taken by others in the power project, personally I have no interest in it. I am, however, interested in this canal, and the consensus of opinion of this House seems to be that a canal from Montreal to the Georgian bay would be a very valuable thing to the Dominion. It also seems to be undisputed that it is a feasible undertaking. I submit that the west is interested in having this canal. It should assist in settling the transportation problem. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) in his remarks the other night pointed out that the charter was first granted a long time ago and that conditions have since changed. I think he mentioned the construction of the Transcontinental railway, the Welland canal and the Panama canal as reasons why this project was not so necessary. I agree that the construction of that railway and the canals referred to does affect this canal project and might not make it so desirable; but it is a good maxim in any line of business administration to scrap old machinery if you can get cheaper and better results by introducing improvements. I do not think that will be necessary in this case, but the idea that you are precluded from getting better results because of existing conditions is not debatable. I was rather surprised that although the hon. member for Leeds went on and showed that this enterprise was not necessary and should not be allowed, at the conclusion of his remarks he expressed the opinion that the proper thing to do was for the government to build it. Now if the canal should not be built by private individuals because it is not necessary, I submit it is not advisable for the government to construct it at a loss to the country. Furthermore, I think that the government is not in a position at the present time to expend the large sums of money that would be necessary to build this canal, regardless altogether of the power development scheme. It would be an enormous undertaking, and this Dominion has heavy enough liabilities at the present time. I do not know how long it would take this country to get into a position to carry out the project and be able to afford the money. The estimated cost, as I understand it, of the canal and power project would be somewhere between two hundred and fifty and three hundred and fifty millions. A large proportion of this would be expended for dams, without taking into consideration the expenditure involved in the construction of the power plants. Therefore I quite agree that the Dominion government could not undertake this project at the present time. It might be fifty years, it might be a hundred years—I am not certain what the exact period would be—but it would be a good many years before we could undertake such a huge expenditure.

Mr. HEAPS: Is the hon. gentleman aware that the government could borrow money cheaper than private interests at the present time?

Mr. McPHERSON: They may be able to borrow money at a cheaper rate, but why borrow money if you can get the canal built without paying anything? I am as much in favour of public ownership as any hon. member in this House, but I am not prepared to sacrifice that benefit which is offered to the whole of Canada, from the maritime provinces to the west, in order to—

Mr. HEAPS: Can the hon. member show anything definite in the bill which would compel the canal to be built?

Mr. McPHERSON: I have already argued, although my hon. friend does not seem to understand the argument, that under this charter they have to build this canal before they can use the power, and that is the reason why I want this bill to go to committee. I am not prepared to say that they are falsifying their statements and that they do not intend to carry out their undertaking to build the canal. I want to put them in the position where we can get the facts from them. If they are prepared to build this canal now I do not wish to wait fifty, seventy-five or a hundred years in order to have the satisfaction of owning the canal ourselves, if we can get the benefit a great deal sooner without any cost to this Dominion.

The value of this canal I think is not in dispute. Reflect for a moment upon what it means by the opening up of northern Ontario, the opening up of the waterways from Port Arthur to the ocean, and the value it would be to Canada as a whole, and it is evident we shall have to be very careful before we say we will not even consider this matter in committee.

In closing, because it is not my intention to delay this matter by a long speech—I have tried to keep to the essential facts as closely as I could—let me say that I am in favour of this bill going to the committee in the first place because I do not think the reason most strongly urged, that there has been delay on the part of the company, is justified. I doubt whether there has been delay for which the company are themselves to blame; but even if there had been delay, and even if that delay was solely the fault of the applicants, I submit that it is our duty as representatives of the people to go into this matter, at least in committee, and ascertain what can be done to preserve the advantages likely to result from this project for the Dominion. But I should like to put this question to hon. gentlemen who may have been in this House in 1912: at whose request and under whose direction was the amendment of 1912 inserted in the act? I am informed that it was at the request of the late Sir Adam Beck on behalf of the Hydro Electric Commission of Ontario. I do not know for certain but I am told that he was present and drafted that clause to protect the interests of that hydro-electric commission. Whether or not that is so can be ascertained. There are doubtless members still here who were on that committee in 1912.

I understand that only in two cases in the last twenty-five years has there been a refusal to send bills to the committee. One was for a patent for some electrical appliance, and the other I think was the Red lake railway bill. The present bill is of vital importance to every hon. member here, and deserves our consideration in the fullest detail. If my explanation of why the provision in subclause (g) was introduced in 1912 is not correct, then I say this: that before this charter is renewed there should be provisions inserted in the bill which will prohibit the applicants or the charter holders from making any profit out of power developments until the canal is complete. If that amendment is made I am prepared to support the bill and to renew the charter.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): Unlike my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. McPherson) I am opposed to this bill going to the select standing committee of this House for consideration. It may be true as my hon. friend has stated that only in a few instances have private bills in this House been defeated upon the motion for second reading. But it is equally true that seldom have private bills been introduced involving questions of so great magnitude and of such great consequence to the people of Canada in general as the bill which is under discussion now and which stands upon the motion for second reading. I realize that upon the second reading of a bill we discuss the principles of the bill rather than its details. I am unalterably opposed to the principle of this bill and I desire to record my opposition to it when the time for so doing shall arrive. In opposing this bill upon its second reading, I feel sure that I am on firm ground and that I am following established parliamentary practice both in this country and in Great Britain when a private bill of this nature is proposed in parliament. My authority for my position is pretty well summed up in the thirteenth edition of May's parliamentary procedure at page 709, where it is said:

> The second reading of a private bill, corresponds with the same stage in other bills, and in agreeing to it the House affirms the general principle, or expediency, of the measure. There is, however, a distinction between the second reading of a public and of a private bill, which should not be overlooked. A public bill being founded on reasons of state policy, the House, in agreeing to its second reading, accepts and affirms those reasons: but the expediency of a private bill, being mainly founded upon allegations of fact, which have not yet been proved, the House, in agreeing to its second reading, affirms the principle of the bill, conditionally, and subject to the proof of such allegations before the committee. Where, irrespective of such facts, the principle is objectionable, the House will not consent to the second reading; but otherwise, the expediency of the measure is usually left for the consideration of the committee. This is the first occasion on which a bill is brought before the House otherwise than pro forma,—

That is to say, the second reading.

—or in connection with the standing orders; and if the bill be opposed, upon its principle, it is the proper time for attempting its defeat.

I oppose this bill on principle. I consider it thoroughly bad in principle and if passed it will prove worse in practice; and I intend to record my vote, when the time comes, as opposed to it. Before concluding my remarks, I shall place in your hands, Mr. Speaker, an amendment in the followig words:

> That all the words after the word "that" in the said motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> The character and object of this bill involve matters of grave national and provincial importance, and are such as to constitute it a measure of public policy which ought not to be dealt with by any private bill.

This amendment has been framed in accordance with recognized precedent in this House in such cases. The bill before us, Mr. Speaker, involves, I submit, very grave questions of public policy. I doubt whether that statement will be denied in any section of the House. I cannot conjure up before my mind any graver matter of public policy at this moment in Canada than the great question of transportation. We have in this bill a proposal that a private corporation shall construct a great transportation work in this country over a course of waterway estimated at about 200 miles, and when that work is constructed it will be a means of carrying the great products of the Canadian west to the Canadian east or to Europe and the products of the east back to the Canadian west—a project which one only needs to state to convince oneself of its importance and of its thoroughly national aspect.

But there is another view of the matter which the House will readily appreciate. This transportation work, if ever constructed, will be at once a competitor with other transportation lines which this country owns and operates and which we all regard as great national undertakings. During recent years we have spent well on to $100,000,000 on the Welland canal for the purpose of improving a waterway from the west to the east and on to Europe. We are proceeding with that expenditure to-day but the Welland canal is not our final goal: once we are through the Welland canal we must go on to the St. Lawrence and have a completed waterway. The object of the present bill is to construct another great canal by private interests to compete directly with the millions which we have already invested in our present waterway a few miles south of the one proposed. We have in this country, moreover, another transportation system, upon which we have expended hundreds upon hundreds of millions of dollars of Canadian money, known as the Canadian National Railways, a great national undertaking in the success of which every corner of the Dominion is interested. This bill proposes to incorporate a private undertaking to construct a work to be carried on in opposition to and in competition with the two established transportation systems in Canada owned by the Canadian people. When one considers these facts, can one hestitate for a moment to decide that this bill deals directly with a matter of public policy and not of private interest in any sense of the word?

There are many other considerations of a distinctly public nature involved in this proposal. The rights of the Dominion and the rights of two great provinces are directly concerned, and these must be taken into account. I agree that until recent years provincial rights as opposed to Dominion rights have not perhaps been very well settled. But through a long succession of decisions in our courts of justice and in the privy council these rights have now been so well determined and adjusted that we all know and recognize them when they are stated. Involved in this proposed work is an interprovincial river dividing the great province of Quebec from the province of Ontario, and we know that on either side of that river, all the land is under the jurisdiction of the legislatures of one or other of these provinces. We know that the provinces own the land; we know that the provinces own the beds of the river right to the middle; we know that the provinces own and control the water in the river; we know that the provinces own and control even the fish in these waters. All, therefore, that this parliament is concerned with is its paramount right in respect of the single question of navigation; that is the only authority which the parliament of Canada can exercise over an interprovincial river. This bill seeks to interfere with provincial rights; it proposes to grant, as an incidental power, the right to utilize for electrical development the water of the Ottawa river and to a certain extent the land on either side of the river, irrespective of the authority of the provinces of Quebec and of Ontario. Surely that is a matter of public policy; surely it is a matter which involves a great principle. And it is a matter of too great magnitude and too great consequence to be entrusted to any private individuals or to any private corporation. Why, one has only to state the case to realize its gravity and importance. On the Ottawa river it is said that over 1,000,000 horse-power of electrical energy can be developed. This potential power is the property of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec; it is so to-day. On the French river, which is entirely, I think, within the province of Ontario, it is said that there is another large amount of electrical power available. Ontario to-day is suffering from a lack of electrical power, and Ontario is looking to the Ottawa river to supply a very necessary demand. The province of Quebec to-day is suffering from a shortage of electrical power, and is stretching out in every direction in its own province to supply the demand. Should we permit a private company, should we permit any body of individuals to come to this parliament and say: We ask you to confer upon us rights which will supersede all provincial claims; we ask you to recognize and restore a charter granted to us by this parliament thirty-three years ago, and to give us further time to construct a work to compete directly with two great national undertakings of this country; we ask you to give us a renewal of authority to construct a work which may deprive both Ontario and Quebec of a wealth of electrical power which the provinces to-day rightly own.

Is this not a matter of grave public concern? Is this not a matter of grave public policy? Is this not a matter which involves a great principle? We in this House must decide upon this question of principles. The highest parliamentary authority in Great Britain or in this country from whom I have quoted supports my contention. May's Parliamentary Procedure is the standard, and May distinctly asserts that the appropriate stage at which to object to the principle of a private bill is upon the motion for second reading. The amendment which I have proposed will afford every member of this House an opportunity of deciding upon that principle. Such was the object which I had in moving the amendment, my main object, of course, being to destroy this measure, to blot it out.

I do not attach very much weight to the argument of hon. members who say: Oh, let it go to the committee. If we do, we will have approved the principle of the bill, and as I said before, I am unalterably opposed to the principle of this bill.

I am not going to prolong my remarks upon this occasion, at all events, Mr. Speaker. I am going to place in your hands now the amendment which I have just read, and which I shall read again. It is moved by myself, and seconded by the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley):

> That all the words after the word "that" in the said motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> The character and object of this bill involve matters of grave national and provincial importance, and are such as to constitute it a measure of public policy which ought not to be dealt with by any private bill.

Mr. T L.. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): Mr. Speaker, I am opposed both to the motion and the amendment before the House. It is on the second reading of a bill that its principle must be considered. The province of Ontario will soon find out where the two political parties in this honourable House stand so far as the development of water-power is concerned.

I want to say to my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. McPherson) that there is no province suffering to-day from corporation rule worse than the province of Manitoba. From the Nipigon river westward, all the water-powers of this country have been given over to American millionaires.

This particular bill, Mr. Speaker, first came before this House in 1894. It has survived thirty-three years. It first came up before the diamond jubilee of our late beloved Queen Victoria. It ran through the reign of King Edward VII, and survived through to the reign of King George V. I say, Mr. Speaker, that it makes this parliament look ridiculous in the eyes of the free citizens of this country to-day that after thirty-three years we should again have this bill before us. Sir Clifford Sifton, who is our arch enemy in the matter of water-powers, wants to grab the whole water-powers of the Ottawa valley. Sir Clifford Sifton has been dominating the west for many years. It is he who is responsible for all the railway ills of this country through tying up the Canadian Pacific to the Crows-nest pass agreement, which is the basis of the rate structure of this country, past, present and future, and if the west is suffering to-day from lack of development of its water-powers and from corporation rule, it is due to the fact that Sir Clifford Sifton in the past has been able to dominate in the Liberal party.

The Liberal party is on trial to-night in this House before the citizens of this country. What is the policy of the government to-day on this particular bill, this bill which has survived under nine prime ministers, under two kings and three queens of this great empire, under eight or nine parliaments, and is again today before this House after thirty-three years during which not a spadeful of earth has been dug on this canal? We have seen the Liberals of Saskatchewan and Manitoba rising in this House to-night and shedding buckets of tears over this multi-millionaire Sir Clifford Sifton, who wants now to grab all the water-powers of the Ottawa valley.

This is not the first time that I have opposed this bill. I was down opposing it with our late beloved leader of the hydro project in Ontario. Sir Adam Beck may be dead today, but his principles will live forever throughout Ontario. I well remember coming down with him and appearing before the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, and hydro had very few friends then in either the Conservative or the Liberal party. I well remember the time when Sir Adam Beck and I were howled down in the railway committee by a large number of gentlemen in the session of 1912. We were here again in 1913, again in 1915, and again in 1918, and I think the last time we were down here to oppose this particular bill was when I was chief magistrate for the city of Toronto in 1921.

The hon. member for Portage la Prairie argued again to-night, as he did last Tuesday, that the company will have to build the canal features first. The canal features of this bill, Mr. Speaker, are a huge joke, and the joker is in the bill. It is ten times worse than the Newmarket canal. Did anybody ever hear of the Liberal party doing anything with regard to that canal except making a political football of it? The people of North York got tired of them, and they defeated the Prime Minister, the leader of the Liberal party, in 1925. Where does the Liberal party stand to-night on this particular bill? It would make a political football of the Ottawa river to-day, just as it tried to do of the Niagara river. In the railway committee last session, I asked what was the policy of the government regarding the Red lake bill? I had the opportunity of talking that bill out, on five or six different nights, and I am prepared to talk this bill out, if necessary, on ten or fifteen nights, because my constituents expect me to do it. I want to know where the Prime Minister stands in regard to this bill. Let me quote from the Toronto Globe, a good Liberal paper, the paper of George Brown.

I look to you, Mr. Speaker, as one of the shining lights of Liberalism in this country to-day. You have never deserted your principles. You stood like a bulwark when others of the Liberal party were willing to surrender the west. You and your predecessor, two of the most brilliant postmasters general, fought that bill to the death. But the Liberal party were captured by the Globe and the Globe pressed for concession after concession with the result that Sir Clifford Sifton is to blame for all the present railway ills of this country. Millions and millions of dollars have been wasted because of mistakes made by Sir Clifford Sifton. You, Mr. Speaker, and Sir William Mulock fought hard to save the Liberal party from being corporationized at that particular time. Sir Clifford Sifton has never built anything in this country. He has made a football out of this particular bill. The Sifton interests are the same as the Holt interests; they are trying to fight each other behind a smoke screen. They are part and parcel of a group of American multimillionaires trying to get this country by the throat. I am surprised at those of the Progressive party who come from Ontario not rising to the defence of the principles for which Sir Adam Beck fought and died. Sir Adam had to fight corporations all his life, but he lived to see his principles respected by Ontario and by Canada.

To-day I ask the government where they stand in this country. Are they prepared to announce their policy regarding the fourteenth renewal of this charter, one of the most iniquitous charters which ever came before this House? The Conservative party stands on trial; so does the Liberal party, and the party system stands or falls by what we do with this particular bill. The people of this country will not any longer stand for the handing over of our water-powers and the wealth of this Dominion to a number of Americans who have come over to Canada and who have found it a happy hunting ground for many years past. Let me say to those who come from Ontario that Sir Adam Beck's work will live for generations. He was the greatest protectionist leader this country ever produced. As Mr. Bruce, the Prime Minister of Australia, said a month or two ago, the work of Sir Adam Beck stands as one of the most marvelous achievements of the age, something of which Canada and the British Empire might well be proud. Ontario should revere that great statesman's memory long enough to defeat this bill.

My respected leader, the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) has always been a good hydro man. In fact he is a city solicitor and one of the counsel for the hydro in his municipality. I believe the motion before the chair, while it does not go as far as I would like, will have the same effect—that of killing the bill. The Liberal party stands on trial in regard to this particular issue. There are only a few Liberals left in Ontario, and after the Liberal party line up, as I expect them to do in a few days, there will be very few of them left in Ontario. I doubt if there will be many of them left in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, because the people are wakening up to the magnificent resources which they have in those particular provinces.

In to-day's Globe there is an editorial sounding the call to arms of the Liberals of this country. The Globe has not deserted the Liberal party; it is the Liberal party that has deserted the Globe and the principles of George Brown. The Globe to-day stands before the people of Ontario in a position in which it has never stood before. It is taking a front place to-day in supporting the platform and policy of Sir Adam Beck in that province. The Globe comes out to-day with an editorial asking where the Liberal party stands. The Liberal party must either stand or fall by their policy in this House. I do not see the much honoured and respected young Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the chamber to-night. I see the beloved Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe)—because he is beloved by his own party and by many on this side of the House. The Globe editorial reads:

Let the Government Speak

For four days now the Dominion parliament has discussed the Georgian Bay Canal Bill in the hours devoted to private members' bills. On each occasion the bill has been talked out. Has the time not come when the government should declare itself on the measure? The Globe believes it has, and is convinced that the great importance of the issue demands an expression of governmental opinion. In saying this the Globe does not forget that the government is not responsible for bills of private members, and may be quite within its rights in refusing to commit itself for or against a private measure. But the importance of the issue in the present instance more than warrants a departure from precedent.

Whether this 33-year old charter is renewed or not is a matter of first importance to two great provinces of the Dominion. With a unanimous voice the legislature of Ontario has spoken strongly against the renewal of the charter and protested to the Dominion government against what it considers to be an unwarranted usurpation of the water-power rights of the province. Surely in response to such a protest the government ought to declare itself. Mr. A. Clair Casselman, Conservative member for Grenville, on Tuesday urged the ministry, in fairness to itself, to state to the people where it stood with reference to what it termed the "power grab".

It is not a "power grab" at all. Newspapers on both sides in this province have been calling the Chicago diversion of water a "water steal," but the Chicago diversion of water is only a miniature steal. This grab of power in the Ottawa valley is a steal on the part of the Siftons.

"The government is laying itself open to rather serious charges," he said, and further added: "I would suggest that, since we are now on our fourth day on this matter in the House, the government should suggest to us what it is its intention to do; whether it is going to support the charter or whether it is not.

It has happened in the past, and may happen in the present instance, that government members have voted against one another on a private bill. But neither this nor any other consideration of precedent or custom should prevent an expression of governmental opinion on this important matter. The government should declare where it stands on the measure, and do it now.

Where is the Minister of Customs and Excise (Mr. Euler) to-night? In the days when Sir Adam Beck was alive he boasted that he was a hydro man. The hon. member for North Bruce, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, (Mr. Malcolm) did the same thing. They were ready to stand up on political platforms in Bruce and Waterloo counties and say: we are hydro supporters; we will defend the principles for which Sir Adam Beck fought and died. If we look at the Ottawa valley, we see that the whole of eastern Ontario has been stagnant for the past twenty-five years. Why? Because the Liberal party in eastern Ontario did not believe in Sir Adam Beck; they believed in private ownership, with the result to-day that the Ottawa valley right up to Nipissing and the Mattawa river is under the control of whom? Of American multi-millionaires, and more territory west of the Quebec boundary right up to the Nipigon river has been ceded to Americans than was ceded in the days of George III.

The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. McPherson) the other evening in this House read an article from a Cochrane paper about the Abitibi Electric Development Company, and he blamed the hydro for it. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that he did not know what he was talking about. The Abitibi Electric Development Company was a privately-owned concern. In 1905, 1906, 1907 and 1908 I was one of a deputation of hydro men who went to ask the Ontario government to electrify the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario in order to aid in the development of the Ottawa valley right up to Cochrane and to carry the boon of cheap light and power from the water-powers of the great province of Ontario to the mining camps in the northern part of the Ottawa valley. The failure to act in this matter was one of the very few mistakes made by Sir James Whitney. The Conservative party of Ontario deserve all the credit for the hydro-electric movement. Talk of that movement being in politics! It must stay in politics until we get all the water-powers not only of the Ottawa valley but of new Ontario. Let me tell the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. McPherson) that the corporations were so influential that they kept Sir Adam Beck out of new Ontario, with the result that to-day the Abitibi Company, according to the article read the other night in this House, are going to charge the town of Cochrane and the mining companies in the neighbourhood at the rate of $75 per horse-power. Who is to blame for that? The people of new Ontario, because they allowed themselves to be deluded by the subsidized press of that section of the country which shouted from the housetops in favour of the corporation.

This bill is one of the most monstrous outrages that was ever perpetrated on this country. It is not a canal proposition at all. A lot of Liberal members from Manitoba are only too willing to take it for granted that the proposed canal will be constructed, but I can tell those hon. gentlemen that instead of a spade being used to turn the first sod for a canal it will be put in the ground to bury them, not only politically but otherwise. This canal has the Newmarket canal beaten forty ways. I wish Gilbert and Sullivan were alive to write a comic opera on this wonderful canal about which the hon. member for Portage la Prairie seems to be somewhat concerned. Again I assure him that he need feel no uneasiness whatever—the canal will never be built. The proposition has been referred to in many elections in the Ottawa valley and has no doubt proved very useful in providing campaign funds for many candidates in that territory, just as the Newmarket canal served a similar purpose in North York.

Last session, Mr. Speaker, I urged that we should go through the statute books and find out how many of these paper companies are still holding charters that may affect power developments for the benefit of the people. This charter stands in the way of Ontario utilizing the water-powers of the Ottawa river. But as for the canal, it is all paper; there is no water in it at all. The first charter was secured away back in the days of good old Queen Victoria, in 1894, two years before Sir Wilfrid Laurier made Canada a nation. The promoters came to the House again in 1898 and secured a renewal, the incorporators numbering ninety-seven and being composed of all the politicians, great and small, in the city of Ottawa. It will be noted that the incorporators were only three less than the celebrated committee of a hundred. It was proposed by chapter 108 of the statutes of 1898 that the company should have sixteen provisional directors. The promoters came back to parliament in 1900 for a further extension of time, and found it hard work to get six gentlemen to act as provisional directors. During the general election of 1900 we heard a great deal about this canal in the Ottawa valley and about the Newmarket canal in the Toronto district. My young friend from Parkdale, as a member of the Parkdale Canoe Club, was supposed to take his canoe up the shining waters of the Newmarket canal and then through the Trent system to Georgian bay and thence by this long-promised canal down the Ottawa river.

Another application for a further extension of time was made in 1904, and the promoters then undertook to go full steam ahead with the canal. They had been to England and interested a good old Britisher by the name of Sir Robert Perks, who came out here and went over the proposed route of the canal. On the strength of this it was said that contracts had been let for the work, but strange to say, not a sod was turned. The only canal we have in the Ottawa valley so far is the canal in front of the Chateau Laurier, and along the banks of that canal we see a few rowboats, which I suppose represent Canada's navy.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hour for private bills being exhausted, the House will now revert to supply.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

The House in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose at six o'clock we were considering item 140—$16,000 for a public building at Wainwright, Alberta.

Mr. LUCAS: The minister has told us that urgency is the factor which determines whether or not public buildings shall be erected. In looking over the list I find that to Kensington with a revenue of about $3,000 we voted $12,000; to Baie St. Paul, with a revenue of about $3,600 we voted $20,000; to Kenogami, with a revenue of about $7,000 we voted $27,000 and to Limoilou, with a revenue of about $5,000 we voted $50,000. Then in Ontario to Durham, with a revenue of about $6,300 we voted $20,000; to Rockland, with a revenue of about $2,800, we voted $25,000, and to Tisdale, Saskatchewan, with a revenue of about $7,000 we voted $12,000. In the item now before us, however, we find Wainwright, with a revenue of $6,313, being voted $15,000. If these amounts have been voted to these various places on account of urgency, I would point out that Camrose has a revenue of $16,500 and is therefore entitled to the very best consideration by the government. In addition to that, the customs office there produces a revenue of over $50,000 annually. Camrose is one of the most flourishing towns in Alberta, and the postal authorities have agreed that if any public buildings for postal purposes were to be constructed in Alberta Camrose should receive first consideration. It is a very important railway centre, with lines radiating from it in eight different directions; it has a very fine normal school which accommodates several hundred students every year, and I know the present post office is taxed beyond its capacity. I feel sure that this has been an oversight on the part of the government; I would not want to think this item was dropped for any other reason, and I am going to ask the minister if he will not give this very favourable consideration, and place in the supplementary estimates an amount sufficient to take care of the construction of a public building in that town.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I cannot give my hon. friend any further reply than I have already given. I might repeat what I have already said to him, but I do not know that that would assist matters. This matter will be considered with the various other applications for public buildings, of which there are many, and they will all receive the best consideration we can possibly give.

Mr. LUCAS: Would not the minister go so far as to say that he would give this particular matter his favourable consideration?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I cannot say that.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Perhaps the minister will tell us why it was given favourable consideration in the estimates last year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I was not in charge of the department at that time.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Do I understand that the change of ministers has brought about a change in the policy of the department? It would appear that that has been so, when places like Tisdale and Kensington can get new post offices.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I do not like to hear a good Prince Edward Islander continually taking up the question of the Kensington post office; I must take exception to that.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I do not know just what my hon. friend means by a "good" Prince Edward Islander. I know the village of Kensington very well; it is a delightful and splendid little place, but there are hundreds of places in western Canada just as nice and larger which have never dreamed of getting a post office. I made a reference to one such town near my own home, and there are many even larger places, more deserving of post offices, which cannot get them. There are many incorporated towns of considerable size in which I would like to see public buildings, but I realize that we cannot get them all. I do think, however, that when the money is being spent it should be distributed as nearly as possible according to the needs, and the needs should be based as much as possible on the revenue of the post offices. I am criticizing this item because of the amount of money being spent in comparison to the revenue derived.

[Mr. Lucas.]

Mr. SPENCER: I would like to support the contention of the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Lucas) that there should be a post office built in that town, because after all is said and done Camrose is bringing in a large revenue to the government. I cannot understand why this item was dropped from the estimates. So far as the item under discussion goes, I know the locality very well indeed, and recognize that the reason a new building was requested, is that the present premises are very inadequate. The town of Wainwright is of some importance as a tourist centre, and as we all know, the largest buffalo park in the world is located near it. It is also the centre of a coming oil field, and there is every reason why a new building worthy of the town should be constructed.

Mr. GARDINER: There is just one point to which I would like to draw the attention of the minister, more particularly when he is making up the supplementary estimates. If you go through the items you will find that practically every province has had an increase in the expenditures to be made, with the one exception of Alberta, for which province the expenditure has been reduced. When the supplementary estimates are being made up I would suggest that this fact be taken into account.

Mr. JELLIFF: For the life of me I cannot understand why, when an amount was included for the Camrose post office in the supplementary estimates for last year, it should be dropped from the estimates this year. It does seem to me that in consideration of the revenue from the post office and customs office, and with the population and business done in that place, the minister would be well advised to maintain this item in the estimates for this year. Only $32,000 is being spent in the whole province of Alberta this year; $17,000 is for general repairs to public buildings, something required every year, and the remainder is made up of this single item of $15,000 for the post office at Wainwright. I have a feeling that this matter is not being dealt with in absolute fairness, and I am going to urge the minister, as the hon. member for Camrose has done, to reconsider this matter and include this item in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. MANION: May I, as a member from Ontario, support the hon. member for Camrose in the attitude he has taken, and I would like to point out to the minister that we might be a little more frank in these discussions. We have heard a number of members get up and say they do not understand why this item was cut out. We all frankly admit why it was cut out—it was because the member for Camrose did not vote with the government last year. There is no use beating about the bush. The same thing happened in the constituency of Queen's-Lunenburg: the item in that case was cut out of the supplementary estimates after the election of the present member. If the minister can confound my reasoning by reinserting these items in the supplementaries I shall be glad to see him do it.

Item agreed to.

British Columbia—public works, $243,262.
Bentinck island lazaretto—new buildings, $5,000.

Mr. ESLING: In connection with the British Columbia vote I should like just to draw attention to the policy advanced by the Minister of Public Works in which he indicated that public buildings would be provided where there was not adequate provision already and where urgent necessity for better accommodation existed. Now this meagre vote for public buildings in British Columbia suggests that the Minister of Health, who is the direct representative of the province in the cabinet, must be exercising his political prejudices against British Columbia because it gave the Conservatives a popular majority of nearly 100,000. There is no other construction to be placed on the fact that we are not getting very much in the way of public buildings in British Columbia. We know that under the generalship of the Minister of Health, who had charge of the British Columbia campaign, the only Liberal returned from that province was the minister himself; and curiously enough in the whole eastern half of the province the only vote for a public building is in the district represented by the minister himself.

Now I want to follow entirely the line of policy indicated by the minister. In the district of East Kootenay, represented by the Minister of Health, there is one vote for $5,500 for a public building in the town of Kimberley. Kimberley will be very glad to hear that news; yet at the same time I submit it will be disappointed, because it is one of the thriving communities of British Columbia, and should have a vote of $25,000. It has a population of three or four thousand, and certainly a $5,000 vote is inadequate for a place which has practically the richest silver-lead mine on the whole American continent. There are many local improvements going on there, and among the communities in the province that should be able to lay claim to a public building Kimberley certainly is one. The fact of the matter is that the Minister of Health owes a great deal to the community of Kimberley. I do not blame the Minister of Public Works for all the contentious discussion that has been going on in this House this afternoon. Really I feel sorry for him because he has inherited a lot of his troubles from his predecessor.

Now, I think we have to admit this—that the minister from each province is responsible for the estimates which are allocated to that province. In other words the Minister of Health is the direct representative in the cabinet from British Columbia, and when he takes part in the cabinet councils, or when he makes his recommendations to the Minister of Finance or to the Minister of Public Works, the only conclusion is that those recommendations will be accepted. Therefore we are forced to assume that in this case the minister was either exercising his political prejudices or the government does not pay very much attention to him.

There is a very marked difference between the estimates brought down right on the eve of an election, and estimates brought down after an election is over and the government feel safe. We have a fair illustration of that in connection with the estimates from the prairie provinces. I want to emphasize that statement from the circumstances connected with one of the cities in my own district. You all remember the general election which took place on the 29th October, 1925. With the object of giving a little prestige to my opponent the Minister of Health purchased a site in the town of Trail for a public building. For that site, consisting of two bare lots, he paid $11,000. Of course they bought these lots from the local Liberal whip. He was the man who put the deal through. Eleven thousand dollars for two bare lots!

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): How much were they worth?

Mr. ESLING: They were assessed at $2,300. At the other end of the same identical block there were two lots on which there was a building. The government had an option on these two lots and that building for $9,000, but they were owned by a Conservative and so their purchase was not considered. The government had a chance to purchase for $9,000 a piece of property which had a rental value of $125 per month. Yet they passed that up and purchased two vacant lots with no rental value at all for $11,000. The simple explanation of that is the influence exercised by the Minister of Health. Having purchased this site for a public building one would have supposed there would have been some intimation on the part of the Minister of Health that the construction of the building would be proceeded with. He got the lots in September, 1925. Remember, the election took place on the 29th of October, 1925. On the 4th of September, 1925, the option was exercised, and on the 27th of September, 1925, just exactly one month prior to the election, there went to the surveyor a rush wire from the resident architect in Victoria. Just to show you the political influence behind it, I may say that this rush wire said:

Will be glad if you will proceed to Trail and have a survey made with the utmost despatch as the matter is very urgent.

The utmost despatch on the eve of this election! They wanted to have this survey made.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Who sent the telegram?

Mr. ESLING: It is signed by the architect of the Public Works department resident in Victoria, who of course gets his instructions from Ottawa. The Minister of Public Works at that time was the hon. gentleman who now occupies the portfolio of Health. Not satisfied, they got the lots surveyed, and for this purpose they thought it necessary to bring a man from the outside. There are three local surveyors in the city of Trail fully qualified for any work of this nature, but instead of securing one of these men the department, simply because they were Conservatives, went to the city of Nelson fifty miles away and brought in a Liberal surveyor, whom they had to pay more than would have been charged by any of the others. They had to pay two or three days' hotel expenses for this man with the result that it cost them $50 to survey two little lots 25 by 100. I do not at all blame the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Elliott) because he must either accept or reject the recommendations of his colleague from British Columbia, and in this case I take it for granted that the latter hon. gentleman recommended what was done.

What I want to impress upon the government is this, that in five years the city of Trail has contributed to the public treasury by way of post office receipts and customs the sum of $300,000.

The CHAIRMAN: May I point out to the hon. member that, according to section 5 of rule 13, speeches in committee of the whole must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration. Considerable latitude is always given in the discussion of estimates, but surely what happened in Trail has nothing to do with the item under consideration, which concerns the Bentinck island lazaretto.

Mr. STEVENS: Before you rule on the point Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: I am not ruling; I am simply pointing out to the hon. member that his remarks at present are not strictly relevant to the item before the committee.

Mr. STEVENS: I submit, Mr. Chairman, that they are. We are discussing vote No. 141 which embraces items in connection with public buildings in British Columbia generally. Bentinck island is not the only item in the vote; there are estimates for Dominion public buildings at Esquimalt, Kimberley, William Head quarantine station, and so on. The vote covers the whole province, the amount asked for being $243,000 odd. Surely the remarks of the hon. member are in order. As a matter of fact, this is the only opportunity he will have of discussing the question which he is now considering, and I submit, Mr. Chairman, that if you give a ruling of the character suggested it will be most unfair to the hon. member. More than that, it will be a complete abandonment of what has been the practice of this House, certainly for the last sixteen years, and I presume since confederation.

The CHAIRMAN: I would remind the hon. member that the committee decided this afternoon to discuss these votes item by item. There is another vote, No. 142, under the head "Generally", which will allow the hon. member to take up the subject he is now discussing. But certainly his remarks are not in order under this item.

Mr. STEVENS: During the last two or three days we have been discussing votes for every other province and the widest latitude has been allowed, as is in keeping with the practice in this parliament; and I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it would be exceedingly unfair were you to rule the hon. member out of order. It is all very well to say that he can take up the matter under some other item, but this is the proper place for him to discuss any question appertaining to public buildings in British Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN: As I have already intimated, the committee decided to take the vote item by item, and the hon. member (Mr. Esling) has been discussing a matter relating to a subsequent vote

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is only one resolution before the chair, relating to public buildings generally in British Columbia. The hon. member, I submit, is in order.

Mr. LAPOINTE: As you have observed, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) asked that these votes be taken item by item.

Mr. STEVENS: I never mentioned it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Somebody did. I think the chairman is technically right, but I would ask him not to insist on the point. Without establishing any precedent we are all willing to listen to the hon. member for West Kootenay.

The CHAIRMAN: I may say that I had no intention in the first place of calling the hon. member to order, but in view of the criticism which has been made, that time has been wasted, I thought it proper to call his attention to the rule.

Mr. STEVENS: I protest against any suggestion that time has been wasted.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We are agreeing with you.

Mr. STEVENS: I will not sit here and allow the chairman to say that we have been wasting time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. STEVENS: The government will find that things will not roll along so smoothly if they seek to override members on this side of the House.

Mr. LAPOINTE: How can my hon. friend address that remark to the government in view of the statement I have just made, that we are willing to let the hon. gentleman proceed?

Mr. STEVENS: I am addressing the chairman.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You spoke of the government.

Mr. STEVENS: You may as well have an understanding now as any other time.

Mr. ESLING: Mr. Chairman, I would confine myself to the item, but the trouble is that it is not there; I cannot speak to it.

I was pointing out that in this particular place, the city of Trail, which I represent, nothing has been spent in the construction of public buildings, although we contribute to the federal exchequer every year four times the total vote for public buildings in British Columbia. Here is a little community of 8,000 which contributes to the treasury $1,000,000 per annum in taxation, yet the accommodation in public buildings which it so badly needs is not given. Notwithstanding that large contribution we make to the Dominion exchequer not one dollar has been spent in public works in that city in the whole period of thirty years I have lived there. Surely, therefore, we are not extravagant in asking now for a vote for a public building.

I would point out also wherein the Dominion is indebted to Trail. Let me take you back to January, 1915. At that time the allies needed zinc, and they were being held up by a syndicate of New York brokers who were charging them forty-four cents per pound for that commodity. The city of Trail then set its research department to work with the result that it evolved a process for treating complex ores which relieved not only this government, but all the allies, for Trail was able to supply zinc at the rate of fifteen cents per pound. Should not such an accomplishment receive some consideration? To-day we are producing in this little community, which the Minister of Health would overlook, 6 per cent of the world's zinc supply and 8 per cent of its lead supply. We have there the largest industrial institution probably in the whole Dominion, except perhaps the British Empire Steel Corporation. Figured in dollars and cents our production is $35,000,000 per year, and that is one little community of 8,000 people, and yet the Minister of Health does not think it is of sufficient importance to recommend a public building to the Public Works department. We produce pure gold, pure silver, pure lead, pure copper, pure zinc, sulphuric acid, antimony and innumerable by-products.

Mr. CAMPBELL: But you do not produce any Liberals there.

Mr. ESLING: That is quite right. The Minister of Public Works this afternoon, in attempting to justify a certain vote, said that there had been an increase in the population of the place. The community I speak for, has in five years time increased its population from 3,000 to 8,000, or an increase of 5,000 people. In that community we have a memorial hall built by the citizens themselves with the assistance of the company, and its equipment is not surpassed in the whole Dominion. It has a gymnasium, recreation rooms, bowling alleys and so forth. We have also a hospital which is the last word in construction and equipment.

I want to say a word now as to the human touch that exists as between the company and its employees. First, this company gives its men group insurance. It has also put aside several hundred thousand dollars for a pension fund, so that a man as soon as he has put in so many years with the company will be able to retire on pension. It also helps its employees in the building of homes. It has loaned to the people of this community half a million dollars for that purpose, and any man who can pay twenty per cent of the cost of his home is advanced the other eighty per cent by the company, at a very low rate of interest. With half a million dollars advanced to this community to help in the construction of homes, the Minister of Health still does not think it is of sufficient importance to give them a small public building, notwithstanding the fact that we have not had one dollar of public expenditure in thirty years. The company also gives the men in its employ fifty dollars in cash at Christmas time, and every married man who has been in the service of the company for three years gets a share of stock in the company, worth $250. The company comes just about as near looking after the welfare of its employees as it is humanly possible for any company to do. It has a payroll of about $500,000 a month.

This afternoon the Minister of Public Works in justifying some of his estimates, said, "I am endeavouring to carry out a policy of constructing public buildings where there is not adequate accommodation, and where the necessity is urgent." I propose to put my case up to the hon. Minister of Public Works, and to show that the necessity for a public building in this community is urgent. I want first to read a letter from the hon. Minister of Health, who is British Columbia's direct representative in the cabinet. I had asked him to give consideration to this matter of the construction of a public building, and he replied under date of February 3, which is not very long ago:

> I am thoroughly conversant with the necessities of that district—

Meaning my district:

> —and it was with a view to giving better accommodation that I recommended the purchase of a property in Trail some time ago—

That "some time ago" was just a month before the 1925 election:

> —it being my intention to advocate the erection of a suitable building on this site.

Now I would ask the present Minister of Public Works if the former Minister of Public Works, who is now the Minister of Health, advocated a vote for this building. He says further:

> I am sure it is the desire of the government to meet the requirements of the fast-growing communities in Canada, but it is well realized that owing to the Great war there was a general desire to curtail public expenditure. It is only within the last two or three years that the government has been able to see its way clear to undertake the construction of new buildings, some of which have been completed.

The Minister of Health apparently has not seen his way clear to recommend the construction of this urgently needed building.

Now I want to quote from a letter from the present Postmaster General. I put this matter up to him, and he was very sympathetic. He did not merely say: I will give it consideration. No, under date of January 4, he wrote:

> I may say that the construction of public buildings is a matter of policy resting with the Minister of Public Works, but I have already made representations to his department that the accommodation at present provided at Trail is totally inadequate, and have urged the erection of a suitable public building.

That comes direct from the Postmaster General himself—"the accommodation is totally inadequate, and have urged the erection of a suitable public building." I have given you the letter from the Minister of Health, showing that he realizes the necessity for this public building in Trail; I have given you the letter from the Postmaster General, saying that he has urged the Department of Public Works to construct a building in Trail. Now I want to quote from the Post Office department itself. The conditions in the city of Trail became so acute, and are so acute to-day, that the Post Office department sent a special inspector to Trail to investigate the conditions, and this inspector reported:

> The present quarters cover 1,218 feet of floor space.

The building which the government rejected contains something like 1,500 feet of floor space. The inspector also reported that there were 1,037 boxes, and that the postmaster there stated that there were 500 people waiting to get boxes. That is, there were 1,037 boxes in use, and 500 people were lined up there waiting to get boxes. There is only room in that post office for 100 boxes, and the postmaster hesitates to put them in, because he has to put them in at his own expense, and he fears that if he did so, the government might construct a public building, and he would be out the cost of the hundred boxes. The inspector further goes on to say that the congestion in Trail has been so great that it has been necessary, in order to accommodate the general public, to establish four places throughout the city where the public can purchase stamps. Trail to-day, he says, has a population of 8,000, and he believes that it will increase in three years to probably 12,000. That is what the post office inspector says, the man who went into this community to make a full investigation of the conditions, and he naturally went to the fountainhead for information; in other words, to the company.

Mr. VENIOT: Will the hon. gentleman give the date of that report?

Mr. ESLING: I cannot give you the date, but I can give you the month. The report was made in December, 1926, only a short time ago. He says that within three years that community will have a population of 12,000. If you were to go to the manager of the Consolidated Mining & Smelting Company, I am sure he would hazard the guess that Trail will have a population of 15,000 souls within the next four or five years. This report from the inspector is in the possession of the Postmaster General and I have no doubt that upon it he based his recommendation to the Minister of Public Works. The government's own inspector recommends the erection of a public building to be proceeded with as soon as possible. He further recommends that this building, instead of containing 1,037 letter boxes should contain 2,100 letter boxes. Surely any hon. member who wants to be fair about this matter will realize that it is a case of urgency, or inadequate accommodation and of necessity. The inspector recommends that instead of 1,200 square feet of floor space as at present, the building should have 3,500 feet of floor space, and in order to avoid congestion, he also urges that there should be two entrances.

There is not another industrial centre in the whole of Canada to equal the city of Trail. In that city, an amount of $1,000,000 is paid each year in taxes and we have not had one dollar spent for public works in thirty years except the $11,000 vote which the minister passed on to his Liberal whip for that site. From my short acquaintance with the present Minister of Public Works I believe he is disposed to be fair. I do not blame him a particle; I put all the responsibility on the minister from British Columbia who apparently has not made the recommendation. I am simply going to leave the matter there and ask for the good offices and fair consideration of the present minister. I will ask him if he will not realize the lack of accommodation in the city of Trail, and endeavour to bring down in the supplementary estimates a vote for the erection of a public building there. At the present time the government are spending $135 a month in rent, $100 for a post office and $35 for a customs house. They might just as well save that money and house the two departments in one building. If the former Minister of Public Works saw the necessity, urgency and rush for getting this post office site purchased from his local Liberal friend before the 29th day of October, the date of the 1925 election, surely the sitting member is justified in asking for a vote for the erection of a public building in Trail.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am rather surprised and grieved to find my hon. friend in such an irritable mood to-night. He complains very bitterly of my action as the minister from British Columbia. I think the fact that as the minister knowing conditions in Trail and knowing them as well as my hon. friend does, I purchased the property which he says I purchased from Liberal friends—

Mr. ESLING: From the Liberal whip, I said.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am advised that my hon. friend and some of his real estate associates in Trail were anxious to sell a site.

Mr. ESLING: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend has been talking for about an hour about a post office in Trail—

Mr. ESLING: Will the minister confine himself to the truth.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am going to speak for five minutes. The purchase of the property was done through the ordinary channels.

Mr. ESLING: On the minister's order.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Is it possible for my hon. friend to contain himself? I know he has not got over the fact that the people of Trail did not give him a majority in the last election.

Mr. ESLING: They did. They gave me a majority of fifteen against your friend you brought from five hundred miles away.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I wish to say this because my hon. friend has gone far out of his way to intimate that I personally purchased property in Trail.

Mr. ESLING: So the minister did.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend will retract that statement, because it is not true. I will wait for him to retract.

Mr. ESLING: I will not say that the minister went there and handed over the money. I will say that he sent his resident architect and told him to see a certain man.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is easy for anyone to make insinuations, but this property was bought by the Public Works department in the usual way and any hon. member can easily inform himself upon the procedure that was followed. An officer of the department goes to the town or place where the purchase is to be made; he makes inquiries; he examines different properties.

Mr. ESLING: He did not. He was told to see a certain man and he saw him. He was told to see the Liberal whip and he saw him.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): He inquired as to values of many properties.

Mr. ESLING: He saw just the one man.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not quite appreciate my hon. friend's attitude. I think I am entitled to speak for a few moments.

Mr. ESLING: Well, speak the truth.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): When my hon. friend had the floor I did not interrupt him, and I would ask him to contain himself and suggest that he have papers brought down as they were last year giving the details of that purchase.

Mr. ESLING: I have them under my hand; every one of them.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): If the hon. member will read the report of the engineers, I am sure he will realize that he has been labouring for an hour in vain and has not been representing the true facts or conditions in regard to the matter. I was pleased to have my hon. friend endorse a vote of $5,000 for Kimberley. I can well understand that, because the great Sullivan mine is there. The town of Trail would not be the town it is to-day if the mine at Kimberley was not in operation. There is no doubt that Trail is a fine industrial community, and it is my hope and desire that money will be provided whereby proper government offices will be erected for the advantage of the people of Trail.

Mr. ESLING: It needs them as much as Kensington, Prince Edward Island, does.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I will ask him if it needs them as much as the people of Prince Rupert do, and I will then ask him to dilate on the purchase of a site in Prince Rupert, giving the date and the price paid for it.

Mr. MANION: The minister might add the Prince Rupert elevator.

[Mr. Esling.]

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is serving a useful purpose.

Mr. MANION: Returning $100 a year to this government on an investment of $1,500,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I do not wish to continue, because it is not necessary, but I take exception to the desire of my hon. friend to make a speech in this House for the purpose of making a little political capital for himself by attacking me.

Mr. ESLING: I have the very report about which the minister speaks from the resident architect at Victoria. I will leave it to any three members on the other side of the House who know anything about building construction, and I know they will pronounce it the most absurd, ridiculous and unjust report that was ever made on a public building site.

Mr. NEILL: I am not interested in the Trail post office; I am not interested even in a public building at Kimberley, but I am interested in the lack of public buildings in the district of Comox-Alberni. I would like to call the attention of this committee, and more particularly of my Conservative friends, to the fact that this vote comprises the sum of $243,262, and with the exception of the small sum of $5,000 for Kimberley the whole of that sum is for buildings in districts represented by Conservatives. Except, I say, for that little vote of $5,000 for Kimberley, every one of the twelve votes is going to districts of hon. gentlemen opposite, one of whom has made so much complaint of how he and his Conservative friends in British Columbia have been treated. I hope the lesson will be taken to heart by them, and that when I ask the Minister of Public Works for some few niggardly votes for odd wharves later on, hon. gentlemen opposite will remember this vote.

Mr. CLARK: It is pretty hard to find anything but a Conservative out there.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Conditions might be improved, though.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): How many patients are there at this lazaretto?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Last year there were seven.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): An increase or a decrease over the previous year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The same number both years.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): From what parts do they come?

Mr. ELLIOTT: As far as I recall, one is from Saskatchewan, and four are Chinamen. Fortunately the number of lepers is decreasing at all our stations.

Item agreed to.

British Columbia—Dominion public buildings —improvements, repairs, etc., $40,000.

Mr. BRADY: So much has been said regarding certain places where post offices are to be built that their names have become historic during the last few days. Let me mention another place that has not a post office building—the large, thriving city of Prince Rupert. The postal and other government business is carried on in a rented building costing annually about $4,000. The postal revenue for 1926 was $35,439; the customs and excise, $301,480. Besides these services the Marine and Fisheries department and the government telegraph department have accommodation in the same building. But it is not by any means adequate for the purpose. One of the government's representatives from Victoria visited Prince Rupert while I was there and after going through the building expressed the opinion that it was neither hygienic nor suitable for the amount of business handled. I do not expect that I shall be able to induce the government to promise me a post office to-night, but undoubtedly they should consider the desirability even from the standpoint of economy alone, of erecting a building at Prince Rupert adequate to handle the large volume of government business that has to be transacted there, rather than pay out every year $4,000 in rent for undesirable accommodation. In Smithers, a very promising town, the postal revenue for 1926 was $4,854, and at Ocean Falls, $6,596. I think since other places have had so many successful advocates, Prince Rupert and those I have just mentioned are entitled to favourable consideration from the government.

Item agreed to.

Esquimalt—general repairs and improvements at R.C.N. barracks and H.M.C. dockyards, $20,000.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Could the Minister of Public Works tell us how many troops are stationed in Esquimalt?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I regret that I have not the information.

Item agreed to.

William Head quarantine station—repairs and improvements, $8,250.

Mr. FRASER: I would like to ask the Postmaster General if he has had any report in regard to the necessity of a post office building in the town of Prince George?

Mr. VENIOT: From memory I would say not, but there may be an application on file. I will look it up and let my hon. friend know.

Mr. FRASER: I would point out the necessity of recommending to the Minister of Public Works an amount for a public building in the town of Prince George. That town is a very important community in the central part of British Columbia, with a population of about 3,500 people, and last year the postal revenue amounted to $12,412. I notice that in the estimates many places are receiving substantial consideration from this government which have neither the revenue nor the population of Prince George. I asked that this be included in the estimates last year and it was not done; I ask again that in view of the development likely to take place in the course of the next year, consideration be given to this request by the Minister of Public Works and the postal authorities. There is also an inspector of customs at that point, and a very considerable revenue is derived in that way. There is also in my district the town of Salmon Arm, with a population of between 1,200 and 1,500, which produces a postal revenue of about $8,800. In addition to the postal and customs revenue at this point I would point out that there are officials of the Forestry branch of the Interior department stationed in that town, and the rentals paid for office quarters must be very considerable. I suggest that it would be in the interests of the government and would reduce expenditure by a very considerable amount to erect a public building of their own in that town and thereby give the necessary accommodation to the various officials stationed there. There is not an item in the estimates for either of these places, but I am hoping the minister will be good enough to include them when the supplementary estimates are prepared. The Minister of Health (Mr. King) laughs; perhaps he remembers that last year he promised to do this for me, and to give it his very serious consideration. He is still considering, but I hope he will pass along a favourable decision this year.

Item agreed to.

Public Works — Generally — experimental farms—replacements, repairs, improvements, etc., $100,000.

Mr. BRADY: I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture if it is the intention of the government to give northern British Columbia an experimental farm?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If it is the intention of the government to give my hon. friend a farm?

Mr. BRADY: No, not to me, to northern British Columbia.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The estimates of the Department of Agriculture will be up after a while, and I will be able then to give my hon. friend all the information he desires.

Mr. BRADY: This is a very important question for the mixed farming districts of the Buckley valley, Burns lake, Smithers, Telkwa, Francois lake and Ootsa lake. Some years ago this question was before the House and was favourably considered by the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell). I think that it would be a very intelligent method of expenditure, because the result of the establishment of an experimental farm in this particular district would be far reaching. This district is one of the most suitable and best adapted to mixed farming in Canada, and the people of that great district which includes thousands of square miles are engaged in all forms of agricultural industry. They have splendid root crops; they carry on dairying; they have wheat, oats, rye, and timothy, and every other crop which should encourage the government to give these people an experimental farm. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Tolmie) some years ago very strongly advocated an experimental farm for this particular part of British Columbia, and I believe the time has now come in this country when the question of mixed farming should receive more careful consideration. We have the great wheat fields of the prairie provinces, but we must consider the other great districts of Canada which are perfectly adapted to mixed farming, and the district to which I refer should have an experimental farm, and the government should assist what is recognized to be a substantitl forward movement in the development of a great industry. When I heard the number of advocates for public buildings I was not enthusiastic, but I do feel that when the question is one of national importance, concerning the well-being of Canada, the voice of these people should be heard and the government should be sympathetic. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that the Minister of Agriculture is of the same mind to-day as he was in 1924.

[Mr. Fraser.]

Mr. ROWE: Would the minister explain on what farms and what buildings this money is to be spent?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is for replacements, improvements, alterations, repairs and so forth on the various experimental farms and stations throughout the Dominion.

Item agreed to.

Flags for Dominion public buildings, $5,000.

Mr. FRASER: How much was spent for this purpose last year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I understand it is all spent every year.

Item agreed to.

Military hospitals—repairs and improvements, $70,000.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Does this vote include the hospitals under the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is my recollection. This amount is required for the following repairs and improvements to various military hospital buildings throughout the Dominion, consisting of Halifax Camp Hill (B unit); Ste. Anne de Bellevue (A unit); Toronto, Christie street hospital (D unit); London Westminster hospital (D unit); Calgary, Colonel Belcher hospital (I unit); Vancouver, Shaughnessy hospital (J unit).

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): They are all under the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Public buildings—generally, $4,500.

Mr. BARBER: What buildings are these?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is an amount for the general care of the buildings throughout the Dominion that cannot be charged to special votes. It is the usual estimate.

Mr. FRASER: Has the minister got covered up in that amount a vote for a public building for Prince George?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No. There is no amount for construction; it is all for repairs.

Mr. FRASER: I thought perhaps the minister wanted to give me a sort of Santa Claus present, so to speak.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): What is the difference between public buildings under this item and public buildings appearing in the votes for each province?

Mr. ELLIOTT: These are general expenses. This vote is required for the following items of expenditure which have to be met every year in connection with public buildings controlled by the Dominion government together with such special outlays for works, and so forth, that cannot well be charged against any other one in particular of the general appropriations made by parliament for prospective improvements in the several provinces taken separately, namely, travelling expenses, stationery and drawing instruments, printing, telegraphy and miscellaneous.

Item agreed to.

Ottawa public buildings and grounds—departments generally—char service including $100 to E. Snowden for firing the noon gun, $385,000.

Mr. QUINN: Is there any provision in this vote for the increase which has been asked for by the char service?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Item agreed to.

Dominion quarantine stations—maintenance, $15,000.

Mr. QUINN: What is the reason for the increase over the previous year?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Since 1921 this appropriation has been $5,000, and the annual expenditure has varied from one thousand to three thousand. Small maintenance appropriations were also provided for the quarantine stations. This year it was decided to incorporate in this vote all the maintenance items, thereby doing away with a special appropriation. For that purpose this appropriation has been increased from $5,000 to $15,000. The details are as follows:

North Sydney, N.S.	$ 500
Chatham, N.B.	750
St. John, N.B., Partridge island repairs	3,000
St. John, N.B., Partridge island water supply	1,000
Tracadie lazaretto	1,500
Father Point	1,000
Grosse Isle	4,000
Maintenance generally	3,250
Total	$15,000

Item agreed to.

Dominion public buildings—rents, $1,440,000.

Mr. SIMPSON: Is that all for buildings in Ottawa?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think the amount for Ottawa is $650,000.

Mr. HEAPS: Is it the intention of the government to proceed with the erection of new departmental buildings, and thus reduce the expenditure for rents?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is in contemplation. It is expected that the first will be commenced this year and that it will take a couple of years to complete. We shall not be relieved of any rental until the new building is habitable.

Mr. MILLAR: Has it been decided what departments will be housed in the new building?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Not yet.

Mr. FRASER: Has the department any complete plan in regard to the buildings contemplated?

Mr. ELLIOTT: We had a plan prepared some time ago, providing for a complete set of departmental buildings sufficient to house the various departments. The scheme is rather extensive.

Mr. FRASER: What is the total cost?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Close to $15,000,000.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Does that include public buildings for all departments?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Have you a detailed statement of the cost by departments?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No, only by provinces. We have 402 buildings rented at a total of $1,440,000.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Perhaps we might have that statement.

Mr. ELLIOTT: In London, England, we have an expenditure of $9,733.30; Nova Scotia, $11,010; Prince Edward Island, $811; New Brunswick, $11,922; Quebec, $97,658; Ontario, $168,980; Ottawa, $650,377; Manitoba, $67,059; Saskatchewan, $76,156; Alberta, $143,868; British Columbia, $65,725; Yukon, $660; militia probable requirements, $34.660; militia rents, pending, $10,931; militia colleges and universities, $20,000.

Mr. FRASER: Does that include the rentals of post offices?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Everything.

Mr. SIMPSON: What buildings are rented in London, England? I thought we had acquired a large building there for the use of the high commissioner and other officials.

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is for the ground rental of the Canadian building in London.

Mr. STEVENS: On a ninety-nine year lease?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Are there any buildings rented in England apart from this, or are all the departments in one building?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The departments are all in one building.

Item agreed to.

Yukon public buildings—rents, repairs, fuel, light, water services and caretakers' salaries, $28,000.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): We have already been given an item of $660 for Yukon. What does this item include?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is required for repairs, fuel, lighting, water service, and salary of caretakers in connection with public buildings occupied by government officials in the Yukon Territory during the fiscal year 1927-28.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): What does the $660 in the other item include?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That $660 comprises $300 for Mayo Landing post office and $360 for Mayo Landing interior. These two items have always been carried under a separate head.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and rivers—Nova Scotia, $296,210.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): Will the minister explain the first item of $1,850 for repairs to the dyke at Amherst Point?

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is a dyke in the county of Cumberland. It is proposed to rebuild it on a length of 190 feet. To carry out the proposed repairs, it will be necessary to drive a line of piles along the outer face of the work and lay planking on the inner side of these piles to hold the back filling of the dyke. It is also suggested that anchor piles be driven about ten feet in from the outer face of the dyke and suitable braces placed from these piles to the top of the piles along the outer face, to give stability to the works.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): Do I understand that these repairs are to protect the government wharf at Amherst Point?

[Mr. Elliott.]

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes. The dyke west of the public road at the government wharf is badly in need of repairs and the farmers' body who own the land in this vicinity have asked the department to undertake these repairs.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): The wharf itself is in a dilapidated condition. Last year a small sum was spent on it, but I believe it was used largely to dig berths to enable vessels to discharge their cargoes there.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That would be dredging.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): Yes; a small amount was spent for that purpose. The wharf itself has been in disuse for a considerable time, but the people are now beginning to make use of it and, temporary repairs having been effected, cargoes have been landed. Representations have been made to me that the flooring on the wharf is not only out of repair but unsafe, and I understand that the board of trade of the town, which is about two miles from the wharf, have asked the department to have the necessary work done so that cargoes may be properly and safely discharged at this point. Has the minister taken these representations into consideration?

Mr. ELLIOTT: The position in regard to wharves is much the same as in regard to public buildings. We have in the Dominion of Canada to-day 2,147 wharves of various kinds. The number was a great surprise to me when I was going over the list with a view to seeing on which ones repairs were most urgently needed. My hon. friend will recall that in the last thirteen years, since the outbreak of the war, there has not been anything like the expenditure on wharves that the people in the various localities thought was necessary, and the result has been that many of them have fallen exactly into the condition that I have no doubt my hon. friend finds this one in. We are trying to make repairs where they are most urgently required, and not to go beyond the amount of money that the government can afford to spend, and we are aiming to make these repairs as far as possible in places where they will encourage production and the distribution of the wealth created in that particular part of the Dominion. I quite agree with my hon. friend that that wharf and many others must be repaired just as soon as funds can be found to do it.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): That is all very nice, but these are public services, and from that standpoint alone they should be maintained in order to provide the public with the accommodation that is required. But leaving that out of consideration for the moment, there is still another viewpoint, and that is the question of what is economy in the long run. If these services are allowed to go into decay, in the end the cost of putting them into proper condition will far exceed any outlay that would have to be made in the interim and the repairs will serve two purposes, namely, save money and provide adequate service. I wish to speak also of other services of a similar character in the county of Cumberland, the same county in which this Amherst Point dyke expenditure is to be made. I would refer the minister to the breakwater and beach protection at a point called Port Greville. A breakwater was constructed there about a couple of years ago, but it was built a considerable distance short of the old one. It was built to protect the harbour and to stop the filling in of the channel of the river on account of tides moving back and forth. Representations have been made to the government to extend this breakwater out to the point where the old one was, in an endeavour to stop the filling in of the channel. It has also been pointed out to me and to the government that the breakwater itself has not been completely constructed, and in order to afford proper harbour protection the breakwater will have to be thoroughly spiled, which is not the case to-day. This is a very important port on the bay of Fundy. Last year there was shipped through it 5,000,000 feet of lumber. There were 31 three and four masted schooners repaired there; 14 large vessels cleared with lumber, there were 8 cargoes of piling, and 16 cargoes of lumber in smaller vessels, also 1,000,000 feet of lumber shipped in scows. In all over 30,000 tons deadweight was shipped out of this harbour last year.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What was the value?

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): I have not the value in dollars, just the quantities, but it is recognized that this is a most important port.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Is not this a wharf on which considerable expenditure has been made by the government in the last two years?

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): Yes, considerable expenditures have been made on the breakwater, but nothing on the beach protection.

Mr. ELLIOTT: About $50,000 in the last two years.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): I do not think that much; but the work has not been finished. The breakwater to-day is not completed; the beach protection is practically useless, and on account of that fact it is not rendering the service to this port that it should. Last year, or the year before, private interests had to dig the channel out in order to allow their large vessels to enter and clear. I understand also that the citizens of that port have made representations to the government for consideration. Certainly I did myself last year and also this year.

I pass now just as quickly as possible to another point on the bay of Fundy. At Spencer's island there is a wharf which is in a dilapidated condition, and for which no provision is made in the estimates. I have before me a communication from the Public Works department in Halifax, which I presume is a branch of the Public Works department here, stating that they were going to ask that the sum of $2,000 be placed in this year's estimates in order to put this wharf in repair. This is also an important point, but I find nothing in the estimates to provide for this work. The matter is one that should certainly be given some consideration by the minister when the supplementary estimates are brought down.

Then at West Advocate there is a breakwater, and the people there are asking for an extension. This is also a very important port through which a great deal of lumber and other commodities are shipped. I am taking these matters up only very briefly, and am not going into details at all, although I have here very valuable information; but I do not wish to delay the committee. I would ask the minister if there will not be some reconsideration in the supplementary estimates of the amounts allotted for harbours and rivers in Nova Scotia, particularly in Cumberland county at the ports to which I have made reference to-night. I believe that in the end economy will be effected by the immediate repairing of these public works, instead of allowing them to go on for a number of years more without attention, when the cost of repairs will be excessive.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the desire of the committee to take up this vote item by item? The amounts are comparatively small, and perhaps we could have a general discussion on the resolution.

An hon. MEMBER: Item by item.

Mr. ERNST: I want to point out to the Minister of Public Works that in the supplementary estimates for 1926-27 there were five items affecting my constituency, as follows: Brooklyn wharf repairs, $1,500; La Have river, dredging, $35,000; Pentz wharf, $4,400; Port Mouton dredging, $55,500; and West Port Joli, breakwater repairs, $3,800. Since the supplementary estimates were brought down not one dollar of that money, so far as I can ascertain, has been expended; in other words the vote will lapse and nothing will have been done by the 31st of March. In the main estimates tabled this year not one of these items has been reinstated, although I note that fifteen other items in the supplementaries for 1926-27 have been carried into the main estimates for the present year. I would like to ask the minister why the five items I have mentioned have been dropped. The whole five of them are in my constituency. None of them has been included and I want to point out further that I have drawn the attention of his department to the fact that the wharf at Tancook is in a bad state of repair; that the breakwater at Blandford is in a bad state of repair; that the wharf at Vogler's cove is in the same condition, and additional dredging is required at Port Mouton. I am going to ask the minister again if he will be kind enough to give these matters his attention and provide for them in the supplementary estimates this year. Every one of them is a service which is urgent and important to the locality.

Mr. QUINN: Just to continue the argument of the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst), I might also refer to the supplementary estimates of a year ago. As regards the constituency which I have the honour to represent, a year ago we had an item of $1,000 for repairs to a wharf and road at Chezzetcook (Murphy's or Myatt's). Then there was another item of $4,800 for a wharf at Ketch harbour and an item of $3,500 for wharf at Necum Teuch. I notice in the estimates for this year an item for wharf repairs at Musquodoboit, $1,600. I have no criticism of that item whatever; I wish it were a little larger, because Musquodoboit was particularly good to me in 1926. There is an item for dredging at Sheet harbour. That is also absolutely necessary and I do not see how the government can get away from doing the work. There is an item for $1,100 for breakwater repairs and improvements at Devil's island. This is absolutely necessary and I thought the vote would be larger. Devil's island is an island at the mouth of the western entrance of Halifax harbour and on it are situated two very important lighthouses. There is also a life-saving station and there is no telephone connection. A cable can be run across the eastern passage a very short distance and I would ask, not only in the interests of the residents of that island but as a necessary work in connection with the life-saving station, that there should be a telephone connection between that island and the city of Halifax or the town of Dartmouth.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What is the distance?

Mr. QUINN: Not more than a quarter of a mile.

Mr. SHORT: I wish to bring to the attention of the minister some much needed improvements in my constituency. There is the port of Westport in Digby county, one of the most important fishing ports in that county. A breakwater was built some years ago at a cost of $75,000 or $100,000, and to-day it requires an extension of about 50 to 75 feet owing to the fact that it was not properly dredged out by the department and the port cannot be used at low tide. There is a recommendation to the Department of Public Works from the Department of Trade and Commerce stating that this work is urgently required, but there is nothing in the estimates for it. A great deal of dredging is needed at a number of the piers and breakwaters in my constituency. Part of my constituency is a fishing district and perhaps there are more breakwaters in it than in any other constituency in Nova Scotia. I would urge upon the minister the necessity of making improvements to a number of these, including Westport; Battery point; dredging at the Racquette at Digby harbour; Anderson's cove and Litchfield. All of these are very urgently needed in order to give proper facilities for carrying on the fishing industry in those places. I would urge the minister to have his engineers report on these places and to have a sufficient amount placed in the supplementary estimates to carry out this urgently required work.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I know that in regard to some of the places mentioned by my hon. friend, and at least one of the places mentioned by the hon. member for Cumberland, the engineer has been asked to make a report. That does not necessarily mean that an amount will be placed in the estimates this year, but I can assure my hon. friend that the matter of supplementary estimates, which must of course depend upon the amount of money that we have at our disposal, is receiving the greatest possible attention. I am quite satisfied, and I think I should not withhold the statement from my hon. friends, now that only a small number of the requests made in regard to places throughout the whole country can be acceded to with the money at hand. On account very largely of the fact that there seems to be a revival of optimism and of business prosperity at every harbour in the country, the demands have been much greater in the last year or so than ever before. I recall a number of the places that have been mentioned to-night. There is no question that some of the breakwaters are in quite serious condition. There are several other places where, on account of new developments such as pulp and paper and other industries, it is necessary, if you are to encourage those industries, that something be done. It is wholly a question of making such improvements as our finances will permit and such as are necessary in order to assist the general production and prosperity of the community concerned.

Mr. SHORT: That is a very fair statement if the minister would only carry it out. The fact is that money is not expended where it is most urgently needed. If the minister would carry out the principle that he has laid down, that would be satisfactory to all of us on this side of the House. As regards all the places I have mentioned, the improvements are urgently needed. The government have expended hundreds of thousands of dollars on breakwaters throughout the different counties in Nova Scotia. Why do they not keep them in repair just the same as a private individual keeps his wharves in repair? The trouble is that in certain localities the government allow these wharves to go down, for some reason that is unexplained. That is not good policy, because if you do not make repairs when necessary, if you allow these works to go without repair for another year, you have eventually to spend double the money. The engineers know what is required. It would be satisfactory if the government would carry out their recommendations, but they are not carried out. The money is spent often where it is not needed and places where it is needed have to go without.

There is an item of $2,500 for breakwater repairs at Black Point. Where is that situated in Nova Scotia?

Mr. ELLIOTT: In the constituency of Richmond-West Cape Breton.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): I notice for Black Point the vote is $2,500 and last year it was $1,400. How much of that $1,400 was spent?

Mr. ELLIOTT: $350.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): What was that expended for?

Mr. ELLIOTT: For sealing up the outer end of the work done in 1925-26, and placing ballast in two bays on the seaward side and repairing the sheathing at those bays.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): If the breakwater was repaired in 1925 why this vote for $2,500 now?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does my hon. friend object to the expenditure?

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): No, but I want to see where the money is going.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The vote is for the reconstruction of the outer sixty feet of the breakwater, sixty feet by eighteen by eighteen, with native timber cribwork. This reconstruction started in 1925-26, when seventy-five feet of the 110 feet proposed was built. The work was stopped on account of stormy weather. Twenty-five feet of the outer end was destroyed in the fall of 1925-26 by storms. The estimated cost of the work proposed for 1927-28 is $2,500.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): How much was expended previous to the general election in 1925? I understand the work was stopped in October.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My statement shows the expenditure last year.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): You have no statement of the money expended up to October 1925?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): Apparently it has become necessary to vote $2,500 to repair the part that was left unfinished just a few days after the election. That breakwater was built around 1911 or 1912. The money for it had been voted previous to the 1911 election, for under the patronage system of our friends they always voted money for such projects the year before a general election. A certain amount of money was spent in the district previous to 1911. Before that time some work had been done at the entrance to the Grand river against the best advice of the fishermen in the district. Due to this work and the construction of the breakwater the entrance to the river was closed by shifting sand and fishermen cannot fish in that district. Now we are proposing to spend another $2,500 after having already spent five or six thousand dollars in 1925, on work that has been destroyed, for you cannot hold the breakwater in that position. As I say, the portion of the breakwater still remaining is helping to block the entrance to the Grand river, so that to-day we are left practically without a fishing port in that district. I would urge that the department send a competent engineer to survey the locality and ascertain if it is not feasible to keep open the Grand river by a little dredging and the construction of abutments. I understood that the people in the district were to forward a petition to the government asking that this be done. By clearing the channels at the entrance to the Grand river the government would open up one of the finest pulpwood areas left in Cape Breton, an area which is along the river, and which communicates with four large lakes. I would strongly urge that this be done not only for the development of the Grand river as a fishing port but also for the development of the pulp industry in that district.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have before me the report of the district engineer, Mr. Locke, whom I take to be a competent official. I assume my hon. friend does not suggest that the local engineer is not competent?

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): The local engineer in that district is, I understand, a very competent man. In 1925 the people of that district asked the government to inspect this region and report on the feasibility of reopening the Grand river. I think Mr. Locke, if so instructed, would be able to present to the government a very favourable report, and for a little expenditure we would have that district developed to its fullest extent. The government should guard against this $2,500 on the Black Point breakwater being wasted. Black Point is just across the entrance of the Grand river.

I also notice that the item for dredging at Petite de Grat harbour is omitted. What has become of the $30,000 that was voted for this previous to the election in 1925?

Mr. ELLIOTT: My reports cover only the details of the items in the estimates.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): Mr. Chairman, is not the minister aware that $30,000 was voted for the dredging of Petite de Grat harbour in 1925? The work was let to a certain contractor, but after a few weeks the dredging was stopped. It is a very important public work but it has been neglected by this government ever since.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not think my hon. friend would expect me to carry information in my head in regard to all these items. I have the file in the office relating to this particular matter and I shall be glad to obtain whatever information there is and give it to my hon. friend.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): I do not expect the minister to carry all the information in his cranium, but I would expect that with his deputy at his beck and call and with all the files of the department available he would have some knowledge at least of such an important contract. I would suggest to the minister that in the supplementary estimates the remaining portion of that $30,000 be included, which will open up that important port and permit the fishing industry to continue. This is probably the only industry the people in that district have; it is a fresh fish industry and these people are about the nearest to the best winter fishing in Nova Scotia. There are some twenty-five or thirty boats fishing out of that port and the haddock winter fishing is very important there. This money was voted in 1925 but work was stopped in October of that year and there has not been a stroke of work done since. I would suggest that the remaining portion of that money be revoted in order to permit work to commence at once. Have contractors who should be able to carry out any contracts they enter into, and if they do not do so it is the business of the government to see that the work is carried on or the contract forfeited.

I would also like to bring to the attention of the minister another matter in connection with the Fourchu district; I notice there is an amount included in the estimates for repairs to beach for the protection of that harbour. These repairs were made in 1925; the work was done under foremen appointed by this government; it was used for patronage purposes, and within two weeks of its completion every dollar's worth of work was washed away. If we are now going to spend more money on this project we should at least see that it is spent properly and that proper materials are used so that it will withstand the weather.

I would also bring to the attention of the minister the question of a life saving station at Scatterie island. I understand that a life saving station was established there some years ago, but during the last few years this government allowed it to be closed; it was stated they would not pay their men a reasonable salary. I do not know what the reason was; it was not that they did not vote right, because up until 1925 Scatterie island always gave a good strong Liberal majority, but in 1926 it did not do so because they felt that they were neglected. They are some eight or nine miles from the mainland and occupy the most eastern portion of Nova Scotia.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend will pardon me, but this matter will come up with the estimates of the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): The minister allowed a discussion on life saving stations under this very item some time ago and I think it might well be brought up now.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The matter does not come under the Department of Public Works.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe the House adjourned at 11.10 p.m.

Monday, March 14, 1927

The House met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill No. 145, to incorporate Thousand Islands International Bridge Corporation.—Mr. Edwards (Ottawa).

BRITISH COLUMBIA CLAIMS

RECONVEYANCE OF LANDS TO THE PROVINCE BY DOMINION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I promised my hon. friend from Victoria, B.C., (Mr. Tolmie) to lay on the table a copy of the order in council appointing Mr. Justice Martin commissioner to inquire into the arguments of the government of the province of British Columbia in support of its claim for the reconveyance to the province by the government of Canada of the lands conveyed by the province to the Dominion. I now table a copy of the order.

SCRIP FRAUDS

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 146, to amend the Criminal Code (scrip frauds).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. KENNEDY: This is the same bill that was introduced last year. It aims to strike out sub-paragraph (a) of section 1140 of the Criminal Code. The sub-paragraph which it is desired to strike out limits to three years the time within which action may be commenced for any offence arising out of the allocation of land that was paid for, in whole or in part by scrip, and was granted upon certificates issued to half breeds in connection with the extinguishment of Indian title.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CIVIL SERVICE

CIVIL SERVICE ACT, 1918, AMENDMENT

Mr. W. A. HALL (South Bruce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 147, to amend the Civil Service Act, 1918, respecting appointments.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Explain.

Mr. HALL: The object of this bill is to give some discretionary powers to the Civil Service Commission in the matter of appointments, instead of confining them in every case to the appointment of the person whose name stands highest on the eligible list. This list is not always prepared by the commission nor approved by it. May I say that the bill does not propose to repeal a single clause or even a word of the present act; it simply seeks to insert a clause expressing the purposes of the measure.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CIVIL SERVICE

EXAMINATION FOR POSTAL CLERKS

On the Orders of the Day.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): I desire to bring to the attention of the government a matter that came to me in the mail. I received a letter to-day—at least it came to my box on Saturday—from the Assistant Postmaster General, indicating that examinations will be held for a certain class of postal clerk, and I desire to draw the attention of the government to one or two matters in connection therewith. The letter reads that:

> Candidates wishing to take this examination must file an application with the Civil Service Commission on or before the fifteenth instant.

Then a little further down it says:

> I would suggest, therefore, that if you know of any candidates who are desirous of entering the postal service you will advise them to file application with the Civil Service Commission at once, signifying their intention of writing at the examination, as this is the only way they can obtain a permanent position.

And then there is a list of the cities where this examination is to be held. First, I bring this fact to the attention of the government: that it would be utterly impossible for a candidate in British Columbia to give notice to the Civil Service Commission by March 15. I received this letter on March 11 and it was mailed on the same date although it is dated March 7. That is my first point. The second point to which I wish to direct the attention of the government is that the city of Vancouver is the fourth city in Canada, and I suppose that in that city there are approximately a thousand government employees, and yet it is not on this list at all. Now the two things indicate what I have complained of on frequent occasions and that is that as British Columbia is, in mailing distance to and fro, nearly two weeks away from Ottawa, it is almost hopeless for a candidate to get in on this examination. I have asked on previous occasions and would like to reiterate the request to-day that a notice be sent out sufficiently early to give the candidates in distant parts of Canada—British Columbia, Alberta, the maritime provinces—ample time to file their applications. In the second place, I assert that surely a city of the importance of Vancouver should be on the list of places where examinations are to be held.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): This is not a matter for the Post Office Department at all. It is a subject which is entirely under the control of the Civil Service Commission. They fix the dates, they inform us, and we send out the notices; but I may add that because Vancouver is not on the list does not say that examinations will not be held in that city. A similar notice was issued by the Civil Service Commission last week for the province of Quebec, and my attention was drawn to the fact that neither the city of Quebec nor the city of Montreal was mentioned there. I took the matter up with the commission, and they informed me that the fact that the cities of Montreal and Quebec were not mentioned in the list did not mean that examinations would not be held there; examinations will be held in those cities at another date to be fixed by them. the same thing applies to the city of Vancouver.

Mr. STEVENS: If the Postmaster General will permit me I should like to say that the names of New Westminster, Prince Rupert and Nanaimo are mentioned with Victoria.

Mr. VENIOT: Vancouver stands in a class by itself.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not complaining of my hon. friend the Postmaster General. What I am complaining of is the short period of time that is allowed.

Mr. VENIOT: I will call the attention of the Civil Service Commission to the fact that they have not given sufficient time in this instance.

[Mr. Stevens.]

TEMPORARY EMPLOYEES

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. J. A. CLARK (Vancouver-Burrard): Will any legislation be introduced this year for the purpose of making permanent civil servants who are now employed under the Soldier Settlement Board and in some of the other departments, who have served for a period of from seven to nine years, whose case has, I think, been dealt with by order in council in the past with the intention of making them permanent, but as regards whom no legislation has been introduced in parliament?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The matter to which my hon. friend has just referred has received some consideration by the government, but a decision has not yet been reached. The government does not propose at the present session to enlarge the legislative programme any more than is absolutely necessary, but the matter to which my hon. friend refers is an important one and will receive further consideration.

Mr. CLARK: I would like to point out that these men are debarred from taking advantage of the pension to which other civil servants are entitled under present conditions.

PRIVILEGE—MR. EVANS

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Rosetown): I wish to contradict a statement in the Saskatoon Daily Star, of Saturday ,March 5, purporting to give an account of the proceedings of the railway committee on March 4. The statement in question reads:

> The bill authorizing the Manitoba and Northwestern Railway to construct a line in central Saskatchewan, was reported by the railways and canals committee of the Commons to-day. The company is owned by the Canadian Pacific Railway and was originally planned to run from Theodore to or near Duval.

The statement to which I take exception is this:

> John Evans, Rosetown, said the proposed construction was not needed. The two main lines already served the territory adequately.

That is an absolute misrepresentation. I never used these words or any others that could be construed into that meaning. The whole thing is an utter falsehood.

IMMIGRATION PUBLICITY

ALLEGED MISLEADING STATEMENTS IN BRITISH NEWSPAPERS

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): I desire to direct the attention of the administration to the form of advertising carried by some of the steamship companies in the old country. I have in my hand a copy of the Down Recorder from Downpatrick in Ireland. It contains a long list of steamship companies advertising for men to take passage on their boats at the rate of £2 or roughly $10 per head. In these advertisements they call attention to the fact that they seek a certain number, in some cases running into the thousands, in one case 10,000, in another 14,000, and they promise, as they also do in the Manchester Guardian in England, assured employment at good wages to men with or without experience. Is the government prepared to guarantee to men in this country employment at good wages? Furthermore, would the Minister of Immigration kindly state to the House whether any means are being taken by the government to protect the immigrant who comes in under this kind of advertising?

Hon. ROBERT FORKE (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): I think I explained that rather fully the other day. I do not know whether the hon. member was in the House. No immigrant can come into this country under the assisted passage agreement at the £2 rate unless he has been nominated by someone residing in Canada or by the government and unless employment has been guaranteed and assured. Those people are all nominated to come to some particular place for agricultural employment, and until that is done they cannot take advantage of the £2 assisted passage. It is rather difficult to deal with the advertisements that are sent out by shipping companies. I know they sometimes depict things fairly brightly.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The minister has not quite caught the point. I would like to know if the minister or his department or the government as a whole is taking any steps to see to it that these steamship companies are not making applications for permits until they actually have employment for the intending immigrant.

Mr. FORKE: Steamship companies are not making nominations of intending immigrants. No steamship company is being granted nominations.

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): The Minister of Immigration has stated, twice to-day and once before, that these men would be admitted to Canada provided that they were nominated by someone in this country. Has the government taken any steps to ascertain the bona fides of the nominations, because in many cases I am sure these people are acting for other parties.

Mr. FORKE: The department has taken a great deal of care to find out the bona fides of those who have made the nominations.

Mr. ARTHURS: What has been the result?

Mr. FORKE: Oh, well.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Is the government prepared to give residents of Canada opportunities equal to those of people who are brought into this country?

Mr. FORKE: I would say absolutely.

PENSIONS FOR POSTMASTERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. F. P. QUINN (Halifax): I would like to ask the Postmaster General if any provision is made for pensions for postmasters who have been retired from the service, particularly for those who have served as postmasters for ten years and upwards.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): If they are retired under the act, there is provision for pensions for them. There is no provision as regards those who are not retired under the act.

PRIVATE BILLS

MONTREAL, OTTAWA AND GEORGIAN BAY CANAL COMPANY

The House resumed from Friday, March 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chevrier for the second reading of Bill No. 78, respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Guthrie.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House is for the second reading of Bill No. 78, respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company, and to this motion the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) has moved an amendment which will virtually kill the bill. It practically means the six months' hoist. The amendment reads:

> That all the words after the word "that" in the said motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> The character and object of this bill involve matters of grave national and provincial importance, and are such as to constitute it a measure of public policy which ought not to be dealt with by any private bill.

When the Red lake bill was before the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines last session, we were told by the chairman of the committee and by the Railway department of the government that the House having accepted the principle of the proposed legislation on the second reading of the bill, virtually all the committee had to decide was whether the application, the preamble and the different sections of the bill were within the power of this parliament. On the second reading of a bill the British practice is referred to in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, page 130, section 511:

The second reading of a bill is that stage when it is proper to enter into a discussion and propose a motion relative to the principle of the measure.

Section 513 states:

It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill, or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction, or prosecution; or otherwise opposed to its progress; or seeking further information in relation to the bill by committees, commissioners, the production of papers or other evidence or the opinion of judges.

Therefore, under the rules of this House and the British practice the proper place to discuss the question of the principle of a bill is on the second reading. The following is stated in the 13th edition of May's Parliamentary Procedure at page 709. The leader of the opposition quoted this the other evening in his address:

The second reading of a private bill, corresponds with the same stage in other bills, and in agreeing to it the House affirms the general principle, or expediency, of the measure.

This is one of the most important bills ever brought before parliament. It involves the whole future of the power rights of this province. The granting of this charter would hand over to the Sifton interests the whole industrial future, not only of the Ottawa valley, but of new Ontario. This is not a private bill, Mr. Speaker. If ever there was a public bill to graft the public resources of this country from the people, it is this particular iniquitous Sifton bill. Talk of the Chicago diversion of water being a steal, as some newspapers do; why, that is simply a small affair compared with this gigantic grab bill, to steal the water-powers of the Ottawa valley and northern Ontario. From the western boundary of Quebec right up to the Nipigon river all the water-powers have been grabbed by private interests, and nobody knows what rates they are charging for domestic power. The Ottawa valley is rich in lumber, water-powers and mines, but all these great resources have been handed over to private capital and private greed and the whole industrial life of the Ottawa valley has been stagnant for a great many years because of the hand-out of these magnificent resources, the natural heritage of the Ottawa valley, to American millionaires.

The other evening some Toronto men could find no sleeping accommodation in Ottawa. I would suggest that they utilize the front benches across the way. We have had sleepers there on the six or seven occasions on which this bill has been before the House. What is the policy of the government in regard to this bill? Can the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) tell me what it is? Can the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) tell me what it is? The Sifton interests are down here trying to claim all these magnificent resources, and this House would like to know what the policy of the government is. This is not a private bill; by no stretch of the imagination can it be called a private bill. It seeks to give away a whole kingdom of resources to private greed. Would you call that a private bill? I say no.

The amendment that has been moved by the leader of the opposition is quite in accordance with the rules of the House. The leader of the opposition is friendly towards the public-owned light and power system in the province of Ontario, and a vote for his amendment will be a vote against the attitude of simply standing idly by while the resources of this country are being plundered and handed over to private interests. I submit that the principle involved in this bill raises the largest question of public policy which this parliament will have to discuss probably during its life, and yet this bill is being made a political football.

This charter was first granted in the days of Queen Victoria. It survived through the reigns of three sovereigns, Queen Victoria, King Edward and King George. It has survived under nine prime ministers, and has been before nine different parliaments since 1894. We did not hear much about it, though, until a few years ago, and everybody thought that the bill had been decently buried, after the fashion of the Newmarket canal in the constituency which the Prime Minister represented a few years ago. I have in my hand, Mr. Speaker, a list of the statutes, fourteen in all, which have been passed by this House respecting this particular franchise. The first one was in 1894, and a large body of the rank and file of the Liberal party in the city of Ottawa, are named as the incorporators. There are ninety-nine of them, just about as many as in the committee of one hundred. After a while, eighty-five of them thought they had better drop out, and then fourteen remained. They went from strength to strength; they found every successive railway committee easier than the last, and what has the result been? The whole Ottawa valley has been stagnant commercially and industrially. Why? Because of the absence of cheap light and power, because of the absence of direct current, because of the giving away to political favourites of the magnificent heritage of this territory.

The situation in the Ottawa valley reminds me of the situation in the province of Nova Scotia where, during thirty-four years of Liberal rule, all the great natural resources of that magnificent province, its timber wealth, its mines and its water-powers were given away to private greed. The Liberals gave away the resources of that province just like Santa Claus handing out presents from a Christmas tree, with the result that the maritime provinces got into such a condition that a royal commission had to be appointed, and we now have the Duncan report before us recommending subsidies and subventions to help make up to the province what they lost by this continual hand-out of its resources.

The time to kill this bill is here and now. A few years ago it might have been called simply an obnoxious bill; but to-day, in view of the $104,000,000 that has been spent on the deepening of the Welland canal and the hundreds of millions invested in the National Railways—in view of the proposed improvements to the St. Lawrence waterway, in view of the several routes our western provinces now have to the seaboard, in view of the changed conditions and the opening of the Panama canal, this bill is not simply obnoxious; it is a scandal. I do not think I can do better than quote from an editorial in last Saturday's Toronto Globe, pleading with the government of the day to come forward and declare what their policy is regarding this particular bill. It says:

> There is practically unanimity of opinion in this province, judging from the expressions of newspapers, on the charter of the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Company. The press —Liberal, Conservative and Independent— evidently believes that the bill which is designed to renew the franchise of this corporation should be killed. It is not a question of politics, but of business—of public business—whether a large provincial asset should be handed over to a private body for development and exploitation at public expense.
> This opinion has also been expressed in a resolution adopted unanimously by the Ontario legislature and presented and read by the Speaker in the House of Commons.
>
> No doubt remains as to Ontario's attitude, and there should be no doubt as to its reception at Ottawa. The policy of this Province in power development is established. The fact that more and more power is needed for public service is well known, and Ontario has more than 50 per cent interest in the water rights which the bill before parliament proposes to give away. It shares with Quebec the power rights of the Ottawa, but from Mattawa west the territory involved is wholly within this province. Therefore Ontario's view should be fully respected in the Federal parliament.
>
> But there is a moral responsibility which transcends the constitutional right. Why should the federal parliament for a moment consider turning over to private interests public property with a potential value of hundreds of millions of dollars? On the face of it, it would be a clear gift of perpetually increasing financial importance—giving away the last remaining natural resource, and one of which the people are in most urgent need.
>
> The amazing thing is that the federal government sits idly by and permits this bill to take up the time of the House, to go through debating periods and to go to a committee for consideration. What is there to consider? Whether the people should be robbed of a large part of their heritage or not? Can there be two answers to the question?
>
> True, as the Globe has said, this is a private bill, and the government is not technically obliged to commit itself for or against. But is the government responsible to the voters and to its conscience only for its own measures?
> If vicious legislation is passed in the House it will be with the aid of the government votes. This is vicious legislation. The government has a clear majority, an authority handed to it by the electors in order that it might be responsible for the laws enacted. There will be no way of evading responsibility if, through disinterestedness, or, worse still, government connivance, the Georgian bay bill is passed and this long-standing charter is renewed.
> A lot of water has passed down the Ottawa since this franchise was first granted. The proposed canal looked more like a public convenience and public necessity than it does to-day. But the reverse is emphatically the case with regard to water-power. The wording of the charter—at no time safeguarding the public —has taken on new significance in a generation. And the point of view of the public has changed accordingly—at least in Ontario. The government cannot afford to ignore this. It should have thrown its weight against the bill at the start, and it should not allow more time to be wasted on legislation which is wrong in principle and in purpose.

After referring to the number of letters which they had received relating to this matter they go on to say:

> Perhaps it may be well once again to make the position of the Globe clear. It takes no orders from would-be party managers, "practical" politicians or profit-seeking promoters. Its liberalism is of the old-fashioned, independent George Brown school, which seems sometimes to be getting out of date at Ottawa. It still deems it the duty of a national newspaper to support those policies which it believes are in the public interest, and to fight, if necessary, for those principles which it is convinced should dominate in the consideration of public affairs. It still subscribes to the apparently antiquated theory that the natural resources of the country are the heritage of all the citizens. And it still regards the welfare of the whole people as more important than the avaricious ambitions of a few.

I think it is time that the Prime Minister rose and told the House what the policy of the government is regarding this particular hand-out bill. As the measure comes before this honourable House it would appear that the Ottawa valley and the fulness thereof, including the water-powers and all that dwell therein, belong to the Siftons. When you give away the water-powers of the Ottawa district you give away the keys of the Ottawa valley and the keys of the district along the Quebec boundary up to the Nipigon river. Why should the people give to private interests a great heritage such as this, which will produce immense wealth in the near future to those who will have control of it? Why should they hand over these privileges to private greed and gain? This province has received great benefits by having public ownership, and why should we allow our profitable resources to be taken away from us in the future?

The Dominion government has jurisdiction only over navigation. I raised this point on the debate on the 7th of April last, when dealing with the rights of the provinces in their fields of activity under the British North America Act. Sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act deal with this subject. The matter came up in debate on a resolution I introduced in the House on the 7th of April last regarding the water-powers at Morrisburg on the St. Lawrence. Hon. members will find on page 2192 of Hansard that the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) admitted my contention. I described the field of activity as between the province and the Dominion with reference to jurisdiction of the province over the water-powers and the jurisdiction of the Dominion over navigable streams. The jurisdiction of the Dominion government is defined in the act which gives to the Dominion the control of the navigable streams so far as navigation is concerned, and to the province the right in regard to the water-powers. The Minister of the Interior admitted that my point of law was well taken and accurately set out as described in Hansard. If that is so, this particular bill should be ruled out on these two grounds.

I doubt if the government has the power to pass the power clauses of this bill. This particular measure is ninety-nine and nine-tenths per cent a power proposition and one-tenth of one per cent a canal proposition. It is as great a joke as the construction of the Newmarket canal was. It is a great pity that Gilbert and Sullivan are not alive to-day so that they could write a comic opera dealing with the Ottawa valley, this canal, the Siftons and the hand-outs of these great power rights; if we had all the facts brought out to-day the people of the province would know who was behind this particular piece of legislation. The gentlemen who are behind it seem to be of opinion that the water-powers of the Ottawa valley have been placed where they are by providence for the purpose of making millionaires out of Sir Clifford Sifton and his dependents and inheritors. That seems to be their feeling—that the Ottawa valley is not for the people of the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario, but is a hand-out for these particular favorites. Mussolini would make short work of the Siftons and their issues, and would soon abolish this noxious piece of legislation. We have nothing in Canada like this knight who would grab the water-powers of the Ottawa valley. The wealth of this great country is for the people. As Mussolini has said "a country does not belong to those who inhabit it to-day. It is an inheritance from the past, a possession for the present, and a trust for the future." That is the manner in which it was regarded by Sir Adam Beck. He treated the water-powers and the resources of the province as a sacred trust along the lines of the philosophy of that great man Mussolini. Here we have an attempt to have reissued a thirty-three year old charter, and here we have a chance for the representatives in parliament to do something, and to tell us on which side of the question they stand, whether they stand for public rights, or for private rights and private plunder. It has got to be one thing or the other. We cannot blow hot and cold on this bill. We must take our stand on the second reading.

Sir Adam Beck said that private monopoly of our public utilities would never make Ontario great and prosperous. His words still hold true. On this piece of legislation the stand of the Conservative party in this House is "No surrender!" I hope that will also be the stand of the Progressive party and of many members of the Liberal party. I do not see the Minister of Customs (Mr. Euler) or the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) in the House. They represent two of the greatest hydro counties in Ontario. Where do they stand on this bill? I hope before the vote is taken they will tell the people of Ontario whether or not they approve of the principle of handing over to a private monopoly the canal and power rights on the Ottawa river. The continued development of Ontario's power resources under public ownership will make the province wealthy. The power rights on the Ottawa river belong to Ontario and Quebec and they should not be handed over to a lot of hungry millionaires who wish to put through this honourable House their get-rich-quick scheme by securing control of the immense power rights on the Ottawa river under the guise of promising to construct a canal.

It is a very simple matter to dissect this bill and get down to its basic principles. In the first place, if it is practicable to construct the proposed canal the undertaking should not be passed over to these promoters to be exploited for private gain; it should be built by the people in the same way as we dealt with the St. Lawrence canal, the Welland canal, the Trent canal—and the Newmarket canal of blessed memory! Consequently, as a canal feature, all the Dominion is concerned about is that navigation be not interfered with by any power projects that may be undertaken by Ontario and Quebec. But as for navigation, there is very little apparent on the canal that now passes by the Chateau —only a load of sand goes through now and again. As a matter of fact, however, the canal project is being used by Sir Clifford Sifton and others purely as a smoke screen—to divert our attention from their acquisition of the million horse-power which the renewal of this charter would enable them to develop for exportation to the United States. That is what I may term the incidental feature of the bill. But the power rights on the Ottawa river are outside the jurisdiction of this parliament altogether and vest entirely in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

This bill should never be allowed to go to the railway committee. This is the proper place to kill it. At the present time, due to shortage of power, eastern Ontario is suffering greater economic ills than any other part of the province, and before many months pass we may find it necessary to have something along the lines of the Duncan report applied to Ontario. For instance, the streets of this city are the worst kept in winter that you will find in any centre of the same size throughout the Dominion. This part of the province has been away behind the times in linking up with the cheap light and power movement that has done so much for the Peterborough district, the Niagara district, and the district of western Ontario. In that territory you will see the tremendous growth, industrially and otherwise, that has followed the boon of cheap light and power under public control. Unfortunately for eastern Ontario the people did not have confidence in the hydro-electric movement and tied themselves up to private ownership, with the result that they are being exploited to-day by private monopoly and are suffering severely for their mistake.

What happened in new Ontario along these lines? The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. McPherson) last week blamed the Hydro Electric Commission for the condition of affairs in that territory where the Abitibi company has a monopolistic control. But the hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken. The people of northern Ontario are suffering for their lack of faith in Sir Adam Beck, who was anxious to give them the benefits of cheap light and power under public ownership. I was delighted to hear the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) proclaim in this House that the only means of safeguarding Canada and preserving our unity with the British Empire was the adoption of a strong national policy. What Sir Adam Beck did provincially could and should be developed along national lines. As I said before, from the Quebec boundary west to Nipigon, including the new Ontario district, all the water-powers, pulp limits and mines have passed into the control of American millionaires. Had Sir Adam Beck been allowed to electrify the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway as he proposed, all the country referred to by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie would to-day be enjoying the benefits that always result from the public ownership and operation of our great natural resources, and instead of only 30,000 there would be a population of 300,000, and the mineral development would have been increased proportionately, with no unemployment problem. That is what public ownership would have done for that particular territory. Thus Sir Clifford Sifton and his associates now want to deprive the eastern part of Ontario and the Ottawa valley of the benefits of cheap light and power.

I oppose the principle of this bill, Mr. Speaker, on the ground of public policy. If the proposed canal is to be built the government should build it. As for the power rights, they belong to the two provinces, subject only to the right of navigation vested in the Dominion. This charter was first granted thirty-three years ago, it has been renewed from time to time, and being now down and out it should not be again revived. In a word, the promoters should no longer be allowed to play with the franchise. This should not be a party question at all. Rightly viewed it is purely an economic and a patriotic question. Therefore I appeal to the members of the cabinet to make the action of this House unanimous, in the same way as Premier Ferguson, Mr. Sinclair, and Mr. Raney did in the Ontario House. These promoters are so many hungry adventurers. The time has come for this House and the government to lay down a Canadian hydro-electric policy suited to the whole Dominion. Canada can not get along without such a policy, and we should have had it long ago in order that this great heritage might be preserved for the benefit of the nation.

The industrial future of this country depends almost entirely upon a sound policy in regard to its water-powers. The complete collapse of government in Canada was never better illustrated than it has been in the manner in which this charter has been dealt with in this House. The government has failed to deal with this problem, and the scheme now before parliament is ninety per cent a power proposition, and not one for the construction of a canal. Sir Clifford Sifton and those associated with him have been haunting these legislative halls for years now and they have done nothing in the way of canal construction. All they have done has been to hold the territory in the Ottawa valley to the exclusion of everybody else. They refused to allow Sir Adam Beck to enter it on the ground that it was their special prerogative. The Ottawa valley was their camping ground. Last year it was the Red lake grab; this session it is the Ottawa valley. It is time for every member of the House of Commons who has the interests of the country at heart to protest against handing over to a private concern such as this the rights of the people at large. The question is, have we or have we not government of the people, by the people and for the people, or government for the Siftons and their dependents?

In view of the way in which these people have disregarded their obligations under this charter, which has been renewed so many times, and having regard to what the hydro-electric has done for Ottawa, I am surprised that any member representing this city should introduce so objectionable a piece of legislation as the bill now before us, the result of which would be to jeopardize the vast investment of the people of this province amounting to some $250,000,000, in the hydro-electric, which has supplied light and power on such very low terms. I know something of the Ottawa valley and of the politicians of both parties, and I can understand why they want to keep the hydro-electric movement out of this territory. I have not the slightest doubt that Sir Clifford Sifton has the support of the government in this matter, for when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was in Atlantic City he was met by Sir Clifford; and in view of the silence of the government it is to be presumed that an understanding has been arrived at. If the government has not given its promise to Sir Clifford Sifton to lend him support in getting this legislation put through the House, I am prepared to give way now to any member of the administration to get up and say so. Let somebody on the government side stand up and declare the government's policy in regard to this question. Is it the intention of government supporters to stand by the principle of public ownership of these water-powers, or have they decided, in consequence of some favour shown by Sir Clifford Sifton to the party opposite, to surrender this heritage to a private concern for its own advantage? I trust that before the day is far spent the government will come forward and tell the House just what its policy is.

This bill not only interferes with federal rights; it encroaches upon provincial and municipal ground. It is subversive of these rights. This is the most reactionary measure ever submitted to parliament, and if it is allowed to go through this House it will prove pretty costly to the people. These promoters have been engaged in nothing else except promotion; they have not the slightest intention of ever constructing a canal. If this charter were extended five hundred years the canal would not be built. The canal is nothing but a myth; it is a huge joke. Why, they might as well ask this parliament to pass a measure to facilitate the transportation of the grain crop of western Canada by an air route as to expect to have anything done by Sir Clifford Sifton and his associates in the way of constructing this canal. The whole scheme is one for the exploitation of the water-power resources of the province; that is all it is. And eastern Canada is made the goat. Eastern Canada, I say, is the goat in this matter and will continue to be the goat so long as we have sitting opposite hon. gentlemen who are not only ready to promote bills of this sort but to give them their earnest support. The promoters of this scheme have treated this parliament with contempt. They have disregarded their solemn contract in every one of the fourteen charters which they have been given. They have treated these charters as mere scraps of paper; they are nothing but hungry political adventurers who are ready to seize upon the water-powers of the province which are the property of the people. Where are Sir Adam Beck's friends to-day? He has been dead only a short while and where are his friends now? Every member of the legislature of Ontario is opposed to the extension of this charter, but where in this House is the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler)? Where is the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm)? Both these gentlemen are members of the cabinet, and what have they to say in defence of the interests of the province which they represent? And where are the members of the United Farmers of Ontario to-day? Where does the Liberal party in the province stand on this question, and what is the policy of the Prime Minister of the country? I say, Mr. Speaker, without any hesitation whatever, that when the time comes and a showdown is demanded it will be found that this government has been lined up, as it always has been, behind the Sifton interests.

Why should this parliament be concerned about Sir Clifford Sifton and his interests? What has Sir Clifford Sifton ever done for the country? Sir Clifford Sifton has never built anything except a title for himself. That is the only thing he has ever built up—that is the extent of his constructive ability: he has been able to accumulate a sword and spurs and epaulets and so forth. That is the sum total of his constructive genius. He was at the head of the Conservation commission which spent hundreds upon hundreds of thousands of dollars of the taxpayers' money, and what did he do? When a resolution was introduced into this parliament for the purpose of establishing a national coal supply policy he indulged in a good deal of talk about a national coal supply for the people; that was his slogan, while at the same time he was masquerading in the old country, endeavouring to interest the financiers there in his own schemes. In view of the success which Sir Adam Beck has made of the hydro-electric in Ontario Sir Clifford Sifton was anxious to grab this million horse-power for himself and his friends, and then he went over to the United States and England where he tried to get financial backing. It does not seem to concern him whether the resources of this province are exploited by foreign money and the profits taken to enrich outsiders. Ontario's great adventure in public ownership will succeed; there is not the slightest doubt about that. It is the duty of members of this House to see to it that no private concern such as this shall be allowed to develop the water-powers of the province of Ontario which belong to the people.

I very much regret the fact that there is another bill to come before parliament of a most obnoxious character, a bill equally as undesirable as this. I refer to the Gatineau bill, which I oppose on the same grounds as I do this. I suppose the Gatineau contract will be commended by some politicians, but for my own part I am absolutely opposed to it. Sir Adam Beck was not more than a week in his grave when the Toronto Financial Post declared war on the hydro in these words:

> Beck died at the height of a public ownership movement that swept him into the position of power and mastery that no other man in Canada has held. The hydro will likely disintegrate as a single institution into a number of smaller corporations, some publicly, and in time, many privately owned, but all linked in a super-power chain.

The process has already begun. The first step in that process is the Gatineau power contract. When I mention the Gatineau power contract I do not wish to be imputing blame to Sir Adam Beck's successor or to his colleagues on the Hydro Electric Power Commission. These men—C. A. Magrath, C. Alfred Maguire and Hon. R. J. Cooke—are the victims of circumstances, and are not to blame. When the time comes I will deal with the authors of these circumstances. We will show where the responsibility lies, because for the past fifteen years every time Adam Beck tried to get into the Ottawa valley and eastern Ontario to establish a power development he was beaten back by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Hon. Geo. P. Graham and the present Liberal leaders when the Liberals were in power and by Hon. Frank Cochrane, and Sir Robert Borden when the Conservatives were in power. Adam Beck was left to fight alone for a public power development in eastern Ontario without any help from the Ontario legislature. As to Colonel MacLean of the Financial Post, I have the utmost respect for that gentleman. He knows more about the situation in the Ottawa valley and the objects of the Sifton bill than anybody else I know of. He has fought Adam Beck and his Ontario power policies in season and out of season.

He made the Toronto Financial Post in the weekly press of Canada all that the Toronto Mail and Empire and the Toronto Daily Star have proved themselves to be in the anti-hydro daily press of Canada. But it is to the credit of Colonel John Bayne MacLean that the Financial Post never hounded Adam Beck as the Toronto Star and the Mail and Empire hounded him to the grave with their own despicable eight-column headlines over the slanderous ravings of an ingrate private secretary. I could wish when Sir Adam Beck's successor is being shown honours by the university of Toronto that that institution had recognized its greatest friend, the man who did more than any dozen men in Canada to provide careers for the graduates of the School of Practical Science. I sometimes wish that the university had recognized Adam Beck when he was alive, and cheered his heart with some recognition of his valuable work.

I heard it said that Adam Beck made enemies. A man who stands up against such plunder as that contemplated by this bill and tries to promote the public interest will make enemies. I do hope Adam Beck's successor will follow so closely in Adam Beck's footsteps that he will make some of the enemies Adam Beck made. If he continues the work Adam Beck began we will applaud him, and he will get applause from the common people.

Where does the Liberal party stand in connection with this particular matter? What is parliament for? Does it exist for the purpose of making Canada a land of milk and honey for the Siftons and their successors? It was said in the newspapers that Sir Clifford Sifton's sons supported the Mackenzie King government in the late election. That is true and one of them ran as a Liberal candidate in the constituency of North York. In return for their services they may or may not have obtained some promises from the Liberal party; as to that time will tell. Is the country obligated to make a millionaire out of Sir Clifford Sifton because of what he has done for the Liberal party? I should like to find out where the Liberal party stands in this particular transaction. When the Grand Trunk Pacific bill was introduced and pressed forward one of the cries raised in connection with it was that "Cox can't wait". In the case of the present project we have a repetition of that cry only the central figure has been changed. It is not the late Senator Cox but Sir Clifford Sifton that can't wait. However, he will have to wait a long time before he gets this bill through; he will have to wait until doomsday. It is going to be talked out on many occasions. Our policy on this side is "no surrender." These important water-powers, involving the development of a million horse-power are not going to be surrendered to the Siftons who are in alliance with great financial interests in the United States with only a smoke screen between them. The Ottawa valley is rich in timber, minerals and water-powers. Even Solomon in all his glory will not be arrayed like unto the Siftons —if they could secure the control of these great resources. Can you not imagine Sir Clifford Sifton, if this bill were to succeed, ascending to some elevated point and saying: Behold my kingdom and my vast possessions? If the bill is allowed to pass I predict that the rates for commercial and domestic lighting will be three times what they ought to be. The policy adopted by the Conservative government of Ontario under the late Sir James Whitney was that these water-powers belonged to the state and not to private individuals. They should be developed for the benefit of the farmer and the toiler in the factory and the intention was by means of this policy to build up a united province in Ontario.

Sir Henry Thornton refused to intervene on behalf of the public when it was proposed to alienate the Red lake district. What is he doing to-day in connection with this particular matter? What is the policy of the government and what is the policy of the board of management of the National railway? Nobody seems to know what their policy is. We do know however that when a radial railway by-law in the interest of Toronto and several counties of Ontario was being voted on, Sir Henry Thornton intervened as an opponent of public ownership.

These counties wanted cheap light and power and radials for the Niagara district. They wanted a transportation system as well. Sir Henry Thornton sent a telegram to destroy that particular work under public ownership. When he comes down to the Ottawa valley, he is prepared to surrender the valley all through new Ontario and the Mattawa river, for what? For private greed and gain, and he does not utter a whisper against this particular piece of legislation. He was the same person who surrendered half of the Port Colborne district to the Canadian Pacific. The more I think of all these hand-outs to American millionaires, the more I survey this particular bill No. 78, the more I think it is a good thing that Labrador was handed over to Newfoundland. It is a good thing that Canada did not get it, because we might have given it away to the Siftons or American millionaires. It will now be developed for the good of the people of the British Empire and not for the welfare of a number of millionaires who come over here and enlist the sympathy of the Liberal party. I am opposed to this bill on grounds of public policy. The proposed bill and every part and parcel of it is nothing but a screen to hand over this whole valley to the super-power trusts of the United States. The canal is only a back-door scheme that will blind nobody, a smoke screen, as I say, to prevent the consideration of the true merits of the bill.

We were told the other night by one or two hon. gentlemen opposite: Oh, we will not pass this bill in this particular form; we will amend it when it comes to the committee, giving the railway commission power to regulate rates. Did hon. members ever hear of the railway commission regulating anything? I will give an illustration of what they do, because it is only by comparison that we can get at the merits of the case. What were we told by two or three members from Saskatchewan, which pays about one per cent of the taxes of Canada? They do not care in that province who pays the taxes. They are protectionists when it comes to their own interests, but free traders when they come to do anything to aid the industrial provinces. Where do they stand to-day? They are supporting the Sifton interests and attacking public ownership. They would like to see the water-powers, the resources of this country owned and controlled by private interests, handed over to American millionaires. The Liberal party have ceded more territory to American millionaires than was ceded by King George III one hundred and fifty or so years ago. They say, let us pass the second reading and when the bill goes to committee we will amend it with reference to the water-powers, putting them under public control, which is a myth.

Let me give the House an example of the way in which the railway commission regulates matters. An application was made for an increase in telephone rates and the application was based on removal of discrimination. What did the government do? The railway commission granted the increase, but they left the government out of it. The government recently made a contract by which they do not pay the increase at all. The increase which the government should pay is thus passed on to the private consumers of the telephone service. The same condition obtains in the case with the National railways. A million dollars was spent in extensions at Montreal for the benefit of the Canadian National Railways, but they pay no increase at all. This increase is saddled on to the poor ratepayers of Ontario and Quebec and the government sponge on the working classes to pay their bills.

Ontario has suffered more economic ills than any other province since confederation, and the time has come for Ontario to have a Duncan report. No village council would listen to this bill for five minutes and suffer such arguments as we have heard around this House regarding this particular piece of legislation. The railway commission will do nothing; it has done nothing to regulate freight rates, passenger rates, telegraph rates, express rates, except to surrender the territory to the applicants. If branch lines, which are so dear to the hearts of hon. gentlemen who come from Saskatchewan, were built, according to the law of supply and demand, there would be no branch lines built, not even the Hudson Bay railway; but when it comes to a matter of handing over a million horse-power to private interests, the private interests get it.

If this is a political bill for the purpose of paying a political debt to the gentlemen who are promoting it, it is the duty of the government to say so. I have nothing but the utmost respect for Sir Clifford Sifton and Sir Herbert Holt. I do not blame them at all for what they propose. If governments are so easy that they are going to hand over all these resources, I do not blame Sir Clifford Sifton and the people with him being smart and clever enough to get this particular bill before the House and the country. I have always been a supporter of public ownership and as long as I have been a member of this House I have stood for that principle. It was stated in this House by inference the other night that the applicants were prepared to drop the bill, provided the government would reimburse what had been spent, say several millions, for the goodwill and what they call vested rights, because no canal has been built. If that is so, I hope the government will say so. It is said also that the Holt interests and the Sifton interests are identical. Well, they all look alike to me, because they are all trying to grab something for themselves and private ownership. The difference between the one and the other is the difference between Tweedledum and Tweedledee.

It was said in this House by hon. gentlemen opposite and also during the elections of 1925 and 1926 by the Prime Minister in North York, that those who sit on this side of the House were the party of the big interests; that the Conservative party in this House were linked up with the big interests. I speak for myself, and I believe I speak for those who sit on this side of the House when I say that we oppose this bill on principle because we stand for the principle of the public control of the water-powers and other resources of this country, and we serve no big interests. Some of us suffered in the battle against the big interests in this country on former occasions, and we are prepared to suffer again in standing for the principle for which we have fought so long. This particular bill will soon show where the Liberal party stands in regard to the matter and what alliance, if any, they have with the big interests. It will show whether the government serves and continues to serve those interests which they charge hon. gentlemen on this side of the House with serving.

I have served the hydro-movement since its inception in 1901. I was an officer of the hydro-municipalities and president of the Ontario Municipal Electric Association. I was Sir Adam Beck's first lieutenant in Ontario for several years and I stand by these principles party or no party. Unplaced, unpensioned, no man's heir or slave. I neither look for nor care for honour or the patronizing approval of any party as far as this obnoxious piece of legislation goes. There is only one consolation for a public man, and that is the approval of his own conscience, a sense of duty done. All I am here for is to do my duty to my constituents and to the 278 hydro-municipalities of Ontario who have invested $262,000,000 for the purpose of conserving for the people of that province the boon of cheap light and power. I serve them and nobody else. I will not knowingly and conscientiously offend any man either by word or deed, but I will stand by the principles of public rights as I see them, which I have supported for twenty-five years in the province of Ontario. But if I am placed in the position of having to defend these principles and must speak, I will speak what I at heart believe to be the truth, moderately, kindly, temperately, but yet plainly, and will call a spade a spade, as I have done here this afternoon. Whatever my lot or fortune for the balance of my life may be and whether I may be a member of this parliament again or not, I will labour on for the promotion of the principles of public ownership and control and for the advancement of those principles for which my late beloved leader, Sir Adam Beck, and Sir James Whitney lived and died. For those principles of public ownership and public control of the resources of this country, and for the advancement of those principles which are to-day accepted by the people of Ontario as an axiom, I will labour to serve the truest and best interests of the Conservative party as I see them. But while I wear the party uniform, I will never wear its plush. I will take my position among the rank and file, however humble it may be, but it will be as a volunteer, and not as a "flunkey."

Sir Adam Beck, being dead, yet speaketh to the people of Ontario, and of Canada and the British Empire, on this power question of the Ottawa valley, as he did from 1915 on to 1918, and again in 1921, when we were here opposing this bill. I remember being here with Sir Adam Beck and being howled down in the railway committee three or four times. We appeared before the railway committee and before the cabinet in an effort to get rid of this bill. Sir Adam Beck was a protectionist of the protectionists, and the most constructive statesman the country has produced. His work in Ontario stands out as one of the most marvellous achievements of the age. Here is his report in regard to this particular project, and how anybody who has any respect for public rights can vote for this particular bill after reading this report which Sir Adam Beck made to the Hydro Electric Commission of Ontario about the economic ills of the Ottawa valley right up through to new Ontario, I cannot understand. Sir Adam Beck makes the statement that this bill had another objectionable feature, the feature with regard to the export of power. I doubt if Sir Clifford Sifton would ever have had anything to do with this bill but for the export privileges which the charter confers. This is what Sir Adam Beck says in this report:

> At the present time the citizens of Ontario and, in fact, the citizens of Canada are confronted with a most serious menace to their future development and general welfare. It is exceedingly regrettable that the efforts being made to re-establish Canadian business on a firm and satisfactory basis should be nullified by the attempt to alienate the basic necessity of low-cost hydro-electric power. And yet this is what is being done.
> In my judgment, no government in Canada can stand against the opposition of the public opinion that will be expressed by the people of the provinces of Ontario and of Quebec once it is fully appreciated what sacrifice of their interests is involved in the lease proposed for the Carillon water-power development on the Ottawa river, involving, as it does, the right to export electrical energy to the United States under circumstances which, heretofore, have not existed. The copy of the proposed Carillon agreement that I have been able to go over contains conditions that are scandalous.

Hon. gentlemen may think I have used strong language, but Sir Adam Beck says that the proposed Carillon agreement "contains conditions that are scandalous." He goes on:

> The chief feature of the menace to the citizens of Canada to which I refer is the definite and concerted effort to break down the safeguard Canadians now have under the Dominion law and regulations relating to the exportation of electricity. As these restrictions now stand, applicants for the exportation of electricity to the United States must take out a yearly license and it has been definitely stipulated that if Canada should require the electricity that is temporarily being exported, it must be returned for Canadian use as and when required. This provision for the taking out of a yearly export license was made in 1907 by the Canadian federal authorities, because the government had in view the fact that eventually all Canadian electrical energy might be required for consumption in Canada. The recent public announcement of the Prime Minister of Canada that his purpose is to discourage and to curtail the exportation of electrical energy by the imposition of the export tax, already authorized by law, is in accordance with the policy of prior governments. The tax now authorized by the government of Canada of only three one-hundredths of a cent per kilowatt-hour is not a sufficient deterrent, and the danger is that it doubtless will be used in justification of further exportation. The Ontario government, the Association of Municipal Electrical Utilities of Ontario representing the municipalities of Ontario, and the Hydro Electric Power Commission, are opposed to further exportation of electrical energy, but, if an export tax is to be the policy, then the maximum export fee of $10 per horse-power should at once be imposed and, if this is found to be insufficient, then under a modification of the statutory provisions relating to this matter a sufficiently larger export tax should be levied.

Then he goes on to refer to this particular bill as being obnoxious, and says that the Carillon lease is being sought by the Quebec-New England Electric Corporation, which wants 400,000 horse-power:

Briefly, it may be explained that even under full development and regulation of the Ottawa river waters it is impossible to develop more than a maximum of 200,000 continuous horse power at the Carillon rapids power site. This proposal, however, is not an oversight on the part of the applicant concerns, because it has been announced through the public press that the agreement provides that any deficiency in the 400,000 horse power to meet commitments of the company—and, of course, it is obvious from the start that there will be a deficiency of at least 100 per cent—is to be made up from some other source or sources of power supply, not improbably from the Ottawa and the St. Lawrence rivers. The stakes to be won are tremendous—

Of course, they are tremendous; otherwise Sir Clifford Sifton would not be in it.

—involving the greatest localized power assets in the world on the St. Lawrence and Niagara rivers.

The programme of expenditure as announced in conection with the company's proposed operations is of such magnitude as to attract special attention. It is proposed to expend $75,000,000, of which some $25,000,000 is to be expended in electrical transmission equipment to be installed in the United States. If the Canadian government should grant the terms asked for in the proposed lease, it is obvious that very extensive vested interests of many more millions in connection with power-using industries would be created in the United States to the preservation of which the government of Canada would be obligated.

Sir Adam Beck then goes on to refer to the imminent shortage of power in Ontario, but as that is well known I shall not quote his remarks.

Then he proceeds to lament the fact that Canada's electricity is being coveted by the super-power interests in the United States; and states how difficult it is to get the hydro-electric into the territory. He refers next to the strenuous efforts he made to get control of the water-powers and to generate for public use in Canada further supplies of electrical energy from the Ottawa and St. Lawrence rivers, and he says:

It is in consequence of such blocking that the commission is now being forced to provide for the generation of electricity by steam power. At the present time, an appropriation of $10,000,000 for steam-electric power has been made and within a few years this outlay will reach $25,000,000. Practically all of such expenditure would not be needed if the Hydro Electric Power Commission had been permitted to proceed with its programme of hydro-electrical development of Ontario's own water power. In view of the fact that the growth in the consumption of electrical energy, as well as other circumstances, demonstrate that a power famine is at hand, it is intolerable that the provinces of Ontario and Quebec should be placed in the position of having to defend their provincial rights against the powerful efforts being made under the pretext of national development to persuade the Dominion government to alienate the hydro-electrical assets of these provinces.

I am convinced that it will not be long, only a year or two, before the oncoming serious power shortage will be experienced—both easterly and westerly—throughout the province of Ontario. There is also a shortage of electrical energy in many parts of the United States, notably throughout the New England states and extending down the Atlantic coast to New York and Philadelphia. It has been represented by some of the United States public organizations dealing with water-power problems that the only satisfactory solution of the problem of supplying low-cost electrical power in wholesale quantities to the New England states is to receive such supply from Canada. This would foster and build up the industries in the eastern United States at the expense of those in Canada. It is not surprising, therefore, that every effort is being made to facilitate exportation of electrical energy from Canada to the United States under long-term contracts or agreements,—in fact, it has authoritatively been stated by some prominent in United States public life that the people of the United States, besides retaining control of the water-powers in their own country, should reach out to control, as extensively as possible, the water-powers in adjacent countries.

Sir Adam Beck, at page 6, says:

Carillon proposals merely part of a gigantic power program by United States interests.

Recently the New York Times commenting on what it terms the "project to link resources across the border with ours," stated that "underlying the entire plan, on which commissions representing the United States and Canada have been working for a year or more, is an ultimate plan to pool the entire power resources of the two nations. This larger plan would involve close to $5,000,000,000 of properties and would call for grouping by territorial sections." In other words, "the ultimate plan" is seen to blanket the water-power resources of the Dominion of Canada, and the proposed export of 400,000 horse power from the Carillon development is simply the first step in carrying out this gigantic program of making Canada's water-powers the source from which electrical energy is to be permanently exported to the United States for building up the communities and industries of that country.

Then on page 8 he refers to the welfare of Ontario municipalities, especially of the Ottawa valley, and says:

That they are competent to employ the electrical energy advantageously is fully evidenced by what has been accomplished by the municipalities in their publicly-owned undertaking in which, at the present time, they have invested over $250,000,000.

He speaks of the great sacrifice and irredeemable loss involved:

I cannot too strongly emphasize the fact that the proposal in connection with the Carillon falls development is not merely the entering of the thin end of the wedge by means of a change in the law governing the exportation of electricity, but is a complete breaking down of the barrier which, heretofore, has been a reasonable, and in fact the only, safeguard to the people of Canada, serving notice annually on all users of Canadian-produced electricity that this commodity is only being exported from the country until such time as the need arises for its use in Canada and until it becomes necessary to employ the electricity for the municipal, domestic, commercial and industrial requirements of the citizens of Canada.

On pages 9 and 10, he mentions the fact that the premiers of both Ontario and Quebec are opposed to the exportation of electrical energy. On page 10 he takes issue with the water-power policy of the federal government, and calls attention to comments made in the public press on May 27 and 28, 1925, respecting the exportation of Canadian electrical energy, with special reference to the proposed development at the Carillon power site and refers to the total possible installation for Canada as 42,000,000 horse-power. He says:

In such a total there appears to be an estimate of about 9,000,000 horse-power for the province of Ontario. No such figure can be justified in connection with any sane appraisement of the water-power that is available for economic utilization in connection with Ontario's industries. As a matter of fact, taking the international section of the St. Lawrence, the waters now available on the Niagara river, and the potentiality of the Ottawa river, there is not more than 2,500,000 horse-power available for economic purposes, and even if 20,000 second feet of water additional for Canada should be provided from Niagara's waters and all other unused powers that may be considered from an economic aspect in Ontario be included, the maximum figures that should be employed in deliberations involving Ontario's water-power would not exceed, say, 3,500,000 horse-power. Water-powers in the far north—such as those on rivers flowing into the Arctic ocean—are not even to be considered at the present time in competition with the highly economical water-powers of the Ottawa, the St. Lawrence and the Niagara rivers. It is, therefore, absurd to give any serious consideration to a quantity so hypothetical from an economic standpoint as the 42,000,000 horse-power for the whole of Canada, and this comment applies also to the 9,000,000 horse-power for the province of Ontario.

Then he refers to the municipalities of the two provinces and to the farmers' organizations and says he is the best friend the farmers of the country ever had. I may say that so far as this particular piece of legislation goes it should be voted down and the bill should be thrown out.

In these paragraphs we have the result of what the hydro-electric has done:

1. Every dollar of the $160,000,000 hydro investment is earning interest and sinking fund.
2. Hydro investment saved Ontario from a coal famine that would have bankrupted the province in war time.
3. Hydro investment saved 2,200,000 shareholders over $75,000,000 in reduced coal, light and power bills.
4. Hydro investment saved Ontario over $100,000,000 on coal prices, which would have gone to $30 per ton in war time but for the hydro investment that gave Ontario the equivalent of 3,000,000 tons of United States coal per annum.

That is what it did for Ontario. I observe there are a few more ministers present now. I have no objection to their help if they will give it to me.

With all due respect to the members of the cabinet, sitting on the front benches, I suggest that this is the time for some minister to arise and tell the House what the policy of the government in this matter is. Is the Ottawa valley to be allowed for the next thirty-three years to stew in its own juice and wait to get direct current while the government take no action to solve the problem? We know what has been said about the conservation of natural resources by the Stanley Baldwin government, the Coolidge government and the governor of New York state. That great statesman, President Roosevelt, made the following statement:

The people of our country are threatened by a monopoly more powerful than has been ever seen, as it affects very closely their domestic and industrial life. Our next generation will witness a shortage of those natural resources, petroleum and gas. The price of coal will be such that hydraulic power turned into electrical energy will, owing to its cost, become the prevailing factor for transport, for manufacturers, for lighting and heating our towns. Our hydraulic power alone, entirely and judiciously employed, would be adequate for the present needs of transport, industries, municipalities and private individuals.

The major portion of these powers is not developed and remains the national property. It would be madness to part, without conditions, with one of our greatest resources. If we become guilty of this crime, our children will be bound to pay an annual royalty on a capitalization fixed at the highest price that the trade will stand for. They will see themselves struggling with powerful sweaters entrenched behind the doctrine of discharged rights strengthened by all means of protection that money can buy and the cunning of corporations defended by legal men. These ogres of finance will have succeeded long before then to monopolize those resources so as to be able to dictate to the people the management of their affairs and their ways of existence. Public opinion will be their least worry.

I have referred, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that the Ontario legislature is unanimously opposed to this bill. In this connection the House will no doubt be interested to hear a few of the comments by the press of Ontario on the advisability of not renewing the charter. The Globe under date of March 7, says:

The Old Fight is On Again

For thirty-three years the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company has held a Dominion charter giving it rights to construct canals and develop water-power resources of the Ottawa and French rivers. In all that time no constructive work has been done.

The company is back to Ottawa again seeking from the Dominion parliament another—the fourteenth—extension of its charter. The application is sponsored by Sifton interests.

They are back on their old stamping ground again. They found it so easy in other years, so why not come again?

The charter for which another renewal is asked apparently does not obligate the company to do anything. It gives the company continued control over public resources of tremendous potential value and permits the company to develop only those resources which it may deem profitable, while "so much of the said canals and works as then remain uncompleted"—presumably the more costly and unproductive construction and development—return to the public.

The canal is just a blind, a mere smoke screen to get the bill through and give them these valuable water-power rights. Then they will say good-bye to the canal and we shall think of the Georgian bay canal in the terms that we now think of the celebrated Newmarket canal.

The provinces of Ontario and Quebec are directly affected. The legislature of Ontario plans to record the protest of this province today. But the fight is at Ottawa. There a great principle is at stake. Shall the natural resources of this country—the property of the people—be handed over to private, profit-taking promoters, or shall they be conserved and developed in the interests and for the welfare of the public?

The old battle is on once more. The Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company's bill must be defeated. The charter must lapse. For the interests of the whole people come before the avaricious ambitions of a few.

That, Mr. Speaker, is from George Brown's own paper. Let me say to my hon. friends opposite that the Globe newspaper has not left the Liberal party; the Liberal party has deserted the Globe newspaper and the principles for which it stands. I see to my left two young and hon. members from the province of Nova Scotia. I know that they do not approve of the way in which millionaires have grabbed the natural resources of Nova Scotia. It is no wonder that their province needs now the measures recommended by the Duncan report. The resources of Nova Scotia were handed over for private exploitation just like Santa Claus hands presents from a Christmas tree—a present to Clifford Sifton great, a present to Clifford Sifton small, and to all the other would-be monopolists. Now it is proposed to cede the rich Ottawa valley to these exploiters of the public domain, and as a result the old Rideau canal now in front of the Chateau Laurier would become part of their canal system. The Rideau canal was built by the British government as a back door to lake Ontario after the war of 1812 had demonstrated the necessity of this project as a measure of national defence. But Sir Clifford Sifton comes in at the front door and tells the Prime Minister and his cabinet what he wants. He has been very successful in managing the government apparently in his endeavour to put this bill through the House. But he is not going to manage anybody in this part of the House because we are resolved to vote against the principle of his measure. The other evening I was told that in this city two hundred people could not find sleeping quarters. I recommended them to go and take a rest on the government front benches. The organ of George Brown has been trying to wake the government up out of their trance so that they may tell the people where they stand on this proposed legislation.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can do better than continue this afternoon service. If any of the ministers now in their seats want to take my place I shall be quite willing to step out of the pulpit, but when they prefer slumber it is incumbent on some of us to take their place, even should we not be members of the United church. I do not happen to be a member of that church. I believe its organization brought about as much union as did Union government. Continuing my simile, I propose to read a sermon preached from the sanctuary of the Globe newspaper on March 2—Ash Wednesday. Apparently the editor feared that during the forty days of Lent the ministry would remain speechless on this bill. I read the Globe. It is the best morning newspaper we have in Toronto. We are all familiar with its motto:

The subject who is truly loyal to the chief magistrate will neither advise nor submit to arbitrary measures.

That quotation from Junius I am sure is perfectly familiar to my two hon. friends from the maritimes, who no doubt studied the letters of this great publicist when they were taking their B.A. course. This is the heading of the Globe sermon given during the morning service. I shall be pleased to conduct this evening service unless some of the hon. ministers will take my place and end their sleep of peace.

The people of Ontario are vitally interested in bill No. 78 now before the House of Commons for the purpose of renewing the thirty-three-year-old charter of the Montreal, Ottawa & Georgian Bay Company, giving authority to develop power on and canalize the Ottawa and French rivers. The second reading was moved in committee last Friday, and was opposed by Sir George Perley on the ground that advancing it to this stage would give approval to the principle of the measure, a point which, he believed, called for serious consideration.

When the charter was granted this company in 1894 Ontario had not entered upon its program for public ownership of water-powers. The project was received with enthusiasm not only in the Ottawa valley and along the French river but throughout the province because of the transportation facilities promised as much as for the prospective power development. Since hydro has demonstrated itself conditions have changed, and the people are no longer willing to turn over to private ownership hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of natural resources which can and should remain part of the public domain.

It was hoped and expected that steps would be taken within a reasonable time to make the charter operative. Authority to proceed with the work has rested during all this time with the company, for it has been able to go to parliament and get its charter renewed no fewer than thirteen times. It is now back for the fourteenth time without having shown any tangible evidence of good faith in carrying out the project. Is it reasonable to suppose that the members of parliament will view this sort of thing with complaisance?

If the Georgian bay canal bill is passed by parliament it will cause Ontario the loss of half a million horse-power, according to Premier Ferguson. The province will back him up if he carries out his promise to fight this to the limit.

The original estimate of the cost of building the canal—the feature of the improvement which has been most stressed by its promoters—was $100,000,000. Not only was this money not forthcoming, but Sir Robert Perks, who appeared in connection with it, and who was known to have powerful financial backing, appealed on various occasions to the federal government to guarantee the bonds of the canal, advancing the argument that it was a work for the benefit of the public. Beyond doing a small amount of surveying, this is about as far as the building of the canal proceeded, and this alone is enough to cast doubt on the sincerity of the company so far as the canal is concerned.

The Sifton interests now appear as sponsors for the undertaking, and besides being a contest, as it has in past years, between demands for consideration for Ottawa power development as against St. Lawrence development, it has developed into a contest for power rights at Carillon between the Siftons and Montreal power interests. As between the two, those who believe in public ownership and the development of hydro have, perhaps, not much to choose, except that, so far, the Montreal people do not appear to seek as much from the public as the others. On the other hand, the charter of the Georgian Bay Company apparently does not obligate it to carry on more development work than it finds profitable.

This is a point which parliament cannot afford to overlook. Under the original act, and as it now stands with its amendments, it is open to the company to proceed, ostensibly, with the construction of a section of the canal, say, in the Carillon falls district, or at any other point along the route where there is a water-power, and then abandon the work. If this is done, or if for any reason the company fails to proceed after developing the Carillon falls power, or any other power, under the guise of constructing part of the canal, there reverts to the government—to quote the language of the act—"so much of the said canals and works as then remain uncompleted."

On the face of it, then, the renewing of the charter gives to the company authority to proceed with such work as it selects, and if it leaves the project incomplete the government can take it over with its blessing. The fact that the company is not given an exclusive franchise, as pointed out by the Minister of Railways and Canals in 1924, does not help much.

Now if this bill is passed by parliament it will mean the loss of half a million horsepower to the people of Ontario according to an estimate made by the premier of the province the other day, and the whole province will be behind Premier Ferguson in appealing the matter to the Privy Council, as undoubtedly he will do if we allow this to go through.

I have here a report on the St. Lawrence waterway submitted by the International Joint Commission concerning the improvement of the St. Lawrence river between Montreal and lake Ontario for navigation and power purposes. At page 94 of this report I read the following:

E. L. Cousins, of the Toronto Harbour Commission, stated on the other hand that the Georgian bay route had been investigated some years ago, and that it had been established that a vessel could be taken from Duluth or Fort William to Montreal by the St. Lawrence in much less time than by way of Georgian bay. He also pointed out that the season of navigation on the latter route would be much shorter, and that it lay through an unsettled country. It may be noted that during the past fifty years or so a number of reports have been made to the Canadian government on the practicability of the Georgian bay ship canal, the most elaborate as well as the latest report upon the engineering features of the scheme being that of 1908, while in that and subsequent years Sanford Evans reported upon the economic practicability of the same route.

At page 34 of the same report there appears a brief survey of the work accomplished in connection with the Georgian bay ship canal project. I would recommend a reading of the report in that connection. When we consider the large investment which the municipalities of the province of Ontario have in the hydro-electric scheme it is nothing short of a tragedy that a private interest should come to this parliament and seek to have this whole territory handed over for exploitation. A resolution was unanimously adopted by the Ontario legislature a day or two ago opposing the passage of this legislation, in view of the immense investment which the people of the province have in the hydro-electric enterprise, an investment amounting to about $250,000,000. Capital is invested in hydro undertakings by the Niagara system to the extent of $141,000,000 odd, also in the systems under the control of Essex county, Thorold, Severn, Eugenia, Wasdells, Muskoka, St. Lawrence, Rideau, Thunder Bay, Ottawa, central Ontario and Trent, and Nipissing; and in service buildings, construction plant, stores, hydro-electric railways, and so forth.

When you reflect on the service which the Ontario Hydro-Electric Commission has been able to render the people of the province, not only in the cities and towns but in the country as well, you can appreciate the gravity of the present attempt to secure for private exploitation this vast territory in the Ottawa valley. To hand over this territory to a private concern would be simply outrageous. Just consider for a moment what the Ferguson government proposes to do to carry the great boon of cheap light and power right to the door of the Ontario farmer, in order to make living conditions as easy for him as for the urban dweller. By means of subsidy the provincial government intends making life on the farm in Ontario a real joy by providing light, power and heat at the lowest rates possible, thus realizing the dream of the late Sir Adam Beck. The scheme which the provincial government has in contemplation is practicable and it will enable every bit of work on the farm to be done by electricity.

The bill before the House is objectionable in many respects. In the first place it does not conform to the rules of the House, and, secondly, there is the finding of a royal commision which was appointed to investigate this whole question. Sir Henry Drayton, Mr. Acworth and Mr. Smith, the president of the New York Central, went into the whole question and submitted a report to parliament. They recommended that there should be no extensions or renewals of canal and railway charters without first a report on the same being made by the railway commission.

The province of Quebec is opposed to this particular bill and the leader of the opposition in the legislature has introduced a resolution with respect to it which is to come up for discussion. As to the attitude of the province of Ontario the Toronto Globe, in its issue of March 4, puts itself on record as follows:

In his clear-cut and emphatic statement regarding the application for the renewal of the charter of the Montreal, Ottawa & Georgian Bay Company, now before the Dominion parliament, Hon. G. H. Ferguson speaks not as a party leader but as the Prime Minister of this province. In his determination to resist the passage of this iniquitous measure —a measure which proposes, in the matter of vast and valuable public resources, to extend the thirty-three-year period of private corporation control during which nothing has been done—and in his appeal to the representatives of all provinces and all parties to unite in defeating it, Mr. Ferguson will find the overwhelming majority of the people militantly behind him.

It is not too late yet for this House to unite with the province of Ontario and so make the action against this bill unanimous. On this point the Globe expresses the following opinion:

Ontario Is Unanimous

By the unanimous adoption of Premier Ferguson's resolution of protest the legislature yesterday placed the province on record as opposed to the extension of the Georgian bay canal charter. There is no doubt that public opinion was thus put in concrete form. The legislators were on safe ground. There could have been no compromise when a question of general policy was at stake. Both Mr. Sinclair and Mr. Raney realized that politics had no place in the matter, and their followers rallied to the support of the Prime Minister.

This was a public-spirited act which their constituents should appreciate. And now the fight goes to the legislative halls at Ottawa, where united Ontario should make itself heard in no uncertain voice. The press of the province, regardless of political affiliation, has expressed disapproval of this charter, that the water-powers of the Ottawa may be retained for the benefit of the people. It is not a question of denying a franchise to one private corporation that another may get it, but of preventing all private exploitation of this important waterway. At Ottawa the fight, to date, has been chiefly between two private interests. Ontario should step in to see that neither succeeds in gaining possession of power rights which can be preserved and developed by and for the public. The St. Catharines Standard points out the situation in these words:

From all reports, a mighty powerful subterranean lobby is in progress at Ottawa on the issue. The Siftons are powerful interests behind the government, but the fly in the ointment, from a government standpoint, is in the fact that the Sir Herbert Holt group is opposing the charter tooth and nail. If the government accedes to the Siftonian demands, then trouble from the Holt group in Montreal may be expected. It is argued that if the company really wants to build the canal, let it go ahead and build it, but parliament should revise the old charter and withhold the power rights.

Ontario is manifestly not interested in this fight, except to checkmate both parties. It has no wish to throw the vast millions buried in the Ottawa and French river waterfalls into the pockets of the Holt exploiters any more than to the Sifton interests. It is doubtful if a canal charter can be given without prejudicing the public rights in the power, and if this is the case the issue for Ontario is the termination of the whole thing. The value to the exploiters lies in the power, not in the canal. The one should not be permitted to cloud the other.

This province knows where it stands, and the representatives of its legislature and municipalities should overlook no step necessary to impress its position upon the members of the federal parliament.

There are two main questions involved in the consideration of this question. The first is with respect to handing over to a few private individuals the right to build a canal through the Ottawa valley to the city of Ottawa and to charge tolls for the use thereof, as against the construction and maintenance of this waterway as a government work. Having decided that question the disposition of the water powers must be considered. As I have already pointed out, subject to the rights of navigation, the surplus water belongs to the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec. The bed of the Ottawa river, the banks on both sides, and the rapids and falls in that river belong to the two provinces equally, subject to whatever water may be required for navigation purposes. These are the two chief questions which must be kept in mind and not by the widest stretch of the imagination can it be urged that the water-power clauses of this particular bill are a matter for the federal authority to deal with.

I should like now to read expressions of opinion by the press of Ontario, outside the city of Toronto, in regard to this measure. The Stratford Beacon-Herald declares:

Water-powers in Ontario are the property of the people. The late Sir Adam Beck fought for years to establish that fact, and he did establish it. He may have been arbitrary in his methods, but he was right in his ideals. It has been the people's money that has demonstrated the worth of water-power development in Ontario and there can be no departure now from that policy that marks all water-power sources as the property of the people. When Premier Ferguson sends his protest to Ottawa against renewing an old charter to a private company he will be sending it on behalf of all the people in this province.

The Port Hope Times gives utterance to the following opinion:

A Gift of $100,000,000

The iniquity of the proposed renewal of the charter of the Montreal, Ottawa & Georgian Bay Company, now before the Dominion parliament, has been recognized for a long while by most people. Some members of the King government, however, and others close to the Sifton interests do not seem to be so impressed with the iniquity of the proposal and apparently there is going to be a battle royal on the application for a renewal of the charter. The granting of the application would mean a gift of $100,000,000 to the Sifton interests.

The Ottawa Citizen takes the following stand:

Privileged Interests Too Late.

The Canadian people are no longer willing to hand over such special privileges, including the control of hydro-electric power resources, to private promoters. Private capital should have been more enterprising in the years when there would have been some credit due to promoters in starting work on the Georgian bay canal. They might have claimed the reward of foresight. But in this age of power development, it calls for no foresight to see the immense value of water-powers on the Ottawa river. It would be the equivalent of a cash gift worth millions of dollars from members of the House of Commons, at the expense of the public, to renew the charter again. Members of parliament who voted for it would come uncomfortably under the scrutiny of an unusually watchful public opinion.

The St. Catharines Standard declares:

The private charter of the Montreal, Ottawa & Georgian Bay Canal Company gives the company the easy spots for the development of power and the country would be faced with the burden of putting up the cash to finish the job. The course of the Sifton bill will be watched with interest in this part of the country, where the Siftons have as much influence over our votes as the Kaiser.

The St. Catharines Standard says further:

It was all right 33 years ago to turn over water-powers to private capitalists, but that policy in Ontario was revoked long ago, thanks largely to Sir Adam Beck, who preached the right gospel. The Sifton interests or anybody else will have the battle of their lives if they try to get water-powers in northern Ontario under any federal charter which has been dormant for over thirty years.

The Ottawa Journal makes the following statement:

Propagandists for the renewal of the Georgian bay canal charter are telling the public that the Georgian Bay Canal Company is prepared to give the country free canals.

The same argument was advanced when the Newmarket canal was undertaken. But saying that canals are going to be free does not make them free any more than the fact that some Liberals call themselves Liberal-Progressives or Progressive-Liberals makes them so in reality. They say they are going to get free canals. All the grain that will be carried free along those canals will be as much as would go in one airship. The article states further:

That, of course, is absurd. One cannot build canals without cost any more than one can build dams and power houses without cost. What the Georgian Bay Canal Company really means is that they will give free canals at the expense of power. They will tax the power to build the canal and maintain the navigation facilities. In other words, the power users, industries, municipalities and individuals of one narrow region in one or two provinces are to pay for navigation facilities that will be free to the citizens of all the provinces and to foreigners, and which under the British North America Act were to be a charge on the national exchequer.

Parliament cannot properly sanction such a thing. It would not only involve discrimination against one class in favor of another; it would give a concealed subsidy to one particular transportation enterprise.

That is what that paper says, and it states the case correctly. The Hydro Electric Power Commission have protested strongly against this bill. They say that the territory should be given back to the Ontario government so that it may aid in developing the industrial centres of this province. I have in my hand, a map, not of the Newmarket canal or the Georgian bay canal, but a map of the Ottawa valley from the island of Montreal right up to the head of the French river through new Ontario. This scheme is being promoted by a large number of financial houses and brokers on both sides of the border, who are boosting the development of this property which has been ceded over to American millionaires, this super-power trust of the United States. Does the Liberal party in this House propose to stand for that sort of thing? Time will tell. The people of Ontario will soon find out where the political parties in this House stand regarding this particular transaction.

I might continue for another half hour until six o'clock, but I will not do so. I do not regret having taken up so much of the time of the House in discussing this matter, because I think a protest is due, and this House should vote down the making of a political football of the resources of the Ottawa valley and handing them over to private parties. We should tell the promoters that the time has gone by in this House when they can get thirteen or fourteen renewals of a charter and treat their charter as a mere scrap of paper. The time has gone by when any government can so deal with the water-powers and other resources of this country. The time has gone by when a party that is willing to hand over to private individuals the resources of this country is entitled to the votes of the people who know the boon of cheap light and power.

The time has come for the government of Canada to declare its policy on this particular bill. It is useless to tell us to wait until the bill goes to the railway committee. Last year, in the case of the Red lake bill, we looked for Sir Henry Thornton to lay down the policy of the government, but there was no help from him in that particular transaction. He did his best to help the interests of the corporations, the Pennsylvania coal barons and the rest of the gentlemen who come from the other side, who are known as the super-power trust. The time has come now for the municipalities and the legislature of the province to demand from the head of the federal government respect for the petition which has been presented to him by the Ontario government. I hope the next sermon will be preached by some member of the government, of whom only five are in the House at present. Some of them have vacated their pulpits. Many of them are on holiday. Every time this bill comes up, they are all seeking a holiday. I know many gentlemen on this side of the House and in other places who want a holiday. Six hundred thousand Canadians had to take a holiday and go to the United States for 365 days in the year looking for jobs. The time has come when the people of this country demand to know where the government stands on this particular transaction.

Mr. J. A. GLEN (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, the discussion on this bill has been broadened by speakers following the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) until it looks as if a first-class issue along party lines had been raised by hon. members opposite. When the hon. member for Argenteuil was speaking the other night, he said that he had no expectation or idea of trying to keep this bill from going to committee. We all know, he said, that cannot be done, and we have no wish to do so. Does the hon. member now take that position, or does he endorse the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition

(Mr. Guthrie) that this is a question of public policy which ought not to be dealt with by any private bill? Does he approve the clear, distinct statement of his leader that the amendment was proposed to afford members of the House an opportunity of deciding upon what his leader chooses to call the principle of the bill? His leader stated that such was the object which he had in moving the amendment, his main object of course being to destroy this measure, to blot it out. If the hon. member for Argenteuil now approves that stand, why was it necessary for him to suggest as he did that the charter should be entirely redrafted to suit modern conditions?

The amendment moved will not give an opportunity to redraft the bill to suit modern conditions. It will blot it out absolutely, and the conference suggested by him between those applying for the charter and other bodies interested need never be held, because the charter holders will be blotted out and eliminated, as the leader of the opposition says. If the hon. member for Argenteuil now concurs in his leader's tactics, it seems to me it would have been proper for the hon. member to state his position in the first instance, that he pursued and practised the policy of delay until he was assured of the support which is now rolling up from different parts of the country.

The hon. member also expressed his satisfaction with the fact that this question was not a party one and could be treated and decided on its merits. I was glad to hear him make a statement to that effect because on that ground, and on that ground alone, does the group which I represent seek to deal with this question, namely, on its merits. We believed, and we still believe, that this question should not be a party measure, and we do not see any necessity for any statement of policy from the government until all the known facts are available to the House. But what has happened?

Does the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) believe now, if he concurs, as I assume he does, in the proposed amendment of his leader, that this measure can be decided upon its merits or that the charter can be altered to suit modern conditions, except upon party lines? The hon. leader of the opposition proposed his amendment, so far as one can judge from the applause which greeted his remarks, with the unanimous approval of every member on the opposite side of the House if one may except only the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church), who is in the position somewhat of a political curiosity. He can blame the party of which he is a member for making this a party issue, and if he derives any satisfaction from that he will be entitled to all that the statement of his leader can give him.

The group which I represent can have and will have no participation in the discussion of this bill on partisan lines. We can and will, with whatever influence we have, pass on this measure in a non-partisan spirit, concerned only with the paramount interests of the Dominion of Canada.

Can any member of this House arrive at a conclusion on the facts which have been submitted to the House up to the present moment? Has any speaker submitted premises on which to build the conclusion that is proposed by the hon. leader of the opposition? Did the leader of the opposition give any reason why this House should adopt his amendment other than that stated in general terms, namely, that the building of the canal necessarily involved the disposal of the power sites which might be created in the proposed canal? The only pertinent fact evolved by the leader of the opposition was that the value of power sites had been recognized and appreciated in a larger measure than heretofore, and upon that ground, and with the idea of protecting the two provinces, he would without any further discussion blot out this charter.

What do we find are the facts concerning the position of those who are the real opponents of the measure as it presently stands? I have here the leases which have been granted in connection with the power sites by former governments, and I propose, if I may, to put them on Hansard, and to read only excerpts containing very general provisions.

The first lease is one which was granted on March 4, 1911. It was made between His Majesty the King and the National Hydro-Electric Company, Limited, of the city of Montreal. The conditions are therein stated; certain rentals, covenants, provisos and conditions. The lease gave certain lots on the northern side of the Ottawa river and certain lots on the southern side of the Ottawa river, and its duration was for twenty-one years from and after March 31, 1911. The rental was to be $100 for the lands and for the water-power $2 per horse-power per year, payable half-yearly in advance. The covenants of the lessees were, first, as to rentals; second, taxes; and third, that they would comply with all the regulations. They were to have access to the property. They were limited to the works, and no works were to be commenced until the plans were approved by the chief engineer of the Department of Railways and Canals. The lessees had to commence construction within twelve months, and within two years have installed machinery to produce at least 250 horse-power. The lessees were to furnish a bond of $10,000, and in the event of a breach, default or non-performance, the minister was to have the right to cancel the lease and the lessees have no claim for compensation whatever. The lessees also agreed to indemnify the lessor for all damages. The lessees were not to commence work until the plans were approved; the rights and privileges to be used solely for the purpose mentioned, and not to be sublet without leave. The lessees were to maintain the roads, and if at the expiration of twenty-one years the lessees desired renewal for a further twenty-one years or any lesser term, the lessee was to give one month's notice in writing of his desire, when the second term might be granted, as well as a third, but the rental might be increased in that event. The lessees covenant also that they will not enter into partnership without consent, and the right is given to the lessor to cancel the lease on six months notice, the lessor paying to the lessee the fair value of improvements made, assessable by arbitration. In case the lessees were unable to agree as to the quantity of power to be sold to any applicant or as to the provisions therefor, the same should be determined by the railway board.

In the subsequent lease, which was granted on December 1, 1921, the parties are the same, and it is recited that the company has made development and installed power machinery to produce at least 250 horse-power: also that by order in council 1792 of July 14, 1913, as amended by P.C. 4553, authority is given for the issuing to the company of a new lease for construction works. The considerations were the same as formerly, and the lease gave lands and surplus water as described in the recited lease; also the right and privilege to construct and maintain a dam across the Ottawa river, and the right to pen back waters; also the right and privilege to use all the waters of the Ottawa river flowing to the said dam, and not required for the purposes of navigation, including the development of power for the operation and lighting of canals. The lands are more particularly described. The duration of this lease was from and after December 1, 1921, to January 1, 1943, subject to renewals as hereinafter described, at the following rentals:

(2) $50,000 from January 1, 1928, to January 1, 1933.

(3) $100,000 from January 1, 1933, to January 1, 1938.

(4) $150,000 per year from January 1, 1938, to January 1, 1964.

(5) For the 21 year period beginning January 1, 1964, such annual rental as may be agreed upon between the minister and the company or settled by the Exchequer court.

(6) For the 21 year period beginning January 1, 1985, the same provision.

It goes on further and gives the covenants, which are the same as in the former lease. They were to commence construction within two years, and they had the power to acquire further lands by expropriation. Clause 9 reads:

(9) The company shall construct a lock at entrance of Carillon so as to put said canal in good condition for navigation, to be the property of the lessor.

(10) The company shall construct on or near Grenville canal a lock satisfactory for navigation, and so forth, to be the property of the lessor.

(11) The company shall do such work as will furnish adequate protection to the existing works of the Carillon canal.

(12) No works will be proceeded with unless approved by the chief engineer of the Department of Railways and Canals.

(13) During navigation period of the company to maintain levels.

(14) The company shall indemnify the lessor for any damages.

(15) Lessor's right of entry.

(16) The company shall keep roads in repair.

(17) At the expiration of term ending January 1st, 1943, the company may renew on giving one month's notice in writing; for a second 21, a third 21, and a fourth 21 years.

Mr. ARTHURS: What is my hon. friend quoting from?

Mr. GLEN: I am quoting from the abstract of terms of the lease granted in 1921, and I have the original lease here:

(18) Upon expiration of the lease the company shall forthwith remove buildings, etc., upon terms therein set out.

(19) At expiration of lease should lessor desire to continue the utilization of power, through private operation, company shall be entitled to such upon terms.

(20) The lessee has no right to sublet.

Mr. ARTHURS: What application has that particular lease to the Georgian bay canal?

Mr. GLEN: That is a very proper question, and a question I propose to answer now. When the Meighen government was in power an order in council was passed renewing this particular lease which I have quoted.

Mr. ARTHURS: What lease?

Mr. GLEN: The one I have already given. I wish the House to note that the renewal was granted on the 26th August, 1926, prior to the date of the general election, when the members on the opposite side of the House had no mandate from the country, and when they took upon themselves to grant a renewal of that lease governed only by their own sweet will.

Mr. HEAPS: Did my hon. friend approve of the grant of that particular lease?

Mr. GLEN: I was not asked to approve.

Mr. HEAPS: Will my hon. friend answer the question.

Mr. GLEN: If my hon. friend will allow me to continue he will find out whether I approved or not. Prior to the last election, without any mandate having been obtained by the leader of the opposition, or the government of which he was a member, they took it upon themselves to renew that lease, and these are the terms. I have a certified copy of the minutes of the meeting of the committee of the Privy Council approved by His Excellency the Governor General on 26th August, 1926, which reads:

The committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report, dated 23rd August, 1926, from the Acting Minister of Railways and Canals, with reference to lease No. 24414, between the Department of Railways and Canals and the National Hydro Electric Company Limited, authorized by orders of the Governor General in Council, dated the 14th July, 1913, and the 1st December, 1921, which lease provided for the furnishing by the company, at no cost to the government, of greatly improved canalization facilities past the Carillon rapids in the Ottawa river, and the utilization by the company of the water-powers adjacent thereto.

The minister observes as follows:

That lease No. 24414 required that actual construction operations be commenced by December 1, 1923, a minimum of 25,000 horse-power developed by December 1, 1926, and certain rentals to commence within two years after the completion of the plant or by January 1, 1928;

That for financial and engineering reasons the company has been unable to conform to the original time clauses of its lease and appropriate extensions have been authorized by orders in council, dated August 14, 1923, November 29, 1924, and October 28, 1925, and

That the company now represents that its investigations and negotiations are advanced to a stage where it will be able to start actual work during the year 1927, and have the navigation improvements and power development adjacent thereto completed by December 1, 1931. Accordingly, it has requested that the arrangements provided in the original lease for the starting of construction work, completion of the improvements and commencement of rentals be now definitely stipulated in a new supplementary agreement.

The minister therefore recommends that he be authorized to enter into a supplementary agreement with the National Hydro Electric Company Limited, to again amend the said lease No. 24414, by granting a further extension of time for the commencement of improvement works referred to by the 1st December, 1927, the completion of the works with a minimum of 25,000 horse-power developed by December 1st, 1930, and the commencement of payment of rentals on Janunary 1st, 1932.

The minister further recommends that should the company secure the coöperation of either or both of the governments of the province of Ontario and Quebec in the power phase of the improvement project, and on a basis satisfactory to Your Excellency in Council, one-third of the total rentals shall become payable to each of such coöperating governments, as a credit upon any rentals such provincial governments may exact.

The committee concur in the foregoing and submit the same for Your Excellency's approval.

(Signed) E. J. LEMAIRE,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

Mr. ADSHEAD: My hon. friend mentioned Carillon falls. Does that cover the same property this bill covers?

Mr. GLEN: Of course not.

Mr. ARTHURS: If this agreement by the government, or by any government previous to the renewal of the charter, has any effect, it means that the charter itself would not be affected; or in other words, if the government had power to grant to any company the control of the Carillon power on the Ottawa river, or under any other power, or any other terms than these, then this bill would be ineffective, would it not?

Mr. GLEN: My hon. friend does not realize the exact situation. Here is a lease granted to a power company which has been in existence for a considerable period, under which certain provisions with regard to construction of works have to be made within a certain time. That work is not completed. They come to the government—unauthorized as a good many seem to think, in office without having received a mandate from the country to carry on—and yet this government of its own act, without consultation with anyone else, grants a renewal of that lease.

Now I come to my hon. friend's point. Lo and behold! We have here the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) moving an amendment to a charter which has not yet expired, and the works under which are in exactly the same position as the works provided for under that lease. His amendment is against the principle of the bill. Does he think that the principle of the lease is any different from the principle involved in the bill? The same request was made of the government of that day for a renewal of the lease as is now being made of this government for a renewal of the bill or charter.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not of the government, of parliament.

Mr. GLEN: Yes, of parliament. The same situation has arisen in connection with a portion of the very same matter that is contained in this bill, and yet the leader of the opposition came forward and offered to that company an extension of the lease without consultation with parliament.

Mr. ARTHURS: No, no.

Mr. GLEN: But it was done.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Absolutely.

Mr. GLEN: Because my hon. friend does not know that when the present government came into power they took upon themselves by order in council to cancel the extension that had been granted.

Mr. ARTHURS: Will my hon. friend allow me a question right there?

Mr. GLEN: I will now read the cancellation if my hon. friend will permit me. This is certified to be:

A true copy of a minute of a meeting of the committee of the Privy Council, approved by the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General on the 28th September, 1926.

The order in council proceeds:

The committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report, dated 28th September, 1926, from the Minister of Railways and Canals, representing that by an order in council of the 26th August, 1926 (P.C. 1337) what purports to be authority has been given for entry into a supplementary agreement with the National Hydro Electric Company, Limited, covering an extension of time for the commencement of the improvement works to be carried out by the said company under its lease No. 24414, dated the 1st December, 1921, in respect of certain lands and land and surplus water, together with certain rights and privileges to construct a dam and to use the surplus waters of the Ottawa rivers; the time for the commencement of the works referred to to be fixed as by the 1st of December, 1927; completion of the works with a minimum of 25,000 horse-power developed to be fixed by the 1st of December, 1930, and the commencement of payment of rentals on the 1st of January, 1932. The said order in council further purports to authorize payment of one-third of the total rentals to each of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, as a credit upon any rentals such provincial governments may exact, in the event of the company securing the co-operation of either or both of the said provincial governments in the power phase of the improvement project on a basis satisfactory to Your Excellency in Council.

The minister further represents that it is expedient that the matter, as approved by the above mentioned order in council of the 26th of August, 1926, P.C. 1337, be given reconsideration.

The minister, therefore, recommends that the said order in council of the 26th of August, 1926, P.C. 1337, be cancelled.

The committee concur in the foregoing recommendation and submit the same for approval.

(Signed) E. J. LEMAIRE,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

Does that answer my hon. friends' question?

Mr. ARTHURS: No, it does not. What possible connection has the order in council or its repudiation by the present government with the Georgian bay canal scheme?

Mr. GLEN: Mr. Speaker, either I have not made myself clear or the hon. member is dull. I have endeavoured to show him and this House that the principle which the leader of the opposition has invoked in connection with this charter is exactly the same principle that he did not invoke when he granted a renewal of the lease to the National Hydro Electric Company. That is the reason why I think this is merely a subterfuge, an attempt to prevent this bill going to the committee where the facts can be ascertained. I fail to see, Mr. Speaker, wherein the leader of the opposition in his speech differentiated between that principle with respect to the lease and the principle which he enunciated in his amendment. It seems to me that the same rule of law should apply in this case as in the other.

Now, I suppose consistency may be preached in politics but not practised. However, I imagine that in this matter consistency would be a great virtue, more especially in dealing with a bill of this magnitude, and that we ought to keep it in view. This brings me to the inquiry as to what interests are involved and why there is this discussion on the principle of a measure that has been before this House for the past thirty-three years, during which time I must assume that the principle was discussed and passed upon. Apparently two interests are concerned in this discussion—one that the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) has just described as the Sifton interests, and the other that has been mentioned by certain hon. members as the Holt interests. There seems to be a conflict between these two interests which is to be terminated by this debate.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the Sifton interests have the charter of which they are now seeking a renewal. According to the statements of several hon. members the building of the proposed canal cannot be divorced from the creation of power sites. This argument is used. If it is admitted, as the leader of the opposition has stated on page 1137 of Hansard, that all that parliament is concerned with is its paramount rights in respect to navigation on an interprovincial river—and I have no reason to doubt that that is so—the question naturally arises: Can the canal be built without at the same time constructing dams and practically everything else necessary for electrical development except only power houses and turbines? In other words, is not the expense of developing the potential hydro-electric energy along the canal an inherent, necessary and incidental expenditure without which the canal itself cannot be built? When he was speaking on this bill last week I asked the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) how he proposed to separate the use of the water in the Ottawa river for hydro-electric purposes from its use for navigation purposes. I thought that was a very pertinent question to put to the first speaker on the subject, and the only answer I received was that, in his opinion, the parties interested at the conference, which he suggested should take place, would determine this. The answer is not satisfactory and, I submit, is not entirely conclusive to members of this House.

I am not offering any evidence myself as to the arguments that have been advanced, for a very good reason which I think will answer the question put to me by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps). But suggestions have been made by a number of speakers as to the potentialities of the project and what it might mean to the Dominion of Canada. I will mention some of these suggestions. It has been suggested, for example, that the control of water in the river for navigation purposes means so controlling the water as to maintain a certain depth in the channels; that the maintenance of the depth of water in the channels is a matter of and is entirely dependent upon the control of the water levels; and that the maintenance of the water levels entirely depends upon the control of all the outlets in the dam irrespective of the form which these outlets may take. Is it not a fact that hydro-electric power is developed by the control and manipulation of the outlets in the dams? Can power be separated from navigation without giving the power company the control of the water which passes through the outlets of the dams to the turbines? If not, would the result not be to separate the two, giving the control of navigation to the power company?

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GLEN: Before the House rose at six o'clock I was endeavouring to put forth some propositions which I think will have to be answered by the opponents of this measure, to the effect that control of the water in the river for navigation purposes means such control as will maintain the depth of the water in the channels; that the maintenance of the depth of the water in the channels is a matter of, and is entirely dependent upon, the control of the water levels; that the maintenance of the water levels depends entirely upon the control of all the outlets in the dam, no matter what form these outlets take; and I asked was it not a fact that hydro-electric power is developed by control and manipulation of the outlets in the dam? Can power be separated from navigation without giving the power company the control of the water which passes through the outlets of the dams, and if not, would the result not be to separate the two, giving the control of navigation to the power company? It seems to me that these questions will have to be answered by the opponents of this measure. If an affirmative answer be given to any of these proposals then the opposition to the bill must necessarily fail. If an affirmative answer be given to any of them there is no justification for the amendment.

Now what is the converse of that position? Does the leader of the opposition, or does the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley), argue that the canal of itself is of no value? I hardly think so. Yet if these power sites are given to syndicates who are not obliged to build the canal—and that I presume is the intention of the hon. member for Argenteuil, whatever may be the intention of the leader of the opposition—then the effect of the amendment if passed would mean not only the blotting out of the measure but also the killing of the canal project itself. Is the House prepared at this stage to take such a drastic step?

The promoters of the charter advance a number of reasons why the bill should carry. I do not say anything with regard to the soundness of their arguments, but among the reasons they give are a number which I propose to enumerate and which I think are worthy of some comment directed to those who are opposed to the bill. The promoters of the bill claim that the project will provide a Canadian deep waterway from the great lakes to the sea controlled and operated by Canadians and subject to no treaty rights with any other nation. They claim that it will develop large quantities of electrical energy from water-powers. That is, I think, indisputable. They claim it will develop the valley of the Ottawa river and make it one of the most desirable industrial areas in Canada, having a sea frontage throughout its length, having transcontinental railway lines passing along it, and equipped with a tremendous supply of cheap hydro-electric energy. They further claim that the project will give to territory contiguous to it overwhelming advantages in the reduction of industrial costs through the cheapness and availability of power, and desirable location from the point of view of lessened transportation rates. They also claim it will reduce the cost of coal to consumers from the central provinces and be the means of opening up a market for Nova Scotia coal as far west as Port Arthur. They claim likewise that it will provide transportation from Port Arthur to the Canadian seaports for the grain of the west seeking markets overseas. If that is so it will, I believe, be of considerable benefit to the producers of the west.

They also claim that transportation by this canal to the seaboard will mean the deflection of a great deal of trade which presently goes to Buffalo. They say that this will mean a saving of time and distance and a considerable diminution in the costs. These and many others are amongst the arguments that are advanced by those who are supporting this bill. As I have already said, I have no knowledge of the soundness of these arguments; but so far as I have heard, read and been told, no other member of this House is in a position to controvert them. It is not to be expected that any single member could give a comprehensive reply to any of the arguments advanced by the supporters of the bill, and I am satisfied that no statement made by any hon. member across the floor of this House could have as much value and effect as if it were made across the floor of a committee room, because then and there we would have an opportunity of examining experts and other witnesses who might be called for or against this bill and of being seized of the actual facts to enable us to arrive at proper conclusions.

We are faced with this proposition, that without a knowledge of the facts, we are asked to condemn a measure which has been before this House at different times over a period of so many years with frequent renewals, when the principle of the bill which is spoken of in the amendment must necessarily have been discussed. This proposition which may have such tremendous and far-reaching potentialities we are also asked to condemn on the bare negative statements made by the leader of the opposition, and to leave these power rights about which there is so much controversy, where? It has been said and repeated in the press time and again that the people of Ontario, through Premier Ferguson, have taken the position that they are out for public ownership. There are many of us in the same position as Premier Ferguson, but sometimes one should clean one's own doorstep before advising somebody else what to do.

I do not give this with any degree of authority of my own, but I am told, as a good many members have been told through the gossip of the lobbies and elsewhere, that this same province and government of Ontario have militated against the principle of public ownership. The hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) was condemning on that ground the Gatineau Power Company contract. What are the facts? I have been told that the fact is that the Ontario government through the Ontario hydro have contracted to buy from the Gatineau Power Company 260,000 horse-power for thirty years at $15 per horse-power. That is a contract to put into the treasury of the Gatineau Power Company nearly $4,000,000 per annum for thirty years, and is a security to that company in the guaranteeing of its bonds. What does this mean? Is this public ownership? I would say certainly not, and when I refer to the fact that anyone who demands cleanliness of house should clean his own doorstep first, it might be well for the people of Ontario to consider that matter before enunciating a policy of public ownership. Is it not a fact that this may account for a good deal of the opposition that is coming to this measure, namely, that a number of hon. members on the other side of the House are anxious to get rid of the Georgian bay canal project in order that the Ontario hydro may guarantee the bonds of a number of privately-owned power companies? Perhaps that is the nigger in the woodpile, as it is often called, but I would like to challenge anyone to find one iota of public ownership in the planks of the Conservative party. I have not found it nor have we heard it enunciated on the floor of this House during this debate.

Those on the other side ask us to drop a proposal which may mean the construction of a waterway without cost to the Dominion, and they do this on the ipse dixit only of those interested and therefore prejudiced. That is not sufficient. I am taking the position that is not sufficient for me. The other day I saw in the Ottawa Citizen an editorial addressed to the Liberal-Progressives of this House among whom I include myself, stating that the members of this group will need to watch their step carefully. It intimated that because of the vote which took place on the adjournment last week, when we voted with the Liberal party on this side of the House for a continuation of the debate, we had not an open mind in the subject. Let me assure the House that for that very reason, the open mind, are we concerned with this bill going to committee. We are not prepared to vote on the measure because of the negative arguments advanced. We prefer, if you like, to put the matter in this way, to Sifton the evidence rather than to be a party to the Holt-up that is being consummated in this House at the present moment.

Only to-day there is in that same newspaper a further editorial, most unfair in its terms, wholly contradictory of the argument that was submitted by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. McPherson). I know him, and probably when the Citizen editorial writer gets to know him as well as I do, he will realize that the hon. member is not likely to become a Richard Yea and Nay, as is the effect of the amendment moved from the other side of the House, but he is willing to listen to and accept, if necessary, sound and solid reasons why he should vote otherwise.

Let me state as emphatically as I know how, and as the rules of this House will permit, that we propose, so far as lies in our power, to see that, if and when this bill goes to the committee, first of all the paramount interests and rights of Canada shall be adequately protected and safeguarded. We will also endeavour, as far as in us lies, to see that the rights of present and future citizens of Canada are not violated or infringed upon by the terms of this charter. This we are satisfied can only be done in committee, when all parties interested, those for and against, including any of the newspapers that like to take the opportunity, shall be given the opportunity to give evidence on the facts. Then, when the data has been collected and analysed, we shall be in a position to decide between the conflicting interests in this proposition, and we shall be able to vote without the dictation of any newspaper writer, just as freely and as conscientiously as he penned his remarks. What we want are the facts. No declaration such as was called for by the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) from the government will be of any value to us now. It may be of considerable value, after the evidence has been collected and analysed, for the government to give us a line and a lead, but, Mr. Speaker, I think the members of this House can also make up their own minds after they have got the facts.

Let me say that we are not satisfied with the terms of the charter any more than any of the other hon. members of this House. It may need revision to suit these present day conditions that the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) spoke of, but if it does need alteration, that alteration cannot be made on the floor of this House, because there has been no evidence adduced by a single member which would lead one to alter the terms of the contract. But on the floor of the committee room, where we have the opportunity, we can amend that charter and it can then come back to the House as amended. I do not think for one moment that the leader of the opposition is likely to say that the committee will not have the right to change the charter. That at all events is not the customary, acknowledged practice. There have been government measures in the past which have been discussed on the floor of this House pro and con in a most embittered fashion, and have been sent to the committee after a vote, and from the committee, after further discussion, they have come back to the floor of this House, not with the recommendation of the committee, but with an adverse report. That I think happened in the case of the Petersen contract measure of two years ago.

Mr. ADSHEAD: The Petersen measure was a government bill. Does my hon. friend dispute the statement of the hon. leader of the opposition that the carrying of the second reading necessarily involves approval of the principle of the bill?

Mr. GLEN: The Petersen contract measure was a government measure. This is a private measure. The question of the principle of the bill, of which so much is made, need not necessarily affect the details of the bill when it comes from the committee, and the mere affirmation of any principle, however far-reaching it may be, does not affect the actual details upon which we shall base a decision. Upon that ground I am resting. We are not affirming the principle of the bill, but we are asking that the bill shall go to the committee in order that we shall know what is the principle in the bill, for we do not know it yet. Then, when we know the principle of the bill, as we shall know it in committee, we shall know what are the details and terms of the bill, and decide accordingly.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, it is not, I think intended, nor can it be established, that the ultimate powers of this House can be abridged in any way by the report of the committee. We can only be bound by the registered vote given in this House when the ultimate discussion takes place. That is the position I take, and that is the reason why I shall oppose the amendment. I view the proposed amendment unfavourably. I cannot rid myself of the thought that it does not represent a policy, but is simply an evasion. The party which gave the extension of the Carillon lease were giving then expression to their viewpoint, and the object of the amendment is simply to embarrass and confuse. I have hopes that in committee this charter may develop and lead to a satisfactory conclusion of what is undoubtedly a question of first-rate magnitude. We ask, and I think the people of Canada are entitled to ask, the exact meaning of this whole issue, the reason for the opposition, the reason for this measure. That cannot be obtained on the floor of this House. It can only be obtained in the committee when the opposing interests are confronted with each other, and for that reason it seems to me the proper and the only course is to send the bill to the committee. I shall therefore oppose the amendment.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Rosetown): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak very long, but I think I would be derelict in my duty did I not enunciate my principles on this measure, which to my mind involves one of the greatest questions that has come before the House since I have been a member.

The question of government ownership of public utilities is a matter of grave concern to this country at this time; in fact, I think it is the deciding point in the welfare of the people for all time to come with regard to cheap power for industry and domestic purposes. When the charter was first granted some thirty-three years ago, I do not suppose that the power question was as acute as it is now; it was not considered of as much importance as it is to-day.

I contend, Mr. Speaker, that no measure should be enacted by this House until the people's rights in their own natural resources of any kind whatsoever and in any part of the country whatsoever have been fully protected.

In answer to my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Glen) I beg to say that no committee can ameliorate the evils of private ownership of public utilities, and no matter how much this bill may be amended or brought into line with his ideas, the evils of private ownership of public utilities will remain for the people to pay for in all the years to come. I am opposed to any private concern constructing even the canal, beginning at Georgian bay and ending at the Ottawa river. That is a public utility in itself, and should not pass into private hands. For that reason I opposed the other day a charter to construct a tunnel between Windsor and Detroit. That is a public utility, and it should not pass into private hands.

It is my opinion that were it not for the power possibilities on the Ottawa river to-day, this question would not be a subject for discussion in the House at this time. When the hon. member for North York (Mr. Lennox) was speaking some days ago, he quoted from an interview which Sir Clifford Sifton gave to the Toronto Star, and he expressed his indignation at certain men who seemed to think they owned Canada, and who sought to control the government for their own particular benefit. I am quite in accord with him. Ever since confederation it has seemed to be the object of certain Canadians, who claim also to have a monopoly of patriotism, to secure for themselves projects by which later on they can bleed the people white of their earnings through the operation of public utilities established on the credit of the country, which is based really on the earnings of the working class. The project under consideration is another scheme that links up the big investor with the politicians in this House, all designed to bleed the public. There is no object in granting this charter other than to secure the earnings of the people, and the people are misled into believing that their interests are looked after by their representatives in this House, while franchises for the creation of public utilities fall continually into private hands. The public press of the country is divided on the question, but I think it can be said that most of the press of the country belonging to the politicians and the big interests here is endeavouring to so dope the minds of the people at this time with false statements about prosperity and patriotism as to render public opinion silent on these matters, while the robbery is going on.

One would have thought it impossible, indeed, it did seem to me impossible, that a bill of this kind could be presented to the Canadian parliament looking to override what seems to me to be the exclusive rights of Ontario and Quebec. By what right can any company lay claim to the power rights on the Ottawa river? I say again that these men who think they control one or other of the political parties in this House presume to control the Dominion. Indeed, Sir, it has seemed for a long time past as though some people believed that this parliament existed for no other purpose than to expropriate the rights of the people and make a safe getaway for those who receive them into their hands. Only last year a measure passed through this House which alienated a certain right of a section of the people, and to-day it is law. I am referring now to vested rights which certain companies held many years ago in private elevators. As far back as 1904 the organized farmers of western Canada advocated the operation of government-owned elevators. As soon as we found that the government would not take over the monopoly we sought to do that work ourselves, and now that the government has seen that we are on the job in this matter, through perfect coöperation, or as perfect as it is possible to bring it at the time, they deprive us even of the right of shipping our own grain to the terminals which we have established out of our own earnings. We are everlastingly creating around us a network of vested interests from which we will find it hard in years to come to free ourselves. Indeed, it is an amazing thing to me—and I say it frankly, and I would not speak otherwise on this great question—that those men, some of them in western Canada, who have been there from practically the inception of agriculture west of the great lakes, will favour a monopoly passing into private hands. We have had a case of monopoly in western Canada between the railroads and grain-handling facilities during the last forty years, which one would think would convince any man representing the people from that part of the country that he should never favour in any way or form any great public utility passing into private hands.

From reading some of the papers on this great scheme I gather that about two years ago a company of which Clifford Sifton is a part got control of the charter to construct the Georgian bay canal. Undoubtedly the power is the pivot of the whole scheme on which this right of the people is now asked to be bartered away. Evidently the Tory government last summer favoured another set of interests, among whose names Herbert Holt appears, and to make sure that the hated Grits on the other side could not again accommodate their favourites they passed an order in council giving rights of power development to the Herbert Holt interests and what is known as the Shawinigan Company. Then, since the Liberal government attained power, this right was rescinded by an order in council which has lately been confirmed. To me it has looked so far like a case of political expediency. I do not think either party had the right to do as they did, and I cannot see yet why the rights of the provinces should be overridden in this matter. All waterways and water-powers should be owned and operated by the people, whether they belong to the provinces or to the Dominion. It does not matter which; they should not pass out of the hands of the people, and whether this power belongs to the provinces on each side of the Ottawa or to the Dominion government, I say again there is absolutely no reason for giving rights on that river from which power may be developed until the rights of the people in this great natural resource are forever protected. The attitude of Ontario was freely set out on March 7, by a resolution moved by Premier Ferguson in the provincial legislature, seconded by W. S. Raney, and I will read, if I may, that resolution to the House. It as as follows:

That this House respectfully urges the parliament of Canada not to enact Bill No. 78 of the House of Commons respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Company for the reasons hereinafter set forth:

That the bill proposes to renew a charter to authorize the construction of a canal and the development of water-powers on the Ottawa and the French rivers, which said charter has already been in existence for 33 years without any evidence of progress toward the accomplishment of the projected canal;

That the application to parliament is an effort on the part of private promoters to secure through the federal parliament the control and ownership of a great and valuable public utility;

That the water-powers in the Ottawa river in interprovincial waters are the joint property of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and that the powers in the French river are wholly situate within Ontario, and are the property of the province of Ontario, and cannot be rightfully legislated upon by the Dominion parliament.

That the development of these powers is essential to the industry and the prosperity of the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and the only effect of Federal legislation purporting to vest these powers in a private company will be to retard development, create litigation, and impair the public interest.

That the water-powers of the Ottawa river, so far as they belong to this province, are an essential part of the public development and distribution of power in Ontario, in which the people of this province have already invested upward of $276,000,000;

That this legislative assembly desires to record its most earnest and emphatic protest against the attempt being made, by means of a private bill in the Dominion parliament, to alienate valuable water-powers from the control and ownership of this province, and thereby deprive the people of Ontario of the advantage of one of our greatest natural resources for the benefit and advantage of private promoters;

That the province of Ontario respectfully urges that the rights guaranteed to the provinces under the federal constitution should be at all times respected by the parliament of Canada;

That this House believes that the occasion calls for a strong and conclusive pronouncement against the proposed legislation as being contrary to the spirit and the terms of confederation and prejudicial to the public interest.

For these and other reasons this House directs that copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Prime Minister of Canada and to the speakers of the two houses of parliament of Canada.

I have read this resolution because I think it is imperative that the House should know the stand taken by the government of Ontario. It is certainly the view of the people in Quebec and Ontario that the power rights belong to their provinces and that neither the Holt nor the Sifton interests have the slightest title to a charter involving control of provincial rights. I think it is a healthy sign of the times that so many on the opposition side of this House have declared themselves openly for government ownership and operation of public utilities.

The member for Nipissing (Mr. Lapierre) read telegrams advocating the building of this canal. Well, I say that we do not want to obstruct the construction of such a work. But why anyone would want to see a great public utility of this character in private hands is more than I can understand. If the canal is needed it will be built eventually by the nation itself. This is the natural and reasonable course to follow. In fact I go so far as to say that I believe the Georgian bay canal should have been constructed instead of the Welland canal. But, I repeat, it is the nation's job, it is not something for private interests to exploit. A great public work of this kind belongs to the people, and from the people it should never be alienated.

Recently I received from Washington a paper call "Labour: A National Weekly Newspaper." This paper contains an article by Judson King describing the fight that is going on in the republic to the south between the champions of public ownership and the power magnates for the possession of water-powers. If I were to change slightly the figures and the names of persons and places contained in this article it might be taken as a description of the contest that is proceeding in this House on this bill. Mr. Judson King, referring to the tremendous evil of allowing these natural resources to pass into private hands, says:

What is there in it for the power trust, which caused its lobby, inside and outside Washington, captained by Colonel Josiah Newcombe, New York lawyer, to go to such spectacular extremes in its fight to kill the Boulder Dam bill? Money? Yes. Politics? Yes. The combine is in politics on a national scale as part of its business.

He adds that the Electrical World in its issue of January 2, 1926, estimated that for the year 1925 the price of power in one of the states was 7.5 cents per kilowatt hour, as against 1.65 cents per kilowatt hour for the same service in Ontario under public ownership. To me it is plain that if this scheme is allowed to be developed by private interests the people of Ontario will have to pay, not 1.65 cents per kilowatt hour but three or four times that amount for their power, light and heat. The evils of private ownership and exploitation were never better set out than in this article.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would repeat that this House has no right to override the wishes of the people of the provinces concerned, most of whom and the majority of whose newspapers are alive to the situation. In this connection allow me to read a paragraph from the Cochrane Northland Post, which was quoted by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. McPherson) last week. Why he read it I do not know, because it contradicted absolutely all that he said on that occasion. This is the paragraph to which I refer:

It seems inconceivable that the government should have given away these natural resources belonging in the last end to the people, to private corporations for the purpose of exploiting these very people to whom such powers should belong, and, who live in the very shadow of their magnificence. As a matter of fact we feel sure that the government has no intention of permitting such big stick methods.

Premier Ferguson gave an intimation to a recent delegation from the northern Ontario associated boards of trade that in the leasing of lands and water-powers, the people's interest had been fully safeguarded and that the big corporations must watch their steps and live up to conditions exacted at the time of such leases being granted and that he would see that they do it.

In regard to all utilities of a public nature this nation should now look forward to the time of coöperative public ownership, so that services may be rendered in the most economical manner and as cheaply as possible to the public. I have enunciated this principle, with some force I hope, for many years. In western Canada we have talked about the public ownership of public utilities, and in fact this policy was one of the main planks of the platform on which I was elected, as it was of the platform on which all those sitting on the other side as Liberal Progressives were returned to this parliament. I trust that those hon. gentlemen will yet deem it their duty to the people to stand firmly on this one principle at least. Public ownership is the natural thing; it is in keeping with the movement of civilization. If we allow this great public utility to pass to-day into private hands we shall be taking a retrograde step and one not worthy of the Canadian people.

Mr. N. M. YOUNG (Toronto Northeast): I lay no claims to powers of oratory or of persuasion such as have been displayed by some hon. members, and particularly by the hon. gentleman from Marquette (Mr. Glen). I do not envy such powers, nor do I need them in arguing a question so fundamental as that of disposing of our natural resources without knowing where they are going or what we are likely to get for them. I had not intended expressing myself on this subject until it became apparent from the comments in the newspapers, in the corridors of this building and in my own constituency that the question is one that is striking deeply into our constitutional fibre. I feel it my duty, however, and I take this opportunity to discharge that duty, of placing myself on record on this vital question, and in doing so I wish to assure the hon. member for Marquette, in reply to a suggestion from him, that this is not a partisan issue. It is not, nor has it been made a party question, at least by hon. members on this side. But when hon. gentlemen opposite inject the partisan element we will certainly dispute the point and disabuse the public of that impression. If any proof is required of the statement that the question is not partisan, so far at any rate as the party which I represent is concerned, I would refer the House to the first page of Hansard of March 9, wherein there appears a resolution passed in the Ontario legislature, moved by Premier Ferguson and seconded by the Hon. Mr. Raney—moved by the premier of the province and seconded by the leader of the Progressive party. If ever we had an example of the lion and the lamb lying down together, we have it in Mr. Ferguson and Mr. Raney agreeing on something. This, I repeat, is not a party issue, and the only reason the hon. member for Marquette made that insinuation was his desire for an opportunity to deliver the most partisan speech which has been made on this question in this House. So far as we are concerned the question is not a party question. But if it is, let the government immediately take all the advantage they can of the fact and, from the party standpoint, kill the bill and go out and proclaim themselves once more the defenders of the poor and the opponents of capitalistic influence.

Let me bring to earth a few of the toy balloons which the hon. member for Marquette has sent up. I do not know exactly what the rules of debate may demand in regard to this question, but certainly the ethics of debate should prevent any hon. member from making insinuations or repeating hearsay on the floor of this House unless he is prepared to disclose the source of his information. The hon. gentleman said—if I took down his words correctly, that Premier Ferguson should clean his own doorstep; and he referred to the Gatineau Power Company, remarking that while Premier Ferguson was outwardly an exponent of public ownership he was at the same time filling the coffers of the company. Let me assure the House that the only reason the Ontario Hydro Electric Commission is buying power from the Gatineau company is the fact that the power from the Ottawa river is not available because of this charter. We must have power, and two years ago we got to the extremity of being obliged to consider steam development. This power we are getting from the Gatineau is obtained at a reasonable rate which suits us, and the contract is not, Mr. Speaker, like the contract which this bill proposes, an interminable one. It is a contract which is convenient to us.

The hon. member declared that he wanted to keep an open mind on the question, and he was anxious to have the bill go to the committee so that its details might be discussed. May I point out that we are now discussing, not the details, but the principle of the bill, and if the principle is wrong, the details ought not to come before this House for consideration. My hon. friend may think he has an open mind, but there are none so blind as those who will not see. This afternoon he referred to a member on this side as being either dumb or dense. Well, the hardest man to convince is the great talker but poor listener, because if he never listens he can never change his point of view. The hon. member made an extensive apology for or explanation of the stand he was taking on the question. I would refer him to a maxim of Napoleon, that the best defensive is a strong offensive, and to a French saying which, if I translate it correctly, is this that he who excuses himself accuses himself. The hon. member has a prejudged opinion; but he has a duty to perform and I compliment him on the glib way in which he put forward his arguments. We are not concerned, however, with half truths; we want whole truths, and when we discuss a question so vital as this surely political prejudices and party advantages should be carefully considered before they are allowed to override the public weal.

This is not a local issue; it is national in its scope, as representing a conflict of jurisdiction and a possible encroachment on provincial rights. A matter of provincial rights affects every province in the Dominion, and this particular question relates in its local application to two provinces which cannot be ignored—as we can well understand from a reading of our history—particularly if the factor of politics is to be considered.

As my hon. leader (Mr. Guthrie) has said, this is the time to settle the question of principle, and if the principle is wrong the House has no right to send the bill to the committee. The details of a bill which is wrong in principle should not be explored because anything which is wrong ab initio cannot be remedied. Of the principles involved, Mr. Speaker, I propose to discuss, and discuss briefly only, the most salient; and as far as possible I shall avoid going over ground that has been covered by others. At this stage of the debate most of the thunder has been stolen, but if it is my privilege to bring up a new point, something that might have some effect, if not on hon. gentlemen opposite, at least on the counsel for the public—the press and on the public itself—I shall consider that I have contributed something worth while to the discussion.

The first principle I lay down is that this is a public measure which should not be concealed in a private bill; or if it becomes apparent that the tentacles of the bill reach out and injure public interests, then the bill ceases to be in its character a private measure. I do not expect hon. members opposite or hon. members on this side to take my word for that. My respected leader the other night referred to May as authority as to the proper time to attack the principle of this bill. May I draw the attention, Sir, of hon. members opposite to Bourinot's Manual of the Constitutional History of Canada? I quote first from page 177:

> It is the duty of the government—

Not a private member.

> —to initiate or promote legislation on every large question of public policy which requires attention at the hands of the legislature.

Now, reading from the next page:

> If the House should press on their attention a particular measure, they—

That is the government.

> —must be prepared to give it full consideration and assume ministerial responsibility for its passage or rejection. They must on all occasions have a policy on every question of public interest.—

This is Bourinot's statement, not mine.

> —and cannot evade it if they wish to retain the confidence of parliament and of the country. As a rule, private members perform a useful public duty in bringing up measures which illustrate public sentiment in various directions. Parliament is essentially a deliberative body, and its not least important function is to prepare the public mind for useful legislation and to give it effect at the earliest possible moment. Private members consequently can materially assist the government by their suggestions for the amendment of the law.

Now will hon. members pay attention to this; I am still reading from Bourinot:

> It would, however, be an evasion of the sound principle of ministerial responsibility if a government should attempt, by means of purely abstract resolutions or by the agency of select committees, to obtain from parliament the enunciation of the principles that should guide them in maturing a measure which imperatively demands legislation at their hands. It is their duty to gauge public opinion on every subject from the utterances of public men and of the public press, and lay down the main features of the policy that should be adopted.

And, Sir, turning to the next page, namely page 180, here is something that is, I think, entirely directed to the point at issue and to this particular bill, and again I am quoting from Bourinot:

> It is the special duty of the government as the responsible leaders of legislation and the chosen guardians of the public interests in parliament, to watch carefully the progress of private legislation, and see that it does not in any way interfere with the policy of the ministry or the statutory law in reference to the public lands, railways, canals, public works, and such other interests as are entrusted to the Dominion authorities.

Sir, is there anything more convincing than that? I may not speak with the authority of some of the older members of this House but I speak with the authority of Bourinot and I think that in the face of this obiter dicta the government is forced to take up the cudgels and stand or fall on the question of this bill, affecting as it does so vitally the public interests.

I would, Sir, refer to another authority and it is the only newspaper from which I shall quote. This is again the Toronto Globe, and it has the advantage of being to-day's issue and is an illustration of the final press reaction to this debate. I quote, Sir, from the first column of the editorial page as follows:

> Hon. Hugh Guthrie's amendment to the Georgian bay canal bill has apparently put the onus on the government to declare itself. He has raised a point which the government itself should have seized and acted upon before being placed on the defensive. The silence of the ministry on such an important question has been almost inexplicable, and certainly disturbing. The proposal to extend the charter of the Georgian Bay Campany comes in a private bill, but it has been introduced by a Liberal member, and its benefactors are conspicuous supporters of the Liberal party. Rightly or wrongly, an impression has gone abroad that the government would not be unwilling to see the bill passed and the water-powers of the Ottawa and French rivers handed over to these interests. Failure of any members of the ministry to take part in the debate on the numerous occasions when the measure has been up has served to strengthen this conviction. It is time the country knew where the government stands. It should now learn.

I am leaving out the next paragraph which is a repetition and a quotation, but which accentuates that statement, and I go on to the last two paragraphs, which read:

Surely this is too grave a matter to be bandied about in a private bill. If a government has any jurisdiction, it is to safeguard the people's interests. But government spokesmen, so far, have had nothing to say, and the silence is ominous. Has the Ottawa Journal hit the point? "Since the commencement of the debate men of all parties have spoken" says this paper. But a great silence has hung over the ministerial benches. Those voluble gentlemen who on Tuesday night massed in verbal defense of an expenditure of $12,000 for a post office in a 500 population hamlet in Prince Edward island, sit like a bed of oysters when this canal charter comes up. Why? Has the government no mind in the matter? Or is it afraid to speak its mind? Can it be that the presence of Mr. Harry Sifton in the lobbies and in the galleries has paralyzed its tongue?

Having a clear majority, the government is in a position to kill legislation not in the public interests. It will have to assume responsibility or take credit anyway for such disposition as is made of this measure if it comes to a vote. It might as well have made its position clear in the debate. If the bill gets second reading it will mean virtually that the government approves of the principle of giving away public power rights. Mr. Guthrie has done right in endeavouring to focus attention on this principle. It is to be hoped he is able to put the government on record, and, for the sake of the government, it is to be hoped that record will declare for the public instead of private interests.

That is quoted from another respected authority of hon. members opposite. It answers, to my mind, Mr. Speaker, the final criticism and punctures the toy balloon set up by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Glen) when he attempted to prove a contradiction in the attitude of the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley). May I say that at that stage of the debate it was felt, just as it is felt to-day that hon. members opposite, were pledged to send this bill to the committee? It was felt that opposition would be useless. But when public opinion rose up in arms it was thought that some hon. members opposite might obey their patriotic instincts instead of their political consciences, and the duty has been forced upon us of indicating public opinion as Bourinot says we should. The hon. member for Argenteuil has not changed his stand. Circumstances have changed since that speech was made, and circumstances have been changed by the tremendous revulsion of public feeling against this measure.

Now, Sir, if this is a proper measure, if it is not really a wolf in sheep's clothing, why cannot we have some utterance from those hon. members present who, on other occasions and in similar matters, have declared themselves in no uncertain terms? The Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) not very long ago made an ardent plea in this House for people to keep their hands off the Canadian National railways and leave that public means of transportation alone.

Mr. DUNNING: Hear, hear.

Mr. YOUNG (Toronto): The minister says "hear, hear". No one on this side of the House wants to lay hands on the Canadian National railways. Sir, I ask from that ardent champion of public ownership some suggestion of where he stands—and this project affects his department, the Department of Railways—on the matter of giving away without any pledge in return that is worth the ink it is written in, a million horse-power and four hundred miles on either side for a thousand feet back of the vast lake shore property—if that country becomes popular as a summer resort—or lake shore property if this canal becomes a channel of trade? Where does the minister, as the protector of public ownership, stand on the question of giving away these tremendous resources in power? Where does the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) stand on a question involving a serious conflict between Dominion and provincial rights?

I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to weary the House by dilating on this. Some other hon. members have simply said: Let the courts decide that. That is ridiculous, as I will attempt to demonstrate before I leave that part of my argument. The courts long ago decided that point, and it would be almost contempt of court to send back to the courts for their decision the question as to who owns that land in the beds of the streams and what are the respective rights of the provinces and the Dominion. Long before the passage of the Bed of Navigable Waters Act, it was decided by the courts that beds of navigable rivers cannot be private property; that they are owned by the crown in the right of each of the respective provinces, subject only to the paramount right of the Dominion in matters of navigation, and that is only so that the Dominion may see that there is sufficient water for and no obstruction of navigation. If hon. members want any authority for that, let them refer to the Montreal harbour case, and if they want any further authority, any further admission that the provinces have the sole right to these waters except for navigation purposes, to ownership of the beds of the streams and the power that is contained in those waters, I am going to refer—and I do this with great deference—to the words of the Minister of the Interior. I am quoting from page 2194 of Hansard of the 7th April last, where he said:

I wish again to emphasize the fact that we are in entire agreement with the Ontario government.

That is in connection with the development of the St. Lawrence.

There is no dispute about the ownership of the power or the land to the international boundary. If they want to develop, there would be no holdup, so far as the federal government is concerned. I should like to see the hydro development on the Ottawa river; it seems to me there is a great opportunity for such development there.

Hon. members opposite may not respect the decisions of courts on points of law, but I think they should respect the opinion of one who sits in the treasury benches, the Minister of the Interior, and there is no equivocation about this utterance. It is an admission by the government that the power belongs to the province. The power is the property of the province, and it is no more a feature of or incident of navigation than is the bed of the stream. But in face of this, there are certain sections of the bill under discussion which bring up the question and the principle. Shall we arbitrarily ignore the established rights of provinces, and shall we, knowing these rights, force ourselves and those provinces into a welter of litigation. That should not be the well-considered view of this House.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is my hon. friend through with his argument about my statement? because I should like to refer to it. At least half a dozen hon. members on that side have used it. I wish it to be distinctly understood that I am not taking back a single word of it, but I want to put this idea forward, namely, that the rights of navigation are paramount upon navigable streams.

Mr. YOUNG (Toronto): I fully admit that, and in admitting that, I am not by one iota weakening the argument I made. I am not discussing navigation, and I am not opposing a canal no matter where it may be proposed. I am opposing, as an incident to that canal, the giving away of $100,000,000 of natural resources. I said that certain hon. members opposite made the statement: Leave these rights to the courts. As regards that statement, I would refer hon. members to page 964 of Hansard where the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Thorson), a distinguished legal luminary, said:

We have courts properly constituted and competent to decide questions of this sort. If Canada has no jurisdiction in the matter of granting this charter, then, I submit, Canada can do itself no harm in granting it.

Although we have no jurisdiction, we shall still go ahead and let some poor unfortunate province or person fight us to the court of last resort in order to obtain the rights which are now granted to them. The same comment was made by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. McPherson) and any hon. member who is interested in checking up my statement will find his remarks on page 1013 of Hansard of this year at the bottom of the first column. At page 1135, there is an unfortunate remark in the statement of the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, a remark which gives us the key-note for the whole address, an address for which I was sorry to hear he was severely castigated this morning in the Citizen. He said:

While a great deal of interest is taken by others in the power project, personally I have no interest in it.

An hon. member opposite has no interest in 1,000,000 horsepower. Any hon. member arguing from that viewpoint cannot persuade a single member of this House.

If hon. members can adopt that legal premise—and they do not have to take my authority for it, because the Minister of the Interior has been good enough to confirm it,—I want to refer to three sections of the act containing the charter which, as a matter of principle, we are to-day called upon to renew. By section 8 (c) the company can enter upon and take such lands as are necessary. There are other restrictions. But may I say that this government has no power to give any company the right which can be given only by a provincial authority. True, the Dominion can expropriate; but is it the intention of this government to pass on to a private company, without any assurance of fair play, the right to expropriate lands of the people of Ontario and Quebec along that river? Where the crown expropriates the eternal grace of the crown modifies and softens the crown's prerogative and ensures fair play to the subject. But is there going to be any fair play from such a company as this? Not only is that provision illegal, ultra vires, but it is unfair. May I refer to section 5 of the amending act of 1912 which replaces the former section 17 of the original act? This is 1912, 2 George V, chapter 123, section 5 of which states that the Crown has power to—

(g) Produce, lease and supply, or otherwise dispose of surplus hydraulic, electric and other kinds of power developed in connection with and for the purposes of the works hereby authorized, the rates or prices at or for which such hydraulic and electric power may be disposed of by the company to be fixed or determined by the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada in accordance with the provisions of section 360-A of the Railway Act.

The Minister of the Interior says that they lay no claim to that power, and yet in this section of the act which we are asked to renew, I find this provision. That is, knowing we have no power, as is admitted by the Minister of the Interior and as has been decided by the courts, we are going to authorize a company by a Dominion charter to produce, lease and supply, or otherwise dispose of hydraulic and electric power, the property of the province.

If there is a rank injustice in this bill, Sir, —and this again is a matter of principle—I draw the attention of the House to section 17 which reads:

If any lock, canal, dam, slide. boom, bridge or other work the property of the government of Canada, and whether now in their possession or leased to any corporation or person, is required by the company for the purposes of its undertaking, the company may, with the consent of the governor in council, and upon such terms as may be agreed upon between the company and the government, take such lock, canal, dam, slide, boom, bridge or other work for the purposes of its undertaking.

Is there any more successful way of stopping the governments of Ontario and Quebec or their respective power commissions, as long as this legislation is on the statute book, from doing a tittle of work in the way of development of power? Under this section of the act if the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario builds or acquires a dam or power plant, on the waterway, the day after it can be taken over by the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company at a price to be fixed between the company and the government. Is there any more successful way, Mr. Speaker, of holding up the power commissions of both these provinces for a high price than to perpetuate the handicaps which prevent them from developing the power which the people of these provinces so badly need? I say it is a scandalous piece of legislation. However, the provinces have protested, and protested in no uncertain terms, and I say that to proceed with this legislation is a sheer and callous overriding of provincial rights. Shall we, as a matter of principle, and it is principle we are dealing with, ignore the rights of these provinces? This is not a hard-boiled business proposition between the ministers of the crown of the Dominion and of the provinces. This is a matter of the welfare of people on the farms and in the cities, a matter of whether this company or the people are going to be protected, a matter as to whether the people are going to have their rights or are to look for their power and light and heat to a company which first demands a profit and which has no sanction of public responsibility.

There is another factor in this matter. There is an old principle in law that a company in default is not entitled to even the ordinary relief. A company that has been in such colossal default, such extensive and extended default as this one, is not entitled to even the ordinary relief. But here, Mr. Speaker, we have this extraordinary measure being piloted through the House in such an extraordinary fashion, and I say the people of this country require some explanation of that. They require more than an explanation. The only answer they will accept will be an absolute and an immediate killing, as a matter of principle, of this iniquitous bill.

This bill is not according to equity and good conscience. As was said by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Lennox), a constituency formerly represented by the Prime Minister himself, we should view our responsibility in renewing this charter in the light of present day knowledge; that is, we must take the same responsibility as if we were to-day passing, in the light of our present knowledge, the bill of 1894 and all the subsequent amendments. There was some excuse in 1894 for the granting of this charter. There was some excuse then from the constitutional standpoint. We had not then had these points so well decided. There was an excuse then, also, for the matter of power was then negligible. There was an excuse even as late as 1910, for the Ontario Hydro Electric Commission had developed a tremendous amount of power, and there was a fear at that time that power would develop in advance of all our requirements. But, Sir, there came a period of industrial expansion. There came the war and the colossally high price of coal, and had it not been for the Hydro development, Ontario would have been in a dilemma at that time on account of the shortage of fuel. I say there was an excuse even up until the demand for power become acute to let this matter more or less drift. May I say that on this side of the House protective measures were taken in 1912 and 1913 to see that there should be no renewal of this bill that would prejudicially affect the rights of Ontario and Quebec? I repeat again, that the National Hydro contract to which my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Glen) referred, was a contract approved by both the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, a contract in which this company was dependent on the will of the government as to whether it was renewed or not, and that same principle was embodied in the 1912 and 1913 renewals of this charter, but to-day there is not a rider to protect the public interest. I say that during that period when fuel prices were high and industrial development was abnormal, power was the salvation of the homes and industry of the province of Ontario and, I do not doubt, to a great extent of the province of Quebec.

Reference has been made here to the great work of Sir Adam Beck. I say that any reference of that kind is a reference entirely apart from politics. Sir Adam Beck adopted the priesthood of power and set his life apart to that service, and we have in the province of Ontario to-day a monument to his service which will be everlasting, and we in Ontario of both political parties have been pleased that his position has been taken by a man who is also removed from politics, and who was chosen simply for his fitness for the job, Mr. C. A. Magrath. There was nothing partisan in that appointment, and that shows how much we treat as a public utility and a public necessity the development of power in the province of Ontario. But the development of power in Ontario has been held up to such an extent that we have considered the development of electrical energy by means of coal plants. We have been forced to buy power from across the Ottawa river, and to-day industry in this province is being crippled because we have not the power that is readily producible from the natural resources of the Ottawa river and its tributaries, and the only reason that power is not available, and the only reason our business expansion is held up, is because of this infernal charter.

We are asked, Mr. Speaker, to refer this bill to a committee. We are told that there it will be torn limb from limb. But, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the committee bears the same proportion of representation as exists in this House, and if we cannot dispose of this bill here, if the members of this House are not going to judge on matters of principle, how is the same proportion of parties and factions going to get any result in committee, if they ignore principle, when they get down to detail? Supposing this bill is passed by the committee and comes back to this House; we should then have a repetition of this same thing. If that is the case, it is in the power of this government immediately thereafter to pass an act under clause 10 (c) of section 92 of the British North America Act, declaring this to be a work for the general advantage of Canada. It was mentioned in a case in the Supreme court some time ago that if such a declaration were made by this parliament, even a candy store on Sparks street could be declared a work for the general advantage of Canada. That, of course, is ridiculous on the face of it, and in recent decisions I am glad to say that the Privy Council have decided that such declarations do not create as facts, things which did not previously exist as facts. In the Insurance case and in the Industrial Disputes case it was held that parliament could not declare a thing to be a crime if that thing was not in fact a crime, and I would say that any tribunal would be very careful before they thought of upsetting a decision of the Privy Council, or a decision of this parliament, that such a work was for the general advantage of Canada. If such a declaratory act was passed, Sir, the provinces would be forever debarred from their rights, even their statutory right to the bed of the stream; they would be debarred from their power and from all the rights which they inherited as the owners, in the right of the crown of the crown lands. If the government is giving its tacit support to this measure and if hon. members of other groups are giving their tacit support to it, the country has nothing else to hope than that they will take this stand all through the piece, and I say now is the time for hon. members who obey their patriotic and not their political consciences to take a stand on the principle of disposing holus bolus of our natural resources.

Another point I wish to make, Mr. Speaker, is this: if we are to develop this power and build this canal, why lose to the public the extra cost represented by the profit to be taken by the owners or promoters of the enterprise? Why should we place our people in the hands of these private interests whereas if it is our own enterprise we can and will protect them? I do not suggest that we should even wait until we can afford to build a canal if the construction of this canal is decided to be practicable, and if this route is decided to be the best water route. In that case it would be better for us to borrow the money ourselves and finance the project than to give away such a tremendous asset, an asset which after ten years may be three or four times its present value. I say we should not do that. If necessary we could build it as a public enterprise. On the other hand, if we cannot afford it, and if the only reason for building it is to give certain advantages to the western provinces and to the maritimes, we should be better off if we subsidized them to the extent of the interest on the investment we would save, or the interest on the value of the natural resources which we are giving away. That, however, is only one solution. One of the hon. members speaking on the other side to-night said that an alternative was not feasible, that it was poppycock. I say that if the government decided to build this canal they should call in the engineers and the proper authorities in Ontario and in Quebec; that they decide upon a scheme for the development of power which would be compatible with the construction of a proper and efficient canal, and that the canal should not be built by anyone or the power developed by anyone until that scheme should be worked out to the advantage of this government and of both provinces.

Many doubts have been expressed, Mr. Speaker, as to whether this canal will actually be built. It is a confession of our own weakness if in deciding upon the principle of this bill we send it to the committee, notwithstanding the existence of some doubt as to its ever being built; and judging from the experience of the years during which the charter has been in effect and the manner in which the bill is brought before the House, we have reason to doubt not that the power will be developed but that a canal will be built which will be useful for the commerce of this country. I am convinced that we do not realize what we are giving away, looked upon in the light of ten years from now. When this act was passed Sir, we had no conception that we would have a $100,000,000 asset in this project. In connection with a matter which has already been referred to I want to draw an analogy between this project and the loss to the province of Quebec and this Dominion of the district of Labrador. The hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has stated that he would get the reasons for judgment and that then we may discuss this matter. I hope that in addition to the reasons for judgment the hon. Minister of Justice will get a copy of the argument—although the argument of the case took, I think, about fourteen days. The amount at stake in the Labrador case was $500,000,000. If we had a copy of the argument hon. members could inform themselves as to how this country lost that sum. If my recollection of the report of the judgment is correct, we lost it because of careless legislation in 1825 and careless map-making in 1874. I say we lost the whole of Labrador on account of legislative and administrative neglect, and Mr. Speaker, we are going to lose control of the Ottawa river and all its vast resources on account of the same administrative and legislative neglect if we do not kill this bill. To further complete that picture, may I say as to power that on the Hamilton river in Labrador there is one direct fall of three hundred feet, another chute with a fall developed at one point of two hundred and eighty feet on that river and all its tributaries. We have also lost there, in 110,000 square miles, 60,000 square miles of the best of timber areas, and we lost it, I repeat, because of legislative and administrative neglect. One lesson of that kind should be enough for the province of Quebec and the Dominion of Canada.

There is a suggestion that this scheme is not practical. I do not wish to make statements based on hearsay, but I am going to refer to a statement which appeared in a good Liberal paper. When I said I was only quoting from one newspaper I overlooked this quotation, which is really a quotation from the report of the Department of Public Works. The Toronto Star has always been a good Liberal paper, and is considered, except at election times, to be careful in its utterances. I am quoting from the Star of March 12, and the quotation in the Star, as I say is taken from a report of the Department of Public Works issued in 1908:

> "The descent from the summit level to Montreal is 659 feet, making the total rise and fall to overcome the divide, a total of 758 feet, the distance from Georgian bay to Montreal is 440 miles, and there are 27 locks on the route (650' x 65' x 22') and the estimate of the cost of the canal was 100 million dollars."

With regard to the question whether or not this is a practical proposition, I call the attention of hon. members to the twenty-seven locks, and also to the comments in this article:

> The captain of a steamer would navigate ten miles of the lakes in preference to one mile on a canal or canalized river.

I read further from the same issue of the Toronto Star as follows:

There is clear sailing over 160 miles on lake Ontario, where steamers run at full speed. The lake run leaves only 210 miles of canal and river, or 230 miles less than the 440 miles of the projected canal.

Long boats, especially when deeply laden, are liable "to take a sheer and run aground or collide with an approaching boat." Difficulties of a light steamer in a canal with a beam wind blowing are mentioned. She must run at high speed in a beam wind, otherwise she will drift down on the lee bank. Delays arise in this way while sister ships are making 10 or 12 miles an hour on the lake.

The last paragraph deals with the engineering practicability of the project, which I am not prepared to discuss, but I give it to the House for what it is worth. The article continues:

The height of land separating the great lakes and the water from that flowing to the Ottawa, requires a summit level from which the canal can be fed east and west. This needs twice as much water as end fed canals like the Welland. It was proposed in 1855 and 1857 to raise the level of lake Nipissing by 16 feet. "At present such a scheme is inadmissible," says the report.

This is the report of the department:

The number of settlements, villages and towns, apart from railway interests, which would be affected are vital objections to it This renders the whole problem of water supply a precarious one. A pumping scheme has been devised as a remedy, and this plan was never tried before on a large scale, such as would be required.

Now, with reference to the practicability of the scheme, if possible I wish to reduce to their proper proportions some of the statements made by hon. members opposite in its favour, because information is valuable only according to its reputability or the source from which it emanates. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Thorson) said last week, in the course of his speech in support of this bill which will be found at page 965 of Hansard:

I am told that the Georgian Bay canal route will be shorter than the present all-water route via Lake Erie and the St. Lawrence river by almost 300 miles; I am told that it will be shorter in time by 37 hours, and that it will result in a reduction in freight rates of from three to five cents per bushel.

He should have informed the House that he was taking that statement virtually word for word, from a circular letter which I believe was sent to every hon. member by the secretary of the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company, Mr. George W. Volckman. This gentleman states that the saving in distance between the two routes is 282 miles. It will be observed that the hon. member spoke also of a reduction in time by this proposed route of 37 hours. Compare with this Mr. Volckman's statement on the second page of his letter:

Saving in time of transit via the Georgian bay canal 37 hours.

The hon. gentleman did not tell the House that he was basing his statement on the brief of the very company that is trying to lobby this bill through parliament.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) made a similar mistake and, as I think, also treated this House unfairly. At page 966 of Hansard he stated:

And as freight rates are based to a great extent on the time it takes to carry freight from one point to the other, that fact would naturally make a large saving in the cost of transporting commodities.

Let me set against this a paragraph from page 3 of Mr. Volckman's letter:

It is well known that "time" is the main factor in fixing of rates and that by the same type of vessel the rate will vary directly as the time of transit.

The hon. member with an air of great wisdom quoted this statement holus bolus to the House, but he did not inform us that, as the mouthpiece of this company, he was repeating their whole argument.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Does the hon. gentleman suggest that the statements are untrue?

Mr. YOUNG (Toronto): I suggest that these statements should be viewed with grave suspicion, and that if the House is being fed with material supplied by the company seeking a renewal of this charter it should in fairness to hon. members be so stated.

Mr. McMILLAN: Do you know if those statements are untrue?

Mr. ILSLEY: Are the statements correct? That is what we are interested in.

Mr. YOUNG (Toronto): I say they are incorrect, but I cannot prove it any more than you can disprove it. Now I wish to read a further statement made by the hon. member for Moose Jaw in the course of his speech last Monday. It will be found at page 967 of Hansard. He said:

We hear our hon. friends opposite every once in a while saying that we are being bled white because our wheat goes through Buffalo. Now if it cost from two to three cents less to carry that grain through the Georgian bay canal than it would via Buffalo, what would happen?

I find—if this is necessary to clinch my point—that the hon. member is again repeating what is contained on the first page of Mr. Volckman's letter, but without telling us the source of his argument. This is what the secretary of the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company wrote:

The Georgian bay canal will immediately short-circuit the Buffalo to the seaboard traffic,—

Hon. members can read the remainder of that paragraph for themselves, as no doubt they all have a copy of this circular letter. When we consider that this bill is being sponsored, not by a single member of the treasury bench, but by certain hon. gentlemen who have made only such broad and general statements as those I have quoted, I say it is incumbent on us all to carefully weigh the sound arguments advanced and the facts submitted in support of those arguments by those who are opposed to this bill before we send it on to the railway committee.

I want to call your attention, Mr. Speaker, and that of the House generally to the final joker in this bill. I have said that it is illegal, that it is inequitable, that it is unconscionable, that in a word, it is bad business, whatever it may have been in its original form. I ask hon. members to refer to the concluding paragraph of the last section of the bill:

—if the said canals are not completed and put in operation within the said periods respectively, the powers granted to the company by parliament shall cease and be null and void as respects so much of the said canals and works as then remains uncompleted.

What does that mean? It means that we are being asked to give this company the right to build a power project as part of a chimerical canal scheme, and when it suits their purpose they can say, "Well, you can cancel the contract, but we have the right to retain the works completed." That is what we are asked to decide on to-night as a matter of principle. Will any hon. member opposite say it is fair to send the bill to the railway committee and thus express our adoption of that principle? I say, No, Sir!

There is one other element to be considered. Already we have suffered enough from the loss of our natural resources to our neighbours to the south. As good business men we want to deal with them but in the way most advantageous to ourselves. I submit, Sir, that the passing of this bill simply means that another of our great heritages will be delivered into the lap of the United States. Yet we are sitting in front of our tents with folded hands and allowing our neighbours to walk off with our most treasured resources! This is not a partisan issue, and must not be considered as such by the House. Therefore I appeal to every hon. member and to the government not to transgress provincial rights by adopting the principle of this bill, but to deal with it in this light, of what people will think of our decision twenty years hence. We are not dealing with the people primarily affected as citizens of the provinces, we are dealing with them as citizens of Canada. And we are not dealing with the details of the bill, we are dealing with the rights of the citizens of this Dominion, and it is for this House to decide now as a matter of principle whether we are going to preserve this great asset for the people of Canada or whether we are going to hand it over to a specially privileged corporation.

[Mr. N. M. Young.]

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): Because of the connection of any matter of canalization with the department over which I have the honour to preside, and especially because numerous references have been made from both sides of the House to leases, past or present, which have a bearing upon the subject matter of this debate, I deem it necessary to give to the House, if possible, some accurate information respecting the history of what I might call "The bone of contention", because beyond any question that bone of contention is the Carillon power. There is not a member of the House who is not aware of that fact, nor is there a member who does not know also that the contention for the bone is, at the present time, not between any public ownership bodies, but between two great private interests.

A great deal of misinformation has been placed before the House during this debate, largely, I presume, because the usual method of dealing with a private bill has not been followed. Many of the statements made in the House, if made before the select committee on railways and canals, could have been dealt with and the facts ascertained, if necessary, from witnesses under oath. Instead, however, we are reduced to a debate on the second reading of a private bill, and because of that departure a great deal of inaccurate information is being put on Hansard and sent out through the press to the country.

What is the present position of Carillon? The present position is that a dam and locks exist there, erected by the Department of Railways and Canals, in connection with the navigation of the Ottawa river. As a result of the erection of the present dam by the then government, a head of water was produced, which of course is a source of power. Back in 1913, as was stated by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Glen) this afternoon, a lease of the power was granted by the government of that day to private interests. And the government of 1913, as every hon. member knows, was a Conservative government. The lease was the usual departmental lease, and I am not criticizing the action of that government in granting it, because all through the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, where the Department of Railways and Canals throughout the years has constructed canals, it has been the departmental practice to lease the water-power secured by the creation of every such head of water to anyone who might offer to lease it when it was available. Indeed, I brought down to the House this session and laid on the table, at the request of the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary), a return showing all the leases presently existant, the rates charged for them, and so forth. Ever since water-power in any form has been used in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, from the earliest days after confederation, it has been the practice of the Department of Railways and Canals to lease to private parties or to public utility organizations the water-powers so obtained. Along the canals constructed by the department water-powers created by the Dominion in the process of construction have been so disposed of, and this original lease, of 250 horse-power only, was granted in 1913 to the National Hydro Company. We come next to the year 1921, and to the very significant date in that year of November 30. The report of the minister is dated November 30, and great expedition was displayed by council in convening. They met the next day, December 1, and passed an order in council which constituted the first governmental departure on the Ottawa river and canals from the principle of leasing powers created by the Department of Railways and Canals and the adoption of the principle of giving to private enterprise the right to future development of power at these points.

Mr. YOUNG (Toronto): Was not that departure consented to by both provinces of Ontario and Quebec?

Mr. DUNNING: I have no record of such consent from either province in 1921 respecting this lease.

Mr. YOUNG (Toronto): That, I am informed, is the case.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will allow this bill to go to the committee it will be possible to bring down all the records of the department. There are a number of significant dates in connection with this matter. For example, I am reminded that December 1, 1921, was just a few days before the election of that year, which I believe was held on December 6. The people of Canada were just then deciding upon a government to carry on the affairs of the country, and upon the eve of the return of a new parliament, this great departure was taken, by these ardent advocates of government ownership, in giving for the first time this considerable concession at Carillon. May I observe that it is estimated that 300,000 horse-power can be developed at Carillon. Figures have been given to the House by various speakers indicating that the whole course of the Ottawa river is capable of producing 1,000,000 horse-power. That, I believe, is the estimate quoted by my hon. friend who last spoke as well as by others. Now, a considerable quantity of that horse-power has already been developed at Chaudiere, while there has been developed 250 horse-power at Carillon. There has been no development at Chats falls. But hon. gentlemen who talk so freely to-day about the great principle of preserving these powers for the use of the public were the very ones who in 1921 were willing to give away, and did actually give away, until the year 2006, 300,000 horse-power of this potential 1,000,000 which is being discussed at the present time. There have been various renewals in between, consequent upon the situation created as a result of the original lease, and we come next to August 26, 1926. Again, there was an election on; there was an election on the fourteenth day of September of that year. And what was done on that occasion?

Mr. KAISER: What do you wish to insinuate? ?

Mr. DUNNING: I am merely making statements of fact; that is all. On August 26, 1926,—and I call attention especially to this fact inasmuch as the mover of the amendment was a member of the government that passed it—an order in council was issued with respect to this matter. We on this side are being accused by inference, in every address delivered opposite, of favouring the giving away of Canada's natural resources to private interests. We are being asked by every speaker what our attitude is as a government. "Insinuation" does someone say? Why every speech made by hon. members opposite has been filled with the insinuation that the members of this government have no concern about the public rights of the people of Canada. An amendment has been moved and what is the wording of it??

The character and object of this bill involve matters of grave national and provincial importance, and are such as to constitute it a measure of public policy which ought not to be dealt with by any private bill.

Hon. gentlemen opposite do not applaud the reading of the amendment. I can well imagine the situation in which they find themselves. This at least is a bill before this parliament. The action taken by hon. gentlemen opposite in August, 1926, and I will describe it in detail in a few moments, was the disposition to a private corporation of no less than 300,000 horse-power of the total developed along the Ottawa river without coming to this parliament or giving this parliament a chance to express its opinion. The lease which I mention—which was executed in 1921 and which established the principle to which I have been referring—had not yet expired. That lease did not expire until the first day of December, 1926. Hon. gentlemen opposite if they had been so concerned with the public weal might at least have awaited the election of a new parliament and allowed the people's representatives so elected to have discussed the lease which did not expire until the first day of December, 1926. But no. Action was taken. On the 26th day of August the lease was extended and a supplement to it was created. I have had that supplement examined and analysed, and this is what it did: It renewed the old lease and added some provisions to it. It reduced the aggregate rental payable to this Dominion under the terms of the former lease by no less than $600,000. That is one thing which it did.

Mr. ROBB: What did the Minister of Finance do?

Mr. BENNETT: Was not the hydro-electric of Ontario a party to that transaction? That was the reason for the change in rental.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DUNNING: I am glad the former Minister of Finance has asked that question. The hydro of Ontario was not a party to that agreement, is not mentioned in that order in council, and there is absolutely no documentary evidence in the Department of Railways that the hydro of Ontario had anything whatsoever to do with it. That is not the only change. Six hundred thousand dollars less revenue to the Dominion over the term of the supplemented lease as compared with the rental receivable under the former lease! That was accomplished by a device which I shall be very glad to go into in detail and bring documentary evidence to prove before the committee, which was the way I expected to be able to deal with what I am now discussing as being the proper way to do it. There was another provision my hon. friend says and that the hydro of Ontario was a party to it.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. BENNETT: And made its own terms.

Mr. DUNNING: I should like my hon. friend to produce the evidence of it, because it is very strange that not a vestige of anything of that sort is on the departmental file.

Mr. BENNETT: What did you do with it?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: What did you do with it?

An hon. MEMBER: Take it back.

Mr. DUNNING: Moreover my hon. friend's insinuation compels me now to go further and to say this—that the order in council of August, 1926, was never communicated to the Department of Railways and Canals until this government came into office. The officers—

Mr. BENNETT: A misstatement has been made. The Acting Minister of Railways made a recommendation. Why not be fair about it?

Mr. DUNNING: Of course the Acting Minister of Railways made a recommendation.

Mr. BENNETT: Yet you did not know anything about it.

Mr. DUNNING: No, I say this: the permanent officials of the Department of Railways and Canals were never advised of the contents of this order in council until after this government came into office.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what the hon. gentleman said.

Mr. DUNNING: That is what I said.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what he said.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is what he said.

Mr. BENNETT: What he said was that the Department of Railways had no knowledge of it. I did not contradict that statement. Now he says the permanent officials did not know of it, which is an altogether different thing.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is really trying to divert me from my argument.

Mr. BENNETT: Not a bit.

Mr. DUNNING: He knows perfectly well that no order in council can pass without the recommendation of a minister of the crown behind it, or at least the recommendation of an acting minister.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. DUNNING: And when I refer to the Department of Railways itself does any member of this House misunderstand what I mean?

Some hon. MEMBERS: None.

Mr. DUNNING: I meant that the acting minister of that day kept the contents of this order in council, and his recommendation in connection therewith, secret from the officers of his own department until after the election was over.

Mr. BENNETT: Sir Henry Drayton is not here to answer to that accusation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: I say that Sir Henry Drayton is not here and cannot reply.

Mr. DUNNING: This constitutes merely one additional reason why we should have a committee and why we should get the facts because they are obtainable. I would call not only the officials of the Department of Railways and Canals but also the Clerk of the Privy Council before such a committee and hear what they have to say in connection with this matter, and I would like to ask my hon. friend—

Mr. BENNETT: What has that got to do with the Georgian bay canal?

Mr. DUNNING: It has a very great deal to do with the amendment now before the House.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes.

Mr. DUNNING: It has a very great deal to do with the amendment now before the House. I think, Mr. Speaker, I have permitted interruptions fairly generously. I know what my hon. friend's motive is of course. It is quite plain and he is very dexterous in the accomplishment of it. He knows I am speaking without a prepared brief before me but just the documents bearing on the case, and it is very easy to divert me from the course I have set for myself.

Mr. BENNETT: I shall not interrupt my hon. friend.

Mr. DUNNING: To come back to the thread of my story: What then was the other changed feature in this order in council, in this new lease? I will read it. Just a few days before the election:

> The minister further recommends that should the company secure the coöperation of either or both the governments of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec in the power phase of the improvement project, and on a basis satisfactory to Your Excellency in Council, one-third of the total rentals shall become payable to each of such coöperating governments, as a credit upon any rentals such provincial governments may exact.

What, pray, does that mean? It means that if this private corporation should by operation of law or otherwise be shown to have to pay a rental to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec this Dominion government would very kindly pay that rental for them so that the terms of the lease and their own profits would not be interfered with thereby. I may say that the lease itself which I have somewhere among my documents carried that idea out in a very peculiar form and illustrates one of the reasons why the present government undertook to cancel the order in council and cancel the lease covered by it. I will come to the action of the present government and the reasons for it in a little while.

In reference again to this question of coöperation with the provincial governments, this is the actual lease agreement in that regard, and after all the lease agreement is what counts:

> And whereas the company has consented to secure forthwith the coöperation of the governments of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario—

The company graciously consented to secure forthwith.

> —on a basis satisfactory to the Governor General in Council in carrying out the development and distribution of the power under applicable provincial laws in order that a dependable source of hydro electric energy may be made available, and it is desirable that the arrangement for payment of the rentals reserved in lease No. 24414 be readjusted to permit the company to be credited with any rentals payable under provincial laws up to but not exceeding in each case, one-third of the total rentals so reserved.

And so on. That is the only item in the lease in question which has any bearing whatsoever upon any possibility of arrangement as between this private interest, called the National hydro and the governments of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. I would ask any lawyer in the House to examine that.

Mr. BENNETT: I take it that the hon. member will lay it on the table.

Mr. DUNNING: The document has been on the table for weeks. It was placed there in order that information might be obtained by hon. members as to the nature of the document. If that means anything to my hon. friends who sit on the front benches opposite and who are both lawyers, I will say as a layman that this particular section compels that private corporation to do nothing. It means merely that if they do make some arrangement with the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, then the Dominion government will consent to forego two-thirds of the rentals properly coming to it, in order that the private corporation shall not have to pay the rentals out of its own pocket. It is a guarantee that the profits which the private corporation might expect to receive as a result of this lease, should not be impaired by reason of any litigation which would compel it to pay anything to the provincial government. The Dominion government was made to guarantee to the extent of two-thirds of its own properly receivable rentals in order that the company in question should not have to pay rentals to the provincial governments. That is the interpretation which I put upon it.

Mr. BENNETT: The word is "exact"—what the provinces shall exact.

Mr. GUTHRIE: As of right.

Mr. DUNNING: In other words if the provinces prove that they have the right to collect any rentals from this great, private corporation, the lease says that the private corporation shall not be called upon to pay them. That is exactly what it says. There is no question that is exactly what it means.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That would be because the Dominion had no legal right to collect.

Mr. BENNETT: Any child knows that.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Subject to arrangement with the provinces.

Mr. DUNNING: Very well, but that is not the language of the agreement. Perhaps my hon. friends might go further and tell me whether it was in the interest of the provinces to reduce the aggregate rentals due to the Dominion under the terms of this lease to $600,000 below what the Dominion would have received under the former lease. I am willing to sit down and let them tell me how that would have benefited the provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: The provinces are the judges of that. The Hydro Electric made its own bargain.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend cannot have given this matter any thought.

Mr. BENNETT: We shall see presently. He knows more about it than my hon. friend does.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. DUNNING: Apart altogether from the feature which I have been discussing of rentals which are due or which might prove to be due to the provinces, the general terms of the rentals were reduced by an aggregate of $600,000 over the period of the lease.

Mr. BENNETT: Because they had to be.

Mr. DUNNING: Because they had to be, my hon. friend says. It is astonishing that the government of to-day has not in its possession the information and the tentative agreement which my hon. friends opposite are referring to every few moments. We have not got them. What did we do? We looked the matter over and decided that it was a fairly big thing for a government to undertake such an agreement on the eve of an election. I presume it was in the interest of public ownership, on the eve of an election to dispose of 300,000 out of 1,000,000 horse-power on the Ottawa river until the year 2006 to a private corporation, and to keep the matter secret, not to tell the public of Canada about it during the election. Perhaps my hon. friend would like to get up and say why it was kept secret from the people of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: Why does my hon. friend say that this bargain was made for 2006 when it was made in 1921? The bargain of 1926 was a ratification and extension of it, and a reduction of the rental was brought about because the Ontario Hydro insisted on getting power at a certain price.

Mr. DUNNING: Does my hon. friend mean that it was necessary in the interest of the provinces not to let the people of Canada know anything about it? My hon. friend has advised me that he is going to follow me, and he is at liberty to do so. I would much prefer, instead of listening to what I know will be a clever speech from my hon. friend, to get this whole question of the Ottawa river navigation and power before a special committee of this House so that we may examine witnesses and secure the facts instead of making speeches one against the other.

Mr. BENNETT: Send for Senator McDougald.

Mr. DUNNING: The government reviewed the matter and decided that parliament should have an opportunity to speak with regard to the whole situation. I would ask my hon. friends in that corner who, I know, have been deluded by the professions of hon. gentlemen opposite, to give us at least this credit, that had it not been for action by this government, this parliament would have had no opportunity of passing upon the disposal of 300,000 of the horse-power dealt with.

Mr. BENNETT: They have not now. This is a Georgian bay canal bill. What a bluff?

Mr. DUNNING: What did we do? We cancelled the contract and cancelled the order in council, but we renewed the 1921 lease which was still in existence until May 1, 1927, the date upon which the Georgian bay charter will expire. Why did we do that? With the deliberate objective of putting this whole matter before parliament, this matter which hon. gentlemen opposite had done secretly ostensibly in the interest of the provinces, as they say. The people of the Dominion were not to know about it. No, this is not a conflict between private and public interests.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): May I ask my hon. friend a question?

Mr. DUNNING: I am glad of the evidence that I am embarrassing my hon. friends. They always want to interrupt when that is the case.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Do I understand my hon. friend does not wish me to ask questions?

Mr. DUNNING: No. Ask a dozen.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I understood my hon. friend to say that this action was taken with the deliberate intention of bringing this matter before the House.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Was it at the instance of the government that the hon. member for Ottawa introduced this bill?

Mr. DUNNING: Not at all.

Mr. BENNETT: What does it mean?

Mr. DUNNING: This matter would have been brought before the House in any case, and my hon. friend well knows that.

Mr. BENNETT: Deliberate intention of the government!

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, the deliberate intention of the government.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Acting through a private member.

Mr. BENNETT: For Sifton.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, Mr. Speaker, we certainly were not acting for the National Hydro or any other private interest in what we did in regard to this matter. It is before parliament, and we knew it was inevitable it should be before parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: You said deliberate intention.

Mr. DUNNING: I will not be discourteous to my hon. friend when he is speaking. I say again, and the Prime Minister will confirm it, that it was the deliberate intention of the government to place this whole matter before parliament. Notice was, of course, given of application for renewal of what is known as the Georgian bay canal charter, and we then knew that the opportunity would in the ordinary course of events come in connection with the bill in committee. The newspapers of the country in discussing the matter made it perfectly plain that there would be a conflict on it, and where in the nature of things did we expect the conflict to come? In the place where hon. gentlemen opposite are afraid to have it, the place where witnesses can be called, the place where the facts can be ascertained, and the place, too, where action in no sense deprives this House of its opportunity to deal with the measure in any way it may deem fit.

Mr. ADSHEAD: May I ask a question? The hon. leader of the opposition made this statement, which I wish the Minister of Railways would dwell upon. He said that if the House allowed a private bill to have its second reading, that committed the House to approval of the principle of the bill.

Mr. DUNNING: That is what the hon. leader of the opposition said, but he knows perfectly well that if the committee reports favourably upon the bill, or if it brings in an amended bill, this House can deal with the committee's report and accept or reject it as it sees fit. He also knows perfectly well that this House can reject the bill on its third reading.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think the hon. minister—

Mr. DUNNING: May I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to continue? I sat and listened to my hon. friend posing as the great champion of public ownership, and never interrupted him at all although I knew perfectly well that he was a member of the government that passed this iniquitous order in council last August. Can he not possess his soul in patience and let me tell my hon. friend who has put the question what opportunities this House will have to kill this bill, if it so desires, after it comes back from the committee, if it does.

In the first place, the bill may be killed in the committee itself. Why, when we pass divorce bills here on the second reading, does any hon. member suppose that many members of this House are agreeing to the principle of divorce? Not at all; they would not do it on any account. They pass the second reading, not because they are in agreement with the principle of divorce, but in order to permit the merits of that particular case to be examined in accordance with the laws of this country. In connection with this particular bill, the committee may kill the bill. It may refuse to report; and if it reports, the House can either accept or reject its report; and on the third reading again, it can reject the bill. Still another opportunity remains to reject the bill on the motion that it do now pass.

If I might be permitted to explain why that argument was advanced by the opposition, it was not in the interests of public ownership at all, or in the interests of the rights of the provinces, but in order to prevent a thorough threshing out of everything connected with this project before a committee of the House where witnesses can be called. I am not speaking in support of the bill. I speak as a member representing a constituency, free to do as I wish in connection with this matter. There may be those on this side of the House who will disagree with me, and they have a perfect right to do so, but I do say with the knowledge I have as the minister of one department intimately concerned with this matter, that because of the very reasons advanced by hon. gentlemen in the far corner of the chamber particularly, we should examine this whole matter. We can still deal in this House with the bill afterwards. There is nothing to prevent it. All the technical objections of my legal friends opposite do not change the fact that this House can deal with the bill either yes or no, after it comes back from the committee. I am very sorry, indeed, myself, to have to make statements on the second reading of the bill, because I have been complaining of the inaccuracy of certain statements made by others. I would much prefer to have my statements examined in a committee of the House where witnesses could be called and the facts ascertained, and if my hon. friends are so positive that I am entirely wrong, why do they not allow this bill to go to the committee where they will have a chance to prove me in the wrong? They have that opportunity, but they refuse to embrace it.

Mr. BENNETT: They have nothing to do with this bill.

Mr. DUNNING: Nothing to do with this bill? Why, Mr. Speaker, I will take a chance even of saying this, that had we not undone the arrangement made with the National Hydro—not with the public Hydro of Ontario; let that be understood—there is not a word in the lease which makes it conditional upon an arrangement with the Hydro of Ontario, not a word, and if we had not cancelled that lease, in all human probability this House would not be discussing this matter at all. It would in all probability have been dealt with as it was on the previous fourteen occasions on which it was before this House.

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition, for whom I have a very great respect—I hope nothing I have said to-night will be taken by him in any personal sense; it was not so intended—says:

> The character and object of this bill involve matters of grave national and provincial importance, and are such as to constitute it a measure of public policy which ought not to be dealt with by any private bill.

May I ask him if those conditions did not obtain in 1924, when the charter was last renewed, if they obtain to-day? Did they not exist in 1921, if they obtain to-day? The hon. gentleman who last spoke (Mr. Young) referred to the shortage of power in Ontario during the last number of years, and spoke of schemes for stand-by plants, and all that sort of thing. Those same conditions existed when this charter was renewed on the last four or five occasions, but apparently they never assumed the position in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite of being of grave national and provincial importance until this particular occasion, and I submit that they only become of grave national and provincial importance on this occasion because this government had the courage to cancel a lease which was given while an election was in progress to the greatest private interest in Canada. That is why it assumed a position of national importance in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite. I yield to no man in this House in my desire to see—

Mr. KENNEDY: I understand that the minister is arguing that this is a struggle between two groups of private capitalists, and that the cancellation of the order in council of 1926 eliminated one group.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. KENNEDY: Will the defeat of this bill eliminate the chances of the other group?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is wrong in understanding that the other group was eliminated, and the best evidence that it was not is in the House on this occasion. I hold no brief for either, but I am desirous that this House should have the opportunity of getting all the facts in relation to the Ottawa river. I recognize this, speaking as a minister that there must ultimately be developed some arrangement which is satisfactory not only to the Dominion on the one hand, but to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec on the other; there is no question about that. But I do not agree that the Dominion in making such an arrangement requires to surrender any rights which properly and constitutionally belong to the Dominion.

I propose as a member of this House to vote, not for this bill, because this vote is not a vote for or against the bill, in my view; it is a vote either to send the bill to the committee for examination or not to send it to the committee. I am not afraid, Mr. Speaker, to have all the facts come out before the committee on railways and canals, and for that reason I propose to vote for a course which will ensure that all the facts will be placed before that committee.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I think the House owes a debt of gratitude to the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Dunning) for having cleared away a great deal of the camouflage which has surrounded this bill. I listened intently to his speech and I heard not one word from the Minister of Railways with regard to the navigation project which the bill is supposed to include. The minister admitted, with a great deal of frankness, which I think was very admirable, that the real question is that of the Carillon power, not that of the navigation of the Ottawa river or the building of the Georgian Bay canal. That is what the bill purports to deal with. The minister himself has stated that that was not the question before the House, but rather the question of the Carillon power. He said the real struggle was between two great private groups, but he did not intimate who those groups were. He took it for granted, I think, that all of the members of this House who have been lobbied for the last two or three weeks have some idea at least as to who these groups are.

Mr. McMILLAN: Does the hon. member mean to convey the idea that all hon. members of this House have been lobbied on this question?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I did not suggest that they had.

Mr. McMILLAN: Yes, the hon. member did.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I know some of us have been.

An hon. MEMBER: Some do not require it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As one who has been lobbied from both sides, and as one who has tried to read some of the elaborate memoranda which have been submitted and which we have heard repeated in this House, I would say that I have come to the conclusion, after studying the matter, that we are facing to-day a much bigger question than we had imagined when the bill was introduced a few weeks ago.

The minister says that this is not a struggle between public and private interests. I say that it is most unfortunate that it is not. Some of us would like to make it such a struggle. It may be that some of us have been deluded, as the minister suggests. It is well known that we are in favour of public ownership. I think the minister does us the credit for believing that we are in favour of public ownership.

Mr. DUNNING: I said so.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes. I do not know that I need to elaborate the statement I have made. I read two of the clauses of the election manifesto of our Labour group on which I was elected to this House. We advocate:

1. First, regaining for the use of the people of this country the natural resources which have been so recklessly alienated by incompetent or venal administration.

Second, public ownership and democratic operation of public utilities; and as soon as possible of essential large scale industry.

I believe that a very large number of farmer members across the country have been elected to advocate public ownership. I noticed recently in one of the papers that the platform of the United Farmers in Manitoba includes:

Public ownership and control of those public utilities which come within the jurisdiction of the province, and operation of such under commissions responsible to the legislature.

They further advocate:

The retention of all water-power sites, that the hydro electric system may be gradually extended for the benefit of the rural as well as urban residents with the least possible discrimination in rates.

We in this corner stand firmly on the principle of public ownership. I think it is most fortunate that we are told that we cannot make this matter a struggle between public ownership and private ownership, but rather that it must be made a struggle between one set of private interests and another set of private interests. If we can only speak loudly enough in this chamber, it seems to me we may yet bring before the attention of the country at large the underlying struggle that faces us. I do not propose to discuss the matter, but it may be quite true that the Conservatives have been guilty of all that they are accused of by the Minister of Railways, of iniquitous orders in council, and so on, but for the life of me I cannot see how that alters the principle we are dealing with to-day.

The minister pleaded that the bill should go to committee. As I understand the amendment, it would preclude the bill from going to the committee. That is a matter of policy, as to which course we should adopt. As far as I can judge from my experience in this House, the reason for the second reading is largely that we may determine the underlying principle, and we who are firmly convinced that there should be public ownership, it seems to me, have but one course open, and that is to insist upon that principle being established, even at this early stage of the proceedings. I am not very much concerned with what might happen in committee. It may be quite true that it would give the Liberals the opportunity of raking over some of the ill-doing of the Conservatives. I do not know whether that would benefit the country a great deal. It might be that there would be certain modifications introduced into this bill. I should hope so, but the outstanding fact is that we are asked by this bill to grant a charter which was given primarily for navigation purposes, and which the minister says is now not for navigation purposes but to secure power rights which were not considered when the charter was first secured.

It seems to me that a few points that have gradually emerged in the course of the debate are worthy of special mention. While nominally this is a navigation scheme, its claims as such have not been fully established and to-day we are told it is not in reality a navigation scheme. I want to refer to that navigation scheme for a moment or two. In the last thirty years things have radically changed. I have not been one of those who thought the Hudson bay outlet was going to offer a solution of the grain route for western Canada, but the western members have urged the Hudson bay as the route for the western grain. If so, and that route is to be proceeded with, it materially alters the situation with regard to the advisability of establishing still another waterway—the old Georgian bay canal route. Furthermore, we are told that the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterway will be undertaken shortly. With the great American nation anxious to coöperate in that work there is a much better prospect of its being carried out. If so, this too will alter the condition of affairs. Whatever fancy pictures may be painted by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Glen), following the lines of the memorandum submitted to us by some of the lobbyists for this bill, I do not think we can imagine every little port along the Ottawa as a sea port. The bill itself provides for the charging of canal tolls, and certainly it is difficult to conceive of such a route being able to compete successfully with routes that are free of tolls.

The fact remains that for over thirty years this project has failed to attract sufficient capital to push it through. Now we are told expressly by the promoters that they are going to rely upon the development of the water-powers at this end of the route to build the stretches that lie further to the west and north. Some time ago I asked what guarantee we had of the completion of this route. There is none whatever apparent in the bill. As far as we can see the only proviso along this line at all is that the government may take over the uncompleted part of the project. That is, after the remunerative part has been secured and developed, and money made out of it, if the navigation scheme does not go through the government may take over the uncompleted canal work.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the introduction of this bill is an anachronism. With regard to these great public enterprises we are passing more and more into the sphere of Dominion or provincial ownership and to give an important franchise of this character to a company ostensibly organized for navigation purposes, but now confessedly seeking a renewal of its charter because of the water-power privileges involved, would seem to me absolutely going back on the principles of public morality which are coming to be more fully recognized to-day.

The strongest argument advanced in favour of this bill is that it would check-mate the Holt interests. Well, personally, I should be very glad to check-mate those interests, but I do not see the advantage of setting up another set of interests that may prove equally dangerous to this country. Nor, on the other hand, do I see any ultimate guarantee of safety by having two rival groups of interests at work. In the natural course of events this would probably mean that ultimately they would combine, as has so frequently happened in the past, and then we would be worse off than ever. We are forced to the conclusion that this is a fight for supremacy between two sets of powerful interests, and that under these circumstances the welfare of the public at large is in grave danger.

The other day I noticed the Electrical World, one of the most reliable of American magazines in this field, estimated in its issue of January 2, 1926, that the grand total of electrical consumption in the United States during 1925 was 47,997,000,000 kilowatt hours, for which was paid $1,389,000,000, or an average of 2.9 cents per kilowatt hour. Commenting on this an American writer points to Ontario as the bright spot on this continent in respect to cheap light, heat and power and states:

> The grand total of Ontario sales was 1,157,000,000 kilowatt hours for which the people paid $19,137,000, or an average of 1.65 per kilowatt hour.
> If we Americans had paid Ontario rates we would have saved ourselves in 1925 $600,000,000.

He makes that statement concrete by pointing out that in 1925 in the United States electric current for domestic use cost 7.5 cents per kilowatt hours, while in Ontario it cost only 1.85 cents per kilowatt hour. That is, the Americans paid four times what we were paying in Ontario. Naturally this writer urges public ownership as the remedy for conditions in the United States. And should we at this time go back on the principle of public ownership in the interest of one particular private group, even although it may be used to check-mate another private group—at least, for the time being?

We have had two outstanding examples of the success of public ownership in Canada—the Ontario provincial hydro electric commission and the municipal enterprise in my own city of Winnipeg. These two enterprises point the way to still greater successes in the domain of public ownership. The trouble is that we as a whole are not yet committed to the public ownership and operation of such enterprises. I frankly admit that probably the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Dunning) is right when he says that at the present stage this is not a struggle between public and private ownership. But until we settle this matter of the public ownership of the great natural resources of this country undoubtedly it would be better for us to go slowly and not commit ourselves, as the Minister of Railways says has been done, until the year 2006. We may readily do that in connection with a bill such as this now under discussion.

In passing, let me call attention to a suggestion made the other night by the member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan). He urged that Canada should buy that portion of Labrador which under the recent judgment of the Privy Council is to pass to Newfoundland. Why? In order that we may retain in Canada the important water powers in that territory. But I would ask the House, supposing we should do that at a cost of millions and millions of dollars, what would we do to-morrow with our purchase? We would turn those powers over to private interests. Now, I would like for a little while to ask the House to consider the larger issues at stake. I think it is pretty generally recognized that we have three or four large companies, or groups of companies, that are trying to secure a monopoly of the water powers of Canada, those groups being the International Paper Company, the Spanish-Abitibi, the Holt group, and lately the Sifton group. About a year ago we had the International Paper Company reaching a long arm into Canada and establishing connections up the Gatineau. The House may remember that at least some of us were strongly opposed to the entrenchment of this great American corporation in this country. It will also be remembered that we viewed with considerable apprehension even the buying of power by the Hydro Electric Commission of Ontario from that company. I do not very often quote the Toronto Telegram, but sometimes we can learn even from papers with which we do not always agree. I think the case was well put by the Telegram in these words:

> The weakness and seriousness of buying power from private companies is two-fold. Rates which the people must pay cover interest and sinking fund charges on the capital investment. The people thus create a debt-free property for a private company instead of for themselves. At the end of the contract period the private company owns the development, paid for by the users of power and light: the consumers, who have paid for the property, however have no right or title in it.

I heard one of the advocates of the present bill say the other day, using the very words, I think, of the prospectus of the company, that this scheme will not cost the people of Canada a cent. That, I say, is an utterly fallacious way of putting it. If the Georgian bay canal were ever built, it would be built entirely by the people by means of higher power rates. That is the very scheme the company themselves propose. The Telegram goes on:

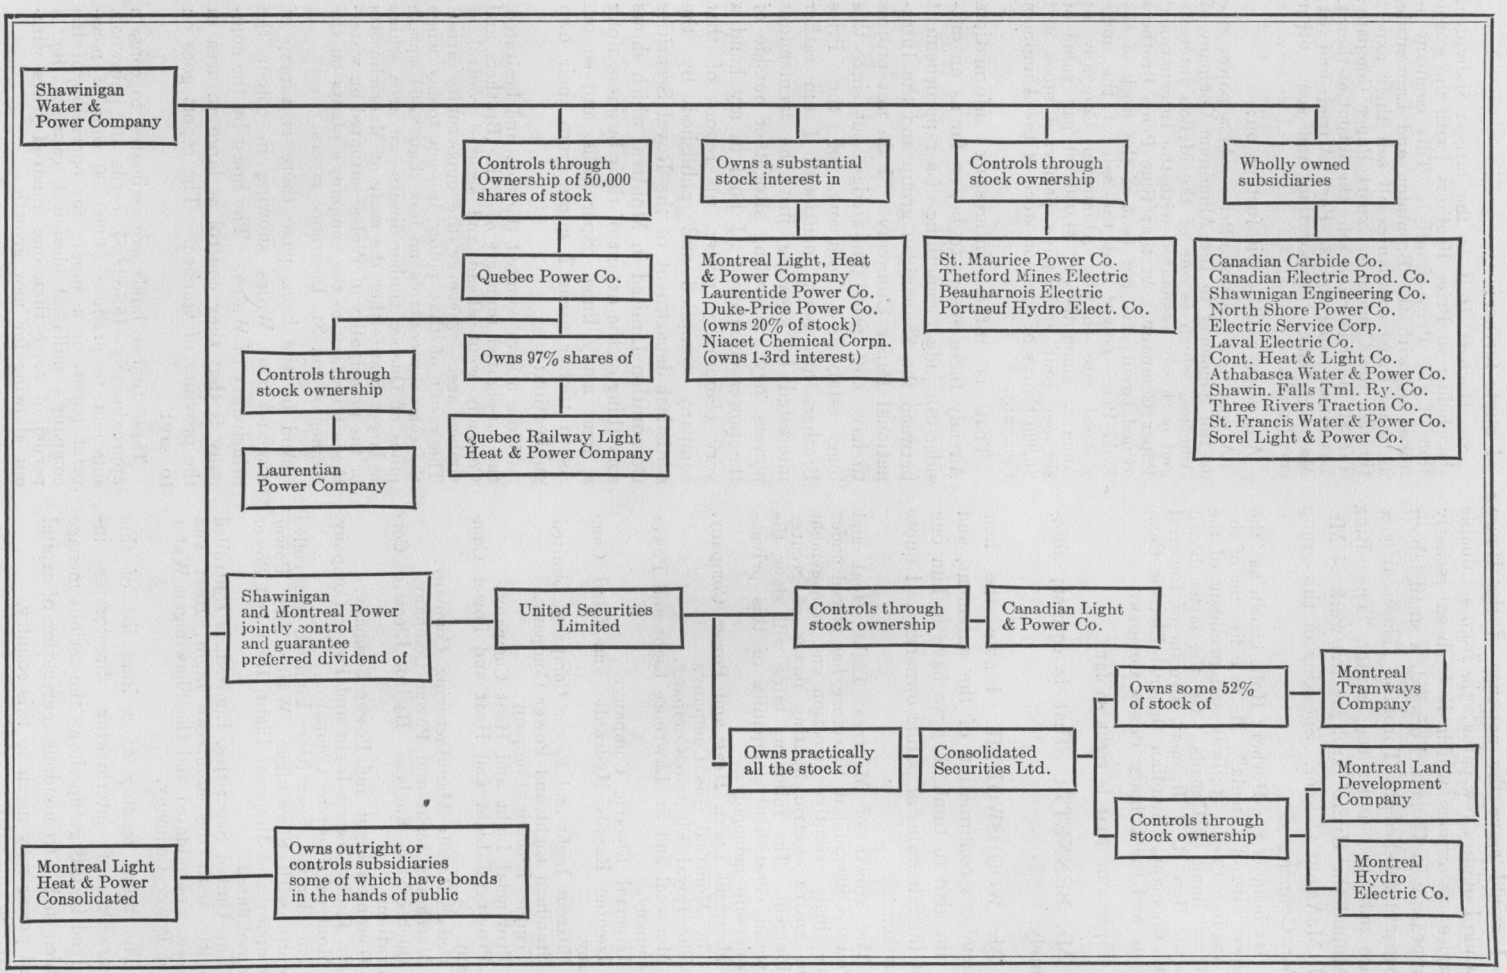
The Gatineau contract will enable the corporation developing this power to create a $45,000,000 debt-free property for private owners out of the revenue secured from the sale of power to the public ownership hydro system in Ontario. This huge sum will be taken out of the pockets of the Ontario public to create a privately owned instead of publicly owned plant. Not only will the company own the plant at the end of the contract period, but they will also be in a position to dictate terms as to a further supply of power. The hydro will be in a position where they will have to pay whatever price is asked, or seek elsewhere for power.

Let me discuss for a moment this International Paper Company, one of those huge concerns whose influence is spreading right across Canada, I understand that the International Paper Company is the largest manufacturer of paper in the world and one of the largest holders of water-power and timber limits in North America. The capacity of its mills is more than twice as great as that of any other on this continent, while its freehold and leasehold timber limits cover more than 12,000,000 acres. It owns and operates twenty-two pulp and paper mills, located in Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, New York and Louisiana in the United States, and in the provinces of New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario in Canada. The chief Canadian subsidiaries of the International Paper Company include the Canadian International Paper Company, the New Brunswick International Paper Company, the Gatineau Paper Company, the St. John River Power Company and the Continental Products of Canada.

Mr. BOURASSA: What about the E. B. Eddy Company?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not sure whether that is one of the subsidiaries of the International or not.

Mr. BENNETT: If it will interest you I may say it is not.



Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) says it is not; he ought to know. I should like to read in this connection, if the House will bear with me, an article recently published in Forward of Glasgow, Scotland, by Mr. J. T. Walton Newbold in which reference is made to the International Paper Company. The writer says:

This International Paper Company, whilst virtually related to the New York Tribune. . . has for its chairman of its financial committee the chairman of the Chase Bank of New York, the International Agricultural Corporation, which together handled the financing of the great German Potash Syndicate, which in turn links up with some of the biggest German pulp and paper companies. He is also on the board of one of the world's producers of fertilizers, the big packing houses of Armour and Company of Chicago.

In the interlocking directorate, as James McArthur Conner observes, Mr. Newbold might have added the name Curtis, connected with the Saturday Evening Post, the Ladies Home Journal, and so forth.

The fact is that the moment we touch large corporations of this kind we touch some of the most stupendous industrial concerns on the North American continent; and I cannot read the facts which have been placed at the disposal of the House in the last few weeks without feeling that we are mere children when we come to handle these tremendous enterprises, of the magnitude of which very few of us have dreamed.

I have spoken of this great corporation. Now let me discuss briefly the National Hydro-Electric, which secured a lease from the federal government of water-powers on the Carillon section of the Ottawa river. I am not able to prove it, but I presume that every hon. member recognizes that the National Hydro-Electric is very largely controlled by the Holt-Shawinigan group. It might be difficult without taking court proceedings—indeed, it might be difficult even then—to show exactly how this control is exercised, but I unhesitatingly say that when we come to the control of the Carillon site we enter distinctly upon the field of the Holt-Shawinigan concern. Some hon. gentleman may possibly have seen a day or two ago in some of the newspapers—I saw it in Le Droit of March 11—an interesting diagram indicating the relationships which exist between various corporations. I should like to have this diagram appear in Hansard:

Shawinigan Water & Power Company
Controls through Ownership of 50,000 shares of stock
Quebec Power Co.
Controls through stock ownership
Laurentian Power Company
Owns 97% shares of
Quebec Railway Light Heat & Power Company
Owns a substantial stock interest in Montreal Light, Heat & Power Company
Laurentide Power Co.
Duke-Price Power Co. (owns 20% of stock)
Niacet Chemical Corpn. (owns 1-3rd interest)

Montreal Land Development Company
Montreal Hydro Electric Co.
Montreal Light Heat & Power Consolidated
Owns outright or controls subsidiaries some of which have bonds in the hands of public

I would crave the patience of the House while I quote a few paragraphs from a valuable series of articles which have been recently appearing in Canada Forward, a small labour paper published in Toronto. These articles are published under the caption "The Ring Around the Hydro" and are the work of Mr. J. McArthur Conner. Speaking of this group Mr. Conner says:

Its head is Sir Herbert Holt, known as "the power king of Canada". He is a director of the Canadian Pacific Railway and president of the Royal Bank of Canada. On the latter board is the Hon. R. B. Bennett, director of Imperial Oil Company, Canadian General Electric Company and the Calgary Power Company.

I presume that is right so far.

Mr. BENNETT: That is correct; absolutely.

Mr. WOODSWORTH. I note the hon. member's confirmation of the statement, and I am glad to think that we have in him one of the advocates of public ownership. I quote further:

The growth of Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated, therefore, has placed under one single executive direction and management the entire electric lighting power of greater Montreal. The following table will show the several constituent companies of this private ownership monopoly:

Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company.
The Montreal Gas Company.
The Royal Electric Company.
Montreal and St. Lawrence Light and Power Company.
Imperial Electric Company.
Lachine Rapids Hydraulic and Land Company.
Citizens Light and Power Company, Limited.
Standard Light and Power Company.
Temple Electric Company.
Provincial Light and Heat Company.
Provincial Light and Heat and Power Company.
Cedar Rapids Manufacturing Company.
Merchants Light and Power Company.
Quebec-New England Hydro Electric Corporation.
Dominion Light and Power Company.
St. Pauls Electric Light and Power Company.
Montreal Electric Company.

The United Securities Limited, controlled jointly with Shawinigan Water and Power Company and Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated.

The United Securities, Limited, is controlled jointly with the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated and the Shawinigan Water and Power Company.

The mere reading of a long list of this character of interlocking directorates involved in this group shows the serious menace which such a tremendous aggregation of capital and power may mean to this country.

I quote further:

Sir Herbert Holt is the largest individual shareholder in Price Brothers (with the exception of the Price family). This company is linked up with the Brompton and Laurentide, as these three companies all sell their export through the Canadian Export Paper Company. The St. Maurice Sales sells the output of the St. Lawrence paper mills, Port Alfred and St. Maurice Valley Corporation and some other small mills.

And then a little bit further on:

A year ago the Duke-Price sold a power site on the Saguenay to the Aluminum Company of America, which is one of the Mellon interests and is closely associated with the International Paper Company. At that time Price Brothers owned twenty-five per cent of the stock of the Duke-Price power and the sale of the undeveloped site to the Aluminum Company of America amounted to $4,090,000 par value of six per cent cumulative preferred stock and 36,800 shares of common stock of the Aluminum Company.

That is rather interesting information. Already there seems to be, so far as an outsider can judge, something of a rapprochement between the Shawinigan group and the International Paper Company. I do not profess to have any inside knowledge, but since this long established company of the Price Brothers has been mentioned I am rather interested in knowing just the tremendous powers they are getting altogether outside of the power company. I hold in my hand a very elaborately gotten up report of that company compiled and published by the statistical department of the Royal Securities Corporation Limited in Montreal which shows something of the extent of their business along a great many lines, paper mills, and so on. As to timber areas I quote from their own publication:

While others counted the cost and hesitated, the far-sighted founders of Price Brothers and Company went ahead and secured control of timber areas wherever the opportunity arose. The result of that policy is seen to-day when the company controls no less than 8,564 square miles of Quebec timber limits—an area which is larger than either the state of Massachusetts or the principality of Wales—situated on watersheds tributary to the company's plants on the Saguenay and St. Lawrence rivers.

And on the back page there is a map of England and Wales showing in colour the principality of Wales. The boast by the company is that they control as large an area in the province of Quebec. The report goes on to say:

These timber lands are estimated to contain approximately 45,782,055 cords of pulpwood, sufficient to produce 31,000,000 tons of newsprint paper, or a supply for operation of the company's mills at designed capacity for a period of more than one hundred years without allowing for new growth.

That is but one illustration of one small constituent or inter-related company of one of these big concerns with which we are dealing to-night. I come back to the article from which I was reading a few minutes ago as contained in Canada Forward, and there is rather an interesting paragraph which perhaps has some political references. I do not know how far this paragraph contains the truth, but I should like to read it, as it was written on January 15, 1927, long before this bill came before the House:

It will thus be seen at a glance interlocking interests behind Sir Herbert Holt. The political expression of these interests in the Dominion House of Commons is Sir George Perley and the Hon. R. B. Bennett, both of whom control the E. B. Eddy Paper Company at Hull. These members are in the same political party as Thomas L. Church, member for Northwest Toronto. It is to this monopoly under the name of the National Electric Corporation whom Howard Ferguson, in a speech in the Massey hall, November 26, 1926, said: "The government had succeeded in negotiating its Gatineau contract and with Premier Taschereau's friendly coöperation it was negotiating a contract for power from Carillon."

It may be as the minister says, that we in this section of the House are utterly deluded, but I would venture to say that it is quite possible that some of the members—the new members—who spoke enthusiastically about this new project may also have been somewhat deluded.

I come to another matter with relation to politics. This time it is provincial politics, and since other members have not hesitated to closely follow memoranda I venture to follow this outline as contained in the articles to which I have referred:

The Shawinigan Water and Power Company has always been strong for the government of Quebec. It can boast of having one of Quebec's most influential citizens as a director, Sir Lomer Gouin, a former Premier of Quebec, a director of the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated, the Bank of Montreal and the National City Company. Now the National City Company is the creation of the National City Bank of New York which J. T. Walton Newbold—

Former Labour member of the British House, who has recently been studying the interlocking capitalist interests of America.

—tells us: "Was created specially to carry on the investment business and to hold for it and its clients bonds and stocks in companies; was in the orbit of the Standard Oil Company, and in the same sphere as the great loan issuing house of Kuhn, Loeb and Co. This latter house, as its name signifies, had its affiliations more particularly with the German fatherland and to be precise with the very powerful house of M. Warburg and Co., of Hamburg. There was a considerable amount of German money invested in the Canadian Pacific Railway Company which had, of course been sequestrated during the first few years of the war. There was, however, a way whereby this German money could be kept safe from the confiscation, which it was easily understood would be its fate should the Allies win, that was to transfer it over to an American house, there to be held in trust for its original holders.

"That German money in the Canadian Pacific railway to an amount totalling some $145,000,000 was taken over by the National City Company.

"That was the way in which and the reason for which the National City Company entered Montreal and formed, thereafter, jointly with the Bank of Montreal, the National City Company of Canada. It came in as German interests went out."

Mr. BOURASSA: Triumph of democracy.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am very glad to have had this bit of information from one who is quite an authority on financial interests in Great Britain and Europe.

Now let me come back to Canada. I should like to impress clearly upon the House, especially upon the western members, who perhaps have not been able as yet to understand so clearly the policy of the province of Quebec, that we will have to reckon upon private interests in that province and the confessed policy of maintaining private interests. Let me give a quotation from an advertisement in the Engineering Journal, of July, 1924, by the Shawinigan Water and Power Company:

The policy of the government of Quebec is to give encouragement and protection to the development of water-powers and the building up of industries dependent thereon through private enterprise, combined with regulation and control of storage waters. The province has constructed engineering works of great magnitude to store flood waters and regulate the flow of various power rivers, measures which have proved successful in a striking degree.

And again:

The most notable enterprise of the (Quebec Stream) Commission has been the construction of the Gouin dam on the St. Maurice river, built by contract under the supervision of the commission's engineers, forming a reservoir covering an area of 300 square miles, with a storage capacity of 160,000,000 cubic feet. Similar schemes have been carried out on the St. Francis and St. Anne de Beaupré rivers and Lake Kenogamis on the Chicoutimi river and on the river Metis. To date the commission has spent on completed works about $3,500,000. On this expenditure the commission receives $300,000 from the power companies for the use of the stored water, to provide interest on capital stock, a sinking fund to redeem the bonds, maintenance, and a small profit to the province.

Let me emphasize the phrase, "a small profit to the province." That is, these enormous expenditures are incurred very largely for the sake of the industry, in the hope, I presume, that indirectly the industry may profit the people. But I would point out that it is by no means a case of public ownership with all the benefits which public ownership involves. I am not going into the ramifications of these various concerns which have their connections, not only all over Canada and the United States, but in almost every country of Europe. For example, Sir Herbert Holt is a director of the United Securities, and he has lately become associated with Alfred Loewenstein by becoming a director of some of the latter's European hydro-electric enterprises, including the Belguim Sidro Company. Alfred Loewenstein is a well-known banker in Belgium. He has acquired a large interest in Brazilian Traction, Barcelona Hydro Electric, and several other Mexican companies. I could quote at length a number of other connections of this concern. But I want to come back again very close to home, and to point out another of the inter-related questions which force themselves upon us in a consideration of the bearings of the proposal now before the House. Let me quote from the Financial Post of December 10, 1926:

While the re-election of Premier Ferguson in the province of Ontario was joyful news to the "wets" and an additional blow to the "drys," perhaps it has not yet come home to both schools of thought that liquids other than beer and wine were involved in the struggle in that province. The other liquids are of course the water-powers which generate electric power in both provinces.

The election in Ontario means in one sense the dawn of a new era as far as the electrical generation of power is concerned, for in future the electrical projects of "peepul" in Ontario will be carried out hand in hand with the so-called "St. James street" gang; in other words, the large power interests of the province of Quebec; a situation which perhaps may cause Sir Adam Beck to turn in his grave, but which will nevertheless be welcomed by all thoughtful people.

I do not know how long the debate will continue; but I hope, before it is over, my Conservative friends, with whom I have a good deal of sympathy at this time in regard to their resolution, will be able to throw some light on an editorial of this character, and very definitely to assure us that there is no danger that the Hydro Electric of Ontario will be in any way imperilled. We ought to be very sure of that.

I have spoken of two of the large groups that have been bidding for power in Canada. There comes now the third, which has secured this ancient charter and which, under the old scheme of the Georgian bay canal, is attempting to challenge the power of one, if not of two, of these older companies. Mr. Harry Sifton come on the scene very prominently during the last election. He was then a director of the Southern Canada Power Company, Limited. I would like to examine that company for a moment. The Southern Canada Power Company, according to the series of articles from which I have been reading, owns and controls the South Shore Power and Paper Company, Limited, La Cie de Gaz Electricite and Pouvoir, the St. Johns Electric Light Company, Brome Lake Railway and Power Company, Richmond County Electric Company, the Sherbrooke Railway and Power Company, Lennoxville Light and Power Company, Limited, Eastern Falls Power Company, International Electric Company of Vermont. These corporations all operate in the St. Lawrence valley below Montreal. This company too has a number of interlocking relationships with other big corporations Let me read on:

When we examine the directors' board of this huge monopoly we find the name of J. B. Woodyatt, Montreal, as president. He is also vice-president of the Power Corporation of Canada, and a director of the Winnipeg Electric Company.

Let me interject that we in Winnipeg have for years past been carrying on a continuous fight between the city hydro and the Winnipeg Electric Company. We are not uninterested in these great trusts in the east because they directly relate themselves to our struggle in the city of Winnipeg. I proceed:

Another interesting personality on the board is A. J. Nesbitt, President of the Power Corporation of Canada and a director of the Ottawa and Hull Power Company, Limited, and the Canada Northern Power Corporation, Limited. Colonel J. R. Moodie of Hamilton is also on the board. The colonel is well known as a prominent director of the Dominion Power and Transmission Company, Limited. The monopoly is also well represented in parliament by two prominent Liberals in the person of W. R. Baldwin, who is President of the Perth Feldspar and Mining Company, vice-president of the Rouyn Gold Mines, Limited, and a director of the Canadian U.S. Oil and Refining Company—and George Parent, K.C., of the well known firm of Taschereau, Roy, Cannon and Parent. Mr. Parent is president of the Le Soleil Limitee, vice-president Citadel Brick and Paving Company, and director in the St. Maurice Lumber Company and the Quebec Power Company.

Mr. PARENT: I thank the hon. member for the advertising.

Mr. WOODSWORTH (Reading):

The latter company and its subsidiaries are the sole distributors of power for lighting and other industrial purposes in the city of Quebec and surrounding industrial district.

Just one other matter and I have finished. I turn and note that with regard to the present company whose bill is before us:

The directors of the board of Montreal, Ottawa, Georgian Bay has on it many Liberal party friends. Its president is the Hon. N. A. Belcourt, a prominent lawyer, member of the House of Senate and a director of La Sauvegarde Life Insurance Company. Associated with him is another senator, Gerald White of Pembroke. Mr. White has numerous interests and they include the Sterling Development Company of Canada, the Steel Equipment Company of Canada, and W. C. Hughson and Company, Limited.

Mr. Speaker, I have ventured to read some of these lists which have been given us in this valuable series of articles simply because I should like the House and the country to realize the intricate and important character of the problem which we are facing at the present time. It involves essentially, as the Minister of Railways and Canals admits, a struggle between two powerful groups—a struggle for power—and I would say that those who are interested in one or the other company are found here as members of this House, or as members of the Senate. I would say that there are direct connections between this bill and the political parties in the province of Ontario and the political parties in the province of Quebec. The corporations are so powerful that, as I have tried to show, their relationships are not confined to Canada or the United States, but extend to Great Britain and to various countries of Europe. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that in facing the problem which is raised by this bill we ought not to lend ourselves to playing the game of either one or the other of these conflicting interests. I would not like by voting down this bill to think that I was playing into the hands of the eastern group of interests; but I have no intention whatever, by voting for a bill of this character, of playing into the hands of the so-called Sifton group of interests. What have we in this House to do with one or the other group?

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that we are facing this great question, as to whether the natural resources of this country shall be owned and controlled by the people in the interests of the people, or whether they shall be given away to these great corporations which sooner or later will undoubtedly be gobbled up by the still greater American trusts to the south of us. That is the problem that we face to-day. I think we would be on safe ground if we maintain that no power right on any of our rivers shall be given away without the consent of the provinces concerned. I do not think we are justified in giving away any right of this character. I know it may be said by some members on the government side that the Dominion has the right over navigable streams, and no one doubts that, but the very minister who put forward this plea said that this was not a case of navigation, but a case of power; and when it comes to a case of power, with all that power involves under modern conditions, we must take no action that will surrender this right to any private corporation. The measure comes before us as a navigation measure, but I have no hesitation under the circumstances in voting against it.

It is a plausible argument to urge that we should withhold our decision until the bill comes back from the committee. That has been said again and again, but I cannot see any reason for that course if one is firmly convinced that we ought not to sacrifice public ownership. The bill is undoubtedly giving a charter to a private company for the development of water-power, and whatever the provincial rights may be in the matter, undoubtedly we ought to-day to stand on guard for the general welfare of the people. That is why we have been elected. Under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I have no recourse but to do my best to defeat this bill at this stage and, if it passes this reading, at any other subsequent opportunity that may offer itself.

Mr. GEARY: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. CHEVRIER: As the hour is late, Mr. Speaker, I would move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. GEARY: Mr. Speaker, I think I had the floor first.

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

On motion of Mr. Geary the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King, the House adjourned at 11.25 p.m.

Tuesday, March 15, 1927

The House met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING

Bill No. 148, respecting a certain patent owned by Chester Earl Gray and Aage Jensen.—Mr. Jacobs.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Customs and Excise) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Customs Act, chapter 48 of the revised statutes, 1906, and to make further provisions for a more adequate enforcement of the act and the prevention of smuggling operations.

He said: His Excellency, the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

IMPORTATION OF SCOTCH MINERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. B. ADSHEAD (East Calgary): I would like to ask the Minister of Labour or the Minister of Immigration if either has received from Mr. Harrington, Minister of Mines of Nova Scotia, any protest against the immigration of miners from Scotland in connection with the British Empire Steel Corporation. The report states that he is protesting to the British Empire Steel Corporation against the immigration of miners when there was so little work to be done, and also because his department had not been consulted, I presume, by the department here in connection with the immigration of those miners. Is it the policy of the government to consult with provincial officials regarding their needs in immigration matters and have they received any protest from Mr. Harrington, Minister of Mines of Nova Scotia?

Hon. ROBERT FORKE (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): I have received no protest of any kind in regard to the immigration of those miners. I have however been informed that as regards those miners, about whom complaint was made some time ago, their passage has been paid back to the old country, but that two of them have intimated their intention of staying where they are.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Will the minister answer my question relative to the policy of the government in regard to consulting with provincial officials?

Mr. FORKE: We do not do so exactly, although we take every possible precaution to see that no labour field will be flooded with people who cannot secure employment. We find that the provincial governments are quite ready to coöperate with us as far as possible in that respect.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REFRIGERATOR CARS FOR SEED POTATOES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince): I wish to read this telegram and to ask the Minister of Railways a question based thereon:

[Mr. Euler.]

Will you kindly use your influence with railroad officials to have refrigerator cars rushed here for shipment of seed potatoes? Over fifty wanted this station. We have only received two in two weeks. Must have supply quick or will lose heavily through cancelled contracts. February orders not filled yet. Would appreciate very much your coöperation.

This is signed by Simmons and McFarlane of Freetown, Prince Edward Island. Will the Minister of Railways be good enough to take this matter up and to see that cars are rushed there as quickly as possible?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I shall, of course, be glad to bring the matter mentioned by my hon. friend to the attention of the management of the Canadian National Railways. I understand that the matter has been the subject of representations previously, and I am sure the railway management is doing its best to cope with the situation, but I shall be pleased to bring the representations of my hon. friend to their attention.

QUESTIONS OF PRIVILEGE

SIR GEORGE PERLEY

On the Orders of the Day.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): I rise to a question of privilege. Yesterday evening the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) read some extracts from a newspaper giving a list of companies and of men who were directors in them, and he referred to this as interlocking interests. This article went on to say:

The political expression of these interests in the Dominion House of Commons is Sir George Perley and the Hon. R. B. Bennett, both of whom control the E. B. Eddy Paper Company at Hull.

Unfortunately for me, I have no interest nor have I ever had any in the E. B. Eddy Company. Further, I am not a director of the E. B. Eddy Company, nor of any other paper company, nor of any other of the power companies in the Dominion.

MR. MCPHERSON

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. A. McPHERSON (Portage la Prairie): I wish to refer to an editorial in yesterday's Ottawa Evening Citizen, under the heading the "Western Members on Trial." I have no complaint to make against the general remarks there made, as apparently it is purely a matter of opinion, and I understand that this paper as a rule is very fair, but there is one statement to which I take exception, and that is this:

Only an inexperienced member would make the mistake of repeating the lobbyist's brief, almost for word, in the House.

I shall not even contest the inexperience; I admit that. But I am in a different position apparently from most members here; I was not consulted and I never saw a brief on behalf either of those favouring the bill or those opposing the bill. I never saw any documents at all except those that were in the House and the original statute and its amendments. I did receive what I understood was a circular letter written on behalf of those who were supporting the bill, but I merely read the title and not a single paragraph beyond. My whole remarks in the House were based upon the act itself. If they happened to coincide with any brief that other hon. gentlemen were using, I can only say that in my judgment they were good arguments, and they have not been replied to.

ENTERPRISE AND YARKER POST-MASTERSHIPS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) to answers which he gave on February 28th to questions I have put regarding the Enterprise and Yarker post offices. The replies state that the Enterprise postmastership was advertised from the 22nd to the 29th of January last and the Yarker postmastership from the 16th to the 25th of November last. I wish to ask the Postmaster General why these positions have not yet been filled, or will he be good enough to look into the matter?

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Postmaster General): I could not answer offhand, but I shall be glad to look into the matter.

WAYS AND MEANS

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT, 1915, AMENDMENT

The House in committee of ways and means, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: The resolution will be found in the Votes and Proceedings of February 17th. It reads as follows:

Resolved, That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend The Special War Revenue Act, 1915, and to provide:—

1. (i) That the stamp tax on cheques, bills and notes, receipts for money paid by a bank, bills of exchange drawn upon persons outside of Canada according to the tenor of the bills, money orders and travellers' cheques, and post office money orders, shall on and after the first day of July, 1927, be—

Two cents in respect of each such instrument for an amount in excess of ten dollars.

(ii) That on and after the first day of July, 1927, the stamp tax on matches shall be as follows:—

On each package of matches manufactured or sold, three-fourths of one cent for each one hundred matches or fraction of one hundred matches;

On each package containing not more than sixty and not less than thirty matches, three-eighths of one cent per package;

On each package containing less than thirty matches, three-sixteenths of one cent per package.

(iii) That from and after the sixth day of July, 1927, the following stamp taxes be abolished, namely,—

On advances made by a bank, as imposed by paragraphs (c), (d), and (e) of subsection three of section twelve of the said act;

On overdrafts, as imposed by paragraphs (f) and (g) of said subsection three;

On advances by any person not being a bank, as imposed by subsection 19 of said section twelve.

2. That the rate of consumption or sales tax be reduced to four per cent and that any enactment which may be founded on this resolution number two shall be deemed to have come into force on the eighteenth day of February, 1927, and to have applied to goods imported or taken out of warehouse on and after that date, and to have applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that date.

3. That said section nineteen BBB be further amended by providing that, for the purposes of the said section, printers, publishers, lithographers and engravers shall be regarded as producers or manufacturers, and that any enactment which may be founded on this resolution number three shall be deemed to have come into force on the eighteenth day of February, 1927.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2.

Mr. BOURASSA: During the debate on the budget I called the attention of the Finance minister to a promise that was made last year by the late Minister of Customs to exempt from the operation of the sales tax small local manufacturers of sash and doors, and so forth. Under the present law, paragraph 5 provides that there shall be collected only 50 per cent of the normal tax upon the following:

Boots and shoes, including rubber footwear; biscuits of all kinds; goods enumerated in customs tariff items 86, 105 and 106: creosoted railway ties.

Under paragraph 14,—

Retail lumber dealers, who do not manufacture lumber, or who do not sell lumber to other lumber dealers, or to other licensed manufacturers, need not take out a sales tax license.

Small sawmillers, selling exclusively by retail and whose total sales are not in excess of $5,000 per year, are classed as exempt from consumption or sales tax.

Then, under paragraph 15,—

The following classes of small manufacturers, when selling exclusively by retail, are regarded as exempt from consumption or sales tax on the sale of their products:—Picture framers, druggists, shoemakers, upholsterers, dentists, harnessmakers, plumbers, opticians, blacksmiths, tinsmiths, show card and sign makers.

The kind of small manufacturers that I recommended last year as entitled to exemption, and that I again recommend to the Minister of Finance, are surely just as useful and interesting as these other small industrialists, only that instead of simply sawing logs into planks and lumber, they do a little more work upon them, and sell them in a purely retail trade to the farmers and villagers around them. The late minister was so impressed with the justice of the claim that he told me he thought he could apply the exemption even under the present law, but I observe that it has not been done in the case I have in mind. The department has been demanding the tax from the small dealers to whom I referred in the budget debate some time ago. In this instance, the small local dealer, the father of twelve children, carries on, with one of his sons, a small industry; he purchases logs from the farmers and turns them into sashes and doors, which he sells to the villagers and the farmers in his neighbourhood. Out of the profits on $2,200 worth of goods which he sold in the retail trade, he supported his family and paid a salary to his son. A demand was made upon him from the government for $110 sales tax. I claim that this demand was unfair, and surely such a proceeding was not in the mind of the government when this tax was imposed. In my opinion such small industries are entitled to the same exemption as is allowed to the sawmillers who conduct business in the same way, with the only difference that the millers render less service to the small community where they operate. I am quite sure that it is sufficient to remind the minister of this matter to induce him to insert a few words in the clause, placing these small industries on the same footing as the industry to which I have referred. I was told in the department last year that they thought the present law covered those cases.

Mr. ROBB: If I understand the act correctly, the minister has certain discretionary powers which might enable him to do what my hon. friend desires, if he could be convinced that it was quite right and equitable. Of course my hon. friend will understand that every day, and sometimes three or four times a day, people come to the office and desire to be exempted from taxes for one reason and another. I have just spoken to my colleague, the Minister of Customs, and we will go into this matter very carefully, and if we feel that it is right in equity, and that the law is wide enough now for us to do as my hon. friend desires, we will do it. I should not like to make any further commitment. My hon. friend will also understand that the Minister of Finance desires to obtain all the revenue he can, but I realize that in the case presented by my hon. friend of the small business such as he has referred to, the tax may be more irritable to the person concerned than it is worth to the government.

Mr. BOURASSA: If the government and parliament thought fit to do it in these cases, I cannot see why it should be considered a matter of favour.

Mr. ROBB: No, it is not a favour.

Mr. BOURASSA: It should not be regarded as a favour or as an exceptional case. There are many such cases in the district of northern Quebec, northern Ontario and New Brunswick. Such small industries are essentially useful to the districts in which they are located and encourage the industrial life of the community. They complain, and quite rightly, in the province of New Brunswick that the large industry has swallowed up the smaller one. People have to build houses in the rural districts as well as in the towns or cities, and some encouragement should be given to the small local industries. If it is proper to do it in the case of the saw millers, why not give the same concession to the small manufacturers of doors and sashes? What advantage is it to the farmer, after he has had his logs sawed into lumber, if he cannot use it to put up his house or repair it? What I suggest would be simply carrying out what already appears in the law. My proposition is that the government should deal with the small industries in the same manner as they do with the large industries. If it is fair to exempt the boot and shoe industry to the extent of a fifty percentage of their sale taxes, why not exempt these small industries of a portion of their taxes, just as is done with the picture framer? I do not think the picture framer is of greater advantage to the community than the man who supplies the doors and sashes. If it be proper to exempt those industries I have referred to, why not make an exemption in the case of the manufacturer of doors and sashes? I know there are eight or ten cases of this kind in my own constituency and there are others in the northern part of the country. Why not put all the small industries on exactly the same footing?

The principle is exactly the same. They make use of the same raw material, purchased from the same class of people, and they render a great service to the community where they sell those products at a much cheaper price than other concerns would. It is merely putting small, local industries of exactly the same character on an equal footing.

Mr. ROBB: I hope my hon. friend will not press that too far. Give us an opportunity to do something next year, after my hon. colleague has reorganized his department and looked carefully into it. In some of the cases mentioned by my hon. friend the sales tax has already been paid by the picture framer. It is just a question of where we shall draw the line. Hundreds of industries throughout the country have put up just as good a claim as my hon. friend, but we will give it careful consideration and do something later.

Mr. BOURASSA: I have known all about careful consideration by ministers for twenty-five years. Such consideration was promised last year by the Minister of Customs, and we know that goods kept in cold storage do not improve. It cannot be said that this is a matter which has not been considered by the government and I am asking for the same application of the principle contained in the law to two industries of a like character. Why should the department favour one and demand a tax from the other? There is no reason and no justice in that. I protest against it in the name of all these small communities in those colonization regions in the northern part of the province of Quebec, extending from Timiskaming along the northern borders of the St. Lawrence valley. This is an easy way to encourage our village people to develop small local industries by making use of the raw material within the district, and it will be a practical means of preventing the exodus of our rural population to the urban centres and in turn to the United States rather than by encouraging the establishment of large manufacturing industries in our urban centres.

Mr. ARTHURS: Last session I called the attention of the Minister of Finance to the fact that the owners of small portable mills doing a very moderate business in country districts had been forced to pay sales tax upon the sawing of logs for farmers. The minister then told me that there was no intention on the part of the government to collect the tax in such cases, and that if any had been collected it was a mistake. Is there any chance of these men being given a rebate for the taxes already collected?

Mr. ROBB: As to taxes already collected, I must inform my hon. friend that "what we have we hold." But we will give very careful consideration to his observations.

Mr. BENNETT: I know that was the promise last year, but I am informed that the owners of some of these small portable mills have been compelled to pay sales tax regardless of the extent of their business. I had a letter to this effect the other day.

Mr. ROBB: The regulations provide very clearly that small sawmillers selling exclusively by retail and whose total sales are not in excess of $5,000 a year are to be exempt from sales tax.

Mr. BENNETT: The $5,000 maximum caused the trouble. In some small communities that is not a very high figure for the year's business done by the owner of one of these small portable mills, especially where lumber is high priced, it being roughly only about $400 a month. I would suggest that if the figure were doubled it would not work a hardship to anyone and at the same time would meet with general approval.

Mr. ROBB: It is rather hard for me to oppose my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) and my hon. friends opposite, because I recall that when Sir Thomas White was bringing in the sales tax legislation I myself took the ground that lumber mills might be excepted from its operation. We will look carefully into this matter.

Mr. McGIBBON: The tax is collected on custom work, not on lumber sawn for farmers, which is really not a product of the mill at all.

Mr. BENNETT: I know that the collection of the tax concerns the Minister of Customs (Mr. Euler), but I draw this to my hon. friend's attention. In the community where I live it was complained in the case of a man who failed that one of the preferential claims was that of the government for sales tax. It is suggested that a better method should be devised for the collection of sales tax, and that rather than extend leniency beyond a given date it would be better for the man himself in the long run if you said, "We will not give you credit beyond that date; then you stop business or you pay." The present system involves considerable hardship on other creditors.

Mr. ROBB: I think the Minister of Customs has that under consideration and is in agreement with my hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: At this stage I do not want to go into the details of unpaid sales taxes, the subject having been discussed in this House on more than one occasion, but it is known to the minister that many millions of dollars are in arrear, some extending over a very long period of time. This lends itself to very great abuse. Once you lay down a fixed and settled rule that if taxes are in arrear beyond a given date certain results will follow, then you attain the object you have in view. The result would be much easier for the minister, much better for the country, and in the long run exceedingly beneficial to the person in default. In response to a question from one of the hon. members for Toronto the House has before it a list of unpaid sales tax, the total running into millions of dollars. I am sure the minister will agree with me that the amount involved being so large some action should be taken to prevent a recurrence of a similar condition. Therefore I press the minister to make a declaration that this sort of thing is to be put an end to. It may be said, "some of your friends have received leniency in that regard." But that is not the question. This leniency is a distinct disadvantage to those who promptly pay their taxes, and I think the minister should take action along the lines I have suggested.

Mr. EULER: Two or three weeks ago I made some comment on this matter in the House. I think every hon. member knows the difficulty we have now in collecting arrears of sales tax, but I do not think any good would result from my discussing that matter on this occasion. Let me answer my hon. friend's inquiry with regard to current taxes, which I think is what he is referring to particularly.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. EULER: Very definite instructions have been issued that henceforth all current taxes must be collected by a certain date, and I think I may assure the committee that in future there will not be any accretion to the present arrears.

Mr. BENNETT: What do you propose to do?

Mr. EULER: One of the difficulties in the prompt collection of the sales tax has been the fact that we have had no power to charge interest on overdue payments, due to an oversight in the drafting of the original act. We have this power of collecting interest on overdue income tax. The omission is to be rectified by legislation in the present session, and I think it will be a very powerful incentive for the prompt payment of sales tax. Under the present conditions many of these defaulters have practically made the government their bankers, withholding payment of their sales tax and thus keeping the money in their business free of interest. We are making every effort to collect the arrears. Those hon. gentlemen who have been in the department know how difficult it is to put every account for arrears into the hands of the law for collection. We are doing that as far as possible, but my hon. friends will know that in all cases it is not advisable to take this course even in the interest of the government itself. However, so far as the future is concerned I can assure the House that there will not be much of an addition made to the present arrears of sales tax.

As to the question raised by my hon. friend from Labelle with regard to the exemption of certain industries, after all it is very difficult to distinguish between those who in a real sense are manufacturers and those who are not. When do we arrive at a distinct dividing line between those who merely make things in a small way and those who are manufacturers on a more or less large scale? We have the same difficulty in the printing trade, where the exemption from sales tax is granted to those printers who produce less than $10,000 worth of business a year. Some say that that figure is too high, that it ought to be $5,000. Here is where the practical difficulty arises. Frequently we get a protest from the man who produces $10,500 worth a year on the ground that the man who produces annually only $9,999 worth escapes the sales tax. The former says he is discriminated against. And so he is. The same difficulty arises where the exemption is put at $5,000; immediately the man whose turnover amounts to $6,000 a year complains that he is being discriminated against. I merely point out these cases to show the difficulties that confront us in the practical application of any such rule.

Mr. MANION: Within what time will the collection be made? The minister said that a certain time had been fixed.

Mr. EULER: It will be a matter of regulation.

Mr. BENNETT: At the present time it is sixty days.

Mr. EULER: The payment is supposed to be made at present by the end of the month immediately following that one in which the sale is made.

Mr. BOURASSA: The explanation given by the minister is somewhat strange in view of what is contained in the law itself. It cannot be difficult to draw a distinction between labourers on a small scale such as I have described inasmuch as there already exists that very distinction. It is no more difficult to draw the line between jobber and manufacturer engaged in the making of sashes and doors than between the man engaged in the sawmill business and the harness maker, and so on. The limitation is there in the law; it relates to those selling exclusively by retail and whose total sales are not in excess of $5,000 per annum. That means that the manufacturer is limited in the first place as to the amount of his sales in the entire year, and secondly, as to the nature of his commercial operations. If he supplies goods to commercial houses, or if he sells more than $5,000 worth per annum, he is taxed. You have two limitations there, and all I ask is that two industries which are in every respect similar, which are operated in the same manner, in the same community and which serve the same purpose, with the exception of a little more service rendered in one case, should be put on precisely the same footing If the minister is so embarrassed about exempting the small sash and door dealers, why is he not embarrassed in the case of small sawmillers? I take the law as it is; I am not suggesting anything new. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill):

That the exemption of the sales tax for small sawmillers should extend to small sash and door makers under the same limitations.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Is the resolution in order?

The CHAIRMAN: I was just going to call the attention of the hon. member to Sir Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, thirteenth edition, page 511. There is a paragraph of considerable length bearing on the point, but the following extract will cover it:

Nor can a member other than a minister move for the introduction of a bill framed to effect a reduction of duties, which would incidentally effect the increase of an existing duty, or the imposition of a new tax, although the aggregate amount of imposition would be diminished by the provisions of the bill.

And further on:

Nor can the amount of a tax proposed on behalf of the crown be augmented, nor any alteration made in the area of imposition.

Under that authority the amendment moved by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) must be ruled out of order.

Mr. BOURASSA: I would ask you, Mr. Chairman to study the point somewhat more carefully. I looked it up this morning myself with some of the authorities and I found that so long as a private member proposing such an amendment remained within the scope of the legislation brought down by the government, and did not suggest any new tax or the substitution of one tax for another, it is competent for that member to submit any change, modification, or even increase in the application of the tax as proposed by the government. I should like to know whether the rules that apply in England apply here as well. There are hon. gentlemen who are prone to quote English precedents, and I want to retain such of them as will make for the preservation of the rights of private members. I appreciate the fact that the government should assume the responsibility for the introduction of money measures; it would be incompetent, inasmuch as it would lead to disorder, for any private member to suggest any form of taxation in substitution for another. If I proposed the imposition of a customs duty in place of this or a modification of the income tax, I can readily understand that I should be out of order. But when I merely suggest that a particular tax should be so interpreted by the government as to alleviate the burdens of a certain number of taxpayers, if I have not the right to make such a suggestion I do not know why I am here.

The CHAIRMAN: Bourinot in the fourth edition would rather confirm the position taken by the hon. member for Labelle. But in view of the fact that he comes into conflict almost directly with the authority I have cited from May, and in view of the practice of this parliament, in cases of doubt, to be guided by British procedure, I fear I shall have to rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. ROBB: As the amendment is ruled out of order, all I have to say in connection with it is that the hon. member must not be discouraged, nor suppose that we shall lose sight of his observations.

Mr. EVANS: I support the views expressed by the hon. member for Labelle. It seems to me that the answer given by the Minister of Customs (Mr. Euler) is one grand argument for the income tax. Here is a man with $2,200 of a total income, paying $110 in taxes. He has no right to be taxed while we have eased the taxation 10 per cent in the case of much bigger incomes. The whole thing is a condemnation of the reduction of the income tax on the big men while we are taxing the small producer.

Section agreed to.

On section 3.

Mr. ROBB: This section is designed to remove doubt as to the interpretation of the words "producers" and "manufacturers". A court in Quebec held that printers, publishers, lithographers and engravers were not manufacturers or producers, while the Exchequer court held that they were. This section is to remove that doubt.

Mr. NEILL: Does it or does it not remove the exemption of $10,000?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Section agreed to.

Resolutions reported.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT, 1915—AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 149, to amend the Special War Revenue Act, 1915.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. NEILL: What is the number of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN: It is not numbered; it has just been read the first time and has not been distributed.

Mr. BENNETT: Presumably the bill will have to be moved out of committee if it is not printed, and it will be finished at some other time. The question of the sales tax as it affects printers came before me in a very concrete way the other day when I received a letter in connection with the payment of sales tax on cases printed for the Supreme Court of Canada or the appellate division of our own court. In the one case the printer did a business of over $10,000 and the sales tax was payable, but the other party had his book printed in a small town where the printer did not do that much business and sales tax was not payable. That is a concrete case which came before me in actual business, and I do think when you deal with matters of job printing it would be very desirable to have everyone on the same basis or to raise the figure above such an insignificant amount. The figure of $10,000 represents a very limited business for a jobber in a large city, but for a man in a small village $10,000 is more than he would ever dream of doing. That is hardly fair; it is discrimination. The one man is paying large taxes, doing a large business and employing many people, while the other man is doing a smaller business and employing fewer people. I would suggest that the amount be raised to something that would represent a real figure or that all be placed on the same basis. I mention this to the minister because it was communicated to me by an old country solicitor who had experienced it. He was very distressed because he had to pay sales tax in Calgary while another legal gentleman was not called upon to pay sales tax because his work was done in a smaller place.

WAYS AND MEANS

INCOME WAR TAX ACT 1917—AMENDMENT

The House in committee of ways and means, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend The Income War Tax Act, 1917, to provide that the rates of tax be reduced by ten per centum.

Mr. HANSON: I am not rising for the purpose of opposing this resolution, but I desire to make a few observations in this connection since I believe it will be the only opportunity open to me of referring to a discussion which took place in this House during the session of 1926, with reference to family or personal corporations. I desire to call the attention of the government to a pledge given at that time by the then Minister of Customs, to the effect that if the law as then enacted should prove a hardship, at the very first session of parliament the government pledged itself to remove that hardship. In this connection I desire to quote the remarks of the late Minister of Customs made on June 10, 1926, and found at pages 4335 and 4336 of Hansard. The 80 per cent clause was under discussion, and in reply to some observations made by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), the then minister stated:

> What I am prepared to say to my hon. friend is this: We do not want to create any hardship. We do not want any concern which in reality is a partnership, which has been formed into a corporation for legitimate reasons, to suffer under the terms of this act and if any such case as that suggested at this moment as an example by my hon. friend is brought to our attention during the course of the present fiscal year, instructions will be given to the Commissioner of Taxation to withhold the levy, and at the next session of parliament this clause will be amended in a way which will meet that particular case.

I take it that that was a very definite pledge on the part of the government, and on that understanding the legislation was allowed to go through. May I call the attention of the minister to the fact that there are corporations which have been penalized by reason of the fact that the percentage is so high. I do not intend to go into details but I have given one particular case to the minister privately. That was the case of a corporation in which three partners owning equal shares in the business turned it into a joint-stock company for purposes of convenience only, long before the section was enacted. Two of the partners were permanent employees of the concern while the third, the president, acted in an advisory capacity only and drew no salary. Consequently that concern does not come within the law as it is at present. I submit that that is a case of very considerable hardship, and I ask the minister to be good enough to amend the law to meet cases of that kind, in accordance with the definite pledge given to the House in the words I have quoted.

Mr. BOURASSA: Last year when the income tax proposals were before the House I called the attention of the government to the importance of encouraging the taxpayers with large families by extending the exemption of $500 for each child to the age of twenty-one years. The reasons then given apparently struck the minister as being cogent and proper, because in three or four instances the late minister, who had charge of that part of the resolution, promised that when the Income Tax Act was next amended, this would be the first amendment taken up by the government. Therefore I am quite sure that it was merely an oversight on the part of the minister when he brought down those resolutions without regard to the promise made last year by his colleague. No promise was made of a general reduction of 10 per cent of the income tax, but a definite promise was made for the further extension of the children exemption clause. It seems to me it is not necessary to develop at length the reasons. First, as everybody knows, children kept at school—and I suppose we ought to encourage parents to keep their children at school as long as they can—are more costly to their families between eighteen and twenty years of age than they are when they are youngsters. Second, twenty-one years of age is the legal age, the age of emancipation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BOURASSA: Yes, of legal emancipation. A child of nineteen or twenty years of age under our civil law—and I think it is the same throughout the Dominion—is not absolute master of himself until he has reached his majority. Of course, if children are earning their living, I quite admit that the exemption should not apply, but it does not apply at present. Supposing a child at sixteen years of age earns his living, works for himself, he does not come in under the exemption granted by law. But a child of nineteen or twenty years of age kept at school by his parents is a heavy charge upon his family, and moreover he is not considered by the government in giving exemption from taxation. It seems to me obvious from a social as well as from a sound economic point of view, that the exemption should be extended to the parents in such a situation rather than that a general exemption of 10 per cent should be granted to all taxpayers, whether they would feel the burden of paying that 10 per cent or not.

It would be quite easy to cite many concrete cases. For instance, take the father of no family with a revenue of $100,000 a year. I have not looked this afternoon at the scale to see what he would pay, but his income tax was already largely reduced last year. He is again favoured this year by a further reduction of 10 per cent on the total amount he should pay. On the other hand, we have the father of a family of ten children earning an annual revenue of, let us say, $7,000 or $8,000. He receives an exemption for those children that are under eighteen years of age; but if he keeps two of those children at school between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one; if he wants to develop their education, if he is prepared to endure sacrifices to make them better citizens of Canada, the government disregards his sacrifices. He is struck precisely at the moment when he is making the greatest financial outlay to give a better education to his children. That is unfair, and in fact the suggestion I now make was considered so equitable last year that there was no discussion. The only reason given by the then Minister of Customs, the late Mr. Boivin, was that as the government had already made large curtailments, it was not proper to make any more that year, but that the following year, if any changes were made in the income tax, so far as he was concerned he pledged himself to see that this would be the first modification.

It is suggested that this would mean a decrease in revenue. I have already stated that the revenue derived from income taxation could be largely increased from various sources. First, this 10 per cent exemption which we are now asked to vote, could be granted only to taxpayers who have less than a certain annual revenue. I do not see why a man who has a revenue of $50,000 should receive the exemption proposed under this resolution. Surely he is not in such a position that the government is bound to take care of him. I have suggested also that we could tax the yearly values of household property over and above a certain amount, to be determined as the reasonable rental value of the property. In that way, we could receive far more than would be compensated to fathers of families by granting that exemption from eighteen to twenty-one years of age.

Third, during the budget debate I mentioned the fact that a very large amount of revenue derived from coupons on debentures escaped taxation altogether. Last week I met in Montreal a man who deals in financial matters on a very large scale. He told me that from his experience, from the relations he had in the financial world in Montreal, he was led to believe that millions of dollars escaped taxation because of two things—that the debentures are not inscribed but are payable to bearer, and that there is no tax on the coupon. Last year I suggested that if a stamp tax were imposed on the coupons, most of which, if not all, are paid through the banks, we could increase our income tax revenue at a very small charge to the taxpayers, and thereby reach a class of taxpayers most capable of increasing their contributions to the state.

At the present time you reach easily the employee of a company because his name figures on the payroll of the company and because the list given by the manager to the income tax branch is on file to prevent that employee from defrauding the federal treasury. You reach the shareholder because companies are obliged to publish their lists of shareholders. But we do not reach one-tenth of the debenture holders because the debentures are not inscribed.

Mr. BENNETT: I think one-tenth would be too large.

Mr. BOURASSA: Perhaps. I am not at all in that sphere of life, but I give the information as I have received it, not from opponents or partisans of any government but from business men. I give it as I had it from some of the most experienced officials of the income tax branch who tell me that they cannot and do not reach a large proportion of the biggest income of the country, an income which should be but which is not taxed. Surely a little attention should be given by the government to those features of the income tax, a little more added on to taxpayers capable of paying the taxation, and a little more consideration given to the father of a large family who, I repeat, is the best contributor to the development of Canada that we have. It is all very well to gather money and to pay subsidies to companies or to charitable associations, to bring children from Europe to fill up the gaps in our country; but surely native-born Canadians are the best citizens we can have. To help fathers of families in this country to keep their children at home and to give them a proper education is far more important than to devise all sorts of plans to bring foreigners to Canada to take the place of native sons of the land. Therefore, from a social point of view and from a sound economic point of view, I most strongly urge upon the government that they implement the promise that was made last year by one of their members. I hope the government will accept this suggestion without my being obliged to move it as an amendment, because I know that a good many of their followers in the province of Quebec at least, in endeavouring to point out to the people reasons why they should vote for the Liberal government, gave this one among others, and surely it is a good one. One of the reasons for which I upheld the government at the last session was the tendency I thought I saw in their budget proposals to come nearer to what I considered sound economics and social justice in matters of taxation, but this year I am sorry to say I do not find the same evidence. A general reduction all round of ten per cent in the income tax has been proposed without any consideration as to the means of the taxpayers and the charges that the family has to bear. That proposal is not inspired by the same spirit as was behind the proposals of last year, and if my suggestion, which I make in the most friendly spirit is accepted, it will help to correct the impression that is getting abroad that this government, after securing the favour of the people by showing itself friendly to the people, is now trying to come a little nearer to those influences that so frequently have more to do with the policy of governments—I am not speaking particulary of this or of any other government—than the real good of the people. I therefore hope that the government will accept this suggestion and implement the promise that was made last year by one of their colleagues, and upon the strength of which a large number of electors in the province of Quebec voted for the government last fall.

Mr. HANSON: Before the minister replies to the hon. member for Labelle, I do not propose to allow him to get away—I am not saying this offensively at all—from the point I was trying to make in regard to these family corporations. This question has raised a good deal of difficulty and caused a good deal of distress. There was a definite pledge on the part of the late Minister of Customs that this condition would be remedied at this session of parliament. I have already read his statement to the minister. The Minister of Customs shakes his head, so I will read it again. He said:

> We do not want any concern which in reality is a partnership, which has been formed into a corporation for legitimate reasons, to suffer under the terms of this act and if any such case as that suggested at this moment as an example by my hon. friend, is brought to our attention during the course of the present fiscal year, instructions will be given to the Commissioner of Taxation to withhold the levy, and at the next session of parliament this clause will be amended in a way which will meet that particular case.

Surely that is a definite pledge. I want to tell the minister that in the case I mentioned the levy has not been withheld. I believe the commissioner takes the ground that he is only the officer administering the law, and that he is not bound by any expression of the minister on the floor of the House of Commons; I think he is quite correct in that. But here is a definite pledge that in the event of hardship being found to exist, the levy will be withheld. The levy has not been withheld, and I ask the minister to redeem the pledge of his late colleague.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: I listened with great interest to the remarks made by the hon. member for Labelle, and I was reminded of the effort that was made in 1921 by the then member for Chambly-Vercheres, Mr. Archambault, to get the government to grant an exemption of $200 for each child. He was successful in this, and later the exemption was increased to $500. I also remember that a demand similar to that which is being made to-day was made upon the Minister of Finance last year, and I remember well the reply of the Minister of Customs at that time. He said that as soon as the finances of the country would permit, the first reduction that would be made in taxation would be in that direction. I think it is only fair, Mr. Chairman, that the father of a family of ten or twelve children should be granted some consideration, and should not be placed on the same footing as the father of a family that is composed of the father, the mother, and a pet dog. So I wish to approve what has been said by the hon. member for Labelle in this regard, and I would urge upon the Minister of Finance to give consideration to the suggestion that has been made.

Mr. MANION: I was just rising to say a few words in support of the earlier remarks of the hon. member for Labelle when my good friend from Quebec-Montmorency rose, and knowing his very fine record I felt that he had much more claim to the floor than I had. At the same time I say in all seriousness, Mr. Chairman, that I wholly agree more particularly with the earlier remarks made by the hon. member for Labelle. If we are not going to throw education into the discard entirely, if we are going to take the attitude which most reasonable people take, that education is an advantage to our children, then certainly it seems to be an extraordinary thing that a man's income should be exempted for a certain amount only up until the time his children reach the age for going to college, and then the exemption ceases, and he is penalized for sending them to college. I have in mind at the moment an instance where two boys are going to the university. Up to their going to the university, the usual exemption was allowed, but now that they are at university and their father is put to greater expense, the income tax exemption is removed, and the father is paying a larger tax at the very time his expenses, on account of these boys, are heaviest. It certainly seems a most ridiculous attitude for any of us to take to say that parents who make the effort, as most ambitious parents do, to give their children a higher education should be penalized for so doing. I submit that the hon. member for Labelle, so far as I have ever been able to judge, is absolutely right on the matter. I have thought of it many times myself, although I have never spoken of it publicly before, and I hope the minister will even at this stage in connection with this resolution accept the recommendation that has been made by the hon. member for Labelle, and so make it easier for ambitious parents to give their children a higher education.

Mr. CAMPBELL: While I agree with the last three speakers, the people I am most concerned about are those who do not have an income sufficient to pay an income tax. I have read in the papers and heard it said in the House that farmers are not paying any income tax. It is obvious why they are not; they are not getting the income on which to pay the tax. One of the hon. members for Toronto last night repeated the figures he had quoted in the House before in an attempt to prove that Toronto and Montreal are paying nearly all the taxation, and that the prairie provinces are paying little or nothing. But there is one fact he has not taken into consideration, and that is that the farmers of western Canada, and I presume this also applies to the farmers of Ontario, Quebec, and the maritime provinces, buy hundreds of millions of dollars worth of goods manufactured in Toronto and Montreal, and added to the price of these goods are the taxes the manufacturers pay. Naturally at the ports of entry the customs receipts will roll up high, but these receipts are simply added to the cost of the goods when they are distributed throughout the country. I say again that I am particularly concerned with these people who have not sufficient income on which to pay income tax. It seems to me it is an economic law, when you reduce the income tax, that you either put more taxes on those people, or you lose the opportunity of reducing other taxes, and I think it is absolutely unfair that there should be a drastic reduction in these taxes, without there being at least a corresponding reduction in the taxes paid by the ordinary people.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Following the war came responsibilities and obligations which necessitated new forms of taxation. Some of those forms of taxation have rightly been referred to as "nuisance taxes". I trust the time is not far distant when all such will be eliminated. I believe of all the forms of taxation that we adopted the most logical and reasonable was the income tax properly graded. I do not know how much will be lost to the revenue of Canada by this proposed reduction of ten per cent all round, but I will venture to say that the total amount of reduction in the revenue caused by this cut of ten per cent will remain in the pockets of those who are well able to pay that money towards the revenue for the running expenses of the country. This cut of ten per cent in my judgment is a step in the wrong direction. I believe the minister and the government would have been well advised, if, instead of making a cut of ten per cent in the income tax, they had made a further reduction in the sales tax. That reduction would have reached every person to a certain extent. There is absolutely no question about that. There can be no disputing the fact that this reduction of ten per cent does not relieve in the smallest fraction the poor people of the Dominion of Canada. They get no relief whatever from it. The only persons who do and who can get any relief from this reduction of ten per cent are those who are best able to contribute to the revenues of the country and who, because of their personal wealth and influence, ought to contribute. They have a bigger interest than the mere individual who has nothing. There are other forms of taxation which might be imposed by the Minister of Finance to take the place of this one.

[Mr. Campbell.]

I think there is one tax he might impose which would perhaps be received with genera approbation throughout the country. He might put a fair tax upon bachelors.

Mr. BENNETT: For instance the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott).

Mr. EDWARDS: There would be a great joy in contemplating such a tax and in seeing whom it would hit. Apart from joking, I wish to place myself on record as saying that I believe this proposed reduction of ten per cent all round in the income tax is a step in the wrong direction, and that reductions might be made in other taxes which would be far more in the interest of those who need reductions.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to endorse the position taken by my hon. friend from Labelle. The hon. member for Frontenac has proposed a tax on bachelors. It seems to me that that would be no more ridiculous than it would be to put a tax, as we do, upon families. It would seem to be quite in keeping that the man who has a large income and no family responsibilities should be taxed more heavily than the man who has a family and who is in every way contributing definitely to the national wealth of the country. But at present we are taxing that man most heavily. I do not know that I can say anything more than has been well said by the hon. member for Labelle. We all recognize that this reduction of ten per cent is a very uneven reduction. Ten per cent may be a comparatively small thing for the man with a small income, but a very heavy reduction for the man with a larger income. Therefore, I beg to move:

That the resolution be amended by inserting after the word "tax" in the second line the words "on incomes under $10,000".

Mr. BENNETT: As one of the two who would be subject to the tax as proposed by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards)—

An hon. MEMBER: How about the member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail)?

Mr. BENNETT: Three, the Prime Minister, the member for Southeast Grey and myself. I might observe that my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has overlooked, I think—I submit, at least—the discussion that took place last year. When the income tax was graded as it was last year, there was no provision made to overcome double taxation and I am sure that a student of economics, such as my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre, will admit that double taxation is always bad. The taxation of last year imposed upon those who received dividends from companies a double taxation, the dividends being taxed nine per cent in the possession of the company, and in the hands of its shareholders—at rates varying from ten to fifty per cent. This merely remedies the injustice then done. I daresay it is within the memory of the members of this House that their late Minister of Customs said he realized and felt the extent of that unfairness, but that it could not be dealt with at that time, and I am quite certain that the Minister of Finance has been endeavouring to ascertain what percentage of reduction would make a fair adjustment of the difficulty of double taxation. You have no justification for double taxation. For instance, if my hon. friend from East Calgary invests in a company whose net income is $5,000 per annum, that company pays a tax of $450 to the exchequer, being nine per cent of his income, and the money that is left to be divided among the shareholders is thereby lessened by $450 and becomes $4,550 instead of $5,000. Under the existing law that $4,550 is taxed to its full extent, without making any allowance for the fact that in the hands of the company it has already paid nine per cent, and this measure—a tardy measure of justice to those who pay upon the dividend —is endeavouring—it does not do it amply, it does not come near doing it—to place it upon some basis of fairness or justice. That is the position, and I am satisfied that my hon. friend who comes from my own province and those who do not come from that province, who sit to the left, desire to be fair and just. To make money is not a crime. It is not an offence to honestly toil and get the recompense for it. Toil is not an offence, and never should be an offence in any country, time or place, and the state depends largely on the revenues it can collect, so far as income tax is concerned, from those who, by their enterprise, by their ability, their perseverence, their energy, and their hard work, have been able to accumulate incomes from which the tax can be collected. I am sure that my friend from Rosetown (Mr. Evans) who spoke a few moments ago will say that he desires to be fair and just to all men. Then if money in the hands of a company is taxed, why should you have double taxation imposed upon it? I put that case to the House last year. The Minister of Finance said that it was worthy of consideration. In one instance I pointed out that money was taxed three times, and the minister said that the difficulty must be overcome. This deduction of ten per cent is merely an endeavour to adjust the taxation so as to prevent money being taxed twice. In England and in all other countries where income tax is collected it is imposed on the principle that money shall not be taxed twice for income tax purposes. This is an endeavour on the part of the minister to carry into effect the suggestion made by the late Minister of Customs himself.

May I go a step further and deal with the matter touched on by the hon. member for Labelle, which I deem of very considerable importance? Ten days ago I heard the case of a gentleman in receipt of a small professional income who has three sons at the university. He and his wife are denying themselves actual necessaries in their endeavour to give their children a chance in life. I do submit to the minister that the exemption should be extended to cover such a case. I agree heartily with the observations made by the hon. member for Labelle and the hon. member for Quebec East. The fact that there are twelve cases of $200 exemption has nothing to do with the matter at all. Where the family revenue is being diminished by reason of the effort made to support a child, whether he be eighteen or twenty years of age in order that that child may be the better able to serve the state, is something that should find recognition on the part of the minister, and I do hope that it is not yet too late for him to take action. When I talked to that gentleman the other day I made up my mind that at the first opportunity I would again urge the minister, as the hon. member for Labelle has so well done, that this exemption should extend to the time while the children are being fitted by their fathers and mothers to become useful citizens of the state. I am sure that to carry the exemption from eighteen up to twenty-one will not involve the sacrifice of much revenue. No one suggests that it should be extended beyond the age of twenty-one, although we all know that the man who sends his boy to a medical school has to support him until he is twenty-five or twenty-six years of age, for during the intervening holidays he is unable to earn any money as he usually goes into a hospital where he gets nothing more than his board. I think the matter is of such importance to the state and to the welfare of families that the suggestions made by the hon. members for Labelle and the county of Quebec as well as by the hon. member for Winnipeg should receive the hearty support of the House. Let it not be regarded as a contentious political matter. Let us deal with it as something that affects the state as a whole and therefore commends itself to the judgment of every hon. member whether Liberal or Conservative or affiliated with any of the other groups.

Miss MACPHAIL: I am opposed to any further reduction in the income tax. I do not think for one moment that the sacrifice of the man who is striving to send three boys to university is to be compared with the sacrifice of the fathers and mothers who are struggling to give their children decent food and clothing. One is almost afraid to mention the name of mother here since men preen themselves so much on having large families.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Miss MACPHAIL: I am deeply angered—not for myself, but for the sake of motherhood. This is a masculine House, so masculine that sometimes I resent it from the very depths of my soul. The size of the family is not something for men to boast of. No woman should be asked to bear very large families. It is the men and women who have moderate families and who try to give them decent food and clothing and some education on very slender incomes that I represent here and that I am concerned with. I must take exception to the statement made by the man who has just taken his seat—whom I respect very much personally—that people of great wealth are necessarily good citizens. Very often they are anti-social in all their tendencies and actions, and they are the people responsible for conditions that make it impossible for many boys and girls to ever get a university education. They are the people who will benefit by a reduction in the income tax. So I stand in my place once more to say that I oppose any reduction of the income tax with all my strength. Supposing all our boys and girls go to university and become doctors and lawyers, under heaven what kind of country would we have! Sometimes the intellectual snobbishness of people who have received a university training makes me thankful that I have never been able to attend university, much as I have wanted to. If a boy has reached twenty-six or twenty-seven years of age, and has never supported himself, he will not be as good a citizen as if he had at least assisted his parents part of the time in maintaining him. Therefore I repeat, we should not further reduce the income tax. We must have revenue, and if we do not take it from the people who are able to pay we will have to take it in increasing measure from the people who are not able to pay.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has moved in amendment to the resolution now before the committee to insert after the word "tax" in the second line the words "on incomes under $10,000." I regret that I must rule this amendment out of order because it interferes with the scope of the resolution, and no such amendment may be moved by other than a minister of the crown.

Mr. GARDINER: Will the Chairman state his authority?

The CHAIRMAN: I am quoting the same authority as that which I relied on in connection with the amendment moved by the hon. member for Labelle.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I point out that if this amendment is adopted, instead of decreasing it will increase the revenues of the country?

The CHAIRMAN: To that extent it interferes with the scope of the resolution.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I submit that this is an altogether new type of ruling. We have had the rule invoked in the past that a private member is not competent to introduce a resolution which would lessen the national revenues; but it has always been held that it is open to a private member to cut down estimates or to do anything else that would not reduce the revenues of the country. In this particular case the purpose of the amendment is to increase the revenue. If such a ruling as this is to prevail, why, we may as well leave this committee for it will be absolutely useless to remain here. I challenge the ruling of the chair.

Mr. BOURASSA: Mr. Chairman, while I have not consulted the authorities for some years, I still recall some of the rulings of old, and having received within the past two hours advice contradictory to your ruling, I am beginning to ask myself if the rules are to be interpreted according to the convenience of the government or not. I notice that Bourinot is quite clear on this point. For many years he was the respected Clerk of this House, and I think he is just as good an authority as any other that can be cited. I have noticed that at times Bourinot is invoked when his opinion coincides with the interests of the government, but otherwise he is ignored. But even May contains a precedent that I think is applicable to the amendment that I proposed. Let me read it.

The principle, that the sanction of the crown must be given to every grant of money drawn from the public revenue, applies equally to the taxation levied to provide that revenue. No motion can therefore be made to impose a tax, save by a minister of the crown, unless such tax be in substitution, by way of equivalent, for taxation at that moment submitted to the consideration of parliament; nor can the amount of a tax proposed on behalf of the crown be augmented, nor any alteration made in the area of imposition.

In support of the last sentence May quotes this precedent:

On the 14th March, 1844, Mr. Howard Elphinstone proposed a committee of the whole House to consider the Stamp Acts, with the view of imposing the same amount of probate duty on real estate as was paid on personal property.

There we have a very different case. Suppose we had proposed to extend the sales tax upon certain merchandise not already taxed, we should be increasing the area of imposition within the meaning of this opinion. Or suppose we proposed to extend the income tax to certain incomes not already taxed; that, again, would come under this rule. Let us now take our dear friend Bourinot:

If the government approve of any plan of taxation suggested by a private member, it is the constitutional course for them to propose it themselves in the committee of ways and means. This was done in the English House in the case of a resolution to extend the probate duty upon property above the value of one million. If the government object, that a motion imposing a tax is not required by the exigencies of the public service, the member offering it should at once withdraw it. All the authorities go to show that, when the government have formally submitted to the House the question for the revision of customs and excise duties—

Mr. GUTHRIE: I rise to a point of order. There can be no discussion on a ruling of the Chair: if any discussion were allowed the debate might be interminable. When the Chairman makes a ruling his duty is to leave the chair immediately if any exception is taken. I submit that the hon. member is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN: The point raised by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) is well taken. No debate may ensue on a ruling of the Chair, but an appeal may be taken from it to the House.

Mr. ROBB: Having reached that conclusion, Mr. Chairman, if we may now come back to the bill under consideration—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. SPEAKER resumed the chair and the Chairman having reported the question, Mr. Speaker submitted it to the House in the following terms:

Whilst the committee of ways and means was considering the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Income War Tax Act, 1917, to provide that the rates of tax be reduced by ten per centum.

Mr. Woodsworth moved the following amendment:

That the resolution be amended by inserting after the word "tax" in the second line the words "on incomes under $10,000".

The Chairman ruled the amendment out of order on the ground that no private member can move to impose a tax, nor can any alteration be made in the area of imposition proposed by a minister of the crown. The question now is, is it the pleasure of the House that the Chairman's ruling be confirmed?

The House divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the Chairman be confirmed? And the ruling was confirmed on the following division:

[Mr. Speaker.]

The House resumed in committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. ROBB: I would not like the House or the country to be left with the impression, which some of us seem to have this afternoon, that this government have not made any concessions to those who have dependents. When the income tax was first introduced I was a member of this parliament and my recollection is that the exemption was $200 for dependents of eighteen years of age and under. This government increased that exemption to $300 and later we increased it to $500. In addition we increased the exemption to the individual so that a married person had an exemption of $3,000 and if there were four children in the family the total exemption would be and is $5,000 to-day. Therefore, if a married man with a family of four children has an income of $5,000 he has no income tax to pay.

In that connection may I give a comparison between the federal government, the different provincial governments that have income taxation and the United States where they have income taxtion? It is true that the exemption under the United States federal act is $3,500 for a married person, but their exemption for dependents is only $400, while ours is $500. The Ontario government have given notice of some changes recently, but they are not applicable on this year's income, and according to our records, in Ontario, for married persons the exemption is only $2,000 and for dependents, $400. In Manitoba the exemption is $2,000 with an exemption for dependents of $300.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The province of Ontario does not collect income tax. The municipalities do so.

Mr. ROBB: The province of Ontario through legislation enables the municipalities to tax incomes. In British Columbia the total exemption for a married person is $1,500 and for dependents, $200. In the state of New York the exemption for dependents is $400 and in the state of Massachusetts it is $250, so that we are somewhat in advance of them in our exemptions.

Some hon. gentleman has referred in this debate to the question as to who pays the taxes, and it has been represented to us that the 10 per cent reduction we are now giving will go more largely to the rich man. According to the records which we have in the department where they collect the tax and have statistical records of those who pay taxes, it will be interesting to know that for the fiscal year 1925-26, it is really the employees who comprise the greatest number of taxpayers. Whoever may dodge taxtion, the employees cannot dodge taxes, because under the law the employer must send to the department a record of his employees with their salaries so that the government is able to check them up. The total number, not incorporated, who paid taxes in the fiscal year 1925-26 was:

Agrarians	3,643
Professional men	17,559
Employees	158,253
Merchants	14,136
Manufacturers	2,543
All others	19,143

While the employees constituted about 73 per cent of the taxpayers, they paid not quite 24½ per cent. The merchants paid almost 12 per cent; the manufacturers, 28 per cent, and all others, 30 per cent. The agrarians paid about one-half of one per cent. It is interesting in that connection to remind hon. gentlemen what I said a few days ago, namely, that the corporations have also paid a considerable amount in taxes and that is not limited to one province. I have already placed that on record.

Some person during the debate suggested that many people were dodging taxes through coupon bonds. That is perfectly true and we know it, but the difficulty is to reach those tax-dodgers. If you put a tax on the coupons, you cannot put a tax on the man who is dodging or trying to dodge taxes without penalizing the honest man as well, because you must tax all coupons. According to the present legislation coupons up to $10 are exempt, so that it is pretty hard to reach that class. My hon. friend is quite right; we know there are people who are dodging some taxes, but, generally speaking, they are paying fairly well.

Just one word in regard to the so-called wealthy individuals who are exempt from this income tax. I think I pointed out to the House during the budget debate that very strong pressure had been brought to bear upon the government from people throughout Canada representing hospitals and other institutions, that we should make exemptions for those who contributed towards hospitals. The ten per cent reduction on the income tax was given as a concession towards that application, and also as a concession, as was represented by the hon. member for West Calgary, the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Bennett), to those who complained that there was double taxation in the legislation of last year. To that extent we have reduced it. But to come back to those who contribute to hospitals, there is at present in Montreal a united campaign being carried on for all their hospitals. The other day there was brought to my attention the case of a gentleman—and I suppose there are many others—who had contributed $150,000 to this hospital campaign. This sort of thing is going on throughout Canada. These hospitals are maintained not only for the wealthy and other city people who are able to pay, but for those who are not able to pay. It is therefore a little unreasonable always to attack that class of individuals.

I do not want to delay my own legislation; but to come to the observations of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), the ex-Minister of Finance, and the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion), who have urged us to make this further exemption in regard to those who are attending schools or colleges, I do not know where we are going to reach the limit. We must have revenue from some sources, and the government must have money to carry on and administer the affairs of the country, and to pay the interest on the war debt. I was not very much impressed with the argument of selecting certain persons who were attending college. I was somewhat inclined towards the view expressed by the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) that there are other people in this country who deserve consideration. But this appeals to me in the observations of the hon. member for Labelle, that after all, under the law, a Canadian is only legally responsible when he reaches the age of twenty-one years. I will admit, as was stated by the hon. member for Fort William, that as regards some professional men who are sending their children on to higher colleges, we come in under the law and tax them a little more perhaps when the young man or woman is going on to college in order to be equipped to become either a doctor or a lawyer, if you will, I think we have about all the lawyers we can get along with in this House now. I have had an experience of some years in connection with the public schools of our country, and I think people are going into the teaching profession just a little bit too young. I think it might be in the interests of the country if they attended college just a little longer. I have read the record of what my former colleague the Minister of Customs said last year, and while he was very careful and did not make any direct commitment, there was an inference that the government would give consideration to this matter, and so my hon. friend from Labelle will be glad to know that I propose now, Mr. Chairman, to move this amendment.

Resolved that section 4, subsection (1A) (c) be amended by striking out the word "eighteen" therein contained, and inserting the words "twenty-one", and that this amendment be made applicable to the income period 1926.

Mr. McGIBBON: I have not anything particular to oppose in this amendment, although on general principles I am opposed to class legislation; I do not think it is right. I think we are on the wrong track when we give special privileges to certain classes of individuals. But what I rose to impress on the minister was this: He has not justified, at least to my mind, his action in taxing gifts to hospitals, and such like. I would like to remind him of the fact that there is hardly a hospital in the country that pays its way, and of the further fact that the people who can pay to go to a hospital are taxed far beyond the actual cost of nursing and medical attention in the hospital. These institutions are run primarily for the benefit of the poor. The nurses in these institutions get practically nothing but their board and lodging and their uniforms, and the medical men and surgeons give their time and their services practically for nothing. That is certainly true with regard to the ward patients. Now the Minister of Finance comes along and instead of relieving these hospitals which are financially embarrassed, he taxes the donations that are made to them. I submit that there is no justification for any such action, which is bound to be reflected in the workings of these institutions. It is going to affect charitable donations to these institutions, which are very much in need of help to-day. If these hospitals are to be maintained, they must have the means to carry on, and I submit that this legislation is bad, and it is bound to be reflected in the carrying on of the work of these institutions. I believe the minister should have a better reason than he has given the committee yet for maintaining this tax.

Mr. ADSHEAD: If I gathered the hon. member's remarks aright, he says that the hospitals are carried on mostly in the interests of the so-called poor people, and that the rich largely contribute out of their means for the maintenance of these hospitals for the benefit of the poor. We in this corner of the House believe and have maintained that the so-called poor man has just as much right to health and the best medical attention as any other citizen of Canada. That is his birthright. We have also maintained in times past, and we do now, that a part of his birthright is a common school education provided out of the taxes upon the community. No doubt in days gone by when schools were not public, philanthropic people gave out of their purses to maintain private schools and give the poor an education. But we maintain that the poor people have a perfect right to health and the best medical attention irrespective of their financial condition. My hon. friend's remarks remind me of the statement that was made by a certain gentleman that the Lord created the poor in order that the rich should shower upon them their philanthropy. We dissent from that, and I maintain that the day will come when the hospitals will be tax-maintained, and when every man will have the right to the best medical attention without being called poor.

Mr. McGIBBON: I do not know what relevance these remarks have to my argument. I am talking of things as they exist to-day. There is no doubt at all that the poor people are being given practically free treatment in the hospitals to-day, and nobody is complaining about that. What I am saying is that these institutions must have financial support, and when people give donations to these hospitals the minister comes along and taxes those donations. I maintain that he has no right to any part of that money.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not know what the hon. gentleman is getting at. He has not shown how much private individuals contribute to the upkeep of hospitals. I can speak with a little knowledge of what is taking place in Winnipeg. Practically all the hospitals in Winnipeg are maintained out of taxes on the community, and I believe that applies to most of the cities in western Canada. Only a very small percentage of the amount of upkeep is contributed by men inclined to give to these institutions. In the case of a poor person who is unable to pay, the municipality is responsible for the amount to the hospital. I believe the very same thing applies in most of the provinces of Canada. I do not believe that five per cent of the amount required for the upkeep of the hospitals is contributed by private individuals in western Canada, and in Winnipeg the facts are exactly as I have stated.

Mr. McGIBBON: I can also speak with a little knowledge of Winnipeg, for I lived there at one time. I say that the municipal tax does not cover the nursing and medical attention. It possibly covers the board bill, and that is about all.

Mr. HEAPS: For a number of years I was on the board of the General hospital in the city of Winnipeg, and also on the city council, which had to deal with this question. I know the number of appeals that the hospitals make in the city of Winnipeg. Only a couple of weeks ago the city granted an amount in the neighbourhood of $20,000 to make up the deficit on one year's operation of the General hospital. The municipal hospitals of Winnipeg, which take care of tubercular cases—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEAPS: —are maintained entirely out of the taxes levied on the people of the city of Winnipeg, and if my hon. friend from Muskoka-Ontario had become a little better acquainted with the workings of the hospitals in Winnipeg he would not have made the statement he has made about the extent of philanthropic donations to these institutions. There may be some cities where large grants have been made, but generally speaking, the maintenance of these hospitals comes from the revenue derived from general taxation by the municipalities.

Mr. COOTE: I desire to make a protest against any proposal to exempt from income tax any gifts of wealthy people to hospitals or to universities, particularly to the universities. Hospitals should be maintained by the municipalities. I think that is almost invariably the practice in western Canada. We have hospitals in our rural districts which are maintained by the municipalities. The universities should be maintained by the state and should not be dependent in any degree upon private subscriptions. It is the duty of the state to educate our young. Universities should be open to our boys and girls at as low a fee as possible.

I would not support the amendment with any degree of enthusiasm. I have had to earn my own living since I was sixteen years of age. Many of those boys going to universities would be benefited if they had to go out and earn the money to enable them to go through the university. I think it might be just as valuable to them in after life as the training they receive in the university itself. Although I am not going to oppose the amendment, possibly the minister would have been well advised to have left it out of the resolution altogether. I hope the time will come—it may be a long time coming—when boys and girls in the 'teen age, having put in four or five years either on the farm or in the factory, and having a good record from their employers, will be given a chance to go to a university at a cost which they can afford to pay out of the earnings they have made during those years.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I do not think my hon. friend who has just spoken should cast any reflection on the boys and girls who go through the university. Like many other hon. members of the House, I have been through a university, and I know that a vast number of the boys and girls put themselves through the universities. I have a boy attending university, as many of us in this House have. A great many of these boys are doing as we did in former days, endeavouring to put themselves through, and instead of getting up and finding fault with the boys and girls who are attending the the universities we should commend them for doing the very thing which will fit them to become good citizens. I am convinced that the vast majority of students contribute largely to their own maintenance while attending university.

Mr. COOTE: Could my hon. friend quote anything I said that would in any way be a reflection on any boy or girl going through the university? If I said anything of that kind it was unintentional.

The CHAIRMAN: The discussion is wholly irrelevant to the matter before the committee.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Will this amendment apply irrespective of whether these boys and girls are under the care of their parents? I think it would be an anomaly if a father, having several children who were out earning their living, possibly at eighteen years of age, could until they were twenty-one claim the exemption for dependent children.

Mr. ROBB: There is no change whatever in the regulation as applied to the age of eighteen years. It applies to dependents.

Mr. BENNETT: I did point out to the minister the difficulties experienced by those who carry on business in partnership as distinguished from those who have companies. The contention is made that two gentlemen across the street carrying on business in partnership pay no income tax in connection with their enterprise, except such sums as are individually drawn out, whereas if two persons link themselves together as a joint stock company, with the aid of one other, they have to pay nine per cent of their revenue. I brought this matter to the attention of the government a few minutes ago and I have not received an answer. The minister was looking into it, and I would like to know his conclusion upon that matter.

Mr. EULER: I may say for the information of my hon. friend—although he knows it probably as well as I do—that the statement he made is not borne out entirely. Two men across the street form themselves into a limited liability company. If they come under the head of "family corporation" they may elect to be taxed as if such corporation were a partnership.

Mr. BENNETT: But the partnership makes no contribution by way of income tax at all.

Mr. EULER: The partners individually do.

Mr. BENNETT: Only on what they draw out.

Mr. EULER: Oh, no.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that clear?

Mr. ROBB: Whether withdrawn or not.

Mr. BENNETT: That has not been done. My attention has been directed to a concrete case.

Mr. ROBB: I am told by an officer of the department that the members of the partnership pay on the profits whether they are withdrawn or not. I have had some personal experience where profits were not withdrawn.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Robb thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 150, to amend the Income War Tax Act, 1917.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first and second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. ROBB: I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again. By way of explanation I may say that the bill will have to be reprinted to meet the amendment which I introduced this afternoon.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the minister also consider the question raised by the hon. member for Labelle, to which one of the members from Toronto would like to speak, as to whether or not coupons should be required to bear a two cent stamp?

Progress reported.

RULES OF THE HOUSE

REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER REVISION

Mr. SPEAKER: In order to facilitate the business of the House, by unanimous consent we will revert to motions. I beg to lay on the table the report, in both French and English, of the special committee appointed to revise the rules of the House of Commons.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

PATENT OF ALBERT P. FRIGON

The House resumed, from March 8, consideration in committee of Bill No. 42, respecting certain patents owned by Albert P. Frigon. —Mr. Mercier (St. Henri)—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1.—Term of duration extended.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 1 has been amended by changing the word "fifteen" in the sixth line to the word "ten".

Mr. ADSHEAD: I thought that this bill was to be reprinted as amended. There were so many changes in the original bill that we do not know just where we are.

The CHAIRMAN: The bill cannot be reprinted without an order from the House.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Drastic amendments were made in the original bill.

The CHAIRMAN: There is another amendment to section 1. In the sixth line on page 2 the word "forty-one" has been changed to "thirty-six."

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): The preamble was considerably altered, was it not?

The CHAIRMAN: The first three lines of the preamble stand:

Whereas Albert P. Frigon of the city of Montreal, province of Quebec, has by his petition set forth that he is the owner of certain patents—

The word "being" in the seventeenth line is struck out and in the twenty-fifth line the word "forty-one" is changed to the word "thirty-six."

Preamble agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the bill?

Mr. ADSHEAD: Do I understand your ruling to be, Mr. Chairman, that a bill so radically amended as this one has been cannot be reprinted without an order of the House?

The CHAIRMAN: That is the rule; unless the private bills committee moves for an order to do so—and that was not done in this instance—the bill cannot be reprinted.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

MONTREAL, OTTAWA AND GEORGIAN BAY CANAL COMPANY

The House resumed from Monday, March 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chevrier for the second reading of Bill No. 78, respecting the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Guthrie.

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto): Mr. Speaker, I find myself in the happy if somewhat unusual position of being in agreement with the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). As they have put it, the question is simply whether this House will support the principle of public ownership of public utilities or will sanction the transfer of public utilities to private interests. I take it that the appropriate time to deal with such a matter as that now before the House is on the second reading of the bill. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie), who is entitled to great consideration when he enunciates points of procedure, has put very clearly before the House the position which the House may and should take on the second reading of a bill such as this. Not only is he entitled to receive the greatest attention, but he is supported by the greatest authority having to do with parliamentary procedure. More than that, what the leader of the opposition has said and what May in his work says will appeal to this House on another ground even more strongly, and that is that it is common sense; it is the sort of deliverance which will appeal to the wayfaring man as showing the only proper and right course to take.

My friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) cited the case of divorce bills, an unhappy illustration I should think for his side of the question. Of course when we pass the second reading of divorce bills we accept the principle of divorce; it was accepted a long time ago, and whether or not he who votes in favour of the second reading of a divorce bill believes in divorce, he certainly does sanction the approval long ago given to the granting of divorces by this House. The bill then goes to committee, where it is decided whether the standard set up in regard to that matter has been met in that particular bill, but no one would think for a moment that in committee on a divorce bill that bill should be thrown out because the committee did not approve of the principle of granting divorces.

If we are determined not to give these public rights to private interests, why send the matter to a committee? That would be simply a gesture and a waste of time, the matter having already been decided by the House. If on the other hand you are ready to grant these public rights to private interests, then by all means send the bill to a committee, because there you can settle the details and terms of the surrender. It would seem certain that if a bill is sent to a committee you adopt the principle of the bill, and how anyone can arrive at any other conclusion or make any sense of an opposite view is not understandable. So I say that this House is perfectly within its rights and is doing the proper thing in fighting out on the second reading of this bill the broad principle contained therein.

As the debate has proceeded and as the various arguments have been advanced on both sides of the House it becomes more apparent that the line of division between the supporters of public ownership and those who would give public utilities to private interests runs down the centre of the aisle of this House. I have to go back only to the other day when my friend the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) prevented the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) from making a speech on this very matter. He did it with all the urbanity possible, and possibly had in his mind at the time those words by Lewis Carroll:

> "I weep for you," the Walrus said;
> "I deeply sympathize.
> With sobs and tears he sorted out
> Those of the largest size,
> Holding his pocket-handkerchief
> Before his streaming eyes.

That indication came from that quarter; another came from the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) and then we come to the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Glen) and the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. McPherson), both bringing specious arguments directed mainly against the province of Ontario and its public utilities, but showing underneath them all that while they were struggling hard to find an excuse they felt in their own hearts that they were doing wrong, and that they were striking a blow against a principle which they have advocated throughout their constituencies. I fancy, Mr. Speaker, that the hustings of Portage la Prairie resounded with declarations in favour of public ownership during the last election campaign; I can imagine that the halls of Marquette re-echoed with the same sentiment, and that in the wide open spaces of those constituencies now represented by my Liberal-Progressive friends the air was filled with the determination of these candidates who now sit in the House to uphold this great principle at all costs. Well, the hustings and the halls are waiting; the wide open spaces are still there, and there remains only the home-coming of these gentlemen, to make some explanation of why, on the first opportunity of striking a blow for a principle they had advocated, they were recreant to their promise.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in his remarks last night said that the Minister of Railways had removed a good deal of the camouflage which had surrounded this bill. If I may be allowed to say so, Mr. Speaker, I think that is exactly what he did not do; in my humble opinion the Minister of Railways devoted his attention to laying on a particularly thick coat of camouflage. He was debating the amendment before the House, and with the comparatively insignificant omission of any reference whatever to the subject under debate, he made a very good campaign speech. He is not in the House, but I would like to say to him very kindly that during the course of that address it seemed to me that he missed most deplorably the town hall audience which is so admirable a target for such an address. The Minister of Railways wants this bill to go to committee; why? So that the whole question may be before the House. What whole question? Mr. Speaker, the question forsooth of the fight between certain interests known as the Sifton and the Holt interests; that, he said was the bone of contention. I cannot think he is on solid ground there; what business is it of members of this House how Sifton and Holt get on? What have we to do with the gang warfare of private concerns like that? For all we care they may both suffer from their quarrels, the fate of Kilkenny cats. We are here to decide a question which has nothing whatever to do with Sifton or Holt; it is the broad general question of whether we are to control for the people the public utilities of this country.

The Minister of Railways wants the bill to go to committee; why? So that he may commence an exposé of some alleged wrong-doing on the part of the late government. If there has been any wrong-doing, by all means bring it out. If the Carillon order in council contains matters that require explanations, let those explanations be made. There are ways of doing this. Let it come up in the proper way; let the House have the whole matter before it, and if there was any wrong-doing on the part of the previous Conservative government, let it be brought out. No one will welcome that more than those who sit on this side of the House. We do not believe from what we hear there is anything in the one-sided story which the Minister of Railways has given to us; but be that as it may, I still say that it has no relevancy whatever to the discussion in which we are engaged at the present moment. May I suggest in all kindness that the reason why the Minister of Railways, speaking for the government, wants this bill to go to the committee, is that he may, by calling witnesses for this and that, by raking up scandals and old political scores, endeavour to evolve political material for the next occasion on which he may hope to use it.

The government has deliberately, so he says, brought up this matter. If that be so, I wonder at their bringing it up by way of a private bill advanced by the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier). If they want to make the fight and bring the whole matter up for discussion and settlement by the House, let them come at it direct and unafraid and not shelter their attack behind a private bill introduced by a private member. The speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite seek to divert the attention of the House from the real issue. It is all very well to speak of the northern part of Ontario and its power problem, to talk of the Gatineau, to hold out fears of this and that; but the purpose underlying all the addresses made on the opposite side of the House is manifest to everyone who is here, namely, to divert our attention from the matter that is really before the House for discussion. The Minister of Railways made an admirable speech of its kind; but, as I say, it had absolutely nothing to do with the matter under discussion. If we analyze it in its application to what we are discussing, and if it is an argument at all, it is that sort of argument which is variously described from the "tu quoque" of the erudite down along the line to the equally understandable colloquialism of "so's your old man." In other words, it is that sort of argument that finds its ultimate conclusion in this and in this only: "If we are doing wrong, we are excused because you also did wrong."

I shall not pause to consider longer the red herring which has been attempted to be drawn across the trail, the red herring of the Carillon order in council. But this side of the House is, I am assured, ready and willing to meet any discussion on that matter when it is brought up for discussion. I mistake very much if the most thorough search amongst the proceedings taken by the late government will show that there is any deep-dyed villain in the plot; that there has been any plan which has a bearing directly or indirectly upon the question of the Ottawa and Georgian bay canal. Be that as it may, if the government be sincere in what the Minister of Railways has said, let it open up the matter as soon and as widely as it can.

The government may have a suspicious mind; it seems to have imagination. A theory is propounded that strikes one as being the sort of stuff that dreams are made on. The same suspicion seems to have been aroused in the mind of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Glen); but strangely enough that suspicion did not first find expression in this House. It found expression first in an interview granted by one of the Siftons, I think Mr. Harry Sifton, and quoted in this House not long ago, when he said that the whole secret of the opposition to the bill lay in the fact that the St. James street interests, or the "crowd", or whatever the words were, had tried to run Canada and, failing in that, they were now endeavouring to run the House of Commons. That is the genesis of the whole argument. That is where it sprang from. If it has been adopted by the government or by the Liberal Progressives, so much the worse. Any member who is swayed by such clap-trap as that is welcome to the sensation.

Are we to renew this charter which is now thirty-four years of age, with nothing as yet accomplished, nothing attempted to be done? Is it to be forever rejuvenescent? Are we to be met every year or every two or three years, or whatever the terms of the extension may be, by the Siftons holding for ransom one of the most valuable rights that Canada can give away. This is the time and this is the place when we should strike a blow that will deliver us from this threat now and for all time to come.

A great deal has been made by the interests who are supporting this bill of an amendment which was introduced into a renewal act dated in 1912, whereby the price of power was to be fixed before sale by the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada. The literature of parties supporting this bill, sent out from time to time, has made a great deal of capital of the statement that Sir Adam Beck agreed that the bill might go through provided only that this clause were inserted. It is within the memory of man that that is not the case; it is not true. Sir Adam Beck was here in 1912 fighting this bill as hard as he knew how. He was overcome; the bill was going through and he saved what he could. He accepted the clause which the committee offered to put in, fixing the price of power by a reference to the Board of Railway Commissioners; but to say that he consented to the bill then or at any time before or after, is an absolute untruth. He did not consent to the bill; he opposed it to the best of his ability, and as the result of his fight he only managed to have that clause, a futile clause, I may say, inserted in the bill.

Can we consider that as some sort of clause which will help us in the sale of power? What is to be the price of power? To begin with, the Board of Railway Commissioners has no facilities whatever for determining what shall be the price of power, and the price of power generated in the Ottawa river will be the price not only of the power itself but of the canals and other works that go to make up that scheme. The board has announced the policy and it has adhered to it in case after case that on all common stock of companies, like the Bell Telephone Company, which handle public utilities, there shall be an 8 per cent dividend and over and above that a 2 per cent allowance on capital stock for profit. That means a 10 per cent return on all the company's stock, watered as it may be. You would have something that people would find absolutely impossible to overcome in purchasing power. The owners would have along the Ottawa river a monopoly that could not be met by any development which the Ontario hydro has. What the traffiic will bear will govern the price.

I believe Quebec is just as much interested in having its industries along the Ottawa river maintained as is Ontario, and the rights of these two peoples, on either side of that great interprovincial stream with its unlimited water-powers, are to be sacrificed to the demand of politicians, whether associated with the government or not, who seek to get this great heritage for their private and personal ends.

This is ostensibly a canal, Mr. Speaker. Very well, then; if it is a canal, why have it built by private enterprise? The day of the toll gate is past. We can remember roads than ran through Ontario, and hon. gentlemen will no doubt remember them in every other province, where you had to pay at a gate every now and then for the privilege of travelling over that road. That is a thing of the past, and yet this bill proposes to make a great national waterway, something of infinitely greater importance than a road, subject to tolls at the instance of a private corporation. But we need not concern ourselves much in regard to the canal or the canalization part of this bill. The Minister of Railways and Canals who spoke on behalf of the government the other evening said that this is not a canal scheme but a power scheme, and the whole question is as to who shall have the control of this vast reservoir of power. Then are we here, I ask once more, to determine a fight between two rival interests, or are we to determine a fight between private enterprise on the one side, and on the other the control by the people of this Dominion of their own great natural resources in order that they may develop them for the public good?

The maritime provinces have grievances, Mr. Speaker. Out in the western provinces the question of the natural resources being returned to the provincial government has become an active issue, and we hear that claims are being made in British Columbia for the return of what they consider themselves entitled to. Here we in the central provinces are asking at the same time for something of the same sort. We do not claim anything positive. All we say is that the Dominion government must keep its hands off our natural resources, that this great interprovincial river, with its almost undreamed of power possibilities, shall be preserved to the people of these two provinces, so that they may develop their resources as they see fit.

One hon. gentleman opposite the other evening was quoting from an editorial in a Cochrane paper. The editorial, as far as I heard it read—it was not all read—was complaining that the Ontario government or the Hydro Electric Commission of Ontario would not step in and relieve the people of that district from the imposition of tremendously high power charges, charges that were being imposed by a private company. If anything were needed to sustain the position of the province of Ontario as to the wisdom of putting into the hands of public enterprise the development of electrical energy throughout the province, then that agitation in Cochrane is sufficient. My own personal view —I do not say that it matters what my view is, but I am one of those who believe that the province of Ontario made a great mistake when it did not go into that northern country with its hydro enterprise. We should have introduced hydro-electric power under the Hydro Electric Commission of Ontario into that northern country. Perhaps it seemed too big a thing. Whatever the reason was, and what it was I do not exactly know, we refrained from going into that northern country.

Mr. MANION: They have power at Nipigon.

Mr. GEARY: I am speaking of that part of northern Ontario, around Cobalt and Cochrane. We refrained from going in there, and that editorial that was read from the Cochrane paper was, as I say, proof of the great mistake that was made not only by the government of Ontario but by the people of that district, in not insisting that electrical energy should be developed from the water-powers of that part of the country for the benefit of the people at cost. They are suffering from high charges now, owing to somebody's fault, and if we had to do it all over again we should introduce hydro-electric power all through that part of the country.

Reference has been made to the Gatineau. The gentleman who made that reference adduced it as evidence that Ontario was not sincere in its development of hydro-electric power. The difficulty in Ontario is that we have exhausted all our available power. We are facing a shortage of power. We cannot get power from the St. Lawrence development for many years to come, and long before that power is available we shall have suffered a shortage running to something like 100,000 horse-power per year. Something had to be done, and the commission, according to their best judgment, did as they did at the very inception of the enterprise; they bought blocks of power from private enterprise, and then distributed that at cost, as though they had developed the power themselves from our own resources. It is not that Ontario in any sense is going back on the hydro-electric policy, and my hon. friend who voiced the dread the other night that perhaps we might be led from that path need have no fear. It is not the government of Ontario, but the municipalities of Ontario, that have put up their money; it is their enterprise and their money that built it. All that the government does is to endorse our cheques; it is the municipalities that are responsible. We have $290,000,000 invested in that enterprise now, and we are not going to see it fail; so my friend from the west need have no fear.

I do not intend to detain the House at any length on this matter, except to try and impress once more that if you do not kill this bill, and kill it at the first opportunity you have, it will drag on subject to all sorts of pressure, influences, arguments and persuasions, until goodness knows where we shall get with it. Now is the time to deal with it when we can administer the final death blow to the enterprise, and leave that whole territory with its vast potentialities, that rich source of power, the Ottawa river and the French, open to the people of this province to develop as they have developed other resources in the many years during which we have had the hydro; and open too, on the other side, to the province of Quebec, so to utilize their own natural resources that they will not be hampered by their being placed in the hands of private interests, who naturally will, as they always have done, farm those natural resources, exact high rates through monopoly control, and bring about the very state of affairs which Ontario had to get out of years ago.

Let me tell the House the origin of the hydro-electric power enterprise of Ontario. It was just because private enterprise had their hands upon the supply of power, with the government of the province of Ontario session after session giving away new power advantages to these private corporations, the rates the people were being charged became unendurable. The people were being milked Moneys were exacted from them till they rose as a unit and said: "No more of this. This private control of public utilities without which we cannot do must no longer remain in the hands of private corporations to be exploited only for their own selfish interests. It must be in the hands of the people who originally held this water-power tumbling over falls in the course of nature. It belongs to the people of the country, and it should be utilized for them alone." And we in Ontario rose to the occasion. We had the courage of our convictions, and in town after town, township after township, city after city, we put up tens of millions of dollars, and in Toronto tens upon tens of millions of dollars, backing our faith with our money. And we are successful. We are meeting all our obligations, and the people are getting what they are entitled to—power at cost, free from all the unrighteous demands that private enterprise from time to time has put upon them.

I have just this word to say in conclusion. We must not be criticised for fighting this bill at this stage. We have got to take every opportunity to strike a blow for the principle that underlies our opposition to this bill. If hon. gentlemen opposite can convince themselves that they should allow the Ottawa river to be given to private enterprise, let them pass this bill. If, on the other hand, they believe as we do, that the power belongs naturally to the people of this country, and should be developed by the people for the people, and at cost, free from all the unrighteous profits made by private enterprise, they should determine at this stage to cast a vote in favour of this amendment, and thus do away with any possibility of this interprovincial stream with all its potentialities being diverted from the uses of the people to the uses of private interests.

Mr. BENIAH BOWMAN (East Algoma): It has been interesting, Mr. Speaker, to listen to the discussion upon the bill before the House respecting the Georgian bay canal. We in northern Ontario are vitally interested in this matter, because a waterway from the Atlantic to the head of the lakes that would pass by our front door would mean something to northern Ontario. It would mean a great deal to the district of East Algoma, which I have the honour to represent in this House.

Listening to the discussion as it has proceeded I could not help wondering whether we were afraid that the canal would not be built, or whether the fear was that the canal might be built. Frankly I almost think the apprehension is that the canal might possibly be built. I am convinced it would be of great advantage to the Dominion of Canada. It could not help but prove of wonderful advantage to northern Ontario to have this great waterway pass along just where it is needed in order to benefit that section of the country. During the past number of years that district has made rapid progress. For a long time it has been asking for hydro development and it is greatly interested in this scheme. It is true that in old Ontario the hydro-electric has made wonderful progress because of the fact that behind the project are strong municipalities that are able to give their bonds under the guarantee of the government of Ontario. That is the system on which the Hydro Electric Power Commission is able to function in Ontario.

The discussion so far, rather than following along the line of the canal, has drifted into a discussion of power development; I wish, therefore, to speak for a few minutes on that phase of the question. Northern Ontario has not had the advantage of hydro-electric development. I think I am correct in saying —and someone will correct me if I am wrong —that there has been only one power development in northern Ontario by the Hydro Electric Power Commission, and that development would not be possible were it not for the cities of Fort William and Port Arthur. Northern Ontario is a new country and it has not been possible for the hydro-electric commission to develop those powers, owing to the lack of municipalities strong enough to get behind the scheme; and so the developments in northern Ontario have been made by private concerns and private capital. Were it not for the private capital expended in northern Ontario that country would not be developed to the extent that it is to-day. Where is the government, where is the parliament, that would pass estimates for large, untried developments when the public does not know whether or not they would be a success? Private enterprise has gone into northern Ontario and made that country what it is to-day, and, Sir, this House is not in a position to vote $100,000,000 to go on with the project. I feel quite sure that unless this development is undertaken by private enterprise the Georgian bay canal will not be built. I do not know whether or not the Georgian bay canal is feasible. I do not know whether or not this is the right company to develop that project, but I do say that this bill should go to committee, and in the committee we ought to have an opportunity of gathering the facts and hearing the different people who are interested in it so that we may form an opinion and decide whether or not the bill should be passed.

It is said that this development ought to be carried on by the government, and that is quite true; that would be the proper course if the government were in a position to go ahead with it. But I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is not going to be very long until this House will have to decide upon another development, namely, the development of the St. Lawrence. I am satisfied that the government will not be prepared to find the money for both of them in the near future.

We in northern Ontario, I repeat, are vitally interested in the bill which is now before the House. It is true the charter was granted a long while ago and has been renewed time after time, and apparently nothing has been done. But conditions have changed, and I think it is only right and proper that we should ascertain at this time whether this company is prepared to proceed with this development or whether it has something else in view. If the company intends to develop the power and does not intend to go on with the canal, we should know it. On the other hand if we do not allow this or some other private company to go on with this development what guarantee have we that these powers will be developed by the province of Ontario or the province of Quebec? Judging from the discussion which we have had in this House it would seem to be the view of some that if these powers were developed by private enterprise they would be of very little use to the province of Ontario or the province of Quebec. But these powers are still in Ontario and in Quebec, and I feel quite sure that the power would be used here and not transported to a foreign country. So that if this power is developed, even by private enterprise, it will be here to be used by the people who need it.

I say further that if the reported arrangement with the Gatineau Power Company for current at $15 per horse-power is correct, the rate is about as cheap as the Hydro Electric Power Commission can furnish power. I am not arguing in favour of the hydro buying power from private concerns, but it will be difficult for the Hydro Electric Power Commission to furnish power very much cheaper than that $15 per horse-power.

Mr. HEAPS: Can the hon. member give his authority for the statement that he has just made? I know we are developing power out west for as low as $10 per horse-power.

Mr. BOWMAN: I think you have cheaper power out west than we have in Ontario.

Mr. HEAPS: It is generated 70 miles away.

Mr. BOWMAN: If I remember aright Winnipeg has about the cheapest power on the North American continent, certainly cheaper than we have in Ontario. The very same argument quoted from the Cochrane newspaper has been used in connection with the Hydro Electric Commission. It is true that the large centres are receiving their power cheaper than the smaller places, and many complaints have been made by the latter that the price they are paying is too high. I do not want to be misunderstood. I am strongly in favour of the hydro-electric power development wherever it is possible, and I believe the hydro commission has been doing its very best for the province as a whole, but the fact remains that the outlying districts feel they are being charged rates that are too high. The reason is, of course, the cost of the power lines, which are expensive to construct.

I say again, Mr. Speaker, that we in northern Ontario feel that the only way in which this development will ever be proceeded with will be through private enterprise, and undoubtedly such a development would be of great benefit not only to the north country but to the Dominion as a whole. For that reason we are anxious to see all the facts brought out so that we may be in a position to judge the matter on its merits.

Hon. E. B. RYCKMAN (East Toronto): I find myself, Mr. Speaker, very much in the plight of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) when he said last night that he intended to speak upon this question without very much preparation. However, having lived in the city of Toronto, and being familiar with the great benefits that the Hydro Electric Power Commission has conferred upon Ontario, I feel that this is an opportunity to declare the faith that is in me, a faith that I believe is held pretty generally throughout the country by all who know what the development of hydro-electric power under public ownership has meant for this province.

But what troubles me is that we are dealing with a bill that, mark you, does not mention a single word about power. This bill which we have so long discussed is a pure sham. In support of that statement I appeal to the recollection of the House as to what the Minister of Railways said last night when he jumped into this fight. He stated: Now, we all acknowledge that the bone of contention with respect to this bill is which of two private interests shall control the Carillon power. The first bill incorporating this company was passed thirty-four years ago when our predecessors had not the slightest thought of the development of the water-powers of this country. What do we find to-day? By a fluke and a side issue what never was in the minds of the original incorporators is now, according to the Minister of Railways, the chief consideration upon which hon. members are asked to decide whether or not this bill shall be given second reading.

It is plain that what is involved in this bill is not the construction of a canal but the acquisition and development of very valuable water-powers that the promoters—and I have no doubt there are more than two parties—would like to secure, and therefore I say it is time for us to pause before we take further action. I am satisfied that nothing in the nature of a canal is contemplated by those who are seeking a renewal of this charter. If it were possible to test the real opinion of hon. members, I feel certain that everyone in whatever quarter of the House he sits would acknowledge that there is not the slightest chance of a dipper of water being turned into any canal that will ever be built under this legislation. But we find northern Ontario declaring: Oh, the north needs a canal. I am confident that it does, and I would welcome the construction of a canal for the benefit of the people there who might have occasion to use it with profit. But the bill is so framed that there can be no possible prospect of a canal ever being built under it.

This measure, Mr. Speaker, reminds me of a bill that was before this House in 1925 to sanction the Petersen contract. That contract was signed by the then Minister of Trade and Commerce on behalf of the Dominion. The preamble of the bill with a great flourish set out that it was important in the interests of Canada that the Dominion should control ocean freight rates. But having read that contract, it was apparent to me, as it must have been to anyone who read it intelligently, that instead of giving to the Dominion the control of ocean freight rates, it placed that control absolutely in the lap of the late Sir William Petersen. That was the contract which the Prime Minister supported.

On motion of Mr. Ryckman the debate was adjourned.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hour for private bills having been exhausted, the House will now revert to supply.

SUPPLY

MINES AND GEOLOGICAL SURVEY

The House in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

For investigation of mineral resources and deposits; of the mining and metallurgical industries, and of mineral technology; wages, expenses of testing and research laboratories, investigations by Dominion Fuel Board, including salaries and all other expenses	$192,000
For publications, English and French, purchase of books, laboratory supplies, instruments, miscellaneous assistance and contingencies	40,000
For transportation charges from outlying provinces on ore shipments which may be sent to the ore dressing plant of the Mines branch at Ottawa for testing purposes, under regulations approved by the Minister of Mines	1,000
To compensate J. H. Fortune for quarters, fuel, light and water supplied him as resident caretaker of the Mines branch building, Sussex st., vacated because of the necessity of utilizing the caretaker's quarters for storage and laboratory space	400
	$233,400

Mr. SIMPSON: How much of this amount was spent in actual field investigation, and how much in Ottawa?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): Not much of this vote is spent in field investigation; that comes under the vote for geological surveys, for which $205,000 is asked. The vote covers chemical analyses in the laboratories. It is largely for the purpose of fuel testing, ore dressing and work in the metallurgical, ceramic and mineral product testing laboratories. In investigations of this character $192,000 is spent.

Mr. FRASER: Is that spent in Ottawa in the Booth street works?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. FRASER: Have you any plans for the extension of those buildings or would that come under some other vote?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is a separate vote. Buildings come under the Public Works department. We had an extension last year and it is planned to extend the Booth street laboratories still further.

Mr. FRASER: Does the minister consider such extension necessary?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. FRASER: Is a vote being asked for this year for the purpose?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We have not asked for one yet, but we expect to do so.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The whole vote for geological surveys and for mines is some $600,000, of which, according to page 92 of the estimates, $571,085 goes in salaries. There is an increase of six in the number of civil servants in the Mines department. How is this increase explained?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Perhaps my hon. friend will wait until we come to civil government, when I shall be glad to give the information in regard to the staff.

Mr. PARENT: Has any report been made by the officers of the department regarding the Labrador survey?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I cannot answer that question, but I do not think so. If hon. gentlemen will confine themselves to the item under discussion I can give at the proper time a detailed report of the geological survey work being done in each of the provinces.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. MANION: Has the minister any statement to make regarding investigations carried on in the development of the lower grade iron ores? I understand that the department, under Doctor Camsell, the deputy minister, has been looking into this important matter, and we ought to have a statement from the minister.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have not the report I want, but perhaps this will serve; this is the report for 1925:

> The progress during this year on the pyrrhotite-pyrite treatment continued with quite encouraging results. Problems in leaching, in purification of electrolytes, and in deposition of iron were successfully overcome. An attempt to develop a new process for the treatment of ilmenite ores was started in September. The process has for its purpose the conversion of the iron oxide to the metallic condition by means of carbon in a furnace at 1000°C. The titanium oxide is unaltered under the conditions used, and the metallic iron is separated by leaching with ferric chloride leaving a high grade titanium oxide residue suited for pigment manufacture.

What we have been doing in a general way is to try to discover a process which will enable us to work our own iron ores, and in so doing we have been taking the processes discovered in other countries and applying them to our ores. We have not made a considerable success; one cannot say that we have yet reached a state where we can say to the investor that we have a process which is commercially workable for the treatment of our low grade ores. We are spending considerable time, however, and watching everything new in this field. Just recently the chief metallurgist of the United States government was here, and in the future we will work very closely in coöperation with the Bureau of Mines of the United States on this very important problem. Suffice it to say in a word that while we have made considerable progress we have not yet arrived at the stage where we can say that a process has been developed which can be worked on a commercial scale.

Mr. MANION: I appreciate what the minister has said, of course; no real result has been obtained as yet, but at the same time on the American side, especially in Minnesota, I believe they are working very successfully on low grade iron ore judging from reports I have received. Of course it is not the duty of the minister to know all the details, but his deputy is probably familiar with them and I would like to impress upon the minister the fact that this is of vast importance. I have considered the matter and have given a great deal of study to it, and

I know of no question the solution of which would be of more importance to this whole Dominion than the question of the development of our low grade iron ores on a commercial scale. Probably it will be impossible ever to develop those ores in such a way that they can compete with the higher grade ores of the United States without assistance in some form, but I do wish to impress upon the minister the importance of giving every attention to this matter. I hope he will personally look into it, because it is really of grave moment to Canada. The solution to that question would put us in a position to use the thousands of millions of tons of iron ore which we have in this country, and it would mean a vast industrial development in Canada.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We are very much alive to the importance of scientific research in this direction, and we are watching every development and keeping in close touch with every move made by the Bureau of Mines of the United States, the Mining Institute of England and similar institutes throughout the world where a study of this question is being made, because without doubt it is one of the most important matters confronting Canadian industry. One rather pleasing feature is that the high grade ore in the United States, as my hon. friend knows, is rapidly nearing depletion as is their anthracite coal, and the problem of our low grade ores, which I think are quite comparable to theirs, will then be brought very much to the fore. So I think we all realize the importance of discovering processes and methods which can be commercially applied.

Mr. BENNETT: I desire to make some few observations with respect to this department generally. For a few weeks—it is a pity it was not longer—I was acting minister of this department, which is manned by a number of very efficient, hard-working and not over-paid officials. In the main they are endeavouring to do a great service to this country, but the real fact is that a very great proportion of this amount asked for is money absolutely lost. Why? Because in the first place in each province there is at least one university undertaking to do some of this work; then again the province is endeavouring to undertake some part of it, and there is also the Research Council which desires to take its share of this obligation. Unless and until there is coördination of the efforts of the provinces, through the universities and through the departments of government, the Research Council and this Dominion, I am bound to say that the federal Department of Mines becomes more or less the fifth wheel on the coach. What is the sum total of the real services rendered by this department to the Dominion of Canada during the past twelve months? Just sit down and consider that question. We spent over half a million dollars in this department; what is the sum total of its contribution to the wealth of the nation?

The great problem now confronting us is how most readily to create new wealth, and mining offers a very ready means to that end. Last year we created new wealth through mining to the extent of something over $242,000,000. I use the word "create" perhaps not in the exact sense; we took that amount of new wealth out of the earth and converted it into products which were convertible into money to the extent of nearly a quarter of a billion dollars, the largest amount we have yet succeeded in realizing in this way. What contribution was made by this department? What did it do to make it easier for the men who labour this year to win from the soil its precious minerals in order to make new wealth, as compared with the preceding year? From the closest study I have been able to make, and I have looked into it carefully, I submit that we have not coördinated as we should the efforts of this Dominion in this direction. I find a university doing something; the Research Council wants to do the same thing. Take for instance a matter of which I was speaking to the minister only the other day. South of Calgary we have large pools of natural gas, and great efforts have been made to utilize these for the public good; they supply Calgary with heat but not with light. In addition to that, after the crude naphtha is taken from the wet gas which comes from the earth, a large proportion of this gas is lost or burned up, and the question of what can be done with it is engaging the attention of scientists. Up to the moment no one has been able to arrive at a conclusion, but instead of having a real coördination of effort on the part of the departments and services interested, that is the universities, the provinces, the Research Council and the Dominion, separate efforts are being made with a result that nothing is achieved.

We know that carbon black can be taken from that natural gas after the crude naphtha has been removed, but we also know that carbon black, or lamp black as we used to call it as boys, is only available to the extent to which a market can be found for it. There is a market for this product in Canada: it is used in the rubber business. It is also used in the printer's ink business, but under existing tariff conditions that lamp black could not be made a valuable item of commerce. It would require some measure of protection. The Alberta government looked into the matter, but I find that nothing has been done by this department in order to arrive at a definite conclusion with respect to it. I expect the federal Department of Mines to be able to assist affirmatively and constructively with regard to matters of that kind where the question of a market depends upon the economic conditions in the country, the demands of foreign countries, and the prevailing prices at which the commodity can be manufactured in other places with which we compete.

There was another matter in connection with the peat bogs at Alfred; I had occasion to look into that. There was another in connection with the Fuel board—about which I fancy the minister proposes to speak at length in a few moments—and another mentioned by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion), the utilization of low grade ores. That is secondary to the question of the utilization of high grade ores. I urge upon the minister that an earnest effort in that regard be made not on paper, but in fact, because I have seen memoranda prepared from time to time. Men lose their imagination, their constructive power; they become mere writers of memoranda which circulate from one branch of the service to another and which are ultimately printed in book form. Last year we had 223 employees in this branch; this year we have 229. Last year we spent $548,000; this year the amount is $571,000. I ask: What is the sum total of the achievement in the department last year toward making it possible for new wealth to be created or won by Canadians out of the soil as compared with the preceding year? That is the test of usefulness in this department. I suggest that the proper thing to do is to link its activities up with the activities of the universities, the provinces and the research council. It is in that sense that I offer these suggestions to the minister at this time, because I feel sure there are many who are thinking in the same terms.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend had an opportunity of looking into the Mines branch while he was minister.

Mr. BENNETT: A few weeks.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think he missed a good deal—

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): —because my hon. friend will admit, as a clever lawyer, that experimental work does not immediately show results. All experimental work must of necessity take time and money if results are to be obtained. May I point to a single instance, that of the discovery of Marquis wheat? One individual worked here for several years before making that discovery.

Mr. BENNETT: That was not in this branch.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I point to others in this particular branch, for instance, in the fuel branch? Very valuable information has been obtained in connection with the utilization of fuel. It would take a good deal of time to explain just how much has been done in that regard. If experimental work must immediately show results in dollars and cents, then we shall not get very far with that work. During the regime of the government previous to ours, experimental work was carried on in fuel testing and in the development of a process for dealing with low grade coal in Saskatchewan. We all decried the efforts and deplored the fact that they spent $1,000,000 with apparently no results. As a matter of fact, this led to results ultimately and they are able to get a successful fuel which they can put on the market to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: To what extent?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): To the extent that they can sell it successfully. Of course the Alberta fuel is a strong competitor.

Mr. BENNETT: Then the economic value is very small.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The economic value is great and the work can be done. While the board turned this plant over to private individuals who are not altogether satisfied with the process discovered and who have been working on a German process, nevertheless—

Mr. BENNETT: A process which existed before our efforts were made.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not altogether. It rather was a process going on at the same period that ours was in progress. I question very much whether the German process is as valuable as ours. Perhaps we should not say that it is altogether our own because a fair proportion of the discovery was made in the United States at the university of North Dakota.

As regards the other aspect of the matter, my hon. friend will not for a single moment denounce the work of the geologists, the field men who are doing geological survey work in Canada. They have been of immense advantage to the mining industry of this country, as my hon. friend will admit at once. That makes up $205,000 worth of the appropriation and these men are operating in every province in Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: They duplicate the efforts of the province of Ontario in its mineral branch.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not that I know of. In the geological work?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not so far as I know. The laboratory work is not overlapping to-day to the extent that it was in former days. Since coming to Ottawa I have had the satisfaction of getting coöperation between the Research Council and the officers of our department so as to prevent overlapping in the experimental work and technical and scientific investigation. In other words, in Ottawa we are not duplicating what is being done in Alberta or Saskatchewan.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, oh. I do not want to interrupt the hon. member. I will explain later.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Fuel testing is being done here, and no fuel testing work is being done in Canadian universities. The wood-testing laboratory situated in the university of McGill in Montreal is carrying on a very important work, work so important that gentlemen interested in the same class of work as that in which my hon. friend is interested, namely, the paper-making industry, have thought fit to advance the sum of $350,000 this year for the purpose of constructing a building which they will turn over to McGill university. That shows how important they consider the wood-testing plant to the pulp and paper industry of this country.

Mr. BENNETT: The paper industry is doing that itself.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They have invested that money in the construction of a building in order that experimental work may be carried on.

Mr. BENNETT: But the government is not doing it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The governmen has supplied the staff and it is the government staff who are doing the work. The government is paying the staff as it has been doing for several years.

Mr. BENNETT: Only partly. The hon. member knows that.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I point these instances out to my hon. friend simply to show him that these great industries are so interested in scientific research that they are willing to invest these sums of money in it. If my hon. friend asks them what particular branch of their industry they think this has benefited, they might answer in a very offhand way: Well, not anything of a very definite character, but scientific research is so important in regard to many of our problems that are giving us trouble that we want investigation carried on in the laboratories in connection with them. I might mention the extraction from jack pine of the resinous content, the handling of the cottonwoods, the high grade treatment of pulp manufactured even from our best grade spruce. These are all problems that can be worked out in the laboratory. I mention these in passing to show the importance of this work.

The hon. member for Fort William has touched upon another important problem. If my hon. friend would ask me what the United States, who are spending millions of dollars instead of thousands, and rightfully so, have accomplished in securing a better process for the treatment of their low grade ores, I would say that they have made no greater progress than we have. Our chemists are working on this problem, just as they are on oil problems and on the treatment of the gases which my hon. friend mentions. Three years ago a company was given a lease in Alberta for the manufacture of carbon black. They never went into business. Why? For the simple reason that I would not give them a lease in the areas contiguous to railways, but only in the areas where gas was escaping anyway. That was in the Pelican rapids field, a long distance from the railways. My hon. friend knows that the very rapid development in the southern states brought into the market tremendous volumes of gas which was turned into carbon black, with a consequent reduction in price to about six cents a pound, so that this company could not hope to exist.

So far as all these problems are concerned, may I say to my hon. friend that a very real effort is being made to prevent overlapping by the universities, the National Research Council, and government departments. I have on my desk in my office a list of the problems that the council have announced they are now investigating. They are not all in Canada, but the council is watching every one of these problems. I might add that, in order that we might have information, I have sent Mr. Camsell to Germany on two occasions to study processes for the better securing of oil from our oil sands. Subterranean mining and all that sort of thing has been investigated by this department for the benefit of the mining industry of Canada. As to the amount of money expended, I believe that the people of Canada will get more results in a monetary way from this technical research work than they could get from any other expenditure except upon like objects.

Mr. BENNETT: I just want to make clear one thing. I suggest that a particular branch of that work be taken by this department, leaving to the universities another branch, and to the provinces another branch, rather than that an effort be made by the three to undertake this work jointly; and the same with respect to research. With respect to the paper industry and what has been done as a gift, surely my hon. friend was not here the other day when Dean Hibbert of McGill made his address, a most amazingly interesting address it was too, with respect to the utilization of scientific research in industry. But as perhaps my hon. friend knows, the chair that Dean Hibbert occupies was established through the benevolence of the late Mrs. Eddy, who left $200,000 to the university for that purpose. That is how the chair came into being, and the paper industry put up $350,000 for the purpose of providing a building for McGill.

The hon. gentleman knows that I share his views with respect to the value of research. All I was endeavouring to make clear to him was this: Could we not make it certain that the university, the province, the Research Council, and this department should each pursue definite lines of action so as to prevent the possibility of duplication? I think the minister has endeavoured to do that, but it has not always been done, I regret to say. If he exercises firmer control over that matter we should get better results.

I know what research means. All one has to do to appreciate its value is to remember what the Germans have done with respect to research. Take, for instance, the specific known as 606, which has been so valuable in disease. It represented 606 different experiments, any one of them taking sometimes months to carry out, with measurements and everything of that sort; hence the name, 606. That gives one some idea of what research means. On the other hand, I think it is desirable that one body should be pursuing one definite course of experimental work and another body another line, in order that there might not be duplication, and in order that there might be a correlation of their effort when they finish their experiments.

Mr. MANION: I think my hon. friend from West Calgary is right in his contention that there should be probably more coöperation than there has been, only, between not the universities and this department but also between the universities and the provincial departments. I have a great deal of sympathy with the minister in regard to the work that has been done by the Mines branch. I remember during the past year some friends of mine basing their explorations in a new mining section of this country absolutely upon reports made years before by some mines branch—I do not know whether it was of this government or of a provincial government. But these men actually went out and searched for minerals basing their explorations entirely on this report, made many years previously, and they found veins in the Woman lake and Red lake country which promise to be immensely rich. I have a very great deal of respect for the work done by the Mines branch, and I agree with the minister that its value cannot be estimated except over a period of years.

I wish to come back for a moment to the iron question. It is of so much importance that this government might well consider the advisability of adopting the report made in 1923, I think it was, by the committee appointed by the Drury government. In that report, as I mentioned in my remarks on the budget, it was recommended that the provincial and federal governments combine in a bounty system to develop the iron ore resources of this country. I pointed out at that time that Mr. Corliss, of the Mond Nickel Company, had quoted American geological survey experts as saying that we had 9,000,000,000 tons of low grade iron ore, 35 per cent ore, in this country, which could be developed if a plan were evolved for that purpose. Obviously 35 per cent ore cannot compete with 45 per cent ore without assistance of some kind from either the Dominion or the provincial government. I remember in 1924 putting a question on the order paper addressed to the present minister, then Minister of Mines, asking him what was being done in regard to that report, and he said that it was under consideration. That was three years ago. The Minister of Finance told us this afternoon that several matters were still under consideration, and I presume this iron ore report is still under consideration—or perhaps it has passed out of consideration altogether. The minister might be well advised, however, even with his more or less pronounced free trade views, to consider on behalf of his government the possibility of adopting that report and coöperating with the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. The province of Quebec, in view of the immense deposits of titanic iron ore discovered around Chicoutimi, put through a resolution in 1925 advocating a bounty system. If the minister would come forward with a bounty system for developing our iron ore deposits that would prove a success, as I believe it would, its value to this whole country would be such that nothing could pry this government loose from its seats for many years.

Mr. ROBB: Nothing can anyway.

Mr. MANION: The minister said that last year, but we pried him loose for a few months at least, and then somehow they sneaked in again. But I would be willing for the good of my country to see the government come forward with a proposition to coöperate with the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and other provinces in which there are iron ore deposits, and if the results were attained which I believe could reasonably be anticipated, this government might easily stay in power for a long time, and deservedly so. I think the minister might well give that suggestion much more consideration than he has in the past on behalf of the country as a whole, because there is no doubt that the iron and steel industry is the basic element in the commercial progress of any country. The progress of every country which has made important commercial advancement has been based on a foundation of the development of iron and steel. I could give a list of the countries, but I have done it in the past and I shall not do it to-night. Of course coking coal enters into the development of iron and steel, and we have I think the second greatest deposits of coal in the world. We have the iron ores, and we have large quantities of the limestone which is necessary to this development. I hope, therefore, that the minister will seriously consider the remarks I have made in reference to this matter and will take some action in order to keep this moribund government in power for a few years.

Mr. McGIBBON: I wish to commend the government for this vote, but I also wish to condemn it for its action in another regard—

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. McGIBBON: Someone says "hear, hear". I quite agree with the minister that there is no department of the government that offers such possibilities for scientific research as this one. But I want to bring home to them the fact that the action they have taken is hopelessly inadequate to the requirements of the country. We have an advisory council on scientific and industrial research, but it has been practically starved for years. When the Department of Health came into existence some years ago a special condition stipulated was that there was to be a department of scientific research, but such a department has not yet been formed. We are leaving this matter, which is after all one of federal concern, to universities and to private individuals and companies, and any result we have got has been practically the result of private research. In the realm of medicine the discovery of insulin was made by Doctor Banting, who, we are told, spent practically his last dollar before he succeeded. He got no help from any government and is not getting it to-day. We are turning these matters over to universities, which I think is a mistake. Of course the universities should take them up but after all the object of universities is to train men in fundamental science, which is a different thing. This department should be fostered and maintained by the government not only in this branch, but in every branch. As we look over the countries of the world and see what they have done, and as we look over the possibilities of scientific research in Canada, I say we have starved the department. I hope the government, the Finance minister and the Minister of the Interior will loosen up their exchequer a little bit and give this department the money it ought to have. With the great natural resources we have in this country, the possibilities of multiplying our national wealth not only ten or twenty but a hundredfold are immense. I repeat that I hope the government will give these departments a little better financial support in the future than they have in the past. I make these comments because I desire to say a word on behalf of two great departments, that of scientific and industrial research and that of health, which have been in existence for some years but which have been poverty-stricken to such a degree that their efforts have been almost futile. I heartily support the minister in this vote, but I say the government are not living up to their duties as a government in this matter, and I can only hope that in future they will do better.

Mr. FRASER: I understand the department has been carrying on exploratory work in the iron ores of British Columbia. I should like to know if it is still being carried on or if it has been completed. If it has been completed, what, in a general way, is the result of the work that has been done?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am told that the report has just been completed and published, and my hon. friend can get a copy of it.

Mr. TOLMIE: Does that include the iron ore on Vancouver island? We have large deposits there; we have iron, limestone and coking coal within reach of one another on tidal waters. Does it include any of these?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am told it includes a portion of the island, I do not know how much.

Mr. BANCROFT: Has the minister's department any recent report of the quantity and quality of the ore at Belcher islands?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am told that Doctor Young spent one season there and has one report on that island.

Mr. MANION: Not only Doctor Young, but a Mr. Flaherty or O'Flaherty who was sent up there some years ago by Mackenzie and Mann, investigated thoroughly the iron ore deposits on Belcher islands. An English company has recently taken a shipload of ore from the Belcher islands and sent it across to England for smelting purposes, and if this project is successful they are thinking of shipping the ore across the ocean for smelting and development.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is there any provision in this estimate for assisting in the experimental work and the testing that is going on in the research laboratories in connection with the power development at Bienfait and Estevan?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is provision made.

Mr. McKENZIE: I would draw attention to the fact that a few years ago, as mentioned by the minister, some money was spent in connection with a briquetting process there which was not as successful as we had hoped it would be, although it was not without some measure of success. There is now, I believe, a process for briquetting being worked on which is more or less a success, and I think as time goes on it will prove more successful than it has in the past. I am pleased to find that there is some provision made for assisting in the development of the work, because there are vast quantities of coal in that area—some hundreds of millions of tons available—and it is of a quality which does not stand shipping for very long distances. I believe the power development that is going on in the laboratories may point the way to the production of great wealth. The federal government, as I understand it, accepts some of the responsibility in the matter, arising out of the fact, no doubt, that they own the natural resources of those provinces. It is well, therefore, that they accept the responsibility of assisting in this development work. I think the time will come when there will be vast wealth found to be available from the coal resources in that area.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Has the minister made any provision in these estimates for sending out prospectors? I quite appreciate the valuable work which is being done by the scientific departments of the government and I have great respect for their head; but as I see it the most valuable work must be that done by the prospector. We know that most of the great discoveries of minerals made within recent years were more or less accidental. When not only this government but the provincial governments boast of the important work that they are doing in developing our mineral wealth, I think they are overlooking the most essential feature—the finding of valuable deposits by prospectors. I hope the minister has made provision for doing this work on a more or less wholesale scale, because it would be money well spent, and the money should be spent if we are to develop our mineral wealth.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We have eight parties of trained geologists in British Columbia, four in Alberta, two in Saskatchewan, three in Manitoba, nine in Quebec, seven in Ontario, two in New Brunswick, three in Nova Scotia, and one in the Arctic. My hon. friend is quite correct, many of the more important mineral finds have been made by the ordinary everyday prospector with his pack on his back. But these parties now go out after the topographical work has been performed. They make a thorough investigation as to the mineral possibilities of certain areas. I am informed that this work is very valuable to the mining industry.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Investigating deposits which have already been discovered, or searching for new deposits?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In some cases investigations are asked by parties who have made discoveries of minerals.

Mr. BENNETT: They report on the geological formation primarily.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I do not mean that at all. I mean searching for individual veins.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Staking claims?

Mr. McQUARRIE: No, I would not expect that to be done. I am urging the department to employ practical prospectors to go over country which is more or less unexplored for the purpose of hunting for mineral deposits.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We are not doing that.

Mr. McQUARRIE: That is done in other countries and important results have been obtained. I think the minister will find this matter worthy of consideration.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am afraid my hon. friend from West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) has left the impression on the committee that there is no coöperation between the Mines branch and the Council for Scientific and Industrial research.

Mr. BENNETT: Not to the extent that I should like.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Camsell, the deputy minister, is a member of the Research Council.

Mr. BENNETT: I know that.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I shall be glad to put into the hands of my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon) the many questions that this board have considered in carrying on research work. I admit that to a limited degree this work has been carried on in the universities. I do not pretend to be an educationalist, but I am rather pleased that the universities are becoming a little more practical in their system.

Mr. BENNETT: So am I.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend says that this ought all to be done at Ottawa. In the United States, after careful thought, instead of establishing a central bureau of mines the government have scattered thirteen stations throughout the country, all doing extensive work. I hate to talk about medical affairs because I admit that I am not competent to do so. I do think that to a limited, perhaps even to an extended, degree medical research may be very helpful, but I am very anxious that there shall not be any overlapping, because in the long run it means an added burden upon the shoulders of our tax payers. I agree entirely with my hon. friend from Muskoka that we are not spending enough money on scientific research. It is the fault of the government and the parliament of Canada that proper laboratories have not been erected to give the council an opportunity to function effectively. I am confident that one of the most important things we can do is to establish in Ottawa a central organization to coördinate scientific work all over the Dominion. I should like to see a real start made at once, because I believe we have the men available for the work.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Why blame parliament? Parliament has never refused any money that I am aware of for scientific research. Why not blame the government?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): On every occasion since I have been a member of the government I have stressed the importance of scientific research, and I am bound to say that with the exception of an odd member here and there not very much interest has been evinced in the subject. Apparently we must first bring home to the people a realization of the value of scientific research in industry, both manufacturing and agricultural, before we shall be able to get the money required for this work. We need two or three million dollars to make a beginning, and the expenditure will run into a very considerable amount to meet the requirements of scientific research even to a limited degree.

Mr. McGIBBON: I submit that in the first place the services have been starved, and in the second place that there has been no directing force. I think we should have in Ottawa a central force which would form the nucleus of a scientific industrial research council. It might be all right for the universities to look after this work, but I do not think that is their function. The universities should train men in scientific research so that they may be available to the government. I agree with the minister that we cannot look for results immediately, probably we would not get any for years, but in the process of solving various problems unexpected discoveries might be made. In fact that is how all the great discoveries of science have been made: scientists have been looking for one thing and have discovered another. These discoveries have been of immense value to the country, but there should be a central directing force in Ottawa to whom all departments might look for guidance. I do not say that this body should necessarily do the work, but certainly there should be some central authority to assign various subjects to the different departments, or the universities, if you will.

Mr. JELLIFF: The hon. member for West Calgary asked an important question and one which is of considerable interest to the people of Alberta. I wish the minister would answer that question. At present there is a lamentable waste of gas in the oil fields. If the gas which is allowed to escape were converted into power it would be sufficient to supply all the needs of the city of Calgary. This is a practical matter which, it seems to me, calls for action by the department. It is imperative that something should be done to stop this waste, because the people of Alberta are suffering a great loss in consequence.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We control, of course, only the wells on crown property; those that are private lands are not under our jurisdiction. It is true we have the power under the terms of our leases to close down any well if need be, but as my hon. friend knows, I think, there is very little waste of gas now so far as the large producers in the province are concerned, whereas two years ago a considerable quantity of gas was dissipated. A very large proportion of that gas is now piped into Calgary and utilized there. I agree that if piping were put down a still larger quantity of gas, at present escaping from wells on privately owned properties, could be converted into power for use in Calgary. But, as I say, we have no control over wells other than those situated on crown lands.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I wish to place myself on record in support of the minister's request for a larger vote. I had the pleasure a few days ago of listening to Doctor Hibbert of McGill university who delivered an eloquent lecture bearing on this subject. Doctor Hibbert occupies the Eddy chair in the university in question, and speaking in the Chateau Laurier he gave a most instructive address on Borderland Sciences, in which he showed the correlation of one science to another. It was one of the finest addresses to which one could possibly listen, and it revealed the extensive work which may be done in the line of scientific research. He told us what the universities were doing, and pointed out vividly what the Dominion and provincial governments should do in this direction. Not only in relation to the subject of medicine, to which he referred, did he reveal some of the most startling facts, but as regards the treatment of products in everyday use he gave some arresting information. There is a great field for development not only in minerals but in every other line. I had a conversation the other day with Doctor Gussow of the Dominion experimental farm here in connection with the growing of potatoes, which is a matter of considerable importance to my own province. Doctor Gussow is an ardent advocate of scientific research and development generally, He thinks that the Department of Agriculture should bring in from Europe some of the best trained men to demonstrate the uses to which some of our surplus products may be put. For instance, in Europe at the present time many valuable commercial products are made from potatoes, but so far in this country we have not developed their use for these purposes. Valuable results might be obtained in this way and I desire, as one member at least, to support the minister's request for a larger vote to promote scientific research along various lines.

Mr. LANG: I would not have said anything on the subject but for the suggestion made by an hon. member that the Department of Mines should send out prospectors. In my opinion, speaking from experience, the very best work that could be done for prospectors generally is being done by the geological parties which are sent out by the federal and provincial governments. The geological surveys which they make are eagerly looked forward to by all prospectors year by year. The prospectors know where these survey parties operate and they try to get the newest geological maps available for the various areas. Every prospector to-day realizes the great value to them of these geological surveys, and you cannot meet one on the trail who is not equipped with the latest map of the particular country he is prospecting. The map discloses the geological characteristics of the country, with marks indicating what veins have been found, together with information relating to the assays that have been made. Practically all of the geologists sent out by the Department of Mines to-day are excellent prospectors as well as scientific men, and the work they are doing is certainly wonderful. Their surveys have made the work of the prospector so much easier that all mining men sending out prospecting parties to-day first study the geological surveys that have been made. Indeed, the prospector is obliged to familiarize himself with the findings of these geologists, whose maps are invaluable.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: In view of the new uses to which bituminous coal is being put, is the department conducting a research into what is known as the low carbonization process for the coking of bituminous coal particularly of the lower grades? If so, what report is there on the subject?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We are very much interested in low temperature carbonization and have been watching closely for developments in this regard. We have also been doing work ourselves. This work presents one of the widest fields for the treatment of coal. In my opinion, research work in low carbonization, and the treatment of iron ores, are two problems of paramount importance at the present time.

Mr. LUCAS: On that point I would ask the minister if he has investigated the process used in Great Britain, which I think is known as the Illingsworth process, for the low carbonization of coal?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, we are keeping very closely in touch with every development in England in this connection, as well as those in Germany and Belgium.

Mr. BIRD: I wish to make a few remarks, but not of a critical kind, because I realize that the department has been doing good work under somewhat restricted circumstances. I would refer particularly to northern Manitoba, where nature has been very lavish but at the same time very perverse in the intricate manner in which the elements have been mixed together. The question of copper mining in northern Manitoba is a standing challenge to the scientific minds of Canada, and I am curious to know just how far the department has been addressing itself to these problems which loom very large to us in that part of Canada. I think it will not be denied that there we have some of the finest copper deposits on this continent, but these are awaiting the discoveries of our scientists. I understand that with regard to the well-known Flin-Flon property, an American firm has been experimenting there for some two or three years; I think it somewhat of a humiliation to us as Canadians that the solution of these immensely important problems should be left to the enterprise of scientists outside our borders, but so it has been in this regard. I do not know just what progress they are making along these lines, but I wonder if the department knows; I wonder if there is any coöperation and if our Department of Mines has been keeping track of the work undertaken by this private enterprise. If that has not been the case, perhaps a little criticism might be expected. It seems to me that a process which is fraught with such tremendous importance to the northern part of Manitoba and to Canada as a whole should be followed carefully by this department. Personally I am not much concerned about geological exploration; I think perhaps that has gone almost as far as it can go with any practical benefit at present in any of these areas. I quite realize its importance, but I also realize that the scientific efforts of our geologists are complementary to the work of our prospectors and that emphasis should be laid upon the metallurgical problems involved in some of the finds already made and blocked out, which are understood to be of immense importance. I do not know what eventual success this American firm will have, but I would like to know just what is the attitude of the Department of Mines towards this important process, which if successful will be of such immense economic importance to western Canada. I am not introducing this matter in a critical mood at all, because I know that the parsimonious attitude of this parliament towards these things has cramped the efforts of that department, and that under the circumstances the department has done good work. I would like to know, however, just what has been done, and I would ask the minister to address his mind to that aspect of the question for a few moments.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am very glad to be able to inform my hon. friend that this particular difficulty, the separation of these ores, has been under review and test in about a dozen different laboratories, but the process to be tried out by the company now, and the one which they feel has the greatest chance of success, is the discovery of our own officers made in our own laboratories here. Of course we cannot say that it will be successful, because it has only been tested, but it will be tried out this year.

Mr. FRASER: The minister has given a good deal of interesting information to-night but I would like to know how he explains the fact that in 1925, according to the public accounts, we spent $237,000 under this vote; last year only $200,000 was provided, and now we are only asked for $192,000. What is the reason for the decrease in this very important item? Will it continue to decrease as the production of minerals in this country increases? Three years ago the mineral products of Canada amounted to $214,000,000; last year they amounted to $228,000,000 and the figure for this year is $242,000,000, so it will be seen that though the production is increasing, the amount of money set aside for this very important work is decreasing. Having brought these facts to the attention of the minister, is it too much to expect that he will provide some supplementary amount to increase the vote asked for at present?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I might explain that by the fact that we were using a considerable portion of this money in the research work carried on by the Fuel board. Some of these problems are out of the way now, and we do not require as much money. Of course there are other problems which we could take up, but we are trying to be as economical as possible without starving any of the very important projects. We did have an increased vote for the purpose of research by the Fuel board into the coking problem, and it will be necessary to have an increased amount in the supplementary estimates for the continuation of the investigation into the peat fuel problem. But that is the reason the amount is less in the estimates now before us.

Mr. FRASER: The second to the last item in this vote is to cover transportation charges from outlying provinces on ore shipments to the ore dressing plant at Ottawa. Last year that vote amounted to $3,000, but this year it is reduced to $1,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I can answer my hon. friend in a word. That item was included originally to encourage prospectors to send their samples from British Columbia; they have never done so to any extent, and we have never used the money, so I cut the appropriation down. We would be very glad if they would send in their samples; these samples come from other parts of Canada, but we felt that we wanted to put the prospectors in British Columbia in the same position as those in Quebec and Ontario, who were close to our laboratory, and in order to do so we offered to pay the transportation cost on their samples for the purpose of inspection.

Mr. FRASER: In the plant which the department has in the city of Vancouver, is any assay work carried on for the prospector?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No. That assay office is purely for the purchase of gold.

Mr. FRASER: I understand if a prospector in British Columbia wants to send his samples to Ottawa, the freight on those samples is paid?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is what the item of $1,000 is for.

Mr. COOTE: I would like to refer to the question raised by the hon. member for Lethbridge, (Mr. Jelliff) in regard to the wastage of natural gas that is at present taking place in Alberta and to direct the attention of the minister to that problem. Let me quote just a few paragraphs from the High River Times in regard to this matter. It says:

That there is a big wastage of natural gas in Alberta made necessary by the exploration for oil is one of the statements in the annual report of the Scientific and Industrial Research Council of Alberta just handed in to the legislature. This section of the report, written by Dr. John A. Allan, professor of geology at the university of Alberta, says that figures indicate that in 88 wells of Alberta there is an available daily supply of natural gas amounting to 480,000,000 cubic feet. The most complete figures available for natural gas sold in Alberta in 1925 was 9,115,500,000 cubic feet representing an average daily consumption of 25,000,000 cubic feet.

Then the report goes on to deal with the wastage of this gas and it says:

The greatest wastage to-day is undoubtedly taking place in Turner valley where the average daily consumption amounts to about 7,000,000 cubic feet whereas the daily production amounts to approximately 45,000,000 cubic feet. Most of the wastage in Turner valley is necessary if exploration for petroleum continues. It seems inevitable that if oil development is going to be permitted in Turner valley, we must expect a considerable wastage of gas for some time to come.

Then Dr. Allan goes on to say, according to this report:

Dr. Allan, however, emphasizes the point that adequate regulations must be enforced to prevent unnecessary wastage of gas in drilling wells and cites a bad example. "Due to lack of supervision", he says, "wells were drilled in the Peace river district and from at least two of these water and gas have been flowing for many years. They are now 'running wild' and the chances are that this uncontrolled water has probably ruined the possibility of getting oil from at least the higher horizons in that district."

Attention is also drawn to the very important fact that the Dominion government regulations apply only to Dominion lands, and these regulations do not apply to free-hold lands which include those lands held privately by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and by the Hudson's Bay Company.

Any regulation that is made to cover the development of petroleum or natural gas in Alberta should apply to all lands, irrespective of ownership.

The reason I am bringing this matter to the attention of the minister and the committee is to ask whether any research work is being carried on by the department looking to the prevention of this wastage, and whether the government are carrying on any investigation as to the possibility of capping new wells which may be brought in. Probably forty new wells are at present being drilled in that area. If even one-half of these should be brought in during the coming year, there is going to be a heavy flow of gas from them. I have been much interested in the remarks made by many hon. members to-night regarding the development of the mineral resources of Canada. It is quite right that we should develop these resources. The fact, however, is that this natural gas which is being wasted can never be replaced. The minerals as long as they lie in the ground are not at any rate being wasted, but this natural gas is in many cases being burned to get rid of it and we are wasting a very valuable natural asset. It is important that the department should carry out any investigational work which may appear possible to them looking toward the control of the flow of natural gas from those wells and also towards the utilization of the gas which is now flowing from them, because I understand it has been found impossible to cap some of them. Possibly, if it is not already being done, the department might investigate the cost of producing electric energy from this gas which is now going to waste. It seems to me that it would not cost any more to install internal combustion engines near this gas field and to produce power in that way than to install turbines in hydro-electric power plants. I would be glad if the minister would inform the committee, particularly for the benefit of the people of Alberta, whether any investigational work along this line is being carried on, and also whether they have in mind any way of preventing the wastage of gas especially from new wells which may be brought in.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): About a year ago, we employed an English engineer, probably one of the most outstanding men in his profession, for the very purpose of preventing what has happened on one or two occasions, if not more—and I know of at least three—where wells, when they struck the heavy flow, blew everything to pieces, twisting their casings and running wild for weeks at a time, the flow of gas from them being wasted. If my hon. friend will remember, about eighteen months ago I came in for some severe criticism when we were insisting on cementing the pipe in rock when wells were being drilled in heavy gas strata. The result was that when gas was struck we could cap the well, if need be, and preserve that gas, shut it off completely. That has not been the case where we do not control the property. My hon. friend has mentioned the fact that many of those lands are privately owned and the federal government has no jurisdiction in that case. The control of property and civil rights is primarily a provincial matter. But where the lands are owned by the federal government and leased by them, we have absolute control and we are seeing that proper precautions are taken to prevent that heavy flow of gas from throwing the casing out of the well and causing a great deal of trouble. In the north I do not know how that gas can be shut off, because there is no rock strata and this wastage has been going on there for a number of years. Wherever there is a rock strata we have shut off the flow at considerable expense to the federal government. In addition we have Mr. Elworthy working continuously on the development of processes for the utilization of the gas, and any of the small municipalities such as High River might very well utilize that gas for the purpose of securing power for the generation of electricity. There is no necessity of research for that; all they have to do is to pipe the gas to a given point and generate electricity from that gas.

As regards federal property we are very much exercised about this matter and we are giving it a great deal of consideration and careful thought. For that reason we have employed this gentleman, who has had a wide experience in drilling for oils and in the proper care of the drilling process to preserve this great natural product if it is found.

Mr. COOTE: Is it possible to procure naphtha from those wells without allowing the gas to escape?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We have not any process yet other than that which is being used.

Mr. COOTE: Just another question in regard to those lands in which the mineral rights are no longer held by the Dominion government. I always understood the province had no control whatever of these mineral rights, that any control that might exist over the minerals underlying the Hudson bay and Canadian Pacific railway lands remained in the Dominion government, and that that was one of the reasons why the Alberta Mineral Tax Act was disallowed a few years ago.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Oh no, as applied to federal lands only.

Mr. HEAPS: All the oil and gas wells are not necessarily to be found in Alberta. We had an oil well discovered recently at Grand View, in Manitoba. Can the minister make any statement to the House as to the result of any investigations his department may have held there?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I would like to be very chary in any statement I make with regard to that, because there seems to be a wide difference of opinion as to whether oil is there or not. Our own officer who visited the well suggested that it first be cleaned out in order that a proper examination might be made. I do not know if that has been done up to date.

Mr. COOTE: Is this department doing anything to investigate the possibility of controlling the big flow of gas while at the same time allowing these wells in the Turner valley to produce?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We are working on that problem all the time, but so far we have not discovered anything better than the process now in use for the separation of the wet gas.

Mr. ADSHEAD: My hon. friend was speaking of the development of power from gas. I might say that proposals were made to the city of Calgary by certain interests in the Turner valley. One was to pipe the gas to Calgary, and another to develop electricity at Turner valley, but so far I understand no arrangement has been entered into, nor have the rates been able to compete with the hydro-electric system.

Mr. COOTE: Is any investigational work being carried on in connection with the production of carbon or any other substance from this gas in the Turner valley?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Carbon could be manufactured if it were profitable, but it is not profitable at present prices. My hon. friend from West Calgary was suggesting that some protection should be given, but as I pointed out a moment ago, the reason for the low prices was the very large volume of natural gas discovered in the southern oil fields that have come into production in very recent years.

Item agreed to.

Mr. ROBB: If the committee is agreeable, there are some small supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1927, that I should like to have cleaned up so that the accounts can be paid before the end of the present fiscal year. Hon. gentlemen will find these estimates on their files. They total $575,204.22. The larger items are $232,000 odd for the Customs inquiry, also certain items in connection with the national parks, and an item for the payment to members of the House of Commons and the Senate for additional travelling expenses on account of the Christmas adjournment. There are some smaller items that I do not need to enumerate.

General

To provide, notwithstanding anything contained in the Senate and House of Commons Act, for the payment to each member of the Senate and of the House of Commons who attended the first part of the present session of an amount representing the actual moving or transportation expenses and reasonable living expenses of such member while on the journey between Ottawa and his place of residence after the adjournment of parliament on December 15, 1926, and on the return journey from his place of residence to Ottawa at the end of the recess which commenced on the said date, or in case any such member did not return to his place of residence during the said recess an amount equivalent to what would have been his travelling expenses if he had returned to his place of residence during the said recess—The Senate, $3,075; House of Commons, $15,000; total, $18,075.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the minister explain this? Are the exact expenses being paid?

Mr. ROBB: I understood that the clerk was paying only the exact expenses and that vouchers would be required, but my idea is that there should be paid just a duplicate of what the members disburse when they come to attend the regular session. That is the idea.

Item agreed to.

Mail subsidies and steamship subventions.—Mulgrave and Canso, steam service between—additional amount required, $4,625.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): Would the minister explain what this item is for?

Mr. ROBB: This is for a daily service, Sundays excepted, between Mulgrave and Canso. For some years Hugh Cann and Son have received a subsidy of $13,500 per annum for this service, but representations were made to the effect that in order to develop the fish business at Canso it was necessary to get a larger boat for the winter months and also to decrease the rate on fish of all kinds from Canso to Mulgrave from the old rate of 20 cents per hundred pounds to 6 cents per hundred pounds. Arrangements were consequently made with the Lovat Steamship Company to place the steamship Lovat on this service from January 1, 1927, for a three months' period, at a subsidy of $6,000 per month.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): Who comprise the Lovat Steamship Company?

Mr. ROBB: I cannot tell you.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): For the benefit of this House, I may say that the Lovat Steamship Company have also another large subsidy of some $50,000 per year for the service on the Magdalen route, from Pictou to the Magdalen islands.

Mr. ROBB: It is not the same service.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): But they are paid for the yearly service $50,000, which is a very substantial sum. The boat was taken off that service and placed on the Canso route, and she receives for that her portion of $13,000, with an additional $6,000 a month. Considering the amount of money for our services throughout the country, that is an exorbitant sum.

Mr. BENNETT: Double payment.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): Yes, not only that but over-payment. I understand that the people who are concerned in the Lovat Steamship Company are people who have been very close to this government in the county of Pictou. So far as my information goes—I may be wrong, but I think the minister should have the information at his finger tips—the relatives of a former minister of the crown from the county of Pictou are shareholders in this company and were shareholders when this government began paying $50,000 for this service to the Magdalen islands, I would ask that this additional sum be struck from this vote.

Mr. ROBB: I am quite in accord with my hon. friend when he brings up generally the question of reducing subsidies down along the coast, but when he brings it up as a reason that they happen to be relatives of some particular gentleman, that is not a good reason. Hon. members will observe that this service has nothing whatever to do with the Magdalen island service. I admit that was a high price, but we had some difficulty in getting a boat placed there for that particular service. We asked for tenders for it. When I was in the Department of Trade and Commerce representations were made to us that those islands were far out; they had no railways and no transportation. We had to give a suitable service for the fishermen and the people living on the island, and they were producing great quantities of fish that were going to the western parts of the Dominion. In connection with this particular service for the winter months, the smaller boats that were there would not undertake to do the work. We had to get a better boat. That boat was available. It was not given as a subsidy to these particular people, but it was so that we might provide a service for the fishermen coming into Canso, and the conditions were that the rate should be reduced from 20 cents a hundred pounds to 6 cents a hundred pounds. That rate is very small and I think my hon. friend will have to give a much better reason before he asks us to reduce the service. However, if he wants to go into the whole service along the coast in Nova Scotia and cut it all down, I will be with him.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): As one of the maritime men, coming from Nova Scotia, I say that there are a good many services in Nova Scotia that should be very thoroughly gone into, and I think it should have been the duty of this government for the past five years to go thoroughly into some of them. It should not be for the hon. member for Richmond or the hon. member for Guysborough, or the hon. member for Antigonish, or the hon. member for any other constituency to take it up; it should be for the hon. minister in whose department these transactions occurred. I say that the very first subsidy that should be gone into and examined is the contract with the Lovat Steamship company for the service to the Magdalen islands. I would advocate, as was done in the case of subsidy in the county of Richmond during the last few weeks, that tenders should be called for and that the contract should be given to the lowest tenderer, first for the Magdalen island service, and secondly, before we vote the additional money for the Guysborough route, that tenders should be called for the Mulgrave and Canso route.

Mr. ROBB: This is a contract; we are now near to the end of March, and the contractors have been providing the service during the winter and have given the reduction from twenty cents to six cents. They have carried out their part.

Mr. GUTHRIE: How long is the contract to run?

Mr. ROBB: It runs out in three months. It was for a three months' period at a subsidy of $6,000 per month. I am not sure when it was made. It might have been made by my hon. friends, but I do not think so. Service was for the winter months, January, February and March—

Mr. McGIBBON: Have you any figures as to the value of the fish exported?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): Might I ask the hon. minister when tenders were called for, and if tenders were called how many were received?

Mr. ROBB: Not for this particular service. This vessel was the one available.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): Tenders were never called for.

Mr. ROBB: I have a record here of the subsidy paid, the traffic returns since 1908, and the trips made. In 1908 they were making 286 round trips, and in 1926, 300 round trips

Mr. BENNETT: A year?

Mr. ROBB: I think for the season. That is not this particular service; that is the general service on the other contract. The other contractors continued up to the end of December and stopped, and we did not have any transportation at all for the winter months.

Mr. McGIBBON: What size boats?

Mr .ROBB: The other steamer employed on the route was the Robert Cann, a vessel of 111 net and 265 gross tons, with capacity for about 200 tons of freight and 100 passengers and with a speed of 11 knots.

Mr. BENNETT: The department had been paying $200 a day for the last three months?

Mr. ROBB: We would not have had any service at all without her.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is this the first year this winter service has been provided?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): Is the steamer Robert Cann receiving $13,000 per year for an all year service?

Mr. ROBB: I do not think it is an all year service. I think we have been paying for the season of navigation, from the opening, about the 1st of April to the end of December.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): I might say for the benefit of the House that previous to last year this very steamer the Robert Cann, had been receiving $13,000 for an all-year service, and that she had performed the all-year service previous to 1926, but now on account of her age and certain other reasons it was thought she would probably not be a good winter boat, and the Lovat was substituted in her stead. I think if the Robert Cann was not able to give an all the year round service tenders should have been called for before the Lovat was put on at an additional $6,000 a month. It would have been good business. We are paying the Robert Cann for performing an all the year round service although for four or five months she is not doing anything, while we are paying the Lovat $50,000 besides provincial subsidies for an all the year round service, and then we turn around and give her an additional $6,000 a month, practically $200 a day, for the winter service. The department kicked at paying $13,000 subsidy for a similar service at the other end not later than the 30th of March last. I claim that this is unfair discrimination and a squandering of public money.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is in error in saying that we pay the Robert Cann $13,500 odd for this service for the year round, although the boat is not giving us that service. The record shows that the Robert Cann from April 1 to December 1 received a subsidy of the old rate amounting to $10,125. So there was $3,375 available towards the subsidy for the winter service. The fishermen complained that that boat was not able to give a satisfactory winter service. Let me repeat, we secured a reduced rate for the transportation of the fish.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Were tenders advertised for when this agreement was made?

Mr. ROBB: No, but there is much in what my hon. friend says for the all-year round service. This was a service provided for the fishermen to enable them to send their catch to market during January, February and March of this year. The moment the Robert Cann stopped running her subsidy ceased.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What negotiations took place when the new arrangement was made? Were tenders asked for, or was there any correspondence, or on whose advice was the arrangement made?

Mr. ROBB: I am advised that the department investigated through our officer down there, Mr. Tupper, and this particular boat was recommended as the only boat available.

Mr. McGIBBON: Has the minister any information of the quantity of fish carried?

Mr. ROBB: The returns are not in.

Mr. SHORT: This is the $10,500 item?

Mr. ROBB: No, the vote is for $4,625, the additional amount required. The hon. gentleman will recall that we had available out of the original subsidy voted some $3,000 odd, which added to this will be sufficient to pay for the winter service.

Mr. SHORT: I think this item should go through. I know something about the service down there. My friends look at me, but perhaps they are not as familiar with the local conditions as I am. Canso is one of the most important fishing points in Nova Scotia. They have had an inadequate steamship service for several years. During the winter of a year ago traffic was held up in that section for a week at a time on account of ice conditions and the boat not being suitable to meet those conditions. I understand this item is to provide for better steamship service. Many of the places along the coast require better steamship service, this one particularly, and I think the money is well spent. I do not say that other services down there should not be attended to as well, but more fish is shipped out of Canso than out of any other port in Nova Scotia excepting Halifax. Consequently they are entitled to a good steamship service, and I support this item with pleasure.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): The district of Canso is probably one of our largest fishing sections, but I may tell the hon. member for Digby that there are other important fishing sections, for instance, Petite de Grat. We are not receiving the same service on the other side of the coast, and I see very strong reasons why my friend from Digby advocates this vote. Of course, he was not a representative of the county of Guysborough-Antigonish in 1925-26 when our Pictou friends had their boat put on the Canso-Guysborough route. I am not interested personally either in the Maritime Fish Corporation or in any other corporation in Guysborough township. I am speaking for the interests of the fishermen and the public treasury. We want service at the lowest possible cost, with no discrimination in any shape or form, and we do not want favours to be handed out to the friends of this government.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Mr. Chairman, I think that is an unwarranted attack on the hon. member for Digby. During the Christmas recess I had occasion to travel into Nova Scotia, and I saw what the fishermen and the fishing companies were doing in Canso. I reached the conclusion that what Nova Scotia lacks is adequate transportation facilities for fish. They appear to be in the same position as we were on the prairies some time ago when we did not have proper elevator facilities for our grain. To-day the fishermen along the coast have no means of transporting their catch as fresh fish, and therefore they have to dry and salt it, which yields them a net return equivalent to only a cent or a cent and a half a pound on the weight of their catch when sold fresh. If these fishermen could have their fish taken to Canso and other places to be marketed as fresh fish they would double their earnings, and I believe the government should spend money to that end. The service given by the Lovat I found to be first class. When I was there a good deal of fresh fish was being shipped from Canso by the Maritime Fish Corporation, and of course being perishable it had to be transported quickly or great loss would be incurred. I believe that by putting the Lovat on that route rates on the transportation of the fish from Canso have been reduced twenty to six cents per hundred pounds. I am in favour of this vote or of any other vote that will give added transportation facilities to the fishermen of Nova Scotia.

Item agreed to.

Mail Subsidies and Steamship Subventions—Mulgrave and Canso, steam service between—additional amount required, $3,000.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): Have tenders been called for in the last few months for this service?

Mr. ROBB: I am sure my hon. friend will not object to this vote.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): No, certainly not.

Mr. ROBB: The financial statement furnished by the contractors, the Arichat Steamship Company of Sydney, covering the last eight years, shows that the service has been unprofitable. The loss between 1917 and 1924 amounts to $31,000. The contractors say they are unable to continue the service without a substantial increase, and point out that in view of the fact that this is a daily service, except Sunday, throughout the year, they receive possibly less than any other subsidized service in the vicinity. They are willing to continue the service with an increase of $3,000. If my hon. friend desires to have tenders called for I have no objection.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): I understand that a service has been going on for a number of years. This is in the county of Richmond and it is in a different position from the service at Canso. It serves an important fresh fish section, but there are no cold storage facilities such as there are at Canso. Fish must reach the cold storage plant within at least twenty-four hours of being caught, and these people are entitled to a very good service. They have approached the government in the past and this is the first vote I notice for an increased subsidy. I see that so soon as the additional appropriation was placed in the estimates tenders were called for by the department on March 7. Are all the tenders in and to whom has the contract been awarded?

Mr. ROBB: No contract has been awarded.

Mr. BENNETT: But have tenders been called for?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): Has any new contract been awarded?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond): Will the same people have the contract?

Mr. ROBB: I do not know; the tenders have not yet been examined.

Mr. SHORT: Are there any further supplementaries to come down in connection with steamship services?

Mr. ROBB: I hope not.

Mr. SHORT: Then I want to point out that the government has omitted a service that should be provided for, namely, that between Bridgetown and Saint John. It has been in operation since 1910 and the subsidy was dropped last year. While the present minister was acting as Minister of Trade and Commerce I took the matter up with him, as he remembers very well. And when the estimates were going through the House in December last I was given to understand that a supplementary would come down later on. I have taken up the question again with the present Minister of Trade and Commerce who informed me that something would be done. If I am to understand now that no subsidy is to be given I must note a protest against the discontinuance of it. I see no reason why this particular service should not receive the same consideration as is given the other steamship lines running into the bay of Fundy. Here we have a subsidy which has been granted ever since 1910 and which is suddenly dropped, and no reason is offered. Some sort of explanation was offered last year to the effect that the company had been making a profit and were therefore not entitled to a subsidy, but this year the statement they have submitted to the department shows a loss. There are two other lines of steamers subsidized, one from Annapolis and the other from Bear river to Saint John. The Bridgetown Steamship Company runs twenty miles further up the river than either of the others, covering the same route, but its subsidy is cut off while the other two are continued. Can the minister not explain this?

Mr. ROBB: These items are for the current fiscal year ending March 31 instant. I am willing to give my hon. friend credit for having done his duty last year, so that if no subsidy was given then the fault is not his. I understand from my colleague the Postmaster General that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has the matter under consideration and is favourably disposed to it, and if he recommends it it is quite possible a vote will be brought down next year.

Mr. SHORT: That is the very reason I wanted to know whether there were any further supplementaries to come down in connection with steamship services.

Item agreed to.

Government of the Northwest Territories—salaries and expenses connected with the administration of the territories, etc. Further amount required, $15,000.

Mr. BENNETT: What is this?

Mr. ROBB: I have not the information. I am not sure that this is not to complete a certain amount required for fire purposes.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think so. I had a letter in regard to this matter and I promised to find out what the item was for when it came up. However, when the bill is in committee the minister can give the information.

Item agreed to.

Government of the Yukon Territory—amount required to pay compensation to John McIver in connection with the purchase of placer mining claims situated on Poker creek, Yukon Territory, $3,000.

Mr. BENNETT: What is this?

Mr. ROBB: I have not the information but I will get it.

Item agreed to.

Adjustment of war claims—Department of the Secretary of State. Further amount required, $5,000.

Mr. BENNETT: An hon. member is anxious to have information regarding this vote, but if later on in committee an explanation can be given, that will be satisfactory.

Mr. GARDINER: Many of the items in this list of supplementaries were passed with no explanation given, and before the list was distributed to the committee. I wonder if the minister would go back to item 385 and give an explanation of how it came to be included?

Mr. ROBB: This item is to authorize and provide for Mr. Meighen's indemnity as leader of the opposition from January 1, 1922 to March 7, 1922, at $10,000 per annum. My hon. friend understands that the leader of the opposition is entitled to that salary. The Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King was paid as leader of the opposition to December 31, 1921, and Mr. Meighen was paid as leader of the opposition from March 8, 1922, the day the House opened, and the present item is to cover Mr. Meighen's indemnity as leader of the opposition in the interval.

Mr. GARDINER: Why is it necessary to place it in the supplementaries at this late hour, and who was responsible for placing it there?

Mr. ROBB: I think the reason was that we did not have the figures until that time. As a matter of fact, we really did not know until later, that Mr. Meighen had not been paid.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Is not the real explanation the fact that until March 7 of that year we did not know who was going to be leader of the opposition, Mr. Crerar or Mr. Meighen, and as a matter of fact until that date there was no leader of the opposition?

Mr. ROBB: No, that was not the reason.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I can give my hon. friend the explanation. When Mr. Meighen's government resigned and the present administration assumed office in October last, Mr. Meighen continued as leader of the opposition until the time my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Guthrie) was chosen leader of the opposition. Unfortunately immediately after we came into office, Mr. Meighen was informed that no salary cheques could be paid to him as leader of the opposition, or to his secretaries and that he was not entitled further to the use of the frank. When I learned of this, I expressed considerable indignation and said I thought it was quite wrong. It seemed to me that the House would not desire the leader of the opposition to be treated with discourtesy of the kind. I was informed that there was no legal authority to pay Mr. Meighen as leader of the opposition, that the law required that to be recognized as the leader of the opposition he must be a member of parliament, and at the time Mr. Meighen had not a seat. I discussed the matter with Mr. Meighen personally and said I would take the responsibility of seeing that matters were properly adjusted. It was then that Mr. Meighen informed me that he had received no salary as leader of the opposition for the period here mentioned though he had acted as such during that time. I said if that were the case I thought it was equally a mistake; that if he was entitled to the salary he should receive it, and that I would ask the House to vote it, this I now desire to do.

Mr. GARDINER: I am glad we have received this explanation because we in this group were wondering why it was included in the supplementary estimates when the salary of the leader of the opposition is provided for in the House of Commons Act. I would like to go a little further than that and point out that there is another circumstance which the Prime Minister evidently has not taken into consideration. The government of which the Prime Minister is now head took office on December 29, 1921, if I am not mistaken, and after the general election prior to that Mr. Meighen did not have a seat in the House and had to wait until such time as a seat was opened to him in order to enter the House. Another circumstance which we must remember is the fact that the party led by Mr. Meighen was not the second largest party in the House and could not claim in any way to be the official opposition. The Conservative party had something like fifty-one members whereas the Progressive party had about sixty-three, and it was not determined until March 6 or 7 which of those two groups would form the opposition. Under no circumstances could Mr. Meighen and the Conservative party claim the opposition benches until such time as the Progressive group had made a decision as to whether or not they would form the opposition. I think it was on March 6 that the Progressive group decided not to become the official opposition, and that information was transmitted not only to the Prime Minister but to Mr. Meighen as well, as leader of the Conservative party. Under the circumstances Mr. Meighen never was the leader of the official oppposition at that particular time. I am not objecting to the amount of the vote, but I do think at this late hour of the day and in view of these circumstances it is pretty small to include that sum of money in the estimates.

Item agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the first and second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

SUPPLY BILL

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. ROBB moved:

Resolved that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1927, the sum of $575,204.22 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported and concurred in. Mr. Robb thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 151, for granting to His Majesty a certain sum of money for the public service of the financial year ending March 31, 1927.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first and second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—$575,204.22 granted for 1926-27

Mr. GUTHRIE: The arrangement was that we were to receive certain information when this bill reached the committee stage, and I assume that the Minister of Finance will move that the committee rise now.

Mr. ROBB: I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.25 p.m.

Wednesday, March 16, 1927

The House met at three o'clock.

ALLIED INDIAN TRIBES OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

ADDITIONAL MEMBER APPOINTED TO JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received the following message from the Senate:

Resolved that a message be sent to the House of Commons by one of the clerks at the table to acquaint that House that the name of the Hon. Mr. Murphy has been added to the list of the members of the special committee appointed to inquire into the claims of the Allied Indian Tribes of British Columbia.

REPORT

First report of the committee appointed to consider Bill No. 105, to amend the Food and Drugs Act, 1920.—Mr. Howden.

BELL TELEPHONE—GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY CONTRACT

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I promised to lay on the table some information for the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary) respecting the agreement between the Bell Telephone Company of Canada and the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, of 1913, which I now do.

[Mr. Robb.]

BANKING AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved:

That the name of Mr. Laflamme be substituted for that of Mr. Rhéaume on the select standing committee on banking and commerce.

Motion agreed to.

MONTREAL, OTTAWA AND GEORGIAN BAY CANAL COMPANY

Mr. W. E. TUMMON (South Hastings): I have the honour of presenting to this House, Mr. Speaker, a copy of a resolution passed by the city council of the city of Belleville, also a copy of a resolution passed by the council of the town of Deseronto, praying that this House do not grant renewal of the charter of the Montreal, Ottawa and Georgian Bay Canal Company, known as Bill No. 78.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

CAPE TORMENTINE—BORDEN CAR FERRY

Mr. BEAUBIEN:

1. What year was the present car ferry established between Cape Tormentine, New Brunswick, and Borden, Prince Edward Island?
2. How many trips did this car ferry make annually from the year it was placed in service to December, 1926?
3. How many passengers were carried annually during the same period?
4. How many tons of freight were carried annually during the same period?
5. How many head of live stock were carried during the above mentioned period?
6. How many bags of mail were carried during the said period?
7. How many automobiles were carried during this period?
8. What have been the losses or profits of the operation of this car ferry, annually, since its being put into operation?

Hon. Mr. DUNNING:

1. 1917

2. 1917, 50; 1918, 1,011; 1919, 1,444; 1920, 1,638; 1921, 1,506; 1922, 1,642; 1923, 1,543; 1924, 1,584; 1925, 2,050; 1926, 2,486.

3. Records prior to 1924 no longer available: 1924, 52,271; 1925, 61,292; 1926, 63,603.

4, 5 and 6. As this is a car ferry handling trains across the Strait, without breaking bulk or transshipment, no record is kept of freight or mail passing through.

7. No records prior to 1923: 1923, 1,562; 1924, 2,395; 1925, 3,368; 1926, 4,299.

8. There is no profit and loss account connected with the operation of the car ferry. The revenues from passengers and freight are train revenues and so accounted. Cost of operation of the car ferry service is given in separate statement attached.

VANCOUVER GRAIN SHIPMENTS

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

1. How many cars of grain were unloaded in the port of Vancouver during the months of September, October, November, December, and January, in each of the years 1922-23-24-25-26, and January, 1927?

2. Has the attention of the government been called to certain evidence recently given before the railway commission that some 2,500 cars of grain were being held back from forwarding to the coast owing to congestion at that point and for lack of shipping?

3. Have any steps been taken by the government to secure shipping for the removal of grain freely offered for shipment via Vancouver? If so, what?

Hon. Mr. RINFRET:

1. Department of Railways and Canals—

2. The Canadian National railway management reports that on account of the large volume of tough and damp grain moving to Vancouver and the limited drying facilities, it was necessary to inaugurate some system for the purpose of avoiding blockade of grain and the consequent possibility of advantage being taken of the situation by speculators in moving grain to Vancouver without at the same time making provisions for steamship accommodation. The arrangement was originally advocated by the Vancouver harbour commissioners, grain trade at Vancouver and terminal railways. Cars are not accepted for shipment to Vancouver except on permit from the railway company. This is considered to be the only satisfactory method for shippers and carriers alike. The control of the situation is not in the hands of the Canadian National railways, but rather in the capacity of the elevator to dry and handle shipments and also the number of available ships.

3. The Canadian Government Merchant Marine take the maximum quantity of grain offering for their steamers sailing from Vancouver.

IMPORTATION OF MOTION PICTURE FILMS

Mr. FRASER:

1. How many motion picture films were imported into Canada during each of the years 1922 to 1926, inclusive, and from what countries?

2. What is the rate of duty on the said films?

3. Does the Department of Customs exercise any supervision or censorship over the said films so as to prevent the entry to Canada of motion pictures, (a) of an obscene character; (b) calculated to prejudice the public mind against Canadian and British sentiment; (c) of an aggressive pro-foreign type including propaganda antagonistic to Canadian interests; (d) falsely interpreting Canadian life?

4. How many motion picture films were produced in Canada during the same period and how often were they exhibited?

5. Has the government considered the advisability of having a careful detailed survey made of the motion picture films exhibited in Canada?

5. No.

VACCINE FOR TUBERCULAR CATTLE

Mr. CASSELMAN:

1. Is it the intention of the Department of Agriculture to make use of vaccination for the prevention of tuberculosis in cattle, in addition to, or as a substitute for the present system of slaughtering diseased cattle?

2. Is the government aware that this method has been used in Switzerland since 1917, in England since 1923, and has been introduced in the western states?

3. If so, what are the known results?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. No.

2. The government is not aware that any system of vaccination for the prevention of tuberculosis has been in use in Switzerland since 1917, nor in England since 1923. The government is, however, aware that a secret alleged cure for tuberculosis has been advertised and talked about in Switzerland and England as well as elsewhere for some years. This is known as the Spahlinger treatment. This treatment has been greatly lauded by some people, and just as warmly condemned by others, and, since the treatment is a secret one, there does not seem to be any way of deciding on its merits or demerits. The government is not aware that the Spahlinger treatment has been officially recognized in the United States or any other country. It might, however, be added that the Calmette system of vaccination for the prevention of tuberculosis in cattle and in human beings has been given wide publicity and many scientists are at present studying the claims for this vaccine in many countries, including Canada and the United States.

3. See answer to No. 2.

Mr. CHURCH:

What are the names of the officials, if any, appointed to office, either temporarily or permanently, at the Toronto post office and custom house, or removed from office at the instance or request of, (a) Liberal candidates defeated at the last election, or Liberal members of parliament; (b) Conservative members; (c) Progressive members or defeated candidates; (d) Labour, defeated candidates; (e) defeated candidates of other parties?

Hon. Mr. RINFRET:

No such employees were taken on or dismissed during period specified in inquiry.

RADIO BROADCASTING REGULATIONS

Mr. SPENCER:

1. Are there any restrictions to anyone installing a radio broadcasting station in the cities of Calgary or Edmonton, or both?

2. What would be the cost of license in each case?

Hon. Mr. CARDIN:

1. Yes. All stations in these cities are subject to the regular restrictions set out in the Radiotelegraph Act and regulations issued thereunder, which apply to all stations in the Dominion of Canada.

2. $50 per annum.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—BAGGAGE AGENTS' UNIFORMS

Mr. PRICE:

1. Are station baggage agents on the Atlantic region of the Canadian National railways refused uniforms while those serving on the central and western regions are provided with same?

2. If so, why?

Hon. Mr. DUNNING: The practices with respect to supplying uniforms to baggage agents and other employees were established before consolidation, and vary as between different regions and, to some extent, on the same region. The attention of the management has been directed to the complaint of baggage agents on the Atlantic region in this connection.

IMPORTED MILITARY STORES—DUTIES PAID

Mr. CHARTERS:

1. What was the amount of duty and sales tax, if any, paid by the Department of National Defence on imported arms, equipment, clothing, etc., for the use of active militia during the following fiscal years: 1919-20, 1920-21, 1921-22, 1922-23, 1923-24, 1924-25, 1925-26 and 1926-27 to date?

2. What was the amount of duty and sales tax paid by units of the active militia for the same fiscal years?

Hon. Mr. RALSTON:

1. 1919-20, $45,251.94; 1920-21, $20,003.18; 1921-22, $29,734.76; 1922-23, $24,834.16; 1923-24, $9,758.36; 1924-25, $24,455.66; 1925-26, $16,596.62; 1926-27 (to February 28, 1927), $7,334.51.

2. No information.

COST OF WELLAND CANAL

Mr. SENN:

1. What has been the cost of construction of that part of the new or Welland ship canal lying between the city of Welland and Port Colborne, up to date?

2. What amount including the sum placed in the estimates for 1927-28 is necessary to complete this section of the canal?

3. What amount of money not included in the above estimates will be necessary to make the harbour and entrance at Port Colborne safe for the entry of boats such as the Welland ship canal is designed to accommodate?

Hon. Mr. DUNNING:

1. Approximately $12,735,000.

2. Approximately $13,766,000.

3. Harbour work at Port Colborne is included in estimates referred to in Answer No. 2.

HARROW EXPERIMENTAL FARM

Mr. GOTT:

1. What was the cost of operating the Harrow, Ontario, Experimental farm for the year 1926?

2. What returns did the farm make?

3. Who is the superintendent of the farm?

4. What salary is paid him?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. $22,582.03.

2. $14,641.39.

3. Mr. Henry Alonzo Freeman.

4. $2,400 per annum.

REPAIRS TO ESSEX COUNTY PIERS

Mr. GOTT:

1. When repairs were made to the piers at Kingsville, Leamington, and Pelee island, Ontario, why was the lumber for same not purchased in Essex county despite the fact that there are reputable lumber dealers in the said county?

2. Does the patronage of the member from Antigonish-Guysborough extend as far west and south as Essex south?

3. In view of the fact that the estimates contain a $5,000 appropriation for repairs to piers in Essex county, will the department make an attempt to purchase material as close to the work as possible regardless of what political opinions are held by the lumber dealers of the county?

4. Have tenders for lumber for repairs in Essex county ever been asked for from Conklin or Ludlam lumber companies of Kingsville, and Leamington, Ontario, respectively, or from the Smith Lumber Company of Harrow, Ontario?

5. If so, were they on the same equality as other firms, and subject to the same consideration?

Hon. Mr. ELLIOTT:

1. Because the prices asked by lumber dealers in Essex county were considerably higher than those quoted by lumber dealers elsewhere, and in other cases no prices at all were submitted by dealers in that county.

2. The patronage in this as in other ridings is controlled by the government.

3. Yes.

4. Yes, tenders have been asked for from Conklin Planing Mills and Ludlam-Ainslie Lumber Company, but not from Smith Lumber Company of Harrow, Ontario, whose name does not appear in the Canada Gazetteer or Fraser's Directory of Lumber Industries.

5. Yes.

GREAT LAKES LEVELS

Mr. ARTHURS:

1. Having regard to sessional paper No. 118, question No. 1, has any department of the government kept any record of the levels of the great lakes or any part thereof, for all or part of the last ten years?

2. If so, what does such report show as above or below zero?

3. What is zero for each of the great lakes?

Hon. Mr. CARDIN:

1. Since 1910 precise records, of the levels of the great lakes, have been kept under the hydrographic survey branch of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. The records are computed from hourly readings obtained by maintaining automatic water gauges on each lake.

In addition to the above, copies of all other authentic water levels (from staff and automatic gauges) of the great lakes, since 1860, have been obtained from both Canadian and American sources. These records have been compiled to a relative basis for comparison with the later records.

2. On the great lakes the yearly mean surface elevations have shown an almost constant lowering of the surface from 1916 and 1919 to the present year of 1926, as follows:

		Feet
Lake Superior..	1916-1926	Loss 2.40
Lake Huron..	1918-1926	Loss 3.19
Lake Erie..	1919-1926	Loss 1.80
Lake Ontario..	1919-1926	Loss 1.84

During 1926, record low-water levels were established for each of the great lakes.

3. All surface elevations of the great lakes are in feet above mean sea level and are referred to the United States lake survey levels of 1903 adjustment.

GOLD AND SILVER COINAGE

M.r BARBER:

1. In what years was Canadian gold coin struck by the Royal Mint?
2. Is it the intention of the government to resume gold coinage?
3. What was the amount of silver coin struck by the Royal Mint during the years 1922, 1923, 1924, 1925, 1926?
4. What was the amount of silver coin issued during the same five years?
5. What was the amount of silver coin in circulation during the same five years?
6. Has the government taken any action toward remitting or exporting American silver coin?
7. If not, why not?
8. If so, when and what action has been taken, and what amount has been exported?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1. 1912, 1913 and 1914.
2. Yes, if demand warrants it.
3. 1922, 1923, 1924, 1925 and 1926—nil.
4.

1922	$24,000

GEORGE H. WORDEN

Mr. JONES:

1. Was one George H. Worden, postmaster at Starkeys, Queens county, New Brunswick, dismissed by the present government?
2. If so, who recommended dismissal, and on what charges?
3. Were there any charges against the said Mr. Worden?
4. If so, by whom were they made?
5. What was the salary of the said postmaster?

[Mr. Cardin.]

Hon. Mr. VENIOT:

1. Yes.
2. Doctor D. H. McAlister. Dismissal on ground of better location needed.
3. No.
4. Covered by No. 3.
5. Salary and allowances, $86.

BIENFAIT-ESTEVAN LIGNITE COAL AREA

Mr. McKENZIE:

1. To what extent is lignite coal from the Bienfait-Estevan coal area being used for heating the federally owned or occupied buildings in southern Saskatchewan and southwestern Manitoba?
2. Has it given satisfaction and proven an economical fuel where used?
3. If it is not being used in all the federal buildings in this area, is there any reason why it should not be used in all such buildings within a reasonable distance of the said mines?

Hon. Mr. ELLIOTT:

1. Used in the public buildings at Estevan and Weyburn, Saskatchewan, and is being tried out this year in the public building at Virden, Manitoba.
2. Yes, at Estevan and Weyburn. No report yet received from Virden.
3. No, provided it could be delivered at a price which would compare favourably with that of other coal, on the basis of calorific value.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

LEAMINGTON ONION WAREHOUSE

Mr. GOTT:

1. What was the total cost of the onion warehouse at Leamington, Ontario?
2. How is the warehouse operated?
3. Who is in charge of same?
4. What salary is paid any and all employees, and what are the names and respective wages or salary paid?
5. Have complaints reached the department recently that onions are being imported from foreign countries while onions are still in storage at Leamington?
6. What amount of onions is now in storage in the government warehouse at Leamington, Ontario?
7. Why was the onion warehouse at Leamington erected?
8. What policy of protection does the government deem in the best interests of the onion growers of Canada—one which protects their crops from frost after being harvested while foreign onions are being consumed on the home market, or one which prevents foreign competition from exploiting our markets and forcing our growers to seek cover and await an opportune time to dispose of their crop while cheap surplus produce floods our markets?
9. How many tons of onions were raised in Canada in 1925-1926?

10. How many tons of onions were grown in Essex county in 1925-1926?

11. How many tons of onions were consumed in Canada in 1925-1926?

12. How many tons of onions were imported into Canada in 1925-1926, giving imports from the respective countries?

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—PRIVATE CARS

Mr. BENOIT:

1. How many private cars were leased or owned by the government and what were they named or numbered, from 1911 to 1921, inclusive?

2. What was the total cost of said cars and the amount expended during the said period of years in making repairs or changes to such cars?

3. What was the cost of operating same during the calendar years above mentioned?

4. Was anything paid for hauling or shunting of said cars during each of the said years? If so, how much?

5. Where were the said cars located, how many at Montreal, how many at Ottawa, and how many elsewhere?

6. Had any of the departments of the government or ministers of the same, cars for their particular use, and what were the names and numbers of such cars and the departments and ministers making use of the same?

7. Were any of the cars referred to placed at the disposal of other ministers or other persons during the last five years of that period? If so, when and by whom?

8. Do any of the railways in Canada or in the United States make any charge for transportation or handling of said cars? If so, what is the rate, and do the companies in Canada by courtesy dead head said cars?

GOVERNMENT MOTOR CARS

Mr. BENOIT:

1. How many motor cars were purchased for the use of the several departments of the government, of what make were the said cars, what did each cost, and when were respective purchases made, from 1911 to 1921, inclusive?

2. During above period how many automobiles were purchased for the personal use of the cabinet ministers, of what make was each car, when purchased and what was the cost of each?

3. What was the amount expended for maintenance and repairs of cars referred to in questions one and two?

4. During above period how many chauffeurs were paid out of the public treasury for driving the cars used by the ministers of the crown, and how much have such services cost in salaries and uniforms.

5. Were the chauffeurs referred to in previous question permitted to avail themselves of the ministers' automobiles for their personal use, and that of their friends?

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT BOARD

Mr. GARDINER:

1. How many soldier settlers are there in the Calgary district who have received loans from the Soldier Settlement Board?

2. How many of these loans were for the purchase of land, stock, and implements?

3. How many of these loans were for the purchase of stock and implements only?

4. How many seizures of crops or grain were made by the Soldier Settlement Board in this district in the crop year of 1926-1927?

5. How many chattel mortgages were secured on crops or grain in the Calgary district for the crop year 1926-1927?

6. How many soldier settlers in the Calgary district have paid their annual payments in full for the current year?

7. The number of settlers in arrears in this district to date who were not asked for a chattel mortgage or whose crops were not seized?

8. The reason why crops or grain were not seized or chattel mortgages secured where the payments to the board were in arrears?

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

NATURAL RESOURCES OF MANITOBA

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

For a return of all correspondence of whatsoever character that has passed between the Dominion government or any minister or officer of the Dominion government and the Premier of Manitoba or any minister of officer of the government of Manitoba since the year 1920 to date, and having reference to the turning over to the province of Manitoba of its natural resources.

QUEBEC POSTMASTERS

Mr. CAHAN:

For a return showing:

1. The names and addresses of each and every postmaster in each and every electoral district of the province of Quebec who has been dismissed from office since September 25, 1925.

2. The persons and their addresses on whose charge or complaint each such dismissal was made and the grounds set forth in each such charge or complaint.

3. The names of the postmasters who received copies of the said charges or complaints so made against them and were given an opportunity to present their defence against such charges or complaints.

4. The amount of the annual salary or revenue being received by each postmaster so dismissed.

5. The names and addresses of those who have been appointed to fill the offices so vacated by the postmasters who have been so dismissed.

6. The names and addresses of those on whose recommendations the new appointments were made.

ILE HAUTE LAND LEASE

Mr. MacLAREN:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, leases, reports and other correspondence or communications between the government of Canada or any official of the government, since January 1, 1922, relating to the granting of a lease of land on the Ile Haute, bay of Fundy, to Sidney Kerr of St. John, New Brunswick.

NOVA SCOTIA POSTMASTERS

Mr. ERNST:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, and all other documents or correspondence between the Postmaster General, or any official or officials of the Postmaster General's department, and any other person or persons, relating to the dismissal of Brunswick Rhodenizer, postmaster of Upper Branch, Lunenburg county, and the appointment of a successor in office; the dismissal of James Backman, the postmaster at Aspotogan, Lunenburg county, and the appointment of a successor: the dismissal of M. A. Harlow, postmaster at North Brookfield, Queens county, and the appointment of a successor.

RABIES IN CANADA

Mr. GUERIN:

1. For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents in the possession of the government which are supposed to prove the existence of rabies in the country.
2. A copy of all orders issued by any department of the government in connection with the supposed outbreak of the disease.
3. A return showing how many persons are supposed to have been infected, and what the mortality has been to date.

HASTINGS MILL SITE

Mr. COOTE:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, and other documents exchanged between the Vancouver harbour board or the government, and the former owners or their agents or any other parties, regarding the purchase of the Hastings mill site.

SEIZURE OF S. S. WESTERN

Mr. W. G. ERNST (Queens-Lunenburg) moved:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams or other correspondence between the Department of Customs, or any official thereof, or the Department of Justice, or any official thereof, and any person or persons, whether employees of such departments or not, relating to the seizure of the ss. Western and the disposal of the cargo of the said steamship, in or about the months of November, December, 1926, and January, 1927.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): In the absence of my colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), we will allow this to pass subject to any reservations as to what may be considered in the department as confidential. I am not sure that there is anything confidential, but there may be.

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT, SICKNESS AND INVALIDITY INSURANCE

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the committee on industrial and international relations be instructed to investigate and report on the establishment of a system of insurance against unemployment, sickness and invalidity.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the motion which I have before the House at the present time asks the House of Commons to submit this particular question for investigation to one of the standing committees. I do not expect that a committee which would investigate a question of such magnitude and importance, would be able to do anything with it during this session or even during two or three sessions. The matters involved are fairly large and cover a very wide territory. It is, however, approximately twenty years ago that the question of old age pensions was referred to a select committee of this House, and even at this date old age pensions have not become a fact in Canada but are still under review before one of the houses of parliament. I hope that the proposal I am introducing on this occasion will not take as long to become the law of the land as is likely to be the case with old age pensions. Legislation along the line which I have in my motion is already in effect in many parts of the British Empire. In Great Britain unemployment insurance has been an established fact since 1911, and I believe it was about the same year that similar legislation became effective in Australia. In other parts of the world they already have unemployment as well as sickness and invalidity insurance, and I think Canada is behind the times in not having on its statute books legislation the same as they have elsewhere.

I believe this question is not new to the Liberal nor the Conservative party, because both of those parties have had it as a party matter under consideration in years gone by. In 1919 the Conservative party appointed a royal commission to investigate the question of industrial conditions in the Dominion of Canada. It was a very representative commission composed of employers, employees and others, and was presided over by Chief Justice Mathers of the Province of Manitoba. At page 6 of its report I find the following:

The chief causes of unrest may be enumerated as follows:

And the first cause given is:

Unemployment and the fear of unemployment.

The commission recommended:

Immediate inquiry by expert boards into the following subjects, with a view to early legislation:

(a) State insurance against unemployment, sickness, invalidity and old age.

This was in the early part of 1919. Not to be outdone, my friends of the Liberal party went one better and at their convention in August, 1919, passed resolutions of a similar nature. I am extremely sorry that the right hon. Prime Minister is not in his seat, for I would give anything this afternoon to hear him deliver in this House exactly the same speech that he gave before the Liberal convention. No doubt as a result of his eloquent appeal to his fellow Liberals on that occasion, the following resolution was passed.

Resolved that the committee recommends that the National Liberal Convention accept in their entirety as a part of the Liberal platform, in the spirit they have been framed and in so far as the special circumstances of the country will permit, the terms of the Labour convention and general principles associated with the League of Nations and incorporated in the conditions of peace.

The convention further resolved:

That in so far as may be practicable, having regard for Canada's financial position, an adequate system of insurance against unemployment, sickness, dependence in old age, and other disability, which would include old age pensions, widows' pensions, and maternity benefits, should be instituted by the federal government in conjunction with the governments of the several provinces; and that on matters pertaining to industrial and social legislation an effort should be made to overcome any question of jurisdiction between the Dominion and the provinces by effective coöperation between the several governments.

And it was also further resolved in the fourth paragraph that there should be:

Effective legislation for the conservation of human life and health.

So, Mr. Speaker, my resolution follows out exactly the platform adopted at the convention of the Liberal party in 1919, and is along the lines of the recommendations of the royal commission appointed by the Conservative government of that day.

I wish now, Sir, to refer to another royal commission which investigated this question. I do not propose this afternoon to deal with unemployment insurance itself, but to emphasize the necessity at this particular juncture of having the subject matter of my resolution referred to the committee on industrial and international relations for investigation and report. During the last sixteen years unemployment insurance has been in effect in Great Britain, and there were some who doubted the wisdom of such legislation. Last year the Conservative government of Mr. Baldwin appointed a royal commission to inquire into the question and report to parliament thereon. The commission was presided over by Lord Blanesburgh, and its personnel was of a fairly representative character. It was not until about four weeks ago that the commission presented its report, to the effect that unemployment insurance has become a permanent feature of the code of social legislation in Great Britain, and that although there had been complaints made in regard to the administration of the act, particularly in regard to what is termed the "dole" system, those complaints were not substantiated before the commission. In fact the report states that no evidence had been adduced to prove that the act had been in any way abused. Indeed, the commission endorses the principle of the legislation. In view of its having been in effect in Great Britain for sixteen years, I do not think Canada should be so far behind the old country in such social legislation.

As an excuse for lack of action along this line it may be pleaded that the conflict of jurisdiction as between the provinces and the Dominion precludes our legislating in this regard. Personally I think, as the Liberal party thought in 1919, that that difficulty should be overcome, and I believe it could be overcome if a committee took this matter in hand as I propose. The insurance of workers against sickness and unemployment is of the utmost importance to our Canadian working people. Last session the government set up a Tariff Advisory Board to inquire into industry, to give an opportunity for those who want higher protection to plead their case before it. In other words, the government set up a commission that was solely concerned with industry and the capital invested in it. While we give ample consideration to industry, we give very little to the most vital factor in industry—the human element. For many months in this House the main bone of contention between the two old parties is protection for industries, and hardly ever do we hear any plea for the protection of our men and women. I think it is time that a little more attention was given by parliament to the human factor in industry.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Do I understand the hon. member to say that this government set up a tariff board with the sole purpose of giving tariff protection to industry?

Mr. HEAPS: No, my hon. friend is mistaken. I never used the word "sole" in that way.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I distinctly heard the word "sole" used.

Mr. HEAPS: Then it was never intended. I think words are being put in my mouth that I never intended to use. I said the Tariff Advisory Board was set up last year for the purpose of giving industry an opportunity to ask for more protection. I added that we set up these commissions to give people an opportunity to appear and ask for more protection, but we do nothing along the same lines to afford protection to the human element in industry. I am trying to point out the different way in which we have treated these two factors in industry—the human and the capitalistic. We are prepared to give all kinds of protection to the one, but none to the other.

Mr. McMILLAN: Does the hon. gentleman think this tariff board—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Order! Stand up if you want to ask a question.

Mr. McMILLAN: Excuse me. Does the hon. gentleman mean to convey the idea that the tariff board was set up in the interests of capital rather than of labour?

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Speaker, I am confident that my hon. friend knows a little better than he would have us think he does. All tariff protection in this country is for the benefit of capital, and nothing else.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh.

Mr. HEAPS: Yes. When applicants appear before the tariff board for more protection for industry they are applying for more protection for capital. A large delegation representative of 2,000 employees in a certain industry in Ontario came to my office to interview me yesterday. This industry I speak of is well protected.

An hon. MEMBER: Where is it?

Mr. HEAPS: Never mind where it is. It is a fairly large industry in Ontario.

An hon. MEMBER: Where?

Mr. HEAPS: I do not mind saying it is in the constituency of Algoma, and, as I say, it employs about 2,000 men.

Mr. SIMPSON: What industry is that?

Mr. HEAPS: The Algoma Steel Corporation. The men in that industry were working on two shifts of eleven and thirteen hours respectively, and their wages run from 35 to 52½ cents per hour. How much protection did those workers enjoy? We are pleading for the government to take some action to improve the conditions under which these people have to work. And the same conditions have existed in the province of Nova Scotia. As a matter of fact it will be found, no matter where you go in Canada, that so far as the labour end of industry is concerned there has been no protection whatever.

[Mr. Heaps.]

Mr. SIMPSON: Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the men connected with the Algoma Steel Corporation were not in favour of protection for the steel industry?

Mr. HEAPS: I did not say that, but I may reply to the hon. gentleman by illustration. When the slaves of the southern United States were about to be freed they themselves fought on the side of their masters, and you may find these men in Algoma believing protection to be of some advantage to them, although so far it has done them no good.

As I said at the outset, I do not intend to discuss this resolution at great length. I have brought the matter up in the hope or having it referred to one of the standing committees. During the past two years we have established a committee on industrial relations which is fairly competent to handle such a question. It is high time that we placed on the statute books of this country social legislation of the character that has been in effect in other parts of the empire for the past fifteen or twenty years, and I hope that on this occasion the government will in no way oppose the reference of this question to the standing committee on industrial relations, who have every facility for making a complete study of the situation and whose report might lead to useful action and satisfactory results.

Mr. C. R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): As chairman of the committee on industrial and international relations, I have listened with interest to what the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) has had to say on this subject. The ideas which he has submitted to the House this afternoon were discussed by members of this House before that committee last year, and while as a Liberal I am not opposed to any resolution of this nature, while I am prepared to admit that the Liberal party is considerably interested in resolutions on which legislation making for social justice can be based, I must say that the argument of my hon. friend in regard to the tariff board does not appeal to me. The hon. gentleman touched on the relations of industry and humanity, and I fail to see how the one can be separated from the other. The welfare of industry and that of humanity are wrapped up in each other, at least to a large degree. The tariff board was set up by this government as a means of securing all the facts so as to determine fairly and equitably whether the tariff in any instance should be raised, lowered or eliminated. It is just possible that in some industries protection might be altogether removed, and if so, it is the duty of the tariff board to obtain all the evidence available and present all the facts to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) who can take the matter up with the House as a whole and have it dealt with by recommendation in that way. In some instances the evidence adduced before the board might lead to the raising of the tariff or the lowering of it, but whatever it might lead to there is no doubt about it that the best way in which any tariff proposal can be investigated or any tariff grievance remedied is through the instrumentality of just such a board which can deal rationally and successfully with the whole question of tariffs. I do not think it will be seriously questioned that the welfare of humanity, the good of the race, and the progress of industry are interdependent. This being so, the Liberal party in creating the tariff board has shown a desire to put industry and the individual employee upon a sound basis.

The resolution before us to-day is important, but it is not necessary to discuss the tariff board in order to come to a decision regarding this motion. Last year there came before the House a similar social resolution, as I may term it, to the following effect:

That in the opinion of this House, a wage sufficient to provide for a reasonable standard of living should constitute a legal minimum wage.

The subject suggested by that resolution was considered for about two months by the select committee on industrial relations. It was a wide resolution and one that called for close attention if it was to be wisely reported upon. The committee considered it for two months or so, and drew up a report which was presented on June 16 and concurred in on June 30th, the day before dissolution. The report of that committee is before parliament and the people of the country. Its final recommendation proposed two things, first:

That a conference of provincial and Dominion representatives intimately in touch with labour conditions throughout Canada be held in the near future to consult as to the best means to be employed of giving effect to the labour provisions of the treaties of peace.

That was the first recommendation; the other was that 10,000 copies of the report should be printed and distributed throughout the country in order that men and women in touch with labour conditions might study the subject and be apprised that so far as this parliament, at least was concerned, there was no reluctance to discuss social legislation and to report conclusively thereon. It will be observed that the main part of the report recommends the submission of the question to an interprovincial conference. I understand that interprovincial conference is being held this year, and I wondered if the hon. member for North Winnipeg would not think it the wiser course to have this resolution taken up then, and to allow that conference to deal with it for this year. This resolution is very closely connected with the one with which we dealt last year, and there is no reason why the interprovincial conference should not deal with it. We have just put through one piece of social legislation, the old age pension bill; that question first came up twenty years ago, and ever since we have been discussing it and developing public opinion until it could be sanctioned by this House. That bill is now before the Senate, and while it is there I would think it perhaps better not to prejudice the upper chamber against too much social legislation; I think perhaps this matter should be dealt with for the present by the conference this summer, and then if necessary it could be taken up here next year. The hour of the session is getting quite late; it will take two or three months to investigate this question and while we could start it this year of course we could not hope for a final report, so I would recommend that this action be taken.

Before taking my seat, Mr. Speaker, I would like to emphasize the fact that as a member of this House and of the Liberal party I sympathize with legislation of this kind. I gave last year's resolution all the support possible, and in the days to come I will be only too willing to coöperate with any hon. members who are interested in further social legislation of this kind. But while I hope we will not have to deal with too much of this legislation, because it means an expense to the country and from a financial point of view we can only deal with a certain amount at one time, I am sure hon. members on both sides of the House will be only too glad to give such a resolution as this their hearty approval.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is the hon. member speaking for the government?

Mr. McINTOSH: I am speaking as a member of the Liberal party; I am not dealing with the question as to whether the government is taking this view of the question or not. Does that satisfy my hon. friend.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am not sure that it does; I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman but he asked me a question. It does not satisfy me, if the hon. gentleman is expressing the thoughts of the Liberal party.

Mr. McINTOSH: I did not think it would satisfy the hon. member, but I cannot help that. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to repeat that while the old age pension bill is before the Senate it might be wise to have this resolution referred to the interprovincial conference which will take place during this coming summer. Further, since we expect that bill to become law, there will be a certain financial obligation connected with it, and since it is possible to go too far in work of this kind, I would suggest that we make haste slowly. Haste means nothing but delay. I think the best thing to do with this resolution is to permit the interprovincial conference to deal with it.

Mr. H. B. ADSHEAD (East Calgary): In support of this resolution I may say that the question of unemployment was first thrust upon my notice in 1913, when a motley crowd appeared on the streets of the city of Calgary with banners reading, "Shall we work, starve or steal?" We endeavoured to provide work for those men, and ever since that day the question of unemployment has been not only before the city of Calgary but before every city in the Dominion and the Dominion government as well. If you do not look upon the question from a humanitarian standpoint but from the dollars and cents side only,—and I am not going to take up the time of the House in discussing the question except to urge that it be referred to a committee—even from a financial standpoint it would be worth while. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) might give us the figures to show what this condition is costing Canada year by year. Last year in Calgary alone it cost this government in the neighbourhood of $5,000, and I know it cost more in Edmonton and in other cities throughout Canada. So it will be seen that even from a financial standpoint it would be worth while to refer a question of this kind to a committee of this House in order that it may receive due consideration and that some solution may be found. Whether we want it or not, that question is before us and will always be before us, and the probabilities are that the financial burden will increase instead of diminish unless we meet it in a non-partisan way and attempt to solve the difficulty. Therefore I urge that this parliament refer this question to the consideration of the committee.

Mr. J. G. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I have only a few words to add to what has already been said in regard to this resolution. I am in favour of any measure which will assist the working men of this country, but before this resolution goes to committee I would like to say something I endeavoured to say the other night when we were discussing the estimates. Before this country starts any new system of unemployment insurance, and before we undertake any expenditures of money in connection with sickness or disability insurance for workmen, I think we should first of all look into the cases of the returned men who have not been provided for by the government. There are a great many men in Canada who came back from overseas under certain disadvantages, and under our present system many of these men have been turned down and are receiving no pension or a very small amount so that some of them are actually on the verge of starvation. Under our law as it is at present these men have to show that their disability is connected with their overseas service. In the minds of those who have seen a great many of these cases there is no doubt that the trouble is actually connected with their overseas service, but it is impossible to prove that or to show that the disability has been continuous or, as they say, to prove continuity. Before we start to spend money on others in this country I say we should look after every returned man and every widow who is destitute. I have been endeavouring for over a year to have some four or five cases taken up by the Board of Pension Commissioners, by the appeal board and by the department, but so far I have had very little success. If this resolution goes to committee I believe this matter should first be looked into. We ought to look after our people who are to-day destitute on account of the war. When you go to these departments and go to the board they tell you, "Well, if you allow that case you let in fifty or a hundred others and that will cost this country millions and millions of dollars." I believe that no matter how much it costs this country we owe these people justice, and even if we have to spend millions of dollars let us carry out the deal we made with them when they enlisted, and look after them.

My hon. friend spoke of the dole system. I hope we will never see the day in Canada when that will be needed. In my opinion it has not proved a very great success in other countries and I think has undermined labour to a great extent in these countries.

My hon. friend also spoke of the immigration into Canada. It seems that some hon. gentlemen in that corner of the House are afraid to let people come into this country.

Mr. HEAPS: Who mentioned that question in this discussion?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I think you mentioned, it, did you not?

Mr. HEAPS: I do not think so.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I think that in talking of unemployment insurance you did.

Mr. HEAPS: No.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I was not referring particularly to the hon. member's remarks, but time and again members in that corner of the House rise and ask questions of the Minister of Immigration in that connection; they seem to be afraid to let people come into this country.

Mr. IRVINE: Is there any relationship between immigration and unemployment in this country?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): No doubt there is, but I point out that several hon. gentlemen in that corner came into this country as immigrants at one time, and they have not done too badly since coming to Canada. If we had had an immigration policy that excluded people from this country at the time our forefathers came here, when there was nothing to offer them in the way of employment—had they been shut out at that time Canada would never have become the country it is to-day, nor could it attain in the future to the country it is destined to be. People of the white race who are healthy should be allowed into Canada, any number of them. We can assimilate them. But one of our great troubles in Canada to-day in regard to immigration is the fact that practically every province in the Dominion is calling for more immigration but will not itself look after its unemployed. It wants to force the Dominion government to bring people here and when they are brought the first excuse advanced is that they are not the right class of people.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is the hon. gentleman aware that a very considerable number of the people that have to be supported in the city of Winnipeg come from the province of Saskatchewan after the harvest is over?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I think it is entirely unnecessary to reply to that question. As a matter of fact, Saskatchewan has always had less unemployment than any other province.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes, because the unemployed are getting out of the province.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The people spoken of as coming after the harvesting of the crops are not people from Saskatchewan.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We have to support a number of them during the winter.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What an argument!

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): If we allowed the provinces of this Dominion to say what kind of people they wanted, and if we secured that class of people on the condition that after they had been brought in by the Dominion the provincial governments would look after them, we would not have any further cry for immigration from those provinces, and we would not have any cry on account of the kind of people that come here. The whole trouble is that the provincial governments like to put this matter up to the Dominion but will not do their own part in looking after those people after they come here.

As I said before I am in favour of this resolution going to committee, but I think the first thing that should be looked into is the condition to-day of the returned men, and of the wives and children of the soldiers who went overseas. That phase of the matter should first be investigated by the committee and then by this House, and if necessary we must spend the money needed in looking after these people.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): I do not intend to delay the House very long on this question. I simply want to congratulate the last speaker (Mr. Ross, Moose Jaw) on his intention to support the motion, and to suggest that it was with considerable regret that I listened to the ultra-Tory argument of the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh). It is very disappointing to me to find—

Mr. McINTOSH: May I ask my hon. friend a question? Is he an apostle in the matter of interpretation of Tory propaganda and arguments?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I have listened to Tory argument in this House for six years and am a fairly good judge of its character.

Mr. JACOBS: Will the hon. member say in what part of the House he heard it?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The hon. gentleman raises a point that is very well taken. It is difficult indeed after listening to the hon. member for North Battleford, and sometimes to the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Jacobs), to tell what corner of the chamber should be assigned to them. When a member of the Liberal party, particularly one from the wide open spaces in the west on an innocent motion of this nature which simply asks for a committee of investigation raises the argument "Hush, hush, you might spoil the sleep of the Senate," it makes me tired. Why worry about the effect on the Senate of resolutions that are discussed in this House? That is not our business. We have no dealings with those gentlemen, at least I hope we do not—we are supposed not to have. The idea of raisng the argument that we should not, when a question is discussed in this House, send it to a committee for consideration for fear it might prejudice the Senate against the old age pensions bill! I am sure the Senate will be delighted to know that the hon. gentleman is so solicitous of their mental condition.

Another point the hon. gentleman raised was that last year social legislation of this character was discussed before the industrial relations committee. What was discussed there was the question of a minimum wage, and that alone. We discussed the question for two months and as a result of that discussion brought in some recommendations which the hon. gentleman has read, the principal one having reference to a conference of the provinces. This resolution is much wider in scope. It calls for relief for the labouring people of this country through the establishment of insurance against unemployment and insurance against sickness and invalidity. I remember very distinctly reading not very long ago a speech made by the leader of the party to which my hon. friend belongs. The Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King made a speech which for its marvellous oratory, for its wonderful appeal to the human mind from the point of view of humanity, and for its understanding of the human element in the industrial world, has seldom if ever been equalled, certainly not in this country. And yet I find hon. members in his party to-day rejecting the theories which their leader has put forth, when they have an opportunity to practise them. After all a time does come in the history of men and parties when action must be taken upon those wonderful thoughts and theories which they develop usually in their youth and discard in later years, I am sorry to say. But the time has now come when the Liberal party ought to show at least some sympathy towards labour and labour conditions in this country. I do not expect any from my hon. friends to the right—I may be entirely surprised, I hope I shall be; I have been from time to time surprised at some quite advanced views of gentlemen to my right, and I think they are coming along very well, but in this matter I do not expect much support— so I am appealing to the Liberal party not to be false to its pledges and recreant to the statements and promises it gave to the public in the resolutions which it passed at the Liberal convention in 1919. That is not too much to ask and the problem is an enormous one. I can perhaps here illustrate the point by quoting from Mr. Arthur Kitson, a man who has won world-wide recognition, first as a banker, then as an economist, and in England itself as president of the Banking Reform League. His remarks with respect to unemployment are as follows:

> It is quite certain that the need for labour must become less and less with the growth of inventions and the increase in industrial efficiency.

How true that is, Mr. Speaker, only those of us who go through the factories of this country can readily realize. Not long ago I was in the city of Montreal going through some of the cotton mills there, and I saw in those factories great looms, thousands and thousands of them, replacing hundreds of men and women, and now being operated by children—yes, and I am afraid in some cases children not of the full age of sixteen. We saw an example there of the displacement of labour created by the inventions to which Mr. Kitson refers. He goes on:

> Indeed, the real problem we have to solve is not so much that of finding constant employment for our people, as our supplying them with life's necessities and comforts out of the abundance of goods created.

There is no difficulty about producing to-day. We have developed that almost to perfection. Whatever new thing comes along, we rapidly develop mass production of it. In agriculture, and in the cotton mills themselves, this country with only a fraction of its present population could produce not only as much or more than it is producing to-day, but could supply everyone with all of these goods that they need if only they had the means of purchasing them. He goes on:

> Even to-day the labour of less than ten per cent of the population will readily suffice to maintain the entire inhabitants of this country in a high state of comfort. Suppose—

And this is an argument which must appeal:

> Suppose discoveries and inventions during the next half century result in the displacement of all manual labour by machinery; must the bulk of the world's inhabitants then perish?

Is the Malthusian doctrine to be accepted and the Christian doctrine abandoned? That is the only inference that can be drawn from the attitude of hon. gentlemen who would oppose legislation to meet the conditions which they see around them, and which are intensifying every day. I understand that an ancestor of mine committed a sin at one time.

Mr. SANDERSON: Surely not.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am afraid so. He might indeed be an ancestor of my hon. friend. His name, I think, was Adam. It is true the hon. gentleman may have come from some other source, but I had not suspected that, not being a believer in the Darwinian theory. However, Adam, I am informed, did sin, and as his punishment, shall I say, it was decreed that he and his children should henceforth earn their bread by the sweat of their brow. That was a form of punishment. Well, Mr. Speaker, we have in our cities to-day, we have right here in the city of Ottawa, men and women praying to God for a chance to have sweat on their brow so that they might live. These things can hardly be justified in what we call a Christian country, yet so cold-blooded have we become in the great march of commercialism, in the bitterness of the competitive struggle between great groups of financiers, that the sense of equity and justice to humanity is almost entirely lost.

One of the great reasons for the vast amount of unemployment is the wrong distribution of the products of labour. Altogether too much goes to entrenched capital. Too much goes to the owner of the factory, and too little to the man who does the actual work. If there was less unemployment at what is called the top of society, there would be a great deal less unemployment at the bottom. That is another phase that might be considered by the committee.

I do not wish to delay the House any longer. All I do ask is that hon. members take into consideration, in a manner which will do justice to themselves hereafter, this resolution of a simple nature, which only asks for an investigation. If it took two months to examine the minimum wage recommendation of last year, and if after two months of that investigation hon. gentlemen found that the committee referred the question for further consideration to an interprovincial conference, surely no harm could be done and much good might result if we referred this broader question to a committee for consideration during the next two months. The force of that suggestion is perhaps considerably added to when the House knows that the industrial relations committee, of which I am a member, has not had a meeting this year and is at the present time doing nothing. We might as well do something with our morning hours, and it would as well have the advantage of keeping some of our friends from becoming too deeply inoculated with Toryism through idleness.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say only a few words to express my hearty support of this resolution. The hon. member who introduced it (Mr. Heaps) made what I thought was a casual allusion to the tariff board, merely in an illustrative way, and that has somewhat diverted the tone of the debate. There is no parallel, no comparison between the two.

Dealing with the resolution itself, we can remember that when the old age pension legislation was before the House an effort was made to have it more inclusive, to take in people of a certain age who were invalids, and particularly those who were blind, also a certain class of soldiers; but it was not thought desirable to mix up too many subjects in that bill. Now here is an opportunity to discuss some of those questions separately. The resolution proposes that the committee be instructed to consider a system of insurance against employment, sickness and invalidity. Blindness, of course, would be covered by that; also chronic disease. It is wide enough, I think, to cover the cases mentioned by my hon. friend from Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross), who points out that there is a class of soldiers not now eligible for a pension but who, as soon as they reach a certain age, will be requiring assistance. All these cases, I think, would be covered by this resolution.

The hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) suggested that this question might better be referred to the interprovincial conference to be held this fall. That might be a desirable thing to do, but I do not think it would do any harm to first refer the question to a committee which could give it a preliminary look-over, so to speak, and then if we found there was not time to deal with it thoroughly, we could refer the question, or some phases of it, to the interprovincial conference.

Another hon. member suggested that owing to our having passed the old age pension bill, if we passed this resolution also there might be danger of seeming in the eyes of another House to be determined to drain the exchequer with social obligations of this kind. There is not the slightest fear on that ground. To begin with, the resolution does not call for the expenditure of money for that purpose. It simply says that the committee be instructed "to investigate and report on the establishment of a system of insurance against unemployment," et cetera, which would necessarily be of a contributory character, because insurance involves the principle of a beneficiary contributing partially or entirely to the benefits he receives. The main idea of this and similar resolutions which are of a practical character is educational. As the hon. member who introduced this resolution very wisely said, it took us twenty years of committee work to get the old age pension scheme brought to a head. I hope it will not take us so long to bring some phases of this question to a head, but certainly let us get it to a committee, where we can get the facts and the evidence to enable us to deal more thoroughly with the situation on a later occasion. If I might use the word, I would almost say that those who have the interests of labour at heart should indulge in a little mild propaganda, and I think we could "propagand," to coin a word, without infringing on truth and veracity as is so often done by those who plead for special interests in this House.

Mr. F. W. GERSHAW (Medicine Hat): I listened very carefully to the speech of the hon. member who introduced this resolution (Mr. Heaps), and I agree with practically all that he said. I do not wish to stress this problem for sentimental reasons; it will easily stand on its own footing from a practical and businesslike standpoint. I am not at all afraid of having too much social legislation on the statute books as from my knowledge of affairs I believe that is a very remote danger indeed.

Someone has mentioned the question of cost in connection with this proposal. I am sure that we will all agree, having in mind the accomplishments of the Great war, that the people of Canada can accomplish a great deal if the necessity is urgent and is impressed upon them to a sufficient extent. Most of the provinces have workmen's compensation boards, the aim of which is to put a man who has been injured as nearly as is humanly possible into the position in which he was before the accident. His salary, limited it is true, will continue and his hospital and medical attention will be provided. If there is any permanent disability, that is estimated and provided for. Therefore, as regards accidents I think the people are fairly well provided for by the various workmen's compensation acts. This resolution, however, suggests dealing with cases of unemployment, sickness and invalidity, and I am convinced that misfortunes of that kind are not amply provided for.

We have, it is true, various forms of insurance. The insurance companies in Canada have done a great service to our people. To get insurance, though, we require considerable capital to start with and a good deal of money to keep up the premiums, and many people in Canada to-day find it hard enough to get along and provide their families and themselves with the ordinary necessities of life, so that quite often they have not a surplus to invest in insurance, although such an investment brings good results. We also have the Canadian government annuities, and I am only sorry that the advantages of those annuities do not appeal more to the people generally. I believe a system of advertising should be undertaken, and I understand the minister has something of the kind in mind. But instead of putting up posters in post offices and other prominent places, the department should mail a short letter or pamphlet to the head of each family, so that he or she may read it over carefully at home and see just what the benefits of an annuity would be. The annuities which we have are truly very costly. They are supposed to be figured out on a 4 per cent basis in accordance with mortality statistics provided by the British offices. Those statistics were compiled a long time ago, and I believe somewhat better terms might be given in connection with those annuities, because we must remember that when an annuity is taken out, if the annuitant dies the principal sum is lost, so that the returns paid quarterly or half-yearly should amount to a little more than interest on the principal sum, and at the present time they do not amount to much more than that.

I believe if some system could be worked out as is suggested in the resolution, many people would not be humiliated by having to accept charity. No one wishes to accept charity, and if at the time they were able to afford to pay a small premium to protect themselves against the calamity of unemployment or sickness or invalidity which comes on through no fault of their own, that would be a great advantage.

In connection with our old age pension scheme, I am sure we are all in favour of a contributory scheme, and a scheme of the kind proposed by the hon. member would be a contributory scheme. It would allow us to obtain the benefits, not when a certain age had been reached, but at the time when those benefits would be most needed, that is at the time of sickness or invalidity or unemployment. For these reasons I am heartily in favour of the sentiments expressed by the mover of the resolution.

Mr. L. P. BANCROFT (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I am absolutely in favour of the resolution moved by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), and I think the House should allow it to go before the committee on industrial relations rather than send the whole broad question directly to the provincial conference as has been suggested. It would be better to have some concrete proposals worked out by the committee to present to that conference rather than to give it the whole broad question of unemployment insurance to discuss. Therefore, I am in favour of this resolution going to the committee.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I am not entirely opposed to the motion of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) for it bears the stamp of the best philanthropy. However, I think that whosoever has in mind the welfare of his country should avoid to burden it with too heavy liabilities. Our present duty lies in meeting our indebtedness and reducing taxation, which, let us not forget, weighs heavier on the workman.

Let me, Sir, draw the attention of the House to our system of immigration. No doubt the government will pursue their sound policy on immigration by enforcing the act such as it at present exists, that is to say, by admitting only a select immigration. By only admitting to this country foreigners for whom positions have already been found, we would not be called upon to discuss an insurance scheme on behalf of destitute persons, and by being careful to admit into Canada but people sound of body and mind, we would render almost useless the enactment of the second part of the motion of the hon. member for North Winnipeg.

Let me also, Sir, point out to the hon. members of this House, the fact that pursuant to section 92 of the British North America Act, there exists in our constitution a proviso granting to provinces the right of establishing charitable institutions; previously to agreeing to the resolution at present before the House, I think, we should concur with the views expressed by the hon. member for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) and have interprovincial conferences. Like the hon. member for North Winnipeg, I greatly sympathize with the class of people who labour, suffer and strive hard, but, as I previously mentioned we should not burden our country with too heavy liabilities; we should strive to reduce our debt and taxation, and thereby lighten the taxes which ever since the war burden all classes of our population and more especially the labouring class.

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, at the outset may I say that I regard this as a very important question, because as the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) has well said, there is nothing so disturbing amongst the labouring people of this or any other country as the fear of unemployment. This question, however, has been the subject of investigations by many bodies, all of whom have made varying recommendations in regard to it. Some have recommended unemployment insurance through labour unions; others have suggested methods of providing more employment; while one commission that I had in mind recommended the transfer of men from one portion of the country to the other to meet conditions of seasonal unemployment. In a word, already we have on record such a volume of data that I do not think any additional information could be secured by the adoption of this resolution, but I have no objection to that course. I had the honour a year or more ago of moving a similar resolution on the floor of the Ontario legislature. Premier Ferguson at that time took the position that although the subject was within the jurisdiction of the province, he thought that Ontario ought not to embark on an unemployment scheme unless the other provinces did likewise, but he undertook to ask the Dominion government to call a conference to discuss this and other questions.

The member for North Winnipeg referred to certain utterances by the right hon. Prime Minister at the time of the adoption of the Liberal platform in 1919. I am sorry I had to leave the House at the time because I missed the opportunity of hearing whether he favoured the particular part of that platform dealing with this subject. Let me quote the particular resolution in this connection:

> That in so far as may be practicable, having regard for Canada's financial position, an adequate system of insurance against unemployment, sickness, dependence in old age, and other disability, which would include old age pensions, widows' pensions, and maternity benefits, should be instituted by the federal government in conjunction with the governments of the several provinces—

Mr. IRVINE: Seeing that the minister has just read the platform of the Liberal party which was drawn up at the national convention in 1919, would he indicate to the House how much has been done towards implementing it, and how much of it the government have discovered to be practicable?

Mr. HEENAN: The minister has not yet got far enough into his duties to ascertain all that has been done or all that is practicable to be done in this connection. But I do know that some of the things enumerated in that platform are to-day in operation in some of the provinces, no matter to whom credit is due for that condition of affairs. I do not say that we have gone too far or even far enough. I say that this is the platform as enunciated by the Prime Minister to be carried out by the Dominion in connection with the provinces. The premier of Ontario has also declared himself in favour of the same policy.

I think very great credit is due to the hon. member for North Winnipeg for moving this resolution, and on behalf of the government I can promise him that its subject matter will be submitted to the interprovincial conference which is to meet here during the coming summer.

Mr. HEAPS: Does not the minister think from practical experience that it would be far preferable to have something concrete to submit to the conference rather than just a bald question?

Mr. HEENAN: I take it for granted that the hon. member means that the committee on industrial and international relations would draw up something of a concrete nature for submission to that conference?

Mr. HEAPS: Yes.

Mr. HEENAN: I have already pointed out that I think we have available all the data that can be secured on this proposition. If, however, it is considered that the committee referred to can gather any further data I may say on behalf of the government that we have no objection whatever to the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. IRVINE: The committee could review the data which the minister says is available and bring in a recommendation on the subject matter of the resolution.

Mr. HEENAN: Like old age pensions, unemployment insurance has been recommended for a great many years, but personally I would rather see it in operation than read all the recommendations that may be made in regard to it.

[Mr. Heenan.]

Mr. IRVINE: That is all right.

Mr. HEENAN: I think there is something in the remarks of the hon. member behind me that we should be careful not—I think I will not proceed further along that line.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister is getting on dangerous ground.

Mr. HEENAN: I recognize that some method should be devised for dealing with unemployment. Whether that purpose can be attained by transferring men from one part of the Dominion to another according to the conditions of employment prevailing I know not; but I do know from practical experience that the present system is not in the best interests either of the working classes or of the country at large. I mean the granting of relief to our unemployed in one industry and the bringing in of immigrants to meet the demand for industrial labour in another industry. If the committee could devise a system of moving our unemployed to those sections where there is a demand for labour I think its work would be well worth while. In conclusion, I wish to say that so far as the government is concerned there is no objection to this matter being referred to the committee on industrial and international relations.

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I am not much in favour of this resolution. It is true the purpose of the resolution is simply to refer unemployment insurance to a committee, and on general principles I am not opposed to such action, in fact I am generally in favour of it. But in the last two weeks I have heard arguments from the other side of the House stating that to refer a question to a committee is tantamount to the adoption of the principle involved.

Mr. BENNETT: That is only in connection with a bill; this is a resolution.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): For my part I am not prepared to admit the principle.

Mr. HEAPS: Does the hon. member object to this subject being referred to a committee because such action would involve the adoption of the principle of the resolution?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: Will the hon. member take the same stand in regard to the Georgian bay canal?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): That is different. I may be in favour of that principle. I do not favour the principle of this resolution because I do not see the need for it in this country. It is true that after a dull season in the old country unemployment insurance may be needed, but their conditions are entirely different from ours. They have a small densely populated island and have developed its natural resources to the fullest extent of our present knowledge of science and industry. There the people have been taught from their infancy to work at one thing, and one thing only. If any of their industries is slack for a time, the people engaged therein are inevitably thrown out of employment and by reason of their specialized training they cannot get employment in any other industry. They are not able to adapt themselves to any other work that can be had in the country. There might be some justification for the dole system in the old country, but in Canada the problem is different. We have vast natural resources awaiting development, and if a man cannot find employment at one thing he can find it at another. There are seasonable occupations which pay big wages. A man can go to the harvest field and earn from five to seven dollars a day and when harvest and threshing are over he is out of employment. Does anyone expect such a man to receive a dole until he is able to find some other work? If he is thrifty he will have saved money against the time of unemployment. The same thing is true of the lumber camps. Men go into the woods in winter and get board and a certain amount of money, and if in the spring they happen to be unemployed they ought to have enough money saved, if they have been careful, to keep them until something else turns up. They do not need insurance against unemployment. They ought to be able to find some other form of employment, and in any case they should have money enough to keep them going until they do get other work to do. The problem in England is different. Here it is simply a matter of adaptability. The people are more adaptable and more ready to take on some other form of employment. It is merely a case of moving from one place to another to find something to work at.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Does the hon. gentleman contend that the thousands of dollars paid out by the minister last year in unemployment relief was wrongfully spent?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): No, I would not say that; the circumstances might have been unusual. I do not suggest that, even if a man has been foolish and has squandered his money, help should be refused him, but I do not think we should say to such a man, "If you are foolish and squander your money you may look to us for help." I think it would be unwise to set up an institution which would virtually invite men to be wasteful.

Mr. HEAPS: Members of parliament?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Members of parliament too, yes. When we are turned out I do not expect any old age pension or unemployment allowance. If members of parliament were given an assurance that their jobs were permanent they might no doubt all vote for such a measure. Seriously, however, I cannot see that there is any need for such a measure as is proposed. As I have pointed out, we have a people who are capable of adapting themselves to the circumstances in which they happen to be at any time, and they ought to save enough money to take care of themselves when they are out of work.

Mr. NEILL: Would not the hon. gentleman's argument apply, as regards the unemployment dole, to sickness, invalidism and blindness?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Sickness, invalidism and blindness do not come within the province of this government. According to the British North America Act, section 92, subsection 7—

> The establishment, maintenance and management of hospitals, asylums, charities and eleemosynary institutions in and for the province, other than marine hospital.

—are matters that rest with the provinces and with which this government has no right to interfere.

Mr. NEILL: The same is true of old age pensions.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is the hon. member aware that his own party in 1919 unanimously adopted the very thing asked for in this resolution?

Mr. BROWN: Does not my hon. friend allow a man to be independent of his party?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): By all means, but let him declare himself.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): I was not at the convention of 1919 which drew up the platform, and I had no part or parcel in that platform. I am merely expressing my own views to-day. I am not speaking for the government nor, indeed, am I speaking for the Liberal party. I do not know that this is a government measure. My hon. friends will agree that a man has a right occasionally to differ from his party.

Mr. J. E. LETELLIER (Compton) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, it affords me much pleasure to have the opportunity of expressing my views on this resolution No. 15, which the House at present has under consideration. How is it possible to imagine that the government can grant every request of the country —among others tax reduction—and at the same time establish pensions for old age, the blind, workmen and destitute people over the whole country? I consider it absurd. Personally, and in principle, I would be willing to support such a measure, however, I realize that, at present, it is not practical to request the government, after considerably reducing taxation, to establish pension funds to meet, again I repeat—all demands of the country and factions being organized throughout Canada.

I lately received on behalf of the Montreal Blind Association, a request to kindly prevail on the Prime Minister to create pensions for the blind. In principle, I consider that it would be an essential necessity for this class of people who have practically no other means of earning a living and who are often placed in institutions, without even having the hope of relying on the support of some relative, because a great number of them have none.

I was glad to hear, a short while ago, my hon. colleague for North Battleford (Mr. McIntosh) move that these important measures be referred to the inter-provincial conference; and I add that we must not forget that our municipal authorities throughout the country have this duty and very ably look after the poor within their limits. Moreover, we have benevolent societies in most of our municipalities, and further, section 92, paragraph 7, of the British North America Act gives the right to organize charitable institutions. We, therefore, have sufficient protection in this regard not only in the parishes of our province but throughout all the provinces of the Dominion. Consequently I am confident that the present government will enact all the measures necessary to meet the needs of all. Resolution No. 15, which appears on the orders of the day, moved by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), is certainly worthy of serious consideration on the part of the government, however, I add that in my humble opinion, the government is not, at present, in a position to acquiesce to these appeals. So long as the people of this country insist that the hon. Minister of Finance should endeavour by every possible means to decrease our debt, and at the same time reduce taxation, it would be imposing an enormous task on his shoulders to have him also find resources so as to establish pension funds of this nature in the course of the present session. I say the time is not opportune. Perhaps next session; as a possibility, but not as a certainty, I hope, together with the hon. members not only on the government side but also those included in all parties of this House, that in the near future, if not next session, at least the third session of this parliament, the hon. Minister of Finance will succeed—with the ability that distinguishes him and the support of his eminent colleagues—in finding ways and means to enact legislation which will bring happiness to our workmen as well as to the destitute people in this country.

Mr. W. J. WARD (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak on this debate until a few moments ago. I think we owe a good deal to the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) for having brought this very important matter before the House. I think it is no less important than even the Georgian bay canal. I was rather disappointed with my good friend from Weyburn (Mr. Young): "Consistency, thou art a jewel." I cannot see the difference between sending a measure of this kind to committee and sending a measure such as the Georgian bay canal charter. Personally I am prepared to support the sending of the Georgian bay canal charter to committee; I do so on principle, and I want to see this motion go to committee on exactly the same basis.

I rose more particularly to support the suggestion of the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross). I have on file I think some fifteen or twenty applications from returned soldiers covering a period of some four or five years; these men have become disabled no doubt through war service but can get no consideration whatever under the present act governing pensions to soldiers. I do think either amendment to that act or new legislation is long overdue; these soldiers who now find themselves disabled due to war service should be looked after.

I think this very important piece of legislation now before us should go to the committee on industrial and international relations, and I also think it would be most unfortunate to throw a measure of this kind, with no previous consideration, into the inter-provincial conference which may take place some time in the near future, because there will be so many matters coming up for consideration then that the conference will not have time to consider in detail a measure of this kind. Apparently this committee is desirous of something to do and is willing to take this matter into consideration, so I think we should let it go to it and see what it can do to prepare this question for the consideration of that conference. I heartily support the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): I am very glad to note the expressions of sympathy just made by hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to this resolution. I merely rise to express the hope that they will not kill it with kindness, because I notice that it is getting towards six o'clock which has sounded the death knell of many an aspiration, so I hope we will save what we have to say until this question comes before the committee.

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): I just wish to add a few words while this question is before the House. I think the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) entirely misunderstands the purpose and intention of this resolution. I do not give it my support on the understanding that it is another means of building up a dole system in this country; my support is given because I believe it will make a dole system unnecessary; I think that is the very intention of the resolution. I understand that if we establish something along the lines suggested by this resolution in Canada, it would be a contributory system. The official figures for Canada and the United States show that about 90 per cent of the men and women who die do not leave a cent behind them, and they have probably had nothing with which to provide for their old age. Under these circumstances it seems to me absolutely necessary to have some kind of an insurance system which will provide for sickness, indigence and possibly unemployment. Unemployment is something that we do not have to consider on the farms, of course; indeed, we are bothered more with over-employment, as the hon. member for Weyburn knows. I would wish, however, to refer particularly to the question of insurance and to say that I think this government might assist in the establishment of some kind of insurance which will lower to some degree at least the cost of protection to-day. I am not criticizing the insurance companies for the enormous profits they have made, because they have done a good service, but at present we who wish to lay something aside for our old age or to provide for our families in case of our early death, find that we must use the present insurance companies. I think if something were built up by the government on the same line followed by the insurance companies, a contributory system, something in which there would be no profits earned but in which all the receipts would be disbursed to the holders of the policies, we would do more for the people of Canada than we can do in any other way in the line of providing insurance against old age and infirmities.

I have here the last copy of the Canada Year Book; that is, for the year 1925, and I wish to quote a few figures showing the profits earned by our life insurance companies, to show what might be done by a contributory system built up by the government. For the year 1920 our Canadian life insurance companies showed an excess of income over expenditure of almost $40,000,000; for 1921 the figure was $47,000,000; for 1922, $50,000,000; for 1923, $60,000,000 and for 1924, $68,000,000 of an actual surplus. If you go over these figures right back to confederation you will find a tremendous surplus every year; in fact during that whole period I think it will be found that only about 50 per cent of the money paid in in premiums is returned to the policy holders or their dependents. I would suggest that if this resolution is sent to the committee they take into consideration some sort of a contributory system, perhaps on the lines of the old age annuities. The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) might just as well have referred to our old age annuity system as a dole system; I think the committee should have an opportunity to discuss this question and devise some means of meeting the situation that way, therefore I wish to give my support to the resolution.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I think it only proper that someone from this side of the House should have something to say on this resolution. It is not a new resolution as far as I am concerned. I have in my hand a volume of the Hansard of 1921 in which I am recorded as speaking in favour of a resolution of this kind. I do not very often find myself in harmony with the ideas of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), I do not think he is very often sound in his ideas, and I am not just sure that I am in harmony with him in the present case. He has in fact not presented any ideas to the House. All he has done has been to present a kind of blanket resolution in which he asks for the appointment of a committee to go in search of some definite ideas. However, I am in favour of this country making some provision for a class of people who, from the nature of our climatic conditions and seasonal industries, find themselves at certain times of the year out of employment. I think that the necessity for such provision is the keynote to and practically the only excuse for a resolution of this kind. We have in Canada many industries which of necessity must be classified as seasonal industries. For example, we have the lumbering industry, which is carried on to a large extent in my own constituency, where for five or six months of the year there is steady employment after which the men engaged in it find themselves out of work and for two or three months have a hard job to make a living. I think a somewhat similar condition exists in the west. Every summer we have a call from the provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba for help to harvest the crops. We all know that those men are engaged in that work for sixty or ninety days. Then they are turned loose on the labour market, and for practically a month or two months they find themselves out of employment. Now I imagine every hon. member knows that the main thing in making a living is to have steady employment even if it is at a lower wage. A man who has steady employment without the necessity of travelling from one province to another, or from one part of a province to another, incurring expense in the shape of hotel bills and railway fares, is much better off than the person who, from necessity, has to follow a seasonal occupation. That is the class in Canada for whom I think we shall ultimately have to make some provision. I do think, and I have made this statement before, that a country as big as Canada, with its vast resources and small population, ought to be one of the wealthiest in the world. Unfortunately we have climatic conditions to face and those conditions practically bring about seasonal occupation. I am prepared to support legislation at this time in the interest of the man who is engaged in a seasonal occupation, but I want to place myself upon record as being strongly opposed to building up in this country a pauper class dependent upon the government for assistance.

That brings me back to a point mentioned by the last speaker. If legislation of this kind is going to be enacted there must be contributions by the individual himself. We cannot introduce into Canada anything pertaining to the dole system of Great Britain. That system is unnecessary here. It is derogatory to the development of a sound national sentiment and is repugnant to a self-respecting, independent and hardworking people. Independence is one of the things we should seek to inculcate in the Canadian character. The man who deserves to be encouraged is the man who is independent of his neighbour, independent of the government, independent of anybody, and who relies upon his own resources. I supported legislation of this character in 1921. I rather think, although I have not had the time to go through Hansard, that I supported the principle even before then. At the same time there is a danger that such assistance may encourage certain of our population in the towns and cities to live on the government, a condition which is derogatory to self-respect and not conducive to the formation of a healthy national character. I support the principle which underlies this proposal but at the same time I point out these drawbacks. In a country with such vast resources and such a small population there should not be any need for providing for such cases if we had a proper national policy.

Mr. G. D. MORIN (Bagot) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed to briefly state my views on the resolution No. 15. I shall consider it from three different points of view. First, constitutional; secondly, moral; and thirdly, economical.

First, constitutional. The British North America Act seems to provide for such cases —I mean of philanthropy—as those unfortunate enough to be without means. I think that the fathers of confederation were well inspired when they left the provinces with full power to dispose of these questions regarding public charity. As I glance over this resolution, I come to the conclusion that if the fathers of confederation had then foreseen not so much the state of poverty, as the economic need which the country would have to face, they would again have been justified in making provision for provincial autonomy in connection with questions of such import. Indeed, the principle of provincial autonomy is justified not only from the economic viewpoint but also if we consider the more immediate interest we take as regards our poor and those who are destitute. Each province having its own government, its own clergy entrusted with the duty of enlightening the people, can better sort out those who are destitute and need public assistance. I state that each particular province is better able to determine those whom they must support with public money, and, that the Dominion government cannot act for each separately.

As to its moral merit? We, in the province of Quebec particularly—I am better acquainted with the people of Quebec than with those of the other provinces—I state that from the moral viewpoint we should object to the principle of this resolution, because it is rather of a nature to diminish the sense of responsibility within the family circle. Should this resolution become law it would point out to the children that they need not concern themselves about the future welfare of their parents, that they have but to look after themselves. This state insurance would provide for their parents when sick or unable to work. Therefore, as to the moral viewpoint of this resolution I cannot feel very enthusiastic.

Furthermore, the resolution mentions unemployment, illness and disability.

Mr. Speaker, as regards unemployment: whosoever becomes the victim of unemployment, in this country, does so because he has no desire to work; he really refuses work. I state in this House, if there be destitute people victims of unemployment, send them to my riding of Bagot, an essentially farming county which I have the honour to represent, and I pledge myself to find them work if they are willing to stick to it. In my opinion, Sir, if this resolution be enacted it will increase unemployment, and therefore it is vicious in its nature.

So far as illness and disability are concerned, it seems to me that each province should be able to look after itself. The province of Quebec is favoured in this regard. We have our charitable institutions; municipalities, our own municipal regulations, and, thank God, should illness or disability prevail among our citizens we have no fear of the future. What of the economic viewpoint? We might discourse at length on this subject. Federal legislation might be enacted, so to speak, throughout the country, but it would necessitate much more organization and would cost enormously more than would a provincial act which would provide for each individual case. As stated a short while ago by my hon. colleague, the member for Compton (Mr. Letellier), does the financial situation of the country allow us to indulge to that extent in new undertakings? Does the situation with regard to the settlement of our public debt allow us to venture on so dangerous grounds? We already have enacted legislation which will entail a very large expenditure. Lately we enacted legislation which will in the opinion of a number of members, bring on unheard of expenditures for each of the provinces, an act almost inapplicable with regard to the maritime provinces and other provinces of the Dominion. Shall we be drawn into another scheme which will be of a nature to impoverish us considerably? I state, Sir,—without any fear—that in principle I am against this resolution and that I am very strongly opposed to it.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (West Calgary): Mr. Speaker, I desire to make only half a dozen observations with respect to this matter. A year ago I ventured to suggest to this House that the only equitable way in which we would ever attain the ends we sought was by an insurance scheme that would involve contributions by all those who desired benefits. I had given some little attention to the matter, and I arrived at that conclusion very definitely. I believe it will induce thrift, initiative; it will induce a man no longer to be looking to the state for everything, but rather encourage him to depend upon his own industry and his own thrift.

This resolution—which is so vastly different from a bill, as my hon. friend from Weyburn (Mr. Young), when he takes the trouble to ascertain, will learn—is based upon what? The assumption that a scheme of insurance may be devised by which every person who holds a policy of such insurance may have the definite promise that in time of unemployment or of sickness or invalidity he would be the recipient of some benefits; that is all. That policy can only be purchased by the payment of a premium, and if we encourage such thrift as will involve the payment of a premium from youth up to middle age, or during the period that he is able to pay it, we shall only be doing what is now being done by large industrial concerns. During the last few years the largest insurance companies in the world have been issuing pension policies, and the premiums are based upon actuarial figures. In the same way insurance against sickness and invalidity is now being issued under group policies which many of the industrial concerns are taking out in insurance companies.

But there is something further. We have in this Dominion an annuity system, and I know that at least one of the very greatest industrial concerns in the city of Montreal, in the province of Quebec, is now carefully studying the whole situation to determine whether or not it shall avail itself for each of its employees of the provisions of our annuity system. If that is done, the result will be that every one of the employees of that enterprise will have in his hands a policy, for it is an annuity policy, issued by the government of Canada at a premium of which he may pay the whole or part, depending upon the arrangement made between him and his employer. The result will be that he will have an annuity certain on reaching a certain age, or his wife an annuity certain in the event of his death, and in the event of illness or invalidity there may come to him certain benefits. Those benefits would not come under the Canadian annuity system, but only under additional insurance carried by the company itself, or by taking out a policy in one of the stock or mutual companies of the country. That is the position with respect to that.

This resolution merely asks that this matter be investigated. I am certain that sooner or later this problem must be carefully studied. Nothing could be worse for this Dominion than to create a dole system. Nothing could be worse for Canada than to induce men to believe that they could look upon the state as something from which they could obtain benefits without making corresponding payments. Compensations and payments are the corollaries of one another; one is the complement of the other, and the payments made with respect to premiums for an insurance policy issued by the state against unemployment, sickness or invalidity, represent the savings made by the individual for the purpose of having the benefits to which I have referred. I think the modern thought and modern tendency, having regard to the great development that is taking place in industrial life and the relation the state bears to industry, has completely changed from what it was half a century ago, and there is an ever-increasing tendency on the part of those responsible for government and those responsible for industry to provide means whereby with contributions made by industry itself or by the state, the premiums are not entirely borne by the insured. Hence it is that this matter now engaged the attention of this parliament.

With respect to the constitutional attitude, the relations between the provinces and the Dominion, that is not important at this moment. It is sufficient to say that the matter is of such national importance that it is worthy of engaging the attention of a committee. It is only necessary to say further, that the younger a country is when it commences to encourage habits of thrift and saving and industry on the part of its people, the better it is for the country as it attains middle and old age, and the only regret of those in charge of these matters in the older countries is that they have not been able to establish such a scheme in days gone by, for the longer it is put off, the more difficult it becomes because of the greater average age of the population and the greater numbers employed in industry. We have this opportunity to inquire into this matter, the fundamental words of this resolution being, "the establishment of a system of insurance against" certain defined things, which, as I say, involves the payment of premiums. And to the extent to which premiums should be paid, just as in workmen's compensation cases we have payments made by industry; to the extent to which in the development of that idea industry and the state should contribute to the premiums which maintain that policy, to that extent it is necessary that this matter be investigated and determined by a committee.

I was rather surprised at an observation made by an hon. member in that corner of the House that he did not look to this party for assistance. Anyone who reads his history and who knows the development of social legislation in England will have learned that the first man who ever attained the rank of privy councillor in the labour ranks of England was one who, having investigated this matter said: We have received more in five years from the Conservative party than in fifty years from the Liberals. He would know that the hearts and minds of the Conservative party are in unison in demanding, so far as lies within their power, that everything possible be done to encourage the practice of thrift, the saving of money, the development of initiative and industry, and the taking care of men in their old age, so that they may be happy and proud and able to look their fellows in the face without realizing that they are recipients of charity or bounty.

Mr. J. J. E. GUERIN (St. Ann): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the arguments that have been brought forward in support of this resolution, but I cannot convince myself that the resolution is seriously meant to bring about any positive action on the part of the committee, because the resolution conveys no specific instructions to that committee. I notice that it asks that the committee on industrial and international relations make a study of the question. Studies are very indefinite things; a study might last a week, a month, a year or a century. If any serious study were to be made, some plan would be laid down and something said in regard to how and when and what they were to study.

Why refer the matter to the committee on industrial and international relations? I cannot understand the reason. If the matter were to be seriously studied or contemplated, it should be laid before a special and eminent committee of members of this House and not before any special standing committee which I doubt meets once in a whole session. I doubt whether this committee has met yet this year, and I am pretty well satisfied that the meetings of this committee during the previous session were few and far between. If they are to meet as frequently in the future as they have met in the past, I must come to the conclusion that the motion as presented is a very innocuous one and is designed simply to afford some imaginative consolation to certain gentlemen in their ardent efforts to make the citizens in general believe that they are the leaders of thought is so far as liberality is concerned. We are all seeking to do the greatest amount of good to the greatest number of people, and it is our duty to do all we can to relieve the needs of our fellowmen. But we are constitutionally established in such a way that we do very well when we attend to our own business. The duty of looking after the individual and the family is a matter which pertains essentially to the provinces, and I do not think we would be quite within our realm if we were to interfere with matters that did not pertain to our affairs.

In Quebec there has been no great anxiety in regard to lack of employment. As the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Morin) has stated, if anybody wants work, let him go to Bagot or to some other county throughout Quebec and he will find that he will get work right away. Nobody in this country has ever yet died of starvation. It is a thing unheard of in Canada and no one in this country is in such a state that he cannot live comfortably. Our province especially takes every care of indigents. We have institutions of every description to look after those who are in need, and I cannot see that it is at all necessary for us to make any profound study as regards the best mode of establishing insurance against unemployment. Those who are unemployed are generally those who are not thrifty, and those who are not thrifty are not going to contribute to an insurance scheme that is calculated to give them a salary when they lose the employment in which they are at the moment occupied.

It does not seem serious to propose that we should undertake a study to find out means of establishing an insurance scheme to get people who are not thrifty to contribute in order to provide them with just what they require as a result of their lack of thrift. The whole situation is most illogical, and if anything were to be done in order to improve the social state in this country, it would be put into some more cogent form; it would be put into the hands of a certain number of gentlemen who understand this mode of insurance better and who could evolve something that would be for the benefit of the people in general. We have had too much of this socialistic doctrine served out to us in order to make us feel that there are some people who are really more inclined to be benevolent to their fellowmen than others.

Judging from the complexion of this House, I have no hesitation in saying that every hon. member here is prompted by the same feelings of benevolence, kindness, anxiety, and indeed worry over the welfare of his fellowman. I do not think it is necessary that we should get any lesson from a distant or an eccentric portion of our country to tell us what the rest of Canada has failed in doing ever since the foundation of this country. We are very sensitive people; we do not like to be criticized; we do not like to be given to understand that we are lax in doing our duty. We have always tried to do our duty as best we can, as fellow citizens of a great country. I am afraid that if we adopt what I may term a universal panacea for unemployment we shall attract those people who feel that they will be provided for whether they work or not.

The granting of doles is really the most baneful system that any country can put in operation. Unfortunately Great Britain instituted the system in response to the cry of the socialistic population following the post-war troubles. Hundreds of thousands of her people were without employment and in indigent circumstances, and something had to be done. But a dole system is very soon abused, and to-day you will find in Great Britain that although various positions are advertised the opportunities for employment are not embraced by those in receipt of the dole; they prefer it to work. We do not want anything of that kind here.

The spirit of internationalism does not appeal to me at all. We have had too much of that spirit evinced throughout the country, particularly in the city of Montreal. On the 1st of May every year our internationalists parade the streets singing anthems in praise of the blessings of internationalism. They never think of hoisting the Union Jack; they prefer to carry the red flag of anarchy, of disorder, of disunion—and we are supposed to stand by and admire it.

I am anxious indeed to see some form of legislation to provide for our indigent people, but I am very much opposed to anything of a socialistic character being enacted which will deceive our people and moreover deceive prospective immigrants. We have had too many people who have not been in the habit of working in their native land come here without the slightest expectation of working. I cannot walk through the streets of our city without being stopped two or three times in every block by those who want help. That is not natural in this country where there is work for everybody and where our charitable institutions are available to relieve those in need. I may say that during the two years I was chief magistrate of Montreal begging was absolutely forbidden within the city, and anybody who offended was sent to gaol, with the result that begging was abolished completely. But lately I find the old trouble has reappeared. I believe the people who beg do so rather from a desire to make a little additional money rather than from absolute necessity.

To put our people in the category of those who will be provided for in case of need takes away from their independence. I remember very well that when I was in London on the occasion of the funeral of King Edward I called on the Right Hon. John Burns, the representative of labour in the ministry of the day. I desired to ascertain exactly how it was that the British authorities worked out their system of providing pure milk for little children. At that time we did not have a similar system perfected in this country. John Burns said to me: "I want you to bear one thing in mind more than any other—do not pauperize your people. No matter how insignificant a sum is required, do not give the milk away. If the people have not a halfpenny for the milk let them get some of their neighbours to come to their assistance. The spirit of independence is naturally paramount in every man's breast and he does not want to become a pauper or a beggar."

I feel that there is something more than insurance against unemployment at the bottom of this resolution. I think it has a tendency to create a socialistic atmosphere that is not at all agreeable to our citizens. We are an independent people and proud, and it is repugnant to us to have to appeal to the government for the necessities of life. Moreover, we are a brotherly people and inclined to help each other. It is not necessary for the state to undertake to do what we regard as our duty. I am sure there is not a member of this House but would resent the idea of being deprived of the opportunity of doing a charitable act, and I think the same is true of our people generally. After all, charity is a virtue that we all like to practise, and if the opportunity is taken from us by the state we are deprived of discharging our bounden duty towards our fellow men. This whole proposition apparently had its inception in the mind of someone who was very well disposed towards his fellow men, but who preferred that other people should put into practice his very generous sentiments. In other words, instead of practising the virtue that we all love to practise, he would have the state dispense charity and in that way relieve himself and others of the bounden duty of being charitable.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make an appeal for my province—Quebec. The province of Quebec is probably the most liberally governed of our provinces. It does not hesitate to look at facts, and is not to be confused or stampeded by any cry that may be raised by any sect or sex or class. We have had the coöperation of the ladies in electing the members to this most august assembly but we are denied that privilege when it comes to electing representatives to our own little family gathering, the legislature in which we look after the intimate matters connected with the home. After all, the provincial government's function is to see to the integrity and well being, the maintenance and comfort of the home, and on that account we have not allowed ourselves to be prevented from practising the virtue of temperance, for instance. In media statu—the middle course—is the one condition in which we may practise any virtue. But if one is to be taken by the throat and ordered to do such and such a thing, whether one likes it or not, one is robbed of the opportunity of practising any virtue. It is partly from religious compunction as well as from philanthropic feelings towards our neighbours who come to visit us that we thought it just as well not to be over-enthusiastic in regard to total abstinence.

We look after our poor and give most generously to hospitals, and we provide for the indigent. But we have not yet begun to endow people about to die. We are doing all that can be humanly expected of a well organized and properly constituted government. I am very proud of the province of Quebec, as I am sure every one of my colleagues here is, because it has shown such toleration and good judgment and such fair dealing in the past. We have no misgivings for the future so far as our citizens are concerned, and I can say therefore in all seriousness that unless something more definite is elaborated to enable us to form some judgment in the matter I shall have to vote against the resolution.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. OSCAR L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, you will not be astonished should I make use of my maternal tongue in making my bow in this House.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) has the floor.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Is it not a rule of the House that speakers shall be heard alternately in relation to their position?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: There is no such rule.

Mr. HEAPS: Is it not the custom?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: That custom has been followed, but in this instance I saw the hon. member for Bellechasse first.

Mr. HEAPS: Did Mr. Speaker look on this side?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member for Bellechasse has the floor.

Mr. HEAPS: May I make a motion?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: No.

Mr. HEAPS: If I may, I move that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) be declared to have the floor.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEAPS: May I move that motion?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is in order in making such a motion.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no motion.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The hon. member for Bellechasse had the floor and he is entitled to speak.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I first saw the member for Bellechasse and he has the right to the floor.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): As I had just stated, you will not be astonished should I make use of my maternal tongue in making my debut in this House. However, I have no apologies to make for speaking French here, it is an acknowledged right and we esteem it an honour to claim that right, when the opportunity presents itself, because there are privileges which may be forgotten by disuse. I had no intention to take part in this debate but certain phases were introduced into the discussion which interest me. I do not know if—

Mr. HEAPS: I rise to a point of order. A few moments ago I moved that the floor be given to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and I should like to know on what ground that motion was rejected by Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am sorry that this unfortunate incident has occurred but my hon. friend is obviously out of order. So far as I can recollect, when two members rise at the same time the one whom the Speaker first sees proceeds, but there may be a motion to give the floor to the other member. In this case, however, the member for Bellechasse had the floor. He had begun to deliver his speech when my hon. friend from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) made his motion, a minute or two afterwards. Surely it would be contrary to the rules to entertain such a motion.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I say that I rose before the hon. member opposite? I was standing and had begun to address the Chair before he rose to speak.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is, I think, a fairly well understood practice in this House that the debate shall alternate. An hon. member had spoken on the other side and naturally I expected that I should have the opportunity next on this side. I was prepared, and contrary to all ordinary customs and courtesies of the House, the Speaker deliberately turned—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —to the hon. gentleman on the other side.

Mr. CASGRAIN: May I say a few words on the subject? There is no point of order and what my hon. friend has said is not within the rules of the House. The point that was discussed was this, whether the hon. gentleman who has resumed his seat (Mr. Woodsworth) or my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) was the one who was seen first. I was sitting on this side of the House and I know very well that the hon. member for Bellechasse was the first to get up and to be recognized by the Deputy Speaker. The Deputy Speaker declared that he had seen the hon. member for Bellechasse before observing the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the matter is therefore settled. The member for Bellechasse has the floor and I do not see why the member for Winnipeg North Centre should be allowed to come in and raise a point of order. At any rate the point of order has been discussed and disposed of by the Deputy Speaker, who allowed the hon. member for Bellechasse to proceed. I think the hon. member is in order.

Mr. SPEAKER (Having resumed the chair): Do any other hon. members desire to speak to the point of order? I understand that two hon. members of the House in the course of a debate rose simultaneously. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre first claimed the right to speak, but the Deputy Speaker decided that he had seen the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger) first. If the point of order was raised then it has been settled, or an appeal should have been taken from the ruling of the Chair or a motion made that the member for Winnpieg North Centre be now heard. No appeal was taken and I do not see how the point of order can now be revived as it has already been decided. Might I recall to hon. members of the House rule 17, which reads as follows:

When two or more members rise to speak, Mr. Speaker calls upon the member who first rose in his place: but a motion may be made that any member who has risen "be now heard," or "do now speak," which motion shall be forthwith put without debate.

Under paragraph 208 of that rule will be found the following:

As a matter of courtesy a new member—

That is the case of the hon. member for Bellechasse:

—who has not yet spoken in the House is usually called in preference to other members rising at the same time; but this privilege will not be conceded unless claimed within the parliament to which the member was first returned.

That is exactly the case of the hon. member for Bellechasse. Everyone knows that the Chair is fair to all sides, and it has happened quite frequently that I have intervened with the whips of the ministerial party and of His Majesty's opposition in order to give the third party, comprising various groups, fair play in the debate. But as the ministerial party and the opposition are more numerous than the third party, naturally it is to be expected that during a debate more speakers from those two parties will be heard, but generally speaking I alternate between the three parties, and that is what I intend to do in the future. The principle of fairness must be applied to all parties in the House. In the meantime I will ask the hon. member for Bellechasse, who is a new member and a decided acquisition to the House, to proceed.

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

[Mr. Casgrain.]

Mr. HEAPS: The point I raised was in connection with the ruling of the Deputy Speaker. Immediately after the Deputy Speaker had refused the floor to my colleague from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) I did challenge his ruling by moving a motion, and I do not know how else a ruling could be challenged. Without expressing any reason, the Deputy Speaker merely called upon the hon. gentleman whom you now ask to proceed, and I desire to know upon what ruling he refused my motion.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: There was no motion made; a point of order was raised and settled, and the hon. member for Bellechasse proceeded.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am informed by the Clerk of the House that the motion was made when the member for Bellechasse had already commenced to speak. The point can be best ascertained by consulting the scroll of the House.

Mr. HEAPS: Not only was a motion made, but I think the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) supported it.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have explained the ruling, and I hope hon. members will accept it in good faith.

Mr. HEAPS: Am I allowed—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The point is settled. No member can be interrupted unless by his leave, and at present the hon member for Bellechasse has the floor.

Mr. HEAPS: But, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEAPS: I would respectfully appeal from the ruling of the chair.

Mr. SPEAKER: There can be no appeal because there is no ruling.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): I do not know, Sir, whether I am in order in alluding to your ruling, however, I wish to thank you for the kind and too flattering words expressed in my behalf.

Mr. HEAPS: Have I the right to appeal the ruling of the chair?

Mr. SPEAKER: I simply stated what the Deputy Speaker, who preceded me in the chair, had done. I understand there was a point of order raised and that it was ruled upon, so there is nothing more to say; there is no appeal from the decision. I hope my hon. friend will understand that.

Mr. HEAPS: Does Your Honour say that I cannot appeal now?

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend cannot appeal now.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have already explained the rules of the House.

Mr. HEAPS: Can I not appeal?

Mr. SPEAKER: I ask the hon. gentleman to kindly preserve order in the House.

Mr. BOULANGER (Translation): Now, Sir, that calm has been restored over the disturbed waters, I trust that I may be allowed to follow up the remarks which I was about to make to the House. I was stating, when interrupted, that certain views introduced into this debate, especially, interested me.

These views were propounded by the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe), in connection with immigration.

If I well understood the member for Laval-Two Mountains, he stated that if our immigrants were selected with care, if we only admitted into Canada people willing to work—people sound of body and soul—it would have been unnecessary for the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) to move the present resolution. I am interested in this question because this very day, I received a request from a number of my constituents, asking me to exert pressure on the government and especially on the Minister of Immigration with a view to affording the same advantages, the same favours and the same assistance to the citizens of eastern Canada who wished to settle in the west, as those afforded to immigrants from Europe. If the same assistance was given to the citizens of eastern Canada, in order to help them to settle in western Canada, our people would never think of asking for the enactment of the resolution we are at present discussing, for the simple reason that the people of eastern Canada have some pride and self-confidence and rely only on the work of their hands or brain to earn their living, and, therefore do not depend on the government to support either their families or themselves.

To assist European immigration, we already spend large sums so as to reimburse them of part of their travelling expenses and also to enable them to reach western Canada. Loans are even made to them so as to allow them to purchase land, farming implements and all that is needed to settle on the land. Taking into account, Sir, all these expenditures made to help immigration, taking also into account the outlay which we must further make to assist our fellow-citizens of the maritime provinces who claim that they are greatly in need of government assistance in the present crisis, considering the disbursements which we have to make to meet our war debt, rescue those who suffered on the battlefields or elsewhere as an aftermath of the war, develop our natural resources, I state that the time is not ripe and the country cannot afford the additional amounts necessary to enact legislation based on a resolution of this nature. We are told: It is not a question of the government assuming all the expenses necessitated by the enactment of this resolution. Very well. Even supposing the recipients are made to contribute, it is nevertheless true that the greatest portion of the money which will constitute the funds of this insurance will come from the treasury of Canada. In the riding which I have the honour to represent and in the province of Quebec as a whole, we do not need a resolution of this nature, we do not need the enactment of a government insurance scheme for our sick people, our unemployed and for those who are destitute. Why, Sir? Because, in the county of Bellechasse and in the province of Quebec, we are good Christians and we practise the maxim of Christ: Help one another. We do not live in opulence in my county, but there is no great poverty. All our citizens are good people and live comfortably; and should it happen that one of our neighbours becomes destitute, falls sick or is out of work, his friends put their hands in their pockets and help him through those unfortunate days. I do not wish to infer that our friends haling from the west are less good Christians than we are, but it strikes me that if they would only put into practice as we do in the province of Quebec, this Gospel truth: Help one another, they would not come before the House and ask the government to supplement their own personal liabilities, those they should themselves discharge towards their neighbours. It is time, Sir, to put a stop to this desire of placing all the burdens, both those of the community and individual, on the shoulders of the government; it is time to react against this continuous appeal to the public treasury in favour of such and such a scheme more or less fantastic, more or less well conceived or thought out; it is time that we should react against these schemes that only tend to increase the country's debt when our finances at present are far from being flourishing.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to rule.
