OFFICIAL REPORT

Thursday, December 9, 1926

FIRST SESSION—SIXTEENTH PARLIAMENT

This being the day on which parliament is convoked by proclamation of the Governor General for the despatch of business, and the members of the House being assembled:

Arthur Beauchesne, Esquire, M.A., K.C., the Clerk of the House, read to the House a letter from the Governor General's Secretary, informing him that the Chief Justice of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, would proceed to the Senate chamber on Thursday, the 9th of December at 3 p.m., to open the session.

A message was delivered by Major A. R. Thompson, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

His Honour the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the House went up to the Senate chamber, when the Speaker of the Senate said:

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I have it in command to let you know that His Excellency the Governor General does not see fit to declare the causes of his summoning the present Parliament of Canada until the Speaker of the House of Commons shall have been chosen according to law; but to-morrow, at the hour of three o'clock in the afternoon, His Excellency will declare the causes of calling this parliament.

And the members being returned to the Commons chamber:

ELECTION OF SPEAKER

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Beauchesne, for the second time this year, hon. members of the House of Commons of Canada have been reminded by the representative of His Excellency the Governor General that the first duty of a new parliament is to elect a Speaker. This, I might remind the House, is not only a duty but a right which is peculiarly its own. It is in no way the prerogative of the government to appoint the Speaker though, under our parliamentary practice, it has become the custom for the name of an hon. member of the House to be placed in nomination for that high office by the administration of the day.

In the mother of parliaments, whence we derive in the main our parliamentary usages and practices, a Speaker, once elected, is honoured by being re-elected to the chair at the beginning of a new parliament so long as he remains a member of the House of Commons. There has been a difference in practice in this particular in our House of Commons from that which exists in the British House. In our House of Commons the practice in successive parliaments has been for the most part to choose the Speakers alternately from members of English and French origin. To which practice it may be best to adhere is a matter which the House must decide for itself, and which cannot be determined except in the light of existing circumstances by the decision of successive parliaments. At the moment there would appear to be a very special reason why we should, at least for this parliament, follow the British practice.

At the opening of the last parliament, the House unanimously re-elected as Speaker, the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux), who, in the parliament preceding, had filled that high office with great ability, dignity and impartiality, and who is equally felicitous in the use of the English and French languages. When first elected Speaker in 1922, the hon. member for Gaspé had been continuously a member of the House of Commons for over a quarter of a century. This was a distinction which, with but two exceptions, was not enjoyed at the time by any other hon. member. When re-elected Speaker in the month of January of the present year, his period of continuous service as a member of the House of Commons had extended to thirty years, and this distinguished record admitted of but one exception. To-day the period of continuous service of the hon. member for Gaspé runs beyond thirty years and is unparalleled in the case of any other hon.

member. In the absence of a duly elected Speaker he stands to-day, literally, as the "first commoner."

In these circumstances, and knowing, as most of us do, how exceptionally qualified by natural endowments as well as by long experience, Hon. Mr. Lemieux is to preside over the deliberations of this House, to be the custodian of its honour, rights and privileges, as well as to maintain its venerable traditions, I believe it will be the wish of hon. members of all shades of political opinion that he should be accorded by unanimous vote of this assembly the high and honourable position to which, by long and distinguished service in its proceedings, he has become the rightful heir, and I therefore beg to move, seconded by Mr. Lapointe:

That the Honourable Rodolphe Lemieux, K.C., LL.D., member representing the electoral district of Gaspé, do take the chair of this House as Speaker.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Beauchesne, speaking for those who occupy this portion of the chamber and who are the official opposition in this House, I regret that we are not altogether in agreement with the reasons assigned by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister for the nomination which he has just made for the office of Speaker of this parliament. In any remarks which I have to make it must be understood that I have no personal objection to the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux), nor to his qualifications as presiding officer of this House. But I think stronger and better reasons should be shown why this House should be asked to break a very old-established custom in the parliament of Canada.

The Prime Minister has referred to the fact that in the British House of Commons a rule prevails whereby a Speaker once elected is elected for all subsequent parliaments so long as he retains his seat in the House. That rule has never been adopted in Canada and there are grave reasons why such a rule should not be adopted here. We have in this parliament of Canada a system of dual languages that has been recognized from confederation down to the present day, and in order that there should be no disparity between the two predominant races, the Anglo-Saxon race and the French race, in this country, our forefathers in this House, I think wisely decided that the high and dignified office of Speaker of the House of Commons should alternate between representatives of the two predominant races in Canada.

I think I am within the fact when I state that from confederation down to the present time the custom of alternating the Speakership in this way has prevailed. I doubt if there has been a single exception. Sir John Macdonald, during his long regime, followed the rule uniformly; Sir Wilfrid Laurier, during his long regime, followed the rule uniformly. Sir John Macdonald, in 1878 started with Mr. Speaker Blanchet, followed by Mr. Speaker Kirkpatrick, followed by Mr. Speaker Ouimet, then by Mr. Speaker White. When Sir Wilfrid Laurier obtained power, he recognized the custom in his very first parliament, in the ninth parliament of Canada, by appointing Mr. Speaker Edgar, who died during his term, and the term was filled out by Mr. Speaker Bain. For the next parliament Mr. Speaker Brodeur was chosen. He entered the government during his term of office, and the balance of the term was filled out by Mr. Speaker Belcourt. In the next parliament we had Mr. Speaker Sutherland, and following him, Mr. Speaker Marcil. Then, when Sir Robert Borden formed his government, we had Mr. Speaker Sproule, followed by Mr. Speaker Sevigny, and Mr. Speaker Rhodes. So we see that the rule was uniformly followed during that long period of time. It is a rule based on fairness, on justice, and on equality, and there is a great deal to be said in favour of it.

My hon. friend from Gaspé was appointed Speaker of the fourteenth parliament. He was again appointed Speaker of the fifteenth parliament, and now the Prime Minister of this country proposes the same individual as the Speaker of this sixteenth parliament, utterly disregarding the well-established and useful rule in this parliament. No good reason has been given by the Prime Minister for this evasion of the rule. It cannot be that he has not plenty of followers of English stock and of English language who would grace the Speaker's chair. Probably he is suffering in that respect from an embarrassment of riches at the present time. Certain it is that there are in the chamber, many followers of my right hon. friend who might well be selected, and the rule thereby maintained.

We all know that the wheel of political fortune will turn, and it is a good thing that it does turn in this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My hon. friends opposite, if they stop to ponder a minute, must know that it will turn in the future just as it has turned in the past, and when another government comes into power, are we to follow this precedent which it is proposed to establish here to-day? What would be said if another government established the precedent of appointing nothing but English speaking speakers? I do not think that would be fair; I do not think it would be just, and I do not think it would give the rights which our constitution intended to give to the two dominant races in this country.

For these reasons, Mr. Beauchesne, I desire with great respect to register the formal protest of the official opposition in regard to the course taken here this afternoon in connection with the Speakership of this House by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. We are not disposed, however, to press the matter any further, certainly not to a division. A division would be misapprehended, and might be looked upon as in some way a personal slight or criticism of my hon. friend from Gaspe, and I can assure the House that we have no desire to make any such suggestion. I am one of those who have known the hon. member for Gaspe for a great many years now. I know something of his fitness and of his qualifications for the high office for which he has been proposed this afternoon by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. We all admit his long experience; we all admit his great ability. It is true that during the past five years we have not on all occasions been able to agree with some of his rulings, but we have always bowed gracefully to his rulings, or we have placed ourselves within the judgment of the House of Commons. We all admire his urbanity. We all admire his wonderful patience. I confess that as I saw him in this House last January, day in and day out, night in and night out, presiding over this august assembly, I used to wonder where all his patience came from. I used to wonder what his thoughts were as he cast his eye over this chamber, and recalled that there was not a single member of the House of Commons who sat as a member of this House when the hon. member for Gaspe first entered this chamber. What a change! He saw no faces there that were in this House in 1896. He himself I think has changed the least of those who sit in this chamber to-day. He seems to have found for himself the secret of perpetual youth, and all we wish him is that he may be continued long in this chamber, not necessarily in the Speaker's chair, but long in this chamber, and that in the future he may be able to say of himself as the years go by, in the language of the poet,

For men may come and men may go,
But I go on forever.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): Mr. Beauchesne, I am in the very happy position this afternoon that I can support the nomination by the Prime Minister of the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) for the position of Speaker. Those of us who have had the opportunity of being in this chamber while he has occupied the position of Speaker can testify to his unfailing kindness, courtesy, integrity, and impartiality. I was rather pleased to hear the Prime Minister bring the question up this afternoon as he did, because we had been discussing the very same problem prior to coming into this House. The viewpoint we take is similar to that taken by the Prime Minister, but for different reasons. We believe that in view of the fact that this House contains now, and probably will in time to come, many groups, it is essential that we shall have for Speaker of the House the best man available irrespective of race or language. That is the attitude that we take in this matter. We believe that the hon. member for Gaspé is well qualified for the position. Indeed, we know of none in this House better qualified, and therefore we are willing to support the nomination of the Prime Minister.

I can quite understand, of course, that things may change. We created many new precedents last session, for instance, and we are no doubt going to create some new precedents this year, of which this is going to be one. We can quite understand, and I trust that our French-Canadian friends will recognize this as well, that in the years to come we may have a well qualified English speaker in the chair for many sessions of parliament, and we believe that it is essential in the interest of this House, in order that the business of the House may be carried on expeditiously that we should have in the Speaker's chair the best qualified member available.

Mr. R. S. WHITE (Mount Royal): Mr. Beauchesne, I venture, with a good deal of trepidation after what my parliamentary leader has said, to say a word in support of the nomination of Mr. Lemieux to the Speakership of this House, and I do it on personal grounds. It has been my good fortune and pleasure to have known Mr. Lemieux, for a period, I presume, of at least forty years, and I rejoice in the fact that my intercourse with him during that period has confirmed my respect for him as a man. He is the dean of this House, as the right hon. Prime Minister has told us. I might say that I entered this House some eight years before the hon. member for Gaspe, but I might also state that there was a great gap of thirty years between the time I resigned my position here and the time when I had the honour to re-enter this chamber. I concur absolutely, without any qualification whatever, in the motion for the re-election of Mr. Lemieux to the position of Speaker.

It was stated a few moments ago with a good deal of force that the practice in Canada with regard to the Speakership has been to alternate between French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians. I would direct attention to the fact that after confederation Mr. Cockburn was nominated by Sir John A. Macdonald and was the first Speaker of the Canadian parliament. After the general election of 1872 Sir John A. Macdonald again nominated the same gentleman for the position of Speaker, intending obviously to follow the British practice of retaining in that exalted and important position a Speaker whose qualifications had been proved by experience. Subsequent to that the practice of alternation came into vogue, and the whole question at issue is as to whether the British practice, illustrated in the continuous service, as Speaker, of Arthur Onslow for thirty-four years in the British House of Commons, is to prevail in Canada, or whether we are to revert to the more recent practice of alternating between English-speaking and French-speaking members of the House? Speaking for myself alone, I disparage any distinction in respect to any position in this House, between a French Canadian and an English Canadian. I believe that the man possessing the qualifications, whatever the nationality of his forebears may have been, should be chosen upon his merits. Now test the member for Gaspe (Mr. Lemieux) by that measure. He has presided over this House for a period of some six years, and I believe that no Speaker, in the history of the House of Commons of Canada, has ever shown more dignity and more forcefulness than the hon. member for Gaspe. Hon. members may speak of partiality and may question the impartiality of the gentleman who is placed in this exalted position, and if I may digress for a moment, I recall that Mr. Joseph H. Choate, the celebrated diplomat, in toasting the then Chancellor of England, referring to the ancient character of the office, said that the antiquity of the Chancellor was so great that the spray of the deluge was upon him. That remark might almost be applied to the Speaker. Impartial! Yes, as impartial as it is given to any human being to be. There will be a natural and inevitable bias, subconscious it is true, but I venture to say that, subject to that inevitable bias, from which no one engaged in politics can free himself, Mr. Lemieux has conducted the duties of Speaker with fairness, and I hope with satisfaction to all parties. Therefore I say that the partiality of the Speaker is more likely to be pronounced when he occupies that position for a term of four years only than if he were to occupy the position for a term of forty years. The longer he occupies that position, in all logic, the more detached he should become from party bias.

Therefore, speaking for myself alone, I concur in what the Prime Minister has said, and desire to express my personal gratification in the fact that the hon. member for Gaspe is to preside over the deliberations of this House.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): I agree with everything that has been said in reference to the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Lemieux). He has many fine qualities of head and heart and is a distinguished Canadian. He has now been nominated to preside over this chamber during the coming parliament. I may say he is a good Canadian and Britisher and is regarded in Ontario as well as in Quebec as an outstanding Canadian, and a man of the most generous qualities.

However, I wish to raise an important principle in relation to the Speaker of the House. I refer to the fact that the hon. member proposed by the right hon. Prime Minister for the position of Speaker is a shareholder and director in some of the chartered banks and insurance companies in this country, who are continually coming to this House asking for favours and for legislation.

The hon. leader of the Progressives has spoken to-day and I wish to refer to remarks he has made. At a meeting of the directors of the Bank of Montreal on December 8, the great and distinguished Canadian now nominated for the position of Speaker referred to that institution as the cornerstone of our national credit and security. That may or may not be so. I might say to the Progressive members that we had a cabinet minister in this House and a former leader of the Progressives (Mr. Crerar) who looked upon the Home Bank of which he was a director, as the cornerstone of our national credit and security and the bank failed and ruined thousands. I find the hon. member now nominated is a director of the Montreal City Bank, a director of the National Life Insurance Company and a shareholder of the Bank of Montreal and some other chartered corporations in the country. I wish to utter my protest because I believe the day is coming in this country when we should regard our Speaker's chair as the most important office we have in the government of Canada. Giving due consideration to the importance of the office we should, I submit, increase Mr. Speaker's remuneration accordingly and he should vacate all directorships. In my opinion this House should do all in its power to make the Chair as respected in Canada as it is in England. The Speaker's office should command the respect of all political parties and of all shades of opinion in the country. What did the Right Hon. Campbell-Bannerman do in Great Britain in 1905? He wisely decided that neither the Speaker nor any cabinet minister should any longer be a shareholder or a director in any corporation, bank, trust, combine or transportation company, and this practice has been carried out ever since for the reason that these concerns are constantly seeking favours and appealing to parliament for special legislation and privileges. The Hon. Mr. Crerar, who at one time was leader of the Progressive party in this House, was a director of the Home Bank in this country which came to this House asking for legislation of that character and the bank was wrecked. I do not believe that this sort of thing is in the public interest. Far better, in my opinion, is it that the Speaker should dissociate himself from any directorships whatever, and to that end this House should deal as generously with his office as possible, increasing his salary and allowances wherever necessary.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is just back from the old country with his pet Magna Charta of liberty and declaration of independence as it were. Let me impress upon him the importance of beginning right in his precedents in this new parliament and independent nation in a matter of such importance as this. Let us not create any undesirable precedents in relation to the presiding officer of the House. The Prime Minister, as I say, has come back now from the old land where he has been making so many speeches, and where he has secured this magnificent Magna Charta—a term misused and of which we have been hearing so much. We are now said to be a nation ready made. Let him see to it, therefore, that whoever may be chosen as Speaker in this House shall give up directorships and be free of criticism in this regard. I know that several thousands of the people in the province I come from suffered in the Home Bank disaster under Mr. Crerar's directorship, and this only emphasizes the importance of the point I am making. I have no objection to the personal qualifications of the nominee; I admire him and respect his ability. But I submit that this motion, if adopted, would constitute an unfortunate departure from British practice.

The Clerk of the House declared the motion carried in the affirmative, nemine contradicente, and Honourable Rodolphe Lemieux, member for the electoral division of Gaspé, duly elected to the Chair of the House.

Honourable Mr. Lemieux was conducted from his seat in the House to the Speaker's chair by Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King and Honourable Ernest Lapointe.

Mr. SPEAKER-ELECT said: Madam, fellow members of the House of Commons, for the third time I have been called to the high office of Speaker of the House of Commons. Let me assure you how deeply I appreciate your nomination. If the honour is great, greater still are the responsibilities.

After thirty years of continuous service in this House, where it has been my privilege to observe men and events, I more than ever realize that, in the discharge of my duties, justice, fair play and strict impartiality will always exercise a moderating influence on political passions. And need I say that the respect for parliamentary institutions in a young democracy like ours is too precious a boon not to be constantly set before my eyes as a guiding star. It is in that spirit that I intend to serve, placing my trust in the goodwill and co-operation of my fellow members. It will be my honour and duty to maintain those ancient privileges, liberties, customs and usages—in a word to live up to those noble traditions, the fruit of so many centuries of struggle, which have come to us as a legacy from the mother country and now stand as the beacon of modern civilization.

Mes chers collègues, pour la troisième fois, vous m'avez offert la présidence de la Chambre des communes.

En retour, permettez-moi de vous dire combien j'apprécie ce témoignage de confiance de votre part. Sans doute, l'honneur est grand, mais combien plus grandes encore les responsabilités!

Après trente années de service continu dans cette Chambre—où j'ai eu l'avantage d'observer hommes et choses—je me rends compte que dans l'exercice de mes fonctions, la justice, le franc jeu, l'impartialité sont le frein le plus salutaire au déchaînement des passions politiques. J'ajoute que le prestige des institutions parlementaires, dans une jeune démocratie comme la nôtre, est un bien trop désirable pour que je n'en sois pas constamment pénétré.

Voilà dans quelles dispositions d'esprit j'entends servir—recherchant votre concours et m'appuyant sur votre bon vouloir.

J'aurai toujours à cœur de maintenir les privilèges, les libertés, les us et coutumes, en un mot toutes ces glorieuses traditions parlementaires dont les origines remontent très loin dans l'histoire et qui constituent le legs le plus précieux que l'Angleterre, notre métropole, ait fait à la civilisation moderne.

DEPUTY SERGEANT-AT-ARMS

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that the Sergeant-at-Arms, with my approval, has appointed Edouard Taschereau, Esquire, to be his deputy during the present session of parliament.

ADJOURNMENT

MARITIME CLAIMS COMMISSION REPORT

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Before you put the motion, Mr. Speaker, may I ask my right hon. friend to be good enough to lay on the table of the House the report of Sir Andrew Rae Duncan in connection with maritime matters. I understand that the report is ready for distribution, and while I know that it is not customary to lay documents on the table until the speech from the throne has been delivered, if to-morrow the Prime Minister will kindly table that report it will very much oblige us on this side.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was the intention of the government to table the report to-morrow.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 3.55 p.m.

Friday, December 10, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

OPENING OF THE SESSION

Mr. Speaker read a communication from the Governor General's Secretary announcing that His Excellency would proceed to the Senate chamber at three p.m. on this day for the purpose of formally opening the session of the Dominion parliament.

A message was delivered by Major A. R. Thompson, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the House went up to the Senate chamber.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Then the Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux, Speaker-elect, said:

May it please Your Excellency,

The House of Commons have elected me as their Speaker, though I am but little able to fulfil the important duties thus assigned to me. If in the performance of these duties I should at any time fall into error, I pray that the fault may be imputed to me, and not to the Commons whose servant I am.

The Honourable the Speaker of the Senate, addressing the Honourable the Speaker of the House, then said:

Mr. Speaker, I am commanded by His Excellency the Governor General to assure you that your words and actions will constantly receive from him the most favourable construction.

Then His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to open parliament by a speech from the throne.

And the House being returned to the Commons chamber.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to state that the House having attended on His Excellency the Governor General in the Senate chamber, I informed His Excellency that the choice of Speaker had fallen upon me, and, in your names and on your behalf, I made the usual claim for your privileges, which His Excellency was pleased to confirm to you.

OATHS OF OFFICE

Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 1, respecting the Administration of Oaths of Office.

Motion agreed to. and bill read the first time.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that when the House did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both houses of parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I desire on this occasion to assure you of the great satisfaction it affords me to be associated with you in the important tasks upon which you are about to enter at this, the first session of the Sixteenth Parliament of Canada, and to avail myself of your assistance and advice in discharging the duties which His Majesty the King has entrusted to me as his representative.

Once again we have cause to be thankful for a bountiful harvest and other assurances of continued prosperity. It is gratifying to note that during the year the foreign trade of Canada has shown further marked improvement and that immigration has substantially increased.

The necessity of making adequate provision for the public services has compelled me to summon you at an earlier date than would otherwise have been necessary. In order to provide for present and immediate future needs, and to regularize expenditures already made, you will be asked forthwith to vote the necessary supply for the current financial year. It is not proposed to proceed with the ordinary business of the session until the reassembling of parliament in the new year.

Those government measures which passed the House of Commons at the last session of parliament, but which failed to become law, will be reintroduced. Amendments to the Canada Grain Act will also be submitted for your consideration.

With a view to expediting public business generally, it is proposed to afford opportunity for an early consideration of amendments to the rules of the House of Commons.

My government has continued to give special attention to the fuel problem and measures providing for assistance to works constructed for the production of domestic coke from Canadian coal will be submitted.

The report of the commission appointed under the Inquiries Act to examine and report upon conditions in the maritime provinces will be presented immediately and your attention will be invited to its recommendations. Measures dealing with the matters referred to in the report of the commission are now under consideration by my government, and certain legislation in respect thereto will be introduced.

Good progress has been made with work on the Hudson Bay railway and it is planned to continue construction at as early a date as possible next year. It has been decided to submit the study of conditions at the port to the careful examination of an outstanding British authority on tidal and estuarial conditions affecting harbours.

Canadian National branch line construction on the basis of a definite three-year programme having proved entirely successful, that method of dealing with necessary railway expansion will be continued, and another three-year programme will be submitted for your consideration.

You will also be asked to approve an agreement with the holders of Grand Trunk Pacific perpetual debentures.

Members of my government have just returned to Canada from attending the meetings of the Imperial conference. The report of the proceedings of the conference, together with its recommendations, will be placed before you for consideration. It will, I believe, be recognized that the joint labours of the governments represented at the conference have gone far to set forth the relations of the members of the British Commonwealth of Nations to one another and to foreign countries and to ensure a ready appreciation of the full measure of self-government now attained in all that relates to their domestic and external affairs. In the prolonged consideration given to specific matters of joint concern, the conference has done much to ensure the free and effective co-operation in common ends of the governments and peoples of the British Empire.

The recent appointment of a minister plenipotentiary accredited by His Majesty to represent the interests of Canada in the United States marks an important stage in the development of the international relations of the Dominion.

The diamond jubilee of confederation will be appropriately celebrated during the coming year. I am pleased to inform you that His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales has graciously accepted the invitation of my government to visit Canada, circumstances permitting, in connection with the celebration. My government has also extended an invitation to the Prime Minister of Great Britain; the Prime Minister has accepted the invitation and has expressed the hope that when the time arrives he may find it possible to be present.

Members of the House of Commons:

The estimates for the current fiscal year which have not hitherto been voted by parliament will, as already mentioned, be submitted for your approval forthwith. Estimates for the financial year 1927-28 will be submitted for your consideration when parliament reassembles.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

In inviting your careful consideration of the important matters which will engage your attention, I pray that Divine Providence may guide and bless your deliberations.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

The the speech of His Excellency, the Governor General, to both houses of parliament be taken into consideration on Monday next, and that this order have precedence over all other business, except the introduction of bills, until disposed of.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a special committee be appointed to prepare and report, with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the select standing committees of this House under rule 10, said committee to be composed of Messieurs King (Kootenay), P. F. Casgrain H. A. Stewart (Leeds) and R. B. Hanson.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): Before you put the motion Mr. Speaker, I desire respectfully to call the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that there are in this House two or three groups who have no representative on that committee. I can quite understand how, in the rush of business, after the Prime Minister's recent return from Great Britain, he has overlooked this situation, and I merely draw it to his attention, and would respectfully ask him to give these groups some representation on that committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I desire to point out to my hon. friend that the committee is a very small one, as he will observe, and I have not the slightest doubt that each member of the committee will be quite ready to confer with my hon. friend and with the representatives of other groups in the House in preparing the report. Speaking for the government, I may say that I have every desire to treat fairly all sections of the House.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) presented the following message from his Excellency the Governor General:

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons a certified copy of an approved Minute of Council appointing the Honourable W. R. Motherwell, Minister of Agriculture, the Honourable J. H. King, Minister of Health and Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, the Honourable J. C. Elliott, Minister of Public Works; and the Honourable Fernand Rinfret, Secretary of State, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons, as commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of the eleventh chapter of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, intituled 'An Act respecting the House of Commons."

MARITIME CLAIMS COMMISSION

REPORT LAID ON THE TABLE BY PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I beg to lay on the table a copy of a report on the maritime claims, requested by the hon. leader of the opposition yesterday. I move, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Lapointe, that a thousand copies in English and five hundred copies in French of the report of the Royal Commission on Maritime Claims be printed forthwith, and that rule 74 be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

IMPERIAL CONFERENCE

SUMMARY OF PROCEEDINGS TABLED BY PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I desire to lay on the table a summary of proceedings of the Imperial conference 1926, including the report of the committee on inter-imperial relations. The appendices to the summary, containing reports of other committees and sub-committees, will be laid on the table as soon as the compilation is completed.

I move that a thousand copies in English and five hundred copies in French of the summary of the imperial proceedings of the conference of 1926, laid upon the table of the House this day, be printed forthwith, and that rule 74 be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

SUPPLY

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): As intimated in the address just received from His Excellency, the Governor General, it will be necessary to provide for carrying on the public service for the month of December, and I therefore move:

That this House will on Monday next resolve itself into a committee to consider the supply to be granted to His Majesty, and that rule 76 in relation thereto be suspended.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved:

That this House will on Monday next resolve itself into a committee to consider ways and means for the raising of the supplies to be granted to His Majesty, and that rule 76 in relation thereto be suspended.

Motion agreed to.

ESTIMATES FOR 1926-27

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1927, was presented by Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the House, and referred to the committee of Supply.

Mr. ROBB: I have just placed on the table the estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1927, exactly as presented to parliament last session. I now desire to place on the table, so that it will be available in the distribution office for hon. members, explanations of estimates, governor general's warrants, and interim supply.

I also desire to lay on the table, for the information of the House a statement prepared in the Department of Finance showing in months and in the aggregate, the amount of governor general's warrants issued since dissolution for the various departmental services.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King, the House adjourned at 4.08 p.m.

Monday, December 13, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

THE LATE MR. J. C. DOUGLAS

TRIBUTES PAID BY MESSIEURS MACKENZIE KING, GUTHRIE AND EVANS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I express to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) and the members of his party the deep sympathy which those of us on this side of the House feel in the loss which his party has sustained in the sudden death of one of its members, Mr. John C. Douglas, the member for Antigonish-Guysborough? May I also express to the friends and relatives of the deceased member the sympathy which this House will feel towards them?

On Friday last when the hon. member entered this parliament to attend the opening ceremonies the flag on the main tower was flying at top mast. It was lowered at sundown only to be raised to half mast at day-break on the morrow out of respect to his memory. Surely there could be no more striking reminder of the "one clear call" which sooner or later every one of us will be summoned to obey, and which, in the exercise of our duties, may well cause us to say with the Psalmist: "So teach us to number our days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom."

The late Mr. Douglas had scarcely more than completed his fifty-second year. He was born in Stellarton, Nova Scotia, in 1874, and was educated at the leading academy and universities of that province. He was by profession a barrister and a journalist. For over a quarter of a century his life was identified with the politics of his native province. In 1900 he entered municipal politics as councillor, and was subsequently, for several years, mayor of Glace Bay. In 1911 and 1916 he was elected a member of the Nova Scotia legislature. Hon. members who sat in this House during the thirteenth parliament will remember him as member at that time for Cape Breton South and Richmond. He became attorney general in the Rhodes administration upon its formation in 1925. This position he resigned to contest Antigonish-Guysborough in the recent federal election. Mr. Douglas won the seat, but there appears to be little doubt that the condition of his heart which occasioned his sudden death was due in no inconsiderable measure to the fatigue, strain and incidental anxieties of the campaign.

Though his career has been brought to a close at the moment it might have been expected to be nearing its zenith, Mr. Douglas' political activities and public services have been such that he will long be remembered as a leading Conservative figure in the politics of the maritime provinces.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, those of us who sit upon this side of the House desire to associate ourselves with the kindly expressions of regret which have just been voiced by the Prime Minister over the death of our lamented colleague, John Douglas. The awful suddenness of the call in his case has impressed us tremendously. We who saw him on Friday last in apparent health and vigour can hardly yet realize that he has been taken from us.

I desire to add my testimony to the kind words of the Prime Minister in respect of the late John Douglas. I knew him well in this House between the years of 1917 and 1921. He was a genial, kind-hearted man, always willing to assist in any work, willing to share any burden or responsibility, a man who commanded friendship on both sides of the House. Before he came to Ottawa he had a good parliamentary training in the legislature of his province. He had also an excellent position at the bar of Nova Scotia. He had been engaged in municipal life there successfully, as the Prime Minister has stated. I suppose the culmination of his career as a public man was when he achieved the very distinguished office of Attorney General of the Province of Nova Scotia. To a lawyer that is sometimes looked upon as the culmination of a career. It is a very high and distinguished honour for any lawyer to attain. However, he relinquished that high post for the purpose of giving his services in the parliament of Canada. This parliament must regret the loss of men like John Douglas. The province of Nova Scotia will feel his loss, but we sitting here on your left, Mr. Speaker, will probably feel that loss more keenly than anybody. We realize, of course, that there is nothing we can do. We realize we can only express our regret in all the sad circumstances and bow our heads to the inevitable.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Rosetown): Mr. Speaker, speaking for this part of the House, I wish to say that although we knew very little of the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Douglas), we certainly regret his death in the peculiarly sad circumstances, and we wish also to extend our sympathy to those to whom he was near and dear.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): I would like to ask the government, and particularly the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning), whether the report of the Joint Board of Engineers in connection with the St. Lawrence development will be laid on the table of the House, and if so, whether it will be available to members during the coming adjournment.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): I shall make inquiries regarding the present situation of the matter, Mr. Speaker.

PRIVILEGE—MR. BROWN

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I wish to correct a report that has appeared in one of the Ottawa papers, and if I may, I shall read a very brief extract:

> Premier King and his cabinet met the rank and file of the Liberal party and with the group of nine Liberal-Progressives who entered the Liberal camp with their leader of last session, Robert Forke.

As a matter of accuracy, the nine Liberal-Progressive members referred to were not present. This occasion may afford me an opportunity, Mr. Speaker, for making a statement with reference to a resolution that was passed at Winnipeg on September 22, 1926, as follows:

> Resolution passed by Liberal-Progressive Members for Manitoba at Winnipeg
> It was recognized that the country had demanded a stable government and the group are anxious to comply with that demand.
> That the policies upon which the Progressives and Liberals were elected are based upon common principles.
> That for the enactment of legislation embodying those policies the group are in favour of the acceptance of a portfolio by Mr. Forke in the Liberal cabinet.
> That such acceptance shall be upon condition that the Progressive party shall give united support to the government upon those principles, and that the Progressive group shall retain its identity as hitherto.

This statement is made in behalf of the members for Lisgar, Selkirk, Provencher, Souris, Neepawa, Marquette, Dauphin, Qu'Appelle, Macdonald and North Huron.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY MOVED BY MR. L. M. AUGER SECONDED BY MR. E. A. MCPHERSON

The House proceeded to the consideration of the speech of His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. LOUIS AUGER (Prescott) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, in accepting the task and the honour conferred by the government, I am relying upon the leniency of the House and I feel confident that it will not be denied to a new and quite a young member who finds himself besieged by fear at the sight of the grandeur and majesty of his surroundings. In the presence of so distinguished political men of all parties—friends and opponents—I well realize, notwithstanding all the illusions pertaining to youth, the deficiency of my personal qualifications and I am fully aware that it is not to my humble personality I owe this privilege, for which I am proud and thankful, of moving the address in answer to the speech from the throne.

The government are broad-minded and magnanimous. In conferring on me this honour they have their eyes on the people of the old French constituency of Prescott, always faithful to their policy. Neither was the French Canadian minority of Ontario lost sight of. Allow me, Sir, on behalf of all my fellow-citizens of Ontario and especially those of Prescott, to lay at the feet of the government, who honours them in my person, the very respectful homage of my most vivid and deepest gratitude.

May I be further permitted, before discussing the speech from the throne, to greet His Excellency the Governor General and his worthy spouse with the warmest welcome, and thank him for accepting the very high and dignified post of representative of the British Crown in our country. We are overjoyed at his appointment. To us he is not a stranger. His high reputation as a diplomat, acquired while he was Viceroy of India and Bombay, preceded him among us. Moreover, he is somewhat of a Canadian through the work accomplished by his ancestors in this country. Canadian readers have read with much interest the book entitled: A Voyage Around the World in the Sunbeam, and the author of which is no other than Lady Brassey, the revered mother of Her Excellency Lady Willingdon. For all the above reasons, His Excellency may rest assured of meeting here open arms and hearts filled with loyalty and affection.

There is a further agreeable and pleasant duty devolving upon me, that of welcoming the return of the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). Having left this country immediately after the great electoral victory, for which they were mainly responsible, they return among us from London, greatly enhanced through the work they have accomplished for the maintenance and natural development of Canadian autonomy and for the welfare of the other parts of the empire.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to offer you my sincere congratulations on your re-election to the Speakership of this House. It is to your impartiality, tact, judgment and dignity that you owe this third term. For my part, I shall further add to the unanimous praise that you have already received from this House: the wish that you may remain among us a long time, in order that we may re-elect you a score of times to preside over our deliberations.

I wish also to congratulate the new ministers of His Majesty. They have shouldered great responsibilities as well as honours. We must bow to their ability and personal merit, and wish them the greatest possible success in the accomplishment of their new tasks.

Although, perhaps, I may not always share the same views as the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie), I have too broad a mind not to appreciate the well-deserved success which he attained at the Conservative convention, and it gives me great pleasure to offer him my sincere congratulations. Everybody recognizes his high qualifications and his experience.

In looking over the speech from the throne, I note that many legislative measures will be presented for the approval of this House. I shall not enter into the details of each one of said measures, many of which were left over from last session. However, I wish to draw attention to the one which will bring relief to the grievances of the maritime provinces, also to those which concern rural credits and the pensions to old age. We cannot grant too many favours and too much protection to the farming or labouring classes who will always remain, whatever may be said or done, the source of generous toils and heroic sacrifices, in a word, the basis of all national prosperity.

I also note with pleasure that the measures embodied in the speech from the throne interest all the people of the Dominion: Here, we find proposed measures which are of special interest to the west; there, the maritime provinces lay claim to their rights; further on, we come across measures which will benefit all citizens of Canada, the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, as well as the west and the maritime provinces, This tends to emphasize the nature of the present government's policy. Sir, is not this solicitude for the general welfare of the whole country remarkable? No part, class, or race is forgotten. Should we not be proud of an administration which, by a sound and well thought out policy, tends to dissipate all causes of grievances and friction? For the last five years, Sir, the government has put into practice this efficient policy of fair play, good understanding, and harmony and I state, without fear of contradiction, that this is one of the great reasons for their splendid triumph at the polls on September 14 last.

To be powerful and prosperous, a nation must be united, and there is no possible union should there exist reasons for some to complain of others. To redress grievances of classes, localities, or races by justice and conciliation, are the very means required to unite the various elements of our young nation and thereby render it more prosperous and happy. The germs of peace which the government is prepared to sow in the hearts of our citizens will bear abundant fruit and the people will maintain in power for a long time those makers of union and peace. When these proposed measures come before us, Sir, we shall consider them calmly and judiciously, laying aside and sacrificing, if necessary, our personal interests and ambitions to think only of the interests of the nation as a whole, which demands everywhere and always citizens happy and contented with their lot.

As the right hon. Prime Minister stated, the party must serve the cause and not the cause the party. Consequently, when these measures are considered, we shall not have paltry and narrow views; but patriotism being the guiding light of the intellect and will of the representatives of the nation, we shall witness, I trust, a unanimous chorus of approbation in regard to this peace-making program.

Another aspect of the speech from the throne, which gives us pleasure to note, is the ever-increasing prosperity of the country. What a contrast, Sir, between the present conditions in Canada and those that existed five years ago. Look at the official statistics, read the statements of the Dominion banks, containing the views of authorities in financial matters.

Everything in 1921, reminded us of deficits in railways and in the general administration of the increase in the national debt and of trade and industrial failures of taxes always the more burdensome and the sorry nation, downcast and without hope, was drifting rapidly towards the deep chasm of hideous bankruptcy.

However, such is not its lot to-day. Canada is moving towards the future with a firm and assured step. A wave of enthusiasm has spread over the nation which knows no fear, now that a sound economy has put a stop to the series of disastrous failures and replaced them by surpluses in the budget, sufficient to decrease the national debt and realize reductions in taxation which burdened so heavily the Canadian rate-payers. Without fear and relieved from taxation, the people have faith and this faith stimulates their farming, trade and industrial activities. Thanks to this stimulant and also to the trade conventions with the other nations, production and sales have increased in our country. Our trade operations are profitable and show a favourable trade balance of more than $400,000,000 for last year. In other words the amount of money disbursed by other nations increases so much more our national reserve and strengthens in a like manner our farming or manufacturing industries. The solicitude of the present administration for the general welfare of Canada has produced splendid results, of which an eloquent testimonial is furnished by foreign capital having no further fear of investment in our country and thus creating here and there centres of industries where to-morrow large and prosperous towns will spring up.

The speech from the throne moreover contains a reference to our inter-imperial relations. Good work was accomplished at the last Imperial conference and whatever news that has leaked out redounds to the patriotism and foresight of our delegates whose speeches over there were in keeping with Canadian statesmanship. The right hon. Prime Minister and the hon. Minister of Justice advocated the only policy which, in my humble opinion, safeguards the legitimate interests of our dear country and guarantees the permanency of the empire; that is to say the complete autonomy of the dominions and a free coöperation between the various countries thus united by the superior and powerful ties of friendship.

Citizens of Canada, without distinction of race or creed consider themselves as Britishers just as much as their brothers in England. They are loyal and desire the maintenance of the imperial ties, they nevertheless love their country and will not be happy until the day when they will fully share the privilege of British institutions for which they are ready to once more make the generous sacrifices which their ancestors made to obtain and safeguard them. Therefore they gladly welcome the appointment of the Hon. Vincent Massey as Canadian Representative to Washington. To them, it is the consecration of the courageous act of the hon. Minister of Justice, at the time Minister of Marine and Fisheries, when he attached his signature alone as Canadian representative to the 1923 Halibut treaty with the United States, and thus broke away from the old custom which required that the British ambassador in the United States' capital should be the only one authorized by His Majesty to sign, on our behalf, our conventions with our neighbours.

We are gradually progressing towards our high destinies as a nation, and we must congratulate the government which has just taken this forward step and has made such a judicious choice in the person of the first Canadian Representative.

We are invited to celebrate, this year, the diamond jubilee of the Canadian confederation. At the time when this pact was agreed upon between the provinces, it was a source of apprehension on the part of many upright and patriotic persons who doubted the possibility of a lasting agreement between the various elements in our country. However, the fathers of confederation based the Confederation pact on a spirit of harmony that will ensure its permanency. It is the spirit of fair-play, harmony, conciliation and mutual concession.

As a French Canadian, I take the liberty of expressing the feelings of my race. If we have wronged any one since Confederation, let us know whom, what race, what province, and we shall be but too happy to redress the wrong. On the other hand, I expect the same broadness of mind and the same loyalty on the part of my English speaking fellow-citizens. The jubilee of confederation should be a cause of rejoicing for all Canadians, whether they are English, Irish, Scotch or French Canadian. Again speaking on behalf of my people, we are ready to do our share in order that harmony and peace may always reign in our country.

The political history of my race shows that always we have shown a disposition to side with justice and conciliation. Never have we been moved by bigotry in voting in order to oppose a man, a party or a race. We have weighed the parties and their political programmes in the light of a reason tempered by a generous and patriotic sentiment. We want a united, happy and prosperous Canada. That is our ambition, and that explains the almost unanimous adhesion of our people to the peaceful policy of the right hon. Prime Minister and his government. We shall continue to love Canada, all its citizens and all its provinces, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from north to south, without any distinction whatsoever of race, language or creed. For my part, I hope to always support in this House, measures of justice and national welfare which will continue to bring more happiness and more prosperity within the boundaries of this country.

Consequently, and stirred by such sentiments, I have the honour to move that an address be forwarded to His Excellency the Governor General to humbly thank him for the speech which he so graciously delivered to both houses of parliament.

Mr. E. A. McPHERSON (Portage la Prairie): Mr. Speaker, I must confess that I rise to address this House with considerable fear and trembling, both mentally and physically. Knowing as I do the composition of this House, and realizing the fact that the greatest orators and statesmen of Canada have occupied the attention of this chamber on previous occasions, it is very difficult for me to know what I can say that will be of real importance or of interest to hon. members. I can only protect myself to a certain extent from perhaps just but severe criticism by reminding those members who, in common with myself, are new members, that they will soon be in my position. I know that the old members will be lenient in their judgment when I remind them of the occasion on which they were first placed in a similar position. I realized, Mr. Speaker, when I was asked to second the address in reply to the speech from the throne that the choice was not made from a personal standpoint but from the standpoint of constituency. On that ground I can justify the choosing of myself as the seconder of the address, but on no other ground.

The constituency which I represent has a unique history in the annals of Dominion politics. In the first election held in that constituency in 1871 there were two candidates, and the result of the polling was a tie. Owing to the fact that there was no provision for a casting vote by the deputy returning officer the two members were both sworn in and given a seat in this House. Another reason is that the constituency was represented, as every hon. member of this House knows, by one of the greatest men that Canada has ever produced, and who will always be regarded as such. I refer to the fact that the late Sir John A. Macdonald was returned by the electors of Portage la Prairie in 1878. To be represented by such a man is a distinction that any constituency can be proud of. I do not wish to go too much into detail, but I must mention one or two others. Sir John A. Macdonald was followed by a gentleman who is a friend of all the old members of the House and who has been a friend of every member in this House. Our constituency was represented for years by Robert Watson, now Senator Watson. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that the west has ever realized the work that Senator Watson did on behalf of that constituency during the long years when he was a voice crying in the wilderness, when he was the only Liberal member west of the great lakes. He was followed by a gentleman who was quite prominent, although not from a political standpoint. I refer to Dr. J. G. Rutherford, a Scotchman with a big heart and a bitter tongue, but he was a man above others, and as an official in the Department of Agriculture I think gave more to this Dominion in connection with animal husbandry than any other official has done at any time. Following him, at a later date, the constituency was honoured by having as its representative the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, a warm personal friend of mine and a gentleman possessing great ability. In twenty years we disagreed on one thing only, but from a House point it was rather important. As to whether he was right or I was right I do not know. We had our own opinions—perhaps posterity will decide we were both wrong. But as I think of all these gentlemen who have represented the constituency, whom I cannot hope to equal in the matter of ability, it makes my task doubly hard. For these reasons I wish to thank the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his colleagues for the honour they have conferred on the constituency through its humble representative.

It is also most fitting, Mr. Speaker, that I should congratulate you upon your election to your present position. It was not necessary to hear the words of commendation expressed the other day by hon. members of this House, because your reputation is not at all restricted to this part of Canada, but is as well known in the west as in the east. I sincerely congratulate you. I wish also, on behalf of the western portion of the Dominion especially, to congratulate the country on the fact that we have now with us Lord Willingdon as the representative of His Majesty the King. His long and distinguished career is a guarantee that the bonds of friendship and loyalty existing between this country and the motherland will be strengthened as the days go by, and I am satisfied that in the discharge of his duties he will be ably assisted by his gracious consort, Lady Willingdon, and that she will endear herself to the hearts of Canadians, as her predecessors have done in the past.

In connection with the bond of empire it is fitting that I should congratulate the right hon. Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) upon the prominent part they took in the conference from which they recently returned, and the favourable position in which they placed our Dominion in connection with the affairs of the empire. If some years ago, or some months ago, I could have foreseen that I was likely to occupy my present position I might have devoted more time to the consideration of Dominion politics as a whole, but not expecting such an occasion to arise, I must confess that my interest in Dominion politics has been largely confined to those questions which interest us in the western provinces. This attitude was not taken from the standpoint of sectionalism, but because we felt that we required certain things in that country to obtain which it was necessary that we should make some effort to force our opinion upon the people of the Dominion. It is true that we had broadcast our demands at great length and for a great many years, on the supposition that the rule, that if ye ask ye shall receive would be followed. But there seemed to be some difficulty about the reception of these requests at Ottawa, and results were not always as satisfactory as we expected. But I am glad to state that during the last two or three years things have apparently taken a turn for the better. I might confess in reference to western conditions that while we as westerners may talk a lot about our demands out there, I submit that anything that is for the good of western Canada is for the good of Canada as a whole, and that the prosperity of eastern Canada, especially the central provinces, is wrapped up to a great extent in the prosperity of western Canada. So that we are not altogether selfish when we make some few demands from time to time.

I am also glad to note, Mr. Speaker, that there are indications in the speech from the throne of further recognition of conditions in the west. The question that interests us to a very great extent, and one which must interest all of Canada, is the question of immigration. It is quite true that since the war of 1914 was brought to a close conditions have been such that any thorough scheme of immigration was difficult to carry out. But we have a territory out there which, although populated over a large area, is really sparsely settled in whole, a territory which can hold a great many more immigrants and a great many more producers. I would submit that the most necessary type of immigrant is he who is willing to go on the land and become a producer, that through him only can the wealth of the nation be built up, and that immigrants in other walks of life will naturally follow as a demand is made for their services. So I am glad to know that we are to have a progressive and deliberate attempt to bring in as many settlers as possible for that purpose.

In conjunction with this, I also note that it is the intention to extend branch lines of the Canadian National railway in western Canada. This is just as necessary both from the standpoint of those who are now living in sparsely settled districts and for the purpose of giving immigrants proper accommodation and market facilities. There are large areas where the farmers still have to haul their grain to market for considerably longer distances than they should have to do in order to compete with others in the same line of life.

I am not going to discuss the completion of the Hudson Bay railway because we in the west regard that question as settled and feel that we are now going to have whatever benefits will accrue from the completion and operation of the railway. Leaving aside all argument as to the advisability of the Hudson Bay railway, I might draw to the attention of the House the fact that the people living in any district think that that district is the only place that is worth while considering. I myself went into the district of Portage la Prairie when there was no railway there, and I can remember as I grew up the criticism of the building of the Canadian Pacific railway on the ground that the country to be served would never be worth anything. Of course, events have proved that criticism to have been absolutely without foundation. In like manner I submit we might be hasty in our judgment should we consider that portion of Canada lying between The Pas and Hudson bay to be a wilderness and not worth while developing. I think the development of the natural resources along the line will amply warrant the expenditures on this railway, and that western Canada in particular and Canada as a whole will eventually reap very substantial benefits from the construction of the Hudson Bay railway.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is one other point in the Speech from the Throne which I wish to discuss shortly, and perhaps it is of more interest to me than to any other member of this House. I refer to the suggestion that the legislation which was not completed last session will be completed in this. This legislation includes the re-valuation of soldier settlers' land. When I am told that in the district lying between lake Winnipeg and lake Manitoba and on the west side of lake Manitoba the conditions of the soldier settlers are worse than in any other part of the Dominion, I regret to say that I cannot very well contradict the statement. I had heard rumours of it from time to time, but I did not realize the gravity of the situation until I went through that district. I am not for a moment suggesting any criticism of what has been done, I do not know who is to blame, but regardless of why or how the conditions arose, Mr. Speaker, I would ask this House to consider that we have a large number of soldier settlers up there who are in dire want, and unless they are relieved without much further delay it is doubtful if they will be able to remain on their holdings. A number of them have already left. I met man after man up there who pointed out to me that there was no possibility of his paying for his land, let alone earning sufficient to return him a good living at the present time. These men did not consider dollars and cents when they volunteered for service to the empire in the days of emergency. Indeed we could not have got one of them to go through what they went through merely for money. Therefore I submit it is not up to the government or to the people of Canada at this stage to consider the financial cost of giving those men justice and fair treatment and thus enabling them to build up homes where they are now located. In short, in considering this the government and the country should deal with these men not on a business basis at all but on a basis of justice and right. These men are not trying to live on their reputation as soldiers. They have gone up there and in spite of the natural difficulties which have existed in that district during the last four years they have hung on in the hope that they would be able to maintain homes for themselves and their families. For that reason one of the first things I should like to see this House give attention to is the revaluation of the land of our soldier settlers, otherwise many of these men will have to abandon their homes. I have seen those so-called "soulless" corporations, the banks of this Dominion, write off agreements of sale on land purchased at the high valuations which existed in the west five or six years ago, I have seen them write off all the interest and reduce the capital by almost fifty per cent, in order that those who bought land under those conditions might maintain their homes and eventually make them their own. When those so-called soulless corporations will do that as a business proposition, how much more should the Dominion be generous in its treatment of these men who are trying to maintain their homes under almost impossible circumstances?

Now, Sir, I have almost broken the rule of brevity that I imposed on myself when I rose. I think perhaps the best interests of the Dominion as a whole will be served and the business of this House will be expedited by the adoption of the amendments to the rules of the House with a view to curtail useless debate. I think our people as a whole will welcome any change that will make our work go through more rapidly and with less discussion. I can only justify my own remarks, Mr. Speaker, on two grounds: I was forced into it, and it is a matter which has to be taken up. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your kind attention.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, let my first formal utterance as leader for the time being of His Majesty's loyal opposition in this chamber be words of welcome to the shores of Canada to His Excellency the Governor General as the representative of our sovereign lord the King in this vast and important part of His Majesty's overseas dominions. The people of Canada upon looking backward to the year 1867, the year of confederation, are at all times wont to recall with pride and satisfaction the long line of distinguished statesmen and publicists who have been selected from time to time to represent their own and our sovereign in the government of this country.

In the present instance the people of Canada, without distinction of race or creed or party, will rejoice that the choice of a representative of His Majesty has fallen upon one so prominent, so well versed both in the affairs of the motherland and of the empire in general, and likewise upon one so well qualified by broad and varied experience in the intricacies of government as is His Excellency the present Governor General. To His Excellency and to his gracious spouse, Her Excellency, this House and this country will unite in according a most sincere and hearty welcome.

May I at this point pause for a moment to offer a word of congratulation to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and to his colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) upon their safe return to their native land, after having been participants in an Imperial conference at the ancient capital of the empire. Before concluding my remarks I may have something to say in regard to the deliberations and the conclusions of that conference, but at the moment my only wish is to convey to Canada's two distinguished representatives at the conference the pleasure which we all experience in this House in seeing them back again in apparent health, strength and vigour.

I now turn for a moment to the hon. member for Prescott (Mr. Auger) and the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. McPherson) and to the speeches to which this House has listened this afternoon from these two gentlemen. I tender them the sincere congratulations of those who sit on this side of the House upon the manner in which each of them has acquitted himself to-day and has discharged the important and honourable function which has devolved upon him. Both in this parliament and in the mother of parliaments at Westminster, the honourable and important duty of moving and seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne usually falls to the lot of those who might be considered to be newcomers to the parliamentary arena; and the very novelty of the task, the novelty of the surroundings, may well cause some hesitation, some trepidation, even to the boldest and the best equipped. The hon. member for Prescott and the hon. member for Portage la Prairie have this afternoon demonstrated their ability under trying and difficult circumstances and are entitled to the warm congratulations of this assembly both upon the knowledge of our public affairs which they have displayed and upon their grasp of public issues. We can predict for them, I think, in the course of their public life in this country usefulness at all times as well as opportunities for turning their abilities to account in this great deliberative body of Canada.

I may perhaps be permitted a personal allusion. When I speak of hesitation and trepidation in respect of one whose duty it is to move or to second the address, I speak from personal experience. It is a little over a quarter of a century since I had the honour of rising for the first time and moving an address in reply to the speech from the throne, and I well remember with what misgivings I performed my task on that occasion. My reason for mentioning the incident to-day is the fact that I see before me at this moment, in the person of my hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil), the man who, over a quarter of a century ago, seconded the address on that same occasion, and I am very glad to be able to say that both in his case and in mine each of us has continuously remained a member of this House, sitting ever since for the constituencies which we respectively represented in 1901.

In the speech from the throne there is on this occasion one matter that deserves perhaps more than passing comment. The near approach of the sixtieth anniversary of confederation is an important milestone in our national history. The proximity of that event is itself sufficient to arouse a certain amount of patriotic fervour in the breasts of our citizens. But when that announcement is coupled with the intimation that we may reasonably expect His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, the Heir Apparent to the Throne, to be with us at that time the event will certainly become of still greater importance to Canada. Nothing could make that event nobler, grander, more patriotic, more historic than the visit of His Royal Highness, unless it were a visit in person from Their Gracious Majesties themselves. We are also delighted to know that an invitation has been forwarded to the right hon. Prime Minister of Great Britain, who has accepted that invitation, and will endeavour if possible to be with us to celebrate our sixtieth anniversary. It has, I think, been correctly stated that up to the present time no prime minister of Great Britain, while holding office, has ever visited Canada. So that we look forward with special interest to the First of July next, when we hope to have the pleasure of welcoming to the shores of this country the Prime Minister of Great Britain during his term of office.

I have to thank my hon. friend from Prescott for the kindly and the too flattering references which he made to myself. I know that I can never measure up to the requirements and to the high standard which he has set me. All I can assure him is that I will do my best in the position which for the time being I am proud to occupy. That position I occupy, of course, by reason of the fact that the election of September last proved disastrous to the Conservative party generally but particularly disastrous in the loss of our great leader. Speaking, not as a partisan, not as a follower of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen on the Conservative side of the House, but simply as a citizen of the Dominion of Canada, I say that his retirement from public life has been a distinct loss to the public service of this country as well as to this parliament. The Right Hon. Mr. Meighen has been an outstanding figure in the public life of Canada since the year of 1908. He entered this parliament as a youth, as a young man at all events, and from that day until the time of his retirement few men have attained as high a standard or as great an accomplishment as he. First he entered the government of Sir Robert Borden as Solicitor General, afterwards filling several cabinet portfolios. Twice in that brief period he held the high office of Prime Minister of Canada, and for the last four or five years has been the recognized leader of the opposition. An able parliamentarian, one of the ablest Canada has ever produced; matchless in debate in this chamber; a keen observer, a wonderful thinker, a man of an accurate and precise mind, as accurate and precise as any who have ever been in this House, his loss is a tremendous one to this House and to the public life of this country. I believe that in our hearts we all feel that it would be a good thing for Canada and for this House if his present retirement from public life is not too long continued.

My reference to the last general election brings me to another consideration. I know it is frequently said that after a general election it is the privilege of a defeated opposition to abstract what consolation they may from the fact that while numerically in the minority in the chamber, they were in an actual majority in the country. I am not bringing up that question now with the idea of taking any consolation from the figures, nor do I make any complaint whatever in regard to the result. My only object in mentioning the matter now is to draw to the attention of the House as forcibly as I can the condition which actually exists in Canada to-day in respect to the representation in this chamber and to show, by the quotation of a few figures, that public opinion as it exists among the people of this country is not fairly reflected in this House to-day. I made that statement publicly about three weeks ago. It evidently received some notice from the editor of the Winnipeg Free Press, who sent me a newspaper containing an editorial upon the subject. His cure-all for the present situation, of course, is the adoption in this country of a system of proportional representation. Another suggestion is that the single transferable vote would cure the difficulty which now exists. I am not a believer in the system of proportional representation; in any country where it has been tried I think the system has proved a failure. I have heard discussions upon the question; I have read books and pamphlets dealing with it, and I am not convinced that any satisfactory change would result from the adoption of that system in Canada. It leads to all sorts of pre-election combinations, many of which are not very meritorious; it leads to great uncertainty in results, and likewise to great instability in the elected chambers in countries where proportional representation is in force. For these reasons and others I do not support that proposal, but I do submit that something must be done to remedy the inequality existing in Canada to-day.

What is the situation? From the report of the Chief Electoral Officer I take some figures, and from them I find that in the Dominion of Canada, at the general election of last September, straight Conservative candidates throughout Canada polled 1,476,000 odd votes, while straight Liberal candidates throughout Canada polled 1,361,000 odd votes. The Conservative candidates throughout Canada polled approximately 115,000 more votes than did the Liberal candidates, yet in this House the Conservative candidates have 91 representatives, while the Liberal candidates have 115 or 116. Although there was a popular majority of 115,000 in our favour, there is a difference in the representation in this House of 24 or 25 seats, the minority having the largest representation. My friend who sent me the paper from Winnipeg remarked that the figures in western Canada are even more glaring. Straight Conservative candidates in the three prairie provinces polled 200,000 odd votes, and secured one representative in the person of the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett). All other parties and all other combinations in the three prairie provinces polled 400,000 votes, in round figures, and secured 53 representatives. The disparity there is very glaring, and one must admit that public opinion as it exists in the three prairie provinces is not reflected in this chamber, although good democratic government insists that the will of the people be fairly represented. In the province of Quebec the figures show that 40 per cent of the electors voted for straight Conservative candidates, while our representation in this House amounts to six per cent. I know it can be urged on the other hand that if I take the figures for Nova Scotia and British Columbia, an inequality just as great will appear, but that is no answer to the charge I make. I maintain that this disparity should disappear, and it can be made to disappear if we adopt a reasonable system of representation by population. That is the principle upon which our forefathers acted when they established confederation. We have wandered far from that principle to-day, with the result that there are hon. members sitting on the government side of the House representing constituencies with a population of 80,000, and other hon. members sitting opposite representing rural constituencies containing less than 20,000 people. We have the same thing on this side of the House; a representative from the city of Toronto represents 60,000 odd people, while another from my own county of Wellington represents less than 20,000 people.

Why should there be a disparity as between the voter in urban and in rural districts? It should not exist; there is no reason for it to-day. Perhaps there was a reason in the early days, when means of communication were difficult in rural communities; when they had no telephones, no good roads, few railways, and slow mails, but that is all changed to-day. The average rural community now has means of communication equal to those of our urban centres. Therefore I say it is the duty of parliament to take notice of this situation. I believe it can be remedied and I believe it to be the duty of parliament to consider the situation with a view to finding that remedy.

In the speech from the throne the first mention is of the bounty of Providence, and we all agree that it is our duty to return thanks for the manner in which Providence has treated this country every year in our history. But in the next sentence we are asked to congratulate the government of the country upon the foreign trade of Canada during the past year. We on this side of the House are always willing to rejoice when there are signs of progress and prosperity in the country, and if the figures having to do with foreign trade reflect a real prosperity, we are prepared to tender our congratulations to the government. But one must really confess that governments have not a great deal to do with such matters. Do the figures as set forth by the Minister of Trade and Commerce only a few days ago demonstrate that we have made any real gain in regard to our foreign trade or the material condition of the people of Canada? What do they show? They show that our trade has grown to the enormous proportions of $1,291,000,000 of exports and $991,000,000 of imports. That is a tremendous total, we admit, and I am glad to say it shows that we have a trade balance in our favour of $300,000,000 odd as between our exports and imports.

Mr. ROBB: Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Does my hon. friend who says "hear, hear" realize how that favourable trade balance has been secured? Does he realize that in only one single instance have we any favourable trade balance, namely in respect of our trade with Great Britain? Our whole favourable trade balance is made up of our trade with a single country. Exclude all the figures of exports and imports in regard to Great Britain and you find that in respect of your trade with the other nations of the world you have, on the figures submitted by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, an adverse trade balance of $9,000,000.

If we could feel that those exports amounting to $1,291,000,000 represented the surplus products of this country after the Canadian market was satisfied, we would all join in congratulations as we would then all participate in the material prosperity which would accrue therefrom to this Dominion. But when we find that those exports do not represent the exportable surplus of our country, but that we have imported into this country to supply our own demands, $991,000,000 worth of goods, that does not leave very much in our favour, does it? To England we export our agricultural products. We export what is a recurring crop, something we have year by year in larger and larger quantities.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

But our export business with the United States is upon an entirely different basis. They will not take from us our annual recurring agricultural crops which year by year under the bounty of Providence we are able to reap. All they will take from us is the irreplaceable natural assets of this country. The United States are year by year draining us of our natural wealth. They are taking from us our lumber, unmanufactured and partially manufactured, our pulpwood, our pulp, our paper, our mineral assets, our asbestos, our nickel and the like. But they are not taking the products of our farms or our factories. The people of the United States have arranged their tariff on a basis to suit the people of the United States regardless of the people of any other country in the world. We have not done so. We have arranged our fiscal policy to throw our market largely open to the competition of every other country in the world, and the result to-day is that as regards our foreign trade, while we export more than $1,200,000,000 worth of the goods and products of this country, we have to replace them with the goods of foreign lands to the extent of $991,000,000, most of which goods could and should be produced in this Dominion.

I am going to call the attention of the House to one or two things that appeared on this trade return and I am glad that my hon. and genial friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) is in his place at the moment. I am free to say that there is no more genial, no more entertaining hon. gentleman in this House than the Minister of Agriculture to whom I desire to pay this tribute. I believe he is an agriculturist of very high standing. I believe he is what we know in this country as a scientific agriculturist, and I believe it would be for the benefit of the farmers and the people of Canada generally if my hon. friend would devote himself strictly to scientific agriculture and would leave common, plain matters of business and merchandise to men who seem to know more about it than he does.

I believe the Minister of Agriculture had a good deal to do with the negotiation of those well known trade agreements with Australia and New Zealand. I have heard him pronounce upon those in this chamber time and time again. I have heard him assure the people of Canada that the effect of those agreements would not be to bring the farm products of Australia and New Zealand into competition with the products of the dairy farmers of this country, but the reverse, and he could always demonstrate his position with figures. I ask him to look at the report which his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce has placed in the hands of the public within the last few days, and which consists of a detailed statement of the trade of this country for the last twelve months. If my hon. friend will turn to page 3 of the report, he will find that in the last twelve months we brought into Canada 8,000,000 pounds of butter. Last year when someone made a statement of that kind, my hon. friend said: What is that? That is a mere bagatelle. Look at what we export. How much did we export during the last twelve months? We exported just 9,142,000 pounds of butter. Eight million pounds of Australian butter displaced in the Canadian market 8,000,000 pounds of Canadian butter and forced the dairy farmers of Canada to send their butter across to the markets of Europe.

Which is the best market for our produce? I ask a candid question. Will anyone answer? Is it here in Canada or in Europe? The home market is certainly our best market, our readiest and cheapest market. It saves us transportation, insurance, cost of commission on this side and across the water. Why not let the Canadian dairy farmer have the full benefit of his home market in respect of that commodity? I have no doubt my hon. friend will hear from the dairy associations in respect of this situation. I have had communications, not from the associations, but from individual dairy men. I know they are feeling the effect of that importation very seriously, and to me it appears to be a sort of trade outrage that we should allow Australia and New Zealand to ship 8,000,000 pounds of butter into this country, while our farmers are forced to export their butter to Great Britain in order to equalize the situation. Why not allow the Canadian farmer to supply our home demand with 8,000,000 pounds of Canadian butter and then we would have a surplus of only 1,000,000 pounds odd which we could send abroad. Would not that be good business? Is that not sound economics? Does that not appeal to the Minister of Agriculture as a pretty fair business arrangement? If it does not, let him consult his colleague in the government who sits behind him and I know he will commend the justice and wisdom of what I say to him. As I said before my hon. friend should keep entirely out of business transactions. He should let some other branch of the government attend to the business end. Let him confine himself to scientific agriculture and research, and I have no doubt we shall have grand results in the Dominion of Canada.

About a year ago we know that my hon. friend drifted into another business venture in regard to horses. I am bringing this matter to the attention of the House only to show the business capacity of the hon. gentleman, not to attack his professional standing, not to insinuate that he is not one of the high class farmers of the Dominion of Canada. But he undertook to tell the farmers of western Canada that he would find them a market in Europe for their horses. The horse market is not as good to-day as it used to be. The automobile, I suppose, has affected the horse market. Within the last twelve or fifteen months the Minister of Agriculture thought that he would develop that trade himself, and he employed someone to go out and purchase horses throughout western Canada. He purchased 84 of them and sent them abroad. He had them sold in the European market—those of them that were fit to sell—and the total outlay of the government of Canada on that enterprise was apparently $28,175.39. When the horses were sold they yielded the handsome return of $7,261, making a net loss of about $21,000 to whom? To the minister? No; to the treasury of Canada; to the taxpayers of the Dominion of Canada, and this is one of the outstanding business experiments of the Minister of Agriculture. Now if he has similar knowledge in regard to the butter trade, I do not see any reason why the butter trade should not also end in disaster. The truth is, Mr. Speaker, that his department should not mix up in business matters of any kind, because when it does, the treasury of this Dominion, or the people of Canada, always seem to get the worst of the transaction.

There is another thing in connection with the trade of Canada to which I would like to draw the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I recognize in the Minister of Trade and Commerce one of the outstanding business men of the province of Ontario. He is still a comparatively young man. He has had an active business experience. He is the proprietor of one of those large industries in the province of Ontario of which the people of this province are proud, and he has made a success of his business. He is one of the largest furniture manufacturers in the province of Ontario. I know that he has keen business capacity, and I am going to ask him to look over his own trade returns and see if he cannot find some way of curing the situation that has arisen through the operations of the King administration during the last four or five years in regard to treaty making. I charge that in every instance in which the King government has made a trade agreement or arrangement with another country, Canada has got the worst of the deal. I ask my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce to cast his eye over his own returns, over the first public document that he has issued to the people of Canada. On the front page it says, "Issued under the authority of the Hon. James Malcolm, M.P." I ask him to cast his eye over his own trade returns and see if he does not agree with me in the statement I made, that in every single trade agreement the King government has negotiated, Canada has got the worst of the arrangement.

Take the results of the trade treaty negotiated with France, as set out on page 2 of the trade returns. In the first year of the operation of that treaty, we exported to France $15,817,000 worth of goods. In the last twelve months our exports fell to $14,071,000. We were promised a great export business with France as a result of that treaty. We were to be given most favoured treatment by France, but our trade with France, instead of increasing, has gone back in three years by over one million dollars in spite of all our efforts. We opened our markets to France, but their exports to us have not gone back. During the first year of that treaty they exported to Canada $17,682,000 worth of goods, and that $17,000,000 odd has grown in the last twelve months to $21,787,000. Our exports to France have decreased, while our imports from France have materially increased.

Take the treaty with Italy. During the first year of the operation of the Italian treaty, our exports to Italy amounted to $17,215,000 worth of goods. In the last twelve months they fell back to $15,911,000, a drop of $2,000,000 in our exports to Italy since the treaty came into operation. But Italy has taken advantage of our market and of the favourable terms which we granted, because while in the first year of the treaty she sold us only $1,800,000 worth of goods, last year the figures had grown to $3,124,000. What is the result? Our exports to Italy, under the operation of the treaty, have fallen off, while their exports to us, our imports of Italian products, have largely increased.

Let us take the Australian trade agreement, which is also mentioned on page 2 of the trade returns. In the year before that treaty went into operation, in 1924, we sold to Australia $14,482,000 worth of goods. Last year our sales had increased to $17,848,000, an increase of about 25 per cent. How about our imports? Before the Australian treaty went into effect we imported from Australia $1,183,000 worth of goods. Our imports have risen now to $4,339,000 worth of goods or an increase in our imports of 400 per cent, while the increase in our exports to Australia amounts to about 25 per cent. It is from Australia and New Zealand that the butter comes, and they have increased their trade to Canada materially, while we have had only a very, very negligible increase in our exports to Australia; and so it is with New Zealand. Before the treaty, New Zealand sent to Canada $1,560,000 worth of goods. Last year the figures jumped to $3,856,000, an increase of 260 per cent in the shipment of their agricultural products into this country. Our exports to New Zealand before the treaty were $13,676,000. Last year these had grown to $15,897,000, or an increase of about 20 per cent. The trade is all going one way as between Canada and Australia and New Zealand. They are taking advantage of our open market and filling this country with Australian and New Zealand farm products, while we, who are getting some slight advantage in their market, are increasing to a minor extent only our sales of paper, pulp products and the like.

Now, how can we justify such a situation? My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce has always been considered in the province of Ontario an outstanding supporter of protection. He is now sitting side by side in the cabinet with my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke), an outstanding disciple of the policy of free trade. Together they sit at the cabinet council, cheek by jowl, sworn to bear confidence and respect for each other, sworn to stand and act together, to be responsible each for the actions of the other. There they sit side by side, an out-and-out free trader and an out-and-out protectionist. I said a moment ago that the Minister of Trade and Commerce was one of the most successful manufacturers of the province of Ontario, and I ask him why. His is one of the few industries in the province of Ontario that enjoys to-day, and always has enjoyed, 30 per cent protection. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not for one moment say that his protection is too high. I go so far as to say that if, upon investigation it is shown that he is not sufficiently protected, he ought to be further protected. On looking at the trade returns, it would appear to me that he has at present sufficient protection for his industry, for out of the millions and millions of dollars worth of furniture used and consumed in this country each year, his own trade return shows that in the last twelve months only one and a half million dollars' worth of furniture was imported from all the world into Canada; so I assume from those figures that he has adequate and proper protection for his industry. Now does my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Forke) think that his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce is one of these robber barons we have heard pictured so often in this House? Can my hon. friend from Brandon honestly and consistently sit in that cabinet council and permit a manufacturer in this country to have a duty of 30 per cent on his production? I should like to hear the opinion of my hon. friend from Rosetown (Mr. Evans) on this subject. Between sessions of parliament I hear the word protection, protection, protection. It is ringing in my ears continually, and it always has a strong resemblance to the voice of the hon. member for Rosetown attached to it. What does that hon. member think of the present situation? His former leader is sitting now in the seats of the mighty, side by side with one of the outstanding protectionists of this country. All I can say to my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce is that I agree that his industry is properly protected. I only ask him to be generous enough and kind enough to extend similar protection to other industries I could name in this country.

Mr. MALCOLM: Will the hon. member give an illustration to show where the protection on furniture is higher than the protection on woollen goods?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I did not say the protection on furniture was too high. I do not wish to be misunderstood. I said if it was not high enough I would make it higher. I say give to the woollen man the same 30 per cent.

Mr. MALCOLM: Let me say—

Mr. GUTHRIE: I respectfully ask the minister not to interrupt me. I only ask him to be as generous and as fair to other industries as the government has been to him. Furniture manufacture is one of the special lines which should succeed in Canada. We have here the raw material in very large quantities. Canada is the cheapest country in the world, perhaps, in respect to such raw material, but it has been considered, not by this government alone but by its predecessors, by the Laurier-Fielding government, that 30 per cent was reasonable protection in regard to furniture, and formerly it was so considered in regard to woollens by the government of this country. They maintained a duty upon woollens at 30 per cent net. Will my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce now be just as fair to the textile men, the woollen men, the cotton men and the linen men, as the government has always been to his particular business?

Mr. MALCOLM: There is no change.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No change in the furniture tariff—no, it has been consistently maintained, and one reason it has been maintained in recent years is that the furniture manufacturers have had a loyal supporter on the government side. Now I do not want to be interrupted. I want to express my view. I am sorry that a habit of interrupting has grown up in this chamber which is not at all times creditable to it. Interruption has become almost a parliamentary practice in recent years. I can remember when it was never permitted in this House. I do not wish to be discourteous to my hon. friend in any way, but I do not want to be disconcerted in my remarks.

I wish to refer to another matter in regard to the trade question, and I am glad the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) is in his seat. If there is a hindrance in Canada to-day to the increase of legitimate trade in this country, in addition to the hindrance that attaches to the operation of a mistaken fiscal policy, if there is a burden on Canadian trade to-day which is bearing more heavily than any other, it is the sales tax, and I want the Minister of Finance to understand that we on this side of the House are willing to co-operate with him and to assist him in every way in our power to remove from industry in this country this heavy imposition for which the King government is very largely responsible. As a war measure the Conservative government imposed a sales tax of three per cent in the aggregate—one and a half per cent on the jobber and one and a half on the manufacturer. That was for war purposes. It was a heavy tax, and we thought it was a maximum. When Mr. Fielding became Finance Minister he raised the tax to four and a half per cent, and the next year he raised it to six per cent. Then he found that the tax was so high that it was actually stopping business in the country, and he reduced it to five per cent, and there it stands to-day. The business men throughout Canada say that, next to an insufficient tariff, the greatest imposition and the worst injustice from which they suffer is this five per cent sales tax which has been imposed upon them by the King government. The figures in the public accounts furnished to this House a day or two ago, for the year ending March 31, 1926, disclose that in the last year of the Meighen government, under the operation of the sales tax, an amount of $73,000,000 was collected from the people, while for the year ending March 31 last this tax amounted to $98,000,000.

Mr. ROBB: Because there was more business.

Mr. GUTHRIE: And also because there was a higher tax. I will be fair enough to say that the item I have given also includes the amount received from a two cent stamp tax which was required upon every cheque. The King government increased that stamp tax to a maximum of $1 per cheque, on cheques of large amounts. The sales and stamp taxes combined produced $98,000,000, and this forms a heavy burden which must be borne by industry in the Dominion of Canada. How are we going to get relief from this oppressive taxation? The method I propose is boldly to strike out and do away with the sales tax.

We will assist the Minister of Finance in that work. We will also assist him in another work, namely, in keeping down the expenditure of the public money of this country. I have reason to know that since the month of July, with public affairs carried on by means of government warrants, a tremendous saving has been effected. When the government had a full treasury, and no restriction on their expenditure, they generally managed to spend all the money that came in and then borrowed a little more. After the month of July it was impossible to spend money in that way. Every dollar that was spent had to be procured in the first place by a warrant from His Excellency the Governor General, and it had to be shown that the expenditure was immediate and necessary expenditure. Now what was the result? The result was that when, after the short interregnum, the Meighen government quit office we were able out of the revenues of the country to pay $30,000,000 of maturing loans to the United States without borrowing another dollar. If we can do that in a few months operation, under a system of governor general's warrants, why not adopt the same system when we are not availing ourselves of the governor general's warrants? There is an urgent demand throughout the length and breadth of Canada that our expenditure be cut down.

Mr. ROBB: Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is a demand throughout the length and breadth of Canada that the national debt be materially reduced. I think the public of Canada were rather shocked within the last few days to learn that the net debt on November 30 last was still at the enormous total of $2,344,436,755. When are we going to start paying off the debt? Do you know, Sir, that back in 1921 the national debt was only $2,340,000,000 odd? Now I know it is always asked by government supporters, "What about the next year?" Because the financial year ends on March 31. I will take the next year; the debt was then $2,422,000,000 odd, as there had been added to it during that year $80,000,000 of railway deficits, shown in the public accounts. At present the government do not add railway deficits to the national debt. They go out and borrow the money on the strength of railway securities which Canada endorses and guarantees. In former days we put our hand in the treasury, took out the money, paid the railway deficit and charged it to the public debt.

We have now had five years of financing by the King government, since 1921, and we have been told on the public platform of tremendous reductions made to the national debt by this government; but according to the statement issued by the Finance department last week there has been no reduction whatever, and as between the debt of November 30 last and that of 1921 there has been a positive increase of $4,000,000. I repeat, there is a demand throughout the Dominion that that debt be reduced. It will be reduced in only one way—by the practice in this House from now on of the strictest economy. When I state that we on this side of the House are willing to co-operate in every way to achieve that end, I am making a serious statement whereby this opposition intend to abide. We will give my hon. friend the Minister of Finance every opportunity to economize. Whether he will accept our assistance or not will be seen as the session develops.

Let me take another item in the Speech from the Throne. My hon. friend the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) has disappeared; I am sorry for that, but I must go on nevertheless. He has been selected as the Minister of Immigration in the new government. I think we can say with all sincerity that if there is one department of the government to which we all wish success it is to the Department of Immigration. From one end of Canada to the other, in the speeches of the mover and seconder to-day, in the speeches of our great employers, in the speeches of the minister himself, but one opinion is expressed: Canada must have a large new immigration if she is to succeed. We wish him well in his efforts, and we will help him all we can. It is said that the figures of immigration for last year show some improvement. We hope they do. We trust that on examination we will find that the figures published are justified, that the people who have been entered as Canadian immigrants have remained here. There is no particular branch of the government which is responsible for the difficult situation that now exists in regard to emigration. One of our greatest difficulties is emigration. One cannot properly blame the Department of Immigration for the exodus that is still going on from the Dominion. That exodus, I fear, is still proceeding just as rapidly as it has for the last four or five years. I am told that every American consulate from one end of Canada to the other is so crowded with applicants for permission to cross to the United States that the staffs cannot handle the work. I know the situation in the city where I happen to live, and I know that there is a continual stream of good Canadians crossing over to the United States because they cannot find employment in the Dominion. But what I wish particularly to call to the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Immigration and of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) too, is this, and I think they will agree with me, that even from the western provinces there is a stream of agriculturists going to the United States to-day.

Mr. DUNNING: No, no.

Mr. GUTHRIE: He says no. Well, my information on the subject is from the Regina Leader, published on October 30 last, and it gives these particulars:

"I am unable to give you exact figures, but I should say there are about three thousand applications under the different quotas," was the reply of Mr. E. E. Herbert, Vice Consul for the United States in Regina, Wednesday, when asked for information about Canadians or others desiring to go to the United States.

An hon. MEMBER: Or others.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am coming to that.

Large increases are noted in the number of applications made daily at the American consulate. In fact Mr. Herbert says it is over double the figures of last year.

Somebody is misstating the case, either the Minister of Railways or the Minister of Agriculture is wrong or the Regina Leader is wrong, or Mr. Herbert is wrong.

Some days it will quadruple the figures of previous years, but daily there is an increase, and the staff is kept busy preparing papers and vises. Another interesting phase of the records is that a large percentage of outgoing people have large families. As late as Tuesday a family of father and mother and ten children left Regina for the south for permanent residence.

Mr. FORKE: May I inform my hon. friend that there has been considerable prosperity in the west during the last year or so and most of the people going south are going there for the winter.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is a very ingenious explanation on the part of my hon. friend, but I regret to say it is not a very honest one. He knows just as well as I do that the article published in the government paper, the Regina Leader, was meant to convey the truth, to convey the information that very, very large numbers of people in the west were leaving Canada permanently for the United States. It is not only so in Regina, unfortunately that condition prevails all through the provinces. I am not blaming the Department of Immigration. The hon. minister was out when I said so. His duty is to bring people into Canada, but it is the duty of every department of this government, it is the duty of the whole government to see that this exodus is stopped.

Another question that has created a good deal of speculation and interest on this side of the House is the question of the Duncan report in regard to maritime rights. The report is long and somewhat involved, and I do not pretend that in the time at my disposal I have been able to read it other than casually. However, I have this to say in respect to it, it is a step in advance of anything which we have had from the King government during the last five years. From 1921 down to last spring there was an incessant demand from the people of the maritime provinces for a remedy of alleged grievances. I do not think my right hon. friend the Prime Minister ever realized until last session what the grievances actually were. I know he is reported as having made a speech a year ago in the Maritime provinces in which he declared: What are maritime rights, anyway? Well, if he did not know then, I think he has a very fair idea now respecting maritime rights. I point out likewise, Mr. Speaker, that for four long years the King government sat in this House with a solid delegation of supporters from the province of Nova Scotia, a solid delegation from Prince Edward Island, a substantial delegation from the province of New Brunswick. Day in and day out this matter was brought to the attention of the government and never was any action taken during the course of that whole four years. The government turned a deaf ear to all demands. Not until the people of the maritime provinces decided in the general election of 1925 to elect Conservatives did the King government waken up to the situation. Last spring when a Conservative delegation from these provinces sitting on this side of the House brought the matter to the attention of the government in such a forcible manner that it could not further remain dormant, it decided that some action had to be taken to meet the situation, then and not till then did the Prime Minister and his government decide that immediate inquiry must be made and something definite done. I do not know whether the Duncan report as presented to the House meets with the approval of the people in the Maritime provinces; I do not know what action my right hon. friend and his government contemplate in regard to that report. But I know this, that if any proper action is taken, if any satisfaction is given to the maritime provinces as a result of the Duncan report the credit for anything done will be due to hon. gentlemen sitting on this side of the House who carried on the campaign in this paliament last year.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Oh, oh!

Mr. GUTHRIE: The Minister of Agriculture laughs. I am now discussing business matters and I am sure he does not understand them. I do not think that he has ever given a moment's thought to maritime rights during his whole five years in office, unless he also was rudely awakened by the debates in this chamber last spring. The case for maritime rights as presented in this House by Conservative members last session has seldom if ever been equalled in parliament. I would ask my right hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) this question: Would he be good enough in his remarks to-day, for instance, to give some indication of what his government proposes to do in respect of this matter? In the speech from the throne it is merely stated that the government intends to take the subject into its consideration and that certain legislation in respect thereto will be introduced. This is a matter of the greatest interest to hon. gentlemen from the maritime provinces, and if the Prime Minister would go so far as to indicate just in what way government action is intended I am sure the information would be gratefully received on this side of the House.

And now I desire before concluding my remarks to make some more or less extended observations upon another subject mentioned in the speech from the throne. I refer to the Imperial conference which has recently taken place in the ancient capital of the empire, the report of which conference was laid on the table of the House on Friday last. Apparently there are two opinions in Canada concerning the exact meaning and scope of the report which was issued by the committee of prime ministers which met and agreed upon it. There is one section of our people who are inclined to think that there is nothing really new or of great moment in any of the clauses or in any of the suggestions contained in the report; there is another view that the whole report is possibly the most momentous state document that has ever been tabled in the parliament of Canada. I believe that the people of Canada and probably the press at this moment lack the necessary information to enable them to reach a satisfactory conclusion in regard to this interesting document. Personally I view it as a matter of very great consequence, but in any opinion which I am disposed to offer to-day, I shall have to make reservations. I cannot offer at the present time anything in the nature of an unalterable opinion, for the reason that there are some aspects of the report which I do not yet profess to understand.

This Imperial conference evidently has been something in the nature of a constitutional conference. I had the opportunity last July or August of glancing over the agenda which indicated in a general way the subjects which were to be discussed, and from my recollection of what I saw in the agenda I may say that I had not the faintest idea that anything in the nature of a constitutional conference was contemplated. I think I am within the fact in saying that when my right hon. friend and his colleague, the Minister of Justice, left Canada to attend the conference, neither of them had the remotest idea that the chief subject for discussion at the conference would be the constitutional status of Great Britain and of the overseas dominions by a committee of prime ministers of the empire. Our ministers had no notice of it; they had no time for preparation; they had no time for consultation with the people of this country; they had no time to obtain any mandate from the people. They went to London to discuss the questions which appeared on the agenda and I have no doubt that the actual deliberations of the conference were perhaps as great a surprise to them as to the rest of the people of Canada.

There is a strong public opinion in Canada that when we venture to make constitutional changes, or even to propose them, the ground should be fairly well prepared in advance and some hard thinking should previously take place. There is the feeling that careful preparation is indispensable before we venture upon the dangerous subject of constitutional changes. Indeed, Canadian statesmen and others have gone so far as to suggest that if any constitutional conference were ever called it should follow the lines of the first constitutional conference held in Canada by the fathers of confederation, which conference was arranged upon an entirely different basis from the one that took place in London recently. In the conference preceding confederation all the great political parties of Canada were represented. Look at that famous picture The Fathers of Confederation if you want assurance on this point. In that picture we see the outstanding figure of the late Sir John A. Macdonald together with one who probably was the next most important figure, the Honourable George Brown; while side by side we see Sir Charles Tupper and Sir Oliver Mowat. All sections of the four provinces at that time were represented, likewise all political parties. Long meetings were held, prolonged discussions took place; until finally our forefathers agreed upon what has proved a most satisfactory arrangement for Canada. Now there is in this country a strong body of public opinion which holds the view that constitutional conferences should be managed upon just such a basis and not otherwise. There should be full and careful preparation; there should be due notice; there should be ample consultation, with all sections of the people of Canada before any effort is made to institute radical constitutional changes. I do not believe that the people even of Great Britain contemplated any serious constitutional changes. In my opinion both statesmen and press of Great Britain agreed that constitutional government in the overseas dominions had for many years been a matter of evolutionary growth and that all that was necessary was to prepare a clear statement of the situation as it had actually existed for over a generation, a declaration of the actual status quo as it was to-day and as it had been for years. The statesmen and the press of Great Britain, in my opinion, felt assured that this would be fully satisfactory to all parties concerned.

There is no question that apart from our written constitution, which we know in this House as the British North America Act, there have been great constitutional changes in Canada. Our written constitution as contained in the British North America Act has been added to in very many instances by conventions, by customs and by practices which have grown to be a part of our constitution and which are just as strong as the letter of the statute. This constitutional growth must be regarded in considering the Canadian constitution as it exists to-day. Anyone who so desires may examine the reports of the various constitutional conferences which have been held in the past and trace through them the gradual growth and development of the Canadian constitution as we have it to-day, both in relation to the government of this country and also in regard to our position in the British Empire in general.

The first of these conferences was held in London in 1888, but it was not a conference as we understand the term to-day. It was a meeting summoned by the Colonial Office of Great Britain to discuss certain matters pertaining to the empire, chiefly matters of defence. No minister of this government attended that conference, and no material result came from it. The next conference was called by the government of this country. It was held at Ottawa; it was attended by representatives of Australia, as then constituted; of New Zealand, and of Cape Colony—there was no confederation of South Africa at that time—and of the Dominion of Canada, while the British government sent out Lord Jersey to watch the proceedings on behalf of Great Britain and the Colonial Office. That conference met in Ottawa in 1894 for the purpose of conferring—because that is the real meaning of the word conference,—and I suppose for the purpose of consulting and advising also. It had no other rights, no other duties and no other authority. The conference did pass a number of resolutions, chiefly in regard to trade matters, and on the whole performed a very useful work, but it did not attempt to elaborate any problems of government either in Canada or outside of Canada.

The next conference was called in 1897, the jubilee year of Her Majesty the late Queen Victoria. It was attended by Sir Wilfrid Laurier on behalf of Canada, and was the first real conference held in Great Britain. It is true that it was not such a conference as we have to-day; it was not attended by the government of Great Britain, but by the Colonial Secretary and by the prime ministers of the self-governing dominions. In the report of that conference you will see that even so early as 1897 the self-governing rights of overseas dominions were fully recognized. Sir Wilfrid Laurier was most particular to emphasize this point in his statement to the conference, and all present accepted this position, as a matter upon which there could be no possible objection.

The next conference was held in 1902, the year of the coronation of His Majesty the late King Edward VII. Similarly, the proceedings of that conference disclosed that Sir Wilfrid Laurier was again most active in impressing this upon the conference, that it had no duty and no right to deal with constitutional matters, that it could only confer and consult. I do not know that any very definite action was taken upon this occasion. The conference of 1907 was perhaps a more important event. Prior to the conference of 1907 there had been circulated among the overseas dominions a definite proposal looking to the establishment of an imperial council sitting at the capital of the empire, on which council there were to be representatives of all the overseas dominions. When the conference met in 1907, Sir Wilfrid Laurier again represented Canada, and he took objection at once to the term "Colonial Council", or "Imperial Council". He said the very word "council" implied more than he was at liberty to do. He did not object to a conference; he was quite willing to confer, to advise or to consult, but he would have nothing to do with a council or a cabinet, and his views were unanimously endorsed. He agreed, however, that a body might be formed to be known as an imperial conference, and a motion was carried in that year that in the future the conference should be called an Imperial conference instead of a Colonial conference and should be a conference not between the self-governing dominions and the Colonial Office but between the governments of the self-governing dominions and the British government, government with government, and the conference of 1911 was held in London under these conditions.

The conference of 1911 was an Imperial conference, the first conference of government with government, and at that conference certain very important matters were discussed, and some were settled. In the report of the conference of 1911 I think the most outstanding feature is the persistence and insistence with which all the representatives of the overseas dominions laid their case before the conference, claiming the fullest rights of self-government; full and absolute autonomy; the right to negotiate and make treaties; the right to do their own business without regard to anyone else, and that position was fully accepted by the conference. At that time, however, a further question arose which is well worth notice; matters of foreign policy were formally discussed in 1911 for the first time. Premier Hughes of Australia brought forward the question of the Declaration of London which, as you know, was the result of a treaty passed by the Peace Tribunal at the Hague, but which did not come into force until ratified by the various governments. Great Britain ratified the Declaration of London without consulting the overseas dominions, to the great annoyance of Australia and Premier Hughes brought that matter to the attention of the conference by way of a direct motion. Sir Edward Grey at that time represented Great Britain as Foreign Secretary, and the discussion which took place between Sir Edward Grey, Premier Hughes and others on that occasion is most illuminating. I do not know that I have time to read it all, but I am going to read just one or two remarks made by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, representing Canada. On that occasion he stated that for many years Canada had enjoyed full powers in regard to treaty making, but he pointed out that there were two kinds of treaties, commercial treaty and treaty of amity, or treaties which some day might involve questions of war or of peace. He argued that Canada had at all times maintained her right to negotiate and make her own treaties. It was true that the British ambassador at Washington and the British ambassador at Paris had been formal parties to the negotiations, but they had allowed Canada to conduct the actual negotiations, and the ambassador had only been called in when the question of ratification arose. But in regard to other treaties, those having regard to foreign policy, the following words will be found at page 116 of the reports of Imperial Conferences:

> Coming now to the other class of treaties, which I characterized as treaties of amity, it would seem to me that it would be fettering, in many instances, the home government—the imperial authorities—very seriously, if any of the outside dominions were to be consulted as to what they should do on a particular question. In many cases the nature of the treaty would be such that it would only interest one of the dominions. If it interested them all, the Imperial authorities would find themselves seriously embarrassed if they were to receive the advice of Australia in one way, the advice of New Zealand in another way, and the advice of Canada, perhaps, in a third way.

Then on page 117:

> This is a thing which, in my humble judgment, ought to be left altogether to the responsibility of the government of the United Kingdom, for this reason: This is a treaty which lays down certain rules of war as to in what manner war is to be carried on by the great powers of Europe. In my humble judgment if you undertake to be consulted and to lay down a wish that your advice should be pursued as to the manner in which the war is to be carried on, it implies, of necessity, that you should take part in that war. How are you to give advice and to insist upon the manner in which war is to be carried on, unless you are prepared to take the responsibility of going into the war?
> Mr. Fisher: Do not we do that in a manner by coming here?

That is Mr. Fisher of Australia.

> Sir Wilfrid Laurier: No, we come here to discuss certain questions; but there are questions which seem to me to be eminently in the domain of the United Kingdom. We may give advice if our advice is sought; but if your advice is sought, or if you tender it, I do not think the United Kingdom can undertake to carry out this advice unless you are prepared to back that advice with all your strength, and take part in the war and insist upon having the rules carried out according to the manner in which you think the war should be carried out. We have taken the position in Canada that we do not think we are bound to take part in every war, and that our fleet may not be called upon in all cases, and, therefore, for my part, I think it is better under such circumstances to leave the negotiations of these regulations as to the way in which the war is to be carried on to the chief partner of the family, the one who has to bear the burden in part on some occasions, and the whole burden on perhaps other occasions.

Such was the attitude taken by Canada's representative, and this attitude prevailed. And Sir Edward Grey, representing the Foreign Office, conceded in definite terms that, whenever possible, he in future would consult all the dominions in respect to matters of foreign policy and in respect to treaties before they were actually signed.

I pass on to another phase of the question. I need not read what was said; it is all in the report. As I said, nothing was more emphasized at the conference of 1911 than our absolute right of self-government. No one had the right to interfere with us. Our rights were clear, distinct and well understood. No further conference was held until the year 1917. A conference should have been held in 1915 but it was omitted owing to the outbreak of war. In 1917, however, there was held in London a conference known as a war conference, at which action was taken in a formal way on motion of Sir Robert Borden who represented Canada. This was the first suggestion of a constitutional conference, and I want to place it before the House. The motion moved by Sir Robert Borden before the conference of 1917 was in these words:

> The Imperial War Conference are of opinion that the readjustment of the constitutional relations of the component parts of the empire is too important and intricate a subject to be dealt with during the war, and that it should form the subject of a special imperial conference to be summoned as soon as possible after the cessation of hostilities.
> They deem it their duty, however, to place on record their view that any such readjustment, while thoroughly preserving all existing powers of self-government and complete control of domestic affairs, should be based upon a full recognition of the dominions as autonomous nations of an imperial commonwealth and of India as an important portion of the same, should recognize the right of the dominions and India to an adequate voice in foreign policy and in foreign relations, and should provide effective arrangements for continuous consultation in all important matters of common imperial concern.

And Sir Robert Borden, in discussing his motion, said that such a conference should be held only after consultation with the people and when representatives of all political parties were present. This resolution referred to a constitutional conference to be held in the future. In 1918 another war conference was held which resulted in the treaty of Peace. Our representatives attended at Paris; they became actual signatories to the treaty of Peace and also to the covenant of the League of Nations. They signed for the Dominion of Canada. Every other overseas dominion had its representatives there and those representatives signed on behalf of their own overseas dominion.

The next conference was that of 1921. There had been a good deal of change in the position of the overseas dominions since the 1917 conference; not only had we been recognized as free and equal nations, but we had actually signed the treaty of Peace, I suppose the most memorable treaty of modern or of ancient times. There we stood in Paris shoulder to shoulder with the other nations of the world and recognized as being on an equality with Great Britain and the other nations. Therefore when the conference met in London in 1921 a question immediately arose as to whether it was now necessary to call a constitutional conference pursuant to the resolution of 1917. The constitutional situation had greatly changed; our position had become definite and accepted. What was the need of a conference? In the report of the 1921 conference the following resolution appears at page 9:

> Continuous consultation, to which the Prime Ministers attach no less importance than the Imperial War Conference of 1917, can only be secured by a substantial improvement in the communications between the component parts of the empire. Having regard to the constitutional developments since 1917, no advantage is to be gained by holding a constitutional conference.

Such was the definite opinion of those who attended the conference of 1921. The position of each of the overseas dominions at that time was definite and ascertained. What more could be done by a constitutional conference? Let me read just one or two short extracts on the speech of Mr. Lloyd George, who was Prime Minister of Great Britain at the time. Mr. Lloyd George as reported on page 14 said:

> In recognition of their services and achievements in the war the British dominions have now been accepted fully into the comity of nations by the whole world. They are signatories to the treaty of Versailles and of all the other treaties of peace; they are members of the assembly of the League of Nations, and their representatives have already attended meetings of the league; in other words they have achieved full national status, and they now stand beside the United Kingdom as equal partners in the dignities and the responsibilities of the British commonwealth. If there are any means by which that status can be rendered even clearer to their own communities and to the world at large we shall be glad to have them put forward at this conference.

The attitude of Premier Hughes of Australia at that time is rather interesting. Let me quote briefly from his remarks as reported at page 22. Premier Hughes of Australia, expressing the matter in his own blunt way, said:

I have nothing further to say on those matters to which you referred yesterday, but reference to one other point may be permitted. It is well that we should know each others' views. We ought not to discuss things in the dark. It has been suggested that a constitutional conference should be held next year. It may be that I am very dense, but I am totally at a loss to understand what it is that this constitutional conference proposes to do. Is it that the dominions are seeking new powers, or are desirous of using powers they already have, or is the conference to draw up a declaration of rights, to set down in black and white the relations between Great Britain and the dominions? What is this conference to do? What is the reason for calling it together? I know, of course, the resolution of the 1917 conference. But much water has run under the bridge since then. Surely this conference is not intended to limit the rights we now have. Yet what new right, what extension of power can it give us? What is there that we cannot do now?

There is a statement of the situation as it existed in 1921. It goes on:

What limitation is now imposed upon them? What can they not do, even to encompass their own destruction by sundering the bonds that bind them to the empire? In effect, we have all the rights of self-government enjoyed by independent nations. That being the position, what is the constitutional conference going to do?

Such was the position, Mr. Speaker, in 1921. This position has not been changed since and was not changed in any respect at the time my right hon. friend the Prime Minister went to London in October last.

Now in the summary report which has been issued of the recent conference, and which I propose to discuss for a few minutes, the first thing I note with great interest is this—and if I am wrong I want to be corrected; I want my right hon. friend the Prime Minister to set me right in his remarks upon this occasion, for I have no desire to be wrong myself in this important matter, nor have I any desire to mislead anybody else. I find there are certain definite statements in this report so plain and so exact that I think we can all understand them. Is there anything behind them which we do not understand? The report starts out with an introduction stating:

We were appointed at the meeting of the Imperial Conference on the 25th of October, 1926, to investigate all the questions on the agenda affecting inter-imperial relations. We found on examination that they involved consideration of fundamental principles affecting the relations of the various parts of the British Empire inter se, as well as the relations of each part to foreign countries.

I agree that they started out upon a very broad and general basis. They found that fundamental constitutional principles were involved. Who gave my right hon. friend the Prime Minister instructions from this country to discuss fundamental principles in our constitution? I do not ask that in any spirit of disrespect. He went to the conference, as was his clear duty, but I submit that he was not summoned there for the purpose of discussing fundamental constitutional principles, and he had no opportunity for preparation in that respect.

Now this is the pronouncement which the committee of Prime Ministers of the empire make, and they have placed it on page 9 of the report, in italics, to call attention to it, and to make it clear and definite. Speaking of the overseas dominions and of the mother country, they say:

They are autonomous communities within the British Empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the crown, and freely associated as members of the British commonwealth of nations.

This is clear and exact language. They are equal in status; they are in no way subordinate one to the other. The meaning of that language if I understand the English language is this: That Canada's status under this declaration is one of equality with Great Britain; the status as between Canada and the other overseas dominions is one of equality. There is absolutely no subordination on our part or upon their part; we are equal in every way so far as concerns all our domestic and all our external affairs. This is a broad and definite statement.

Lower down on page 9, as if to emphasize the position, there is another clear declaration upon the same subject:

Every self-governing member of the empire is now the master of its destiny. In fact, if not always in form, it is subject to no compulsion whatever.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the attention of all sections of Canada should be drawn to this declaration. It implies no limitations, no conditions, no reservations. We are absolute masters in this Dominion of Canada in all our domestic and in all our external affairs. I ask my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) whether they fully considered the extent to which this declaration might ultimately lead us. This confederation was founded upon compromise. We have now absolute control in every domestic and external matter. Can we change the basis of confederation? Can we change the compromise upon which this confederation was founded? This country is largely made up, Mr. Speaker, of two distinct races; the two great races as recognized are the English-speaking Canadians and the French-speaking Canadians. Will a day ever come in this parliament when a government will say: We propose to abrogate some of the special features in our constitution which have been maintained ever since confederation? I submit that within the scope of the positive declarations a Canadian government might have absolute power to do so. I ask my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, if he has not already done so, to go to French Canada at the earliest opportunity and consult the leading members of the French bar in regard to the opinion which I now offer. My opinion may be wrong. My hope is that it may be wrong. My fear is that it may be right. I am going to put a case, and in order to make it impressive and expressive, let me put a very extreme case. Some time in the future some government in this country may arise and propose to abolish bilingualism in this parliament—a matter of purely domestic concern, with no external application whatever. We are the masters of our own destiny, according to document, and no power can interfere with us; we are subject to no compulsion. The British government cannot interfere. If they tried to do so we would say: No interference; the declaration affirms that we are not subordinate to you, so hands off Canada. Such might be our reply to Great Britain. Mr. Speaker, I have many times in this chamber admired the stand which you have taken upon Canadian constitutional questions. I have heard you argue with rare force and ability in favour of the rights of minorities. I have heard you demonstrate in this chamber that the great bulwark upon which you and your compatriots rest their rights and their security was to be found, if not in this parliament, in the British parliament and at the foot of the throne. Are these rights now to be jeopardized? Do you, Mr. Speaker, realize the language we have before us here? Do you realize that if a government should arise in Canada at some time in the future and in its madness or in its rashness, should propose to abolish our provincial legislatures, and adopt a system of legislative union—do you realize that under the language of this declaration they might possibly do so? It would be a matter pertaining purely to the domestic affairs of the Dominion of Canada. I submit that under the definite terms of this declaration a government, if so minded, might abolish every provincial legislature in the Dominion of Canada, and nobody could rebuke it; nobody could interfere with it; no compulsion could be employed to stop it.

I have heard it suggested, that the British government would veto such an act. Look at another clause in the report. The power of disallowance has now been done away with. The right to disallow a bill of the Canadian parliament has been in the statutes since confederation. It has only been exercised once, and that over half a century ago, but the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice have brought back a report containing a clause providing that the right of disallowance no longer exists.

Now what is the situation? I submit that it is the most serious situation that has ever been laid before the parliament of Canada since confederation; it may have the effect of sweeping away those safeguards which the fathers of confederation placed in our constitutional act in 1867. I would not allow any part of the Dominion of Canada or any section of this Dominion to be exposed to attacks in these respects in the future. I would not allow the present protection to be taken away from minorities, as it might be taken away if this report were adopted in its present form by this House. Why was there not some limitation or reservation in regard to Canada?

I have turned this matter over in my mind many times since Saturday night, when I first read the report. I have thought it out as best I could. I thought it might be argued that if Canada should hereafter attempt to pass such an act as I have described by way of illustration, the British government might in some way interfere. Well, it might be possible to do serious mischief without an act. If we did it by resolution or by motion in this House no one could interfere and if we proceeded by act of parliament I doubt if there could be any interference. But suppose Great Britain should interfere, suppose Great Britain maintain it can interfere, what would Premier Hertzog say of such interference in South Africa? He would say, "If you can interfere in Canada, you can interfere in South Africa, and that is not the meaning of the declaration made in London." If Great Britain can interfere in Canada it can interfere in Ireland, and what would the Irish Free State say? The truth is that the declaration of rights is so broad that it would permit us to do practically anything. The language of this declaration really brings into force the resolution moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) some time ago in this chamber, to provide that we in Canada should be allowed to enact anything we saw fit in regard to our constitution. I am not prepared to take that stand. I do not believe the people of Canada are prepared to take that position, and I submit it as broadly, as forcibly and as clearly as I can to the Prime Minister, that if we could only see the discussion that took place at the conference we would be in a much better position to form a safe conclusion. We have not the discussion before us yet. I presume we will have it in due time.

What attitude did the Prime Minister take in this matter? What attitude did the Minister of Justice take? He is a representative of one of the provinces which in my opinion might be specially affected if this report were adopted.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And a strong supporter of this report.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would ask the Minister of Justice whether he has taken expert legal opinion in regard to the matter I am bringing to his attention.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There were many experts there.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Has he ever considered it from the standpoint of his own province or in regard to the rights of minorities in Canada?

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend need not worry about my province.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is he willing to take the risk of the enactment into law of the proposal in the report?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Surely.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Perhaps in a few days the minister may hear from Quebec and the report may yet have to be amended. I would not be prepared to open the door as widely as it is proposed to open it in this report. I would put in limitations and restrictions to safeguard effectually the special interests and privileges of the people of this country who may be adversely affected hereafter if this report be approved in the present form.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

I desire to refer to another phase of the matter. I admit there are some things I do not fully understand at the present time. With reference to this equality of status which is now proclaimed—the proclamation that one shall not be subordinate to the other—how can you reconcile that with the actual position of affairs in the British Empire? Great Britain is the predominant partner. She is the partner that has the power behind her. She must always be the predominant partner. Let me put another pointed instance, an extreme case. We are not of equal status and we cannot be, I submit, Mr. Speaker, under this arrangement. Let Canada tonight declare war against some foreign country; do you think such a declaration by Canada would be treated as more than a nullity? It would be looked on as an international joke. I go further. Let Canada send an armed force to invade a foreign country, would our act be treated as an act of war? I submit not. It would be treated as a criminal act, a filabustering expedition, for which our people would be punished and we would have to pay damages. I go further still: Let our naval force in a moment of anger seize or destroy the commerce of another nation upon the high seas; would that be an act of war or be treated as such? It would be treated as an act of piracy. But let Great Britain do the same thing, and how would it be treated? Circumstances might arise in some remote corner of the world where it might become necessary for the government of Great Britain to act upon the moment, as has happened before. The rights of British subjects or their property might be in jeopardy, and she might have to act instantly. Her declaration of war would involve this country as a belligerent, the moment Great Britain made the declaration. We might repudiate the war; we might say, "We will not go into it and will in no way participate," but the moment the declaration was made our shores would be subject to attack, and our commerce would be liable to be seized or sunk, and our citizens treated as alien enemies through no act of our own. Under such circumstances can it be said we are of equal status? To state such a thing makes it appear almost ridiculous. We are not of equal status. Sir Wilfrid Laurier always recognized that. He maintained that we could not be of equal status unless we agreed to share some of the burdens and assume some of the responsibility.

What was done, may I ask, in regard to burdens and responsibilities at the conference? This question has also occupied our attention previously. What was the attitude of the Prime Minister in regard to the burdens and responsibilities? I suppose in due time we will know what he said in respect to that matter, but I would like if to-night or at some convenient time he would give us a definite statement in this respect. I know the conference did not deal with the question of empire defence. They simply remitted it and left it where it was before. They took a lot of time discussing moving picture films and double taxation,—very important matters in themselves—but when it came to the great and important question of empire defence, they merely remit the matter back to where it was in the conference of 1923, and the conference of 1923 merely provided for an exchange of offices as between the Dominions and Great Britain and the establishment of an imperial college for the military training of officers in London. What about the burdens? What about the responsibilities? Did our ministers offer to undertake any? Are we willing to undertake any? Was our case in this respect properly put before the imperial authorities? These are matters distinctly within our control.

Another matter I would like information upon, Mr. Speaker, is the question of the change in status of His Excellency the Governor General. Under the British North America Act, section 10, our Governor General represents the queen. By the Interpretation act those words to-day mean the king. Now under the provisions of this report His Excellency the Governor General shall in future represent the crown. This report I understand was drawn by very expert draftsmen. No doubt there is a good reason for the selection of every word that appears in it. I should like my right hon. friend to tell me whether there is anything significant in the wording here. Constitutional writers attach different meanings to the words "king" and "crown". Looking at the publication known as The Round Table for this month I see a writer in that magazine says the crown means in this case the Canadian Prime Minister. Would the Governor General as representing the crown be subject to the will of the Canadian Prime Minister? I do not refer particularly to the present time but to the future, for all time—whom does he represent? What is the meaning of the word "crown"? Why was it used instead of the word "king"? If there was no reason for the change, if my hon. friend will assure the House that the words are synonomous, I have no further questions to ask in regard to that point.

In regard to the appointment of the Governor General, I have always understood—perhaps I am wrong—that in no case was the Governor General appointed to the Dominion of Canada without consultation with the government of Canada, and that in all cases the government of Canada expressed its acquiescence before the appointment was made. I have also heard that in some instances names have been submitted by the government of Canada and have been acceded to by the government of Great Britain. Is there any change contemplated in the future? In the future will the Governor General be nominated upon the recommendation of the Canadian Prime Minister, or will he not? I should like to know what is in contemplation in that regard, as I cannot find it in the report. Would the Canadian Prime Minister be entitled to nominate a Canadian to the position of governor general? The report affirms that we have a right to do everything in respect to our own domestic and external affairs. Does it go so far as to give us the right to nominate a Canadian as governor general? There is nothing in the report to give us any definite information on the subject one way or the other.

There are a great many other matters upon which I should like some light before I come to any definite conclusion in regard to them. But this I am going to say, that the course pursued by my right hon. friend during the months of July, August, and September last gave the people of Great Britain an entirely false idea of the actual situation in this Dominion. My right hon. friend in July, August, and September last paraded this country from platform to platform raising grave constitutional questions, indulging in a great deal of vain constitutional babbling, making covert threats that if certain things were not done certain other things might happen.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend tell us what one of those threats was?

Mr. GUTHRIE: That we were being ruled by Downing street.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I never made such a statement. I challenge my hon. friend to find a statement of that kind anywhere. I made the very opposite statement.

An hon. MEMBER: Take it back.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If my right hon. friend says he did not—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say positively I did not, and I challenge my hon. friend to produce any such statement from any paper.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I heard him make in this House during the closing days of last session statements, the only result of which would be to lead people in Great Britain to suppose there was something rankling in the minds of the people of the Dominion, that we were suffering from some grave imagined injustice. I have heard speakers on the Liberal platform and I have read speeches made by Liberals during the recent election, complaining of the grave injustice which was being done to Canada, alleging that the heel of the British government was still on the neck of the people of Canada, and that we had been relegated to the position of a crown colony. These statements all had their effect in Great Britain, they had their effect upon public men there, they had their effect upon the leading newspapers of Great Britain, and the people of Great Britain imagined last September that there was something seriously wrong in the situation in this country. After the election the applause given to my right hon. friend in the republican press of the United States added fuel to the flame and caused more uneasiness and uncertainty in Great Britain.

We were all gratified that when the Prime Minister left Canada he made a very reassuring statement at the old city of Quebec. I am taking that statement from the Canadian Press correspondent's report, and I trust it is correct. This language does my right hon. friend entire credit:

Again referring to the conference, he said: "We are in the happy position of having no grievance of any kind."—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE:

"The relations between this Dominion and the mother country are all that could be wished for. Mr. Lapointe and I feel that our one aim and purpose should be to represent Canada as a full, self-governing nation—one of that commonwealth we speak of as the British Empire, all united under one king, one flag and one ideal."

Very excellent sentiments to take from Canada to Great Britain. Did you notice Mr. Speaker, that when the right hon. gentleman arrived in Great Britain he was immediately bombarded by reporters with the question, "What about annexation?"

Mr. LAPOINTE: Tory propaganda.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My hon. friend has had his interruption and he has his laugh. I will tell you why the question was directed to the right hon. gentleman: Because the American press had come out as his champions and loudly acclaimed his success in the election. Why was it that immediately on his arrival he was challenged as to his views on revolutionary action? Who started that?

Mr. DUNNING: The Tories.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Tory slander.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My right hon. friend started it himself, and he is himself responsible for the false impression that existed in Great Britain. On the one hand, they had a false impression in regard to Canada; on the other hand, they had serious misgivings as to the situation in South Africa, but it turned out that these misgivings were largely unfounded. The Prime Minister of South Africa took very high, very radical ground in regard to the position of South Africa. He had moved in the legislature of his country that the Dominion of South Africa should have the right to declare her neutrality, and that her neutrality should be recognized internationally. That, in brief, is the ground which he took. Do you wonder that the British press was considerably alarmed, do you wonder that the public men of England were considerably alarmed by the Prime Minister of Canada raising what actually was a smoke screen to prevent criticism of himself and his government in regard to the customs scandal? But they knew nothing of that in Great Britain; they thought they had a serious question in Canada to deal with and another serious question in South Africa, and they resolved to accede to every request that should be made. Certain it is that they did all in their power to arrange any difficulties. However I am glad to say that on his arrival in Great Britain in his first interview with press correspondents we find him presenting a message of goodwill. We find also that he had no complaints to offer, that he did not mean revolution, that he was content with evolution, as is stated in the press reports.

We are glad that it worked out in this way, and we are glad, for the sake of South Africa, that a common working basis was found by the conference. But I say again, Mr. Speaker, in closing, that never in the history of this parliament from confederation down to the present moment has so serious a problem been laid before us. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is inclined to laugh at my pronouncement on the subject to-day. I predict that he will not vote this report through the House of Commons in its present form and without amendment. I venture to say he dare not do so. It will have to be changed, it will have to be limited; otherwise at some future day it may spell disaster to this country. I say to my right hon. friend and to his government that they will have to forgive my imperfections as leader of the great party which sits on this side of the House. We desire to approach this question in a non-partisan spirit, if ever a question was so approached in this chamber; we want to arrange this matter solely in the interests of the Dominion of Canada. I state this notwithstanding the smiles and the jibes of some members who sit on the other side of this House. If we cannot secure serious consideration of this great and important question it will be a shame and a disgrace. We ask for it, and we are willing to co-operate in the programme of the session to the fullest of our ability. We demand our rights, of course, we expect to exercise our full rights, but if ever there was a question in which co-operation should be the basis of parliamentary debate in this House, that question is the report of the conference which has just been laid before the House.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Before I reply to the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Guthrie), may I, on my own behalf as well as on behalf of those sitting with me on this side of the House, extend to him our hearty congratulations upon his having been chosen for the high position which he now holds and which by natural endowments and long parliamentary experience he is so admirably qualified to fill. When I read in the press despatches that my hon. friend had been selected as leader of the opposition and of the party to which he now belongs, I confess recalling his old and long associations with the Liberal party of Canada, I felt that the compliment was perhaps greater to the party to which I belong than to hon. gentlemen opposite and the party to which they belong. My hon. friend will, I am sure, be the first to concede that what he inherits in the way of great natural endowments comes to him of Liberal parentage of which he may well be proud, and I have no doubt he will also remember with considerable pride his long association with the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, of whom he was a trusted follower almost to the very end of his career. May I say that I think my hon. friend, in accepting the position as a temporary one, owing to the exigencies of his party and under circumstances which necessarily must be more or less embarrassing, did so from very public spirited motives, and in view of that fact he is as much entitled to the thanks of the House as he is to the thanks of his own party.

My hon. friend this afternoon in the course of his remarks, on being interrupted, drew attention to the fact that in this House in the last session or two discussion had not always been carried on with as great a regard for decorum as might have been wished. Let me say at once that while I cannot hope that we shall be in agreement over matters of party controversy I shall be indeed happy to join with him, if he will be prepared to join with me, in doing all that can be done to preserve a right tone in debate in this House and, with your aid, Mr. Speaker, to keep it on as high a level as possible. I do believe that in the last few years there has been much more acrimony in debate, very much more in the way of personal bitterness and feeling, than has been necessary. Just to what cause that may have been due it is not for me to say at the moment. In one sense of the word, I think it is true to say that ever since September, 1925, we have been engaged more or less in a continuous campaign. We had the campaign in the country in the fall of 1925 and it was carried from the constituencies into parliament; and during the last session this House partook, for the most part, much more of the nature of a political battleground than of a deliberative assembly. We carried the discusssion from parliament back again to the constituencies and fortunately we have received a decisive verdict, a verdict which I believe is hailed throughout the country with approval inasmuch as, apart from other reasons, it helps to ensure greater certainty and stability in the administration of public affairs. I submit to my hon. friend that this is a moment when we might well join together to do our utmost to maintain the high traditions of this parliament in every possible respect. Indeed, if parliament is to hold in the country that respect which it ought to command, the members of all political parties and groups must co-operate towards this end.

Speaking of the choice of leaders, I observe that my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Tolmie), who happens to be in his seat at the moment, has within the last couple of months been chosen leader of the Conservative party in the province of British Columbia. It is somewhat interesting to remark that the choice in this case also is a bit of a compliment to the Liberal party, for I recall that the hon. member, too, is an erstwhile Liberal. He shakes his head. Well, he may wish to forget the fact; he has been in bad company for some time. However, for a long while he was looked upon as a Liberal. May I, in congratulating him as well as my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, say to both of them in all sincerity that I hope they may be continued in the high office of opposition leaders with ever increasing satisfaction to themselves and others as long as they live.

Having extended congratulations to my hon. friends opposite, I join with the leader of the opposition in extending very hearty congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address. I am sure that we all felt very proud of the splendid manner in which the young hon. member for Prescott (Mr. Auger) spoke in the course of the debate this afternoon, and I think those of us who reside in Ottawa feel a particular pride in the knowledge that he is a graduate of the university of Ottawa. He is the youngest member of this parliament and, I believe, one of the youngest members who ever entered the House of Commons. I am sure when we realize that his college course was largely obtained unaided, through his own industry and effort, and that during it he carried off prizes and scholarships, we can say that he is an example and an inspiration to the young men of our Dominion. We may well hope that many more of his age will take a serious interest in the public affairs of their country and find places in increasing numbers in this House.

The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. McPherson), who seconded the address, came to us with a reputation as an able debater, as one experienced in public affairs and well versed in public matters, particularly those pertaining to western Canada. He has sustained that high reputation to-day in an admirable manner, and after listening to him I think we all feel that our parliamentary force has been greatly strengthened by his presence here. May I congratulate him not only upon the speech he delivered this afternoon, but also upon the great victory which he obtained at the last election, and which, more than anything else, accounts for the change in the person of leader of the opposition in this House. I am not going to pronounce any valedictory upon the departed, because I am not at all sure that we may not see him back in this House again; for my part, I should not be surprised to see him once more at the head of his party. That, however, is a matter for my hon. friends opposite to decide; it is a family affair and I have no desire to intrude into their domestic concerns.

May I, Mr. Speaker, take advantage of the moment to express the pleasure I am sure it gives most of us to see so many of the members of the last parliament in attendance again. A few of our old members are missing, and I confess that I am very glad that one or two of them are not here. In large part, however, old members have been returned, and I think it is with a feeling of pride and satisfaction to all that we meet again in the numbers we do to resume our labours in a new parliament. On behalf of the government, and on behalf of the old members of the House, I extend to the new members a most cordial welcome. I am sure we all have reason to know that the ability and debating talent of this chamber have been greatly added in virtue of the new members who have come into our midst.

I should like to join with my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, and with the mover and seconder of the address, in expressing appreciation of and pride in the appointment of the new Governor General of Canada, and the pleasure it affords all to have with us at Rideau Hall at the present time Lord and Lady Willingdon. In the short time they have been in Canada they have captivated the hearts of our people wherever they have gone. As the leader of the opposition said this afternoon, very truly, I think, we in Canada have great reason to be proud of the long list of distinguished gentlemen who have filled the high position of the king's representative in this Dominion. I may say that without exception we have been fortunate indeed in those who have been selected as governors general of our Dominion. I believe that great as have been the qualities of those who have filled this high position, the present Governor General possesses attributes second to none of his predecessors. He has had the advantage of a parliamentary experience over a considerable period of time. He has been a representative of the people in parliament; he also represented as governor of Bombay and Madras over an equal period of time His Majesty the King. He has been on important diplomatic missions to other lands, and taken all together his experience is such as to qualify him in an exceptional way for the high position to which he has been called. It is a rather interesting coincidence that, as in the parliament before last, we begin with a new parliament, a new government, and a new Governor General.

Perhaps this is an appropriate moment for a new statement as to the position of the Governor General. In this connection I was a little surprised at the suspicion with which my hon. friend was inclined to view a reference to the crown in the report of the Imperial conference committee. He asked very pointedly whether there was any ulterior motive, or if there was anything behind the plain statement of fact which appears in its pages. I may say to my hon. friend that the reason the statement was made so plain was to prevent the possibility of anyone having an ulterior idea with respect to any phase of the subjects to which it relates. I might just read to the House the statement contained in the report with reference to the position of the Governor General. The pertinent words are as follows:

The Governor General of a dominion is the representative of the crown, holding in all essential respects the same position in relation to the administration of public affairs in the dominion as is held by His Majesty the King in Great Britain, and that he is not the representative or agent of His Majesty's government in Great Britain, or of any department of that government.

I think that is a statement with which every hon. member of this House will be in hearty accord. My hon. friend asked if there was any particular reason why the word "crown" should be substituted for the word "king". I may say that I was not aware of a thought in the mind of anyone that a substitution was being made; in fact, in the one sentence both words are used:

—the representative of the crown holding in all essential respects the same position in relation to the administration of public affairs in the dominion as is held by His Majesty the King in Great Britain—

My hon. friend in the course of his remarks drew attention to the fact that some old documents refer to the queen, having reference to the Victorian era. Possibly the word "crown" was put there in order to stand for either king or queen. I can assure my hon. friend that from any discussion I heard at the conference, and from what took place there, there was not in the mind of anyone, so far as I am aware, the slightest desire to have the crown mean other than the ruling sovereign, be he King George or any of his successors, and be they kings or queens.

The important point of that paragraph, the significant feature of it, is that which makes perfectly clear that the Governor General in Canada is the personal representative of His Majesty; that he is in the truest sense of the word, a viceroy; that he is not the representative of the government or of any department of the government of Great Britain. That is the important feature of that particular statement, and I am sure there is reason for feelings of pride in the breast of every citizen of this Dominion that a statement to that effect should be made in unqualified terms. Indeed, the paragraph immediately preceding gives the reason why the statement is made as clearly as it is. It reads:

That position—

That is the position of Governor General.

—though now generally well recognized—

That is as the representative of His Majesty in the Dominion—

—undoubtedly represents a development from an earlier stage when the Governor General was appointed solely on the advice of His Majesty's ministers in London and acted also as their representative.

In our opinion it is an essential consequence of the equality of status existing among the members of the British commonwealth of nations that the Governor General of a dominion is the representative of the crown, holding in all essential respects the same position in relation to the administration of public affairs in the dominion as is held by His Majesty the King in Great Britain.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not like to interrupt, but perhaps the right hon. gentleman would not mind if I asked him this question. Does he mean the crown in right of the Dominion, and is the appointment of a Governor General to be made on the recommendation of His Majesty's ministers in Canada or His Majesty's ministers in London? That is a development of the proposition with which he is now dealing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was coming to that. The point that I wished to make perfectly clear in the first instance was this: That within the British Empire, in the so-called self-governing dominions, there has been a distinct constitutional development, or evolution, whatever term one prefers to use, from the status of crown colony to that of a self-governing dominion. In the case of a colony a Governor General is sent out as the representative, not merely of the crown, but of the British government; he receives his instructions from the British government or some department of that government as its agent, and he acts as an agent of the British government.

In a self-governing dominion the position is different; the Governor General in a self-governing dominion is constitutionally in identically the same position in relation to the affairs of the particular country to which he comes as His Majesty the King is in in relation to the affairs of Great Britain. He is not, any more than is His Majesty the King in Great Britain, an agent of the government or a representative of the government or any department of the government of Great Britain. The Governor General in a self-governing dominion such as Canada, represents His Majesty the King alone. From now on there can be no question as to his not representing the government or any department of the government of Great Britain.

As to the matter of the selection of Governor General I am not wholly familiar with the methods that have been adopted heretofore. I am inclined to believe that what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) surmised this afternoon, namely that the government of Great Britain, before making an appointment, conferred with the Prime Minister of the day either by written or oral communication and made the appointment only after such conference, is the method that has been followed, at least in recent years. Speaking of what took place with respect to the appointment of the present Governor General, I do not think I am betraying any secret which I should not when I say that the British Prime Minister did confer with me as Prime Minister of Canada with respect to that particular appointment and that the distinguished gentleman who is at the present time filling the position of Governor General was heartily approved of by myself in correspondence with the Prime Minister of Great Britain before the appointment was made.

I do not think the British government would, for one moment, contemplate recommending the appointment of a Governor General to Canada who was not persona grata to the ministry in office in Canada at the time of the appointment. It will, I think, be time enough to raise the question as to whether we are to draw hard and fast lines between the British government and our own in the matter of the ultimate selection of a Governor General when any difference threatens between the British government and our own over the matter of an appointment. I have not the least doubt that the government of Great Britain would not think of suggesting the appointment and, in virtue of the statement that is here laid down so emphatically, will not hereafter attempt to recommend the appointment of a Governor General to this Dominion without the approval of the Prime Minister—and that I take it means the cabinet—of this country before the appointment is made.

I would like now to say a word with reference to the celebration of the diamond jubilee of confederation and to join my words to those of hon. members who have already spoken in saying what a source of pleasure and pride as well as an honour it will be to us all to have with us in the celebration of the sixtieth anniversary of our Dominion His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. May I say that from conversations I was privileged to have with His Royal Highness during the course of my recent visit to England I know he is looking forward with intense pleasure to being in Canada next year, and that nothing except wholly unforeseen circumstances which would make his visit impossible will prevent him from being with us during the celebration. It goes without saying that His Royal Highness will receive a right royal welcome when he comes back to our Dominion.

May I say, too, that the welcome which will be extended to the Prime Minister of Great Britain will be as hearty as the citizens of this Dominion can give to anyone? As my hon. friend said this afternoon it will be the first occasion when a Prime Minister of Great Britain in office has visited one of the great dominions. I am sure that all who have had the pleasure of meeting the Right Hon. Mr Baldwin and of knowing him will say that it will be their ardent hope and wish that when the time comes he may find it possible to be one of our guests at the celebration of the diamond jubilee.

In this connection I believe it will be the wish of the people of this Dominion that an invitation should also be extended by the government to the Prime Ministers of the other self-governing dominions. As all of them were present recently at the Imperial conference and have been absent from their countries for a considerable period, they may find it difficult to be present; but it will be our hope that if they themselves should be prevented from coming it will be found possible for ministers of their governments and possibly parliamentary delegations from their countries as well to attend. I believe that occasions such as these afford the public men of the different parts of the British Empire the best kind of opportunity of meeting together and coming to understand more fully the great aims, purposes and ideals which they hold in common. Only good, I am sure, can come from any event which will help to bring together from the different quarters of the globe those who are citizens of the countries comprising the great empire to which we belong.

May I continue what I have to say in the order of the remarks of my hon. friend? At the outset I might observe that with most of the items in the speech from the throne he appears to be in hearty accord. At any rate, he made no comment on the greater part of the speech, and I gather from his silence in this particular that the speech on the whole commends itself favourably to him, as indeed I should expect that it would. However, he has in the course of his remarks been critical of one or two references in the programme as therein outlined.

One remark he made was not specifically in reference to any item in the speech from the throne, but was more, I imagine, in the way of a sort of solace to his soul, namely that the representation in this chamber at the present time was not as much in accord with the numerical complexion of the population of the country as he thought it ought to be. He indicated that the total number of votes cast for his party ought to have given it, on a numerical count, a larger representation in the House. May I remind him that the constituencies as they appear at the moment, and as they were in the recent campaign, were the result of the work of a joint committee, of which, if I am not mistaken, he himself was a member. My hon. friend shakes his head. In that I stand corrected. At any rate, two or three members of his party were members of that committee. The late member for South Oxford, Mr. Donald Sutherland, I am reminded by my hon. friend from Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), was a member of that committee, and I think that any committee of which Mr. Sutherland was a member may have been expected to take pretty good care of the interests of the Conservative party. When that report was brought into the House, all members of this House, regardless of the party to which they belonged, concurred in it, and the report was passed unanimously. There was no exception taken to it. In other words, it was generally conceded that the government in the preparation of the electoral map had sought to do what was wholly fair and right with respect to the representation of all parts of this country.

May I just add this? My hon. friend drew attention to what he regarded as an evil, namely, that there was no representation in this House whatever of minorities in certain areas. He did not propose a remedy, he pointed out the evil and he immediately ran away from the one obvious remedy which suggests itself, namely, the application, to a limited extent, at least, of the principle of proportional representation or of the single transferable vote. If my hon. friend will reflect for a moment upon where his members come from, he will agree that in considerable part they come from large cities, Toronto for example. I see seats over there representing something like eleven members who are returned in virtue of the votes that are cast in that one Tory hive. Toronto returns directly or indirectly eleven members altogether, they are all Tories; there is not a single Liberal among them. My hon. friend will surely not for one moment say that the number of Liberals there are in Toronto is not sufficient to entitle them to the representation of at least a single member in this House. If our electoral choices were made fairly and squarely on the basis of numbers, there would in fact be several Liberal members if the total Liberal vote counted. I simply point that out because I agree with him in part that the present system needs modification. But I do not agree with him when he is unable to give us any suggestion as to how that condition might be changed, especially when there is before him, as there has been before this country for a long time, a plan that has worked very well in other countries, and that ought to work equally well, applied within limits, within our own country.

My hon. friend was of the opinion that the time had come when the rural constituencies should be represented on exactly the same numerical basis as the urban, or vice versa. I cannot altogether agree with him as to that. He says that the rural constituencies have virtually the same opportunities to-day that the cities have, now that we have the automobile, the aeroplane and other devices. They have in some particulars, but they have not when it comes to the influence of opinion upon the affairs of government. I think my hon. friend will realize in a moment that in the cities there are the large journals, the daily press, which has a mighty influence on public opinion. My hon. friend will agree that the influence of the great dailies which issue from the cities is vastly greater than that of the rural press. Then in the cities there are such institutions as boards of trade, chambers of commerce, manufacturers' associations and the like, different organizations concerned with almost every interest, all of which bodies can quickly bring to bear through the influence they have on public opinion their views and ideas in a manner in which rural communities cannot begin to exercise any influence. For that reason, I am inclined to think that some special consideration may have still to be shown for some little time to come to the rural constituencies.

My hon. friend dealt with the question of foreign trade, and implied that the figures of foreign trade did not altogether reflect credit on the government. I would ask him this question: Does he think that the condition that existed at the time the previous Liberal administration came into office, when there was a larger amount of imports than exports, was a better condition than that which prevails at the present time, when our export trade exceeds our import by some $400,000,000? That is the difference. I confess, if there is any advantage at all in a large favourable balance of trade, that advantage has been steadily growing to the credit of the Liberal administration.

My hon. friend also said that all of the treaties that had been made since the Liberal administration had come into office had been against the interests of this country. I fail to see how he arrives at any conclusion of the kind. He spoke of the Australian treaty, and seemed to imply that because Australia had increased her exports to Canada somewhat, that therefore the treaty was not of as much advantage to us as it is to Australia. He did not draw the attention of the House to the fact that our exports to Australia are at least four times as great as the exports of Australia to this country, which is the fact. He said nothing about that whatever. He drew attention to the circumstance that relatively there had been some slight increase in the export trade of Australia to Canada. May I say this to my hon. friend: It was only with the greatest difficulty that our government was able to get an agreement with Australia at all, for the simple reason that the Australians felt that the balance of trade was so favourable to our country, and so lacking in favour to their own. If we had not that agreement, the certainty is that instead of exporting to Australia the large amount of material wealth that we do to-day, we would be exporting very much less.

The point I wish particularly to take exception to in my hon. friend's remarks is this. He seems to think we must always, in order to have an advantage out of a trade agreement, be exporting more than we are importing, and that such must be our position in relation to all countries that we do business with. I would ask him, what is the purpose of trade at all, if it is not that a man may obtain something he already has not and give in exchange for it something that he has? If a man has gold and wishes to buy something that is produced in another part of the world which he cannot get in his own country, surely he is the gainer if he buys that article, and gives gold in exchange. He does not trade unless some advantage is to be gotten out of it. My hon. friend since he has been in the society of hon. gentlemen opposite has been so closely associated with one particular group in the community that he has forgotten altogether the multitude that represents the country as a whole, namely, the consumers of the country, all of whom are entitled to get some advantage out of a trade agreement. My hon. friend led the House to assume that Canada's trade was of such a character that she was for the most part, parting with her raw materials when she should be keeping them, in order that her manufacturers might be in a position to supply the home market with manufactured goods, instead of buying them abroad. That particular argument might have had some force and weight if it had been addressed to his own following at the time they were in office prior to 1922, because at that time the excess of imports of manufactured goods into Canada over exports from Canada was something like $264,000,000. When the present administration came into office the excess of imports of manufactured goods into Canada over the export of manufactured goods began steadily to decrease. In the fiscal year ending March 31, 1922 the excess of imports over exports was $120,000,000. In 1923 the excess of imports over exports of manufactured goods had fallen to $59,000,000. In 1924 it had fallen to $47,000,000, and in 1925, instead of there being an excess of imports of manufactured goods into Canada over exports, Canada actually exported more than $15,000,000 worth of manufactured goods more than she imported. I have not the figures at hand for this year, but I am quite sure in my own mind that they will show a still further increase in the value of manufactured goods exported from Canada over the value of manufactured goods imported into this country.

My hon. friend sought to derive a little amusement for himself and his followers and a little consolation as well by drawing attention to the fact that in the present administration there were seated "cheek by jowl" as he expressed it, gentlemen whose views on tariff matters at some previous period may have represented shades of opinion that were not identical. I confess that every government of necessity must be composed of men who have different interests, but when men enter a government they give up a consideration of their own special interests, or the interests solely of sections of the country they represent, and become of common accord on matters of governmental policy, in an effort to find, not the extreme view which might suit one particular section, but the course most reasonable to adopt in a country as vast as ours, where conditions in different parts of the country vary as much as they do. May I say to my hon. friend that the situation, however humorous it may be, of gentlemen in the present administration sitting cheek by jowl with each other is as nothing compared to the amusement to be derived when one looks across to the benches opposite and sees the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie), the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Tolmie), and one or two others, formerly all good Liberals, seated cheek by jowl with dyed-in-the-wool Tories and carrying off the plums. I cannot imagine any situation quite as ludicrous as my hon. friend the leader of the opposition sitting cheek by jowl by the side of the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church), who of necessity is one of his followers at the present time. I think the less my hon. friend has to say about cheek by jowl the better for all concerned.

The leader of the opposition in the course of his remarks touched quite a little on the question of the tariff. In that particular he was only running true to form in the leadership of the party of which he is now the head. At every general election we have heard much discussion by the Conservative party with respect to protection. They come out in full force as advocates of a protective doctrine, which they say is all important in order to save the interests of the Dominion. But as soon as the election is over and they come into parliament, while they talk a great deal about protection, I have noticed that never once have they come forward in the debate on the budget with an amendment of their own in which they lay down their doctrine and their principles with respect to the tariff. In the election of 1921, from one end of the country to the other, the then leader of the Conservative party advocated the doctrine of a consistently maintained protective tariff, but when we came into the House and the debate of 1922 on the budget took place, when one might have expected that the leader of the party would have moved his tariff programme, what did he do? He and the party opposite contented themselves with a motion complaining that the government of the day had not put into force all at once all the pledges that had been made at a previous Liberal convention. Nothing whatever was said about their own programme. In 1923 a similar course of talking about the need of protection was adopted, except that at that time the opposition did not present any motion as an amendment to the budget, it was left to the then leader of the Progressive party to move an amendment. In the following year 1924, they again failed to bring in any amendment to the tariff setting forth their own programme, and they left it to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), to bring in an amendment relating, I think, to the cost of living. Then again in 1925, instead of presenting their tariff platform, for which they professed to have such great concern, the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) or some other member at his instance, brought in an amendment regretting that taxation had not been reduced and that the national debt was as large as it was—not one word of their policy of protection consistently maintained. Then we had a general election, and all the talk about protection over again, and we came back for another session. What was their position on the tariff? Did they present an amendment to the budget embodying their policy of protection? Not a bit of it. They brought in a resolution regretting that before certain changes had been made in regard to the tariff in relation to one of the industries of the country, the whole matter had not been referred to the tariff board. Now after another general election at which there has been much talk about protection, we have my hon. friend coming forward with his general talk on the need of protection, but carefully avoiding a statement of what his party desires. I hope when the budget debate proceeds he and his friends will have the courage to state exactly what they stand for on the tariff, and let us see how our friends from the maritime provinces, who form a large part of their following, line up with my hon. friends from Toronto and elsewhere, in regard to protection and the question of the tariff.

My hon. friend next spoke about the net debt of the country, and regretted that the net debt did not seem to have been reduced as rapidly as possible. I think my hon. friend forgets just how much of that debt was incurred during the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not wish to go over subject matter debated in previous sessions, but I do think it is well worth while, when my hon. friend speaks of five years financing by the present administration, to call to mind how the financing was done by my hon. friends opposite in the four or five years they were in office during the period of the war. At that time something like $1,760,000,000 was added to the public debt of the country as the capital cost of the war, and not one single dollar of that amount was raised by way of taxation. Every cent of it was borrowed money and every dollar of it was left for subsequent administrations to meet. That is where at the present time, if the government finds it difficult to reduce the public debt as largely as it might wish to reduce it, the difficulty arises. We have to continue to pay off the loans that were made at that period, most of which moreover, were made in a manner that deprives the government altogether of deriving any revenue from the income from the bonds that were issued by the government of the day.

Now, in regard to immigration, I hope if my hon. friend is really in earnest in desiring immigration to assume the proportions that he has said he would like it to assume, he will drop this talk about there being no employment in Canada and about migration to the United States. Let me ask him at the moment, should his remarks be cabled to England, what would be the effect to-morrow, on the mind of an immigrant about to come over to either Canada or the United States? He would read that the hon. leader of the Conservative party in Canada says that the doors of some of the American consulates in Canada are being crowded by people wishing to go to the United States, and that there is no employment in Canada for those wishing to come here. What would the result be? The man debating in his mind whether to go to Canada or to the United States—he has decided to go somewhere on this North American continent—reads the words of my hon. friend opposite, and they are sufficient to turn him to the United States. This country has suffered all along far too much through hon. gentlemen opposite preaching blue ruin. It is time now that at least that kind of party propaganda should cease. May I say to hon. gentlemen opposite, the answer to all their talk of blue ruin will be found in the statements which are appearing from every commercial house, from every banking institution and from every financial concern of importance in this country, week in and week out, that not for many years has there been a period of prosperity such as Canada is enjoying at the present time, and that so far as the future is concerned it points to greater and still greater prosperity.

My hon. friend asked me about the report of the commission upon conditions in the maritime provinces, and in that connection said that, while it was a step in the right direction to appoint that commission, the credit for doing so was due to representations from the delegation of Conservative members from the maritime provinces which was in the House last session. I would remind my hon. friend that before the House assembled last session the government had prepared its speech from the throne, and in that document there was this paragraph:

> With a view to affording such remedies as may appear to be practical and appropriate, the government also propose to appoint a royal commission to inquire fully into the claims that the rights of the Maritime provinces in regard to the operation of the Intercolonial railway have not been observed, and that in regard to transportation, immigration and other economic factors these provinces have suffered prejudicially in their position under confederation.

The speech from the throne in which that declaration appeared was read on January 8 last before this House had formally assembled for business. May I add that far from hon. gentlemen opposite being responsible for the commission being appointed, hon. members from the maritime provinces sitting behind my hon. friend were among those who criticized the government for appointing that commission. What was done by the government in that particular was done as a matter of fact in spite of the representations from hon. members from the maritime provinces on the other side of the House rather than because of them.

I wish I could oblige my hon. friend by meeting the specific request that he made of me in the course of his remarks, namely, to advise him at this present juncture of the particular measures which the government intend to bring down to carry out the recommendations contained in that report. He said that he had not had an opportunity of reading the report carefully. I doubt very much if many members of the House have had that opportunity up to the present time. I know that personally I have not had an opportunity thus far to give to the report the careful study that I should like to give to it before beginning to discuss in detail the particular measures that will be brought in to carry out its recommendations. During the time that my friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and myself were in England our colleagues in the government gave very careful study to the report. They have in mind the steps which should be immediately taken, but up to the present time neither the Minister of Justice nor myself have had time to confer with them to the extent we should like before pronouncing in this House on the particular measures to be brought down. I think my hon. friend will agree that it is not unreasonable for us to ask that we should have that opportunity before speaking in detail of the measures that it is our intention to introduce.

Before I come to my hon. friend's remarks on the Imperial conference there is one item in the speech from the throne of which he made no reference, but to which I should like to refer because in a way it relates itself to the period of the Imperial conference; that is the announcement therein contained of the appointment of an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary at Washington. I take it that in the absence of any comment my hon. friend approves of the action of the government in that particular. If he does not, I should be happy if he would say so at the moment, because I have been under the impression that all parties in this House looked favourably on the appointment of a representative of Canada at Washington. I know there are individuals who hold opposite views. But I should like my hon. friend to say quite frankly whether the Conservative party in the House take an opposite view to the government's in the matter of that appointment. If he should say so, I would wish to draw his attention to the circumstance that in 1920 the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden, then leading the House, made a long statement as to the reasons why Canada should be represented at Washington by a Canadian minister. The Hansard of that session contains the account then given of the negotiations which Sir Robert Borden's government had had with the government of Great Britain respecting the appointment of a minister at Washington from Canada. The matter was agreed to, and an understanding was reached which was acceptable both to the British government and to the Canadian government of the day, and also, I understand, to the American government.

Now, that arrangement, as I recall it, went further than what is proposed by the present government. The arrangement as made by Sir Robert Borden's government provided that the Canadian minister would, in the absence of the British ambassador, fill his position at Washington. Hon. members who were in the House at the time may recall that the Liberal opposition of the day took exception to that particular feature. We did not see how an appointee of this government could act as the representative of another government. In the event of any mistake arising it would be difficult to know which government would be expected to take the necessary action to bring about redress. We could not see wherein an arrangement of that kind would be of advantage either to the British government or to our own, and we have decided therefore that the representative of the government of Canada at Washington shall represent the affairs of this country only.

May I say that the appointment of our minister to Washington has been made in precisely the same way as the appointment of an ambassador from England to the United States would be made. It has been made upon the advice of the Canadian ministers to the crown, and the crown accepting their advice. The necessary letter of credence will be taken from His Majesty the King to the President of the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: Would that be by the crown in the right of Canada or of England?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The crown in the right of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: The Governor General here signs the commission?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The King actually signs the formal document that accredits the minister to Washington, but on the advice of his Canadian ministers.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The appointment was made in the first instance by order in council of the Canadian government. His Majesty the King was informed of it and after Washington had been communicated with to ascertain whether the person appointed would be acceptable to the President, and a reply was received in the affirmative, the further necessary action properly to accredit the minister was left to His Majesty the King.

Mr. BENNETT: If it is not trespassing on the Prime Minister's speech, may I ask why the appointment should not be signed by the Governor General here rather than by the King? Why should not the appointment come from Canada rather than from England?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He is the King's representative.

Mr. BENNETT: I know, but he is also Canada's minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The formal document appointing the minister in the first instance is signed by the Governor General. The appointment is made by order in council of the Canadian government, and the Governor General signs the order. That order having been communicated to His Majesty, His Majesty agrees to the appointment and accredits the minister.

Mr. BENNETT: If there is an equality of status, why the necessity for having the matter transmitted to England?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: His Majesty has his deputy here in the person of the Governor General, it is true; but in the appointment of ministers to foreign countries I assume it will always be the desire not only of His Majesty but of this parliament that the formal letters of credence shall be signed by the King.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He is the king of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With respect to this appointment it is, I think, desirable to direct attention to the fact that there are no two countries in the world between which there exists so extensive a boundary as that which separates Canada from the United States. Probably there are no two countries in the world in which the respective citizens have as much in the way of business transactions with one another as have the people of these two countries on the North American continent. Fortunately we have not inherited the military feuds of the old world, nor have we racial hatreds to contend with. But there are many matters of immediate concern both to the United States and to Canada, and we believe that a minister from our own Dominion will be in a position to deal more expeditiously and effectively with such matters than has hitherto been possible. Let me say at once that we in Canada have reason to be profoundly grateful for and appreciative of the splendid services which up to the present time have been rendered this country by the British ambassador at Washington. Certainly no one could have been more solicitous of the interests of the Dominion than Sir Esme Howard, the present ambassador to the United States. Sir Esme Howard, as many members in this House have heard him say, himself welcomes the appointment of the Canadian minister to Washington. I think he feels that a colleague coming direct from our Dominion and dealing especially with those matters that immediately affect this country will prove in every way not only of advantage to the Dominion but, as well, of considerable assistance in the relations between the British Empire and the United States.

I have only this to add: in my opinion the country is indeed fortunate in the person of the gentleman who has received the appointment of minister at Washington. The Hon. Vincent Massey is exceptionally well qualified to fill that high position. He has the advantage of having had a university training not only in Canada but at Oxford. He has had large business experience. He has held important administrative posts. He is still a young man, is possessed of a high public spirit and is so admirably qualified in other particulars that I doubt whether a better choice could possibly have been made.

I come now to the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Guthrie) with respect to the Imperial conference. I confess that I was somewhat surprised at the comments he made upon and the questions he asked in relation to the conference. He seemed extremely critical of the results that had been achieved. I would remind him, as well as hon. gentlemen opposite, that the criticisms he has directed, apparently at my colleague and myself, apply in equal measure to the representatives of Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, the Irish Free State, Newfoundland, and Great Britain, inasmuch as every resolution that appears and every line of the report has the unanimous approval of all the representatives at that conference. When my hon. friend suggests that possibly there has been some ulterior motive in the use of the word "crown" instead of the word "king", when he finds possibilities of disruption of the empire in other sections of the report, he is adversely criticising the Prime Minister of Great Britain; he is criticising Lord Balfour, the leader of the British government in the House of Lords; he is criticising the Foreign Secretary of Great Britain. In a word, he is criticising every member of the British government and every one of the representatives of the other dominions who took part in the conference. If my hon. friend will for a moment forget altogether the political bias which he may feel he is expected to some extent to show, and will look at the report as all those who were present at the Imperial conference certainly looked at it, he will realize that what is therein embodied expresses only what the representatives of every part of the empire, after the fullest and most careful examination, felt to be in the interests of all concerned. That is the point I wish first of all to impress upon my hon. friend.

The second point to which I call his attention is the contradictory character of his comments with respect to the question of equality of status. As I listened to his remarks it seemed to me that the first part of his speech was an effort to show that nothing had been attained which had not been accepted for some time. I gathered that in his view, Sir Wilfrid Laurier had contended that Canada had the fullest rights of self-government in all particulars; that there was equality of status with the Mother Country so far as this Dominion was concerned. He contended also that Sir Robert Borden had taken that position; at any rate I think Sir Robert Borden would wish to have it known that he had so held. The whole argument of my hon. friend at the beginning was to the effect that, after all, statements made with respect to equality of status constituted simply an affirmation of a position which Canada had maintained as already established. In the last part of his address the hon. gentleman's effort seemed to be directed to showing that there was no such thing as equality of status. The position he took was that there could not be equality of status inasmuch as England was very much larger, more powerful, and much more influential than the Dominion of Canada. In his view, therefore, the talk about equality of status was all nonsense.

With all due respect to my hon. friend I suggest that he has confused in his own mind the terms "status" and "stature." Status and stature are not the same thing. Bigness, extent of power, and the like are all matters of stature and not of status, for status has nothing whatever to do with size. Status has to do with rights enjoyed within certain limits. Perhaps I might offer an illustration. Every hon. member of this House, whether he be the youngest member and one who has entered parliament for the first time or the oldest parliamentarian like yourself, Mr. Speaker, enjoys equality of status with every other member. There is not one member of parliament who as member has any rights greater than any other. Some, it is true, may perform different functions, may for the time being fill one position or another; one may be exercising the function of a minister of the crown, and another the function of the leader of the opposition; but each is, so far as his status goes, a member of the House of Commons of Canada, representing the people of the particular constituency which has returned him here, and each constituency is entitled to the same measure of representation in this House of Commons. Every constituency has the same right to representation in this parliament, quite regardless of the individual stature or importance in other particulars of its representative. That is precisely the view the Imperial conference has taken with respect to Great Britain and the self-governing dominions; it is not a question of size; it is not a question of power or of might, but a question of the rights of each of the self-governing communities with respect to the control of their own domestic and external affairs. With regard to the domestic and external affairs of this Dominion, the Imperial conference has said that in the opinion of its members, those rights of control are just as full and complete with respect to Canadian affairs as are the rights of the British government in respect of the domestic or external affairs of Great Britain. Now I should like to know, Mr. Speaker, is there any hon. member of this House who would have the position any different? Does my hon. friend wish us to be in a position of subordination?

Before I come to that, in order quickly to reassure my hon. friend and any other timid souls as to how far they are being involved in virtue of anything that has been done, I would like to recall what my hon. friend said as to Sir Wilfrid Laurier's attitude. Sir Wilfrid took the position that he was attending a conference and not a cabinet. Let me say that that was the position which my colleague and myself took very firmly from first to last throughout this conference, and that was the position I took at the previous conference. I recall very well at the conference of 1923 urging strongly that in the report of the conference itself, it should be made quite clear that the conference was not a cabinet laying down policies of government for the empire, but that it was simply what from its name it purported to be, namely a body of gentlemen representing different governments, who had met to confer together, to come as far as possible to a consensus of opinion and then report the result of their joint deliberations together with their recommendations, back to the governments and parliaments which they had been sent to represent. Expression is given in the summary of proceedings of the Imperial conference of 1923 to that position. It will be found on page 13 of the printed proceedings, Canadian edition, as follows:

> This conference is a conference of representatives of the several governments of the empire; its views and conclusions on foreign policy, as reported above, are necessarily subject to the action of the governments and parliaments of the various portions of the empire, and it trusts that the results of its deliberations will meet with their approval.

That was the position taken in 1923 and that position was again taken at the recent conference. It was a conference of representatives of the different governments, and everything the conference did, before it begins to bind a single part of the empire, is subject to the approval of not only the governments but also the parliaments of the different parts of the empire. It is the intention, Mr. Speaker, of the government to set apart one day or two days, or longer, if so desired, for the discussion of the proceedings of the conference; meanwhile I wish to assure hon. members of the House that in no particular has the hand of a single member been bound with respect to any matter which appears in the report of the proceedings. The report represents what the representatives assembled in London believed to be was a true statement of the present position. If this parliament takes a different view from that of the representatives of the governments at the Imperial conference, it is quite within the power of parliament so to express itself. I may say to my hon. friend that the government intends to put the report before this House just as it appears, and to recommend its adoption. If my hon. friend has any resolution to offer in amendment, we welcome his amendment, and ask him to debate it with us on the floor of the House. As it stands, however, we believe that this document expresses in the best possible form what is a matter of common opinion and agreement between all parts of the British Empire, and as such we believe that it will help to make for greater concord and greater unity within the empire.

My hon. friend asked who instructed my colleague and myself to go to London and attend an Imperial conference on constitutional questions. I am somewhat surprised that my hon. friend should ask that question, because as I remember it, he and his party were urging as strongly as they could that I should go to the conference; that on no account should I stay away; that if need be, parliament should be put off for some little time to make sure of my presence. That was not an instruction, but I am rather surprised that my hon. friend should now raise any question with respect to the presence of my colleague and myself at the conference. With regard to the agenda, I may say that it was before him during the time he was in office, or rather during the time he was supposed to be in office, and that he had an opportunity of looking it over; it was not altered in any particular after we went to London. My hon. friend also said that we had no mandate. I do not wish to enter upon any controversial point at the moment, but my recollection is that during the period of the general election, there was a good deal of question as to who was to represent Canada at the Imperial conference. I think the results of the election indicated rather decisively the preference of the Canadian people in that regard.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

May I say to my hon. friend that when my colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and I went to London, we went with a perfectly open mind as to the questions which were to come up at that conference. I am free to admit that neither of us had had much opportunity to study in advance the questions coming before the conference, or to prepare for them. Indeed, if we had consulted our own convenience in the matter, I think we should have greatly preferred not having had to take up the work at such short notice. To make our attitude perfectly clear, I spoke in advance in the city of Quebec with reference to the point of view from which we would approach the issues which were likely to come up at the conference, and my hon. friend has done me the kindness to comment favourably on what was said at that time. I did say that as the representatives of Canada we were going to the conference in a spirit of goodwill towards Great Britain and towards all the dominions which would be represented there; that we had not a single grievance; that we had no particular demands to put forward, but that we were prepared to co-operate to the best of our abilities with the representatives of the other governments concerned. That was the position, so far as Canada was concerned, as I stated it at the conference itself. I made it perfectly clear to all who were there assembled that as between Great Britain and this Dominion there were no difficulties of any kind; that as between Canada and the other dominions there was the greatest friendship, and that so far as the relations of this country with foreign countries were concerned, they were all to the good, as we could see them; that we came there simply to join with our colleagues from other parts of the empire in taking up the questions presented to us in the spirit in which we believed all would wish to have them taken up. We sought to maintain what we believed to be the Canadian point of view, and I contend that this document, as it is presented here, does present the Canadian point of view on the matter of inter-imperial relations. Not only does it represent the Canadian point of view, but I believe it represents the point of view which the mother country and the different dominions hold in common. I will say, however, that I think it was the Dominion of Canada which led the way to that particular point of view. I am not speaking of this particular conference, but of the Canadian point of view as it has been developed over a period of years. This dominion has led the way in the discussion of inter-imperial relations, and Canada's position, which sometimes has been criticised from different sources as being an advanced position in some regards, has come at last to be looked upon as the position best calculated to maintain not only national autonomy, but imperial unity as well.

It would take too long a time to attempt during this debate to go at any length into the matters dealt with in the conference report. Indeed, as I have already indicated, the government intends to set apart a day for the discussion of matters relating to the Imperial conference and I shall reserve until that time what I have to say with regard to the work of the conference as a whole. All I wish to do at the moment is to set at rest any fears or alarms that may be in the minds of my hon. friends opposite and to make it clear that so far as Canada is concerned parliament has it entirely in its power, if it so desires, to reverse in any particular any statement of position which may appear in the report of the conference.

While the conference took up matters relating to trade, defence, migration, communication, research, forestry, and other economic questions, the most important work of the conference concerned inter-imperial relations and in a special way the negotiation, signature and ratification of treaties. The committee that dealt with the question of inter-imperial relations was presided over by the Right Hon. the Earl of Balfour. The committee that dealt with the negotiation, signature and ratification of treaties was presided over by the Minister of Justice of Canada (Mr. Lapointe), and in that position my hon. colleague commanded not only the admiration but, I believe, the gratitude as well of all members on that committee. As regards inter-imperial relations hon. members will find in the italicized portion of the report which deals with the status of Great Britain and the dominions, the central feature of the entire report. I will read that particular clause because I think it is important to bring it concretely to the attention of the House.

There is however a most important element in it—

That is to say the British Empire.

—which from a strictly constitutional point of view, has now, as regards all vital matters, reached its full development—we refer to the group of self-governing communities composed of Great Britain and the dominions. Their position and mutual relation may be readily defined.

Then the italicized portion follows:

They are autonomous communities within the British Empire equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the Crown and freely associated as members of the British Commonwealth of Nations.

That represents in as concrete a form as it can be given the view held in common by all the representatives of the British Empire with respect to the relative position of the dominions and Great Britain in regard to their domestic and external affairs. If there is any criticism to be offered of that particular formula, I think it should take the form of suggesting wherein the formula is misleading or what should be said of an opposite character. Let me take the formula clause by clause:

They are autonomous communities within the British Empire.

Will any member in this House differ with that statement?

Equal in status.

I have already made mention of the meaning of that.

In no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs.

Is there a member of this House who desires that this dominion shall be subordinate either to Great Britain or to any other part of the British Empire with respect to its own domestic or external affairs?

Though united by a common allegiance to the crown.

That position is a link and bond which all of us wish to see maintained.

And freely associated as members of the British commonwealth of nations.

Is not that an exact statement of the truth?

The work of the conference, after stating the root principle governing relations within the British Empire, was directed towards removing any forms or practices that seemed to be at variance with that particular formula.

The conference took up one by one the different matters which were brought to its attention from each and every source, and which seemed to be in conflict with the statement of the true position as outlined. Many of these questions were brought up by other dominions. I have already intimated that Canada did not put forward at the conference any grievance, or application for alteration of any particular matter. Many things that were of concern to us had already been raised by other of the dominions. We entered the conference ready to take our part to the best of our respective abilities in each and every question as it came up.

I will leave until a subsequent time a further discussion of the work of the conference in detail. May I say here what I said publicly in London before coming away, that I believe from the Canadian point of view the merit of the conference will lie not so much in a statement of what has been gained as in the statement of what has been attained and is now acknowledged to be altogether beyond debate. I think it is true that all the great charters of freedom in British history have for the most part not purported to introduce anything new or revolutionary. They have purported to be a statement of those rights which the citizens of the day believed were theirs and which they regarded as established. They were a formal statement which could be appealed to by future generations as indicating the point of agreement that had been reached with respect to the several matters with which they dealt. In that particular, I believe the work of this conference so far as the statement of inter-imperial relations is concerned, will take its place in history, by the side of those great charters which have stood in one form or another for a larger freedom. I believe this great conference, once party controversy is removed and we get a true perspective of it, will stand out in history as a conference which has revealed how broad, deep and enduring within the British Empire are the foundations of national autonomy and imperial unity.

In listening to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition I had intended, when five or ten minutes to six arrived, to conclude my remarks with this topic which I thought would be also his last. Prior to that moment my hon. friend, it seemed to me, had been careful to avoid much in the way of controversy arising out of the recent political campaign and had been more or less guarded with respect to the statements he made. At ten minutes to six, however, for some reason best known to himself, he launchd out in direct fashion in an attack upon myself. Amongst other things, he spoke of a constitutional issue that had been put forward by myself and others as an important issue in the campaign, but which according to his view really did not amount to anything. He went on to say a number of things which even in that short space of time I found it necessary to take exception to. If, therefore, I touch at the moment upon the constitutional issue which he has brought up, he has only himself to thank for it. It is I think important, in view of the remarks which my hon. friend made, that with respect to the constitutional issue my own position and the position of the present administration should be made perfectly clear.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

May I say to him, first of all, that when he speaks of the misapprehensions people in the old country appear to have been under at the time of the last general election, I could tell him of a good many, and I could tell him pretty conclusively of the reasons therefor. Without doubt the propaganda of my hon. friend and his friends in the last campaign did mislead the British public considerably. It misled the British public in more respects than one. The British public were sadly misled by the Conservative press of this country through cabled despatches to the effect that a Conservative government was going to be returned in this country by an enormous majority. In that particular the British public were quickly undeceived once the election took place.

May I say that I think it important that in our political discussions we should have some regard to the representations made not only because of their effect upon our own electorate, but also because of the effect which is likely to be produced abroad. My hon. friend spoke about annexation to the United States. I would like to know when in the recent campaign a single member of the Liberal party ever uttered one sentence which was capable of being construed as a desire for annexation to the United States. On the other hand, I say that hon. gentlemen opposite over and over again in different parts of this country did all they possibly could to have the citizens of this country believe that members of the Liberal party were in favour of annexation. And what was the result? The people of Canada knew better, they understood the truth. They were not deceived by this propaganda. But as my hon. friend has said, when my colleague and I arrived in the old country, we found the people of Great Britain thinking there was a great question on this continent, namely that of the possibility of the annexation of Canada to the United States. It was all the result of Tory propaganda—nothing more and nothing less.

My hon. friend says that there was really no constitutional question. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not know what he has in his mind as the question that really influenced the electorate most in the last campaign, but I believe that it was the constitutional question, perhaps not the question in the form in which he would like to phrase it, but in the form in which it actually arose.

I do not believe there is an episode in Canadian history that will stand out as such a Gilbertian performance as that witnessed in this House of Commons during the last four days of the last parliament, when hon. gentlemen opposite undertook to occupy seats on the treasury benches. Anything more ludicrous than the sudden entry upon the political stage of that phantom ministry, and its equally sudden exit, I do not think has been enacted in politics anywhere. As I look at hon. gentlemen opposite at the moment and seek to divine the thoughts of that phantom ministry, as they pass through their minds even at this time, I imagine I can hear them saying to one another:

She was a Phantom of delight
When first she gleamed upon my sight;
A lovely Apparition, sent
To be a moment's ornament.

That is what it was, the late ministry, a phantom and an apparition, and that is how it will be viewed by history.

I would be prepared to leave the matter there were it not that my hon. friend still contends that there was no constitutional issue. For purposes of record it is perhaps important that with respect to that phantom ministry the government's position should be clearly stated. We take the view that the whole proceedings of that ministry from beginning to close were unconstitutional, that it never was a ministry in any true sense of the term as ministries are understood under the British constitution. When was there a ministry in British history that undertook to carry on the government of the nation, having no authority from parliament and no authority from the country? That was the position of the ministry that assumed to carry on the government of this country for a period of some eighty days.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Freebooters!

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I remind the House of the last word of the last parliament with respect to that so-called ministry? It will be found, Mr. Speaker, in the resolution passed at midnight of July 1 and reported in the Votes and Proceedings of that day:

That the actions in this House of the honourable members who have acted as ministers of the Crown since the 29th of June, 1926, namely the hon. members for West York, Fort William, Vancouver Centre, Argenteuil, Wellington South, and the hon. senior member for Halifax, are a violation and an infringement of the privileges of this House for the following reasons:—

1. That the said hon. gentlemen have no right to sit in this House, and should have vacated their seats therein, if they legally hold office as administrators of the various departments assigned to them by orders in council.

2. That if they do not hold such offices legally they have no right to control the business of government in this House and to ask for supply for the departments of which they state they are acting ministers.

That was the verdict the House of Commons pronounced on that particular ministry of that day. I say that when that verdict was pronounced that so-called ministry should instantly have resigned; it should not have attempted to continue to advise the sovereign's representative, and, least of all, should it have attempted to advise the sovereign's representative to dissolve parliament without so much as the formality of a prorogation. I say that the whole proceedings of that ministry from beginning to close were unconstitutional. There was no ministry while parliament was in session. There was but one minister sworn to office. The so-called acting ministers acknowledged that not one of their members was a minister of the crown. There can be no such thing as a ministry de facto. There must be a ministry de jure. There was no ministry de jure. That was the view that parliament took of the ministry, and that was the view that was before the country when the elections were held, and the country endorsed that view, and so I say, Mr. Speaker, that except to the extent that this parliament by its action explicitly or impliedly is prepared to countenance or regularize what was done by that administration, everything that it did was unconstitutional and is actually without any binding effect.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, unexpectedly I am requested by the leader of the opposition to continue the debate. As the hour is quite late and as we have had a somewhat lengthy sitting, and this is really our first day, I would suggest to the Prime Minister that he concur in my moving the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I shall be very happy to concur in the motion, but I hope that if we adjourn now, my hon. friend will agree not to make his speech much longer as a consequence.

Mr. CAHAN: I will promise the Prime Minister to be very brief.

On motion of Mr. Cahan the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 9.42 p.m.

Tuesday, December 14, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S WARRANTS

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): I desire to lay on the table a statement of the Auditor General as to governor general's warrants issued since last session, and expenditures thereunder; also a statement of the Auditor General as to treasury board over-rulings of his decision. Hon. members of the House will be interested to know that the Auditor General says in his report that there have been no treasury board over-rulings of his decisions since last session.

INDIAN LANDS

Hon. J. H. KING (for the Minister of the Interior): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of the Interior I beg to report that there were no remissions on sales of Indian lands during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1926. I desire also on his behalf to give notice to the House that no irrigation regulations have been enacted under the provisions of chapter 61, section 57, of the revised statutes. The Minister of the Interior also desires to give notice to the House that no orders in council relative to water in the railway belt have been passed under the provisions of the statutes of 1913, chapter 45, section 4.

CIVIL SERVICE

BILL TO ABOLISH CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION AND PROVIDE FOR BUREAU OF EXAMINERS

Mr. P. A. SEGUIN (L'Assomption-Montcalm) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 2, respecting the Civil Service. He said:

Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill is to abolish the Civil Service Commission as it exists to-day, in order to simply replace it by a board of examiners who will judge of the qualifications of the candidates applying for positions in the civil service and of those who are in line for promotions.

This bill in effect does away with the complex nature of the present act, while relieving the budget of some few hundred thousand dollars per year.

I am of the opinion that the present system has not in any way bettered the service and that it is a heavy burden, useless to the state.

This bill, it seems to me, has therefore its usefulness.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

[Mr. Cahan.]

PELEE ISLAND CABLE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. J. GOTT (South Essex): I desire to inquire from the Minister of Public Works if the repair work on Pelee island cable has been abandoned for the season, and if so is there a possibility of connecting the island with the mainland for the winter months? I wish also to inquire as to how far the work has progressed?

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (Minister of Public Works): I will be very glad indeed to make inquiries and ascertain the exact position of the work referred to by my hon. friend and give him the information he desires.

ATHABASKA ELECTION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River): Will the Prime Minister inform us if we can have the report of the Minister of Justice in connection with the inquiry held into the Athabaska election in 1925 tabled within the next few days?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I cannot say offhand whether the report is in the Department of Justice, but if it is I will undertake to say that it will be laid on the table of the House.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed from Monday December 13 consideration of the motion of Mr. L. Auger for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of the remarks which I wish to make I think I may say, on behalf of all members on this side of the House, that we concur most cordially in the welcome which has been expressed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie), to His Excellency the Governor General and Lady Willingdon. I have no doubt that their sojourn in this country of ours will prove both a pleasure to them, a profit to us and a service to the crown which His Excellency represents. I do not imagine, Sir, despite the report of the Imperial conference committee and the remarks which have been made thereon by the Prime Minister, that His Excellency will find the duties of the office of Governor General in Canada very much increased or very much diminished by the alleged changes mentioned in the report of that committee. The Governor General as a representative of the crown is the representative of the king, and as the representative of the king he has not, hitherto, so far as I am aware of his administrative acts, been the agent of any department of the British government or of the British government itself. I think the status, so far as His Excellency is concerned, is the status expressed in the British North America Act and not otherwise. It will be convenient, I think, when this report of the Imperial conference committee comes up for further discussion, that the Prime Minister lay on the table of the House a copy of the commission and instructions to His Excellency, in order that we may ascertain more definitely whether there has been any change in his duties and responsibilities as expressed in those two official documents.

I might say also, on behalf of the Conservative members of this House, that we appreciate more than we can express the consideration which the hon. leader of the opposition has shown to our unanimous request in caucus that he should undertake the onerous and responsible duties of leading the Conservative opposition in this House during the present session, assuming those duties and responsibilities at a great sacrifice to himself personally, I believe, in order that he might give the best of his services to the party who support him in the House and to the House as a whole. I can assure him also, I think, on behalf of the Conservative members of this House, that they will give him a loyal and consistent support in the performance of his duties and in assuming the responsibility of his official position.

I may also express, not only on behalf of myself but on behalf of the Conservative members of the House, our appreciation of the fact that, despite the fatigue of the enormous and extended campaign that the present Prime Minister carried on during the recent election, despite the onerous duties imposed upon him at his assumption of office, he did, from a sense of duty I believe, and from a sense of responsibility to this parliament and to the country, lay aside the home duties of his office and take his place as the Prime Minister of this country, with his colleague associated with him, at the recent Imperial conference at London. I may say that in these days of tumult and turmoil, when our social and political life and traditions are being adjudged and weighed in the balance as never before, I am disposed for one to give to every office of authority, and chiefly to the leader of this House and Prime Minister of the government of this country, every support which is necessary, in order that he may have, as a representative of this country, either in the councils of the empire or in dealing, so far as it is his function to do so, with foreign states, the full support of the parliament of the country, so far as we can consistently extend it to him. Whatever may be our dissensions and differences with regard to our domestic affairs, I believe it is our high duty to uphold the office of Prime Minister and to support the incumbent in carrying out the high duties and responsibilities of that office so far as we may, consistently with our own conscientious judgment of the political necessities of our common country. But to that remark I may add that I do not agree with the Prime Minister, under the conditions in which we find ourselves to-day, with this report of the Imperial conference before us, that any attempt on our part to elucidate clearly the real meaning of the paragraphs of that report constitutes a personal criticism of him, or a personal criticism of the Prime Minister of Great Britain or the prime ministers of the dominions represented at that conference. In the latter part of his address he stated the true position I believe, that that report will be placed before parliament for the consideration of every member of this House, and that it is our duty as individual members on either side to give it our most careful attention, and if we shall find discrepancies or inconsistencies therein, or verbiage which is not clear to our intelligence or to our judgment, to exercise our right to make such comments as may be necessary in order to elucidate the real position in which that report places the country at large.

Now, Sir, in dealing with the debate on the address the Prime Minister—and I may speak of it in this connection—referred to the fact that, after his resignation as prime minister was accepted in June last, certain expenditures were made by the incoming government by warrants of the Governor General, and if I apprehended the meaning and intent of his remarks, they were to the effect that, in his judgment and in the judgment of his colleagues on the government benches, the expenditures so made were unconstitutional and illegal in view of the circumstances in which they were made. I differ entirely from that opinion, and I say to the Prime Minister and to this House that rather than have that opinion go forth to the country as being based upon the facts and upon the law—based it was in part upon the fact that a resolution in the latter hectic days of June passed this House by a majority of one, which was not a majority in fact, and that therefore the House had pronounced the position of the new government to be unconstitutional and illegal—a judgment of a divided House which I think does not appeal either to the legal or the constitutional views of the great majority of the members in this House, or of the people in the country; I say if there is any doubt, when we come to pass the supplementary estimates, let the Prime Minister leave aside any single expenditure made by the late government which he deems as an exemplification of the view which he has expressed, and let him go to the courts of this country to procure a decision of that issue. In recent years we have had in this House many expressions of opinion from the opposite side, and even I think from the Prime Minister himself, that in legal matters there should be a judicial decision and not a political decision by the members of this House. I therefore ask him to assert the same dictum now. Let him take any item he may please and have the courts of this country decide whether the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen and his colleagues acted illegally and unconstitutionally in the expenditures they made during their term of office.

But if I may make one other passing reference to the hectic days of last June, I do think that the Prime Minister might have still further elucidated his own position in this House at the time that he went to the office of His Excellency the Governor General and asked for a dissolution without consulting parliament, and, when a dissolution was refused, resigning the high office which he then filled and leaving this country for the time being without governmental authority. I do not know what truth there is in the report, but I have noticed it in the press, and in view of its having been made and circulated I suggest to the Prime Minister that it is his bounden duty, in order that the facts may be known at no late date, to bring down to this House his own correspondence with His Excellency in the matter of his resignation when it was made in June last, because the report has been circulated from one end of the country to the other, and it is believed by many, that the Prime Minister on that occasion advised, and even urged, the Governor General to seek instructions from the colonial office as to his duty, and then His Excellency is reported to have replied to his prime minister of that day that in Canada he represented the king and the crown, and that he would make no such appeal to the colonial office. If such an event did take place, then I say the Prime Minister in June last assumed a position entirely inconsistent with that which he assumes to-day on his return from the Imperial conference at London.

Now, with regard to the address of His Excellency the Governor General and the motion which we have before us with respect to an address in reply, I find in the speech from the throne one or two matters on which I may make some comment. First, with respect to the Hudson Bay railway which interests so large a section of the country, and which is supported and approved by such a large body of the members of this House. In the address it is stated that:

It has been decided to submit the study of conditions at the port of Nelson—

—to the careful examination of an outstanding British authority on tidal and estuarial conditions affecting harbours.

I wish that that statement had been somewhat enlarged. I think it is absolutely necessary in order that public opinion throughout the length and breadth of this country may be fully informed that we should have expert reports not only upon the navigability of Port Nelson, but the navigability at all seasons of the year or during any considerable time of the year of the Hudson straits and bay. Certain hon. gentlemen seem to think, and judging from the reports of some of the political speeches which I read during the last election campaign the idea was prevalent in the west, that for selfish commercial reasons the east was opposed to the opening up of the Hudson bay to the commerce of the world. That I do not think is correct. We who were born and bred in seaport towns and villages can count among our acquaintances not only mariners of steamships but mariners of sailing ships who during the last fifty or sixty years have made more or less frequent visits through Hudson straits to Hudson bay, and the current opinion in the east is due largely to our personal intercourse and communication with such men who have been upon the spot and have seen something of the conditions which prevail in that region. I myself have made one trip, not through the Hudson straits but in its proximity up along the northern Labrador coast, and it gave me certain pessimistic impressions. Possibly not being an expert I may be told those impressions were erroneous. This I do say, that if it can be established clearly and definitely that Hudson strait and Hudson bay are navigable for any considerable period of time during consecutive months of the year; if it can be shown with a degree of reasonable definiteness that that port may be opened up to afford cheaper freight rates for the products of the west to Europe and for the products of Europe to the middle west; then many of the objections which prevail in the east would be entirely removed. The attitude of the east is not one of hostility to the west. We know that our prosperity, such as it is, depends to a certain extent upon the west being prosperous, and any new route that may be opened, any improved conditions of transportation that may be found which will open up the west and give the people there swifter and cheaper transportation to the markets of the world, will, I am sure, receive a large measure of approval in the eastern sections of this country.

With regard to the ordinary business of parliament, the same bills will be introduced which were discussed last year, and with regard to these I have no comment to make at present. Regarding one other matter which is not mentioned, but which is of very considerable interest to a large proportion of the electorate, namely, the constitutionality of the Alberta Act of 1905 which is to be referred to the courts for a clear decision, all I suggest is that when that reference is made it should be made as comprehensive as possible so as not only to elicit a judicial determination of the meaning and intent of the clauses of the Alberta Act of 1905 dealing with school funds, but also to secure a definite opinion from the courts as to the meaning and intent of the Dominion Lands Act of 1908, and as to how far the enactment of that measure, after the passage of the Alberta Act of 1905, affected the powers of the governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan in respect of the distribution of those school funds. I do not pretend to represent a large body of opinion in this country, but so far as I am acquainted with the opinion which does prevail the desire of those who are most interested in the Alberta school question is this, and this only, that under the guise of transferring natural resources of Alberta to the Alberta government, no new rights should be created either for the Protestant minority or for the Catholic minority. They are equally anxious that the old rights which are assured to them by particular clauses of the Alberta Act of 1905, and by similar clauses in the Saskatchewan Act of 1905, should not be abrogated nor diminished indirectly under the guise of transferring the natural resources to either of those provinces. These minorities wish to remain as they are and they are quite willing that the courts should determine what, if any, minority rights subsist to-day, with a view to having those rights preserved and not increased, and with this further object in view, that if the existing minority rights are to be prejudiced or limited or abrogated, it should be done by direct action on the part of parliament so that there may be a full and clear discussion as to the merits of the case.

There is also in the speech from the throne a reference to the report of the so called Duncan commission. I do not intend to enter at length upon any discussion of that report. I regard it as a mere incident in the assertion by the maritime provinces of certain rights and interests which they think and believe appertain to them. The real problem, the real matter for discussion, will come up when the legislation promised by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is brought down for consideration in this House. Then and then only, when that legislation is laid before the House, may we determine whether the agitation leading to and the work of the Duncan commission have been successful or not. For my own part, therefore, I reserve decision until the proper measures are brought down. But having been born and bred in one of those provinces by the sea I do believe that all parties in this House including, I hope, some hon. gentlemen who are living now in western Canada and who received their education and training in the maritimes, will consider with sympathetic minds whether that irritating sore which does exist in those provinces should not be healed, however great the price, if that price is within the reasonable limits of the competency of this parliament. I do not agree with some who think that the highest political destiny of the maritime provinces was not bound up with that of the other provinces of Canada. If I were again living there and the matter were to come up anew I would say to the people of the maritimes: "Your highest and best political destiny is to be worked out in association, and only in association, with the other provinces of this great country."

I came of a family whose modest way of living was equal to that of any other family in our surroundings, and I may say that the standard of living in that day was not as high as the standard of living in Nova Scotia at the present time. There is more of comfort and well-being in Nova Scotia to-day than there was in the sixties or seventies. But those provinces have not made an advance commensurate with the progress achieved by the other older provinces, and especially by the western provinces to which the maritimes gave so much, and for the development of which, I repeat—I hope the expression is not an unpleasant one—they made so many sacrifices in the early days. It sometimes seems to me that one of the greatest gifts from the maritimes to their fellow-Canadians is that men trained in the legal, engineering and other professions, or even as farm labourers, have left those communities for the west and assisted those coming from the old country to our Canadian west in establishing those three great prairie provinces on a basis of sound constitutional government and respect for English law and English institutions; they have given of their best endeavours to build up the west. Scotland has done the same thing; her sons have been dispersed throughout the whole British Empire.

Then there is another cause. I remember from my boyhood days that the county of Yarmouth, in which I was born, owned more shipping per capita sailing the seven seas than did any other part of the world. But with the coming of steamships that shipping has disappeared, and there has been no other industry to take its place. There have been many things detrimental to the progress and prosperity of these provinces, but I do believe that this parliament as a whole will give its most careful and favourable consideration to any measures of relief which may be brought before it in the hope of mitigating some of the grievances to which these provinces are subject.

With respect to the Imperial conference, one cannot understand the real position without reflecting somewhat upon the conditions which have prevailed in recent years, dealing with not only inter-imperial relations but also with the relations between the dominions of the empire and foreign states. The British Empire consists on the one hand of Great Britain with her vast aggregation of colonies and possessions which are directly under the supervision, the direction and in a large measure the control of the British government. Then there is India, which is only partially autonomous, for which in recent years the Morley-Minto scheme, the Montagu-Chelmsford reform scheme, and finally in 1919 the Government of India Act, have provided for a certain measure of self-government for that country, possibly placing it in a position leading to ultimate complete self-government. Then we have the six dominions of Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Newfoundland, the Irish Free State, and South Africa, all of which with the exception of Newfoundland are members of the League of Nations. The constitutional developments of recent years have tended more and more to distinguish between these six dominions and the dependencies of the British Crown to which I have referred, and in my own opinion —and I think in the opinion of all—the survival of the British Empire depends upon the continuous co-operation of all the parts in carrying out the common ideals which constitute the standard of possible attainment. These common ideals have not yet fully developed; they have not yet been fully proved, and it is possible that the basis of cordial co-operation has not yet been fully attained. So it must remain the duty and responsibility of this generation of Canadians, and of every succeeding generation, to make its contribution, however meagre, to the living growth of our national life, and to the slow but sure development of our political institutions.

There has been in recent years a more constant development in the direction of a more direct and extended consultation between Great Britain and the dominions. This is no novel method. As far back as the days before the declaration of the independence of the United States, Edmund Burke was for years the agent in London of the state of New York, in direct communication with the British government, while from time to time the state of Pennsylvania sent Benjamin Franklin to London as a special commissioner to adjust matters with the British government. Our older British colonies did the same thing, and were so represented at intervals. In 1880 we sent a high commissioner to London for the first time to provide a source of information between this country and the British government, and although it is sometimes said that our successive high commissioners at London have been somewhat estranged from the ideals of this country, and that in the atmosphere of London they did not clearly apprehend the views of the people they represented, yet I think it is the opinion in this country that without exception our high commissioners have represented Canada in a manner that merits approval for themselves, and in such a way as to facilitate the development of a better feeling of goodwill between this Canada of ours and the mother country in which they were our representatives. I think on the whole they have faithfully and efficiently performed their duties.

Then we have had the development of the Imperial conference, and, as the leader of the opposition stated, we have had this development through various phases during the war down to the recent conferences of 1923 and 1926. But it is clear that in recent years there has not been any overt attempt on the part of the British government to restrain or restrict in any particular the absolute authority of the several dominions in the administration of their domestic affairs. It is suggested in the press—I do not know whether the Prime Minister himself would suggest it—that the result of the deliberations of the latest Imperial conference is to proclaim a new Magna Charta for the British Empire, but I think the circumstances under which the original Magna Charta was granted were so entirely different that the use of the term tends to a complete misunderstanding of the atmosphere of the recent conference. The Magna Charta of King John was a demand for the head of the sovereign, unless the concessions demanded should be made. There has been no strife between these dominions and the British Crown or the British government; they have ungrudgingly and graciously acceded from year to year to almost every suggestion made by the representatives of the dominions. For several years, however, two divergent tendencies have been manifest in the direction and control of our relations with foreign states, that is, the direction and control of the relations of this dominion in reference to foreign states. Gradually in commercial negotiations, beginning as far back as when Sir John A. Macdonald represented Canada at the Washington treaty; later when Sir Charles Tupper represented Canada at Washington in the negotiation of the Fisheries treaty, and more recently when Mr. Fielding represented Canada in the negotiation of the commercial treaty with France, we have requested and have been granted the authority to deal in commercial matters and with respect to commercial treaties with all foreign states. But in respect of foreign policy there is still a marked divergence. Claims hitherto made to consultation in matters of common interest have asserted for the Dominion a measure of equality, but only a measure of equality with respect to Great Britain; and such consultation, which is largely dependent upon continued good will can certainly be promoted, to a very large extent, by careful and timely extension or development of the existing machinery of what I may call well-lubricated intercourse and communication. As to this there have been really no wide differences of opinion between the successive governments of Canada and the government of Great Britain. But dominion claims to independent action in foreign affairs imply a demand for equality of status with independent foreign states. That concession is not one for Great Britain to make, and it is one which up to this time no foreign state has ever made. I do not need to go into the particulars but even France, and more recently the United States, have shown very great reluctance indeed to concede to us, as a dominion, equality of status in dealing with them as independent foreign states. The implications of this tendency of the dominions to assert independent political action were recognized in Lord Ripon's despatch of 1895, when he was Secretary of State for the Colonies. He then stated the implications which I think continue down to this day. He said:

> A foreign power, can only be approached through Her Majesty's representative, and any agreement entered into with it, affecting any part of Her Majesty's dominions, is an agreement between Her Majesty and the sovereign of the foreign state, and it is through Her Majesty's government that the foreign state would apply, in case of any question arising under it.
> To give to the colonies the power of negotiating treaties for themselves without reference to Her Majesty's government would be to give them an international status as separate and sovereign states, and would be equivalent to breaking up the empire into a number of independent states.

I am reading from the Parliamentary Papers of 1895, C. 7824. And again, particularly in the London conferences of 1907 and 1911, the view has been emphatically expressed by many representatives of the dominions, as well as by representatives of the British government, that the empire must be one from the point of view of its political treaty relations with all foreign states. We all remember Mr. Balfour's dictum, I think it was at the conference in 1911, that Great Britain could not share with the dominions the direction and control of foreign policy; and even to-day Great Britain, with her far-flung empire—dealing if you will and restricting the application of your words to her possessions, her colonies, outside of the dominions—touches a foreign state at every point of the seven seas, and she must have and exercise a large power of direction and control in dealing with all foreign countries whose interests are adverse to hers or to the empire of which she forms a part.

The imperial resolutions of 1923, which were submitted by the Prime Minister to this House for confirmation, contemplated two types of international agreement in some of which only one part and in others more than one part of the empire is concerned, and the procedure in detail was prescribed for the negotiation of these two types of treaties. That procedure was formally ratified by this House. But it is significant, I think, of the incompleteness of the work of successive Imperial conferences that the conference of 1926 has, in my opinion, apparently modified very considerably in very essential particulars the procedure prescribed in 1923 and ratified by this parliament last year; and it leads to the reflection that one may sincerely doubt whether the political and social engagements of the representatives of the dominions at any hurried meeting of the Imperial conference will conduce to that careful consideration and comprehensive expression of inter-imperial relationships which is necessary in order that they may be clearly studied, understood and expressed. And one may also doubt, I think, whether the representation of the dominion by party leaders only at any such Imperial conference, as suggested by the leader of the opposition, may be deemed to be binding upon the judgment and conscience of the whole body of the electorate of this country. If we are to have Imperial conferences called for the purpose of formulating a more complete code, and defining in more explicit terms inter-imperial relations and the relations of each dominion to foreign states, while the Prime Minister of the country undoubtedly must have an effective voice, yet for the preservation of domestic unity in dealing with foreign states, and in furtherance of the desire shared by all to preserve the unity of the empire to which we belong, provision should be made for the representation at such conferences of the views of opposing groups and parties in this country.

To resume, it was, I think, distinctly affirmed by the resolution of 1923 that Canada, as well as the other five dominions, had acquired a constitutional right to accept or to be excluded from the operation of treaties negotiated by the government of Great Britain which would otherwise directly affect Canada's international obligations and interests, and it was affirmed by the Canadian parliament at its last session that the Canadian government should signify its acceptance of the terms of any such treaty only upon the authority of a resolution formally presented to and accepted by the Canadian parliament. I think that is, perhaps, a fair resumé or epitome of those resolutions of last year.

One thing occurred to me in reading this report of the Imperial conference. I have had considerable experience in various parts of the world in drafting complicated agreements and contracts where large interests were concerned, and where I met around the table lawyers of other countries and of other languages I always found it very convenient indeed to ask opposing counsel to make the first draft of the proposed agreement, because when they did it with carefulness they disclosed on the very face of the draft contract all those matters for which their clients were really contending, and my duty then was, if my clients would not accede to their extreme demands, to use such intelligence as I had to bring about modifications by way of addenda, parentheses and amending conditions, so as to remove or ameliorate all the burdensome conditions imposed by opposing counsel. Now when I read this draft report, I think it is clear that there were what you might call some rather extreme demands made by the representatives of one or more of the dominions—of course, I accept fully the statement of the Prime Minister that he expressed no grievances and made no extreme demands—and those extreme demands are granted, or are seemingly granted, by the terms of this report through the expression of certain well-known platitudes with respect to the autonomy of the dominions. We have such statements, for instance, as that declaring that the dominions are:

> —autonomous communities within the British Empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the crown, and freely associated as members of the British commonwealth of nations.

Again, the report says:

> Though every dominion is now, and must always remain, the sole judge of the nature and extent of its co-operation, no common cause will, in our opinion, be thereby imperilled.

Now that conveys to my mind that some draftsman, perhaps an astute English draftsman, conceded the idea that the dominions are autonomous, with equality of status, but insisted nevertheless that, being partners in the empire, there are certain implied duties and obligations to which we are expected to respond. I can picture to my mind the smile of satisfaction which might have fluttered over the face of two such astute draftsmen as Lord Birkenhead or Lord Balfour, two of the most astute political strategists that the recent political life of England has produced, when they witnessed the drafting and acceptation of the latter clause. For do not such clauses as those implicitly, and yet emphatically, declare that we are partners in the empire, equal in status, if you will, participating as citizens of that empire in the advantages and privileges, —world-extended privileges—which accrue to the position and power of membership in the empire; yet, they express by implication that by moral obligation, by the precepts of common and equity law, we, as such partners, equal in status, are in fact morally bound, by the very implications of the contract, to share in the international obligations of the empire and in the liabilities imposed by such obligations to the extent of our resources; and though, as it is stated in another clause, we are the sole judges of the nature and extent of our co-operation, yet the declaration as to our status is made by the representatives of Great Britain, I believe, in the abiding faith and confidence that no common cause will be imperilled by the lack of our support. That is their attitude, and that is the basis on which they concede these matters of constitutional right, rights which have been recognized throughout all recent years. If you look beyond the mere platitudes to the obvious restrictions and modifications inserted in this report, I do not think that you could find a more emphatic declaration of imperial solidarity than is contained in certain of the implications of this new covenant which is about to be presented to us for our acceptance.

Note one thing, which has not been published in the press so far as it has come under my observation. We are presented with certain constitutional aspects of this one report, but there were other reports adopted by this conference, and one of these reports, I find, contains a resolution on the matter of defence, as follows:

1. The resolutions on defence adopted at the last session of the conference are re-affirmed.

Then this resolution of 1926 makes reference to a paragraph showing what was the nature of the resolutions which were accepted at the Imperial conference of 1923, resolutions that it was not deemed advisable, perhaps by oversight or otherwise, to submit to this parliament for ratification. We had submitted to us, at the last session of the last parliament, certain matters of privilege accruing to us with respect to the negotiation of treaties, but this other resolution of 1923, which was re-affirmed in 1926, has never been submitted to us for ratification; I am speaking within my own recollection when I say that. That resolution reads as follows:

1. The conference affirms that it is necessary to provide for the adequate defence of the territories and trade of the several countries comprising the British Empire.

And then, going on as to how that defence is to be provided, it says:

The conference suggests the following as guiding principles:

(a) The primary responsibility of each portion of the empire represented at the conference for its own local defence.

(b) Adequate provision for safeguarding the maritime communications of the several parts of the empire and the routes and waterways along and through which their armed forces and trade pass.

(c) The provision of naval bases and facilities for repair and fuel so as to ensure the mobility of the fleets.

(d) The desirability of the maintenance of a minimum standard of naval strength, namely, equality with the naval strength of any foreign power, in accordance with the provisions of the Washington treaty on limitation of armament, as approved by Great Britain, all the self-governing dominions, and India.

So I can well understand that British statesmen would agree to an expression of certain so-called constitutional rights, long since acquired and developed from year to year in constitutional practice, because they received a quid pro quo, the implications of which are enormous in extent, in that they imply the solidarity of the British Empire and the moral responsibility upon each and every dominion to make every sacrifice to the extent of its power and resources, in order to maintain the empire's defence throughout all succeeding years. If we are to have this Imperial conference report of 1926 submitted to parliament, let us have both sides of the shield, so that we may clearly and distinctly understand the obligations which this parliament is asked to undertake on behalf of this generation of Canadians and other generations yet to come.

There has been a reference in this report to the Locarno treaty. We have never had that treaty submitted to us for approval or discussion. Some calls were made, I think, incidentally, for the submission of the treaty during the last parliament. but it was a matter entirely within the discretion of the Prime Minister and his colleagues in the government, and they decided to withhold that treaty from discussion, or any pertinent or relevant discussion that could affect the question of Canada's acceptance or rejection of its terms. This Imperial conference report in its reference to the Locarno treaty is rather ambiguous in its terms, and I would be gratified, before that report is finally accepted, to have from the Prime Minister a clear and complete expression of the extent to which the acceptance of the report of the Imperial conference dealing with the Locarno treaty imposes moral obligations upon us. I see in the press to-day a despatch from London which reads:

London, Dec. 13.—Lieut.-Colonel L. C. Amery, Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs, answering a question in the House of Commons to-day as to whether any of the British dominions were now associated with Great Britain in her responsibilities under the Locarno treaty, said that if the questioner meant the assumption of obligations under the article in the treaty dealing with mutual guarantees, the answer would be in the negative. However, he referred the questioner to the unanimous approval of the Locarno treaty by the Imperial conference.

The questioner declared that the resolution passed by the Imperial conference on the recommendation of the Premiers' committee on Inter-imperial relations had no solid meaning, and he asked if Colonel Amery had made any representations to Sir Austen Chamberlain, Foreign Secretary, to the effect that Great Britain should not be left isolated in this way.

Colonel Amery replied that he thought the resolution of the Imperial conference expressing satisfaction with the foreign policy of His Majesty's government was a solid contribution.

Leaving the matter there, I invite at a later date an expression of opinion from the leader of the government as to what is the extent and nature of that solid contribution which we are to give in respect to the Locarno treaty, which has never yet been submitted to this House for ratification or approval.

Now, furthermore, the report of the Imperial relations committee of this latest Imperial conference, speaking in regard to the negotiation of treaties states:

When a government has received information of the intention of any other government to conduct negotiations it is incumbent upon it to indicate its attitude with reasonable promptitude. So long as the initiating government receives no adverse comments, and so long as its policy involves no active obligations on the part of other governments, it may proceed on the assumption that its policy is generally acceptable. It must, however, before taking any steps which might involve other governments in any active obligations, obtain their definite assent.

And then it proceeds:

Where by the nature of a treaty it is desirable that it should be ratified on behalf of all the governments of the empire the initiating government may assume that the government which has had full opportunity of indicating its attitude, and has made no adverse comments, will concur in the ratification of the treaty.

Applying this declaration to the negotiation of treaties by the government of Great Britain, then when the government of Canada has received notice of the intention of the government of Great Britain to conduct negotiations with Germany or France, or with any other foreign state, though the treaty to be consummated many affect the rights and interests of British citizens wherever domiciled, or British shipping or other property, belonging to Canadian citizens, wherever located, the government of Great Britain, in the absence of adverse comments from the Canadian government, may assume that its policy is acceptable to Canada, and that the government of Canada, having made no adverse comments, is morally and in good faith bound to concur in the ratification of the treaty so negotiated.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Such treaties may involve the rights and privileges of Canadian citizens in any part of the world, outside the British Empire. We as Canadian citizens have rights guaranteed to us by the British constitution in every part of the world to which we go, as citizens of the British Empire, rights which guarantee to us certain respectful treatment under the Union Jack wherever it flies throughout the British Empire, or wherever it flies on the seven seas, or on the coasts of any foreign state. Those rights and privileges which we enjoy as British citizens throughout the world should not be easily sacrificed, and should not be compromised readily without very clear and careful consideration as to the effects involved. We recall the declaration of the Prime Minister at the last session of parliament that hereafter no British treaty is to be binding upon Canada, unless it received the ratification of the Canadian government, and we by express resolution of parliament declared that no consent or approval or ratification should be expressed by the Canadian government, except upon the authority of parliament itself; yet we find in this new document the possibility that some default, on the part of the Prime Minister or the Minister of External Affairs of Canada, in making adverse comments on any treaty, may result in imposing that treaty upon us, we being morally bound to accept it, simply because one department of this government, through inadvertance or otherwise, fails in the performance of its duty. I find it impossible to reconcile that with the resolution passed by this House last session. Then we have this statement:

Every governing member of the empire is master of its destiny.

I can accept that with modification and restriction. As a platitude for the public platform it is well enough. But as a statement of constitutional right it requires many modifications and restrictions in its application. In a restricted sense Canada is mistress of her own political destiny; but the very existence of Canada as a political entity depends upon keeping inviolate the understandings and conventions embodied in our own constitution with respect to the rights and interests of certain racial and religious minorities, with respect to the rights of certain provinces, such as the provinces by the sea, which have a representation in the Senate that is valuable for the preservation of their specific interests, and with respect to other matters. Those understandings and conventions must be maintained in order that we preserve the political entity and political unity of this country.

Therefore I am driven back to the assumption that when the Prime Minister was giving countenance to that broad statement, it was not his intention thereby to abrogate the provisions of the British North America Act, which is a statute of the Imperial parliament defining the minority and other provincial rights to which we had agreed by convention and arrangement upon the organization of the provinces of Canada into one great confederation. If there is equality of status, perhaps I may add another term to the definition which was given by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie). Equality of status may mean that the Canadian parliament cannot of its own volition override acts of the Imperial parliament; and it may mean, just as it has meant since confederation was formed, that in the last analysis the Imperial parliament has a deciding voice in respect to the nature and extent of the amendments to the British North America Act which are sought by the Canadian parliament or by the provinces of Canada. If in order to achieve our national destiny we wish to abolish the rights of any province, or if we wish otherwise to modify our own constitution, I think we will be driven back upon the old procedure of asking the Imperial parliament to ratify a new agreement, concurred in not only by the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, but concurred in also by the provincial legislatures of Canada in so far as their special rights and interests might be affected.

Now, the definition of the office of Governor General and of his status does not give validity to one contention of the Prime Minister advanced during the recent elections. I understood, without quoting his exact words, that not only in this House in the last days of June, but throughout this country on the platform, he expressed the contention that the life and independence of this very parliament in which we sit may be determined, by the sole and arbitrary will of the prime minister in the exercise of his sole and arbitrary discretion, by the advice which he shall give on each and every occasion and under each and every condition to His Excellency respecting the dissolution of parliament. That I understand to be the new constitutional principle which he announced on the eve of the last election, and on which he sought the verdict of the people. All I can say to that is this. We do not wish, I think, to create a new master; we do not wish that a prime minister representing either party should be invested with such arbitrary power that, whenever his policy meets with the disapprobation of parliament, he can thereupon destroy its very life and hold possible dissolution, at his discretion, as a weapon of blackmail over the heads of the independent members of this House of Commons. If that new principle is to be introduced into the constitution of this country, it should not be introduced by mere platform utterances or in the confusion of a general election; but first, at least, it should be introduced as a rule and principle to guide His Excellency in the matter of dissolution, a rule and principle that should be submitted to parliament itself, and first be approved of by the members of parliament. I do not think that either the House or the country will vest the prime minister with an arbitrary power that has never existed in English history since the days of Cromwell.

I will not take any more time, Mr. Speaker, but there are other very important matters which the members of the Imperial conference, in their wise discretion, have left for further consideration by committees of the Imperial conference and, I suppose, by their respective governments. These are:

1. The details of methods and forms of communication and consultation between the British government and the governments of the dominions;

2. The scope and application of the Colonial Laws Validity Act;

3. The right of each dominion to legislate with extra-territorial effect, or to give extra-territorial operation to its existing legislation;

4. The scope and application of Imperial Shipping Acts to Canadian shipping and Canadian seamen;

5. The status of Canadian shipping and Canadian seamen and citizens in the event of Great Britain being involved in foreign wars in which Canada may refuse actively to participate;

6. The restriction of appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in criminal as well as civil matters;

7. The confusion that may arise by reason of conventions or treaties made by His Majesty on behalf of two or more parts of the empire, which are more or less inconsistent in their terms;

And this is very important:

8. The responsibility of Great Britain with respect to the enforcement of treaties made by His Majesty on behalf of a dominion government, which the foreign state may repudiate or refuse to carry out;

9. The obligations, moral or otherwise, of the dominions as members of the League of Nations, with respect to the treaty of Locarno.

These are not defined.

10. The reservation of dominion legislation.

All these, thank Providence, are left for further consideration and discussion.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I think we may express our grateful appreciation of the services of the Prime Minister in London, and particularly our appreciation of the fact that the great body of these intricate questions have been left, as they have been left ever since Canada was formed, to the consideration of the governments of the respective dominions when particular events arise demanding discussion and decision. And I think, in spite of the concession of this "great charter," we will go on and preserve the unity of the empire chiefly by dealing with events only as they arise, after consultation, with goodwill, being ever anxious to conciliate and adopt so far as we can the views of other sister dominions and of Great Britain herself, all to the end of preserving the unity of the British Empire, upon which the peace of this world for years to come must so largely depend.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): Before I discuss the speech from the throne I desire to congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, on being re-elected to the chair. I am quite sure that with your past experience you will be able to perform your duties with dignity and impartiality, and I have no doubt that all hon. gentlemen will join in wishing you every success in your office. I desire also to congratulate the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) on the position to which he has been elevated. We realize, of course, that he now holds a very important position and an onerous one. I listened to him yesterday with a good deal of satisfaction in that his address was most modest in its tone, and because of that fact he is perhaps an improvement upon leaders recently occupying the position in this House. I had not the privilege of hearing the mover and seconder of the address and so I am unable at the moment to compliment them upon their efforts, but I trust that I shall have ample time to read the report of their remarks and later on to congratulate them personally. I have been told that they made splendid presentations and I shall certainly take occasion in due course to offer them congratulations.

Two of the most important addresses in this House have concerned themselves more particularly with the conference recently held in London. I understand that time will be afforded the House to discuss later on the results of that conference, and therefore I do not propose to inflict upon hon. members at this time any remarks in that regard except to observe incidentally that I trust, as no doubt other hon. members do, that the efforts of our delegates representing Canada and this House at the conference have been successful.

It has been customary since I have been a member of this House to discuss election results on the meeting of a new parliament. For some peculiar reason nothing has been said up to the present moment in regard to the recent election. Everyone remembers no doubt the situation that developed during the last session. A special committee was appointed to inquire into the conduct of the Department of Customs and Excise. This committee divulged certain facts which were taken into consideration by the House, and our Conservative friends when parliament dissolved felt they had a sure election cry. They expected to come back in sufficient numbers to control the government. This has not happened. Why? We cannot for a moment suppose that the people of Canada did not take into account the revelations that were made by the committee; we cannot help assuming that these disclosures were considered. There must therefore have been something besides the report of the Customs committee which the people took into consideration when they cast their ballots at the last general election. I have discussed the question with many people in many walks of life, and I can say quite emphatically that, generally speaking, the people were influenced more by the legislative program of the last session and by the budget which was brought down than they were by the results of the Customs inquiry. That program and that budget had, in my opinion, more to do with the outcome of the election than had the inquiry. On many occasions I have listened to members of this House referring to the great leaders of the two old parties in the past. We have all heard hon. gentlemen declaring their acceptance of the principles laid down by Sir John A. Macdonald or Sir Wilfrid Laurier, as the case might be. I have often been astonished that men with any intelligence should speak in that manner of the political leaders of the two old parties in decades gone by. No doubt these were great men and they had great problems to face. But let us remember that those problems were incident to that day and the problems of that time are not the problems of our generation. Consequently any government that wishes to remain in power in this country for any length of time will have to apply itself to present problems rather than lean upon its predecessors.

Coming to the speech from the throne, it seems to me that in some particulars it is very indefinite; I will mention the points as I go along. However, taking it as a whole, I may congratulate the government upon the general content of the speech. We view with a great deal of pleasure the fact that the government intends to introduce the measures that were passed last session but which did not become law, which measures I feel will naturally go through without any great discussion or any waste of time. The most important measures passed last session, in which we are more particularly interested, include rural credits, which is a matter of great urgency. We regret the circumstances which have kept this legislation in abeyance, and we hope that it will eventually become law and so prove of great benefit to the agricultural sections of the country. There is also the legislation dealing with the revaluation of soldier settlers' lands. This is an important piece of legislation and it is absolutely essential that it be pressed through the House as soon as possible in order to afford relief to those men who fought so valiantly for us but who find themselves to-day in a condition so onerous that it is almost impossible for them to stay on the land.

Another important measure is the old age pensions bill which I am glad to see the government proposes reintroducing. True, this particular measure is not of great magnitude; it only begins to touch the question. But to the extent that the government are making an effort to deal with the matter, we should give them our support. I notice also in the speech that the government purpose re-establishing the special committee for the revision of the rules of the House. Those of us who have been members of parliament for any length of time realize that the rules must be amended in some particulars to allow the business of the House to be carried on more expeditiously. When there were only two parties the rules were probably adequate, but with the advent of several parties and groups the situation has altogether changed and consequently the rules should be revised and brought up to date to meet present conditions and to facilitate the passage of legislation.

One of the items in the speech which I consider very indefinite and in respect of which I purpose reserving judgment is that dealing with the coking of Canadian coal. We have no intimation as to how far the government propose to go in this direction. Possibly they have in mind the coal situation in Nova Scotia, but I would remind the House that for decades past, industries in that province have received bounties and subsidies by the million, which bounties and subsidies have only made millionaires of a few people while they have impoverished the many. We therefore reserve our judgment in that regard, waiting with patience for the proposals of the government.

Dealing with the situation which this brings to our minds, that is, the maritime situation, there is one thought which I would like to impress upon this House. Before we start to tamper with this great problem, let us first of all be sure of our ground, and then let us be sure that whatever action we may take will be all-sufficient to meet the conditions as they exist in the maritime provinces. I do not believe we should deal with this problem in a piecemeal manner; we should do it thoroughly, and it will be more effective. When the report of the Duncan commission comes before the House I trust that we will be in a position to offer some constructive suggestions in that regard.

I also notice that the government propose to make some amendments to the Canada Grain Act. These amendments are not set out in the speech from the throne, of course, but I presume that one amendment likely to be brought forward will deal with the property rights of the farmer in respect to the routing and the destination of his grain. Hon. members will remember that two years ago we passed a new Canada Grain Act in which certain amendments were included which deprived the farmer of his property rights in routing the grain to a terminal of his own choosing. I opposed that amendment when the bill was before the House, and I oppose the situation as it is to-day. You cannot deprive any large class, such as the agricultural class, of their property rights without at the same time opening the door for the demand that other classes be deprived of such rights also, and therefore it is very important that the property rights of farmers in the routing of their grain should be restored at the earliest possible moment. If that right is not restored, we will have the situation in Canada of one class being deprived of certain rights while other classes are not so deprived.

There is still another matter touching the grain situation which is very important, and I must confess that we are looking for some way out of the difficulty. Under the Grain Act it is determined how our grain shall be graded, and the certificates of the inspection department are very important. In recent years we have enlarged our inspection system through the creation of new inspection points, and as a result we find that with the larger number of points where grain is inspected, the dissatisfaction of the farmer in regard to the grading has increased to a large extent. It seems unfortunate that such should be the case, but most farmers to-day feel that they can get a better grade for their grain by allowing it to go through Winnipeg and be inspected at that point. The point I desire more particularly to emphasize, however, has regard to the moisture content of the grain. This is a very important matter, and it has become very important to western farmers particularly during the last two years, because of weather conditions. If the House will bear with me for a few moments I will explain the situation. Grain may be given a straight grade provided it does not contain too much moisture. We have nothing in the Canada Grain Act; we have no order in council and no regulation of the Board of Grain Commissioners which determines the percentage of moisture which is allowed in straight grade grain. We have always understood that fourteen per cent was supposed to be the maximum moisture content for straight grade grain, but we found on examination and inquiry that there was no regulation or order in council in force which stipulated that particular percentage. During the last session of parliament we had several interviews with the Board of Grain Commissioners, and when we inquired of them as to how they determined whether or not grain was straight grade in so far as the moisture content was concerned, the chief inspector and the chairman of the appeal board stated that it was determined merely by the inspector feeling the grain, and if in his opinion the grain was fit for warehousing, it went as straight grade. If on the other hand he determined that the grain was not fit for warehousing, it would be graded as rejected, and consequently there would be quite a difference in the price paid. We also received the information from the commissioners that in some years the natural moisture content of grain was much higher than in others; the chairman of the appeal board went so far as to say that in some years the average moisture content ran close to fifteen per cent, and yet that grain would go as straight grade and consequently would be fit for warehousing. The situation to-day seems to be that it is almost impossible for us to set a definite percentage of moisture content for straight grade grain, because of the varying climatic conditions from year to year. Some remedy must be found in order to satisfy the producers of this grain. I noticed a press report some time ago wherein the Board of Grain Commissioners stated that when grain was tested for its moisture content by the appliances at their disposal, anything over 14.4 per cent would go as damp or rejected, yet in the same despatch I noticed that the Board of Grain Commissioners stated that any grain with less than 15 per cent moisture content would be put into storage. Naturally we want to know the reason for the difference.

If it is possible for the Board of Grain Commissioners or the elevator companies to store grain with a moisture content of less than 15 per cent that grain should evidently go as straight grade. The only remark I wish to make in that connection is that when the Board of Grain Commissioners hand out these rulings, it would be well for them to explain the reasons for them, so that the farmer who produces the grain will know the intentions of the board in that regard. The information they give out is so meagre that the suspicions of the farmer are immediately aroused, and consequently he feels that he is not receiving fair treatment. I hope, however, that the government will give us an opportunity to make representations to them when the question of these amendments comes up.

I now come, Mr. Speaker, to the question of railways. The first point I wish to discuss in regard to the railway situation is with reference to the Hudson Bay railway. We note with a good deal of pleasure that it is the intention of the government to finish the construction of this line, so I hope that at no far distant date steel will be laid to the bay. We believe that this railway, even if it serves only for colonization purposes and to tap the ore fields in northern Manitoba, will be a success. When we come to the question of the development of the port, however, we enter into another phase of the situation altogether; and I feel that the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) has probably done the right thing in securing expert advice before proceeding further. Nevertheless, I trust it is not intended to postpone the time when this port will be equipped with the necessary facilities. We receive many contradictory reports as to the feasibility of the Hudson bay route. Personally I think it is feasible, but if there is any doubt about the matter, allow me to suggest to the Minister of Railways what may provide a possible solution. We have in the Canadian Government Merchant Marine many vessels that are now being held for sale, that is to say vessels that are of no value to the marine service. Some of these vessels have been sold already at a very low price, or at a price which is insignificant when compared with what they cost the country. Would it not be possible for the government to take one of these ships and send it up into Hudson strait, the point where it is important there should be an investigation, run the vessel each summer for a certain period, and find out the exact situation in regard to ice flowing through this strait. By adopting such a plan as that we can get some authentic information, and I trust it will be of a nature that will assist this House in determining to what extent it would be desirable to spend the country's money in the development of the harbour of Port Nelson.

Coming now to our National Railway system I believe that we all desire to congratulate the president and his officers upon the splendid financial showing made by that system last year. They have succeeded, to a wonderful degree, in reducing the deficits which have burdened the system from year to year. We hope that that increased prosperity will be maintained, more particularly in the western sections of the Dominion, and that the time will not be far distant when the Canadian National Railways will be able to meet their obligations in full.

I note in the speech from the throne the statement that the government purposes bringing in a three-year branch line programme. I think that those of us who have followed developments in that regard will admit that the last three-year programme has been a success, and it is our belief that it is a good method of carrying out new construction in so far as the National lines are concerned. But there is one point I should like to impress upon the Minister of Railways and it is this: There are many branch lines on the National system, more particularly in western Canada, that are only partly completed. These branch lines are intended to serve well populated districts in the west, and we believe that every effort should be made to complete them. Those of us who have followed the situation know very well that no railway system can make a success of branch lines that are only partially completed. For one thing they are operated under a heavier expense than they would be if the lines were finished. There is no doubt that the completion of branch lines already under way should be the first objective of the National Railway system.

The speech from the throne also intimates that it is proposed to make some arrangement with the debenture holders of the old Grand Trunk system. These debentures, I understand, were issued in perpetuity. I do not know exactly what the government's proposal is, but I can assure them that we will give it the closest possible examination. Any proposals of this character should be fair to all parties concerned, and we hope the government will be successful in adjusting the matter to the satisfaction of the House and the people of Canada as a whole.

Hon. members who sat in this House during the last four or five years will recall that we have had before us what is known as the Crowsnest pass agreement. I do not believe it is necessary for me to enter at this time into any detailed explanation of that agreement. I feel that all I need say is that it was entered into in 1897 between the then government under Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Canadian Pacific Railway. Under the agreement certain subsidies were granted to the latter corporation in return for which they consented to a maximum rate as regards grain and grain products and certain commodities coming from eastern Canada. At that time grain rates were much lower than the maximum fixed by the agreement but the Great war brought about abnormal conditions resulting in a gradual increase of those rates until they reached the maximum agreed upon. Later on the agreement was suspended by act of parliament. In the year 1922, under another statute, it was restored in part with respect to grain and grain products originating in western Canada and going to Port Arthur and Fort William. I believe, too, that that portion of the agreement affecting commodities coming from eastern Canada was once more brought into force. Subsequently we discovered certain discrepancies as regards the rates applicable to western Canada under that agreement. That is to say certain points at a similar distance from Fort William or Port Arthur were being charged a higher rate than were points at an equal distance on the main line of the Canadian Pacific. The government of the day recognized the disability from which those producers were suffering who were paying higher rates than they should pay, and in 1925 brought in amending legislation. In such legislation that part of the Crowsnest pass agreement which dealt with maximum rates on certain commodities originating east of Fort William was abrogated. It was anticipated that when the amending legislation was passed, the railway companies would naturally apply the rates as parliament expected them to be applied, that is with fairness, and that there would be no discrimination in the application of the rates to points at a similar distance from Fort William and Port Arthur. Soon after this legislation became effective, and it went into force on the 27th of June, 1925, the Board of Railway Commissioners asked the railway companies to file a schedule of tariffs consistent with it. Up to the present time the railway companies have never filed that schedule of tariffs. They have sheltered behind this claim: They say that the rates in force are, in their judgment, neither unjust nor discriminatory, and consequently they should remain in force. The situation is this, Mr. Speaker. On the main line of the Canadian Pacific railway these rates are in force, but on railway lines south and on railway lines north of the main line of the Canadian Pacific railway, higher rates have to be paid for a similar distance from Fort William, running from one to five cents per hundred pounds higher, and thus discriminating against those people who live on these other lines as compared with those who live on the main line of the Canadian Pacific railway.

In 1904 this parliament by legislation created the Board of Railway Commissioners. The chief function of the Board of Railway Commissioners was to administer the Railway Act, and to see that railway rates were equitable. That was the desire of parliament, but what do we find? We find that when the Board of Railway Commissioners ask the railway companies to file a schedule of rates in conformity with the legislation passed in 1925, the railway companies ignore that order. It was on the 8th day of July, 1925, that general order No. 420 was passed by the railway board, requiring the railway companies to file their schedules, but as I stated before, they have never laid their schedules before the board. The situation, then, is simply this: Our railway companies are flouting the Board of Railway Commissioners. They go even beyond that; they are flouting the authority of this parliament. We have always understood and believed that this parliament was supreme, that when it passed legislation to remedy any disabilities, its order would be supreme and be given heed to, but here we have two large railway companies practically saying to this parliament, and to the board that was created by this parliament to have jurisdiction over them: We take no notice of what you do; we shall do just as we please. I would ask this House, are we going to allow that state of affairs to continue? Is it not time that something was done to make these railway companies recognize the fact that this parliament is supreme, and that when it passes legislation, its legislation must be lived up to? We cannot for one moment admit that any large corporation in Canada can at its own sweet will do just exactly as it likes and pay no heed whatever to the legislation passed by this parliament. Therefore, I respectfully submit to the Prime Minister and to his colleagues that this situation should in some manner be remedied, and that these two railway companies should be made to understand that when this parliament passes legislation, that legislation must be lived up to by them just as much as by anybody else in this country.

There is another matter in regard to the railways that I should like to bring to the attention of the House. I have stated previously in my remarks that this House created the Board of Railway Commissioners by legislation in 1904. The membership of the board is six. Recently there has arisen a very peculiar situation on the board, which might have been anticipated because of the even number of its membership. On several important questions that have come before the board, when a decision had to be reached we have found that the board split three to three, with the unfortunate consequence that no action could be taken on these important matters where there was no majority decision by the board. We submit that that is not a proper state of things to continue, and that the board should consist of an odd number of members, whether it be five or seven.

Furthermore, we believe that western Canada is not adequately represented upon that board. In view of the fact that the three western provinces and British Columbia are very important factors in providing traffic for our railways, we submit that these four provinces should be more fully represented on the board than they are at the present time.

There is another question on which I wish to speak, which is not mentioned in the speech from the throne, and that is the income tax. The reason why I bring this matter to the attention of the House is because of a pamphlet that I hold in my hand, called The Retail Trade Review, issued by the Retail Trade Bureau of Canada. This is a national organization, and I understand that this pamphlet has been distributed from one end of Canada to the other. The article in this pamphlet is headed: The Vigorous and Aggressive Campaign Undertaken by the Retail Trade Bureau of Canada Against the Dominion Income Tax to be Continued Until the Tax is Entirely Abolished. That seems to be the purpose of this organization, the abolition of the income tax, through persuasion, or ways and means best known to themselves. Now the basic principle of all taxation has been accepted as being the ability of the person to pay, and we submit that the income tax carries out that principle fairly. The income tax takes more, of course, from those who have the greater ability to pay, and therefore we maintain that it is a fair tax.

Another reason why we support the income tax is because it is a direct tax. We believe that direct taxation is far better than indirect taxation. We believe that if we had more direct taxation the people of Canada would take more interest in public affairs in this country, would watch more closely the expenditures of their various legislative bodies, and consequently we believe that this tax has a beneficial effect all round. I wish to call the attention of the Prime Minister and his colleagues to the following paragraph in this pamphlet:

> In presenting our claims to the government a large and influential delegation waited upon the members of the cabinet on March 12, 1926, and presented a memorial setting forth our reasons for the necessity of abolishing the Dominion income tax, and we are more than pleased that the government recognized the injustice of the application of this tax and saw fit to substantially reduce it.

What I would like to ask the government is this: Is that a fair interpretation of the attitude of the government on that occasion? We realize, of course, that it is quite possible for delegations such as this to read something into the attitude of the government which the government never intended, but we would like to know from the government very definitely whether that is their attitude and whether it is their intention to gradually abolish this tax. We quite recognize the possibility of there being some inequalities in this tax, and so far as possible these inequalities should be removed. As far as the tax itself is concerned we contend the present percentage schedule should be maintained, because it is in the best interests of all concerned. In reading this particular pamphlet, I find that they stress very strongly the fact that in their opinion this income tax prevents more capital from coming into Canada. I am not satisfied for one moment that that is the case. For instance, I believe you will find that the protective tariff is more instrumental in preventing new capital coming to this country than the income tax, because the protective tariff is a tax upon new capital coming to this country. In order to demonstrate that, we must examine how capital comes into this country. In the first instance, of course, it comes in by way of a bank credit, but in the final analysis the bank credit must be followed by goods. In the final analysis the goods that are required for the purposes of production are capital and every high tariff placed on goods coming into this country is just so much of a tax on new capital coming in. I would like to refer hon. members back to the time when we had that great era of prosperity that is often spoken about, say from 1900 to 1912. That has been looked upon as the time when we had the greatest prosperity in this country, but how was that prosperity arrived at? It was arrived at because new capital was coming into Canada in the form of mortgages which were being placed upon lands which were being abandoned by the settlers.

Mr. BENNETT: And railway construction.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, we had railway construction it is true. But if you look up the trade returns of that period you will find our imports were always greater than our exports and that substantiates the argument I advance, that when new capital comes into the country it must come in the form of goods. Therefore, I trust the government will not under any consideration think that by reducing the income tax they are going to get more new capital into the country. If the government on the other hand would reduce the tariff, more particularly on those articles which bear high protective duties, they would do more in that way to bring new capital into the country than by tampering with the income tax.

There is another circumstance I would like to draw to the attention of the House in this regard. Last year provision was made for a tariff advisory board. Many applications have come before this board, more particularly for higher protective tariffs. Judging from some reports that have appeared in the press, I understand that the board, when hearing these applications, have gone fully into the question of capitalization, and the overhead that that capitalization means to the particular business concerned. It has been reported that when the business of these particular concerns has been investigated they have invariably stated that their plants were too large for the business available, and the size of their plants has necessitated a larger overhead than otherwise would be necessary. This merely shows that in so far as the manufacturing industries are concerned, we are not very much in need of new capital, but in so far as other industries are concerned, more particularly in regard to those industries which develop our natural resources, there is a possibility that we could do with a good deal of new capital in this country. But after all that may be said about this particular question, I trust hon. members will remember that our protective tariff is a greater barrier to the inflow of new capital to the natural industries than the incidence of the income tax.

During the last session of parliament a motion was placed on the order paper dealing with the transfer of the natural resources to the province of Alberta. For various reasons, or more particularly for one reason, this was not gone on with. It is quite true this covenant had been entered into between the federal government and the provincial government of Alberta. They were both parties to the agreement and signed it. Since the last session of parliament the government has referred the question of the validity of section 17 of the Alberta Autonomy bill of 1905 to the Supreme Court for a decision as to whether the particular clause in this section dealing with the question of denominational schools is valid or otherwise. We submit, Mr. Speaker, in all fairness to Alberta, that, in view of the fact that this matter will be decided by the Privy Council, there is no need to further withhold the natural resources from the province of Alberta, and that the natural resources should be transferred to the province, without any reference whatsoever to the school question. In all fairness to the province we believe that is the attitude the government should take. We maintain of course that by the act of 1905 the natural resources should have been transferred to the provinces at that time, but for certain considerations or for certain reasons it was not done. The sooner the natural resources are returend to the province the more expeditiously will those resources be developed. We have recognized that fact, and it has been our experience that long range administration is not very effective. Let me give you one instance, for example. All hon. members are all aware of course that certain developments are proceeding in Alberta in regard to oil. We are all aware that in certain portions of Alberta we have a large natural gas field. Arrangements have been made with certain companies to supply gas to the people of several cities in the province of Alberta. During the development for the securing of oil many gas fields have been tapped, and today millions of feet of gas are going to waste, yet in the city of Calgary, for instance, the people are paying 45 cents per 1,000 feet for gas. That situation should not be allowed to continue for any great length of time. We cannot waste a natural resource in that manner and still feel that we are looking after the interests not only of ourselves but of posterity. I am a firm believer in taking from our natural resources all that we require for our present day needs, but I am also just as firm a believer in preserving the balance for posterity, because after all we have that duty thrust upon us whether we like it or not. Taking these various factors into consideration, then, I submit that in all fairness the province of Alberta should have transferred to it these natural resources without reference to the difference of opinion with respect to the educational clauses of the act of 1905.

There is one other matter I wish to refer to and it is of importance to the province of Alberta. After the Panama canal was completed trial shipments of grain were made from our Pacific port of Vancouver. We found it to be quite feasible to ship grain by that route. Vancouver is certainly much nearer to the province of Alberta than either Fort William or Port Arthur, and naturally we desire to ship our grain by the cheapest possible route. The government of the day took into consideration the development of this port, and by legislation created a harbour commission composed of three members, charged with the responsibility of providing such appliances as are required to facilitate the passage of goods through the port. The largest single commodity going through that port at the present time is grain, and most of it is produced in the province of Alberta. In view of the situation we submit to the government that the wheat producers of Alberta should receive representation when the present vacancy on that board is filled. We would not like to see such a representative appointed as would look only after the interests of those producers and would discriminate against the interests of other shippers; but on the other hand we maintain that there is always a tendency for a commission of this description to place a higher cost upon the grain going through the port than should rightfully be levied against that commodity. Therefore we urge that it is not only in the interests of Alberta but also in the interests of Vancouver city and port that the wheat producers of Alberta who are providing the largest volume of the business going through that port should have representation on the board.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have only one other word to say. You will remember that when you were nominated for the position of Speaker I stated that we had created many precedents at the last session of parliament, and that it was very likely we would create some further precedents at this session. I find that I am in accord with most of what is contained in the speech from the throne, but I would not care to sanction some of the items until information with respect to them is available. Now, so far as I am concerned I purpose to create another precedent. If there is a division on the speech from the throne I intend to support the government, with the understanding that the items which are now so indefinite I will be free to discuss and even to vote against if I deem it desirable. It is an unfortunate circumstance in our parliamentary procedure that when the speech from the throne or the budget is before the House we must vote either for or against it as a whole. We all know that in either the speech from the throne or the budget there are some items that every member of the House can support, and it places such members in a very unpleasant position when they find that they must either vote in support of or against the budget or the speech from the throne, as the case may be, as a whole. We give warning to the House that we are going to take a different course. If we find there is more good than evil in the speech from the throne or in the budget, then we will support either, reserving to ourselves the right to speak or vote against anything therein contained which we think is wrong. That is the attitude we purpose to take, and I trust the House will accept this declaration in the same spirit in which it is made.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister yesterday referred to the endorsation the government had received in the recent elections. Perhaps I may be permitted to say that our little group here in this corner can boast what no other group can, that we came back fifty per cent stronger—we have one member more.

Last session, owing to the fact that this side of the House was very much crowded, we took our places on the government side, stating to the House that there was no particular political significance in our change, but that there we could hear and be heard to greater advantage. This session, since there are no cross benches and there is more room on this side of the House, we are back on what is termed the "opposition" side with a number of the farmer members, with whom during the past five years we have found ourselves working in very close co-operation. But let me say that we, like the hon. members around us, do not regard ourselves as necessarily being opposed to the government; we rather would emphasize the fact that we are trying as best we may under the existing rules of the House to maintain an independent position. We are thinking in terms of legislation rather than in terms of party. We propose to support to the best of our ability good legislation from whatever source it comes, but we do not propose to give unqualified allegiance to any party irrespective of their legislative programme or of their administrative efficiency.

The desire has been expressed that we ought to expedite the business of the House, and we in our corner here have every disposition to do so. However, I feel we have a perfect right, even during the few days we are here, to discuss various matters which come before us in the speech from the throne. I might call attention to the fact that two whole days were devoted to formal functions. Surely two or three days may be devoted to a discussion of the business of the country. There is indeed some little danger that we in Ottawa may forget the real business for which we come here. I notice the newspapers announce that we are in for a brilliant social season. In connection with the coming of the Governor General the newspapers of the country sent out a despatch to the effect that Ottawa society was agog over the prospects of a social season of luncheons, dinners, teas and dances. That may be all very well for a few members here, but I would suggest that it does not particularly appeal to the large mass of the electors, our fellow citizens, who sent us here and who are living in the industrial areas or on the prairies of the west.

Our group may be small, but I venture to say that it represents a very considerable proportion of the people across the country who otherwise are not vocal. The point of view of the Labour party is somewhat different from that of the older groups and even from that of the farmers with whom we co-operate. It is true, I know, that some of the members of the older parties claim to represent labour, inasmuch as there are labour people in their constituencies. I do not at all object to their efforts to represent labour, but it is not very frequently that they press what are essentially the principles of organized labour. There are in my constituency in Winnipeg North Centre bankers who probably would agree with me in the statement that I have not during the past five years tried to represent in the House their special point of view. In the same way there are a great many members here in whose constituencies there are labour men and who represent in a general way the views current in their different communities. But these members do not come to give distinct expression to the view-point of labour in their constituencies. It is therefore our peculiar task and duty to attempt to represent labour as best we may. Sometimes I fancy it must be quite pleasant to represent a constituency composed very largely of bankers or wholesalers or manufacturers. In such a case even I might wax eloquent over the "increased prosperity of the country" and indulge in other phrases of that character. However, some of us, if we are to be true to the people who sent us here and to the platforms on which we were elected, are forced to try to preserve the point of view of certain sections of the public that feel very differently from that section that receives the greatest publicity in our leading newspapers.

We are very glad to note that there is to be reintroduced the legislation we passed last year. In some of that legislation we have a particular interest and we would give the government full credit for having done its best during the past session to put these measures on the statute book. I would point out, however, that as a matter of fact the legislation which was of special interest to labour went by the board, as did a good deal of other legislation. It is not the law of the land. I know there was a sudden dissolution which abruptly terminated the business of the House, but I would point out that the old age pensions, amendments to the Criminal Code, and amendments to the Immigration Act actually passed the House but were rejected by the Senate. The same conditions, on the whole prevail at the present time, and I would submit very respectfully to the government that if they propose simply to reintroduce this legislation without taking some steps to ensure that it shall become the law of the land, they cannot very well hope to receive the continued support of the country. In this connection I would venture to call attention to a resolution which I have placed on the order paper and which I would commend to the attention of the government, namely, that we be permitted this year to have a special parliamentary committee to consider what changes might be made in the British North America Act, which, —while conserving the principles of confederation, would enable us more adequately to cope with the complicated problems which now confront Canada.

It would seem to me that if the government are really in earnest—and I have no reason to believe they are not—in having old age pensions and other social legislation placed on the statute books they should not allow the second chamber to continue to have powers which enable it effectually to nullify the will of the people.

The speech, using the customary phrases, expresses gratitude for a bountiful harvest. I should like to ask what this means in terms of the enjoyment of the good things of life by the ordinary Canadian citizen. Speaking particularly for the west I would call attention to the fact that that section of Canada enjoys only a little over half of the good things it produces. A very interesting study was made a few years ago by the Department of Trade and Commerce and published by the Bureau of Statistics with regard to the economic position of the Canadian prairie provinces. The latest figures are for the year 1923 and I presume the proportions will be fairly the same to-day. In fact, if there is a more bountiful harvest at the present time, if there is a greater production on the prairies, it is quite possible that a larger proportion will be sent out of the country instead of being retained in the prairie areas. Owing to certain factors into which I need not enter to-day, it is exceedingly difficult for the statistical department to make a study of this character for the whole of Canada, but in view of our inland position on the prairies it has been possible to make a detailed investigation. Let me quote from the pamphlet:

Perhaps the outstanding result of the investigation is that it shows net exports from the prairie provinces amounting to approximately $270,000,000, whilst imports into this area were approximately $145,000,000. The "favourable" trade balance of this section of Canada was, therefore, in the neighbourhood of $125,000,000.

Now, we may have had a bountiful harvest in the west, but the point to which I would call attention is that the greater part of that harvest or its money equivalent goes out of the country altogether and that we are left in the west to enjoy only a part of the fruits of our labour. Let me ask, where does this $125,000,000 go? That is what is known as the "favourable" balance, though indeed I do not know why it should be a favourable thing for us to send more out than we get in. I have never been able to understand that point of view.

Mr. COOTE: It is more blessed to give than to receive.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Possibly; but we do not generally conduct business on that basis. I suppose we can find the explanation in what is known to economists as invisible exports. As the pamphlet itself says:

Some of the items, for example, which must be included in a complete statement of the "invisible" exports from the prairie provinces of Canada would include (1) payments of interest and sinking fund sent outside the area; (2) payments of dividends on securities of prairie companies to persons resident outside the prairie region; (3) remittances of cash by immigrant residents; (4) expenditures of travellers; students, etc., ordinarily resident in and deriving their income from the prairie provinces, made outside the prairie district; (5) payments to outside insurance companies; (6) the export of capital accompanying emigration; (7) capital sent away from the prairies for investment; (8) charges for transient labour recruited mainly from eastern Canada (harvesters' excursions).

That may indicate, perhaps, the great outstanding fact that the extent to which we are truly grateful for a bountiful harvest will possibly be dependent upon the proportion of that harvest which we are allowed to enjoy. Let me go on to say that in all parts of Canada a very large proportion of the production is eaten up by our inequitable system of distribution, and in this connection I would like to quote, not a radical writer, but rather a few sentences from an interview with the late W. J. Hanna at the time he was food controller, when he found himself faced with the necessity of doing something if possible to eliminate some of the profits which went to the middleman. Mr. Hanna at that time referred to:

> The supernumerary, unnecessary and inefficient middleman, whose presence in the community is one of the most serious economic wastes of the day,—

And later he goes on to say:

> That there have long been too many city people and too few farmers in this Dominion is common knowledge, but it is not so well known that among our city people there are too many mere distributors, too many shippers, packers, carriers, wholesalers, retailers, advertisers, printers, salesmen, brokers, sub-brokers, deputy brokers, assistant-sub-deputy-brokers, and the whole army of people in the services and professions that wait upon the middleman.

Later, in speaking of this inflated staff of non-producers, he says it—> —was and still is dependent for its wages upon the movement of farm goods to the city and city goods to the farm, and all the over-specialized, over-elaborated processes which a luxurious civilization imagines are necessary to its happiness—

Here again may I emphasize that we have perhaps in this very House a large number who more nearly represent that great class of middlemen, and it is not much wonder that perhaps they rejoice in the bountiful harvest because they are able to secure a very considerable proportion of that harvest. I am reminded of a saying of Mr. Bernard Shaw's, to the effect that man is the only animal that counts himself rich according to the number and voracity of his parasites.

Let me pass on in considering this bountiful harvest to the question of some of the people who actually help take it off; I mean the harvesters. I happened to come down on the train with a number of these men who were returning to the east; some of them were riding in the regular coaches, while some had been riding on box cars. On that very trip one poor fellow had apparently fallen between the cars. In conversation with a number of the men who had been out through the west for the harvest, I found that owing to the rain which came during harvest time, a very large number of these men were unable to obtain very much as the result of the weeks they spent in the west. I would like to commend to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) a suggestion that we might very well make provision for some kind of insurance for those who harvest the western crop. It is undoubtedly a question of national importance that the wheat harvest should be safely garnered in, but we often find that owing to an early frost in one particular region, a hail storm in another region, or an early snowfall in still another, hundreds of men are thrown out of work. It would seem reasonable that the great burden of a disaster of that kind should not be borne by the few individual harvest hands who happen to be located in that particular district. The west is accustomed to insurance against hail and other such contingencies, and it would not seem an unreasonable thing that the Agriculture department or the Immigration department, recognizing the importance of the task, and also recognizing that no group of individuals in one neighbourhood or no one district could handle this situation, should bring forward some sort of insurance scheme. The details of this would need to be carefully worked out. The end to be attained is that those men who go from the east or from overseas to harvest the crops of the west may be sure of coming back with at least decent wages for the time they have spent in this very essential work.

Further in this connection might I point out that the ordinary industrial worker in the cities has by no means profited to the extent he should profit by the bountiful harvest, and the added production which has characterized the last year in this country. Let me give a statement from a recent investigator of wages on this continent:

> The recent researches of Paul H. Douglas show that the gain in real wages in the United States from 1890 to 1919 did not average one-half of one per cent a year.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the conditions are very similar in Canada, although we have not had a careful research carried on in this country. If during the past 20 years the industrial worker in the United States has gained only something like one-half of one per cent a year in real wages, it would seem to me that it might very well be that we should devote a little more time to asking what this bountiful harvest means to the ordinary man in industry or on the farm.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, before the House took recess I had been trying to explain that in connection with the speech we are attempting, as far as we can, to present the special viewpoints of the Labour group that we represent. I had been dwelling upon the question of the bountiful harvest, and suggesting that although there have been greatly increased production and increased trade that that did not necessarily mean that the rank and file, either of the agricultural or the industrial workers, had very largely benefited thereby; that very frequently a considerable portion of production was already mortgaged; that very often our system of distribution was such as to permit only a small percentage to remain in the hands of the actual producers.

I should like now to pass to what might be considered almost as a part of the unfinished business of the last House. The members of last year will recall that a parliamentary committee was appointed to consider the question of the minimum living wage. Near the close of last session the committee brought in a report containing certain recommendations, and this report was unanimously adopted by the House. The question itself, however, has not been very fully discussed, and so far as the speech from the throne is concerned there is no indication that legislation with respect to it is to be brought down. May I say that the principle of the minimum wage has been very clearly recognized by the government of Canada for some time past. As far back as 1918 we had a declaration of war labour policy by the Dominion government. I quote from it section 9:

That all workers, including common labourers, shall be entitled to a wage ample to enable them with thrift to maintain themselves and families in decency and comfort, and to make reasonable provision for old age.

Again in section 15, where there is a reference to what is known as "fair wage" provisions, the words used are:

Always mindful however, of the necessity of payment of living wages.

After the war was over this question of decent standards of living was considered not merely by the Canadian government but by the governments of all the allied nations, and in the Peace treaty of Versailles certain general principles with regard to labour were incorporated. I should like to read a few phrases which, perhaps, may bring before the members of this House the broad scope of the agreements which were solemnly entered into at that time:

The high contracting parties, recognising that the well-being, physical, moral and intellectual, of industrial wage-earners is of supreme international importance, have framed,—

And so on. We have clause 1, which sets forth the guiding principle that labour should not be regarded merely as a commodity or article of commerce. And again clause 3, which declares in favour of—

The payment to the employed of a wage adequate to maintain a reasonable standard of life as this is understood in their time and country.

I do not think it is necessary to remind the House that this treaty was signed and the conventions were ratified later on by Canada.

The next step with reference to these matters was taken by the government in 1919 when a royal commission on industrial relations was appointed. On this commission there were not only representatives of labour but also representatives of the employers. The following well known gentlemen were on the commission: Hon. Chief Justice Mathers, of Manitoba, Chairman; Hon. Smeaton White, Mr. Carl Riordon and Mr. F. Pauzé. At the opening session, the chairman with the approval of the other members made a statement, and I quote simply one paragraph of it so as to give some idea of the expressed attitude of those who were interested in industrial affairs at that time:

In July, 1917, the British government appointed a commission of inquiry into the problem of industrial unrest, and in conclusion I do not think that I can do better than quote from its report:

"What is wanted is a new spirit—a more human spirit, one in which economic and business considerations will be influenced and corrected, and it is hoped will eventually be controlled, by human and ethical considerations. The main cause of unrest lies deeper than any material considerations. The problem is fundamentally a human and not an economic problem. A new spirit of partnership is therefore essential."

This declaration and the recommendations of the commission were followed up by a National Industrial conference held also in 1919. I may say, however, that practically nothing was done at that conference that resulted in anything of any concrete advantage to the workers. If I might allude to a phrase used by the Prime Minister yesterday, it is quite possible that the status of labour was readily accorded, but labour has not risen in stature sufficiently to be able to take any very great advantage of the status that was so readily conceded in 1919.

Our committee last year brought in a report which has been placed, I think, in the hands of all the members. From this I should like to quote one or two brief sentences. One witness, Doctor MacMillan, of the minimum wage board of the province of Ontario, said:

There seems to be no reason why if this principle is good for women's wages, it should not be applied at least to some classes of men's wages.

Further the report states:

The evidence also showed that some workers in Canada are receiving less than will enable them to adequately maintain this standard.

I think that is putting it very mildly indeed, but that was the unanimous statement of the committee after examination of all the evidence placed before them. It was stated by the Deputy Minister of Justice that minimum wage legislation was primarily, under the British North America Act, a matter for provincial legislation. But he also quoted section 132 of the British North America Act:

The parliament and government of Canada shall have all powers necessary or proper for performing the obligations of Canada or of any province thereof, as part of the British Empire, towards foreign countries arising under treaties between the empire and such foreign countries.

Commenting on this he said:

There can be no doubt that where Canada has entered into an obligation by treaty—and in that connection I mean an association with the empire, of course—within the meaning of section 132, which I have just read, I do not think there is any doubt but that parliament has power to legislate for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of the treaty.

That is a most important statement, and I think perhaps warrants the further statement of the committee itself:

This opinion goes to show that the British North America Act by no means contemplates industrial problems of the kind and scope to which Canadians to-day must adjust themselves.

The committee recommended, among other things:

That a conference of provincial and Dominion representatives intimately in touch with labour conditions throughout Canada be held in the near future to consult as to the best means to be employed of giving effect to the labour provisions of the Treaties of Peace.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister, who unfortunately is not in his seat, but to whom this message will undoubtedly be delivered, whether the government will not consider the calling of this conference at a very early date. Further than that, to this conference there might possibly be also committed the carrying out of the other provisions of the Versailles peace treaty. Anyone who has read anything of the proceedings of the League of Nations must understand that Canada is not by any means in a foremost position as regards labour legislation, and it seems to me that in ordinary decency, and having regard to the premier position which we occupy among the British dominions, we ought not to lag behind in social legislation of this character.

Let me say that the evidence given before the committee showed the budget that was necessary in order to maintain a minimum standard of health and decency. There are a great many people living much below the standard, but the most careful social workers prepared for us an estimate which goes to show that in order to maintain a family properly, to clothe and feed them properly, and provide proper shelter, education, a moderate amount of recreation and other things of that kind, it is necessary to-day, according to the prices now prevailing, to spend in the neighbourhood of $2,200 per annum. That you will find in the evidence of the committee.

Now, on the other hand, I ask what are the actual wages paid in Canada. I find, according to the Year Book of 1925, the latest figures that we have, the average yearly earnings of wage earners in manufacturing industries in Canada, as shown at page 429, amount to only $959. That is less than half the amount that is considered necessary to maintain a family in health and decency, according to the figures prepared by some of the most careful investigators. It may be quite true that this average figure of $959 includes the wages paid to unmarried men and to girls, but I submit that that does not make it any easier for the married man who has the responsibility of the family, for in the case of girls at least, they are paid very little more than what is necessary, according to the government's own standards, and as enforced by the minimum wage regulations of the various provinces. We had a concrete instance given us, which may help to make the subject very definite to all in this chamber.

In one manufacturing town in Ontario, and I think it is a fairly representative town, in a cotton industry the girls were receiving $10 a week, and the men, many of them married, were receiving only $15 a week. The $10 had to be paid under the minimum wage laws of the province of Ontario. There was no legislative provision whatever as to the payment to married men, which simply meant that whereas, under the most rigid investigations, it had been found necessary to give $10 a week to keep an unmarried girl, the men were getting only $5 a week more. They were supposed to be able to keep a wife and family on that additional $5. I ask anyone can it be done? If so at what cost?

I do not think I am going too far afield, Mr. Speaker, when I hear the fine phrases about the increasing prosperity of this country, about the bountiful harvest, about the greatly increased production, if I call your attention and the attention of the House to the fact that very large numbers of our fellow-citizens are living below the standard that is necessary to maintain health and decency. I do not know that our own employees, the civil servants, are very much better off. Let me read from an editorial in the Ottawa Citizen of January, 1926:

> In the session of parliament, 1922, Mr. McQuarrie, in answer to a question, received the information that 19,467 employees of the Dominion government received less than $960 per annum.

That is, government employees were receiving only about what is the average wage in the manufacturing industries, and which is only about half what is necessary, according to government and other investigators, to maintain a decent standard of living in Canada. In that same editorial the Citizen goes on to comment on this state of affairs. It says:

> Political and economic leaders are accustomed to lay great stress upon perfection in the production of material commodities of all kinds. Appropriations and statistics in parliament are largely confined to the increase of material wealth and the pursuit of gainful occupations for profit—that is, for the almighty dollar. The development of our natural material resources is no doubt of great importance. It may well be asked what is the ratio between the importance attaching to the development of material wealth and the care and cultivation necessary for the improvement of the human existence. While our economic system is grinding out wealth, how fares the great mass of struggling humanity during the process?

Now, Mr. Speaker, may I ask, since it requires, according to the figures presented to the committee, something like $2,200 to maintain an average sized family in decency, and the average wage paid in this country is only $959, how is the difference made up? Because the majority of the families do manage to get along on less. They sometimes save on food, and we generally pay the bills through contributions we are making to the hospitals and other institutions. They may save on houses, and we have the overcrowding that exists in so many of our larger cities, which again leads to deterioration in the life of the family, and we very often have to pay again through our hospitals and other institutions. Very often the difference is made up by the earnings of the husband and father being supplemented by the earnings of the wife and children; the effect is to mortgage the next generation, and we have another generation coming up with very little education, fit only for blind-alley occupations and very inadequately equipped to meet the strenuous conditions of modern life. I submit the time has come when this parliament will have to fall in line with the parliaments of other great nations, especially with the parliament of the mother country and with some of the colonies, for instance with New Zealand and Australia, and give a little more attention to matters of this kind.

I would commend to the attention of the House a resolution that has been placed on the order paper by my hon. friend for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) which reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the Committee on Industrial and International Relations be instructed to investigate and report on the establishment of a system of insurance against unemployment, sickness and invalidity.

The speech goes on to state:

> It is gratifying to note that during the year immigration has substantially increased.

We have discussed the question of immigration in this House again and again and it is not my intention to go into this matter to any great length, but since the railroads and the boards of trade are on every hand emphasizing the need for increased immigration, I would like once again to utter my protest against increasing immigration without taking greater care of the incoming immigrant and the men already here. It is very easy to permit immigration to be used simply to overcrowd the labour market, as to supply fares for the railroads and a sale for the lands of the west. I am glad to find that the departments are beginning to talk about colonization instead of immigration. It is a move in the right direction, but we will have to go a great deal further in practical provisions before the situation is at all satisfactory. It is a disgrace to civilization to have brought before us the pathetic stories that fill the papers in nearly all our cities about this time of year. We have appeals not only for a Christmas dinner, but at the same time we have little glimpses into the wretched conditions under which a considerable part of the population must live. I do not need to go outside of Ottawa. Here is a newspaper clipping of a date no later than December 2, a statement by the Social Service Commissioner of Ottawa, who says:

> We are told repeatedly that Canada needs immigrants. The transportation companies have a large interest in stating that our prosperity will be increased in proportion to the number of new citizens who come to our shores. It seems a reasonable assumption that the further importation of men would aggravate the present situation. If we need further labour during the summer months, it might be feasible to import men in the spring and send them home again in the fall.

And again—

The quality of our citizenship is not improved by the presence in our city of thousands of under-nourished little children, hundreds of cold and cheerless homes, many families forced into the streets because the rent cannot be paid.

Are those statements correct? If they are not I think it is the duty of the government to correct them. If they are correct, it is the duty of the government to introduce such legislation as will make it impossible that those conditions should continue.

Again the speech from the throne goes on to state:

It is gratifying to note that during the year the foreign trade of Canada has shown further marked improvement.

I am sure we all rejoice in that statement, because as a whole we have taken it that trade returns indicate a substantial betterment in general conditions. On the other hand, I sometimes wonder why we are so solicitous about our foreign trade. I sometimes wonder why we do not spend a great deal more attention in developing the home trade. We cannot do that unless we increase the buying power of the masses of the people. There it seems to me is one of the solutions of the economic problem which faces not only this country but all the countries of the world to-day. In this connection, just to show that a good many people outside the labour movement are thinking along these lines, I should like to quote a paragraph from one of the papers of my own city, the Winnipeg Tribune. I might say this paper was a supporter of the Conservative party during the last election so that I cannot be accused of quoting from any organ that is particularly favourable to my own position. The editorial reads:

Home Markets Needed

The American Federation of Labour is getting down to economic fundamentals, when it asserts that "the best interests of the whole social group are served . . . . by high wage standards which assume sustained purchasing power to the workers, and, therefore, higher national standards. In other words, the more money the masses of the workers have to spend, the greater will be the home market for the goods which they produce."

Again it says:

It is curious that nations should fight for foreign markets and should spend vast sums of money in building up semi-civilized people to the point where they will become customers, while they have right within their own borders masses of people in real need of the things they have so much difficulty in selling. It should not be difficult for an economist to show that what the over-industrialized countries should do to find a market for their "surplus" production is, as the American Federation of Labour suggests, to increase the purchasing power of the masses at home.

That particular phase of the economic question has of course been given a considerable amount of emphasis in magazine articles, and the experimental work of Mr. Henry Ford has perhaps served to draw popular attention to the possibilities. I commend that suggestion to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It is quite possible to stimulate prosperity in this country by developing our home markets.

Reference is made to adequate provision for the civil service. We all want to look after the civil service, but may I ask why we do not begin some of our economies right at home. I should not like to suggest the abolition of the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon); he is too genial a man. I would, however, like to suggest the abolition of his office, as was suggested a year or so ago. I do not know why it is that the government seems to have settled back again and to be apparently determined to take no action along these lines. Again and again it has been suggested that we might have various consolidations of departments. All of us, I suppose, have considered ways in which this might be done. I mention the consolidation of the Public Works department with the Department of Railways and Canals. Half a dozen other consolidations will readily occur to almost any member. Why should we persist in a very considerable measure of extravagance with regard to higher officials when we are constantly talking about the necessity of exercising economy across the country?

May I venture to suggest one or two things that have occurred to me—and I am sure to many others—in connection with the recent elections? Why should not the suggestion of the Chief Electoral Officer be carried out in legislation this session, and electoral officials be appointed for a considerable period of time? So far as I am concerned, I should like to take the electoral machinery out of party politics altogether. We had a struggle last session between the two major parties partly at least because each was determined to get hold of the electoral machinery. Why? It may have been that each was not intending to use that machinery illegitimately; but each party was decidedly afraid the other would. There we have the situation. Why not take the electoral machinery out of party politics altogether?

There is another inquiry I should like to make of the Prime Minister, but again I note that he is not in his seat. Last session before the dissolution of parliament it was decided with respect to the inquiry into the Department of Customs and Excise that a commissioner should be appointed by a judge of the Exchequer court. That was done, and Mr. Justice Lemieux was appointed. I have never yet ascertained—it may have been announced in the newspapers—just why it was that the government when it came into power proceeded to make an appointment of its own, leading apparently to the resignation of Mr. Justice Lemieux and the appointment of another judge to take his place. It would seem to me, and I think to anyone who sat through last session, that the idea in having the commissioner appointed by a judge of the Exchequer court was that there should be no suspicion or partisanship in the appointment. You may remember, Mr. Speaker, that one amendment was that each of the larger parties might nominate a judge to form the commission of inquiry, but it was felt that that of itself might lead to partisanship, and so a judge of the Exchequer court was asked to make the appointment. I think it is due to this House that at some early opportunity the government should tell us why the change was made.

Another matter that I would like to call to the attention of the government is in connection with the Tariff Advisory Board. As I understand it, this is a fact-finding body. Then why should not the reports with a summary of the evidence be given to the public? If I am correctly informed, at present these reports are turned in to the Minister of Finance, and I have no doubt they will be of great advantage to him in determining the policy of the government with respect to tariff matters; but if the reports do not consist of recommendations, but rather a digest of a mass of evidence, it does seem to me that it would be a very great advantage to parliament and to the people generally that the facts in connection with tariff matters should be given the widest possible publicity.

Before I leave these miscellaneous matters, might I venture to suggest further that when the government brings in its measure providing for a change of the rules of this House some provision should be made by which the estimates, instead of being discussed in committee of the whole, might at least be first referred to an appropriate committee? This is done to a limited extent in the case of the railway estimates, and has met with very general approval. I am sure that any of the older members must have realized the immense loss of time involved in attempting to discuss the details of estimates in a large assembly of this kind. It would seem to me that by this method the interests of the country could be very well safeguarded, and yet the business of the House be greatly expedited, especially when as at present members' speeches are being recorded for Hansard.

The speech from the throne makes reference to the Imperial conference, and already considerable time has been devoted by previous speakers to a consideration of some of the matters arising therefrom. There is not the slightest doubt that the Prime Minister has brought back some very excellent phrases. We must all admit that. I hope we will be able to use those phrases to very good advantage. But as one examines the reports that have been submitted to us in the newspapers, I am afraid that some of the subsequent paragraphs do not altogether bear out the full meaning of the phrases which are crowded into the front of the report. We are told:

> The dominions are autonomous communities within the British Empire, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs.

Now, as far as I am concerned, that is very highly satisfactory, and yet I read on in the report—I might say that I have only the newspaper despatches to go on, as the House has not yet been supplied with printed copies of the report itself—I read:

> That the principles of equality and similarity, appropriate to status, do not universally extend to function.

I have read that sentence again and again, and confess that I do not know what it means. I think a man would need to take a post-graduate course in metaphysics to know just what it does mean. Let me read it again, for possibly some subsequent speaker may be able to enlighten me.

> The principles of equality and similarity, appropriate to status, do not universally extend to function.

Again, we are told that we are equal in status to the motherland, and yet later on with regard to foreign relations we find this:

> Their delegates have recognized that in this sphere . . . . the major share of responsibility rests now, and must for some time continue to rest, with His Majesty's government in Great Britain.
> British diplomacy, it is suggested, can only commit the dominions to passive, not to active obligations.

Again, I confess that I am absolutely mystified. What are "passive" obligations as distinguished from "active" obligations? Further, we are told that:

The British Empire depends essentially, if not formally, upon positive ideals. Free institutions are its lifeblood, free co-operation is its instrument.

May I point out what has been noted by some old country papers, that of the 450,000,000 of the empire's inhabitants over 350,000,000 know nothing whatever of free institutions. The Daily Herald has this to say:

Not a mention of India, not of Malaya, of Nigeria, of Kenya, of the Sudan, of all those colonies and protectorates and dependencies and mandated areas which have no "free institutions" and know nothing of "free co-operation". Not a mention of all the subject peoples, of the empire.

It does seem to me that at least those of us who have anything of an international point of view cannot very well rest satisfied that the Imperial conference should have taken such slight account of the great majority of those who are sheltered under the British flag.

We are to be given a summary of the proceedings of the conference. I should like to know just how much of those proceedings we may expect to have divulged. Here again, it strikes me, there has been altogether too much secrecy about the conference, a condition which is far removed indeed from the ideal of open diplomacy which is pretty well worldwide at the present time. I would ask the government, what about secret commitments, what about implied guarantees? So far we know nothing about these things. Let me quote a news item which appeared on November 15, 1926:

After witnessing the maneouvres of aircraft at Croydon, the Atlantic fleet off Portland and Saturday's demonstration by army tanks, motor artillery and mechanical transportation the Dominion delegates are expected to express their views on motions to maintain the defence of empire.

What are these views? We have a right to know. Are they in harmony with that resolution published with regard to Locarno, reference to which was made this afternoon? In his Armistice day speech at Kansas City President Coolidge said:

It is more and more becoming the conviction of students of adequate defence that in time of national peril the government should be clothed with authority to call into its service all of its man power and all of its property under such terms and conditions that it may completely avoid making a sacrifice of one and a profiteer of another.

That will meet with the approval of many hon. gentlemen in all parts of the House, but I suggest that the government should take the very earliest opportunity to bring forward a policy along these lines. If we are in any sense of the word to be committed, either actively or passively, to participation in another great war we ought to know at the earliest possible moment just what obligations we are undertaking, and adequate provision should be made in that direction. Let the government bring down its legislation. In this connection I would review briefly some figures given last year by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) in his presentation of the budget. The minister stated that the expenditures directly attributable to the war amounted to 47.83 per cent of our entire income, and then he went on to enumerate certain other items which brought the total up to fully 50 per cent. I cannot imagine that the people of this country can be generally aware of the fact that of all taxation that is gathered together in Canada by means of income tax and levies in various other forms, not to mention the tariff, fully 50 per cent goes to pay the interest on the debt incurred through the last war. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself later on in the same debate if I remember rightly, stated that not a dollar of the principal in connection with that debt had yet been paid. Inasmuch as it is practically impossible for us to form any adequate idea of the meaning of figures running into the millions, I would put the matter this way: the total spent by the Canadian government on public health amounts to .19 per cent of our income; the total on scientific institutions, merely .29 per cent; and the total on labour .36 per cent. Here are three very important phases of our public life—health, scientific institutions, and the matter of industrial relations—to which a total of .84, or less than one per cent, of the revenues of the country is devoted, while 50 per cent of that revenue goes to pay for the last war. I would venture to offer a suggestion to the Minister of Finance. If we seriously contemplate another war why not adopt ordinary business principles and set aside a sum sufficient, say $50,000,000 a year, as a contingent fund? Not only have we to pay for the last war but apparently we are contemplating another war, and this being the case we may as well prepare for it. Any business conducted on sound principles sets aside certain reserves against contingencies; and this is not a mere contingency, for according to our experts it is dead certainty. I suggest therefore that the minister set aside $50,000,000 a year for a contingent fund. This, I submit, would be a much more effective preparation than summer camps for militia. And still more important, it would enable us to pay for our own folly instead of shouldering the burden on our children's children.

This is not a mere personal matter with me, although I feel strongly on it. Only a few days ago there was sent to me through the mails by the Secretary of the Farmers' Union of Canada a resolution which, after enumerating some of the evils of the last war, declares:

> Be it resolved that we urge on our representatives in parliament to take action to ensure that Canada lead the world now by being the first country in the world to adopt complete disarmament; and with that end in view;
> 1. That our standing army, our navy and militia be abolished.
> (2) That all cadet training in schools be discontinued and that appropriations thus saved be expended in helping to provide;
> (1) Adequate pensions to disabled war veterans.
> (2) A system of state insurance against financial difficulties incident to sickness, old age, and death, including a pension to all indigent widows and orphans and pensions to all aged people in want, so that, on reaching the age of sixty-five years, every man and woman in Canada would be in receipt of a dollar a day for life.

Personally I have hardly the courage to suggest that every one should receive that much, and yet it would take an infinitesimal part of our annual revenue. Instead, not only do we go on year after year paying 50 per cent of our revenue towards the cost of the last war, but apparently we are actually entering into certain obligations that may precipitate another conflict.

Before closing let me make this observation. During the war social legislation was very largely suspended or postponed. Between 1921 and 1925 the government did comparatively little in this direction. In 1925 I remember distinctly charging the government with having done practically nothing for labour—at any rate, nothing of a constructive character during the preceding four years. Last year they made a good beginning in introducing old age pensions and other measures that would have helped a large proportion of the ordinary people of the country. But it is only a beginning. Social legislation is sadly in arrears. I submit that at present the government has a wonderful opportunity; it has not only a majority of its own followers, but it has in this quarter of the House members belonging to other groups who are prepared to support it if it goes forward with a progressive policy. I might, however, utter a word of warning. I want to state very frankly that if the government fails to carry out a constructive program then the government will soon find that the people of Canada did not put them into power in order merely to hold office, but rather to get things done. The west at least, and I think, the country at large, expects action. So far as we in this corner of the House are concerned, we shall do our utmost to co-operate in pressing forward such action.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. WILLIAM GORDON ERNST (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself with the hon. members who have preceded me in conveying my congratulations to you, Sir, upon your re-election to the office of Speaker; also to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, and to His Excellency the Governor General and Viscountess Willingdon upon the appointment of Lord Willingdon as Governor General of this Dominion. From a purely personal standpoint I also wish to convey to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) my congratulations on his appointment as a minister of the crown. I happened to be associated with him and to serve under him, in an enterprise perhaps more hazardous than the present one; I have been associated with him in civilian life as well, and I only hope that he will continue to fill his office with distinction until the next general election.

As the first Nova Scotian to speak, Mr. Speaker, I feel it my duty to convey to this House the keen sense of personal loss which we all feel on the death of the late member for Antigonish-Guysborough, Mr. J. C. Douglas. We appreciated the kind and sympathetic words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie), but perhaps we knew him best, and we feel his loss most keenly. I need only say that his passing leaves a genuine sorrow in thousands of Nova Scotian hearts.

My main purpose in arising this evening is to draw to the attention of the House what I believe to be one of the most monentous documents tabled here since confederation; I refer to the report of the Duncan commission upon maritime rights. Before I pass to that, however, I want to say just one or two words with reference to another matter mentioned in the speech from the throne; I refer now to the Imperial conference. I do not profess to be a great constitutional lawyer, but if I am not mistaken, when that conference convened there were gathered around the council table representatives of one sovereign country and of six dominions. In international law at least the attributes of sovereignty and those appertaining to a dominion are decidedly different; for instance, the sovereign country alone can make peace or declare war. I need not quote the other attributes, but amongst them is this, that a sovereign country can legislate for its subjects whether they be within her own domain or whether they be in other countries; a sovereign country can legislate for its ships whether they be on the high seas or in their home ports. There was one such country represented at the council table, and that country was Great Britain; the rest were dominions. If we are to believe the report which was tabled in this House, something has happened; each is equal to the other, and none is subordinate in any respect. One thing or the other must have happened; either Great Britain has ceased to be a sovereign country and has descended to the level of a dominion, or each dominion has become a sovereign country. I dismiss the first proposition as absurd; I believe this House would consider it absurd that Great Britain should descend to the level of a dominion. If on the other hand Canada has become a sovereign country, I am going to put to hon. members opposite just one plain proposition in order to test that out. If Canada is a sovereign country she can legislate for her subjects whether they be within or without her borders; she can legislate for her ships whether they be on the high seas or in their home ports. If I mistake not, the right hon. Prime Minister, during the hectic last days of the last session and during the resulting campaign, stated that it was the desire of his government, or his party, to suppress the smuggling traffic in this dominion. If that desire was genuine, Mr. Speaker, and if that report means anything, then the Prime Minister has his opportunity. Those interested in the enforcement of the law say the reason why smuggling is so difficult to suppress is that they cannot go outside the three mile limit to seize and search ships. If this report means anything then I shall expect the government, in order to test it out, to introduce legislation enabling them to seize Canadian ships whether they be inside or outside the three mile limit. If they do not do so, there are only two conclusions one can draw. The first is that the government was not sincere in its statement that it desired to suppress smuggling; the other is that it has not the power and Canada is not a sovereign country. As a matter of fact, I believe that if they did pass such a law—and I present my opinion for what it is worth—it would be held ultra vires by every court of competent jurisdiction in this country. Further, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the report, in so far as that statement is concerned, is nothing but an empty platitude. Canada acquired her status, not through the efforts of her politicians, but through the efforts of the 500,000 men who went overseas between the years 1914 and 1918. Fifty thousand of them sleep on foreign soil, and he who says that Canada's status is due to the efforts of her politicians is trying to filch honour from the dead.

I pass now to the subject on which I propose to dwell during most of the time I hope to occupy the attention of the House; that is, the question of maritime rights. The campaign started in 1920, in the province of Nova Scotia, and bore its first fruits when the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Black) was elected in the by-election of 1923. In the course of his remarks yesterday, the Prime Minister sought to take unto his government credit for the fact that it was his government which had appointed the commission headed by Sir Andrew Rae Duncan. May I point out that the senior member for Halifax was the first to mention the question of maritime rights in this House. At that time Nova Scotia was represented by fifteen Liberal members, and each of these members said that the statements of the senior member for Halifax were absurd, and had no truth in them. May I further point out that in the general elections of 1925 the maritime provinces, out of a total representation of thirty, returned twenty-four members pledged to the cause of maritime rights. The speech from the throne, it is true, contained a reference to the appointment of the commission, but I venture to say that it was not any desire on the part of the Prime Minister to have the subject investigated, but rather the voice of the people of the maritime provinces which compelled him to do so. Further, when he states that the maritime members opposed the appointment of the commission, he overlooks the fact that the maritime members stated that they knew what was wrong with the maritime provinces, and had come here to get legislation to remedy those wrongs. He refused to believe them; he stated they did not know, and asked, "What are your maritime rights?" He appointed that commission; he has his answer, and that answer is a complete vindication of those members who sat here last year representing the maritimes.

I purpose dealing briefly with some of the main provisions of that report. The hon. leader of the United Farmers of Alberta (Mr. Gardiner) in the course of his remarks this afternoon said that before we legislated for the maritimes we ought to be sure that we knew what we were doing, and then do all that needed to be done at once. May I point out to him that the gentleman who headed that commission was referred to by no less a person than the Prime Minister of this country as a second Lord Durham? May I also point out to him that if he wants to know what is wrong with the maritimes all he has to do is to read that report with care. Then if he wishes to know how to provide a remedy all he need do is to support legislation to enact the provisions of that report, not partially but in their entirety.

But let me take up the provisions of the report one by one. The first deals with the question of subsidies. It recommends that Nova Scotia be granted an increase of subsidy amounting to $875,000 a year; New Brunswick an increase of subsidy amounting to $600,000; and Prince Edward Island an increase amounting to $125,000. I have heard it argued that this recommendation does not mean an increase, but represents the total subsidy which should be paid. May I draw the attention of hon. members to the statement in the report of the commission to be found on page 19, which reads as follows:

> We do not feel, however, that it would be right or wise that the Maritime provinces, in their present state of grave necessity with deficits accumulating against them in their ordinary revenue and expenditure, should be left in suspense until a re-assessment is made by the Dominion government, and accordingly we recommend that immediate interim lump-sum increases should be made in the payments to the three Maritime provinces as follows:—

May I point out further that a few lines later on in the report appear these words:

> In suggesting the foregoing sums we have fixed what we believe to be the minimum addition that the three Maritime provinces should have in any such revision—

And then if any doubt remains as to whether, in relation to the three maritime provinces, the sums named are increases or total subsidies to be paid, let me refer hon. members to the figures for Prince Edward Island which, in the report, are $125,000 in so far as the increase is concerned, whereas the subsidy paid to-day to the province of Prince Edward Island is something over $180,000. The figures leave no doubt that the amounts recommended are to be in addition to the amounts which are being paid to-day. I know there are some hon. members who will say this is a raid on the Dominion treasury. If they make the statement and let it go at that they are overlooking the facts of history. When Nova Scotia and the other maritime provinces entered confederation they handed over to the Dominion government the chief sources from which they raised their revenue; they handed over the collection of customs, they handed over the railways which they themselves had built and they obtained no credit for these in the statement of their public indebtedness. In addition they had as provinces of Canada at the time of confederation a proprietary interest in the western lands which belonged to the Dominion. Those lands were apportioned and the proceeds given to the western provinces. Nova Scotia received nothing in return, whereas Quebec and Ontario received large accessions of territory in addition to the area which they had at the time of confederation. Need any further justification be urged for the increased subsidy which is recommended?

I pass on to the question of railways. To put the matter briefly the commission recommends first that a reduction of twenty per cent be made on all railway rates pertaining to the Atlantic division of the Canadian National Railways, to apply equally to traffic which originates in the maritime provinces and is destined to points outside, and to local traffic which both originates and terminates within the division. There was a further recommendation. The maritime province members had asked for special freight rates for their basic commodities, for their coal, steel and lumber. This question is left wide open by the commission. They say it should be dealt with by the railway board; that if the board has not that power to-day it should be empowered to deal with the question and deal with it effectively for the benefit of those interested. It will be said that if this twenty per cent reduction is made it will be statutory legislation. May I draw attention to the fact that it will not be the first time that statutory legislation has been invoked in so far as railway rates are concerned? In the second place it will be pointed out that the Atlantic division of the Canadian National railway is to-day operating at a loss, and that this reduction will mean a further raid on the Dominion treasury. May I point out to hon. members, in the first place, that the Atlantic division of the Canadian National railway was not built primarily for commercial purposes, but was built for military reasons to connect these maritime provinces with central Canada and in order that the latter might have an outlet in the winter months. In carrying out that policy the railway was made two hundred and fifty miles longer than it need have been had its construction been carried out for commercial purposes. In the second place may I point out that, as was said by an hon. gentleman yesterday, unless each and every part of this Dominion is prosperous and contented the Dominion as a whole cannot be prosperous and contented. I believe that one of the Austinian theories of law is that that law is best which is best for the greatest number of individuals. So it is with a country: that policy is best which is best for the greatest number of its people. From confederation down to the present time that policy has been consistently the policy of protection. But there are certain parts of Canada which do not derive benefit in equal proportion to other parts. Some industries in the Maritime provinces do not derive an equal benefit in comparison with others. We say that the whole should help the part, and we shall be helping by making these contributions from the Dominion treasury. In that way a part of Canada may be rendered contented and prosperous and the reaction will be for the benefit of the whole Dominion.

I pass on now to the third recommendation of the report, namely the recommendation for port development. The port of Montreal has for years had a Board of Harbour Commissioners. The ports of Halifax and St. John, which should be the main winter ports for the traffic of this country on the Atlantic seaboard, have no such board of harbour commissioners. The Duncan commission recommends, and recommends explicitly, that a board of harbour commissioners should be appointed at once for both ports of Halifax and St. John. In this connection, however, may I say that even when the board is appointed there will be one or two matters which will need attention if the ports are going to be able to handle the business of the country. The first is referred to in the report. It is that better grain-handling facilities must be placed in these ports. Secondly it is recommended that adequate cold storage plants be built so as to help the agricultural industry and aid the fishing industry of the provinces.

I pass on now to the question of trade. The first recommendation made by the commission in this regard is that a bonus, or rather a bounty, be paid in connection with the manufacturing of steel. The matter is complicated but it is easy to understand once it is looked into. The commission recommends that a bounty or bonus on steel should be paid when that steel is manufactured from Canadian coal, and that the amount of the bounty or bonus should be equal to the drawback given on the duty on coal where steel is manufactured from foreign coal. Now, Mr. Speaker, I understand that it takes four tons of coal to manufacture a ton of steel. The duty per ton is fifty cents, the drawback amounts to 99 per cent; and I may tell hon. members on the government benches that we are looking for a bounty or bonus of $2 a ton on steel in connection with that trade as a result of the report of the commission.

There was another matter to which the commission referred and that was the question of a tariff. In this connection something most unfortunate has happened. As a result of that unfortunate happening we have not a recommendation but what merely amounts to a suggestion. When the commission was appointed, the terms of its appointment gave it an absolutely free hand to examine into conditions in the maritime provinces and to make specific recommendations. It was fettered by nothing. The Prime Minister himself wrote to the chairman of the commission saying that the commission had an absolutely free hand, and he wanted the chairman to consider so, and to look into every phase of maritime conditions. Yet in spite of that fact, the chairman of the Tariff Advisory Board saw fit to intimate to the chairman of the Duncan commission that that commission had to keep its hands off the tariff and make no recommendations in relation thereto. If I may refer the House to page 37 of the report, paragraph 25 says:

> In respect of this matter, we do not conceive it to be our duty to express any opinion, since the question is, as we were informed by the chairman of the Tariff Advisory Board, who met us at our request, at the present moment under the consideration of that board.

But they say further:

> But we do regard it as our duty to record that the significance of this industry to the Maritime provinces was forcibly brought home to us, not only in the manufacturing towns we visited in the Maritimes, but also throughout the agricultural districts of the Maritimes. We record this in order to emphasize the need for prompt action.

That is in relation to steel. Here is what the commission says in regard to coal:

> Several features of the customs tariff in its relation to coal were brought to our attention, both by the government of Nova Scotia and by the operators of the coal mines. These we feel ourselves precluded from dealing with, since they are a matter properly to be considered by the Tariff Advisory Board; but we may be permitted to say that we are impressed with the need for reconsideration of the customs tariff in its relation to coal, anthracite and coke, and we recommend that the Tariff Advisory Board should be asked to give immediate consideration to the subject.

When the right hon. the Prime Minister of this country was touring the maritimes in his election campaign, he stated publicly that any recommendations or suggestions of the commission would receive the sympathetic consideration of his government were he returned to power. May I point out to him that here there is a definite suggestion that the duty on coal and steel is too low, that the duty ought to be raised for the benefit of those industries, and we demand that this House act upon that suggestion. There is no need to refer the question to the Tariff Advisory Board if the government is going to be governed by its own precedents, for in the case of the automobile industry, the government considered itself justified in lowering the duties on automobiles without having any investigation of any kind whatsoever. In this case we have the specific suggestion of a royal commission, and surely if the government saw fit to act in the case of the automobile industry without any recommendation or investigation of any kind whatsoever, it ought to act, and act quickly, on the report of the Duncan commission, and give us increased duties on both coal and steel during this present session.

In relation to trade, there is another specific recommendation in the report, and that is for the establishment of coking plants. I do not intend to deal with that at any length, because I notice in the speech from the throne it is intimated that the government will make special provision for carrying out the recommendation of the commission.

I pass on to the last matter with which I purpose to deal in so far as the report of the royal commission is concerned, and that is in relation to the fish trade. That is a matter in which I myself am particularly interested because I represent what is, so far as deep sea fishing is concerned, the biggest fishing community in Canada, and it is also vitally interested in the fresh fish trade. The problems of the two are very, very different, and I purpose dealing first with the fresh fish trade.

There is a recommendation that the government proceed, if possible, to make a trade treaty with the United States in order to have the Fordney-McCumber tariff done away with, a tariff which is burdensome to the shore fishermen of the maritime provinces. May I say that that proposition has our approval provided that the interests of the country as a whole do not have to be sacrificed in order to attain the objective. But there are several things which can be done even if that cannot be done, and the first of those is that fast refrigerator trains should be established to carry fish from Nova Scotia into the markets of central Canada. Secondly, the Dominion government can aid the provincial governments of the maritime provinces in a campaign to popularize the eating of fish throughout central Canada, and if I may make one personal observation, I would say that there is a fertile field.

I pass on to the question of the salt fish trade. There is very little that can be done in this connection in so far as the question of maritime rights is concerned, but there is one matter that I would like to bring to the attention of the government. The salt fish trade is one that thrives in competition with the world. Our chief competitors are Norway and Newfoundland, and the chief market difficulty to-day is that Norway appears to be marketing a superior quality of fish, due to the fact that Norwegian fish are caught nearer home and do not have to be so heavily salted, and consequently can be better cured. I would suggest that a research bureau be established by the government to investigate with a view to finding improved methods of curing and packing fish, and to see if the market for salt fish cannot be extended.

I want to make one other reference in connection with this matter. From Lunenburg there go forth every year 100 vessels, and 3,000 men who earn their living on the deep. Last year during the storm in the month of August, two schooners, the Sadie Knickle and the Sylvia Mosher, were lying off Sable island when the storm came up, and they were caught and wrecked on the sand bars, and their crews of fifty men went to destruction. Why? Because there was no effective method of giving them warning that the storm was coming. If they had received warning, they could have obtained sea-room and escaped. After the election I wrote to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Cardin), and suggested that warning could be given if the government saw fit to establish radio-telegraphic communication. If the weather reports could be broadcast in plain English so that they could be picked up with a radio receiving set at a certain hour each day, disasters such as happened to the Sadie Knickle and the Sylvia Mosher need not happen in the future. I am happy to say that I received a most courteous reply from the minister, assuring me that the matter was being attended to, and that the Marconi station at Louisburg would be equipped for the purpose. I wish to impress upon the minister the fact that if it is to be of any use in the coming year, it will be necessary that some definite assurance be given that the service will be in operation by the month of March because at that time the fleet leaves for the sea. I would further suggest to the minister that the service be extended in this way: In the United States the Westinghouse stations every Saturday night broadcast messages to the men of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police in the far north. These Lunenburg fishermen are on the banks two or three months at a time earning their living, during which they have no means of communication with the people at home; so I would suggest that the same station, Louisburg, broadcast, say every Saturday night, messages from relatives to members of the fleet, which could be picked up by the latter on their radio receiving sets. If this is done I can assure the government that it would bring an added sense of security to many homes in my constituency.

Before I sit down I want to draw the attention of hon. members on the other side of the House to the fact that so far as this report is concerned the people of Nova Scotia are in deadly earnest. They started six years ago to struggle for what they deemed their rights. They struggled to have their disabilities removed. The conditions in the Maritime provinces, despite all that has been said to the contrary, demand a remedy and demand a remedy at once, and the remedy that has been suggested and demanded has been placed in concrete form by the commission. The right hon. Prime Minister, while in the Maritimes, gave the impression that the recommendations and suggestions of the commission would be carried out to the letter. Speaking at Windsor, in the county of Hants, on the evening of Monday, August 30, 1926, he said, as reported in the Halifax Chronicle:

> It was anticipated that the commission would make its report in the near future. Mr. King desired to say that when the report is made out the Liberal administration would see to it that its recommendations are sympathetically received. It will be observed that the commission had been directed to make specific recommendations. This was in order that the government might have concrete measures which it could present to Parliament. He had no hesitancy in saying that he felt sure that the Liberals of western Canada would join with the Liberals of the Province of Quebec and the Province of Ontario in seeking to give effect to any legislative proposals based upon the findings of the commission, as he knew it was the desire of the Liberal party in other parts of Canada to have the Maritime provinces feel that the rest of Canada appreciated their problems and was prepared to join in finding the satisfactory solution.
> "In my opinion" said Mr. King, "the report of Sir Andrew Duncan's commission will afford a historical parallel to the late Lord Durham report which in the late thirties did so much by way of concrete recommendation and suggestion to remove the grievances of which Upper and Lower Canada were suffering at that time. Sir Andrew Duncan is a second Lord Durham and any recommendation from his pen will be sure to carry great weight in the parliament of Canada."

May I say to the right hon. Prime Minister that the people of Nova Scotia are looking to him to make good that pledge in letter and in spirit. What they demand is the full measure outlined in the report of the Duncan commission. They desire legislation to carry it out in full, and not simply any part or parcel thereof. Nova Scotia to-day is in a precarious position, and I speak particularly for my own province because I know it better than the other provinces. Nova Scotia to-day is in the same position as an under-nourished man. She has been fed by the government on smelling salts so long that they are now useless for the purposes of nourishment and she must have something better. Unfortunately we have had cause for misgiving. We have had fears that the attitude assumed by the Prime Minister during the last election was as expressed by one of the finance ministers of this country some time ago, something on which to get into power. That impression has been strengthened somewhat by the fact that the speech from the throne is very vague indeed. As to the remedies the government proposes for the purposes of alleviating conditions in the maritime provinces and carrying out the recommendations of the Duncan commission, the speech simply states that certain legislation will be introduced. And may I say that the impression is not helped in any respect by the attitude the party of the Prime Minister took consistently up to the time the commission was actually functioning. Members from Nova Scotia stated in this House last year that there was nothing wrong with the province. I repeat that Nova Scotia demands the full measure of justice. I wish to say—and I do not make the statement as a threat, because there is no person more loyal to Canada than I am—that as an under-nourished man is susceptible to disease, so the province of Nova Scotia is susceptible to the germs of disease and there are within the party led by the right hon. the Prime Minister men who are trying to drive Nova Scotia from confederation, and we want him to help us to thwart them in their purpose. Only last election we had a man running in the county of Pictou who was an avowed secessionist and he was the official candidate of the Liberal party. One of the planks in his platform was secession. Furthermore, there is on the government side of the House a member representing a Nova Scotia constituency who six short years ago was an avowed secessionist, and the two chief Liberal organs of the province of Nova Scotia are owned by a man who is reputed to have as his purpose the breaking of the ties of confederation. We do not want anyone to succeed in any such purpose. We want to help Canada, because we believe the destiny of Nova Scotia is linked with that of Canada, and I can assure the right hon. Prime Minister that if he gives us the full measure of the Duncan report—nothing less—the province which gave to this country Howe, Tupper, Fielding, Borden and Thompson, will go on to play her part as she has in the past and will be a contented and integral part of the great dominion that is to be.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Rosetown): Mr. Speaker, there is still a remnant of the Progressive party in this part of the House—that is even if you do not include under that name those who have been elected as an economic group and now bear the name of the United Farmers of Alberta. After the capitulation of a number who were elected in Manitoba who used to sit with us, and another member in Saskatchewan who was similarly situated, we certainly have been reduced in number, and occupy now a fourth place in this chamber, but a party nevertheless. Last year, under this name, we supported this government on a programme of legislation. We intend doing the same thing this year, and while we are sorry that a number of our former Progressives have now taken their seats on the Liberal side of the House I want to say that the spirit of Progressivism in western Canada is as strong as it ever was. The word stability no doubt had something to do with the division of our group this time, but I wish to say a word regarding stability. We must realize that stability cannot be maintained unless all classes together have found a common ground for stability. Before stability can be attained in government there must at least be equality of opportunity among the different sections of the country and the different classes that exist, even if we may differ as to policies of the administration. The member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) in his speech this afternoon mentioned some of the chief of those discriminations which mostly affect us in western Canada.

I was indeed very much interested in listening to the speaker who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Ernst) in his description of the maritime provinces and what he considers their rights. The Duncan report is now before the House. After thirty-five years in western Canada, trying to make a living under the same conditions as the people of the maritime provinces, I think I know something of the needs of that part of the country. The class discrimination and class privilege are responsible for the most of it, and any subsidies or bonuses that may be given are not going to remedy the situation. What the maritime provinces need to-day is exactly what western Canada needs—a chance to make their own living. That is what we must have. A cut of 20 per cent in railway rates is advised. Who is to bear that 20 per cent? Will the maritime provinces themselves benefit by it? They may for a time, but only for a time, and very little at that. Again, I wonder if the maritime provinces are willing to be reduced to the status of paupers in this Dominion and become wards of this nation? I do not think self-respecting men are willing to be reduced to that status, and I am sure that western Canada will never submit to such a status. What we want is a chance to make our own living.

Now, evidently the hon. member who has just sat down is labouring under a false impression regarding the statutory regulations of freight rates. No doubt he referred to the Crowsnest pass agreement. That agreement was an attempt on the part of the Laurier government to remove the terrible discrimination in freight rates which the west since confederation has laboured under. But even the Crowsnest pass agreement has only partially removed that discrimination, and even when the agreement was operating to its full extent on commodities hauled west we were paying higher freight rates on similar commodities over similar distances in western Canada than were being paid anywhere in eastern Canada; and although the government two or three sessions ago put through a bill for the equalization of freight rates, no attempt has yet been made to put its provisions into force, and some of the grossest discriminations in freight rates still exist in western Canada. Neither bonuses nor bounties will do any good either to wheat raising or to the production of steel. What we want, I repeat, is a chance to make our own living.

I intend to deal with the speech from the throne for a very short time. It is pleasing to me to see that the legislation which failed last session to be placed on the statute books will be reintroduced this session. That legislation failed to become law last session because of the undignified and, I might say, the disorderly break-up of parliament.

The Canada Grain Act is to again come up for amendment. As far as the act itself is concerned, western Canada hopes, in fact expects, that the government will remove every obstacle to the co-operative effort of the farmers to market their grain in their own way. We have started a co-operative movement there with the purpose of trying to retain in our own hands a part of what the speculators used to take. We want every discrimination removed, but we found last year that those who have had the privilege of deteriorating our export grain and taking the profit of the difference in price between that and the cream of the crop—our prices are always based on the export grain—are going to fight this bill to the last ditch. We are the only class in Canada to-day who are not privileged to market our own products in our own way. That is one of the tremendous class discriminations which must be removed.

The revaluation of soldier settlers' land is a measure long overdue.

Now, the government has seen fit to include in the speech from the throne a reference to the fuel problem. We are offered reciprocity with the United States in coal, in fact complete free trade in coal. That to my mind would be the best solution for the marketing of our own products and the securing of our own fuel. If the government intends to subsidize any private company to construct a coking plant in any city solely for the purpose of private gain and exploiting our citizens, it will find this group utterly opposed to the scheme. But if any municipality or any of the consumers of this country would like co-operatively to organize themselves for the production of their own fuel in as cheap a manner as possible and in adequate quantities, then I think we would be quite agreeable that the government should give some help. But we shall be utterly opposed to the government giving any private company the hard earned money of the taxpayers of this country.

Regarding the Hudson Bay railway, I might tell the government that a good deal of suspicion exists to-day in western Canada because of the action of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) in securing an engineer from abroad to pass on the merits of the two ports. Now, Port Nelson after two or more investigations was decided on as the terminus of the railway. Plans were made and a large part of the work has been done, costing I think some $6,000,000. Only a fraction of that amount is needed to put the port into a condition whereby the whole scheme may be tried out. Time has shown that no great difficulty as to the elements has to be overcome to make Port Nelson a trade harbour. We are pleased, however, to know that the railway is to be completed with all possible despatch. Western Canada is confident that within a few short years it will be shown that the fears of many regarding the navigability of the waters of Hudson bay and strait are utterly unfounded. In the meantime I am sure the railway will be needed to develop industry in that part of the Dominion.

Another feature of the speech from the throne is the reference to our foreign trade. It is gratifying to know that a marked improvement has been shown. Let me say again that this has been due mostly to the two great crops in western Canada during 1925 and 1926. All industry in this country depends still upon agriculture, and agriculture is preyed upon by other industries to an extent which perhaps is not generally realized. Indeed, it is not too much to say that the class privileges which certain manufacturers and others enjoy are a direct charge upon agriculture; they charge the home consumer such a price as will ensure them a profit on all their export trade. If they can compete in foreign countries with the cheap labour which is to be had there, then why is a tariff needed in Canada? Some of the government statistics to-day will show that the tariff is being used to ensure the manufacturers a profit over the whole of their export trade. Let us take the finshed article from the produce raised on the land by the farmer. We ourselves are consuming wheat and oats, the finished article being produced in western Canada, and we are paying just a little more to-day in Saskatchewan for the ninety-eight pound sack of flour than the people in Liverpool are obliged to pay, although wheat is anywhere from thirty-eight to fifty-four cents dearer in Liverpool than it is in Winnipeg. These are things that should not be, and it is for these reasons that I foresee in western Canada a condition similar to that which now prevails in the maritime provinces. I fear we are being reduced to the same state in which the people in that part of the country find themselves. We are moving at express speed in that direction and neither subsidies nor bonuses nor cuts in freight rates will do us any good while such a condition exists.

Let me ask hon. gentlemen this question: What will Ontario or Quebec care how much taxes they pay to effect a cut in railway rates so long as they can pass it on in the form of the price they charge for the goods which they compel us and the maritimes to purchase? It does not matter how large the cut may be, the fact is we are going round in the same old circle. We are merely making it wider, putting off the evil day a little longer. I repeat: What western Canada and the maritimes need is a chance to make their own living.

It should be particularly gratifying to members of the government to-day to find that those industries on which the tariff has been reduced are making the greatest improvements. There is only one thing in the whole Dominion that hinders production, and that is the high cost of living. That is what is preventing production of agricultural commodities in western Canada to-day. That is why we are year after year voting millions for an immigration policy for the purpose of bringing in more dupes to take our places in western Canada as we are squeezed off the land. These are the conditions that face us out there; this is the evil the government is expected to confront and to remove at this time. It is to be hoped that the government, with the encouragement it has had in the matter of tariff reduction, will now lose no time in removing some of the unjust taxes which are at present levied particularly on those things most needed for the maintenance of health and vigor in this rigorous climate, namely, food and clothing. With increases in many lines of production, with exports and imports showing improvements, surely a cut in taxation is due. I would urge the government to maintain the income tax as it stands to-day; it is the fairest means of raising revenue we have ever found. We should remove the import penalties and the sales tax from the necessaries of life most needed by the workers of the nation. These things must be reduced.

Perhaps one of the greatest injustices which the people have ever had heaped upon them we had to face last summer in western Canada, particularly in that area that grows less of fresh fruit and vegetables than any other part of the Dominion, at least for a shorter period of the year. The Minister of Customs last summer saw fit to impose upon tomatoes, peaches and pears such a valuation as increased the duty from 100 to 180 per cent. There are about 1,000 crates of tomatoes in a carload. We used to pay some fifteen cents per crate on these tomatoes, making $150 a carload. Reading some of the Liberal party's own election propaganda, I saw that the valuation was so increased as to result in a duty not of $150 but of $355 per carload on tomatoes, while peaches and pears were increased proportionately. I cannot understand how any government or any man would so trade on the rights of the people, particularly those on whom the burden bears heaviest, as to make their food so much more expensive. Why is it done? One gentleman in the United States a little while ago said that the tariff was always a dicker between the politician and the man who thought he would like to be protected. What does that imply? It implies that this is done for a consideration. The Minister of Customs last summer increased the duty to the extent I have mentioned—for whose benefit? Who got the benefit of that increase? The raiser, the producer? No. It is entirely a distributor's measure from beginning to end, and I say from my place in this House to-night that it passes my comprehension how any man or any government can trade on the rights of citizens in this way without a consideration of some sort, either in the way of campaign funds or otherwise. Such is the tariff and such it will always be, bringing our public men under suspicion year after year until the name of politician has come to be something to be suspected. These are evils we want removed.

[Mr. Evans.]

Two of the greatest evils we have to face are the tariff and liquor. Smuggling has gone on to such an extent that we are trying the friendship of the country to the south, which has always been at peace with us. It seems to me that unless the people take the thing in hand the liquor traffic will ultimately control the Dominion, as indeed it is very largely controlling it now, so much so that the new Minister of Customs this last summer was appealed to to do things which otherwise I am sure he would not have done. Even the sacks used in connection with the liquor traffic were allowed to go free of duty just so that bootlegging might be facilitated, and for the convenience of the bootlegger himself. Not only did the Minister of Customs break the law of the land in doing so, but he also violated the spirit of a treaty we entered into with the United States. These things ought not to be.

Then let me deal with another discrimination, the grading of grain in western Canada. The seasons of 1925 and 1926 were unique in the history of Canada for fickle weather, and a tremendous quantity of damp grain has been coming forward. In 1925 we found that the grain commission was not equipped to deal with the situation as it then existed. The government, or the grain commission, I do not know who was responsible, denuded the laboratory in Winnipeg of its equipment and staff and left the chief in that city without even a charwoman to look after his office. When this damp grain came forward in such volumes there were no moisture testing machines or experienced men to deal with it, with the result that dissatisfaction exists to-day all over western Canada. This is only another way in which the west is being bled, we are losing thousands and thousands of dollars in every community because of improper grading.

I have just one further word, and this time it is dealing with the word "status"; I am not confusing this with the word "stature". A good deal has been said regarding our status in the empire. I am not so particular about the status which we enjoy as a part of the great British commonwealth, or the British Empire; what I am more concerned with is that each part of this Dominion should have an equal status. Is it right that Ontario and Quebec, because of a heavier representation in this House, should pass legislation and wield the big stick over the provinces which have not that representation? If we are going to be a successful country and confederation, all parts must enjoy the same freedom before contentment will result. I think we have the finest country on God's earth; no other people in the world are so blessed with natural resources as we are in Canada. We have nearly everything we want; living should be cheaper in Canada than in any other country of the world; production should be cheaper as well, but to-day we find the cost of living in Canada the highest, I think, in the world. This should not be. Every province must have equality, and every class must have equal opportunity. I think this is the great task of statesmen in Canada to-day. Confederation presents a challenge to the people of this country; different parts of Canada are talking secession, because we are not equal; we are discriminated against; discrimination exists as between the rights of one citizen and another. This can be remedied by the government, and no other government since confederation has had the opportunity which is before this government to-day. Let them remove some of these inequalities. This is the test of statesmanship to-day, and we wonder whether they will rise to the status of statesmen or continue to wallow in the slough of expediency.

Mr. MICHAEL LUCHKOVICH (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my fondest wish at the present time is that my voice could be as great as the province from which I come, and that my eloquence might be as lofty as the mountains which skirt the western part of that province. I could then voice the sentiments of the inhabitants of that fair province in a manner befitting its greatness and the important part it is bound to play in the affairs of Canada. Being a new member, however, and never having run the gauntlet of Liberal and Conservative criticism, I feel that I am taking a chance of being heeded or even given a favourable hearing. I feel, however, that I am speaking as a citizen of a great country, to whom has been given the honour of representing one of its constituencies, and as such I hope this, my maiden speech, will be the beginning of a truer Canadian citizenship, a citizenship which I hope to impart to the people in my constituency, especially to those whose origin was in a foreign country. As it happens, I do not belong to a group commanding a very large membership, but that will in no way prevent me from doing my duty as a good citizen; on the contrary, I believe that only in this group can I do my duty conscientiously and faithfully.

During the past three days I have noticed that there are different stages to the debates in this House. There is the jollicose stage; then we have the bellicose stage, and finally the comatose stage. I saw evidences of the comatose stage this afternoon, when in looking at the other side of the House I saw and heard two or three hon. members vociferously snoring. We are now dangerously near bedtime, and I do not wish to speak at any great length; in other words, I do not wish to put any hon. member into the comatose stage.

In the speech from the throne there was brief mention of a substantial increase in immigration. The views of individual men are different on this subject. As a matter of fact, one hon. member has said that it is useless to spend a million dollars bringing settlers to the farms when that money could be spent more advantageously otherwise, but no matter in what light we view this subject, immigration is always before us, and it has been a policy of every government in Canada since confederation. I understand further that immigration from northern and central Europe has been urged, or at least looked upon with favour in certain quarters. In my constituency there are many immigrants of Scandinavian and Slavic descent, and I can vouch for the success attained by those men. They have, under the most trying circumstances, made good, and are now from every point of view first class citizens. I do not mean to say that I advocate bringing in immigrants only from Scandinavian countries and from countries of eastern Europe. There certainly must be a leaven of British in this country so that we can retain our institutions and our ideals as we have always had them in Canada. Individuals, however, differ very much as to the merits of an immigration and colonization scheme. Some would like to follow the United States in her "partly-closed policy", and stem the tide of agricultural people from eastern and central Europe. Apprehension is being felt for the safety of this country if this influx is not stemmed. It is based on a fear that the foreign stock resident in Canada would soon be out of a safe proportion to the native stock; that the Canadian farmer would be menaced with an agricultural over-production. These conditions really do not exist in Canada and in view of our present state of under-development, therefore, such an apprehension is absurd. The United States followed for a century the open door policy. Her population now is actually over the hundred million mark, and she is thus in a position where she can quite readily overtake human wastage from natural increase. In such a case a limited immigration is quite justified. But to Canada, in her undeveloped condition, the same argument cannot be applied.

A few weeks ago I met a man on the train coming down from Alberta to Winnipeg and he asked me why it was that so much of the comparatively poor land in Alberta was occupied by the peasant class, by Ukrainians. He thought that some of the farms would be the last place he would settle on. This friend of mine unconsciously gives us the keynote to the whole situation. About one third of the arable land of Canada is alienated and occupied. It is almost safe to presume that most of this area of arable land already occupied comprises the best land. The remaining area of unalienated arable land would be either medium or inferior. Here we have our problem. It is these medium and inferior lands that we must try to colonize successfully. How are we going to do it? These lands can only be reclaimed by intense human labour, and this involves clearing, the digging out of stones, drainage, and breaking. It involves years of patient industry, self sacrifice and self denial. No one but a pioneer of great sturdiness and endurance could successfully create for himself a home on such land. That type, I believe, can be found in the central European peasant. He has shown us in the past that he is quite capable of surmounting the difficulties incidental to pioneer farming, and that he possesses all the virtues and qualifications essential to such a task. Of course it is quite understandable why an influx of settlers from European countries should be a cause for alarm from a patriotic standpoint. British sentiment, ideals and institutions might be endangered. I do not think so. Take the United States for instance. For a hundred years immigrants have been coming into the republic from every European country, but her institutions are just as strong to-day as they ever were. It is a very significant fact that the children and grandchildren of those immigrants are just as loyal to the country of their adoption as the native born are. Our problem will not be helped at all by discrimination, or by making the foreigner the goat of all our social unrest. To discriminate means to alienate, and alienism only leads to a worse problem. What is needed primarily is clear and sane thinking. I do not see what we have to fear in the peasant. It is true that when these people first came here thirty years ago they were somewhat unobtrusive so far as taking part in civic affairs is concerned. They did not seek to exercise a directing influence in the affairs of this country because they were too busy establishing homes for themselves. But to-day, after the lapse of all those years I can safely say that they are beginning to make an intelligent contribution both to our social and political life. As evidence of this we have hundreds of their children in the professions, and some are serving a political representative capacity. Measured by all standards they are quite susceptible to Canadian ideals and influences. As far as they are concerned the question of citizenship is bound to arise, but it will come best if allowed to come in a natural manner. That course has been followed successfully in the United States, and there is no reason why the same success should not be encountered in Canada. The process of amalgamation is, I think, inevitable.

In dealing with this question I am reminded of the remark of an Irish politician, who, in speaking of immigration, said: "Don't worry about the foreigner. In about ten years he will get out of the skinned class into the skinners, and he will then be as patriotic as any of us."

Some day it is hoped our province will get control of its natural resources. At the present time Canada is very much underpopulated Here again we differ from the United States The latter country has sufficient area and resources for its people and enough people for the development of its resources. In Canada our resources are plentiful but the population is insufficient for their development. There is in Canada, also, another peculiar condition. Our agriculture and manufacturing production, our railway mileage and commerce, and all our other industrial enterprises are far out of proportion to our population, as compared with most other countries. I believe that by bringing in immigrants animated with a genuine pioneer spirit this condition could be amended.

I notice also in the speech from the throne that those government measures which passed the House last session, but which failed to become law, will be reintroduced. For one thing it is sincerely to be hoped that the Canada Grain Act amendment will be brought in again. In the next place legislation on rural credits if enacted will not only be of assistance to farmers and workers already located here but will be of material benefit in connection with an immigration policy.

There is also the question of railroads. A country that produces the world's best wheat and oats, such as the Peace River district, must offer unrivalled opportunities for settlement. It is a region of marvellous productive ability, with many thousands of acres of cheap land awaiting the settler's plough. A great immigration movement could be started in that direction. The only thing necessary to bring that about is an announcement that the Peace River district will be given an outlet to the Pacific coast without delay.

Another railway which would be heralded with great joy by settlers in northern Alberta south of the Saskatchewan river, is the new railway which the Canadian Pacific is building from Cut Knife, Saskatchewan. The influence of the government in speeding up construction on this line would be greatly appreciated in that part of the west. As it is now many of the settlers there, and the district is very well settled, have to haul grain as many as forty or forty-five miles to the nearest point of transportation.

It is also to be hoped that the government will not discontinue grants to B-circuit fairs. Such fairs are of immense educational value to the communities in which they are held. A discontinuance of such grants would kill all interest in such fairs, as the committees in charge depend largely on these grants to finance their undertakings. It is said by some that it would be better to give grants to fairs in cities like Toronto. I think that even cities like Toronto get most of their exhibits from small country places as Vegreville and other towns of its size.

This morning I received a resolution from the Town Council of the town of Tofield, which reads as follows:

> Resolved, that whereas Cooking lake forest reserve contains much arable land and land suitable for the raising of live stock, and while it is at present being used by the Blackfoot Stock Association to some extent for the ranging and pasturing of cattle, this town council is of the belief that this land could be best utilized, and would become of the greatest use to the greatest number if it were thrown open for settlement and homestead entry.
> We therefore suggest to the hon. Minister of the Interior, for his consideration, that that portion of the Cooking lake forest reserve lying south of the Edmonton-Mundare highway be thrown open for homestead entry with the right of pre-emption, or purchase at a reasonable figure, of a further quarter-section.

I happen to know this Cooking lake reserve. It contains about 66 sections of land, and if it were settled on the basis of one settler for each half section, about 130 settlers could be placed on it. I think it would be a far better scheme to place these settlers on the reserve than to have the reserve used as it is now by the Blackfoot Stock Association for the ranging and pasturing of cattle. I think it would be of greater advantage not only to that community itself but to Canada as a whole if this land were thrown open to settlers. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the government will take cognizance of the remarks I have made.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): As one of the members from the province of Ontario, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words to-night on this debate. I very much regret that in the speech from the throne the government have given no indication that they are going to take any active steps to solve the economic ills of the country. There is the problem, for instance, of unemployment. Unemployment to-day in the larger centres of population is very acute. I might refer to the unemployment in the large manufacturing city from which I come. I know the conditions there, and I know that in the past few days very rapid preparations have been made by the social and charitable institutions and public bodies of various kinds in the city to try and cope with the unemployment situation with which we shall be faced this coming winter. I regret, I say, that the government in the speech from the throne has announced no definite policy for taking care of the economic ills in the larger centres of population in this country. They have no practical solution of these problems to bring before the House and the country at the present time.

One of the essential features of a speech from the throne is to give the representatives of the people in parliament the opportunity of bringing before the House and the country the economic problems that are facing the country, with a view to applying a remedy to the disease, if there is any, that affects the country. Looking over the speech from the throne I find that it deals very largely in platitudes. It says something about the coal question. Well, Mr. Speaker, for five successive sessions the question of a national coal policy has been before this House, and what has the government done? Has it done anything to bring Nova Scotia coal to central Canada? Has it done anything to bring Alberta coal to central Canada? No. The government has simply made a political football of the question for the past five sessions. This question of a national fuel supply was to be referred on the 7th of March last to the railway commission. How did they treat the question? They have not yet had a hearing upon it, and I notice in the press of to-day that representatives of the government of Alberta are coming to interview the government of Ontario with a view to getting this question before the railway commission. What is the railway commission for if it is not to take up urgent national questions such as this, which mean so much to the working classes of this country? Yet no hearing has as yet been given by a commission paid and sworn to act promptly.

I support protection, Mr. Speaker, as a principle, not as a privilege. I believe that the proper application of the doctrine of protection will solve all the economic ills of every province in Canada from Vancouver to Halifax. It will solve the problems not only of the great manufacturing industries in this country, but of the agricultural industry, the great wheat-growing industry in the west, and it will solve the economic ills we have in central Canada and in the maritime provinces. I am not ashamed to declare myself a national policy Conservative. I believe that the protectionist principles of the national policy can alone draw together the varied interests of the Canadian people so that we shall become one great economic unit. These principles can join the mines of Alberta and Nova Scotia to the markets of Ontario and Quebec. Despite what Sir Henry Thornton has said, despite his sneers at the lunch-counter idea of reducing freight rates, I say here and now that Canada may just as well run a system of lunch-counter freight rates if that will mean keeping the Canadian workers employed at home instead of having to go to the United States to look for a job; we might just as well have this lunch-counter system of freight rates and employ Canadian workers as to increase freight rates and add to the number of dollars of Sir Henry Thornton's salary and the number of private cars in his service.

With a proper application of the national policy, the ideal of protection is the one true and enduring foundation for the future prosperity of this country. The national policy, rightly understood and wisely applied, recognizes no difference between the problems of war and the problems of peace. There is the principle of protection in war. All the resources of a country are mobilized in war time for the country's defence. We can apply the weapon of the tariff in times of peace to solve the economic ills of the country. When in war time we are invaded by a foreign enemy, our resources in men and money are mobilized and concentrated at a point where the invader can be beaten back. In peace time we are invaded by unemployment, stagnation, and other economic ills, and it is then that the country's money and thinking power should be concentrated at the point of danger.

I am proud to serve in this House as a representative of one of the divisions of Toronto, and we are just as much interested in Toronto in the economic ills of the west and of the maritime provinces as we are in our own. I am as much interested in the ills of the maritime provinces and the ills of the western provinces as I am in the ills of York county. I support the building of the Hudson Bay railway on the protectionist principle. It is advocated by hon. gentlemen to my left who are free traders where other people are concerned, but protectionists where their own interests are concerned—free traders so far as eastern Canada is concerned, but protectionists where their own interests are concerned, and the Hudson Bay railway is one of them. I, Mr. Speaker, am a consistent protectionist. I support protection as a principle, and not as a privilege. The people of the west are content to leave it to the law of supply and demand to provide markets for eastern industry, but they are not content to leave it to the law of supply and demand to provide railways for western agriculture. I have been giving some thought to this question, and I am for the national policy, Mr. Speaker, even if the protectionist principle of the national policy requires the building of the Hudson Bay railway for the protection of the agricultural industry in the west from its competitor to the south, and to protect the farmer from loss of profit in marketing his product.

In addition, I am for the national policy of protection to the hilt as applied to the problems of the far distant maritime provinces. I believe that with a proper application of the doctrine of protection we shall be able to solve the economic problems of the maritime provinces. It was the free trade policy of the Liberal party that landed the maritime provinces in the condition in which they find themselves to-day. For forty years the Liberal premiers in the maritime provinces treated the resources of those provinces—the products of the sea, of the soil, the forest and the mine, the timber wealth of those provinces, their water powers, and their great basic industries—on the free trade principle. To this favourite a timber limit would be granted, to another favorite a coal mine, to another a water power, with the result that the Liberal party gave away the resources of the maritime provinces under free trade. They were like Santa Claus taking down presents from a Christmas tree. I believe that a proper application of the doctrine of protection will solve all the economic ills of the maritime provinces, and as one of the members of Ontario I will support the general principles of the Duncan report.

I believe that the people of central Canada, especially Ontario—and no province is suffering so much to-day from economic ills—will support active aid to the maritimes as a necessity. We certainly need a ginger group in this House for Ontario, to dwell on Ontario's economic ills also, which are acute. The people of the province of Ontario believe in the confederation doctrine of all for each and each for all. That is the doctrine which should rule this country in any modern confederation. I may say that if confederation cannot be made a commercial success in the maritime provinces, the people of the maritime provinces must be in a very bad condition. The people of the maritimes for more than forty years put their trust in the idol of free trade and in the interests of Montreal greed. The maritime provinces allowed the incompetence of free trade rulers at Ottawa from 1896 to 1911 and the incompetence of corporationist free traders in at Halifax 1882 to 1924 to fritter away their opportunities for growth and prosperity and give away their public assets. The incompetence of private ownership greed in Montreal with some assistance from the same forces in Toronto butchered the great possibilities of the maritime provinces in the production of coal, iron and steel and in the production of power. I believe it is the duty and the mission of the Conservative party to revive and extend the good old national policy and apply those ideals as the hydro Conservatives of Ontario applied those ideals. The principles of the national policy forbid us to come here to serve the local needs of the sections where we live. The principles of the national policy require us to come here and think and vote in the spirit of the old Cornish battle cry, "Each for all and all for each." That is the battle cry of the national policy breed of protectionist as opposed to the battle cry of the hon. member for Brandon his leader and his followers, whose policy has emptied nearly five hundred thousand Canadians out of their own country since 1921, the semi-free traders who fight under the banner of a tariff uncertainty that is worse than free trade, the star-spangled music of the war cry, the United States for Canada and Canada for the United States. That is the kind of protection I would apply to the various provinces of confederation. We have no jobs to keep our own Canadian born at home. The greatest problem of the immigration policy is to devise a scheme to stop the emigration to the United States, which has amounted to nearly half a million Canadians since 1921.

That is the first corner stone in the immigration policy. Instead of forcing our own Canadian born citizens to go to the United States we should supply them with jobs in our own country. This can be done by developing our natural resources and our raw materials, thus preventing nearly half a million of our citizens leaving for the States every year. We are losing all those wages which now go to the people of the United States. If we had a proper system of protection we would have enough work in our own country for our own unemployed, not only on the farms but in the urban districts.

Another phase of the immigration policy is the bringing of immigrants from the British Isles. Why should we bring immigrants from England to Canada if we have no jobs for them? Because we have not even jobs for the Canadian born worker. At the present time Canadian money is going to the United States at the rate of nearly $500,000,000 a year. These workers are now living under the Stars and Stripes when they should be in Canada serving under the Union Jack. The policy of the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) is a policy for the suppression of opportunity for employment of Canadians in their own country and the employment of British workers in Canada. The hon. gentleman has done little or nothing in the matter of an immigration policy. Fancy this country having a free trader as a commissioner on immigration. How can there be any immigration under free trade? How can we furnish jobs for our working men under a policy of free trade? If we cannot supply jobs for the half million men who have gone to the United States, how in the name of heaven can we supply jobs for immigrants who come here under our policy of free trade.

I said that the policy of the right hon. Prime Minister and of the Minister of Immigration was a policy of enmity to the production of jobs for Canadians. I take back that statement, in part. The policy of these gentlemen has made Ottawa the seat of a great industry, an industry that manufactures jobs for broken down politicians. The workings of that policy have made Canada a nation—yea, a nation of ambassadors.

This government have stated that they have nothing to do with unemployment; that under the British North America Act unemployment is for the provinces and municipalities. We say to the government to-night that unemployment is a matter for the federal government under section 91 of the British North America Act. They are in charge of the tariff, the banking laws, the transportation laws, the immigration laws and are responsible for the exodus of Canadians from Canada; and the blame for the present condition of unemployment rests on the federal government. Instead of the government dealing with this problem, they say nothing about it in the speech from the throne. They are not ready to go as far as they did years ago when they were prepared to pay one-third of the cost of unemployment relief, the provinces and municipalities to pay the rest of the cost. It is all very well for them to make a football out of it. The responsibility is with the Dominion government of the day to see that the people of Canada do not suffer, to see that some remedial legislation is introduced into the House. I regret to observe, however, that no such amendment for the benefit of the worker has been mentioned in the speech. Parliament has legislated for the benefit of the trusts and combines, the bankers' association, the railways and others, but when it comes down to a question of doing something for the unemployed in the urban centres of population, the government is content with a policy of drift, and will do nothing to try to remove the burden from the working classes of this country. The first duty of a government is to look after the health and condition of its people.

It was charged in this House last session and the session before that the Conservative party was the servant of the big interests in Canada. I have some speeches of the Prime Minister made in the country to this effect. I say that the Conservative party serve no big interests in this country, I can speak for myself. Personally I do not serve any big interest, and some of us have suffered in the battle against the big interests and are prepared to suffer again in defence of public rights against these same interests. The speech from the throne should have announced some social legislation to redress the grievances of the people who are suffering from the terrible disease of unemployment. In England the Prime Minister, Mr. Stanley Baldwin, although a Conservative, is an advanced radical regarding the solution of this unemployment question and also regarding the solution of other social questions. He has been content to apply a measure of protection to help the coal and great shipbuilding and steel industries weather the storm, by subsidies, subventions and protection, and in that way to help the working classes. But to-day unemployment in this country is a political football in the hands of the government. It is all very well to send an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Washington. I like and have the utmost regard and respect for the hon. gentleman personally and wish him well, but I will oppose on principle the granting of one dollar for the opening of an office in Washington while thousands of Canadians have to go to the United States as ambassadors to try to get a living there that they are denied in the country for which they fought. Apparently all the government can do to relieve unemployment is to give a lot of politicians jobs as ambassadors in Berlin, in Pekin, in Constantinople and in all the other capitals of the countries washed by the seven seas. A modern Shakespearian quotation would read:

> Regions Caesar never knew
> Kings' ambassadors shall know,
> Where his Eagles never flew.

A few favorite Canadians are to be appointed ambassadors at the public expense, while other Canadians have to go as ambassadors at their own expense to search in a foreign land for the jobs that they cannot find in their own country. Many of them returned men who fought for Canada in the Great war, at the hazard of their lives.

The great industrial system of the United States was built up on the principle of protection and solved unemployment. Nero never fiddled while Rome burned the way this government is fiddling in appointing a tariff commission to solve the economic problems of this country. The tariff is not a party question, it is a matter of economics that concerns our farmers and toilers in the various centres of population. But instead of announcing in the speech from the throne some measure of protection and safeguarding legislation that would solve our economic ills, nothing is being done by the government to relieve our unemployed who are asking for a job that they may get bread. Many industries are closed up altogether, others are working only 50 per cent, and even the great agricultural industry of the west is suffering.

If one industry in this country should be protected it is the grain growing industry. It is not a north and south industry; it is an east and west industry and an oversea industry to the markets of Britain and Europe.

I can tell the Minister of Immigration that his ideas of filling up the west are all wrong. As a specialist in filling up the United States the minister can point with pride to the result his policy has achieved in driving Canadians away from their own country to seek jobs in a foreign land. As a would-be specialist in building up Canada the hon. the Minister of Immigration does not know what he is talking about. The minister cannot build up a great prosperous life on the western prairies by pumping wheat growers and still more wheat growers into the provinces between the boundaries of western Ontario and the Rockies. Feed the needs of the west on that sort of free trade diet and wheat will become so abundant the crop will not be worth 75 cents a bushel and the wheat growers of western Canada will be where the cotton growers of the United States are to-day, doomed to grow and sell wheat at less than the cost of production.

That will be the result of the policy of the hon. member for Brandon and his followers, and of the hon. gentlemen to my left who call themselves, U.F.A's, U.F.B's, U.F.O's and all the way down the alphabet, but in my opinion they are all Liberals. I notice that the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail), a young lady for whom I have the utmost regard and respect, has been deliberating on what side of the House she will sit. Nine hundred to a thousand Conservative voters voted for that splendid young lady under the belief that she was an independent and would exercise her independence in parliament for the benefit of the country generally, but on looking over the records I find that except in one instance she has always voted for the Liberal party in the past two parliaments. My experience in the last three parliaments is that the U.F.A's, the U.F.B's, the U.F.O's and the other letters of the alphabet, are Liberals first, last and all the time. There is really no necessity for any of our Progressive friends to hesitate as to where they will sit. In fact I am sorry that the other side of the House has not sufficient benches to seat the overflow of Progressive members on that side, where they all politically belong.

This United States first policy of "tariff uncertainty," dooms other Canadians to appoint themselves ambassadors at their own expense to search in a foreign land for the jobs that they cannot find in their own country. The great industrial system of the United States was built up on the principle of protection. In the early days of Horace Greeley the opportunities for employment in the United States were threatened by imports from Europe as the opportunities for employment in Canada are to-day threatened by imports from the United States. The Americans asked their rulers for the bread of employment. These rulers did not offer their countrymen the stone of free trade theory. No, and these rulers did not require the founders of American industry to go before a minstrel show of a tariff commission and persuade the interlocutor, the tambo and the bones who call themselves commissioners, that the tariff should be changed in favour of industries that would employ Americans in their own country instead of driving these Americans as Canadians are being driven to seek employment in a foreign country.

This parliament was summoned to Ottawa to consider proposals for the improvement of conditions in this country. The 432,000 Canadians who have been driven from their native land since 1921 are only part of the story. The other part is the work of that other "Excellency," Right Hon. P. C. Larkin and his anti-emigration officials at London. Until we have a pro-immigration policy of protection at Ottawa, we can have no jobs to keep our own Canadian-born workers at home, we can have no jobs to attract other British-born workers to these shores, The big part of immigration problem is a problem of stopping emigration to the United States with jobs for Canadians in their own country. The other part of the immigration problem is the problem of starting immigration from the British Isles with jobs. How can we have immigration without jobs to employ the native-born Canadians who would like to stay here and the British-born workers who would like to come here? How can we have jobs when Canadian money goes to the United States at the rate of five hundred millions in wages to workers under the Stars and Stripes when that money should be kept in Canada to pay workers under the Union Jack? The whole policy of the hon. the member for Brandon's leader is a policy for the suppression of opportunity for employment of Canadians in their own country and the employment of British workers in Canada. The natives of this land that have given some wealth to the hon. member for Brandon, the natives of the isles that gave birth to the same hon. member never had a worse enemy than the hon. member for Brandon and his leader. The policy of these hon. members has proved itself a foe to the creation of jobs for our own people who vainly seek employment that would keep them in Canada or jobs that would bring them to Canada from the British Isles.

I said that the policy of the Prime Minister and the policy of the Minister of Immigration was a policy of enmity to the production of jobs for Canadians. I take back that statement, in part. The policy of these gentlemen has made Ottawa the seat of a great industry; that industry manufactures jobs for broken down politicians; the workings of that policy have made Canada a nation, yea, a nation of ambassadors. The Gaul of Caesar's Commentaries was divided into three parts; the gall of Canada's present rulers is so great as to be indivisible. That gall cannot be divided, especially the gall that asks this parliament to authorize the ambassador-cure for unemployment.

The policy of the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) can be summed up under two heads: First, that nothing that can be bought in the United States shall be made in Canada, especially in eastern Canada; and second, that everything that cannot be bought in the United States shall be imported from overseas, preferably from continental Europe—including Germany. The departmental stores in Toronto to-day, owing to the action of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), for whom I have the greatest respect, in not providing a tariff dumping clause, are filled with cheap, shoddy German goods which are being offered to Christmas buyers while our own industries suffer and many are closed.

I have consistently advocated in this House the doctrine of protection in order to promote the manufacture of our own raw materials and some twenty minerals exported in a crude and semi-crude state, and to prevent their export to the United States in such large quantities as are being shipped out at the present time. The proper application of protection would mean a saving to the people of Canada of an enormous amount of money which to-day is going to enrich the country to the south of us. Ninety per cent of our imports from the United States could be manufactured in Canada, thus affording employment to our own workers and in that way providing a market for our home products to the mixed farmer and market gardener. According to the figures brought down as to July 31 of this year, our early imports of United States bituminous coal totalled 13,373,204 tons valued at $28,781,711. In addition to this our early imports of United States anthracite coal, amounting to some 3,362,631 tons represented a total of $27,256,806. So that we have a total for bituminous and anthracite coal of some $56,000,000, all of which money is going to swell the pay envelopes of some 70,000 miners in the United States. In other words, the people of Canada are contributing to the upkeep of United States communities to the extent quoted, notwithstanding that this money could be used in Alberta and in the maritime provinces to the advantage of 70,000 Canadian miners. This is the sort of thing which the Minister of Immigration and his followers are preaching. The free trade serpent is coiling itself about the whole body of our industrial activities.

[Mr. Church.]

Let me refer for a moment to the automobile industry. I have given the imports of coal and I will now mention those of automobiles and automobile parts to show what a huge sum is now going to the United States from Canada in this direction to supply wages to thousands of workmen across the border instead of being spent at home. I find that 97 per cent of the patents in connection with automobile parts are owned by aliens, many having to do with engines, doors, and so forth I would have all these parts manufactured in Canada and I would also see to it that motor trucks as well were made here. After the cars were manufactured I would apply the principle of protection; I would give 100 per cent protection. I would at the same time protect the consumer in this way: I would have an officer of the Finance department decide upon a fair market value in Canada, allowing for wages, overhead and so on; and after that I would allow a profit of 10, 15 or 18 per cent as the case might be, the balance to go into the treasury of Canada. In that way the automobile purchaser and the user of motor trucks would be protected.

With the free trade policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, we are sending out of Canada at the present time $38,906,337 in payment for American motor cars and parts. If this money were devoted to the manufacture of automobiles in Canada we could provide pay envelopes for a very considerable number of workers and we could maintain from eight to ten Oshawas instead of one. But free trade as we have it in the preaching of the hon. member for Brandon results in the employment of 150,000 workers in the United States, all of them kept busy manufacturing cars for use in Canada. There is no reason why we should not keep this money at home and employ our own workmen. The hon. member for Brandon will indeed be fortunate in his career as Minister of Immigration if he can do as much to fill up Canada in the future as he has done to send people to the United States in the past.

The policy of the Minister of Immigration and his followers begins with a job for His Excellency, the Right Honourable Vincent Massey. I believe I speak for my constituents, and I am sure I speak for myself, when I say that I am ashamed that the Conservative party can be justly charged with responsibility for the creation of the Canadian embassy at Washington. The Conservative party has to count its many blessings when the followers of that party remember all they owe to Union government and the joint leadership of Sir Robert Borden and Hon. Wesley Rowell. Had I been in parliament when Sir

Robert Borden submitted the proposal to separate the representation of Canada at Washington from the representation of Great Britain and the other British nations I would have voted against that triumph of iniquity of separating them, even though I had voted alone. So long as I am in parliament I will voice my protest and record my vote against the appropriation of one dollar of Canadian money to maintain the embassy at Washington. I am a Conservative after the fashion of Sir John A. Macdonald's principle: A British subject I was born and a British subject I will die. I have always been opposed to the doctrine of separatism. I notice that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has brought home from the old country a portrait of Sir Robert Borden, painted by that great artist Orpen—not Abe Orpen the Canadian,—but Orpen the artist in the old land. Now while a staunch Conservative I am an independent Conservative as well and am proud to be such, and I will oppose the Conservative party through thick and thin in any tendency it may at any time show towards separation. When I read that this portrait had been presented to the Prime Minister it occurred to me that he ought to hang it in Laurier House, for I know of no one who has done more for the Liberal party than did Sir Robert Borden, Hon. Wesley Rowell, and his Union government. I am sure that if this separation matter had been made an issue in the last election many hon. gentlemen now occupying seats in this House would not be here. If they had taken a stand before the election such as the Prime Minister has taken in regard to our relations with the rest of the empire I have no doubt that many hon. gentlemen would have been defeated. This matter came up for discussion on 21st June last when there was introduced a motion of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) which at the time I construed as a straight separatist proposal. The motion was introduced by the Prime Minister on June 21 in this House and was debated by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), myself and others. Some of those on this side of the House agree with Sir Robert Borden and Mr. Rowell. I was never a follower of the Union government; I voted for it because I had no option, but the Union government put the Conservative party in the cemetery. I have always opposed separatism and will continue to oppose it in this House so long as I am a member. I would like to repeat a part of the speech I made last June in this connection:

> Five hundred thousand soldiers who went to the front and fought for civilization in France and Flanders were satisfied with Canada's status. Fifty thousand of those gallant men lie buried in those countries; they were content to fight even unto death under Canada's status. They fought for Canada's status but did not ask that any change should be made in it; they did not ask for any increased status for Canada. Such being the case I think the civilians who stayed at home should also be satisfied with the status of this Dominion.
> Of the links that used to bind Canada to the motherland what links remain to-day? First there is our allegiance to the British crown; secondly there is the right of appeal to the Privy Council; thirdly any treaties into which we enter must have the sanction of the mother of parliaments.

As I said then, we are not an independent nation; we are not a nation at all, but a link in the chain of commonwealths making up the British Empire. There is no feeling in favour of annexation to the United States, and there is no desire to be an independent people. We cannot be independent; we could never stand against the nation to our south. A foreign fleet might sail up the St. Lawrence with not even a rowboat opposing it, while our toy navy is locked up in a garage in Halifax. We should be satisfied to meet with New Zealand and Australia and try to solve the economic problems of the different countries.

I do not believe the people of Canada are at all satisfied with the results of the last conference; nothing practical has resulted from it. It is all very well to talk about the status of Canada, but after all that is a mere academic question. It seems that some people would rather discuss an academic question of that kind than try to solve some of the inter-imperial trade and economic problems concerning this country. I am not at all content with what was done at the conference; if all the results obtained are set out in the speech from the throne, I think the delegates might as well have stayed at home. Where was Mr. Larkin and Canada House when this conference was going on? The representatives of New Zealand and Australia had a brief in a book containing all the economic troubles of their countries. What brief did the representatives of Canada have or work up? None. I would like to see it produced and laid on the table of this House. What material had all those experts of Canada House, London, concerning the economic ills of Canada? In my opinion the High Commissioner's office was not prepared to offer any constructive program to our sister dominions. At the conference Canada preferred to talk about our status and academic questions of that kind, and to sponge on the old country for our maritime freedom when England is bearing the burden of taxation resulting from the war. We should be helping to carry the burden of that magnificent fleet which protects our shores both in times of war and in times of peace.

If we are a nation, ready made we must have a fleet. If we have attained this wonderful status; if we are independent, although we have sent half a million people to the United States to look for jobs, then we must have a fleet. Are we to wait until some foreign fleet sails up the St. Lawrence and blows up some of our great buildings? Under this new status, are we to issue Canadian passports instead of accepting British passports? I have never had an opportunity of going to the old country, but I know that if I ever do go I will want a British passport; I will not want a scrap of paper called a Canadian passport under our new autonomy and status as an independent nation under separatism.

In this connection I would like to quote an article which appeared in the Toronto Saturday Night a short time ago:

Saturday Night is occasionally accused of being too British in its sympathies by those "little Canadians" who secretly or openly advocate anything which may assist the severance of the British connection. This journal believes that those who advocate this course are not fully cognizant of the extent and importance of the benefits that Canada derives from its membership in the British Commonwealth.

The truth is that if, as we are told, it is more blessed to give than to receive, Great Britain has a better claim than Canada to a place in the Heavenly Kingdom. British taxpayers are now, and have been for many years, annually providing immense sums of money that would have to be raised here in Canada if British support were withdrawn. Consider, for example, the matter of naval defence. This is surely as relatively important to Canada with its Pacific coast just across the street, as it were, from the teeming millions of China and Japan, whose most urgent need is room for expansion, as it is to Great Britain herself. Canada would not survive many decades without adequate protection. Furthermore, sea-power is obviously needed to protect Canada's ever-gowing overseas trade.

And who now pays the cost of this protection? Figures published by the Federation of British Industries show that the estimated expenditure by Great Britain on naval defence of the Empire, during the fiscal year 1925-26, was approximately $302,500,000, by Canada $1,500,000, by Australia $19,605,725, plus a special appropriation of $5,000,000, by New Zealand $2,691,625, and by South Africa $699,465. The payment per capita of population in Great Britain was approximately $6.69, in Canada 16 cents, in Australia $3.16, in New Zealand $1.92, and in South Africa 42 cents. Thus it is obvious that the overwhelming proportion of the cost of the naval defence of the British Commonwealths is borne by Great Britain.

The total for Great Britain and northern Ireland was $2,730,000,000, with a per capita cost of $61.98; for Canada $145,000,000, per capita $16.72; for Australia $165,000,000, per capita $30.42; for South Africa $15,000,000, per capita $9.82; and for New Zealand $30,000,000, per capita $25.42. These figures clearly show the striking disproportion between the burdens borne by the British and dominions taxpayers.

In many respects other than national defence Canada benefits enormously by her partnership in the empire. For example, she is given the full use of Britain's world-wide diplomatic and consular facilities and pays therefor not one penny. The conception that many Canadians have of Great Britain as a tottering old lady depending for support on her stalwart sons is, of course, very far removed from actuality. Without the dominions of India, Great Britain would still be one of the world's mightiest powers, with dominion over 3,800,000 square miles and one hundred millions of people. J. L. Garvin, editor of the London Observer, wrote recently in this connection:

It is hard, and sometimes seems hopeless, to make the self-governing dominions understand that Great Britain, though never dreaming of keeping any kind of restrictions upon them in its own interest, is a mighty nation on its own basis; so that if—which heaven forbid—every single self-governing dominion were to secede to-morrow, Great Britain's remaining dependencies and protectorates would still cover millions of square miles, still constituting in productive area the largest and best and most valuable colonial system in the world.

And yet, Mr. Speaker, we are still prepared, under this policy, to sponge on the mother country, maritime freedom instead of taking a leaf out of the books of Australia and New Zealand at the last Imperial conference and doing something on a worthy scale in the interest of the empire and for maritime freedom.

There is a subject on which I should like to get some information from the government. I have noticed in the press within the last few days a despatch from Detroit and Washington that some ten thousand Canadians who live in Windsor and now working in Detroit are running the risk of losing their jobs in Detroit on January 1st and being deprived of their bread and butter. I think the government should look into this matter. Under this new doctrine of separatism, under this new brilliant status idea originated by the present government, Canada is going to resemble one of the many Latin republics of South America, and as a consequence although the city of Ottawa is known to-day as "the Washington of the North", this country will be stigmatized now as "the Mexico of the North". We may talk in vain about any solution of the problem of the diversion of water by Chicago. Under separatism we may say good bye to any hope of getting anywhere in the settlement of this question. In the treaty made between Great Britain and United States, Canada has not been mentioned. This issue, which is of such consequence to Canada, is being treated as a football by the government and people of the country to the south. Instead of Canada calling upon the British government to enforce the treaty in question in our behalf we have only sent a representative to watch the proceedings in the Supreme Court of the United States, although the American courts have no more jurisdiction in connection with the Boundary Waterways treaty than has the Court of Revision in the city of Ottawa. I believe the people of Canada are thoroughly opposed to the principle of separatism involved in the government's policy as outlined at the Imperial conference. Personally I am entirely at variance with this principle as announced in the Speech from the Throne. The government talks about celebrating Canada's diamond jubilee, the sixtieth anniversary of confederation. Thousands of Canadians now working in United States—a half million—will not celebrate our diamond jubilee. They will be celebrating the Declaration of Independence and participating in the next Fourth of July festivities. What do they now care about the status of Canada and the diamond jubilee of confederation? It would be far better, instead of celebrating the diamond jubilee of Canada, to try and settle the economic problems of the Dominion, and thus repatriate the thousands of Canadians in United States, many of whom are returned soldiers who have crossed the international boundary in the hope of getting a job. We are told that confederation has been a shining success. That success would have been heightened immeasurably had we done something of a practical nature to solve Canadian economic problems and applied the principles of protection to our economic ills. Of course the people of Canada will gladly welcome the heir apparent, the Prince of Wales. He will be received with open arms from coast to coast. He will be greeted as Britain's greatest ambassador the world over. I am sorry that when the Prince of Wales does come he will see that so much has been left undone in the solution of the economic problems that confront this country. Had these questions been approached in the right spirit there would have been a more universal rejoicing over the celebration of the sixtieth anniversary of confederation. But the government has failed absolutely to deal with any of these problems in an adequate way.

We hear a lot about tax reduction and the Robb budget, the latter named after the popular Minister of Finance. We have had a reduction in the postage and a reduction in income tax, but let me say the Dominion government invaded the municipal field when they imposed income taxes. I advocated by resolutions in this House on three or four occasions—in 1923 and 1926—the reduction of what are called "nuisance" taxes. Last session I was asked to withdraw my tax reduction motions on this subject and was told that if I did so it would be incorporated in the budget. It was incorporated in the budget, but only in a modified form of income, sales tax, stamp tax, postage reductions.

The Conservative party in Canada is not discouraged even though it has met with a reverse. It stands before the people of Canada to-day as the constructive party, the cohesive party, the party that built up this country, the party that established the national policy in Canada and made a success of it, the party that preached the gospel of protection in all the provinces of Canada, the party that is supporting the maritime provinces to-day in its rights, the party that has all along been in favour of protection and advanced social legislation for the workers in this country. While it has met with a temporary reverse I believe that party has very strong support among the working class in Canada. New conditions will arise; new leaders will arise. The Conservative party to-day is the working man's party in this country. The trades and labour movement in the United States is a protectionist movement. The late Mr. Samuel Gompers was the greatest protectionist this continent ever produced. Great Britain is coming round to protection in connection with the Safeguarding of Industries Act. Every session of parliament over there witnesses advances along these lines. They are introducing into the British House social legislation for the benefit of the toilers which is in reality a protectionist movement. The Conservative party to-day stands for a protective policy brought up to date, which will benefit all the provinces. The hydro-electric policy established in Ontario by Sir James Whitney and Sir Adam Beck was a form of protection. These great men preached the gospel of preserving the water powers of Ontario for the benefit of the people. They fought the battle in Ontario of the masses against the classes.

Talk about the Labour party in this country! We have two gentlemen from Winnipeg. I do not see them in their seats tonight, but I have respect for their views: I believe they are sincere in their views, but they are not the Labour party, and simply calling themselves the Labour party does not make them the Labour party. They do not represent the Labour people, for instance, of the industrial district from which I come. The trades' union movement, Mr. Speaker, is a protectionist movement. Mr. Gompers did not believe in a Labour party. He believed in a trades' union movement in the United States working within the two old political parties there, the Democratic and the Republican parties, with the result that the American Federation of Labour has been a force throughout the United States for the past twenty-five years, and has been an influence within the Democratic and Republican parties. So I say that to be a proper supporter of Labour you have to be a protectionist, because only by that gospel of protection can the working classes in this country preserve a job for themselves, so that they will not have to seek a living in the United States.

I very much regret that the government has not seen fit to announce in the speech from the throne some economic measure that will safeguard the industries of this country, and provide a dumping clause to protect our industries, to protect as well the great grain-growing industry in this country, and the market gardener and the mixed farmer in Ontario. The failure of the government to incorporate such a policy in the speech has been a disappointment to many of the manufacturers and the farmers and to struggling industries in this country, who were expecting that after we got a settled government we would have stability of tariff, instead of constantly nibbling at the tariff here and there. I regret very much that the government has not announced in the speech from the throne an adequate measure to protect the industries of this country, to ensure employment in this country, and make provision for those who are now out of work.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King, seconded by Mr. Robb, it was ordered that the address be engrossed and transmitted to His Excellency the Governor General by such members of the House as are of the Honourable the Privy Council.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER

ELECTION OF MR. J. FRED JOHNSTON, LONG LAKE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, rule 13 of the House provides that at the commencement of every parliament, as soon as an address has been agreed to in answer to His Excellency's speech, a chairman of committees of the whole House shall be elected who shall serve as Deputy Speaker.

I desire to propose as Chairman of Committees Mr. J. Fred Johnston, member for the electoral district of Long Lake. Mr. Johnston has been a member of this House continuously for nine years past. He is a member of the last three parliaments and, as hon. members who have sat with him well know, he possesses many qualifications which eminently fit him to serve in the important position of Chairman of Committees and Deputy Speaker. On frequent occasions he has acted for the Chairman of Committees and Deputy Speaker, and in the discharge of the important duties of this joint office he will bring a knowledge of the rules required by careful observation and study, and in no small measure by practical experience.

I believe he may be expected to be both fearless and impartial in the exercise of an authority which, in its character, is essentially judicial.

I have, therefore, much pleasure in moving, seconded by Mr. Lapointe:

That Mr. John Frederick Johnston, member for the electoral district of Long Lake, be appointed Chairman of the Committees of the Whole House.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY BILL

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee of Supply.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. ROBB: As hon. gentlemen know, the estimates that have been presented this session are identically the same estimates that were presented at the last session, and most of them were passed at the last session. Tomorrow is pay day in the public service, and it is important that we should make provision as early as possible so that the public service not only in Ottawa but throughout Canada may get their cheques; for their families, like our own, want to be provided for over Christmas. As these estimates were fully considered at the last session I am not going to ask hon. gentlemen to go through them all again. If the House is unanimous, we can expedite the matter. I now move:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $64,590,350.74, being a proportion of the amount of each of the several items to be voted as set forth in the Main Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1927, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty, on account for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1927.

Mr. BENNETT: That is merely the unvoted portion of the general estimates?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: Before this resolution is carried, would the Minister of Finance explain whether there will be any other opportunity of discussing these estimates, or will the committee, by passing these estimates now in block, be precluded from discussing various items in the estimates in the future?

Mr. ROBB: I think it will be quite reasonable for the chairman to allow very wide latitude in the discussion of these estimates when the main estimates for the fiscal year 1927-1928 are before the House. I might add that there are also supplementary estimates, which I am not going to ask the House to rush through at this time. I simply want to get this resolution through to provide for the public service to-morrow. As I explained before, most of these estimates have already been voted, but they did not receive the royal assent. I think we will allow full latitude in discussing the estimates when the supplementaries and the main estimates come up later.

Mr. GARDINER: I would call to the minister's attention that some very important items in the main estimates did not receive the consideration of this House at the last session. I do not think many members expected the House to go into committee to-night, and I would therefore suggest to the minister that he move that the committee rise and report progress, and let us go into the estimates to-morrow, in order to give those members who are particularly interested in certain items an opportunity to secure the information they desire from the government. I think that is a fair request, and I trust the minister will be able to acquiesce in it.

Mr. ROBB: I have no wish to rush the matter. All I want to make plain to the House is that if the public service is not paid to-morrow, the fault will not be mine. May I suggest to my hon. friend that we advance this resolution through its various stages up to the bill, and then allow a very wide discussion on the bill when it comes up. That will enable us to get along and have the Deputy Governor General come to the Senate and give royal assent to the bill; for of course we cannot pay out this money until the bill has received the royal assent.

Mr. BENNETT: We can reserve our rights under the bill.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend can reserve all his rights under the bill, if that is agreeable.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand this vote is to pay the salaries. That is practically all it involves. I would remind the Minister of Finance that it would hardly be opportune when the bill is before the House to discuss the important items that some of the members, I believe, desire to discuss, and I think it is asking a little too much of the House that, after concluding the debate on the speech from the throne to-night we should be asked to vote this large sum of money. We desire to help on the business of the session to the best of our ability, but at the same time I suggest the minister is not quite reasonable in this regard.

Mr. ROBB: I have no desire to be unreasonable and if my hon. friend wishes it to stand over I will not press it, but I repeat that most of these items have already been voted by the House and did not receive the royal assent. It is impossible, as my hon. friend understands, to pick out the salaries, and I want to make it clear to the public service that I am doing my best to provide for them. Three months' estimates have already been voted by the House and the money has been paid. If my hon. friend can give me the assurance that this will go through early to-morrow, so that we can get royal assent within a reasonable time during the day to issue the cheques for the payments I will not press it to-night. But I would not like it to appear that I had in any way kept the service from being paid to-morrow. I know that to-day messages have come to me from Quebec and Halifax asking when the cheques were to be issued.

Mr. BENNETT: I think my hon. friend from Acadia misunderstands the situation. If the House adopts the resolution to-night, and it is distinctly understood that on the second reading of the bill he may discuss any items of the estimates as though the House were in committee, then we will have advanced the supply at least a day, and will have enabled the House to rise a day sooner than we otherwise would.

Mr. ROBB: That is right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Another factor that will have a bearing on the matter is that three months' supply of this past year was voted by the House and the money is spent. Another four or five months' supply has been paid but under governor general's warrants. All the government is now asking for is permission to have voted the balance required to complete the year. If it is understood, as has been mentioned by my hon. friend opposite, that when the bill comes up to-morrow there will be opportunity for discussion on any point my hon. friend wishes to bring up, would that not meet the purpose he has in view?

Mr. GARDINER: I fully appreciate what my hon. friend says, but I would like to draw attention to the fact that if the supply is advanced it can only make a difference of twenty-four hours in payment of the staff. I can quite realize that is a consideration so far as the staff is concerned. In reply to my hon. friend from West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) I would point out to him this important difference between discussing the estimates on the second reading of the bill and discussing them in committee; that it is impossible on the second reading of a bill to secure information from the minister that possibly some member of the House might desire.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister says he will provide it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The bill has to go into committee.

Mr. GARDINER: If the minister says he will procure the information, all right.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, I will endeavour to secure all the information I can.

Mr. GARDINER: All right.

Resolution reported, read the first and second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

SUPPLY BILL

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. ROBB moved:

Resolved that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1927, the sum of $64,590,350.74 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported and concurred in. Mr. Robb thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 3, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1927.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second time and considered in committee.

Progress reported.

CHRISTMAS ADJOURNMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): On the assumption that we conclude the business to-morrow, I give notice that to-morrow I will move that when the House adjourns it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, 8th February, 1927.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is only a notice?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: By consent that notice is given.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I inform new members that every Wednesday the House sits at two o'clock according to the rules.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 11.35 p.m.

Wednesday, December 15, 1926

The House met at two o'clock.

ATHABASKA ELECTION

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): In compliance with the request made yesterday by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) I lay on the table of the House the interim and final report of Mr. Justice Clarke, commissioner appointed to inquire into the alleged existence of corrupt or illegal practices in the electoral district of Athabaska, and also the certificates of the Acting Attorney General of Canada, respectively.

CHRISTMAS ADJOURNMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I move that when this House adjourns on the eve of the Christmas holidays it stand adjourned until the 8th February, 1927.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): I am sure the House will not object to granting a reasonable adjournment.

There are special reasons at the present time why a comparatively long adjournment should be granted. We are all aware that the Prime Minister has been out of the country practically from election day to the present time, and the government have not had the necessary time for preparation. The date suggested would suit me very well, but a great many hon. members on this side of the House consider that an earlier date would suit their convenience and the convenience of the House better than the date now suggested. May I ask my right hon. friend to consider whether he could not make the date a week earlier, say February 1, or better still the last week in January. I think either of those two days would probably suit the convenience of most members of the House better than the date he has now suggested.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government considered very carefully the point my hon. friend has just mentioned of endeavouring to suit the convenience of the members of the House by fixing as early a date as possible. We did think of asking the House to permit the adjournment until the 15th of February, but, on ascertaining the views of different members and conferring between the two sides of the House, we concluded that a week earlier than that would be preferable, and for that reason we have fixed the 8th of February. I ought to remind the House perhaps that there are a number of matters requiring the consideration of the government to which the government has had so far no opportunity to give consideration. All of this year has been taken up pretty much with matters of political discussion either in the House or outside of it. Many departmental matters which should receive the attention of the ministers have necessarily had to be left over until an opportune moment came for their consideration. The estimates for the coming year have to be prepared with care. It will take some little time for the ministers to determine finally the amounts to be placed in the estimates. We would like to have the estimates in readiness to be brought down as soon as parliament reassembles. It is not an easy matter, as hon. members opposite who have had experience will know, to decide on such matters as the estimates while parliament is actually in session. I would ask the House to show to the ministry that degree of consideration to which I think it is entitled at this time in allowing the extra week, which will mean a great deal to many of us in getting the sessional business in shape for the reopening of parliament. I can assure the House that it will be the effort of the government just as soon as parliament reassembles to have all its business in readiness to go on with immediately.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I remind the House that we are through with the formalities attendant on the opening of the session, we are through with the debate on the address, and we will be at the point on February 8 that in previous years has not been reached until well on in February or March. So by reopening the session on February 8 we will really be very much in advance of what we have been for many years past at that period of the year. I would not ask the House to support the motion as introduced if I could not say honestly that we have given the matter very, very careful consideration and feel that in the public interest we should ask for an adjournment until that date.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY BILL

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, may I at this time ask unanimous consent of the House to proceed with the bill for supply so that once it is disposed of it may be sent over to the Senate?

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee of supply on Bill No. 3 for granting to His Majesty a certain sum of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1927, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2, $64,590,350.74 granted for 1926-27.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, I understand that last night the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) agreed that any item upon which an explanation might be desired by members would be open for discussion so that the explanation might be given. I am sorry, however, to notice that the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) is not present, as I should like to ask him why $18,000 is provided for in the estimates for the movement of coal when only a shipment of 2,000 tons was moved. The share the federal government was to bear was one dollar per ton, or $2,000 in all. Why the $18,000 in the estimates, and what is going to happen to the balance?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Mr. Chairman, I wish to inform the hon. member and the committee that the Minister of the Interior has been ill during the past week and is not able to attend to-day. I regret that I have not the explanation referred to by my hon. friend.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that the fiscal year is not yet at an end, and some of that money may still be required between now and the end of March.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In this case, Mr. Chairman, I should like to remind the government of the order in council which was passed, I think, on February 13 of this year, p.c. No. 225, which specifically instructed the railway board to immediately inquire and report to the government upon the question of the cost of transporting coal from both the maritimes and the west to the central provinces. Some delay ensued, a natural delay, for the preparation of counsels' briefs, but I understand that at this moment counsel on all sides are prepared to go on. The case could be disposed of for action at this session of parliament. If the Board of Railway Commissioners do not consider this matter of sufficient importance, even in view of the declaration on the part of the Privy Council of its immediate necessity, then no action can be taken until after the general rates inquiry is disposed of, which will delay any action on the transportation of coal for at least a year, thus losing two seasons' movement. I think, Mr. Chairman, it is of the utmost importance that the Prime Minister should assure the committee that he will use every effort to see that the instructions of the order in council of last year are carried out by the Board of Railway Commissioners at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, my colleague, the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Dunning), may be able on behalf of the government to give an answer to my hon. friend on that point.

Mr. DUNNING: There are, Mr. Chairman, a number of rate cases now before the Board of Railway Commissioners. The one to which my hon. friend refers I believe, if I heard him correctly, has to do with coal rates.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The order in council.

Mr. DUNNING: Exactly. My information is that at the present time the board is considering an application that that particular case be taken up forthwith. But there are a number of orders in council referring various matters to the railway board, orders dated approximately the same date, and in some cases the decisions of the board with regard thereto have been appealed to the Privy Council, that is, to the government. I expect before the House meets again following the adjournment that the government will have to arrange to hear counsel representing the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia on one appeal and on another appeal the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan in connection with this matter. The government is becoming a sort of court of appeal from the Board of Railway Commissioners—not a very happy position to be placed in. The briefs are very voluminous, and apparently the government must under the law constitute itself a court of appeal. I will be glad to look into the question raised by my hon. friend, but I doubt very much if the government is justified in interfering and saying to the Board of Railway Commissioners, "You shall hear this case or that case first," except on a proper appeal being taken from the decision of the board as to the date of hearing that particular case.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to take up more than a few minutes of the time of the committee, for I realize the general desire to close business this afternoon; but in regard to putting through these estimates, while I appreciate the fact that since the war there have been very many calls on the national finances which have prevented the government from giving consideration to very just claims for the spending of money in various parts of the country, yet I do want to say this, that these places which should receive consideration cannot be put to one side if money is to be spent in other places where it is needed less. Twelve years ago a lot was bought in the village of Sydenham in Frontenac for a post office. Nothing has been done since. Again, I say that I do not find any fault because of that delay, having regard to all the circumstances. I wish to impress upon the government this fact, that there are many places throughout Canada where small sums of money should be spent for the proper accommodation of the public, and these conveniences cannot be indefinitely postponed. I shall register my very strong protest against, for example, any disposition to spend any sum of money, large or small, in making changes in the city of Ottawa, such as have been suggested in the way of tearing down one or two blocks and putting up new buildings. I should not feel that I was doing my duty if I allowed works of that kind to go on and money to be spent in that direction without offering any protest, after I have waited twelve years for an expenditure of five or six thousand dollars for a post office in my county, which expenditure is not forthcoming. There are many places that have had to wait, and with good reason. I do not want to offer any captious criticism of the estimates; on the contrary, the government will find me disposed to expedite their business along that line. But I expect from them a square deal and fair play, notwithstanding the fact that I am sitting temporarily on this side of the House. The county I have the honour to represent has never received one single dollar of public money from Confederation down to the present time, and in view of the fact that $1,000 was voted and paid out for a site for this post office I submit that my proposal for the expenditure of five or six thousand dollars is a very modest one. I want to impress upon the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), as I have already impressed on the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Elliott) and members of the government generally, the necessity for fair consideration of this matter when they come to prepare their estimates for the coming year.

Mr. LANCTOT: May I tell my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) that I represent a constituency whose case is somewhat similar to his, the only difference being that mine is older by a few years. The site in my constituency was purchased in 1912 by the Hon. Mr. Monk, then Minister of Public Works, and we have waited ever since for some expenditure, just as my hon. friend has done. But as he points out, money has been scarce. Now I submit that if money is spent on a public building in the hon. gentleman's constituency I have a right to ask that the same thing be done for the people I represent. I shall have to ask my party to go ahead with the work in my constituency if similar works are proceeded with elsewhere.

Mr. COOTE: There has been a growing demand among the people of southern Alberta that the power of Spray lakes be developed. As the ownership of this power is in this government, I would like to ask if it is the policy of the government to allow development of power at Spray lakes.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This matter is one that comes very largely under the Department of the Interior, and as the minister has been ill for the past week I would suggest that the question be brought to his attention so that he may advise the House and the hon. member at the earliest possible date.

Mr. GARDINER: Has the Minister of Agriculture any knowledge as to how much has been spent in connection with the destruction of animals under the tuberculosis test? If he has not that information will he briefly outline the policy of the department in this matter? Is it the same as it has been in the past or does the department intend making any changes?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Under the Health of Animals Act the amount usually paid out for the destruction of animals is between $600,000 and $700,000 annually.

Mr. GARDINER: Is it intended to continue that policy or does the department purpose looking into new developments in that direction?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have a number of policies, one with respect to cities, one with respect to accredited herds, and one with respect to restricted areas. The latter policy we are extending very considerably, our hope being to have it apply in time to the nine provinces. The restricted area was introduced three years ago in Manitoba, under the provisions of which regulations all cattle are tested. Every animal that reacts is killed and compensation paid therefor. The area includes four municipalities of that province. This policy was extended to three counties in Quebec, and the whole of Prince Edward Island has been similarly dealt with. Later on the Fraser river valley district in British Columbia was made a restricted area, and six months ago another area was established east of Long lake in Saskatchewan. As I say, we hope to be able to apply it to every province in the Dominion. We plan then to take up the matter with the provinces with a view to dealing with the Dominion generally.

Mr. GARDINER: Is there any policy in the department looking towards further research, more particularly in connection with preventive work?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes. Doctor Watson is conducting a very important research in Hull, Quebec. We are constructing a laboratory there to extend activities, and I understand from Dr. Watson that he is on the verge of very important discoveries in connection with immunizing vaccines to prevent the spread of tuberculosis among cattle. We believe that immunization and prevention will be far better than any policy of paying compensations after the animals are diseased. However, this is a matter of investigation at the present time. As my hon. friend (Mr. Tolmie) knows, research is going on in this direction throughout the civilized world, and as Doctor Watson has made a record for himself in discoveries of a similar character, we are anticipating a good deal from his present investigations.

Mr. COOTE: With further reference to the power at Spray lakes, I would urge upon the government the desirability of reaching a decision as soon as possible. There has been a great deal of agitation in Alberta for the development of that power. I would ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) another question, which is of very considerable importance. I refer to a serious explosion which took place in one of our coal mines in Coleman, Alberta, a few weeks ago in which ten men lost their lives. The mine had to be flooded to put out the fire that resulted from the explosion and considerable damage occurred. I know the Minister of Labour has received a request from the relief committee in the town asking the Dominion government to make a small grant to meet the distress. Has this request received the minister's favourable consideration, and will a small grant be made to assist the people of Coleman to relieve the distress caused by this disaster.

Mr. HEENAN: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has stated, we have received such a request and we are waiting for further details. The matter is under consideration.

Mr. COOTE: I would like to ask the Minister to give it his very best consideration. I would like to emphasize the fact that this is a very grave disaster. The miners in this town were working only three days a week for about two months prior to the accident, and the closing down of the mine has thrown them all out of work. Most of the men left families dependent upon them, in some cases aged parents, with very little means of support. The town is absolutely dependent upon the mining industry; I know that in the rush of departmental business sometimes these things are not given the consideration to which they are entitled. The government of the province of Alberta, after careful consideration has seen fit to make a grant to this relief committee. I might also remind the government that in 1924, at the time of the serious disaster at Hillcrest, a disaster much worse than this, when sixty men lost their lives, the government of the day made a grant of $50,000 to the sufferers. We are not asking the government to make any such grant, but we trust that they will be as generous as was the provincial government.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I call the attention of the new Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) to item number 89, "Cadet Services." In the main estimates $400,000 is provided, of which $100,000 was supplied through interim supply, and $252,587 under governor general's warrants. It would take a considerable stretch of the imagination to understand that this was a very necessary service in Canada. Notwithstanding the reiterated protests in this House with regard to the policy of cadet training, that amount has been expended. It is not my desire at present to delay the House with regard to this policy—

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): May I ask the hon. member a question? When did this House enter a protest against that service?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I stand corrected; members of this House protested. I would like to say that the organized bodies of labour and farmers in Canada have again and again protested against this policy.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If necessary, I can read the resolutions in that connection, and I will do so when I am speaking again on this matter. What I should like to reiterate is that these large representative bodies, as well as other bodies of citizens, have taken a strong stand on this matter and have laid their protests before the government. Therefore I would suggest to the new Minister of National Defence that in the preparation of next year's estimates he give due consideration to those protests.

Sections 2, 3 and 4 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received the following letter:

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that the Right Honourable F. A. Anglin, acting as deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber to-day at 3.15 p.m. for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
JAMES F. CROWDY,
Asst. Secretary to the Governor General.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, you have just announced that the deputy of the Governor General will attend in the other House at 3.15. I assume that there is no other business which hon. members wish to transact in the interval and in the circumstances I would suggest that proceedings be suspended until that hour.

At 2.45 p.m. the sitting was suspended until 3.15 p.m.

The House having resumed:

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret to inform the House that owing to a death in his family, Major A. R. Thompson, the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, cannot attend this afternoon. I have therefore received the following message from the Senate:

Resolved that a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House that it is the Deputy Governor's desire that they attend him immediately in the Senate chamber.

A. E. BLOUNT,
Clerk of the Senate.

Accordingly, the House went up to the Senate,

And having returned,

Mr. Speaker informed the House that the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General had been pleased to give in His Majesty's name the royal assent to the following bill:

An act for the granting to His Majesty a certain sum of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1927.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King, the House adjourned at 3.40 p.m., until Tuesday, February 8, 1927.

Tuesday, February 8, 1927

The House met at three o'clock.

VACANCIES

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received communications from several members notifying me that the following vacancies had occurred in the representation, viz:

Of John Carey Douglas, member for the electoral district of Antigonish-Guysborough, by decease;

Of John Warwick King, member for the electoral district of North Huron, by decease.

I have accordingly issued my several warrants to the Chief Electoral Officer to make out new writs of election for the said electoral districts, respectively.

NEW MEMBER

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Chief Electoral Officer a certificate of the election and return of William Duff, Esquire, for the electoral district of Antigonish-Guysborough.

PARLIAMENTARY LIBRARY, PRINTING AND RESTAURANT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House:—

That the Honourable the Speaker, the Honourable Messieurs Green, Hardy, Ross (Middleton), Sharpe, Taylor and Watson, have been appointed a committee to assist the Honourable the Speaker in the direction of the restaurant of parliament, so far as the interests of the Senate are concerned, and to act on behalf of the Senate as members of a joint committee of both Houses on said restaurant.

Also,—A message informing this House that the Honourable the Speaker, the Honourable Messieurs Aylesworth, Sir Allen, Beaubien, Chapais, Gillis, Gordon, Griesbach, Hardy, Hatfield, Laird, Lewis, McDougald, McLennan, Poirier, Taylor, Turriff and Webster (Brockville), have been appointed a committee to assist the Honourable the Speaker in the direction of the Library of Parliament, so far as the interests of the Senate are concerned, and to act on behalf of the Senate as members of a joint committee of both Houses on the said library.

And also,—A message informing this House that the Honourable Messieurs Aylesworth, Sir Allen, Buchanan, Chapais, Dessaulles, Donnelly, Farrell, Green, Legris, Lewis, McDonald, McLean, McLennan, Murphy, Pardee, Pope, Robertson, Sharpe, Taylor, Todd, White (Inkerman) and White (Pembroke), have been appointed a committee to superintend the printing of the Senate during the present session, and to act on behalf of the Senate as members of a joint committee of both Houses on the subject of the printing of parliament.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEDNESDAY SITTINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Wednesday the 9th instant and subsequent Wednesdays to the end of the session the House shall meet at three o'clock in the afternoon.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): It may have slipped my memory but I do not remember any notice having been given of this motion. It has come on me very unexpectedly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps my hon. friend attaches more importance to the motion than he will if I explain it. Under the rules the House meets at two o'clock on Wednesday until a motion is carried that it shall meet, as on every day, at three o'clock. The custom has been to change that particular rule at the beginning of each session and meet forthwith at three o'clock instead of at two on Wednesday. This being the case I thought it advisable to put the motion immediately. I have no objection to letting it stand until the close of this sitting if my hon. friend wishes to discuss the matter with hon. gentlemen opposite, but I rather think it is the general wish that the House shall meet at three o'clock on Wednesdays.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not mind agreeing that we meet at three o'clock to-morrow but I suggest that the Prime Minister allow the motion to stand until we have had an opportunity of discussing it. Meeting at three o'clock instead of at two on Wednesdays takes an hour off one of the days allotted to private members. I am not sure whether or not, in consequence of the recess which we have had, private members are now to be deprived of Thursday. If I am right in assuming that they are, then Mondays and Wednesdays are the only private members' days now available, and Thursday becomes a government day. I do not want to curtail the rights of private members who may have motions which they desire to discuss, and I am afraid that such will be the effect if the present motion is carried.

Mr. SPEAKER: Rule 40 provides:

> Two days' notice shall be given of a motion for leave to present a bill, resolution or address, for the appointment of any committee, or for the putting of a question; but this rule shall not apply to bills after their introduction, or to private bills, or to the times of meeting or adjournment of the House.

In view of this rule I must rule the point of order not well taken.

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Owing to the recess which took up the month of January, private members, I understand, are deprived of Thursday, so that we have now only Mondays and Wednesdays. I think the government should take that fact into consideration. I do not believe the introduction of such a motion so early in the session will expedite the business of the House nor will it tend to shorten the session. I would ask the Prime Minister to take into account the fact, which I have pointed out, that owing to the recess, private members will not now have that full opportunity, which otherwise they would have had during an entire month, to discuss questions in which they are interested. I do not think that the motion ought to be pressed at this time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me assure my hon. friend at once that I shall see to it that the rights and privileges of private members in this matter shall not suffer in any way by reason of the adoption of this motion. We will take care to see that the extra hour is made good to private members. The only reason for introducing this motion is that it meets with the convenience of all hon. members. When the rule for meeting at two o'clock on Wednesdays was observed it was found very frequently that the attendance when the House met at two o'clock on that day was very slim, most members being apparently unable to break away from the custom of attending at three o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall the motion stand?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I move, Mr. Speaker, that the motion be amended to read that to-morrow the House shall meet at three o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion as amended?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried; the House meets at three o'clock to-morrow instead of at two o'clock.

THE COPYRIGHT ACT, 1921, AMENDMENT

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 45, to amend and make operative certain provisions of the Copyright Act, 1921.

He said: This very bill was exhaustively inquired into and a great deal of evidence was heard by a special committee of parliament which sat during the session before last. The terms of the present bill are practically the same as those of the bill which was reported by that special committee, and the measure is being reintroduced now. It consists mainly of minor changes with one exception concerning licensing clauses. In other respects the bill contains no matters of great moment. During the interval between the session before last and the present time—that is to say, during last session—I had occasion as proposer of the bill to confer with a number of organizations in different parts of Canada, particularly in Montreal and Toronto, and as a result some of the objectionable features of the original bill were modified. That aspect of the matter will, however, be discussed when the bill is considered in committee of the whole.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

THE LATE MR. J. W. KING, M.P.

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, when parliament met in December the constituency of North Huron was represented in this House by Mr. John Warwick King, of Bluevale, Huron county, who was first elected to parliament in the general elections of 1921, and who was again returned in the general elections of 1925 and 1926. To-day the constituency as you have just reminded us, is without representation owing to the death of its member on January 14.

It is fitting, Mr. Speaker, that before the House resumes its duty we should give some expression of the sense of our loss, and of the sympathy which will be felt in all parts of the House with the relatives and friends who have been bereaved by the sudden death of our late member.

At the time of his death Mr. King had just entered upon his seventy-second year. He was born of Scotch parents at Smith's Falls, Ontario. He received his early education at Bluevale public school and at the collegiate institute of St. Catharines and of Collingwood and at the normal school in the city of Ottawa. For seventeen years he was a public school teacher in this province. He gave up teaching to farm in Huron county, and spent the last twenty years of his life as an agriculturist.

In politics Mr. King was originally a Liberal. He joined the Progressive party in the elections of 1921 and was on each occasion returned to parliament as a member of that party. In this House, while loyal to the party to which he had given his allegiance, he retained in full measure his Liberal convictions and sympathies, and wherever he felt justified in so doing, gave wholehearted support to my colleagues and myself. I mention this circumstance at the moment only because of the larger measure of loss which I feel we on this side of the House share in common with our Progressive friends.

Mr. King was of a quiet and retiring disposition. His voice was not often heard in debate, but his presence made itself felt in his frank and friendy intercourse with the members, and in his exceptionally faithful attendance in the House. He was a man who made many friends and I should imagine very rarely made an enemy.

A very short time ago Mr. King suffered a great bereavement in the death of his wife, whose loss he greatly mourned. They had no family, but he leaves behind him immediate relatives and many friends by whom he will be greatly missed, and to whom this House will extend its fullest sympathy.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this is the second occasion within a comparatively brief space of time upon which the House has been asked to note the death of one of its members. Mr. King, the former member for North Huron in this House had, it is true, reached what is looked upon as the allotted span of life, but in appearance he retained many elements of youth and displayed great activity for a man of his years. During his career here he was most constant in his attendance, most diligent and assidious in the discharge of his parliamentary duties and while, as my right hon. friend has just said, his voice was not often raised in debate in this chamber, he was looked upon as a man of good judgment and strong common sense, a very valuable asset to this chamber and to the proceedings of this parliament. The loss of such a man will be felt here and perhaps in the constituency which he represented, more than in any other quarter. To his friends there and his friends here and to the relatives who survive him, we join in expressing our sincere sympathy.

Mr. JOHN L. BROWN (Lisgar): It is perhaps fitting, Mr. Speaker, that a member of the group with which Mr. King was more directly associated should express on this occasion our appreciation of the loss we have sustained. When I say that I shall always remember with pleasure my intercourse with Mr. King, I believe I express the sentiments of the group to which Mr. King belonged in this House. We always found him a genial companion, a man of unimpeachable integrity and sound judgment, and his voice was heard in the councils of the group of which he was a valued member. We recognize that that group has suffered a loss; we recognize that this House and the people of North Huron have suffered a loss as well, and they will be indeed fortunate if they find a successor to Mr. King who will be equally faithful to his duties, equally sound in his judgment and equally willing to give all his time and the best that is in him to the service of his constituency and his country. With the other members of our group I wish to express a sense of the loss we have sustained.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Rosetown): Mr. Speaker, John King was a man greatly respected by the group to which he belonged from 1921 on, as indeed I think he was respected by all who knew him. He was in this House shortly before Christmas, and it was a shock indeed to most of us to read in the papers of his death. This is only another reminder that life is uncertain at the best. Although our friend has reached what is usually considered the allotted span of life, I believe he was still young in the strength of his ideals and in his hopes for the emancipation of his own class. We hope also that the people of North Huron will see fit again to elect a man with the ideals and integrity of character possessed by our friend who has passed away. I would like to convey the sympathy of this group to his friends and relatives.

FURTHER SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES FOR 1925-26

A message from His Excellency the Governor General, transmitting further supplementary estimates for the year ending March 31, 1926, was presented by Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the House, and referred to the committee of supply.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES FOR 1926-27

A message from His Excellency the Governor General, transmitting supplementary estimates for the year ending March 31, 1927, was presented by Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the House, and referred to the committee of supply.

SUPPLY

The House in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair:

Resolved that a sum not exceeding $2,727,376.35, being amount of further supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1926, be granted to His Majesty for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1926.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What item are we on?

Mr. STEVENS: The amount read by the Chairman covers eight items in all. I think that in this particular case each item should be read.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Item 374, providing for the payment of surplus funds of the Canadian wheat board—governor general's warran of August 19, 1925—is the first as I understand it.

Mr. STEVENS: The printed form shows that there are eight separate resolutions, all set forth in proper order and you, Mr. Chairman, read them as if they were just one resolution. That, I think, is not the proper form of procedure.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Very well, take the resolutions one by one:

Payment of surplus funds of the Canadian wheat board (governor general's warrant of August 19, 1925), $560,000.

Mr. STEVENS: I think the minister ought to give us an explanation of these items. I notice that each amount is covered by a governor general's warrant, and, of course, the government will be most anxious to explain the use of governor general's warrants in view of criticisms of the past. These are all passed, I notice, in 1925-26, most of them in August, 1925. We ought to have an explanation of each item from the minister.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): This item has to do with the Department of Trade and Commerce and the minister, as hon. gentlemen perhaps know, is absent to-day in Sarnia. This amount is for a governor general's warrant issued in 1925. Hon. gentlemen will recall that the profits of handling wheat during a certain period were paid to the receiver general. At that time I was the receiver general and I resisted very strongly paying the amount back to the provinces. But my hon. friends opposite, and my genial friend alongside of me (Mr. Dunning), who was then Premier of Saskatchewan, insisted that this money belonged to the people who had produced the wheat. The governor general's warrant is to meet that request.

Item agreed to.

Compensation to Crown Paving and Construction Co., on account of excavation work Edmonton grain elevator (governor general's warrant of September 1, 1925), $6,726.56.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister give us an explanation of this item, too?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I can explain the item, but it will have to be pretty much from memory. This was a case in which the contract for the excavation of the Edmonton elevator was let at a fixed price, with a provision with respect to weather conditions. It was in the late fall when the work began, and very severe weather set in, but the architect, Mr. Howe, insisted that the contractor go on with the excavation under very exceptional and severe weather conditions. This is to provide for an allowance that was given the contractor for having performed the service during a period when it cost him a great deal more money than if he had been granted the advantages of the weather provision in the contract. As I recollect them, these are the circumstances.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The only thing is that the minister's explanation hardly harmonizes with the date which is given in the item. A governor general's warrant for $6,726.56 was evidently issued on September 1, 1925.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I beg my hon. friend's pardon?

Mr. GUTHRIE: September 1, 1925 is the date of the warrant as given in the estimate now before the committee.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That was the date on which it was paid, but the work was done in January and February of the winter before.

Mr. GUTHRIE: A governor general's warrant for the expenditure of money can be issued only when the House is not in session, and only to meet urgent and necessary payments. This work, as I understand it, took place during the preceding winter, some time in January or February. Parliament was then in session, and the matter could have been brought to its attention and the necessary money voted. But the government allowed the session to conclude without making provision for this money, and then seven or eight days after the dissolution of parliament, folowed by a general election, they resort to the process of a governor general's warrant to make a payment which has stood evidently from the preceding winter, and which could not be either urgent or necessary in view of the circumstance. I think we should offer a reasonable protest to the issue of governor general's warrant under such circumstances.

Mr. STEVENS: I should like the Minister of Finance to convey to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, when he returns, a request that he lay on the table of the House all correspondence in regard to this item, also a copy of the governor general's warrant and of the order in council on which it was based.

Mr. ROBB: I will bring the matter to the minister's attention.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I point out to the ministers concerned that questions asked when the estimates were last before the House, I think on December 15 last, have not been answered, at least there has been no answer in my own case. I was promised an answer at that time which, however, has not yet been given. I would ask that some recognition be accorded the rights of members and that answers to questions be given by the minister from whom information has been sought.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What minister?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): One of the ministers was not present at the time but the matter was to be brought to his attention by one of his colleagues.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I will be prepared to give my hon. friend an answer to his question to-morrow. I have not the necessary information with me to-day.

Item agreed to.

Payment of compensation levied against employers by workmen's compensation boards in respect of pensioners who are engaged in industry (governor general's warrant of September 7, 1925), $45,000.

Mr. STEVENS: We would like to have an explanation now in regard to this item of $45,000. The occasion for the warrant is not clear and we do not know what it is for.

Mr. ROBB: I frankly admit to my hon. friend that I have not the information before me. I will furnish the information to-morrow, and bring down any papers we have in connection with it.

Mr. DUNNING: It is the regular vote.

Mr. STEVENS: If the minister or his colleagues cannot explain it, it is rather difficult to expect us to appreciate why a governor general's warrant was necessary on September 7th, 1925, I think the very day of dissolution that year.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh no.

Mr. STEVENS: It was two days after my hon. friend's famous speech at Richmond Hill, and I think he will find dissolution occurred just after that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, dissolution took place the day of the speech as a matter of fact.

Mr. STEVENS: Then it was within two days of dissolution. I submit it is rather straining the credulity of hon. members on this side of the House to ask us, without any explanation at all, to accept this resolution:

Payment of compensation levied against employers by workmen's compensation boards in respect of pensioners who are engaged in industry.

My understanding of the various workmen's compensation acts is that they are provincial legislation, wholly under the administration of the provinces and presumably—I cannot say because I am guessing at it—the government is compensating some of the employers for contributions to this fund. We ought to know who the employers are and the reasons why the government should contribute. It is an extraordinary vote. I do not recall having seen anything of this kind before parliament, although there may have been such cases. As I say, the money was paid on governor general's warrant two days after the dissolution of parliament. I think it is really asking a little too much to ask that we should pass this item blindly, without any explanation.

Mr. DUNNING: As I understand the situation, certain of the pensioners, partially incapacitated men, are employed by corporations and industries in various parts of the country. The employers co-operate with the pension board in that regard, but each employer in a province where a compensation board, a provincial institution, exists, is levied upon for his employees, and in the case of these pensioners, who are taken in as a national service by the employers, there is a vote, I think in the Department of National Defence, for the payment by the federal government of the workmen's compensation assessment with respect to such partially disabled men. It so happens that these supplementaries should have appeared in the estimates at the time of the last session of parliament. They are dealing with the fiscal year 1925-1926; hence the lack of preparation. But the matter happened to arise in going through the estimates before the Treasury board. This is an amount which is not easily calculable when estimates are made up.

Mr. STEVENS: All right. May we have the file laid on the table in this case?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Item agreed to.

To provide for additional outlay in connection with fighting fires in the Canadian national parks (governor general's warrant of December 3, 1925), $18,500.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The explanation of this item is that with respect to forest fires we had one of the most disastrous years in the history of the country and we were about $18,000 short in our estimates.

Item agreed to.

To meet the cost of the salving of the H.M. G.S. Armentieres, (governor general's warrant of December 3, 1925), $40,000.

Mr. ROBB: This is to meet the cost of the salving of His Majesty's ship Armentieres.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): What was the value of the vessel?

Mr. ROBB: If my hon. friend will refer to the public accounts he will find the cost price.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): There would not be much sense in paying $40,000 for a vessel only worth $15,000 to $20,000.

Item agreed to.

To cover expenses in connection with the prosecution of an alleged combine in the distribution of fruit and vegetables in the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba (governor general's warrant of January 6, 1926), $60,000.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not criticising the vote, but very large sums were spent in connection with this case. It was a very noted case. Certain very large fines were collected. Personally, I would be satisfied if the minister would give us the particulars of this warrant, and, in addition to that, if the minister would lay on the table a statement of the total cost, to whom paid, and also as to the collection of the fines and to whom the fines were paid. Were they paid to the province, to the various cities, or to the Dominion exchequer?

Mr. ROBB: Perhaps it would be more in order if my hon. friend would move for a return.

Mr. STEVENS: No, the Finance minister misunderstands me. I am not asking for any large return. I do not want to go to that trouble, but here we have an item of $60,000. There are a great many instances other than this, but I ask merely for a general explanation of this item, giving the totals. Then there is the question of the fines. As I have already intimated, I think there was one fine of $125,000 and several other fines of $25,000 apiece. Could we have a statement showing whether those fines have been paid or not? I heard a rumour that some of the fines have not been paid. There was an intimation that some of them were remitted. Whether that is true or not I do not know. If the minister would give us a financial statement of the case, which is perhaps one of the most noted cases that we have had in recent times, it would be sufficient.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is a departmental matter.

Mr. HEENAN: I will lay a statement on the table.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If the minister says he will lay a statement on the table that is all that will be necessary.

Item agreed to.

Supplementary estimates for 1927—charges of management—printing, signing, sealing and macerating Dominion notes—further amount required, $50,000.

Item agreed to.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): What about the second part of the item, Mr. Chairman? You read only the first part.

The CHAIRMAN: It seems that there are two amounts under the one heading, "Charges of management."

Mr. ROBB: I have not the information before me, but I observe that the government of which my hon. friend (Mr. Edwards) was a supporter and candidate issued a governor general's warrant in this connection for $18,142. So there could not be much wrong with the item.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The point I was making was simply that the item had not been brought up by the Chairman. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance does not give me credit when I am trying to help him. I want to see the item carried.

The CHAIRMAN: The item is subdivided into two amounts. It is true I did not read the two parts of the item. The committee carried the item for $50,000. Shall the item for $60,000, for printing, advertising, inspection, express, etc., carry?

Item agreed to.

Justice—salaries—to provide for salary of a confidential messenger, $1,200.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I remember when I was the occupant of the office of Solicitor General, we had a very excellent messenger, but he was not described as a confidential messenger. I think he is still there, and my recollection is that in that office we did not have a very great deal for a messenger to do. May I ask my hon. friend the Solicitor General whether he is asking for an additional messenger, described here as a confidential messenger, or is there to be only one messenger in connection with that office?

Mr. CANNON: Only one.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The word "confidential" means nothing, I presume?

Mr. CANNON: I am not responsible for the adjective.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is there any distinction in salary between the position of messenger and confidential messenger?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think it means a couple of hundred dollars more.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The other one was just an ordinary messenger. Might I ask if it is the same man?

Mr. CANNON: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police—salaries—to provide for the position of supervisor of ticket of leave, from April 1, 1926, to March 31, 1927, $3,840.

Mr. HANSON: Is this a new vote? I thought this was under the Justice department.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is under the Justice department.

Mr. HANSON: It is the same item, is it not?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Mr. HANSON: Is it a new vote?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes. This is a new position that has been created and classified and the appointment made by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. HANSON: Is this a new appointee, or is this the same officer who has been doing the work in the department?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, this is a new position. The work was done previously by an officer of the mounted police, but it has been found better to have the work done by a civil employee altogether.

Item agreed to.

Civil government generally—to provide for authorization by the Treasury board of salaries, reclassifications, revisions, promotions and increases, $70,692.48.

Mr. STEVENS: We ought to have an explanation of this item. I would ask briefly, is this a new vote, at whose instance has it been brought forward, and what does it cover? It mentions the Treasury board. I cannot see what reclassifications, revisions of salaries, promotions and increases there should be in the Treasury board to account for this additional $70,692.48.

Mr. ROBB: As my hon. friend knows, when the Civil Service Commission provide for reclassifications or advancements in positions, all these are brought before the Treasury board after having passed the deputy minister. When the deputy minister prepared his estimates earlier in the session, there were certain reclassifications, promotions and salary increases that were not provided for, and this is simply to clean up matters in the different departments.

Item agreed to.

Penitentiaries—British Columbia—to recoup Workmen's Compensation Board, province of British Columbia, payment made on behalf of late guard R. E. Farrell, killed on duty; and to provide for continuance of pension granted widow by board at the rate of $50 a month, $2,069.30.

Mr. SPENCER: May we have particulars?

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Has the minister received a similar application in the case of guard Jenkins, who was killed on duty at the Kingston penitentiary? If so, what action has been taken?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I remember having received an application for the widow of a guard who was killed while on duty at the Kingston penitentiary. I will take the matter into consideration and let my friend have the information.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): May it be reconsidered under some other vote?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It can be considered on the estimates of this year.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): May we take this item as an indication of the general line of policy which the government intends to follow in similar cases? For myself, I would be prepared to give my support to such a policy.

Mr. LAPOINTE: As my friend will see, we are merely paying what has been granted by the Workmen's Compensation Board of British Columbia; we are complying with the judgment of a court.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): But that does not cover the $50 a month to the widow.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, that pension was granted by the compensation board.

Mr. McGIBBON: Would not the government be equally compelled by the practice of the Workmen's Compensation Board in Ontario to carry out the same policy?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think they would, but I will give my friend more information about this when we come to the main estimates, and probably before that date, because my friend from Frontenac speaks to me often on this question.

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I would think the government, if not compelled, would be impelled to do so on the principle of equality of status.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Those are two good words from my hon. friend.

Mr. HANSON: Are all the penitentiary employees under the Workmen's Compensation Act in the various provinces?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Mr. HANSON: What about New Brunswick?

An hon. MEMBER: They have no penitentiary there.

Mr. McGIBBON: Is the government not prepared to deal with this question now?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Had I known this matter would be discussed to-day I would have brought with me all the information relating to it. I regret that I cannot answer my friend to-day.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): The minister might then be prepared to explain why this particular case is under the Workmen's Compensation Act of British Columbia and similar cases in the other provinces are not also subject to the various provincial acts dealing with workmen's compensation.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will give the information to my friend later on.

Item agreed to.

Legislation—House of Commons—expenses of committees—further amount required	$89,925 02
To increase the salary of the secretary to leader of the opposition from $2,500 to $3,000 per annum from April 1, 1926	500
To provide for the full sessional indemnity to members of the House of Commons—days lost through absence caused by illness, official public business, or on account of death during the present session,—Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in chapter 10 of the revised statutes, an Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons, or any amendments thereto—payment to be made as the Treasury board may direct	10,000

Mr. CANTLEY: Is it the intention of the government to include the sessional indemnity of the late Hon. J. C. Douglas who, it will be remembered, died during the present session?

Mr. LAPOINTE: These estimates refer to last year. The question of the indemnity of the late member will no doubt be considered when the estimates for the present year come before the House.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I should like an explanation of the second item, to increase the salary of the secretary to the leader of the opposition.

Mr. ROBB: It has been customary for many years to provide for the secretary to the leader of the opposition, and we thought this was a reasonable increase of his salary considering the work he has to do.

Item agreed to.

General—for distribution to members of parliament of publications of the League of Nations, $750.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Do these publications include the publications of the Labour branch of the League of Nations? If they do, those publications are not coming to me.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My friend will see that the amount involved is very small. I know that the publications of the International Labour Bureau are printed as well as documents concerning the League of Nations. I find them in the library; I am afraid they are not distributed.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I realize that the item is obviously not adequate to cover the cost of distribution of these publications to all the members of the House and Senate. Frankly, I think the information contained in many of the publications is well worth distribution, and I would suggest to the minister the desirability of increasing the vote in order that members might be supplied with copies of all these publications.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The suggestion will be taken into consideration. Meanwhile I may point out to my friend that he will find copies of the publications in the parliamentary library.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Yes, but when you are two thousand miles away it is very difficult to hunt for those publications in the parliamentary library. It is much more convenient to have them come through the mails.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I agree.

Item agreed to.

Agriculture—for the administration of the Destructive Insect and Pest Act, and necessary buildings, additional amount required, $70,000.

Mr. TOLMIE: Will the minister kindly furnish particulars of this item?

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): The amount inserted in the main estimates last year was too small, consequently this item is inserted to bring up the vote to the amount for the preceding year. There is always a certain amount of work to be done to hold in check insects and pests that have already established themselves here as well as to try to keep out others that have not yet gained a footing. In the orchards, in our agriculture and in the forest there are various pests to contend with.

Mr. TOLMIE: Were necessary buildings not anticipated?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This is the regular designation of the vote. We do not anticipate any buildings in this vote.

Item agreed to.

To meet expenses in connection with preparations for the World's Poultry Congress, 1927, $23,000.

Mr. TOLMIE: Will this vote be ample to make a good showing for Canada at that congress?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Salary and expenses of agricultural produce marketing agent, additional amount required, $5,000.

Mr. TOLMIE: Is this a new vote?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This applies to Mr. Wilson, who has been established in the Canada building on Trafalgar square for a few years. The vote has stood at $10,000. The primary object of the appointment has been to keep us constantly acquainted with matters relating to the export trade and to detect defects in our export surplus products either in the matter of quality or as regards containers. The expenditure has served a useful purpose.

Mr. TOLMIE: This does not mean an addition to his salary?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am sorry to say it does not.

Item agreed to.

Experimental farms, additional amount required for work with tobacco, $5,000.

Mr. TOLMIE: Is any of this vote for work in British Columbia?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No. We are doing some work in the Okanagan valley, but this is to establish a small farm in the province of Quebec at Montcalm where the tobacco business is assuming important proportions. Tobacco export has increased rapidly and to keep pace with the growing requirements we have established a small tobacco farm in Montcalm. Similar work has been done in Ontario.

Item agreed to.

For assistance in the erection of pre-cooling plants for fruit, $30,000.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): On what basis is this assistance given?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This money is to be spent in the Okanagan valley. Different places are applying for plants and the chances are that Vernon will be successful. Some years ago we adopted the policy of contributing thirty per cent towards these plants, the parties interested paying the other seventy per cent.

Mr. HANSON: Is anything being done in this direction in the Annapolis valley or in New Brunswick?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The climate down there is of such a nature that there has been no demand for such plants. It is fairly cool in the fall of the year and no such establishments have been asked for.

Item agreed to.

Compensation for animals tested under the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, and dying from the disease for which they were tested before it was possible to slaughter them under the provisions of the act, as follows:

J. N. McDonald, Whim Road East, P.E.I.	$ 28
A. Pallardeau, St. Timothe, P.Q.	34
J. E. Leask, Seagrave, Ont.	96
E. Lindsay, Hornby, Ont.	80
Jos. Platt, Ste. Agnes de Dundee, P.Q.	20
Andrew Oberle, Walkerton, Ont.	1,910

Mr. TOLMIE: To one man in Walkerton the sum of $1,910 is asked for. Did all those animals die?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Under the Contagious Diseases Act, unless an animal is slaughtered no compensation is paid, but sometimes it happens that on the way to the place of slaughter an animal dies. In such a case no compensation is given and this is the only way the money can be provided.

[Mr. Tolmie.]

Mr. COOTE: Is this money which is being voted owed lawfully under the act, or is it simply a gift to these men, outside the law?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Under the act the animal must be slaughtered under government supervision either in an abattoir or at the owner's home. It occurs sometimes, however, that in transit an animal, for which compensation is bona fide payable, dies either from overcrowding in the car or from getting on and off too frequently. The case is a bona fide one and in order to pay the compensation we have to come to parliament to get the money.

Mr. TOLMIE: Is it a common practice to ship animals from one part of the country to another to be slaughtered while they are suffering from a highly contagious disease such as hog cholera?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No.

Mr. TOLMIE: Then how does it come about that these animals died so quickly?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There was a light outbreak of hog cholera. As many doctors and veterinarians will differ in their diagnoses, it happened in this case that before a correct diagnoses was made many of the animals died on the farm of the owner.

Item agreed to.

Grant to the Canadian Tuberculosis Association—further amount required, $5,000.

Mr. McGIBBON: What aid does the government give to these institutions?

Mr. ROBB: I have not the main estimates before me and the minister (Mr. King) is absent owing to the death of his brother. I know there is a contribution, but I will get the information.

Mr. McGIBBON: I understand that the government cut the contributions to the society a year or two ago; the amount was reduced by half. Will the full amount be restored?

Mr. ROBB: None of these grants has been reduced. The provinces have something to do in their administration and, as my hon. friend knows, the government had to provide for a great expenditure incurred during the war. So far as it is possible to do so we are trying to reduce various miscellaneous grants and I would not promise an increase.

Mr. McGIBBON: I do not agree with the government's policy in cutting down its contribution to a society which is doing such excellent work. It is true the provinces are doing their share, but the help given to this institution of late has been meagre compared to what has been done in the past. The society is doing an invaluable work in endeavouring to eradicate a dreadful disease and it deserves greater consideration.

Mr. STEVENS: So far as I can see there is no grant in the main estimates for this institution; this would appear to be the total grant.

Mr. McGIBBON: When you think of what is being done to eradicate diseases from amongst the animals in the country and then look at what assistance is being given for the eradication of such a disease as this amongst the people the contrast is odious enough.

Mr. DUNNING: What would be a reasonable grant?

Mr. McGIBBON: $25,000.

Mr. DUNNING: That is what they are getting.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Does this mean an increase in the vote?

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Item agreed to.

Pension—to provide for pension to Captain J. E. Bernier, $1,767.74.

Mr. SPENCER: May we have some explanation of this item?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Captain Bernier is a very old employee of the government; he was first engaged by the Marine and Fisheries department and later in the Department of the Interior in expeditions up the east coast to the Arctic circle. He is now seventy-four years of age and has been retired. Not being pensionable, under any superannuation law I am asking parliament to vote him this pension for the rest of his days, in order to place him on a parity with other civil servants.

Mr. SPENCER: The reason I asked was to find out why he was not pensionable?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): He did not come under the provisions of the Superannuation Act; a good many of our civil servants were not fortunate enough to come under that act, and this is the only way we can take care of them.

Item agreed to.

National Defence—militia services—non-permanent active militia, $50,000.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): May I ask an explanation of this?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I am told that this amount was really included previously in a general vote for bonuses. As I understand it, the bonus was done away with and when the main estimates of the department were made up this amount was not included, it being thought the bonus would come out of the general vote. It was found that that was not so, and this amount had to be put in to take care of the increased salaries which were provided instead of the bonus.

Mr. HANSON: Bonuses for what?

Mr. RALSTON: For civilian salaries and charges on the department.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is for the non-permanent active militia. I understood this represented an additional amount used last summer on training.

Mr. RALSTON: The leader of the opposition will agree with me that a certain amount of the salaries and wages at headquarters are chargeable to the permanent and non-permanent militia alike.

Item agreed to.

Naval services—further amount required for the maintenance of ships and establishments of the naval service, $100,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Could the minister give us a word of explanation on this item? My reason for asking is that last summer, in July or August, while I was presiding over the department of National Defence for a time, it was represented to me that a heavy expenditure was very necessary in regard to our naval service in order to make it seaworthy. One of the training ships or one of the destroyers on the Atlantic coast, I think, was represented as being unseaworthy; it was said that she would have to go to the West Indies to take part in the imperial naval manoeuvres with a crew of something like one hundred young lads who were in training, and in the opinion of the officers of the department the boat could not be used for this purpose without involving serious risk of life. Is this amount which we are now asked to vote intended to put these ships in repair? I assume the money was spent during the past year. For what purpose was it used, and are these two destroyers now in a seaworthy condition?

Mr. RALSTON: I am advised that this is not for the purpose referred to by my hon. friend. I think practically all of this amount is for the purpose of bringing our accounts with the British Admiralty up to date. We owe the admiralty a good deal of money for the pay of officers who are with the British navy, for ordnance stores, technical stores which we get from them and which we cannot get in Canada, for ammunition, for ships' articles and for instructional supplies. This is for the purpose of squaring our accounts with the admiralty. They made a request that the account be straightened out, and this amount is for that purpose.

Item agreed to.

Air service—Canadian air force—further amount required to meet the demand from other government departments for extensions in civil operations, $398,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is one point I would like to bring out; this amount is for the requirements of other departments of the government. Why should not that be charged to those departments? It makes the air service vote very large, and the air service gets no benefit from this amount while the people are sometimes inclined to criticise such expenditures. I would suggest that the other departments requiring these services pay for them, and the amounts be charged to them, which seems to me a fair proposition.

Mr. ROBB: We will take that into consideration.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): May I point out that this is something of which a good many will approve, as one way of increasing the air force. I am strongly in favour of it; the air force is a branch on which the government should spend much more money.

Mr. LANCTOT: They are spending too much on it already.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I say that my learned friend's suggestion was followed particularly in connection with the fire patrol work for a year or two, but it is not pleasing to have to vote a sum of money over which you have no control. We have two services, the aerial photography service, which is so valuable from the standpoint of a surveyor, and the fire patrol service, both carried on by the Department of National Defence, and we are in the position of passing accounts of which we knew nothing. Therefore we adopted the principle of putting the whole vote in the air force, they being responsible for it, and giving an estimate of what the requirements were.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—to compensate Chairman W. C. Shelly, Vancouver parks board, $15,500.

Mr. SPENCER: Will the minister explain?

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. RALSTON: I was about to explain, Mr. Chairman, that this estimate is to repay to the chairman of the Vancouver parks board an amount which he expended in order to pay off a claim of a dispossessed squatter. Vancouver park, I understand,—

Mr. LADNER: Stanley park.

Mr. RALSTON: Stanley park is owned by the government and there were a large number of squatters, one of whom established a prescriptive right. The chairman of the parks board paid off this amount which is proposed to be repaid by the government.

Mr. ERNST: Was the amount awarded by a tribunal, or is it simply a compromise settlement?

Mr. RALSTON: I am sorry but I cannot give that information. A prescriptive right was established, but I cannot tell my hon. friend how the assessment was arrived at.

Mr. LADNER: If I might make a statement I would say that this action became necessary as a result, as the minister has said, of a prescriptive right being established by one squatter out of a number. Some of these cases went to the Supreme Court of Canada, and I think even to the Privy Council. The parks board wished to preserve this essential property for the purposes of Stanley park, and they were on the eve of losing it. Some speculators desired to take the property over, and were about to offer an amount to the squatter when the parks board stepped in and saved the property to the public.

Mr. BROWN: Was that particular case a test case for the others?

Mr. LADNER: The other cases had been tried and this particular case succeeded.

Mr. ADSHEAD: What was the size of the property?

Mr. RALSTON: I am sorry but I do not happen to have that information before me.

Item agreed to.

Imperial War Graves Commission—further amount required to meet Canada's share of expenditures and contribution to endowment fund to March 31, 1926, $237,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Would the minister be good enough to give an explanation with respect to the endowment fund. There is an endowment fund provided for, but I understand this is a larger amount than usual and I should like the minister to explain it.

Mr. RALSTON: As I understand it, this amount of $237,000 is for the purpose of bringing our contribution to what is called the endowment fund up to date. A project has been inaugurated whereby a permanent fund is established for the keeping of the graves of our soldiers in perpetuity, and that fund requires payments, I think, over a period of five years. The present amount pays the instalment up to a year ago. I may say that the yearly amount payable from now on is something like half a million dollars.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I see that last year it was half a million dollars.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The minister says this endowment will call for payment extending over a period of five years?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: So I understand. I know a great deal about the Imperial War Graves Commission, I was a member of it from the beginning of the time I was in England. I have a great admiration and respect for the work the commission are doing, and am very glad the government has cooperated in providing this endowment fund.

Mr. McGIBBON: What is the basis of the appropriation?

Mr. RALSTON: I am sorry but I cannot give my hon. friend that information at the moment.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Is this exclusively for graves overseas?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes. The Imperial War Graves Commission, as I understand it, deals exclusively with graves overseas.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: May I say that the Imperial War Graves Commission has to do with the graves of the British soldiers, who fell during the war, throughout the world. Colonel Osborne, of Ottawa, is the secretary for Canada and does the necessary work for the Dominion.

Item agreed to.

Railways—to provide for adjustment of allowances paid for railway and canal employees while they were on service in the Canadian Expeditionary Force during the Great war, $92,000.

Mr. HANSON: May I ask the minister a question or two in connection with this vote? In the early days of the war the employees of the Canadian government railways were given to understand that they would receive the full pay, as well as their military pay, on enlistment. At that time, I suppose, there was no idea that the war would last so long, or that it would become so great a charge on the country. Afterwards that policy, as I recollect it, was changed. Is this to supplement the original promise, or just what is the purpose of the vote? Are all the men that enlisted to be treated alike?

Mr. DUNNING: There was no intention by this vote, Mr. Chairman, to go back to the original promises made by the Conservative government in 1914, which, were afterwards revised by that very government. But certain situations were created due to the taking over by the government of other railways. This particular amount was required to deal with employees who enlisted prior to May 1, 1915, that being the date upon which certain Grand Trunk Pacific undertakings became government undertakings. The result was that men who enlisted after May 1, 1915, had the advantage of the government's provision, but men who enlisted prior to that time, although employed on the same work, were not legally considered government employees, because they had already gone overseas before the Grand Trunk's undertaking was assumed by the government. Action was taken in connection with this class in the estimates of 1923, and the amount now placed in the estimates is to clean up outstanding claims of that particular class.

Canals—St. Peters canal—improvements—additional amount required to pay claim of the Atlantic Dredging Company, $12,151.96 and interest on same at rate of five per cent per annum from October 1, 1925, $12,629.72.

Mr. HANSON: I think we should have an explanation of this.

Mr. DUNNING: An original claim by the contractors of an amount of $46,000, was subsequently whittled down by the department's engineers and by negotiation to the sum here mentioned. I will read an explanatory extract from the report of the engineers; not the whole of it because it is too lengthy. That extract is as follows:

The discrepancy between the original estimate of cost and the final amount paid is explained as follows: When the survey was made on which the original estimate was based, every effort was made to secure accurate information concerning the rock surface, and from points on the work where solid rock could be definitely located and also from the depth of old cribwork where it could be definitely ascertained, a profile showing the probable rock surface was plotted for the information of intending bidders. After the contract was let, it developed that the probable rock surface, as exhibited, for a length of 250 feet was a very hard cemented clay intermixed with stones. Consequently the contractors were required to excavate this material to the bottom of the canal for the crib seats, resulting in a large increase in the estimated quantities of excavation, cribwork, stone filling in cribwork and earth filling behind cribwork.

Briefly the situation is this: The boring indicated that rock did not exist; consequently deeper foundations had to be created in cement clay formations.

Trent canal — improvements — additional amount required, $51,900.

Mr. McGIBBON: Is this canal completed? It has been on the way for about one hundred and twenty-five years, it is nearly completed, and if the government is ever going to get revenue from it, it can only be done by completing the work.

Mr. DUNNING: The government does not intend to complete the canal. So far as revenue is concerned, I think it can be said that all the revenue the government can get from that canal is now being received, the only revenue receivable being rentals from power supplied to individuals or to communities. We are now, I think, in receipt of the maximum amount of power rentals which we could receive, even if the canal were completed, and the government has no intention of completing it.

Mr. McGIBBON: I point out to the minister that the only practical use to which this canal could be put—although I would not advocate it—would be the encouragement of the tourist traffic. At the present time it is practically of no use.

Mr. DUNNING: Tourists make a great deal of use of that canal and can make use of it although it is not completed over the height of land.

Mr. COOTE: What particular improvements are necessary in the canal to require an expenditure of $50,000?

Mr. PECK: In Peterborough and the neighbouring district there is a strong feeling that the canal should be completed. The canal itself connects the Georgian bay with lake Ontario. Although the canal is in all two hundred and forty miles in length the amount required for actual canal purposes is about thirty miles. It has been constructed from lake Ontario to lake Simcoe, to the Severn river, and all that is necessary now to give complete communication is to construct a small section on the Severn river. I think there are two rapids. When that portion is completed, there will be a complete passageway for boats of six or seven feet draught from the Georgian bay to lake Ontario. There is a certain amount of power to be generated still on the canal, and it is not, it seems to me, fitting, after so much money has been spent upon the canal, that this remaining section should not be completed. As I say, the people in my district are very much impressed with the importance of the work, and arrangements are being made for deputations to Ottawa to wait upon the government, and urge the completion of the work. I trust what has been said by the Minister of Railways and Canals will not prejudice their application.

Mr. DUNNING: I should be glad to receive any deputation on any subject whatever. Perhaps my hon. friends will permit me to bring down further information upon the whole matter in connection with the main estimates.

With reference to the supplementary estimate to which the remarks of my hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Coote) have reference, I do not expect to spend it; none of it is spent yet, and inasmuch as the authority will expire on the 31st March I do not expect that the money will be spent. It will have to be provided for in the main estimates, because it has to do with the creation of power. Certain of our works along the canal are going to pieces and require to be replaced. They happen to be works of a character that produce revenue in the form of power, and consequently we desire to keep them in good shape, in order that we may receive the rental from them.

To provide for compassionate allowance to the mother of Francis S. King, who was accidentally killed while employed on the work of St. Lawrence river investigations, $2,000.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I do not know whether this is all the allowance the mother will have to depend upon. The item says "compassionate allowance." I presume that she will have some other means on which to subsist, and that she will not be compelled to live on this amount. If, however, this is her sole means of support, would it not be better to give her an allowance of $100 a month to the end of her life, so that she would be able to exist. I observe that in the next item we are voting $4,000 to improve the acoustics of the House of Commons, which is quite necessary, but I think it is equally important that the mother of the man who was killed in the service of the government should receive an adequate allowance. I suggest that parliament should give the mother $100 or $125 a month to the end of her life.

Mr. DUNNING: I should not like to be placed in the position of being hardhearted in giving consideration to cases of this character. The case in question was that of Francis Stanley King, engineer's assistant St. Lawrence river investigation, who died following several wounds caused by having been struck by a train in April, 1926. The accident occurred while he was going to a point where he had been engaged in taking the temperature of the water. The coroner's jury excused the Canadian Pacific Railway from any blame. The boy was a promising young chap of eighteen years of age, and had been contributing his earnings to the support of his family, which consisted of father, mother, two sisters over twenty-one, and a brother and sister fifteen and five respectively. Application was made on behalf of the mother for compensation, and seeing that the case was one which could not be treated under the Workmen's Compensation Act, I recommend to the House that compassionate allowance as above indicated be granted by specific appropriation. The mother will be grateful to receive this consideration, to which I think she is entitled under the circumstances.

Mr. GUERIN: I know something about this case. The accident happened to one of my constituents. This boy was employed by the Department of Railways and Canals. He was, I believe, in the vicinity of Caughnawaga, he was sent out to get water, and to do this he had to cross the Canadian Pacific railway tracks; the train passed, travelling at a very rapid rate, and whether it was by suction or not—that is the pretension anyhow—he was drawn under the train and killed outright. He was practically the sole support of his father and mother. I had hoped that the amount would be considerably greater, but the government have conceded $2,000 to the boy. I think that by every claim of justice and right the family are entitled to this money. The boy was killed while doing his duty, and through no fault of his own.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I have had some experience with mothers who had been dependent upon a son, and were given a lump sum. The difficulty is that it disappears very quickly in various ways, and if this amount is for the mother's maintenance, I would suggest that it be not given in a lump sum, but rather in monthly payments, so that the mother will be assured of so much a month for her own support, just as she was during her son's lifetime.

Item agreed to.

Ottawa parliament building—to improve acoustics of the House of Commons, $4,000.

Mr. COOTE: May I ask just what particular improvements are intended to be made, and whether $4,000 will induce the members to endeavour to make themselves heard in the House?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: There are several pages of items coming under the Public Works department, and until some minister who is specially charged with these items is here, I would suggest that they might as well stand.

Mr. ROBB: The minister is away attending the funeral of the late Senator Pardee. I quite agree with my hon. friend (Sir George Perley) that we can let these items stand at least until eight o'clock this evening, when perhaps the deputy minister will be here.

Item stands.

Topographical surveys—additional amount required in connection with aerial surveys, etc., $20,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Here is another air service item. Will the minister explain?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This is for the purpose of preparing for the aerial survey work to be carried on next year—for the placing of gasoline and the taking of aerial photographs in a system of strips across the country, to be done by the Royal Canadian Air Force. The work must be limited owing to previous preparations not having been made for 1926, but this will be followed up by the placing of supplies by canoe in the summer time, in order to get better results from the flying operations, which are very extensive. Most of this work is along the Churchill river and in the northern portions of Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

Item agreed to.

To assist in the conservation and development of deep-sea fisheries, and the demand for fish—further amount required, $100,000.

Mr. ERNST: I see that the item is to provide for assisting in the demand for fish. What amount of this item is being devoted to educational work, advertising and so forth?

Mr. CARDIN: The object we had in view in placing this item in the estimates was to meet certain requests which had been made of the department to help in the marketing of fish. As I understand it, the difficulty in certain parts of the maritime provinces is that the fishermen have not the opportunity of disposing of their fish as advantageously as fishermen living in the vicinity of the larger ports, and the idea was to help establish a service for the purpose of collecting the fish from the smaller ports and bringing them up to the more important ports where they could be sold more advantageously. I must admit that nothing very definite has yet been decided upon. The suggestion has been made to us that we should subsidize a certain line of steamships, or else that we should help to establish a certain line, for the purpose of collecting the fish, but nothing very definite has been done as yet, and I am afraid that nothing is going to be done in that direction before this vote expires on the 31st of March next.

Mr. ERNST: It would not be of any use until after the 31st of March.

Mr. CARDIN: Not very much, except so far as preparation is concerned.

Mr. ERNST: Will further consideration be given to this matter in the main estimates for the coming year? At the present time, along a good portion of the coast of Nova Scotia the National Fish Company are operating boats for the purpose of collecting fish for their own trade, but along the south shore of the province, which embraces the counties of Lunenburg, Queens, Shelburne and Yarmouth, nothing is being done in that direction, and the fishermen are without any method of getting their fish to market. I would ask the minister to bear that in mind, and to provide some such service for the south shore of Nova Scotia.

Mr. CARDIN: Certainly. That is the object we had in view.

Item agreed to.

Amount required to remunerate Messrs. Bain, Bicknell, Macdonell and Gordon, solicitors, for professional services rendered in the matter of the King vs. the Dominion Shipbuilding and Repair Company, Limited, $392.49.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the explanation of this?

Mr. CARDIN: I regret not being in a position to give many details regarding this item, which relates to a case in the department. I may say that these fees are all taxed by the Department of Justice.

Item agreed to.

Amount required to remunerate Messrs. Bain, Bicknell, White and Gordon, solicitors, for professional services rendered in the case of the King vs. the London Guarantee and Accident Company, Limited—the Prince Rupert Dry Dock and Engineering Company, $973.04.

[Mr. Cardin.]

Mr. COOTE: Were these solicitors successful in compelling the London Guarantee and Accident Company to pay the bond that has been hanging fire so long?

Mr. CARDIN: They have not succeeded yet.

Mr. COOTE: Is this case closed—was the government unsuccessful?

Mr. CARDIN: No, the case is not closed.

Item agreed to.

Amount required to provide for the removal of the wreck of the S.S. Canadian Recruit, $50,000.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Perhaps the minister will give some explanation of this item?

Mr. CARDIN: The Canadian Recruit, one of the steamers of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, was wrecked several years ago in the gulf of St. Lawrence, and it has since been practically established that the wreck was the cause of the stranding of other vessels at this point. Representations were made to us by the navigation companies that we should remove the wreck, and in view of the difficulties we are experiencing in getting the insurance rate reduced, we deemed it desirable that all obstacles to navigation should be removed.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Was this wreck located right in the channel?

Mr. CARDIN: It was just at the edge of the channel below Quebec. It is one of the most dangerous places of navigation in the gulf by reason of the currents. This wreck increased the difficulties of navigators, and we therefore decided to take this action and so allay the anxiety of the navigation companies.

Mr. GARDINER: What was the depth of water at that point?

Mr. CARDIN: The wreck has been removed in order to give a clearance of thirty-five feet at low water. Before its removal the wreck was visible at low water.

Item agreed to.

Mines and Geological Survey—Mines branch —to provide for the operation of peat bog at Alfred, Ontario, $70,000.

Mr. CANTLEY: Explain.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of Mines): The explanation of this vote is that the federal government and the government of Ontario have spent in the neighborhood of $250,000 in developing machinery to manufacture peat fuel at Alfred. Two years ago the advisers of the government felt that the machinery had been perfected to the point where it would be well to let a commercial company operate the plant. This was undertaken by a company headed by a gentleman in Montreal—I have forgotten his name—under the supervision of Mr. Moore, representing the two governments. Unfortunately the company was not able to finance the project. Apparently investors felt that the process was not yet beyond the experimental stage, and that therefore the government should lend further aid. I may say that this peat fuel has been sold as far east as Three Rivers, as well as in this city and the surrounding country. I take it that this will be a very important industry not only to Ontario but also to the maritime provinces and to Quebec, and if this industry is to be established it is necessary that we take over the plant and operate it for one year.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The government is taking back the plant?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, and operating it for a year. The plant is now located on land which is held by the owner at a very exorbitant price, and it has been decided to move it across the railway track at Alfred on to property that can be purchased on reasonable terms. As the difficulties confronting the company appear to be insurmountable, we have decided, as I say, to take over the plant and operate it for one year, and so demonstrate the feasibility of the project and the value of a cheap fuel. Moreover this demonstration will be useful for the utilization of the peat bogs at the southern end of lake Simcoe and in other portions of this province where the people have to rely on imported fuels. We will be able to use only a very small portion of this $70,000 before the expiry of this vote, and therefore it will be necessary to come back and ask for a further vote, in order that we may bring to a satisfactory conclusion the development of this cheap fuel and prove conclusively that it can be manufactured and sold at a reasonable price.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Was it not supposed at the time the minister handed the plant over to this company that the system had been perfected so that the peat could be produced commercially?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That was the advice we received from our technical officers. They suggested several improvements in connection with machinery which was not then actually in operation. The apparatus for spreading and pulverizing and so forth was all in use but it was suggested that the steam engines be abandoned and electricity used instead for generating power. That has been done but the company unfortunately has been unable so far to put the manufacture of peat, in this respect, on a commercial basis.

Mr. CANTLEY: In the operations which have been carried on over a number of years, and which are being carried on at the present time, the government has spent hundreds of thousands of dollars and I can assure the minister that the whole scheme is impracticable as a commercial proposition. So far as I am aware—and I do not think I am subject to correction in this—the only peat that is used is the air dried product. In my judgment, as well as in the judgment of men better equipped than I am to give an opinion, it is impossible to manufacture peat mechanically and make it a commercial success in competition with the ordinary forms of fuel to be found in this country. As I say, we have spent several hundreds of thousands on this experiment, one year following another, under different managements in different departments of government, and we have got nowhere. Nor are we likely to get anywhere in treating peat mechanically. I protest against any further expenditure in this direction.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend is under a misapprehension if he thinks that the experiment had to do with anything but air dried peat. Having some knowledge of other experiments conducted by governments and private individuals, I am bound to say that little money has been spent on the development of peat fuel in comparison with expenditures made in other experimental work. What was done was to produce machinery to spread the peat and dry it by air. No attempt was made to invent any machinery that would compress the peat, the object being simply to develop the proper machinery to spread it on the surface and dry it. Machinery was also secured for picking up the peat, thus avoiding the excessive labour cost entailed in this process in the absence of such machinery. Up to the time when the experiment was turned over to the company, what had been done was largely a matter of developing and testing the necessary machinery to do the work in such a way as to make it commercially feasible to sell the fuel in competition with other fuels on the market. We have done that. If the company had succeeded in financing the scheme they would have been making peat to-day and would have been able to sell it at a profit in competition with other fuels in this province and in the province of Quebec. These provinces are both in the acute fuel area. In this city and in Montreal between 15,000 and 20,000 tons of this fuel have been burned in domestic furnaces and it has proved successful. While therefore one cannot say that it is entirely beyond the experimental stage, nevertheless the experiment has been carried far enough to demonstrate that peat fuel can be produced by the process upon which these expenditures have been made.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I know something personally about this matter because forty years ago I spent a good deal of money trying to develop peat fuel commercially. There is no trouble about selling it; it is a very fine fuel. If we could discover a method by which it could be made satisfactorily from a commercial point of view it would be worth a great deal of money to this country because we have peat bogs in every part of Canada. And it would help to solve our fuel problem. There is, I repeat, no trouble about either selling it or burning it; indeed, I burned it in my own house forty years ago. The problem is to complete successfully such a process as will turn out the fuel commercially at prices which the people can afford to pay. I understood from the minister that when he handed the property over to the company they had a completed process. It seems now that it is not entirely successful.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am sorry my hon. friend got that impression. Certain drawings were made for the improvement of the machinery, so that this part of the machinery at least could not be said to have been tested. The major portion of the machinery was all tested and proved efficient and to that extent the process has gone past the experimental stage. Unfortunately, however, as in the case of many new enterprises, they could not finance the project and carry it on, so that they were unable to operate.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I doubt whether it was a lack of funds that made it difficult for them to carry on. I am not sure whether as a matter of fact it was found that the process had not been sufficiently completed to enable the fuel to be made commercially. That is the question. I doubt very much whether the process has reached the point where peat can be turned out in large quantities at a reasonable price. I cannot understand why the government should have handed the plant over to a private company unless the process was completed. Now the plant must be taken back. The simplest thing to do, in my judgment, is to continue the experiment in a small way. I am willing that a reasonable sum should be spent in an endeavour if possible to discover some means of making use of this natural product.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We are confident that we can sell the fuel if we can move the machinery and set up the plant, which is all there with the exception of some of the machinery which the company has bought.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Does the minister suggest that he can sell the fuel at cost?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We can sell it and make a profit; we have demonstrated that with machinery not entirely completed. We have to sell the fuel at about $7 or $8. You can manufacture it and put it on the cars for less than $5, and it has already been proved that we can cut that $5 cost considerably. It will be remembered also that we had to haul the fuel a considerable distance to Alfred station. We propose now to lay a track to the fuel bed itself, thus effecting a saving.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: When this matter comes up in the main estimates the minister might bring down a statement covering a period of months, giving the expenditures and the receipts, to show that the fuel can be profitably disposed of.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I shall be glad to bring down a statement of costs when the general estimate is up.

Mr. ADSHEAD: After the manufacture of this fuel has been proved a commercial success is it the intention of the Minister of the Interior to continue operating the plant as a government concern or to sell it again to some company?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is not the intention of the government to continue operating it as a commercial enterprise once it has proved commercially practicable, but to sell it to those who can operate it.

Mr. RYERSON: May I ask the minister if he has any figures showing the amount expended by this government during the last ten or twenty years in connection with these experiments?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I can get those figures for my hon. friend. This particular experiment was carried on jointly with the Ontario government.

Mr. RYERSON: I might back up the words of some other hon. members by saying that a great deal of money has been expended during the last twenty-five years on experiments in connection with peat fuel. To my personal knowledge two or three companies have spent a lot of money and failed in attempts to discover this process, and it seems to me time the government called a halt on the experimental stage of this peat fuel business.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not agree with my hon. friend. I may be a protagonist of peat fuel, but I am convinced that the process will work. I have watched it for two years and I am convinced that fuel can be made and sold in competition with other fuels at a price which will leave a profit. For the information of my hon. friend I may say that a millon dollars was spent in Saskatchewan in an endeavour to briquet the lignite coals there, and after spending that amount we did not have a process that would work satisfactorily. But we kept at it, and through information received from the university of Dakota we eventually did evolve a process of briquetting these coals successfully. One might very well say that the million dollars was a total loss so far as our experiments were concerned, but that is not so. It seems to me that it is the business of the government to endeavour to bring into use these latent natural resources, to spend some money on them and if necessary take some losses. I am very keen about this thing because I may tell you that I was very much opposed to it when I came here, and wanted to stop the whole thing. To-day, however, I have changed my mind, after very careful investigation, and I am satisfied that these experiments at the Alfred bog can be made a success. If that is the case then public or private enterprise will open up other bogs in Ontario and manufacture this fuel.

Mr. CANTLEY: I am very glad to observe the minister's recent conversion. I have gone to most of the meetings of the mining society for more than twenty years, and during all that time various reports have been brought in regarding the Alfred bog. It has been a failure from beginning to end. I think the minister has forgotten some early history, or he would have remembered that efforts were made to dry the peat by the use of steam, and in other ways, and all those efforts were unsuccessful. These bogs have a value but it is only a local value. In Ireland and Scotland and other places where the people immediately adjoining these bogs spade the material out and dry it in the sun, it has a certain value, but it has no value when you have to employ machinery of the kind now used. The history of this enterprise for the last twenty years proves that fact beyond question. The minister can spend his $70,000 but I do not believe he can come here next year and tell us that this is a commercial success.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I would like to ask the minister if he has information as to the output of the present machinery and as to how many years that output will continue with the present machinery in operation?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not understand my hon. friend's question.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): There are several questions in this connection. First, what would be the possible output of peat with the machinery now in operation or about to be put in operation, and for how many years could that output be continued?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I estimate that within the season, which in Ontario is necessarily short, because it must be air dried, the capacity of this plant would be about 30,000 tons, but I cannot give my hon. friend an estimate of how many years the Alfred bog would last. I assume however, that it would last a great many years with that output.

Mr. PRICE: I am very glad indeed to see anything done in connection with the development of our natural resources, but in regard to one of our resources, gas and oil, outside capital has been spent in Canada which would like a little easement from the duties that are exacted on casings, for instance, and other machinery used in the development of this field. Last year I think some encouragement was given to the development of the oil shale industry, in regard to the bringing in of crushing plants for the extraction of oil from shale, but at the same time the government exacts a very high duty on casings used in drilling wells which are not manufactured in this country satisfactorily. In the maritime provinces the success we have had in connection with gas and oil has resulted from wells varying in depth from 1,500 to 3,000 feet. The casings used are from eight inches to fifteen inches in diameter; they are required to be of great strength and properly milled and there is no dependable material of that kind manufactured in Canada. Therefore I would like to take this occasion to draw to the attention of the minister the fact that these companies which have spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in the last ten or fifteen years without a single dividend, require at present a little easement.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is no duty on that piping.

Mr. PRICE: I took the matter up with the Minister of Finance last year, when the duty on machinery for the extraction of oil from shale was under consideration, and something was done in that connection to reduce the duty and give these people an opportunity for development. In the case of these other concerns, however, those who have to go down thousands of feet into the earth before they know whether or not the well is of any value, no relief at all has been given. I think the Minister of Finance will bear me out in that, and I think he is sympathetic to those concerns.

Mr. ROBB: I do not like to interrupt my hon. friend's speech but will he guarantee that such a proposal will receive support from that side of the House?

Mr. PRICE: I am in favour of anything tending to the development of our natural resources, which does not interfere with our own manufacturing concerns. Our Canadian concerns do not manufacture a satisfactory article in this case, and therefore people interested in oil and gas development should be allowed to bring this material in free of duty.

Item agreed to.

Geological Survey—grant to second Empire Mining and Metallurgical Congress, $25,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What is this?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This world congress is coming to Canada this year and will hold meetings right across the country. There will be representatives of mining institutes and people interested in mining, from all over the world. The meetings will begin in Montreal, and will continue in this city, and in Toronto and Winnipeg. Sessions will be held in all these centres right through to Vancouver. Side trips will take place from Toronto, and points in the north, into the northern mining areas of Ontario. A splendid program has been prepared, and we have been asked to vote $25,000 for the purposes indicated.

Item agreed to.

Indians—Nova Scotia—medical attendance and medicines—further amount required, $5,000.

Mr. ERNST: May I ask the minister whether any of that sum is to be expended for the Indian reserve at Scarsdale, Lunenburg county, Nova Scotia?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I cannot tell my hon. friend whether that particular reserve is included. We have had over-expenditures for medical relief in Nova Scotia, as indeed in all the other provinces, but I cannot give him any definite amount that may have been spent on an individual reserve.

Mr. ERNST: Can the minister supply the information in the near future as to how much has been spent in that connection on the reserve at Scarsdale in Lunenburg county? I am fairly well acquainted with that reserve and I have been unable to find any Indians on it. It is filled with white men, and yet the government has been maintaining a medical service, schools, and an Indian agent. As a matter of fact all the people there want to get title to their land. They do not want to be treated as Indians, and they have asked that steps be taken to have the lands conveyed to them. There are no Indians at all on the reserve, and yet the government has been spending money for these purposes for the last fifteen or twenty years.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I may say for the information of my hon. friend that there are a number of reserves upon which there are no Indians. I wish also to tell him that if there are no Indians on the reserve then the government have not been spending any money on it; any expenditures made are on the Indians themselves.

Mr. ERNST: There has been money spent on this particular reserve.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton) There may be money spent for the agent. We do not spend money on the land but on the individuals, therefore my hon. friend's information could not possibly be correct.

Mr. ERNST: How about schools?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If there is a school there must be Indians in attendance.

Mr. ERNST: They are shown as Indians, but I am prepared—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): To take your oath that they are whites?

Mr. ERNST:—to state that they are whites.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Have they got votes?

Mr. ERNST: That depends upon which government is in power.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I shall be very glad to get the information for which my hon. friend has asked.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): Would the minister supply a list of the Indian reserves in Nova Scotia?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not offhand. There are a great many reserves in Nova Scotia, but they are small ones.

Item agreed to.

Indian education—further amount required, $122,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will the minister be good enough to give some information about this vote?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): As hon. gentlemen are aware, we have taken over the construction of Indian schools and the purchase of existing schools that are sufficiently valuable to justify their acquisition from the church organizations that have been carrying on this work. I may say that in accordance with our treaty obligations the education of the Indian devolves upon the government. Up until a few years ago, indeed up until 1923, the government were carrying on this work by means of a per capita grant, and the various church organizations had established themselves—had constructed school buildings and were maintaining them for a grant that was less than $20 per head. I felt this was hardly fair, and I recommended to the government that in future we build all schools and equip and maintain them, and let the various church organizations carry on the teaching with a slightly increased grant. This has relieved the churches of a very considerable obligation, and has given quite an impetus to the work. I intend speaking upon this question when the Indian estimates are up, or prior thereto, because I think it is important that parliament should have full information, first as to our responsibility to these aborigines, and secondly as to what we are doing to carry out the treaty provisions, particularly with respect to education.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Has this amount been spent this year?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The contract for the Blood reserve school in Alberta, plus extras on the building, is for $130,117. Of this amount $19,000 is to be paid from the 1926-27 appropriation. Sioux Lookout school in Ontario, which is also nearing completion, is being erected for $84,400. We require $91,000 to clear up the furnishing of these two schools and make them fit for the reception of pupils. Then there is an amount of $6,000 required for the Gitladamix reserve, where the schoolroom was burned. This provision is badly needed. I am going to say to the House now that I shall be forced, perhaps this session, to ask for a larger appropriation for Indian education than we have needed in the past, because the work is always growing, and the demand is becoming greater as the Indians familiarize themselves with what they are entitled to receive from the government. I am asking for the present amount to clear up all our obligations for this year.

Item agreed to.

Labour—unemployment relief—to provide amounts due various municipalities and provinces as authorized by P.C. 315, $59,500.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not quite understand this vote. Will the minister be good enough to explain it?

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Minister of Labour): As the hon. member will recall, under P.C. 315 the Dominion government undertook to supplement, to the extent of one-third, the expenditure necessary by the provinces and municipalities to take care of unemployment relief last year.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is it paid to the provinces?

Mr. HEENAN: To the municipalities.

Item agreed to.

Additional amount required for investigational work re the practicability of bringing reindeer into the Northwest Territories, $5,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will the minister say a word on this?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The problem of a meat supply in the north country is becoming an ever-increasing one. Some years ago the Hudson's Bay Company made the experiment of locating reindeer on the east coast. It was not entirely a success, largely because an investigation was not held by a botantist for the location of a proper feeding ground. The United States government have made a great success of the rearing of reindeer in Alaska. Not only the government but many private individuals have large herds of reindeer, and it will be an easy matter to transport them from Alaska to the Northwest Territories, to the Eskimo and Indian tribes further north. We have engaged the services of two botanists who were recommended by the American government and who are now in the north country endeavouring to locate feeding grounds for the reindeer. It is merely a precautionary measure, to ascertain whether we have in the Northwest Territory feeding grounds on which they would thrive, and for that purpose we ask the House to vote this amount.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Have we not made other experiments with regard to reindeer?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: With what result?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We have a few of the herd on Anticosti island, but the reindeer that were placed on the east coast of Hudson bay did not thrive. The difficulty was one of pasture. If these thoroughly experienced men can locate areas in the central portions of the territories upon which reindeer can thrive, we will purchase the reindeer, drive them across the territory and seek to instruct the Eskimo in the care of reindeer.

Mr. GEARY: Are these botanists Americans or Canadians?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Americans.

Mr. GEARY: No Canadians?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): None who have had experience with reindeer and their problems. We got these two men so that we would make no mistake.

Item agreed to.

To provide for payment to the government of the United States in pursuance to articles 8 and 10 of Lake of the Woods convention as signed at Washington on February 24, 1925, and as approved of by the House of Commons on May 5, 1925, and by the Senate on May 12, 1925, $275,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: How is this arrived at?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It was allocated by the board appointed for the purpose of estimating the damage claims that might arise, and this was our proportion of the amount payable to the American residents on the south shore of the lake of the Woods whose property would suffer damage.

Item agreed to.

Mr. ROBB: I wonder if my hon. friend would be ready before six o'clock to let an item go through. Item 381 in the further supplementaries for 1925-26, was held up by my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre. It was a large item, and I was not able to give the explanation, but I have it now. It is in the small sheet, 381 of the supplementary estimates.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would prefer that my hon. friend should take it up to-night.

Mr. ROBB: I would be glad to wait, but I wanted to point out to my hon. friend that it was a customary item and had gone through each year. It was passed in 1919-20 and in 1921-22 during my hon. friend's administration. It was a customary item.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would ask that my hon. friend let it stand till eight o'clock.

Reception of the Interparliamentary Union for Peace, $11,448.88.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is that something that is going on in the future?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will remember that there was a meeting at Washington of the Interparliamentary Union, and the delegates were entertained at Ottawa later.

Item agreed to.

Expenses under the Naturalization Acts, 1914 and 1920—further amount required, $2,000.

Mr. SPENCER: Could we have some explanation of this?

Mr. RINFRET: It is merely to complete the work of the year. It is a routine vote—nothing special about it.

Item agreed to.

Dominion—provincial conference, $10,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What does this refer to?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This item was in connection with the Dominion-provincial conference with reference to provincial legislation where there have been conflicts in the courts.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Has it been held?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is not going to be held between now and March?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, no.

Item agreed to.

Public Records Commission, contingencies and salary of chairman, $3,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: What is this commission?

Mr. RINFRET: It is a commission for the purpose of helping in the collection of manuscripts for the Archives department. It has been found that we could not collect the material quickly enough and in proper order for that very important department, which has developed very much lately, and it was therefore felt it would be better to establish a commission, on the same standing as the commission which exists in England, for the purpose of collecting such material. The idea is to have a chairman, together with honorary members in every province in Canada, to make the work of collection more active. The amount asked for just now is only $3,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I approve entirely of the object which the government has in view in this respect, which is to assist the archivist. Might I ask whether a chairman has been selected?

Mr. RINFRET: Yes. I have a copy of the order in council here, appointing Dr. Doughty chairman of the commission on May 12, 1926.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is this an additional salary for Dr. Doughty?

Mr. RINFRET: He will not get the full amount for the current year, as it will date back only to the date of the order in council.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would just like to understand the position correctly. Do I understand that Dr. Doughty is both Dominion Archivist at a special salary, and that he is also to be chairman of the Public Records Commission at another salary?

Mr. RINFRET: That is the situation.

Mr. GUTHRIE: How do you overcome the provisions of the Civil Service Act and allow him to draw two salaries?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Dr. Doughty comes in as a deputy head under the Civil Service Act, and if parliament votes this amount for the Public Records Commission, there will then be parliamentary authority for the purpose. As no doubt my hon. friend is aware, Dr. Doughty is a member of the service who has quite an exceptional knowledge with respect to Canadian documents and manuscripts of various kinds. It has been with the greatest difficulty that the government has been able to retain Dr. Doughty in this country, for he has had offers from Great Britain that have been most attractive. I might say that Dr. Doughty is staying here at the present time at a very considerable financial sacrifice. He is an officer of the service who gives not only his days, but his nights and his entire time to the work that he is interested in as a specialist, and the government felt that if they were able to retain his services, no doubt parliament would endorse their action by supplementing the amount he is receiving as a deputy minister with this extra amount to be given him as chairman of the commission, on the understanding, of course, that he gives time to the work of the commission in addition to what would be expected merely of the Dominion Archivist.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I endorse everything my right hon. friend has said in regard to Dr. Doughty. I think he is one of the ablest men in the service of the government, and I sincerely hope that he is continued for the special work which he does. However, I do not know that the principle we are now adopting is a correct one. I think it would be far better to increase his salary as Dominion Archivist by a proper amount than to add to it in this indirect way, for that is what is really being done by the appointment of this commission. I would support a substantial straight increase in Dr. Doughty's salary, as I think it is very necessary for Canada to retain him.

Item agreed to.

Salaries and expenses, passport office—further amount required, $6,500.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This item is to provide for new passports that are necessary in consequence of a new Governor-General. They have to be made out in the name of the new Governor-General.

Item agreed to.

Amount required for expenses of delegation to Imperial Conference, $10,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is this all spent?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, it is not all spent.

Item agreed to.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Miscellaneous—To replace and implement the sum of $80,000 paid the Government of Canada by the Canada Atlantic Railway Company for the purpose of clearing the government reserve on the west bank of the Rideau canal between the Plaza and Laurier avenue in the city of Ottawa and to construct thereon an extension of the park and driveway system in charge of the Ottawa Improvement Commission—the said sum of $80,000 having been expended, in satisfying claims of the heirs of the Sparks estate in connection with the government reserve on the east, or opposite bank of the Rideau canal between the Plaza and Laurier avenue, $100,000.

Mr. STEVENS: Could we have an explanation of this item? It is rather large.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, I understand that some years ago the late Mr. Booth, in his position as president of the Canada Atlantic Railway Company, presented to the city of Ottawa a sum of money for the purpose of clearing the government reserve on the west bank of the Rideau canal and making it a park. The money was used for another purpose. It is now the desire of the improvement commission to continue the driveway system from Laurier avenue bridge to the post office, and this vote is really to replace the original gift from the Canada Atlantic Railway Company.

Item agreed to.

To provide, subject to the approval of the Treasury board, for salaries, reclassifications, revisions, promotions and increases, $89,340.

Mr. ROBB: This is the usual vote for the reclassification which comes along each year.

Mr. ARTHURS: But why each year?

Mr. ROBB: Because of reclassifications during the year. Early in the year the deputy ministers submit estimates based on the salaries then current, and during the year the reclassifications in the different departments, approved by the Civil Service Commission, become effective. Those are submitted to the Treasury board. Sometimes at the end of the year the deputy ministers find themselves short of their requirements.

Mr. ARTHURS: As a rule these reclassifications have been pending for many years.

Mr. ROBB: It does not really mean more expenditure; there may be less expenditure in one department and more in another. We have to vote the item to satisfy the Auditor General.

Mr. STEVENS: It is rather an ingenious explanation that this does not mean more money. Why, we are voting more money. I would call the minister's attention to the fact that this afternoon when I asked for an explanation of the $70,000 odd under item 390 he gave the committee precisely the same explanation that he is now giving for this item. Why should there be two items, almost identical in wording, in the supplementary estimates for this current year? Under civil government item 390 is:

To provide for authorization by the Treasury board of salaries, reclassifications, revisions, promotions and increases, $70,692.

Item 496 reads:

To provide, subject to the approval of the Treasury board, for salaries, reclassifications, revisions, promotions and increases, $89,340.

The wording is practically the same.

Mr. ROBB: One is inside and the other outside.

Mr. ARTHURS: What is the difference between the inside service and the outside at the present time?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: One is inside and the other outside, that is all.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. ROBB: The inside service comprises the departments in Ottawa; the outside service may include the services at various customs outports as well as post offices throughout the country.

Mr. ARTHURS: In some instances are they not all classified under one head?

Mr. ROBB: Each is under a different vote.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We ought to have this more clearly explained. The first item is 390, "civil government generally": there is neither inside nor outside service about that. That item is for the civil government of Canada, I assume. The item we are now discussing is 496, to provide for salaries, reclassifications, revisions, promotions and increases. The amount of this vote is $89,000 odd. There must be some explanation of these two items and we should like to know what it is.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Civil government as set out in the main estimates relates to the inside civil service exclusively, and in addition to that there is the outside service, which is voted as such, although not under the head of civil government. The explanation would be that the same reason that accounts for the sum required in the one case applies equally to the sum required in the other. The Civil Service Commission from time to time make reclassifications of employees, promoting them from one grade to another, and it is impossible before the promotion is made to know what amount will be required to enable the government to pay the extra salary attached to the new grade. It is only at the end of the year that the total amount can be made up. It has been suggested that it might be advisable to have no promotions take effect except at the beginning of the fiscal year, all promotions to become operative at that time. If that were done it would not be necessary to make this request of parliament on each occasion to adjust differences that arise between one fiscal year and another.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Are we to understand that it is definitely stated that the first item is for the inside service and the second for the outside?

Mr. ROBB: As my hon. friend knows, "civil government" is generally understood to apply to the administration of the different departments in Ottawa. The other service might be in Toronto or Montreal or Hamilton.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The distinction is between the outside and the inside. The first item applies to the inside and the second to the outside service.

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then we understand that.

Mr. HANSON: The minister says that this vote does not necessarily mean more money. Are there ever any demotions in the civil service?

Mr. ROBB: Very seldom.

Item agreed to.

To provide for salaries and expenses of the advisors engaged in tariff inquiry. Payments may be made notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act or regulations thereunder. Further amount required, $25,000.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Since the procedure in connection with this tariff inquiry has not been very fully worked out I suggest that the public should be given fuller information than it has received so far. Some of us have been supplied with copies of the applicant's case in particular instances but no copy has ever been given of the case in rebuttal or of the conclusions reached by the tariff board. On one occasion I had an opportunity of listening to one of the hearings, when some very important evidence was given against the granting of an application. No report was published in the press of that particular hearing and there is no way in which the public can be apprised of what may be said against any application. Further than that, seeing that the minister is not bound to act on the recommendations of the tariff advisers, there would seem to be no particular reason why the public should not be given at least a summary of the conclusions of the board. The board might be made of great educational value to the public if the arguments pro and con, or a summary of them, could be made available to members of the House and to the country at large.

Mr. KAISER: How many officers are there on the board, and what salary does each receive?

Mr. ROBB: There are three members on the board. The chairman devotes the whole of his time to the work of the board, as does the secretary; the two other members are called in when the board is in session. The chairman's salary is $10,000 per annum and that of the other members $3,000.

Mr. EVANS: I wish the minister would answer the question as to the publication of arguments. The committee would like some satisfactory statement in that regard.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend will understand that if the board is to serve any useful purpose it must be in a position to secure information which it might not always be advisable to publish. If this were not understood we might not be able to get such information as would enable us to reach a fair conclusion in respect of every matter submitted to the board. Speaking offhand at the moment, however, I see no objection, if any hon. gentleman moves to that end, to having tabled the report of any particular hearing. I do not see why such a report should not be tabled, reserving whatever information might be deemed confidential. So far I have not observed anything confidential handed in to the board. The board is a free forum where all are heard and the newspapers give, I think, fair publicity to the evidence on both sides.

Mr. HANSON: Are the only matters coming before the board those referred by the minister, or may an application be made by any party directly to the board?

Mr. ROBB: When anyone writes to the minister requesting a reduction or an increase in the tariff the minister replies that, if it is desired, he will submit the request to the board, and he indicates the procedure which is followed. On the recommendation of the retiring chairman we shall change that method somewhat. In view of certain delays that have taken place we shall now require applicants to prepare a brief giving the reasons for any increase or decrease, as the case may be, so that those opposing the application may be in a position to meet the arguments presented.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the minister go further than that? I understand that the memorandum of the applicant is made available to members of the House; I have received several documents of that nature. On the other hand, the counter arguments are not available. If we are to be in a position to judge the merits of a case it would seem reasonable that not only the applicants' memoranda but, as well, the counter arguments be submitted to us.

Mr. ROBB: That is a matter of record in the department; if one is tabled the other will be.

Mr. LADNER: Are these memoranda available automatically to members of the House or are they obtained on request?

Mr. ROBB: I should think it would be by request; many matters are brought up and we must exercise reasonable judgment in running up a big bill. I know that now there is some lobbying going on to increase the amount of printing and to have a lot of things printed which will be piled away where no person will ever read them.

Mr. GUTHRIE: May I inquire of the minister whether the tariff board on hearing an application makes any recommendation as to what action should be taken?

Mr. ROBB: No, the tariff board is a fact finding board.

Mr. GUTHRIE: They do not make recommendations?

Mr. ROBB: No. The government of the day must take the responsibility.

Item agreed to.

Trade and Commerce—amount required to refund money collected on overages in public terminal elevators, $81,330.74.

Mr. STEVENS: We will have to have some explanation of this, I think. Will the minister give us some idea of what this is?

Mr. ROBB: This amount is the total of the sums paid under protest by the following terminal elevators to the Board of Grain Commissioners in accordance with section 95 of the Canada Grain Act:

Empire Elevator Company, Limited.	$ 2,921 82
United Grain Growers, Limited.. ..	13,281 48
Grand Trunk Pacific Elevator Company. Limited..	15,500 22
Port Arthur Elevator Company.. ..	35,116 73
Thunder Bay Terminal Company..	12,107 62
Saskatchewan Co-operative Elevator Company..	2,030 14
Fort William Elevator Company, Limited..	372 73
Total..	$81,330 74

It was claimed that we had no right to collect these overages; they went to court and the judgment was against us, and we are refunding what was paid in.

Mr. STEVENS: Do I understand that now the government are not permitted under the law to collect any of the overages at all?

Mr. ROBB: The act was amended, so that now we have some right of collection. Under the old act we did not have that right.

Mr. STEVENS: What proportion does the government collect now?

Mr. ROBB: It is the same proportion as before, one quarter of one per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: The elevator company is allowed to retain any overage of one quarter of one per cent, and the government takes anything above that?

Mr. ROBB: I will read the section of the Grain Act and my hon. friend can interpret it. In the year 1919 the Canada Grain Act was amended by adding to section 95 the following subsection:

In the month of August in each year, stock shall be taken of the quantity of each grade of grain in the terminal elevators; if in any year after the crop year ending the thirty-first day of August, 1919, the total surplus of grain is found in excess of one-quarter of one per cent, of the gross amount of the grain received in the elevator during the crop year, such excess surplus shall be sold annually by the Board of Grain Commissioners and the proceeds thereof paid to the said board. Such proceeds shall be applied towards the cost of the administration of the Canada Grain Act in such manner as the Governor in Council may direct.

Mr. STEVENS: How long has that section been in force?

Mr. ROBB: It is included in the new amendments.

Mr. BROWN: It was the clause bringing the elevators under the definition of works for the general advantage of Canada which made possible the application, I think.

Mr. COOTE: I would like to ask the minister if any overages were collected from the public terminal elevators last year?

Mr. ROBB: The returns are not available yet.

Mr. COOTE: Could the minister tell us whether they are collecting any overage at present?

Mr. ROBB: We have no returns from the Board of Grain Commissioners for this year, but they are expected daily.

Mr. STEVENS: How about the end of the last crop year?

Mr. ROBB: That is the year my hon. friend asked about.

Mr. STEVENS: The end of the last crop year was August 31, 1926. There should be a return showing whether there were any overages then beyond one quarter of one per cent.

Mr. ROBB: We have not yet received the returns for 1926.

Mr. COOTE: I do not know whether or not I am correct, but I think the Grain Act was last amended in 1925, and would apply to the crop year ending August 31, 1926, and if the act did cover that year I would like to know whether the Board of Grain Commissioners collected any overages in that year. If not, has the government any policy to set forth definitely here as to whether they intend to collect that overage this year?

Mr. ROBB: It is not a question of government policy; it is a question of the Board of Grain Commissioners administering an act of parliament, and the act provides that they shall collect these overages. As yet, however, these returns have not been received for 1926. We will probably have them available by the time we reach the main estimates, because my deputy informs me that they are expected daily.

Mr. GARDINER: Can the minister tell the committee whether it is the intention of the board to collect these overages?

Mr. ROBB: The act of parliament provides that they shall collect them.

Mr. GARDINER: Has the minister any information as to the intentions of the Board of Grain Commissioners?

Mr. ROBB: I understand that the Board of Grain Commissioners are the servants of parliament and they must carry out the act.

Mr. GARDINER: What would happen if they did not carry out the act?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Put them in the tower.

Mr. GARDINER: Is that to say that any public servants working under a certain act passed by this parliament can do as they like?

Mr. ROBB: No, the intention of the government is that they shall carry out the law as it stands.

Mr. GARDINER: Can the minister assure the House that this law will be carried out?

Mr. ROBB: I shall direct this to the attention of my colleague to-morrow morning.

Item agreed to.

Canada Grain Act—further amount required, $350,000.

Mr. STEVENS: This is a large sum; what is it for?

Mr. ROBB: The amount voted in the main estimates was $1,430,000. Of this sum now asked for, $200,000 was to provide for the estimated additional requirements for 1925-26. The amount actually required, however, was only $146,993.33, this sum being the amount of unpaid accounts on hand as of March 31, 1926. The balance, $150,000, is to provide for the reorganization of the grain research laboratory and the establishment of other services in connection with the administration of the act. I think last year we made some commitments to improve the laboratory system.

Mr. EVANS: Is any provision being made to establish the relative value of some of the grades? There is great dissatisfaction throughout the country this year in relation to dried grain, the people feeling that they have not had a square deal as to the setting of the grades, particularly of grain that has come forward in a damp or tough state.

Mr. ROBB: I understand that Dr. Tory, the head of the research commission, is looking very closely into the matter, and the commission are getting along as fast as possible with the equipment for making the necessary chemical tests.

Mr. EVANS: Has he been authorized to do that?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Has anything been done towards grading the grain as the millers do, according to the protein content rather than following the practice adopted before? I have received some letters from the west on this subject. It seems that the millers in every case grade grain according to the protein content, and it is pointed out that this would be a practical way of carrying out the grading if the government, or the grain commission, would take the necessary steps to have it done. Has anything been done, or is anything contemplated, in that direction now?

Mr. ROBB: I think this vote is partly to provide for making an attempt along that line. Of course, as my hon. friend knows, each miller has his staff, and what they do is this: They test the wheat in different localities, and in localities where they discover that there is a larger percentage of gluten they pay a little more money for the wheat.

Mr. COOTE: Before the vote carries may I draw the attention of the minister to the advisability of conferring with this board? Possibly they would need to ask for a somewhat larger estimate next year if they desire to carry out the recommendation I wish to make. I suggest that they should make provision for enough travelling expenses so that the inspectors may be changed from one inspection district to another during the season. The greatest complaint that could be made against our inspection system at the present time is, I think, that there is nothing uniform about it. A sample of wheat which will grade No. 3 at Calgary will grade No. 2 at Winnipeg, and maybe No. 4 at Edmonton, or sometimes the reverse will be the case. At any rate there is nothing uniform about the system; it is quite easy to get two different grades on the same sample of grain. I think the best way to correct that is to have a frequent interchange of inspectors between different offices. The only additional expense entailed would be the travelling and living expenses of the inspectors while they are being temporarily transferred from one office to another. I think we must endeavour to make this system much more uniform than it is now, and it seems to me that what I suggest is one of the best ways of getting that done. I hope the minister will see that the matter is taken up with the board so that if possible they may make provision for having some such interchange of inspectors during the next inspection season.

Item agreed to.

Halifax elevator—additional amount required, $130,000.

Mr. STEVENS: What is that for?

Mr. EVANS: To what extent is this elevator being used? Has there been an increase in the quantity of wheat going through Halifax during the last year or two?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend knows that Halifax is largely a winter port. It was complained, when the elevator was completed, that there were only facilities for loading a vessel at one dock. This additional expenditure is to provide for carriers to three different docks so that there will not be any delay in the loading of vessels when they come to the port.

Mr. COOTE: Does the minister think that this will really help in causing the elevator to be used?

Mr. ROBB: It has been so represented to us by the railway and shipping companies.

Mr. QUINN: Is there any likelihood of this money being spent before March 31, 1927?

Mr. ROBB: I could not say. I think a part of the money has been already spent. If it is not spent we will have to re-vote it so as to continue the work which is under contract.

Mr. CANTLEY: How much grain has gone through the Halifax elevator up to the present time, or up to the end of the year?

Mr. ROBB: I have not that information here.

Item agreed to.

Equipment of elevators—further amount required, $78,150.

Mr. SPENCER: We must have some explanation of this.

Mr. ROBB: The expenditure on the Port Arthur elevator is $29,900. Then there are these other items:

Moose Jaw elevator: alterations to driers, $8,850.

Saskatoon elevator: alterations to driers, $8,850.

Calgary elevator: alterations to driers, $8,850.

Construction and installation of additional drying equipment and boiler house, $75,000.

Construction and equipment of feed-chopping and sacking plant, $30,000.

Item agreed to.

Prince Rupert elevator site, $165,000.

Mr. STEVENS: What is the explanation of this rather extraordinary item?

Mr. ROBB: This amount is required to pay for the site of the Prince Rupert elevator.

Mr. STEVENS: Three years after it was built.

Mr. ROBB: The valuation placed on this site—part of water lot E—is $70 per foot for the 1500-foot frontage, which amounts to $105,000, and in addition to this—60,000 yards of rock filling at $1 per yard was placed on the site, thereby bringing the valuation up to $165,000. The property in question belonged to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company and the Grand Trunk Pacific Development Company, of which two companies the Minister of Railways and Canals is the government receiver. The properties of these companies are being administered by the Canadian National Railways as agents for the government receiver in liquidation. So we had to pay this amount into these companies to keep ourselves straight with the bond-holders of the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. COOTE: What amount of grain went through the Prince Rupert elevator last year?

Mr. ROBB: I am not sure that we have those figures. The elevator now is under lease to the Grain Growers Grain Company.

Mr. COOTE: Who was responsible for the valuation of $70 a foot placed on this site?

Mr. ROBB: The arbitrators, I think. We had arbitrators so as to protect the government, and in order that the bond-holders of the Grand Trunk Pacific and of the Grand Trunk Pacific Development Company should not say that the government had treated them unfairly in the handling of this land. I have not the names of the arbitrators before me.

Mr. SPENCER: I think the minister is in error in the statement he has made. He told the House that the elevator was under lease to the Grain Growers Grain Company. Is it not the Alberta wheat pool?

Mr. ROBB: I think my hon. friend is right. It is the Alberta wheat pool.

Item agreed to.

British and foreign news service—additional amount required, $16,000.

Mr. HANSON: This is the vote to Reuters, is it not?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. HANSON: The minister voluntarily struck out a portion of that item when the main items were under discussion. I should like to inquire in regard to the change of heart.

Mr. ROBB: I am glad my hon. friend brought that up. Objection was raised to the vote by hon. gentlemen opposite when it was brought forward. I said "Very well, if it is not agreed to by the House I will reduce it." I did reduce it, and the next day some of the hon. members on the front benches on the opposite side who had opposed the item came to me and wanted it restored. They recognized that it was a fair way of sending Canadian news around the world, and I think I am restoring it with the consent of both parties, who recognize the value of it for advertising purposes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the minister state more in detail how this service is carried on?

Mr. ROBB: The statement I have before me is very lengthy. Perhaps I can give it to my hon. friend in brief form, because I made the contract with them some years ago when we subsidized Reuters. They gather the news themselves through their representatives in Canada. That news is cabled to the head office. It is distributed sometimes by cable and sometimes by mail service to all parts of the world on general items affecting Canada, so that we feel that it gives Canada publicity in all countries where Reuters have agencies.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: They have entire discretion?

Mr. ROBB: Oh, yes.

Item agreed to.

Adjustment of war claims—Secretary of State —further amount required, $8,672.18.

Mr. STEVENS: While we are on that vote will the minister tell me when we may expect some definite report about the adjustment of these war claims.

Mr. RINFRET: I think I may confidently tell the committee we may have a report next week. I will not pledge myself that it will be a complete report, but there will be some progress made.

Mr. STEVENS: Will that report show claims approved for payment and will payment be made within a reasonable time?

Mr. RINFRET: The House will have to determine what way payment is made, if any payment is made at all. But the commissioner will make his report on the great number of cases before him.

Mr. HANSON: Is this item to pay the salary of the commissioner?

Mr. RINFRET: Yes, and travelling expenses.

Mr. HANSON: How much has it cost the country to date under the various commissioners who have been in charge of the commission? I know there have been three.

Mr. LAPOINTE: They are all New Brunswick men.

Mr. HANSON: Yes, and they worked very well; I am not complaining about that. But the point is, why should not the cost of the adjustment of the claims be borne out of the money in the hands of the custodians? Why should the country be put to this expense?

Mr. RINFRET: There might be a balance when everything is adjusted that will go back to the treasury, and that will meet my hon. friend's demands.

Mr. CLARK: Will the report show the names of the individual claimants whose claims have been adjusted?

Mr. RINFRET: I expect so, yes.

Item agreed to.

Mulgrave and Canso—steam service between —additional amount required, $10,000.

Mr. HANSON: How much are they getting now?

Mr. ROBB: The amount now is $13,500.

Mr. HANSON: And this will make $23,500.

Mr. ROBB: Hugh Cann & Son of Yarmouth had the contract for this service and provided a daily service, except Sundays, between Mulgrave and Canso, and for some years Hugh Cann & Sons Limited have received a sum of $13,500 per annum for the service. Reports however were made to the effect that in order to develop the fish business at Canso it was necessary to obtain a larger vote, and also to reduce the charge from the old rate of twenty cents per hundred pounds to six cents per hundred pounds. Arrangements were then made with the Lovat Steamship company for a three months' period at $6,000 per month. The Hugh Cann service was only a seasonal service. This is a winter service.

Item agreed to.

St. John and St. Andrews, calling at intermediate points, steam service between—additional amount required, $1,000.

Mr. HANSON: Why is the minister increasing this subvention? This is only a weekly service, is it not, and they have been getting the regular subsidy right along.

Mr. ROBB: The contract for this service has been held by the Maritime Steamship Company of Black Harbour, Nova Scotia, since 1909. The subsidy was $4,000 per annum up to March 31, 1924, when it was reduced to $3,000, and it has remained at $3,000 per annum up to the present time. The same amount was provided in the main estimates for 1926-27. The contractors represent, however, that their expenses on this service are so heavy that it is impossible for them to continue running unless their old subsidy of $4,000 per annum is restored. The company's financial statement for the year ending March 31, 1926, has been received. I do not know whether it is fair to put this on the record or not—

Mr. HANSON: I would not ask that. I will take the minister's word.

Mr. ROBB: Their request is quite justified according to the statement.

Mr. SHORT: Now that we are increasing many of the steamship subsidies, can the minister give me any reason why the subsidy granted to the steamship line running between Bridgetown and St. John was withdrawn? That is the only subsidy of the whole lot, I believe, that has not been renewed. Is there any good reason why this particular subsidy should have been dropped from the list altogether? Will the minister give me an assurance that it will be renewed?

Mr. ROBB: I am quite willing to do my hon. friend this service, to say that if a vote is not in for that particular line, it is not his fault, because last year he represented in season and out of season that such a vote should go into the estimates. It was put in the estimates by the department, but when it came before the Treasury board it was dropped, because, I suppose, my hon. friend had not convinced us that it was necessary. I repeat, however, that if it is not in, it is not the fault of my hon. friend.

Mr. SHORT: That is not a very satisfactory answer. I would like to know whether or not it will be in next year. This service has been performed for the last eleven years, but for some reason unknown to me, and which I cannot find out, the subsidy was dropped.

Mr. ROBB: I shall direct the observations of my hon. friend to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He will have to wrestle with it this year.

Item agreed to.

Ottawa parliament building—to improve acoustics of House of Commons, $4,000.

Mr. CANTLEY: What has been done in that connection?

Mr. ROBB: This vote is to improve the acoustics of this building.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not notice $4,000 worth of improvement.

Mr. EVANS: I am afraid the acoustics have not been improved very much, because I have not been able to hear yet, Mr. Chairman, what item you are reading.

The CHAIRMAN: It is item 419, on page 4 of the supplementary estimates for 1926-1927—"to improve the acoustics of House of Commons, $4,000."

Mr. GUTHRIE: What is proposed?

Mr. ROBB: The best acoustical expert available in the United States was called in. He has examined this chamber and has reported that there is not very much to be done; so while the item is here to be voted, it is questionable whether we shall spend the money. I will read the report of this expert for the information of hon. gentlemen:

As a result of the tests, I feel sure that the House chamber is unusual in the clarity with which speech of very moderate volume can be heard and understood in it. When the House is not in session an ordinary conversational tone is loud enough to be audible if one listens, and if one is not disturbed by extraneous sounds. It would hardly be wise, however, to count on so small a volume of sound being satisfactory when the House is in session, yet it was obvious when I was there that many of the members did not raise their voices materially above the ordinary conversational level in addressing the House. It may be an effect of the extraordinarily good acoustical qualities of the room that the members may sometimes think a low tone is sufficient, but when the press representatives and the public in the galleries are to hear, it seems to be absolutely necessary that the speaker should use as loud a tone as though he were in any other hall addressing an equal number of persons.

On your suggestion I have also considered the question of supplying the House chamber with microphones and loud speakers. On the whole my recommendation is decidedly adverse. It is evident that the formal speeches in the House are clearly audible to the members, the Speaker, the press, and a good proportion of the public. Interjected remarks, quick questions and answers, and the like, which seem to be not infrequent in the House procedure, are sometimes lost, but they could not be amplified by any practical arrangement of microphones. Each member would have to have one on his own desk and would have to keep it disconnected when rustling papers or making other noises, and turn it on before making remarks.

Mr. STEVENS: That is worth $4,000 in itself.

Mr. RENNIE: Would it not be possible to get someone residing in Canada to make a report of this kind, instead of going to the United States to get someone to tell us what we ought to do?

Mr. ROBB: The chief engineer of the Johns-Manville Company, a Canadian, was associated with this gentleman.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Did that report cost $4,000?

Mr. ROBB: No. We put that amount in, expecting to do something with it, but it is questionable whether it will be needed.

Mr. CLARK: How much did this report cost?

Mr. ROBB: We paid just the travelling expenses of this expert and—

Mr. CLARK: No fee?

Mr. ROBB: A fee of about $100.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and rivers—Quebec harbour —Champlain dock—further amount required	$ 84,400
Port Arthur and Fort William—harbour improvements — further amount required	35,000
Sorel—harbour improvements	100,000

Mr. STEVENS: What are the needs calling for these trivial amounts to be put in the supplementaries?

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, is the Champlain dock under the control of the harbour board?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Oh no; the Department of Public Works.

Item agreed to.

Public Buildings, Nova Scotia—Halifax—H.M. gun wharf—clothing store—revote, $8,000	$ 15,000
Halifax—repairs to buildings and wharfs at R.C.N. barracks and H.M.C. dockyard—revote, $3,700	25,340
Mahone Bay—public building	10,000

Mr. ERNST: Has any money been expended on Mahone Bay to date? If not will any portion of this vote be expended before March 31?

Mr. ROBB: Nothing has been spent there yet.

Mr. ERNST: Will anything be spent before March 31?

Mr. ROBB: It is not likely.

Mr. ERNST: Is the minister able to give any assurance that the item will be reinstated in the main estimates for 1927-28?

Mr. ROBB: I would not care to commit myself as to that.

Mr. ERNST: I ask because this is something like the Guysborough railway—it has been promised to the people of Mahone Bay for a good many years.

Item agreed to.

Prince Edward Island—Kensington—public building, $12,000.

Mr. HANSON: Has this money been spent?

Mr. ROBB: No. That is another new building.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): For what purpose?

Mr. ROBB: A post office.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): What is the size of the place?

Mr. ROBB: The population in 1921 was 556, and it was the same in 1926. Kensington is 39 miles from Charlottetown and 9 miles from Summerside. It contains three hotels, four churches, one bank, one butter and cheese factory and one sash and door factory. Of course the post office serves a large surrounding country.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): What is the revenue from this office?

Mr. ROBB: About $3,000.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): What are the reasons why Kensington with a population of 500 and a postal revenue of about $3,000 should have $12,000 expended for a post office, when other places—for instance, Sydenham in the county of Frontenac—have waited a long time in order to get cold justice, although they have much larger populations and greater postal revenues? What particular constituency is Kensington in, and just what peculiar pull has the member got? I should like to get a little information on this in order that by copying the same sort of manoeuvre

I might secure something for my riding. I am perfectly frank; will the minister be equally frank in telling me what justification there is for spending $12,000 for a post office in a little place of 500 inhabitants, while other places from the Atlantic to the Pacific with two or three times that population are ignored? The minister says, you have to take into consideration the surrounding country. Well, invariably there is country surrounding every town and village, and Kensington with a population of 500 is not the only place so surrounded. I should like to shake hands with the member for the constituency in which Kensington is situated. What particular pull has he got on this government to be able to draw $12,000 out of the treasury for a post office in a little village of 500 population, while other parts of the country have never had a dollar spent on them since confederation and have to wait for favours until they smile in such a way as to suit hon. gentlemen opposite?

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, I sympathize with the viewpoint of my hon. friend from Frontenac. I represent a constituency that has received no public buildings since confederation—a very good constituency too.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): But the difference between my hon. friend and myself is that while his constituency may be in the same position as mine in not getting anything for public buildings, yet look at what it is getting through the salary that its member is pulling down?

Mr. ROBB: Would you not like to do that?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Yes, in three or four years we may change places, and then my turn will come. But that does not answer my question. Seriously, what are the grounds to justify $12,000 being spent at this particular spot in these very hard times? —because the minister always puts up that plea, lack of money.

An hon. MEMBER: The building is needed.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): No, it cannot be from the standpoint of need, because if that place needs a post office, there are other places of larger population and providing much more postal revenue that have waited a longer time to get justice. I appreciate the fact that during the period of the war lots of public works had to be left in abeyance, but now the time is come when this or any government that may be in power ought to consider seriously the fact that many places throughout the country have waited during those years of the war and do deserve some consideration for the length of time that they have waited. I want to see fair play all round. Will the minister answer my question: What are the reasons why Kensington is treated in this favourable manner while other places with stronger claims are passed by?

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend from Frontenac said he would like to shake hands with the member who represents the county in which Kensington is to be found. Well, if he will just come across the floor and up this aisle I shall be glad to shake with him. This vote is being considered by the House because, although the population of this little town may not be quite sufficient to meet the requirements for a public building, still what it lacks in quantity is made up in quality, and, as the Minister of Finance has said, it is the centre of a very large surrounding country and a considerable number of rural routes are served from the local post office. Moreover, there is a strong demand from the whole community for a public building. At present there is no suitable building there sufficiently large and heated for a post office; it is not in the centre of the town nor does it fill the requirements, although it is well kept and has served the community for a long time. We ask, not perhaps for a $12,000 building, but for a building which will give the town and country better accommodation than they have to-day. My hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) is a genial, good-natured fellow who is always willing to support anything that is fair and just, and I am surprised that he should get up now and single out this one small item for the little province of Prince Edward Island and attack it in the way he has done. I appeal to the hon. gentleman to support me in my request for improved accommodation for that little town down there and I promise him that when he comes forward with a similar request I will back him up and do my best to see that his constituency gets what it deserves.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): It would not do for me not to express my appreciation of the hon. gentleman's promise. I sincerely appreciate it, coming as it does from a member who has been as successful as he has been in securing what he wanted for his own constituency. He says that the people there do not want a $12,000 building. Well, I feel I have a strong ally in him and I am prepared to shake hands with the hon. member on this matter and go arm in arm with him to the Minister of Finance with a request for half or less than half that appropriation for my constituency. I can understand why this vote is going through; I saw the reason the moment the hon. gentleman rose to his feet. You have only to take one look at him, a fine upstanding fellow, to realize how he put it over the Minister of Finance. There of course he has an advantage which I cannot claim: I have not the same engaging features nor have I the same appeal in the matter of physique. But notwithstanding these handicaps I am ready to go with the hon. gentleman and, on the strength of his promise, appeal to the Minister. I am sure my constituency would benefit one hundred per cent, and then somewhat. The hon. member says his people do not expect the whole $12,000. Why then is $12,000 being voted? On that point I want to make this observation in all seriousness. I believe that millions of dollars have been wasted in this country in putting up public buildings here and there because of the pull which this or that particular member had on the government. Because of that pull he was able to obtain an expenditure in his locality fifty or seventy-five per cent over and above what was really needed. If a man had the necessary influence he could get a building costing $50,000 when one of $20,000 would have been more in keeping with the other buildings in his district. I do not wonder that the hon. member says they do not expect the whole of $12,000; I should not think they would in a village of 500. In my constituency there is a larger village than that whose claim is stronger, and I appeal to the minister to cut that $12,000 in two and allot half of it to Kensington to provide the kind of building they ought to have there, and give the other half to Frontenac. Both places would then have buildings in keeping with their importance.

Mr. ROBB: What do you say to cutting them both out?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): No; I do not say that. I want my hon. friend who is interested in this vote to understand that I am not in any way knocking the item. I do not want him to labour under any such impression. I simply say that $12,000 is more than is required for such a building as would be suitable to a village with a population of 500. For some reason or other, because of some magnetism by which fortunately his constituency benefits, a member is able to get twice as much spent as is necessary, while the money ought to be distributed around so that other places which for many years have been waiting for some consideration might get something.

Mr. ADSHEAD: The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) suggests that some one probably had some pull to get a post office somewhere in Prince Edward Island. May I remind that hon. gentleman that somebody must have had a pull when the government of which he was a supporter was in power to have a post office in Calgary, not put up but pulled down. The post office there was pulled down and we have had to rent a building. I would suggest to the Minister of Public Works that a building be erected in my constituency in the near future to take the place of the one pulled down in 1911.

Item agreed to.

Quebec—Baie St. Paul—site for public building, $4,000.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): What is that for?

Mr. ROBB: It is intended for the purchase of a site for a public building in Baie St. Paul. The estimated cost of the building is $27,000. We propose at present to purchase only the site.

Mr. ARTHURS: What is the population?

Mr. ROBB: 2,600.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): What is the building for?

Mr. ROBB: A post office.

Item agreed to.

Chicoutimi public building—addition, $20,000.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): What is that for?

Mr. ROBB: This is for a two-storey stone addition to the public building at Chicoutimi. It is an extension to provide for increased accommodation for the postal and customs services. There has been a very large development up there.

Item agreed to.

Drummondville—public building, addition, $13,000.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Is this another post office?

Mr. ROBB: No, this is a one storey addition at Drummondville, where there has also been a large development, with new factories going up.

Item agreed to.

Gaspe—purchase of building for postal purposes, etc., $20,000.

Mr. ROBB: That is a rented building which it is proposed to purchase; it would be cheaper to own than to rent. The present rental is $700 per annum, of which $175 is paid by the Post Office department and $525 by the Department of Public Works.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac) : Is this a post office?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, and it is for the customs as well.

Mr. HANSON: What is the assessed value of the property for which it is proposed to pay $20,000?

Mr. ROBB: Mr. John Baker of Gaspé was asked to submit a valuation in March, 1926, and he valued it at $20,000 for the building and $5,000 for the land.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Where is that situated in Gaspé?

Mr. ROBB: At the harbour.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): What is the size of the place?

Mr. ROBB: The total postal revenue for 1924-25 was $3,858.69.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Would the minister give us some idea of the character of this building; is it brick, or frame, or log?

Mr. ROBB: It is a brick building, apparently.

Mr. DUNNING: Here is a picture of it; it is a very fine building.

Mr. GARDINER: Did the minister state that the income of this post office was between $3,000 and $4,000 a year?

Mr. ROBB: The gross revenue was $3,858.69.

Mr. GARDINER: Is this building used for any other purposes?

Mr. ROBB: It is used for customs and telegraph purposes.

Mr. GARDINER: What proportion of this building will be taken up by the postal service?

Mr. ROBB: The ground floor, and the next floor is the customs.

Mr. ERNST: Did I understand the minister to say that the total rental to-day was $700 per annum?

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. ROBB: This lease must have been made just prior to the government going out in 1921, because it is dated December 21, 1921.

Mr. ERNST: I ask because I was unable to understand the statement of the minister that it would be cheaper to buy than to rent. At five per cent the interest on $20,000 would be approximately $1,000.

Mr. ROBB: They require larger accommodation.

Mr. DUNNING: The whole building is not now rented.

Item agreed to.

Grosse Isle quarantine station—shelter shed, $22,000.

Mr. QUINN: Explain.

Mr. ROBB: This is for increased accommodation at the quarantine station, which, as my hon. friend understands, serves as a quarantine station for all vessels coming up the St. Lawrence.

Mr. QUINN: I notice in the estimates for Nova Scotia there is a vote of $2,500 for the quarantine station at Halifax, for repairs and improvements. In comparison, $22,000 for a shelter shed at Grosse Isle appears to be a very large amount, because the quarantine station at Halifax is used six months a year, the same as the station at Grosse Isle.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend will realize that at Halifax it was a repair but this is a new shed. My friend knows there is greater immigration during the summer months than during the winter months. The officers of the Department of Health advise what is required and we are doing this on the recommendation of the medical advisers of the department.

Item agreed to.

Maisonneuve — public building — further amount required, $75,000.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I think we should have a little explanation here.

Mr. ROBB: This building which we are purchasing for a postal station is the old Maisonneuve city hall. Maisonneuve is one of the growing parts of Montreal and is a large manufacturing centre. As my friend will recall, all these suburban parts have been taken into the city, and this building is now available.

Mr. QUINN: Who represents that constituency?

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Robitaille.

Item agreed to.

Montreal—postal station in Outremont division, $50,000.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Is this a new building or an addition?

Mr. ROBB: This amount is required for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building there. No site has yet been decided upon. As my hon. friends know, Outremont is a large, growing part of Montreal, a residential centre, and the revenue there was over $23,000.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Does this cover the purchase of the site and the erection of the building?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Has the minister any idea of how much the site will be?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Item agreed to.

Montreal postal station site—to cancel agreement, $5,000.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the explanation for this item?

Mr. ROBB: This was a trades union organization which undertook to buy some government property. They made a deposit on account, but owing to the war they got into financial difficulties and we are now paying back the amount of their deposit and keeping the property.

Item agreed to.

St. Jerome public building—alterations, etc., $13,000.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): When an item refers to a public building and the character of the building is not specified, are we to assume that it is always a post office?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): If we know that it will save time and also questions.

Mr. ROBB: Generally speaking it is a post office that is referred to, but it may be a customs building, or a customs and post office building combined.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): What is the nature of the building here?

Mr. ROBB: It is a combined post office and customs building.

Item agreed to.

St. Jacques l'Achigan—public building—further amount required, $5,000.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): How much has already been spent there?

Mr. ROBB: This amount of $5,000 is required in addition to the sum of $16,000 in the main estimates, for the construction of a public building in the town of St. Jacques, and also for the installation of the necessary fittings, lock-boxes, sidewalks and grading. The building is being erected under contract at a contract price of $15,450 on a site situated at the corner of Main street and the road leading to the factory. It is required for postal purposes, and so on.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The amount will be about $21,000, altogether if I heard correctly.

Mr. ROBB: The probable cost will be about $24,000.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): What is the population?

Mr. ROBB: The population of the village is given as 1,332 and of the parish as 1,714. The postal revenue in 1924-25 was $2,477.05.

Item agreed to.

Westmount—armoury, $6,687.85.

Mr. ROBB: That is only a payment under contract.

Mr. GARDINER: This is not a new building?

Mr. ROBB: No. The contract was entered into some years ago and we are making annual payments. We shall own the building at the end of the prescribed period.

Item agreed to.

Ontario: Brant hotel, Burlington—to provide for a payment of outstanding accounts incurred by expropriation proceedings, $14,000.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): What is this for?

Mr. ROBB: The building was formerly a military hospital. This is to provide for the payment of accounts in connection with expropriation proceedings.

Mr. RENNIE: I believe this building is vacant now, what use will be made of it in the future? The former inmates have gone to Christie street hospital. What does the government propose to do with this building in order to derive some revenue from it?

Mr. ROBB: It was put up for tender and no person tendered for it. If my hon. friend desires to purchase the property he might make a deal with the Department of Public Works.

Item agreed to.

Durham—public buildings, $20,000.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): What is the population of Durham, and what revenue is derived from this office?

Mr. ROBB: The population numbers 1,640, but there is quite a thriving district surrounding it. The postal revenue is $6,308.22

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): My reason for asking the question is that in the town of Hespeler, Waterloo county, the population is approximately 3,000 and the post office is in a rented building. The government has owned a site for some ten years and an amount for constructing a public building has been placed in the estimates for three or four years in succession and yet nothing has been done. I should like to know what pull Durham has which enables it to get a vote of $20,000 for a public building when we cannot get anything for the town of Hespeler.

Mr. ROBB: What is the postal revenue in the town of Hespeler?

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): It is a manufacturing town with a population of 3,000.

Mr. ROBB: I will have the matter looked into.

Item agreed to.

London—tractor for postal purposes, $4,500.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): What kind of a tractor is that?

Mr. ROBB: An electric tractor for carrying the mail around.

Item agreed to.

Ottawa—public buildings—paving roadways, $25,500.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): On what basis are these appropriations made for the construction of sidewalks?

Mr. DUNNING: They are for sidewalks around the public buildings.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Simply on the grounds of the public buildings?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): That is to say the government owns the property.

Mr. ROBB: We have to make provision for local improvements on streets on which the government own property.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Only there?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Robb.]

Rockland—public building, $25,000.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): What kind of building is that?

Mr. ROBB: A post office and customs building.

Mr. ARTHURS: What is the population?

Mr. ROBB: The revenue is $2,745.84. Rockland is a town on the Ottawa river, twenty-two miles east of Ottawa, connecting with the Canadian National railways. The population is 3,354 and there are some very large mills down there.

Mr. GARDINER: The minister said the postal revenue was a little over $2,000?

Mr. DUNNING: The amount he gave was $2,745.84.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the revenue from other departments there?

Mr. ROBB: I have not got that here.

Mr. GARDINER: Was the expenditure of this amount justified in a small place of that description with such a small revenue? It seems to me the expenditure for public buildings has no relation to the income. I think the government should take that point into consideration when advancing sums of money for public buildings. This country cannot afford to spend extraordinary sums of money in places where the income is very small. On the other hand, there are places where the income is substantial, and the building appropriation is not sufficient. It does not seem to me that the matter has been given the full consideration which should be given to it, and I believe the time has arrived when a new policy should be evolved in dealing with public buildings of this description.

Mr. ARTHURS: I have in my district a town without public buildings, and even a constituency without a public building. We have in the town I represent an annual average income of about half a million of customs for many years, a postal revenue of many thousands, and a population much greater than any of those cited here to-night, and yet no consideration is given to such cases. I think some policy should be laid down whereby the revenue and the needs of the various peoples should be considered, rather than political exigencies.

Item agreed to.

Sarnia—purchase of building for armoury purposes, $24,000.

Mr. HANSON: Is this a new expenditure? Is the government embarking on a new policy of building armouries?

Mr. DUNNING: Not building—buying them.

Mr. ROBB: This is the boys' brigade hall.

Mr. ARTHURS: Has it the approbation of the member for Southeast Grey?

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): Has there been any appraisement made of that hall at Sarnia?

Mr. ROBB: It has been appraised at $30,000 and the land at $9,000, making a total of $39,000.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I understand the building was to be specially used for training cadets and boys.

Mr. DUNNING: It is the boys' brigade hall.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Are we to understand that it is to be used for the purpose of installing warlike instincts into the boys?

Mr. ROBB: No, to get them away from it.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): What does the minister want it for?

Mr. ROBB: For the ordinary reasons.

Item agreed to.

Toronto Postal Station "A"—mechanical equipment—further amount required, $50,000.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): This seems rather a large amount for so insignificant a place as Toronto.

Item agreed to.

Winnipeg—Fort Osborne barracks—new boilers, $10,000.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): What boilers were specified in that contract?

Mr. ROBB: I do not know that I have the specifications—high pressure boilers, I could not tell you whose boilers.

Mr. EDWARDS (Waterloo): I do not want the particular make or type, but it was a high pressure boiler?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Wainwright—public building, $15,000.

Mr. GARDINER: What is this building at Wainwright for? Is it not in Alberta?

Mr. ROBB: This is for the erection of a public building on the corner of Main street and Third avenue, 52 feet 6 inches by 33 feet, on concrete foundations.

Mr. GARDINER: For postal purposes?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the revenue at that point?

Mr. DUNNING: The revenue is $6,313.

Item agreed to.

Camrose—public building, $15,000.

Mr. GARDINER: What is it for?

Mr. DUNNING: Postal and customs.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the revenue of the postal department there?

Mr. DUNNING: $14,000.

Mr. GARDINER: Is the minister satisfied that this building is adequate when the revenue derived from that point is taken into consideration?

Mr. ROBB: Does my hon. friend recommend any larger amount?

Mr. GARDINER: I am asking why the difference, when we take into consideration the total amount of revenue derived from these other post offices and the amount that is being voted for post office buildings at these points.

Mr. DUNNING: The population in this case is only 1,800.

Mr. GARDINER: But the revenue, I think, is the main thing. Here is a building costing $15,000, when the revenue from that point is over $14,000. We have just passed an item for a $25,000 public building at Rockland, I believe, where the revenue was only $2,700. That merely emphasizes what I stated before, that no consideration seems to be given to the amount of revenue being derived from these post offices.

Mr. DUNNING: The estimated cost of this particular building is $52,000. This vote is only a beginning.

Mr. LUCAS: The last postal return shows the revenue from the Camrose post office to be $16,500. There is also a custom house there with a revenue of over $50,000, and I might add that there is a large surrounding country to be served. It is recognized, I think, that the Camrose district is one of the premier districts of the province of Alberta. It is also recognized by the postal authorities that Camrose is due for this expenditure on a public building, and I thank the government for including it in the estimates.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): I always thought Wainwright was in Alberta, Mr. Chairman, and I would ask that the item for a public building for Wainwright be charged up to Alberta and not to Saskatchewan.

Item agreed to.

Vancouver—Winch building—taxes, $8,901.87.

Mr. GARDINER: What are these taxes for?

Mr. ROBB: These were the taxes that had accrued from the time we took over the property up to the end of the taxable year. That was the bargain we had with them.

Mr. GARDINER: The property is not taxable now?

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. DUNNING: Only for local improvements.

Item agreed to.

Experimental farms—new buildings, $74,000.

Mr. GARDINER: Where are these new buildings located?

Mr. DUNNING: This item covers practically every one of the farms. I will read the list if my hon. friend desires.

Mr. GARDINER: If it is a long list I do not want it read.

Mr. DUNNING: It is a long list, including nearly every farm. Summarized, the amount is $65,910 for the Central experimental farm, Ottawa, and $95,900 for the branch farms.

Item agreed to.

Parrsboro—harbour improvements—further amount required, $6,500.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): Would the minister explain this item?

Mr. ROBB: This is for the completion of the contract.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): Is this in addition to the contract price?

Mr. DUNNING: The amount of $6,500 is required for the following purposes:

(1) To pay balance due Minas Basin Dredging Co., on dredging contract..		$3,434 38
(2) In memo. of April 7, 1926, the chief engineer states that an amount of $2,000 is required to improve the approach to the new wharf and also to improve the channel and basin. The estimated cost of this work is as follows:—
1,050 cu. yds. scow measurement, mud, clay and gravel at $1.50..	$1,575 00
425 cu. yds. overcast at $1.00..	425 00
		2,000 00
(3) Providing additional guard to public wharf under contract with Mr. Thos. P. Charleson..		413 00
(4) Replacement of beach protection		500 00
Contingencies..		152 62
Total..		$6,500 00

Item agreed to.

Matane—in full and final settlement of the claim of H. Dussault & Co. in connection with their contract for dredging in 1923-1924, $19,025.60.

Mr. GARDINER: Would the minister explain this item?

Mr. ROBB: This amount of $19,025.60 is required to pay Horace Dussault & Company in settlement of their claim for extra compensation due to the difficult and unforeseen nature of materials encountered when dredging under their contract in 1923-1924. The company's claim was for $33,000, but the district engineer has recommended a payment of $19,025.60. The company have not yet accepted that, but we are putting that amount in the estimates, and we will pay it to them subject to their giving the government a clearance in full settlement of their claim.

Mr. GARDINER: Is there any provision in contracts of this character that where the company comes up against unforeseen difficult conditions, they shall be paid a higher rate than set out in the contract?

Mr. ROBB: It is purely a matter of equity in dealing with these government contracts. I am sure if my hon. friend had a contractor doing work for him, and he considered the contractor had a fair claim, he would deal with him equitably.

Mr. GARDINER: Then there is no provision made in a contract of this description in case difficult conditions are met with?

Mr. DUNNING: It often turns out that the physical conditions are different from what was expected when the contract was let. That is the chief trouble in my department. The borings disclose certain physical conditions, but when the work is started the actual conditions are found to be different. That is usually the basis of claims of this sort. They are very difficult to adjust, and considerations of equity must rule.

Wabigoon—wharf	1,200

Mr. GOTT: What is the nature of the work involving an expenditure of $4,000 at Kingsville, and of $1,100 at Leamington?

Mr. DUNNING: At Kingsville: to repair decking and stringers on the east pier, 10,000 feet board measure, and to place 24 feet of sheet piling on a length of 200 feet of the west pier. At Leamington: repairs to decking, stringers and caps, involving replacing 8,000 feet board measure timber and the renewing of the sheet piling.

Mr. GOTT: Is there any dredging in connection with that?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. GOTT: How is the dredging done, by contract or by the government?

Mr. DUNNING: Whichever is most advantageous for the work in hand.

Mr. GOTT: How is it generally done?

Mr. DUNNING: Everywhere according to the circumstances.

Mr. GOTT: Have you any record of how the last contract was done there?

Mr. DUNNING: We cannot remember.

Mr. COOTE: Where is the $100,000 to be expended on the Fraser river?

Mr. ROBB: On the Fraser river.

Mr. COOTE: The Fraser river is possibly 1,000 miles long. Possibly the minister can tell us on what part of the river the money is to be expended.

Mr. DUNNING: From New Westminster to the mouth of the river.

Mr. COOTE: Does the government intend to dredge the Fraser river to a sufficient depth so that New Westminster may safely be used as a grain port?

Mr. DUNNING: That is the intention.

Mr. LADNER: Does that apply equally to the north arm of the Fraser river where a large proportion of the shipping is done?

Mr. DUNNING: Just the main river at present.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—maintenance and operation of water storage dams on Ottawa river and tributaries, surveys in connection therewith, and settlement of land damages—further amount required	$57,000
National monument on Connaught place—further amount required	25,000
Compassionate allowance to Phidolin Synott father of Maxime Synott who was drowned while on duty at Summerside, P.E.I., on September 30, 1924	2,500
	$84,500

Mr. GARDINER: Will the minister explain the item of $57,000?

Mr. ROBB: That is for the maintenance of the storage dams on the Ottawa river to maintain the level of the waters during dry seasons.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Can the minister give us some information in regard to the next item of $25,000, further amount required for the national monument on Connaught Place: when the work will be started, when it is estimated it may be completed, and how much it will cost?

Mr. DUNNING: The contract was let as a result of a world competition. The winner is now engaged on the monument in his studio at Farnborough, just out of London. The total cost will be in the neighbourhood of $100,000. I am informed that it will take three years to complete the work.

Mr. GUTHRIE: When will the work of erection be started in Ottawa?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might say to my hon. friend that I had occasion to speak with the architect and the sculptor. The work is being executed by a family of the name of March whose members, five in number I think, have won many prizes in art competitions. They intimate that it will take three years before this monument can be completed, and that no work on Connaught Place can be done until the monument is ready to be put in place. In the meantime progress estimates have to be passed. Last summer the architects informed the government that the original sketch of the monument contemplated the figures being life size, but as it was to be placed in the open air they very strongly advised that the figures should be made heroic size instead. To do that meant a very considerable increase in the original cost but the government felt, after taking advice from expert sources, that it would be well to have the figures made heroic size, and that we could count on parliament voting the additional amount required to have the monument all that could be desired. This will probably occasion more in the way of cost and will perhaps take longer in execution.

Item agreed to.

To cover unprovided items, 1924-25, as per Auditor General's report, part A, page 2, 1924-25, $1,995,649.79.

Mr. ROBB: Before six o'clock I was pointing out to my hon. friend (Mr. Stevens) that this is the usual item that comes up every year. I have a memorandum of the vote each year covering a period of years. This year the items included—I will not give the odd figures—are: Customs and excise, $273,000; pensions $716,000; post office $716,000; soldiers' civil re-establishment $234,000. In the following years the following amounts were voted as "unprovided items":

1918-19	$1,071,403.34
1919-20	1,250,303.73
1920-21	544,009.25
1921-22	2,055,030.86
1922-23	368,783.39
1923-24	130,442.08

Mr. GUTHRIE: Why are these amounts not put in the main estimates or in the supplementary estimates? I confess I do not quite understand the system, although evidently it has prevailed for some time. Why should these different amounts be required each year to balance accounts?

Mr. ROBB: I am not quite sure that I am right about this, but I understand that they have drawn upon vote No. 1 to pay for vote No. 3, and so forth, and this is to legalize the procedure. There are overdrafts on the different departments.

Mr. GUTHRIE: In other words, they spend more money than parliament authorizes.

Mr. ROBB: Under a certain vote, but the total vote is there.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We are voting a lump sum to balance the account and that represents an amount of money not voted by parliament but which has been spent.

Mr. ROBB: I do not understand it that way, but I shall have that point carefully looked into.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is a matter of curiosity on my part, but it is a matter of consequence. We are asked to vote $1,995,000 odd which is not voted in the main estimates or in the supplementary estimates; it is money which has not been voted by parliament. Is not that correct? We are now asked to ratify the expenditure by voting it.

Sir EUGENE FISET: No, we are simply using a balance in respect of certain items to meet overdrafts in respect of others.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It does not seem to me that we are using a balance; we are authorizing an additional expenditure.

Sir EUGENE FISET. This practice was followed during your regime.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have said that it has prevailed a long time.

Mr. ROBB: There is no new expenditure involved; we are merely asking for parliamentary sanction for an overdraft.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is for an over-expenditure.

WAYS AND MEANS

SUPPLY BILL

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance), moved that the House go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. ROBB moved:

Resolved that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1926, the sum of $2,727,376.35 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. ROBB moved:

Resolved that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1927, the sum of $7,057,741.85 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolutions reported and concurred in. Mr. Robb thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 46, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the fiscal years ending respectively March 31, 1926, and March 31, 1927.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first and second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

RURAL POSTMASTERS—LOSS OF REVENUE

Mr. NEILL:

1. Has the government obtained any data showing the loss of revenue at rural post offices due to the reduction of postage on letters from three cents to two cents, and if so, will such data be laid on the table of the House?

2. Will the government give favourable consideration to an increase of the percentage allowance to rural postmasters to replace the loss of revenue to them caused by the reduction in postal rates, and will consideration be given to the fact that the commission to rural postmasters has not been increased to meet the higher cost of living since 1914?

Hon. Mr. VENIOT:

1. Yes, but incomplete until close of complete year from 1st July, 1926.

2. The matter is receiving consideration from both points of view.

SPRAY LAKES WATER POWER

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

1. What steps, if any, have been taken by the government to deal with the Spray lakes power site in the Banff national park since the subject was last discussed in parliament?

2. Before any such rights are granted within any national park, will the minister submit the whole subject to parliament for discussion and consideration?

3. Has an editorial published in the Winnipeg Free Press of November 24, 1926, and entitled "A Projected Raid on the national Parks" been brought to the attention of the government? If not, will the responsible minister of the government condescend to give consideration to the sentiments contained in the said editorial before he alienates any rights or powers within any national park?

4. Will the government introduce at this session legislation defining and limiting the power of government by order in council to alienate any rights or extend any privileges within national parks?

Hon. Mr. STEWART: The government has been giving serious consideration to the many and varied representations made concerning the application to develop water power storage at Spray lakes in Rocky Mountains Park, and will introduce at the present session an amendment to the Dominion Forest Reserves and Parks Act, which will enable discussion of the Spray lakes application in the House of Commons. In the meantime no decision will be made on the application.

WEST INDIES TRADE AGREEMENT—STEAMSHIP SERVICES

Mr. CAHAN:

1. What has been done towards the fulfilment of the terms of the West India agreement with respect to the West India steamship services?

2. What is the present position of the eastern and western services respectively?

3. Is the regular eastern service with Barbados, Trinidad, Demerara and the smaller islands of the eastern group now being maintained, and to what extent?

4. What difficulties, if any, prevent an immediate acceptance of tenders for carrying out the proposed improved steamship service with the eastern group?

5. Is it the intention of the government forthwith to invite new tenders for carrying out the steamship service with the western group on terms which will comply with the stipulations of the West India agreement, or otherwise?

6. Is it the intention of the government to procure modifications of the stipulations of the West India agreement regarding passenger service, speed of steamships, or otherwise, for carrying out the proposed new steamship service with the western group?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1. The Canadian government has decided to entrust the fulfilment of that part of the agreement, providing for steamship services to the Canadian National Railways management. The services on both eastern and western routes will be put into operation as nearly as possible within the time stipulated in the trade agreement.

2. On the eastern route the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company are maintaining a monthly service with the steamers "Chaleur" and "Chignecto", calling at all the ports formerly called at by the subsidized service and in addition calling at the island of Nevis, both north and south bound, for which they are receiving the same subsidy as before, namely, $13,102.56 per round trip. This service will be continued until the end of the fiscal year, the last trip being made from Halifax on March 25, 1927, arriving back at St. John on May 3rd.

After the end of the present fiscal year, the temporary monthly passenger and freight service will be continued by the Canadian National Railways and will be supplemented by monthly freight sailings from Canadian Atlantic ports, thus providing fortnightly services from those ports to all islands and colonies of the eastern group. Freight sailings from St. Lawrence river ports during the season of navigation will be continued as heretofore.

On the western route the Canadian Government Merchant Marine are maintaining their usual service every three weeks, with the steamers "Canadian Fisher" and "Canadian Forester", calling at Bermuda, the Bahamas, Jamaica and British Honduras, and this service will be continued until the new service can be put into operation.

3. Answered by No. 2.

4. Answered by No. 1.

5. Answered by No. 1.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

HON. C. J. DOHERTY

Mr. DENIS (St. Denis):

1. For how many years did the Hon. C. J. Doherty occupy the office of judge, and what amount was paid to him during that time?

2. Why was he placed on the pension list, and what amount has been paid to him since he was placed on said pension list?

[Mr. Cahan.]

3. What amount was paid to him as attorney in the Labrador case, of which judgment is still pending before the Privy Council?

4. What were his expenses for professional services, travelling and otherwise, in said case?

5. Are there any claims that have not been settled in connection with said case, and what do they amount to?

6. What amount was paid to him during and after the war for professional services, and travelling expenses in connection with his representation in the negotiations of the Versailles treaty?

7. What amount was paid to him as representative, and for travelling expenses at the League of Nations, at Geneva?

8. What is the total amount which was paid by the government to the Hon. C. J. Doherty, while serving the state, either as member, judge or otherwise?

WATER POWER LICENSES

Mr. GEARY:

1. All water-power licenses now in force and issued by the Department of Railways and Canals, the statement to show in each case location of site, the amount of power leased and the rental both at present and at time of issue; also the date of each original lease and to whom the same was issued; transfers of same and the name of the present holder.
2. All water-power licenses issued by the Department of Railways and Canals which have been cancelled or otherwise lost effect.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Perhaps I am at fault, Mr. Speaker, but I intimated to one or two hon. members on this side of the House that notices of motion would not be taken up to-night, and they have now left the chamber. Since we have finished with the estimates, I would suggest that we adjourn.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 10.28 p.m.

Wednesday, February 9, 1927

The House met at three o'clock.

NATURAL RESOURCES—PRAIRIE PROVINCES

PETITION PRESENTED BY HON. MR. EDWARDS

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): I have the honour to present a petition, addressed to the Prime Minister, the cabinet and members of the House of Commons, earnestly requesting that their natural resources be transferred to the prairie provinces at the earliest possible moment, without restrictions or limitations of the said provinces as to the complete control of their educational or other local affairs. The petition is signed by fifty electors of Chatsworth, Ontario; by fifty-seven electors of Lambton county, Ontario; by twenty-one electors of Kamloops, British Columbia; by fifty-two electors of Walkerton, Ontario; and by sixty-two electors of Yarmouth, Nova Scotia.

ESTIMATES FOR 1926-27

A message from His Excellency the Governor General, transmitting estimates for the year ending March 31, 1927, was presented by Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the House, and referred to the committee of supply.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEDNESDAY SITTINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): With respect to the motion I made yesterday regarding Wednesday sittings, I understand that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) is agreeable to having it presented again to-day in the form it was intended to be put:

That on Wednesday, the 16th instant, and every subsequent Wednesday until the end of the session, the House shall meet at three o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 47, to amend the Post Office Act (newspaper ownership).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the object of this amendment is to provide for a uniform law for newspapers in regard to the use of the mails, similar to those acts in the mother country, Australia and the United States. The proposed bill requires sworn semi-annual statements from all newspapers, magazines, trade journals and other periodicals which contain articles designed to influence public opinion, giving the names and addresses of editors, owners and stockholders. There is a proviso that this act shall not apply to religious, fraternal, temperance, scientific, or other such publications, and the names of the small stockholders are not required to be given. A copy of these sworn statements must be published in such newspapers or other publications, and paid editorials and other reading matter for which money is paid must be plainly marked "advertisement". Failing this, such publications shall be denied the use of the mails.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

RAILWAL ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 48, to amend The Railway Act, 1919 (special rates on coal).

He said: The object of this bill is to assist the establishment of a national coal supply for Canada and to provide a remedy for the provinces supplying the coal market—that is, the maritimes and Alberta. At present grain and flour are carried on a special preferential basis, and since coal is almost as necessary as flour and grain, it should be carried on the same basis. The bill seeks to establish a national coal policy for Canada. This country owns the railways and the merchant marine; in the coal question the matter of transportation plays a very large part, and the object of this bill is to place the carrying of coal on a preferential basis with grain and flour.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SENATE BILLS PROCEDURE

Mr. SPEAKER: I have not called the first reading of Senate bills because on December 15 the examiner of petitions for private bills made a special report on most of these bills, and on the remainder to-day, to the effect that while the rule regarding publication of notice had been fully complied with last year, no notice has been published in reference to any of them this year.

Under the provisions of rule 96, subsection 2, the petitions and the above mentioned report stand automatically referred to the committee on standing orders for a recommendation as to the action the House should take; under the circumstances these bills should not be proceeded with until the report of the committee has been received. I have no doubt that the committee will report that these bills be favourably taken into consideration by the House, but we must follow the rules.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

SALES TAX ARREARS

Mr. HOCKEN:

1. How many firms in the Dominion were in default in payment of the sales tax on December 1, 1926?
2. What is the number so in default in each province?

Hon. Mr. EULER:

Province	Active	Inactive	Total
Nova Scotia	23	55 (18)	78
Prince Edward Island	1	9 (6)	10
New Brunswick	9	16 (4)	25
Quebec	280	690 (208)	970
Ontario	149	770 (240)	919
Manitoba	21	99 (32)	120
Saskatchewan	12	16 (14)	28
Alberta	11	59 (9)	70
British Columbia	18	175 (35)	193
Totals	524	1889 (566)	2413

Note—

Active arrears represent those firms in default being followed up by the collectors.

Inactive arrears represent firms in default being followed up by the department at Ottawa, the figures enclosed in brackets representing the number in litigation.

TAXATION IN CANADA

DUPLICATION AND DEMAND FOR REDUCTION

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest) moved:

Whereas it was deemed necessary and expedient to impose an income tax by the parliament of Canada as a revenue measure growing out of the war and to temporarily invade the former exclusive field of the municipalities to collect this form of taxation.

And whereas such taxation has led to duplication and there is an urgent demand for further reduction of taxation and to restore to the municipalities their former exclusive rights and prerogatives to this form of taxation. Therefore this House will support the government in any immediate measures it may take to give effect to the principles of this resolution or to reduce taxation generally, including income tax, sales tax, stamp revenue postage and other forms of what are called nuisance taxes.

He said: I am introducing this resolution at the request of some of the municipalities who are complaining about the duplicate income taxes. A resolution very similar to this was introduced last session, and the minister asked that it be withdrawn after several hours of debate, with the understanding that some form of reduced taxation would be brought down in the budget, which was done.

Until 1917 the municipalities always had the exclusive right to impose income tax; rightly or wrongly, that field belonged to them, and there were reasons for that. Under the British North America Act the federal government has very extensive powers of taxation, in fact their powers are almost unlimited. This was necessarily so, because by that act matters of general import were referred to the parliament of Canada, such as trade and commerce, railways, banks and banking and so on, and in these fields this parliament was supreme. The war broke out and it was thought necessary to levy different forms of taxation and some new innovations were brought in. So in 1917 the federal government invaded the field of the municipalities and provinces and imposed an income tax which affected a large number of people throughout the country. The imposition of that taxation at the time was justified, probably, in view of the very heavy burdens resulting from the war. Owing to the dislocation of business, the disturbance of the industrial equilibrium and the resultant disturbance in the industrial and financial worlds, and to many other factors that entered into the situation, it was found that more money was needed to carry on the affairs of the country, and so recourse was had to this method of taxation.

May I say that the question of taxation is one of the most important that we have to consider. It is discussed wherever business men meet in public and in private, it is discussed by boards of trade, chambers of commerce, business men's associations, and other organizations. The three greatest problems in this country that await solution are those of taxation, immigration and the taking care of the deficits on the national railway. It was intimated some time ago by the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) that in view of the double-headed taxation and the pyramiding of taxation that has been in operation in this country ever since 1917 a conference would be called on the subject of taxation between the Dominion and the provinces and their allies, the municipalities. A conference took place, I think the year before last, and resolutions were passed having for their object the remedying of the existing situation. But nothing practical has resulted from that conference, and we find the municipalities still debarred from using sources of revenue which should rightfully be theirs. In addition the federal parliament charter certain federal companies which have powers of taxation in a municipality; such as the Bell Telephone Company, and express and railway corporations.

In addition to the other heavy general burdens imposed upon the municipalities they are saddled with the responsibility for caring for the unemployed. Although the federal government makes laws regulating trade and commerce, immigration, and the banking system of the country, it takes the stand that it is not responsible for unemployment or its relief and passes that burden on to the provinces, which in turn thrust it upon the municipalities, although the last named have enough to do already in maintaining hospitals and other institutions for the care of the sick, the infirm and the aged and other municipal institutions.

The amount required to run the country annually is in the neighborhood of $346,000,000 and the revenue for this purpose is derived from customs and excise taxation, income and sales taxes, and other impositions. The time has come when, notwithstanding the admittedly heavy burden carried by the Dominion, some relief should be afforded the provinces and the municipalities. In providing this relief regard should doubtless be paid to the action which has been taken in New Zealand, United States and Great Britain. But in doing so the ability of the people to pay must not be lost sight of. Take for example the case of Great Britain. The mother country is paying no less a sum than $500,000 a day, amounting in the aggregate to billions of dollars, in repayment of its reparations debt to the United States. Therefore I say do not forget the ability of the people of Great Britain to pay, bearing in mind the enormous burden of debt they are carrying and the sacrifices they have made in the interests of civilization. So when we consider the position of the people of England and Canada in regard to income tax, when we compare the amount of income tax which they pay with the amount paid in this country, we must not forget those facts. As to taxation in the United States we must remember that it is the most highly protected country in the world, and that the republic to the south emerged from the Great war in a much better position financially than any other country.

In considering the double-headed form of taxation let me remind the House of the income tax form sent out in Ontario by the municipalities which must be filled in by business men on February 14—and in a few weeks the federal forms will be required. So complicated in character is this form that it would take a Philadelphia lawyer to fill it out properly. When the needs of the municipal law have been met in this respect the business man is confronted with the federal income tax form and the same procedure has to be gone through again, and so we have duplication of income tax and pyramiding of taxation all along the line. The present federal income tax form is of so complicated a character, there are so many provisos and so many exceptions, that an expert lawyer would have difficulty in filling it out correctly.

I repeat, that the time has come for the Dominion to allow the municipalities to occupy this field of taxation again to themselves, and I may say in this connection that the amount of federal revenue derived from income tax is diminishing year by year. It is now 52 millions a year.

There is no doubt as to who pays this and other taxes, it is the consumer. An undue share of this federal income tax comes out of the pockets of what I may call the working class. In the case of a man with a fixed salary no evasion of payment is possible; the collector can walk into his office and find without any difficulty the exact amount of salary which he receives. I am familiar with the case of a jobber in Toronto who, although his transactions are on a large scale, pays no income tax. What he did at the end of each year was to represent his earnings as a bonus or something like that, and so he escaped income taxation altogether. So complicated is the income tax law and the method of assessment that it is difficult to find out the details by thousands of who pays this tax.

As regards the city of Toronto there is not the same difficulty; it is possible to get from the assessment department details respecting the income tax in operation there. The assessment department of the city of Toronto have tables showing the number of incomes from $50,000 a year all along the line down to $1,000, and these tables reveal the fact that 80 per cent of the income tax is borne by the small man with an income under $5,000. In Toronto there were 76 incomes amounting to $50,000 assessed last year and 29,781 incomes under $5,000. From this it will be seen that the main portion of the income tax collected comes out of the small wage earner.

Last year the federal government relieved their burden a little by increasing the exemption to $3,000 in certain cases. This year the provincial government of Ontario has taken a leaf out of the pocketbook of the federal government and decided to do something along that line. In the Ontario speech from the throne it has been announced that the exemption is to be increased to $3,000. While in the case of the federal tax the exemption of $3,000 and the deductions applied to all classes of income, earned or unearned, the proposal in Ontario applies only to personal earnings and gratuities.

If we take into account the different forms of taxation we find that an amount of $346,000,000 is being collected by the federal government under eleven different forms of taxation imposed by this parliament, as follows:

1. Customs tariff.
2. Excise taxes on various commodities such as automobiles, matches, cigars, wines, beverages, and so forth.
3. Income tax.
4. Tax on sales.
5. Tax on licenses.
6. Taxation on corporations and companies.

Of which there has been so much discussion pro and con.

7. Tax on cables and telegrams.
8. Railway and boat tax.
9. Stamp tax on cheques, drafts, bills of exchange, notes, and stock transfers.
10. Stamp tax on money orders, letters and postcards.
11. Stamp tax on receipts.

[Mr. Church.]

From these eleven different forms of taxation imposed by this parliament last year there was collected about $346,000,000 which was used to operate the country for twelve months.

I contend that the present form of income taxation is inequitable, unfair and unjust, and the duplications and inequalities of these different forms of taxation proposed by the various legislatures are making the people dissatisfied. It is a method of taxation which means robbing Peter to pay Paul. The poor man pays the bulk of the taxes; the millionaire escapes. I know of one case of a man who used to live in Toronto but who does not live there now. He went overseas and escaped the British tax collector by claiming that he was domiciled in Canada. When he appeared before the court of revision of Toronto, where he was said to have an income of $1,000,000 a year, he said: "I am not liable under the Canadian law because I am domiciled in the old country." In this way he escaped both tax collectors. It is on account of these inequalities in the field of taxation that I am making this protest.

At present there are more than $900,000,000 worth of war bonds outstanding which are free from taxation. Why cannot part of this be commuted and this vast capital put back into circulation and into economic and industrial development, thereby creating another source of revenue to the country? Canada is the most overgoverned country in the world and this is shown in its methods of inequitable taxation.

Public bodies all over Canada are complaining about the heavy burden of taxation which is in force to-day. At every meeting held this year of six chartered banks the boards of directors and the shareholders in their annual reports have made strong protests against this burden of taxation and have appealed for additional reduction in taxes. In 1926 the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) reduced the taxation of the country by $25,000,000, and we heard a good deal about this during the last election. I am not one of those who would not give the hon. gentleman some credit for this reduction which was brought about by what is known as the Robb budget. It was a good budget so far as it went, but it failed along some other economic lines to give relief to industry; notably as regards the tariff, in not preventing raw material from going to the United States and in not preventing Canada from being used as a dumping ground for cheap German and American goods. The minister however reduced the taxation by $25,000,000 and I give him every credit for so doing. He carried out heartily what he said he would do when a similar resolution was before the House last year, when he said he would do something to reduce taxation when his budget was brought down.

Many public men have expressed their opinion with regard to the taxation and the reduction. The other day Sir Thomas White in a speech before the Canadian Club at Montreal, referring to the drain on the country, expressed himself as follows:

> In addition to our Dominion direct debt there is the heavy outstanding indirect liability upon guarantees of issues of the railway companies now embraced in the Canadian National railway system, and for the annual deficits from that system which is owned by the Dominion.
> Heavy Taxation and Enterprise
> More serious even than this is the effect of our heavy taxation upon the spirit of enterprise in our people. The heavy super-taxes upon income deter men of initiative and constructive capability from embarking in new enterprise in which if loss is made it must be borne by themselves, while the gain accrues in such large proportions to the public treasury. The withdrawal of such large sums as are collected annually in income taxation from the capital fund available for new enterprise constitutes a serious hindrance to the launching of new undertakings by the people of Canada. The result is that our people are not participating to the extent they should in the development of Canadian industry and commerce.
> Problem of National Economy
> Connected with this problem of taxation is the problem of national economy. This must necessarily relate to controllable expenditure. Governments are blamed universally for their extravagance, but the fault partially lies back of governments and parliaments, with the people themselves.
> We shall get economy in all governments when the great mass of the people are so imbued with the spirit for economy that they will not support needless expenditure. You are not likely to get this condition until our public agencies, such as the press, actively take up the question and bring home to the conviction of the people the consequences of indifferences or lethargy or even hostility in the matter of public economy.

Sir Herbert Holt of the Royal Bank of Canada recently said:

> Taxation in Canada has reached the point where it is retarding the growth of national wealth, increasing the cost of production, decreasing demand—and with it profit and wages—and withdrawing money from productive use. He says the country is over-burdened with government, and the enormous expansion of the public debt is a matter of grave misgiving. Canada is over-governed and over-taxed, and the one is the natural corollary of the other. The political diseases from which we suffer have been diagnosed long ago, not only by business men but by the ordinary voter as well. Administrative extravagance and incompetence have been in the saddle too long.

Those are the opinions of one or two of a number of public men on income taxation and the necessity of reducing it further. In England they are endeavouring to do something to reduce the tax. Last year I quoted a comparative table showing the income taxation in the United States and Canada, and I need not read it again. It shows that in the United States they are reducing this form of taxation. In fact they have had four decreases in income tax in the last five years.

Mr. Winston Churchill, the British Chancellor of the Exchequer in England announced a reduction in British policy. He said:

> The main grounds of British policy have been threefold: first, to balance the budget out of revenue; secondly, to reduce the debt; and thirdly, to reduce public expenditure, and in consequence to remit taxation. We had either achieved or made progress towards all these objects. From 1920 onwards we had balanced our budgets. We had reduced our debt from the peak of which it stood in 1919 (not in nominal figures but in facts) by over £736,000,000, and we had reduced our real annual interest charge by over £70,000,000 a year. Expenditure had fallen from £1,655,000,000 in 1922 to less than half that figure now, and taxation had been reduced by over £300,000,000 a year. This year's budget alone reduced taxation by £32,000,000 in a full year. Except the United States, Holland and Switzerland, we had the lowest bank rate in the world.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer made a reduction in the British income tax. It may be that the income tax in Great Britain is higher than it is in Canada, but we must remember Great Britain's much heavier commitments per capita. The Coolidge administration at Washington last year, at midnight on the 30th of June, made the following announcement:

> After to-morrow midnight there will be no tax on a movie that costs you 50 cents or less, no tax on telephone or telegraph, candy or a variety of commodities, such as X-ray films, hunting knives, riding habits, stilettos, smoking stands, hunting garments, etc.

These nuisance taxes were wiped out altogether. A comparison would show that the income tax in the United States is much lower than the income tax in Canada. I will cite only a few figures:

Income	U.S. Tax	Canadian Tax
$ 3,000	7 50	40 00
4,000	22 50	80 00
5,000	37 50	126 00
6,000	57 50	178 00
10,000	207 00	619 00

I admit that the Minister of Finance brought in an amendment to the act last year which will slightly modify the above table, but substantially the figures are correct.

According to all the text books on political economy the principles upon which taxation should be based to be fair and just are, first of all, ability to pay; second, certainty; third, convenience; fourth, economy. According to Andrew Mellon, secretary of the United States treasury, the principles underlying his taxation of last year are, first, it must be scientific; second, the taxation must not disturb business; and third, the taxation must get the most money with the least inconvenience.

There is a great deal of dissatisfaction in this country over the numerous methods of taxation that are now being collected, and which are passed on to the consumer. In addition, there are many people in this country who are escaping altogether payment of the income tax. The Minister of Finance did announce a general reduction of taxes of some $25,000,000. That was his estimate without the reduction made later on motor cars, and without regard to the amended import duties on the materials that enter into motor cars, which in my opinion, if taken into account, would very materially increase that $25,000,000. I admit that the minister was entitled to some credit for that reduction, although his reduction, did not go one-third far enough. Further reductions might have been made in the sales and stamp tax: the income exemption might have been increased further for the small wage earning class; the sales tax might have been eliminated altogether, and the tax, if possible, taken off clothing. Next to the food on the breakfast table, the most important item of expenditure for the working classes is rent, and then clothing; in some cases, clothing comes second and rent third. There is a direct tax on almost every article of clothing the working man wears, and it is a very big sales tax. The government is taking $10,000,000 in taxes out of the working class in this country by way of sales tax on clothing, and that tax is passed on to the consumer, because in the clothing industry it is not the wholesaler, not the retailer, who pays the tax, but the man who wears the suit of clothes. I am glad to hear the minister has given some intimation recently that there may be a reduction along this line this year. Of course, the finance minister, in his annual estimate of revenues, has to consider how much revenue will be necessary to administer the affairs of this country. He has to consider if there will be a crop failure, and economic conditions generally—the economic requirements of the country. But I believe that the enlarged purchasing power of the agriculturists, resulting from several successive good crops, has had a decidedly stimulating effect on domestic trade. You will also notice, Mr. Speaker, that during the last eight months the customs revenue has been going up. In the city of Toronto the customs revenue is now over $60,000,000 a year.

Many representations have been made to the government regarding reduced taxation along several lines, notably as to:

1. The sales tax.
2. The corporation income tax.
3. The personal income tax.
4. The various stamp taxes.

These four nuisance taxes have been a drag on business, both wholesale and retail, and generally on business; I refer to the stamp taxes on drafts, bills of exchange and many other forms of negotiable paper. This is a form of nuisance tax as to which I hope we may hear an announcement in a few days to the effect that we are to be given partial if not entire relief.

There is a great deal of discrimination also in our taxation, as is shown by the different resolutions which have been presented to the minister asking for relief. Considerable objection is taken to the income tax on corporations. Although the present administration have closed their minds against any upward revision of the tariff, I believe that the tariff laws of this country have a most direct bearing on taxation. In the United States, there is an average 35 per cent protective tariff for the protection of their own industries. Our tariff in Canada averages only from 20 to 24 per cent. If our tariff was increased up to the United States level we could eliminate the sales tax, the income tax, and all these nuisance and other taxes, by reason of the increased revenues from import business we should do in this country. Take, for instance, the toy industry in Canada to-day. There is an industry that has been destroyed owing to the failure to have a dumping clause to protect our factories from importation from various countries where the labour conditions and rate of wages are on a very much lower level than here. We are importing cheap, shoddy, German toys, owing to the failure of the government of Canada to protect the employers of labour in Canada. The toy industry should be a native industry in this country, because we possess thirty-six basic materials that enter into the making of toys. Instead of that, however, we are buying all our toys from Germany. On the sixth floor of Eaton's in Toronto at Christmas time you will find the whole floor filled with cheap, shoddy German and American toys, which are sold even to the soldiers who fought in the Great war, and to the workingmen of this country, many of whom are out of work. In Germany the manufacturer has the advantage of depreciated currency, longer hours of labour, easier labour laws, and in addition he pays no income or sales tax to Canada and shares a home market here with our Canadian manufacturer, who has to pay here sales tax, income tax and other taxes, while his foreign competitor pays none. I contend that it is unfair, unjust and inequitable. It is a burden on the industries of the country—on the employers and the employees alike. In addition to that, it is a bad advertisement for Canada. The sales tax, as well as the income tax, was imposed during the war. There were some good points about it. It was imposed when the country was dislocated by the war owing to the industrial conditions produced by that war. But to-day, with the expansion of business by the amendments to the tariff, I believe the sales tax should be abolished altogether, because the economic tariff amendments which I suggested would have the direct result of giving the country two or three times the amount which we now obtain from the sales tax. The revenue from the sales tax was as follows:

1921-1922	61,518,751 13
1922-1923	91,262,254 13
1923-1924	100,990,076 80
1924-1925	66,707,369 96

The income tax has dropped down, as I stated before, to about $54,000,000, and from the sales tax and the customs tariff the government obtained in the following years the amounts stated below:

1918-1919	$158,046,333 87
1919-1920	187,524,181 77
1920-1921	179,667,683 12
1921-1922	121,487,393 90
1922-1923	133,803,370 12
1923-1924	135,122,344 76
1924-1925	120,222,453 70

The late administration imposed a certain sales tax, the present government increased it. I hope this government will remove the sales tax burden from the industries of the country and seek other forms of new taxation. For instance, let them impose an export tax on raw materials sent to the United States. Here we have a zinc company incorporated north of Sudbury by Americans and this zinc limit is so valuable it is worth millions to the concessionaires. This was only one company and there are others. The American millionaire has found Canada a happy hunting ground. The International Nickel Company have a gold mine. Then we have copper, platinum, lead, coal, and many other minerals which are exported in a crude and semi-crude condition out of Canada. Take the zinc company incorporated the other day with a lot of Americans at their head. They will make a fortune. A new taxation plan will take care of all this and a just and equitable federal tax imposed. The result now is that Canada is making millionaires out of a lot of Americans at the expense of the people of Canada. There should be an export tax on all these raw materials and conservation of our resources. If Premier Bruce of Australia were in Canada he would take care of our resources in this respect; he is one of the greatest imperial statesmen we have, a radical who preserves the resources of his country for the people and for posterity. Notwithstanding what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) stated the other day in Toronto, Mr. Bruce got the ear of the country on inter-imperial problems and inter-dominion economics and trade. Mr. Bruce showed Canada the way to inter-imperial trade, and showed the people of Canada the economic troubles this country is suffering from and the necessity of preferential trade within the empire if the empire is to last. How would Mr. Bruce deal with our economic problems if he were premier of Canada? Would he allow Canada to become a happy hunting ground for Americans to grab our resources and escape taxation? Would he permit them to seize our resources with all our raw material and take them to the United States and impose no taxation whatever? Would he permit the exportation of our raw materials and resources to the United States without any export tax? If Stanley Bruce were prime minister of this country he would see that the raw materials sent out of the country were taxed and he would lay down an economic policy, both federal and provincial, to develop Canada and its resources. Under the policy of the present government they cannot remove the burden of taxation from the working classes and place it on the American millionaires. Hence Canada is the happy hunting-ground for Americans in this respect.

I believe the Doherty Act should be repealed, in view of the Ontario recent vote, and the tax of $10 a gallon on liquor and spirits should be removed, if not reduced. It is not a luxury for the working classes to have a glass of beer. This form of taxation, $10 per gallon, should be substantially reduced. In view of the provinces now engaging in this business and having a system of public ownership of the liquor traffic for the benefit of the people, a large revenue will be derived by Ontario from the trade. If the Doherty Act were repealed and a reduction of the $10 a gallon tax, business would be increased and taxation benefited otherwise.

The sales tax was originally a war tax and should be removed as soon as the finances of the country will permit. The sales tax on clothing for men and women should be reduced. The tax cannot be collected equitably on such articles. The tax on food for the working classes should be reduced and relief provided. When we see this sales tax imposed on the clothing used by every working man in the country, I think the time has come to call a halt.

Last session I moved for a return, sessional paper No. 247—and the return was brought down on the 28th June—as follows:

Return to an order of the House of Commons, dated the 15th of March, 1926, for a return showing,—

1. Total revenue of the government from all sources for the last year of record.

2. What portion of this cash revenue is contributed by each one of the nine provinces, and the respective amounts from each province.

The Department of Customs and Excise brought down the following return, totalling $309,000,000:

Import duty	$120,220,826 13
Excise taxes	89,330,987 59
Excise duties	39,013,179 96
Sundry collections	1,194,104 55
Income tax	56,248,042 82
Business profits tax	2,704,427 37
Special war revenue, part 1, section 4	315,314 88
Total	$309,026,883 30

Looking over the return I observe that the province of Ontario pays about 44 per cent of the taxes of the country. Ontario is an industrial province, and the working classes are asking for some relief from the burden of taxation which I have referred to. I have a table here showing details which I will ask to put on Hansard. It reads:

STATEMENT OF REVENUES COLLECTED BY DEPARTMENTS OF CUSTOMS-EXCISE DURING FISCAL YEAR 1924-25

The same proportion appears in regard to other public departments, such as Finance and Insurance; the percentage is about the same. Of the revenues collected by the Department of Marine and Fisheries the province of Ontario pays $147,000 of a total of $422,000 under the head of Marine; while in the Post Office Department Ontario contributes over $11,000,000 to a total of $28,000,000, compared to $5,000,000 odd paid by the province of Quebec. In other words the province of Ontario, in this department alone, pays more than twice as much as the province of Quebec, by a million dollars odd. The percentages are, Ontario, 40 per cent, Quebec, 18 per cent, Manitoba 11 per cent, and so forth.

I do not wish to detain the House any longer, but before concluding I must pay a tribute to the fair way in which the minister has viewed this matter.

We discussed a similar resolution last year and he said he would see what could be done favouring the principle of reduction and promised that he would look into the representations made to him. He has been favourable and has been willing to meet any deputation that has waited upon him regarding taxation. After all, taxation ultimately comes out of the consumer and I would urge the minister to look very carefully into this whole subject. He has had a good many experts engaged on this work and the time has come for him to tell the House and the country what he is prepared to do. I do not ask him to give all his plans away, but I cannot too strongly impress on the minister the claim of the municipalities, on whom the burden of taxation is falling more and more, and who are looking anxiously for relief from duplicate income tax.

Something ought to be done to relieve the employers of the country and at the same time the working man from these heavy taxes. Our manufacturers have to meet competition from the various countries of the world and they should be given more relief and consideration. There should be some new method of collecting taxes from American millionaires who have grabbed off the resources of the country—from the mines, the forests, and the sea. Large quantities of our raw products are being exported, very largely to the United States, and the time has come for us to impose various forms of export taxes on our raw materials. Certainly something should be done to relieve the middle classes of the burden of the present heavy taxation, and I commend this resolution to the attention of the minister.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): There is no more genial member of the House than my hon. friend who has just concluded (Mr. Church). He is able to argue either side of the question and this afternoon he has pleaded eloquently, as he always does, for a reduction of the revenue. Last week, I am told, he was a member of a delegation in Toronto that waited upon the government with a request for an increased expenditure. I think I shall have to call my hon. friend in and have a quiet talk with him. If he can give me the recipe for reducing revenues and at the same time spending money to deepen harbours and erect public buildings in the great city of Toronto he is undoubtedly a very useful man and he should not be sitting on the other side of the House.

This year, I observe, my hon. friend tells us he is speaking on behalf of the municipalities. He says that there is a duplication of taxation from which some of the municipalities are suffering, and he thinks the time has come when we should give up some of our revenues, particularly the income tax, on the ground, as he argues, that there is no longer a war. The income tax, he points out, was imposed during the war and he thinks we should now do away with it. I must remind the hon. gentleman that while it is true that there is no longer a war—and we are all glad of the fact—the war debt yet remains and must be paid; more than that, the interest on that debt has to be met. It is therefore more difficult for us to-day who have to carry on the affairs of the country to reduce taxation than it has ever been, especially as the people were taxed less a few years ago.

My hon. friend has not brought forward the argument he presented last year in regard to the legality of the income tax paid to the federal government. The legality of that tax was questioned by a member of one of the provincial governments and the case was taken to the Privy Council. There it was decided that the federal income tax was legal, so that Sir Thomas White, who imposed it, was quite within his rights when he introduced that form of taxation. In introducing that tax Sir Thomas White had a very clear conception of the demands of the country at that time. He was not only aware of the expenditures which the country was then faced with, but he realized what expenditures would ensue from the war. In presenting that measure to parliament—I recall this very well, and hon. gentlemen can verify it by reference to Hansard—Sir Thomas White made it very clear that he was proposing the tax because of additional expenditures. He said he had hesitated to bring it in but that, seeing that the country had decided to call 100,000 more men to the colours, he realized that Canada would be involved in considerable expenditures for some time to come.

Just before discussing the taxes we have to pay, may I refer to a statement made by my hon. friend, that we had made a promise some time ago to call a conference of the treasurers of the various provinces to see whether some means could not be devised of eliminating the duplication of taxation. My hon. friend, not wilfully but altogether inadvertently, overlooked the fact that such a conference was called. He is wrong when he says that it never took place. We had a conference of all the provincial treasurers, who met in Ottawa, and we agreed upon one policy, namely, that "what we have we hold." The Minister of Finance of the federal government could not afford to lose any of his revenues, while the various provincial treasurers were in need of more funds. We agreed upon another point: it was felt that there should be a further conference to consider in what direction we could effect an economy and so get rid of a certain amount of duplication of service, for which the people were paying, as between the federal and the provincial administrations. It was agreed that that conference should be called by the premiers of the two older provinces, Ontario and Quebec, and I am still waiting for my good friends Mr. Ferguson and Mr. Taschereau to call the meeting. When that is done I will be very glad to attend it, if I am still occupying the office of Minister of Finance.

My hon. friend raises the question of who pays the expenses of carrying on the affairs of the country. There I think he is on pretty solid ground, and we can agree on that. The consumer pays, but every person is a consumer, and when my friend attempts to argue that in the last analysis only one class pays the taxes, I think he is a little wrong. I shall deal with that a little later, however. The tax paid to-day is quite different from that imposed by Sir Thomas White when he introduced the income tax measure. Since that time reductions have been made from year to year; I will give Sir Thomas White and Sir Henry Drayton credit, because they made slight reductions, but I believe every person will give this government credit for those greater reductions which were made last year. To-day a married man has an exemption of $3,000 and if he has three children he has a possible exemption of $4,500, he will have a revenue of $4,500 before being called upon to pay one cent of a tax. Even my genial friend opposite now has an exemption which he did not have before; as an unmarried man he is entitled to an exemption of $1,500, but because his sister keeps house for him and he is a householder, he is entitled to the same exemption as a married man, under the act of last year. So my friend must give us credit for these concessions.

I am not going to delay the House with the statistics which were placed on the records last year, more than to say that the expenses in connection with the war are to-day greater than the amount we are collecting from what are known as special war taxes—taxes which were imposed by previous governments in war time to meet the requirements of the war; but we have made considerable reductions even in the cost of those war taxes. For instance, the interest on the debt in 1921 was over $126,000,000, and we have reduced that interest until to-day it is down to $117,000,000. In 1921 the interest on the public debt over the interest of 1914—that is the addition for war purposes, such as pensions, soldiers' civil re-establishment, soldiers' land settlement, Imperial War Graves Commission, battlefield memorials and adjustments of war claims—was $219,589,436, and by our economy in the administration of the affairs of this country we have reduced these charges until last year they totalled $163,688,411. So we have made some move toward the reduction of taxation.

My hon. friend argued that our taxes are higher to those doing business in Canada than are the taxes in the republic to our south. I am sure that if my hon. friend would give that matter closer attention he would alter his view. I have the statement of a most eminent citizen of Toronto who does as much business in the state of Massachusetts as he does in Canada, and that statement shows that it costs him more to do business, as far as taxes are concerned, in the state of Massachusetts than it does in the province of Ontario. I have another statement from a gentleman who does business both in the state of New York and in Canada, and that statement goes to show that it costs more to do business in the state of New York, as far as taxes are concerned, than in the Dominion of Canada. That is, when you add together the federal taxes, the state taxes and the civic taxes, and make the same comparison with Canada, that is the result.

Then my friend argues and quotes statistics —and we all know what statistics mean—to show that the two older provinces of Ontario and Quebec pay the larger share of the taxes; I think he argued that they pay 80 per cent of the total taxes. You can argue that if you take the office where the taxes are collected, but it is not fair to argue that because in the city of Montreal the revenues are so much, it is the city of Montreal only which pays those taxes. The income tax branch at Montreal covers all that part of the province of Quebec from the Ontario boundary to Three Rivers, and in Montreal are located great corporations which do business throughout Canada. I refer to the railway companies, the banks, the telephone companies and the telegraph companies, the taxes of which are all paid into that office. The city of Montreal has no right to say that only the citizens of Montreal pay those taxes, and the same argument will apply to the city of Toronto. Toronto covers not only the city itself but includes the counties of York, Peel, Grey, Muskoka, Dufferin, Durham, Ontario, Simcoe, Victoria, Halton and the Parry Sound area. I think I have only to mention this to show my hon. friend that all Canada contributes in some measure to the payment of these taxes.

My friend had almost finished his speech before he suggested one way in which we might get greater revenue. No place in Canada receives more free advice just now than does the office of the Minister of Finance, and I am bound to give my friend credit for being about the first gentleman in the last two months who has offered a remedy. He has offered a remedy, although I am afraid that it would not be very effective. I have had advice for the reduction of taxation which has been estimated by some industrious newspaper man to amount to $177,000,000 in loss of revenue, but no person has suggested a remedy until this afternoon. My friend says we should put up the tariff and apply the dumping clause. But if he puts up the tariff so high that nothing will come in, where are we going to get any revenue? I am afraid we cannot quite agree, but I will be very glad to call in my hon. friend and have a talk with him. If he can show me some way in which I can meet the expenditures asked for by the city of which he was mayor for so many years and where he resides; if he can show me a way to provide for those expenditures and at the same time reduce the revenues, balance the accounts and meet the interest on the public debt, then I repeat that his place is over on these benches, and we will be very glad to see him here.

The hon. member, having brought this matter to the attention of the House, is I presume quite willing to withdraw the resolution.

Mr. CHURCH: Very well.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. gentleman have leave to withdraw the resolution?

Motion withdrawn.

DOMINION ELECTORAL LISTS

PROPOSED NATIONAL REGISTRATION SYSTEM

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the present election act as to voters lists is unsatisfactory and should be repealed and replaced by a national registration voters list system adapted to Canada's special circumstances by which every voter must register to secure the franchise before any federal election.

He said: In my opinion the present system of elections is not what it should be for a people numbering nine or ten million. The Canadian election machinery is the most cumbersome in the world, and I have studied many of the systems. Under the present law the names of many voters are left off the list, especially in the larger urban centres. On the other hand the registration system has been made a success in the United States. Anybody who wants to vote should take enough interest in the affairs of the country to go and register, and a national system of registration would be the cheapest way, it seems to me, to get the popular vote recorded. The existing electoral law of this country is so complicated that it would take a Philadelphia lawyer to interpret the act correctly. The returning officers cannot interpret it, even many county judges cannot do so; and the many election frauds which have grown out of the present election law make it the most ineffective system that obtains anywhere to my knowledge, and at times the most corrupt and costly.

Take the Peace River election which was discussed in this House last session. Under a proper election system would it have been possible for an electoral contest to have been conducted in the fraudulent manner that that one was? I am certain that it would not. I believe that the present election act should be referred to a select committee of the House so that it might be thoroughly investigated. The government should take the responsibility of nominating such a committee composed of representatives of all parties and groups in the House, and that committee should go into the election law and into the whole election machinery and suggest drastic changes. A national registration system would remedy the defects which experience has revealed in the existing law, or at any rate would go far in that connection. In this country to-day if a man's name is left off the voters' list he is prevented from voting, he is disfranchised. Such cases are not isolated. In my own constituency two hundred and seventy-six returned soldiers who had fought for civilization in Flanders and France found their names omitted from the lists in one of the recent elections. That was not due to any fault of their own; someone had neglected to sign an affidavit, or something of that kind. Is it fair that such things should be allowed to take place? The present election law is most costly in its operation not only to the candidate but to the country and to the great body of voters. To-day the fact that women enjoy the franchise in Canada makes it even more indispensable that the election law should be enforced with fairness and accuracy. In large municipalities in the province of Ontario the registration system is practically in effect to-day because of the recent assessment to election day; elsewhere it is not carried out so often. Now, the provincial voters' lists are somewhat based upon the municipal system, but not the Dominion lists. A national system of registration would be fair to everybody, and if a person does not take the trouble to register the application of some sort of penalty would almost be justified. Such a national registration plan is followed, I believe, in the state of New York, also in other states of the republic, and in other countries successfully. In my opinion a national registration system would prove far more satisfactory than the law in force to-day. I regret very much that the party to which I belong assumed office last summer and thereby secured control of the electoral machinery. It was thought that by having that control they would secure several seats. In my opinion such control did not gain one single seat under the party system. Under the party system everybody wants to be appointed returning officer or poll clerk, and everybody wants to remove the name of somebody else from the list. The present election system, I think, has outlived its usefulness. A committee of this House should be appointed, with power to act during the recess of parliament and to carefully investigate the entire electoral machinery and that of other countries A national system of registration would certainly be best for cities and towns. There might be rural constituencies where it would prove somewhat of a hardship but such cases could be taken care of by other provisions. The present franchise act has been weighed in the balance and found wanting. It contains too many defects, and is most cumbersome and costly in its operation. No matter whom you might have as chief electoral officer it is not possible to carry out the law efficiently. I am not reflecting on the present occupant of that office; the whole election machinery is absurd. The present law is costing the country far too much and is too inefficient. Furthermore, there is too much expense thrown on candidates which should be borne by the country such as notifying voters where to vote and register. If we improve the law in the direction indicated we shall have purer elections and a larger popular vote will be recorded.

For the reasons given I suggest the appointment of a special committee to overhaul the existing election law and machinery and bring in a report. We are spending a large amount of money on the present law and it is a flat failure. I doubt whether there is a riding in the whole of Canada where men and women have not been disfranchised owing to the inequality and injustice of this particular legislation. It is a relic of antiquity of other days, and we have not advanced beyond the somewhat crude system which was in force at the time of confederation. In some instances open voting was the method then followed at elections. Even this method would have prevented such frauds as occurred during the Peace River election.

I ask for a national registration voters' list system adapted to our service, taking into consideration the geographical sections of the country, the provinces and the special circumstances of the case. Those who do not take enough interest in the matter to register if necessary, should not have a vote. I believe the introduction of this system has led to a large increase in the number of voters in New York city and in the state of New York. In the last election for the governor of that state and the many minor officers, warm approval was expressed of the national registration system as against the voters' list system which had been weighed in the balance and found wanting.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the resolution of my hon. friend is to the effect that the present election act as regards voters' lists is not satisfactory and that it should be replaced by a national registration voters' list system. I would be inclined to agree with the hon. gentleman that the present system is not quite satisfactory. From my experience in my province I know that the former system of using provincial lists which are prepared and corrected every year was much more satisfactory. Under the present system we have to have long election campaigns and this is very costly, especially in the cities.

In England I know they have lists which are always in readiness. They have officers whose duties are to prepare and correct the lists, and when a dissolution occurs the lists are ready. They have closed lists that cannot be changed or modified after the issuing of the writs. Such a system has a good deal to commend itself even to the people of this country.

On the other hand the system of accepting the provincial lists cannot be adopted because the provincial lists are not uniform in all the provinces. In Quebec the women are not yet on the provincial list so that there would have to be some system of putting them on the lists which are used in the federal election. That matter could be looked into and I do not know whether it would not be possible to go some distance along the line suggested by my hon. friend.

As regards the question of referring this matter to a committee, there is no such statement in the resolution, which merely asks the opinion of the House regarding a system of national registration for the voters' lists, and we had better wait until some other time to discuss this matter. The chief electoral officer has not yet forwarded to this House the report which he has to make after every general election. Doubtless he must have new suggestions to offer as the result of his experience during the recent campaign and that report will have to be considered and studied by this House. If there is a necessity for a committee—and I am sure that when the election act is being changed or modified, it will be proper to refer it to a committee for its consideration—that will be the time to submit the matter to a committee. Meanwhile I think the suggestions made by my hon. friend deserve the consideration of this House and it will be well for every member to give the benefit of his views and experience when the time comes for changing the present system.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I feel very much interested in the matter which the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) has brought to the attention of the House this afternoon in regard to the existing election machinery in this country. I well remember when the present Dominion Elections Act was passed in this House, I think during the session of 1920 or 1921. I remember also I had a great deal to do with the passage of that much maligned measure. If my memory serves me aright that measure was before the House for either one or two sessions and it certainly was under review by a committee of the House. Very much labour was expended on the bill.

We had this condition to face– and we must realize it because we have yet to face it—that we have in Canada nine provinces in nearly all of which there is a varying provincial franchise. There is no uniformity amongst them. We have the most varying inequalities in regard to Quebec, where under the provincial franchise women voters have not yet been admitted to the franchise. In all the western provinces there are other variations so that you could not as a matter of fact adopt provincial lists as the basis for a Dominion franchise unless you adopted in this House the provincial franchise. If in the judgment of the House it would be well to adopt the provincial rather than the federal franchise, then provincial lists might be made available.

We did introduce new systems in that act and we thought we were taking a step in advance. Whether that was the case or not the electors of this country and the members of this House can judge. We adopted a system of registration in the cities and towns and a system of enumeration in the rural districts. We took the system of enumeration in regard to the rural districts from the law in force, I think in Saskatchewan, a law which had not prior to that time been in force in any part of eastern Canada. We were then confronted with the condition which existed in Prince Edward Island where there were no voters' lists at all. We could not adopt the provincial list in that province because there was none. Under these circumstances the committee and the House gave the country what they believed to be as workable, as practical an act as it was possible to evolve, an act which would suit every portion of the Dominion of Canada.

I am sorry to confess that in the actual working out of that act difficulties have arisen. It has proved to be expensive; it has proved in many cases to be inconvenient, and it has not met the requirements of Canada in every instance. That we all admit. It is easy enough to criticise, but I want someone to suggest a better method. The hon. member for Toronto Northwest, has suggested a method of national registration. I do not know what the term implies, and I do not understand the system. The resolution itself throws no light upon the system, and my hon. friend in his speech offered us no intimation in regard to the working of such a system. I do not know what it is, but I believe in every country where an electoral system is in force some objection is still found to the existing system. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has referred to the system in force in Great Britain. I believe their system is as nearly perfect as any we know of, but at almost every session of the British House there are objections made even to that system. In the first place, it is very costly. It requires a host of officials, not for the purposes of elections, but officials who are appointed practically for life—revising barristers and their clerks, and a host of supernumeraries for each riding. They have a dense population; they have not the long distances we have to contend with here, and they are able under their system to get up what is in my judgment a well-nigh perfect list, more nearly so than the lists in any other country that I know of. I would certainly welcome the adoption of such a system in this country. It was tried, you may remember, Mr. Speaker, under the government of Sir John Macdonald in 1885. The principle of revising officers was then adopted in this country, but it was found to be unworkable, cumbersome, expensive, and no improvement on the former law, and the very government that introduced that change, after trying it out in two elections, repealed it, or at all events was ready to repeal it. Well, should we be ready to adopt it again? That is the question. I am satisfied that if we did, if we worked on the English principle and were willing to stand the expense, we should have as nearly perfect a voters' list as it is possible to get.

Registration, in my judgment, is not going to help the situation any. It might avoid a little difficulty in our urban centres, but it could never be applied to our rural districts. You cannot ask a farming community in this country to go five, ten, fifteen, twenty or fifty miles for the purpose of registering prior to an election, and it would be impossible to appoint enough officials to go round and register them at their respective homes.

If anyone has any suggestion to make by way of improvement, I am sure the House will welcome it, or if a committee can devise any better means than we have now under our present elections act, then by all means let us get a committee to work and evolve a better system than we now have. We tried to get as perfect a system as possible, but I am perfectly willing to admit that it has many imperfections. If my hon. friend from Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church), who seems to have given some attention to this matter, would set himself to work and devise certain amendments designed to bring about an improvement in our present system, we would examine them with pleasure, and I am sure that any helpful suggestion would be welcomed by the government and by the House.

Motion withdrawn.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

NATURAL RESOURCES—ALBERTA

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): Might I ask my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) if he would cause to be laid upon the table of the House, if possible to-morrow, the exact question which was submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada recently in regard to what is known as the Alberta natural resources case? I am aware I can get it from the files of the Supreme Court, but it would be a great convenience if my hon. friend would lay it on the table to-morrow.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I shall be pleased to comply with my hon. friend's wish in that respect to-morrow.

CARILLON POWER DEVELOPMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): Might I also ask that there be laid on the table of the House, at as early a date as possible, copies of all orders in council which have been passed within the last twelve months in respect to the Carillon falls power development on the Ottawa river, near Hawkesbury.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I shall be pleased to bring my hon. friend's request to the notice of the right hon. leader of the government, and no doubt he will give a satisfactory answer to my hon. friend.

DISSOLUTION OF LATE PARLIAMENT

REQUEST FOR CORRESPONDENCE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): Might I ask that there be laid on the table of the House, at as early a date as possible, all correspondence which took place between the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen and His Excellency the Governor General, then Lord Byng, in June or July last, with reference to the dissolution of the then parliament, and all correspondence which took place between the same persons with reference to the resignation of the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen last autumn; and at the same time and in the same connection, all correspondence which took place between the present Prime Minister of Canada and His Excellency the Governor General in the month of June last in regard to the resignation of the then government or in regard to the dissolution of the then parliament.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I shall be pleased to transmit the nature of my hon. friend's wishes in this regard to the right hon. leader of the government, and no doubt he will give a satisfactory answer to my hon. friend.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

STANDING COMMITTEES

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): There is just one other matter I wish to mention with a view to expediting the business of the House. There are a large number of Senate bills on the order paper which cannot be proceeded with until the standing committees of the House are struck. Might I urge upon the government the propriety of seeing that these standing committees are struck as soon as possible so that the legislation may be proceeded with. The striking committee, I think, was appointed last December before the adjournment.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I am sorry the chief whip is not here. I know there have been communications between representatives of the various groups in the House, and I thought that a decision had been reached. However, I think that to-morrow an answer will be given to my hon. friend in regard to that matter.

HOME BANK DEPOSITORS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): I would like to ask the Minister of Finance if it is the intention of the government to carry out the recommendations of the judges of the Exchequer court to grant another $500,000 to the depositors of the Home Bank.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): I am not sure at the moment that we have had any such recommendation from the judges of the Exchequer court, but I will look into the matter.

Mr. McGIBBON: It was announced in the newspapers.

NATURAL RESOURCES—ALBERTA COAL

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): Last spring two urgent matters came before the House, the first with reference to the rates for the transportation of coal from Alberta. This question was to be referred to the railway commission for immediate action, but we have heard nothing of it since. Secondly, what has become of the application to the Supreme Court of Canada in reference to the natural resources of Alberta, about which we were told a year ago in the speech from the throne legislation would be brought in? We were told that there would be also a special meeting of the Supreme court, and that parliament would then be advised in regard to the matter. It is a question not of law but of policy. What has become of these two matters? It is nearly nine months since the House dealt with them? Why the delay? What is the situation?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I can answer perhaps one of the questions put by my hon. friend, with reference to the question submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada. As my hon. friend knows, since that statement was made in the House, many things have happened in this country. There has been a general election and another government has come into power, and until the present government was back in office again, according to the wish of the people of Canada, nothing further was done with regard to that reference. It is now before the Supreme court; it is pending, and I hope there will be an early decision.

Hon. CHAS. A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): As far as the other matter is concerned, I presume my hon. friend is referring to the request which was made to the Board of Railway Commissioners to inquire into and determine what was the actual cost of transporting coal from Alberta to Ontario. The Board of Railway Commissioners have not yet reported with respect to the matter. They have been busily engaged ever since in connection with the general rates inquiry and I am not just sure just how far they have got in connection with the question of the cost of transporting coal.

TARIFF ADVISORY BOARD

DUTY ON PUMPS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): In view of the statement made by the Minister of Finance yesterday, will he be good enough to lay on the table the evidence of the report of the board in connection with the application by the Ames Baker Company, Limited, of Brandon, for a change in the duty on pumps, as made before the Tariff Advisory Board?

Mr. ROBB: The information will be made available.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe, the House adjourned at 5 p.m.

Thursday, February 10, 1927

The House met at three o'clock.

NEW MEMBER INTRODUCED

William Duff, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Antigonish-Guysborough, introduced by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King and Hon. J. L. Ralston.

EXPENDITURE UNDER GOVERNOR GENERAL'S WARRANTS

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): On February 8 my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) raised a question with reference to an expenditure of $45,000 under governor general's warrants. There was some controversy between the hon. member and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) as to how this corresponded with a certain speech delivered at Richmond Hill. I promised to lay on the table the papers in relation to this matter, but perhaps the House would like to know that this expenditure was made to comply with the requirements of an order in council passed on December 29, 1921, which, as my hon. friend will recall, was about the day before the government of which he was a supporter resigned. Under the terms of that order in council the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment was authorized to assume the cost of compensation in respect of pensioners of twenty per cent and upwards who were engaged in industry, the object of such legislation being to make it easier to find employment for disabled ex-members of the forces. That order in council was renewed for one year on September 18, 1924, and accordingly it expired on September 18, 1925. At the time of this authorization an order in council was put through to meet expenditures that had been incurred during the winter of that year, the vote not having been quite sufficient. I will lay all the documents on the table so that my hon. friend can examine them.

IMPERIAL CONFERENCE, 1926

APPENDICES TO SUMMARY PROCEEDINGS TABLED

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The appendices to the summary of proceedings of the Imperial Conference of 1926, copies of which I am now tabling, are those printed by the British government. I move, seconded by Mr. Lapointe, that 1,000 copies in English and 700 copies in French of the said appendices, laid upon the table of the House this day, be printed forthwith, and that rule 74 be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Robb.]

FRUIT AND VEGETABLE COMBINE

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday last the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) requested a statement of expenditures in connection with the fruit and vegetable combine in western Canada. Regarding that request I wish to state that the situation—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member cannot make that statement just now; he may make it before the orders of the day are called.

LOAN COMPANIES ACT, 1914, AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 49, to amend the Loan Companies Act, 1914.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Explain.

Mr. ROBB: In the first place this bill adds section 54 to the group of sections which apply to companies incorporated before 1914 requiring loan companies to send copies of their financial statements to shareholders with the notice of annual meeting; (2) permits loan companies to increase by by-law their borrowing powers from four times their capital and reserve to eight times their capital and reserve, due notice being given to shareholders and debenture holders and the by-law being approved by the Treasury board; (3) makes it necesary for loan companies to obtain and have renewed annually licenses from the minister in order that they may be authorized to carry on their business; (4) requires all loan companies to file, on request, with the department, a certified copy of their by-laws; (5) substitutes the word "license" for the word "certificate" and makes it clear that it applies to old as well as new companies.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INSURANCE ACT, 1917, AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 50, to amend the Insurance Act, 1917.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Explain.

Mr. ROBB: The objects of the bill are as follows: (1) It gives all Canadian insurance companies the power to issue sinking fund; (2) increases the deposit to be made by British or foreign companies entering Canada to transact life or fire insurance business from $50,000 to $100,000; (3) makes applicable to no par value shares the conditions for eligibility as investments now contained in the Insurance Act regarding common stocks of par value; (4) permits to a limited extent the investment by Canadian insurance companies in the stock of other Canadian insurance companies, the limit of such investment by any company being fifteen per cent of its own assets; (5) gives to all Canadian fraternal benefit societies the right to issue old age endowments; (6) makes slight change in qualifications of actuaries eligible to make fraternal societies' valuations by adding to list members of the American Institute of Actuaries, and provides that actuaries to be eligible must be members by examination of the various approved institutes; (7) provides that in estimating margin of security provided by Canadian fire and casualty insurance companies any investment in stocks of other companies permitted by the amendment contained in section 4 above shall be disregarded.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WINDING-UP ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 51, to amend the Winding-Up Act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Explain.

Mr. ROBB: Under the bill parts III and IV of the act are merged, the amending clauses removing the suggested discrimination, in liquidation, in favour of Canadian policy holders, as against other policy holders of Canadian companies.

Another object is to make more satisfactory provision for the re-insurance of the policies instead of distributing the assets by way of dividend on the unearned premiums, or net values of the policies. Under the amendment the liquidator will have power to re-insure the business without the consent of the policy holders being first obtained. A new subsection is added to section 162. It is intended to overcome a condition created by a recent judicial decision by which certain rights were given to a class of company in connection with the deposit made with the minister. It is believed that a recognition of this decision would amount to a violation of the trust involved in the making of such deposits, and that this interpretation should be made impossible in future.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TRUST COMPANIES ACT, 1914, AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 52, to amend the Trust Companies Act, 1914.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Explain.

Mr. ROBB: This bill makes it necessary (1) for trust companies to obtain and have renewed annually licenses from the minister in order that they may be authorized to carry on their business; (2) for all trust companies to file, on request, a certified copy of their by-laws; and (3) there is a substitution of the word "license" for the word "certificate," making it clear that it applies to old as well as new companies.

Mr. BENNETT: Before the motion is put may I ask the Minister of Finance if he has considered these bills in the light of the revision of the statutes which is now taking place. It seems to me they should be passed as soon as possible, if they are necessary, and placed in the hands of the commission for the revision of the statutes. Because my hon. friend will remember the old story: You revise the statutes this year and then you have amending statutes the same session, and then the value of the revision in such matters is very limited. I am sure the Superintendent of Insurance will take the matter in hand and see that the revision takes place.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): May I say to my hon. friend that the commissioners appointed for the revision of the statutes are going to continue their work until the end of the present session, so that the legislation passed this session will form part of the revised statutes.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 53, to amend the Criminal Code (holding public games for charitable objects).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. CHURCH: The desire for this legislation has come from a large number of municipalities. The privilege is frequently sought to raise funds for relief work by social, church, charitable and patriotic associations, and mayors and wardens have been granting permits to raise funds for these worthy objects. This form of permit was not allowed when the code was drafted thirty years ago, and the object of the amendment is to make this form of permit legal now for the above charitable objects. Many municipalities have petitioned for the change, which is introduced at the request of the municipalities.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DOMINION FOREST RESERVES AND PARKS ACT AMENDMENT

CANADIAN HISTORIC PARKS

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 54, to amend the Dominion Forest Reserves and Parks Act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Explain.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The objects of this bill are to change the name of the parks from "Dominion parks" to "Canadian National parks" and to provide statutory authority for the administration of the small areas commonly known as historic sites and monuments that are hereafter being called Canadian historic parks. It is considered that the parks have now become of sufficient national importance that before any change is made, either in the way of an addition or a withdrawal, there should be an open discussion of the matter on the floor of the House, or in other words that no change can be made without a special act of parliament. That is practically all that is provided for in the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ST. REGIS INDIAN RESERVE

CONTROL BY SUPERINTENDENT GENERAL

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 55, to provide for special control by the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs of certain islands in the St. Lawrence river being part of the St. Regis Indian reservation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In the Indian act provision is made for doing just what this bill proposes to do, namely to lease lands, but there is not full provision for leasing lands that are already under lease. Inasmuch as these lands have been in some cases for ninety-nine years held under lease with a provision in the lease that there be a continuation of it for a further ninety-nine years—and indeed it is somewhat indefinite—action was taken in the Exchequer court by the Department of Indian Affairs to cancel these leases. It will be understood by the House that there are no Indians residing on these islands but they are very valuable as summer resorts. As regards the islands designated in the bill we have succeeded in cancelling the leases. There are two or three as to which a decision of the court is still pending. We are asking for power not to sell these islands but to lease them and to get a reasonable revenue out of them for the maintenance of the Indians.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 56, to amend the Indian Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The first purpose of the proposed amendments to the Indian Act are to give the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs power to deal with small amounts accruing to the bands in the way of band funds where in some cases the bands have become almost extinct, and to allocate these moneys in the interest of the Indians. The second provision is that we shall have more complete control over pool rooms and places of amusement upon the reserve, and the third is as follows: Under the act as it exists at present all changes in the regulations, and particularly in connection with those dealing with the appointment of Indian chiefs, have to be enacted by order in council. We are asking that this may be accomplished by the Superintendent General without reference to the council. Paragraph 6 is repealed and there is a provision for the repression of intemperance and profligacy. This is to give the council of chiefs themselves more power and to make clearer the meaning of the definition giving them more power to take action.

There is the question of carrying out the temperance laws, which it has become somewhat difficult to enforce, and we are asking wider powers in that connection. In British Columbia we are asking for some control over the sale of totem poles, which are of great historical value and which have been disposed of and sold without let or hindrance, indeed without the Superintendent General or the department being able to exercise any control whatever. These are the main provisions of the amendment to the act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

INSURANCE OF FRENCH-CANADIAN WOMEN

Mr. BOULANGER:

1. Is the government aware that certain insurance companies demand an extra premium on policies issued in favour of French-Canadian women?

2. If so, does the government intend to introduce legislation to stop such unfair discrimination?

Hon. Mr. ROBB: The government is aware that higher rates have in some cases in the past been charged French-Canadian women, the extra charge being, it was claimed, justified by the mortality experience of this class of insured risks. It is believed, however, that the practice has been abandoned and that little cause for complaint will be found in the future.

SOUTH INDIAN—CHANGE OF NAME TO LIMOGES

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton):

1. Has any change been made by the Post Office department in the name of South Indian post office, in the county of Russell, Ontario?
2. If so, what is the present official name of this office, and is there any other office of the same name in Canada? If so, where?
3. Why was a change of name made in respect of this office?
4. At what date was the change authorized?
5. Was any petition presented by the local residents in favour of such change of name?
6. If so, how many petitioners signed such petition?
7. Was any petition presented against such change of name?
8. If so, how many petitioners signed such last-named petition?
9. How and by whom was the new name of this post office selected?

Hon. Mr. VENIOT:

1. Yes.
2. Limoges. No other post office of same name.
3. Petitioners stated South Indian has no meaning. There are no Indians in neighbourhood and name provokes ridicule.
4. Authorized 23rd October, 1926, effective 1st December.
5. Yes.
6. 59.
7. Yes.
8. 246.
9. Recommended by petitioners who stated it was name of former parish priest held in high esteem, whose ancestors came from Limoges, France.

CHINESE SITUATION

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

1. What has Canada done to protect Canadians in China during the present disturbances in that country?
2. What protection is now being afforded such Canadians and at whose expense?
3. If Canada is contributing to the expense of such protection, how and to whom is the contribution made?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This question relates to the situation in China and I will therefore read to the House the reply which I propose to make to it. The reply will perhaps serve to answer other questions on the order paper and what it might otherwise be necessary to say in reference to one of the motions of which notice has been given.

The protection of life and property, in any country, whether of nationals or of aliens, is primarily the duty of the government of that country. Of late, civil war in China, now of several years' duration, has increased the difficulty of ensuring that protection, and the evacuation of certain interior areas by foreign residents has been considered an advisable precaution. At the same time it must be recognized that the loss of life by foreigners in these years of disturbance has been extraordinarily small. So far as is known, only one Canadian has been killed; the existence of a political motive in that case, which occurred in June, 1926, was not fully established, and the murderer was shot immediately by Chinese soldiers.

Canada is in full sympathy with the desire of the Chinese people to secure control of their own destiny, having due regard to the safety of the life and property of foreign residents. While there are extremist elements in the situation, it is clear that as regards the responsible leaders and the great majority of the Chinese people, the present nationalist movement is directed, not against the lives or private rights of foreign residents but against the special privileges or the measure of control over Chinese affairs exercised by foreign countries as regards extra-territoriality, customs, concessions and other matters. Canada has not in the past had any part in shaping or maintaining the policy of acquiring such rights or privileges in China, and has had no part in the recent negotiations for their readjustment. The Canadian government is, however, in full sympathy with the British Foreign Secretary's announced policy of "going as far as possible to meet the legitimate aspirations of the Chinese nation," and believes that this course is both just and best adapted to ensure protection of life and of religious and business interests.

Under these circumstances it is not considered that it would serve any useful purpose to propose despatching Canadian forces to China. If the situation should change the government will take the earliest opportunity of consulting with parliament as to the appropriate course to pursue.

SIR AUGUSTUS M. NANTON

Mr. WOODSWORTH:

1. What sums of money, if any, were paid during the war to Sir Augustus M. Nanton?
2. For what services?

Hon. Mr. ROBB: The late Sir Augustus M. Nanton was a member of the general executive and the head of the organization for the province of Manitoba in the three victory loan campaigns, 1917, 1918, and 1919. The records of the Department of Finance indicate that he served in these capacities without remuneration.

If my hon. friend desires to inquire from any other department his question will have to stand as an order for a return.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PUBLIC PURCHASING AND CONTRACTS

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River):

1. In regard to public purchasing and allotment of public contracts under federal government, what is the amount in dollars of purchases and contracts allotted: (a) total for year 1925-26; (b) total allotted under open competition; (c) total allotted departmentally; (d) total allotted under authority of the government contracts supervision committee?
2. In regard to the government contracts supervision committee, what is the present situation as to: (a) extent of establishment; (b) cost of establishment; (c) nature of duties performed?

4. What is the total cost for the Dominion?

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

Mr. SEGUIN:

What annual amount does the government pay for the functioning of the Civil Service Commission, as to salaries of commissioners and all employees including travelling costs, rentals, and any other expenditure in connection with said commission?

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT, 1915, AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in the measure to amend The Special War Revenue Act, 1915, as passed by both houses of parliament at the last session but not assented to, providing

(a) for the removal of the one cent additional postage on letters for transmission by post for any distance within Canada; excepting "drop" letters and post cards;

(b) for the remission of the stamp tax on receipts;

(c) for a straight tax on playing cards, on every fifty-four cards or fraction thereof in each package—ten cents per pack;

(d) for a provision to remove doubts as to whether goods are liable to sales tax when sold under process of law, or under a lien, etc.;

(e) for the exemption of certain specified articles from consumption or sales tax;

(f) for adding certain specified articles to the list subject to 50 per cent of the sales tax;

(g) for removing the tax on carbonic acid gas;

(h) for a refund of tax paid on ships' stores;

(i) for the removal of excise taxes on automobiles valued at not more than $1,200, when the conditions prescribed in the said legislation are fulfilled as to importation from any British country under the British preferential tariff, or from countries enjoying most favoured nation treatment, or as to automobiles produced or manufactured in Canada, and authorizing a refund of excise tax on such automobiles new, unused and unsold in the possession of the dealer or agent on 8th June, 1926; and

(j) for the repeal of certain orders in council relating to the operation of these provisions.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this resolution covers legislation arising from the budget of 1926. The measure to be submitted is identically the same as that which passed both houses of parliament, but which failed to receive royal assent. The principal parts of the legislation were made effective by order in council dated July 14, 1926. There is no change whatever in the general principle of the legislation.

Motion agreed to.

MONTREAL HARBOUR COMMISSION

LOAN OF $12,000,000 FOR TERMINAL FACILITIES

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in the measure to authorize a loan to the harbour commissioners of Montreal in an amount not exceeding $12,000,000, to carry on the construction of terminal facilities, upon approval of the Governor in Council of detailed plans, specifications and estimates for such works and the deposit of debentures of the corporation to cover said loan, which legislation was passed by both houses at the last session, but which failed to receive the royal assent owing to the dissolution of the House.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

This is the same resolution, Mr. Speaker, that preceded the bill of last year for a loan to the harbour of Montreal.

Motion agreed to.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY

SUBSTITUTION OF CANADIAN NATIONAL FOR GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC SECURITIES

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved. 1. That it is expedient to bring in a measure to confirm the scheme of arrangement, dated 26th August, 1926, with the holders of the four per cent debenture stock of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company issued pursuant to chapter 100 of the statutes of 1906 and chapter 123 of the statutes of 1913, whereby the Canadian National Railway Company may, by by-law approved by the Governor in Council, create and issue new stock in exchange for the certificates registered in the name of the holders, for a like amount or the like aggregate amount as the case may require.

2. That the amount of the new stock shall not exceed in the aggregate £7,176,801 par value, being the par value of the balance of the total issue of £10,176,801 of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company stock now outstanding after deducting from such total issue the certificates representing £3,000,000 of Pacific stock held by His Majesty in the right of the Dominion of Canada as collateral security for advances made by His Majesty to the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

3. That the new stock shall carry interest as from 1st July, 1926, at the rate of two per cent per annum, payable half-yearly, and a sinking fund is to be set aside each year for redemption of stock equal to two per cent.

4. That the Governor in Council may authorize the guarantee by His Majesty in the right of the Dominion of Canada of the due and punctual payment of the principal and interest of the new stock, and the provision for and application of the instalments of the sinking fund, and other relative clauses of the scheme of arrangement.

5. That upon the said scheme of arrangement being carried out, the Governor in Council may, on such terms and conditions as may be necessary in the public interest, declare that the receivership of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway is terminated, and upon such termination the said company or any company included in that system, may be amalgamated with the Canadian National Railway System upon the recommendation of the Minister of Railways with the sanction of the Governor in Council.

6. That the scheme of arrangement having already been assented to in writing by the holders of three-fourths in value of the Pacific stock, shall, according to its terms, become operative on the passing of an act of the parliament of Canada approving the scheme and authorizing the Canadian National Railway Company to create and issue the stock, and authorizing the guarantee above mentioned to be given.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. DUNNING: The object of the scheme, which can be much better examined in detail when we reach the committee stage on the resolution, is to clear up a difficulty of very long standing in connection with the four per cent perpetual debenture stock of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, conditionally guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada. As I think every member of the House is aware, there has been difficulty for a number of years with regard to this matter. I think every member of the House knows that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company is still to-day in receivership very largely, if not altogether, on account of the difficulty created by this particular issue of stock being outstanding. The issue which we seek to deal with is a perpetual issue; that is to say, it never matures. Anything which is done in connection with it, therefore, must be done either by way of purchase in the open market of the whole stock, which might prove to be difficult, if not impossible, or secondly, by way of negotiation.

I do not propose to go into the history of the difficulty at length, except to say this: as a consequence of the difficulty there undoubtedly has existed in England, and in Europe generally, a feeling that Canada was not dealing fairly with these debenture holders. The matter has been discussed in parliament, and I feel sure that every hon. member present who is familiar with the facts believes that Canada has dealt justly with the holders of the Grand Trunk Pacific perpetual debentures in the past. Just as it takes two parties to make a quarrel, however, so also it requires agreement between two parties in order to bring that quarrel to an end—at least where perpetual debentures are concerned—and for some time past negotiations have been conducted with committees representing debenture holders in London with a view to amicable settlement and avoiding litigation. I think I am correct in saying that the arrangement proposed in the bill was reached as between the committee of the debenture holders and representatives of the Canadian National Railway during the month of August, and the arrangement here proposed was, I believe, authorized by the government then in office in the Dominion of Canada. The present government has examined it very carefully in detail, and has no hesitation in recommending it to the consideration of the House. Briefly, it provides that such of the present debentures as are in the hands of the public, amounting to something over seven million pounds, shall be taken up by a new issue of Canadian National debentures, the new issue to bear interest at the rate of two per cent per annum. There is a further provision that two per cent shall be placed in a sinking fund, the proceeds of the sinking fund to be used for the gradual retirement of the debentures.

We can go much more readily into the further details in the committee stage, but in the meantime I should like to say that there is no doubt that there is advantage to Canada and advantage to the Canadian National railways from these points of view. First we have the elimination of the accounting necessary to keep the results of the operation of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada separate, and make it possible to reduce considerably our accounting work and expense. Another important advantage is that it will enable the present receiver of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company to be discharged and permit that company and its lines to be amalgamated with the Canadian National system. I think we may say that another advantage is that this bill, if passed, will eliminate any possibility of a lawsuit which might involve prolonged and expensive litigation, and there is no doubt it will create a better feeling in London and the continent towards Canadian securities and enterprises generally.

Mr. GEARY: Is this the four per cent debenture stock which was adjudged in the arbitration to be of no value?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, no.

Mr. DUNNING: No, these are debentures of the Grand Trunk Pacific.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): My hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) asked me if we on this side would assist in expediting the passing of this measure through the House. As it is a proposal which has many apparent advantages, both for this country and for the bondholders who hold those perpetual debentures, we on our part thought that we should do all we could to see that the measure passed through the House with as little delay as possible. I agree with my hon. friend that the passage of this measure will have the effect of setting at rest, upon a satisfactory basis, rather an awkward situation that arose some years ago and has continued to exist down to the present time between the debenture holders in Great Britain or other places and the government of Canada in respect of these debentures. The debentures were originally sold to the public to the extent of about seven million pounds. The government of Canada became the possessor of three million pounds of debentures through a transfer from the old Grand Trunk Pacific at a time when it asked the government of Canada for assistance, and gave three million pounds of those debentures by way of security. The debentures were not only a charge on the Grand Trunk Pacific, but likewise a charge on the old Grand Trunk system, but only when the profits on the Grand Trunk system would warrant the payment of the interest on these debentures.

Mr. DUNNING: After prior charges.

Mr. GUTHRIE: After interest on prior securities has been provided for. They were not in one aspect of the case of great value to the Dominion of Canada. However, the real value of these debentures has been a matter of a good deal of difference of opinion. Now the arrangement, as stated by the Minister of Railways, appears to me to be made upon a very satisfactory basis. We are paying two per cent annually to the holders of these debentures. We are taking up the old debentures, issuing new ones on the basis of two per cent per annum, and providing an additional two per cent to pay off the debentures, I suppose in some forty or fifty years, although the term is not stated in the resolution. I therefore think it is our duty in this House to carry through this arrangement. It appears to be fair and reasonable in all its terms and satisfactory to all parties concerned to carry it through as speedily as possible.

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent this motion is made.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee on the resolution, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. CHURCH: This resolution is one of very great importance, and the minister has not given the House all the information about the particular arrangement made with the shareholders in this connection.

The arrangement is not fair to Ontario. About $122,000,000 credit and $22,000,000 cash were taken out of Ontario by the Grand Trunk and invested in the Grand Trunk Pacific. The Grand Trunk, who were the parent company, brought the government in as a quasi partner and when the Grand Trunk Pacific went to the wall a receiver was appointed. A survey was made by the government and the case heard of the holders of the common four per cent stock of the Grand Trunk Pacific company by a royal commission. The Grand Trunk Railway took all this cash and credit out of the old Grand Trunk Railway in Ontario, when the Liberal government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier sanctioned the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific through the parent company, the Grand Trunk Railway. On whose credit? Very largely the Grand Trunk Pacific on the credit of the Grand Trunk railway in the old province of Ontario and the federal government. Ontario suffered untold ills as a result of the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific. We have invested over $2,000,000,000 in the publicly owned roads; about half of this is a frozen asset, pays no interest at all and has no sinking fund. If we are going to adopt this principle of allowing the holders of certain stock of a bankrupt road in the hands of a receiver to exchange it for new stock of which the government will guarantee interest, I say it is not in the public interest; it is tantamount to robbing one class of investors in order to pay others—that is, robbing Peter to pay Paul. The construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific impoverished the Grand Trunk Railway to such an extent that for nearly sixteen years Ontario suffered all the inconveniences incident to a very inadequate transportation service by the Grand Trunk system. There was no money for rolling stock or equipment or even for the ordinary betterment of the railway, with the result that the farmers of Ontario suffered very serious inconvenience. I sympathize with the shareholders named in the resolution, but I fail to see why they should be singled out for preferential treatment, especially when the unfortunate depositors in the Home Bank are getting what is little better than pin money. We are being over generous to this particular type of investor.

I am going to vote against this resolution in protest against the scheme of arrangement entered into with the holders of the four per cent debenture stock of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway. In my opinion a survey should be made of the whole system. There should be a full investigation of the Grand Trunk Railway and the other railways incorporated in the Canadian National railway system, instead of taking Sir Henry Thornton's word for this or that. It must be remembered that this is not the only company we took over; there are some fifteen or sixteen charters linked up in the one system now known as the Canadian National Railway, all with separate claims and in separate conditions. Consequently if we confirm this arrangement we may have the stockholders of some of the other constituent companies asking for preferential treatment. In my opinion the committee should have more information concerning this particular arrangement, and we should also have a declaration of policy from the Minister of Finance as to how it will affect the deficits of the National Railways and, in turn, the credit of the country. I repeat, Mr. Chairman, I am going to vote against this resolution.

Mr. POWER: Mr. Chairman, it is not often that I agree with my hon. friend from Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) on any subject, but it seems to me that in this case far more information should be given to the House than is at present before us. For instance, I should like the minister to tell us just what legal right the debenture holders have to be paid on this stock; I should like also to know from him just what the arbitration board decided with reference to this matter; and generally speaking, I should like to know why we are disbursing approximately $35,000,000 on stock which apparently is worthless; and, further, I should like to know why we make a reimbursement on this particular debenture stock when there are other stocks and bonds which have been taken over by the Canadian National Railway and on which no dividends are being paid. Apparently there is no chance of ever obtaining reimbursement in those cases. I have in mind bonds subscribed by the city of Quebec and issued by the old Quebec and Lake St. John Railway. If my memory serves me right, the city of Quebec, in order to help the construction of a railway into the northern portion of Quebec, subscribed nearly $1,000,000. In return the city received bonds and also a written agreement whereby it was to be given certain favoured treatment with regard to freight rates. Since this road has been taken over by the Canadian National Railways, the management of the national system has seen fit to repudiate the obligations of the original road, and also apparently to repudiate any obligations under the agreement. No interest is being paid, and there appears to be no chance of any reimbursement. Before voting any money as public charity to people who, after all, are not citizens of this country, I would ask the minister to consider very carefully the claims of our own citizens.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps if I had been a little more familiar with the procedure it would not have been necessary for hon. members to ask me for information, but I was under the impression when I last spoke that all that was required was a general statement sufficient to justify the House going immediately into committee on the resolution. I did not give a complete explanation of such a complicated matter at that stage, believing in my ignorance that these matters would naturally arise on the various sections of the resolution itself in the committee stage, and that on that occasion questioning would be much easier for hon. gentlemen than when the Speaker is in the chair. Perhaps I am wrong in that regard; if I am I apologize.

First, as to the rights of bondholders. The assumption on the part of the hon. member (Mr. Church) and my hon. friend from Quebec South (Mr. Power), that this proposal has some charitable aspects, is I am sure entirely wrong. These people have rights. Let us examine what they are. We want to be just but, of course, we want also to conserve the interests of our own people. My hon. friends will agree with me, I think, in that regard. These people have, not shares, not stock, but bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, bonds apparently never maturing and bearing a rate of interest of four per cent per annum. These bonds are guaranteed in turn by the old Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada. The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, the original issuer of the bonds, cannot pay the interest, nor has it done so. The old Grand Trunk Railway Company has paid interest only in those years when it has earned sufficient, over and above prior obligations, to be able to pay. The last occasion on which interest was paid under the terms of the bond was in 1924, by reason of the fact that in 1923 the old Grand Trunk had earned sufficient, over and above prior obligations, to make payments of interest to holders of Grand Trunk Pacific securities.

Now, I put it to the committee merely as a business proposition—not as a charitable proposition at all—that it is desirable in the interests of Canada and of the Canadian National Railways to get these perpetual debentures into a better position, a position which will permit the termination of the receivership at present existing in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific, and which will render our liability in relation to them certain rather than uncertain, as it is at present—a position, furthermore, which looks to the termination of what is at present, and will continue to be, a perpetual lien, unless something of this kind is done.

Mr. BENNETT: When was interest last paid?

Mr. DUNNING: In 1924, as a result of 1923 business of the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

Mr. POWER: Is there any cumulative feature about it?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. POWER: So that we are not actually under any obligation until the Grand Trunk Pacific has earned enough to pay?

Mr. DUNNING: Not the Grand Trunk Pacific but the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

Mr. CLARK: Has the business of the Grand Trunk Railway Company justified the payment of interest since 1924?

Mr. DUNNING: Certain bondholders allege that it has; we say that it has not.

Mr. CLARK: Are the accounts not kept separately? How did you arrive at the fact in 1924? Is the same system not in vogue to-day?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, but there is a dispute, as always is the case in such matters, as to whether the proper system is being followed. Naturally those desiring to collect interest make representations to the effect that if some other system were followed a better result would be shown. In matters of interchange of traffic, and so on, it is difficult to get absolutely accurate figures, but the same principle of accounting has been followed in either case.

Mr. CLARK: Was there any dispute in 1924?

Mr. DUNNING: No, not with respect to the earnings of the old Grand Trunk Railway as an entity separate from the rest of the Canadian National System.

Mr. CLARK: In that case the earnings of 1924 must have been much better than they have been since.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, on that particular part of the Canadian National system which must be considered in determining whether or not the guarantor is in a position to pay interest after taking care of prior obligations.

Mr. CANTLEY: At what rate of discount were the bonds issued?

Mr. DUNNING: I have an historical resumé which I will try to find for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. POWER: Why did not the minister include these bonds in the bill which he asked the House to sanction last year permitting him to purchase certain bonds which had been guaranteed by the government? Is there any difference between these bonds and those referred to in the bill?

Mr. DUNNING: Had the legislation which I introduced last year been enacted it would have included provision for just such cases as this, but that legislation was not passed.

Mr. CHURCH: A royal commission investigated this matter and made a report to parliament with reference to the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway. The members of that commission were the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton), Mr. Acworth, and Mr. Smith, then president of the New York Central Railway. A receivership was established for the Grand Trunk Pacific and an application was submitted to the commission by the four per cent debenture holders of the system, and the commission made a report touching this particular situation. If I remember rightly, they made no recommendation in favour of these people inasmuch as they had been foreclosed.

Mr. DUNNING: They never were foreclosed.

Mr. CHURCH: Are you going to give this particular class of shareholders preferential treatment now?

Mr. POWER: Why was this matter not referred to the Exchequer court? If the debenture holders have a legal claim, they might, by appealing to the Exchequer court, have the whole question discussed and a remedy applied. From what the minister tells us, I think perhaps in equity there may be something to be said for these shareholders, but I see very little to be said in their favour in law. It is unfortunate that these people should lose money, but other people throughout Canada have lost money on other occasions and we have never voted fifty million dollars to pay them.

Mr. DUNNING: I have not yet made myself clear. There is no legal question involved. The rights of the bondholders are not in dispute at all; those rights are clear.

Mr. POWER: Their rights to dividends are in dispute.

Mr. DUNNING: Their rights to dividends are not in dispute, provided the conditions precedent to the payment of dividends are complied with.

Mr. POWER: Then it is only a question of fact: can the Grand Trunk Railway Company pay dividends on their earnings or not? That ought to be established elsewhere than in the House of Commons.

Mr. DUNNING: In any year in which the Grand Trunk Railway does earn sufficient to pay interest, in that year interest is paid. And that will be the case in future. If we do not pass this legislation the four per cent payment is due these bondholders in any year in which the old Grand Trunk lines earn that much over and above prior obligations. That will continue to be the position unless some other arrangement is made. We are however adopting the position that we can best solve the matter by agreeing to pay four per cent every year, two per cent of which will go into the sinking fund for the redemption of principal under the conditions which will be outlined in detail in the bill when the scheme of arrangement is before the House. We think it better, from the point of view of Canada, to agree to pay four per cent every year, two per cent of which will go into that sinking fund for the redemption of principal, rather than to place ourselves in the position of having perhaps to pay four per cent in any year in which the Grand Trunk may earn sufficient to make that possible. It is a purely business negotiation, not a legal matter.

Mr. POWER: Is the minister optimist enough to think they will be able to pay four per cent?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend forgets that the Grand Trunk did earn this interest in 1923.

Mr. BENNETT: It did last year too.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like the minister to state whether, in view of the financial situation of this road at present, it is probable that it will be able to pay in the near future.

Mr. DUNNING: The old Grand Trunk?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. CHURCH: I have here the report of the Drayton-Acworth commission and I wish to make a short quotation from it. It deals with the finding of the commission in regard to this particular application. The report says:

Our inquiry has fully satisfied us that the Grand Trunk management was content at the time with the arrangement made; that it deliberately took its business chances, and proceeded with the undertaking. On the evidence there is nothing whatever to justify any charge of lack of fairness or good faith on the part of the government in its dealings with the company. We have no hesitation in saying that, neither legally nor morally, have the promoters or shareholders of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company any basis for a claim that the country shall make good the Grand Trunk's mistaken investment in the Grand Trunk Pacific. Any aid given to them must be looked upon not as a matter of obligation but as spontaneous bounty.

The question is really so left by the Grand Trunk officials themselves. The record reads (page 176), as follows:

"Sir Henry Drayton: Doesn't it really come down to this, that the statements in your letter mean that in your view, in order to protect the finances of the Grand Trunk, and as a corollary to protect the finances of the country, the government ought to relieve the Grand Trunk in regard to its investment; isn't that the whole thing?

Mr. Chamberlin: That is the whole thing.

Sir Henry Drayton: There is nothing else to it?

Mr. Chamberlin: Nothing else."

There is the finding of the commission that was appointed to investigate this particular application.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is quite wrong. That is not dealing with the same matter at all but with an entirely different matter.

Mr. CHURCH: It is not a different matter. It is this particular application, and it is all set out in the proceedings from which I have quoted. The commission were asked for this very relief and they would not give it.

Mr. DUNNING: Unless the committee is to get a wrong impression may I explain that the quotation which my hon. friend has just read has not the remotest bearing upon the matter which is now before the House. The report of the commission from which my hon. friend has just quoted has to do with the rights of the shareholders of the old Grand Trunk. I am not now proposing, nor do I expect to propose, any measure of relief for the shareholders of the Grand Trunk. The shareholders! This proposal has to do with the people who hold an absolute security in their hands—bonds, not shares at all. My hon. friend is quoting what relates solely to the shareholders' interests in the old Grand Trunk.

Mr. BENNETT: I am quite certain that my hon. friend is under a misapprehension.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. BENNETT: I was saying that my hon. friend was under a misapprehension. The four per cent perpetual debenture stock of the Grand Trunk Pacific was placed on the London market, and the prospectus that was issued referred to the relationship between the company and the government. The stock was bought by investors believing—in many instances they believed, and they say they have established that at least—that it practically carried the guarantee of the government of Canada. Such was not the case. Canada did not guarantee this stock; it was four per cent stock guaranteed by the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the thing to remember. The Grand Trunk Pacific could not pay the interest, as it did not earn sufficient. The Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada was then called upon to pay this interest. They responded that they had not in particular years earned sufficient money to pay the interest upon the prior securities and the interest upon these as well. The result was that there was default in the payment of interest upon this perpetual four per cent debenture stock. There being default in the payment of interest the holders of this stock have always complained that the people of Canada should have paid it.

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Mr. BENNETT: Successive governments of Canada took the position that they were not responsible for payment, and so have declined to pay the interest. But in 1923 the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, after paying the interest upon its securities having priority over these other guaranteed securities, was called upon, out of its earnings, to pay the interest because it had earned it. The difficulty since then has been this: Vast sums of money have been spent on the Grand Trunk railways; very large sums in equipment, in improvement of road beds, and matters of that kind; and the separation of the accounts inter-departmentally, the separation of earnings in the Grand Trunk, the Grand Trunk western, the Canadian Northern and the various branches of the Canadian Northern, and the various branches of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada has made it practically almost impossible for the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, now a part of the Canadian National railway system, to say it has not earned the money. Under those circumstances the holders of the debentures constituted a committee of very powerful bankers in England and they were prepared on the advice of counsel to have the accounts of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada examined for the purpose of proving conclusively that the railroad had earned the money. That was their position, and they contend now that the railway company earned money during the years 1924, 1925 and 1926 to enable it to pay these guarantees. Eighty-five per cent or more of these debenture holders, represented in England by eminent bankers, negotiated with the Canadian National railway system and reached a conclusion, a conclusion which is embodied in the resolution now before the House. Under the terms of that resolution the Canadian National Railway System in this country will pay, not four but two per cent per annum upon this four per cent perputual debenture stock thus saving two per cent. The other two per cent is to be paid into a sinking fund so as to amortize or pay off within a period of fifty years this entire obligation.

Mr. DUNNING: Thirty years.

Mr. BENNETT: It will never take fifty years of course. The result is that we have removed a sore spot from financial circles in England which is of some importance to this country. But above that we have made it possible to operate the Canadian National system as a whole and are not forced to try to maintain the different accounts that would have to be maintained in order to ascertain just what earnings of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada might be made applicable to this particular guarantee. That position will be cured, that difficulty overcome, and there is the further advantage that this arrangement has been approved by eminent men in the financial world in England who had to do with it as one that was calculated to be first of all in the interest of the railway system, secondly in the interest of the debenture holders, and lastly in the interest of this country, as removing a grievance that the four per cent debenture holders in England have asserted continuously for a period of twelve years in the financial journals of London. That is the position. That is the reason the resolution is in the form it is, and certainly I have no difficulty in bringing my mind to the firm conclusion that it should be supported by the House, as I did several months ago when it met with the approval of the Governor in Council, which had to be given at that time to close it out in order that it might be submitted to parliament by the government of the day, whatever government that might be, and legislation embodying the arrangement enacted by this House.

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): Is the hon. member in a position to tell the committee the market value of those bonds prior to the 26th August, 1926?

Mr. BENNETT: I have not the figures before me. They are rated on the stock exchange in London. I know however, that a two per cent bond secured with an amortization clause of two per cent does not enhance the value of that security, except that it gives a measure of certainty to it when there was a measure of uncertainty which would have involved the Canadian National system in litigation in respect to keeping accounts and showing in detail what might be available for the purpose of meeting this guarantee.

Mr. DUNNING: The question raised by the hon. member is of course a question which must be considered in all these cases whether, as a result of these negotiations, speculative features were introduced which might have resulted in profits to individuals who happened to know of the arrangement earlier than other individuals. In connection with this particular case the nature of the arrangement, if examined by anyone at all independently, will reveal that such a result was not possible, and moreover the market prices of the stock before and after the arrangement became public are a clear indication of what the position is in that regard. If my memory serves me aright, I can assure my hon. friend that the prices at that time ranged between 60 and 70 cents on the dollar. I have not the day-to-day prices before me. A very representative committee of bond holders was negotiating the matter and negotiating it in public. The question was dealt with in every issue of the financial newspapers for the past two or three years.

Mr. BENNETT: It was sold down as low as 47 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: I think that was the low point. That was when their hopes were the very lowest. The point I was about to make is this: the fact that 85 per cent—and the last cable from London indicates it as more than 90 per cent—of the bondholders, immediately after the terms became public, consented to the arrangement, is evidence that there was no great amount of the stock floating around for speculative purposes, but that they were holding on in the hope of making some reasonable arrangement.

Mr. LAVIGUEUR: The debate that is going on just now is very interesting to members from Quebec. The minister states that there is no direct legal obligation to take up this stock. For the past ten years we have been vindicating the right of the city of Quebec. We asked the late government —and we had the approval of our party at that time as we have it to-day—to reimburse the citizens and the city of Quebec for the amount subscribed for the construction of certain parts of the Canadian Northern railway and the Lake St. John railway for which the citizens and the city of Quebec had subscribed more than $650,000, and moreover had for certain considerations handed over very valuable properties to the government. We were always met with refusals, being told that there were no legal obligations to take up the bonds of the city of Quebec, subscribed by the citizens of Quebec. To-day however, although we are told that there is no direct legal agreement, we are asked to vote an amount of $35,000,000 to take up bonds which, as stated by my colleague the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) a few minutes ago, belong to outsiders, to strangers. The bonds subscribed by the citizens and the city of Quebec are an obligation on this government, and if we take up outside bonds I do not see why at the same time we should not include bonds subscribed by the citizens and the city of Quebec.

Mr. DUNNING: I understand the situation of the city of Quebec to which my hon. friend and the hon. member for Quebec South referred to be not exactly as he stated. He again falls into the error the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) fell into in confusing stocks and bonds. In the case of the city of Quebec they own stock in one of the companies now comprised in the Canadian National system, namely, the Quebec and Lake St. John railway. I believe that is the case to which my hon. friend refers.

Mr. POWER: Both stock and bonds.

Mr. DUNNING: Whatever legal rights any citizens of Quebec may have with respect to any bonds which they hold secured upon any part of the Canadian National system, they have just the same right as these other bondholders. But as regards the ownership of shares they are again precisely in the same position as the junior shareholders of the Grand Trunk; that is to say, they cannot get anything unless the property of which they are shareholders earns something. There is no other way.

Mr. POWER: That is to say the bondholders in the old Quebec and Lake St. John railway may at some time obtain the interest on their bonds if that portion of the railway pays.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is a very good lawyer himself and he knows that would depend entirely upon the term of the bond and the term of the mortgage upon which the bond is placed. That is a purely legal question that my hon. friend knows better than I do.

Mr. POWER: The minister said that we were in exactly the same position as the bondholders of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway.

Mr. DUNNING: In principle.

Mr. POWER: I understand we are trying to make a bargain with the bondholders whereby, instead of waiting to find out whether or not the Grand Trunk will ever earn enough to pay the interest on these bonds, we are simply saying that we have hopes in the future of the country; that we think the Grand Trunk will some day make enough money to pay this interest, and we decide we are going to do it ourselves.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It does.

Mr. POWER: If it does, what is the necessity of this legislation? The Minister of Justice does not understand the situation any more than I do.

Mr. LAPOINTE: His understanding seems to be very small.

Mr. POWER: I think I will explain to the minister I know more about it than he does.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps my hon. friend would let me answer the question.

Mr. POWER: I want to answer the Minister of Justice first and then I will answer the Minister of Railways. The minister has just stated the Grand Trunk earns enough to pay the interest on these bonds. If that is so, why come before parliament for legislation authorizing the payment of the interest? If it is not so, then we are anticipating the time when the Grand Trunk will pay the interest and we say, in order to save a little money, two per cent, we have such faith in the future of the railroad that we are going to pay the interest in advance. At the present time we are not making money on the road and so we do not have to pay the interest. The bonds remain there. Some day in the future, maybe a hundred years hence, we shall be able to pay the interest. Why not wait those hundred years? Why should we not wait for the bull to come to us before we take him by the horns?

Mr. DUNNING: Principally because the bull is here now.

Mr. POWER: If he is here, why the legislation? I have not understood yet why we have the legislation if we can do it without it.

Mr. COOTE: Would the minister be good enough to tell us in how many years the Grand Trunk has failed to pay this interest? I understood him to say that they paid it in 1924. In how many years did they fail to pay it?

Mr. DUNNING: I think 1924 was the only year since 1915 in which the interest was paid. I will get the exact information for my hon. friend in a few moments, because I want to be sure I am right, and the whole history of this matter is rather complicated. My impression is, however, that 1915 was the last year in which interest was paid up until 1924, and it has not been paid since 1924.

Mr. COOTE: My reason for asking the question is that it seems to me the information would help us to determine whether this stock is of any value or not. If interest had been paid at four per cent in only one year out of ten, that would seem to be an indication that the agreement to pay two per cent every year is very much in the interests of the bondholders, rather than in the interests of the National Railways and of this country. In addition to that, the minister says that there will be a great saving effected in the matter of bookkeeping. I presume there would be some saving there, and I suppose the minister has some idea of what that saving would amount to. Possibly he would inform the committee on that point. If we had that information it might help us to determine whether or not this agreement would be in the interests of the country.

Mr. DUNNING: With reference to my hon. friend's first question, I must confess that it embarrasses me, and for this reason: If I advance facts to prove that the old Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada is likely to earn this four per cent every year in the future, then I am saying to the old country bondholders that this arrangement takes away from them two per cent per annum to which they are entitled. If on the other hand I do not state that, then my hon. friend and those who sympathize with his view will say that it is not a good deal from the point of view of the Dominion of Canada. Our best judgment has been exercised upon this question; we believe the future will demonstrate that it is a good deal so far as the Dominion is concerned and a fair deal from the point of view of the bondholders. Further than that I do not want to go, and I would ask my hon. friend not to press me for a definite statement as to the basis of calculation with respect to future earnings.

Mr. COOTE: It seems to me the minister is imputing to me an entirely wrong motive. I think anyone would agree that the two questions which I asked were merely for information to enable me as a member of this committee to try and determine whether this agreement was in the interests of Canada or not. If I have got a correct understanding of the last remark the minister made, he simply wants us to believe that in his opinion this is a good agreement, and therefore we should swallow it.

Mr. DUNNING: That is unfair.

Mr. COOTE: It is unfair if we cannot ask questions without having the minister assume that attitude.

Mr. DUNNING: I had no intention whatever of assuming any attitude of reflection. I was merely pointing out the embarrassing position in which the minister is placed, in the very nature of things, in negotiations of this kind. I had no intention at all of reflecting on my hon. friend or on his motives. But it is a simple fact that if I answer my hon. friend by stating that we are reasonably sure the old Grand Trunk will from now on earn the four per cent called for by the existing debentures, then I am serving notice on the bondholders in the old country and elsewhere that the deal which they have agreed to takes away from them two per cent of the interest to which they would have been entitled had they kept their original bonds. I do not propose to make any such statement. But I can say, having examined the whole matter very carefully, with more care than I have given to any other financial transaction, that I am satisfied it is better for the Dominion of Canada to issue these new bonds than it is to retain the old bonds and the obligations under them. I simply ask my hon. friend to accept that assurance; or he can get from me, otherwise than publicly, facts and figures which I feel sure will convince him that I am right in that regard.

Mr. POWER: It all boils down to this, that we have not before us information sufficient for us to give a judgment on this matter, but we have the word of the Minister of Railways that in his opinion this is a good transaction for the country. I quite understand the nature of his dilemma, and in so far as I am concerned I am prepared to accept his word and will make no further objection. I will go further and say that I am prepared to tell those outside who do not know the minister as well as I do that they should accept his word for it whether they believe it or not.

Mr. GARDINER: What is the total amount involved in this transaction?

Mr. DUNNING: The total is £7,176,801, of which £3,000,000 is held by the Dominion treasury at the present time.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: Provided there is a period of great development in Canada and that this railway company should have increased earnings in the future, is there any possibility of the bondholders coming back on the country for increased payments in view of the increased earnings of the road?

Mr. DUNNING: Ninety per cent of the bondholders have voted to accept this arrangement, have voted to accept a new bond the terms and conditions of which will be set out just as exactly as were the terms and conditions of the old bonds, and the rights of the bondholders will be restricted absolutely to the terms of the bond itself, just as they are in the case of the bonds we are now endeavouring to retire. There will be no question of any further claim with respect to these particular bonds.

Mr. SPENCER: Can the ninety per cent of the bondholders speak for one hundred per cent, or will there still be a liability with respect to the other ten per cent?

Mr. DUNNING: The legislation which I hope to introduce based on this resolution, and which by the way will explain a great many of the questions that I know are in the minds of many members of the committee, contains a provision whereby the acceptance by seventy-five per cent of the bondholders makes the agreement binding upon the one hundred per cent. That is in conformity with the general practice in the old country in that regard, and is well understood by the people interested. We are fortunate, however, in having ninety per cent in favour of the agreement, which is about the maximum we could expect, because there is bound to be a percentage of the bondholders who have disappeared in various ways and cannot now be found.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Do I understand that, according to law, if seventy-five per cent of the bondholders assent to this arrangement it is binding upon the other twenty-five per cent?

Mr. DUNNING: That will be one of the provisions of the bill when it comes before the House, but for the information of the committee I may say that we already have assent from ninety per cent to the proposed arrangement.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not quite understand. Is there some manner by which the other twenty-five per cent can be coerced into accepting a measure of this character?

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will await the terms of the arrangement itself, the details as to how that is to be carried out will make that matter more clear to him than I can do at the moment.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think the total amount of the issue was £10,176,000, of which the government held £3,000,000 and the balance, £7,000,000, is outstanding. The minister said the total was £7,000,000, of which the government held three, so that there would be only £4,000,000 outstanding.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is correct; I used the wrong figures. I should have said that £7,176,000 was the amount now outstanding, and that in addition to that £3,000,000 are held by the Dominion treasury.

Mr. KELLNER: Did the Grand Trunk arbitration, appointed in 1918, make a return of the value of these securities?

Mr. DUNNING: No, the matter was not directly before that tribunal, which was dealing with the value of the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada. These bonds represented one of that company's liabilities. The bonds are not an asset of that company but a liability, and I have not any doubt the liability was taken into account by the investigators who were endeavouring to arrive at a proper value for the Grand Trunk property.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 57, respecting the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company and respecting the Canadian National Railways.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. DUNNING: I understand the bills are not distributed. If I could move along tomorrow with the second reading it would be quite satisfactory.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It would be satisfactory so far as we are concerned.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT ACT, 1919, AMENDMENT

Hon. ROBERT FORKE (Minister of Immigration) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider a proposed resolution with respect to revaluation of soldier settler lands.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Minister of Labour) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider a proposed resolution with respect to old age pensions.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Would the Minister of Labour inform us whether there is any change in the proposal as set out in the resolution from the bill which was before parliament last year?

Mr. HEENAN: It is identically the same bill.

Motion agreed to.

ROYAL AGRICULTURAL WINTER FAIR ASSOCIATION OF CANADA

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the granting of financial assistance to the Royal Agricultural Winter Fair Association of Canada, for the purpose of erecting and equipping a building or buildings in the exhibition park at Toronto, to be used to display for public inspection the live stock, agricultural and dairy products of Canada.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

LONG TERM FARM LOANS

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the appointment of a board to be known as the Canadian Farm Loan Board for the purpose of issuing farm loan bonds to make long term loans to farmers.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

DISSOLUTION OF LATE PARLIAMENT

REQUEST FOR CORRESPONDENCE

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) requested that—> —at as early a date as possible all correspondence which took place between the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen and His Excellency the Governor General, then Lord Byng, in June or July last, with reference to the dissolution of the then parliament, and all correspondence which took place between the same persons with reference to the resignation of the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen last autumn; and at the same time and in the same connection all correspondence which took place between the present Prime Minister of Canada and His Excellency the Governor General in the month of June last in regard to the resignation of the then government or in regard to the dissolution of the then parliament—should be laid on the table of the House. I ought to say to my hon. friend that I have no knowledge of any correspondence that has taken place between the former Governor General, Lord Byng, and Mr. Meighen, either in relation to the formation of the government of which Mr. Meighen was the head or with regard to other matters; nor is there, so far as I am aware, any correspondence of the kind on record in the departments of the government. Communications between the Governor General and the Prime Minister, whether verbal or written, are as a rule regarded as confidential, and in that respect they are not similar to most communications that pass between heads of departments of state and others.

With respect to the communications between the former Governor General, Lord Byng, and myself with regard to dissolution of parliament last year and as to my resignation at that time, I have personally no desire either to withhold those communications or to lay them on the table of the House; certainly I would not think of publishing them without consulting Lord Byng in the first instance. I shall cable Lord Byng and ascertain whether he is agreeable to having the communications made public; if he is, I am perfectly agreeable. But I would say to my hon. friend that communications of this character, if of any value, generally find their way into volumes of reminiscences and memoirs, and I should think that he and hon. gentlemen opposite would be very glad to have them so appear rather than make their appearance otherwise at too early a date.

I wish to say, however, that if these communications are to be brought down it must be distinctly understood that it is because hon. gentlemen opposite so desire, and not because of any wish on my part to reopen an incident which I am quite content to regard as closed.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Certainly.

ANTI-DUMPING DUTY ON USED PIANOS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOHN MILLAR (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance the following questions:

1. Is a duty being levied under the Anti-Dumping Act on used pianos entering Canada?
2. Under what section of the act is such duty levied?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Questions of this nature should be put on the order paper.

CARILLON POWER DEVELOPMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there is one other piece of information I asked for yesterday in the absence of my right hon. friend the leader of the government with regard to copies of all orders in council relative to power development on the Ottawa river at Carillon falls. If I could have those laid on the table it would oblige me very much.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Copies of the orders are being prepared for placing on the table. I hope to have them ready to-morrow.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

INDIAN TRIBES OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, there is a question that I should like to ask the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), but in his absence perhaps the right hon. Prime Minister will give me his ear for a moment. For many years there has been pending the question of the status of the Indian tribes of British Columbia and their right or title to lands in that province. To my personal knowledge it has been before the public for seventeen years—I was asked to preside at the first meeting when I was acting mayor of Vancouver some seventeen years ago —and it has been pending ever since, without very much warrant in some respects, and at great expense to the Indians. While I have not much sympathy with some of the views entertained by those who are agitating the question, nevertheless I do think it is desirable to satisfy and quiet the Indians in regard to it. I am anxious to co-operate in giving them every opportunity to have the question settled, but I do not think any headway will be made if it is allowed to drift any longer. I do not say this by way of criticism at all, I offer it rather as a suggestion. I would ask the Prime Minister if the government would consider the appointment of a small select committee to hear the representatives of the Indians and give the question study in order to see if we cannot bring it to a conclusion.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I may inform my hon. friend that I have of late been giving some thought to the question of status in our inter-imperial relations, but the status of the Indian tribes of British Columbia is a subject to which I am afraid I have not given the attention that I should like to have been able to devote to it. In the absence of the Minister of the Interior, who has been considering the matter very carefully, I think I had better say to my hon. friend that I will draw his remarks to the attention of the minister and ask the minister to communicate to him the views of the government when he is next in the House.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PURCHASE OF ROLLING STOCK IN THE UNITED STATES

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) a couple of questions based on an announcement which appeared in the Wall Street News of the 8th instant, as follows:

The Chicago, Burlington & Quincy has ordered 1,000 freight cars, and the Canadian National Railways has placed a similar order with the Pressed Steel Car Company.

Will the Minister of Railways kindly say if that is true? And if it is true, is he aware that there are a number of big plants devoted to the manufacturing of cars idle in this country, including one in my own city, in the activity of which I am naturally interested?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways): It is the policy of the Canadian National to have manufactured in Canada all of the equipment for its Canadian lines that can be manufactured in this country, and of necessity they must have a very large portion, if not all, of the equipment for the American lines manufactured in the United States. I have no doubt that the item to which my hon. friend refers relates to some equipment for American lines. In a few moments I hope we shall be in committee of supply on Canadian National estimates for the current year and I will then give detailed information regarding equipment.

Mr. MANION: Will the minister try to have this information either then or tomorrow?

Mr. DUNNING: I may have it by me now.

RULES OF THE HOUSE

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER REVISION

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): There is one more matter to which I desire to call attention: I refer to the revision of the rules of debate in this House. I had an opportunity of a few moments' conversation with my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in regard to the report made by a committee of the House last year on the question of improving the rules. I want to suggest to my right hon. friend before the session is too far advanced, that another committee be appointed to consider the question with a view to bringing forward some remedy during the present session.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The government is in entire accord with my hon. friend as to the desirability of having the rules considered at an early date. I am informed by the whip on this side that the names of members of the committee, so far as we are concerned, are ready, and he is now waiting to get the names of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. GUTHRIE: On the rules?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. We hope to have the motion brought in either tomorrow or the day after.

Mr. SPEAKER: I may add for the information of the House that the rules were revised by a committee two sessions ago. The report was laid on the table but was not considered last year in view of the length of the session. All that the new committee would have to do would be to reconsider the report, which I am sure would be adopted unanimously. The committee at that time was unanimous, and it should not be difficult to rally its members to the support of the committee of 1927.

FRUIT AND VEGETABLE COMBINE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Minister of Labour): The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) the other day requested certain details in connection with expenditures in relation to the fruit and vegetable combine in western Canada and I promised to make a statement on the subject. I now do so.

The situation with respect to the fines imposed in connection with the combine in the distribution of fruit and vegetables in western Canada is as follows. The trial in this case resulted in the conviction of four individuals and four companies. The individuals were sentenced to one day each in jail and to a fine of $25,000 each. The corporations were sentenced to fines of $25,000 each. All of the fines imposed, totalling $200,000, were paid immediately following the trial, and no part of them has since been remitted. The amounts were paid into the British Columbia court and subsequently transferred to the provincial treasury. The federal Department of Justice is negotiating with the provincial attorney general with a view to the transfer of these funds to the Receiver General of the Dominion. The cost of the investigation and the prosecution amounted to $116,724.53, the fines therefore exceeding the cost by $83,275.47. With respect to the expenditure I am laying on the table of the House a detailed statement as promised.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS

The House in committee of supply, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Railways and Canals—Loans to Canadian National Railway Company

Amount not exceeding $31,000,000 to meet expenditures made or indebtedness incurred (where amounts available from net operating income or investments may be insufficient) by or on behalf of the Canadian National Railway Company, herein called "The Company," or any company specified or referred to in chapter 13 of the Statutes of Canada, 1919, and chapter 13 of 1920 or now or hereafter comprised in the Canadian National Railways or by the company in respect of any railways, properties and works entrusted to it from time to time under the provisions of section 11 of chapter 13 of the statutes of Canada, 1919, or any one or more of such companies, on any or all of the following accounts, such expenditures or indebtedness being herein called authorized expenditures:—

(a) Interest on securities, notes and other obligations; rentals for lease of lines;

(b) Equipment principal payments; sinking funds; miscellaneous maturing or matured notes and other obligations secured or unsecured;

(c) Operating income deficit, whenever incurred or ascertained;

(d) Construction and betterments, including co-ordinations; acquisition of real or personal property.

The amount herein authorized may be applied from time to time to meet authorized expenditures, in the discretion of the governor in council:—

(a) In respect of railways, properties and works entrusted to the company as aforesaid;

(b) In respect of railways, properties and works not so entrusted by way of loans in cash, or by way of guarantee, or partly one way and partly the other, subject, however, as follows:—

If by way of loans from His Majesty, the amount or amounts advanced to any one or more of the said companies shall be repayable on demand, with interest payable half-yearly at the rate fixed from time to time by the governor in council, secured if and when directed by the governor in council by mortgage or mortgages upon such properties, in such form and containing such terms and conditions, not inconsistent herewith, as the governor in council may approve.

If by way of loans from persons other than His Majesty (without the guarantee of His Majesty) the amounts, terms and conditions of such loans shall be such as the governor in council may from time to time approve.

If by way of guarantee, any such guarantee may be either a general guarantee covering the total amount of the issue, or by a separate guarantee endorsed on each obligation, and may be of the principal, interest and sinking funds (if any) of the notes, obligations or securities of one or more of the said companies specified by the governor in council, which notes, obligations or securities the companies so specified are hereby authorized to make and issue, and such guarantee may be signed by the minister of finance, or such other person as the governor in council may authorize, on behalf of His Majesty, in such form and on such terms and conditions as the governor in council may determine to be appropriate and applicable thereto. Any guarantee so signed shall be conclusive evidence for all purposes that the provisions of this enactment have been complied with.

Should temporary loans be made or negotiated before the lapse of this appropriation either from His Majesty or other persons, guaranteed notes, obligations or securities may subsequently be issued under the provisions of the preceding paragraph of this enactment to renew, refund or adjust such loans, or any part thereof.

Each company herein mentioned or referred to is hereby authorized to aid and assist, in any manner any other or others of the said companies, and, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, may for its own requirements and also for the requirements of any or all of such other companies from time to time:—

(a) Issue notes, obligations or other securities, joint or several, at discretion, for the purpose of any guarantee made or to be made under the provisions of this enactment;

(b) Apply the proceeds of any such guaranteed issue, or the amount of loans received by virtue of this enactment, in meeting authorized expenditures on its own account or on account of any or all of such other companies;

(c) Make advances for the purpose of meeting authorized expenditures to any or all of such other companies, upon or without any security, at discretion.

No purchaser of such guaranteed notes, securities or obligations shall be under any obligation to inquire into the application of the proceeds of any guaranteed issue.. .. .. ..$31,000,000.

Mr. STEVENS: In his explanation will the minister say whether there is any change in this item?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways): That is what I propose to do. Perhaps I should make a general statement to the committee regarding the estimate now under consideration. It is for the Canadian National Railway Company and has relation to the detailed estimates which were examined and reported upon favourably last session by the select standing committee which deals with Canadian National Railways and shipping. Only $10,000,000 of the $31,000,000 was however voted last session, and so we are bringing down the whole vote again on this occasion. There are some changes which I should report to the committee, changes which might require a reference again to the special committee; but in view of the fact that these changes are few in number, possibly the House will be able to deal sufficiently with them in committee of the whole instead of sending them back to the select committee.

The first difference I would call to the attention of the committee is in the wording of the resolution itself. One of the difficulties we had experienced in connection with the former wording was this: whenever temporary loans were made it was impossible, under the wording of the resolution as formerly adopted, to fund these temporary borrowings during the year in which the authority was operative. On that account the present resolution is altered in that respect. The change will be found in the second paragraph on page 2:

If by way of loans from persons other than His Majesty (without the guarantee of His Majesty) the amounts, terms, and conditions of such loans shall be such as the governor in council may from time to time approve.

And in the next paragraph but one:

Should temporary loans be made or negotiated before the lapse of this appropriation either from His Majesty or other persons, guaranteed notes, obligations, or securities may subsequently be issued under the provisions of the preceding paragraph of this enactment to renew, refund, or adjust such loans, or any part thereof.

The intention is to enable our long term financing to be done at one time during the year instead of having repeated issues. The object is to enable us to fund temporary loans and thus put all our borrowings for one year together into one considerable transaction, if it proves wise to do so, rather than make a number of small loans. There will be a considerable saving of interest by the adoption of the new wording because it will enable the railway to establish short time banking credits for their requirements, afterwards funding them in accordance with the terms of the resolution by the issue of guaranteed securities.

Now with respect to the estimates themselves, there are one or two changes in detail which I might point out.

Last year, as members of the select committee will remember, provision was made for the purchase of $5,000,000 worth of new equipment for the Canadian National system, $1,000,000 to be secured from the Minister of Finance and $4,000,000 from equipment trust securities under the plan which has now been in operation for some time with respect to financing Canadian National railway equipment. Now that the year is nearly over the management of the system find it necessary to increase their equipment very materially, and I am requested to ask the House to make provision for $20,000,000 worth of new equipment instead of $5,000,000 worth. That $20,000,000 would involve an advance of $5,000,000 from the Minister of Finance instead of $1,000,000 as last year. The balance will be provided by equipment trust obligations in the regular manner.

For the benefit of hon. gentlemen I might give particulars as to the new equipment which should be ordered forthwith for the various parts of the system.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is that the new schedule you have there?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, I have the new schedule here.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If it is not too long perhaps my hon. friend will read it.

Mr. DUNNING: I was about to do so. On the Grand Trunk Western, that is our western lines, the following equipment is needed:

Grand Trunk Western

12 mountain type locomotives at $75,000	$ 900,000
10 switching locomotives at $40,000	400,000
6 baggage cars at $20,000	120,000
2 combination mail and baggage cars at $24,000	48,000
1,000 automobile cars at $2,100	2,100,000
100 ballast cars at $3,000	300,000
10 air dump cars at $3,000	30,000
20 cabooses at $3,000	60,000
Total	$3,958,000

That makes a total of $3,958,000 for equipment for the Grand Trunk Western.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Did the minister say United States equipment?

Mr. DUNNING: I did not say United States equipment. I spoke of the Grand Trunk Western which comprises our United States lines.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): That is what I meant.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, the United States lines.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): That means that the equipment will be bought in the United States.

Mr. DUNNING: I think all of it. We must do that under the relations that exist between the two countries regarding tariffs, the regulations of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and all that sort of thing.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I do not like to interrupt the minister but I must point out that the United States company operating railways in Canada do not have any of their equipment made here.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend can suggest a means whereby we can get some of the work for our United States lines done in Canada we will be very happy to give consideration to it.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): I should have thought that was a matter for the authorities, for the railway management or the government.

Mr. DUNNING: It must be remembered also, in fairness to the United States, that we make money operating a railroad there.

United States traffic will pay interest on this equipment which we are purchasing for the lines over there. In fairness we should say that.

Mr. BENNETT: Are we going to guarantee equipment trust issues?

Mr. DUNNING: Not at all. Perhaps I should qualify that by saying that all equipment trust issues are made on the basis that $1,000,000 of cash must be provided for $5,000,000 of equipment. So the proportion of one to five would hold in the case of this $3,958,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Twenty per cent must be put up in cash?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, but there is no government guarantee of the balance.

Mr. CANTLEY: What is the rate of interest?

Mr. DUNNING: On the last issue four and a half per cent.

Now I presume my hon. friends wish the whole list placed on Hansard for the sake of convenience. The Central Vermont railway, which is another United States line controlled and operated by the Canadian National Railways—

Mr. BENNETT: And which is losing money.

Mr. DUNNING: Which is losing money, as my hon. friend states.

Mr. BENNETT: For which the Canadian people are paying.

Mr. DUNNING: For which the Canadian people are paying. I will not get into a party controversy with my hon. friend, but certain suggestions are emanating from the Minister of Finance just now as to the responsibility for taking over that railway.

Mr. BENNETT: We had the responsibility for the whole railway mess in this country placed this afternoon upon the late Liberal government. The legacy we are taking care of was bequeathed by them and the Minister of Finance knows it.

Mr. DUNNING: I do hope that we need not, in considering these business matters, get into a political controversy. My hon. friend well knows there is a very effective answer to the remarks he has just made, and I do not doubt that he could come back again. In the meantime, however, the business of the railway would not be under consideration by this committee.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. BENNETT: The answer to my statement has not yet been discovered.

Mr. DUNNING: To resume:

Central Vermont Railway

4 mountain type locomotives at $65,000.	$260,000
2 gas electric motor cars and trailers.	115,000
2 gas electric motor cars and trailers.	115,000
15 milk cars at $5,000	75,000
Total	$565,000

So that for the Central Vermont railway we require $565,000 for railway equipment.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): That equipment will be built in the United States.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): For which we are paying as in the case of the other line.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps my hon. friend would wait until the main estimates are down before he comes to the conclusion that Canada is going to pay for all of this equipment. I gave a very plain statement a year ago as to the position of the Central Vermont in relation to the whole system. It would be unfair to make an extreme statement either way. It is true the railway is losing money, but not to the extent which involves payment by us of the whole of an amount of this character. Now let me take the Canadian lines:

Canadian Lines

20 mountain type locomotives at $85,000	$ 1,700,000
20 Mikado type locomotives at $75,000	1,500,000
1 electric locomotive at $70,000	70,000
25 first-class cars at $34,000	850,000
12 baggage cars at $25,000	300,000
13 dining cars at $47,500	617,500
5 compartment-observation cars at $50,000	250,000
4 combination baggage and second-class cars at $33,000	132,000
30 sleeping cars at $47,083	1,412,490
20 sleeping cars at $47,083	941,660
50 express refrigerator cars at $10,000	500,000
60 freight refrigerator cars at $4,900	294,000
200 freight refrigerator cars at $4,900	980,000
40 tank cars at $3,700	148,000
800 automobile cars at $2,400	1,920,000
1,000 box cars at $2,700	2,700,000
50 cabooses at $3,000	150,000
1 rotary snow plough	61,500
20 wing snow ploughs at $10,000	200,000
Total	$14,727,150

That is $14,727,150 of equipment for Canadian lines, as against $3,958,000 plus $565,000 on American lines. There is sales tax in connection with the Canadian equipment amounting to $736,357 which brings the total cost of the equipment required for Canadian lines to $15,463,507, or a total of $19,986,000, approximately, the amount stated.

Mr. MANION: I should like to ask the minister a question in regard to the inquiry I made on the orders of the day. There is only one item in the list he has read that covers the item, if it was correct, which I read from the Wall Street News, and that was 1,000 steel cars or box cars. The only item of 1,000 cars mentioned in the list given by the minister just now is 1,000 for Canadian equipment, and this statement which I read says that an order had been given by the Canadian National Railways to a United States company for 1,000 steel cars on the United States side. There was nothing of that sort in the United States equipment the minister mentioned.

Mr. DUNNING: One thousand automobile cars.

Mr. MANION: It is possible that covers it. I took it to be box cars.

Mr. DUNNING: It is, of course, practically a box car.

Mr. MANION: That may be the item. Would the minister do me the favour of looking into the question and seeing if it is correct? I presume he has not the information with him at the moment but he can give me an explanation later.

Mr. DUNNING: This is the complete statement of the proposed equipment orders of the Canadian National Railways, and in itself is a complete check against any newspaper statement. I hope my hon. friend will not ask me to go inquiring if this or that newspaper statement is correct when in to-morrow's Hansard he will have exactly what the Canadian National proposes to do.

Mr. MANION: While that will be in Hansard, there is just this brief sentence in this paper and if the minister could instruct his secretary or whoever he wishes to have this checked up, it would not be very much trouble to him and we would be sure of it. I do not question this item at all but I wish to know the facts in regard to the matter. If it turns out to be as the minister states it is, I have no special criticism of it, but I should like to know that, in view of the fact that a number of immense plants on the Canadian side are idle.

Mr. DUNNING: We will have it checked up, although I thought, as my hon. friend is not quite as busy as I am—though he will be later—he might make a comparison in Hansard himself.

Mr. MANION: While my hon. friend is a very busy man, he is a hard worker and I am sure he will do this for me.

Mr. DUNNING: I will attend to it.

Mr. BENNETT: The question of providing money for equipment is one of the most important in connection with the operation of a railway. If this railway is not setting up any reserve, as was the custom with railways in days gone by, the result will be that we are merely confusing the whole situation. I remember at an annual meeting of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company the president of the company told the shareholders that the Canadian Pacific made it a rule out of earnings to provide a new car for every one that was worn out in service. Whether or not that is being done depends upon the system of accounting that prevails on this road. It is difficult to think that this system, after having spent the enormous millions that we did a few years ago for equipment, should now come back asking for $15,000,000 more if we have been putting aside reserves year after year to take care of the equipment that has become worn out in service. That is the position to which attention should be directed, because after all in the long run the country has to provide the money one way or the other. If there are any deficits, those deficits must be provided by the country. If we are being misled into the belief that we are making money when we are not, that is something that should be attended to without delay. If this equipment is being worn out and no adequate reserves set up to provide for the replacement of a worn out car with a new one, the system that prevails is not right. That is all that can be said about it. The matter perhaps can be more fully developed when we have an opportunity of examining the accounting system of the road.

Hon. members in past years complained very bitterly of the expenditures made on the Canadian National to provide equipment. This amounted not to $15,000,000 but to many more millions of dollars. I do not have the exact figures in my mind at the moment. Enormous sums of money were spent on new equipment and if adequate reserves were set up to provide against wear and tear, depreciation of these cars from time to time, there should be a substantial fund to take care of the replacement of worn-out equipment with new. In that way it would not be necessary to commit us to the spending of further sums of money without any relation to reserves as we are being asked to do to-day. The answer my hon. friend makes is that Canada is not guaranteeing these equipment securities; but on the other hand the money has to be found for these equipment securities and the result will be that at the end of the year if the obligation is met, there is that much less money with which to pay the interest upon the fixed charges of the system. That matter should be very carefully inquired into, and I suppose when we have occasion to investigate before a committee of the House the system of accounting that prevails on the road, an opportunity will be given for such an inquiry.

Mr. DUNNING: I am sure that the system of replacing car for car does prevail, with the exception that if the new equipment is twice as large as the old, one might replace two, and as regards locomotives, the tractive power is of course the basis of comparison. My hon. friend's observations give me the opportunity again to emphasize the value, in connection with an enterprise of such wide ramifications as the Canadian National Railways, of the small committee which it has been the custom of the House in recent years to appoint for the purpose of examining the officers of the system itself regarding all of those matters of finance, accounting, operation and so forth. By means of that special committee inquiry may be made in less formal manner than is possible in the House itself. Very shortly I hope to propose again to the House that a select standing committee be appointed to deal with matters affecting the Canadian National railways and shipping. As was the case last session I intend to propose to that committee, that we again permit any member who so desires to bring any special matter before the committee or, through the committee, before the management or any of the officers of the road. The committee should, and I hope will, extend that privilege to all members.

I have satisfied myself that this equipment is or will all be vitally necessary by the time it can be delivered from the various plants and work shops which will be engaged in the production of it. I would like the committee to understand that this proposal does not involve an increase in the aggregate of the Canadian National vote proposed at the last session; but because of the situation developing more favourably than was then expected we are able to provide for investment in this new equipment without asking the House for any more money than that of which the House voted a third one year ago.

Mr. MATTHEWS: May I ask what is to be the term of the equipment trust bonds, and whether they will be issued in the usual serial form, maturing year by year? The usual term I think is ten or fifteen years. These equipment trust bonds have been regarded as a very high grade security, and have always commanded very high prices in the market. If these bonds are to be issued in that form, it seems to me that the question raised a moment ago is answered.

Mr. DUNNING: That is correct. The usual term of equipment trust securities is fifteen to twenty years. They are always issued in serial form, which means that a proportion of the principal is retired, and must be retired, each year out of earnings.

Mr. CANTLEY: There are surely no equipment trust bonds for a term as long as twenty years.

Mr. DUNNING: We are using the fifteen year term.

Mr. GEARY: Did I understand the minister to say that the Canadian National Railways set up a depreciation reserve year by year to cover the cost of property used up in the company's service?

Mr. DUNNING: Every year a proportion of the loan made for the original purchase of a car is retired out of earnings. That of itself constitutes, of course, a depreciation which is equivalent to the wiping out of the whole cost of the car within fifteen years from the issuance of the obligation.

Mr. GEARY: That is fifteen per cent of your book cost every year?

Mr. DUNNING: Is my hon. friend referring to cars not purchased under the equipment trust system?

Mr. GEARY: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: In the case of cars not purchased under the equipment trust system, every one which goes out of service is replaced by its equivalent out of earnings.

Mr. GEARY: There is no depreciation fund set up for that.

Mr. SPENCER: The minister in giving us a list of the equipment for the Grand Trunk western lines said that they would need a certain number of the mountain type locomotives, and I believe he gave the price as $75,000 each. Later on he gave us a list of the equipment needed by the Canadian National lines, and as far as I could hear, I gathered that the price for a similar type of locomotive was in that case $85,000.

Mr. DUNNING: That is correct.

Mr. SPENCER: The first mentioned locomotives were being made in the United States, and the others would be made in Canada. I would like to ask why there is this difference of $10,000 for a similar type of locomotive?

Mr. DUNNING: The figures in each case are merely estimated, and while the words "mountain type" are used, that should not be taken to signify that the locomotives are identical, for you may have a twenty-five per cent, a fifty per cent, or a sixty-five per cent mountain type locomotive. It is simply a question of type. I am not able to say at the moment whether identically the same locomotive can be purchased cheaper in the United States than in Canada, but I shall be glad to get that information. My deputy informs me that they are cheaper in the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: The locomotives are $10,000 cheaper in the United States.

Mr. DUNNING: I was just answering the question and pointing out that the use of the words "mountain type" does not necessarily indicate identically the same locomotive.

Mr. HANSON: I understand that all the new rolling stock that is being used on the through expresses, such as the Ocean Limited has been purchased with money derived from the sale of equipment trust bonds. Is it the practice of the Canadian National Railways to charge against the government system—I would speak of it as the old Intercolonial—an annual or a per diem rental for the equipment used by that road, and is that a factor in the annual deficit shown on the Intercolonial? My reason for asking that is this, that the Ocean Limited and other through expresses are equipped with the so-called 6,000 type of engine, and I have been informed that the Canadian National Railway Company charges for the use of those engines a rental said to be as high as $175 a day. If that be the case, I can well understand how they will run up a very large bill against the Intercolonial system every year, and it would never be possible for the earnings to balance the expenditures under that system. If there is nothing in that, I would be glad to have the public know it.

Mr. DUNNING: I am very glad my hon. friend has given me an opportunity to explode that particular fallacy. I am glad to be able to prove that at least one imagined injustice does not exist. With regard to charges of the kind mentioned by my hon. friend for the use of locomotives or of cars, in this division or that, there is one great pool, into which is charged all that type of expense, and each division bears its proportion of that expense, having regard to the mileage of the equipment used in that particular division.

Mr. HANSON: There is a rental charge for the equipment used by the division?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, and it is the same all over the system.

Mr. HANSON: If that is the case, it is satisfactory.

Mr. DUNNING: It is merely a method of allocating charges properly to the various units of the system, and precisely the same unit basis is used all over the country.

Mr. MILLAR: I do not expect the minister to be in the inner confidence of the American railways as to the policy they are pursuing in Canada, but could he inform the committee whether the American railways in purchasing equipment for that part of their lines operated in Canada adopt the policy of buying any equipment in Canada?

Mr. DUNNING: Only to a limited extent. Naturally we have not precise information as to that, but so far as our information goes, the purchases in Canada are not very heavy. I understand that the Customs department is watching very carefully what the American railways are doing with respect to bringing their equipment into Canada for operating purposes, just as the American customs authorities are watching our railways in that regard. In fairness it should be stated that the Canadian National operates in the United States a far greater mileage of railways than is operated in Canada by all the United States railways put together.

Mr. MATTHEWS: May I ask the minister as to the average life of the equipment that is used on the railways nowadays? Years ago the equipment bonds were issued for a term of ten years. The minister says that he is issuing these bonds for a term of fifteen years, and that in some cases bonds are issued for a twenty year term. The minister will appreciate the fact that it is very important that the securities issued in respect of equipment should mature well within the life of the equipment. That is the only method by which you can have sound financing.

Mr. DUNNING: It is the only sound principle.

Mr. MATTHEWS: Quite so. Then I would ask the minister what is the average life of equipment nowadays; also whether, when these bonds are to be sold, tenders will be called for?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend's first question is a very difficult one to answer because of the transition which is taking place in the type and structure of the equipment used. We might, for instance, be discussing all steel equipment, or only part steel, or almost wholly wood equipment. If my hon. friend will bear that point in mind when the special committee is sitting, I am sure the officers of the road who are most intimately concerned with this matter will be able to supply the information he wants. The committee I am sure quite understands that I am not a railroad man. Such knowledge as I have of these matters has been acquired as a result of study in my capacity as minister, and it would not be difficult for any member to put questions to me which I cannot at the moment answer.

Perhaps the committee would now allow me to explain another variation from the estimate which was presented a year ago.

Mr. MATTHEWS: Would the bonds be sold by tender?

Mr. DUNNING: The sale was subject to the approval of the Minister of Finance, and I fully expect that tenders will be called for, But in the absence of the Minister of Finance I should not like to give a definite answer.

There is one other change, and it is the last change of any considerable importance in the estimate of last year. There are, of course, in the book of particulars placed before the committee last year many changes of a less vital character, but the important change is the request for authority to commence the extension of the Chateau Laurier, and provision is asked of $2,000,000 to enable a start to be made on that work. The management regards the enlargement of the Chateau Laurier as a matter of good business. I have here some facts in that connection which I will put forward for the consideration of the committee. It is proposed to provide not less than two hundred additional rooms and additional accommodation for banquets, balls and other facilities required of first class hotels. The gross revenue for 1926 was $865,408.38, an increase of $135,534.06 over 1925. In straight operation of the service rendered by the Chateau Laurier during the year a net surplus of approximately $180,000 was obtained. We, however, spent some $30,000 of this surplus in renewal of furnishings and equipment, which should have been spread over the operations of the past five years. Thus we show an actual net in operation of $150,746.83. That operating net, it must be borne in mind, does not include interest on the investment in the property.

Mr. HANSON: Depreciation on the structure?

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. In addition to this, during the first six months of 1926 the Chateau Laurier was filled to capacity 72 nights out of a total of 181; and during this period they were forced to offer some 1,500 guests who had registered at the hotel accommodation in sleeping cars parked at the Union station. Over 1,000 of these guests refused this accommodation and sought rooms elsewhere. There were also hundreds of guests seeking accommodation during this period who did not register when they were informed that the hotel was taxed to capacity.

Another condition existing at Ottawa, which I am informed by the management, has become most acute, is the fact that the Chateau Laurier banquet and ball room space is totally inadequate to take care of large functions, and many of a moderate size that are undertaken are very difficult and costly to handle. As an illustration of what we have had to refuse, in the latter part of December, 1925, and 1926, a party of winter tourists numbering three hundred and fifty, for three or four days, which would have netted the hotel approximately $10,000 to say nothing of additional money brought to the city of Ottawa.

There are other arguments put forward by the management in connection with the proposal, but these are the most vital. The addition of the proposed wings and accommodation asked for, I estimate conservatively, will produce for us an additional revenue of $300,000 per year, with an increased net of approximately $120,000. The management state that they are confident of being able to operate the completed structure with a net surplus sufficient to pay the full interest on the entire investment, from its completion.

Mr. BENNETT: After allowing for depreciation, how much will be invested there?

Mr. DUNNING: I am speaking now without having the actual figures before me. This new addition, together with furnishings and everything, will cost something under $4,000,000. The management has gone into the matter very carefully and very fully, and estimate that they will be able to make an earning on that basis. In the estimates now before the House however we are only asking for $2,000,000 to make a start on the work.

Mr. HANSON: This means an expenditure of $4,000,000.

Mr. CANTLEY: I should like to congratulate the minister on the statement brought down in regard to equipment. I have not a shadow of doubt that the equipment asked for is required; in fact I think some additional equipment is required by way of general service cars, none of which is provided for in the estimates. But when we come to consider the amount of money to be expended in Canada and the amount being expended in the United States, we find the proposal to be to expend for rolling stock in the United States practically one quarter of the entire amount. I submit that amount is out of all proportion to the Canadian National mileage in the two countries. If the minister will review our experience over a period of the last few years I do not think he will find that the United States lines are expending any considerable portion of money for equipment purchased in this country. In the old days the situation was different. At the time the Michigan Central ran a portion of their line through Ontario they had to and did buy their equipment to a large extent, in fact practically all of it, including spare repair parts, in Canada. We have departed from that system and have allowed the Americans to put one over in that regard, to use a common or slang expression. So far as the purchase of equipment by trust equipment certificates is concerned, if payment of these be limited to a period of ten or even fifteen years they will be practically taken care of. The question has arisen as to the life of steel equipment as compared with the former wooden equipment. Our steel equipment is not at present old enough to enable us to determine just what the life of such equipment is as compared with the life of wooden equipment. I am persuaded that the life of steel equipment is two and a half to three times greater than that of the former wooden equipment. If you fix ten years as the average life of wooden cars you can safely estimate the life of steel cars at twenty or twenty-five years. There is another important matter, as to the loss through collision and through the ordinary handling of freight on trains made up of the wooden equipment five and twenty years ago as compared with the present system. That is an item of very considerable importance and value in operating costs.

In that connection there is a matter I desire to bring to the attention of the minister. On the system we have a very considerable number of Grand Trunk Pacific wooden cars, built fifteen or sixteen years ago. Those cars are a menace to the operation of the railway and should be withdrawn from traffic altogether. I trust he will see to it that no money is spent on repairs to that type of equipment.

Let me call his attention to one other matter. On the service between Sydney and Halifax—

Mr. DUNNING: Will my hon. friend permit me? Apparently he is about to branch into railway management. I hope he understands that under the law I have absolutely no authority with respect to the question that he is now about to mention or with respect to the preceding question that he brought to my attention.

Mr. CANTLEY: I think the minister is anticipating something that I have no intention of saying. I am comparing the type of equipment on the line between Sydney and Halifax with that used on express trains on other divisions of the Canadian National Railway system. We have to put up with wooden equipment that is not in use on any other section of the government railways.

Mr. DUNNING: Will my hon. friend show me wherein this parliament has given either to myself or to the government any authority to decide what type of equipment shall be used on any portion of the Canadian National railway system?

Mr. CANTLEY: I am not dealing with any question of authority at all. I am asking the minister to provide steel passenger and sleeping cars for that service similar to those that he provides for the other branches of the road, and I do not want him to try to evade my request by suggesting that I am developing another line of argument; I am not. Within the last two weeks there was a very serious collision on the Canadian National railway in the maritime provinces, and I can assure him that if the equipment in use between Halifax and Sydney had formed part of either of the express trains involved on that occasion somebody would have had to answer for a large loss of life. I travelled from Sydney to New Glasgow a few nights ago in a car in which it was impossible to hear conversation because of the complaining, screeching and squeaking of the decrepit equipment. That particular sleeping car is I think older than the minister and should have been relegated to the scrap heap long ago.

Mr. DUNNING: Along with the minister.

Mr. CANTLEY: No; the minister is physically all right. I thank him for the explanations he has given in regard to many railway matters this afternoon; indeed, I wish particularly to compliment him on the very clear exposition which he made an hour or so ago. But I am deadly in earnest in asking him to take into serious consideration the matter of the Sydney-Halifax passenger equipment to which I have just referred.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CHURCH: The resolution under consideration involves an expenditure of $31,000,000 and if during the coming twelve months the members of this House find that agreements have been made, title deeds given, and rights of way conferred in regard to which they know nothing then they can only blame themselves, because if any hon. gentleman wants information concerning any of these questions or this system, this is the time now to ask for it.

I am a supporter of public ownership but I believe in the right kind of public ownership. I do not want to see public ownership in Canada repudiated because of mistakes made in the administration of our national railway system in regard to either capital or maintenance. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) has made a statement touching the situation, but it seems to me that the whole of this resolution which we are at the present moment discussing, as well as the following resolution with reference to the merchant marine, is about as illuminating as are some of the talks of Sir Henry Thornton over the radio; the one contains about as much information as the other.

With all due respect to the board of directors, I would point out to the minister that according to the returns of the Department of Railways the sum of $2,000,000,000 has been expended on our railways, a considerable proportion of which outlay constitutes nothing but a frozen asset. A very considerable portion of this vast sum does not pay any interest at all. I quote from page 13 of the report:

Guarantees

The funded debt, unmatured, held by the public amounts to $931,329,302.74, of which roughly two-thirds, or $674,947,283.77, is guaranteed. Of this last-named sum $581,372,903.51 is guaranteed by the Dominion and the balance, $93,574,380.26, by the several provinces, as follows: Ontario, $7,859,997.59; Manitoba, $24,389,892.18; Saskatchewan, $17,904,061.99; Alberta, $18,394,427.37; British Columbia, $25,026,001.13.

The balance is not guaranteed. I submit that something should be done to simplify our entire railway structure. What is parliament for? What is the railway commission for? We had an investigation into the railway systems of Canada in 1917 by Sir Henry Drayton, Mr. A. H. Smith and Mr. Acworth, and a large sum of money was invested in a survey both of the Canadian Pacific railway and of the component parts of the Grand Trunk railway, now the national system. Recommendations were made by these experts to parliament, and it was urged by those who knew what they were talking about that no new branch lines should be built without a special report to parliament by the railway commission. That recommendation has been absolutely ignored. Sir Henry Thornton is a law to himself and pays no attention whatever to the railway commission. Instead of these matters being decided by parliament, consisting of the Governor General and the two houses, we seem to have for the disposition of railway questions a fourth House namely the Governor General, the Senate, the House of Commons, and the house of Thornton. There is no control whatever over the president of the Canadian National Railway system. He is a law to himself over parliament.

As to this $31,000,000 of guarantees, what happened when the present minister's predecessor in 1925 was here? An original estimate of $75,000,000 was cut down to $30,000,000 and that vote was passed two years ago early in the morning in the dying days of the session. Towards the close of the session the government brought down a similar bill for betterments, branch lines, securities, the hypothecation of title deeds and so forth, and only two or three members on this side of the House were able at the time to ask any questions. What information did they receive? Why, it was of such little importance that the questions might as well have not been asked. Is parliament going to serve merely as a rubber stamp for the president and directors of the Canadian National system? I should like to ask the minister this question: Do the board of directors hold meetings, and what and whom do they direct? The list of the directors has the appearance to me more of a Liberal election executive or a Liberal campaign fund committee; certainly, in my opinion at any rate, they do not know enough about the administration of a two billion dollar property. We want to find out something about the system and to get some definite information as to how it is being operated and what are the functions of Sir Henry Thornton and the board of directors. While I am a supporter of the Canadian National system, I am bound to say that in my opinion it is not properly administered to-day and we are losing a lot of business in consequence. We are told that there is no politics in the administration of the railway. I say there is politics in it; there is a good deal of politics in connection with the administration of the railways in the district I come from.

So far as this particular vote of $31,000,000 is concerned, I do not propose as a representative of the people to vote for it until I know for what purposes it will be used. In 1921 the people of Ontario were so disgusted with the way in which they had been and were being treated by the Grand Trunk railway that they made a vigorous protest. Some $122,000,000 in cash and $23,000,000 or $24,000,000 in credit of the old Grand Trunk Railway had been taken and spent in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific and that system became bankrupt. Those who built the Grand Trunk Pacific railway were altogether too impatient to foist that expenditure upon the people of this country. The Liberals could not wait, and so we had this white elephant forced upon us.

It is all very well for the minister to say, as he said this afternoon, that there was no foreclosure regarding the Grand Trunk Pacific bill to-day. Let him read the Drayton-Acworth report and he will see just how the various systems are linked together and where the deadwood is. Well over $500,000,000 of the investment is paying no interest at all; as I say, it is a frozen asset. It is nothing but a liability, although the money was advanced to this railway, paid out of the till of the country in the form of cash, in land grants, subsidies in handouts and in various guarantees. Not satisfied with coming and rapping at the door of this parliament and begging for assistance, the builders of these railways appeared at the doors of the different legislatures of the provinces with an application for more handouts: they got a duplication of these various grants from the provinces of Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, British Columbia, and western Canada. The system went bankrupt; a receiver was appointed and it had to be taken over by the people of Canada—all due to private ownership, not public ownership.

The Grand Trunk Railway were partners with the government of Canada in the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific and then they wanted to hand back to the country the Grand Trunk Pacific, that white elephant, although the Grand Trunk were responsible for the construction of it. Let the minister read the report of the Department of Railways tabled the first day of the session, particularly with reference to capital and maintenance of this system. I would quote just a few lines:

> Attention was called by a special committee of the Senate, during 1925, to the fact that the increase in Canadian National Railway obligations during the last six years had averaged $100,000,000 annually, and the report in question stated that there was no assurance that, under the present system, this expenditure would materially decrease in the near future. During the last six years the increase in the funded and unfunded debt of the national railways has amounted to $636,655,760.21, but of this sum $153,105,854 consisted of interest due the government and added to the railway debt. It does not represent actual expenditure, is a book-keeping entry only, and rendered necessary by the rigid requirements of railway accounting. Apart from this government interest, the increase in railway debt during the last six years amounted to $483,096,636. But that sum includes all capital requirements and thus represents much more than deficits. No less than $265,068,560 has, during the period in question, gone into the actual improvement of the property by new construction, betterments, property acquirements and new equipment.

The report of the Railway department refers to the fact that a committee has been appointed each session for the past three or four years, known as the committee on railways and shipping, to go over these estimates both for capital expenditure and maintenance and see what should be done with them. Well, what kind of a committee is it? It is simply a board of strategy for Sir Henry Thornton and the National Railways to whitewash their proceedings and pull the wool over parliament's eyes. I have come to that opinion because I have attended meetings of the committee, and have here some nine or ten of their reports. Attempts were made on the floor of the House to elicit information as to what Sir Henry Thornton was doing. For example questions were asked as to the identity of a certain Mr. Gaston, a supposed American lawyer.

It was admitted in the committee that this gentleman was not a lawyer at all, but a graduate of the Yale law school. He was invited to come over to Canada which, it seems, is a happy hunting ground for Sir Henry Thornton's friends. It was announced in the Canadian press that Sir Henry Thornton had engaged his own staff to prepare plans for a hotel at Vancouver. He is very fond of going to the United States to get men to fill positions in connection with the National railways. How different was the course pursued by the late Sir Adam Beck in connection with the hydro electric system in Ontario. In the power development at Chippawa every engineer and other skilled person employed on the works was a Canadian. They had there some of the finest hydraulic engineers in the world, graduates of Toronto university, McGill university, Queen's and other Canadian universities. There is no position in this country that a Canadian cannot occupy, yet when it comes to filling places on the Canadian National system American citizens are favoured and brought over. They are now filling the highest positions on the National system, even the executive offices. Some of the American occupants of these positions call themselves vice presidents, but the fact that they do that does not make them vice presidents in reality; a lot of these high officials do not know any more about railways than I do. There is no use disguising the fact that the Canadian National railway system is a sort of happy hunting ground for Americans. In the House of Commons an hon. member from the maritime provinces asked what was the salary of the Mr. Gaston to whom I referred, and what his duties were. The minister replied that it was not in the public interest that this information should be disclosed. I have referred to the committee on railways and shipping as "a board of strategy" for the National railway system. It was probably appointed to withhold from parliament the information which it would otherwise have got. In spite of the fact that this committee is in existence, we cannot get the information we want. We have an "Alphonse" in Sir Henry Thornton and know his salary but we are not told who "Gaston" is or his salary.

We are told very little about this protege of Sir Henry Thornton's who was brought to Canada as an authority on railway securities, and on the hypothecation of deeds, and the obligations of guarantees. We are told that this gentleman is a graduate of Yale university. How can he be familiar with the laws governing real estate in this country, to say nothing about the system of registration and the Torrens land system? A man versed in these matters, and a returned soldier, could easily have been secured from any Canadian law office, but Sir Henry Thornton had to go to New York to get his own man. No sooner was Sir Henry Thornton back from his honeymoon than he appointed his father-in-law as architect to prepare plans for the erection of the Canadian National hotel in Vancouver city. Some fifteen or sixteen gentlemen from the United States have been appointed to fill good positions in connection with the Canadian National railways, but it is impossible to find out what salaries are paid to them or what their duties are. It seems to be impossible to get a Canadian or a British subject to fill any of these positions.

The Minister of Railways is responsible to the people of this country for what is going on. I do not blame the minister altogether, he has always been willing to give the House any information that he possibly could; but as a Canadian I object to Sir Henry Thorntonism, and many other of his "isms", which he has forced upon this unwilling country.

Over three billions of dollars of Canadian money have been invested on railways in this country with a population of only nine millions. Canada has a huge railway mileage of 40,000 miles of track, equal to what Germany, France and England have with populations of 60, 46 and 47 million people. Think of the over-duplication of railways that has gone on around the city of Toronto and from Toronto on the main line east, three or four different lines.

I was on a train with some Progressive members from the west going to Toronto, and I observed them scrutinizing the railways between Belleville and the queen city. They surely must have been impressed with the railway duplication in evidence between Scarboro junction and Toronto and Belleville and the consequent waste of public money. Compare this with the economy shown in the construction of the hydro electric system. There you have a public ownership system in the ideal administration form. But for Sir Henry Thornton the Toronto and Guelph railway, the Niagara, St. Catharines and Toronto railway, the Toronto and Eastern railway would all have been incorporated in the hydro system without the cost of one dollar to the tax-payers. That shows the kind of public ownership man he is. That is the kind of support he gave to the hydro electric movement in Ontario. Had these three railways been attached to the hydro-electric system, they would have been feeders and brought business to the national railways; they would have given great help to the struggling tax-payers of this country, and would have aided in relieving them of the burden of debt which railway duplication has helped to bring about.

What happened? Under Sir Henry Thornton the radials were killed in Ontario. The province is suffering as others are doing. What is the result to-day? The Ontario government have opened up good roads and the national railways are losing the cream of the business between Toronto and Hamilton; they are losing the business in the Niagara district, and they have lost the support of the hydro municipalities' systems as feeders. These inter-urban hydro radial cars which collect package freight would have acted as feeders for the Canadian National and would have saved Canada from the expense of some of these bankrupt lines in Ontario, some of them not earning enough to pay interest on their indebtedness. I am sorry that happened because, as I said this afternoon, Ontario has suffered more than any other province. The old Grand Trunk, which was a good road, built up that province, but it took $150,000,000 in 1905 in cash out of Ontario and left the province to stew in its own juice for a system.

I should like to get some information in regard to these matters. I could get none from the board of strategy of this committee which was appointed, known as the committee on railways and shipping. I think it is the most remarkable committee I ever attended and some of the information I tried to get I was unable to obtain. The administration of Sir Henry Thornton's system is not what it should be, and he is losing business to-day. He seems to take a leaf out of the book of the Canadian Pacific. When I had a cheap fare bill before this parliament three years ago, who appeared before the railway committee to oppose it? The national railways with their directors and a whole carload of lawyers. That particular bill proposed to renew cheap fares as they existed before the war for the farming community for holidays and week ends. It was supported by the municipalities, by different public organizations, by the working classes through their organizations known as the labour councils of this country. The bill proposed to restore to the people single fares on holidays and week ends and special excursions and all that kind of thing. The British railways have again adopted in the ordinary course that principle as a matter of good railway business; the United States railways have done the same; but this national system had to wait for the bill to be prepared and then helped to defeat the bill. When the bill was defeated many sporting organizations throughout the country, instead of travelling on the National railways now use motor busses in order to go to Hamilton, Guelph, Niagara, the Muskoka district and so on, owing to the high railway rates.

Another abuse which I brought up before the committee was the abuse of the pass system. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) called this the "deadheads" railway. I call it the "deadheads" railway also here to-night because that is exactly what it is. I travel on the system myself and it is appalling to see the large number of people who have passes or who travel in private cars. I do not know where they get them, but the receipts have been depleted by the way in which the system has been administered. I was informed by Sir Henry Thornton before the railway commiittee that he had the same pass system as the Canadian Pacific. The trouble with Sir Henry Thornton is that he is always comparing his system with the Canadian Pacific. His system is a bankrupt railway going behind $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 a year in addition to having huge frozen assets. On the other hand the Canadian Pacific is a privately-owned system that cannot operate at cost, that must pay dividends. According to the statement of the year before last, they effected $14,000,000 in economies in operation, and can afford to have a pass system of their own. The railway act covers free transportation. Not so the national railways. I was told by one of the officials of the department that inasmuch as I was one of the few members of parliament who never asked for a trip pass I should have a bust of myself placed in the Victoria museum to let future generations see such an exhibit of modesty. The pass system and the private car system of the Canadian National Railways are abused. There is discrimination between different people. Some of one religious denomination can get a private car; others can get none. Some of one religious denomination can get passes, others cannot. There is a wholesale discrimination along that line contrary to the railway act which governs passes. Nobody in this country should have a pass on the national railways except government officials. I endeavoured to secure this information in regard to passes from the railway committee but I was unable to do so. The only time to get this information, as the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) said two years ago to the former minister, Mr. Graham, is now.

Another matter about which I was complaining is the way in which the Toronto district is used. With the assistance of some financiers they were to build a sky-scraper at the corner of King and Yonge streets. The existing building was to be torn down and the Canadian National Railways vacated it. They formed a company; they made a proposition, but they did not carry it out. The railway agreed to occupy certain stories and the rent would have paid for the building in a few years. Then it was abandoned after two or three years of negotiations and after the Canadian National Railways had moved to and fro from King and Yonge to Toronto and King and back, and after they spent $100,000 at the corner of King and Yonge on repairs, and on repairs at King and Toronto and on the telegraph offices of the Great North Western on Scott street. It was all just a speculation by speculators on the Canadian National Railways credit; they were using the credit of the national railways. The intention was to build a sky-scraper; the Canadian National Railways would be a tenant and out of the rents of which enough money would come to the Canadian National Railways to pay for the sinking fund and interest and wipe out the bonds in thirty-five years, and the speculators would own the property.

It was announced by the minister two years ago that a new deal was being made. What happened the other day? After moving back to King and Toronto street for the second time, away from King and Yonge street, after moving the telegraph offices from King and Yonge to Scott and Toronto street, the property at King and Yonge was vacated. Then a company was to be formed for the third time and the building was to be built. Now they announce with a flourish that they are not going to go on with it at all and back go the Canadian National Railways to King and Yonge street again. This was done although there were four or five buildings which had been built by private individuals and in which there was I forget how many feet of space vacant.

That is an example of what happens as a result of passing a blanket item like this of $31,000,000 that will give Sir Henry Thornton power to do everything he wants to do except build a branch line to Timbuctoo. If he had his way he would build lines to the sun, moon and stars and there would be no way of stopping him. He seems to be a law, or a sort of high court of parliament all to himself. Do you think he would obey the orders of the railway commission? No, the railway commission does not apply to this venerable statesman. Does the railway act apply to him? No. How do I know that? I know because when the late Mr. Carvell was considering a railway case in which the city of Toronto was interested, he was not altogether sure whether, in view of the constitution of this great big legislative system, the railway commission had any jurisdiction over it. I do not believe they have because events during the past two or three years show that they have no jurisdiction over it. When you consider that this is a railway on which the people of this country have spent nearly $2,000,000,000, you would think if it was fit to be called a national railway, it would do something for the people of Canada.

I have already referred to the numerous officials who came over from the United States and were given soft jobs in this system. Let me refer to the failure of this national system to do anything to build up Canada and to solve our economic needs. The claims of the maritime provinces are at present before parliament in their attempt to get preferential treatment in the Duncan report. I hope that long-suffering part of the country will be given just treatment, and if we have to vote subsidies and subventions for that purpose, let us do it, and the same with the west. Instead of Sir Henry Thornton doing something for the benefit of the west, instead of bringing coal from Alberta and the maritime provinces over the Canadian National system to central Canada, and instead of utilizing the merchant marine for that purpose, what did he do? He sold some of the ships of the merchant marine that were worth $1,500,000 for $50,000. Some of those boats could have been converted into part lake and part ocean boats, like the whaleback boats, and during five or six months of the year could have been engaged in carrying coal from the maritime provinces to central Canada. A large number of extra idle cars at the head of the lakes, for several months empty, could also have been converted for bringing Alberta coal to central Canada. Did Sir Henry Thornton do that? No. He was asked to quote a rate on Alberta coal, and he took so long to do it that the people got tired of waiting for him to do anything to help solve the problem. At last he quoted a rate of $9 during last session. He might just as well have quoted $22. He is content to let Canadians be hewers of wood and drawers of water to the Pennsylvania coal barons. That is what he wants us to be. He did not care about developing this country or solving Canada's economic problems or helping to market the products of the sea, the soil, the forest and the mine. No, he was content to have Canada continue to be the happy hunting ground for the American coal millionaires under his system of administering the Canadian National railways. If Sir Henry Thornton had any conception of his duty as head of that great system he would long ago have solved the coal problem and adopted a national policy.

The coal situation is in a terrible state. Stanley Baldwin in England has come to the support of the coal mining industry. It is an industry so closely connected with the railways, with steel, agriculture and other basic industries, that Stanley Baldwin during the hard days of the coal strike had to come to the support of the British railways and of the British coal industry, and by a system of subventions and subsidies help put that industry on its feet. Not so Sir Henry Thornton. He is prepared to have us spend $150,000,000 in the United States for coal, and to let us go on doing so for many a day before he will help to solve the coal problem in this country and come to the help of the people of Alberta and the maritime provinces, who should have been helped long ago to get their coal to central Canada.

But that is not the only point. A case came before the railway committee not long ago. There are several sub-charters belonging to the Canadian National system— the Vermont system, the Michigan system, and the system running through Maine and Illinois. In the city of Detroit Sir Henry Thornton gave up a very valuable right of way to the people of Michigan. He gave up an agreement under which he was paying $25,000 taxes to the state of Michigan, and gave up the right of way on Woodward avenue in the city of Detroit for a backdoor right of way from Detroit out through the state of Michigan, and under this new agreement, instead of paying $25,000 in taxes, the Canadian National railway has to pay $125,000. When I asked for papers concerning this matter, it took me over a year to get them, and when they were finally brought down, they were not the ones I wanted. Millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money of this country is being spent, and when we ask for information, we are told it is not in the public interest to give it. I say, Mr. Chairman, that before parliament passes this large expenditure of $31,000,000 there should be an investigation into the whole administration of the National railways from top to bottom. Before any more large capital expenditures are made, the railway commission should report on this particular matter. In the Drayton-Acworth report, Mr. A. H. Smith, Sir Henry Drayton and the late Mr. Acworth, the eminent English engineer, after making a survey of the railways in this country, say that the railways had got into a rut of debt because of the haphazard granting of charters and the duplication and waste that went on. So far as the administration of the national railways to-day is concerned, it is a sealed book. You ask for information on the order paper, and you are told that it is not in the public interest to give it. Take the Hydro-Electric Commission in Ontario. They disclose everything to the legislature in connection with their administration—the salaries of the commissioners and engineers, and all costs and contracts, and all the details of the plant at Chippawa, which is being built at a cost of $65,000,000.

Sir Henry Thornton seems to take his cue in a great many things from the Canadian Pacific railway. He did so in regard to the bill I had. He finds out what the Canadian Pacific railway is going to do, and then he does it. His policy is "me too." He seems to forget that the railways, as I said two years ago, have a commodity to sell—transportation. Instead of being able to sell transportation like any other commodity, in accordance with the law of supply and demand, this particular commodity is hemmed in with all kinds of laws, human and divine, and with all kinds of regulations and legislative restrictions. Secondly, transportation is not a free commodity. There is discrimination in the sale of it, with both sectional and provincial interests being considered. According to speeches that have been delivered, political considerations seem to prevail, instead of economic considerations, in settling the question of rates. Freight rates from the standpoint of the railways and their bondholders should serve four purposes, namely, to provide:

1. Operating expenses.
2. Money for sinking fund and fixed charges.
3. A reasonable dividend on the investment.
4. If possible, some money for betterments and extensions.

I am very much disappointed with public ownership, Mr. Chairman, if this is a sample of it that we are having in connection with the administraion of the Canadian National railways. It is not really public ownership at all, as I see it. I believe that this whole resolution should be referred to the railway committee before which the officials of the system could be examined as to securities, notes, equipment, operating income deficit, construction and betterments, and all these other matters as to which it is not fair for us to expect the Minister of Railways to be able to answer. We are being asked to vote $31,000,000 to-night. That is almost as much as it took to run this country when Sir Wilfrid Laurier came into power in 1896. It took $36,000,000 to run the country then, and to-night we are being asked to vote $31,000,000 in this haphazard manner without any report from the railway commission, and without the matter going before the railway committee.

Then as regards the freedom of the press in this country. It was brought out before the committee on railways and shipping that a great many newspapers in this country are receiving privileges from the Canadian National railway system. Newspapers to-day are being carried over the system in the mails as third-class matter at a cost of almost $1,500,000, when the actual cost is over $3,000,000 or $3,500,000. Sir Henry Thornton when he took over the Canadian National railway system went in for advertising very extensively. Hon. members all know that by the literature they receive. Some newspapers were getting paid for advertising from which they received no practical value and there was no passenger or freight business coming to this system as a result of those advertisements. Many of them received passes as well. To do what? Passes no doubt which would result in praise of the system. Passes to enable many officials coming from the other side to get a good position. Is that the reason? I do not know. I say further that the colonization department of this particular system is on a wrong basis. Sir Henry Thornton's whole colonization department of the national railways is on a wrong basis. It is an un-British and un-Canadian policy. It should be coordinated with the immigration policy. Under the present system we are not getting the immigration and I do not expect we will get it. Under this system immigrants are brought to Canada and then they go to the United States. About a hundred thousand people who really belong to this country went to the United States. Why can we not bring these men back and give them a chance to work in Canada? Yet they have an immigration branch and a colonization department, but I do not know whom they are colonizing. We have no way of checking it up. No sooner do the immigrants get here than they go to the States. I might refer to the attempted purchase by Sir Henry Thornton of the Home Bank property in Toronto on King street. The Canadian National Railway money was deposited by the railway in the Home Bank and if it had not been for the question asked in the House we would have lost a million dollars. The money was taken out a week before the bank failed. How did the money get there? The president of the Home Bank happened to be a director of the Canadian National Railways and also of the Home Bank and had used his influence with the president and directors of the Canadian National to have the money deposited in that bank. The board of directors of the National Railways look to me more like a Liberal campaign committee. What did they do? Whom did they direct? Sir Henry Thornton seems to have been very successful in directing his votes through parliament in the dying hours of last session. A special committee was appointed on railways and shipping. To do what? I might call it a whitewashing committee for all the information I could get in regard to it. What is the board of directors for? How do they function? Do they really carry out their duties? I have already explained how one of the directors carried out his duty in the purchase of that building in Toronto. I believe the time is coming when the people of the country are not going to stand for this course of conduct any longer. It is a very important matter to the people of Canada. Instead of Sir Henry Thornton effecting economy, his alleged economy is pure bookkeeping. Why do they not do as the Canadian Pacific did when the earnings of the company went behind $13,000,000 in 1924? They practised economy and effected a saving of $14,000,000 in operation and were thus enabled to pay their dividend.

It was announced in Toronto the other day that Sir Henry Thornton was going to build another hotel in that city. Almost every other day somebody in our city is going to build a hotel. Then Sir Henry contradicted himself and said that no money was going to be furnished by the company. A week ago he comes out with a new statement that he is going to give his goodwill and blessing to a proposition of business men but the Canadian National Railways will put up no money. Will the new hotel be similar to the skyscraper in Toronto at King and Yonge streets? Is the credit of the national railways and the government to be used for building the hotel like the credit was used for the skyscraper? I would like to get this information. The money which will be spent will be frittered away and will help to swell the deficit of $56,000,000. Sir Henry Thornton could find Canadians to fill the chief posts in the railway if he wanted to, and it would be much better for the system. His father-in-law is going to prepare plans to build an hotel in Vancouver for the system; perhaps other relatives will help to build hotels elsewhere.

All over the country a section of the suburban and urban press are talking about the Canadian National Railways. Instead of Christopher Columbus having discovered America, I think, according to some newspapers, it was Sir Henry Thornton who discovered America. Look at the oriental splendour in which he travels over the country and look at the cars in which he travels.

When the question was asked as to the cost of repairs to Sir Henry Thornton's car it was stated that it was not in the public interest to give the information. And why not? In his tours of America I say that King Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like Sir Henry Thornton. The Egyptian and oriental splendour that characterizes his travelling through this country with his radio and everything else is something dazzling and is a sight for the farmers and working classes. In a few days he will no doubt announce that some new Alphonse and Gaston from the states are located in a good job on the railway system. Yet they say it is not in the public interest to divulge how these new men obtain thousands of dollars from this Dominion for doing little or nothing.

I believe in real public ownership, but I venture to say that Sir Henry Thornton, from the foregoing, is doing more to-day to kill public ownership than any man I know of. If this matter comes to a vote I intend to oppose this resolution. I believe that this resolution should be referred to either the standing committee on railways or a special committee, or to the railway commission for a report.

Mr. DUNNING: Some of my hon. friend's remarks are of such a character as to necessitate some brief reference on my part. I do not remember to have ever listened to a more astounding combination of unrelated facts and misinformation than the speech just inflicted upon the committee by my hon. friend. It was a bitter and grossly unfair attack on the Canadian National system. If my hon. friend and those who applauded him so vigorously on the other side of the House—

Mr. CLARK: And your own.

Mr. DUNNING: Am I to take it that the applause from my friends opposite was merely ironic? If my hon. friend believes even a very few of the statements made by him regarding Sir Henry Thornton in his capacity as president of the Canadian National railway system, it was his duty as a member of this House to conclude his address by a motion that Sir Henry Thornton be at once dismissed from that position.

Mr. HANSON: What good would that do here? It would be out of order.

Mr. DUNNING: What good would it do here? My hon. friend would not vote for it, would he?

Mr. HANSON: That is quite another question. I submit that such a motion would be ruled out of order instanter.

Mr. DUNNING: In this House we are expected to treat serious matters seriously, and when we are dealing with an institution of such great importance to this country as the Canadian National Railway, I think it is at least the duty of every member to assure himself as far as he can of the correctness of every statement he makes. I cannot pretend, sitting here listening, to prepare an answer to misstatements, errors and entirely erroneous statements in such great number as were presented by the hon. member for Toronto Northwest; I can only pick out a few typical instances.

Sir Henry Thornton was blamed for the acquisition of the Toronto Eastern. The fact is that the Toronto Eastern was acquired by the Conservative government before Sir Henry Thornton ever became president of the Canadian National system. Sir Henry Thornton is blamed as an enemy of public ownership because he opposed the selling of certain Canadian National lines to the Hydro-Electric Commission of Ontario. He opposed that sale in what he believed to be the interests of the Canadian National system which is owned by the people of Canada. It is difficult for me to see how he can be charged with being untrue to the principles of public ownership simply because he believed it was desirable in the interests of the system that he was running for the government of Canada to refuse an offer for the disposal of certain property belonging to that institution.

My hon. friend repeated over and over again about Sir Henry Thornton's father-in-law being the architect for the Chateau Laurier extension and, I think he said, for an hotel at Vancouver. I wish to assure my hon. friend, and any others who may be interested, that the architect for the extension to the Chateau Laurier, for which partial provision is made in the estimates now under discussion, is Mr. John S. Archibald of Montreal.

With regard to an hotel at Toronto, I want also to assure my friend that the Canadian National Railway is not investing, directly or indirectly, one dollar in the construction of such an hotel, stories to the contrary notwithstanding. As to the twenty-six storey sky-scraper that my hon. friend imagined at the corner of King and Yonge, also in the city of Toronto, may I say that the Canadian National Railway is not investing, either directly or indirectly, one dollar at the present time or in the immediate future in the erection of such a building.

Mr. McGIBBON: What about the two years' rent that they lost?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend gives me an opportunity of going into that; my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Cantley) also gave me a lead along that line this afternoon, and perhaps it is just as well that the House should be clear as to what the law is respecting the relationship between the government, represented by the Minister of Railways on the one hand, and the Canadian National management on the other. The law provides that the management of the property shall be committed to a president and a board of directors. They are in absolute charge of all matters of operation and management of the Canadian National Railway property. Under the law enacted by this parliament no power whatsoever is given the minister to interfere in any of those matters. Under the law the minister's power—the government's power—becomes operative only in case proposals are made by the board of directors which would have the effect of increasing the aggregate obligation of the people of this country or of impairing the property in any large way.

What does that mean in practice? It means that with respect to all of the type of matters to which my hon. friend from Pictou referred this afternoon—the class of equipment to be used on any particular branch line, the kind of materials to be bought for this or that purpose, who shall get contracts, and so forth—with respect to those matters the management itself is supreme; which means in railway operation very largely the president of the road. There is no question of that. But when the board of directors or the management propose to expend, let us say, $5,000,000 on a hotel in the city of Vancouver, in the city of Toronto or in the city of Ottawa, or propose to buy $20,000,000 worth of equipment, it is necessary for them to come to the minister. Then if after examination of the proposals he is convinced of their soundness, he must propose to his colleagues in the government an order in council giving the necessary authority for the expenditure and the consequent increase in the capital liability of the people of this country.

I am not arguing that we have yet arrived at a complete adjustment between the necessities of public ownership on the one hand and the necessities of responsible government on the other. I have never argued that we have yet reached the place where we can say that we have successfully adapted our great public ownership experiment to the necessities of responsible government. I do not want to be misunderstood in that regard, I do not want my remarks to be quoted as indicating that I am an enemy of public ownership—far from it. Neither am I one of those friends of public ownership who shows his friendship by attacking, in season and out of season, the management of a public ownership undertaking, which management is year by year improving the standing of that undertaking.

With regard to passes, my hon. friend's remarks were full of insinuation rather than statements of fact. The issuance of passes, as every member of this House knows, is governed by the Railway Act, and I should like any hon. member who has knowledge of a case where the Canadian National Railway issued a pass in contravention of that act to advise me either publicly on the floor of the House or privately, as he may desire. More than that, the Railway Act provides for an audit of all free transportation issued under its provisions. That audit is made under the authority of the Board of Railway Commissioners, and involves sworn statements and the most careful checks that parliament could devise when the amended Railway Act was passed in order to prevent abuse of the pass privilege.

So many wild statements were made by my hon. friend that it was impossible for me to follow him sufficiently close to make a note of them all. The few to which I have referred are samples that will give the House an idea of the effect of my hon. friend's statements generally. What a great opportunity Canada missed when looking for a president of the Canadian National Railway system. If my hon. friend is as qualified a critic of the management as his remarks would indicate, the country surely missed an excellent opportunity. And what an opportunity my hon. friends opposite missed when last year and previously they had the privilege of placing the hon. gentleman, as one of their nominees, on the select committee appointed by this House to investigate the Canadian National railways and shipping. But my hon. friends, in spite of their applause of the hon. member's remarks to-night, saw to it that he was not one of their representatives on that committee.

The hon. member to-night reviewed the proceedings of that committee in a manner which, if it conveyed any reflection at all upon the members of this House, certainly reflected equally upon the members of his own side, because last year, as hon. gentlemen will remember, the committee was composed of an equal number of Liberals and Conservatives. I attended every one of its sessions. Members opposite and members on this side were also in attendance at every session and I think the committee gave careful conscientious attention to the mass of detail which they had to consider in connection with the Canadian National accounts and Canadian National business generally. That is the place where it is possible to make a much closer examination than can be made before the House as a whole, and I do earnestly urge that statements such as those made by my hon. friend should not be taken seriously by this House, but that each side should see to it that their best men—good, sound business men who desire to see public ownership a success in Canada—be placed on that select committee, so that when the officers of the company appear before them it may be apparent to all that a committee of this parliament is doing its best to serve the public interest in connection with the operation of this great system. Very shortly I hope, it will be my privilege to move again the nomination of such a committee, and I trust that my hon. friends opposite will give consideration to the nomination, as one of their representatives, of my hon. friend from Toronto—that is, if they really believe that he is an expert in these matters. If his criticism of Sir Henry Thornton and the management is well grounded, the place for him is on that special committee to inquire into these matters.

So far as the Canadian National Railway system is concerned, if four years ago anyone had predicted that the system could be to-day in the sound financial shape in which we find it he would have been regarded as crazy. Every hon. member knows that. Of course, Sir Henry Thornton makes mistakes; he is human, unquestionably; very human. I do not always agree with him. As minister and president of the system, respectively, we often have very wide differences of opinion on matters which it is Sir Henry's business to place before me at times. Nevertheless I am convinced that Sir Henry Thornton is heart and soul behind the system in an endeavour to make it a success for the people of Canada. I can say that, much as I may differ from him in certain particulars.

My hon. friend conveyed the impression that the House was being asked to vote $31,000,000 in a haphazard manner, ignoring altogether the fact that the details of this $31,000,000 were exhaustively gone into by that special committee containing six or seven representatives from the other side of the House with a similar membership from this side. This afternoon I called attention to the only major variations in detail as between the work of the committee last year and the estimates now under consideration. I shall be glad to answer questions, so far as they may be within my knowledge, but I do not think that the remarks of the hon. gentleman will be taken very seriously by the people of the country.

Mr. BENNETT: Nothing could better illustrate the seriousness of our railway problem than the observations of the minister (Mr. Dunning) to-night. The remarks he made with reference to the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) were wholly out of keeping with the general tenor of his speech. Sarcasm is not an answer, neither is an endeavour to heap ridicule on a member who advances certain opinions any reply to that member's statement. That is clear. But there is this point I should like to impress upon the committee, and I regard it as a matter of great importance. This is an estimate for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1927. It was approved of by the special committee, and to that extent we need not further concern ourselves about it, inasmuch as it was considered in all its bearings. There are in the estimates some items which increase the amount of the country's obligations beyond what was approved of by the committee, as stated this afternoon by the minister himself. But the purpose of my rising now is to point out the very great necessity of seriously considering how the people of Canada, who own the Canadian National railway system, may function as shareholders. That problem has not yet been solved under our democratic system of government. We have no real directorate control of this organization, for the directors are politicians. I ventured on a previous occasion to mention who they were and why they functioned as politicians, what they did in that capacity, and what their efforts were to control votes at election times. The directors of such an enterprise should not be primarily politicians; they should be business men of capacity, able and willing to assist the president of the system in the conduct of its operations. How is that directorate to be chosen and how is it to be elected? If at the annual meeting of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, or of one of the banks, or of any other corporation, it is found necessary to elect directors, the shareholders have an opportunity to make the election. To-day the shareholders of this system, the people who own it, have no opportunity to place upon the directorate their representatives to control and direct the affairs of the railways. That is the real difficulty of government ownership in this country at the present time. I suggested a year ago, and I still believe the suggestion capable of application, an idea which seemed to me to meet the difficulty. I have given a considerable amount of attention to this problem, as I have no doubt every other hon. gentleman has done; and it is obvious, for reasons which are quite evident, that the people of the country, the shareholders of the system, can in the very nature of things exercise no real control over its operation. In other words, there are no directors who direct. The directors are merely nominal, persons who draw their salaries, have the advantage of certain transportation, and do no work commensurate with the obligations that should devolve upon a directorate. How is the question to be dealt with? I suggested—I venture to suggest again to you, Mr. Chairman, and in due course of time I shall elaborate the suggestion in detail —that there are nine provinces in the Dominion, each of which should have a director on the board, that director to be elected on the joint ballot of the members of the legislatures of the various provinces and of the Senate and the Commons of Canada. I know of no other way in which the problem could be handled. The very fact that the legislature of British Columbia, say, has to vote for a man from Prince Edward Island, or the legislature of Alberta or of Saskatchewan to vote for a man from New Brunswick or Nova Scotia, would at least ensure our getting men of capacity, integrity and vision, who would endeavour to make a success of the business and direct it as they would their own. I have no hesitation in saying that if we adopted such a plan we could secure from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, for example, men of the finest type willing to give their best service to the state. And coming to Quebec and Ontario, the same applies, as it does to the western provinces. So long however as we appoint men merely on the principle of obliging a political friend, so long as we are content to make a druggist in British Columbia, who has rendered some political service to a party, a director of a great system such as this, just so long will the present condition prevail.

Now, everyone knows—that is everyone who has had occasion to consider this matter—that the real difficulty is how to place control in the hands of the people directly, and if we elected the directorate in this way we would have some control: If the smallest province had one man and the largest province had one man on the directorate then, of course, there would be no feeling on the part of the smallest province that they were being overborne by the weight of the representation from the larger provinces. I do suggest to the minister that the time has come when notice should be taken not only of the conduct and operations of the system but of the political activities of some of the people connected with it and of the boasts which one responsible officer at least made to a minister as to how well he had done his duty during the last election.

Mr. DUNNING: Who?

Mr. BENNETT: I say boasts made by one of the officials of the road to one of the ministers as to how well he had done his duty. That is what I say exactly, and I say that the time has come when the only way in which the system can be removed from the field of politics is to have a directorate elected by the people. Then we should know where we were when we are asked to vote money.

Mr. DUNNING: In reference to a matter of that kind, I think my hon. friend should go a little further or else withdraw his statement. I ask what minister he refers to—

Mr. BENNETT: I will say—

Mr. DUNNING: —and what officer.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not going to give the name of the officer. The officer who reads my observations will know exactly whom I mean, and when the time comes he will have an opportunity before the special committee to answer as to the truthfulness and correctness of the statement. Let there be no misunderstanding about that.

Mr. DUNNING: Will my hon. friend name the minister?

Mr. BENNETT: I will name the minister on that occasion, not now.

Mr. DUNNING: Not now?

Mr. BENNETT: No, I have no intention of doing it now. I will afford ample opportunity to the man to whom I refer to make his explanation.

An hon. MEMBER: You are afraid to do so.

Mr. BENNETT: I beg your pardon.

An hon. MEMBER: They say you are afraid.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not in the least afraid. Do not for a moment think that.

An hon. MEMBER: Give us the information then.

Mr. BENNETT: I repeat what I said a moment ago, that one of the responsible officials of this road boasted of the success of his efforts last fall with respect to the vote of the Canadian National railway employees. That is what I say, and I have this much further to add: There are men in this House who know to whom I refer and the minister to whom the observation was made. What is more he was told that they did not thank him for the observation. I will say that in fairness to the man to whom the observation was made —they did not thank him for that sort of thing. There is only one way in which this system can be lifted out of politics and that is by having a directorate representative of the people of this country who own this road. There is only one way by which we can meet the situation and that is by the method I have indicated, namely, having the largest province and the smallest province each elect one director on a ballot of the members of the legislatures of the provinces and of this House. The difficulties in connection with taking such a ballot are not great. It can easily be done by mail as is done with respect to the university, as is done in connection with the law society of the province in which I live in western Canada. The election can be carried out in that way, and we will get a class of men who will give disinterested public service, and secure the people of this country against the necessity of saying in parliament what the hon. member (Mr. Church) has been saying to-night.

Mr. DUNNING: There was no necessity for saying what he said.

Mr. BENNETT: There was with respect to some of the things he said. With respect to the building on King and Yonge streets there was very great necessity, because I took occasion myself to investigate the facts with respect to that and a suit is now pending which has been brought about by reason of the very circumstances to which the hon. gentleman alluded; and I believe it is the duty of any man who represents a section of the great city of Toronto in this parliament to go into the facts with respect to that property.

Mr. DUNNING: The facts, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: And he has stated the facts. That property was supposed to be leased for Canadian National purposes and actually a suit is now pending. It will not be discreet to do more than say that litigation is now pending with respect to the matter arising out of the termination of the agreement by which that property was to be used for Canadian National railway purposes. That is the fact. My hon. friend may shake his head but I happened to see the order in council under which the matter was referred to the Exchequer court—

Mr. DUNNING: Ah, yes, you passed it.

Mr. BENNETT: —in order to have the matter settled. Certainly, that is how I know. The late government passed it because this man preferred a claim for damages by reason of a breach of contract. He alleged that he had suffered loss and damage because the contract which he had entered into had been broken. Surely any hon. gentleman in this House who represents a section of the city of Toronto has a right to direct attention to that fact. Was the Home Bank building bought for this purpose or not?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: It is alleged that it was bought for this road. That is the point the hon. gentleman was making, that it is possible on a misrepresentation of the facts by one man to bind this whole Dominion. What about the Scribe hotel? That is another case of the same kind. Was that done openly or not?

An hon. MEMBER: What about the Vancouver hotel?

Mr. BENNETT: The Vancouver hotel stands in this position—that the president of the road recommended that the site be bought and the hotel constructed, and on the strength of his recommendation the order in council was passed.

Mr. DUNNING: Without the authority of parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. DUNNING: Exactly.

Mr. BENNETT: But subject to the approval of parliament.

Mr. DUNNING: No, no.

Mr. BENNETT: I repeat, subject to the approval of parliament.

Mr. DUNNING: No, no.

Mr. BENNETT: Excuse me, subject to the approval of parliament. The Postmaster General (Mr. Veniot) has no knowledge of what he is talking about, or the Minister of Railways either if they say it was not subject to the approval of parliament. I can only say to the Minister of Railways that contortions, facial or otherwise, are not answers. The coldblooded truth is that the order in council was passed, but it was subject to the approval of parliament and to the amount being included in the vote that was passed by the special committee and approved by this House.

Mr. DUNNING: Does my hon. friend say—

Mr. BENNETT: These are the facts.

Mr. DUNNING: Does my hon. friend mean to say that there was any such understanding with the contractor, and that he entered into a contract to build not knowing whether he was to get his money?

Mr. BENNETT: No contract was concluded.

Mr. DUNNING: Ah!

Mr. BENNETT: I repeat no contract was concluded.

Mr. POWER: Was the work started?

Mr. BENNETT: As to that I cannot say. There was no contract.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. POWER: A man who entered into such arrangements without getting a contract must be crazy.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member (Mr. Power) asked whether the work was started. My answer was that no contract was signed.

Mr. DUNNING: Was the property purchased?

Mr. BENNETT: I believe it was, and what is more it was purchased on the strength of a letter which was written by the president of the road asking and directing that it be done in settlement of difficulties between the city of Vancouver and the Canadian Northern, the predecessor of the Canadian National railway system, and the litigation is now pending.

Mr. DUNNING: But without the authority of parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: The authority of parliament was to be given before the matter became final, and they took chances with respect to it. I know that is so. It was to be approved by parliament; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. DUNNING: Does the order in council say so?

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend has asked me a question as to which I cannot speak with authority. All I know is this: That the acting minister or Prime Minister wrote a letter and I know that he assured his colleagues and assured this country that it was subject to the approval of parliament. Do not let us have any misunderstanding about the matter. That is the fact with respect to it.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. DUNNING: We will produce the facts and the documents too.

Mr. BENNETT: The documents will speak for themselves. Will the hon. gentleman say that the contract was signed?

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will sit down I will tell the House exactly what took place.

Mr. BENNETT: I asked my hon. friend was it signed.

Mr. DUNNING: It was signed by the contractor.

Mr. BENNETT: Was it signed by the railway company? That is the question.

Mr. DUNNING: Will my hon. friend sit down and permit me to answer?

Mr. BENNETT: I will continue my observations, and then you can answer my question. I ask this question again.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. BENNETT: I asked my hon. friend a question and gave him a chance to answer it.

Mr. DUNNING: He will answer it now.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, answer it.

Mr. DUNNING: I will if my hon. friend will take his seat and let me answer it.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, answer it.

Mr. DUNNING: I am going to answer it.

Mr. BENNETT: You are not going to make a speech, I hope. When I have finished the minister can make a speech.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend will not prevent me from getting this on Hansard.

Mr. BENNETT: Let there be no misunderstanding about the matter. Will the minister say now whether that contract was signed by the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member will not let me answer.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes or no? Was it signed or not?

Mr. DUNNING: My turn will come.

Mr. BENNETT: It is easy to bluff but this is not the place for it. Was the contract signed by the railway company?

Mr. DUNNING: I shall answer when the hon. member gives me the floor.

Mr. BENNETT: I knew he could not answer except to say no. The contract was not signed by the railway company. There was therefore no binding contract between the contractor and the railway company, and there was no order in council.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member says there was no order in council?

Mr. BENNETT: There was an order in council authorizing it but it was not completed. I desire that there shall be no misunderstanding. The contract with respect to the Vancouver hotel was subject to the approval of parliament and its voting the money with which to discharge the monetary obligation created by contract. This could not be otherwise and the minister has so stated here to-night. He said that wherever there is a monetary obligation imposed on the ratepayers of Canada, it must have the approval of parliament.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what the minister said a moment ago.

Mr. DUNNING: What I was discussing was the relationship between government, minister and railways, and what I said was that expenditures of magnitude could not be incurred without the minister being consulted and recommending to his colleagues in council an order in council authorizing the expenditure. Hansard will bear me out in that.

Mr. BENNETT: That is exactly what was done, but wherever a monetary obligation is imposed upon the country parliament must vote the money.

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Mr. BENNETT: This was subject to parliament voting the money but it had not voted it. The money was to be spent before it was voted.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: This afternoon the minister read out a statement showing that cars were on order. Did hon. members hear him? He came to this high court of parliament this afternoon and told us that the orders were already given for cars and asked us to vote the money with which to pay for them. These orders were announced in the press, the Wall street Journal and other papers. If the minister will hand me the sheet of paper from which he read this afternoon I will call the bluff at once where it said "on order." Let me have the whole statement.

Mr. DUNNING: That is all the statement I read, every word.

Mr. BENNETT: Let hon. members listen to this:

Proposed new equipment, 1926-27.
Item 12. Fifteen milk cars on order.
Item 15. One electric locomotive on order.
Item 21. Thirty sleeping cars being built under rental contract.
Item 24. Sixty freight refrigerator cars on order.
Item 25. Forty tank cars, on order.
Item 30. One rotary snow plough on order.

Mr. DUNNING: And the money was voted at the last session of this parliament for every one of them.

Mr. BENNETT: If that were true it would be an answer.

Mr. DUNNING: It is true.

Mr. BENNETT: But unfortunately it is not true.

Mr. VENIOT: It is.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister was not here.

Mr. VENIOT: I know the record.

Mr. BENNETT: Judging from the records of the House on that occasion, I think Moses was engaging the attention of the Postmaster General.

Mr. POWER: If the hon. member's party had had a Moses, it might have helped some.

Mr. BENNETT: We had a Moses, but the original Moses was not permitted to see the promised land. Joshua saw it, not he. So we had the Moses but it might be my hon. friends had the Joshua for the moment.

Mr. POWER: I would imagine the Joshua was on the other side of the House as well.

Mr. BENNETT: Parliament did not vote this money.

Mr. DUNNING: It did.

Mr. BENNETT: What happened was that 25 per cent of the estimates were approved. This House passed the balance but they were not passed by parliament. If they were why is the minister asking parliament to vote it to-night?

Mr. DUNNING: I will deal with that when my hon. friend has finished.

Mr. BENNETT: If my hon. friend will make his answer conformable with the facts he will once more agree with me that these various items were on order. Will he say they were not on order without parliament having sanctioned the estimates?

Mr. DUNNING: I say that parliament voted the money for them.

Mr. BENNETT: What parliament?

Mr. DUNNING: Last session.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely my hon. friend has confused two things. The estimates were not passed.

Mr. DUNNING: Did my hon. friend not hear me this afternoon even if he were not in his seat? Last session parliament did vote outright $10,000,000 of the amount we are now discussing.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, and the $10,000,000 was lent at once by the Department of Finance to the Canadian National Railways. An amount of $7,500,000 was paid over before parliament was dissolved and the other $2,500,000 afterwards, and none of it has reference to this transaction.

Mr. DUNNING: How does the hon. gentleman know that some of that money is not available to pay for cars that are ordered?

Mr. BENNETT: Because the orders under which it was obtained from the Department of Finance disclosed what it was for and these were not the purposes. These matters stand in exactly the same position as the Vancouver hotel. The money for the Vancouver hotel had to be passed by this parliament and until parliament passed it, there was no money with which to pay any estimates or anything else. What the minister said this evening is true; that is where the functions of parliament come in. Parliament must pass the estimates for expenditures of their money for the Canadian National Railway Company before capital expenditures can be made, and it is for that reason that the authority of parliament is being sought to-night, just as the minister stated this evening. We agree with that, and until such time as parliament passed that amount the Vancouver hotel project was without money, —absolutely without a dollar—just as in this case, if we do not pass this estimate for equipment, there would be no money to pay for these various items now on order. The two stand in exactly the same position because they are capital expenditures. I would ask the minister, has any money been paid on account of this equipment thus far.

Mr. DUNNING: Not on account of this particular equipment, no.

Mr. BENNETT: It is on order, and the money is not paid.

Mr. DUNNING: It is not all on order.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: Part of it is on order, and the money is not paid, and when parliament votes the money, it will be paid?

Mr. DUNNING: If parliament does not vote this $31,000,000 at all, with the $10,000,000 that has been already voted we can pay for the equipment that is on order.

Mr. BENNETT: I can only say that I know of my own knowledge that the $10,000,000 is paid.

Mr. DUNNING: What for?

Mr. BENNETT: To meet arrears of interest and matters of that kind. Over $10,000,000 was short in interest charges alone. That is the position with respect to that.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, some reference has been made to the Vancouver hotel, and I observe by the tone in which the reference has been made that apparently some hon. gentlemen are labouring under an entire misapprehension with regard to the matter. I just want to state the facts in regard to the history of this matter. I am not attacking the minister; I think he will agree with the statement that I am about to make.

It was about a year or a little more ago—it was in the month of January—that the city of Vancouver sent its chief counsel, Mr. McCrossan, to Ottawa for the purpose of straightening out certain outstanding differences between the Canadian National railway and the city of Vancouver. I shall not go into details other than to mention very briefly the history of this matter. During the year 1912 or 1913 the Canadian Northern railway entered into a contract with the city of Vancouver whereby the city of Vancouver gave to the railway company 165 acres of land in the very heart of the city, in return for which the railway company undertook certain obligations. One of them was to build a large depot, to cost I think in the neighbourhood of $1,000,000, which depot has been constructed. Another was to construct a tunnel entrance from the Fraser river to the city of Vancouver, at an estimated cost of approximately $8,000,000. Another was to construct, pave, and maintain certain streets through the property; also to provide drainage and outlets for city sewers through this property. In addition the railway company undertook to construct a hotel of 250 rooms in the city of Vancouver, at some location to be decided on, at a cost of approximately $1,000,000. There were other minor obligations which I shall not refer to now.

The war broke out, and the Canadian Northern railway was taken over by the government and now is a part of the Canadian National railway system. During the war, and immediately subsequent thereto, the city of Vancouver made no particular criticism, although the subject was discussed from time to time, of the delay in the carrying out of the obligations by the railway company, but the matter did come to a head, or rather came to a point of acute complaint and discussion about two years ago, when the city claimed through the city council and his worship the mayor that the railway company should carry out the obligations it had entered into. This went on until last January. As I stated, the counsel for the city came to Ottawa and made overtures to the railway company and also to the government to secure a settlement. I understand that the city offered and ultimately agreed to waive some of the minor matters included in the agreement which they were by law entitled to receive. One of these matters was the construction of the tunnel, as it was felt that this was an expenditure not warranted at this time by the traffic. There was one other obligation that I had overlooked, namely, the construction and operation of a line of passenger ships across the Pacific. That was a part of the obligation, but it was not pressed by the city. In return the railway company agreed to construct a hotel, not of 250 rooms, but of 500 rooms—a larger hotel commensurate with the increased needs of the situation. The city waived—I want to make this clear—some of its claims, and this agreement was finally concluded between the city and the railway company during the month of March, if I recall correctly, and Mr. McCrossan went home and made an announcement that a satisfactory arrangement had been made.

I wish to say also that his worship the mayor asked me if I would co-operate with Mr. McCrossan and give assurances to the ministry of my co-operation in assisting to bring about a settlement. I very cheerfully did so. I consulted with the hon. Minister of Public Works of that day, now the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, and I consulted also with my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, and gave him an assurance of any assistance and support that I could give him in bringing about this settlement. I would like to remind the minister, and he will recall, as parliament will recall, that I brought this matter up in the House in the form of a question in the orders of the day upon one occasion. On the 1st of April, or thereabouts, a settlement was arrived at between the railway company and the city, under which this hotel was to be constructed, but it was under an arrangement of this character. A syndicate would construct the hotel, and the national railways were to lease it from the syndicate at a rental to be fixed, which rental was calculated to cover the fixed charges on the cost of the hotel. The syndicate proposed to raise the money by the issue of bonds in the city of New York, which bonds, if I recall rightly, were to be sold at something like 92, and I understand—I am subject to correction as to details—that the rate was 6½ per cent or thereabouts. Now this arrangement was concluded so far as the railway and the syndicate was concerned. The syndicate consisted of Mr. Evans, Colonel Ryan, the contractor, and others, I think, whose names I do not know. This was all concluded so far as the railway and the syndicate were concerned some time about May, I should judge.

Mr. DUNNING: The date is wrong.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the minister correct me in that? I am not quite sure as to the date.

Mr. DUNNING: The arrangement never was concluded.

Mr. STEVENS: Not so far as the minister is concerned.

Mr. DUNNING: Nor so far as the railway company is concerned.

Mr. STEVENS: It was pretty well concluded. It was all concluded to this extent, that the president of the railway gave a letter, and furthermore, authorized the purchase of the property, which property was placed under option by the parties referred to. Let me make this clear: There was absolutely no politics in it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. STEVENS: Let me just state who these gentlemen were. First of all there was the mayor of the city, Mr. L. D. Taylor, all his life a Liberal; Mr. McCrossan, all his life a Liberal; the contractor, E. J. Ryan, a Liberal of note. These are the gentlemen who were negotiating this agreement. The mayor asked me to co-operate. The minister knows I co-operated with him and gave every assistance I could to bring about a happy solution of the difficulty between the railway and the city. The whole thing centred around this outstanding agreement. During the hectic days of June, the last month of the session, nothing was done in connection with the matter. When the government changed, his worship the mayor wired me—I have not the wire before me—asking me if I was going to take the same stand I had taken in support of Mr. McCrossan and the city council when we were in opposition, and I immediately wired him "Yes." We made no change whatever in the negotiation except one, and by the way I should have made it clear that the one thing remaining to be done was the authority of the government by order in council—

Mr. DUNNING: Hear, hear. And the authority of parliament, if expenditure was involved.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. My hon. friend from West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) is quite clear on that, but no order in council had been passed.

Mr. DUNNING: You will be fair enough to me to say that I consistently refused to ask such authority in connection with that matter.

Mr. STEVENS: I could not say as to that. I take my hon. friend's word for it.

Mr. DUNNING: I told you so.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not recall that.

Mr. DUNNING: My colleagues all know it.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not questioning that at all. The fact remains that at that time it was not authorised by order in council. The matter then came before the new government. The Minister of Railways at that time, the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) I think—

Mr. DUNNING: Acting minister.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, that is quite true. My hon. friend is entitled to his little quip, if he enjoys it. The Minister of Railways at that time contended that instead of approving of a contract such as that which was outlined, namely, the erection of the hotel by a syndicate which would entail a heavy interest cost per annum, it should be provided out of the public funds which were under the control of the railway company, and so the order in council was framed along that line. It was found, and so stated by the railway officials, which the minister can verify, that a saving of fifty to a hundred thousand dollars a year would be made in interest alone if the financing were done under the aegis of the railway rather than by a syndicate, and so an order in council was passed, the order in council referred to by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett), approving of the railway's arrangement with the contractor and with the city of Vancouver; and I want to point out that this hotel contract was a part of the solution of the difficulty with the city of Vancouver and the outstanding dispute. I do not think the minister will contend that the city is not entitled to the carrying out of the agreement for which it turned over the 165 acres of land in the heart of Vancouver, an agreement entered into in good faith by the city and the railway company. I do not think Sir Henry Thornton or the railway directors or management ever had any intention of doing otherwise than carrying out that agreement, with this exception: that in the passage of time it was found that some expenditures were perhaps not wise and not necessary and that a saving could be made, and as I have already stated, the city council of Vancouver approved of the waiving of eight million dollars on the tunnel and also some other matters to bring about a settlement.

Mr. BENNETT: And the ships on the Pacific.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. I do not think the ships on the Pacific were actually named in the resolution which contained these terms, but they were not being pressed. It was a distinct saving to the railway company and to the country.

In so far as the need of the hotel in Vancouver is concerned, there is a situation there which I think parliament ought to take note of. I am no enemy, as the minister is no enemy, of the great Canadian Pacific Railway. In common with many other Canadians, I recognize that it is a wonderful system, well operated and a model of business capacity, but at the same time it does seem to me preposterous that the Canadian National railways, when it comes to that terminal point should turn over all its passenger traffic to the Canadian Pacific railway hotel, which is the one outstanding hotel of Vancouver. The passengers are taken from the Canadian National depot to the Canadian Pacific hotel, and without any question, the business of the management of the Canadian Pacific is, as far as possible, to influence and divert traffic to their own channel. If they did not do that they would not be serving their own interest. The consequence is that the Canadian National directors I think recognize, without any question whatever, that it is highly desirable and necessary that the Canadian National railway should have an hotel at that terminal. As far as I am concerned, I do not care who builds it, or how it is built, as long as we can get an hotel in the city of Vancouver for two purposes; first, to serve the Canadian National railway, and second, to keep faith with the city of Vancouver in regard to the agreement of 1913. As far as the minister is concerned I want to say that in any conference or conversation that I have had with him on the subject during the months of, I think, February and March, possibly April and May, he always treated Mr. McCrossan and the representatives of the city and myself with courtesy, fairness and consideration. I have no complaint, and I am not criticizing him in the slightest degree. I wish to point out that any action taken so far as the government headed by Mr. Meighen was concerned was taken as, shall I say, continuing the arrangements partially entered into by the national railway; in fact, I think the minister will agree with me in this, that the terms of the settlement, if not, indeed, the actual settlement between the railway and the city, was arrived at long before the change of government. I know that the resolution of the city council of Vancouver approving terms and waiving its rights was passed long before there was any change of government. I think the minister will agree with that. I do not happen to have it before me but I can obtain it, and I know I am right.

Mr. DUNNING: It was passed before, but not long before.

Mr. STEVENS: Not long before. I am only trying to show that the matter was a question of good faith between the railway and the city. Furthermore, in authorizing the purchase of the land, Sir Henry Thornton acted in perfect good faith and in conformity with the arrangement made with the city and with the syndicate. I urge the minister to lend his co-operation and either to revert to the suggestion of the syndicate, if it is thought better—I see that form is followed in Toronto —and allow the railway to secure accommodation in Vancouver, or to adopt the principle which we adopted, namely, the construction of an hotel financed by the national railway. But in any case let us have the accommodation at the city of Vancouver to serve the national railway as I think it ought to be served. I think that is a fair statement of the case.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, there are a few points that very naturally I want to deal with regarding my usually genial friend from West Calgary (Mr. Bennett). First, with regard to politics on the part of the officers or men of the Canadian National Railway. I was struck with surprise to hear such a charge from his side of the House, and there are scores of hon. gentlemen behind me who must also have been equally surprised, because I know that more than one-half of the members on this side of the House have reproached me with complaints regarding the Tory activities of the employees of the Canadian National Railway.

Mr. McGIBBON: It worked the other way, don't be alarmed.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, I venture to say if my hon. friends had been as frank with the people regarding their opinion of the Canadian National management before the election as they have been to-night we would have had a very much larger representation on this side of the House. They concealed their love for the president and the management of the Canadian National Railway; they revealed it only after the event.

Now, with regard to the Vancouver hotel situation, let me say to my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) that I do not propose to discuss any of the obligations which the Canadian Northern Railway may or may not have incurred towards the city of Vancouver, for the reason that I am informed that the city of Vancouver has taken legal action in regard thereto.

Mr. STEVENS: I quite agree with my hon. friend, and I hope he is not suggesting that I was trespassing in discussing a matter that was before the courts. I merely stated the historic fact by way of introduction.

Mr. DUNNING: I think my hon. friend is quite enough of a politician to take care of himself along that line. As the matter is pending before the courts, I do not propose to say anything touching that phase of it.

Mr. STEVENS: Quite so.

Mr. DUNNING: But I can deal with the proposal to build a hotel in Vancouver without entering into a discussion of any contractual relations which may have reference to it. Last spring when I came down here first as Minister of Railways this was one of the things on my doorstep. Everything was arranged. All I had to do was to give approval, as minister, of an arrangement for a syndicate to build a hotel in the city of Vancouver for the Canadian National management. I may as well tell the House on this occasion as well as any other that I have an inherent suspicion of any proposal on the part of a group of philanthropic citizens to erect either hotels or office buildings for the Canadian National Railway Company. I have a very strong leaning towards the Canadian National building its own utilities with money voted by this parliament, rather than under any arrangement whereby third parties, however created, should do the work.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

An hon. MEMBER: You have put your foot in it.

Mr. DUNNING: Have I? Perhaps my hon. friend can point out one single case where, as Minister of Railways, I ever authorized an arrangement of that kind. I will give him an opportunity to do so now.

An hon. MEMBER: Get up.

An hon. MEMBER: Come along!

Mr. DUNNING: If I have occasion at any time to change my views in connection with this particular matter I shall expect to come on the floor of the House and give good reason therefor. As to the Toronto office building, my hon. friend from West Calgary well knows that from the first day I refused to approve of an arrangement whereby a syndicate would buy property from the railway, erect a building for the railway, and then rent it to the railway.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. DUNNING: I disapproved of it, I refused to endorse it, and I have kept on refusing to this day.

Mr. BENNETT: But the arrangement was made before my friend's time.

Mr. DUNNING: The arrangement never was completed.

Mr. BENNETT: I know, but they took possession.

Mr. DUNNING: The arrangement never was completed and they never took possession.

Mr. BENNETT: Go and look at the building now.

Mr. DUNNING: I believe I am correct in stating that before my time the property was vacated.

Mr. BENNETT: The railway moved out.

Mr. DUNNING: But as a matter of fact the arrangement never was completed. My predecessor as Minister of Railways, the Right Hon. Mr. Graham, refused to authorize the revival of an arrangement which had lapsed.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend is right, but the railway vacated the building and there is now a claim pending in the Exchequer court for a million dollars damages.

Mr. LAPOINTE: They will not get much out of it.

Mr. BENNETT: You and I will not anticipate that.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. DUNNING: I do not want to branch into a subject which possibly is in litigation, but I certainly think that a government which permitted a claim of that kind against the crown even to go to the Exchequer court is open to very serious criticism indeed.

Mr. BENNETT: The poorest subject has a right to go before the court.

Mr. CANNON: But this case went by an order of reference.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) is looking after that. I sometimes thank goodness that I am not a lawyer; but a lawyer of the capacity of the Solicitor General is very useful to have around on occasions. With regard to the Vancouver hotel, my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre knows well that I consistently, and this government in its previous existence consistently, refused to authorize the arrangement whereby a syndicate—no doubt of estimable gentlemen; no doubt they were both Liberals and Tories—were going to build a hotel for the Canadian National and lease it to the Canadian National. Ostensibly they were going to make money out of it. I expect so. When the Canadian National builds a hotel in Vancouver, if it ever does, it will be built straightforwardly with money voted by this parliament for the purpose—at least, so far as I am concerned and so far as the present government is concerned.

Mr. STEVENS: I think the hon. minister will concede that I tried to do him justice. Will he not now admit that that is precisely a term of the order in council which we passed, that the hotel should be built out of moneys voted by parliament for that purpose?

Mr. DUNNING: I will come to that. I am willing to do my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre this justice, that he was willing to support me in giving Vancouver a hotel any old way at all; and I am willing also to admit that when he had a measure of responsibility as a member of a temporary government, he was very careful not to do it in the precise way in which it had been urged upon me as Minister of Railways of this country.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend is scarcely fair. I think he wants to be fair. He told me himself that he did not think it was possible to get a vote through parliament for the construction of the hotel when we discussed the building of it in the manner he now mentions.

Mr. DUNNING: That is quite right. And I doubt very much if it would be possible to get a vote through the House for the building of the hotel to-day. But to continue my story. To listen to my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre, one would almost get the idea that this deal whereby a syndicate was to build a hotel in Vancouver for the Canadian National, and rent it to the Canadian National, was all but completed when the stormy times of last June commenced. The actual fact of the matter was that the people concerned were in the position of the importunate widow—they were continually asking and were continually being refused. That is the whole position. There never was on my part or on the part of the government any indication at any time of consent to that proposal. When my hon. friends came into office nothing was done immediately; but during the election, while the campaign was on, word went out that a $5,000,000 hotel had been authorized to be built at Vancouver by the Canadian National Railways on a cost plus basis. The former Minister of Finance, the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) would have the House and the country believe that it was made plain at that time that this hotel was to be built, and the money spent, only provided parliament voted the expenditure.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the law; that is the statute law.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the law, but my hon. friend is the prophet. It will be plain to the House how clever he is in putting forward that explanation—and I always take off my hat to his cleverness in debate—when I tell the House that this proposal, which was to be proceeded with only if parliament approved, first involved the expenditure of about a quarter of a million for land—and they spent it—if parliament approved. But the men who owned the land now have the money and we have the land—"only if parliament approved."

Mr. BENNETT: That is absolutely correct.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend asked the question, which he would not allow me to answer, whether the contract was signed by the railway company. Well, because he is so insistent upon an answer I must tell the committee something which I did not deem of great importance but which assumes an importance under the circumstances. After the government of which my hon. friend was a member was sent into opposition by the people of Canada last September, and just a few days before the new government now in office was sworn in, I received a visit from the Deputy Minister of Railways. I wanted to know what he came to see me for. The Hon. Mr. Black was Minister of Railways and Sir Henry Drayton was acting minister. The deputy minister told me that he came to see me on instructions from Sir Henry Drayton, to consult me as to the desirability of the railway officials signing the contract for the Vancouver hotel which had been authorized and which had been signed by the contractor and was back for signature by the officials of the railway company. That is how far he went.

Mr. BENNETT: He referred it to the new minister.

Mr. DUNNING: Quite properly; I hope the committee will not misunderstand. I am not now criticizing the action of the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) in instructing the deputy minister to consult me in regard to the matter, although how he knew that I was to be Minister of Railways I do not of course know.

Mr. BENNETT: Coming events cast their shadows before.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It was a strong assumption.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: In any event it was perfectly proper for a member of the defeated government not to sign that contract under the circumstances.

Mr. BENNETT: It was the railway company who would sign it in any event.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, not to authorize the railway company to sign it. But I ask the members of the committee whether they are credulous enough to believe that that contract would not have been signed had my hon. friends been returned to power. The assumption is too absurd for words. As a matter of fact, the political campaign of hon. gentlemen opposite, who now represent the city of Vancouver, was based upon the building of that hotel and the building of it immediately. Are they now, in the language of the hon. member for West Calgary, going to admit frankly that they deceived and deliberately deceived the people of Vancouver in connection with the building of that hotel? Every newspaper and every political speech made by hon. gentlemen opposite who were candidates in Vancouver conveyed the impression to the people of that city that the land was bought, that they were going right ahead, that the contract was being let, that the hotel was to be built forthwith in Vancouver. To-night is the first occasion on which I for one have heard the statement that it was quite clear that the hotel was to be gone on with only if parliament approved. I never heard of it before.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister permit me—

Mr. DUNNING: I will permit anything.

Mr. STEVENS: One of the bitterest criticisms of myself was that after coming into office I supported the construction of that hotel in Vancouver. I was criticised and bitterly criticised by my own friends as well as by opponents, but I want to assure the committee that the building of the hotel did not constitute a fraction of the appeal that I made or that any of my colleagues made to the people of Vancouver. Furthermore, this criticism was levelled at me—

Mr. DUNNING: I protest; I did not inflict this on my hon. friend.

Mr. STEVENS: I know that in his heart my hon. friend does not wish to be unfair. I appreciate his desire to be just. He will therefore allow me to finish my statement. The criticism was also made—and this is where the political side of it comes in—that we were approving of something that was handled entirely by opponents of ours, and I told the mayor of the city that my action would be the same towards the proposition, as the records will show, after the change of office as before.

Mr. CLARK: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. DUNNING: I had the floor and I permitted my hon. friend (Mr. Stevens) to interrupt, but I must object to further interruptions.

Mr. CLARK: I want to correct my hon. friend.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. CLARK: This is a matter of privilege. The minister made the statement that I personally appealed to the electors of Vancouver on every occasion in the manner he has described. I want to say in answer to that statement that it is absolutely incorrect and without foundation. So far as I at any rate am concerned, not on one platform did I mention the hotel in Vancouver, nor did any speaker refer to it on any platform on which I stood. To the best of my recollection no mention was ever made of that hotel. I ask the minister, as regards myself at least, to withdraw his statement.

Mr. LADNER: I rise to the same question of privilege. The minister in his vigorous style sometimes uses extravagant and incorrect language. So far as his words refer to myself, the statement he has made is incorrect, because on no occasion did I ever refer—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LADNER: I am making this statement as a member and a gentleman and I want to be heard. I say, on no occasion did I ever refer to the Canadian National Railways in connection with this hotel in any of my speeches to the people. The minister should be careful in his statements.

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): How did the people of Vancouver find out that they were going to get the hotel?

Mr. LADNER: Through the usual channel, the press.

Mr. DUNNING: If it will please my hon. friends opposite, I am quite prepared to believe their statement that they made absolutely no political capital out of the fact that during the election campaign the government of which my hon. friend was a supporter authorized the expenditure of $5,000,000 on a hotel in Vancouver. I am prepared to accept that statement.

Mr. CLARK: Be a man and withdraw the statement. Be a gentleman.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, I will—

Mr. CLARK: I should like to believe that my hon. friend is a gentleman and that he will withdraw and apologize for his statement.

Mr. DUNNING: I am quite content to let the facts speak for themselves.

Mr. CLARK: State the facts.

Mr. DUNNING: I am quite convinced that my hon. friend never mentioned the Vancouver hotel during his election campaign. That is what he says and I accept his word.

Mr. CLARK: I said more than that.

Mr. DUNNING: More than that?

Mr. CLARK: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: Nobody on my hon. friend's behalf mentioned the Vancouver hotel.

Mr. CLARK: There was no such appeal made on my behalf.

Mr. DUNNING: I accept that statement—that neither my hon. friend nor anybody on his behalf in his election campaign—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Nor any newspaper.

Mr. DUNNING: Nor any newspaper, nor anyone with whom my hon. friend had to do for the purpose of getting elected mentioned the Vancouver hotel.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DUNNING: But referring to matters specifically before the House, the hon. member for West Calgary referred to my statement that in regard to every item here mentioned as being "on order" the railway company had sufficient money to pay for that equipment when delivered.

Mr. BENNETT: That was not the question at all.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend read out a few items of the long list I read this afternoon and which had following them the statement "on order". I have totalled up the amount involved and if my figures are correct, and I believe they are, it amounts to $833,000 out of a proposed expenditure of twenty million. I would point out to the House that one-third of the total thirty-one millions which is now before the House was voted at the last session of parliament, that the money was paid out to the Canadian National Railways, and I make the statement that it was quite proper for the Canadian National Railway Company to pay for that portion of the equipment which is "on order"—that they were quite right in doing so. As to the orders in council to which my hon. friend refers, outlining the purposes for which the advances were made to the Canadian National Railway Company while he was Minister of Finance, I have not received them, but I have sent for them.

Mr. BENNETT: They were made before my time.

Mr. DUNNING: I understand there were orders in council.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I say. There were seven and a half millions obtained before our time.

Mr. DUNNING: And two and a half millions since.

Mr. BENNETT: After you came back.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. The point is, in connection with the small proportion of this proposal which is "on order", that there is authority to pay the money required to be paid.

Mr. BENNETT: That money has been all spent otherwise.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: The whole of the ten millions has been spent otherwise. The deputy will tell you that. I know whereof I speak.

Mr. NEILL: May I say that I live in British Columbia and have access to the daily papers published in Vancouver. As a loyal British Columbian I feel somewhat inclined to support the attitude of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) who made a reasonable statement as to the claims of that city. I certainly hope they get the hotel built if they are entitled to it. But when it comes to statements made by his colleagues that they never in any way used this question to promote their political ambitions I must take them with a great deal of gravity. I heard the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) this evening describe what he considered was the nature of that transaction. He called it a contract but he admitted in answer to a question from the Minister of Railways that it was a contract that was not signed by the railway company. That would be somewhat similar to the position of a man who might come to me and say "I have sold you a house". To that I would say, "Oh, have you, I did not know it." "Oh, yes, I have sold you a house because I have got the contract signed." To that I would say, "Have you? I did not sign it," evoking a reply, "No, but I signed it." That is the position the hon. member for West Calgary tells us was the correct one. But that was not the position that was represented to the people of Vancouver. I did not hear those hon. gentlemen say anything about the matter, but in the newspapers friendly to them there was displayed, in such big headlines that there was barely room for anything else on the page, "The contract is signed". There was nothing mentioned to show that it was signed only by the contractor and not by the railway company; that point was not brought out. That modification was not set forth even in the small print that is customary in setting forth the composition of patent medicines. That important detail was omitted entirely. Of course I was more particularly interested in the election in Comox-Alberni, but I saw the daily papers of Vancouver and I would say offhand and subject to criticism that as near as I could guess the campaign of their party in that city consisted to the extent of one-third, customs scandal, one-third attacking the old age pension legislation, and one-third enthusing about the building of this big hotel.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Did the minister make the statement that the value of these orders amounted to only $800,000?

Mr. DUNNING: I calculated the amount from the sheet supplied me by the management and which I lent a few moments ago to my hon. friend (Mr. Bennett)—that is I calculated the items stated to be "on order". It is true that within the last few days, knowing the near approach of the session of parliament, orders may have been given with the assurance that parliament was going to deal with the matter, subject to cancellation before any work was done. Even from a technical standpoint I cannot see that the management has not been correct in giving orders subject to the authority of parliament.

Mr. HEPBURN: The minister made the statement that it was the intention of the Canadian National Railway management to spend in the United States a portion of the money to be used in purchasing equipment for the American lines forming part of the system. I should like to point out to him the situation in southern Ontario. Despite the tremendous traffic that part of Canada yields American lines, they have in the last few years practically reduced the construction of cars and the repairs done in their shops in Ontario to a minimum. The result has been that many men have been laid off and the local municipalities have a serious situation to deal with. Is there any way by which this House can compel the American lines operating in that part of Canada to give to Canadian workmen a portion of the work that justly belongs to them? Last year in the estimates there was an appropriation to build new shops for the Canadian National at St. Thomas. I ask the Minister of Railways if it is still the intention of the railway management to go on with these shops, and if not what reason they assign for changing their plans.

Mr. DUNNING: I found it rather difficult to hear my hon. friend but I gather that his remarks had relation to the desirability of getting as much of this work done in Canada as possible. Am I correct in that?

Mr. HEPBURN: I should like to point out that in the last few years the American lines have practically discontinued the construction of new cars and are doing no major repairing. They have shops equipped for that purpose but they are not using them; they are not making any major repairs in Canada. I am speaking about the Michigan Central Railway in particular. Are there any customs regulations or anything that would compel them to do a proportionate share of this work in Canada?

Mr. DUNNING: As I stated this afternoon, the Customs department is watching the situation in that regard; but I would point out to my hon. friend that a great deal of American equipment passes from the United States into Canada and out again just in the same manner as our equipment does, and in such cases the customs regulations of both countries permit the passage through and repairs can be made on either side. I shall be glad to make further inquiries in reference to the point raised by my hon. friend which really has no bearing upon the particular estimates before the committee, although this is a proper time to mention it in any event.

Mr. BENNETT: I know the minister will be very glad to have his attention directed to the fact that the national railway makes contractual commitments before parliament has voted the money, because in the Kingston Standard-Whig of Wednesday I find a despatch from Montreal indicating that the first of a series of orders was received on Saturday by the Canadian Car and Foundry Company, Limited, for $2,000,000 for some of the very equipment that has been mentioned to-day and that orders are now to go to Kingston to the locomotive company for the work that has to be done there. Apparently this is an inspired despatch because it describes where the contracts are to go with regard to the Grand Trunk eastern lines. I merely state that this illustrates the point I was endeavouring to make, namely that the railway company makes contractual commitments before parliament has voted the money, and it is desirable that there should be some uniform system with respect to the matter if it is to be followed along the line suggested by the minister himself. This record indicates clearly what is taking place with respect to the Canadian Car and Foundry Company.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend will surely recognize that that article says merely what the newspaper believes has happened.

Mr. BENNETT: It is a despatch from Montreal.

Mr. DUNNING: Quite likely, but it is not a Canadian National official statement.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes it is. It says that they have placed orders for new equipment.

Mr. DUNNING: Who says that?

Mr. BENNETT: The newspaper says that the Canadian National has done so.

Mr. DUNNING: It does not officially quote the Canadian National.

Mr. BENNETT: We will ascertain if the contracts have not been made.

Mr. DUNNING: My information regarding that point is simply this: The railway company has been pressing very hard to be allowed to get into a position where this equipment will be on order, as much of it will be very badly required before it is delivered and deliveries will stretch over a year or more of this particular equipment. Sir Henry Thornton on the last occasion when he discussed the matter with me stated, "I must move forward." I said, "Very well, there is nothing to prevent you from going through all the preliminaries of calling for tenders and getting your prices so that you will be in a position to act with the utmost expedition once we have dealt with the matter in parliament."

Mr. BENNETT: Will the minister inquire whether or not on Saturday last a contract was let to the Canadian Car and Foundry Company for $2,000,000 worth of equipment, and let parliament know the result?

Mr. DUNNING: I will.

Mr. BENNETT: If he does I am satisfied he will find that a contract has been let.

Mr. DUNNING: The deputy minister is a director of the company and he advises me definitely that such a contract has not been let.

Item agreed to.

Loan to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine Limited, repayable on demand with interest at a rate to be fixed by the Governor in Council, upon such terms and conditions as the Governor in Council may determine, and to be applied in payment of:—

(a) Deficits in operation of the company and of the vessels under the company's control during the year ending March 31, 1927.

(b) Capital expenditure in connection with the vessels under the company's control, $600,000.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will the minister give a word of explanation about this appropriation?

Mr. DUNNING: This appropriation is identical with the material submitted to the special committee one year ago. There is no change.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it for the year ending March 31, 1927?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: There is nothing for next year?

Mr. DUNNING: There is nothing in any of these estimates for next year.

Item agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the first and second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

SUPPLY BILL

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING moved:

Resolved that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1927, the sum of $21,400,000 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 58, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1927.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

Friday, February 11, 1927

The House met at three o'clock.

RULES OF THE HOUSE

MOTION FOR SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER REVISION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a special committee consisting of His Honour, the Speaker, Hon. J. C. Elliott, Hon. W. D. Euler, Hon. Ernest Lapointe, Hon. Charles Marcil, Mr. J. Fred Johnston, Mr. D. F. Kellner, Mr. T. W. Bird, Mr. R. B. Hanson, Mr. W. A. Boys, Sir George Perley, Mr. George Black (Yukon) and Mr. Finlay Macdonald (Cape Breton South) be appointed to consider with His Honour the Speaker the advisability of revising the rules of the House, and to report to the House at the present session.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): In order that the committee may not overlook the point, I think it would be well if they would take into consideration, in addition to the matters that were considered by the former committee, the method in which divisions are recorded in this chamber. As a rule it takes from twenty-five to thirty-five minutes to record the vote of a House of two hundred and forty-five members, whereas in the parliament of Great Britain that operation is performed, on the average, in eight minutes although the membership of that body is something over six hundred. Now, the conditions here are especially favourable to the adoption of the English system; we have lobbies adjacent which can be utilized, and I trust that the committee which meets this session will consider the suggestion.

Motion agreed to.

CARILLON POWER DEVELOPMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I desire to lay on the table copies of orders in council relative to power development on the Ottawa river at Carillon falls, which were requested by the hon. leader of the opposition.

HEALTH AND PROPRIETARY MEDICINES ACTS

Hon. J. H. KING (East Kootenay): I beg to report that no regulations have been made under the Health Act or under the Proprietary Patent Medicines Act since the last session of parliament.

THE LATE MR. J. K. FLEMMING

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Before the orders of the day are called may I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to make mention of a loss this House has sustained, and which at the moment is much in the minds of all present. For the third time, in the brief interval which has elapsed since this parliament assembled, we have been called upon to pause in the proceedings of this House and refer to the death of one of our number. The speech from the throne had just been read when we learned of the death of an hon. member from the province of Nova Scotia. At the beginning of the present week we had occasion to refer, as we reassembled after our brief recess, to the death of another honourable member, this time from Ontario. And to-day, ere the week is over, we are called upon to record the death of yet another of our number, an hon. member from the province of New Brunswick. All three were present with us and took their seats at the opening of the present session, the proceedings of which have only thus far little more than commenced. I do not believe that in the history of our parliament the House of Commons has been called upon to mourn in so brief a space of time the loss of so many of its members; certainly never before were like losses in its membership sustained upon the very threshold of a new parliament.

The Hon. J. K. Flemming, whose death occurred yesterday, was the member for Carleton-Victoria. He entered this parliament at the general elections of 1925 and was present through the greater part of last session, which, as is well known, was also the last parliament. He was returned again at the general elections of 1926. Though in parliament but a short time he was a conspicuous figure, having some years ago occupied the position of premier of his native province. Though faithful in his attendance in this House, his voice was not heard on more than one or two occasions, partly no doubt because it was his first session in the federal parliament and partly due no doubt also to the ill-health from which he suffered. In the short time he was here, his kindly and pleasing personality won for him many friends among men of all parties.

The Hon. Mr. Flemming was born in Carleton county on April 27, 1868. His life was, for the most part, identified with the county of his birth and the affairs of his native province, of which, in the year 1911, he became the premier. After receiving an education at the common schools, he graduated from the provincial Normal school and followed for a time the profession of teaching. Later he engaged in commercial and industrial pursuits. For a time he was a travelling salesman and merchant; subsequently he became actively interested in lumbering operations and the development of the lumbering industry.

Mr. Flemming was a leader of the Conservative party in the province of New Brunswick. Practically all his life he took an active interest in public affairs. He encountered at the outset two defeats in his candidature for the legislature of his province. That was in 1895 and 1899, but in a by-election in 1900 he was returned to the legislature; and from that time on his rise to prominence in the affairs of his province was unbroken and rapid. He was re-elected to the legislature in 1903 and 1908. In the latter year he became Provincial Secretary and Receiver General in the cabinet of Sir Douglas—then Mr.—Hazen, and on the resignation of Sir Douglas Hazen in 1911, when Mr. Hazen entered the cabinet of Sir Robert Borden, Mr. Flemming succeeded to the premiership of the province; this position he held until the close of 1913, at which time, suffering from ill-health, he resigned both the premiership and his seat in the legislature.

From 1914 until 1925, when he was nominated to contest Victoria-Carleton in the interests of the Conservative party and was returned as member to this parliament, Mr. Flemming had practically retired from active politics. Whilst to some extent he regained his health and strength, he nevertheless suffered one or two serious illnesses during this period of retirement and hon. members who were with him in this parliament at the last session will recall that he suffered considerably at times through the impairment of his health. When, therefore, it was learned a few days ago that he had again to undergo an operation there were many who greatly feared the outcome.

May I, speaking for hon. members on this side of the House, say that we join with hon. gentlemen opposite in greatly regretting the loss which the House has sustained, and which will be particularly felt by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition and those who support him; and that we share with them the sympathy which we hope you, Mr. Speaker, will kindly convey, in the name of the Commons as a whole, to the widow and sons and daughters of our late colleague, who have been so greatly bereaved.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of those who sit on your left in this chamber, may I thank my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for the befitting and generous tribute which he has just paid to the memory of one whom we held in great respect, whom we held very dearly in this quarter of the chamber. I did not know the late Mr. Flemming personally until he came here for the first time about two years ago; but one was at once struck with his ability, with his kindheartedness, with his wonderful fund of information in regard to public affairs in this country. What struck me most was that even as far back as a year or two ago he seemed to have himself a realization that he was afflicted with some malady which would in the near or distant future result fatally. He told me last session that his health was rapidly failing and he did not know how long he would be able to continue. But he always exhibited patience, cheerfulness and courage, although he was well aware that the vital forces were daily growing weaker and weaker.

He was a man of outstanding ability, a very able speaker, an excellent debater, a man who had risen to the highest position in his native province, and who, had he been spared in this chamber, would have proved to be one of the ablest and most useful of our membership. But during all the time that he sat in this chamber I am satisfied that he had a hard fight against the ill health which constantly pursued him. I am sure that the whole chamber will deeply regret his death. We on this side realize that we have suffered a tremendous loss. We have lost a political friend, a personal friend, and a great ally in the Conservative party.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the members who sit in this corner of the chamber, may I say that we desire to be associated with the message of sympathy and condolence to be expressed to the widow and other relatives of the late Mr. Flemming. We particularly in this corner did not know Mr. Flemming very well, but he always seemed to us to be very cheerful and we thought he was in fairly good health. Circumstances have decreed otherwise, and we in this corner of the chamber, as we all must, very much regret his loss. We desire, therefore, to be associated with this message of sympathy.

SELKIRK PULPWOOD CONCESSIONS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. L. P. BANCROFT (Selkirk): I would like to ask the government the following question: Has an application been received by the Department of the Interior for a pulpwood concession sufficient to warrant the building of a pulp and paper mill at Selkirk, Manitoba? If so, what progress has been made in the negotiations and will the government give an assurance that this application will receive the same consideration as was, or may be, given to the Manitoba Pulp and Paper Company, who recently established a mill at Pine Falls?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): The department are not in receipt of—

Mr. SPEAKER: Such questions are out of order; they ought to be put on the order paper. But if the minister can make a brief answer, I will allow it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am quite prepared to answer. No application has been received for the construction of a mill at Selkirk. We have had an application from the Backus interests for territory in Manitoba for the construction of a mill in the vicinity of Winnipeg; but as that application was based on stumpage dues for all territory north of township 46 in Manitoba and only an offer of twenty cents of a bonus south of the boundary, we did not give it favourable consideration.

IMMIGRATION

GUARANTEED EMPLOYMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Is the Minister of Immigration aware that agents for the Canadian National Railways are offering guaranteed employment to immigrants to this country and that some of those who have been guaranteed employment are now in absolute destitution in the cities of western Canada? I should like further to ask what can be done in such a matter as this.

Hon. ROBERT FORKE (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): I have no information of any destitution anywhere in the Dominion at the present time.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I not secure from the Minister of Immigration an answer to my question? If I may repeat it, I said the Canadian National railway agents were guaranteeing employment to immigrants to this country, that some of these immigrants are now destitute, and I ask what can be done by the Minister of Immigration under these circumstances. I am prepared to offer proof of my statement. I think it is only fair that I should have an answer as to what can be done by the Immigration department when a serious state of affairs such as this exists, when men are coming to this country under an agreement that they are to be provided with work—I have a printed copy here to that effect—and then when they get here become a burden upon our cities.

Mr. FORKE: If the hon. gentleman had given me a little notice that he was going to ask this question I would have been able to reply to him much more fully. I am a new minister just starting out, and I was taken a little by surprise. The Canadian National Railway Company do undertake to find employment for immigrants they are bringing out to this country. I have heard that there has been unemployment in some of the towns in Canada. For instance, we had complaints from Calgary that a certain number of immigrants landed there by the Canadian National Railway were destitute. We made inquiries and found out that employment had been found for all these immigrants from whom we had complaints. I had a communication from the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan)—and I can assure my hon. friend that the Minister of Labour is always on his job, and that he keeps very close tab on me to see that I do not bring in any more immigrants than I should—to the effect that there was some unemployment, but I have heard nothing very serious yet, and I am perfectly confident, Mr. Speaker, that there has been less unemployment this year than we have had for a number of years past.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Instead of putting it in the form of a question, might I advise the minister that the latest information I have is that there are over one thousand men in Vancouver to-day, or were recently, getting one dollar per day on relief work?

BARNARDO HOMES

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (Toronto West Centre: I would ask the Minister of Immigration whether he has considered the wisdom of rescinding that regulation of his department which prevents the Barnardo Homes Association from bringing out children.

Hon. ROBERT FORKE (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): That is a matter of policy that I am not inclined to discuss in the House at the present time, but when the Immigration estimates come up or at some other convenient time I shall be prepared to go fully into any matters of that kind.

INDIAN TRIBES OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) interrogated the Prime Minister yesterday in respect to the agitation going on in British Columbia in connection with Indian title and I did not happen to be in the House on the occasion of the interrogation. This matter has been before the government, I think, during the whole life of the recent administration and for some considerable time prior to that.

Mr. STEVENS: Twelve years or more.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes. During all that period we have endeavoured by negotiation and conference to see if a settlement could not be reached. We had not been so fortunate up to recently as to be able to say that a settlement was even in sight. But we have been making a special study of the whole question, because the provincial government, the federal government and the Indians are all interested in the matter. The adjustment of the reserves, which was a burning question, is with some few exceptions almost completely settled. The representatives of the Indian tribes are pressing for a judicial investigation of the whole question of Indian title and asking that the matter be carried to the Privy Council.

That request has not been granted, although it is receiving consideration. We have a committee of the government acting in co-operation with the Deputy Minister of Justice, working on the situation and endeavouring to reach a decision as to whether or not it would be wise to submit the matter for judicial investigation, with the privilege of carrying the whole question to the Privy Council.

Mr. STEVENS: Might I ask the minister if he has given consideration to my suggestion that a small select committee of parliament be appointed to consider the matter? The minister may not be prepared to answer now, but I again make the suggestion, and only in the interest of bringing about some solution of the problem.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have given that matter some consideration, but we have already spent a great deal of money in bringing witnesses from British Columbia, and I really do not believe that any new evidence can be submitted; there are volumes of evidence already. If a committee of parliament would be helpful, without going to the expense of bringing two or three hundred witnesses from British Columbia, I would be inclined to ask for that assistance, but there has been so much investigation already, so much evidence taken and so much money spent on this controversial question, that I am inclined to think we had better have a try at a solution of the problem by the present committee and see if we cannot get together. We have managed to settle some of the more difficult problems that were engaging our attention. I do not say that we shall settle this one, but we at least want to make a little further attempt to settle it.

Mr. STEVENS: I earnestly hope the minister will be able to settle it.

ALBERTA COAL—TRANSPORTATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), I believe, is still awaiting an answer to a question he asked some days ago with respect to a governor general's warrant for $17,000 odd, which is to be found in the estimates, for the movement of coal from Alberta to Ontario. A governor general's warrant for this purpose was passed for the sum of $17,943.64 by the Conservative government just prior to their resignation in September. All of this amount was paid to the Canadian National Railways, and the Ontario government refunded to the Dominion government the value of the coal, which amounted to $13,647.56. The actual cost, therefore, to the Dominion government for the movement of the test shipment of 2,000 tons was $4,296.08.

SUPPLY BILL

On the motion of Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance) Bill No. 58, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1927, was read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY

SUBSTITUTION OF CANADIAN NATIONAL FOR GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC SECURITIES

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved the second reading of Bill No. 57, respecting the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company and respecting the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): I desire to point out that this bill has just been distributed and we have had no opportunity of going into the provisions contained in the bill. When the matter was before the House yesterday afternoon very important questions were asked the minister upon which he did not care to express an opinion in a public way. Would it be agreeable to the minister to permit this legislation to go before the special railway committee in order that they might be able to go into the matter more fully and report to the House? There are many important matters of which we have no knowledge. A very large sum of money is involved in the bill and furthermore there is a principle which we should recognise and we should see to it that we know what we are doing before we go any further.

Mr. DUNNING: The government is desirous of permitting the fullest possible explanation of the bill and its terms. The method proposed by my hon. friend will, I am afraid, take a very great deal of time, and we should bear in mind that this arrangement has been before the public of this country and of the old country, in detail, for a period of months, and that the principle, indeed a large measure of the detailed arrangement, was embodied in the resolution discussed yesterday. Will it meet my hon. friend's wishes if we proceed to-day to take the second reading and consider the bill in committee, with the understanding that we leave the bill in committee until Monday, in the meantime permitting any inquiries to be made of myself or of the officers of the department by any member who may be interested in further explanation which cannot be given here?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On Section 2—Scheme of arrangement with holders of four per cent debenture stock with Grand Trunk Pacific Company confirmed.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: It would be impossible for hon. members to read the whole section while the chairman reads a short synopsis. None of us happens to be acquainted with the contents of the bill, and I fail to see how we can carry it intelligently until we know what the sections contains. If we are to proceed with the bill to-day and pass it clause by clause, should we not have the clauses read?

Mr. COOTE: It would be very helpful to the committee and might save time if the minister, who I am sure is very familiar with this bill, would have the clauses read, and if there is anything vital in the clauses he might make a very brief statement to the House.

The CHAIRMAN: Clause 2 reads:

2. Notwithstanding anything in any of the acts relating to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company (hereinafter called "the Pacific Company") or to the Canadian National Railway Company (hereinafter called "the National Company") and except where inconsistent with this act the scheme of arrangement set out in schedule "A" to this Act, and hereinafter called "the scheme of arrangement", to be made with the holders of the four per cent debenture stock of the Pacific company (hereinafter called "Pacific stock") issued pursuant to chapter one hundred of the statutes of Canada for the year 1906 and chapter one hundred and twenty-three of the statutes of Canada for the year 1913, is hereby duly confirmed and declared to be valid and binding upon all persons and companies affected thereby, or interested or mentioned therein, in every respect as if the Scheme of Arrangement had been enacted hereby; and the said persons and companies are hereby authorized and required, subject to the provisions of this Act, to observe and carry out all the terms and provisions of such scheme of arrangement according to the true intent and meaning thereof.

Mr. DUNNING: I think the explanatory note opposite the section in the copy of the bill which is in the hands of every member of the committee is about all that is required by way of explanation. This makes effective the scheme of arrangement later set out.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. COOTE: A question was raised yesterday with reference to line 19 where it says:

Declared to be valid and binding upon all persons and companies affected thereby or interested or mentioned therein.

Does not the question naturally arise here as to how this agreement is to be made binding on every individual holder of the debenture stock? Or will that point be covered later?

Mr. DUNNING: The particular point to which my hon. friend refers arises directly on the next section.

Mr. KENNEDY: Does not the passing of this section involve the passing of schedule A? I should like to hear an explanation of the meaning of that schedule before this section is finally passed.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, I thought I outlined that fully yesterday, but if it is the desire of the committee I will repeat what the scheme of arrangement is. The scheme deals with an issue of over £7,000,000 of Grand Trunk Pacific perpetual debentures, now outstanding. In addition to the £7,000,000, there are £3,000,000 of the same debentures which are at present held by the Finance minister of Canada, and which are separately and especially provided for in the legislation. The debentures now outstanding are perpetual; that is to say, they never mature. They bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum. The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company is responsible in the first place for the payment of that four per cent; failing payment by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada becomes responsible as guarantor of the Grand Trunk Pacific. But the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada can only pay this particular interest for which it is liable as guarantor in case it earns sufficient money in any year over and above its prior obligations. The scheme of arrangement proposes gradually to eliminate the perpetual feature by means of the issue of a new security, which will be exchanged for the security now in the hands of the holders. The new security will bear interest, not at four per cent but at the rate of two per cent. Another feature of the scheme of arrangement is that two per cent will annually be paid into a sinking fund, the proceeds to be used for the retirement of the principal year by year. Under the scheme of arrangement, instead of paying the four per cent indefinitely, whenever the Grand Trunk earns it, we will pay two per cent, and by means of the sinking fund we should be able to retire the entire principal sum in thirty years. That, briefly, is the scheme of arrangement. It was recommended by an advisory committee representing the bondholders and the Canadian National Railways. It included a number of distinguished old country gentlemen headed by the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna, and was negotiated after a very careful examination by lawyers on both sides as to the relative liabilities, and by financiers on both sides as to the probabilities in the future in regard to the position of the stock. The arrangement was adopted subject only to approval by this House.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Am I right in my understanding that the bondholders are satisfied to take a certain two per cent rather than rely on an uncertain four per cent whenever the Grand Trunk may be able to pay it; and that the bonds will be retired in thirty years with the two per cent paid into the sinking fund?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. SIMPSON: Will the debentures be retired at par, or how is the price to be fixed?

Mr. DUNNING: That is an important question. The arrangement for the retirement of the debentures is that the proceeds of the sinking fund shall be applied each year in the purchase of debentures, the purchase to be made by tender. That is to say, any debenture holder will be at liberty to offer his debentures each year to the sinking fund trustees, to be paid for out of the sinking fund. But there is a further provision that at the end of ten years the debentures shall be retired from time to time at par.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, in what rank will these new bond obligations stand in relation to the other obligations of the company?

Mr. DUNNING: So far as the company is concerned, the question of priority does not arise because the new obligation will be guaranteed by the government of Canada.

Mr. MILLAR: Has any serious objection been taken to this scheme on the part of the stockholders who have not accepted it? Is there any organized objection to it?

Mr. DUNNING: Not only is there no organized objection to the scheme, but I can recollect receiving only one individual protest. I may say that ninety-two per cent of the total holders of bonds have assented, and if we allow for those who more or less disappear in one way or another and cannot be reached, I think we can pretty well take it for granted that all those interested have accepted the scheme of arrangement.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): In answer to a question asked by an hon. gentleman to my right a moment ago, the minister intimated to the House that for ten years the government would retire the bonds on tender to the amount of the sinking fund accumulated irrespective of the value of the bonds. Any stockholder could send in an offer to sell his bonds?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What is to prevent a large number of the stockholders or all of them getting together and agreeing on a fixed amount per share, in other words, holding up the government?

Mr. DUNNING: There is no compulsion under the scheme of arrangement for the sinking fund trustees to buy the bonds offered, and the danger that my hon. friend refers to in any case is remote when we bear in mind that there are about seven thousand individual bondholders. I do not think there is likely to be any danger along that line. I do not know how we could guard ourselves against it even if there were such danger.

Mr. GARDINER: I notice in schedule A on page 6 of the bill that for the first ten years the bonds may be redeemed at a price of not less than £60 or more than £100 per £100 of stock. Is it necessary to insert the minimum in that case?

Mr. DUNNING: That was a matter of bargaining between the parties, and was one of the points on which the negotiations pretty nearly broke down. I may say that the bonds have been selling in the neighbourhood of £60 for some time past in spite of the uncertainty of the bondholders receiving interest.

Mr. McGIBBON: What was the price of the bonds when the Grand Trunk Pacific went into receivership?

Mr. DUNNING: I am sorry I have not that information.

Mr. McGIBBON: Could the minister tell the committee the total percentage of interest that has been paid upon those bonds since that date?

Mr. DUNNING: The last payment by the Grand Trunk Pacific was in 1919. The Grand Trunk Pacific went into receivership in 1919. There has been one payment since that time as the result of the old Grand Trunk earning sufficient to pay the interest; that was in 1924 on the 1923 operations.

Mr. McGIBBON: Then providing these bonds were held for the next ten years, and taking into consideration the interest lost, they would really be retired at a price of only £60?

Mr. DUNNING: About that; and we would be paying two per cent interest.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Scheme to be operative upon passing of this Act.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: For the benefit of those of us who have had no legal training I hope the minister will explain how this arrangement can be forced upon individual bondholders. It looks to me like the confiscation of their existing bonds and the substitution of something else whether the individual bondholder may be agreeable or not. I understood the minister to say yesterday that this was not a matter of charity or of a compassionate allowance; he stated that these individuals had a legal claim. Well, if they have a legal claim, how can that claim be superseded in the way here proposed? If one individual bondholder undertakes to stand out, how can he be forced to come into the scheme? And if he can be forced into the scheme, then it is worth considering whether or not we are right in proceeding with the arrangement. If there is nothing legally binding on us in this regard it seems to me that the other question which was discussed yesterday must come up again. These people gave bonds for a concern that proved bankrupt and the Dominion came to the resuce and stood behind the railway. Now it appears that we are to honour all the claims that exist in regard to this unsuccessful railway. Why should we do so if we are under no legal obligation? These are questions that should be clearly explained before we adopt this legislation. We were told yesterday of one instance in which one party signed the contract while the other declined to do so. It seems to me that in this case the Dominion is signing. How shall we force the other people to sign if they do not want to do so?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend's premise regarding the situation of the company in relation to the government is scarcely correct. I said yesterday, and I repeat it to-day, that these people hold in their hand an absolute security having behind it terms enforceable in the courts of the country against first, the Grand Trunk Pacific which, as my hon. friend says, is a bankrupt concern in receivership. I have the unpleasant privilege of being the receiver for the Grand Trunk Pacific. The Grand Trunk Railway, however, cannot be placed in the same class at all, and in the bonds held by these people there is a provision of guarantee by the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada. Now the Grand Trunk Railway has other legal obligations ranking prior to this one, and if in any year the Grand Trunk Railway earns more than sufficient to pay those prior obligations and has any money over, then these people have a legal claim against the former Grand Trunk Railway for their four per cent interest.

As to the other point dealing with minorities who do not assent, I remarked a little while ago that we had had the assent of ninety-two per cent of the bondholders. I am told that it is unique that there should be such a large proportion of assent in connection with an arrangement of this kind.

Mr. BROWN: Is that a binding assent?

Mr. DUNNING: Absolutely binding; it is a signed assent. Now there must always be some machinery for clearing up matters of this kind, otherwise business could not be conducted. That is recognized in our Exchequer Court Act and in the Railway Act, whereby provisions are made generally to deal with the liquidation of bonds of railway companies. The Railway Act provides that the Exchequer Court may give permission to bind what my hon. friend refers to as a minority in case seventy-five per cent of the whole consent. And in view of the fact that in this case we had already in hand a ninety-two per cent approval we thought it unnecessary to involve the legal machinery of the Exchequer court which, as I have said, is authorized under our existing laws to bind the others in the event of seventy-five per cent consenting. That is the best answer I can give my hon. friend. If there were not some means of cleaning up the tag ends no bond issue could ever be dealt with because there is always a proportion of bonds which simply cannot be located. Bonds vanish, they go out of existence, they are burnt up in fires or they go down with ships. As a matter of fact I am of opinion that with such a large percentage agreeing we may say that practically all the existing bondholders have given their consent.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Under this procedure no legal action can be taken by the eight per cent against the government. Is that right?

Mr. DUNNING: That is correct.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I am not perfectly clear in regard to the interpretation of the percentages. Section 3 provides:

> The scheme of arrangement having already been assented to in writing by the holders of three-fourths in value of the Pacific stock—

That is altogether different from saying, "three-fourths of the holders of the stock". The minister says that ninety-two per cent of approximately seven thousand bondholders have given assent. Does he mean the holders of ninety-two per cent of the stock or ninety-two per cent of the holders of the stock?

Mr. DUNNING: Ninety-two per cent "in value".

Mr. CARMICHAEL: That is a different thing from ninety-two per cent of the individual bondholders. I can well conceive that ten or twelve bondholders may hold seventy-five per cent of the stock and that a large majority of the bondholders may be coerced into doing what the minority wish them to do, simply because that minority hold a majority of the stock. Is that the situation?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is suggesting a purely hypothetical possibility; it is remotely possible. I am sure however that had there been any such coercion we should have heard about it, for the reason that this matter has been discussed in the press, particularly in investors' journals in the old land, for years past; and the scheme of arrangement itself was widely advertised months ago, each bondholder having been personally apprised of the fact that the scheme contains a provision that it shall become operative when assented to by three-fourths of the bondholders. That is what the bondholders were asked to consent to as part of the scheme of arrangement.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: Has the minister the information as to what percentage of actual bondholders have subscribed to the agreement?

Mr. DUNNING: I am afraid I have not that information.

Mr. HANSON: Was this original bond issue secured by a trust deed?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. HANSON: Or a statutory mortgage?

Mr. DUNNING: Statutory stock, yes.

Mr. HANSON: And does this arrangement depart from the conditions of the statute in any other respect?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. HANSON: Well then, I do not think the point raised by our laymen friends was very well taken. If ninety-two per cent in value of the bondholders have agreed, that is a very large proportion of any body of bondholders. Usually the proportion is very much less.

Mr. DUNNING: Very much.

Mr. BENNETT: Sometimes it is only sixty per cent.

Mr. HANSON: Yes, and less than that.

Mr. COOTE: I should like the minister to correct me if I am wrong in the supposition that by this legislation we are deliberately depriving the holders of this debenture stock, who may not have signed the agreement, of any rights which they may have, except what we now give them in this way?

Mr. DUNNING: That is correct.

Mr. COOTE: Would it not be much better to follow the usual procedure and ask the Exchequer court to make this ruling? Because I understand that one reason why we are putting this agreement through is to help the condition of Canadian credit in London. There is a feeling there that we have not treated these bondholders properly. Is it not possible that some of these bondholders would not approve of this scheme, and will have the right to say that the parliament of Canada has deliberately by legislation taken their debenture stock which calls for four per cent interest and give them two per cent? It does seem as though they might consider we are doing something very drastic to interfere with the security which they hold, and in that case they certainly could say much against Canada because this parliament is deliberately putting through this legislation.

Mr. DUNNING: The point my hon. friend raises was a point of difficulty with myself in considering the scheme, that is as between myself and officers of the company. The element of time is of very great importance in connection with this matter, because of the very near arrival of another interest date on these bonds, and the arrangement which is accepted, as I say, by ninety-two per cent of the bondholders, provides in clause 9 (b) that the scheme shall become operative when the same has been confirmed by the Exchequer court of Canada if such confirmation shall be required by the company. That is to say the bondholders themselves agreed to waive confirmation by the Exchequer court, provided the company did not require it for some purpose of its own. Well, when the matter came to me I said: Unless the percentage of consenting bondholders is much higher than seventy-five per cent I do not think it wise to introduce into the Canadian parliament a measure which would have the effect of coercing a considerable number of minority bondholders, and I simply told the company that if they desired to avoid Exchequer court proceedings they would have to get a practically universal assent. I was anxious to avoid the very thing my hon. friend points out, that is, a feeling of soreness, a feeling that people had not been treated properly; and it was not until we were assured of ninety-two per cent of assents that the arrangement now proposed was inserted in the bill. As I said before we would surely have heard of objections to it had there been any, because no matter of a financial character that I can recall has had wider public discussion in the press than this has had. The details we are now discussing have been discussed in the homes of many small investors in the old country, because this issue is very largely held by small investors, as the number of the debenture holders indicates, and it is very well understood, I am quite sure, that we would have heard before this of any substantial ground for complaint, if such had existed.

Mr. COOTE: I do not wish to labour the point, but it does seem to me very doubtful if many of these small investors know that in this scheme it is proposed that the parliament of Canada should deliberately take away from these people any right they may have; that is to say, we are going to compel them to accept this arrangement whether they want it or not. If these people were united in any way in a company with a majority of ninety-two per cent of them enforcing their will on the rest, that would be a different matter. But it does seem to me that parliament is doing here something that is not right in principle, and something which it is just possible we may be sorry for some day.

Will the minister be kind enough to give us a little information as to just how the Grand Trunk was taken over by the government? As far as I remember that has not been mentioned in the debate.

Mr. DUNNING: The old Grand Trunk?

Mr. COOTE: Yes, as to whether it went into a receivership or what the procedure was.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is imposing upon me a rather difficult job.

Mr. COOTE: The minister need only give it very briefly. I want a point cleared up for my own satisfaction.

Mr. DUNNING: It occurred, of course, long before I had anything to do with the matter. If I should err in giving an historical review I am subject to correction by gentlemen who were members of the House at the time. The former Grand Trunk was taken over by the government of Canada as the result of arbitration proceedings. Those proceedings decided the amount, if any, that should be paid for the junior stocks, and the road—the former Grand Trunk—is now the absolute property of the government of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: Of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. DUNNING: Of the Canadian National Railways, which in turn are owned by the government of Canada, subject to public charges. What I mean by public charges are such bonds issued as are outstanding and which embody obligations to the public secured by the property.

Mr. BENNETT: And the rental charges.

Mr. DUNNING: And the rental charges. What was arbitrated was the value of the preferred and common stock in the old Grand Trunk, the stock being acquired by the Canadian government.

Mr. BOYS: I should like to know if this clause is in harmony with the provisions of the trust mortgage which secured the bonds in question.

Mr. DUNNING: There was no trust mortgage.

Mr. BOYS: I think there was.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. BOYS: If there was not, then it seems to me this provision is more far-reaching. I refer to the words which appear at the top of page 2 of the bill:

> All the terms and provisions of the scheme of arrangement shall be binding on all holders of Pacific stock, whether assenting to or not assenting to the scheme of arrangement—

If there was some document which gave certain rights which could be exercised notwithstanding the wishes of the minority, that would be all right; but if there is no such right it seems to me there is very grave doubt about it, and it may be an interference with property and civil rights as well. I thought the minister made some reference to a statutory mortgage.

Mr. BENNETT: No, statutory stock.

Mr. BOYS: Then I misunderstood the minister. Is it the fact that this arrangement will absolutely deprive these people of rights which they undoubtedly have? I am not seeking to object to the legislation, but the thought comes to me which was first raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). The thought was in my own mind at the time but I imagined it was overcome by virtue of some arrangement with the Pacific bondholders themselves when they purchased the bonds.

Mr. DUNNING: There is.

Mr. BOYS: If there is such an arrangement that would satisfy me absolutely on the point.

Mr. DUNNING: Look at clause 9, subsection (a) of the scheme of arrangement on page 7 of the bill.

Mr. BOYS: Then, as I understand it, that scheme of arrangement is one that was made without the assent of the eight per cent. My point is this: Where do you get the right to interfere at all with the acquired rights of the eight per cent? We know quite well that there are clauses in mortgages securing bonds which give rights where there are certain majorities, but it seems to me that feature is absent here. If it is, what I should like to be enlightened upon is whether it is proper to deprive these eight per cent, or whatever the percentage is, of their rights, and is it not an interference with property and civil rights?

Mr. DUNNING: The Railway Act and the Exchequer court together provide that in connection with matters of this kind, whenever seventy-five per cent of the bondholders have assented, the Exchequer court may determine to bind the other twenty-five per cent. What parliament is asked to decide on this occasion is whether ninety-two per cent of assents received is sufficient to justify this parliament in saying there is no necessity to go through the extra machinery and to incur the extra expense and delay, which is even more serious, of an Exchequer court action. If I could see that an injury was being done to anyone, I would not suggest such a course; but in view of the very large proportion of assents and the fact also that we are not taking much away from these people, because after all they are getting a guaranteed security—

Mr. BOYS: I am not criticising the terms at all; I am referring to the authority.

Mr. DUNNING: It is a gilt-edged security. The other is perpetual and a perpetual source of uncertainty in regard to the receipt of interest. There is no doubt they will receive two per cent interest; the bonds will achieve a definite market value, and a larger proportion of assents has been received, than has ever been known in financial history.

Mr. COOTE: The question of injury is after all a question to be decided by each person; it is their personal opinion and that is the great danger that confronts us in this case. By right of might, because of course that is the only way in which we can handle the matter in this parliament, this parliament can say that those people's right is taken away and they are given something else in its place. That is wrong in principle and personally I would like to register my objection to it.

I would like to ask the minister another question in regard to the prior claims which the Grand Trunk must pay before they will have to pay these debenture stocks, that is, whether the interest on the money advanced by the government to the Grand Trunk once it was taken over, would be a prior claim.

Mr. DUNNING: I can perhaps best answer that question by reading the exact wording of the conditional guarantee given by the Grand Trunk Railway Company to the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company. It reads:

> Provided always that the liability of the Grand Trunk in the premises shall from time to time be conditional and wholly depend upon the amount of its gross earnings during any half year ending on some 30th day of June or 31st day of December showing a surplus after the following deductions therefrom (that is to say):
> 1. All working expenses as defined by the Canadian acts of parliament relating to the Grand Trunk railway.
> 2. All interest and other moneys payable by the Grand Trunk in respect of
> (a) The Grand Trunk loan capital as defined by the said acts.
> (b) Any bonds or liabilities of any other company pursuant to any guarantee or undertaking heretofore given by the Grand Trunk.

That is given prior to this one.

> And such surplus as aforesaid being shown the liability of the Grand Trunk in the premises shall be limited to the amount of such surplus and shall wholly determine when a payment or payments to such amount shall have been made to any holder or holders of stock under the covenant in that behalf hereinbefore contained.

It ranks next after the charges created prior to the giving of it.

Mr. SMOKE: Am I right in understanding that the bonds outstanding are perpetual debentures and the principal never matures?

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Mr. SMOKE: Then I am wholly in sympathy with this bill. If eight per cent of the bondholders say: "We do not agree to this proposition", let them hang on to their bonds and the government continue to pay them the four per cent or whatever interest is payable. The government will never have to pay the principal. Is that not the worst position the Dominion of Canada can be placed in?

Mr. DUNNING: That is why we have that section.

Mr. ADSHEAD: What was the market value of the old bonds and what is the market value of the present stock they are getting?

Mr. DUNNING: The new bonds have not yet been issued, but the old ones sold last year at amounts varying from just over sixty to pretty close to seventy at times.

Mr. CANTLEY: I should like to congratulate all who have been concerned in completing this arrangement because it is eminently in the interests of this country that it should be done. I say so for two or three reasons. In the first place we are getting quit, within a reasonable time, of these bonds and at the expense of one-half of the interest due those bondholders. In the second place there has been a good deal of dissatisfaction in the old country, whether warranted or not I am not prepared to say, although I have my opinion in regard to the matter. It is eminently in the interests of this country that that source of dissatisfaction be removed and it is being removed by this bill.

We have been very large borrowers in London in years past. In recent years since the war we have been borrowing largely from the United States; but the time may and very likely will arrive and perhaps before long when we shall again have to have recourse to the British financial market. In view of those and other considerations I think it is highly desirable that this question be settled on a fair basis, and the proposal before the House does settle it on an eminently fair basis so far as this country is concerned.

The other point brought up is in regard to the outstanding or possible outstanding eight per cent in value of the bonds concerned. If I am in a company and if ninety-two per cent of my friends have made up their minds that an arrangement proposed to be carried out by the company is fair, right and desirable, I do not think I shall receive very much sympathy, either within the company or on the street, for shouting in regard to my rights having been disregarded. I do not think, as regards arrangements of this kind carried on over a period of years in this country generally, you will find any other such arrangement has been so successfully carried out that ninety-two per cent have acquiesced voluntarily without any coercion of any kind whatsoever. In view of these considerations I am strongly in favour of the passage of this bill.

Mr. MILLAR: If this bill goes through, as it will, and the eight per cent should wish to take action against the government for the payment of what would naturally fall due to them, what stands in their way? I know in some cases permission must be had from the government before action can be taken against it. Is that the situation in this case?

Mr. DUNNING: By law we say here: If this bill passes, they shall be deemed to have transferred to the company. That is, we are here doing what the Exchequer court would do under our ordinary laws if the matter were placed before it. We are doing it here only because there is such a large proportion of consent in the first place, and because by doing so we can avoid the expense and, what is more important, the delay involved in allowing time for proceedings to be taken before the Exchequer court by any possible dissenter.

I might say something which I have not said before in connection with this bill, namely, that I regard it as the first step towards straightening out the very serious complications of the Canadian national financial structure. I do not know if I shall live to see it completely straightened out, or if I shall be able to handle the job, but there is no question about it that one of the most serious expenses of the Canadian National system, one of the barriers to its success, is its present complicated financial structure, and here we are taking the first essential step in the direction of simplifying that structure. It will enable, as I said before, the Grand Trunk Pacific receivership to be terminated, with all the separate bookkeeping and legal procedure which that has involved. It will enable the Grand Trunk Pacific and its subsidiaries to be merged with the Canadian National system, and until this is done, until this bill is passed and this matter is settled, that amalgamation is impossible. I hope to come later with other proposals to reduce the extent of the confusion that now exists in the Canadian National financing. But it will be a much slower process than some of our editorial friends would have us believe. It is a most complex problem. When I come forward with this one proposal, immediately it bristles with difficulties, and members of the committee have no trouble at all in pointing out possible difficulties, possible injustices, possible complications. Each one of the financial motions necessary to deal with the situation—and eighty-nine separate corporations now comprise the Canadian National system—will involve, I am afraid discussions of this kind whenever it is necessary to bring them to parliament. This is merely the first step.

Mr. HANSON: The minister is not referring to the question of reduction of capitalization, is he?

Mr. ROBB: Do not try to draw him out too far.

Mr. HANSON: Then why refer to it at all?

Mr. KENNEDY: I understood the minister to say in reply to a question that the worst that could happen with respect to the eight per cent, if they were dissatisfied, would be that they would hold on to their stock.

Mr. DUNNING: No, that would not do them any good.

Mr. KENNEDY: They must turn in their stock and accept the new stock issued?

Mr. DUNNING: If they do not submit the old stock in exchange for the new, they will be deemed to have done so, and the records of the company in relation to them will be kept as if they had done so, and they will be entitled to all the benefits of the new stock.

Mr. COOTE: The only advantage then, I take it, in not referring this matter to the Exchequer court and getting an order from them is that it can be done here much more quickly.

Mr. DUNNING: And save expense. My hon. friend understands that the Exchequer court would have to give a period of time in their own discretion within which to permit any of these eight per cent to come forward. How long that period would be I do not know, but I do know it would surely conflict with the dates that are set out in the scheme of arrangement, and by reason of that would upset the whole financial arrangement.

Mr. KENNEDY: I wonder if the minister would answer this question. Now that we are facing the possibility of paying interest on this stock, does he not think we are due for a reduction of freight rates in Canada?

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Delivery of certificates of Pacific stock, in exchange for new stock.

Mr. STEVENS: In the last line but one it says "sinking fund and call". What is the necessity for the word "call"?

Mr. DUNNING: There is provision for call after ten years. We will come to that section later.

Section agreed to.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Order in council to terminate statutory charge securing Pacific stock.

Mr. COOTE: Would the minister explain what this clause is for?

Mr. DUNNING: We provided in section 5 for cremating the securities. Here we are providing for eliminating the charge which the cremated securities carried before they were cremated.

Section agreed to.

Section 7 agreed to.

On section 8—Certificates for £3,000,000 of Pacific stock held as security to be surrendered and cremated.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: The language of this section is similar to the language of section 5. It says in section 5 that the certificates "may be" cancelled and cremated, and in section 8 that the certificates "may be" surrendered. Should it not be "shall be"? The sections leave it optional; should it not be compulsory?

Mr. DUNNING: The intention is, unless some vital or unforeseen reason arises between now and the time when the securities are collected, that they shall be cremated, but unless permission were given it would not be possible for us, in the event of such an unforeseen reason arising, to keep the securities for a time.

Mr. KENNEDY: What is the meaning of the words in lines 31, 32 and 33:

But such cancellation and cremation shall not affect the obligations of the Pacific company to the National company nor of the National company (as successor by amalgamation with the Grand Trunk Railway Company) to His Majesty in respect of the said advances.

Mr. DUNNING: The explanation on the other page of the bill deals with it completely.

Mr. KENNEDY: We have been referred to the explanation and we would like to look at it.

Mr. COOTE: We would like to expedite business, but we should be given a chance to read the explanation.

Mr. KENNEDY: If I understand the matter correctly, this means that the charge for interest would be against the Grand Trunk Pacific, notwithstanding the arrangement that is being made with the bondholders on behalf of the Grand Trunk. I think I am safe in saying that the troubles of the Grand Trunk Pacific are due very largely to the management of the Grand Trunk in the location of that railway. It is a fine illustration of bad business management in that regard when we know that the survey was originally made to the Peace river country, where they neglected about seven hundred miles of good farming territory to build seven hundred miles through bush, a territory which cannot be revenue-producing. We have here another illustration of the absolute unfairness in our dealings with large companies. Western Canada will again be charged up with the mismanagement of the big company in the east, and it will show in our railway deficits to the debit of the Grand Trunk Pacific for all time to come.

Mr. COOTE: What is the use of carrying this item on the books? Would it not be just as well to wipe it out?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend wants to see the Canadian National financing gradually and properly cleared up, but it is necessary in doing it to proceed one step at a time. It is necessary to maintain as of record the indebtedness between the parties until we proceed a step or two further in the financial reorganization. It will be a book entry merely for the time being, and it will maintain the relative standing of the indebtedness between the parties as it now exists. We should not, until we are prepared to look at the whole structure and deal with it, proceed to wipe out individual assets and liabilities and simply forget them.

Mr. COOTE: I asked the question in the hope of getting some reason why this liability should be carried on. If the item were wiped out altogether that would simplify the bookkeeping. I take it from the minister's statement that there is some reason for carrying this item on the books, though he is not very definite in his statement in regard to it.

Mr. KENNEDY: What progress has been made with regard to the straightening of the capitalization of the various Canadian National railways? I understand they have been at it for about two years. I was wondering how soon we would get to a point where the capitalization would be written down or where it might be brought down.

Section agreed to.

Sections 7 to 11 inclusive agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the title carry?

Mr. GARDINER: I would suggest that before we carry the title the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again, in order that we may have an opportunity further to consider the bill.

Progress reported.

LOAN COMPANIES ACT, 1914, AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 49 to amend the Loan Companies Act, 1914.

Mr. HANSON: Has this bill been distributed?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee on banking and commerce.

INSURANCE ACT, 1917, AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 50, to amend the Insurance Act, 1917.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee on banking and commerce.

WINDING-UP ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 51, to amend the Winding-up Act.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we all want to expedite the business of the House, but speaking for myself I have not yet had time to look at any of these bills. I am not going to object to the second reading, but I think it should be stated that in giving second reading to these bills the House is not necessarily committed to their principle; we take it for granted that we will have an opportunity to discuss the principle of these bills if we deem it necessary to do so.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Speaker, I quite appreciate the position taken by my hon. friend. We are passing the bills along so as to advance them a stage. We are referring them to the select standing committee on banking and commerce, where there will be every opportunity for the members of the committee to debate them fully and to get all the information they may require.

Mr. COOTE: I have heard it stated many times in this chamber that when we agree to the second reading of a bill we are committing ourselves to its principle. That is the reason why I rose to make a statement. I think it certainly should not be taken for granted that the House is committed to the principle of these bills until members have had ample time to consider them.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee on banking and commerce.

TRUST COMPANIES ACT, 1914, AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 52, to amend the Trust Companies Act, 1914.

Mr. COOTE: Mr. Speaker, may I ask if this bill is printed?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. COOTE: It does not appear to be on our files. These bills are being dealt with so rapidly that I have not time to look for them in my file.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the select standing committee on banking and commerce.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT, 1915, AMENDMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in the measure to amend The Special War Revenue Act, 1915, as passed by both houses of parliament at the last session but not assented to, providing

(a) for the removal of the one cent additional postage on letters for transmission by post for any distance within Canada; excepting "drop" letters and post cards;

(b) for the remission of the stamp tax on receipts;

(c) for a straight tax on playing cards, on every fifty-four cards or fraction thereof in each package—ten cents per pack;

(d) for a provision to remove doubts as to whether goods are liable to sales tax when sold under process of law, or under a lien, etc.;

(e) for the exemption of certain specified articles from consumption or sales tax;

(f) for adding certain specified articles to the list subject to 50 per cent of the sales tax;

(g) for removing the tax on carbonic acid gas;

(h) for a refund of tax paid on ships' stores;

(i) for the removal of excise taxes on automobiles valued at not more than $1,200, when the conditions prescribed in the said legislation are fulfilled as to importation for any British country under the British preferential tariff, or from countries enjoying most favoured nation treatment, or as to automobiles produced or manufactured in Canada, and authorizing a refund of excise tax on such automobiles new, unused and unsold in the possession of the dealer or agent on 8th June, 1926; and

(j) for the repeal of certain orders in council relating to the operation of these provisions

He said: Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair I may say that this resolution covers legislation arising from the budget of 1926. The measure to be submitted is identically the same as that which passed both houses of parliament, but which failed to receive royal assent. The principal parts of the legislation were made effective by order in council dated July 14, 1926. There is no change whatever in the general principle of the legislation.

Mr. BENNETT: Nor in the details?

Mr. ROBB: They are the same except as to dates.

Mr. BENNETT: There was one clause that could not be made effective by order in council.

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I do not remember what reason was given when this resolution was before the House last session with regard to section (a) dealing with the removal of the one cent additional postage on letters transmitted within Canada, excepting "drop letters and postcards." If I understand rightly, the additional cent on drop letters and postcards was put on as a war revenue tax, the same as the additional cent on other letters. I fail to understand why the war tax should have been removed from letters generally and not from drop letters and postcards. Has the minister any satisfactory explanation?

Mr. ROBB: It is purely a matter of policy. We were returning to the penny postage and it was contended that it cost as much to distribute drop letters in the city as to send them to outside points in Canada. It is said that it costs as much to deliver letters in Ottawa, say, posted in the city, as to send them to Winnipeg. The same practice obtains in the United States.

Mr. COOTE: Has the minister assured himself that the manufacturers of automobiles valued at $1,200 and under who have been relieved of the excise tax have passed the advantage on to the public, as promised last year?

Mr. ROBB: I have heard no complaints.

Mr. COOTE: Has the reduced tariff on sugar from the West Indies gone into effect? It is not mentioned here and I do not know whether it should be or not.

Mr. ROBB: It has nothing to do with this. I shall be glad to discuss the matter with my hon. friend later on.

Mr. COOTE: I just wondered whether it should be mentioned here or not.

Mr. ROBB: No.

Mr. COOTE: I suppose the minister will take it for granted, until he hears something to the contrary, that the automobile manufacturers are passing that advantage on to the public.

Mr. ROBB: If anyone has any complaints to make I shall be glad to listen to them.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Will this matter be brought up again in the form of a bill?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I trust that we shall have that bill before us at least an hour in advance. Personally I have not had an opportunity of studying the matter.

Mr. ROBB: As a new member of parliament my hon. friend is entitled to have that information, but had he been with those of us who spent two or three hard weeks in debate upon this resolution I think he would be pretty well posted on it. However, the request is not unreasonable and if anyone wishes to delay the measure I shall not press it.

Mr. ADSHEAD: We cannot vote on it without information.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Robb thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 59, to amend The Special War Revenue Act, 1915.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. ROBB moved the second reading of the bill.

Mr. GARDINER: I must protest against this method of doing business. Most of the members who were here last session will agree to put the resolution through, but there are many new members and I think it is only fair that they should have an opportunity of studying the bill before being asked to consider it in committee. So far as we over here are concerned, we desire to expedite the business of the House to the best of our ability, but at the same time we do not wish to lose any of our privileges. I suggest to the government therefore that before going further we should have the bill distributed in order that new members may know what they are doing.

Mr. ROBB: If hon. gentlemen will allow us to go into committee on the bill I shall move that we rise and report progress.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Progress reported.

MONTREAL HARBOUR COMMISSION

LOAN OF $12,000,000 FOR TERMINAL FACILITIES

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in the measure to authorize a loan to the harbour commissioners of Montreal in an amount not exceeding $12,000,000 to carry on the construction of terminal facilities, upon approval of the Governor in Council of detailed plans, spécifications and estimates for such works and the deposit of debentures of the corporation to cover said loan, which legislation was passed by both houses at the last session, but which failed to receive the royal assent owing to the dissolution of the House.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. COOTE: Last year when these resolutions, and I think the bill accompanying them, were before the House, it was brought to the attention of the minister that the operations of the different harbour commissions in Canada should be subject to audit by the Auditor General. I do not just remember what provision, if any, was in the bill which came down on that occasion, but I urge the minister to carry the suggestion out. I think the operations of some of the harbour commissions in Canada prove the necessity of placing some check upon them, and I would be very glad if the minister would give us his opinion now as to whether he is willing to have the financial operations of these commissions placed under audit by the Auditor General of Canada.

Mr. CARDIN: These commissions are already subject to the Audit Act, and auditors from the office of the auditor general can be sent to inspect their accounts—in fact auditors were sent from Montreal and Vancouver during the course of last year and the results of their investigations embodied in reports.

Mr. COOTE: Who orders the officials to conduct an audit, and where is it made?

Mr. CARDIN: The Minister of Finance has authority under the Audit Act to send auditors to audit the accounts of harbour commissions.

Mr. COOTE: Is this audit permissive, or is it compulsory? Is it done annually?

Mr. CARDIN: The Minister of Finance has the power under the Audit Act to send auditors to make an audit at any time he chooses.

Mr. COOTE: He may or may not send them?

Mr. CARDIN: That is the case, he may or may not send them.

Mr. MacLAREN (St. John): What has been the practice in the matter of conducting audits?

Mr. CARDIN: The practice has been to have audits made, and audits were made in both Montreal and Vancouver last year.

Mr. MacLAREN (St. John): Are the audits made yearly?

Mr. CARDIN: They started in 1924.

Mr. COOTE: I suggest to the minister that the practice should be made compulsory, and that a system of yearly audit should be instituted. If these commissions know that their operations are going to be audited by the Auditor General—or by the audit board if that is better. although I cannot see why it should be—I think their operations would be carried on in a much more satisfactory manner.

Mr. CARDIN: I cannot see any objection to the suggestion of my hon. friend.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: Will the minister give us some information in regard to the amount of loans made to the harbour commission in Montreal and the total interest payable by that body; also whether any of these loans have been repaid or not. I can recall during the past few years different loans that have been made to harbour commissioners, and I was wondering whether any repayment is ever made.

Mr. CARDIN: Speaking offhand I may say that the loans made to the Montreal harbour commission up to the present time total about $40,000,000. So far the interest on these loans has been paid by the harbour commission. Also speaking offhand I think I can say that none of the bonds which have been issued by the harbour commissions for these loans have matured.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: Is it certain that the harbour commission will be able to take care of all the loans made to it? Also, before the minister answers that question, I would ask him if he has considered the possible effect of the deepening of the St. Lawrence, which is a live question at the present time, and which may take away from Montreal some of the revenue which it has been receiving in the past, particularly in the grain handling business?

Mr. CARDIN: I am free to say that I have no fear even the deepening of the St. Lawrence will prevent the port of Montreal from growing and developing in the future as it has done in the past. Even if the St. Lawrence is deepened, the port of Montreal will continue to expand just the same, because the business of the country will, as a result of the development, grow more rapidly than heretofore. Furthermore, the information we have from the commissioners is that the revenue is quite considerable and will be quite ample to take care of the interest upon these loans in the future as it has done in the past.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: Has any provision been made for taking care of the original loan?

Mr. CARDIN: There is a sinking fund in connection with all these loans.

Mr. GARDINER: Has that sinking fund been kept up to the proper standard?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. ADSHEAD: What is the rate of interest?

Mr. CARDIN: One per cent.

Mr. GARDINER: Is any portion of this twelve millions to be used in connection with the new bridge?

Mr. CARDIN: No, not a cent.

Mr. KENNEDY: What is the $12,000,000 intended for?

Mr. CARDIN: The amount is to cover: dredging, $800,000; wharves, piers and basins, $5,400,000; plant and equipment, $155,000; shops and buildings, $322,000; rails and electrification, $1,342,000; permanent sheds, $300,000; grain elevators, $3,155,000. There is a sum of $142,000 made up of small amounts for small works in the harbour. It is admitted by almost everyone conversant with the shipping business that the port of Montreal lacks certain necessary facilities to meet modern requirements. The shipping interest has been representing to the department the absolute necessity of doing something in this direction, more particularly in regard to increasing the storage capacity of the elevators there.

Mr. GARDINER: Will these different items total $12,000,000?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. COOTE: I have had the pleasure of visiting the harbour in Montreal on several occasions and from very superficial observation I think as a rule they have made very fair use of the money parliament has voted, and so far as we hear in a general way Montreal harbour is well conducted. But what I should like to make sure of in conection with this bill is that an audit shall be instituted—as I said before, a yearly audit, because we are putting so much money into these harbour commissions that their expenditures should be audited just as well as the other government expenditures which we vote here.

Mr. CARDIN: I agree with the suggestion of my hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: The question as to an audit was raised by myself at the last session in connection with the Montreal harbour commission, and the minister after investigation pointed out that the Audit Act was available to the Minister of Finance to enable an audit to be made. The point that we endeavoured to make on that occasion was that this parliament should have some control, through the Auditor General's report, to investigate those accounts. For instance, it was clearly established that at least in one of the ports, that no man could find employment on the harbour board unless he had a card from a particular source signed by a particular individual. For example, in one of the interior elevators in this country a man may not find employment unless he has a card signed by a particular person. All that is bringing about a condition that makes men apprehensive as to where we are going in this respect. I shall have something to say in regard to the matter during the discussion as to bringing the port of Halifax under the act.

First of all the audit that is mentioned by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) is an audit beyond the Audit Act. It is an audit such as the Auditor General himself imposes upon the accounts of this country, so that in the Auditor General's report we may have an opportunity to understand what has been done with the money, and the public accounts committee of this parliament, if it so desires, may have an opportunity of investigating those accounts. That was the point that was made at last session with respect to the matter. The minister took it under advisement, the sense of the House being that there should be an audit, and as I say, he returned with the view and made the statement that the matter could be dealt with through the audit board. The audit board is nothing more nor less than machinery that may be used by the Minister of Finance if he so desires. If he does not desire to use it, he will not, and if it is not at the moment particularly desirable to use it, it will not be used. If as the minister now says he is content to add to the bill a provision that the accounts shall be audited annually under the provisions of the Audit Act, that is some protection and, in my judgment, one that will go a long way towards meeting the objections that were urged to this measure last year. Perhaps the minister will recall the evening when the discussion took place and we drafted an amendment to the act. Subsequently, having regard to the provisions of the Audit Act and the explanation given by the minister and the Minister of Finance, the sense of the House was that that amendment should not be adopted. That is the fair way to put the matter, because no vote was taken upon it.

It seems to me that the old machinery under which these harbour commissions were established provided a safeguard that is now gone. There was a provision that harbour commissioners should be elected by the community in which they lived and the harbour board consisted of a larger number than it now does. For instance, in the harbour of Quebec we have a very large investment which is returning no money at all, yet we have increased that amount notwithstanding the fact that, with two or three exceptions, no interest has been paid in recent years. If there was some way in which the liability of the community could be linked with that of the nation and the community could exercise some say as to the appointment or election of commissioners, the system would be vastly improved.

As we are about to embark, according to the order paper, upon the passage of legislation that will bring at least one other part under the provisions of the statute in addition to the port of Vancouver, in which the west is so vitally interested, it is highly desirable that we should thresh the matter out, because on the strength of this legislation the port of Montreal has made certain financial arrangements and gone ahead with part of the work in view of the fact that the legislation was passed by both houses at the last session and, not having received the royal assent, did not become effective. Under those circumstances I had not proposed to make any observations, believing that, as the harbour commissioners of Montreal, relying upon this bill as it had passed both houses at the last session, had made certain expenditures last fall out of moneys they received from other sources, it was highly desirable that the legislation should be enacted. But I should like the minister to consider the question whether in all these ports the local community should not have a voice in the election of commissioners so as to prevent the political character of the commissioners entirely dominating the situation, ensuring as such a condition does, employment to limited numbers of persons, and the development of a sort of Tammany Hall with respect to all the work of the harbour commissioners. That perhaps does not apply to the harbour of Montreal to the same extent that it does to some others, because, as everybody knows, the Montreal harbour board is a singularly effective body. When the bill is under discussion I will give some instances of what is happening at Vancouver, Victoria and the terminal elevator at Edmonton. The way to deal with the matter is to provide that one commissioner shall be elected by the people in order that they may have a direct and vital interest in the operation of the facilities of the community in which they reside.

Mr. ROBB: I will leave it to my colleague to discuss the method of electing or appointing the harbour commissioners, but I fear from the observations of the former Minister of Finance (Mr. Bennett) that there may be some misunderstanding in regard to the audit of the harbour commissions. It was that audit board which my hon. friend had in mind that made the audit.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I said.

Mr. ROBB: As regards the Auditor General going in and auditing the books of the Montreal harbour commission, there is no more sense in putting a staff in there than there would be in putting such a staff into all the railways of Canada. The Montreal harbour commission has been taking care of itself, providing its own interest and meeting its obligations all the time. But when the audit board was created a few years ago by the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding, he took the stand, and properly so, that the Minister of Finance should have the right to send that board to audit any organization of any kind to which the government were making a contribution. That was done purposely. We make contributions in various ways to many harbours throughout the country. The port of Quebec is not the only port in Canada that does not meet its interest obligations. As a matter of fact the harbour board of Montreal is about the only harbour board in Canada that meets its obligations regularly.

Mr. STEVENS: Vancouver always does.

Mr. ROBB: The Vancouver harbour board have been doing so, but they have been a little slow lately.

Mr. CLARK: Is that recently, or was it not at the time the Dominion government had in their possession money belonging to the harbour board, and by mutual arrangement the interest payment was not made because that money was not advanced? Have there been any recent instances of default?

Mr. ROBB: I have not the details; I do not carry them around with me. But I know we had to bring some pressure to bear on the Vancouver harbour board to have them meet their interest accounts.

Mr. CLARK: Is that since this government came into office—I mean since September, 1926?

Mr. ROBB: I will not go into details as to dates because I do not carry those around with me. We have made large contributions to the harbours of St. John, Halifax and Toronto; we have spent large sums of money at the head of the lakes at Fort William, and it was for that purpose that the audit board was put in. To insert in the act a provision that the Auditor General should audit all the harbour commissions would be only running up a large staff and unnecessarily adding expense to the country. I think the hon. gentleman should be satisfied to have the condition such that when the Minister of Finance, whoever he may be, determines that the audit board should go in and make an audit of those books, he shall have the power to do so. In that way the rights of the country and of the treasury will be properly safeguarded. We have had audits made of the Montreal harbour commission, and they have been tabled and are available to any member of the House.

Mr. STEVENS: This question of an adequate audit has been discussed on several occasions. I appreciate what the minister says, that it is unwise to build up a staff that will simply be a duplication of some other staff, but perhaps this difficulty could be overcome if the Auditor General were appointed the auditor for the board, not necessarily having other auditors duplicating the work. The House ought to bear in mind—and this applies generally—that it is the people who advance these large sums. Montreal is admitted by all to be a well administered port; still, $40,000,000 odd is spent there. In my own city of Vancouver I presume, speaking offhand, about $15,000,000 is spent. Now that is money advanced by the people of Canada. These two harbour commissions pay the interest on these advances and provide for sinking fund. That is very good; it is highly commendable. On the other hand is it not reasonable that those who advance the money should have an opportunity in some manner of determining whether or not it is properly expended? When harbour commissioners appoint their own auditors, it is just the same as the management of a company appointing the auditors and the shareholders having nothing to do with their appointment. I pointed out last year—it is a principle not always followed, but it is a sound and a vital principle—that in the administration of all corporate bodies the shareholders appoint, or are supposed to appoint, the auditor, and the auditor is supposed to be the safeguarder of the shareholders' interest as between them and the management. So I suggest, as I have suggested before—and I say now in support of the suggestion of the hon. member for West Calgary—that the shareholders, represented by this parliament, should really be the appointees of the auditor, namely, the Auditor General of Canada. The great respect in which the institution of Auditor General is generally held throughout Canada is based upon the fulness of the report which he from year to year presents to parliament, and upon the freedom which parliament is allowed to scrutinize that report. We contend, and I am wholly in accord with the suggestion, that it would be better if the Auditor General were constituted the auditor of the harbour boards.

The Minister of Finance mentioned the port of Vancouver. I do not wish to inject here a discussion of that port, but I would like to call this to the attention of the committee as an argument in support of the very point we are advancing: The commissioners in the port of Vancouver have been appointed by the government. As a result, these appointments are necessarily more or less political in their character. There is no question about it that when the harbour board was constituted in 1913, the commissioners were appointed as friends of the then government. In 1921 the incoming government removed the old commissioners and appointed three new ones. I may say—because the House ought to be made aware of it, although I think it is generally pretty well within its knowledge—that during the past two years there has been considerable criticism of the administration of that important port—criticism on the part of the board of trade, the shipping federation and other prominent organizations of business men. Arising out of that criticism, and supporting what was suggested by the hon. member for West Calgary a moment ago, I have come to the conclusion that it would be desirable to have on these commissions an appointee identified with the local interests affected, such as in my own city, for instance, a representative of the board of trade, or of the shipping federation, or of the interests that are more or less directly identified with the business carried on through and by the harbour board. I have a very strong conviction that it would be desirable to do that.

Without wishing to be critical at the moment, I may say that the three new commissioners recently appointed in Vancouver are all gentlemen of very excellent standing: they are personally men of integrity, respected by all those who know them and wherever they move. Nevertheless in spite of that fact there is a good deal of criticism because of the requests and suggestions of those using the harbour not being considered. I simply mention that as an illustration of what we have already said. We can do very much to remove the criticism of these commissions if, in the first place, a proper independent audit is made which would carry with it the full confidence of the people. Secondly, and here I am supporting what the hon. member for West Calgary said a moment ago, these commissions should have within their membership individuals who are identified with the interests using the port. For a long time it has been felt that the great province of Alberta, with its large interests in the shipping of wheat through the port of Vancouver, should have been represented on the Vancouver harbour board, and I offer to the government now this suggestion that they take into their very earnest consideration the enlargement of that board and the appointment thereon of a representative person from Alberta who would understand the needs and the interests of that province. I think that would tend to bring about greater harmony between the different sections of the country using that great port. The situation may not be quite the same at Montreal, and perhaps the local interests can very well take care of it, but there is a rather peculiar and delicate situation in the case of Vancouver.

When the Minister of Finance intimated a moment ago that there had been some default in the payment of interest by the Vancouver harbour board, I was very much surprised.

Mr. ROBB: I did not say default; I said delay.

Mr. STEVENS: I cannot distinguish between the two. If there is delay in payment of interest, it must be delay beyond the time when the interest is due; therefore the interest must be in default. It might be in default for only one day or for a year. I made inquiries early last session—or it might have been the previous session; I will go back two years anyway—and was advised by officials of the government, that the interest and sinking fund had been well maintained in regard to the port of Vancouver. I certainly am very, very much surprised, chagrined, indeed, to think that the port of Vancouver should in any way default either in the sinking fund or in the payment of interest. There is no need for it, and I say to the government: Not only put on pressure, but see to it that there is no such dereliction on the part of the commissioners in the payment of their proper obligations, because goodness knows they are collecting high enough fees. I am almost tempted now to go into another subject and to say that these fees ought not to be as high as they are, but there is no reason in the world why out of the large earnings of that port the interest should not be promptly paid and all provisions in regard to the sinking fund properly maintained.

I conclude by supporting my hon. friend from West Calgary, and in urging upon the government these two points: That the Auditor General be constituted the auditing power of the harbour commissioners—I am referring to commissioners who receive money from the exchequer direct in the way of loans or grants—and that these boards, or at least some of them where different interests are affected, should include representatives of the local interests using the ports.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to endorse the position that has just been taken by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre with regard to the question of auditing. I recall several years ago, when some of us were urging bank inspection, that the then Minister of Finance took the position that the ground was covered when the government were able under the existing arrangements to send in an inspector whenever they deemed it advisable. That is precisely the ground that has been taken this afternoon by the Minister of Finance with regard to the audit question. Many hon. members will recall that after that position had been taken regarding bank inspection there occurred the failure of the Home Bank, which brought home to the public at large the necessity for a more adequate system of inspection. It was then provided that the government should assume responsibility for inspection. It had been stated that if there were a government inspector, a very large staff would have to be employed. I think it was later recognized that this was not essential, and legislation was passed providing for the appointment of an inspector-general who would have charge in a general way of all inspection. It seems a very reasonable thing that something of this kind should be done with regard to these important commissions. I do not know why there should even need to be a duplication of auditors. If the auditing is to be done by the government it would be quite unnecessary that the harbour board should have its own auditors. I gladly support the position already taken.

Mr. COOTE: It seems to me the proposal advanced that the Auditor General should do the work of the harbour commission is so logical and reasonable that it should not be necessary to say anything more in favour of it, except to commend it to the good judgment of the members of the government. Rather than involve extra expense it would probably save a good deal of money, because if the Auditor General were the official auditor for the harbour commission the Finance minister would certainly never be called upon to send out auditors under the audit board. So that there would be distinct saving, and as I know the Finance minister is always looking for a place to save something in the way of expenditure, I gladly commend the scheme to him and hope it will receive the approval of the government.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Cardin thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 60, to provide for a loan to the harbour commissioners of Montreal.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT ACT, 1919, AMENDMENT

Hon. ROBERT FORKE (Minister of Immigration and Colonization) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that is is expedient to amend the Soldier Settlement Act, 1919, and to provide—

1. That a settler whose land agreement with the board has not been terminated may make application for the revaluation of the said land, and that the depreciation to be determined shall be the diminution in the present value of the land and the improvements sold to the settler, as compared with the price at which the settler agreed to purchase the said land and improvements from the board.

2. That where it is shown that there has been depreciation in the value of the land and improvements, credit shall be given the settler as on the standard date in 1926, with the amount of the depreciation as finally determined, and the balance owing by the settler shall be consolidated and the total cost of the property may be amortized over the remaining period of the loan.

3. That the expenditures necessarily incurred thereby shall be paid out of moneys appropriated from time to time by parliament to soldier land settlement.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. CLARK: Would the minister explain?

Mr. FORKE: I do not think it is necessary to take up any time at the present moment in discussing this resolution. Hon. members who were in the House during the last parliament will remember that the bill was introduced and was discussed and passed in the House, but afterwards, when it was sent to the Senate, it was amended in some respects. In fact the amendments restored the bill almost to the position it was in when it first came into the House of Commons. I intend to introduce a bill based on the resolution along the lines of the bill of last session as it came from the Senate, with the amendments that were added to it after it left the House of Commons. Owing to the dissolution there was no opportunity last session for the bill to come back to the House. I think most of the members who were in the House during the last parliament are familiar with the whole subject and familiar with the bill. However, if this resolution is allowed to pass there will be ample opportunity to discuss it when the bill is before the House.

Mr. CLARK: Will the minister explain to the committee just what clause 1 means?

[Mr. Coote.]

Mr. FORKE: I think it means just exactly what it says. I do not know what other explanation the hon. member wants, unless he wants a little amusement out of the matter.

Mr. CLARK: That answer does not amuse me very much. The section requires some interpretation, and I should like to have it interpreted.

Mr. FORKE: I will read it.

Mr. CLARK: I have read it and I want it interpreted. I would like to know, in simple language, what it means.

Mr. FORKE: Will the hon. gentleman tell me his difficulty?

Mr. CLARK: I want to know what it means.

Mr. FORKE: It means what it says.

Mr. CLARK: If that is the best the minister can do I will have to accept it.

Mr. FORKE: If the hon. member cannot understand it, it is not my fault.

Mr. CLARK: This is one of the most extraordinary exhibitions I have ever seen given by a minister in this House. Here is a resolution the language of which certainly is not simple. To me, though I am a lawyer, it is open to two or three different interpretations. I should like to know in simple language just what that clause means. With all due deference to the minister, I think I am entitled to an explanation, because depending upon the meaning given that clause by him, I have some very vital questions to ask and perhaps some remarks to make.

Mr. FORKE: I should like the hon. member to put his question. I would ask the committee to allow the resolution to pass, and when the bill is introduced there will be ample time for discussion. It seems to me that the hon. member is trying to create a difficulty that does not really exist. However, if he will ask me a plain question I will try to give him a plain answer.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The question is very plain: A brief explanation of the clause is all that is asked. The House is entitled to that, and certainly every minister always grants it. I think my hon. friend is making a mistake in declining to give an answer.

Mr. FORKE: Mr. Chairman, I will read the clause and try to elucidate some of the difficulties that seem to be bothering hon. gentlemen on the other side.

1. That a settler whose land agreement with the board has not been terminated may make application for the revaluation of the said land,—

I suppose that is all right?

Mr. BENNETT: Does that apply to crown land as well?

Mr. FORKE: It applies to land on which soldier settlers have been settled; that is all it means.

—and that the depreciation to be determined shall be the diminution in the present value of the land and the improvements sold to the settler, as compared with the price at which the settler agreed to purchase the said land and improvements from the board.

I think that is not very difficult to understand. We know that when those lands were sold to the settlers they were sold at a very high valuation. Land values have depreciated since that time, and it is generally felt that something should be done to remove the disabilities under which the soldier settlers are suffering through having bought their land at inflated prices. It seems to me that that is as clear as it could be expressed.

Mr. CLARK: What is "diminution in the present value?"

Mr. FORKE: A board of arbitration will be appointed to work out the present value. That is not as easy to arrive at as my hon. friend seems to imagine.

Mr. CLARK: I want to know what we are submitting to this board of arbitration.

Mr. FORKE: That will appear in the bill.

Mr. CLARK: Then after you pass the legislation will the board of arbitration interpret what the statute means, or is the House to find out now?

Mr. FORKE: I am afraid the hon. gentleman is labouring under so many difficulties that it will be impossible for me to enlighten him this afternoon.

Mr. CLARK: If I could get an interpretation of this clause I might have no difficulties.

Mr. FORKE: If the hon. member reads it often enough he may get some light as to its meaning.

Mr. CLARK: I do not propose to encumber Hansard. I want an explanation.

Mr. FORKE: Mr. Chairman, I think the objection the hon. member is offering is not for the purpose of getting information, and I think he had better let it go for the present.

Mr. CLARK: No, I do not propose to let it go.

Mr. FORKE: Then proceed.

Mr. CLARK: I want an explanation, but if the minister admits to the committee that he can give no explanation, I suppose I must be satisfied.

Mr. FORKE: Will the hon. gentleman kindly tell me what he wants?

Mr. CLARK: I want to know what "diminution in the present value" means.

Mr. FORKE: The difference between the valuation we put on that land to-day and the valuation put on it at the time the settler bought the land. Anything further?

Mr. CLARK: What will be the date of the "present value"?

Mr. FORKE: After the bill has been passed by parliament and a board has been appointed and has made a valuation; that will be the valuation.

Mr. CLARK: I am afraid that does not answer my question at all. I want to know what is the "present value".

Mr. FORKE: The present value will be the value appraised by the board of valuation to be appointed for that purpose.

Mr. CLARK: The House will not decide?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I suppose diminution in the present value is not what is really meant. The clause is badly drawn. Really it is the difference between the former value and the present value; but the resolution says "diminution in the present value".

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): The difference between the present value and the former value is what is meant.

Mr. FORKE: The resolution was drawn by the law officers. The meaning may not be stated in the best language possible, but I am not responsible. We will try to make it plain in the bill so that hon. members will have no difficulty in understanding what is meant. Really I do not think any good purpose is being served by the hon. member at the present time, with all due deference to him.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We have a right to expect civil answers to our questions. The minister will find as he proceeds that a soft answer is very effective.

Mr. FORKE: I do not wish anyone to be under the impression that I am not trying to answer questions civilly. I trust that I shall always be ready to give a civil answer to any question asked me across the floor of the House. If I thought there was any real difficulty in understanding the first clause of this resolution, I certainly would have taken a little more care in trying to explain it. But I want to bear tribute to the intelligence of the hon. member for Burrard; I think he can understand that clause just as readily as anyone in this committee—if he wants to.

Mr. CLARK: Mr. Chairman, really I am astonished at the minister's stand. I asked him a question on a phrase which gave me trouble, and apparently it also gave trouble to my hon. leader (Mr. Guthrie) and to my hon. friend from West Calgary—two very able lawyers. I can attribute no meaning whatever to clause 1 in this resolution. I saw it only a few minutes ago, and after a cursory reading I am unable to understand what "diminution in the present value" means. It seems to me that the present value could not diminish. How could it? But if the government intends to present a resolution to revalue soldier lands on the basis of their value to-day and the value when their purchase was recommended, and give the soldier settlers credit for the difference, there may be some meaning to it; but this resolution does not say that at all.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, it does.

Mr. BENNETT: The present value has not diminished.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The present value as compared with the price at which the settler agreed to purchase.

Mr. MILLAR: I think if members would read the clause there would be no difficulty, starting with:

—the present value of the land and the improvements sold to the settler, as compared with the price at which the settler agreed to purchase the said land and improvements from the board.

Mr. BENNETT: The diminution must be in the former value.

Mr. MILLAR: That is plain enough for any ten year old child to understand.

Mr. CLARK: I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the minister amend his resolution right now so that it will have some meaning. We want to pass effective legislation for this purpose.

[Mr. Forke.]

Mr. ROBB: What does my hon. friend suggest?

Mr. CLARK: Offhand, I would say, "reduction in the former value" rather than in the "present value".

Mr. FORKE: Would the word "difference" suit my hon. friend instead of "diminution"?

Mr. CLARK: I think if you struck out the word "present" the clause would mean something.

Mr. FORKE: All right.

Mr. CLARK: Mr. Chairman, I should like to bring up what I think is a very serious matter on Vancouver island with respect to an area where soldiers' lands were purchased at the value then set by the board. Those lands to-day appear to have no market value at all and no value for agricultural purposes. I wanted some explanation from the minister for the reason that I have a letter to-day from one of these settlers. He and his brother, two returned soldiers, purchased the land, which was passed by the Soldier Settlement Board, for $13,000. I am quite certain his brother did not see it; I can tell that from the letter, but whether he personally saw it or not I do not know. There is a possibility that he did not see it, for he accepted the valuation of the board as giving the true value of the land. He went on the land and since that time has been practically in a state of starvation. He paid one-tenth down, and subsequent valuations indicate that the land is of no value whatsoever for agricultural purposes.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILL

SECOND READING

Bill No. 41, to incorporate Columbia Life Assurance Company—Mr. Stevens.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT ACT, 1919, AMENDMENT

The House again in committee on a proposed resolution to amend the Soldier Settlement Act, 1919—Mr. Forke—Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. STEVENS: I wish to ask the minister a few questions in regard to this resolution with the object of getting an explanation, and I shall preface that request with some very brief observations. During the last week the House has witnessed a spirit of courtesy and co-operation which I think has been unparalleled in my seventeen sessions in parliament. We have expedited, or tried to expedite, the passage of the various measures. This afternoon we advanced several important bills for the Minister of Finance with scarcely any comment, and I must say that the ministry have been very prompt in making brief statements and explanations of the various measures introduced. This fact we welcome and appreciate. Now, speaking for myself alone I am exceedingly anxious that we should expedite the business of this session. We have had a couple of years of pretty hard parliamentary duty, and I think both the country and parliament will be the better for a little surcease from bitterness and controversy. I can say on behalf of my colleagues on this side that we have tendered our hearty co-operation and, as far as we could extend it, courtesy in these matters, and I should be very sorry to see this spirit dissipated in any way. It takes two to make a bargain as well as two to make a quarrel, and if we have a response from the ministry such as we have had during the past few days I think we can assure them of reasonable co-operation. Of course we reserve always our right to question and criticise measures—and I may add that the ministry will find a keen and critical opposition very often a very valuable factor.

I would remind the committee that last year this particular measure was perhaps one of the—I was going to say the most poorly drafted measures introduced. I am not placing the blame upon the minister who had the bill in charge, because there are officers of the House who are supposed to assist in the drafting of these measures; but last year I recall that the whole House was engaged, sitting after sitting, in correcting the drafting of the bill that was presented to it. It was very faulty drafting, and the minister withdrew it two or three times and had certain sections redrafted. That is what occasioned the query regarding the drafting of the present resolution, and while the point has been referred to already I should like to allude to it again. It is quite clear to me that the wording of the resolution, and of this particular clause as it now reads—it has not yet been formally changed—namely, "the diminution in the present value" is a meaningless term, or a term that certainly does not fit in with the intent of the proposed legislation. The intent is to provide for the diminution of the difference between the original price and what the price may be at a given time fixed by parliament, which is an altogether different thing. Had it specified a diminution in the purchase price, which would be the exact reverse of the present reading there might be some sense in it, but as the provision now reads it has no sense. What I want to ask the minister is this: In the light of his assertion that this is the same measure that was introduced last session—and I think he described it as the same resolution and the same bill which had passed both houses of parliament—how does he explain the resolution of last year as compared with this one? There is very little resemblance between them. This resolution consists of three very short clauses; the resolution last year occupied a whole page and contained seven different specified clauses. Furthermore, certain matters which were referred to in the resolution last year are not referred to in the present resolution. Now, Mr. Chairman, had we accepted the minister's statement and passed this resolution we would have been more or less precluded from offering criticism later with respect to the difference between the two resolutions. The minister should explain to the committee what changes there are in this resolution from the preceding one and the reasons for the changes. I have no doubt they are sound and probably an improvement, because the original resolution of last year, with the bill based thereon, was certainly far from a perfect measure. After the minister has stated the changes we shall be able to judge whether they are matters of principle or merely matters of detail. As I received the journals of the House only a few minutes ago I have not yet had time to analyse the long resolution of last year as compared with the resolution of this year, but certainly there is a marked difference.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before the minister replies I might say a word to my hon. friend about the resolutions as they appear on the order paper this year as compared with previous years. Last year there was a good deal of comment in the House about the length of resolutions. In many cases the resolutions were, I will not say longer than the bills that were introduced, but they were practically as long; they comprised nearly the whole of the bills. The purpose of a resolution is not to go into the details of a bill, but rather to acquaint the House with its main purpose and any major considerations of which account should be taken.

Last year the government drew the attention of the law officers of the crown to this feature and it was again drawn to their attention this year. They were asked whether there was any necessity of making the resolutions unduly long and whether the purpose of parliament could not be as well, if not better, served by an abbreviated rather than by a lengthy resolution. The resolution as drafted now is one case where the law officers of the crown themselves have cut down the original resolution to a length they regard as quite sufficient for the purpose it is intended to serve.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): With regard to what my hon. friend (Mr. Stevens) has said in connection with the bill of last year, I think his memory does not serve him well. The reason that the bill was withdrawn on three different occasions was that an endeavour was made to meet widened powers suggested by members of the committee—

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton):—and not because the drafting of the bill was faulty.

Mr. STEVENS: There was some faulty drafting.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In some slight respects there was, but the reason the bill was withdrawn and amended from time to time was in order to meet, as the government has always endeavoured to do, the divergent views of members of the committee of the House with respect to soldier legislation. When the bill went to the Senate practically every amendment suggested in committee of this House was repealed and the bill came back in its original form. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) was then on this side of the House and he suggested that we pass the bill as amended by the Senate. That is the bill which is being reintroduced on this occasion. While it may not meet the views of many hon. members, nevertheless as it ran the gauntlet last year in both houses, it was felt that the bill would be acceptable in the form in which it came back to this House for ratification.

Mr. STEVENS: Unfortunately the Minister of the Interior was not in the House just before dinner. What I was trying to do was to protest mildly against the treatment that we were receiving from the minister who had the bill in charge. I desired to suggest to the minister that if he would attempt to meet us frankly in our request for an explanation, the passage of the bill would be facilitated. I wanted also to emphasize this, as was borne out by the statement of the Minister of the Interior, that this was a very difficult measure. It engaged the attention of this chamber on both sides for many sittings and a genuine effort was made to make the bill as serviceable and effective as possible. The Minister of the Interior then in charge of the bill responded to several suggestions which were offered from this side of the House by way of amendment. If the minister will be good enough to explain briefly the resolution in its amended and abbreviated form, which may be and, I hope, is an improvement on the resolution that was introduced last year, but which is certainly not the same resolution, matters will be facilitated.

Mr. FORKE: I have not before me the resolution as it came before the House last year. Perhaps the explanation that the Prime Minister has given may explain why there are some differences in the resolution of this year. I think the committee will sympathize with me when I explain that when I read the resolution I found that exactly the same phraseology was used as was used in the bill of last year after it passed the House of Commons and passed the Senate. It ran the gauntlet of the House of Commons with exactly the same phraseology; it ran the gauntlet of the Senate and passed the Senate in the same way. Now it comes back to the House in exactly the same wording, and yet the hon. member (Mr. Clark) who questioned me could not understand what it meant. To me it seemed plain enough. Perhaps I may have been lacking in giving credit to the hon. member for seeking information, but I will read the phrase as it occurred in the bill:

> The depreciation in value to be determined shall be the diminution—

Exactly the same words.

> —in the present value of the land and improvements sold to the settler as compared with the price—

And so on. The same wording is used as that in which the bill pased the Senate and the House of Commons. That, my hon. friends say to-night, has no meaning. I cannot understand it; I am quite willing to use any other words.

Mr. STEVENS: Are those words to which my hon. friend refers in the bill?

Mr. FORKE: They are in the bill that passed the Senate last year.

Mr. STEVENS: Then they are meaningless.

Mr. FORKE: My hon. friends allowed them to pass last year.

Mr. CLARK: A different bill came back from the Senate.

Mr. FORKE: I am not in a position to say whether the same phrase was used in the original bill. I am reading from the bill that came back from the Senate.

Mr. STEVENS: Let me offer to the minister a practical suggestion, one that, I think, must be adopted. This wording must be changed if the bill is to be of any value. I would suggest that it read:

And that the depreciation to be determined shall be the diminution in the original purchase price.

That is what the minister is trying to get at, not the diminution in the present value. There can be no diminution in the present value. There may be diminution in the original purchase price. The wording might be:

The difference between the purchase price and the present ascertained value.

I want the minister to appreciate the fact that the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard was offering this suggestion to him this afternoon. If the minister will respond to our suggestions this matter can be corrected in a few moments and we can have the legislation put through in something like decent order.

Mr. McMILLAN: Might I say that the observation of the hon. gentleman would not be sensible at all if he reads the bill all through?

Mr. STEVENS: It will. If my hon. friend wants to argue the point we can do so; but I have already pointed out that we are anxious to facilitate the passing of the bill, and if the minister will accept our suggestions the passage of the bill will be facilitated. There can obviously be no diminution in the present value.

Mr. McMILLAN: I understand that. Let the hon. member read the whole clause as he would have it.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not drafting it. I offer the suggestion to the minister that it should read:

The depreciation to be determined shall be the diminution in the original purchase price.

I offer the minister another suggestion; that it should read "shall be the difference in the value" from the original purchase, and so on. If the minister would accept that suggestion, or would strike out the word "present" we could get along with the business.

Mr. CLARK: I understood both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Public Works this afternoon to agree that the clause should read, "diminution in the value," and so on. Do I understand that the Minister of Immigration does not approve of that suggestion?

Mr. FORKE: I have not had time yet to consider it, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CLARK: That was this afternoon.

Mr. FORKE: I am quite prepared to meet hon. members reasonably. I think we are all anxious to have the bill in the very best possible shape for all concerned, and if it is thought that striking out the word "present" will make the clause any better, I am quite agreeable. Will that satisfy hon. members?

Mr. STEVENS: That seems to be all right.

Mr. FORKE: I am willing to strike out the word "present" then.

Mr. STEVENS: It is the minister's prerogative to move that the word "present" be struck out.

Mr. FORKE: I move, Mr. Chairman, that the word "present" in the third line of clause 1 be struck out.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. McGIBBON: What is included under the term "improvements"?

Mr. FORKE: Ordinary farm improvements, I suppose, such as fencing and a great many other things. It is pretty hard to state definitely just what would come under the head of improvements. You would have to see the actual farm and see what had been done.

Mr. McGIBBON: We are not discussing what the hon. gentleman supposes might be included. We are entitled to know what he means. He surely knows what he means.

Mr. MILLAR: It seems to me that striking out the word "present" makes it worse than it is now. The diminution in value when? Does it mean a month after the land was originally purchased, two months after, five years after, or when?

Mr. McGIBBON: I submit, Mr. Chairman, that I have certain rights in this House, and I do not intend that you or anybody else should deprive me of them. When I ask a question I am entitled to an answer.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman has asked a question of the minister. Of course, I cannot force the minister to answer it.

Mr. NEILL: I was in favour of the change in language suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre until the word "present" was struck out. I agree with the hon. member for Qu'Appelle that striking out the word "present" is going to make it a great deal worse, because the first question the layman will ask will be, "The value when?" Surely it is desirable to state the period when you are going to make the comparison. I do not like the word "diminution" very well, but this is only the resolution, and the word may not be in the bill, so it is not important just now. It would read better, I think, if it read "shall be the difference in the present value of the land and the improvements sold to the settler, as compared with the price at which the settler agreed to purchase the said land and improvements" but as it reads now, "shall be the diminution in the value of the land and the improvements sold to the settler," it might almost be taken to mean the value at which it was sold. It leaves it open to discuss the question, at what date? I cannot see any object to be gained by striking out the word "present" unless you go further and insert the whole suggestion of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre.

Mr. McGIBBON: I wish to protest against the contempt with which the minister is treating this committee. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard before six o'clock asked for certain information and he was sneered at, and the minister is now treating the committee with contempt. He might as well understand now as hereafter that if he is going to get his bills and estimates through this House he will have to give a little consideration to members on this side. If he does not, we will make him.

The CHAIRMAN: I was following the remarks of the minister very carefully, and I cannot see how he can be charged with treating any hon. member with contempt.

Mr. HANSON: Who made the chairman the judge?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. FORKE: I am entirely at a loss to understand my hon. friend's suggestion that I have treated him with contempt.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is another great omission in this resolution. Last session the question as to who was to make the valuation, what was to be the machinery, was one of the chief bones of contention. There is nothing in this resolution to give us the slightest inkling. That was one of the cardinal principles of the act of last session, but we know nothing about that from the resolution before us. I admit that a great many details should be left out of a resolution, but this is a very important point. What board are you forming? Who is to determine this question?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Surely my hon. friend will agree that it expedites business to shorten the resolution, and give the full details in the bill?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The rules of the House provide that the resolution shall acquaint the House generally with the contents of the bill.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In the most meagre form possible.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It does not say anything about meagre.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend will admit that if progress is to be made with the business of the House we cannot discuss the whole details of a bill both on the resolution and when the bill itself is brought down.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have heard the details discussed many a time on a resolution in this House.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have too, but it is certainly a means of provoking a great deal of unnecessary discussion.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If the information was given it would expedite business very much. Is there any object in withholding the information? What machinery do you propose? There is nothing in the resolution to show. The easiest way to overcome the difficulty would be to tell us.

Mr. BROWN: The minister said that the bill he intended to introduce was in the terms of the bill as it passed the Senate and came back to this House.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is not the same parliament as last year.

Mr. BROWN: I think the terms of that bill are pretty well understood.

Mr. McGIBBON: You could give us the information in half the time.

Mr. BROWN: It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that if we are going to have a committee to revise the rules of the House, one point they might very well consider is this question of the introduction of bills preceded by a resolution. A resolution is undoubtedly desirable in some cases, but in a case of this kind it is absolutely unnecessary to give the details. The bill is one on which there is no difference of opinion in the House. This legislation has been before parliament for the last five years, and we all know its purport. It would certainly facilitate business to allow the resolution to pass, so that we could have the bill read and go into committee on it, when all these details could be discussed. Undoubtedly it is wise that some bills should be introduced by way of a resolution, and at times it may be desirable to give all the details or at least some details. But in view of the history of this particular legislation it seems to me that we should be only wasting time to discuss the details on the resolution, for when the bill comes down we shall see exactly what is in it and will have full opportunity to discuss all the details.

Mr. CLARK: I suggest that it would be a very simple matter, if the minister has the bill before him, to tell us what the provision in the bill was as it came back from the Senate. It would take only a moment to do that, and would eliminate these long speeches. I for one took a very great deal of interest in this legislation last year. The bill was amended in many particulars in this House and re-amended in the Senate, and I cannot recall just in what form it came back to us. Moreover, I am sure many of the new members know nothing about it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The bill will be printed, distributed and passed in its final form before hon. members will be asked to discuss the various provisions of it.

Mr. CLARK: We are not discussing it now. We want the minister to tell us what the principle is.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This practice of having all bills which provide for the expenditure of public money preceded by a resolution is an old custom which has existed a very long time, and there is that difference between such legislation and ordinary legislation. It has never been claimed that the resolution should be framed as the bill would be, and I do not see why my hon. friend should be anxious to ask, for instance, to have a certain word inserted in the resolution, because that resolution will not be the law. It is merely advice given to the House that a bill will be introduced which will be discussed, and it will be changed; the language of the bill will be modified according to the wish of the House. But surely we are wasting our time trying to find a better word for some word which appears in that resolution.

Mr. CLARK: I do not see how the House would be giving authority to introduce a bill if we passed a meaningless resolution.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is merely for the expenditure of money.

Mr. CLARK: I am not going to debate this at length, because I think it is quite useless, I was anxious to find out what it meant. It meant nothing, as has been admitted by members on the other side, but I think the difficulty has been cleared up to my satisfaction. I wanted to draw to the attention of the minister and the government the situation that follows upon the interpretation of this resolution as it has now been explained. I commenced before six o'clock to draw the attention of the minister to a particular class of case and I wanted to know whether any provision was going to be made to meet that particular case. A man, for instance, purchased a piece of property on Vancouver island; the price was $13,000. The Soldier Settlement Board recommended a loan on that basis. The soldier has resided there since the purchase, but has never at any time been able to make enough to pay interest. He had, however, placed in that purchase probably all of his savings. It has since been ascertained that the property is valueless as an agricultural property. There is a large number of these cases, where men who came back after serving their country, and who were unfamiliar with prices in the first place and perhaps unfamiliar with agriculture, or at least unfamiliar with and not judges of the fertility of land, relied upon the judgment of the experts provided by the Soldier Settlement Board. The case to which I refer was in the constituency, I think, of my hon. friend from Nanaimo. In that case the man served his country, returned to Canada, accepted the advice of the Soldier Settlement Board and invested all his savings in the property, and has not been able to make a living, much less pay interest.

Mr. NEILL: How much did he borrow?

Mr. CLARK: I have not the amount before me, but my hon. friend can judge from the amount of the valuation.

Mr. NEILL: He probably borrowed the full amount that he could obtain.

Mr. CLARK: He probably did, but it does not matter whether he borrowed one thousand or ten thousand, the land is valueless, and it was passed upon by a government official. As a matter of fact I think his contract has been cancelled because he did not pay. He has lost his right to come under this legislation and have the land revalued, or have it established that the land was commercially valueless. That class of case is entitled to better treatment, and that case should be provided for in this resolution.

There are not so many cases of this kind that this country cannot afford to take care of an occasional mistake, or of many mistakes, made by the government officials in valuing the land. We can afford to take that man to another piece of land, give him credit for the amount he paid on the valueless land, and enable him to get another start in life. To-day immigrants who are strangers are assisted to come in and take up land. Men from the mother country are coming in and receiving assistance, and great care is being taken in the choice of the land upon which they are placed. They are being given privileges that our own Canadians who served this country over a period of years are denied, I make, therefore, this request—and I think it is a very reasonable one—that that class of case be taken care of now. That is what I had in mind before the adjournment when I asked the Minister of Immigration a question about the meaning of the resolution.

Mr. BROWN: If anything is necessary to illustrate the absurdity of the situation in which the House now finds itself, it is the speech of the hon. member. Here we are dealing with a resolution providing for the introduction of a bill. In that bill when introduced there will be undoubtedly a clause defining those who are to benefit by the bill. For anything the hon. member knows his particular case may be provided for.

Mr. CLARK: I know that it is not, because it is not provided for in the resolution.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is not necessary that it should be.

Mr. CLARK: I am drawing attention to it in the hope that it will be provided for.

Mr. BROWN: The resolution does not indicate anybody who will be benefited by the bill, and I suggest that it will be the part of wisdom to wait for the appearance of the bill and then let the hon. gentleman make his speech.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Unfortunately the rules and practice of the House provide that the bill must originate in this committee; we must know what the bill is. The origin of the whole measure is here in the committee, and the origin of the whole measure must be submitted to His Excellency. That is why we are entitled to the information. Many times a discussion is left over until the bill is drafted. The matter is as broad as it is long. When the Minister of Railways introduced his resolution to the House, with his well-known courtesy he explained it to the House and when the bill came it required very little discussion. All we ask is a reasonable explanation of the bill. Is there any reason for withholding the bill? We have rights and are bound to maintain them. The expeditious way is to answer the questions as we ask them, and I ask what machinery does the government propose to adopt for the valuation of the soldiers' land—a question the minister can answer in a moment. Why does he not do so?

Mr. FORKE: I have not had an opportunity. I have been willing to answer it for ten minutes. It is machinery that was provided in the bill as it left the Senate last year.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That gives me no information.

Mr. FORKE: The machinery that is proposed will be the Soldier Settlement Board and the representatives of the settlers. If they are unable to agree it will be referred to the Exchequer court. That is the machinery that is proposed in the bill.

Mr. STEVENS: Referred to the Exchequer court?

Mr. FORKE: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That was the amendment proposed by the Senate.

Mr. CLARK: That was never before the House of Commons.

Mr. STEVENS: I might point out to the minister that we asked in the interests of the settler that any dispute should be referred to the local county court judge. I recall a very long discussion on the point, and I think my hon. friend—now the Minister of Immigration and Colonization—when he sat over here spoke along those lines himself. The point, really the most important in the whole bill, is whether or not we are going to give to the soldier settlers in these various localities a fair chance to get their revaluations made. Now the minister tells us there is to be a reference to the Exchequer court. I ask any member of this House, what chance has a poor settler in British Columbia or the prairie provinces to get a revaluation if he has to take his appeal to the Exchequer court here in Ottawa? For all the good it will do him you might just as well toss this resolution out of the House at once. There is not the remotest ghost of a chance of his getting any remedial treatment. I submit that that would be worse than the original suggestion in the resolution last year, from which this resolution, I repeat, is wholly different, because the former resolution included not only provision for the adjustment of these things and that the expenditure incurred should come out of the consolidated revenue fund, but it also recited and indicated the method by which this was to be accomplished. Through my hon. leader we have elicited that this is an entirely new measure, and yet the minister told us a few minutes ago that it was along the same lines as that of last year.

Mr. FORKE: Mr. Chairman, when I introduced the resolution this afternoon I explained that the bill which would follow it would be along the lines of the bill passed by the Senate—I hope my hon. friend gets that—and that that bill provided for a reference to the Exchequer court.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend never told us about the Exchequer court until a few minutes ago.

Mr. FORKE: I stated that the bill to be introduced would be along the lines of the bill amended by the Senate, which provided that where the Soldier Settlement Board and the settler could not agree the case would be referred to the Exchequer court. So all my hon. friend's criticism relates to the bill that the Senate passed.

Mr. STEVENS: We are not here judging the Senate.

Mr. FORKE: Excuse me, Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman a minute ago said that I gave no information as to what the bill would be. If he will refer to Hansard tomorrow he will find that I am correct.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend spoke of a bill that had passed the Senate and the House of Commons, but I am not going to quibble about that at all. What I am pointing out is that the resolution before us does not give a fair indication of the contents of the proposed bill which is about to be introduced; we are only now learning piece by piece what its provisions will be. My hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Brown) read us a lecture just now about losing time; I think he would have been better employed if he had not wasted the time of the House with those observations. The fact of the matter is, Mr. Chairman, that this resolution purports to contain the main principles of the bill, and the bill to follow is not supposed to depart from the resolution. Whether we like it or not, that is the rule of the House.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does my hon. friend remember the resolution which preceded the introduction of a bill in this House to acquire the whole of the Canadian Northern railway system, involving an expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars? That was a resolution of only two lines.

Mr. STEVENS: I have no doubt that that resolution was very comprehensively drawn.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Like Mr. Meighen, you are supposed to know.

Mr. STEVENS: I think this resolution is an improvement on the resolution of last year, but it does leave out this vital point—the nature or character of the arbitrating body that shall determine the revaluation.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Chairman, as I went through a five or six day grilling last year on a similar bill, may I direct the attention of hon. members to exactly what happened on that occasion? When that bill was introduced my hon. friend from Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Clark) argued strongly that the matter he has referred to to-night would be embodied in the bill; that is, that individuals who were not then resident on the land would be given consideration. I remember his spending several hours on that point.

Mr. CLARK: I never spent several hours.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am not finding any fault with the attitude of my hon. friend, but I think it was pointed out last year how hard it was to take cognizance of those who were not then resident on the land. I merely mention that in order that my hon. friend's memory may be refreshed as to his plea on that occasion.

Mr. CLARK: To-night I was speaking for the men who are at present on the land, but who have been practically foreclosed and ordered off.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I misunderstood my hon. friend.

Mr. CLARK: I realize the impossibility of following men who disappeared perhaps three or four years ago.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The individual he is speaking of to-night is still on the land?

Mr. CLARK: I think he is still there, but he is ordered off.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): He comes within the bill.

Mr. CLARK: I think not.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, those resident on the land come within the four corners of the bill.

Mr. CLARK: If his land is found to be commercially valueless, how is he covered under this bill; and what will be done?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Nothing will be done unless there is some value in the land.

Mr. CLARK: I think the minister appreciates that there are many cases where men have gone on land that may have a nominal value; but the minister himself would not go on that land, and could not make a living off it if he did—in fact no human being could sustain himself there. That land might have a value of, say, $5 an acre. The result of the bill of last year, as I saw it, would be to give that man credit for the price he paid, less its then present nominal value, which might be $200. He would be required to pay only $200, but he would be left on that barren rock. He could not be dealt with under this resolution.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend cites what is an almost impossible case.

Mr. CLARK: No, there are many of them.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I take my hon. friend's word for it. In the bill there is no provision to hand money back to the settler; that was clearly explained last year. If my hon. friend introduced a principle of that sort it would be so far-reaching and involve so many difficulties that the whole scheme would be impossible. Now my hon. friend has relieved my mind to the extent that the individual is still on the land and can be dealt with as generously as circumstances will allow. If the land is valueless, of course the case is to some extent hopeless.

Mr. CLARK: That is what I want provided for. I say that man has been misled. There are enough of these cases to warrant making provision for them in this bill by authorizing the Soldier Settlement Board to take men so circumstanced and transfer them to another area where the land would be fit to cultivate. There is plenty of land in this country available for that purpose. Of course, I am assuming that the men come up to a certain standard of fitness as agriculturists and are worth encouraging. In the majority of cases I think those men would qualify.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend is arguing now for what was provided in the former bill before it went to the Senate. I do not know in what shape it was returned to this House. But the present bill which my colleague is introducing is a copy of the bill which was amended by the Senate. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) rose in this seat and asked me, when I occupied the seat across the floor, whether I had any objection to offer to the amendments of the Senate. I glanced hastily at the bill and was informed that it had been amended practically to its original form. I am bound to say that I doubt very much whether provision for decision by the Exchequer court was ever embodied in the original bill and I frankly confess that I did not notice that feature in the amendments. What we provided was intended to meet the suggestions of hon. gentlemen opposite and we included the feature with reference to the decision by the district courts. It was believed that the bill was acceptable to the members of the House. It was provided in the first place —and I agreed entirely with this—that only the settlers on the land should be given consideration, that is to say, those who have not left, who are still in possession. They are the only ones to be considered. In the next place, if the board and the settler fail to agree as to the valuation to be placed on the land the final decision shall be rendered by the Exchequer court.

Mr. CLARK: Was there not a provision that those who had been foreclosed for a period of six months prior to the passing of the bill should be given some consideration? Surely that consideration should still be extended to this class, as well as to those who may have been foreclosed in the last twelve months. Of course it is not mentioned in this resolution.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I frankly confess that if that provision was in the bill I have no recollection of it.

Mr. CLARK: I am sure of it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We spent a day at least discussing the point and it was decided that only those in occupancy could be dealt with and not those who were off the land.

Mr. CLARK: Those lately foreclosed as well.

Mr. NEILL: That point was in the bill before it left the House.

Mr. WARD: Would it be possible to have this whole matter submitted to one of the standing committees of the House? It seems to me that this debate threatens to be interminable; we do not appear to be approaching any decision at all. I do think that the bill should be submitted to a committee of the House. I agree with the hon. member

(Mr. Clark) that the suggestion to submit the valuation finally to the Exchequer court is positively ridiculous. In fact, in my opinion it is equally ridiculous to expect the county court judges to deal with the matter. I understand that there will be fourteen or fifteen hundred cases in Manitoba alone, and it will be physically impossible for even the county court judges to sit on these examinations. If the bill were submitted to a committee, who could consider the whole matter in all its details and bring down a report to the House, we might make some progress.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): According to the Minister of the Interior the bill will apply only to settlers actually on the land. I do not believe, from the wording of the resolution, that it will go even so far. The first line or so of the resolution reads:

> That a settler whose land agreement with the board has not been terminated may make application for the revaluation of the said land.

Suppose a man who is still on the land had paid $10,000 for the property and by great personal sacrifice raised the money to pay off the government's claim. The valuation today is $5,000; the land is found to be worth not more than that sum. Is that man to receive no relief, and is the government to keep from him that $5,000?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That was the provision of the old bill.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): But surely that man is entitled to some relief. As the matter stands, the only men who will get the benefit of this legislation are those who are still in debt, while those who have been industrious enough to raise the money to pay the government will be left unprovided for. Is it not reasonable that the industry, the ability and the success of the man who has paid off the purchase price should receive some reward, if we are going to help those who are still in debt?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We did not provide for such relief.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Suppose a man had $5,000 to pay, and having paid two thousand he was unable to meet the balance of the indebtedness when it fell due. He was foreclosed and finally put off the land. Is he not going to get back that $2,000 or any part of it? If that is the situation, then it seems to me this is class legislation; it is not broad enough to cover the situation and is unfair to these classes of ex-soldiers I have mentioned. The government should not declare it impossible to deal with these classes; that is not the word to use. The government should admit that they do not intend to deal with these classes, preferring to penalize them, withholding from them the equitable treatment which this legislation will extend to others. I submit that the classes I refer to should be given consideration, as they easily could be.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That point was exhaustively discussed last year, over and over again. Both classes mentioned, those who had completed their payments and those who possibly had suffered to some extent by reason of over-valuation, were considered, and it was decided not to include them in the bill.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Why?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): For the simple reason that the treasury would have to pay back the money.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Well, why not?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am not arguing the point; I am merely reminding my hon. friend that it was discussed thoroughly and it was decided that these men would not be taken care of. That was the conclusion of last year's parliament. This parliament may take another view; I do not know. But to suggest that the government is not sympathetic is hardly fair in view of last year's discussion and the decision arrived at. With respect to the other case to which reference has been made, the bill last year applied only to those who had payments to make and who were still in possession of the land. As regards the proposal mentioned by my hon. friend (Mr. Clark), that those who had been off the land for six months should be given consideration, I do not remember such a provision.

Mr. NEILL: They were to be allowed to come in again.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): And secure their land if it had not been sold?

Mr. NEILL: Yes.

Mr. McGIBBON: Will the minister give a definite answer to the question asked him by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard? There are in my district a number of ex-soldiers who were put on poor lands at the instigation of the government inspectors and I hold that the government is responsible for the acts of its officials. These lands have proved, unfortunately, almost worthless from the standpoint of agriculture. What will be the attitude of the government towards these men? I do not think we should be guided by what was done either by the Senate or by the last House of Commons. We should be guided by a spirit of equity; this House should try to solve the problem in a spirit of fairness. There are in my district, as I say, soldiers who have incurred indebtedness to the government, and this on the advice of the officials of this government, although their land is almost worthless for agriculture. Will the suggestion of the hon. member for Burrard be carried out and will these men be given lands in a suitable agricultural area?

Mr. ROBB: I want to say just a word or two, not particularly with reference to the resolution, but in answer to the statements of the last speaker (Mr. McGibbon). I notice that all the speakers have attempted, in arguments that will go out to the country, to indicate that this government was responsible for the purchase of inferior lands at high prices.

Mr. CLARK: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CLARK: I rise to a question of privilege. I deny—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ROBB: I will listen to the hon. gentleman when I get through.

Mr. CLARK: I am frank enough—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CLARK: —to admit that the land was purchased—

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. CLARK: —long before this government came into office.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Sit down.

The CHAIRMAN: The minister has the floor.

Mr. CLARK: I am answering an insinuation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. STEVENS: I rise to a point of order. My hon. friend (Mr. Clark) rose, and you may not have heard him state, Mr. Chairman, that he rose to a question of privilege. He is entitled to do that at any time and to state his question of privilege.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Surely that is not a question of privilege.

[Mr. McGibbon.]

Mr. STEVENS: No one can judge whether it is a question of privilege or not until he has stated it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We know what he wanted to say.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. STEVENS: Under the rules of the House, Mr. Chairman, we have a right to claim your protection and your ruling in these matters.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Surely nobody has a right to evade the rules of the House and to take the floor without authority to do so just because he has a question of privilege.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, he has at any time.

Mr. CLARK: If I may speak to the matter, I would claim that I have the right, when an hon. gentleman suggests that I have said something I did not say, to rise and make a denial. I deny having stated or insinuated or suggested that these lands were purchased under the present government in a political way. I did not inject any political thought into this discussion. I thought the Minister of Finance was above suggesting such a thing as that.

Mr. ROBB: I was proceeding to say—and may I remind the committee that I never, directly or indirectly, mentioned the name of the hon. member for Burrard—I was dealing with the statement that these lands had been bought with the approval of the authorities of this government, a statement made by the last speaker.

Mr. McGIBBON: If, by inadvertence I used the expression "this government" I retract it. I did not mean to blame this government but rather this parliament. It was owing to the parliament of Canada, through the government of the Dominion, that these soldiers incurred these liabilities, and the government is responsible for the acts of its officials.

Mr. ROBB: I accept my hon. friend's retraction. Now let us go back and see when these lands were bought. They were bought in the years 1919 and 1920, and some of them a little later. It was said by some that they were valued by officials of the government. They were not valued by officials of the government, but by a representative board that was appointed. No doubt the members of that board were recommended to the government of the day by friends of the latter. They put a valuation upon these lands and they valued them too high. This government was not responsible. This government, ever since 1922, has endeavoured to respond to the reasonable requests of the committee that looked carefully into the matter. This is the third attempt we have made to bring in legislation to correct the high prices paid for land at that time. If the legislation has been delayed it has not been delayed by the government of the day. The legislation may be improved, it may not be ideal, but it is an honest attempt on the part of the government to meet the wishes of the joint committee that made certain recommendations. It is all wrong to have the impression go out to the country that the land was bought by the government of the day at exorbitant prices. That is not the case. A great deal of the land was purchased at fair prices, at reasonable prices; indeed some of it was sold for more than the soldier settler paid for it. But there are a few districts—and I think I know something of the matter because I was in that department—throughout Canada where the land was bought at high prices. The price of the land was beyond its value, as it was not suitable for agriculture; it was unloaded on the poor settler to the advantage of some friends who were able, at the time, to get the ear of the government. I am not blaming the government. In a large country like this the government in Ottawa cannot be watching everything. Generally speaking, I repeat, the land was bought at a fair price, and I may say that as Minister of Finance I will watch pretty closely to see whether any attempt is made to reimburse some chaps who have made fairly good on the land. It seems to me that we would do well to let the resolution go through as it is. When the bill is presented, and we sit down in committee to consider it, if the measure should contain any errors we can correct them.

Mr. ERNST: If clause 1 stands with the word "present" deleted, is that the only change made in it?

Mr. FORKE: That suggestion was made but the word has not been deleted yet.

Mr. ERNST: Regarding what has been said here as to the resolution paving the way for the bill to be introduced, the bill will have to be framed in corkscrew fashion if it is to follow the wording of the resolution. If the minister takes the trouble to read clause 1, with the word "present" deleted he will find it is more meaningless than it was before, if that is possible. Clause 1, as the minister has noted, would read:

> That a settler whose land agreement with the board has not been terminated may make application for the revaluation of the said land, and that the depreciation to be determined shall be the diminution in the value of the land and the improvements sold to the settler, as compared with the price at which the settler agreed to purchase—

And so on. I admit that on the government side there are many able lawyers, but I do not think a Philadelphia lawyer could draft a bill to follow that resolution. I suggest to the minister that he redraft clauses 1 and 2. By means of a pencil I could make a far better draft than clause 1 is in its present form. I think it would be better if it were redrafted so as to read something like this:

> That a settler whose land agreement with the board has not been terminated may make application for revaluation of the said land. The said land and improvements shall be revalued and assessed, and the revaluation so arrived at shall date back to the date of the purchase or agreement and shall be deemed to be the original purchase price.

In that way you will get something explicit, but no satisfactory bill can be introduced upon the resolution in its present form.

Mr. LAPOINTE: May I say to my hon. friend that this House has pretty able officers, lawyers who have been appointed to look after that sort of thing. The bill passed the Senate last year, and would have been the law of the land to-day if there had not been such a speedy dissolution of parliament. Because when the bill came back to this House from the Senate, the then acting minister in charge of the measure asked the House to adopt it in the form in which it had carried in the Senate.

An hon. MEMBER: Who was the acting minister?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion). So that the bill would have been the law to-day if the doors of parliament had not been closed on a certain afternoon in the month of July. The bill as it passed parliament last year has been taken charge of by the present Minister of Immigration. What he did was to send that very bill, which would have been a statute to-day if the occurrence referred to had not happened, to the officers of the House, who are men of experience. My hon. friend speaks of Philadelphia lawyers. Well, they are not American lawyers, they are not Boston nor Philadelphia lawyers, but they are good Canadian lawyers, as far as I can judge and they have prepared the present resolution on the bill sent to them by the Minister of Immigration. Surely we must have some confidence in our own officers; I do not think they have blundered in the way my hon. friend has suggested.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I do not know whether I have absolute confidence in the officers or not, but most of us have been through at least part of the public schools and this language as it originally stood is certainly not good English.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That may be.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: The resolution as presented reads:

The diminution in the present value..... as compared with the price at which the settler agreed to purchase.

That is not good English, and if it is amended as the minister has proposed by leaving out the word "present", to read:

The diminution in the value....as compared with the price at which the settler agreed to purchase.

That is much worse, for this reason. The settler may have purchased the land in 1919 at a high price. In 1923 there was a great slump in prices in western Canada. The diminution would then be greatest; what time are we to take for the diminution? It seems to me that we could get around all this difficulty without redrafting the clause, if we changed one little word "in" to "to". Then it would read:

—shall be the diminution to the present value of the land and the improvements sold to the settlers, as compared with the price at which the settler agreed to purchase.

Mr. ERNST: In reply to the Minister of Justice I want to make only one thing clear, and that is that I was not criticising the bill as sent back by the Senate. I have not had an opportunity of seeing that. I was not in the House last year, although the fault was none of mine. I was criticising only the drafting of a resolution which, I understand, is a prelude to a bill. The resolution as it stands, or as amended by the minister, means nothing, can be a prelude to nothing. I am not criticising the legal talent of the government—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not the government—of the House.

Mr. ERNST: I accept the correction. I am not criticising the legal talent of the House, but I am suggesting that not much of it was expended on drafting the resolution.

Mr. FORKE: The hon. member says that he did not see the bill as it came back from the Senate. I said some little time ago that the wording of the resolution is identical with the wording of the bill as it came back from the Senate.

The depreciation in value to be determined shall be the diminution in the present value of the land.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

That is the language of the bill as it came back from the Senate. Hon. members may realize that I have been taken by surprise in having so much difficulty with this resolution. The resolution was drafted in the terms of the bill as it passed the Senate and as it would have become law, as the Minister of Justice said. Now when it comes to this House it seems that it is a tremendous blunder. That may be correct, but I never anticipated any such difficulty. It seemed to me that the meaning was quite plain on the face of the resolution and I am sorry there should have been any trouble. I want to be as courteous as I can in replying to questions, and I hope hon. members will allow the resolution to pass. We shall have plenty of opportunity to discuss the bill in all its details.

In reference to what has been said about the Exchequer court, I admit that when I heard of that provision as coming from the Senate I thought the Exchequer court was rather a curious place to settle a difference that had arisen between the Soldier Settlement Board and the settler. But I was informed that the Exchequer court would simply appoint some other body, probably the county court judge or some outstanding man in the district who was familiar with the ground, to be the final arbitrator in the case. When it was put in that light it did not seem as ridiculous as it did at first sight. In any case that is the bill as it passed the Senate.

One idea I had in mind in introducing the bill in the form as proposed was this. I may be all wrong but I did it with the best intentions. Last year we threshed out all these questions that have been discussed tonight. We are all familiar with these arguments; we went over them last year, and we finally passed the bill. It went to the Senate; it passed the Senate in an amended form; it came back to this House and it would have passed here. I thought if we reintroduced the bill as it passed the Senate last year and as we were ready to accept it last year, it would be the Senate's own bill; the Senate would not reject it; it would go through the Senate; it would become law, and the soldier settlers would get some remedy in the near future. If we pass a bill again after amending it and making it entirely different, and if it goes to the Senate and they amend it again I am afraid of what will happen to the bill before it becomes law. With these explanations I hope that hon. members will understand the situation in regard to the bill. I am just as anxious as anyone that justice should be done to the soldier settler; but I am certain, no matter what bill we pass in this House, we shall never be able to pass a bill that will meet all the cases and hardships that have occurred.

There is too common an impression in the House and perhaps in the country that all the soldier settlers have been working under disadvantages and have paid too much for their land. While I have been only a few months in this department, I have found quite a number of cases where, after the soldier settler has left the land, it has been sold at a much higher price than he originally paid for it. Therefore in those cases they could not have paid too high a price. I shall be able to show at a later date, if I have an opportunity, as I probably will, that the big majority of our soldier settlers, instead of being failures, have done exceedingly well. Large numbers of them have done well and perhaps as big a percentage of our soldier settlers have done well as other classes of the population who took farming at the same time. We take too gloomy a view of the soldier settler cases as a whole, although the Minister of the Interior or someone else who spoke to-night said that in certain cases in some districts soldier settlers were taken advantage of and something ought to be done for them. I hope the committee will allow this resolution to pass. We shall have ample opportunity to discuss the matter when the bill comes before the House, and any improvements to be made can be made at that time. I will withdraw the amendment to leave out the word "present".

Mr. GUTHRIE: It was carried.

The CHAIRMAN: I must inform the minister I understood the motion was carried.

Mr. FORKE: No.

Mr. MILLAR: I have an amendment that I would like to offer. This is the whole clause as I would propose to amend it:

That a settler whose land agreement with the board has not been terminated may make application for the revaluation of the said land, and that the depreciation to be determined shall be the difference between the price at which the settler agreed to purchase the said land and improvements from the board and the present value.

Mr. FORKE: I discussed this matter to-night with a high official in the Soldier Settlement Board and I was told that when the original draft was made the law officers of the crown changed the word from "difference" to "diminution."

Mr. DUNNING: We have too many lawyers about it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: They claim in the Senate that they have the best legal talent, and this is their own drafting.

Mr. ERNST: The minister rather insinuated that the purpose of my remarks was delay. I can assure him that I have every sympathy with the merits of the measure he is proposing, and my only purpose in saying anything about it is to ensure that the measure when finally passed will not prove a burden rather than a help. It would be bad enough for the soldier to have to go to the Exchequer court to have his land valued, without having to have the Exchequer court and perhaps the Supreme court interpret the statute. There is one rather peculiar thing about the minister that has struck me, and that is his peculiar veneration for the Senate since the beginning of the present session.

Mr. DUNNING: There have been remarks, Mr. Chairman, about the past history of this measure, and I thought it worth while to get the facts. We are all relying on our memories in connection with a rather hectic period last summer. I find that the then acting Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment in the person of the present member for Fort William, introduced this measure on its being returned amended from the Senate, and Hansard of last session very clearly sets out what was the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite, who then composed what has since been described as the "shadow government", towards this principle of permitting the Exchequer court to be the deciding factor, and also towards the general principles of this legislation. It is interesting to note that the concluding exercises in connection with this particular measure last session consisted of a further effort on the part of the Acting Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment to get the House to pass the bill as it came from the Senate, and he was met with the objection by my right hon. leader that we on our side of the House had not yet had time to consider fully the changes proposed by the Senate, and we asked for time, at least until after the six o'clock recess, to look into the proposed changes. It is interesting to note that this matter never came up again. Other very important matters came up. Now, Mr. Chairman, we on this side of the House have had time to consider the effect of the changes proposed last year by my hon. friends opposite, and we now come here and say we agree. Coming here in a spirit of agreement, we now find our hon. friends opposite have changed their minds again, and they want something different.

So far as the Exchequer court is concerned, if it were to be used as a court in the city of Ottawa to adjudicate on the value of soldier settler lands, of course that would be an expensive and impossible procedure for the soldier to take. But my understanding is, and this was the explanation made a year ago with regard to it, that it is possible for the Exchequer court to name individual officers of the court in various parts of the country to act for them in adjudicating matters of this kind, and it was on that assurance from my hon. friends opposite that I was willing last year to accept the Exchequer court.

Mr. CLARK: Will the minister read that clause? That is what we have been trying to get information about, but all we get is, as somebody says, a scolding from the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Finance. All we want is information. Perhaps the minister will read that clause. It may be an admirable one that we would be willing to accept, but at the present time we do not know what it is.

Mr. DUNNING: I have not the particular clause before me. I simply have the information that last year one of my hon. friend's leaders, with whom he was perfectly satisfied, a colleague at that time of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre and the then leader of the Conservative party, a member of the government so-called at that time, considered this matter with his colleagues, and they reached the conclusion that the legislation which we now put before the House was the proper thing. We came here expecting to meet hon. members opposite in a spirit of goodwill on this matter, because we were offering to the House precisely what they themselves offered after the bill had been returned from the Senate.

Mr. CLARK: Why not give us the information if you are meeting us in a spirit of goodwill? We want to assist the passing of this legislation. We are the ones, I believe, who want this legislation, and I begin to question whether my hon. friend the minister wants it at all. Otherwise he would be courteous and frank enough to give this side of the House the information when it is courteously requested.

Mr. McGIBBON: This seems to be a remarkable exhibition on the part of the government. They come here with a resolution for which they are certainly responsible, no matter what its origin may be. We ask for information, and there is nobody on the government side that can give it. The Minister of Justice gets up and says that the law officers of the crown drafted it, and therefore it must be right.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: You accepted it last year.

Mr. McGIBBON: The Minister of Railways gets up and says that the hon. member for Fort William, who was at one time Acting Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, accepted it, and therefore it must be right. Some other member gets up and says that this is a product of the Senate, and therefore it must be right. But not a single member on the government benches can get up and argue the resolution on its merits, and they ask this House to accept a resolution that they do not know the meaning of themselves. It is a ridiculous exhibition.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You are repudiating your own child.

Mr. IRVINE: I do not rise to offer any suggestion to the law officers of the crown as to how to draft this resolution, nor am I particularly impressed with the argument of the Minister of Railways that because he has proved that another government introduced a measure equally innocuous, we ought to let this one go through as it is. I wish to pass on to the minister in charge of this resolution suggestions which were made to me by the soldiers who are on land under the Soldier Settlement Board in my own riding. I understand that the purpose of the resolution is to give an opportunity to discuss the principles which will be at a later date embodied in the bill to be presented to parliament, and therefore I presume that what I have to say will be in order, as it deals with the principle of the bill.

I assume that it is the intention of the government in bringing in this legislation to give immediate and effective relief to the soldier settlers. The soldier settlers at the present time are rather afraid that the process of arriving at a revaluation is going to be so cumbersome and so difficult to attain, and perhaps so expensive, as to nullify the beneficial effects of the legislation, and accordingly many soldier settlers are of the opinion that it would be better not to attempt revaluation as it is suggested in this resolution and as was provided for in the bill of last year, but rather to make to all soldier settlers now on the land, a flat percentage reduction in the purchase price. It is not my intention to argue that now, I merely pass the suggestion on to the minister in the hope that he will give it consideration before he finally drafts the bill. I think it is clear that no legislation can possibly meet every case. It will be absolutely impossible under any proposal to give relief to everybody, but if we have a bill which provides for a very difficult process of revaluation, it may be that many who could get relief under the simple proposal of the soldiers to have a flat percentage reduction will not get any relief at all. I offer this suggestion to the minister, and I hope that he will give it his serious consideration when he prepares the legislation which is to be based on the resolution before the committee.

Mr. COOTE: I take it for granted—and if I am taking too much for granted I hope the Minister of Immigration and Colonization will say so—that the bill will be brought down and introduced in the same spirit as it was presented a year ago; that is, that the minister is willing to consider any changes which members of the House may suggest when they have the bill before them. At the present time I am very much concerned with reference to the proposal to accept the amendment which the Senate proposed last year, of having the valuation in some cases referred to the Exchequer court. Many soldier settlers feel that their cases are practically hopeless if they have to go to such a body as the Exchequer court of Canada, situated, as they are, two thousand miles from Ottawa. The hon. member from Dauphin made a splendid suggestion—and I hope the minister will accept it—that when the bill comes down it be sent to a special committee, or one of the select committees of the House which is capable of dealing with the bill in a satisfactory manner.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It would be regrettable if in the matter of legislation regarding soldiers the government should take the position that they would not consider any suggested changes. That was not our attitude last year, nor the attitude of any party in this House; but rather that the House should endeavour to reconcile the differences as nearly as they could with respect to this particular measure and enact legislation that would be mutually beneficial, or beneficial to the soldiers themselves. I want to assure hon. members opposite that the same consideration will be given to suggestions as has been given heretofore. I can quite understand the difficulty that my hon. friend experiences. This revaluation is long overdue, and many men have been forced to leave their land who, if the revaluation had taken place two years ago, would now be farming on it. We want at this session of parliament to pass a bill that will provide for a revaluation of the land and play fair with the men still on the land. I think we can surely approach this question in that spirit. I can foresee that a lot of argument made last year is going to be introduced again this year, but there is no harm in that. That is what this body is for. I hope the outcome will be that the suggestions made will be beneficial to the soldiers and that we will enact a measure that will be of real value to the men who are fighting their way along on land that was valued too high, or sold to them at a high price. Do not forget that many of these men were fortunate in their selections and that their land is now worth more than when they purchased it. I say that to show how impossible the suggestion made by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin would be. We have gone over all that, and when hon. members know the circumstances surrounding these cases they will realize that some of these suggestions would not be beneficial. As one member of the government I hope the discussion will continue in the way it has hitherto been conducted in connection with soldier settlement matters and that we will arrive at a proper conclusion.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): A few minutes ago the Minister of Railways told the House that according to Hansard of last year the hon. member from Fort William had asked the House to adopt the bill as it came back from the Senate with the proviso that appeal should be made to the Exchequer court. I do not think the minister stated in what portion of Hansard that reference is to be found. Would he give us the reference to the date and the page of Hansard, which I happen to have before me? If he is correct, the advantage is all with him, and if he is incorrect I should like to know it, and I should like the House to know it.

Mr. DUNNING: In the last volume of Hansard it is shown that on two occasions the present member for Fort William presented the bill as it came from the Senate. I wanted it to be quite clear that it came from the Senate with the Exchequer court provision in it, and the hon. member for Fort William, then Acting Minister of Soldier's Civil Re-establishment, presented it to the House in that form. If my hon. friend has Hansard before him he will see that on the first occasion the hon. member from Fort William indicated that he had not had sufficient time clearly to grasp the matter himself, or something to that effect.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Will the minister be good enough to give me the reference?

Mr. DUNNING: I sent it back; it is not before me now. But I can find it if my hon. friend will lend me the Hansard.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): I will not only lend it to the hon. member, but I will give it.

Mr. FORKE: I have the exact wording as it came from the Senate.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): What page of Hansard?

Mr. FORKE: This is the bill as it came from the Senate.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): But where does it appear in Hansard?

Mr. FORKE: The section reads:

—and if any applicant is dissatisfied with the decision of the board he may, within such time as is prescribed by regulations made by the Governor in Council, appeal to the Exchequer court of Canada and the decision of that court shall be final.

Further on the bill states:

The Governor in Council may make such regulations as he deems fit for the procedure in appeals to the Exchequer court under this section, and may by such regulations modify or dispense with any provisions as to procedure in the Exchequer Court Act or in the rules of practice of that court.

Mr. CLARK: Will the minister read the clause which permits the Exchequer court to delegate its powers to any other court?

Mr. FORKE: I will tell the House again what I stated before with reference to referring the matter to the Exchequer court. As a layman I thought it was ridiculous, but it was explained to me that it was not necessary that the applicant should come to Ottawa, or that the judges of Exchequer court should try the case; that they could delegate the case to someone in the locality where the difficulty arose. It is not so absurd, therefore, as appears on the face of it.

Mr. CLARK: I cannot see the provision in the clause the minister read which empowers the Exchequer court to delegate its powers to anyone else.

Mr. FORKE: I was informed by a lawyer to that effect—that that was what the court had power to do. Maybe I am wrong, I am not a lawyer at all.

The CHAIRMAN: There seems to be some misunderstanding in the committee as to whether or not the motion made by the hon. minister was carried. It was my understanding that it was carried and I so marked it, but with unanimous consent it can be rescinded. I would point out that the motion of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle cannot be entertained unless the previous motion is rescinded, because the motion made by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle goes back beyond the word "present," as it appears in the resolution, and paragraph 336 of rule 36 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms states:

After a decision has been given on an amendment to any part of a question, an earlier part cannot be amended.

Consequently it is necessary, in order to consider the amendment moved by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, that the motion to strike out the word "present" be rescinded. Is it the unanimous consent of the committee that the motion be rescinded?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

The CHAIRMAN: Then the motion moved by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle would be in order. It is to this effect:

That in the third line after the words "shall be the" the words "diminution in" be deleted, and the following words inserted, "difference between the price at which the settler agreed to purchase the said land and improvements from the board and"—

The remainder of the clause following the words "present value" will be deleted.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Chairman, may I rise to a point of order? This resolution has been submitted in its printed form to His Excellency the Governor General and has received his approval. Can a private member by a motion change the language of such a resolution without its being re-submitted to His Excellency?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. leader of the opposition is perfectly right in his contention. I would suggest that inasmuch as dozens of amendments to this bill will be submitted when it is in committee, the committee accept the resolution, much as they seem to question its wording. This is a contentious bill, and I defy any member to introduce a bill of this character that will be entirely satisfactory and that will not be the subject of many amendments. That has been my experience in the four years that I have been trying to put through similar legislation. The adoption of my suggestion would create no precedent; such a course has been taken heretofore.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Chairman, in order to show our entire goodwill to the new Minister of Immigration and Colonization, and to help the government out of an apparent dilemma, we agree to the suggestion made by my hon. friend.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Forke thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 61, to amend the Soldier Settlement Act, 1919.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

LONG TERM FARM LOANS

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved,—1. That there shall be a board known as the Canadian Farm Loan Board which shall be a body politic and corporate consisting of four members, one of whom shall be the Minister of Finance and the other three shall be appointed by the governor in council and of the latter one shall be designated by the Canadian Farm Loan commissioners.

2. That the board shall issue farm loan bonds to make long term loans to farmers, and the government of Canada shall provide initial capital for the board to an amount not exceeding five million dollars and subscribe an amount of 5 per cent of the capital stock as loans are made by the board.

3. That the government of each province in which loans are made shall be required to subscribe to the capital stock of the board as loans are made in such province an amount equal to 5 per cent of the said loans and each borrower an amount of 5 per cent of his loan payable at the time the loan is made. The loans shall be made on the security of first mortgage on farm lands; the interest rate shall be such a rate in excess of the interest payable on the farm loan bonds as is sufficient to provide for the expenses of operation; the farm loan bonds shall be legal investments and may be purchased by the Minister of Finance provided that the amount of such bonds held by him shall not at any time exceed $15,000,000; and the amount of any payment by the government of Canada on account of capital of the board or as payment for farm loan bonds purchased shall be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund on the authority of the governor in council.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the minister be kind enough to give us a brief explanation?

Mr. ROBB: The bill to be founded upon this resolution will be submitted to the House in identically the same form that it left the House to go to the Senate last session.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Robb thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 62, for the purpose of establishing in Canada a system of long term mortgage credit for farmers.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 9.50 p.m.

Monday, February 14, 1927

The House met at three o'clock.

NATURAL RESOURCES OF PRAIRIE PROVINCES

PETITION PRESENTED BY HON. MR. EDWARDS

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): I have the honour to present petitions signed by some 370 electors in British Columbia, Manitoba, New Brunswick and Ontario, asking for the transfer to the prairie provinces of their natural resources without restrictions; also other petitions signed by 2,700 electors of Alberta and by some 3,000 from Saskatchewan.

CROWN PAVING AND CONSTRUCTION COMPANY

Hon. JAMES MALCOLM (Minister of Trade and Commerce): In conformity with the request of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) last Tuesday, I lay on the table correspondence respecting payments made to the Crown Paving and Construction Company, Limited, in connection with the construction of the government grain elevator at Edmonton, and orders in council in relation thereto.

SALVATION ARMY IMMIGRATION WORK

On the Orders of the Day.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (Toronto West Centre): I am prompted by what I read in the newspapers to ask the Minister of Immigration what is his attitude towards the Salvation Army with regard to its immigration work.

Hon. ROBERT FORKE (Minister of Immigration): That is a rather difficult question to answer. My attitude towards the Salvation Army with regard to its immigration work is the same as the attitude of the Immigration department towards all other organizations engaged in the same class of work.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

PUBLIC PURCHASING AND CONTRACTS

Mr. EVANS:

1. In regard to public purchasing and allotment of public contracts under federal government, what is the amount in dollars of purchases and contracts allotted: (a) total for year 1925-26, (b) total allotted under open competition, (c) total allotted departmentally, (d) total allotted under authority of the government contracts supervision committee?

2. In regard to the government contracts supervision committee, what is the present situation as to: (a) extent of establishment, (b) cost of establishment, (c) nature of duties performed?

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I would like to point out to Your Honour that although this question stands under Mr. Evans' name on the order paper, it is really the resolution which should stand under my name, Mr. Evans' question having been dropped. There is, I think, a mistake in the printing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This morning I directed the attention of one of the officers of the House to what appeared to be a mistake. Mr. Evans' question was dropped altogether and should be reinstated. I understand he intends to reinstate it. The name of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken should appear against the question next on the order paper.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Will question No. 1 be called?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It will appear on the order paper to-morrow.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): But question No. 1 was declared to be dropped by the Speaker. Might I suggest it would be proper to call question No. 1 giving the name of Mr. Garland (Bow River)?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It would be better to let it stand under the name of the hon. member for Bow River.

Mr. SPEAKER: A similar question under the name of Mr. Garland (Bow River) was passed as an order for return last Thursday. Shall I still allow the question to stand?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No. That is quite satisfactory.

Mr. SPEAKER: Well, it is dropped.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must explain to the hon. gentleman that it is dropped as a question on the order paper but it stands as an order for return. This means business.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Quite so. I fully appreciate that the question is not dropped but stands as an order for return.

Mr. SPEAKER: Exactly.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION

Mr. CHEVRIER:

Did the Department of Justice pronounce upon the legality of a ruling of the Treasury board, dated the 17th December, 1926, reference No. T 118914 B, relating to the Civil Service superannuation of 1924, which provides for the confiscation of contributions in certain cases?

[Mr. Evans.]

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

No. The question of legality does not arise. The power conferred by section 10, subsection 3, is discretionary and Treasury board is competent to determine under what circumstances its power to recommend shall be exercised.

PILOTAGE FEES

Mr. DICKIE:

1. What are the pilotage fees paid by the Canadian Government Merchant Marine vessels operating into California ports?
2. What are the pilotage fees paid by the United States coasting vessels operating into British Columbia ports?

Hon. Mr. CARDIN:

1. According to information in the Department of Marine and Fisheries the maximum pilotage rate at San Francisco is $2 per foot draught and 2 cents per registered ton—both inwards and outwards.

2. The rate at New Westminster, B.C., is $1 per foot draught and one cent per registered ton—inwards and outwards.

Pilotage is not compulsory at the other ports in British Columbia where any fees charged for pilotage are determined by agreement between vessel owners and persons acting as pilots.

HASTINGS COUNTY GEOLOGICAL SURVEY

Mr. TUMMON:

1. When was the last geological survey made in Ontario covering the central part of Hastings county?
2. Has the report of the above mentioned survey ever been published?
3. If so, when?
4. If not, why?

Hon. Mr. STEWART:

1. An investigation of the fluorspar and talc deposits of Hastings county was commenced by the Geological Survey in 1920 and completed in 1925.

2. Yes.

3. A report on the fluorspar deposits of this district was published in the Geological Survey summary report, 1920, part D. The talc deposits of Hastings county are dealt with in the report on the "Talc Deposits of Canada" (No. 2 Economic Geology Series) published in 1926. A map and report on the general geology of the region are now being prepared.

CANADIAN MINISTER AT WASHINGTON

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the government decided to open a separate Canadian embassy at Washington, separate from the British embassy, and when and at what estimated cost per annum for: (a) salaries; (b) maintenance; (c) capital or rent commitments?

2. What staff will be employed in this embassy?

3. Who is the ambassador appointed, for what term and salary and allowances and what is his title?

4. Will the embassy be opened before parliament has passed: (a) on the principle of such separate representation, or (b) funds voted in committee of supply for said office, and when will parliament have an opportunity of dealing with the matter?

5. What functions and duties will be performed by the said embassy and the British embassy re Canada?

6. Will the government lay on the table of the House all correspondence with the British and United States governments in the matter, or with other persons?

7. To what other foreign countries will ambassadors be appointed?

8. Will one be appointed to China to take care of Canadians and their property there in view of the trouble in the Far East?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. His Majesty has appointed a minister at Washington, with the special object of representing in the United States of America the interests of the Dominion of Canada. The minister will present his credentials to the President of the United States on February 18. Provision for the expenses of the legation was made in the estimates of 1926-27, and further provision will be included in the estimates for 1927-28, which will shortly be laid before parliament.

2. The staff will probably consist of two first secretaries, a commercial secretary, a private secretary, and four clerks and stenographers.

3. Hon. Vincent Massey has been appointed as minister, during His Majesty's pleasure. His salary will be $12,000 a year; house and representation allowance has not yet been definitely set. His title is "His Britannic Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary at Washington to represent the interests of the Dominion of Canada," or briefly, "the Canadian minister to the United States."

4. No. Parliament has repeatedly considered the principle of special Canadian representation in the United States. On May 10, 1920, the Acting Prime Minister, Sir George Foster, announced in the House of Commons that "as a result of recent discussion an arrangement has been concluded between the British and Canadian governments to provide more complete representation of Canadian interests than has hitherto existed." On April 21, 1921, in committee of supply, during a discussion of an appropriation for Canadian representation in the United States, Sir Robert Borden gave a comprehensive survey of the development of opinion and policy on this question from 1870 to 1921. Provision for the expenses of such Canadian representation has been included in the estimates each year since and including 1919-20, and approved in all cases by parliament.

5. The minister will be charged with the duty of advancing the interests of Canada in the United States and will serve as the ordinary channel of communication with the United States government.

6. A notice of motion has already been given calling for a return of certain documents and correspondence in connection with the appointment of the minister.

7. No other appointments of ministers are under consideration at the present time.

8. Answered under No. 7.

LONDON RADIO INSPECTOR

Mr. WHITE (London):

1. Is it the intention of the government to appoint a radio inspector for London, Ontario, and vicinity?

2. If so, when is the appointment likely to be made?

Hon. Mr. CARDIN:

1. Yes. For London and district.

2. In the immediate future.

ADVANCES TO CANADIAN BANKS

Mr. IRVINE:

1. Does the Finance minister make advances on securities to the Canadian banks at the present time as was the practice under the supplement to the Finance Act of 1914?

2. If so, is it to be understood that the section of the Finance Act of 1914 which made provision for giving advances on securities to the banks, is still acted upon?

Hon. Mr. ROBB: Advances are now made under the Finance Act, 1923.

STANLEY BARRACKS FIRE

Mr. STEWART (Leeds):

1. Has the government been informed of a fire which occurred in the stables of Stanley barracks, in the present month?

2. Has any investigation been made as to the cause of the fire in which horses and equipment were lost?

3. What was the total loss by fire, (a) to the government; (b) to others?

4. To what extent, if any, is the loss covered by insurance?

5. What was the cause of the fire?

Hon. Mr. RALSTON:

1. Yes.

2. A court of inquiry is proceeding with the investigation.

3. Not yet established.
4. Nil.
5. Not yet established.

JUBILEE CELEBRATION OF CONFEDERATION

Mr. KAISER:

1. Does the government intend to appoint a committee to look after arrangements in connection with the jubilee celebration to be held in Ottawa during the coming summer?
2. If so, when will same be appointed and what will be its scope?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might give a verbal answer to this question. The government has thought it advisable to follow with respect to the celebration of the diamond jubilee of confederation the plan that was adopted with respect to the Canadian patriotic fund, namely, to ask parliament to appoint a committee and to give that committee entire power to make all arrangements that are necessary in connection with the celebration. I have to-day given to the Clerk notice of a bill which will be presented to the House by resolution which will appear in to-day's Votes and Proceedings.

CANADIAN MINISTER AT WASHINGTON

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING APPOINTMENT

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George) moved for:

1. A copy of the royal commission and instructions, if any, issued by His Majesty the King to Honourable Vincent Massey as Minister Plenipotentiary to represent the interests of Canada in the United States;
2. A copy of each and every order in council passed by His Majesty the King in Council or by the Privy Council of Canada, requesting, authorizing or approving of the said appointment of the Honourable Vincent Massey as such Minister Plenipotentiary;
3. A copy of all correspondence between the Prime Minister of Canada or any minister of the government of Canada, with the Prime Minister of Great Britain or any minister or department of the government of Great Britain relating to the said appointment of the Honourable Vincent Massey as such Minister Plenipotentiary;
4. A copy of any instructions issued by the government of Canada to the said Minister Plenipotentiary.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can see no objection to the motion carrying provided it is understood that wherever reference is made either to His Majesty the King in Council or to the Prime Minister of Great Britain, or the minister of any department of the government of Great Britain, the consent of either His Majesty in Council or of the minister concerned will be had in the first instance.

Mr. CAHAN: That is quite satisfactory, Mr. Speaker, if in the meantime, in order to assist us in our subsequent discussions when we come to take up the report of the Imperial conference, we might have such documents produced as are within the possession and at the disposal of the government of the Prime Minister of this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall be very pleased to see that my hon. friend's wishes in that particular are met. I think so far as our government is concerned, we can bring down immediately all the papers and I shall try and have them placed on the table to-morrow.

I might mention that I doubt very much if there is any order in council passed by His Majesty in Council, and I doubt if there has been any correspondence with the ministers in Great Britain, so I presume the return asked for will be virtually complete when we bring down our return.

I might mention, too, if my hon. friend will allow me, as he has asked for a copy of the royal commission and instructions, if any, issued by His Majesty the King, that in the case of an appointment of a minister His Majesty issues letters of credence, in this case the letter of credence is from His Majesty to the President of the United States, Mr. Coolidge. There is no commission. With my hon. friend's consent I will bring down a copy of the letter of credence that has been issued.

Motion agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF GOVERNOR GENERAL

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George) moved for:

1. A copy of the royal commission and instructions issued by His Majesty the King to His Excellency Lord Willingdon, as Governor General of Canada;
2. A copy of each and every order in council passed by His Majesty in Council or by the Privy Council of Canada requesting, authorizing or approving the said appointment of His Excellency Lord Willingdon as Governor General of Canada and the issue of said commission and said instructions.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Perhaps I should say to my hon. friend what I said with respect to the previous motion. This motion refers to a copy of the orders in council passed by His Majesty in Council. The consent of the British government to the production of any such would have to be obtained. I will see that inquiry is made at once.

I should add that inasmuch as this motion relates to a commission issued to His Excellency the present Governor General, I think my hon. friend will agree with me that, as a matter of courtesy, we might obtain His Excellency's consent as well.

Motion agreed to.

DISSOLUTION OF LATE PARLIAMENT

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George) moved for:

A copy of all correspondence between the Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King, then Prime Minister, and His Excellency the Governor General, Lord Byng, during the months of May and June last, relating directly or indirectly to dissolution of parliament on the advice of the said Prime Minister who then held office, the refusal of His Excellency the Governor General to grant such dissolution on the advice of said Prime Minister, and the subsequent resignations of said Prime Minister and the members of his ministry from the offices held by them respectively.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when this matter was mentioned the other day by the hon. leader of the opposition, I pointed out that I would not wish to lay the correspondence on the table without the consent of Lord Byng. I immediately cabled to Lord Byng, and I have Lord Byng's consent in the matter of taking full liberty of action with respect to the correspondence. I just wish to repeat what I previously said when the correspondence was asked for by the leader of the opposition. I have no desire personally, nor has the government any desire, to reopen an incident which has been closed, we think very satisfactorily, but which may be reopened in a discussion of this correspondence. If it is laid on the table of the House, as I am prepared to do immediately, it is being laid on the table because the opposition desire that this should be done. I consent to the order being carried, Mr. Speaker, and beg leave to table the correspondence immediately.

Motion agreed to, and correspondence tabled.

PEACE RIVER RAILWAY OUTLET

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the time has arrived for the commencement forthwith and the completion in the near future of a direct railway outlet from the Peace river country to the Pacific coast.

He said: It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to detain the House at any great length on the subject matter of this motion, because it has been before the House, though not in this particular form, for the last four or five years.

The Peace river country lies in the provinces of British Columbia and Alberta, just east of the Rockies, and from four to seven hundred miles north of the international boundary. There is settled in that district approximately two million acres of land—two million acres of land as easily developed as any part of the prairie provinces, and with just as great possibilities as any other portion of like acreage anywhere within those provinces. It has been said that a great deal of this land is covered with bush. While there is a large part of the country covered with light brush, that is not true of the two million acres that is already settled. Approximately eighty per cent of this is simply covered with light bluffs and they are not in any sense a real detriment to the development of the country. That country is chiefly a farming country so far. We have, of course, the fishing industry. In Lesser Slave lake they have taken out as much as 1,200,000 pounds per annum. That quantity was reduced some years ago to one-half of that amount, because it was felt that 1,200,000 pounds annually was a little too heavy for the production of the lake. We have the lumbering industry, and there is a tremendous amount of timber. It has been estimated that in some districts not very far from Grande Prairie the amount of timber runs up into the billions of feet. It has been remarked by visitors who came into the country in 1910, when the rush of settlement started in that district, and by those who came in in later years after the war, that there was more permanent development in the Peace river country during that period than possibly in any other section of the prairie provinces in the same length of time. This is partly accounted for by the fact that there is timber in the country and it provides cheap material to build homes. It is also accounted for by the fact that a country where the land is rich and where there is a reasonable number of trees tends to encourage people to develop homes, rather than to make them merely speculators who prove up, then sell their lands and go elsewhere.

It has been said by a large number of people who have studied immigration and the settlement of the country that there are always three classes of settlers, first, the homesteader, then the man who buys from the homesteader and develops the land and lastly, the farmer.

So far as the Peace river country is concerned that is not so. After the war, of course, we had deflation. In the years 1922 and 1924 we had dry seasons. These two factors made for us possibly as difficult times as any part of the country ever had, and a large number of people left the country, but in only very few cases did the original pioneers leave. They are practically all there still. It is not surprising, possibly, in view of the fact that most of them went into the country over a trail three hundred miles long, which was jokingly referred to once by an Irishman as a "mud canal". We think most of the settlers who would have proved inefficient as actual settlers did not get to the country at all. We have a population there to-day of approximately 20,000. The main industry, of course, is farming. We are located an average distance of about 1,600 miles from the head of the lakes. We are located geographically within 800 miles of the Pacific ports, but in order to get to the Pacific ports we have to travel by railway a distance of 1,200 or 1,300 miles. There has been a rather intensive agitation for a direct connection with the Pacific coast during the last five years. That agitation has had some effect. We have received a great deal of support from the newspapers, and may I say that we have received very excellent support from the Southam press last year, Mr. Southam and some of his editors took a trip up through the Peace river country and gave us some very excellent publicity.

The country is served by the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia railway, which runs northwest for a distance of 300 or 400 miles into the Peace river country. Up until November 1926 the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia was operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway. In November 1926 it was taken over by the provincial government and is now operated by the provincial government through its Department of Railways and in close association or affiliation with the Canadian National Railways. The Canadian National is the railway which can give us proper connection with the Pacific coast, because they can give us the direct connection that we ask for by the construction of approximately 168 miles up to 200 miles. I know that is the minimum mileage. But the country is well served to-day, or would be, with the construction of say another 100 miles of construction by branch railways. That is the settled portion of it, and if we had in addition to that a direct connection with the coast we would have a loop or semi-circle formed by the road running northwest from Edmonton and that running southwest to the British Columbia coast. I have said that this agitation has been carried on for four or five years and we have heard declarations made by public men in the west regarding this Peace river outlet. It has been the chief plank in the platform of both Liberal and Conservative candidates in the Peace river constituency in the last two elections. We have had statements regarding the Peace river railway from the Prime Minister in the city of Edmonton, as well as from Mr. Meighen when he was leader of the opposition. I have here the statement made by the Right Hon. Mackenzie King in Edmonton and reported in the Edmonton Bulletin on November 11th, 1924, and I quote the following:

King pledges self to the Peace river cause.

These are merely headings.

Premier promises outlet to Pacific;
Just as soon as humanly possible.
Railway will be built, declares Prime Minister, at mass meeting here.
Government has but minority in Commons; says times are now difficult and everybody must have a little patience, but Liberal party is not falling down on any of its pledges.

Here is the direct quotation:

"It is the policy of the government of which I have the honour to be the head to introduce a vigorous policy of immigration which will people the vast areas of undeveloped country in the great west," declared the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, Premier of Canada, when addressing mass meeting of citizens in the First Presbyterian church last night.

Mr. CAHAN: What is the date?

Mr. KENNEDY: October 11th, 1924, at the First Presbyterian church in Edmonton. The quotation continues:

There is to the north of this city a great tract of land that is crying out for development. The Peace river country is amongst the richest in Canada, but before the proper development of that country can take place an outlet to the Pacific coast is an absolute necessity. I pledge myself that as soon as it is humanly possible the great Peace river country will be given that measure of railway relief that will bring to the pioneers of that country the outlet they have been so long denied and will open up the country for prospective settlers. I must, however, sound the same note to you here as I did to the citizens of Saskatoon. The times that we are passing through are very difficult, and I would ask you to have a little patience and in as short a time as possible a railway outlet will be provided for Peace river and northern Alberta districts that will open up an era of prosperity for that country which will not be equalled by any other province in Canada.

A "little patience" in 1924 and the railway would be built "as soon as humanly possible". That is a very sweeping statement and I think I am safe in saying that the terms of my motion are strictly within the terms of this pledge given by the right hon. Prime Minister at Edmonton in 1924.

Mr. Meighen made a trip west and he also said something regarding the Peace river outlet. This quotation is from Mr. Meighen's speech delivered at Edmonton October 1, 1925, and is taken from the literature of the Conservative candidate, in 1925, Mr. Collins:

I have always urged that the north country should have railway relief. I cannot be accused of making futile promises such as the Hon. Mackenzie King promised in the speech from the throne at the opening of the last session of parliament when he stated that he was going to give railway relief to the north country, and nothing has been done. This great question has been sidetracked by Senate reform, which subject has been discussed for forty years.

I may say that on the strength of that statement Mr. Collins, promised, not one outlet but two—one east of the mountains and one west. The Liberal candidate in 1926 —and I am sure the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) will recognize his picture— said this:

Pacific Coast Outlet: I consider this is the only solution for the financial difficulties of the people of the northern part of this riding, and I will do my utmost to get some definite action on it if elected. . . . For years the Peace river country has suffered the iniquity of oppressive freight rates and lack of transportation facilities. For years the northern people have valiantly tolerated these conditions and have fought with great tenacity for their removal. In a measure they have been successful, but much yet remains to be done. The coast connection alone stands between the Peace river people and wholesale prosperity.

An hon. MEMBER: What did you do yourself?

Mr. KENNEDY: (continuing reading):

At this election your vote will decide whether that measure of prosperity will accrue to you now or never in this generation. Weigh these bald facts, Mr. Voter. Do not lose sight of the fact that if we secure a coast connection it will be the Canadian National that will furnish it. Do not lose sight of the fact that Mackenzie King appointed Sir Henry Thornton, and that the Liberal government's courageous policy of national ownership has revealed a most astounding success.

What about myself, the hon. member asks. Neither in 1925 nor in 1926 did I promise more than I am doing at the present time. I stated that I was quite satisfied with the Right Hon. Mackenzie King's declaration of 1924, and would do my best to see that he lived up to it. That is my purpose in bringing forward this resolution.

It is fair, I think, to state that the federal government settled the Peace river country. A lot of people have asked why we were foolish enough to go back three hundred miles from a railway. Well, at that time the lands were thrown open by the Dominion government, that is, in 1910, 1911 and 1912. Both Liberal and Conservative governments helped to settle that country. The ministers of the interior under those respective governments were the Hon. Frank Oliver and the Hon. Robert Rogers. There was a survey made of the Canadian Northern railway that ran northwest from Edmonton and right through Grande Prairie, across the mountains and out somewhere to the Pacific coast. I myself saw men in 1912 buying right-of-way in Grande Prairie, and they said three years was the limit we would have to wait for a railway.

So far as I am aware the entire expenditures of the federal government towards supplying that country with railway facilities is a grant of $5,000 a mile in connection with the line running from Spirit river down to Grande Prairie, a distance of some 50 or 60 miles, representing approximately $300,000. The provincial government has spent in the neighbourhood of $19,000,000 in providing railway facilities for that country. The federal government saddled the province with the responsibility, and I think it is up to the federal government to assume some further obligation with regard to the continued development of the Peace river district. The railways in the province of Alberta run northwest almost to the boundary of the province, and the only railway facilities the settlers have on the British Columbia side is the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia railway. The Alberta government cannot be expected to build railways through British Columbia. In addition to the grant of $300,000 that I have mentioned—that is not the exact sum, but it is approximately correct —the federal government voted $50,000 in 1923 for a survey of the various routes from the Peace river country to the Pacific coast, and in 1924 it voted an additional $75,000.

In 1925 we had tabled in this House the joint report of the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific engineers who were sent out to make a survey of the country in order to ascertain what would be the most economical route to build and operate, particularly with the view of avoiding duplication. That joint report is somewhat canny and careful in its recommendations, but its authors go so far as to admit that the railway is justified. Unquestionably there is enough territory there to justify these transportation facilities. There is a rich territory to be served, and it will be a revenue producer to the Canadian National Railway system. Indeed I do not know of any better revenue producing territory for the Canadian National main line running from Edmonton to Prince Rupert than the Peace river country. In 1914 the first car of wheat was shipped from the north side of the Peace river. The wheat was grown in my own district. In 1921 about two and a half million bushels of grain were shipped out; in 1923 about three and a half million bushels; in 1926 it is estimated that about six million bushels have been hauled out. In addition to that the wheat is generally of very high quality. If there was ever any doubt at all about the possibilities of Peace River, it was surely dissipated last year, because Herman Trelle at Wembley near the present terminus of the Edmonton-Dunvegan railway, captured the sweepstakes at Chicago in both wheat and oats, this being the first occasion on which one farmer has ever done that in the history of that grain show. This is the second time that Peace River has secured the sweepstakes in wheat, the first occasion being in 1883 when wheat from a district north of Peace River won the first prize at a fair in Philadelphia.

There is an interesting report by Mr. Macoun, published in Ottawa on December 15, 1903, illustrating how pessimistic people can be sometimes regarding the future possibilities of a country. This gentleman was sent to make a survey of the Peace river district, and the impression he conveys in this article is shared, I think, by many people throughout Canada even to-day. Many people still have the same feeling regarding the Peace river country. It is so far away, so near the north pole that there must be something wrong with it. This report was not distributed. I believe it was suppressed by the minister of that day, and it was well that it was because it has been shown to be entirely wrong. This is what he said:

> While the country that has been described should, in the opinion of the writer, not be settled by either the rancher or the grower of wheat until there is more satisfactory evidence that it is suited for either of these pursuits, it may be safely prophesied that after railways have been built there will be only a very small part of it that will not afford homes for hardy northern people, who never having had much will be satisfied with little. It is emphatically a poor man's country, a country where any hard-working man may, in a few years, gather around him a few head of stock—horses, cattle and hogs—where he will be able to grow vegetables and in most years barley and oats and sometimes even wheat. But it will be many years before anything can be grown for export, even with good transport facilities. The building of the railway will lead to the development of the mines in northern British Columbia, and these mines will afford a market for beef and pork at least; but until there is some such market, cash will be very scarce. During the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, there will of course be a ready market for any produce grown near the route it will follow, but such a market cannot last more than a year or two and the demand for food products will cease when the road is completed.

I have often thought of that statement when reading the engineers' report, and I will refer to it a little later. I have already said that we have 2,000,000 acres of settled land in the Peace river country, of which 150,000 acres are under cultivation. This year we have produced about 6,000,000 bushels of grain for export. The province of Alberta has about 29,000,000 acres settled, and in 1924 there were about ten or eleven million acres under cultivation, from which the province produced something like 131,000,000 bushels of grain, about half of that being wheat. I have said before that the 2,000,000 acres settled in the Peace river country can be developed just as easily as the 29,000,000 acres settled in Alberta, if not more easily, and with a reasonable and steady price for wheat, if the wheat pool lasts, you will see a wonderful development in that part of the Dominion.

The engineers' report goes on to state that we should wait until there is sufficient tonnage in the Peace river country to justify the railway. Well, there never would have been a railway built in Canada—at least, few would have been built—if we had always taken that attitude towards railway construction. Certainly the Canadian Pacific was not built under any such restriction, nor was the Grand Trunk Pacific nor the Canadian Northern. The fact is that settlement and railway development must proceed together if we are to have a healthy and reasonable development of the country. It has often been said that a large program of railway construction has led us into great difficulties. It was not the railway construction but the wrong location of the railways, and extravagance in connection with the building of them. I do not think there is a mile too much of railway in Canada to-day. The railways, are located in a great many instances in the wrong places.

There are three routes recommended by the engineers' report. One route is by Obed, running south from the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia railway, east of the mountains. It would use the Edmonton-Dunvegan section of the railway running up through Grande Prairie and the Central Canada railway, which is a branch of the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia railway, as the branch line system for the present. That route is about 200 miles shorter to Pacific ports than the present route. The route that has been surveyed through Monk-man pass, and which does not call for a larger expenditure than the completed Obed route, would bring the whole Peace river country within about 800 to 890 miles of the Pacific coast and is nearly 400 miles shorter than the present route. I do not think it is an economical proposition for the country to haul freight 1,200 miles when the freight can be landed at Pacific ports, where a great deal of it goes anyway, by hauling it a distance of 800 miles.

We are doing a lot of work for nothing. That may be a good policy for people who believe that the great thing in the world is work, but most of us believe that the best thing is to get things done with as little labour as possible. I am not going to argue for any specific route, but I say to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) that in my opinion he could very well examine more closely the Monkman and the Pine pass routes. The survey to-day is merely a temporary one, and I think the mileage obtainable both to Peace River and to Prince Rupert justifies that survey. It means a difference, from one or two of the main points in Peace River, of 400 miles to Prince Rupert as compared with the present route.

With regard to the question of immigration there is a good deal of propaganda in Canada to-day. The suggestion is that we should have more immigrants. If you will go back to the time when we were getting a lot of immigrants, from 1900 to 1913 and 1914, you will find that we had a very strenuous record in the matter of railway construction. In 1900 we had 17,000 miles of railway and to this was added in 1901, 483 miles; and we kept on increasing our annual program of railway construction until 1914 when nearly 5,000 miles were constructed. You will find that during the years when construction was heavy immigration also was heavy. From 1914 to 1918 we had the war and practically no immigration or railway construction, but since then, in 1920, 1921, 1922 and 1923, we have constructed two hundred or three hundred miles of railway annually, and it seems to me that that is a wrong policy with a railway program. Just because we went to extremes in the years previous to 1914, if indeed that is our conclusion, is no reason why we should swing back and say we will not do anything in future, or that we will do as little as possible. If it is worth while to settle the country with new immigrants, and the vast majority of them will go where they can get free land, free land in the Peace river district is possibly more attractive to-day than anywhere on the North American continent, and it will be much more attractive when this Pacific coast outlet is constructed. I think it reasonable to say that the construction of the railway and the settlement of the country must go on together; we will not get the country settled as fast as we would like, without the railway.

We are asking to-day what is the matter with the steel industry; a report has been made to this House stating that bounties and tariffs may be necessary to save our steel industry. If you look at the railway mileage constructed in each of the years from 1919 to 1924, there can be no question that we have there at least one explanation of the difficulties of the steel industry in Canada to-day, and that is another illustration of the fact that you cannot halt a certain line of activity without the result reaching back to other industries as well. If we are going to do anything to help industry in this country it should be along the line of a reasonable development of our natural resources, because I believe that trade is better than tariffs, and business is better than bounties.

With regard to the Peace river outlet there can be no question of development; the country is there, the business will be there, and I think the project is justified from every angle.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I have a few observations to make, but I assumed that some others of those supporting the resolution desired to speak before I made any statement in regard to it. If that is not the case I am prepared to go on now for a few moments, by way of information.

I think possibly exception might be taken to the resolution itself as being of doubtful order, inasmuch as its language would commit the House to an immediate and considerable expenditure of money. I do not propose to raise that question, which might be debatable; I do not assert that it is definitely out of order, but the point is at least questionable. The reason I do not desire to raise the point of order is that I think it desirable that an hon. member elected from a constituency so peculiarly situated as is the constituency of Peace River, should have full opportunity to place before his colleagues in parliament the situation of his people with respect to railway transportation.

My hon. friend quoted at some length the statements of various political leaders with regard to the question of an outlet westward for the people of Peace river. The question as I understand it is not so much one of bringing railway facilities nearer to settlers, but is rather a question of securing access to the Pacific coast on a shorter mileage than now exists on the railroad already in existence. It is not by any means the ordinary branch line question; that is usually a question of getting railway facilities of some kind within reasonable reach of the people in the district concerned. This problem, I repeat, is one of giving access to the western coast of this country to people who are in a large measure now served by railroad facilities, but which run, so far as they are concerned, in the wrong direction.

My hon. friend referred to certain statements made by the right hon. Prime Minister in 1924, and I think in fairness he might have gone on to say that subsequently in 1924, or early in 1925, a conference was held in the office of my predecessor, the Right Hon. George P. Graham, at which were present not only representatives from the district in question but also Sir Henry Thornton, president of the Canadian National Railways; Mr. Beatty, president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the then Prime Minister of Alberta, a gentleman of the same political faith as my hon. friend. The purpose of the conference was to determine the best way of intelligently attacking this problem of a western outlet for the Peace river country, and I think I am correct in saying that the conference agreed upon the examination of the question by a joint body of engineers responsible both to the Canadian National Railways and to the Canadian Pacific Railway. The interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway was due to the fact that at that time they were the lessees of the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia railway, which is owned by the province of Alberta and which serves the people to whom my hon. friend has been referring. As a result of that conference a detailed examination by engineers took place, and I have here their report, which was tabled in the House last session and was available to all members. It contains a good deal of interesting information with respect to the problem now under discussion, and I know that my hon. friend was surprised at some of the facts which were developed.

Sir Henry Thornton is very enthusiastic about the future possibilities of the Peace river country. I believe in its agricultural possibilities myself; I think it will develop into one of Canada's richest agricultural areas. Its possibilities from the standpoint of quality were well set out by my hon. friend when he pointed out to the House that the winner of the world's prize for wheat and oats at Chicago in 1926 was a farmer of the Peace river area, in his own riding. The agricultural possibilities of the area are undoubtedly proven, but I think my hon. friend will also agree with me when I say that the problem is not in the main one of branch line construction to serve settlers now farming there. Only a relatively limited number of the farmers are now a long distance from existing lines of transportation, and the problem is really one of providing a more economical way to the markets of the world for those situated within reasonable distance of those existing lines of transportation. I want to qualify that by saying that, as the engineers' report demonstrates, there is undoubtedly need for some further branch line construction on the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia system in order to enable the country to fully develop, in order to assist in its settlement and encourage immigrants, but in the main the problem is one of providing a more economical outlet to the people already there and within a reasonable distance of the existing lines of railway.

Mr. CAHAN: Would the hon. gentleman give us the number of that return in order that we may identify it for further study?

Mr. DUNNING: I am sorry that the copy I have is not numbered, but I will see that my hon. friend is supplied with a copy. I spoke of Sir Henry Thornton's enthusiasm in regard to the district in question. This is an extract from a letter which he wrote me under date of December 20, 1926, regarding this matter:

> You are aware that a couple of years ago I made a trip through the Peace river country and came back much enthused with respect to its productivity and the desirability of providing a more suitable outlet. After some discussion the engineers of the Canadian Pacific and our own railway made a joint report, dated February 26, 1925, and this report is on file in the archives of the department. The conclusions were disappointing, at least to me, as the amount of money involved far exceeded that which the traffic would justify.
> Under the present arrangement, as you know the province of Alberta is operating the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia railway in conformity with the traffic arrangement with the Canadian National railways. I think that for the time being this provides all of the transportation facilities which may be required, and you will note that such reductions in freight rates have been made as would seem to serve the immediate necessities of the Peace river country. In view of the large amount of money involved, I think we should allow the present arrangement to run for three years and see how it works out.

I do not want to weary the House with details in regard to the engineers' report on the project, but in reviewing it we should bear in mind what the motive of the people now living along the line of the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia railway is. Why do they want a western outlet? My hon. friend says that they want a western outlet because it would be some 400 miles shorter. That is, I think, correct. By at least one of the routes proposed some 400 miles are apparently saved in the distance to the Pacific coast as compared with the distance via Edmonton. The hope of every one concerned undoubtedly was that this saving of 400 miles in distance would result in an economy to the people now farming, now doing business in the area referred to. To put the matter briefly, they want the western outlet because they think they could thereby get products to market more cheaply than they can at the present time. They do not want it for any other reason. I think my hon. friend will agree with me in that. The report of the engineers in that regard is somewhat disquieting. I quote now from the engineers' report on page 23, not desiring to weary the House with details, but rather to give conclusions. Summarizing, the engineers say:

> The studies show conclusively that for a long time to come the most economical route is, not by a western outlet, but via Edmonton over existing lines of railway This statement cannot be questioned for the reason that the excess interest charges on the initial investment in the most economical of the proposed routes is over ten times the extra cost of hauling the assumed initial traffic via Edmonton. In the case of the Obed route and the Edmonton and Canadian National railways to Vancouver, the figures are:
> Extra interest charges, $548,200 per annum.
> Extra cost of operation, $40,683 per annum.

I know my hon. friend will say that if the western outlet were built, the Peace river country would rapidly fill up and therefore would develop a greater density of traffic and a greater economy in operation. But I may say that the engineers, in calculating their initial assumed traffic, take a much larger volume of traffic than has hitherto come off the lands in question. Am I wrong?

Mr. KENNEDY: The report says that but it is wrong.

Mr. DUNNING: I am merely quoting from the report. Taking the quotation to which I have just referred, namely:

> That for a long time to come the most economical route is, not by a western outlet, but via Edmonton over existing lines of railway—

That is, to the Pacific coast.

> This statement cannot be questioned for the reason that the excess interest charges on the initial investment in the most economical of the proposed routes is over ten times the extra cost of hauling the assumed initial traffic via Edmonton.

Mr. CAHAN: Would the hon. gentleman explain that statement, make it a little more intelligible to us?

Mr. DUNNING: Does it not speak for itself? I gave the figures. The extra interest charges involved in the cheapest of the routes discussed are $548,200. The extra cost of hauling the assumed initial traffic via Edmonton is only $40,683 per annum. That is the statement of the engineers contained in their very complete examination of the question.

Mr. CAHAN: Does that amount of $40,683 per annum refer to the cost of carrying out the farm products from the Peace river valley at the present time, or does it represent the assumed cost over the shorter route if built?

Mr. DUNNING: It represents the extra cost of operation involved in hauling via Edmonton over the existing route as compared with the cost of operation alone over the most economical of the proposed alternative routes.

Mr. CAHAN: I understand now.

Mr. DUNNING: With regard to the question generally, one could go into a great deal of further detail on the basis of the engineers' report. The men responsible for it were reputable men. Mr. Sullivan was consulting engineer for the Canadian Pacific in connection with the matter. Mr. Gzowski, chief engineer of the construction department of the Canadian National also signs the report. The others are Mr. Fairbairn, chief engineer of the Canadian Pacific, Mr. James, assistant chief engineer of the Canadian Pacific, and Mr. Hill who was the exploration and locating engineer of the Canadian National.

Mr. CLARK: Did all of these gentlemen or any of them personally visit and go over these proposed routes?

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot say that they all personally went over the proposed routes. I know Mr. Hill did. He did the exploration work. Perhaps the hon. member for Peace River could help me on that question. It is my impression that all of the gentlemen concerned were up there.

Mr. KENNEDY: Yes, they were.

Mr. STEVENS: They all signed the report?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. I think the report would repay study by any member of the House interested in transportation problems. It may be said that the engineers are wrong, but I must say that after an examination and testing of the figures which they give in their report and asking the permanent officers of the department and officers of the railway for criticism of various phases of them, I find that those figures have so far been proven up to the hilt. I have had no criticism of the accuracy of the engineers' report. In that connection may I say that it was tabled in this House last March or April. I just forget the month, and no question has ever been raised so far as I am aware as to the accuracy of the engineers' conclusions in that regard?

Mr. CAHAN: Would it not be advisable to have a report such as that circulated or distributed? At times reports laid on the table of the House do not attract much attention, but certainly the development of the Peace river country has attracted the attention of the whole Dominion, and it is well that we should be accurately informed with respect to the several proposals.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not know to what extent the newspapers took advantage of the opportunity to print the conclusions of this report. The report is available, of course, in the same manner as any other document. Personally I would favour the printing of this report for distribution in the area affected, for the reason that the Peace river people would not be any better off with a western outlet unless it saved them money in freight rates.

Mr. BROWN: Would the minister deal with that question just a little more in detail, comparing the rates they pay now with what they would pay over the proposed new route. I understand that there was some arrangement made whereby they got some benefit.

Mr. DUNNING: They have now the prairie standard of rates. The reduction took place, I think, two years ago. My hon. friend from Peace River well knows the time at which it occurred; I am not so accurately informed as to that, and I do not know that I could in a moment find in the report the detailed information which my hon. friend from Lisgar desires, but I can give what is really the crux of the matter, and that is the cost of constructing any of these outlets. It is the capital cost of construction which involves the increased interest charge, and that would involve an increased cost at the present time on the volume of traffic available.

Mr. BROWN: If my understanding is correct, there was an arrangement whereby the settlers, instead of paying on a mileage basis, were given some reduction in rates as compared with the rates that would be necessary over the longer haul. I had the impression that there was some such arrangement as that.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, there is. I have not the details of it before me, but I shall be glad to get them.

Mr. FORKE: I think they are allowed a rate that would be about the same as if they had the shorter haul; that is to say, as if it had been reduced four hundred miles. They had about the same rate via Edmonton as they would have over the shorter haul.

Mr. BLATCHFORD: I think you will find that the Peace river farmers were paying freight rates on the Rocky mountain scale until two years ago, when the prairie scale came into effect.

Mr. DUNNING: That is right, but when my hon. friend from Lisgar asks me just how many cents a hundred the difference was, I regret that I have not that information at hand, but the hon. member for Peace River well knows the nature of the reduction, and after all, is not the question one of principle? If the report of the engineers is correct, that the people now living in the Peace river country, along the line of the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia railway, would not get lower freight rates by reason of a western outlet being built, then they would certainly not be realizing their expectations, because they want the western outlet in the hope that it would mean reduced freight rates for them.

Mr. CAHAN: What was the estimated capital cost of the construction of this new western outlet?

Mr. DUNNING: I will pass to that immediately.

Mr. KENNEDY: Does not that involve an entirely new principle in the fixing of freight rates?

Mr. DUNNING: I did not get the question.

Mr. KENNEDY: The railway commission fix rates partly on a mileage basis, and if, when you build a new railway from the Peace river country to the Pacific coast you are going to saddle the local traffic with the capital cost of that railway, I say you are introducing an entirely new principle in the fixing of freight rates.

Mr. DUNNING: I am not setting up any principle, but it is my duty as Minister of Railways to point out that if these people get lower freight rates as the result of the building of a western outlet, it will be at the expense of this country as a whole, because the western outlet, as proposed, could not on the present volume of traffic begin to earn the interest on the capital cost in addition to the cost of operation.

Mr. CLARK: Has not that been the result, for a period of time, at least, in the case of each new piece of railway that has been built in Canada?

Mr. DUNNING: It may be true with respect to certain new pieces of railway that have been built in Canada, but it must be remembered that this is a special problem, entirely distinct in its nature from the ordinary branch line problem. The country is now mainly served. The question is the building of a westward link through a portion of country which will be mainly unproductive, according to the engineers' report, and again I must fall back on that.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the minister permit a question?

Mr. DUNNING: I really cannot deal with a complicated subject like this and take every interruption. However, as my hon. friend is so courteous and has not questioned me before, I shall be glad to allow a question.

Mr. STEVENS: Go ahead. I will speak in a minute.

Mr. DUNNING: Come on.

Mr. STEVENS: No, go ahead.

Mr. HOCKEN: If my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre is not going to take advantage of this opportunity, do I understand that by the building of this new line to the coast we would then have three lines of railway going to the coast from that district? We have now the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National; is there another one to go through?

Mr. DUNNING: No, not necessarily, and even if there were, I would like to assure my hon. friend that there is an awful lot of room out in that country. The question at issue between myself and the hon. member for Peace River is not whether or not this line should be built, but his resolution declares that it should be built immediately, forthwith, right away quick. That is my difficulty. If it were in order for every member who desires branch line railway construction to come into this House and move a resolution that a certain line of railway should be built forthwith, I can well imagine that this House would spend a very great deal of its time debating such resolutions, and I am afraid we would not be able to work out the destinies of the Canadian National along business lines if that were done.

The whole question is one of the time at which this work should be done. On the basis of this report, which is the only authentic information of a responsible character in existence regarding the whole matter, I cannot as Minister of Railways say to the House that we ought to agree to proceed immediately with the building of this route. Now what will it cost, according to the engineers?

For the route via Sturgeon lake and Obed, new construction of 204 miles would be required for the assumed minimum traffic. The capital investment would be $13,336,000, or to Prince Rupert $13,356,000.

For the route via Monkman pass, the new construction required, assuming the line goes to Prince Rupert, would be 188 miles for the assumed minimum traffic. Assuming the line goes to Vancouver, the construction required would be 198 miles, and assuming it goes via the Pacific and Great Eastern, which is British Columbia's railway, 310 miles of new construction would be required.

The capital investment on the Monkman pass route, taking Prince Rupert as the destination, the shortest route, would be $16,092,000. The capital investment on the Peace pass route would be $21,472,000.

An hon. MEMBER: How many miles?

Mr. DUNNING: New construction via the Canadian National to Prince Rupert would require 502 miles. New construction via Canadian National to Vancouver would require 512 miles, new construction via Pacific and Great Eastern to Vancouver 542 miles, and new construction via the Fraser river to Vancouver 850 miles. That is via the Peace pass. The Pine pass is dismissed in favour of the Monkman route by the engineers.

Then another interesting alternative is discussed on page 10, the route to Stewart on the Portland canal. Instead of going to either Prince Rupert or Vancouver, the possibility of going to Stewart on the Portland canal, via the Findlay Forks is dealt with, and the minimum construction for assumed initial traffic in that case would be 611 miles, and the capital invested $30,370,000, or including the connecting line to Prince George, $37,750,000.

Mr. CLARK: Which is the Brule cutoff?

Mr. DUNNING: That is the one which is described in the report of the Obed route. It is the cheapest of the three and would involve a capital cost of $13,336,000.

Mr. CLARK: Are the grades good on that route?

Mr. DUNNING: The gradient against outbound traffic would be 0.5 per cent.

Mr. CLARK: It is a very low grade.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, a very low grade.

Mr. TOLMIE: The lowest grade is on the Monkman route.

Mr. DUNNING: The gradient against outbound traffic to Prince Rupert is 0.5 per cent.

Mr. TOLMIE: Is there any choice between the different routes as regards the fertility of the land?

Mr. DUNNING: What is known as the cutoff via Brule would not give us an outlet to the ports of British Columbia. It is almost due south of the existing end of steel on the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia line.

Mr. CLARK: Could it not be extended into it?

Mr. DUNNING: That is always a possibility. As to the relative merits of the various routes, I think the only difference of opinion to-day would be as between the Obed route, known as the Brule cutoff and the Monkman pass route. I think my hon. friend will agree that they are possibly the only two alternatives that should be considered, the one involving a gradient of 0.5 per cent and the other a gradient of 0.75 per cent to Vancouver via Canadian National. The Monkman pass route would involve a one per cent grade if the Pacific and Great Eastern and the Canadian Pacific railway were used.

I give this information not with a view of demonstrating that such a cutoff should never be built, but with a view of demonstrating on the basis of the report which we have, that it should not be immediately proceeded with, as my hon. friend's resolution calls for. I hope that in presenting proposals for capital expenditure on new lines of railway I will always have the support of the recommendation of the president and the officers of the Canadian National Railways. It has been the practice in the past, I think before my time, when branch railway bills are brought into the House, that they are referred to the committee of the House dealing with railways and canals, in order that officers of the railway may be called before that committee and justify on economic grounds the proposals for construction which they make. That plan I hope the House will follow this year with respect to a new three-year program of construction for Canadian National lines.

I hope my hon. friend will not press this resolution to a vote of the House. In any event it ought to be carefully examined, in the same manner as ordinary branch lines proposals are examined because it involves a tremendous expenditure.

May I suggest also that there is no more enthusiastic individual so far as the future of the Canadian National Railways in the Peace river country is concerned, than the president of the Canadian National Railways. I am sure that when Sir Henry Thornton deems it an economic possibility, a practical thing, to build this connecting line westbound rather than to haul the traffic round by Edmonton to get to the Pacific coast, he will recommend to the Minister of Railways that the work be proceeded with. The best evidence of his good will and the good will of the government in that regard is the fact that such a careful examination was ordered as resulted in the report which I have been discussing and to which my hon. friend referred. If my hon. friend divides the House on the resolution it will be with very great reluctance that I will vote against it. I shall have to do so however, because it calls for an immediate start to be made, an immediate commitment of this House to an expenditure of $13,000,000 odd as a minimum on the basis of a proposal which, on the best advice we have been able to get, will not bring the relief in lower freight rates that the people affected expect to get as a result of it.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): I had not intended to say anything in regard to this motion, but some of the arguments of my hon. friend the minister lead me to say a few words. I think the House ought to notice this rather significant fact, that practically every argument advanced by the minister, as well as by the engineers in the report which he quoted, is based upon the words "initial traffic". That is the traffic that is there now. Every comparison that is made as regards loss or gain one way or the other is based upon figures of present traffic. I want to point that out at this stage because I think it very vitally affects the whole question.

Mr. DUNNING: I am hardly fair to the report in not stating to the House that the report goes on and assumes traffic development, and deals with what the situation would be in the event of further development taking place.

Mr. STEVENS: I am rather sorry, because that was the question I tried to ask the minister when he said he did not like to be interrupted when expounding an interesting question. My hon. friend from Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) is asking the House to declare that the time has arrived for the commencement forthwith and the completion in the near future of a direct railway outlet from the Peace river country to the Pacific coast. The minister complains bitterly about the word "forthwith".

Mr. DUNNING: Not bitterly.

Mr. STEVENS: No, but strenuously.

Mr. DUNNING: He does not complain at all.

Mr. STEVENS: He emphasized that more vigorously than I think he should have done. I should like to remind the minister and the government that this very word was attached to their estimate for the completion of the Hudson Bay railway—"forthwith". I should like also to remind the minister in particular and his colleagues generally from the prairie provinces that they won their election in Saskatchewan very largely on that word "forthwith" attached to the estimates for the Hudson Bay railway.

Furthermore, they pledged themselves to the completion of the Hudson Bay railway forthwith without all this engineering investigation. Having pledged themselves forthwith to complete that railway they are now sending air corps to three points on the Hudson straits, and they are also bringing from England an engineer to make investigations to ascertain whether it is wise to go on with the railway.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend's statement is entirely incorrect.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Speaker, I should like the minister to point out wherein I am misinforming the House.

Mr. DUNNING: No investigation is being conducted by the government into the advisability of completing the Hudson Bay railway, not the slightest.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister, I notice, is very fond of interrupting. I have just mentioned this in a casual way; let me make it a little clearer for his benefit. I want my hon. friends from Saskatchewan to pay attention to this. Next summer the government are establishing three aerial posts on the Hudson straits with the purpose for one year, from next August over until August of 1928, of carrying on investigations by aircraft as to the navigability of the straits. They are also bringing out from England an engineer to determine whether Fort Churchill or Port Nelson is the better place as the terminus of the line. Now the minister tells us that that has nothing to do with the forthwith completion of the Hudson Bay railway. It does not matter whether the straits are navigable or not, it does not matter whether the engineer from England reports in favour of Fort Churchill or Port Nelson, they are going to finish the road forthwith.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Speaker, in all good humour I must again protest against my hon. friend's statements regarding the government's intentions. They are entirely wrong. No announcement such as that quoted by my hon. friend has ever been made by the government.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister tell this House that there has not been considered by the government the establishment of three aerial posts on Hudson straits, and that no orders have been given to that effect?

Mr. DUNNING: I shall not make any denial.

Mr. STEVENS: No, the minister cannot, because those orders have been given.

Mr. DUNNING: Will my hon. friend permit me? There will of course be a proper time to discuss the Hudson Bay railway and the Hudson Bay route, but I submit that it is not on this resolution, which deals directly with the Peace River and an outlet to the Pacific coast. A great many miles lie between the two points. But I might point out to my hon. friend that what the government has in contemplation on the Hudson straits has not anything at all to do with the completion of the Hudson Bay railway. The Hudson Bay railway will be completed anyway.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister a moment ago sought to lead the House to believe that I was not telling the truth when I said these posts were being established.

Mr. DUNNING: No, no.

Mr. STEVENS: Now he admits they are. He dare not deny it—nor does any other minister dare deny it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must ask hon. gentlemen to confine their remarks to the Peace River.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Speaker, you have very properly drawn our attention to the subject matter of this discussion. But I should like you, Sir, who are a master in debate, to appreciate this point: I am using the ministerial word "forthwith" to illustrate that there cannot be much credence placed in the minister's argument to-day and his objection to that word.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that the hon. member is not only drawing an analogy between the two railways; he is travelling too far on the Hudson Bay railway whilst the resolution has reference only to the Peace River railway.

Mr. STEVENS: Exactly, Mr. Speaker, and I am fortunate in having such a judge of my words and my intentions. My hon. friend, however, sought to make this a sort of contest between the movement of grain eastward and westward. I regret that, because after all it is a controversial question, and I submit, Sir, that it is not a question that should be debated on that ground, as I hope to show before I conclude.

The whole question is that Canada some fifteen years ago opened up the Peace river country; it invited settlers to come into that country; it offered to the prospective settlers excellent prospects of transportation to the seaboard for their products. A large number of men responded and, as my hon. friend says, some 20,000 settled in that district. It is admitted by all who know the district to be one of the finest agricultural areas in Canada. It is often referred to as an empire within an empire. It is recognized that those 20,000 settlers form but a nucleus of the population that may be placed there if a proper outlet is given for their products. Up until two years ago so high was the cost of transportation of moving those products out via Fort William to the markets of the world that many settlers left the country, while others frequently kept their grain and fed it to stock. Those are facts.

It is very easy for the minister to say, as he does say, that comparatively few of the settlers are remote from existing transportation. To anyone not understanding the existing transportation situation that might be a very satisfactory statement; but that is mighty poor comfort to the settler, because undoubtedly that great settlement in the Peace river country was brought about by the expectation of the settlers that they would get facilities for taking out their products to make it possible for them to live and prosper. To simply say to those people, "Oh, you are now within measurable distance of existing transportation," is, I repeat, cold comfort indeed. The minister also said—again I am using his own words—that the district was now well served with railways. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the district is not well served with railways. In support of this I direct the attention of the House to a statement made by Sir Henry Thornton, which was read a moment ago by the minister, namely, that a more suitable outlet ought to be found. The district is not well served with railways. A certain section of the district, it is true, has railway contact, but to say that it is well served with railways is misleading.

Mr. DUNNING: That statement by the way, Mr. Speaker, I did not make. My hon. friend from Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) was looking at me when I made the statement that there were certain branch line requirements in addition to the western outlet, but not very many.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend used those very words. He conceded that certain branch lines were needed.

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Mr. STEVENS: And he pointed out that a very limited number of settlers were remote from existing transportation.

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Mr. STEVENS: Now, Mr. Speaker, let me take the argument the minister advances and upon which he lays great emphasis. He said that the increased interest cost would exceed the initial saving on the present volume of traffic, to use his own words. That is an utterly unfair comparison to make. Through the discouragement of ten or fifteen years of excessive cost for the bringing out of their produce, many settlers are producing only to a very limited extent as compared with the quantity they could turn out. Many of them are living there in the hope of future development through an outlet to the Pacific, so that they may get their produce satisfactorily marketed. If this can be brought about they will produce in larger quantities. Others are taking advantage of the comparatively high price of grain—and when I say that I mean compared to what was received years ago—running about $1.38 at Winnipeg to-day, or at any rate over $1.25 a bushel. They are able to ship their grain out, even paying the excessive cost of transportation to the head of the lakes, and notwithstanding that cost they can make a small margin of profit. But if grain goes down to a dollar a bushel, even those who are located near the best transportation facilities will find it difficult indeed to send their grain out and secure any return. So that the comparison which the minister makes, based upon the report, and which I am really surprised that engineers of such standing should submit in regard to the saving between the increased interest charges on capital investment and the calculation based upon the present volume of traffic, is wholly false. The only reason in the world why we would ask for the completion of the road lies in the hope of having an increased traffic. No one in his senses would suggest building the road in there at a cost of thirteen million dollars to serve the present volume of traffic, for that is an absurd position to take. I say it is absurd for these engineers to take that position.

Mr. DUNNING: They do not.

Mr. STEVENS: That is the way the minister presented the matter.

Mr. DUNNING: No. The words used by the engineers are "assumed initial traffic." If my hon. friend will permit me I will give him the engineers' words; I will tell him what the engineers take as their basis for the term "assumed initial traffic."

Mr. STEVENS: It is exactly what I am saying—the assumed initial traffic. I will take my hon. friend's own words.

Mr. DUNNING: If the hon. member will let me inform him he will not fall into error.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend would not allow me to interrupt him, or even to ask him a question.

Mr. DUNNING: If I owe the hon. member an apology I offer it now. I know, however, that he wants his statement to be fair to the engineers. The engineers say:

> We have therefore for our studies assumed an initial outgoing traffic to the Pacific seaboard about five times as large as that indicated in the previous table, showing shipments during five years ending with the crop of 1923.

That is to say, in dealing with the assumed initial traffic they are taking a tonnage five times larger than the average of the five years ending in 1923. I merely want my hon. friend to have correct information.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister says that the assumed initial traffic is based upon a tonnage five times greater than the average of the five years up to 1923.

Mr. DUNNING: That is what the report says.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, that is what the minister bases his argument upon. Now, if I am not greatly mistaken—I have not had time to look into the question—more wheat went out in 1926 than in the preceding years. In 1926, six million bushels were shipped out whereas the amount that went out in the previous years was very much less.

Mr. DUNNING: That is true.

Mr. STEVENS: I still submit that the basis of the minister's argument is absurd. Notwithstanding all the handicaps of the last ten or fifteen years—not of the last two years, because they have been less serious in that time—20,000 settlers have stuck to their guns. They have tried to make things go, to increase production, and tens of thousands more are ready to go into that country if it is given such transportation facilities as nature affords it. That is the point I make, and to base the whole argument of a report, which is supposed to be accurate, upon an assumption of a tonnage five times greater than the average of five years that were very much leaner than the present, is absurd.

It appeals to me that the proposition narrows itself down to this: you have a magnificent country ready for settlement, a country that is well developed, and known to the world, known I think all over the globe as the choicest section of the North American continent, where good land can be had cheaply from one of the last remaining large areas. And in that section there is already a settlement of 20,000 people. All that is required to make that area accessible to the markets of the world is the construction of a few hundred miles of railway at a cost of $13,000,000. That construction would accomplish two things: it would give to these 20,000 settlers, who went there on guarantees of the service, something to which they are entitled, namely, access to the markets of the world. And in the second place, it would do something greater for Canada, for it would open up a virgin territory which is exceedingly attractive and which offers opportunities for great returns.

Now I urge the minister and the government to give this matter their consideration. I am not going to compare this section with others, nor am I going to draw any comparison between this suggested work and work which is authorized, or which may be authorized, elsewhere. I do say, however, that I know of no area in Canada to-day that offers greater possibilities than the Peace river country. I know of no territory that would be more readily settled by immigrants than that country, if this question were solved. I know of no territory of similar extent that can be so cheaply brought into active productivity.

I want to give one or two figures. The minister suggested to the committee that with present rates the farmers could move their products to the markets of the world as cheaply as if they had connection with the Pacific coast. This, surely, cannot be sound.

The mileage from Grande Prairie, the centre of the district, to Fort William is 1,600 miles, while the mileage to the Pacific coast, if this new connection were made, would be 800 miles, or one-half the distance. The maximum grade to the Pacific coast is one-half of one per cent, according to this report of the engineers. In other words it is really a water grade to the Pacific, being practically level. On the other hand, there are adverse grades on the prairies, going to Fort William, which are much higher. So that the question of grade does not enter into the discussion at all. The grade is A1; nothing better could be wished for; and the distance is one-half that to Fort William. Now, if you are going to haul grain 1,600 miles to Fort William—I do not care what rate you get—when you could haul it 800 miles to the other point, some one is going to pay the difference in cost between these mileages. The cost will be made up from some source. In other words, assuming that the inference drawn by the minister is correct—and, by the way, I dispute it—if these people can send their grain to Fort William as cheaply as they can to the Pacific coast, then they are getting a rate far below that given anyone else on the prairies.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is misquoting me entirely. I never discussed the question of shipping grain to Fort William but to the Pacific coast via Edmonton. I made no comparisons based on shipments to Fort William.

Mr. STEVENS: To the Pacific coast via Edmonton, then. The mileage to the Pacific coast via Edmonton is 1,200 and the minister says that they will haul grain from the Peace river country 1,200 miles as cheaply as they would be able to get it out if this connection were made giving a haul of 800 miles.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not say that either.

Mr. STEVENS: I am narrowing the minister down to this fact, which he should have stated, that there would be a distinct saving to these settlers if they had this cut-off. The minister sought to leave the impression with the House that there would be no saving; I leave it to the House if that is not so. He did not say it in so many words, but when I rose to put the straight question he would not let me speak, saying that he was making an intricate argument and did not wish to be interrupted. I say now that there would be a distinct saving to the settlers of the Peace river country if this connection were made, and there would also be such an impetus given immigration that it would mark an epoch in this country.

Now I am going to make a suggestion to the House and to the mover of this resolution, which I urge the minister to receive kindly. I make this suggestion on my own responsibility; I have not consulted my leader, whom perhaps I should have asked, but nevertheless this is my view. It is a simple suggestion, which I hope will be found acceptable. We have a committee of this House which is appointed year by year to deal with the problems of the Canadian National railways; to this committee are usually referred the railway estimates and other similar matters. I consider this matter to be of such great importance and to affect the lives of thousands of people so seriously, as well as to offer such magnificent opportunities, that it should be directly referred to this committee with instructions to inquire carefully into it and to examine the reports which have been presented, as well as the engineers themselves if necessary. Then the committee could bring into this House some recommendation dealing with the question. I think this is a reasonable suggestion, and one which should be accepted. A moment ago the minister stated that if this came to a vote he would have to vote against it, and of course in saying that he asked all his supporters to do the same.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not want to see the House reject this motion; I would not like to see it voted down, because in a sense it would be a repudiation of a suggestion which I think merits more consideration than that. By sending this matter to a committee, which I think should be called together very soon, an opportunity would be given those interested to present their case, and at least that degree of consideration would be given.

Mr. JAMES C. BRADY (Skeena): Before I deal with the subject under discussion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to dissociate from it the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning). I believe he has given us not his own opinion but what information he has obtained from a report made to him.

Having done this, I would like to enumerate the various reasons advanced from the report, why the development of the Peace river district should not be commenced immediately. I think these reasons were very well emphasized, and are thoroughly understood even by those not directly interested. It was said that the president and engineers of the Canadian National Railways did not deem it an economic possibility; that it would not lower the present rates; that it would cost about $13,000,000, and that the present volume of traffic does not permit the development of this district. I would like to ask the House if any one of these reasons has sufficient weight to prevent this necessary development of the greatest agricultural area in Canada. Without going into figures, Mr. Speaker, I think I could give four or five reasons which would make the government consider the necessity of immediately dealing with this question.

The Peace River development is not a local matter; it has a national importance, because it would almost double the present area under grain in Canada. Then it would also assist the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) in overcoming the many handicaps in the way of an up to date immigration scheme, which is practically essential. This development is necessary to the interests of the Canadian National Railways, as well, because, it would add to the present volume of trade running over this road to the Pacific coast, and is a sufficient warranty for this work. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) said something with which I quite agree and which I think everyone appreciated, when he asked, "Should we start with immigration first, put the people on the land and wait till they make good, or should we at the same time give those people opportunities to develop their land more quickly and bring returns to the railways?"

I do not intend to speak further on this matter, Mr. Speaker, but there is one other reason which I think the government should consider carefully. In Prince Rupert we have an elevator which in the last four months has handled a little over 2,750,000 bushels of grain from Alberta; now that the elevator is there it must stay there, and it is the duty of the government to see that this elevator is able to continue to function.

It is the imperative task and duty of the government to develop the western part of the Peace river district which, by every proof that can be and has been advanced, has been shown to be the most productive agricultural area in Canada. I have therefore great pleasure in supporting the resolution of the hon. member for Peace River, and I do so, not merely on behalf of the incoming immigrants, not merely because of an extra six million bushels of wheat that may come, but on behalf of the development of Canada and the natural resources which are there ready for the settler if he be given but a chance. In the development of the Peace river country we have an opportunity of great moment. If we make an investment of $13,000,000, in a few years we shall be rewarded beyond our most sanguine expectations. This is not a party question but it is a question that strikes deep at the root of the future development, growth and prosperity of Canada as a whole.

Mr. J. A. FRASER (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I am very much disappointed at the report that these eminent engineers have given in relation to the railway problem of developing the Peace river country. I also notice that very little attention has been paid to a certain project that we have in British Columbia, namely, the Pacific Great Eastern railway. Mention has been made of the Edmonton and Dunvegan railway, but very little has been said of the Pacific Great Eastern railway. Let me remind the House that when these two railways were undertaken, the Pacific Great Eastern by the province of British Columbia and the Edmonton and Dunvegan by the province of Alberta, they were to connect at the boundary between these two provinces, forming a continuous line of transportation from the Peace river country to the Pacific as well as from the Peace river country to Edmonton. Both of these projects unfortunately have fallen short of their destination and they both remain at the present time up in the air.

I might say a word or two in regard to the early history of that part of the country. The province of British Columbia was opened up in the first place by way of the Peace river pass, the very pass to which all these railroads are pointing at the present time. The elevation of the Peace river pass is 2,500 feet, not a very great elevation, in fact the lowest point there is in the Rocky mountains on the North American continent. It seems to me surprising that these eminent engineers, with only that elevation to overcome, have not directed the attention of the people of Canada to the Peace river pass. The Peace river passes through the Rocky mountains at Hudson Hope. That is the eastern breaking of the Peace river canyon. You go up the Peace river and then you follow up the Parsnip river until you come to Summit lake. From that point you have only seven miles of a portage in order to reach the Fraser river. The elevation at that point is 2,500 feet. With all deference to the eminent engineers I believe the Peace river country should properly be opened up by the easiest natural route, which is the Peace river and the Fraser river, the following of each of those water courses from the coast to the Peace river country

The Peace river country is an immense country, probably 400 miles long on each side of the river by 100 miles in width, and it is capable of vast development. Indeed, as has been pointed out here to-day, it is easily conceivable that it might double the production of grain in the Dominion of Canada. That being so, surely the idea of spending $13,000,000 is not going to stop the development of a country of that kind. What is the matter with the people of the Dominion of Canada? What is the matter with this government of the Dominion? Is that the spirit in which the Canadian Pacific undertook to open up the prairies of the west. We have a question of spending only $13,000,000 to complete this project and still the government says: Oh, it is too much.

On the other hand what do we find? The other day we were asked to vote $12,000,000 for the port of Montreal and in another case we were asked to vote $14,000,000 for work on the Welland canal. It is conceded as a matter of fact that the opening of the Welland canal is not going to cheapen the transportation of grain to the port of Montreal by a fraction of a cent per bushel. Still we are spending $15,000,000 a year and we have already spent some $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 on it. But when we have a question of opening up an outlet for this great empire in the western part of the country we cannot do anything with it. With all deference to everyone's opinion I believe there is no question that the Peace river development not only in Alberta, but also the development that will follow in British Columbia, will more than warrant any expenditure that is necessary to complete a project of that kind.

The Peace river development is not a very new matter so far as I am concerned. In the year 1891 I went to the town of Quesnel which is on the Fraser river some ninety miles south of Prince George. I went into commercial business in that town, and in the course of my business there at that date, before the completion of the Calgary and Edmonton railway, I sold goods, I loaded goods on scows in the town of Quesnel and had them transported into the Peace river country in order to provide that country with necessaries of life. They would go in in the fall and come out again the following spring with furs in return for the goods which they had brought in. Does that not point to the fact that the Fraser river and Peace river route affords a natural access to the Peace river country?

I might say a good deal more in connection with this matter, but the principal thing I have to say is to express my disappointment not only with the action of the government, but also with the report of the engineers. My own personal opinion is that that report is not of very much value, and that the subject has not been studied from as many angles as possible. For instance, I understood from the Minister of Railways that the Pine river pass route had been thrown to one side entirely, discarded as impossible and impracticable. If I am not right, the minister will correct me.

Mr. DUNNING: That is scarcely a correct quotation from the engineers' report. They discarded that route because of the manifest advantages, comparatively speaking, of the Monkman pass route.

Mr. FRASER: It is the Pine pass route I am speaking of.

Mr. DUNNING: That was not discarded because it was quite impracticable. According to the engineers, the Monkman route is so much superior, and so nearby, that it was not necessary to go into detail in the report on the Pine pass route.

Mr. FRASER: The minister was speaking of the Monkman pass route, and he gave us no estimate of the Pine pass route at all. Might I ask if there is an estimate of the cost of that route in the report?

Mr. DUNNING: I shall be very glad to read what the report says in regard to the matter. It says:

> The only advantage which the Pine pass route has over the Peace pass route is that it would be shorter for traffic originating south of the Peace river. There is no feasible crossing of the Peace river between Peace river crossing and the Canyon at Hudson Hope.

Mr. FRASER: That is correct.

Mr. DUNNING: It continues:

> —and on account of the high country between the latter point and the Pine pass, the line would have to return east for a considerable distance on the south side of the river before the ground becomes low enough between it and the Pine river to allow of a feasible line south to the Pine river valley. The recently discovered Monkman pass is in turn more advantageous than the Pine pass for this traffic on account of its lesser gradients and distance. Pine pass is approximately 175 miles from, and nearly due west of Spirit river, and approximately 155 miles nearly due north of Prince George.

They do not give any estimated costs of the Pine pass route, for the reasons there stated, but the Peace pass is fully dealt with and I can give my hon. friend the figures if he desires them.

Mr. FRASER: They considered that it would be a great deal more expensive than the Monkman pass route.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, $21,000,000 for the initial development as against $13,000,000.

Mr. FRASER: Nothwithstanding the comparatively larger cost, when you consider this question from the point of view of the province of British Columbia, and British Columbia must be taken into consideration as well, because you come very close to a section of British Columbia which is very highly mineralized—let me interject just here the prophecy that if the proper railway development is given to that part of the country you may see in the Omineca district another development such as we have in Trail today; that is quite within the realms of possibility; indeed, it is very probable—I say that that section of the country should be connected up with the Pacific coast. I know perfectly well from travelling through the Peace river country both in Alberta and British Columbia that that is the objective of every person in the Peace river country. They say that they went in there with the promise of a railway outlet in a very short time.

Mr. MILLAR: Which route do the majority of the settlers now in the Peace river country favour?

Mr. FRASER: So far as the settlers in any part of the Peace river country are concerned, they favour no particular route. What they want is connection with the Pacific coast, and they leave to the proper authorities the selection of the most feasible route.

Again, take the railway which was started by the province of British Columbia, the Pacific and Great Eastern. Some people call it British Columbia's white elephant; in fact, that is what our own government out there calls it, but let me tell the people here that so far as I am concerned the Pacific and Great Eastern is no white elephant at all. What is troubling British Columbia at the present time is the white elephant of a government that we have there, and if we could only get rid of our white elephant government we might have reasonable railway development.

I have had much pleasure in listening to the debate on this question this afternoon. I think the suggestion of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) is a very good one. I know perfectly well that so far as I am concerned this is a question that has not been examined as thoroughly as it should have been, and it has not received the consideration to which it is entitled, nor have the people of the Peace river country received the consideration to which they are entitled. I therefore think that the suggestion of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre is a very reasonable one, that this question should be referred to the special railway committee. In conclusion, I must say that I have very much pleasure in supporting the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) in any effort he may make for the opening up of that territory by means of a railway outlet, which has been promised so many times.

Mr. J. A. CLARK (Vancouver-Burrard): In rising to say a few words on this resolution, I may say at the outset that if the matter comes to a vote, I am prepared to support the resolution as it stands. Failing that I will support the proposal made by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens).

I am prepared to support the resolution as it stands because the report of the engineers from which the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) has quoted shows conclusively that a line of railway can be built through this territory by one or more alternative routes and at a moderate cost. Take, for instance, the Sturgeon lake and Obed route, which the minister states is approximately 200 miles, and the cost of which is approximately $13,000,000. That line can therefore be built at a cost of approximately $65,000 per mile or $35,000 per mile less than the country paid for the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific—approximately the same amount as the Canadian Northern paid for the construction of their line of railway through the province of British Columbia.

I support the resolution secondly for the reason that a railway outlet would, in the words of the Prime Minister, open up for development an empire. I note that the hon. member for Peace River, speaking before an audience in Edmonton, stated that the Prime Minister said:

> The Peace river is among the richest in Canada, but before the proper development of that country can take place an outlet to the Pacific coast is an absolute necessity.

I am in entire agreement with the statement of the Prime Minister, and for these two reasons I am prepared to support the motion of the hon. member for Peace River that this railway be built now.

It may be asked, how can you favour this course in view of the engineers' report and in view of the statements made by the hon. Minister of Railways. Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation in saying that this report from which the Minister of Railways has quoted is absolutely misleading. Rather I would put it this way: that this report is of no value from a commercial point of view. Perhaps the Minister of Railways will correct me if I am wrong in the deductions I make from the report. I observe that the report states that the average tonnage available for a period of five years, ending 1923—

Mr. DUNNING: What page?

Mr. CLARK: I am quoting from the typewritten copy, page 13. It may correspond with the report the minister has. It states that the average tonnage available is 48,934 tons, or a total of 2,043,000 bushels of grain. Now then, the minister stated that the engineers had allowed five times that amount as the initial traffic which would be available. I notice that they place the tonnage at 35,000 tons—that is at page 25—and they multiply that by five, making a total of 175,000 tons available. On page 13 the report states that the average tonnage over the period of five years up to 1923 was 48,934, or 13,934 tons greater than that allowed by the engineers. As a matter of fact, on the figures quoted by the member for Peace river, the number of bushels taken out of the Peace river in the year 1926 amounted to 6,000,000, or three times the tonnage that was available on the average of the five years quoted. That would make a tonnage of grain alone for the year 1926 of 146,000, which is almost equal to the amount which the engineers report to this House as being five times that presently available. In other words, the tonnage for this year of grain alone almost equals that which these engineers state to be five times the amount presently available.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend must bear in mind that this report was made in February of 1925.

Mr. CLARK: I appreciate that; I am giving the year and trying to show that there has been that development since.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the point.

Mr. CLARK: Which shows that the report is of little practical value to us.

Mr. STEVENS: They should make it five times that this year.

Mr. CLARK: Exactly what I am coming to. There is another respect in which this report fails—and I hope the minister will correct me if I am wrong, because I have not had an opportunity of making a careful analysis and study of it.

[Mr. Clark.]

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend was not wrong.

Mr. CLARK: I am right so far, and I have the concurrence of the minister. My next point is that I think it a well-recognized principle that there would be available approximately three hundred per cent more tonnage on all commodities carried than would be carried in grain alone.

Mr. DUNNING: Three hundred per cent?

Mr. CLARK: Yes, three times. In other words, if the railway carried a tonnage of grain of 150,000 tons, which they would carry this year, they would carry of all commodities in and out approximately 450,000 tons. I think my hon. friend from Peace River will have figures to show that that was approximately the percentage of increase carried by the railway company in all commodities.

If I am right in that respect, I want to carry my argument one step further. The figures supplied by the railway engineers allow that country a production of approximately two million bushels of grain. This year, two years after the report was made, we find an increase of three hundred per cent, despite the tremendous disadvantage that country is suffering from—three hundred per cent in two years' time. I think the House will agree with me—and in fact I think it is admitted by the Prime Minister and in all the reports—that Peace River is one of the richest grain countries in the world, and if there are over two million acres presently available for cultivation if properly tapped by the railways, that the production of wheat and other grain in that district would be not less than fifty million bushels, or twenty-five times the average tonnage estimated by these engineers two years ago in grain alone. In addition of course this government must take hold of the situation and undertake a colonization scheme, because conditions in that country warrant a colonization scheme if it is warranted in any part of Canada. I ask this government, where to-day in Canada are there lands that equal in quality the lands in the Peace river district available for colonization? Where to-day are there lands that are available at as cheap a price as the lands in that district? Where to-day has the Dominion government an area of land under its own jurisdiction which can be used for immigrants? Where else can such land be found? I think, Mr. Speaker, we can safely state that there is no other part of Canada that presents such a fertile field for immigration as does the Peace river country, and it is dependent entirely, as the Prime Minister himself said in addressing an audience in Edmonton, on an outlet to the Pacific coast, which he stated at that time was an absolute necessity.

We have this afternoon emphasized the resources of that country for grain alone, but we all know that it has immense mineral wealth and immense timber wealth, either of which might justify the building of a railway. These two subjects have not been touched upon, but they are resources which would provide a tremendous increase in the tonnage. Without, however, allowing a single ton for minerals and timber, we will find that colonized for agricultural purposes alone the country will provide a tonnage twenty-five to thirty times greater than that upon which the engineers based their estimate. That being the case there should be, when that country is colonized, a tonnage in agricultural products alone and those necessarily handled in conjunction therewith, in excess of thirteen million. In this report the engineers admit that when the tonnage equals 1,400,000 tons it will be economically unsound to haul via Edmonton over the Edmonton and Dunvegan route.

Now, it is very clear that if this country is colonized and developed to anything like its capacity there will be, based on agriculture alone, a total tonnage in the not far distant future, ten times greater than that referred to by the engineers as being sufficient to justify the building of this outlet. Just visualize, Mr. Speaker, what that railway would mean not only to the people who are there to-day, but to the development of Canada generally and to the Canadian National Railway. It is well known that no railway in this country has prospered which did not have feeders or branch lines. On the Canadian National Railway we have one stretch in excess of 700 miles which has no feeder or branch line. We come here now asking for a branch line leading into one of the richest parts of the Dominion, and the minister stands in his place and calmly says that for three years at least, based upon this report, we should not consider the building of this railway.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Speaker, again my hon. friend is misquoting me. I read Sir Henry Thornton's opinion that the existing arrangement with the Alberta government operating its own railway might very well work for the next three years. I did not express an opinion of that kind myself.

Mr. CLARK: I thought the minister was really basing his conclusions upon this report. I have not the letter of Sir Henry Thornton before me, but I feel convinced he must be basing his opinion upon this report.

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Mr. CLARK: Then that is good enough. It is perfectly clear, I think, to anyone who has made even a cursory study of the report that it is not worth the paper it is written on for the purpose of arriving at a sound conclusion as to whether or not this railway should be built. There is information in it of inestimable value, but from the point of view of whether the railway would be an economically sound project or not I feel the report is of no great value to this House.

There are several other aspects of this report that I might touch upon, but I have dealt with what I consider the fundamental feature of it. If there is any portion of Canada where additional railway construction is justified and requires immediate investigation it is in this particular part of the country. I repeat, the Prime Minister considered that to be the case three years ago when he pledged himself that as soon as it was humanly possible the great Peace river country would be given that measure of railway relief that would bring to the pioneers of that country an outlet that they had been so long denied and would open up the country for prospective settlers. What stronger pronouncement could we have? Am I to infer that the Minister of Railways disagrees with the policy announced by the Prime Minister on that occasion? It would appear so. It might be very interesting indeed to have a vote upon this resolution to see who on that side of the House are following the Prime Minister and who are following the Minister of Railways, because I do not think there could be any declarations of policy so diametrically opposed to each other than that announced by the Prime Minister at Edmonton and that which we have heard this afternoon from the Minister of Railways.

I urge upon this House, Mr. Speaker, the immediate and favourable consideration of this resolution. Failing that, I urge an immediate investigation before a committee as suggested by my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens).

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): Mr. Speaker, I confess that before hon. gentlemen had spoken I did not think there was any need for a further investigation, but the more statements I hear about the Peace river country and the proposed railways there the more I am in favour of the suggestion of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) because I think there is a great deal of misinformation abroad in this House in relation to the subject.

Let me say at once that I am extremely interested in an outlet to the coast from the Peace river country. On various occasions I have pressed this matter upon the attention of my colleagues, and I do not believe the Peace river country will ever come into its own until there is such an outlet. But the suggestion of building the outlet by Obed or a connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific railway east of the Rocky mountains is not the solution of the question. Anyone who knows the country will say so immediately. So what is the use of discussing a $13,000,000 project which gets us nowhere? That is why I say we need more information. As for the Monkman pass, practically the same thing can be said. It touches only the southwest corner of the Grande Prairie district, and would entail expensive railway building from the north side of the river, which is a huge agricultural territory that still needs railway construction. Going westward, it is admitted by everyone that you cannot cross the Peace river until you get in the vicinity of Hudson Hope. Therefore you are figuring not on 119 miles but on 150 miles more. I agree with the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Fraser) that the only feasible route, irrespective of what it costs, is by the Peace river pass. No one can deny that who knows the topography of the country and the direction in which the rivers run.

Surely the Alberta government has had experience enough in crossing the Peace river. When the estimate for the construction of the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia railway was before the Alberta legislature it stood at $7,000,000. Well, hon. gentlemen from that province know that up to date it has cost almost three times what the engineers estimated at the outset. I am not interested in any engineers' figures because they are no guarantee of what the ultimate cost may be. I am not familiar with British Columbia, but I have been greatly impressed by the reports of what may be accomplished by going ahead and opening up the coal mining area in the Portland canal district and the mining territory between the head of the Parsnip river and the Portland canal in a direct route from the coast to the Peace river country.

May I say that the building of the line merely from the boundary of British Columbia to the coast is not the solution of the problem? A great deal has been said about the possibility of putting new settlers in that country if you complete that piece of construction. If the logical route is chosen you would have to connect the two lines at Hudson Hope and build one hundred miles north of the Peace river. There is no very desirable territory to be opened up over that whole hundred miles, but there is territory in British Columbia favourable for settlement that the line would render accessible. That is, in addition to building the line from the boundary of British Columbia to the coast, no matter what route you choose—and I am all for the Peace river—you would have to build additional lines into Alberta before you could put new settlers on crown lands. So I say all these things need investigation. If you were to build a line from Peace river crossing to Fort Vermilion you would open up an immense territory of some 300 miles of virgin land which could be devoted to cultivation. But it requires a railway to open up that land. After the experience we have had with the Peace river country, however, I am not one of those to encourage new settlers to take up homesteads in such territories in the hope of having railways built to them. There should be some more definite assurance than the settlers got in the Peace river country before people are induced to take a chance and wait years for railway development to enable them to ship their produce. We know that grain can be grown in the Peace river district. The Lawrences have been established for years and have been growing and milling grain, selling it to newcomers, in a district 300 miles north of Peace river. But these territories would all have to be opened up by rail.

I welcome the suggestion that a thorough investigation of the whole matter should be made before we plunge into an expenditure of thirty or forty million dollars, for it would mean that much; although, let me add, the district is worth that expenditure. When the railway is built there will be a period of years during which it will be neither more nor less than a colonization line, and will not pay interest on the bonded indebtedness. My hon. friend has pointed to the two existing railways. The Edmonton-Dunvegan, I would remind the House, is a heavy burden on the people of Alberta who have to carry the bonded indebtedness of this line, because it has done little so far besides paying operating and maintenance expenses. The Canadian Pacific, when the new lease was suggested, offered fifty or sixty thousand dollars towards the carrying charges of the bonded indebtedness, and inasmuch as they operated the line for five years they should have been in a favourable position to estimate what the road would be worth. The line to Obed, in my opinion, will be no solution, for the reason that it simply taps one corner of the Grande Prairie country and lines would have to be built across the Peace river to connect the north country with it. More than that, it would result in a cut-up that would absolutely kill the usefulness of 300 miles of the Edmonton-Dunvegan railway, and that is not to be desired by the people of Alberta.

I think a great deal more information is required if we are to come to a wise decision on this question. I am not one of those who are prepared to stand up and say that it will cost a small sum to open up the Peace river country. I do not think it will be inexpensive. I believe that at the earliest possible moment at which there is reasonable hope of providing an outlet the road should be built, but I am not ready to suggest that it should be this year. In fairness to the House we ought to recognize that the question involves far more than the mere construction of a line from the Peace river country to the coast. It is true we have an elevator at Prince Rupert, and I am pleased to learn that such a large volume of grain has passed through it. It has warranted its construction and the whole northern portion of Alberta is now producing well and will increase in production in the future by leaps and bounds, so that all these elevators on the coast will have been justified. I would point out to my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), that during the past two or three years little or no grain has passed through any portion of northern Alberta to Fort William. It is practically all routed to the coast, and will continue to be so shipped unless an embargo is put on to prevent the shipment of grain through the elevator at Prince Rupert.

No matter how much relief we are able to give the settlers in Peace river in the transportation of their grain by way of Edmonton they will always be under a handicap until an outlet is provided, for it is not possible to obviate that 400 miles of haulage, and the settlers will always suffer disabilities in that respect. I say, therefore, that if we are to undertake this project we should do so with our eyes open, fully realizing what it will cost. Even if it takes $40,000,000, the expenditure ultimately will be warranted, but it is idle to suggest that $30,000,000 will suffice. That is entirely out of the question. And further, if we are to place any considerable number of settlers on the land there it will mean additions to already existing branch lines.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. J. H. KING (Minister of Health and Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few remarks on this very important resolution, and first I would like to commend the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) for having brought it before the House. He seemed to base his remarks on statements made at public meetings by the right hon. Prime Minister and the late Prime Minister, Mr. Meighen, when they suggested that the construction of a railway into the Peace river country, giving an outlet to the Pacific coast, should be undertaken forthwith. I do not think we should take exception to the remarks of either of these gentlemen, because we know they were aware of the importance of this matter not only to the people of the Peace river district but to those in Alberta and British Columbia, and its indirect importance to the people of Canada as a whole. Believing that, I think they were well within their province when they stated that as leaders of great parties they were prepared to do what was in their power to bring about the early construction of this railway.

I think we must also take into consideration the statement made by my colleague the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning); he was able in his address to lay before the House information secured from what might be considered the best channels available. In other words, at the conference already mentioned there were present the executives of the different railway companies, under the chairmanship of the then Minister of Railways, Right Hon. George P. Graham. In addition to Mr. Graham there were present Hon. Charles Stewart, Hon. J. H. King, Hon. John Oliver, Premier of British Columbia; Hon. H. Greenfield, Premier of Alberta; Hon. V. W. Smith, Minister of Railways and Telephones for Alberta; Sir Henry Thornton, President of the Canadian National Railways; S. J. Hungerford, Vice-President of the Canadian National Railways; C. J. Smith, executive assistant to the president of the Canadian National Railways; G. A. Bell, Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals; E. W. Beatty, President of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company; Grant Hall, Vice President of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company; D. M. Kennedy, M.P. and W. F. Maclean, M.P. The meeting was held at 2.30 o'clock on January 9, 1925, and was called at the instigation of the government then in power. It was the desire of the government at that time to try, through the medium of these railway executives, to devise a plan whereby this great section of hinterland could be served by proper railway construction, it being the hope of the government that these men, with their vast experience, could bring forth some such plan. So far as railway construction in Canada is concerned we have arrived at the stage to-day where the executives of the two great railways must take their responsibilities in advising the government on questions of importance.

At that conference it was decided that the presidents of the railways mentioned would place their engineering staffs on a basis of mutual co-operation to solve this problem. The Minister of Railways gave the House this afternoon, briefly but concisely, the information obtained in this way, which would indicate that it is not an expenditure of $13,000,000 or $20,000,000 which will solve this problem. An expenditure of $13,000,000 would give access by one route to the main line of the Canadian National railways, what is known as the old Grand Trunk Pacific, while an expenditure of $20,000,000 would give connection down through the Peace river pass to the Canadian National railways leading to Prince Rupert and Vancouver. But as I see the situation, Mr. Speaker, that merely gives an outlet to the territory which is at present adjacent to the lines of a railway already constructed, and does not deal with the larger question of a development of the Peace river country. Instead of an expenditure of $13,000,000 or $20,000,000 I am informed by that report that to develop that great country will require an expenditure of probably $50,000,000 or $60,000,000, if the lines suggested this afternoon were followed out. Such an expenditure should not give anyone any concern if it is shown that the construction will lead to the development of that great country, because we are informed that the area there is capable of a development which will pay very handsomely for such an expenditure.

In the few moments I have at my disposal I would also like to call to the attention of the House the efforts which have been made by the people of British Columbia and Alberta, through their governments, to solve this question. We find that there has been an expenditure of some $50,000,000 by those two provincial governments representing the people of those provinces. I wish to make this suggestion to the parliament of Canada and to the railway executives of this country, that in the solution of this question, that is, of providing proper transportation facilities to that country, the efforts and the expenditures that have been made by those provincial governments with the object of bringing about what we are to-day considering, should not be lost sight of, and that if it is possible to conserve those investments to the advantage of the Canadian National Railway or the Canadian Pacific Railway, whichever may undertake to develop that country, such conservation should be made.

I do not think the parliament of Canada should lightly brush aside expenditures made by those provinces in connection with the object which we are now considering. There is undoubtedly a great country to be served, a country which when opened up can be served advantageously by connection with the Pacific coast ports, and the people who are so fortunate as to go into that country and receive that service will, I believe, be probably better placed than some of those who may live and reside to-day in central Canada. I know there is a tendency in other portions of the northwest and of the prairie provinces to confine our settlement operations to areas already served by rail transportation; that is, that there may be a more concentrated centering of the population in those provinces. But I am satisfied that within the very near future, with conditions improving as they are in Canada, there will be a demand, and a proper demand, made for the earliest development of this great portion of Canada known as the Peace river country.

It is not for me to discuss the pass or channel which should be chosen in order that the outlet may be had. I was pleased to hear my colleague the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) this afternoon confirm the suggestion made by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Fraser) that in his opinion—which should be worth something to members of this House because he has had large experience in the province of Alberta; probably no member has a larger knowledge than he has of that great country in the north—the Peace River pass, even though it may cost $7,000,000 or $8,000,000 more than the pass first mentioned, is undoubtedly one that should be considered in the development of that district. He also threw out the suggestion that it might be eventually found advisable to extend the line, not to the south, but directly west to the Portland canal or what is known as the Stewart terminus. That is a matter that should certainly receive our consideration and be thoroughly canvassed before parliament makes up its mind as to what developments should take place in that country. With the consent of my confrere the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning), I am going to suggest that we follow the suggestion of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), and rather than place this resolution to the view of the House at the present time, refer the matter to the committee on railways. Was that the one?

Mr. DUNNING: The suggestion was the special committee. I would prefer the standing committee on railways and canals.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The minister says he would prefer the standing committee on railways and canals. That would meet with my approval, and I hope the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) will see the wisdom of that suggestion, because it will enable hon. members to secure further information on the subject; and it will be possible for them to call before the committee the various railway authorities and enable us to develop to a greater degree the knowledge that we have in regard to this important question.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as the discussion upon this important question has proceeded in this chamber to-day, it is evident that the government is now inclined to appreciate the seriousness of the subject far more than it was at the outset of the debate. I remember that the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) concluded his remarks this afternoon by stating that if this matter were pressed to a division he would be compelled reluctantly to vote against it. I am glad to congratulate the government that they have now had new light upon the subject. The speeches this afternoon of members of this House coming from the district more particularly affected by this motion have been to my mind most convincing. I confess that I am not as familiar with the geography of the Peace river district as some hon. members are, but at the same time I have a fair idea of it. After hearing the statements as presented in this chamber this afternoon I am convinced that we have before us a very important question which should be settled in the near future.

The Minister of Health (Mr. King) commenced his remarks by saying that the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) must have received some inspiration from speeches made in regard to this proposed development by the present Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) and from speeches made by the former Prime Minister of Canada during the election contest. I gathered that both of those right hon. gentlemen in those pre-election utterances committed themselves in regard to these various projects. The Minister of Health seems to draw a sharp distinction between a commitment made by the Prime Minister of this country in an election proceeding and a commitment made at any other time. A commitment made by a Prime Minister in the course of an election is of the most sacred character. If the present Prime Minister promised during the last or the preceding election to go ahead with the construction of this railway, the government is morally bound to proceed with it, and this House will not accept an explanation by the Minister of Railways, or the Minister of the Interior, or the Minister of Health, because they cannot explain away what was a clear commitment on the part of the head of the government of this country Had the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen been returned to power the promise would have been made good.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GUTHRIE: But when we speak of a promise made by a Prime Minister on the other side of the House, his colleagues laugh; they treat it as a joke. One of the most serious criticisms that can be levelled against this government for the last six years is that they have always been inclined to treat their promises somewhat lightly, and this is just another evidence of their weakness in that respect. This report, I am told, came out immediately before the last election campaign. I do not know whether it was made prominent during the campaign or not, but this I do know, that the Minister of Railways and his colleagues this afternoon have pointed out that this railway construction into this wonderful portion of the Dominion of Canada which awaits development would cost the country approximately $13,000,000. That is one aspect of it only. That would give that country a railway connection with the present Canadian National system. Go a step further, and the expenditure of $20,000,000 would take the traffic through the Peace river pass, connect up with the Canadian National, and on to Prince Rupert and the Pacific ocean. My hon. friend the Minister of Health (Mr. King) goes further than that. He looks upon the completion of this great work as something that will ultimately have to be undertaken. If we go ahead with the project at all, it may in the end cost forty or fifty or sixty million dollars—that is, for a completed railway system through the Peace river district to the coast.

Mr. DUNNING: Eighty-one million dollars.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is the maximum of expenditure. That is not a matter to be undertaken at a single jump. It will have to be undertaken as occasion requires, but the start should be made now, and a very substantial start; and very substantial relief may be given by the expenditure either of $13,000,000 or of $20,000,000. We do not seem to have any very great difficulty in financing railway projects in other parts of Canada. We seem to be able to get three or four or five million dollars to build hotels for our railway system either in Paris or at Vancouver or some other point in Canada. It seems to give us no trouble whatever to do that. If we want eight or ten or twelve million dollars to improve our transportation facilities by way of developing harbours and building canals, we have no trouble whatever in getting the money. Now, what does this particular project, putting it at $20,000,000 as a maximum for the present, involve? It involves a loan of $20,000,000. Assuming the rate of interest to be five per cent, that is $1,000,000 a year. That is the total burden to this Dominion in respect of this development, and if the stories we have heard this afternoon and on other occasions of the wonderful possibilities of the Peace river district are true only to the extent of twenty-five per cent of the statements made, then the investment is a justifiable investment, one which the government should undertake in the interests of Canada and undertake at the present session, on account of the pledge of the Prime Minister of this country that it would be done.

I am glad, however, that the ministers have seen some new light during the course of the afternoon. They do not want this question to come to a vote now. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways is reluctant to condemn this project by a vote now. The government seem to think perhaps they can shelve the matter better by allowing it to come before a select or a special committee of this House. I am not opposing the suggestion.

Mr. DUNNING: Surely my hon. friend understands that the suggestion came from his own colleague.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I know where it came from; most good suggestions do come from this side of the House. I am not opposed to the suggestion, but I think the duty of the government and the duty of the Minister of Railways in this instance is to come to parliament and say: Yes, the Prime Minister of Canada did pledge the construction of this railway prior to the last election, and we are here to carry out that pledge.

These are the only remarks I have to make, Mr. Speaker, upon the subject. I think when the matter comes to the committee such a case will be made that the government will not be able to resist this construction that is demanded in the interests of the whole country—a work that should be proceeded with, with as little delay as possible.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River): Lest I forget, let me say at once that I agree with the suggestion that this matter be referred to the railway committee. I am inclined to that view because of the fact that there is a mass of evidence even in this report itself, a lot of which I cannot agree with, and which I should like to thresh out with the engineers as well as some others.

I am exceedingly gratified by the reception of this motion this afternoon. There are, however, a few things I wish to deal with, and I shall be as brief as possible because of the fact that we seem to be agreed on sending it to the committee.

The present Peace river country, the producing part of the country, consists of Grande Prairie, Pouce Coupe, the Spirit river settlement north of the Peace, and the High Prairie settlement. The Grande Prairie settlement needs approximately another fifty miles of railway to give it a branch line service. North of the Peace, where I live, another fifteen miles of branch railway is required, and I submit that if this mileage is built, with an additional fifteen or twenty miles into the Pouce Coupe district, which is a thickly settled farming area, you would have sufficient territory to feed the main line running to the Pacific coast and also the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia railway. The constituency of my hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Coote) is not any bigger than the Grande Prairie district alone, and it is less than half of the district to which I have referred. It is not any richer in soil, and does not get any more moisture, and yet it has produced in one year 15,000,000 bushels of wheat.

I think this report of the engineers is unfair because of the fact that they have taken possibly the worst five years in the history of Canada, when the Peace river country was developing, from 1919 to 1924. That was just before the Peace river country got into its stride so far as development is concerned. They have calculated that in these five years the average export tonnage would be approximately 35,000 tons. But they also say that the only thing to consider in estimating the cost of a road to the Pacific coast would be farm produce, for various reasons. Now the total tonnage of the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia railway in that year, and three-quarters of that is accounted for by Peace river, actually comes very close to 175,000 tons, whereas the engineers figured that the maximum tonnage at that time would average only around 35,000 tons.

Mr. DUNNING: No, 48,000 tons.

Mr. KENNEDY: They credited 35,000 tons to the Peace river country.

Mr. DUNNING: It is on page 13 of the report.

Mr. KENNEDY: Page 25 says, "Present, 35,000 tons; initial, 175,000 tons." The total amount of grain handled over the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia railway from 1919 onward, and three-quarters of that was from the Peace river country, was as follows:

Year	Tons
1919	41,000
1920	49,000
1921	45,000
1922	68,000
1923	60,000
1924	96,000
1925	89,000
1926 (11 months)	91,000

Those are the figures of the Bureau of Statistics. The grain tonnage handled by the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia Railway—and this is chiefly tonnage from the Peace river district—ran from 41,000 tons in the year 1919 to 91,000 in 1926. The total revenue tonnage was 155,000 and in eleven months of 1926 it ran to 237,000. That is the basis of my contention that this report is not doing the Peace river country justice, and I do not think the engineers will contend that their prophecy so far as the Peace river country is concerned was optimistic enough. These engineers were sent up to find out the best route for the development of the Peace river country. They have said that the Obed route is the best route of all. The Minister of the Interior this afternoon said that the Stewart route was the proper route; therefore, we require further investigation, and when that investigation is completed, why, $50,000,000 or $70,000,000 will not be too great an expenditure for the development of Peace River. It is all very well to want facts, but surely we have already some facts on which to proceed. I do not want to see this thing go on as the Hudson Bay railway has been going—as a negro said, "Vestigate, and vestigate and never do anything." I think to-day we have a report on which action might be taken. I doubt very much if the Stewart route is superior to the Monkman route, because the Monkman route, depending on which point you take, cuts off from one hundred to six hundred miles between the central points of the various zones of the Peace river country and Prince Rupert and Vancouver as compared with the present route. The straight line mileage from any point you like in the Peace river country to Stewart is just about seventy-five miles shorter than the straight line to Prince Rupert, and unless there is something in British Columbia to call for the extra mileage, a new line north of the present Canadian National, I doubt very much whether there would be any justification for building another line there at the present time, moreover, I think it would mean an indefinitely long delay.

So far as the Obed route is concerned, there is a little difficulty in connection with the report. The report says that if you build the line from Aggie on the Edmonton, Dunvegan and British Columbia Railway it will cost $13,000,000, but to complete that route another sixty mile branch from Grande Prairie across the Smoky river, is required, and that will run the cost of the 250 or 260 miles up as high as the 168 miles of the line through the Monkman pass to whatever point in British Columbia the line touches the Grand Trunk. This estimate is $16,000,000.

Regarding the north side of the Peace, there will have to be another railway built some day, just as the Edmonton-Dunvegan had to be built from McLennan, in two sections, one serving Spirit river and Grande Prairie, and the other going up to Peace River and Whitelaw. Any railway from the west will also require two branches from Hudson Hope eastward, one running north of the Peace river and one south.

I am willing that this resolution should be referred, with the evidence we have in the matter, to the standing committee on railways and canals, and of course we hope that the matter will be taken up by the House when the committee reports and that we will get somewhere with the matter then. If the motion is not referred to the committee, my purpose is of course to press the matter to a vote.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand the hon. gentleman consents to the reference to the standing committee on railways and canals.

Mr. KENNEDY: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman cannot amend his own motion, so that the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) or some other member will have to move, seconded by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell), that the following words be added at the end of the resolution:

And that the matter be referred to the select standing committee on railways and canals.

Mr. DUNNING: Is that a proper motion to be placed at the end of a main motion?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Would it not be proper for the hon. Minister of Railways to move the amendment himself?

Mr. SPEAKER: He has already spoken.

Mr. DUNNING: I am willing to do it but I cannot.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Could we not get the support of one member of the government?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am quite willing to move it.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion is:

That, in the opinion of this House, the time has arrived for the commencement forthwith and the completion in the near future of a direct railway outlet from the Peace River country to the Pacific coast and that this matter be referred to the select standing committee on railways and canals.

Instead of the word "and" we might substitute the word "but"—but that this matter be referred to the committee on railways and canals.

Mr. DUNNING: As I understand the language the House would be committed nevertheless to the comencement forthwith of the work, and I certainly do not want to be committed to the commencement forthwith of this work. I cannot see my way clear, as Minister of Railways, to recommend it to the House just now.

Mr. SPEAKER: My understanding of the motion as altered by the amendment is that the House is not committed, but that the whole question is referred to the standing committee on railways and canals.

Mr. J. J. DENIS (Joliette): I for one am absolutely against this resolution if it means that the House is to be committed to the terms of the resolution. With all due respect for your ruling, Mr. Speaker, unless your ruling stands in the place of the resolution itself I cannot support it. If the House passes this resolution now it puts itself on record as in favour of the terms of it. The amendment has only the effect of adding to the resolution. The resolution remains for the time being and the committee will proceed immediately to examine it. When it goes to the committee, the committee will deal with a resolution which has already been agreed to by the House. As I understand it, that is not what the Minister of Railways wants; therefore, I object to the resolution as drafted.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I understand Your Honour gave a ruling a moment ago that this resolution itself was being sent to the committee for their consideration, not necessarily with the approval of the House but in order that the committee might have something to work on.

Mr. SPEAKER: This motion expresses only a pious wish. With the amendment, the House now directs that nothing shall be done in connection with the motion until the select standing committee on railways and canals has studied it and reported thereon.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Still, Mr. Speaker, even a pious wish may be more than what the House intended. Would it not be better to put it in this form?

That in the opinion of this House the select standing committee on railways and canals should consider whether the time has arrived, and so forth, and that this resolution be referred to it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. minister kindly draft his motion?

Mr. COOTE: Mr. Speaker, I can remember several occasions when resolutions of this nature have been referred to select standing committees or to special committees in terms identical with those of the amendment now before the House. The question has never been raised heretofore that the House was thereupon committed to the principle of the resolution. I think we shall be adopting the usual procedure if we alow the resolution as amended to pass.

Mr. BOURASSA: Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to give to a committee the right to state that it has more judgment than the whole House. It may be that it has; I am not quite sure that numbers make for quality. I understand that the motion, if amended as proposed, would simply mean that the committee would study the whole question and report to the House, leaving it to the House to decide on the merits. I for one am prepared to use what little judgment I have, but I am not prepared to give a power of attorney to fifteen or twenty other gentlemen to decide what my judgment should be.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Speaker, so long as everyone considers that this is not committing the House to the principle of the resolution I do not see any objection to the motion as amended.

Mr. SPEAKER: No resolution can commit the House of Commons to any expenditure except through the instrumentality of the crown. As I said before, it is simply a pious wish. The resolution has been discussed by the House and is now merely referred to the select standing committee on railways and canals, whose duty it will be to report to the House after having carefully examined the subject matter of the resolution. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion as amended?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Motion agreed to.

DISSOLUTION OF PARLIAMENT

PROPOSED VOTE OF HOUSE WHEN PRIOR TO EXPIRATION OF TERM

Mr. A. M. CARMICHAEL (Kindersley) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, no government should have the right to ask for a dissolution of parliament prior to completing the five-year term as provided in the British North America Act except when authorized to do so by a majority vote of the House.

He said: Mr. Speaker, we have had a very pleasant and profitable trip through the Peace river country, viewing the scenery and considering the possibilities of that section of the Dominion. The purpose of this resolution is to bring us back into this chamber to consider some of our proceedings here.

The resolution as worded would seem to be quite orthodox in some respects. That is, it asks for the opinion of this House; it also hints that something should be done by means of a majority vote. There is, of course, a feature of the resolution that might be looked upon by some as altogether unorthodox, in that it brings before us for consideration a certain point of procedure that has not been practised hitherto. But I am not so sure that that should cause any consternation among hon. gentlemen. In fact, Mr. Speaker, it is not so very long since this House adopted a procedure at variance with a long-established custom in this House. At the very opening of this present session the House agreed to violate an established tradition in selecting its Speaker, that it has observed since confederation. It has been the well-established custom in choosing the Speaker of this House to alternate between representatives of the two dominant races in this country, the English and the French. None of us felt very badly over the breaking of that old established custom; indeed we were all quite satisfied to have Your Honour occupy the position for the third consecutive parliament. So that if we violate an old established tradition by adopting this resolution it may cause no more consternation than our departure from precedent at the opening of this parliament.

I purpose considering this resolution in the light of the practice followed in the mother parliament as well as in this parliament. As hon. members are aware, there is a marked similarity between the Canadian and the British form of government; in fact, they are so nearly akin that one may be said to have been copied almost entirely from the other. In Great Britain parliament is composed of the crown, represented by the King or Queen, and by the two houses of parliament, the Commons and the Lords. Our parliament is much along the same lines, the crown being represented by the governor general and the two houses of parliament by the Commons and the Senate. In the Imperial parliament we have what might be termed two arms, the executive and the legislative, the executive arm being represented by the crown on the one hand through the king in council, and the legislative by parliament. Similarly, we have the two arms of government, the executive represented by the crown through the governor in council, and the legislative by parliament.

Looking first at the British form of government, it is what is known as a limited monarchy. It was not always so. Let me go back a few hundred years in order to establish the fact in our minds that there has been a gradual and noticeable change in the power and prerogatives of the British sovereign. Going back to the time of William the Conqueror, starting with the year 1085, we find that the crown at that time was almost absolute. In fact, the sovereign of that day had assumed the role of practically an absolute monarch in his ruling powers. Then, proceeding for a period of about one hundred and thirty years, up to the time of King John, the crown continued to exercise a very considerable power. But we know that in the year 1215 the people, as represented in what might be termed parliament, made demands upon King John and secured from an unwilling sovereign certain rights embodied in what we know as the Magna Charta. These rights may be said to have formed the foundation of British parliamentary government in Britain. Following that period, up to about 1485, the crown was more or less arbitrary in the exercise of its power. It seemed to assert itself and to predominate over the rights of the people as represented in parliament. Under the house of Tudor, from 1485 until the year 1603, the crown continued to hold great power. As a matter of fact, in Henry VIII we find an almost absolute monarch of the type of William the Conqueror. Under the Stuarts, however, from 1603 to 1688 parliament made great constitutional progress. In the latter year the people, through their representatives in parliament, drew up a declaration of rights which may be said to have inaugurated the prerogative of parliament and to have asserted the rights of that body over the crown.

The constitution of Britain now is not only that of a limited monarchy; it is largely an unwritten constitution. Now, this is quite in contrast with the situation that exists, for example, in the country to the south of us where we find a written constitution. When we speak of the British constitution being unwritten we mean that certain traditions are followed and certain practices established apart from any direct written authority. These traditions and precedents have come down to us and we have heard them referred to in this chamber quite often as established practices followed by the mother of parliaments.

In the British government the power is vested nominally in the crown, but that power is delegated practically to the cabinet. The power of the crown virtually rests in the cabinet, which is a committee of the legislative body. The cabinet is nominated by the crown. That is to say, the prime minister is nominated by the king and the cabinet by the prime minister in conjunction with the crown. It is safe, therefore, to say that the cabinet is nominated by the crown although dependent for its support upon parliament. In Britain the cabinet has the power of advising the dissolution of the assembly which it represents. The prime minister is, of course, the spokesman for the cabinet. There is a fine point here as to whether the prime minister has the absolute right to go to the crown and ask for a dissolution of parliament regardless of the wishes of his cabinet. It may be conceded that he has that right; I am not prepared to argue the point. Whether he has it or not, however, is a question that does not relate to this resolution now before the House. But it is a recognized fact that the prime minister has no legal primacy over the members of the cabinet. In fact it is only a matter of less than fifty years ago since the term "prime minister" was first used in any European document. In 1878 the term was first recognized in Britain, and it is only about twenty-two years now since the official precedence of the prime minister was first established in Britain.

As regards the power of the cabinet in the advising of a dissolution I purpose tracing in short form what has actually happened in Britain in the last twenty years. Let us take the history of the British parliament since the year 1906 up to the present date. We find that on February 13, 1906, parliament met, dissolving on January 10, 1910, after an existence of three years, eleven months and twenty-four days, notwithstanding that the statutes of Great Britain call for a parliament of five years as a maximum. The next parliament assembled on February 15, 1910, was dissolved on November 28, 1910, having lasted nine months and thirteen days. The next one was called on January 31, 1911, and lasted until November 25, 1918, having been in existence for a period of seven years, nine months and twenty-five days. That was of course the war parliament, and that accounts for its having extended its life beyond the five year period. The next parliament was called on February 4, 1919, and was dissolved on October 26, 1922, so that it lasted for a period of three years, eight months and twenty-two days. The next one was called on November 20, 1922, and dissolved on November 16, 1923, after having sat for eleven months and twenty-seven days. The next parliament met on January 8, 1924; on October 9, 1924, it was dissolved, so that its life had not been more than nine months and one day. And the present parliament was called on December 2, 1924.

So that in a period of twenty years in Great Britain there have been seven parliaments, although the Parliament Act of 1911 stipulated that parliament should last for a period of five years. If we deduct the length of the parliament that carried on during the war, which existed altogether for seven years, almost eight years, we find that there have been six parliaments in the old land within a period of about twelve years, with an average life of two years each. One of these parliaments lasted only nine months and one day, while three of them existed for less than a year. This demonstrates the fact that, because of the power resting in the cabinet to dissolve parliament, the life of the legislative body is precarious indeed, and may be terminated at any time. In the old country, as we see, there have been a number of parliaments of very short duration.

I have not inquired into the cause of dissolution of each individual parliament, with a view to ascertaining whether in any case it was necessary or not; I was not particularly concerned with that point. What I wished to show was that under the British constitution parliaments have been rather short, three of them having been exceptionally so. This is a matter which might be regarded by some people as of little consequence, but when we consider the expenses inseparable from a general election in a country like Great Britain we are bound to concede, I think, that it is of considerable moment. The expense of general elections, holding them every two years rather than every five years, is quite a strain on the country. Under the British constitution the sovereign can dissolve parliament at his will, and no parliament can be assembled, prorogued, or dissolved without his express command. This resolution does not propose to invade that territory at all; the sovereign has that prerogative and so far as this resolution goes he has a perfect right to keep it.

Now let us look at our Canadian constitution for a short time. Without going into Canadian history too deeply, we should remind ourselves that here has been a struggle in Canada for constitutional reform and liberty and responsible government almost on a par with that in the old country. If we take the period of Canadian history from its earliest time up to the present we see that there has been quite a continuous struggle for responsible, representative government. In our early days we had a period of military government, almost a despotic government similar to the early days of British history, gradually the parliamentary institutions gained under such measures as the Quebec Act of 1774 and the Constitutional Act of 1791, but even these measures did not bring to the people all they wished. As a result in 1837 we had quite a decided uprising in both Upper and Lower Canada in favour of responsible government. The Act of Union of 1840 brought us a little further on the way, and then in 1867 the British North America Act was passed, of which I am sure we have all heard many times.

The British North America Act is supposed to be the great act upon which our constitution is based, and we are continually referred to that act as embodying certain rights and certain privileges which we hold and cherish very dearly. In section 50 of that act we have these words:

> Every House of Commons shall continue for five years from the day of the return of the writs for choosing the House (subject to be sooner dissolved by the Governor general), and no longer.

That is one part of the British North America Act which we wish to consider more particularly. Provision is made that parliament shall last for a period of five years, unless sooner dissolved by the Governor General. You will notice that the act does not say "Governor General in Council"; it is the crown. That is, in Canada as in Great Britain, the crown has the right to dissolve parliament. I believe that is what was intended at the Imperial conference of 1926, since on page 14 of the proceedings we find these words:

> In our opinion it is an essential consequence of the equality of status existing among the members of the British Commonwealth of Nations, that the Governor General of a dominion is the representative of the crown, holding in all essential respects the same position in relation to the administration of public affairs in the dominion as is held by His Majesty the King in Great Britain—

Therefore it would appear to be the sense of the Imperial conference that the Governor General is the representative of the crown, and as such he has the prerogative of dissolving the House. This resolution does not aim at taking away any such powers from the Governor General of Canada; there is no hint that that should be done. This resolution states that no government should have the right to ask for dissolution; in other words, the House of Commons should be supreme in these matters.

If we look at our Dominion parliaments since confederation we find quite a variation in their duration. From July 1, 1867, up to and including this present parliament, a period of sixty years, we have had sixteen instead of twelve parliaments, and during that time at least one of our parliaments extended over the five year period, while a great many did not last that long. I have a list here showing the duration of the different parliaments; they vary from ten months to six years, two months and seven days. I will not take time to read the list, but I will insert it in Hansard as I have it. It is as follows:

Dominion Parliaments since 1867

			Years	Months	Days
1.	From July 1, 1867,	to July 8, 1872	5		7
2.		to Jan. 2, 1874	1	5	25
3.		to Aug. 9, 1878	4	7	7
4.		to May 18, 1882	3	8	9
5.		to Jan. 15, 1887	4	7	28
6.		to Feb. 3, 1891	4	..	19
7.		to April 24, 1896	5	2	21
8.		to Oct. 9, 1900	4	5	15
9.		to Sept. 29, 1904	3	11	20
10.		to Sept. 17, 1908	3	11	19
11.		to July 29, 1911	2	10	12
12.	(War)	to Oct. 6, 1917	6	2	7
13.		to Oct. 4, 1921	3	11	28
14.		to Sept. 5, 1925	3	11	1
15.		to July 2, 1926	(About 10 months)
16.	Present parliament.

I would point out, however, that the last parliament began on September 5, 1925, and lasted until July, 1926, a period of about ten months. I do not propose to go into the whys and wherefores of the dissolutions of our Canadian parliaments; some hon. members might consider a dissolution justifiable, while others might think to the contrary. I simply point out the actual situation, that our parliament is dissolved prior to the completion of the term provided for in the act which is the foundation of our constitution.

It must be remembered also that dissolution takes place because a committee of this House decides that it should be done. It may be that the Prime Minister of himself has that prerogative; I am not prepared to argue that, but I hardly think the present Prime Minister has ever asked for dissolution without consulting his colleagues in the government. If he has done so he has done with his colleagues what he has not generally done in this House; for he has usually consulted the members of this House to ascertain the best procedure. Last session, of course, found us in a very unusual situation. We had a governing body without a majority in the House, and perhaps that has given rise to what might be termed a need for such a provision as that provided by this resolution. That is, where there is a government without a majority in the House it is an altogether different situation from a government with a strong following. I am prepared to grant that if the government had a following of two-thirds of the House, this resolution would not have so much force or effect, because such a government could easily carry a resolution to dissolve parliament. But when we have, as we had last session, a group carrying on which is less than one-half of the total membership of the House, the situation is quite different. Their legislation is brought in ordinarily with a sort of club held over their own following, and indeed in the last parliament held over some of the independent members, in that if legislation were not accepted, the government would dissolve the House and go to the country. That is rather an unfortunate situation.

Many hon. members, at least the independent members in this House, are more concerned about legislation than about dissolution or general elections, although none of us is so very anxious for a dissolution right away. We have had to run enough elections in the recent past to last us for a few years to come. We are more concerned about legislation, and we would like to consider legislation on its merits. When a legislative program is brought in or when a particular legislative proposal is made before the House, we do not like to have that club held over us—you have to support the government or you will defeat the government, and if you defeat the government, that means another general election. That was the situation in the last parliament and I am not so sure that we are very far removed from it in this parliament. Oh, yes, we have a large number of members sitting on the other side of the chamber, but there is a ribbonlike row extending along there with a double row of defence ahead of them and a double row of defence behind them, and I am not so sure that row is one hundred per cent affiliated with the Liberal party. In fact, if we are to take at face value a statement that was made in this House in the early part of the session, the group to which I refer, strung along in that ribbonlike fashion, is organized as a separate entity with a chairman and a secretary and does not meet with the Liberal party in caucus. That situation has a very serious aspect. It means that the Liberal party has not a majority in the House, notwithstanding the fact that the press of this country has tried to lead us to believe that we now have stable government. I am not so sure that it is any more stable than it was in the last parliament, except that there are a few more to tend toward stability, but not enough to make it stable. That being the case, it is easy to conceive that during this very session of parliament legislation may be brought forward which will make it very unprofitable for some of that ribbonlike row in the centre of the group opposite us.

An hon. MEMBER: The thin red line.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: The thin red line, somebody says. For instance, we might mention the maritime report. If that should be implemented by legislation embodying all the recommendations contained therein, I am not so sure that some hon. members across the way will not have to think two or three times as to what they should do. That is, if the government prepares to implement one hundred per cent of the maritimes report, the question will be: Must I take it all or stand for the defeat of my government? That is not a very satisfactory situation for an independent member. It is an excellent thing for the party man, the man who thinks of party ahead of legislation, or ahead of the country he represents; but it is not the ideal situation, and as independent members in this House we are prepared to protest against such a situation. We claim that legislation should be brought in, of course on the initiative of the government; that each legislative proposal should be considered on its merits, should stand on its own feet, should be voted on as to whether it is wise or not, and that the question of dissolution should be considered by itself.

I am going to try to curtail my remarks so that I shall not transgress the proposed recommendations in connection with the rules of the House. I am watching the clock and I intend to try to stay within the proposed rule of not speaking too long. This resolution leaves the five-year term as it is in the British North America Act and the expiration of that five year term brings about dissolution. The Governor General, if I understand the statute correctly, may order dissolution at any time. This resolution does not change that provision.

Mr. BOURASSA: Upon advice of the government, of course.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I understand that the Governor General may order dissolution without the advice of the government.

Mr. BOURASSA: That is fifty years old.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I am not going to go into that or argue it, but my understanding of the British practice and the British North America Act, as outlined in section 50, is as I have stated.

Mr. BOURASSA: In letter but not in spirit.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: The House is subject to be dissolved by the Governor General, not by the Governor General in council. The crown in Britain has that right to dissolve parliament at its will, and we are not arguing that the crown in Canada has not also that right. I am prepared to grant that that right exists and perhaps should exist. I am not prepared to argue the matter. The resolution also provides that a majority of this House may dissolve parliament. Thus we have three very feasible ways of bringing about dissolution.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Is it not a fact that in 1914 or 1915, I am not sure which, the Lieutenant Governor of Manitoba dissolved the legislature against the wishes of the government, against the wishes of the legislature?

Mr. CARMICHAEL: That might be true. I would not dispute it. Not being a resident of Manitoba I cannot grant that it is correct, but I am prepared to admit that such power rests in the hands of a lieutenant governor as well as in the hands of a governor general.

Mr. WARD: What the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) says about the situation in Manitoba is correct. The Lieutenant Governor did dissolve the legislature against the wishes of the government then in power.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I am thankful for the help of the thin red line across the way. Another reason why it seems very necessary that some such provision as this should be made against dissolution is the fact that whatever party is in power, I care not whether it is the Liberal party or the Conservative party, there is a tendency on the part of such party to bring about dissolution at a very opportune time for that party, and the legislative program is shaped largely with that thought in view. Now we are going to go to the country and we must get a program that will appeal to the people. I am not going to say that that was what done last year. I do not know whether it was or not. I know the program was very appealing, but I am not going to say that that program was provided especially for going to the country on, but it does often happen that a government brings in a program that is especially appealing, and without any particular desire to get that program enacted into statutory legislation, they hie themselves to the country at their own sweet will and pleasure and bring on a general election, knowing that such a program will work in their own best interests. Mr. Speaker, such is not in the best interests of this country or of any other country. The expenses of a general election are no inconsiderable sum. The country is put to a great deal of expense, and individual members are put to a great deal of expense; business conditions are disrupted from one end of the country to the other, and on the whole a general election has a disturbing effect on the whole country.

I commend this resolution to this Chamber. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this House of Commons should be supreme in the matter of dissolution. No Prime Minister, and no cabinet, which is simply a body representing this chamber, should have the prerogative of going to His Excellency prior to the completion of the necessary five year term and saying: We must dissolve parliament. The cabinet is but a committee of this House, and, if you please, I would like to consider them as the servants of this House. That may not be a very dignified term to apply to them, but this House itself is but the servant of the nine million people of the Dominion of Canada. The electors in general of Canada send 245 members to this House to do their business as their servants. We in this House look to our cabinet of some eighteen or more members to be our servants to carry on the business of legislation, and it seems to me that it is not very appropriate for those who are the servants of the House to decide in their own councils that they are going to carry out a certain line of procedure in regard to dissolution. Such procedure should be referred to the full membership of this House, and the question should be decided by the House. If the government is strong and has a large number of followers in the House, their will can easily be carried at any time they wish. But the situation that existed in the last parliament, and exists in this so far as membership and groups are concerned, is altogether different from the condition that prevailed some years ago, and one that is going to exist for a few years to come. We are not going to get rid of the independent groups in this House just because some party men would like to get rid of them; they are here to-day and will be here for some time. In fact, if we compare the membership of the independent groups this year with last, counting the thin red line as being an independent group, we have more members in the independent ranks this year than last. There has been quite a gain. I believe last year we had something like twenty-six, while this year we have thirty-one or thirty-two members altogether in the independent groups. So the independent groups are not dying out and that has given rise to a situation altogether different from what we had in this country sixty or a hundred years ago. The need, therefore, is apparent for considering the present situation.

I commend this resolution to the House. I am quite sure that if adopted it will not disturb our equilibrium in this chamber any more than the breaking of the old tradition of electing our Speaker. I am quite sure, too, that the adoption of this resolution will not disturb business conditions throughout the country or impede the wheels of industry one whit. On the other hand, I am sure that it will work to considerable advantage in the future.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the subject matter of this resolution is indeed a very important one, and I am pleased to congratulate my hon. friend from Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) on the way he has dealt with it. He has made a very interesting speech. I am sorry, however, to be compelled to confess that he has not convinced me that the British system in this matter is wrong. Under the British constitution, and this point my hon. friend has not touched at all, the underlying principle is that the country and parliament must be in harmony; they should not be at variance. It sometimes happens—it has happened in the past both in Great Britain and in Canada—that some parliament is elected in a period of patriotic exaltation or some other feeling, and a year or two afterwards it is perceived that it does not represent the majority of the people who voted for it at the previous general election. It is necessary that at such a time a government should not be bound by a fixed rule compelling them to wait three or four more years before appealing to the people and allowing them to elect representatives who would more fairly represent the opinions and views of the majority of the people at that time.

True, as my hon. friend says, if his resolution were adopted a majority of parliament would be required before dissolution could be obtained, but that is just where the objection comes in; that is the obstacle. A House of Commons elected at a certain period would have a majority in the House to oppose dissolution later on at a time when the government considered dissolution necessary under the British constitutional system.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I ask just how my hon. friend proposes to get himself out of that extraordinary situation? Supposing a government is elected with a strong majority over all, and suppose, for the sake of his argument, that that government within two years becomes, as he says, distasteful to the people. May I ask him to proceed from that point, and let us know the next step. How are you going to get out of that situation?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It has happened in the past, and I am going to quote instances. It is easy to perceive when a parliament is no longer in harmony with the people who elected them. You can see that especially when a series of by-elections goes against the government. That happened in England during Mr. Gladstone's time, in 1873 and 1875, and Mr. Gladstone went to the country two years before the expiration of his term of office just for that very reason. I quoted some words of his in a previous debate in the parliament that expired in 1921. Mr. Gladstone went to the country because all the by-elections were going against his government. He dissolved parliament, and in the general election that followed, he was defeated by an overwhelming majority, showing that he used good judgment in advising the crown to dissolve parliament. He was blamed for doing so at the following session. One of his previous supporters moved a resolution of censure against his course in dissolving parliament before the expiration of the term, and in reply Mr. Gladstone said—British Parliamentary Debates, 1874, page 80:

My hon. friend seems to think that there is but one important element in the position of a government, and that is the numerical amount of its majority. Now, upon that point I join issue with my hon. friend. I think he fundamentally misunderstands the constitution of this country if he supposes that the actual majority that a government may possess in an existing House of Commons is sufficient to give it more moral and political strength for the discharge of its arduous duties, after it has become apparent or when it is becoming clear that the possession of that majority is not agreeable to the sense and the convictions of the country. Now, Sir, there is the whole difference between my hon. friend and myself.

And he adds:

Because in this country we watch the signs and currents of public opinion. We recognize the general title of the country to be governed in conformity with its wishes and its intelligence; and the mere possession of a parliamentary majority, satisfactory as it is when it is a true indication of the actual current of feeling and opinion of the country, is no adequate support and no adequate warrant for the continuance of a government in office if it has become clear, or when there is reasonable ground for supposing, that the desires of the country are in an opposite direction.

In 1900 hon. gentlemen will remember that there was a khaki election. That was following the South African war, and two or three years after that election the government then in power met the same fate that the Gladstone government suffered in 1873. All the by-elections went against the government and then the opposition of that time moved that there should be a dissolution of parliament, because the majority in parliament did not any longer represent the sentiment of the country, and here is what Sir Henry Campbell Bannerman said at page 71 of the British Hansard of 1905:

It is common for us to say, and it is true constitutionally, that the minister of the crown in this country is selected and appointed because he is the man who commands a majority in the House of Commons. But what does that mean? It means that the command of the majority of the House represents the feeling of the country. The moment the House of Commons gets out of touch and harmony with the country, then that plea for retaining office dissolves; and the right hon. gentleman has no right to entrench himself behind the confidence and support of his friends here after it is known to all mankind and to himself, as well as to any of them, that he has lost the confidence of the country. When I say it is known to himself, it is obviously so, because, if he was not aware he had lost the confidence of the country, why should he show any reluctance to appeal to the country and immensely strengthen his position by securing a favourable verdict from it.

That position was also taken by Sir Edward Grey, now Viscount Grey, and it is the position also advocated by the various authors on the constitution of England, especially Anson, Dicey and Green, who are here quoted. My hon. friend says that governments should not ask for a dissolution because it is contrary to the supremacy of parliament, and his words to that effect were applauded. I believe in the supremacy of parliament, but I believe that the supremacy of the people must be above that of parliament when parliament no longer represents the majority of the views of the country. In such a case I think parliament should disappear and a new parliament should replace it which would be a mirror of the conditions of the country as they exist at the time.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: Does the minister argue that a group in this House which has less than half of the members has a better chance of rightly interpreting the opinion of nine million people than the whole membership of the House?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I believe the group in this House which can command the support of the majority of the members should carry on the government, but subject to the condition that the people are willing to have that group carry on. If the people show in an unmistakable way that this government or any other government does not any longer command the confidence of the majority of the people, I think this is a good time for a dissolution of parliament, and that we should not wait, as they do under the other system, until there has been a certain lapse of time. I do not think the American system is better than our own in that regard, and of course it is not based on the same principle. The President of the United States is elected by the direct vote of the people for a certain period of time. He is a ruler in the real sense of the word, not only in name but in fact, and it may very well happen, as it has happened in the past, that after elections, which occur in the United States every year for a certain part either of the senate or the congress, that the president does not command a majority in one or other of the houses, but the president has to carry on for the whole time for which he has been elected. Our system is quite different from that, and I do not believe it is inferior to it. I think there is a great advantage in keeping parliament and the country in harmony.

Mr. SPENCER: The hon. member for Kindersley is not advocating the American system, but simply advocating that the will of parliament be supreme.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He is not advocating it, but he says that parliament will continue for five years unless the majority in parliament decide to the contrary. I have seen occasions when something of the kind has occurred in the other country. I do not want to refer to it in Canada because those times are still too close to the present to make reference to it. But we have had the same condition here, and surely you cannot expect that the majority in parliament under those conditions would vote themselves out of parliament.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Where has the hon. member proved anything.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not thank the hon. member for the compliment.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Far be it from me to do anything but pay the most kindly compliments to a gentleman I so deeply respect, but I wish to have this cleared up. I do not wish him to leave the House under any misapprehension. He has given us the two cases, the Campbell-Bannerman and the Gladstone cases, in which two prime ministers took the initiative and invited dissolution, although they had a majority in the House. The speaker has not yet proved that they would not have had to ask for dissolution if they had sought the opinion of the House.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But they had a majority.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The majority could dissolve the House. Is the minister going to impugn the motives of the British House of Commons?

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend knows that the majority in those circumstances would not vote itself out of parliament.

Mr. BIRD: I wonder if my hon. friend considered that by-elections were an unmistakable evidence that the government itself was unpopular?

Mr. LAPOINTE: When a government loses by-elections consistently in various parts of the country, I think it points that way.

Mr. BIRD: From 1874 to 1878 various by-elections went in favour of the government, and relying on this Disraeli went to the country, but he got licked.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But the fact that he was licked shows that the country was opposed to him.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Might I ask the minister another question?

[Mr. Spencer.]

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Unless this cross-examination is discontinued I shall have to dissolve the House.

Mr. LAPOINTE: May I mention other circumstances in which I believe the present system is best? For instance, when a very important measure involving a radical change in the national policy is submitted to parliament it is important for the government of the day to have this power of appealing direct to the electorate. Take the case of the Home Rule bill introduced by Gladstone and rejected by the British parliament; was it not essential that his government should have the right to appeal from the verdict of parliament to the verdict of the people? I quote that case because Gladstone was defeated when he went to the country on it, and it shows how essential it is that a government should consult the electorate on an issue first raised in parliament and on which the electorate have not had an opportunity to pronounce judgment.

Then again, take the case of Mr. Bonar Law. My friend referred to the fact that there had been three elections in Great Britain within three years, which he thought a calamity. Why? Mr. Bonar Law appealed to the electors on a policy of preference within the Empire. He had not been elected on such a program, and he thought he could not force through the House of Commons an issue on which the electorate had not been consulted. I think he took the only stand which a constitutional leader in a democratic country should take—not only to consult his own followers in parliament on a question which had not been debated and decided by the electorate, but also to dissolve parliament and go to the country. I think my view of the matter is at least as democratic as that of my friend. I think it is really the people whom I want to consult in such a case, and who under the British constitutional system of government are consulted. Mr. Bonar Law was defeated, but his action shows that he had a proper respect for the will of the electors. As a result of that election three parties were returned in almost equal proportions. Naturally it made government very difficult for some time. Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, who had the largest group, carried on for a year, but finally he was defeated in the House of Commons. Surely then it was to the advantage of the United Kingdom that the electors should be given an opportunity to decide on what party should be returned to power They did decide. I do not know whether I was greatly pleased because a Conservative government was elected there, but they secured a fair working majority, and since that time they seem to have had a reasonable degree of peace in England.

Mr. McGIBBON: Strange!

Mr. LAPOINTE: Perhaps. Conditions differ. May I mention one or two other circumstances where it is important that the government have the prerogative of dissolution? This has happened in Canada and in other countries. Under special circumstances, during a war for instance, a government goes to the country and is returned with a special mandate. When that mandate is fulfilled is it not better that the people should have the opportunity of electing a new parliament on whatever issues may then be before the country? In countries where the franchise has been extended gradually from time to time, when the electorate is considerably enlarged or modified, is not that also a good reason for appealing to the new electors and giving them an opportunity to exercise the franchise?

I believe that the present system is the really democratic one and that there is no reason for changing it. My friend said that it is a tradition or a custom, and that we ourselves this session have broken a custom by electing you, Mr. Speaker, to the chair for a third consecutive term. But the subject we are discussing is more than a custom, a practice, a tradition. I submit, Sir, that it is the very basic principle on which our constitution is founded, and which makes it different from the American system of government. I am glad that this subject has come up for discussion. I know that many people think the change suggested by my hon. friend would be a good one. I repeat that I do not agree with that view, and that I think we should retain the system which is in force today.

May I conclude by reminding my hon. friend who has referred to the fact that this government is not any more stable than that which carried on last session, that I think it is more stable because we have a Forke in the present government!

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the hon. minister before he resumes his seat? He has based his argument in defence of the present practice on his respect for the people as being above parliament. Would he consider that a prime minister had a proper respect for the will of the people if at any time he should use his right to dissolve parliament as a club over the heads of hon. members?

Mr. LAPOINTE: That power could be used as a club only if the prime minister has a secure majority in the country. A prime minister who is weak, who cannot carry his elections, who does not feel that he is backed up and supported by a majority of the people would not use that club; the club would be used against him.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): The hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) must be congratulated upon having brought this subject before the House. No doubt for many years past, but especially during the last two or three years, an increasing number of people in the country have been asking themselves whether everything is right with our parliamentary system of government, and particularly whether the power of dissolution is always exercised in the best interests of the Dominion. It seems to me that instead of looking through books to find precedents and to discover what was done in this or that year in Great Britain or in this or that other country, we should devote ourselves more to this question: What is the system best suited to the needs of Canada now and in the near future? Of course, there is a good deal that may safely be borrowed from outside. I would be the last one to advise my compatriots and the members of this parliament to disregard all British precedents. But if I understand my British history, and with the little knowledge I have of the British parliamentary system of government, I am bound to say this, that precedent after precedent has been established to meet at particular times the needs of the people of the British Isles, now Great Britain. And if we are so concerned about imitating the British people in the operation of their system, we should do what they are doing and apply ourselves to find out in what respects their system corresponds to our needs and to our situation generally, and in what directions we should make changes as they are needed. I have never considered it necessary to show our admiration for the British people and their constitution by making ourselves monkey-like British subjects and copying everything done in Great Britain simply because it is done in Great Britain. For example, I have never been able to bring myself to the point of turning up the bottom of my trouser legs simply because it is raining in London. The conditions in Canada, geographical, political and economic, are in many respects different from those in Great Britain. In many respects they are certainly much more similar to the conditions that prevail in the United States. So that before we declare outright that the Americans are all wrong in their method of dealing with political problems, and go on following mechanically what is done in Great Britain, we should consider conditions in their bearing on the various aspects of the question.

The first thing to be considered is, in my opinion, the question of the relations that exist or that should exist between the executive and the legislative power. This has been a great subject of dispute and the occasion for many precedents that have displaced each other in Great Britain from time immemorial. Indeed, the makers of the American constitution decided upon a separation between the executive and the legislative powers in the United States precisely because of their deep knowledge of British history and because they wanted to avoid, in the operation of political powers in the United States, such difficulties as had arisen in Great Britain and had from time to time brought into conflict the king and the lords, the lords and the commons, or the king and parliament at large. And it is precisely because, on the one hand, they wanted to strengthen the hand of the executive power in the management of the general affairs of the country, and on the other, to reserve to the legislative body that full independence derived from the mandate given by the people, that they decided to make the executive absolutely independent for the four years during which it should be in power, and at the same time guarantee to the legislative power complete independence in relation to the legislative measures it adopted as well as in the votes which it might give on the budget of the country. On the whole, I do not think it has worked so badly; and before discarding altogether that American precedent, which is nothing else than the result of many centuries of British precedents, or the putting into concrete form of the thought, or the maturation of thought of many British legislators and British jurists, we should question seriously the wisdom of copying what was done by Lord Beaconsfield or Mr. Gladstone in this year or that year. Rather, we should ask ourselves whether, our conditions being more like those that obtain in the United States, we should not to a certain extent combine in our own system of government something of British precedent and something of American practice.

As to the rights of the people and their supremacy, and the rights of democracy, all that of course sounds very well. All parties, all leaders, all representatives of the people pay a tremendous amount of respect to the voters so long as they think they can win their votes. And in our own history, as well as in the history of Great Britain, it has been proved that once entrenched in power governments have all more or less respected the will of the people. This applies even to that great statesman, Disraeli, who after having fought the popular will, both on the Corn Law and in connection with the Reform laws, discovering that he was likely to lose in the end, risked the support of the landed gentry on his Tory policy, turned his coat, and adopted a more radical policy than that of the Liberal party, which he had previously opposed. This he explained by saying that his party had educated their masters.

The point is not whether public opinion as expressed by the votes of the people will be supreme in the long run. That is admitted. The question is, what is the most practical means by which an elected parliament will carry on the government of the country for the normal period for which it has been returned, and keep a proper balance between the democratic principle and the maintenance of a government which will respect itself, respect the House and respect the people. I quite admit with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) that if a great unforeseen question arises during the lifetime of a parliament, if the government, faced with the necessity of taking a stand on such a question, finds either through the House or from outside expressions of opinion that it cannot exercise its responsibilities and pass legislation on that question, it should ask for a dissolution in order to obtain a fresh mandate from the people on that particular matter. Such questions do arise once in a while, but they are rather infrequent. The other aspect of the question raised by several gentlemen on the opposite side presents itself at almost every session. The government brings down legislation which may be in the interests of the people, but which is imposed upon them by certain groups or large interests. If a portion of the majority is unwilling to accept such legislation by conviction, the ministers turn to those members and say, "Well, we are bound to bring it down, and if you do not accept it we will dissolve parliament." This is another aspect, a smaller one I admit but one which must not be disregarded; because, after all, the public life of a country, the standard of public morality and the public spirit are not to be measured by the attitude of parliament or of the people upon great or rare occasions, but by the daily life of the country and parliament; and everything which makes for the greater independence of parliament makes for the greater liberty of the people.

On the other hand I must say that I was quite shocked to hear the hon. gentleman asking this House to say that the majority shall decide whether or not dissolution could be granted. If this resolution were voted in this form it would simply strengthen the hands of a powerful and unscrupulous government to enforce upon the weak and time-serving majority that very dangerous power against which we are both protesting. The stronger and more unscrupulous the government, the more time-serving will be the majority at the back of that government, and if this resolution is voted where is the remedy?

Mr. CARMICHAEL: Does the hon. member mean that if the government have a strong following in the House they would be sustained and would not be granted a dissolution?

Mr. BOURASSA: My argument is that under the holy rule of democracy the more unscrupulous the government, the stronger it is with the people and with parliament. I must say that I have not much faith in democracy, in spite of all the millions we have spent to make it reign all over the world. Let us leave that for a moment, however, and turn back to something else. You have a government with a large number of followers interested individually in not going to the people, in not running the risk of an election. If the legislation proposed is unpopular and against the interests of the people but must be swallowed up for certain considerations, it is generally brought in at the beginning of a parliament. I have sat in this House in the olden times; I have studied the records of this parliament, and the more shameful a policy, the more detrimental it is to the interests of the people, the more generally it has been brought in by a strong government with a strong majority at the beginning of parliament. That has happened with all parties and if some of the followers said, "We cannot swallow that", the government replied, "Well, my good fellows, if you do not swallow it you will have to go to the people; if you do not stand by the government, will you stand by the opposition which you have fought? We have supplied you with electoral funds; where else will you get your moral help to convince the consciences of the people?" The result is that the stronger the government and the larger its majority, the greater is the tendency to impose any kind of legislation under threat of dissolution. Therefore I quite agree with the Minister of Justice, and I am quite sure my hon. friends opposite do not desire to bring this new-born democracy, with its feeble conscience, to the state of political morality which existed at the time of Disraeli and the remnants of the pocket boroughs. If we want to have some kind of practical administration we must prepare something similar to what the Americans have done; give to the people the absolute right to decide on certain occasion who their representatives will be, and then stand by the consequences for the time being. It is far better to have elections at a fixed date than have dissolution upon any pretence; and I would further say that neither the Governor General, the Lieutenant Governor nor any other single gentleman, at Rideau Hall or elsewhere, a man not representative of the people, should have that right; I will never stand for that. I would say that power should be reserved to the executive chosen by the majority of the House, and possessing the confidence of the House.

On any trivial matter, any measure which may be brought in by this or that minister, the House should be free to accept or refuse it, and let the government abide by the decision of the House. The people do not ask to be consulted in a general election upon any trifling bill which may be brought in by the Minister of the Interior, the Minister of Railways or anyone else; the people are more reasonable than they are sometimes represented. As the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has well said, they want to be consulted upon great measures of unforeseen consequences. For example, I know the people in my province felt indignant when this parliament, which had been elected on certain matters of administration, decided by an understanding reached between the two parties that we should go to war in Europe. That feeling of indignation spread all over the country, when the constitution of this country was violated to permit Liberals and Conservatives to sit for one year more than they had been elected for, in order to impose conscription on the people. Yes, the people feel indignant at these violations not only of British precedents, but of the most elementary rights of justice and common sense.

But if a minister proposes that a grant of money be made to build the Peace river railway or any other railway; if a minister brings in a measure for the administration of his department, let the House decide whether or not such a measure shall be supported or such a grant of money be voted. It is not necessary to disturb the business of the country and dissolve parliament for that. If the minister concerned considers that he is no longer able to fill his position in the cabinet, let him resign, something which is done frequently not only in France and other countries, but in Great Britain as well. I have not the precedents in mind at the moment, but I know something of the parliamentary history of Great Britain; and I know that such precedents could be quoted. One is coming to my mind, and from the records of a rather aristocratic government. When Macaulay was Secretary or Under-Secretary of State for India, he proposed something with regard to the government of India; he was defeated in the House of Commons, and the government wanted him to withdraw his measure. He said: No, I think it is necessary for the good government of India; therefore if I have to withdraw the measure, I will withdraw myself. So he resigned, but the government stayed in office. There was no cry of indignation; there was no ministerial crisis, and there was no appeal to the king to dissolve parliament. The government went on with the rest of its policy.

That is where I think we should and could meet the views of both the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael). We should find a via media between the British system and the American system. For my part, although I do not boast of it, I am attached to some British precedents, all those British precedents and traditions that agree with our needs and our conditions.

But there are other points of view. Everything which tends to multiply general elections in this country ought, I think, to be avoided unless necessary. In this again there is one feature entirely different in our country from conditions which prevail in the old country. This is a confederacy, it should not be forgotten. This is not a commonwealth; this is not one kingdom or one republic. We have nine provinces which have all their various problems to deal with, which have their legislatures and their executive powers. They appeal also to public opinion and to the public conscience through the press, informed or misinformed. The electors are the same; the ratepayer of Saskatchewan is the same elector who looks after the affairs of his province as the elector who looks after the affairs of this Dominion, and the same is true of the electors of Quebec, Ontario and elsewhere. Therefore, in Canada, as in every confederated country, the minds and activities of public spirited citizens are taxed more heavily than in a united country where all the affairs are dealt with by one parliament and executed by one government. As we have to go through the turmoil of general elections for provinces, for municipalities, for some other public bodies, and for federal affairs too, I deprecate the idea that we should have as frequent elections as they have had in England in the past.

Even in Great Britain the tendency has been in late years to avoid as much as possible unnecessary dissolutions. The Minister of Justice has just touched upon one incident quite recent in the history of government and parliamentary institutions, namely the awkward situation in which the British parliament found itself after an election—I do not remember the year just now—when there were three parties with no majority at the command of any one of them. The Liberals and the Tories agreed to this extent, that it would be better to let Mr. Ramsay MacDonald and the Labour party form a government. Of course, for anyone who knows something of the inside life of British politics, that is easy to understand. They thought Ramsay MacDonald would break his head so early that it would be to the advantage of the two old parties to let him take the risk. The moment they found out that he was in the process of giving to Great Britain the best government she had had for many years past, they agreed again to kill him.

Mr. McGIBBON: The people killed his government.

Mr. BOURASSA: My hon. friend will find out in a few years whether Ramsay MacDonald is killed or not. That is the game of party, as we all understand. In every country that brand of politics is to be found. They are no better or worse in Great Britain than we are here; we should not be either proud or ashamed of the difference. There is just about the same human nature everywhere. But evidently they discovered and they now know that the thinking and working democracy of Great Britain is tired of being appealed to from month to month by time-serving politicians.

Likewise, the people of Canada, do not care to have such frequent elections. The people who really consider and value their citizenship do not care to be called upon every six months or every year to pass through the turmoil of general elections. What they care about is that the men and parties that appeal to them, once elected and in parliament, should give them at least twenty-five per cent of their promises. The people are beginning to be more concerned about the results; and for that reason we should come to the point of combining the best part of the old traditional spirit of British government,—which was not democratic, which was entirely and thoroughly aristocratic, which was based upon contempt for the people, which meant simply the selection of a few individuals by a somewhat larger number of individuals,—and the best part of the American system of government, which has its dangers, which threatens not only the American people but the world at large with the domination of plutocracy taking the place of the old landed gentry which governed England, but which nevertheless offers some examples that we might make use of.

Can we not have faith in ourselves, I will not say in our genius, but simply in our common sense, to try to adapt to our conditions such measures or systems of government which may or may not exist elsewhere, without asking ourselves: Has that been borne and brought up under the British flag? Does this bear the English or the French stamp? Let us endeavour to build something by ourselves out of our own common sense, taking advantage of course of what is good and what has produced good elsewhere, endeavouring also to avoid the dangers and the clap-traps into which other countries have fallen. If we do that, it will be quite possible to devise a system which will not prevent any majority from declaring that the government has lost its confidence and should go to the people. I would keep that part of the British precedent, because that, instead of being a club in the hands of ten men against two hundred, would be a club in the hands of two hundred men against ten. It would be far more effective. I quite admit that it will take a long time before a truly party majority will make use of that club against its own government; but nevertheless, leave in the hands of a majority of the House to declare that the government has lost its confidence, and therefore that an appeal should be made to the people. I think this would meet the object of the motion of the hon. gentleman, as well as the object of the motion standing on the order paper in the name of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland). Unless there is a decided vote given by the majority of the House to defeat the government and send it to the people, I claim that we should follow the American system and declare that the House shall not be dissolved until the expiration of the five years for which it is elected.

As regards the prerogatives of the Governor General, I hope that nobody and no group in this House will stand up and ask us to go back on a principle which now stands unchallenged in every country where floats the British flag. I am not apt to wave the British flag, but I hope that gentlemen in this House who are prepared to wave it upon all occasions and sing "God Save the King" on every street corner, will be prepared to stand up here and say that in the House of Commons of Canada we are not prepared to go one hundred and fifty years back of the people of Great Britain, back of the people of Australia, of New Zealand, and of every other country which acknowledges the British king as its sovereign. There is not a teacher of law, there is not a statesman, there is not a public man under the British flag in any other country but Canada, who would claim to-day that the king, or in any part of the king's dominions, the representative of the king, has the right to dissolve parliament unless it is by the advice of his legal counsellors.

I hope hon. gentlemen will forgive me a little heat upon that point. Of course, it is in the blood; but I hope also that hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House will realize that if I have taken a somewhat unexpected share in this debate it is because I earnestly hope that all men of goodwill will join hands to see that in the functioning of our representative institutions there shall be a growth, a development which will both satisfy the need which has been well presented by the hon. gentleman, and as to which a great many people in the country feel as he does and desire a remedy for that situation, and at the same time keep in view the principles which the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has laid down. It seems to me that this is a subject which might usefully occupy the minds of a few hon. gentlemen in some committee of the House. It would certainly be as useful and as timely a subject to engage their attention as the amendment of the rules of the House, which subject is to be brought before this body within a few days. There is no doubt that the people in the country feel uneasy at the uncertainty of government and of legislation. They feel that at times too much legislation is forced upon a weak government by some group holding in its hands the power to maintain or overthrow that government. They also feel that very often weak representatives of the people let a strong or daring government impose upon them legislation against their conscience and against the interests of the people they represent. We must have more freedom, we must have more order, and we must also have a little more businesslike spirit in the working of our institutions.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): Mr. Speaker, I wish to add only a very few sentences to this very interesting and, to my mind, very important debate. I was not surprised that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) defended the present system. I have, as has been said by other members of this group, a very great respect for the Minister of Justice, but the people who benefit from a certain system are almost always found in the ranks of its defenders.

If I understand the speech of the Minister of Justice the leading point in it was that the cabinet knew better than the members of the House of Commons what the people of the country wanted. As a matter of fact, I think they know much less about what the people want than do the members of the House of Commons, and for a very good reason; they have not the chance to know. I have said that before. When ministers go to their own constituencies there is such a terrific pow-wow made about them that they never happen to hear what the people are really thinking. They are welcomed everywhere with respect and a great show of elation and so they do not get to know, as we common individuals do, what are the people's thoughts on specific questions. I do not think there is any doubt about that, and I am amazed at the modesty of the Minister of Justice that he should stand up here and say that he and his colleagues in the cabinet know more about what the people in nine provinces want than do the representatives from the 245 constituencies. I think we must all admit, I think even the most partisan, even the most blind, must admit that a gradual but continuing change is coming over our form of government. Responsible government once meant being responsible to the crown. However, gradually a change has come about until responsible government to-day does not mean responsibility to the crown; it means responsibility to the people, and so the House of Commons, being the chamber in which the representatives of the people sit, is the most important part of the government of Canada or of Great Britain. If it is not, at least it ought to be, and to my mind it will not be so very long before the cabinet is what I once heard the Minister of Finance say in a previous parliament that it was—a committee of the House of Commons. It is, of course, not that, but it ought to be, and I think as we become seized of the fact that responsible government does mean government responsible to the people, we will also come to know that a cabinet should be a committee that is responsible to the House of Commons; and if they are not responsible to the House of Commons, they are not useful, and there should be some way in which we can get rid of them.

I think everyone who has sat in this House knows that very many times government supporters are forced—I think that word is not too strong—into supporting measures for which they have no use at all, simply to avoid having their leader, the Prime Minister of the country, go and ask for a dissolution of parliament, and thereby bring upon our heads that which members of parliament dislike most, a general election. I recall, and I am sure you do, too, Mr. Speaker, the time when Mr. Andrew McMaster, then member for Brome, introduced a resolution that cabinet ministers should not hold directorships in great companies. I yet recall the sullen faces of the Liberal members when they were forced—I use that word advisedly —to vote against that resolution which they themselves, a very few months before had, almost all, if not all, supported.

Mr. BOURASSA: Their masters had educated them.

Miss MACPHAIL: Yes. I remember some of them were so angry that we did not see them in the chamber for some days afterwards. That sort of thing is bad for the character—yes, it is bad for their disposition, as my seatmate says, but it is bad for the character, and if they stay in the House of Commons and are continually put in a position where they must vote against their honest convictions, I am afraid they will cease—well, one hates to say it—to have honest convictions. The system of government that brings about a condition like that is a very bad system.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Hear, hear.

Miss MACPHAIL: It has been argued tonight by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, who spoke so eloquently and held us with such interest, that where a party had a majority in the House, if they voted together, they could at any time by a vote of the Commons bring about a dissolution. But we must admit—and I know that some members will do it with very great reluctance —that in Canada we are not as much wedded to the two-party system of government as we used to be, and that there are growing up in Canada economic groups—you can call them class groups if you like, because that is what they are—which are the result of an organization in the country. These groups come here to speak with the voice of a particular industry. I am one such. There are many of us in this corner of the House. We have no particular interest in party government. We do not care which party is the government. We care very much what kind of legislation they offer us, but the name of the party itself is of no personal concern to us, and so it seems to me, as this thing continues—and I think there is no doubt it is going to continue—that some new way of carrying on government in this House must be found, and that a time will come—and surely this resolution is one step towards it—when members will be liberated and able to express their honest convictions. Of course it sounds revolutionary, but I do not think it is so dangerous. The time will come when members can vote on issues as they arise, whether they are government measures or not, and when they, the members of the House of Commons, believe that it is in the best interests of all the people to bring about a general election, my faith in the members of the House of Commons is sufficient to believe that they will bring about a general election, and are more likely to bring it about at a time when it is in the general interest and for the welfare of the general public than are a few men who are known as the members of the cabinet.

I do not intend to continue my speech, which is not really a speech. I entreat hon. members—I was going to say hon gentlemen; it would be all right for me to say that, because so many of you say hon. gentlemen, but hon. members is a better expression—I entreat hon. members not to close their eyes to the fact that changes are taking place in Canada, first in the organization in the constituency. The old bluff stuff, even with lots of money behind it, does not work as it used to do. There is an organized electorate which has a collective intelligence and they are exercising it, and so we had better get rid of the old system, as the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) said, and use our own common sense in the creation of a system that suits our own conditions. We can do it if we forget all the precedents that ever were.

Mr. T. W. BIRD (Nelson): Unlike the hon. lady from Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail), I was somewhat surprised at the stand the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) took against this proposed improvement in our methods of doing business in this House. I had usually associated the hon. member with a certain fine elasticity of mind and with a spirit that was attuned to democracy, but somehow or other the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Kennedy) must have caught the blind spot in his eye to-night. I was so much impressed with the speech of the hon. member that I thought it was worthy of at least my support. I am glad there are not many voices in this House—they seem to be a diminishing quantity—that are prepared to speak out on behalf of widening the elbow room in this chamber for Canadian democracy.

This power of cabinets to dissolve parliament is one of those vestigial things that come down to us not from times when men climbed trees but when certain classes of men found themselves up trees and sought an easy way to climb down. It is a curious thing that in the growth of our British constitution that power was wrested from the hands of autocracy and handed down to the people in very short stages. When they took this power from the monarch they did not place it immediately into the hands of the people, but placed it in the hands of the oligarchy, and there it has remained ever since to the detriment of democracy.

Mr. BOURASSA: That was Cromwell's work.

Mr. BIRD: Like all things of this character that have outlived their usefulness, that time has caused to seem uncouth, it has become a kind of incubator of disease in the body politic. I feel sure myself that this power, remaining beyond its time, outgrowing its usefulness and purpose, has had a pernicious influence upon our government. It has provided a means whereby governments, oligarchies, small cliques of men, have been able to club popular assemblies into insensibility towards the wishes of the people. It is a sad thing, the influence that popular assemblies, so-called, have upon the members who from time to time are sent to them. It does not require very much to take the edge off those fine sentiments with which men first make their appearance in these assemblies. It does not take much, it seems, to dilute those high principles which animate our breast when first we make our entry into these places. One of the things that is most responsible for killing these enthusiasms, for destroying these attachments to high principles is the influence of the party whip. What is it that gives to the party whip his power, his torpedo-like effect upon the followers of a government? When he draws out the black snake and cracks it over the heads of his party's followers, then enthusiasms decay and evaporate. Why is it? Simply because we have allowed to survive into our age of democracy this vestige of times gone by when it may have had some use to buttress autocracy, but never to strengthen democracy.

I am sure that this out-of-date practice also fosters what I may call opportunism in government. This does not need very much fostering, because in times gone by it has been the very spirit of the politician. But here is something that deliberately fosters opportunism in government. It allows governments to lengthen their term of office—I am arguing contrary to the Minister of Justice; it is just as legitimate one way or the other—I say it permits governments to prolong their life until they think it is opportune to consult the people. Here we are in parliament supposed to be transacting the people's business, but from election to election we sit gazing out of the window wondering what kind of political weather it is going to be instead of transacting the people's business. We have our eye upon the political barometer. My hon. friend says that governments keep their eyes on by-elections, and that as the mercury rises or falls, it determines the length of life of governments. I may have made a mistake in checking up my hon. friend on the dates he mentions, but I remember that in 1874 when Gladstone went to the country because he felt that the political barometer was falling his government was succeeded by the Disraeli government, one of the most inept, retrograde, shallow and inefficient governments that ever held office in England. Throughout their term of office they scanned the political horizon and when they thought the barometer was rising—several by-elections went in their favour—they appealed to the country. What happened? They were severely beaten. The political barometer failed them, why should not it fail at any other time? In our own experience we know there has been such a failure. The political barometer proved to be misleading as recently as last session. What was it then that impelled the government of the day to go to the country but their sizing up of the political situation? You know, Mr. Speaker, as well as I do that not ten per cent of the people were wanting an election last year; they were wanting legislation, as the member for Southeast Grey said. Nevertheless they got an election, and they got it because of this outworn practice that we have saddled upon us in this democratic age. Here we have political parties watching the clouds. As the Scripture says, when you watch the clouds you do not sow. That is one reason why parliaments are so sterile in legislation—most of the time is spent between looking back to the last election and forward to the next.

I think this custom is out of keeping with present-day parliamentary conditions. As the member for Southeast Grey said, the members of the older groups in this House have always deliberately refused to recognize the emergence of the third party. We are in the age of the multi-group system; groups have come to stay. The fact that the group I represent in this parliament sits partly on one side of the House and partly on the other does not, I think, make much difference. Personally I feel sorry in a sense to see my colleagues sitting over on the other side of the chamber, but perhaps it is due from me to say to the House that it might be as well for those who do not understand the situation not to try to derive too much comfort from seeing some of my colleagues on the benches opposite. I think my colleagues there will agree with me that in the last five years, in Manitoba at any rate, there has been no fundamental change in the opinion of the people; they are not one whit more attached to the bi-party system to-day than they were in 1921. I say to my friends of both parties that if I were in their position I would not presume too much from the fact, regrettable enough to me, that some of my colleagues are sitting where they are to-night.

I want to say that it is an insult to the democratic spirit that has manifested itself throughout the country in the last six years to make almost deliberate attempts to disintegrate the third party both in this House and in the country. It cannot be done. There is such a momentum behind the movement that all this petty obstruction can have only a momentary effect. I would have been proud, indeed gratified, if the Minister of Justice speaking, as he presumably does, for the government, had assumed a more generous attitude towards this measure of reform that has been put before us to-night. I do not say that it is sufficient. I think possibly it has a serious defect.

I could not see very much difference between the position taken by my hon. friend (Mr. Bourassa) and that of the member for Kindersley, except perhaps that one was a little more stringent than the other. After all, these things are but details in a wider system of renovation which is overdue in our Canadian parliament. Anyone who knows parliament, who has had experience of it, knows that out of all its turmoil, out of all its labours, there comes forth precious little in the way of advanced legislation for the benefit of the people. And why is that? Is it not reasonable to assume that it is because of the antiquated system to which we are clinging? From my own observation I am sure it is. Parliament is not functioning as it should function in a democratic country; the voice of the people is stifled the moment it tries to find expression in this House. The moment the will of the people tries to express itself, it is cribbed, cabined and confined in this very place which traditionally is supposed to stand for the rights of all. Why should any Liberal quarrel with a new and rising democracy? When this new spirit of democracy, this clamant call of the people for better representation, makes itself felt here, why should it be restrained? Why should it not be given every reasonable encouragement? Is not this the home of democratic institutions? This is the place that has been reared through generations to welcome the voice and the spirit of the people. We cannot therefore take this resolution lightly to-night. While it may be very inadequate, yet it points to something that is eating at the very vitals of our public life.

A few days ago I received from one of our outstanding newspapers a pamphlet aimed at converting me to the system of Mussolini in Italy. Why should an intelligently conducted journal try to foist that system on Canada? Because evidently it sees its opportunity; it sees some vital debility in the present system. But are we believers in British constitutional development going to listen to the wild, thoughtless, wrecking advice of a capitalistic newspaper and overturn the traditions of our beloved country simply because, being subsidized, that newspaper is able to pamphleteer us? Let us act like reasonable men and try to keep our constitutional development along the sound lines that have been laid down by our British statesmen in days gone by. Those men were not perfect; they shapd their policies to fit in with the needs and the state of devlopment in the time in which they lived. But their vision was far-reaching nevertheless.

I do not think we can take the speech of the Minister of Justice very seriously because, in my opinion at any rate, it represents no fundamental philosophy in his own mind. I would much rather believe that he is on the side of the angels with respect to these things; if he is not, he should be. In looking up a reference a short while ago, explaining why Gladstone became disheartened, went to the country, and finally retired from the leadership of his party, I found a very interesting passage. Mr. Chamberlain, who at that time was the strongest radical in British politics, was himself dragging Mr. Gladstone, Napoleon-like, into his Elba. Chamberlain advised the Liberals at that time to vote against the government of their party until they should learn the Liberal alphabet sufficiently well to be able to spell the first words of the Liberal cause. He repeated that throughout the length and breadth of England, with the result that the Liberal government was turned out of power. They had to learn the alphabet of liberalism. I do not think we heard the alphabet of liberalism to-night from the lips of the Minister of Justice. We heard a strange language, a foreign accent,—

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am not responsible for that.

Mr. BIRD: I was referring to the hon. gentleman's mental accent.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Oh, I see.

Mr. BIRD: I was talking in the realm of mental and moral things. And I say it sincerely, and not at all in any captious spirit, because I am thoroughly convinced that what the minister said to-night was not inspired by anything he can find in the story of Liberalism. He will search in vain the lives of Liberal statesmen, he will read Liberal textbooks as much as he likes, he will find nothing at all in keeping with the spirit of the little address he gave us to-night.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): I do not propose at this late hour to go fully into this question, important though it is. I believe however that it is of sufficient importance to merit greater consideration than the House will be able to give it to-night. Unlike the previous speaker (Mr. Bird), I was rather impressed with the argument of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), although not with the whole of it. Certainly I think he presented the constitutional principle at its very best, and there is something well worth safeguarding in that principle. On the other hand, I should hope that the Minister of Justice would be willing to admit that the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) is trying to remove from the practice of parliament something that is a real grievance and hindrance, both to democracy and to the best interests of the House. The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) has presented both sides of the question clearly to us. Judging from the remarks of the Minister of Justice it would be surprising to me if this resolution were to pass. I think his very utterance, under the present practice of parliament, draws to his support every member on the other side of the House who belongs to his party, and that being so the resolution will of course be lost. I believe, on the other hand, that if a committee were appointed to study the question, or if one of the standing committees were delegated to take it into consideration and discuss it, something might possibly develop which could be adopted. It is obvious to everyone that the chief thing we are trying to get away from in the resolution is the power which a prime minister wields in parliament by his continual threat to dissolve parliament if certain legislation is not passed. That is the most important point implied in the resolution. Therefore, in view of the importance of the resolution, and also in the hope that with greater or more mature consideration some means will be found whereby the principle set forth by the Minister of Justice, and the one emphasized by the hon. member for Kindersley, may be embodied in one practice, I move seconded by Mr. Spencer, that the resolution be amended by adding the words, "That this resolution be referred to the committee on rules of the House."

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): It is so seldom that I have an opportunity of agreeing with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) that even at this late hour I am not going to let the opportunity pass of saying that I do agree with him in the stand that he takes in regard to this resolution. The Minister of Justice stated that the will of the people was above even the will of parliament, and if that is so I would like to say that in the last election the party on this side of the House, of which I am a humble member, polled more of the popular vote than did the parties represented by the Minister of Justice and the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael). Therefore, in so far as public opinion is concerned, I may find myself at variance with the minister.

I do not intend to take many minutes at this late hour to discuss this question. We have listened to the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), who has certainly a very extensive vocabulary and who does not intend that any part of that vocabulary shall grow rusty through disuse. I will readily admit that he is a fluent and interesting speaker at all times; perhaps more interesting when you hear him first than when you hear him later on because of his frequent repetitions and all-embracing generalities which come up in almost every speech. If the remarks of the hon. member for Labelle had any meaning at all they meant in one part that we should adopt the cast iron, iron clad system of the United States. But apparently that did not suit him, nor did the motion of the hon. member for Kindersley please him. That is not unnatural with the hon. member for Labelle; in fact that is playing true to form, When has any person known the hon. member to agree with any person, any party, or any individual except the hon. member for Labelle?

I can easily understand the attitude of the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) and the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird), in their desire to hang on to their seats for five years, no matter what the circumstances are. When a person will cut short a trip across the Atlantic in order to try to keep in power a party which that person has already denounced as unfit to hold the reigns of office; when a person will "inadvertently" cast his vote to keep that party in power, I can well understand the attitude of those hon. members this evening in saying that parliament should extend over the full term of five years no matter what the circumstances may be, in order that they may hold the seats which they now represent.

The hon. member for Labelle frequently pays tributes, in that tone of voice and attitude which generally characterize all his utterances, to the British constitution and British institutions, but he generally endeavours to find something with which he endeavours to discredit them afterwards. So he said, with that flourish not of trumpets but of arms, with that acrobatic performance which nearly always goes with his speeches in this House, "We must not accept British precedents and British practices because they are British." All I have to say, Mr. Speaker, and I say it to the hon. member for Labelle and need say it to no others in this House, that neither do we have to discard British practices and British precedents because they are British. I think we are on pretty safe ground in following the practice of the mother of parliaments in regard to this matter, as we might very well follow them in regard to many other matters, and as most of the civilized countries in the world have followed them also. I believe that our course here is far more democratic and more in conformity with the will of the people than is the practice across the line in the United States of America.

It was said by one of the speakers, if not by the hon. member for Labelle, that the government might use its power of dissolution as a threat or club over hon. members to force them into submission. That is not a practice which I will endorse or which should be endorsed, but I venture to submit that it is no worse for the government to do that, having on their shoulders the responsibility of carrying on government, than it was for the hon. member for Labelle to rise in his place in this House last session and convey to the government the threat that unless they changed certain legislation he would tell something that took place in a secret conference in 1905. Who was holding a club in that case? I do not think it any worse for the government to exercise its right of dissolution than it was for certain hon. gentlemen from the city of Winnipeg to exercise their power and authority in this House last session and say to the government, "Give us this legislation or give us that, or out you go." It may be that the government may see fit to dissolve parliament, but it seems to me that according to human nature as exemplified by this government, they are not very apt to dissolve parliament short of the legal term. I think we can take it for granted that they will hang on as long as they possibly can, at least I am convinced that I have seen evidences to that effect on several occasions. But I can conceive that it may be possible for circumstances to arise in the country whereby a certain matter may come up which will agitate Canada from one end to the other, and where the government must take a firm stand.

I want to say here that I do not agree with the hon. member for Southeast Grey when she says that the ordinary member of parliament is in a better position to get public opinion than are members of the cabinet. I disagree with that absolutely, because it is the business of the cabinet, selected from all parts of the country, to make themselves familiar with public opinion on all great questions. If the government of the country take a stand on a question; they are a number of men bound together and acting together, and if certain other men take the opposite side on a question which is agitating the country from the Atlantic to the Pacific, then I say it is right for the government to tell the others. "We believe we are right; we may be in the minority in the House, but we believe the people of the country are with us, and believing that we will submit this question to the people." In that case they should not be dictated to by a few individuals in this House representing any class or group who think they hold the upper hand and can force the government to do what they will.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, taking into consideration all these matters I am inclined to agree with the position taken by the Minister of Justice. I listened of course with attention and interest to the remarks made by hon. gentlemen and the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) in the southeast corner of the House, the Progressives. If democracy has been smashed to splinters in the opinion of those hon. members, if the liberties of the people are being violated and all that sort of thing, why do they not use their great influence in Manitoba and Alberta, where they have Progressive governments, and get them to institute such a system out there? Have they done that? Not that I have heard.

Mr. SPENCER: Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): When? They have not produced any results. They will produce no more results if they try it out there than they will produce here. They have not invaded the field out there; they have not used their perfervid eloquence in taking up this question with the Progressive governments of Manitoba and Alberta, telling them where they were wrong and how they were trampling on the liberties of the people and infringing the sacred rights of democracy. No, hon. gentlemen will leave all that, come down to this parliament, and tell us that we are all going to the political bow-wows because we do not see just as the political group in that corner sees on this question.

I repeat what I said in the beginning. Having regard to the situation in the old country, to the development of democratic institutions there under the British system, because that is what he have had, the recognition of the rights of the people in that land where for centuries they have developed their institutions, and having regard at all times to the will of the people, I say that that is a very good and safe course for us to follow, and I for one believe that to depart from that course and to take away from the government of this country, whatever government it may be, the right to be guided according to what it believes to be the will of the people and, in any great crisis arising, to dissolve parliament and ascertain the will of the people, will be a retrograde step. I close by using again the sentence which I uttered in the beginning, namely, that I am glad on this occasion to take a few minutes in order to place myself in accord with the hon. gentleman for whom I have a great respect so far as his personality is concerned, but for whose politics I have very little use.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am bound to return the compliment to the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) and I am really pleased to see that for once we are in agreement. I believe that I am right notwithstanding.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): That was the very point that bothered me.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I was pleased that one of his arguments at least was an answer to the hon. member for Southeast Grey, whose suggestion that my stand in the matter might be influenced by the benefits I received from the present system was not altogether fair. As the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington said, I think any benefit there would be from the present system in having a secure government and a safe position in the council would be as great as it would be if the motion of the hon. member were adopted.

Miss MACPHAIL: Is the hon. member assuming that the cabinet knows better than members of the House of Commons what the people want?

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is another question entirely, but I may assure my hon. friend that I am discussing this on a matter of principle and not of self-interest. That is not my way in the public life of Canada.

Miss MACPHAIL: I was not attaching any blame or trying to say that the Minister of Justice was personally benefiting any more than any one else under the system, but it is quite a secure position for the cabinet when the very last word comes out of their own mouths.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Well, the words were unfortunate. The hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) did not attach any self-interest to me in the matter, but he rather inferred that he was sorry for my Liberalism. Really I think that when I am keeping company with Gladstone, Asquith, Sir Edward Grey and Campbell Bannerman, I am with fairly good Liberals.

Miss MACPHAIL: And the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have said already that I am right notwithstanding. I think I may fairly repeat that the British system is the truly democratic system. Reference has been made to-night to those practices in the past in England when they had an aristocratic government and corrupt boroughs. There was such a time in England and it took perhaps centuries for the people to get all their liberties, one after the other. They fought for those liberties; but there is no other system in the world—and I am proud to proclaim this to-night—which is as truly a popular and democratic system as the British one at present.

Miss MACPHAIL: Is the British system finished?

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is not finished; but we must not go back; we must improve. I may remind my hon. friend that a change is not always a reform. There are changes which are retrograde and this would not be a reform. As regards the amendment, surely it cannot be expected that we should send a motion of this kind to a committee to amend or change the rules of the House. This is not a question of precedent; it is a question of principle, and personally I am not going to entrust any committee of my fellow members to decide my principles for me.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. F. P. QUINN (Halifax): I may be out of order, Mr. Speaker, but I was in my seat when the vote on the amendment was being taken, and I wish to record my vote for the amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: I will ask the clerk to state whether or not he recorded the vote cast by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Quinn).

The CLERK: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think it should be recorded, because first of all, he was in his seat when the question was put, and Bourinot says at page 381:

> If a member who has heard the question put does not vote, and the attention of the Speaker is directed to the fact, the latter will call upon him to declare on which side he votes: and his name will be recorded accordingly.

In the present instance, the hon. member was, as he says, in the House when the question was put. He had not made up his mind whether or not he would support the amendment when the vote on it was being taken, but later on, when the vote against the amendment was being taken, he made up his mind and stated that he wished to support the amendment. Under these circumstances I am justified in saying that his vote should be recorded. The question is now on the main motion.

Mr. CAHAN: I think there are very good grounds indeed, Mr. Speaker, why a resolution of this kind should not be referred to the committee on the rules and practices of this House, but I think the subject, if there is time and an opportunity offers, is worthy of further consideration by this House, and as the hour is now late, I would move the adjournment of the debate on the main motion.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe, the House adjourned at 11.50 p.m.

The House met at three o'clock

ATHABASKA ELECTION

REFERENCE OF REPORTS OF MR. JUSTICE CLARKE TO PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS COMMITTEE

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I beg to move:

> That the interim and final reports respectively of the Hon. Mr. Justice Clarke, commissioner appointed to inquire into the alleged existence of corrupt or illegal practices in the election held in the electoral district of Athabaska, in the province of Alberta, on the 29th of October, 1925, which reports were laid on the table of the House on December 15, 1926, be referred to the select standing committee on privileges and elections.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): May I ask my hon. friend to explain what is the purpose of sending these reports to the privileges and elections committee?

Mr. KENNEDY: Possibly, Mr. Speaker, as this is a new parliament I had better give a few facts to the House regarding the petition, and at least one reason why these reports ought to be referred to that committee.

A petition was presented to this House in the early part of last session, on February 1st, I think, signed by A. C. Berry, of the electoral district of Athabaska, in the province of Alberta, alleging that illegal and corrupt practices had extensively prevailed in that election. The House received that petition, and a motion passed the House on March 18, 1926, for the appointment of a commissioner to conduct an investigation. On July 10th, the Hon. Mr. Justice Clarke, of Alberta, was appointed as commissioner, and he conducted the investigation, and made, as is stated in the motion, two reports to the government. In his interim report he stated that corrupt and illegal practices had extensively prevailed in that constituency. Further in that report he mentioned certain polls, a dozen or more I think, in which there was a tremendous amount of fraud committed such as stuffing ballot boxes, forging returns and other documents. He did not in his report make recommendations further than simply to present the findings of his investigation to the government and the House. It seems to me that one purpose at least—there may be others—is to examine the findings of Mr. Justice Clarke and to ascertain if it is not possible to provide ways and means whereby it will be impossible in the future to conduct elections in Canada in that manner.

Mr. D. F. KELLNER (Athabaska): Mr. Speaker, before this motion is carried there are a few things that I would like to say regarding the motion to refer this petition to the committee on privileges and elections. While the commissioner held an extensive investigation and made a report, there are several things in connection with it which he did not deal with at all and which in fact he had no power to deal with. The report will show that a large number of individuals were guilty of corruption, illegal practices and such like. A certificate of indemnity was given to election officials covering the charge of forging ballots, putting their names on ballots which they were not so authorized to initial, and offences of that kind, but the commissioner did not deal and had no power to deal with a large number of other offences. For instance, the report will show that some of them were guilty of forgery, that is, that they had forged cheques which had been sent out to pay the expenses of election officials and had cashed those cheques and obtained the money. The report will also show that some of them were guilty of perjury; that they gave false evidence when called before the commission. Surely no one will argue that the commissioner had any authority to grant certificates of indemnity covering those cases, but the result is that those people have not been punished to date, and so far as I know no notice has been taken of the matter.

Mr. STEVENS: I did not quite catch what the hon. member said. Do I understand that these parties to whom he refers are in the government service?

Mr. KELLNER: Some of them are and I will deal with that in a minute if my hon. friend will let me pass it for the moment. It might be well to give a little review of the whole situation that was planned for this election. In the first place the returning officer's office was at a point called Lac la Biche about a hundred miles away from the centre of settlement. There is a twice-a-week train service in that part of the country; there is only one highway running north and south reaching the point and it is not readily accessible. To the returning officer being allowed to operate at that point the electors took very serious objection. They objected to the Chief Electoral Officer, requesting that he move the returning officer. If the Chief Electoral Officer were not acquainted with that constituency, one might fairly assume that he did not himself know the situation; but he lived in the city of Edmonton for a good number of years, having been as a matter of fact a law partner in the firm of Short & Cross, the latter being one of the candidates in the election. Therefore, he must have had a considerable knowledge covering the whole situation.

The next point was that they selected as returning officer a man who admitted on the witness stand that he could neither read nor write. They did bring in two aides for him who could read and write. In fact they sent down to Seattle and they brought back two men, one named Lawler and the other Deyl to run this election. I am sure the name of Deyl will be quite familiar to some of those who have been in the Liberal party in western Canada for a number of years. I would be much surprised if the Minister of the Interior had not heard of Mr. Deyl in the old days.

Mr. STEWART: Quite often.

Mr. KELLNER: When liquor licenses were granted in Alberta, he was the man who used to go around to the hotel keepers telling them that unless they made a contribution to the campaign funds, their licenses would not be renewed. He was a revenue producer. Mr. Lawler is also well known to some of my Liberal friends. I would be surprised if the hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Blatchford) did not know him. I believe he rendered very effective assistance in the civic election in 1925. These two men came in and took control of the elections. To begin with the registrars refused to send out voters' lists and the committee that was in charge of that campaign in that election protested strenuously to the returning officer and to the Chief Electoral Officer. When polling day came we had in our possession something less than 100 lists out of a total of 235. That may seem a small matter, but when you come to examine the lists it will be very apparent that the plugging of those voters' lists was a part of the whole scheme of corruption. For instance, on the list covering the poll at Venice, there were 105 names, and the return from the poll showed that ninety-five people had come to vote, ninety-four of them voting for Mr. Cross and one ballot being rejected.

Mr. CHAPLIN: How did that happen?

Mr. KELLNER: They were experienced men. They should not have had a rejected ballot. On an investigation of the names on the voters' lists it was found that there were probably thirty to thirty-five actually resident in the district. They were all on the list. Evidently the registrar started to put other names on the list, names of people who did not exist and who had not existed for quite a few years. As a matter of fact we found the name of one man who had been dead for twelve years and the return from the poll showed that a ballot had been polled under his name. Another man had been dead for three years. There were several men who had been out of the country for quite a number of years, including the priest of that district who was at the moment visiting in Italy. His name was, however, recorded in the voters' list as having gone to the poll and voted. It seemed also that in the compilation of the voters' lists they were endeavouring to break even between the males and the females, and when they put the priest's name on the list, to make the thing even they put the priest's wife's name on also. That is one registrar to whose being paid we objected, but a cheque was issued and went out covering the compilation of that list.

Another case which I would like to cite is that of three polls that were held in the forest reserve where nobody lives and where nobody is allowed to live. But those were not all the polls that were held there by any means. The evidence shows that three deputy returning officers were instructed to take ballot boxes on election morning, follow up a trail that runs across this reserve, get back off the road about a half mile so that if anybody passed, they would not be seen, get into the bush and hold the election. All of this they did. Then they took the ballot boxes down to the Hudson's Bay store and proceeded to put in the ballots.

Now, is there any reason why this government should send out cheques for the compilation of those lists and to pay those deputy returning officers and poll clerks? Yet that is precisely what has been done. We have heard of election irregularities in England, where there have been two or three outstanding cases, but there the electorate itself actually lost its head and either polled a corrupt vote or refused to allow some of the voters to exercise the franchise. This is a different case entirely. So far as this investigation shows, there is no evidence of any corruption on the part of the electorate; the corruption has been entirely on the part of the officials who were running the election. Inasmuch as those officials are the servants of this parliament, I think it is our duty to give due consideration to this case and to make certain that no future election in this country shall be conducted in a similar way.

One other charge was mentioned a moment ago. A close scrutiny of those election officials will show that a large percentage of them are civil servants holding positions under the federal government. Take, for instance, one of the polls mentioned in this report, that at Lac la Biche. One of those who was found guilty of having put ballots in the box of people that never came to vote and was disfranchised—that is practically the only penalty the commissioner could enforce—is the postmaster of that village; he is also the sub land agent and in charge of the Dominion government telegraph service. I was notified this morning that he has resigned as postmaster. But it is four months since the report was made, it is two months since it was laid on the table, and all the time that man has been acting as postmaster and sub land agent and has been in control of the government telegraph service.

When those men who held the poll in the forest reserve were asked who told them to do so, they said it was a man by the name of Harry Bowtell. This Harry Bowtell is a rather interesting character—and also a civil servant. He is the postmaster at Frog Lake. He has held the office for seventeen years. I think he is also a sub land agent. I do know he is in charge of the Dominion government telegraph office. His wife is the assistant postmistress, and she admitted that when the cheques were being sent in the name of people who did not exist she had knowledge that a couple of the cheques were coming to that office. As of course she knew no one would call for them, she signed the registration book for one cheque and got her thirteen-year-old daughter to sign for the other. Then they endorsed the cheques and cashed them. And yet Dominion government cheques have been sent to pay those people for such services in spite of the protests made by the people of Athabaska. We wrote letter after letter to Ottawa trying to stop payment of those election officials, but a deaf ear was turned to our protests; those officials were paid.

I do not want to go into all these irregularities, there are so many of them, and I do not know that it is advisable to even attempt to do so. My purpose is to point out that these irregularities have been brought to the attention of the government, and that the government has taken no effective way of dealing with them. The members of the government practically shut their eyes to the whole thing. Section 87 of the Dominion Elections Act says that:

Any person who is, in any proceeding in which after notice of the charge he has had an opportunity of being heard, found guilty of any corrupt practice or of any illegal practice, or of any offence which is a corrupt practice or illegal practice; shall, in addition to any other punishment for such offence by this or any other act prescribed be, for a corrupt practice during the seven years or for an illegal practice during the five years, next after the date of his being so reported, convicted, ordered, or found guilty, incapable of being elected to or of sitting in the House of Commons or of voting at any election of a member of that House or of holding any office in the nomination of the crown or of the Governor General in Canada.

I think that must have been inserted in order to give parliament special jurisdiction over these officials. True, under the criminal code, as under the Election Act, penalties are prescribed which can be enforced by a court, but this section applies particularly to the government and to parliament. In accordance with its terms these men were incompetent to hold any government position at the time that report was made, but we find they are still retained as government officials.

I charged a moment ago that the government has not taken any effective measures to wipe out this revolting situation. I think I can go a step further and very truthfully say that wherever that machine was weakened by reason of this investigation those behind it have tried to make good the damage and in fact to strengthen their organization. In the village of Warspite the post office had been conducted in a store. The storekeeper sold out last fall. His successor was appointed postmaster by the postal inspector of that district. That man is reported to have been a very efficient postmaster. The post office guide shows that about eighty-five families get their mail at that post office. A petition signed by 150 people was sent to the Postmaster General's department that that man be left in charge of the post office, but a month or six weeks ago word came from Ottawa that the position must be taken away from him and given to another man. Every man and woman in the district signed that petition except seven. Evidently seven people in that district had influence enough to have the transfer made. I leave it to the House to say what is behind the transfer. Certainly the transfer was not made because the new man was going to give better service. No one could argue that. If you are getting service that is satisfactory to 153 out of 160 people you are doing mighty well, and you are not safe in making any change.

[Mr. Kellner.]

Now, shortly before Christmas the French-Canadians of this country had a reunion at Ste. Anne de Beaupre. To that reunion came a Mr. Giroux, member of the legislative assembly of Alberta. It is interesting to learn how he obtained the money to pay his expenses. The head office of the Dominion government telegraph service in Alberta is at Edmonton, in charge of a man named Elmer. He sent out what is called a "twenty-three." It is a message sent over the lines to which all the operators are instructed to listen in. He told them about Mr. Giroux coming down here to interview the ministers and look after the superannuation of the operators, and that they would be requested, or commanded—I am not sure which—to put up five dollars apiece. He also wrote some telegraph operators down in Saskatchewan to put up a similar amount. I am told that altogether about $220 was secured for the trip. Now, is it in the interests of Canada that the civil service be used for obtaining political contributions? Let me go a step further. Is there a minister in the government who will get up this afternoon and say that Mr. Giroux interviewed him in any particular in the interests of the civil service? I do not think there is. He came down here to have a good time.

But the most regrettable point about this is that one man connected with the system who refused to make a contribution has since been reported to the department to his detriment. The hidden hand is trying to force him to contribute to Liberal campaign funds or else to blackmail him. I look across the House and I see quite a number of men who used to sit over on this side, who used to belong to the farmers' movement in western Canada. That movement was started largely—

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): Oh, take your medicine.

An hon. MEMBER: Did you ever taste it?

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): Yes. You take it now.

An hon. MEMBER: Taste it yourself.

Mr. KELLNER: May I ask my former colleagues one question. That movement was started as a protest against such political scandals as this, and that movement brought out such men as to-day you see sitting on the other side and actively lending their support to the government. Let me ask the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) if he feels comforted.

Mr. BROWN: The hon. member for Lisgar will be found expressing his opinion on the situation when the time comes.

Mr. JACOBS: The remarks of the hon. member (Mr. Kellner) are quite interesting but it seems to me that they are altogether outside of the motion now before the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has so far been in order, but I would advise him not to make what may be considered insinuations against certain members of the House as being in favour of such a situation as he has described.

Mr. KELLNER: Very well, Mr. Speaker, I will deal with the report itself. I want to consider that portion of it dealing with the stamp of the returning officer. The situation in this regard was this: while the returning officer was at his office in Lac la Biche, the stamp was in possession of one Wilson in Edmonton, and the evidence would go to show that the ballots were taken over and given to Wilson, who stamped them. Now, the Elections Act provides that a returning officer shall keep the stamp in his possession, and as a matter of fact there is a severe penalty—I think it is five years—for anyone in illegal possession of it. Yet here you find a man in Edmonton who is in possession of the returning officer's stamp. I was amazed, indeed, to read the finding of the judge that he was legally in possession of it; I do not see for the life of me how he could be. However, the returning officer is now dead and I do not wish to bring him into the discussion, but I will say that during the time we had some criminal prosecutions out there he gave evidence, swearing that the ballots were sent to him at Lac la Biche.

At the very least, parliament should decide when the stamp of a returning officer is legally in his possession and when it is not, and decide also whether or not the stamping of ballots in the city of Edmonton for a returning officer one hundred miles away is something that is in keeping with the instructions of the Elections Act. There was one other feature about the ballots which was lightly passed up in the investigation, and that is the fact that they were not all the same. On some there was a mistake in the spelling. My name was incorrectly spelled, as was also the name of Mr. Geauvreau, the Conservative candidate. Perhaps it is not remarkable that Mr. Cross' name was spelled correctly in both cases. The explanation of that irregularity in connection with the spelling of the names was that when they were printing the ballots, a sheet of paper got caught in the roll and some ballots were spoiled. And that consumed a considerable quantity of paper that could not be accounted for. Then, the evidence goes on to show that a mistake in spelling the names was noticed and corrected, after fifteen or twenty thousand had been printed. This was called to their attention, according to the witness, by the returning officer over the long distance telephone. When you recall the fact that the returning officer could neither read nor write you wonder how in the name of common sense he could know. The printer's statement about the manner in which the paper was caught in the roll might account for the consumption of all the paper sent out by the Chief Electoral Officer, but it certainly does not account for the fact that there were two sets of ballots printed. Then, again, it was amply proved that ballots were sent by registered mail to several polls; and it was further established that two or three automobiles at least were driven from one poll to another by persons who were inquiring whether the officers had sufficient ballots, and assuring them that they could supply any deficiencies if need be.

Now, I consider all this a long way from being in accord with the instructions contained in the Elections Act, and I will conclude my remarks by requesting that this report be referred to the committee, that they be asked to submit definite findings covering the matter of the stamp, and that some recommendation be brought in to deal with these officials. Certainly it is a disgrace to Canada if they are to be allowed to continue holding positions in the civil service while being guilty of such irregularities as have been proven in this report.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): I did not expect when the motion was introduced that I should be drawn into the discussion, but in view of the utterly uncalled for remarks of the hon. member who has spoken (Mr. Kellner) I cannot allow the occasion to pass without some comment. Hon. members who were associated with us last year will recall that in our caucus, when the matter was discussed and this subject was brought to our attention, as to the corruption that prevailed in the Athabaska election, I was one who strongly insisted that we should stand behind the member for Athabaska, who had suffered from these malpractices, and that we should stand behind him even to the extent of affording him financial assistance in bringing the question before the House. In view of that fact, I feel that his remarks were absolutely uncalled for. We have had a number of references made to the position occupied by this group and I want to say that for myself, and I believe I can speak for those more directly associated with me, I am not prepared to stand for anything in the way of electoral corruption. When the time comes, if it does come, we will be found insisting that those who have been directly responsible or in any way personally responsible for the practices which have prevailed, be visited with the full penalty of the law. In view of this situation I think a very humble apology is due this group from the hon. member who has just spoken.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): The attention of this House was called to the famous Athabaska election for the first time during the course of last session, when a petition was presented to the House of Commons under chapter 8 of the revised statutes of Canada. The petition was signed by twenty-five or more electors of that constituency, and represented that the time for acting under the Controverted Elections Act having expired, a commission be appointed under the authority of this House, by the Governor General in Council, for the purpose of determining whether or not corrupt practices had taken place during that election. The House of Commons did act under that petition and requested the Governor General in Council to select a commissioner from various names contained in the motion, and a commissioner was appointed under the chapter I have already mentioned.

Under this law the commissioner must report to the Governor General the evidence taken and what he finds concerning the investigation, and that was done. Mr. Justice Clarke, who I am pleased to say is one of the most eminent members of the judiciary of Canada, made an interim and a final report, which mentioned certain persons as having been found guilty of corrupt practices. Section 31 of chapter 8 reads as follows:

> Whenever it appears by the report of the commissioners under this act that any person named by them has been guilty of a corrupt practice and has not been furnished by them with a certificate of indemnity, such report with the evidence taken by the commissioners shall be laid before the Attorney General of Canada, who shall, if in his opinion there is sufficient evidence available for a prosecution, certify such opinion to the Secretary of State, who shall thereupon communicate the report with the evidence to the Lieutenant Governor of the province in which the election was held.

When the interim report was forward by Mr. Justice Clarke the Solicitor General, who was then Acting Minister of Justice and Acting Attorney General of Canada, immediately sent it with his certificate to the Secretary of State, and when the final report was received I myself did the same thing. The requirements of the law were met, and if proceedings have not been instituted, as to which I do not know, we would not be responsible; it is up to the Attorney General of the province of Alberta, who under the law must institute such proceedings.

Let me say to my hon. friend that as Minister of Justice I will be only to glad to associate a counsel with the local representatives of the province of Alberta in any proceedings which may be taken as a result of those frauds which took place during that election. I am in favour of the motion, and I may also say that if, as a result of this being referred to the committee on privileges and elections, some way may be found to prevent electoral corruption as it seems to have prevailed in that election, I and those who sit with me on this side of the House will be only too glad to associate with my hon. friend in that respect.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think the House will agree with me that the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Kellner) has this afternoon made one of the most serious and most damning indictments against officers of this House and civil servants of this country that has been made in the parliament of Canada for many days. I noticed that when the motion was made this afternoon to refer these reports to the committee on privileges and elections, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) immediately asked, "For what purpose?" Until hon. members spoke in the House this afternoon the government would seem to have been lulled to rest with the idea that their full duty had been completed when they delivered the reports to the Secretary of State and the Secretary of State in turn delivered them to the provincial attorney general.

The indictment laid before the House today goes much deeper than that. These reports of Mr. Justice Clarke have been in the hands of this government for four months, and the House will be anxious to know at this time what steps the government have taken under the law in regard to these election officials, and what steps have been taken in regard to the civil servants of this country who were guilty of gross wrong doing and in some cases of serious crime. I gather from the remarks of the hon. member for Athabaska this afternoon that many of these people are still in the service of the Dominion government notwithstanding the crimes that have been actually proved against them in that investigation. If this be so, what is the reason? Has the government taken no action in the matter? Has the government quietly taken the position that having referred the matter to the local attorney general their duty is at an end? The Attorney General of Alberta has nothing to do with the civil service of Canada and he has nothing to do with our postmasters, so why has not this government taken some action?

There is just one other thought in this connection. We had another investigation in the western part of Canada last year in regard to election irregularities.

Mr. ROBB: Before my hon. friend leaves that, is he laying down the principle now that every civil servant who took part in the election should be dismissed?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No; I am not, and my hon. friend should know that from my remarks. I am referring to those who are alleged to have been guilty of perjury, forgery and the like, as has been found by this report. Now I wish to refer to another case which came up for investigation last spring before the criminal courts of this country, in which the most gross frauds were proved. Officials of this House carrying on the elections were proved to be guilty of serious offences and were sentenced to severe penalties and terms of imprisonment. But I am informed to-day that two of these criminals have already been set at liberty although their full terms have not been served. I am also told that in the very near future another notorious official named Baldy Robb will also be given his liberty under ticket-of-leave, or by some process of the Department of Justice. I mention the matter in order, if I can, to stop the ticket-of-leave in that instance; I trust that the bringing up of this subject to-day will stop all negotiations for it. I was for a few days last July in the Department of Justice as acting minister. I know that Baldy Robb was sentenced about the beginning of May to a long term in the penitentiary, I think five years, and although he had only served from two to two and a half months at that time, already largely signed petitions, containing the names of political supporters of the government, were coming in from that western country asking for a remission of the penalty imposed. I hope Baldy Robb has not been granted any release or any ticket-of-leave. I hope none of those who were sentenced for irregularities last spring have been leniently dealt with. I hope also that this House will insist that this government take action at once in regard to those officials, those civil servants in the employ of this country, who have been found to be guilty of gross irregularities, and in many cases of serious crimes, in connection with the Athabaska election.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Edmonton, Minister of the Interior): I would not have risen except for one reference of the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Kellner), namely, to my knowledge of Mr. Deyl and Mr. Lawler, although the hon. gentleman did not couple Mr. Lawler's name with that of Mr. Deyl. May I say that all who know the history of the province of Alberta are well acquainted with my actions in connection with all the chief actors who figured in this investigation?

Mr. Cross was attorney general in the government of which I had the honour to be the head. We disagreed, and he left the government, so that I take no responsibility for Mr. Cross.

With respect to Mr. Deyl, he was employed in the lands registry office at Edmonton, and left the service shortly after I became premier of the province. I never had anything to do with Mr. Lawler, nor was he ever employed in an official capacity while I had charge of affairs in Alberta. It seems to me that when this matter is referred to the committee the fullest investigation should be held. So far as I am personally concerned, I have no desire to shield anyone. My opinion is that everyone should pay the full penalty for his actions; and if anything can be discovered by the committee that will in any way prevent a recurrence of this sort of thing, I shall only be too happy to associate myself with such action and do all I can to forward it.

May I say, however, with reference to the remarks made by the leader of the opposition, that while I followed the newspaper reports —because I may say for the information of the House those reports were coming out every day during our election campaign in Edmonton last fall, and they were not doing the Liberal party any particular good, especially my colleague and I in the city of Edmonton—I had no knowledge that there was any official of the Department of the Interior implicated in any of these irregularities. Perhaps I have been recreant in my duty inasmuch as I have not read Judge Clarke's report in its entirety, but if amongst those mentioned in that report there is any employee of the Department of the Interior, employed even in the most humble capacity, then he or she will be dismissed at once. That has been the rule I have always sought to follow in my public life which has extended over eighteen years; and I wish to say definitely that not one official proved to have been guilty of improper conduct will remain in the government service even if he is only drawing a dollar a year—because these sub-offices of the Dominion Lands branch are very humble positions as hon. gentlemen will readily understand.

But may I say in reply to my hon. friend that one of the things I consider most grossly unfair is this: I have followed the evidence carefully in the press. There were at least ten or fifteen individuals who came forward and gave evidence upon which they were given immunity. Now, if anything could be said to be worse than actions of the three or four individuals that were convicted, then the actions of the others were worse. Yet they were given immunity and are at large, and apparently the intention is that they shall remain at large.

With respect to Deyl and Lawler, I believe the provincial government are endeavouring to locate and punish them.

Mr. BENNETT: There are warrants out for them.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, and they are the individuals who are responsible for most of the rascality, not the poor unfortunate Italian, Billos.

As for Harry Bowtell, I have no excuse to offer for him. He had full knowledge of what he was doing and should take the consequences. But there are some of the others who were in gaol, and who have been freed on parole, who committed crimes not nearly as heinous as those offenders who are still at large.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Have some who were found guilty been actually paroled?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, two or three of them.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is Baldy Robb one of them?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): These men were convicted before the Clarke inquiry; they were not subject to investigation at that inquiry, but they were implicated in the election frauds. May I say that if there was any excuse what I have referred to might be offered as such. Furthermore, the petition was signed by almost every resident in the neighbourhood in which these individuals live, as well as throughout the district of Athabaska. I believe that when the citizens signed that petition they had in mind the fact that all the guilty parties were not receiving like punishment in connection with this matter.

Mr. BENNETT: I think my hon. friend has misunderstood the position. Those who were given immunity could not be convicted but they confessed, and they confessed because they got immunity. That is the position.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Exactly. I may not have stated the position as lucidly as I might but I quite understand that point. But although they confessed and received immunity my statement is that they were equally as guilty of wrongdoing as the individuals who were convicted by the judge prior to that time.

Mr. BENNETT: But they could not be convicted because they had been given immunity, and they received immunity because they confessed.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): But they were equally guilty with those who were punished. As I say, there have been very largely signed petitions asking for parole. It is equally true that a very largely signed petition has been received, with respect to Baldy Robb, and on the petition is the signature of the gentleman who represented the Conservative party in the constituency of Peace River. The petition asks that Baldy Robb be paroled. I have nothing to say with respect to him. Baldy Robb has done as much injury to the Liberal party as any individual possibly could do in years gone by. Why he changed his allegiance is beyond me, and I have no brief for him. But he did change, and possibly this time was more reckless than he had been in the past. At all events he is in gaol for five years. However, the fact remains that a very large number of people have been persuaded or they believe that he should also be given the benefit of a parole notwithstanding the crime which he committed. I am not arguing that point. My hon. friend (Mr. Guthrie) says this man should be made to serve his sentence for the crime of which he has been convicted. I have not a word to say in this connection except to repeat what I said in the first instance, that the men who were responsible for most of the rascality that prevailed, particularly in the district of Athabaska, as I have seen it in the press, are out of the country. True, there is a warrant out for their arrest, and I hope they will be apprehended, and that justice will be meted out to them, because I think most of the other individuals up there were their innocent dupes.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Are we to understand that exclusive altogether of the case of Robb, only those have been paroled who secured immunity by confessing?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, they never were convicted.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Then there are others to whom clemency has been extended, without their having secured the pseudo-right to it by confession?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No clemency was extended to those who were given immunity.

Hon. LUCIEN CANNON (Solicitor General): In answer to the question put by the hon. member for West Hamilton (Mr. Bell), the discussion this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, only goes to show how difficult it is to keep the administration of justice outside of politics. A question has been brought before the House by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy), and I have no doubt that every member of this House, no matter to which party he may belong, is of the one opinion, and that is that every man who has been implicated in electoral frauds should be prosecuted without mercy, and that justice should prevail.

When Mr. Justice Clarke was appointed by the government, an investigation full and complete was held. Reports were made, two in number, the first being an interim report, and the second a final report. When the interim report was transmitted to Ottawa, my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) being away at the time attending the Imperial conference, and I being then acting minister, I followed the law to the very strictest letter and in the very strictest spirit, and saw that every means was taken in order that the reports should be dealt with according to our law, and I do not think that any fair criticism can be made of the attitude and conduct of the Department of Justice in relation to the reports filed by Mr. Justice Clarke. Proceedings, if any are to be instituted, are to be instituted not by the federal authorities, but by the provincial authorities of the province of Alberta, and the attorney general of that province is at perfect liberty to institute whichever proceedings he may deem mete. The law provides that in so far as the Attorney General of Canada is concerned, he may appoint counsel to act in conjunction with the counsel appointed by the provincial government. My learned friend the Minister of Justice stated a moment ago that this government was perfectly willing to do so if occasion should arise.

In conclusion, when these two reports are laid before the committee on privileges and elections, I believe that every member sitting on that committee will be moved by one, common spirit, and that is to try and devise means of preventing any such things happening in the future as were proved to have happened in that constituency in the election of 1925.

As Solicitor General, having in charge the remission branch of the Justice department, I wish to make answer to the remarks of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) in regard to the paroling of two persons convicted of electoral frauds in the constituency of Peace River. The leader of the opposition mentioned the case of Baldy Robb. Firstly, Baldy Robb is in no way connected with the Athabaska election, and has absolutely nothing to do with Mr. Justice Clarke's reports. His activities were confined, and we may thank heaven that they were, to one constituency—the constituency of Peace River. I realize, listening to what has been said in this House this afternoon, and listening to the question put by the hon. member for West Hamilton (Mr. Bell), how careful we must be when dealing with remission cases. Reproaches have been levelled at me for having taken certain action. My hands, Mr. Speaker, are tied, and the leader of the opposition knows it. He has been Solicitor General in former governments, and he knows that every record in the remission branch, for motives and reasons of public interest, is confidential and cannot be brought before this House. I shall treat these files as confidential. I shall not try and screen my own responsibility by bringing before this House facts which are supposed, in the public interest, to remain confidential. The decisions which were taken were decisions which I took after mature consideration of all the circumstances. I have been a member of the bar of my province for over fifteen years. My family possesses certain judicial traditions which I cannot ignore, and my reputation as a member of the bar puts me away beyond any imputation that I might have been actuated by political motives.

Mr. KELLNER: I would like to make this statement to the House. I myself signed the petition for paroling these two men. I think in fairness to the Solicitor General I should say that.

Mr. CANNON: I congratulate the hon. member upon his remark. I had no intention of mentioning his name, any more than I have the intention of mentioning the names of other people who are close to the leader of the opposition, and who came to see me asking that these people be paroled. Last year, sitting in this very seat, was a minister, also from my own province, and of about the same age as myself. He took action upon certain representations made by fellow-members. He is no longer here because politics intervened with decisions that should be left to the fairness of the judgment of the minister, and we, as ministers, trust that when fellow-members come and make representations to us, they should have a spirit of honour sufficient to make them stand by their representations even when they come back to the House.

As to the case of Baldy Robb, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to say that this man will remain in gaol five years or four years or three years. I will say that he will be treated with justice notwithstanding what politicians may say.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (West Calgary): Mr. Speaker, I think all members in this House might well agree that the degredation of our institutions has reached a point where by our combined effort we should do everything within our power to prevent it continuing further, and I do appeal to the government to give attention and consideration to the motion which has been made to the House for the purpose of enabling, first, recommendations to be made with respect to the election law of Canada.

It does seem to me incredible that a man who cannot read or write should be appointed a returning officer in these days. It does seem to me incredible that two men could be moved from Seattle and placed in charge of an election in Alberta. Yet that is what happened. It does seem to me incredible that men should be paid out of the public exchequer large sums of money for preparing lists of electors, which work consisted of taking pieces of paper, writing indiscriminately a number of names upon them, and then voting them at a poll behind a bush. That admission seems incredible and yet that happened in Canada, according to the evidence given before Mr. Justice Clarke in 1926.

The point is that the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) this afternoon moved, seconded by the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Kellner), that this report of the Hon. Mr. Justice Clarke should go to the committee on privileges and elections for the purpose of enabling such recommendations to be made to this House as might prevent a repetition of the conditions to which I have referred. I think it is not, as the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) has said, a matter of politics at all.

Mr. CANNON: I never said that.

Mr. BENNETT: I gathered that the Solicitor General stated that this matter should be dealt with, not as a political matter, but as a matter fundamentally affecting questions of right and wrong.

Mr. CANNON: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sorry if I misunderstood him and he intends that it be dealt with as a political matter.

Mr. CANNON: With all due respect to my hon. friend, if he interprets my remarks in that way, I am very sorry that his mind this afternoon is not as keen as it used to be.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sorry at the failure of the hon. gentleman to express himself as he would like. What I said a moment ago was that I suggested that this matter should not be treated as a political matter and that the Solicitor General had so indicated. He says: Not at all. I judge that he does desire that it should be treated as a political matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend allow me? I have been listening to my hon. friend's remarks, and I think that if he reads his own remarks in Hansard he will find that anyone sitting on this side would have gathered that he was saying that the Solicitor General wished to have the matter treated as a political matter. That is why the Solicitor General rose to make the remark he did. It is just a misunderstanding.

Mr. BENNETT: Then we will say that the Solicitor General does not desire to treat it as a political matter. That is what I said at the opening of my observations. I am delighted to say that the Solicitor General has approached it from that standpoint. The first matter that should be considered is: What recommendation can the committee make with respect to amending the election laws of this country so as to prevent a repetition of those conditions? The second is also a matter of some importance as it touches the position of the civil servants of this country. Shall a civil servant who has been convicted of a crime or who admits the commission of a crime and has secured immunity by reason of his confession, continue in office? Shall the public service acts of this country not be amended so as to provide that by reason of any confession of that character he shall at once vacate his position?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Surely.

Mr. BENNETT: It seems to me that we are agreed upon that and therefore the reference to the committee on that second point is a matter of great importance. There is also the third matter that touches the elections of this country and corrupt practices generally, the investigation of what can be done to insure the public will being expressed without being subject to temptations, on the one hand to the coercive power of government, and on the other to the destructive power of corruption. These things are not matters that should be lightly treated. During the time that I have lived in western Canada—and the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) has made some reference to his experiences there—in certain parts of the west for a period of twenty-five years a studied system of corruption prevailed. An effort was made on a large scale to prevent the public will finding expression. I do not think we should blame parties in that respect at all. I know what the temptations are with respect to matters of that character. We know that decent, respectable citizens will not lend themselves to those things; but we know there are camp followers, men behind, men who are not only corrupted themselves but who are willing to corrupt others. We know there are men who are ready and willing at all times to do what we are pleased to call "dirty work", and then after the matter is over they come and ask administrations and sometimes they brow-beat administrations to give them consideration to which they are not entitled.

The Minister of the Interior referred to two such persons this afternoon and I quite agree with him that they occupied in Alberta positions which they should not have occupied. They did work which has had a baneful and injurious effect upon the public life of that province. The same thing happened in Saskatchewan. We had in the journal of that legislature, as read here last session, a record of that condition of affairs. This House should use its every effort to stop that sort of thing because, if we do not prevent it, our very democratic institutions are destroyed and responsible government has indeed become valueless in this country. That is the reason that the motion made this afternoon by the hon. member meets with my approval, although not with the hope that we shall be able at once to change this condition of affairs.

A very distinguished statesman, the late Dr. Weldon, came into this House of Commons, and he was so impressed with the dangers to democracy on account of the conditions to which I alluded, that he endeavoured to place upon the statute books short provisions whereby men might lose their franchise under certain conditions. This has been a dead letter although he had hoped for great things of it, and one of the real difficulties that threatens the life of this country to-day is electoral corruption on a very large scale throughout this Dominion. When I say "electoral corruption" I do not mean going out and buying votes. That is not what I have in mind at all. I mean the means used by which the free will of the people cannot be expressed, by which enormous sums of money are expended in an ordinary election, and it seems to me that we should follow the method which they have been compelled to adopt in England of limiting the amount of money that may be expended in elections.

I remember a friend of mine travelling on the train not long ago after the election of 1925, saying that two passengers on the train had been speaking and one said to the other that Bennett had spent $70,000 in the election in West Calgary. I am pleased to say that the return which I made covered every single sou that was expended by me with respect to that election and the election of last fall. But elections cost too much money and moreover so do the contributions that are enforced for the purpose of enabling them to be contested. We should have recourse to the provisions that obtain in the English law, whereby a limit is placed upon the amount that may be expended in any one constituency. In England, as hon. members know, the member has to pay the sheriff or the returning officer with respect to these things. I look upon the reference of this matter to this committee as affording an opportunity for it to make recommendations in regard to amending the statutes to which I have referred.

It is also not right to say that the blame attaches to any one party. I do not believe that, because I know there is no magic in belonging to one party in so far as virtue in an election is concerned. The whole fact is that sometimes those who are opposite to us are more astute in being able to manipulate the public will than we are, with a result that is detrimental to this country, returning them to power and leaving us in the opposition. That is another matter entirely; but astuteness in manipulation comes only from long practice, and it will be remembered that the Liberal party was in power for a much longer time in Canada, from 1896 to 1911, than the Conservative party was from 1911 to 1917. I suppose in the minds of some hon. gentlemen that may account for the result. It seems to me, however, that men should not occupy public positions and receive public moneys in this country who have been convicted of offences to which I have alluded or who have made confessions to that effect.

One point the Minister of the Interior dealt with, that I should like to clear up, is this. He contended in his observations that men should be released on parole or on ticket of leave because others had received immunity who were guilty of equally offensive violations of the statute. That is hardly fair. The guilt of the men who made the confession would not be known but for their confession. The crown endeavoured by every means in its power to secure sufficient evidence to convict them, but these crimes in many instances were done in the dark and—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend is not correct there. The three who came before the court prior to the appointment of Mr. Justice Clarke as investigator were convicted and sentenced, and I am bound to think that had the others come before the court they too would have been convicted.

Mr. BENNETT: My friend the Minister of the Interior perhaps has not followed this case as carefully as he should. Some were acquitted, some were convicted in the courts, but those who received immunity from the Hon. Mr. Justice Clarke received it in consequence of making confessions,—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Quite so.

Mr. BENNETT: —and there was no testimony by which they could be convicted because, as they themselves admitted when they went into the witness box, in many instances they did those crimes alone in the darkness of the night, in some instances they prepared the lists and put names upon them when nobody was looking at them. My friend will remember that two of them, co-conspirators, went into the darkness behind a tree and there fixed up the ballot boxes. With respect to the printing of the ballots, a great effort was made to fix responsibility, but Mr. Deyl and Mr. Lawler had gone out of the country, and there was nobody else on whom could be fastened blame with respect to the ballot papers referred to by the hon. member for Athabaska.

Now, I should like to bring this to the attention of the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon). The Minister of the Interior has asserted the doctrine that where a man confesses to a crime which could not be proven, and thereby secures immunity, those who pleaded not guilty, but were convicted, should receive lenient treatment from the crown, and a recommendation should be made by the law officers to the Governor General for their relief, merely because they were equally guilty. That principle is not sound.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. CANNON: Will my hon. friend allow me? For his own information I may state that we give our law to the Minister of the Interior whenever he wants it; he never gives us any.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course, the observation of the Solicitor General indicates how lightly he really does consider this very serious matter.

Mr. CANNON: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Nothing could better illustrate the absolute lack of sincerity of his observations in connection with this election scandal than the closing observation he has made to this House.

Mr. CANNON: Mr. Speaker, we are at the opening of a new parliament, and I want to tell the hon. member for West Calgary—

Mr. BENNETT: What has that to do with the matter?

Mr. CANNON: I want to tell him that I am not going to stand either from him or any other member such remarks as he has just made. My hon. friend is a member of the bar—

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. minister has a question of order or a question of privilege let him state it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CANNON: It is a question of privilege. My hon. friend is a member of the bar, and he certainly has no right to allege lack of sincerity on my part in what I have said to the House. The remark I made is to the effect that I am one of the law officers in this government. Therefore the legal principles on which we are to base decisions are to be decided by the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General, not by the Minister of the Interior who is a layman. My hon. friend knows perfectly well—

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, surely this must not be allowed to continue.

Mr. SPEAKER: A point of order has been raised. I do not see where any point of order comes in.

Mr. BENNETT: Nor does anybody else. but Your Honour permitted the Solicitor General to get away with it.

Mr. SPEAKER: When an hon. member rises to a question of privilege or a point of order, I must listen to what he has to say. I do not consider that there is a point of order in this instance.

Mr. CANNON: The hon. gentleman has no right to accuse me of a lack of sincerity and there is no point of order in connection with such a charge. It is a question of privilege.

Mr. BENNETT: I was about to say that the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) had confused two matters, and I know enough about government, without being instructed by the Solicitor General, to be aware that in matters affecting the release of prisoners it has been customary from time immemorial for ministers to speak to the law officers of the crown. I remember distinctly the case of Baldy Robb and two others being spoken to during the fall. I recall an expression of my own opinion with respect to the matter to the effect that it was important that an example be made. It is far more important —this is the attitude I took—that the law should be vindicated, though not vindictively, and that its majesty be upheld than that feelings of sympathy should prevail in relation to any individual. We have all experienced those things; every man in public life knows that he has to make the choice between sympathy and public duty. His sympathies naturally impel him to do what the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Kellner) rose in his place to-day and so admirably stated— "I signed a petition for the parole of these two prisoners, for the reason that my sympathy found expression in the act." That was done to change and mould the opinion of the Solicitor General and of the Minister of Justice favourably towards the request. But as a public servant, owing a duty to the public, it is not open to any public man occupying a position of trust to sign any petition for the release of any prisoner under a system of ticket-of-leave. And we all know it. Time and time again I have had to refuse such requests by virtue of my representative position. I could not act in my capacity as a private citizen and lend the support of my official authority to a petition of that character, however it might affect the friendly disposition of the Minister of Justice or of the Solicitor General, whose human sympathies we all take for granted and whose desire to do what the Solicitor General describes as justice we do not question. But there is no such thing as justice with respect to tickets-of-leave; it is merely a question of the exercise of discretion, founded upon judicial opinion, sometimes that of a judge, sometimes the views of penitentiary authorities or, perhaps, those of persons in charge of gaols, as to whether or not the release of a particular individual will enable him to start over again, to begin a new life under fresh conditions and overcome the peculiar difficulties that surrounded him in his first or second offence, as the case may be. Everyone who has read the life of that leader of the church army in England, Prebendary Carlisle, will understand thoroughly what has been done with reference to matters of this sort. Now and then it is possible to pick out a man and to say, "Here is material out of which a real man can be developed. Here is a case in which a ticket-of-leave may safely be granted." Where there has been inexperience in connection with the commission of a crime, or where the other factors are such as to render it advisable, one may support the granting of parole. But in the case of a man of a notorious past, who has exercised political influence improperly in days gone by for one party or the other, it is important that the law should be vindicated in order that the public at large may appreciate the inevitable character of the consequences that follow upon wrongdoing. People should be made to understand that forgery, the manipulation of ballots, the destruction of ballot boxes, the marking of ballots otherwise than in the manner contemplated by statute are all contrary to the law and that any violation of the law in any of these respects shall be visited with rigid puishment, so that those newcomers who are to attain Canadian citizenship shall respect the institutions of the country. They should be made to understand that such lawbreaking as this is not to be tolerated, and that the law will be enforced whatever may be the result.

That is the attitude we should take with respect to such a question as this, and that is the reason attention is directed to it this afternoon. No one has any vindictive feeling against Baldy Robb. I have known him for over fifteen years and, were I to consider feelings of sympathy alone, I should desire to do him a good turn to-morrow, just as I would any other man, whether he were for or against me. But I cannot permit myself to become a party to the release of one who has boastingly said, "I have the power and the influence to be out of gaol almost before I get there." And this was his boast made openly as reported in the journals of the country at the time. For these reasons I support the motion of the hon. member for Athabaska, in the hope that the members of the committee, realizing the enormity of these offences—although sometimes some of us may be tempted to smile at what we may consider something not so grave—which threaten the life of our democracy, which are injurious to the very wellbeing of our responsible institutions, and which in the long run will sound the death-knell of the things about which we should be greatly concerned. It is, I say, for these reasons and in the hope that the committee will make, with respect to the Elections Act and the Civil Service Act, as well as other statutes, such suggestions as will ensure the ordered and well regulated conduct of elections, free from the conditions that have obtained in Athabaska and Peace River, and in the hope, further, that we may be able to place upon the statute books a greater safeguard in the light of these occurrences, that I propose to give my support to the motion which has been introduced.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): With regard to appeals to the Department of Justice for remissions or tickets-of-leave, this is a matter that must depend upon the judgment of individual members of the House. I have myself on one occasion sent a letter to the department stating that I was prepared after a thorough investigation to stand on the floor of the House and support such a remission, and I would do the same thing again if a similar occasion arose, because the fact that I am a member of parliament does not deprive me of my right as an individual member of society to see that justice is done. The case to which I refer had nothing to do with election trials or frauds; it had to do with a temporarily insane man who was found guilty of having $2.50 or less in his pocket, which money, during the period of his insanity, he had not returned to his principals, and who was sentenced to the penitentiary for a term of three years. I considered this an injustice and said so, declaring that I was prepared to vindicate that stand in the House of Commons.

I trust, however, Mr. Speaker, that when this report is sent to the committee on privileges and elections they will feel that they have the sanction of the House for making a pretty thorough inquiry into the whole matter of the preparation of the electoral lists. I do not know anything about the preparation of such lists in other provinces, but I have had experience for two years in one constituency in the island of Montreal. I am blaming no one; I make no charges, but I shall say what I found there.

In the election of 1925 I was convinced, from the reports of my committee, that there were a large number of names on that list of persons who had no residence within that constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George, and who had not resided there for many years. After the election was over, in order to satisfy my curiosity, I employed a number of men who were experts in the preparation of directories and publications of that character, and I had them working during the months of November, December, January, February and March. Throughout those five months they went through the constituency finding out what names were on the lists for the election of 1925 of persons who were not residents in the constituency, and they found that over 2,000 fictitious names were on the federal list, some 900 impersonations having been voted in the election by means of this false list, not one of them voting for myself.

When it came to the preparation of the electoral list for the last election of 1926 I had a store of information available. My committee had to send out men to ascertain whether on a certain date in May persons of the same names were entitled to be on the list. We received a return from the provincial reviser for the city of Montreal, and tracing down that provincial list which we received in 1926 as a basis for the preparation of the list for the federal election of 1926, we found over 2,000 fictitious names on the list for the federal constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George, these names having been derived from the provincial lists. We did nothing behind anyone's back. We made a list of these fictitious names and gave the committee of our opponents complete access to it. We also gave them a list of over 2,000 individual affidavits which we had prepared in order to make a proper legal protest against these names being retained on the federal list for that district. Now, the preparation of 2,000 individual affidavits after 2,000 individual searches is an expensive matter. The committee on the other side, taking a list of over 2,000 found 175 or thereabouts which they said were the names of persons resident in the district formerly, who had removed to some other street in the district. They acted as fairly in the matter as we did, and I give them every credit. They desired to see that the revision was properly done, after their attention had been directed to the matter. We each sent one representative to run down these 175 names in dispute, but I do not know what came of it, because I personally paid no more attention to the matter.

I do say that there is something radically wrong in the preparation of the lists in such a constituency as St. Lawrence-St. George when 2,000 fictitious names may be incorporated in the federal lists from the returns of the provincial revising officer. When the local provincial revisions was recently going on, I thought, although I may never run another election in St. Lawrence-St. George, that out of curiosity I would find out how the provincial list in the city of Montreal was prepared, and, during the last revision a couple of months ago, I sought to check the names going on the provincial list for the two provincial constituencies of St. Lawrence and St. George. I found that under our system of provincial registration in the city of Montreal, it is possible for a person residing in or purporting to reside in St. Lawrence or in St. George to register his name for those districts with any registrar in any other electoral district of the island of Montreal, so that in order to check the names going on the lists for St. Lawrence and for St. George I would have to send fifty of sixty representatives to fifty or sixty registration booths in all parts of the island, covering constituency after constituency —an impossible task, and one far beyond my financial resources.

But I will defy any man in the city of Montreal or elsewhere to point to one single dollar spent by me or by my committee in those two last federal elections for any improper purpose. There was not a single dollar expended which was not vouched for. If I remember correctly, in order to secure a proper revision of these lists, and to see that no fraud was perpetrated, the expenditure in the 1925 election ran up to something like $25,000 while in the election of 1926 it was something like $14,000. I am trusting to memory. Now, there is $40,000 which a candidate for the House of Commons from that constituency is compelled to spend, not one dollar of it being devoted to fraudulent or corrupt purposes, but simply for the purpose of securing as correct a list as possible, and for the further purpose of preventing the impersonation of voters at the election. Talk about limiting the expenditure of money, as the hon. member who preceded me (Mr. Bennett) suggested! Before you limit the expenditure of money in an election under conditions such as these, you must take efficient means to secure a reliable registration list. As I am saying this I am glad to note that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) nods his assent, because I will say that he and many of his friends on the Liberal side in the city of Montreal take exactly the same position as I take, and leading Liberals of Montreal are as anxious as I am, I believe, to have a correct list. I am making no partisan charge in that regard, but as I will soon disappear from the political stage, I wish that there may be in Montreal an opportunity for the younger men who are making their way in the industrial, commercial and professional life of that city to play their proper part as candidates for elections to this House. There are many such young men who would be worthy representatives of that city, but owing to the expenses, which are so great, they are utterly deprived of the possibility of ever being elected, no matter what may be their personal efficiency or qualifications for the position. Therefore I do trust that, on both sides of the House, out of the experience of the past and out of the experience of those intimately connected with these elections, we may find some way of procuring an efficient revision, so that when the results are known we may be confident that they are the results of an honest vote on both sides.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES FOR 1926-7

A message from His Excellency the Governor General, transmitting further supplementary estimates for the year ending March 31, 1927, was presented by Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the House, and referred to the committee of supply.

MAIN ESTIMATES FOR 1927-8

A message from His Excellency the Governor General, transmitting estimates for the year ending March 31, 1928, was presented by Hon. J. A. Robb (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the House and referred to the committee of supply.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES FOR 1927-8

BILL TO REMOVE NECESSITY OF RE-ELECTION OF MEMBERS ON ACCEPTANCE OF OFFICE

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 63, to remove the necessity of the re-election of members of the House of Commons of Canada on acceptance of office.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Explain.

Mr. JACOBS: The object of this bill is to declare that a member of the House of Commons shall not vacate his seat by reason only of his acceptance of an office of profit under the crown, if that office is an office the holder of which is capable of being elected to or sitting or voting in the House of Commons.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DEBTS DUE THE CROWN

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure respecting certain debts due the crown, to provide that the governor in council shall have power to make regulations providing for the apportionment and adjustment of indebtedness incurred for advances of seed grain, fodder for animals and other relief, and to discharge and release in whole or in part any moneys due to His Majesty in respect of either principal or interest or both, as may be considered equitable in the circumstances.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

THE BUDGET

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Hon. gentlemen may be interested to know that on Thursday of this week we expect to deliver the annual budget statement.

HOME BANK DEPOSITORS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. McGIBBON: I would like to renew the question I asked the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) a week ago regarding depositors in the Home Bank.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): I am not sure that I recall the question.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. McGIBBON: The question was based on a newspaper report that the judges of the Exchequer court had recommended that the government grant a sum of $500,000 for the further relief of the depositors of the Home Bank.

Mr. ROBB: I have no answer other than that given the other day, that it has not been brought to my attention.

MARITIME CLAIMS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): I would like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister in regard to the Duncan report. It is now about two months since that report was laid before parliament, and it contains recommendations of vital interest to the maritime provinces. I am glad to say that these recommendations find very general acceptance on this side of the House, but we are most anxious to know when the government will be prepared to declare their policy in that regard. I do not ask that the policy be outlined now, but if my right hon. friend would give us some idea of when he will be prepared to do so, I think it will be satisfactory in the meantime.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) has just announced that he intends to make his budget speech on Thursday of this week and I have no doubt that he will then move that the discussion on the budget proceed forthwith and have precedence over other matters. Hon. members of the House will, I believe, agree that the business of parliament would be expedited if we could get under way with discussion of the budget at an early date, and I think it will be equally apparent that the interest of all will be best served if we deal with the maritime province problem by itself, and do not confuse that issue by its consideration prior to or along with the subject matter of the budget. For that reason the government has sought to bring in the budget as early as possible, with the intention of following the conclusion of the budget debate with a pronouncement with respect to the report of the commission on the maritime provinces' claims.

SALVATION ARMY IMMIGRATION WORK

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (Toronto West Centre): I ask the Minister of Immigration and Colonization if it is the intention of his department, or of the government, to discontinue the financial assistance which has been given heretofore to the immigration work of the Salvation Army.

Hon. ROBERT FORKE (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): I may say there is no intention of discontinuing the grant for assistance that the Salvation Army get in bringing out immigrants. As I said yesterday in reply to questions that have been asked me, they are getting exactly the same treatment that other people engaged in that work are getting. The army is receiving a grant this year of $25,000 cash for the work that they have been doing. Now, the Dominion government with the Imperial government are paying the passage of the boy immigrants that the Salvation Army are bringing out, and that money is being devoted to that purpose. If the army undertake settlement work along the lines that the Vimy Ridge organization, for example, are carrying on in the province of Ontario, they will receive exactly the same treatment. They will receive no direct grant next year other than the assisted passage paid jointly by the Imperial and Dominion governments.

Mr. HOCKEN: I simply want to get a clear idea of the situation. I understand from the minister that no assistance is to be given to the army in bringing out boys. Is that the idea?

Mr. FORKE: They are getting the assistance of the passage which is paid, the same as other organizations.

Mr. HOCKEN: Is that an imperial arrangement?

Mr. FORKE: No, it is an Imperial and Dominion arrangement under which the Dominion will pay a sum in hard cash on every boy that comes out, and which will amount to quite a large sum in the aggregate. I may say for the information of my hon. friend that some little trouble has arisen over the after-care of boy immigrants. The Salvation Army have claimed or sought a grant because they give after-care to these boys. The department, however, have taken the stand that they have a fully equipped staff capable of giving the after-care to boy immigrants, and consequently that they are not justified in making a grant to the army for doing exactly the same work that they are doing. We shall always be glad to have the Salvation Army, or any other organization, give whatever care they deem necessary to the immigrants they are particularly interested in. When the immigration estimates are before the House I will give full information concerning all the different immigration schemes as regards both adults and boys coming to Canada from the British Isles.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY

SUBSTITUTION OF CANADIAN NATIONAL FOR GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC SECURITIES

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved that the House go into committee on Bill No. 57, respecting the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, and respecting the Canadian National Railways.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING: The bill now before the committee, is, I think, completed. I only desire to draw attention to one or two clerical errors which occur on pages 8 and 9 merely involving the change from 1926 to 1927. I am informed, however, that the law clerk of the House will be authorized to make such minor changes as that.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT, 1915, AMENDMENT

The House again in committee on Bill No. 59, to amend the Special War Revenue Act, 1915, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Sections 1 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

On section 9—Excise tax on passenger automobiles not to apply on cars valued at not more than $1,200.

Mr. BARBER: I wish to draw the attention of the minister to a question which has arisen under the budget of last year which it seems to me can be appropriately discussed in connection with this section. It appears that under tariff item No. 438-B, automobiles entering Canada from the United States, valued at not more than $1,200, take a rate for duty of 20 per cent, and an excise tax of 5 per cent. Cars valued at over $1,200, under item 438-A, are dutiable at 27½ per cent. In the former case the excise duty is 5 per cent, and in the latter case it is 10 per cent. The effect seems to be that there is some discrimination against western Canada, and I think it is necessary that I should draw the fact to the attention of the minister. Under these regulations persons importing an automobile valued at $1,150 from Detroit into any point in eastern Canada would pay 20 per cent duty and an excise tax of 5 per cent. But since there is a customs regulation that the amount of the freight from east to west shall be included in the value for duty purposes, the freight in the case of this particular car from Detroit to Seattle would be $100, making the total value for duty $1,250. A person importing an automobile into western Canada would therefore have to pay duty at the rate of 27½ per cent, and an excise duty of 10 per cent. Therefore, there would be some discrimination. Let me show how that works out by giving a sample entry. I have a sample entry here of an eastern importer, for instance, as follows:

Eastern Importer:—
Automobile. Value for duty $1,150.
Duty at 20%	$230 00
Sales tax 5%	69 00
Excise tax 5%	69 00
Total	$368 00
Western Importer:—
Automobile. Value	$1,150
Freight	100
Total value for duty	$1,250
Duty at 27½%	$343 75
Sales tax at 5%	79 69
Excise tax at 10%	159 37
Total	$582 81

The sales tax and the excise tax are, of course, computed on the duty paid value. This makes an increase in the cost of the car to the man in British Columbia who imports from Seattle of $214.81. In other words, the Dominion government is collecting $114.81 more on that same car imported into British Columbia than it would on the same car imported into Ontario. As I said before, I think it is only necessary to draw this to the attention of the minister to have it remedied. I would suggest that perhaps the fairest method would be to fix the duty on the list price of the car f.o.b. the place of manufacture.

Mr. ROBB: Apparently this is purely a departmental question, and I shall direct the observations of my hon. friend to the attention of the Department of Customs.

Section agreed to.

Sections 9 to 14 inclusive agreed to.

On the preamble:

Mr. CHURCH: Would the minister mind answering now a short question I wish to put to him which would come more properly on the first section? Does he not think it is a hardship on the large centres of population to maintain the two-cent rate for drop letters, when letters can be posted all over Canada for two cents? The revenue of the Toronto post office, for instance. is $6,000,000, and are the cities to continue to carry the deficits in the postal service in other parts of the country? With all due respect, I think this concession should be made to the working people in the large centres of population, where the bulk of the post office business is done, and where the bulk of the post office revenue comes from. Does not the minister think the time has come to restore the one cent rate for drop letters in cities?

Mr. ROBB: When the tax was reduced last year restoring penny postage in Canada, I explained that it was a business proposition. As regards the question of revenue, when the budget statement is presented on Thursday I shall place before the House a statement of the revenues of the post office as affected by the changes that have been made, and after that, we shall be in a better position to consider the observations of my hon. friend.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

ST. REGIS INDIAN RESERVE

CONTROL OF ST. LAWRENCE ISLANDS BY SUPERINTENDENT GENERAL

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Edmonton, Minister of the Interior) moved the second reading of Bill No. 55, to provide for special control by the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs of certain islands in the St. Lawrence river being part of the St. Regis Indian reservation.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I think the minister had better explain what this bill is intended to do.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The explanation is really all contained in the preamble of the bill. For a great number of years there have been long leases, ninety-nine year leases, granted on certain islands in the St. Lawrence river owned by the St. Regis band of Indians. No Indians have been residing on these islands, and the islands have been leased for this long period at very nominal sums. It will be noted from the preamble that the department has taken action in some cases. Some of the leases have matured, and in other cases action has been taken to break the leases, and the islands are designated in which that has been effected. Further court action is pending in regard to the other islands.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Did the courts annul these so-called leases in all cases?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, except in those cases that are still pending. We have succeeded in recovering Lewis island, Snyder island, and Thompson or Macmaster island, and actions are still pending in respect of Thomas or Hamilton island, and what is known as the Easterbrook farm on Cornwall island. It is considered that the revenues derived from these leases are not nearly adequate for the land that is under rental, and we propose to lease them at rentals that will be more commensurate with their value, the proceeds going to the maintenance of the band of St. Regis Indians.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Is anybody complaining that this is causing them an injustice?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We have felt that it was an injustice to the St. Regis band that these islands should be leased at such low rentals, and we desire to secure rentals that will be more commensurate with the value of the property. This property of course has become much more valuable in recent years for summer resort purposes and will bring a much higher rental. There was in the old lease a provision that there could be a renewal at the termination of the first lease, so this is what we are doing.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Are the present lessees of these islands under the Indian title complaining of this action of the government?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not that I have heard. The only request I have had registered is that those already in possession under leases should be given the first opportunity to re-lease.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I suppose the minister will agree to that?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, I think they are entitled to that.

Mr. GARDINER: How long is it since these leases were first issued?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have not that in my notes. The leases were for ninety-nine years with a provision in the lease for renewal at the end of that period.

Mr. GARDINER: Do these leases purport to be given by the Indian band?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes. They were at all events given by the consent of the band.

Mr. GARDINER: Were these leases in writing?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Will any of these islands likely be affected by the St. Lawrence power development?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I cannot give that information.

Mr. COOTE: Were the leases signed by the Indians or by the department?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): By both, I am given to understand.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Superintendent to have power to deal with certain islands.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: It seems to be all right that the department is only to deal with these lands when the old Indian leases are declared by the court null and void. I notice that clause 2 reads that the department may——grant leases, licenses or other concessions without the necessity of obtaining a surrender of the said islands from the band.

I do not see anything in this bill stating that the proceeds shall go to the St. Regis Indians, although I understand that is what will happen.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The Indian Act provides in all cases for that. When we come to discuss the amendments to the Indian Act my hon. friend will note that all proceeds of leases go for the benefit of the band. But as we are not selling the property, but simply taking power to lease these islands, we have inserted in clause 2, this provision to which my hon. friend has referred. These lands are being leased in the interest of the band themselves.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Is it not customary to obtain the consent of the band with respect to any dealing with their land?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes. In cases where the band is in residence upon the reserve, the Indian Act provides for the consent of the band being obtained, and it is obtained in the ordinary way through their council. But in cases such as this where the Indians are not residing on the land, but it is part of the reserve and the reserve is being used for other purposes, we are asking for power to deal with these lands in this way.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is the minister sure that these islands are not at or near the proposed development in the river St. Lawrence? They are near Cornwall.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I cannot say.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Would they be used for purposes of the development?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If they are, of course action would have to be taken to get possession of them.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not think there should be any alienation of them.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Compensation undoubtedly would have to be made to the Indians for the land.

Mr. GUTHRIE: But there should be no alienation of the islands in the meantime.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We are not asking that power. We are asking power simply to lease them. There will be no alienation of the land from the band itself.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): These islands should be held as far as possible under public control until it is decided whether in any case they will be required for that development. No leases should be granted in the meantime where such interests might have to be expropriated.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In this legislation we are endeavouring to get away from long leases. Values change very rapidly. Five years are the limit in leasing this land, and in most cases the leases run from year to year. I have not had any representations made to me with respect to leases; but if this should come under the St. Lawrence development, undoubtedly either a sale would be arranged, or the authorities who are dealing with the matter would expropriate the land under the Expropriation Act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I thought the leases were for the purpose of summer cottages and the like. It strikes me that one of the engineers in my hon. friend's department told me at one time that some of these inslands would be utilized for dam or bridge construction work if the development went on. I think it would be well to safeguard that possibility, because in the event of a five or ten year lease, we might have to expropriate not only the lease but some buildings and the like. There should be a saving clause of some kind.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Something of that sort will occur on these islands. It is occurring on all the islands, and these are not an exception.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I have been reading over this proposed legislation, and really it seems to me the only power it gives to the government which it does not have now is to lease these islands without the consent of the band. There is a long preamble telling about the old leases, how they have been cancelled by the court, and how the department is not going to deal with any of these islands unless the old title has been extinguished by the court. Then the bill simply goes on to say, in clause 2, that the department may lease the islands without the consent of the band. I see nothing else in the bill.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is quite true. This property has never been occupied by the Indians. It is being maintained for their benefit. In cases where we execute leases for grazing or agricultural purposes on the reservation itself, where the Indians are in occupation, the act provides that the Indians shall be consulted. But this is just where the difficulty arises in this case. These lands are not occupied by the Indians and these long term leases have in the past entailed considerable difficulty. In some cases we want to get absolute control of this property for the benefit of the Indians. That is the reason we are asking for this bill.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Is there any precedent for the department dealing with the lands of an Indian reserve without the consent of the Indians?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We have that in the Indian Act. Under the recent amendment to the Indian Act we may take that action, but it has not been taken, with the exception of this case. That is why I suggested a bill for the purpose.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Why does the minister need a separate bill?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In some particular cases it becomes necessary that we have the authority; but as I say it has never been exercised, because we have always been able to deal amicably with the band, and I am against it in any case where the band is in residence. This is a different situation altogether. A great deal of controversy will arise in connection with leasing these islands and the Indians who do not reside upon them are constantly having representations made to them. We are asking for fairly drastic amendments to the Indian Act, not applying to lands upon which the Indians reside. We are asking in the next bill for some supervision over individuals who seek to act legally for Indians, to solicit subscriptions from them, and so forth. This bill is primarily for the purpose of giving us control of these islands without reference to the band itself.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Is there no general clause in the Indian Act to the same effect?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not giving the power that is asked for here.

Mr. BROWN: There is a band of Indians in whom the ownership is nominally vested now?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, the Regis band. They will get any profits that accrue from the administration of the land.

Mr. COOTE: Why should not the Indians be consulted if it is Indian property?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): For the simple reason that this is a group of little islands on some of which there is timber and most of which are of great natural beauty, and we find the utmost difficulty in getting the Indians to agree as to who should have them. We are also troubled by people going to the Indians and agitating them about leases. If we can have control of these islands we shall be able to get a very considerable revenue, which will assist very materially in looking after the welfare of this band.

Mr. COOTE: If the Indian department does not try to get more revenue than it has in other cases of Indian land that it has let without the consent of the band, its control will be to the detriment of the Indians. For my part I do not like to see this House pass legislation removing the land altogether from any right the Indians may have as to its disposition. I brought a case to the attention of this House two years ago where the Indian department deliberately leased land against the vote of the Indians at much less than could have been obtained for it had it been leased by auction or on any other competitive basis.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Chairman, there is a fixed rate at which Indian lands are leased by the department, six cents per acre for pasture land for cattle and ten cents per acre for sheep. The lease mentioned by my hon. friend carries that rate. For some considerable time we had a great deal of agitation in connection with that case, but I have heard nothing of it recently. Just as valuable land as that referred to is leased for identically the same figure. As one who has to take responsibility for the administration of the Indian Act, I may tell the House that in certain cases we need this authority. We have a great deal of trouble in the administration of the Indian Act. There are agitators in every band, and there are also outside agitators who excite the Indians and give them a false conception of their rights. That has happened on more than one occasion since I have been in charge of the department. I am merely asking here for what is obviously necessary in order to protect these islands and to secure from them a revenue commensurate with their worth for the benefit of the band.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): What is the area of these islands?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I cannot give my hon. friend that information.

Mr. COOTE: Mr. Chairman, in connection with the reserve which I mentioned a moment ago, I would ask the minister if the Indian department did not there do exactly what he is asking authority for under this bill with respect to these islands? The department simply went ahead and leased that Indian land without the consent of the band, although the band had voted against such leasing. If the department had power to do so in that case under the general act, I do not see why the minister need come now and ask for this special act to do what seems to be the very same thing in connection with other Indian lands.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Chairman, the lease in question was fully discussed here and I gave an explanation of every detail of it. Due consideration was given to the whole matter by the commissioner in western Canada, and on his recommendation we made the lease. In certain instances we have power to override agitators in any band We have difficulty at the moment on the Six Nations reserve, and I say frankly that I think the trouble has come about largely because I have tried to be lenient with those Indians. I find in some cases that is not the best policy to pursue, for there is not a single band in which there is not a fair percentage of agitators, who thrive on agitation in preference to working for their living. Those agitators can always stir up a great deal of difficulty for the department. There is a very valuable revenue to be secured from these islands.

Mr. COOTE: I am at a disadvantage because I have not the Indian Act before me, but is there not a provision in that act empowering the superintendent general to go ahead without the consent of the band and lease unoccupied lands as he sees fit?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not to give us the authority we want under this bill.

Mr. COOTE: It seems to me that the very same thing has been done by the department before under the Indian Act, and that is why I am asking the minister what is the necessity for bringing in this bill.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am advised by the law officers of my department that the authority asked for under this bill is necessary to give us full control of these islands. We certainly would not ask for this special bill if we had authority under the general act.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Consent of superintendent required for occupation, etc.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Surely the department has the right under the general act to make regulations such as those described in this section to prevent any person going on Indian land and cutting down and carrying away trees.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Of course, no one could do so without being subject to action for trespass, but we are simply making the position clear with respect to these islands. The clause may not be entirely necessary, but I see no harm in it.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: There is a bill now before the House for the amendment of the general act. I take it for granted that under the general act the department has power to make regulations in the terms of section 3 of this bill. Therefore why the department should be given this power in a special bill is something that I cannot understand. It seems to me that if the department is not satisfied with the general act as it stands in dealing with these and other Indian islands, the minister had better suggest amendments that his officials consider necessary.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think it is only fair where you are taking absolute control over certain lands that you should designate those lands in a separate piece of legislation. We have general powers for leasing, but we have not power under the Indian Act to take absolute control of any Indian land on behalf of the department. That is what we are seeking to get here.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: But do not those general powers cover what you are seeking under section 3?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Powers are delegated under the act to the council, subject to the approval of the superintendent general, but in this particular case we are taking power to deal absolutely with these lands, making provision not to dispose of them, but simply to lease them. We are also making regulations with respect to trespass and so forth. The control of the reserves under the Indian Act is primarily with the council, subject to the approval of the superintendent general.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: That is all right so far as section 2 is concerned, but as to section 3, the minister has not said whether the department has or has not now under the general act the power to make regulations bearing on that section.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): As I say, the power is in the council, subject to the approval of the superintendent general.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: With the consent of the minister I would suggest that the bill remain in committee until we get some further explanation as to why we should have certain sections in this act instead of in the general act.

Mr. SPEAKER: If any remedy is necessary, the hon. member may have it on the third reading of the bill, unless he wishes to move now that the bill be referred back to the committee.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: With the consent of the minister I move that the House go into committee again on the bill.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Edmonton, Minister of the Interior) moved the second reading of Bill No. 56 to amend the Indian Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

On section 1—If capital does not exceed two thousand dollars.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This is to give us power to dispose of certain small sums of money belonging to the Indians. It applies chiefly to the Indians of British Columbia where there are approximately about 100 bands whose capital ranges from $9.17 to $2,000. The annual interest on such funds is negligible. Many of the bands consist of just a few members and in some instances there is no occasion for the disposal of money. The purpose of the proposed amendment is to enable the Governor in Council to dispose of small amounts among the Indians in any way that may be deemed beneficial to them. When the amount involved is under $2,000 the distribution of interest entails a great deal of bookkeeping inasmuch as the individual member of the band receives so very small an amount. We are asking for authority to distribute these moneys amongst the bands interested and so clean up the situation.

Mr. GARDINER: That is, to distribute the capital itself?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: Are these small accounts stationary?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They are capital accounts.

Mr. STEVENS: But not accounts that may be added to by some unexpected lease or sale of timber or land or some other resource on the reserve?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No. In that case there might be a possibility of the capital exceeding $2,000, but this is to fix an arbitrary amount from which point to work down to zero. It does not contemplate cases in which the capital amount may be augmented by subsequent sales.

Mr. STEVENS: That is the point.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The object is to get rid of little capital accounts.

Mr. STEVENS: If these are dead accounts it is all right.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Regulations.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This is to give us more power over the operations of poolrooms, dance halls and places of amusement generally. In some instances we have no authority in relation to such matters, particularly as regards the sale of liquor on the reserves.

Mr. SMOKE: In my constituency is at least a portion of the Six Nations Indians, who stand in a different class altogether from all other Indians in Canada. I am not competent to give the complete history of the Six Nations Indians, but the committee will remember that during the Revolutionary war in the United States these Indians were allies of the British nation, and remained loyal. After the war they, like a number of others, were excluded from the American nation and forced to leave that country, as were the United Empire Loyalists. These Indians came to Canada under a treaty with King George which allowed them certain rights in this country. In intelligence the Six Nations Indians compare very favourably indeed with the average white man; the average Indian in the townships of Tuscarora and Oneida is quite equal to the average white man, and is quite capable of managing his own affairs. Therefore I think there should be an exception made in the case of those Indians known generally as the Six Nations. I do not know whether they should be under the Indian act at all; they were brought here by the British government and given certain lands under the Haldimand treaty, with which I am not familiar. I do know, however, that these lands were largely reduced by subsequent treaties.

I do not know how these later treaties were made; I have a question on the order paper in that connection which will give that information. Originally the Six Nations were entitled to a strip of land six miles wide from the mouth to the source of the Grand river, and that has been reduced until now they are in two townships, one in the county of Brant and the other in the county of Haldimand. The government still assumes to deal with these lands; they are held under life leases or in some other way with which I am not familiar, but as I have already said these Indians are thoroughly capable and well-behaved citizens of Canada, and I do not think the Indian department should longer assume the position of superiority implied by the Indian act. I would ask the minister if he will not take into consideration the question of excepting the Six Nations Indians from the provisions of the bill now before the House.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I inherited the responsibility of dealing with the Six Nations Indians as well as all other Indians in Canada. Of course where an Indian becomes enfranchised and takes upon himself the responsibility of full citizenship, he is no longer upon the reserve. I do not desire to discuss the treaty respecting these Indians; I understand my hon. friend is asking a question which will bring the matter up. I am not prepared to discuss that matter to-day nor am I ready to give a direct answer as to whether I would advise the release of the Six Nations Indians from the control of the Indian act. For one thing, I might say that there is a very serious difference of opinion between the bands themselves on that reserve, not through any interference by the Indian department but because of a difference in their own ideas. Just whether or not these Indians are at a stage of development where they can take full responsibility for their own affairs I am not prepared to say. White people quarrel amongst themselves and I see no reason why the Indians should not be given that privilege if they desire it. I may say, however, that this act applies to all the Indians in Canada; under section 92 the superintendent general may do a great many things, subject always to the councils selected by the Indians themselves, whose business it is to work under this act for the good government of their reserves. They themselves are desirous of having more stringent regulations governing the licensing of pool halls, dance halls and other places of amusement on the reserves. In the bill there are a great many clauses enumerated having to do with sanitary regulations, regulations for taxation, the control and destruction of dogs destroying sheep and all that sort or thing. The council administers these by-laws in running the reserve, and this amendment simply asks for more control over the pool halls and other places of amusement.

[Mr. Smoke.]

Mr. SENN: The pool rooms and dance halls and places of that character are taxed by the provincial government; the pool rooms pay a flat rate and the dance halls pay amusement tax. Will that still be operative in this case?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No. The Indian reserves are quite immune from any of the provisions of the provincial law. The control of the Indian reserves is under the jurisdiction of the federal government.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Life chiefs.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This is merely a change substituting the jurisdiction of the superintendent general for the Governor in Council. There is a restriction for three years, but if there is any protest I have no objection to dropping this.

Mr. STEVENS: There are two clauses which substitute the superintendent general for the Governor in Council, and one thought occurs to me in that connection. After all, in dealing with the members of our Indian tribes, and remembering their position as related to our own and as related to the government, I think it desirable to keep them as closely identified with the government as we possibly can. In other words, I think we might accord them this distinction, that their removal must be by the Governor in Council. It is a small thing, and really I would suggest to the minister that these two clauses be dropped. I do not think there is much need for them and it is one of those little courtesies which I think will probably smooth the paths of the department and of the minister.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am not particularly keen about this; as a matter of fact I rather welcome the responsibility of the order in council, although of course the superintendent general must take the responsibility of recommending it.

Mr. STEVENS: It is very little trouble, just a pro forma order.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have no objection to dropping these two sections, and carrying on as we have done in the past.

Sections 3 and 4 dropped.

On section 5—confirmation by the superintendent.

Mr. STEVENS: As to clause 5 I should think the same thing would apply unless there is some reason for using the word "also".

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This clause is not so important, perhaps, as the other. The other dealt with the removal of the chief and councillors and head men. This is a matter which merely deals with regulations. To provide that there should be an order in council will give an air of greater authority.

Mr. STEVENS: I think so.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have no particular objection. The sole object was to simplify the administration, that is all we had in mind. But if there is a feeling that the matter should proceed by order in council I do not object.

Mr. STEVENS: That is more formal.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I move that section 5 be dropped.

Motion agreed to.

Section 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Acquisition of totem poles, etc., forbidden.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This clause applies particularly to British Columbia, and it is something that we are desirous of having, because these works of art, if one may call them such, are very rapidly disappearing on the coast.

Mr. STEVENS: There is only one thing I should like to ask the minister. I am fully in accord with the idea expressed in this clause, but some of the Indians are making a business of carving small replicas of these totem poles and selling them, which I think is a very useful thing. Would this clause prevent them from doing that?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is not our intention. We are seeking to preserve these totem poles because of their historic value.

Mr. STEVENS: It says here:

No title to any. . . carved grave pole, totem pole, carved house-boat, or large rock—

And so on. The clause as it now reads would include any carved thing of that character, would it not? I know some of the Indians, for example those around Alert bay, carve these replicas and sell them to the tourists that go by on the Alaska tourist steamship route. We have a small one in our own home that was given to us by an Indian.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There would be no objection to the Indians doing that, although, perhaps, the clause might be interpreted to mean that they would not have such a right. I do not know how we are going to take power to prevent the sale of these historic tribal relics without having this clause in the bill.

Mr. STEVENS: The language seems to be so sweeping in its character that I think it would have the effect of stopping this business to which I referred, although it is one which should be encouraged, I think.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I quite admit the force of my hon. friend's contention, but I do not know how we are going to have the necessary authority, unless we have some such clause.

Mr. COOTE: Perhaps between now and eight o'clock the minister may hit upon something which would overcome the difficulty.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 42, respecting certain patents owned by Albert P. Frigon.—Mr. Mercier (St. Henri).

Bill No. 44, respecting the Ottawa Gas Company.—Mr. Mercier (St. Henri) (for Mr. Chevrier).

OTTAWA ELECTRIC COMPANY

Mr. PAUL MERCIER (St. Henri) (for Mr. Chevrier) moved the second reading of Bill No. 43, respecting the Ottawa Electric Company.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri) moved that the bill be referred to the committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Speaker, just on a point of order, is it proper, in the absence of the promoter of a bill, to move that it be referred to the committee? It may be possible that the promoter does not desire to proceed. I have no objection to this bill or to this procedure, but I think last session or the session before we laid down the rule that in the absence of the promoter the bill should stand.

Mr. SPEAKER: The reason I put the motion is that the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) was away on two different occasions when the bill was called before, and I thought he would like the bill to go before the committee.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have no objection to that.

Mr. SPEAKER: Strictly speaking, the hon. member is right. The sponsor of the bill should be present. However, by unanimous consent the motion may be agreed to.

Motion agreed to.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 56 to amend the Indian Act—Mr. Stewart (Edmonton).

On section 7—Acquisition of totem poles, etc., forbidden.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Our difficulty in connection with these totem poles, which are from fifteen to forty-five feet high, is that rich Americans have been coming up into British Columbia and purchasing them, and if this goes on the whole coast will soon be denuded of these totem poles if we do not take some action to preserve them. They are of great historic value. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre raised the question of Indians being allowed to practise the art of making miniature totem poles for sale. There is no objection in the world to that on the part of the department. The totem poles that we have in mind and wish to preserve are in the nature of stationary monuments, carvings on rocks, and the posts that appear along the coast. The art of making smaller totem poles would not be interefered with by this provision at all. This is merely to preserve the historic mementoes of the Indian tribes along the coast, and it applies only to British Columbia.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Have quite a number of these totem poles been sold?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, Americans have been purchasing them and taking them to the United States and placing them on their properties there. We want to preserve at least enough for those who come after us, or otherwise they will be found only in museums.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I notice that the clause is not drafted to apply to sales, but only to removal. There is no prohibition against the sale.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The sale would not be valid; removal cannot take place.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is nothing to make the sale valid. There is a provision to make the removal invalid. If a bona fide sale takes place, is the purchaser not entitled by law to remove what he has purchased?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It says:

No title. . . . shall be acquired by any means whatsoever by any person without the written consent of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The word "acquired" would cover it.

Mr. NEILL: I would like to point out to the minister in charge of this bill while it is perhaps desirable to retain these historic poles, I do not see why we should interfere with the Indians engaging in the occupation of making new totem poles, which is getting to be quite an industry now, just as the manufacture of old furniture is becoming quite an industry. They are copies, and they do not profess to be anything else but what they are. Why should these people who have had this facility handed down to them through long years of tradition and practice be prevented from selling the work of their hands from day to day? A distinction should be drawn between the old historic totem poles and the copies. I fear this restriction will apply to all copies made in the future.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is not the intention of the department that this should apply to those which are simply copies, but rather to the historic poles and monuments. They are taking the monuments as well as the poles, and anything that is a copy could be sold quite freely.

Mr. NEILL: Not under this legislation.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is just this one restriction. May I point out that unless we have this power, all will be sold. If you make distinctions, you will have difficulty in distinguishing between what is really a copy of the historic pole and what is the real article. I wish to assure the committee that there will be no objection in the world to the Indians carrying on the art of copying these monuments and historic poles.

Mr. NEILL: The bill does not say so, and I suppose it is the bill that will govern the Indian agent and the Indian department.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If my hon. friend inserts a provision that the Indians may freely dispose of the copies without reference to the department, then in all probability the historic poles will go as well.

Mr. NEILL: I would suggest that the clause be worded so that no poles made previously to this shall be disposed of and any poles made subsequently to this may be disposed of by obtaining the consent of the Indian agent who is always immediately available, and who can put a stamp on it and permit it to be exposed for sale. As the bill stands now, while I quite understand there is no intention of doing what I am speaking about, the bill does not say so.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If the Indian is permitted to dispose of copies without this restriction, without reference to any one, we shall have a great deal of difficulty in preserving the historic poles that are of value Even if you inserted in the bill a provision allowing the Indians to sell, the sale would have to be under the control of the department, because otherwise as these historic poles are almost invaluable to some people who have money to spend on articles of historic value, they will pay fabulous prices for them. Therefore it is simply an endeavour to preserve these poles of historic value, and if the Indian manufactures a new one and desires to sell it, such a sale can be very easily arranged for by the department.

Mr. NEILL: The department will make regulations to that effect?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. NEILL: Then I would suggest that the matter be made subject to the permission of the written consent of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, or anyone deputed by him. Otherwise every time an United States tourist wants to go ashore from a steamer and pay six bits for a little thing about six inches long, he has to get the written consent of the man down here at Ottawa There is no sense to that.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This would not apply to the small copies. That is the very point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), but it is pointed out that they make exact copies of the poles that are from twenty to thirty feet high. I do not know whether they do or not.

Mr. NEILL: Certainly they do.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What my hon. friend was objecting to was in connection with these smaller copies of the originals that are sold every day by these Indians who are practising their art. There is no interference with that at all.

Mr. NEILL: The bill says that they have to send to the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, and he is three thousand miles away. It will take a month or six weeks to get his consent.

Mr. SMITH (Stormont): I presume the superintendent general would have power to delegate his consent in regard to small copies without reference to him on each particular occasion.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The consent in that case will be obtained from the superintendent who is located at Victoria.

Mr. ADSHEAD: The consent applies not to the copies but to the originals. Is it the intention of the department to allow these originals to be taken away?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The bill does not say anything about originals or copies. It says simply that these monuments, poles, gravehouses, carved posts, shall not be disposed of without the consent of the department. That is the wording of the bill.

Mr. NEILL: That is hardly a fair statement. It says that they must not be disposed of without the written consent of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs. If it was the department I would not have much objection, because that consent would be obtained from the agent who is available in time, perhaps in three weeks. The bill does not say that; it says "without the written consent of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs", and there is only one man in that position. It does not say any one deputed by him. So when the United States tourist comes along from the steamer—and he is an important source of revenue to members of these bands —and says: "I will give you $75 for that totem pole", the man says "All right. Sit down and write a letter to Ottawa and you will get an answer back in the course of six weeks, when we shall be able to make a deal". I am not going to press the matter further, but I know there will be a great deal of discontent. I know the object is desirable, but it could be attained in such a way as not to hurt these Indians, many of whom make a living by carrying out this very art which we say is desirable and which soon they will be discouraged from carrying out if they find they cannot get a ready sale.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman says that the object is to prevent these old historic marks from being disposed of. In that case it is a very proper thing that the written consent of the superintendent general should be had, because that would prevent their being disposed of.

Mr. NEILL: My point is the delay occasioned in writing to Ottawa to get the written consent. The United States tourist is not going to wait while you write to Ottawa, three thousand miles away, for the written consent.

Mr. BENNETT: The object is to prevent their being sold at all.

Mr. NEILL: I am talking about the copies.

Mr. BENNETT: I would not say that this applies to the copies.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not think so. Of course lawyers can make these things apply to anything, but that is not really the intention. The intention is to preserve these historic monuments.

Mr. STEVENS: I will not delay the minister beyond one suggestion. I would suggest that in line 20, instead of saying:

Without the written consent of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs.

Put:

Without the authority of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs.

Then the minister by regulation can authorize the local agents to supervise the matter.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): It would be well to define what is meant by the term "totem pole". Is that the original pole owned by the tribe or one of the very many representations of it that are made annually? On my annual trips up and down the coast I see so-called totem poles manufactured and sold by the cord, not only to United States tourists, but to all classes of tourists. Has any one of these Indian carpenters who carves out a totem pole, before he makes a sale, to get leave from the Indian department? Surely that is not the intention. These are merely copies. It seems to me it is hardly necessary that any legislation should be passed to prevent these people from selling these carved objects any more than that they should get leave from the Indian department to sell a wicker basket.

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have just been trying to point out to the committee that if you give the Indians the privilege of selling exact copies of the totem poles you will have very great difficulty in preventing sales of the originals and they will disappear entirely. This provision may appear to work a hardship on the Indians, but strong representations have been made to us that these monuments are of great historic value not only from the standpoint of the people of British Columbia but from the standpoint of the Indians themselves. We cannot enforce an authority such as that suggested by my hon. friend, and I think on further consideration he will realize this. There is a tremendous territory to guard and there are still some very valuable historic poles to be found there.

Mr. KAISER: Why not specially provide for totem poles of historic value?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If you give permission for the sale of copies you cannot very well guard the historic poles, for they will be more valuable and more eagerly sought after than the copies, with the result that somebody will arrange to get the originals out of the country. True, this section provides that we may seize any article removed, but we cannot very well recover a totem pole taken into the United States, for instance. If there is any desire on the part of the people of British Columbia who made these representations to preserve these historic monuments, then we must have control over the copy as well as over the original itself.

Section agreed to.

Section 8 agreed to.

On section 9—Receiving money for the prosecution of a claim.

Mr. McPHERSON: Mr. Chairman, there might perhaps be occasions when the minister would not want this section to be enforced. I can personally recall two or three instances when a considerable sum of money was obtained for the Indians of Manitoba from the American government. We have a situation there that is perhaps unique, in that a large band of Sioux Indians came over from the States immediately after the Custer massacre and settled near Portage la Prairie. I know that during the past two years they have received from $3,000 to $10,000 from the American government. I do not know what legal charges were made for obtaining payment of that money, but I do know the money was secured through the assistance of solicitors. Under this clause those solicitors would be prosecuted. I do not think that is quite right, nor do I think it necessary that a solicitor in such a case should have to apply to the superintendent general for permission to act. I may add that there is more money coming to those Indians, because they have in the United States a rather valuable territory. I would suggest that the section should receive further consideration.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Chairman, that is exactly why we want this clause —in order that we may exercise some supervision over persons who make private bargains with Indian bands for the purpose of collecting claims, whether legitimate or imaginary. I do not like to mention names, but a case has come to my notice since I have been Superintendent General of Indian Affairs in relation to a very large claim which we think is owing by the American government to a band of Indians located in Ontario. Notwithstanding that the department has spent considerable sums of money in securing advice as to the possibility of collecting the claim, this band made a solemn agreement with an attorney under which he was to be remunerated for his services at the rate of nearly fifty per cent of whatever moneys might be collected by him. I could cite a dozen other instances in which representations were made to Indians with respect to certain claims, for the collection of which the Indians agreed to pay substantial remuneration. My hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) would not have to go very far to cite one case—

Mr. STEVENS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton):— in which for years the British Columbia Indians have been paying certain persons for their services in connection with claims which it had been represented could be enforced. I think those Indians have claims—at all events for consideration. But from one end of Canada to the other it is becoming a common practice to represent to the Indians that they have certain rights, and those making the representations usually manage to get the Indians to enter into a contract providing substantial remuneration for their advisers. We think it is to the advantage of the Indians that these contracts should be scrutinized by the department in order to protect them from exploitation.

Bill reported.

ROYAL AGRICULTURAL WINTER FAIR ASSOCIATION OF CANADA

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved. 1. That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the granting of financial assistance to the Royal Agricultural Winter Fair Association of Canada, for the purpose of erecting and equipping a building or buildings in the Exhibition park at Toronto, to be used to display for public inspection the live stock, agricultural and dairy products of Canada.

2. That for the said purpose the sum of $35,000 each year for a period of twenty years, commencing with the fiscal year ending March 31, 1928, shall be paid out of the vote appropriated for "live stock, including exhibitions";

3. That such grants shall be payable on condition that the government of the province of Ontario make to this association a grant equal in amount and for the same periods as the grants from the Dominion government, and upon such other conditions as to allocation of space, premiums, and plans and specifications, as may be prescribed.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The primary purpose of this resolution, upon which a bill will be based, is to extend further assistance and encouragement to the live stock industry of Canada by making the definite grant stipulated in the resolution to the Royal Agricultural Winter Fair Association whose headquarters are located at the exhibition park in Toronto. We are dealing with the Royal association as well as with the live stock associations throughout Canada, and perhaps I may say a word in reference to the extensive building used at present and which has been in use for the past five years. About six or seven years ago—I think in 1921—the Royal Agricultural Winter Fair Association entered into an arrangement with the city of Toronto for the construction of a building costing $1,500,000 for the housing of the exhibits of that show. The show was increasing in proportions and the city of Toronto undertook to construct the present building, which was opened in 1922. The exhibits very soon became so numerous and the fair was so popular, being patronized from one end of the country to the other, that the building in 1923 proved quite inadequate to take care of all that was offered for display. In that year the building, although it covers five acres of ground space, was able to accommodate only about one third of the cattle exhibited, and all the poultry, leaving two-thirds of the cattle exhibits, all the horses, sheep and swine to be taken care of in temporary buildings which were quite unfit for the housing of this high grade live stock, most of which is pure bred.

The question then came up as to who would supply the additional housing accommodation which was found to be necessary. The exhibition had become not only of national but of international importance, attracting a large number of exhibits from the United States, just as the Chicago International Exhibition attracts exhibits from Canada. The association discussed the matter with the city of Toronto and the city took the ground that they had done as well as they could be expected to do, as in fact they have. They had risked their money and their judgment in putting up a building at a cost of a million and a half, believing that circumstances would justify that expenditure, and that the exhibition would soon grow to the capacity of the building. Their belief was fully justified, for inside of two years the accommodation originally provided was found to be inadequate. The question is, should the further accommodation be provided by the province of Ontario, whose live stock men, to a greater extent possibly than those in other parts of Canada, enjoy the use of the building; or should the Dominion as a whole share in the expense? It must not be forgotten that live stock men throughout the country, from the maritimes to the Pacific, share in the accommodation afforded by the building. Should this parliament, therefore, assist in providing the necessary extension in conjunction with Ontario? The live stock men and the Royal Agricultural Winter Fair Association have agreed that it should, and have accordingly requested the government to take steps towards this end. Some two years ago we were asked to provide the necessary housing accommodation for this rapidly extending exhibition.

The resolution provides for an annual grant to the association of $35,000 for a period of twenty years. The legislature of Ontario has passed an act for a similar purpose, with the proviso that the Dominion should contribute its quota. We have agreed to do so on the same understanding. So that we have the three parties co-operating, the city of Toronto, which put up the original building at a cost, as I have said, of $1,500,000, and the province of Ontario and the Dominion government providing funds for the necessary extension on a fifty-fifty basis to the extent of $1,400,000. The building, when completed, will cover seven acres, and it is expected to cope fully with the demands. I may anticipate the question—why Toronto?

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): No one has asked it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, one might say that Toronto has a record of a half century behind it of putting on one of the best exhibitions in Canada and that it was to that city's own interest to put up the original building. But the question is, should Toronto be expected to accommodate this broad Dominion's live stock, or should the federal treasury assist with a small annual grant extending, as suggested, over twenty years, to help the province? If we contribute, I can assure the committee that at the end of a very short time the entire accommodation will be taken up by the exhibition, and then we shall have the most outstanding international live stock show on this continent.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If this resolution passes, is the minister prepared to guarantee that, should other cities apply for similar assistance—say, Winnipeg, or as someone behind me suggests, Calgary—that assistance will be given? This grant of $700,000 will, with interest, run well up into a million.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This includes the interest.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I did not know that. At any rate the money is intended to extend what after all, is a local exhibition. It is called "Royal" but I do not know what that means. We were told a year or two ago that it was against the law to attach this name to any private institution. Further than that, we are told that it was called the Winter Fair Association of Canada. I do not know why one particular city or province should undertake to call its local exhibition a Canadian exhibition. There are a great many other places which might do that equally well. It would seem to me that essentially this is a local exhibition; undoubtedly it has been successful in the past and I do not see why it should not continue its successful career. But if the government continues to make grants to one particular locality, we should have an assurance from the government that grants on a proportionate scale will be made to other parts of Canada.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is something in what my friend has said, but we will have to deal with each case as it comes before us. I do not think we could undertake to have three or four outstanding national or international fairs or exhibitions in Canada at this time, because we must have a reasonable amount of provincial co-operation before we can even have one good show, because of the scattered nature of our provinces. In the United States they concentrate on one outstanding international exhibition at Chicago; it is the centre of attraction of the whole continent, and I think most of us have the idea that we should also centre on one, but of course not altogether to the exclusion of all others. This government is giving more money to our exhibitions in Canada to-day than any other government in our history. In regard to Winnipeg, I may say that we have an allocation of what we call our "A" fairs; two of these have been allocated to each of the four western provinces but Manitoba only avails itself of one, because Winnipeg has not revived the exhibition which was formerly such a pronounced success. We are keeping a little niche in our program, however, looking to the day when the city of Winnipeg will once more conduct this fair and, by making use of the old grounds and renovating the old buildings, resume her place in the agricultural life of Manitoba. If Winnipeg does that the usual grant given "A" fairs will be made, but outside of that I cannot say anything further, except that I think at this juncture we should confine ourselves to the idea of one outstanding national exhibition, and then deal with other applications on their merits.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Is it not a fact that the Toronto exhibition is the only exhibition carried on in the Dominion of Canada which has the right to be called international at present?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think so.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): If you are going to make this apply to side shows in Winnipeg and other places like that where they gather a few people together for a visit once a year or once every two or three years, the next thing will be applications from every township for the little one-day shows. The only reason back of this grant is the fact that this exhibition is international.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is its only justification.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): It is international, and when the city of Winnipeg or any other city in Canada can establish a fair of anything near the proportions of the Toronto exhibition I dare say this parliament will be ready to take that into consideration, and it would be in the general interests of Canada to do so. But there is no comparison at all between a grant for a little show in Winnipeg and a grant for the international exhibition in Toronto.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has confused two things; the exhibition at Toronto is not being discussed. We were discussing the Royal Agricultural Winter Fair, an exhibition for the display of the live stock, agricultural and dairy products of Canada. If the point under discussion were the relative merits of the Toronto exhibition and any western exhibition I think possibly my friend's observations, in a little different language, might be well taken, but while we in the west have not the population of the east, we do not conduct exhibitions as side shows. That must be clearly understood, because the winter exhibitions of live stock in western Canada are international in their character, as the minister very well knows; he also knows the efforts now being made to centralize these exhibitions in the city of Winnipeg this winter. I believe those efforts will be successful, because a large convention is being held in Winnipeg within the next few weeks, if I remember correctly. I know that on one occasion this parliament was good enough to vote a very large sum to Calgary to assist the exhibition there. So I would very much regret anyone giving voice to the thought in this chamber that the cattle of eastern Canada and the dairy and agricultural products of eastern Canada are in any sense better than those of the west. The population of western Canada is very much less than that of the east, but having regard to the population it is only fair to say that western cattle have taken first prizes in every part of the world where they have been exhibited; the same may be said with respect to sheep and horses, to a lesser extent, while our dairy products really form the basis of the largest export trade in dairy products which we have at present. So I would like the House to realize that it is not voting money for the great Toronto exhibition, which is international in its character, but for a cattle exhibition in the city of Toronto, a winter show for cattle and dairy products. To that extent I hope the day is not far distant when under similar conditions we may be able to make some similar appeal for one of the cities in western Canada.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): It is quite true that this amount is for the winter exhibition, but there is a relation between the winter exhibition and the international exhibition which must be remembered. I venture to say that this application would never be considered for a moment if it were not for that relationship.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): My hon. friend was very hard up for an argument when he took the ground that I intimated that the cattle of western Canada were not equal to those of the east; I did not suggest that for one moment. This is not an exhibition for Ontario cattle; cattle from western Canada will be on exhibition there as well as cattle from other parts of Canada and from the United States. I repeat that there is a connection between this winter show and the international exhibition, and if it were not for the fame that exhibition has acquired all over the world this grant would not have been asked for and would not have been made.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): I hope the committee will not lose too much time in discussing this item which the good minister has recommended. Every one knows that this is not a local fair or a local association of any kind. The live stock associations of Canada are all interested in this coliseum which it is proposed to build; as the minister said, the city of Toronto spent a million and a quarter to build the coliseum already there, which to-day will not house more than one-third or one-half of the exhibits entered. These exhibits come from the west, from every province of Canada and from almost every state in the union. This is an international fair pure and simple, and I hope the vote will go through without any further discussion which only leads to more controversy.

Mr. COOTE: I am very sorry to disappoint any hon. member for Toronto by not letting this amount go through without further discussion, but I am afraid it cannot be helped. I would suggest to the minister that the time to cut out these dips into the treasury, which he described so realistically, is right now before we make this grant to the royal winter fair at Toronto. He is starting out on a policy that will, I am sure, lead his government and successive governments into trouble. Since the minister assumed charge of the department he has been cutting down grants to fairs, starting with the little fairs. There is too much concentration in Toronto. There are enough things centralized in that city now without handing that city a grant of $700,000 to put up another building. They have got lots of money in Toronto to put up such a building; most of the money in Canada is corralled in that city. It would not hurt the citizens of Toronto very much to pay $700,000 themselves to put up this building if they needed it. The thing is wrong in principle. If you want a place for a central exhibition in Canada, that place surely is Winnipeg, because it is nearer the centre of Canada than Toronto. In the years to come it is certainly going to be the centre of Canada as far as agricultural production is concerned, and dairy products at that. I do not think the minister has really given us any very good reason for embarking on a policy of subsidizing this exhibition association in order to enable them to put up a building. The minister has been hard enough on the small fairs by cutting down their grants, but he still continues to make grants to the bigger associations. I think that while he is doing that, this association should take care of its own buildings. I do not think this government, or this House should embark on a policy of putting up buildings for exhibition associations.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): The hon. gentleman who preceded me cannot be serious. If he is, he is speaking without regard to the facts. The hon. gentleman must know that we are not making a grant to the city of Toronto. The exhibition of the royal winter fair is held in Toronto, but it is not in the interest of the city of Toronto but of the whole Dominion. Toronto is capable of looking after its own fairs and does not need to ask for anything here. What is more if it did I do not believe the Minister of Agriculture would grant it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The last speaker is quite right. This proposition is to provide for the housing of the pure bred live stock of Canada and not to house the pure bred Tories of Toronto. The city of Toronto has demonstrated for many years its capacity for putting on and pulling off excellent exhibitions. It is a large, populous centre, with good hotels and good railway connections, and it is the centre to which the live stock of all Canada are gravitating. Every provincial government helps to pay the freight bill of the respective provincial exhibits to this great national exhibition, so that it has the sympathetic support of all the provinces of Canada. I hope my hon. friend from Macleod will endeavour to take a broad, national aspect of this undertaking, and forget that there is such a place as Toronto. Let him remember the needs of the live stock industry. This building must be located somewhere, but if anybody can find a better place than Toronto I will consider the proposition. In the absence of any better location it seems to me that Toronto is the logical place.

Now as to the necessity of this accommodation, the matter has been fought out for the last three years. The exhibits are so crowded that exhibitors are considering the idea of discontinuing sending them because there is not proper accommodation. In the weather such as we have in November, the ground is simply nothing but a quagmire. There is such a demand for accommodation that temporary buildings, even tents, have to be provided, and for the exhibition of horses recourse has been had to box cars. While the judges are at work the horses are taken out of the cars, and then returned again to the restricted accommodation which those cars offer. That cannot continue. The exhibition must go forward and develop in accordance with its possibilities as a great national show. It cannot be expected that in a case of this kind the whole burden should be supported by Toronto; some of it must devolve upon the rest of the Dominion.

Mr. COOTE: I should like the minister and the people of Toronto as well to understand clearly that I am not objecting to this grant because it is going to Toronto. I am objecting to it simply because I think it is wrong in principle and because I think we should not embark upon such a policy. The minister seems to argue that the building should be provided because the exhibits have been increased. In that case if Calgary wanted a new building all its people would have to do would be to come down to the minister and say, "We have got to house some live stock in box cars and we should like to have $700,000 in order to make an addition to our building." I would not object if the government or the minister think they have plenty of money for all these purposes; but when I have to pay about $2 in the shape of a tax on my sleeping car berth to the Dominion government when I want to come down to Ottawa, I think the government must be pretty hard up for money to run the country. Erecting exhibition buildings is a poor policy for us to embark on. Let me repeat to the hon. member (Mr. Spence), who resented my remarks, that I do not object to Toronto getting this grant simply because it is Toronto. I object to the principle contained in the policy we are embarking upon here of putting up buildings in which to hold winter fairs, or summer fairs either for that matter.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): As one of the western members of this House I should like to take the opportunity of agreeing for once with my hon. friends from Toronto. The winter show in Toronto is a national show, and people come from all over the Dominion to compete. We are not giving Toronto, or the Toronto exhibition, anything in this grant; we are simply adding to the accommodation for the annual exhibition of the winter fair so that a national show can be accommodated properly.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): That is right.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): To try to build up a national show in any other part of Canada to-day would take three or four times the amount of money asked for in this vote, and unless we are going to allow the great live stock show of Canada to retrogress, we have got to spend a little money immediately. Therefore I agree entirely that we should make this appropriation for the winter show which happens to be held in the city of Toronto—not for Toronto, but for the live stock and dairy industry of Canada as a whole.

Mr. KAISER: I wish to say a word in support of this resolution, for one or two reasons. In the first place this winter show must not be regarded as a Toronto conception at all. I have perhaps occasion to be somewhat intimately connected with it for the reason that most of the men who are associated with it come from the constituency that I represent in this House. Have the members who suggested Winnipeg or Calgary as the scene of an exhibition men in their midst who would give as much time and energy to the building up of a show as Mr. John Bright, for example, who was the live stock commissioner for Canada for a great number of years, and to whom, I think, we may attribute the building of this coliseum and the establishment of this fair in Toronto? Mr. Robert Miller, who was president of the fair two years ago, and the present president of the fair, Mr. Dryden, are both from my constituency, and by virtue of that fact naturally they would expect me to say something in regard to this resolution. I consider that it is a move in the right direction, and I would say to the gentlemen from Winnipeg that if they would give as much time to the development of a show in Winnipeg as Mr. Miller, Mr. Dryden and Mr. John Bright have given to the development of this fair in Toronto, they would be justified in having a grant. I know that our people will be quite thankful for the efforts that are being put forward, because the accommodation is absolutely needed. I am very glad to support the resolution.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Motherwell thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 64, for the granting of assistance to the Royal Agricultural Winter Fair Association of Canada, at Toronto, Ontario.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Minister of Labour) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure respecting old age pensions, and to provide,—

1. That the Governor in Council may make an agreement with the Lieutenant-Governor in Council of any province for the payment to such province quarterly of an amount equal to one-half of the net sum paid out during the preceding quarter by such province for pensions pursuant to a provincial statute authorizing and providing for the payment of such pensions to the persons and under the conditions hereinafter specified and regulations made under the proposed legislation.

2. That every agreement so made shall continue in force so long as the provincial statute remains in operation or until after the expiration of ten years from the date upon which notice of an intention to determine the agreement is given by the Governor General to the Lieutenant-Governor of the province with which the same was made.

3. That before any agreement so made comes into operation, the Governor in Council shall approve the scheme for the administration of pensions proposed to be adopted by the province, and no change in such scheme shall be made by the province without the consent of the Governor in Council.

4. That all sums payable to any province in pursuance of any such agreement shall be payable from time to time on the certificate of the Minister of Finance out of any moneys belonging to the consolidated revenue fund of Canada not otherwise appropriated.

5. That provision shall be made for the payment of a pension to every person who, at the date of the proposed commencement of the pension:—

(a) is a British subject, or, being a widow, was such before her marriage;

(b) has attained the age of seventy years;

(c) has resided in Canada for the twenty years immediately preceding the date aforesaid;

(d) has resided in the province in which the application for pension is made for the five years immediately preceding the said date;

(e) is not an Indian as defined by the Indian Act;

(f) has not made any voluntary assignment or transfer of property for the purpose of qualifying for a pension.

6. That the receipt of a pension shall not by itself constitute a disqualification from voting at any provincial or municipal election.

7. That the maximum pension payable shall be two hundred and forty dollars yearly, which shall be subject to reduction by the amount of the income of the pensioner in excess of one hundred and twenty-five dollars a year.

8. That provisions be made as to the credit to the pension authority of the annual value of a pensioner's residence, and the recovery of pension payments out of deceased pensioner's estate, and for the distribution of pension burden among provinces by proportionate reimbursement or proportionate reduction where the pensioner resided in more than one province or transfers his permanent residence to another province, and for ceasing of payments where he transfers his residence to some place out of Canada, and the revival of his rights upon again becoming a resident of Canada.

9. That no pension shall be subject to alienation or transfer by the pensioner, or to seizure in satisfaction of any claim against him.

10. That on or before the thirtieth day of April in each year, the Minister of Finance shall make a full report to parliament of the operation of the agreements made pursuant to the proposed act, and of the moneys of Canada paid to the provinces under each of the several agreements entered into pursuant thereto.

11. That the Governor in Council shall have power from time to time, on the recommendation of the Minister of Labour, and with the approval of the Treasury board, to make regulations, not inconsistent with the provisions of the proposed act, with regard to the pensions herein provided for, and such regulations shall be published in the Canada Gazette, and be laid before parliament.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a word or two in regard to this resolution, more particularly to set clearly before the House the attitude of the Conservative party here, and I think of the Conservative party of Canada, in regard to the subject matter of the resolution; and I do so having regard to the debate which took place in this House on this question less than a year ago, which, of course, is found fully reported in Hansard.

Those who were present in the House when the former bill was introduced last session will remember quite clearly the discussion which took place. A great many members of the Conservative party in the House at that time spoke to this measure when it was in the committee stage. I have read over the debate with some care, and I think I can state with assurance that each hon. member on this side of the House who discussed the proposal on that occasion agreed as to the principle of the bill then submitted. They did not accept it as an ideal measure by any means, but rather took the view that it was better to accept half a loaf than no bread. Member after member on this side of the House criticised many of the details of the measure; our suggestions were met in very good spirit by the government at the time, and some most useful amendments were made to the bill as originally drawn.

Several members on this side of the House said very clearly, very ably, very forcibly, that while they were prepared to support the measure then submitted they would have preferred a much wider measure, one applying to the whole Dominion of Canada, rather than one conditional upon its acceptance by this province, that province and the other province, which was the proposal submitted by the government.

On behalf of the government it was urged in regard to the bill then presented, which was a sort of provincial arrangement, that in order to come within our constitutional rights in this House it was necessary that we should become practically subservient to the will of the provinces in this matter. Indeed, it was intimated on more than one occasion during the debate that this House had no constitutional right to pass an old age pension bill. Opinions were cited from some of the law officers of the Department of Justice, but the opinions cited did not bear out the contention of those hon. members who had urged that this House had not the inherent right to pass an old age pension bill if it so desired.

Another objection that was taken, and very forcibly taken, was that the government's proposal in regard to old age pensions was too limited. Some considered the age limit of seventy too high. Another criticism which had force was that the pension was not founded at all on the question of disability, either ordinary physical disability, or disability through blindness or the like. It was founded solely upon one consideration—old age, and old age did not count until one had reached the age of seventy years.

Mr. NEILL: Old age and destitution.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I did not notice the word destitution. I assume that one must accompany the other. I think our position was made abundantly clear, Mr. Speaker, upon that question. It was deemed to be the unanimous wish that the bill should pass unchallenged after amendment and after discussion in the committee, and the bill did pass this House unchallenged; there was no division on it. But during the course of the election last fall I think I am safe in saying that in every quarter of Canada Conservative candidates in the various ridings were charged with opposition to the old age pension bill. Upon almost every Liberal platform that charge was made. I remember being in the city of Windsor during the last election and being handed an election card charging the present member from the city of Windsor with having voted against the old age pension bill. That is only one instance; but in riding after riding, it was charged against the Conservative party and Conservative candidates that they had opposed the passage of that bill through the House of Commons.

I am speaking at this moment in order to make our position absolutely clear upon this question. The position of the Conservative party in this House in regard to old age pensions as proposed in this measure is this. We prefer a federal scheme. We prefer a scheme which will apply equally to every corner of Canada. This bill is limited to those persons who are in destitution and who have reached the age of seventy years. Apply the proposal to the Dominion of Canada equally and let the Dominion treasury bear the expense. I say to my right hon. friend and his government: If you will do that, I believe you will have something in the nature of a real pension measure for the class of persons to whom it applies. I am not seeking in my present remarks to extend the measure beyond those described in this resolution, namely, those who are destitute and at the age of seventy; but taking that as the standard adopted by this government, I say: Go further than you have gone; make it an all Canadian scheme; adopt the federal principle and apply it throughout the whole Dominion. Then you will have a pension scheme which may and which will be of some advantage to the people who seek it.

My criticism of the present measure is just the criticism which was levelled against it last session. In all probability it will be inoperative. It is founded upon a wrong principle. We have in this confederation nine self-governing provinces. This proposal is based upon the theory that these provinces are going to agree to a measure dictated by the federal parliament. The federal parliament proposes a measure and says to each of the provinces: If you adopt this measure which we propose, then we will pay one-half of the amount that you are called upon to pay in respect of pensions to aged people. That is an improper principle. It is nothing short of dictation to the provincial governments of this country.

But what is the actual situation? Last session there was only a very faint intimation that any single province would come into the scheme. Member after member on this side of the House urged that the provinces be called together in conference to say what their attitude was in regard to this proposal. But no, the government would not hear of such a suggestion. They wanted to go boldly forward and practically say to the provinces of Canada: There is the measure; we dictate its terms; come in or stay out. What will happen if some of the provinces stay out? Supposing Ontario or Quebec decides not to come in under the present proposal, what will be the result? Other provinces may come in, and Ontario or Quebec, refusing to come in, must bear their proportionate share of the taxation under a scheme with which they will have nothing to do. Does that not sound a little like dictation to the provinces of this Dominion? Is that not an imposition upon the rights of the people of the various provinces? That was one of the grounds upon which we argued that your measure was faulty; that in all human probability it would never have any results; that there had been no preparation for the proposal. Indeed I doubt if any progress has yet been made in regard to obtaining the views of the various provincial governments. It has been intimated that British Columbia is now likely to agree to the proposal at present before the House, but has the government any official assurance from any other province that it is likely to come into this scheme? If it has not, I tell my right hon. friend and his government that they are wasting the time of the House in proposing this measure. They will fool the people of this country who are depending upon obtaining old age pensions at some time in the not too remote future. If your bill passes, it may become absolutely inoperative.

Have we or have we not the right to pass a federal measure dealing with this matter? I submit without hesitation, without any reservation, that under the constitution of this country this parliament can pass a federal measure. Unquestionably it has the right, and if the government will propose a measure applying to all Canada, where the whole amount is to be paid out of the federal treasury, there can be no doubt as to our constitutional authority to do so. We impose no burden upon any province. We exact no condition from any province. We ask no contribution from any citizen of any province. We invade in no respect what is known as property and civil rights in the various provinces. We have the right. The only question is: Is the government willing to exercise that right and pass a measure which will give relief to the people mentioned in this resolution and who, I submit, will receive no relief, or very tardy relief, if the present scheme is adopted by this parliament.

I wonder if the government has considered just what the scheme means to some of the provinces. I was startled by figures which I saw to-night. This proposal involves this, that if the provinces enter into it and pass legislation practically identical with the resolution which we are now discussing, they may ask for and receive from the federal treasury one-half the amount that they are called upon to pay for the aged poor of their various provinces. I am going to take only the single instance of Nova Scotia. An estimate has been made of those in that province who are over seventy years of age, and it is said that forty per cent of those people will be able to qualify under this clause as destitute and also as having attained that age. Does the government realize what they are imposing upon Nova Scotia? They are asking that province to contribute, in addition to what they now contribute for their aged and infirm, some $600,000 or $700,000 per annum to carry out this measure. While the Duncan report, which we hope will give some relief, suggests an additional subsidy of only $850,000 all told for that province, if this government carries out its present proposal and Nova Scotia accepts it, almost the whole of that increased subsidy will have to be paid out for old age pensions. I do not know what the figures are in regard to the other provinces. I have seen them in tabulated form, but the one that struck me was with regard to Nova Scotia. That is a burden which that province cannot bear.

I object to this scheme as a mere piece of patchwork. One of the chief criticisms to be levelled against it is that it will apply unequally, bear unequally, unless every province submits to the dictation of this government in matters over which they themselves have control. Now, have I made clear the position of the party which I have the honour to represent in this House upon this question? We ask for a federal measure. The cost of the present proposal is estimated at something like $12,000,000 a year. The cost of a federal scheme, according to the report of the committee which examined into these matters, would be about $23,000,000 a year. Shall we make two bites of the cherry, I ask? Why not adopt a federal scheme? Why not pay the whole amount out of the federal treasury in order that we may have a uniform system throughout Canada?—one which must bear equally upon all the provinces, because all the provinces must contribute their fair proportion of the taxation of the country.

That is the policy of the Conservative party on the subject. That is the measure for which we ask. If it is denied to us, what are we to do? Vote against the present measure? No. We will do as we did last session, we will say to the government and to the country: We will accept half a loaf or a quarter loaf rather than get no bread at all, and our support of the present bill is only by reason of the fact that this government will not bring in a federal measure, which is the one we desire and the one we advocate.

Mr. HEENAN: Mr. Chairman, I am glad to hear the remarks of the leader of the opposition, for if he is keen to spend $24,000,000 I am sure there will be a fair chance of getting him to vote for the $12,000,000 which we propose. As to the attitude of the Conservative party, I notice it is somewhat changed from that taken last session.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No.

Mr. HEENAN: I think there is on record a document from the then leader of the opposition to the effect that he would not consider the introduction of an old age pension plan for Canada.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I never heard of it.

Mr. STEVENS: Where is the document?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will my hon. friend tell us what document he refers to? I have never heard of it. I am only asking out of curiosity now.

Mr. HEENAN: Before the debate is over I think the document will be produced, or I am very much mistaken. If it is not produced I will take back that statement. Referring to another remark by my hon. friend, I think he said that last session every member of the opposition spoke in favour of the principle of old age pensions. Well, I sat through nearly all the debate, and it may be I do not quite understand the English language, but I thought many members on the other side of the House were not only trying to discourage the adoption of an old age pension plan, but spoke absolutely against it. Indeed I do not think my hon. friend would have very far to look to find some around him right now.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have read the debate.

Mr. STEVENS: You had better name them.

Mr. HEENAN: The argument of my hon. friend that the provinces would not co-operate in an old age pensions scheme is something like the argument that was advanced during the time when other co-operative measures were under consideration in this House, yet we find in operation to-day co-operative plans between the various provinces and the federal government calling for an expenditure of over $65,000,000 from the federal treasury, and instead of the provinces trying to withdraw from those agreements they are asking for their extension.

Again, last session I heard the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) read the replies received from the premiers of the different provinces, and I believe he stated that not one of those premiers was in favour of the old age pension bill at that time.

Mr. MANION: Hear, hear.

Mr. HEENAN: I had not read over the documents at that time, but I have taken the trouble to do so since, and I am glad the hon. member says, "hear, hear", because evidently he has not changed his mind. I find that the Premier of New Brunswick stated:

While I feel that it would be a good thing—

That is not against it, is it?

While I feel it would be a good thing, yet it would be impossible for me to commit the province to any action in this matter at the present moment.

Mr. MANION: Is he for it?

Mr. HEENAN: He endorses the principle.

Mr. MANION: But he would not commit the province to it.

Mr. HEENAN: At the present moment.

Mr. MANION: That is what we were talking about.

Mr. HEENAN: So that premier was in favour of the plan.

Mr. MANION: Oh, oh.

Mr. HEENAN: The Premier of Nova Scotia replied:

Without a further and better understanding of the subject matter no action would be possible at present.

Mr. MANION: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: That is favourable?

Mr. HEENAN: Would you take it that he was against the plan?

Mr. STEVENS: Certainly.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Have you anything subsequent to that?

Mr. HEENAN: Without a better understanding he said no action would be taken at the present time.

Mr. MANION: What can you have more definitely against the scheme than that?

Mr. HEENAN: Evidently we do not understand the English language in the same way.

Mr. MANION: Has he said anything since?

Mr. HEENAN: We have had something since, but not from Nova Scotia. The Premier of Prince Edward Island replied:

I shall place the matter before my government at its next meeting and will then advise you of its decision.

Is that saying he would not have anything to do with the scheme?

Mr. MANION: It is not saying he would.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I supposed he welcomed it.

Mr. HEENAN: The Premier of Ontario said:

I shall be glad to consider the matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HEENAN: It might be a good laugh, but it is a laugh on the Premier of Ontario.

Mr. MANION: It is a laugh on the Minister of Labour, I think.

Mr. IRVINE: Are those the second or the third replies from the premiers?

Mr. MANION: It is their replies to the committee.

Mr. IRVINE: I happened to be on the committee, and I think all the premiers except one were expressly opposed to the pension scheme. I was wondering whether there had been any further replies.

Mr. HEENAN: No, these are the replies read by my hon. friend from Fort William.

Mr. IRVINE: I am afraid the minister is not reading all of the letters.

Mr. HEENAN: I am not.

Mr. STEVENS: These are the most optimistic corners.

Mr. HEENAN: Saskatchewan replied:

While we are disposed to think that an old age pension scheme should be undertaken, the difficulties in the way of the suggested scheme appear almost, if not entirely, insurmountable.

Mr. STEVENS: Strongly in favour!

An hon. MEMBER: Give us another favourable one.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. HEENAN: If in view of these replies we now introduce a bill that removes the obstacles mentioned, would you not consider that the provinces are in favour of an old age pension scheme?

Mr. MANION: Finish the provinces' replies.

Mr. HEENAN: That is an illustration of their replies without reading any further.

[Mr. Manion.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HEENAN: Well, I have some that are in favour of the scheme.

Mr. MANION: Read us one that is in favour of it.

Mr. HEENAN: As an example, the province of British Columbia was opposed to this scheme because the obstacles in the way were insurmountable, but to-day we have the spectacle of a bill introduced in the legislature—

Mr. MANION: "Spectacle" is right.

Mr. HEENAN: —providing for this on a co-operative plan.

An hon. MEMBER: What about Quebec?

Mr. HEENAN: We will discuss the details when the bill is before the committee. From the information we have in the Department of Labour we find that there are many schemes of old age pensions, about twenty-eight in fact, some providing for pensions at the age of seventy, others at sixty-five, others again at sixty, while in other cases no age is specified; and others provide for a diminution of pensions if the pensioner has an income or is possessed of property. In other words, it appears that old age pensions have been adopted in various countries to meet the conditions peculiar to those places.

In this country the subject of old age pensions has been under consideration for the past twenty years. In 1906 a resolution was introduced to deal with the matter, and again in 1908, in 1912 and in 1913, resolutions were introduced calling for the appointment of special committees to consider the advisability of adopting an old age pensions plan. In 1908 a law was passed authorizing the sale of annuities for old age. That was the first practical movement in the direction of old age pensions ever made in Canada. In 1914 a resolution in favour of an old age pension system for this country was moved in the House, but the debate was not concluded. In 1922 the House of Commons adopted a resolution introduced by the member for Hull declaring that in its opinion the federal government should consider the advisability of devising ways and means of establishing a system of old age pensions in Canada. In 1924 a special committee of the House was appointed on motion of the Prime Minister to inquire into an old age pensions scheme for Canada. That committee reported on July 1, 1924, submitting the following recommendations:

1. That an old age pension system be established at the earliest possible date for deserving indigent persons of seventy years of age and upwards.

2. That applicants for pension must be British subjects of at least twenty years' residence in Canada, or naturalized subjects of at least fifteen years' naturalization and twenty-five years' residence.

3. That the maximum rate of pension be twenty dollars per month, which will be lessened by private income or partial ability to earn.

4. That one-half of the amount of the pension payable be borne by the federal government; the other half, by the provincial governments of such provinces as express by legislation their desire to adopt the system—the cost of administration to be borne by the provincial governments.

The report of the committee was communicated to the provinces to ascertain their views in the matter. At the session of 1925 the committee was reappointed, and the correspondence between the various provinces was submitted to it for consideration. After careful deliberation, and having obtained advice from the Department of Justice, the committee again favoured the adoption of a co-operative system of old age pensions. The chairman of the committee in moving the adoption of its report on June 18, 1925, in the course of his remarks said:

> This government has taken the initial step and we hope the matter will be proceeded with and prosecuted until it arrives at a successful conclusion in a co-operative movement between the federal government and the provincial governments.

As hon. members are aware, the government last session introduced a bill along the lines recommended by that committee, and it is practically the same measure I have the honour to introduce at this time. The bill introduced last year passed this House, as hon. gentlemen no doubt know.

In view of the fact that representations have been made from some quarters urging that a different system be adopted, that is to say, a purely federal scheme, and one which my hon. friend on behalf of the Conservative party now also advocates, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that, when the resolution to concur in the recommendations of the committee was before the House in 1925, the committee having suggested a co-operative plan, an amendment was moved that the report be referred back to the committee with instructions to consider and report again upon a purely federal scheme. That amendment was voted down by 139 to 17 in this chamber. There is no question therefore that the decision of the House at that time was against a purely federal system. As I have already said, the House during the last session passed the bill, but it was subsequently defeated in the Senate and consequently did not become law.

During the last election campaign the question of old age pensions was one of the matters which were most prominently before the electorate of Canada. One could hardly read a newspaper during that campaign without noting some reference to the desirability of establishing a system of old age pensions in this country. If we are to interpret the will of the electorate on that question in the way we usually interpret electoral decisions, there can be no question that the principle adopted in this bill was endorsed by the people of Canada.

During the debate last session some members advocated a contributory system. I believe the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) was one of those who espoused that scheme. But as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) pointed out at that time, practically every scheme of old age pensions in existence to-day began upon a non-contributory basis. They were all initiated at first as purely non-contributory plans. Like the Prime Minister, I feel that if we were establishing an old age pensions scheme with our younger people in view, I should myself be inclined to the contributory system. But having in mind the fact that we are facing a practical problem, and that we are legislating for our old pioneers, indigents, if you will, who have been unable through lack of opportunity or by reason of misfortune to provide for themselves, I think that the plan we are now proposing is the best one, at least for the time being. At the same time I hope to see the annuity system developed—

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. HEENAN: I trust my hon. friend will say "hear, hear" to what follows. I hope to see the annuity system developed into a broad scheme of social insurance. Of course it will be on a contributory plan, and I am hoping that it will also be in co-operation with the provinces. I have given a good deal of study and thought to the extension of the annuity system, and I see great prospects ahead for that scheme.

It has just been argued by the leader of the opposition that the provinces may not come into the scheme on a co-operative basis, and one of the reasons given is that it would be too expensive; the province of Nova Scotia was taken as an example. I am afraid those supporting that view have not considered the fact that the provinces and the municipalities bear the entire burden now, and by this legislation we are attempting to lighten that load by offering to contribute one-half of the cost.

Mr. BENNETT: One is charity and the other is a pension.

Mr. HEENAN: It does not matter what you call it; you may re-christen the bill if you like, but we are offering to bear one-half of the cost which they bear at present.

Mr. BENNETT: It does not touch that.

Mr. HEENAN: Who is taking care of it?

Mr. BENNETT: The municipalities.

Mr. HEENAN: And the provinces, and if we do it in co-operation with the provinces we will be using the machinery already in existence. I want to point out just what the establishment of a federal old age pension plan might cost, considering administration only. I sent telegrams to several of the provincial premiers, to which I have received two replies. I asked the cost of administering the Workmen's Compensation Act and the Mothers' Allowance Act and I will give the House the replies received from Ontario and British Columbia. For the last full year in Ontario the cost of administering the Workmen's Compensation Act was $277,936.16, and the cost of administering the Mothers' Allowance Act $73,516.73, or a total for Ontario of $351,452.89. In British Columbia the administration of the Workmen's Compensation Act cost $104,980 and the Mothers' Allowance Act $16,048, or practically half a million dollars for these two acts in the two provinces. We would practically duplicate that expenditure if we set up a federal scheme of this kind, so is it not better to work in co-operation with the provinces in order to lessen the cost of administration by using their own machinery?

I think there can be no question of the necessity for an old age pension scheme for indigents; for proof of that we have only to look about us. Right here in Ottawa the city is at present taking care of 641 people, many of whom do not belong here, which is one of the difficulties all through the country in relief work. Men become indigent and come into towns and cities for relief; the municipalities often feel that they are overburdened with their own indigents, and try to evade the responsibility of taking care of the outsiders. In that way the burden is not shared equally, nor are the people treated in the same way.

I am sure that if hon. members will only think it over they will realize that we should give a better assurance to the older people, the pioneers of this country who have not been so fortunate as some of the rest of us, that in their declining years we will not throw them on the scrap heap. Old age and poverty combined plead their own case; there is no necessity for anyone to advocate their cause, but I feel that we should not evade our responsibility by saying that we would prefer another act and therefore will not support this scheme.

This bill passed the House last session after a great deal of discussion, but was defeated in the Senate. Subsequently it went out to the electors during the last campaign, and if there was one question discussed more than another, even more than the customs scandal, it was the old age pension scheme. I contend that the principle of this bill has been endorsed by the people. To those who still think that the provinces may not co-operate let me say that when other schemes of a co-operative nature were under consideration here it was predicted that the provinces would not participate in them, yet now we have some five or six co-operative schemes in force calling for an expenditure by this government of over $65,000,000. Just last week we had representatives of the different provinces asking that we extend our activity in connection with one of these schemes. Nova Scotia was represented, and I cannot believe that Nova Scotia would have any less regard for humanity than for its progress along material lines.

The argument advanced by my hon. friend on behalf of Nova Scotia seems to be taken from other arguments advanced in another chamber during last session, and I do not think the people of Nova Scotia would agree that over forty per cent of those over seventy years of age are indigent and unable to take care of themselves. That is a guess, as many other things which have been said in this chamber are guesses. What we should do is pass a bill and get it in working order, and then we can amend it according to the experience gained from practical knowledge.

When the workmen's compensation acts were introduced, many of us thought the compensation was not sufficient, and many protests against the pittances, as they were called, were made. But some of us in the front row were fighting to get the principle established, and one of the things I would like to see established in the interests of the working men of this country now is an old age pension bill. Let us get it into working order and then it can be amended as was done with the Mothers' Allowance Act, the Minimum Wage Act for women and girls and the Workmen's Compensation Act. Now, as I say, British Columbia has not only intimated its approval in correspondence from the prime minister, but a bill was introduced at this session of the legislature providing for the making of an agreement between the government of that province and the federal government. So that we have made a start along the right line.

Having given a great deal of thought and study to the subject, and having taken every possible factor into consideration, I think we should adopt this measure, and the principle contained in it, as best suited to the needs of the country at the present moment. The bill will accomplish what it is intended to do. It will assist those in need who are over seventy years of age and have not been able to provide for themselves in their declining years.

I should like to see all the members of the House range themselves unitedly behind this bill. Then we could impress everybody outside parliament who may have to deal with the subject in a legislative way that we are united in the matter. It will be a cue upon which they can act so that the law will be applied throughout the whole of Canada. After the measure has gone into effect and we find that any amendment is necessary, and the country is willing to support the obligation the change may involve, we can amend it just as we have amended other measures in the light of practical experience.

Mr. GEARY: I do not think this House needs any particular advocacy of an old age pension bill, and that part of the address of the Minister of Labour might very well have been omitted. My hon. friend has given a very lucid description of the difficulties which have arisen in endeavouring to secure the co-operation of the provinces in this measure. And whether he intended it or not he succeeded in convincing me that the federal government has not nearly approximated to that agreement with the different provinces which must be arrived at before this measure can be of any avail.

The position enunciated to-night by the hon. leader of the opposition is no new position for the Conservative party; it is the position that we on this side took when the bill came up for discussion in the House last year. I can refer to a speech of mine on that occasion, which was agreed to by all members on this side, which stated the position then as the leader of the opposition has stated it to-night.

An hon. MEMBER: At what page is it to be found?

Mr. GEARY: At page 2495 of the revised edition of Hansard. The quotation in question is:

> There is no legal objection to the passing of a bill by the federal House assuming the entire responsibility.

I am interpolating some words:

> If the government feels it can go the whole way and provide the money for the scheme throughout the Dominion of Canada, I shall be very glad. Failing that, and in the hope of getting something, in the hope that the Prime Minister may prove to be right when he says that he is sanguine that it may lead to results, I shall support the measure.

Now that was a very definite agreement with the measure that was submitted, and members on this side of the House unanimously took that same position. Therefore there was never any question as to this side being opposed to the old age pension scheme on principle. We agreed to the measure. There was no vote against it. There was no suggestion of a vote against it. There was only the suggestion that it was a poor measure, inasmuch as it would not produce the result aimed at, but that if the government would consent to take all the responsibility on behalf of the Dominion, then we would get a bill that would be workable. That is the position we took then, that is the position we take now; and if the government can see its way clear to say that it will introduce a bill assuming full responsibility financially for the measure, then we on this side, as I understand my leader, are prepared to and will accept such a measure proposed by the government.

I agree thoroughly as to what was said as to the representations during the last election. Personally I met those representations in various ridings. They were most unfair, they were not justified by anything approaching the facts. They were made from Liberal platforms for the purpose of securing votes for Liberal candidates against Conservative candidates. They were untrue, they had no basis in fact, and what is more they were not sporting or fair; it was not putting this party in its proper light, nor stating the position this party took when the measure came up.

In 1924 this matter was almost identically reported on by the committee in the terms in which we have the bill to-night. Two years passed by before the government introduced the bill. They had communicated in a very slim sort of way with the different provinces, but they had made no effort that indicated any serious intention to get the provinces into communication to discuss the matter and see if an agreement could be arrived at which would enable the bill to be worked out. I am subject to correction but I do not think I can be corrected in the matter when I say that all that was done was to send a communication to each premier of a province, and to take the reply and file it away. There was no real effort to arrive at some sort of round table conference by which we would know what the provinces would agree to and what suggestions as to alterations they wished to make. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) can probably add very much to the information which this House possesses at present as to the genesis of this bill last year. Whether the government intended to introduce a bill or not I do not know but it clearly appeared from the proceedings—from the remarks made by my hon. friend and from the story of his visits to the Prime Minister—that it was only on his insistence and, in a way, on his threat, that the government did introduce the bill we have now before us. It was not mentioned, as one of my hon. friends close by says, although important enough in every sense, in the speech from the throne in 1926. The government might have had the intention to introduce the bill but they did not mention it, although they mentioned, goodness knows, almost everything else in the speech from the throne; and it was not until the hon. member was able to interview certain members of the government and secure from them the letter which he placed on Hansard that this bill was brought down.

I have nothing more to say in advocacy of old age pensions. As to that I think we all agree. I said what I had to say last year, and I stand on the record of Hansard as to my views on that occasion. We did not vote against old age pensions; we only suggested to the government that if it desired a bill that would work and that would give an old age pension to the people of this country, almost at once, or as soon as the effective machinery could be put into force, then they should adopt our suggestion and assume the whole financial responsibility.

Well, I look with a good deal of apprehension upon the progress of negotiations with the province. We have already found from negotiation that some of the provinces are not agreeable to this measure. Whether other provinces will assist in its going through this year, despite the disagreement of those who will not come in, I do not know. We look upon a path that is beset with difficulties, and desiring earnestly and sincerely as we do a workable scheme of old age pensions, we think the government should adopt the suggestion we made last year, and have again made at this moment, to frame the bill in such a way that the federal authorities will assume full financial responsibility. You will effect your object, and you will not be taking too much in the way of advice from us. You will be getting, after all, what the government claims to want and what the members on this side of the House want.

I only suggest in closing, Mr. Chairman, that the government even at this late stage—and we are early in the session yet—do reconsider the proposition that they have before them, and that they remodel the bill in the sense that I have indicated. If they do, I believe that it will secure the unanimous support of the House, and that we shall get a workable measure. Failing that—I represent my own feeling of last year and this, and endorse every word the leader of the opposition has said—we on this side of the House will support the measure that is now before the committee.

Mr. COOTE: Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary for me to say that I am in favour of old age pensions. I have been so for several years. More than that I have been in favour of a purely federal scheme if it could be secured in this House. I am rather glad that our friends to the right have had a change of heart, and that they now favour a federal scheme. I remember very well less than two years ago, when the report of the special committee which was considering the matter of old age pensions was being considered in this House—and by the way, that report recommended, I believe, that a conference should be held between the Dominion and the provinces to consider some joint scheme—the then member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine), who had been a member of the special committee, and who was in favour of a federal scheme, and was of the opinion that the communications from the provinces to the Dominion did not give any indication that they were ready to proceed with a joint scheme, moved, on June 18, 1925:

> That this report be referred back to the committee with instructions to consider and report upon a purely federal scheme.

That motion did not meet with a great deal of support in the House. The division upon it is recorded at page 4433 of Hansard, 1925, and I find that the following members voted in favour of Mr. Irvine's motion: Messrs. Bancroft, Bird, Black (Yukon), Campbell, Church, Coote, Davis, Gardiner, Garland (Bow River), Good, Irvine, Kellner, Kennedy (Edmonton), Leader, Shaw, Ward and Woodsworth; a total of seventeen. Those voting against the motion totalled 139. The list is too long to read, but it included all the other members who were in the House at that time.

Mr. DUFF: Read the list of the Tories. Put them on record.

Mr. COOTE: I am afraid it would be taking up the time of the committee. The Tories and the Grits, I presume, are all mixed up in this list, for this was one occasion when the Tories and the Grits voted together, except for two Tories, all honour to them, who voted with us upon that occasion.

Lest there be some misapprehension in the minds of the committee as to how hon. members to our right, and I suppose those who sat opposite, felt when they voted against this motion, may I quote the remarks of one of the members of that committee. I shall be very brief. The member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) said:

As one member of the old age pension committee, I may say that we have given this matter a great deal of consideration, and I hope that at this late hour of the session we shall not take up too much time discussing it. The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond) has given the House the effect of the recommendations of the committee, and may I say that the recommendations we have made will get somewhere?

Might I interject there, the members to our right have changed their minds. They think now it will not get anywhere. He goes on:

But the amendment moved by the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine), and supported by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth), is simply playing to the gallery.

I wonder what my friends to my right are doing now? He goes on:

We had no intention of stalling this old age pension question; that was not our desire at all We have made a recommendation, not to the effect that a special conference should be called, but I understand that a conference is going to be held this fall of the premiers of this Dominion, and at this conference this matter can be taken up. We cannot hope to go into this scheme at all.

Mr. Irvine: Why not?

Mr. Spence: The cost is entirely too high. At the present time this country cannot bear it.

Might I interject that we can now afford to build a $700,000 exhibition building. The debate continues:

Mr. Irvine: Then why not have the courage to say so, to tell the people the truth?

Mr. Spence: We are.

Mr. Irvine: You are not.

Mr. Spence: We feel that the administration by the provinces would be much cheaper. The overhead would not be so large. We have given this matter all the consideration that is necessary, and I hope the House will pay absolutely no attention to the amendment that has been moved to the committee's recommendations.

It is true that the House did not pay very much attention to the motion of the hon. member for East Calgary, but I am very glad that Hansard is in existence to prove that there were some of us at that time who believed in a purely federal scheme. I am still of the belief that it is the best thing. I believed that a year ago. I did not oppose the government's bill, because we had this division recorded here giving us the views of the members of parliament, and the majority of the members of both the old parties in this parliament apparently were strongly opposed to a purely federal scheme. Under the circumstances, what were those of us who wanted an old age pension scheme to do? The only thing we could do was to accept the bill the government brought down a year ago.

If the government will change the principle of the measure we have now before us, to make it a purely federal scheme, I shall be very glad to support it, and I would support it with much more vigour and enthusiasm than I shall this particular measure, but if they will not do that, I shall support this measure to the best of my ability, because I think it is time we inaugurated some old age pension scheme in Canada. If we pass this bill, we shall find out whether it will work or not. As a final word to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan), I would say that I still believe in a purely federal old age pension scheme as the proper thing, and I should be very glad if even now he could see his way clear to change the principle of this measure to make it a purely federal scheme.

Mr. J. E. FONTAINE (Hull) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I intend to be brief in my remarks. Having, however, set my heart so much on this question of old age pensions, I deem it my duty to state that I shall give this resolution my utmost support. I say, Sir, that I have at heart this question, and to give further proof, in 1922, as the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) stated a short while ago, I had the honour to move a resolution requesting the government to favourably consider the enactment of legislation with the view of providing for old age.

It was only in 1924 that a committee was appointed in order to inquire into the matter, and last year, in 1926, a bill was brought down by the government making provision for old age pensions. This act was based on the report of the committee appointed in 1924, and by which a pension of $20 per month was to be paid to destitute old people having attained the age of seventy.

It is true, as the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) stated a short while ago, that the opposition of that time did not oppose this measure; however, as in the present case, those who then formed the opposition put forth all kinds of arguments in order to criticize the bill, and slanderous tongues even went so far as to state that the leader of the opposition of that day —Mr. Meighen—had influenced his friends in the Senate in order to have the bill disallowed in the upper house.

As it was previously stated by the leader of the opposition, this question was freely discussed by the public in the course of the last electoral campaign, and so far as I am concerned, I know that in my riding and especially in the city of Hull, a large number of votes were cast in my behalf because I had stood up as the sponsor of this measure. It seems to me but just that the state should come to the relief of the workers and citizens who have laboured all their life, when their hands cannot render the same services and they find themselves unable to earn the same wages. Pensions have been provided by the government for various classes, namely for judges, civil servants, and I think it is but right. By providing a system of pensions, railway companies, among others, come to the assistance of their old employees. I think it is the duty of a country to look after their old servants whose only fault is to have worked for small wages, to have raised large families and not to have provided for their old age. I often hear it said that these people should have been more thrifty and wiser, that they should have set aside savings. But how can you expect people who earn wages of two or three dollars per day to lay aside savings when they raise large families and have to provide for them?

If there is a sad spectacle, it is to see people who have been good citizens all their life forced to take the road which leads to the poor house because they were unable to lay aside savings and because the government does not come to their rescue.

I think the resolution is well in order and I wish to thank the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for the activity which he displayed to have this resolution carried. Moreover, an old age pension act is part of the Liberal program and I can recall that at the time of the 1919 convention, a special clause was adopted with such a view. I also remember that our old leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, at a large meeting held in Montreal in 1916, stated that one of the first questions which he would consider when he returned to power would be the enactment of a system of pensions for old people.

[Mr. Fontaine.]

Mr. Speaker, I am entirely in favour of this resolution and I trust that it will be unanimously carried by this House. I also hope that this year the Senate will reconsider their decision and acknowledge that they made a mistake last year, and once for all will accept with good grace this old age pensions bill, thereby displaying not only patriotism but especially a philanthropic spirit.

Mr. RYERSON: Mr. Speaker, as mover of the resolution which stands in my name, dealing with this subject, I would like to say a few words at this time in support of a purely federal scheme of old age pensions. Too often in the past it has been used as a political football, both in this House and on the public platform. This question has become one of such urgent importance as to call for the earnest and thoughtful consideration of every hon. member. As representatives of this Dominion we should no longer deal lightly with the responsibility which rests upon us to enact legislation which will relieve the distress of those of our people who, in the evening of their lives, are without means and unable to support themselves. The demand for some measure of relief is now so insistent that it becomes our duty to deal with it in a practical and businesslike manner. Our responsibility in this matter is our obligation as a Dominion to these unfortunate citizens and how best to meet that obligation.

In reply to the argument which we have heard that the relief and care of the aged poor is a matter for the provinces and municipalities to deal with, I would point out that many of these people, representative as they are of all walks in life, have been in the past worthy and useful citizens, having contributed in different ways to the life, prosperity and upbuilding of this country as a whole, and are to-day in the unfortunate position in which we find them through no fault of their own, but by reason of circumstances over which they have had no control. For this reason I claim that our obligation to them is a direct one, and any relief which we may decide to render in the form of old age pensions should be direct to the pensioners and not one of contribution through the provinces. Hon. members representing all groups in this House have at different times, both in this chamber and on the public platform, declared themselves in favour of the principle of old age pensions. This declaration of principle is all right as far as it goes, but as a measure of relief a mere declaration is of no value whatever. What is more important at this time is some method or scheme of practical application.

Organized Labour, as represented by the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, has declared itself in favour of a purely federal scheme of old age pensions. In confirmation of this, I will read two clauses dealing with this subject taken from the Memorandum of Proposed Legislation submitted to parliament on December 16, 1926. On page 22 I read:

> It has been made very clear that there is strong public support for any measure which would apply equally to all Canadian citizens irrespective of the province in which they reside, and that this could be best brought about by the federal government assuming the whole responsibility for the cost of such pensions.

And again on page 23:

> In view of these circumstances, we press for the enactment of a federal law under which pensions would be payable upon reaching the age of sixty-five years and after fifteen years domiciled anywhere in Canada.

I am in full sympathy with that part of the last clause placing the age limit at sixty-five years, at which time pensions should begin. We must realize that many people lose a great deal of their physical vigour through sickness and overwork long before they reach seventy years of age. In these days of keen competition and intensive production, it becomes increasingly hard for workers, once they are out of a job, to secure new employment after they reach the age of fifty. If they have been unable, prior to this age, to save anything for the future, the outlook for them will indeed be a black one, and long before they reach the age of seventy, many of them will be in want or forced to seek shelter in some of our charitable institutions. Many organizations take care of their employees by means of old age pensions, and in all such cases I believe the age is set at sixty-five, when pension becomes payable.

The government may protest that they are unable to provide the necessary money for the larger scheme. We are now spending millions of dollars annually upon all kinds of projects, many of which appear foolish and extravagant, and which we could very well do without. Surely the money can be found for a humanitarian purpose of this kind.

We are told that the present bill follows the exact wording of the one passed by this House in 1926. If this is correct, then it will be subject to the same criticism and in the end will be of very little value as a measure of relief. I claim, Sir, there is a strong public support for a measure that will go much further than this bill will go. I strongly appeal to the hon. Minister of Labour who is responsible for this legislation to give full consideration to the views of hon. members and the recommendations of organized labour rather than attempt to force this bill through as it stands.

Mr. IRVINE: I am very glad, Mr. Chairman, to note the general agreement in the committee with respect to old age pensions. I do not think any hon. member is really opposed to such a scheme, and in my short experience of parliament I do not recall any other proposal that has met with such unanimity. I need not say that I am very much in favour of old age pensions, having advocated their being provided for on several occasions in preceding parliaments. However, I am afraid that the bill to be based on the resolution now before us will be very unsatisfactory and that the Minister of Labour will find himself in the position of Mother Hubbard—he will have a lot of people coming to his cupboard but he will not have a bone to give them.

There is absolutely no assurance that this bill will result in anything tangible. When the Minister of Labour was seeking to assure the committee of the willingness of the various provinces to accept the legislation he told the committee, in reply to my question, that he was reading the letters which had been sent to the parliamentary committee which dealt with this subject in 1925. I wish to read a little more fully the letters that the Minister of Labour presented to us in order to leave it to the committee's judgment to say whether we can be assured that when we have passed the proposed bill it will meet with any practical success. The first is from the New Brunswick government, under date of May 23, 1925. I am quoting from Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons dated June 16, 1925. The premier of that province wrote:

> This province is now considering the establishment of what is known as widows' pension, and we are not prepared to take any decision in the matter of an old age pension. While I do not disapprove of the old age pension, and feel that it would be a good thing, yet it would be impossible for me to commit the province to any action in this matter at the present moment.

Under date of February 17, 1925, the Minister of Public Works and Labour for Quebec wrote:

> On the occasion of the recent visit of the delegates of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, this question was taken up and, although it was not submitted in the regular way to the cabinet, I understood from the remarks of my colleagues that it could be no question for the province of Quebec, considering the obligations actually imposed upon it, of adopting a law which would take care of the old age pensions in this province.

Under date of June 2, 1925, the Premier of Nova Scotia Hon. Mr. Armstrong, wrote:

In view of the importance of the subject matter, and the lack of an opportunity to fully consider the same, I was instructed to advise you that without a further and better understanding of the subject matter and without an opportunity to fully discuss it with your committee, no action would be taken upon the matter at present.

Under date of May 22, 1925, the Premier of Prince Edward Island, Hon. Mr. Stewart, wrote:

In this province, as you probably are aware, except in the towns, we have no municipal government, consequently all assistance to indigent and aged persons is furnished directly by the provincial government, either in the provincial infirmary or by monthly contributions to private persons who become responsible for their support. I have read over your letter and the accompanying report with interest. I shall place the matter before my government at its next meeting and will then advise you of its decision.

The Premier of Ontario, Hon. Mr. Ferguson, under date of November 24, 1924, wrote:

I shall be glad to consider the matter.

Under date of February 25, 1925, the attorney general of Manitoba, Hon. Mr. Craig, wrote:

We are in the midst of our session just now with the multiplicity of matters requiring immediate disposition. I shall, however, take up the matter with the premier and the minister of public welfare at the earliest opportunity.

If the Minister of Labour has not yet heard from the Manitoba government I presume they are still taking the matter up. Saskatchewan, under date of November 19, 1924, when the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) was premier and the present Premier of Saskatchewan, Hon. Mr. Gardiner, was the minister of labour and industry for that province, the latter wrote:

The government of Saskatchewan is of opinion that an old age pension scheme for Canada can best be adopted by the federal government alone. There would seem to be so much difficulty in the way of providing any scheme that would be suitable to all the nine provinces of Canada as to make it almost impossible, and it will be readily understood that if any number of the provinces were to remain out, it would be almost impossible to adopt any scheme that would not subject those provinces within the arrangement to considerable expense that should rightfully be borne by those outside the scheme.

While we are disposed to think that an old age pension scheme should be undertaken, the difficulties in the way of the suggested scheme appear almost, if not entirely, insurmountable.

Now, I believe that Alberta has prepared a bill in anticipation of this legislation, which it is ready to accept. I understand from the Minister of Labour that the British Columbia government is considering this scheme favourably. But with the exception of those two governments, unless the minister has some information which he has not given to the committee, the other provincial governments are not in favour of this bill. If they are not in favour of it, we have really no bill. In other words, the bill will be absolutely impracticable. It may be regarded as a good move on the part of parliament to be so kind as to pass an old age pensions bill, but that will not feed very many aged ladies and gentlemen in this country.

Now, I think the proposal is an expensive one, apart from the fact that it will not be very likely to meet with any success. Surely if a sum of $24,000,000 is to be collected in taxes to finance this proposal, it would be easier and cheaper for one government to do the collecting. Otherwise there will be a duplication of administrative machinery, and the cost of collection will be doubled, and there will be no gain to offset that duplication. If I as a citizen of Canada living in Alberta have to pay $10 in taxes for old age pensions, do I feel particularly pleased because I have to spend a two-cent stamp to send $5 to Ottawa and another two-cent stamp to send the other $5 to Edmonton? Would it not be better if I sent the whole ten dollars direct to this government? That is of course direct taxation. I do not know by what means the government intends to raise the money, but it matters not what method is adopted, there will have to be two systems of collection and the same people will pay the money. What is to be gained by this? It appears to me that this parliament is actually ignoring or attempting to escape its responsibility. The Minister of Labour in his closing remarks urged that we should be very careful not to shirk our responsibility in this matter; yet I think the bill provides a means whereby we may all do so. If the provinces adhere to the opinions which they have expressed, according to the letters which are on record, then I cannot see that we are likely to have any old age pensions in Canada. May I remind the committee that when we were discussing the subject in 1925 the special committee appointed to take the matter of old age pensions into consideration was dissatisfied with these letters, as one would naturally suppose. The committee instructed its clerk to write to the various governments again and ask if they were sure that they understood what was meant, and to reply as speedily as possible indicating their views. I do not know that any replies have ever come; if they have, the Minister of Labour has not given them to us. I can only assume therefore that the provinces which are on record in the matter still hold to the opinions they have already expressed, and we have no right to assume that they will alter those opinions when we pass the bill.

I am of course in favour of a federal scheme, as I was in 1925, and I am glad that the leader of the Conservative party has taken a firm stand on the matter. I am sorry that his party did not do so before. I am not blaming the government for doing as it did, because a reference to the vote which the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) placed before us will show that the overwhelming opinion of parliament at that time seemed to be that a federal scheme should not be proceeded with. The government, with that opinion to guide them, went ahead with this scheme in the hope that it would be better than nothing at all. Now however that the Conservative party has taken a definite stand on the question I cannot see why the government could not accept the federal scheme, and let parliament assume the responsibility for it. Why should the government be so anxious to assume responsibility for a bill which will prove impracticable when all parliament is willing to become responsible for a better measure? Of course, if the government will not take the suggestion offered by all members on this side of the House, I for one will not vote against this Mrs. Hubbard proposal. It is better than nothing even to be able to say that one has considered the question favourably. I do hope, however, that the Minister of Labour and the Prime Minister will carefully reconsider the whole proposal before refusing to accede to the expressions of opinion which have come from this side of the House asking for a federal scheme.

Mr. SMITH (Cumberland): I desire to associate myself with the sentiments expressed by all those on this side of the House as being in favour of a federal scheme of old age pensions. In the absence of such a scheme, however or of any legislation looking to that end, we are prepared to support the resolution before the House inasmuch as it recognizes the principle of old age pensions on which we are agreed. Reference was made to the position Nova Scotia would occupy under this joint scheme of old age pensions, and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) was very modest in his estimate of the amount it would cost the province under the proposed legislation. I have before me the figures which I may say are based on the operation of the old age pensions scheme in Australia in which forty per cent of those eligible to receive pensions actually apply and do receive assistance under their scheme. The working out of the scheme in this Dominion on the same basis as applied in Australia shows that in Nova Scotia our share would amount to $1,188,000 annually. That would be our staggering contribution towards the project. Take the little province of Prince Edward Island; its proportion would be $255,000 odd. In other words, over one-third of the revenue of Prince Edward Island would be absorbed in its contribution towards this old age pensions scheme. And what applies to Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island applies equally to New Brunswick. We are the old provinces of the Dominion, and the proportion of older people is far greater than in the western provinces or even in central Canada.

It has been stated that there is some constitutional question that prevents this parliament from passing a federal old age pensions bill. As I understand it, the opinion came from the Department of Justice in 1924 or 1925, based upon a section of the British North America Act, that the civil and property rights of the provinces were clear and distinct and could not be transgressed by the federal authorities. It seems to me that if the federal scheme is unconstitutional on these grounds it is a much more unconstitutional matter to force a province to contribute to a scheme into which it has not entered. In other words, if Nova Scotia or any other province decides not to participate in the scheme as brought down in the House to-day while other provinces do so, then Nova Scotia will be contributing to the expenses incurred for the benefit of the rest of the Dominion without receiving any benefit. That is far more unconstitutional than any interference with property and civil rights of the provinces as suggested by the decision given by the Department of Justice in 1924.

A suggestion was made last year by the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Macdougall) which appealed to me as being of considerable sense and importance in connection with old age pensions legislation. The hon. member stated that there were certain hazardous and arduous occupations such as coal mining, steel working and the employment of women in factories which should be classified under an old age pensions bill as constituting eligibility for pensions at the age of sixty. I cannot help endorsing that suggestion as humane and highly important.

I do not know that there is anything more for me to say except to repeat what I stated in opening, that we on this side of the House favour an old age pension scheme, preferably one of a national character inaugurated and operated by the federal government, one which will do justice to every individual part of Canada. In the absence of that, then we accept the next best thing, the resolution brought forward by the Minister of Labour to-night.

Mr. NEILL: I would like to answer a few of the criticisms made in reference to this resolution for fear that it may be criticized to death, as was done last year, or so damned with faint praise as to be ineffective. I would like first to deal with the remarks of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine), who quoted a number of letters received from the different provinces, nearly all of which were unfavourable to the idea of co-operating with the federal government in an old age pension scheme. But he did not tell the situation and the circumstances. He and I were on a committee of this House in 1924 when this question was taken up and we decided that the first thing to do was to put it up to the provinces. We assumed that they knew what we thought we knew, that it was a provincial matter, but we had no authority to say so and we asked their opinion on that occasion. In response to that request we received the letters which the hon. member read and which, as he said, were all more or less antagonistic. I think the province of British Columbia went further than any of the others, practically telling us to mind our own business and attend to our own affairs. Then the matter was referred to the same committee, in 1925 and we were attracted by the trend of thought which seemed to be prevalent, that it was our funeral and none of the business of the provinces, so we decided to ascertain whether we had been wrong. In doing so we obtained an opinion from several of the best law officers of the crown, gentlemen who are supposed to be expert and who had the experience acquired in previous questions to guide them. Their report was made in writing and is on record, and it stated emphatically that so far as the British North America Act was concerned this matter had nothing to do with the Dominion, but was entirely a matter for the provinces.

They did add a corollary to the effect that if this House chose to do so it could aid any scheme initiated by the provinces, but they stated emphatically that we could not pass an act containing anything of an obligatory character. So we found that our previous conviction was right, and that the conviction so pronouncedly held by the provinces was wrong. We then sent out another circular or round robin to the provinces, conveying the report of those law officers, and then found the situation entirely changed. Instead of finding that we were trying to shove some of our obligations on them, a thing they naturally resented, the provinces found on the contrary that the obligation was entirely theirs and that we were trying to help the thing along by giving half or nearly half of the cost if they would take up the scheme. It was then that the provinces took a different view and modified the position which they had previously taken. For instance, we find British Columbia writing to say that they now understood the situation in a different light, and further evidence of that fact is to be found when we note that just a few days ago the legislature of British Columbia unanimously passed the second reading of a bill accepting any bill which this parliament may pass along the line of that now before us. That is a very decided change of attitude from that expressed a couple of years before, when we were practically told to mind our own affairs.

Then again the hon. member spoke of Quebec, of a letter from some member of the cabinet apparently speaking without authority. But in that committee of which I spoke there was present at least one representative of Quebec, and that representative agreed heartily with the resolution or report of the committee. Again the hon. member said that the government of Alberta was moving toward the acceptance of such legislation as well, which makes two provinces out of nine, or an average of twenty-two per cent, willing to accept this measure which has not yet been introduced. Surely we might hope that when the measure is fully explained and put before those governments, the pressure of public opinion in the different provinces will enable more of the others to come in as well.

Then again the hon. member introduced the argument that, after all, this money is paid by the people, so why not let it be paid by way of federal taxation? There is an answer to that, my friend said that it would be necessary to duplicate everything, but that is not so. It is not yet indicated in what manner the money will be obtained, but

I believe the suggestion is, that it is to be taken out of the consolidated funds, and in that case it would simply come out of the general taxes and would not cost anything more to collect. Then there is another feature of it. If we make it a federal scheme we will have to start a federal department to deal with it, with a minister at $14,000 a year and extras, a deputy at $8,000 a year, and a large staff, and in that way it would cost far more to administer such an act than it would if it were carried out according to the suggestion of British Columbia, for instance. That province is somewhat in advance of some of the others in the handling of the Workmen's Compensation Act; there it is done at a very fractional cost of the total expenditure, and it is proposed to put the old age pension scheme under the control of that same board. The head of that board told me a few months ago that they already have the necessary machinery, and that it was only a question of a little more clerical assistance to carry on the administration of such an act. This same board looks after the mothers' pensions act and it would cost very little more for them to do this work as well. In the administration of the Workmen's Compensation Act there is someone right on the spot or some one who can go anywhere at short notice, so that it would be infinitely cheaper and easier to do it in that way than to do it by any method which could be controlled from Ottawa.

Two hon. members opposite, particularly the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Smith) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) spoke of the prohibitive expense to some of the provinces in the east, particularly Nova Scotia, and I particularly noted that the leader of the opposition said that Nova Scotia would be saddled with this expense in addition to the present cost. I take issue with him there; it would not be in addition to the present cost but it would be less the present cost. The present relief work may not be done adequately; it may be done in a grudging spirit, but it is done and the cost is very large. I have a clipping in my hand, in which it says that in Vancouver the cost of relief ran up to over three thousand dollars for twelve days. That was only in one city in British Columb a —a sum of $3,000 was paid out in twelve days and coming on to the spring of the year.

The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Smith) questioned the constitutionality of legislation on old age pensions. But it is on record that the party of which he is a member, a few years ago introduced identically the same principle in connection with the Highways Act. They voted a large sum of money—was it twenty millions?—on condition that each province put up a certain percentage. I think the amounts were forty per cent and sixty per cent. The same argument was used then that the hon. member for Cumberland has used to-night. Certain provinces said, "If we stay out of this thing we will have to bear the burden of those who have gone in". The answer was, "Then, come in". The success of the scheme was such that provinces which did not come in at first came in later. They realized the advantage they were getting, the substantial sum they were receiving, and all the provinces finally came in. So we have got the precedent of constitutional practice for that phase of provincial contributions as well.

Mr. IRVINE: Would the hon. member say what form of question was submitted by the committee to the law officers of the crown? I am of the opinion, although I may be wrong, it was as to whether the scheme which the committee was then considering would be constitutional. I do not think we ever asked the law officers if this government had power to pass an old age pension bill from a federal point of view without considering the provinces at all.

Mr. NEILL: My impression is different from that of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. IRVINE: I may be wrong.

Mr. NEILL: Speaking from memory, we asked them in general terms what was the jurisdiction as between the provinces and the Dominion in connection with support for destitute old age. Here is the answer:

> The subject of old age pensions does not fall specifically within any of the enumerated subjects given to the Dominion under section 91 of the British North America Act, but does fall within the subject of property and civil rights committed to the provinces under section 92.

And then the Deputy Minister of Justice added this:

> I am of the opinion that the subject matter of pensions has been entrusted to the provincial legislature rather than to parliament. I do not mean to suggest that parliament has not the power to legislate upon the subject so as to assist—

Mark that.

> —so as to assist the provinces or to establish an independent voluntary scheme, provided that in either case the legislation does not trench up on the subject matter of property and civil rights in the province, as, for example, by obligating any province or person to contribute to the scheme.

Mr. BROWN: That is, it fixed the obligation on the provinces?

Mr. NEILL: Yes.

Mr. GEARY: Does the hon. gentleman state that as his authority for saying that a bill passed by this House, assuming full responsibility, is ultra vires of this House?

Mr. NEILL: It could be questioned. If the action were voluntary it might possibly be so. But the point that was submitted was "Were these provinces right in saying that the sole responsibility rests on us?" The answer was, "The sole responsibility does not rest on you, but on the provinces." That was the point.

Mr. GEARY: The hon. gentleman does see from that opinion that the federal government might assume the responsibility, and the opinion of the Minister of Justice, expressed in a reply to a question of mine last year during the course of the debate, was in agreement with that.

Mr. NEILL: The hon. member who has just taken his seat made some reference to the unanimous way in which this legislation was received on that side of the House last year. Well, that is a matter of degree, I suppose. The Right Hon. Arthur Meighen wanted to know what the cost of it would be, and those of us who were there remember that he used this language: "I do not expect a close estimate at all, but say within a hundred million dollars or so." Then we find Sir Henry Drayton saying:

> I am not at all certain that it is a good thing for this parliament to try and look after other business than its own. This is entirely a provincial matter.

Then we find the hon. member who represents West Calgary saying:

> I do venture to plead with my hon. friends opposite to urge the government not to proceed with this at the present time.

Faint praise, surely. Then we find the hon. member for Muskoka asking:

> Are we prepared at present to put everyone on the payroll of the country? It seems to me that we are getting into the habit in this parliament of going, I was going to say mad, in the way of such legislation.

That could hardly be called friendly comment and criticism. Then we find—I am speaking now from memory, but I know I can prove it if necessary—one gentleman referring to it as "impossible" legislation. Another one waxed more enthusiastic and said it was "a washout." Another member rose to the highest flights of his oratorical vocabulary and called it an "abortion." Poor comment, in the light of the opinion of this gentleman who now claims that this legislation last year passed the House unanimously.

I recall that the bill was very much talked about in the last election, nowhere more so than in British Columbia. I recall a speech that the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen made in opening the campaign, I think, in this city It was a great speech, worthy of a great man and a great occasion. I read it with much care, but I could find nothing in it on that subject which afterwards became so important in the campaign, that of old age pensions. You would have thought that a matter that was so much in the public mind, or at least was going to be, would have been foreshadowed in some way in this platform in which he was enunciating the program of his party in his appeal to the country. As a matter of fact I think I know when, and where, and how the hon. gentleman, like Paul at Damascus, got light on the subject. The right hon. gentleman came west. I am not familiar with the speeches he made along the line in his journey from the east to the west—hon. members from Saskatchewan and Alberta will be more familiar with that subject than I am; but I do know that I cannot recall any mention of old age pensions in his speeches, as a platform, until he reached British Columbia. I do not think there was any mention made of it even in Prince Rupert, the first place in the province where he spoke. He did me the honour to speak in the district of Comox-Alberni, and I have it on the authority of one of his own supporters, who told us of it at a public meeting, that he had said to Mr. Meighen, "Something has got to be done about old age pensions; people have asked about it and we know very little about it." Mr. Meighen said, "You shall have it." That is where the right hon. gentleman got his light and introduced the subject into his program. I have here, shown in big headlines, the announcement made by the Conservative organs the day after he made his next great speech in the city of Vancouver. The announcement in those headlines was, "Mr. Meighen declares himself at Vancouver meeting." Yes, he declared himself for the first time on that subject. Mr. Meighen dealt with old age pensions, the Australian treaty and co-operative marketing, but he put his contemplated promise of action on the subject of old age pensions first. Under the circumstances I think I am justified in saying that it was only when Mr. Meighen got into British Columbia and found out how urgent the situation was, how worked up public sentiment was, and how insistent the people of the province were, that he gave any explanation of his half-hearted support of, or to speak more truly, his attacks upon, old age pensions in the House. It was then he suddenly discovered that he was in favour of this legislation.

I will not at this stage of the resolution go into some of the comments that were made on this question during the last campaign and the attacks upon those of us who supported that legislation. Some of it was entirely comical in its attitude, and some of it was almost sad in the ignorance it displayed of those who were putting it forward, but I will deal with that perhaps on another occasion. I only hope this will not follow what happened last year. The country has certainly shown, as the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine) said, that no subject appeared to go so closely home to the hearts and minds and interests of the people during the last election campaign as this question of old age pensions, and it had more weight at the close than it had at the beginning of the campaign. I hope that the other honourable body of this parliament will realize when this bill comes up to them that they are not facing a party measure sent up by this House, whether as a party or by the whole House, but that they are facing the almost unanimous wish of the people of Canada.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Mr. Chairman, it is only fitting that as the Labour member representing East Calgary I should put my views on record regarding this measure. I fully agree with the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote). I would prefer a purely federal measure, and there are many amendments I would like to see made when the bill comes down. I would prefer the age limit to be sixty-five instead of seventy years. But I regard this as a stepping stone to better things. We have in the measure before us a fifty-fifty proposition. I had hoped that the government would make it a sixty-forty proposition, and perhaps if this measure should prove a success they will yet make it a sixty-forty proposition, and perhaps by-and-by a seventy-five-twenty-five proposition, and ultimately perhaps a purely federal measure.

There is one thing quite sure, that this measure was discussed on nearly all the platforms in the last campaign, and there was no measure presented to the people in my constituency at all events which contributed more to the success of myself and the Liberal candidates generally than this one, and it was entirely on a fifty-fifty basis. As to the characterization of this measure by my hon. friends who opposed me in that election, I remember particularly the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen himself when he visited the Pavilion at Calgary describing the proposed legislation in these words: "It is a sham; it is a sham; it is a sham." These words echoed and re-echoed throughout my constituency in connection with this fifty-fifty proposition, but I am glad to see my friends to my right perfectly willing now to support a measure which erstwhile they called "a sham, a sham, a sham." Not only did they call it that, but they advocated a measure that would be entirely contributory, and which if it had passed would have entirely left out those who could not contribute, whereas this measure is put forward, I believe, for the benefit of those who are unable to contribute in their old age.

If the provinces should not fall in line with this measure, the only thing that can be said is that they are not obeying the dictates of the people: they are not considering what was in the hearts and in the minds of the people in the election campaign of last September, and in that campaign the old age pension scheme contributed more largely to the success of the Liberal candidates than any other measure put before the people.

There is another matter which I think deserves attention. It has been stated here tonight that this measure would be imposing something on the provinces against their will. The other side of the question is more correct: It will be relieving the provinces of fifty per cent of their obligations in maintaining their poor. I have been associated with the relief department of the city of Calgary, and the gentleman who is now the manager of that department told me that he was looking forward to the time when even this fifty-fifty measure would become law, for he said that the number of old people in that city who required assistance and had to be kept by the city was growing every year, and that if this measure should pass it would relieve the city of many thousands of dollars it would otherwise have to pay out in relieving these old people.

I do not think I need say anything more at this stage. While I would have preferred a purely federal measure, and while I submit for the consideration of the Minister of Labour that he put this measure on a sixty-forty basis instead of a fifty-fifty, and while I hope that he will make the minimum age 65 instead of 70 years, if he cannot see his way to making these changes I shall have to support the measure as it is.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): At this stage I shall occupy the time of the committee very briefly indeed, because my leader has fairly and fully set before the House his attitude, which corresponds I think with the attitude of hon. members who sit behind him. I know that he has expressed very fully and very clearly my views upon this question.

This is a very important measure, and it is much in the minds and seriously occupying the attention of the people of Canada at this time. Unfortunately the matter was one of considerable controversy in the last election, and I can only say that the attitude of those who sit on this side of the House was much misrepresented indeed in the last campaign. Speaking for myself, I was pictured first as one who had voted against this measure, although there was no vote upon it; it carried without a vote. Then when that was pointed out to be incorrect, it was asserted that I opposed the measure, but Hansard will be searched in vain for one sentence uttered by me in opposition to this measure. I am in favour now, as I was in favour then, of old age pensions, but I believe that whatever is worth doing is worth doing well, and I suggest that this measure is not doing justice to the question. If we are to have a wholehearted scheme of old age pensions, then this parliament should deal with it exclusively and should not make its grant conditional upon a grant by the provinces. I am afraid that a great many of the old people who are expecting old age pensions will be keenly disappointed, because, unless the provinces adopt the scheme there will be no pension for them. As one speaker has said, it will be a case of Old Mother Hubbard going to the cupboard, and when she gets there finding it bare. That is about all I have to say at this stage of the debate. When the bill is in committee I may have some further observations to make.

In conclusion, I want to say that there is an element of unfairness and injustice in this bill, because a province that does not adopt a system of old age pensions will be called upon indirectly to pay its proportion of the cost of old age pensions in every other province that does adopt the system. That is a serious matter to Ontario, to Quebec, and to all the other provinces, but notwithstanding that injustice, notwithstanding that defect, and because it is, if nothing else, at least a gesture in the direction of old age pensions, I am going to support this measure. I would much more heartily support a measure that would ensure at once bring about for the deserving old people of Canada an immediate pension. I fear this only puts it off, but if we oppose it we shall be charged with placing obstacles in the way of this measure. For that reason, while not satisfied with it as a wholehearted, substantial measure, I am going to give it my support.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Might I suggest to my right hon. friend that it might be a good thing if the committee were to rise now and we take up another order of business? There are still many on this side who desire to speak on this question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If there is a desire to have this discussion prolonged, I agree that the suggestion made by my hon. friend is much to the point. I was hoping that we might pass the resolution to-night. If it is the wish of hon. gentlemen opposite to continue there will be an opportunity on the bill for any who may wish to speak. We might perhaps agree on passing the resolution, and then have a further discussion on the bill.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have an idea that if we have the discussion on the resolution, the bill will pass much more speedily than if we allow the discussion to go over on the bill. I know there are still several on this side who desire to speak on the question, and as I understand there is other business to be done to-night, it might be well to let the committee rise now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is another matter which I desire to bring to the attention of the House before the sitting is over, and I shall be pleased to accede to the request of my hon. friend and have the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

DIAMOND JUBILEE OF CONFEDERATION

PROPOSED NATIONAL COMMITTEE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): On the Votes and Proceedings of to-day, hon. members will see a notice that I have given of a resolution which reads:

> That from and out of the consolidated revenue fund there may be paid and applied a sum not exceeding $250,000 towards defraying any expenses that may be incurred for the celebration of the sixtieth anniversary of confederation.

I understand that the Senate in all probability will conclude its sittings this week, and will then adjourn for some little time. It is desirable, that as rapid progress as possible should be made with the formation of the committee to have charge of the celebration of the diamond jubilee of confederation, and if the House will grant its unanimous consent, I should like to have permission to introduce this resolution to-night and if possible to introduce as well the bill which in this connection, the government proposes to introduce. I might say that I have before me an important precedent for this procedure. When the House was asked to give its approval to the treaty of Peace between the allied and associated powers and Germany, Sir Robert Borden, then Prime Minister, on the afternoon of the 4th September, 1919, asked the House to agree to a resolution, notice of which had just been given in the Votes and Proceedings. I would like to ask the House now to allow me to have this resolution placed on the order paper for consideration as for this date, and if it is passed I will introduce the bill based upon it. I beg to move:

That it be resolved that the proposed resolution as it appears as a notice of motion in the Votes and Proceedings of the 14th instant, as follows:

"Resolved, that from and out of the consolidated revenue fund there may be paid and applied a sum not exceeding $250,000 towards defraying any expenses that may be incurred for the celebration of the sixtieth anniversary of confederation" be placed on the order paper for consideration this day.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That from and out of the consolidated revenue fund there may be paid and applied a sum not exceeding $250,000 towards defraying any expenses that may be incurred for the celebration of the sixtieth anniversary of confederation.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think we ought to have some explanation as to how it is proposed to expend this large amount, how the committee in charge is to be formed, and matters of that kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall be very happy to give my hon. friend the information as soon as His Honour the Speaker leaves the chair.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It has been thought by the government that the management of the celebration would be better effected if the whole matter, rather than being dealt with departmentally, were put into the hands of a national committee, this national committee to form an executive committee; the executive committee to be given the powers that will be set forth in the bill which will be introduced. I might say that the government is following in this regard the example that was set by a previous administration with respect to the administration of the Canadian patriotic fund. When the committee for the administration of the Canadian patriotic fund was formed, a number of gentlemen were named, because of their representative positions, as members of a provisional committee. The provisional committee was fairly large. It held one meeting at which it selected certain of its numbers and others who were not of its membership as members of an executive committee. This committee held meetings at regular intervals during the time that the fund was in existence.

It is proposed in the bill that will be introduced to incorporate a body to be known as the national committee for the celebration of the diamond jubilee of confederation. The personnel will consist of Their Excellencies the Governor General and the Viscountess Willingdon, the lieutenant governors of the several provinces, the premiers of the several provinces, the Speakers of the House of Commons and the Senate, a few members of His Majesty's Privy Council for Canada, a few senators, the Chief Justice of Canada, the deputy heads of certain of the departments of the public service, the presidents of the two large railway systems, the heads of a few representative organizations of Canada, among the number being the President of the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League, the President of the Canadian Battlefields Memorial Association, the President of the National Council of Women of Canada, the President of the Imperial Order of Daughters of the Empire, the President of the Daughters of Canada, the one lady member of this House of Commons, the chairman of the Ottawa Improvement Commission, the chairman of the Executive Committee of the Association of Canadian Clubs. I think I have summarized those whose names are mentioned as being among those of the committee to be incorporated and regarded as the provisional committee. The names have been chosen regardless of party affiliation and with the view as far as possible of making the committee representative of the whole of the Dominion. Naturally there are many organizations that might appropriately find a place in its membership, but if a beginning is made in one direction it will have to be followed in others and this will involve the addition of a very large number of names. I should like the House to understand that this is a provisional committee, and that it will have power to add any names that in its wisdom it may deem desirable.

The bill gives the committee power to receive moneys the parliament may appropriate or any moneys that may be contributed for the purpose, and allows it to determine how the money is to be spent. In other words, the government is not desirous of dictating the particular programme which shall be adopted by the Dominion with respect to a great national celebration of this kind. We think it will meet with more general satisfaction on the part of the public if a representative body such as this is given power to make all the arrangements that may be necessary.

I may say to my hon. friend that communications have come from a very large number of sources containing all kinds of suggestions, from pageants to the publication of histories, and other schemes too numerous to mention. The government proposes to turn over to this committee all the suggestions that it may receive and to place upon the committee the responsibility of deciding what shall be done.

May I say to hon. members, so that they will have reason to know there is no effort to prevent the fullest discussion as to how this money shall be spent, that the House will be given an opportunity to discuss the matter when the estimates are under consideration, because this item of $250,000 will have to be voted in supply. The committee will have to have its accounts audited and will have to make to parliament a full statement of how it has conducted its affairs.

Mr. IRVINE: Will this vote constitute a limit for the committee, or will there be any limitation at all?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It depends entirely upon what the committee recommends. The committee may come to parliament with a request for an additional vote, but so far as public funds are concerned, I would say, that the committee will be restricted to the amounts given to it by parliament. Parliament will have to consent to any addition to the appropriation.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. JACOBS: Are the provinces to be invited to contribute to this fund?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: One of the purposes of having this committee formed is that it may immediately get in touch with the provinces and if possible work out some form of joint celebration. A number of municipalities will no doubt also wish to have their own celebrations. This committee will seek to coordinate efforts from one end of the Dominion to the other, as they relate to provinces or to municipalities, with whatever the federal government may attempt.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, may I point out that in the outline the Prime Minister has given us, although he says that the appointment of this committee will be entirely irrespective of party, its personnel is very largely political in character? The organizations mentioned are of a particular type, they are not in any sense representative of all the different classes of the people of Canada. As I think of the people who have made confederation worth while, I think of the large farming population in every one of these provinces, yet so far as the Prime Minister has intimated there is no farmer appointed on any of these committees. We have large farm organizations in each of the three prairie provinces which I know best—very large and very representative farm organizations, both men's and women's—and yet apparently these have been entirely overlooked. I think of the particular group which I have been representing in this House, the labour group in each of the provinces. I suppose there are over 150 distinct labour organizations in Canada representing the rank and file of the people who are contributing very largely to the upbuilding of this country. Apparently they are entirely overlooked in the outline which has been given us by the Prime Minister. If a celebration of this kind is to be made of any very great educational value, I should think that those who would be in the very forefront would be the representatives of our educational system, members of the universities, and especially school teachers. We have school teachers' organizations in almost every province of the Dominion to-day. These school teachers are in touch with a very large proportion of our population, that is, the younger part that is attending school, the most impressionable part, and they ought to be most interested in a celebration of this kind. These teachers are apparently overlooked in the selection that has been made of the people who are to determine what character will be given to this event. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that these matters require a little further consideration than would appear to have been given them from the outline that has been so far presented to us.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, may I say to my hon. friend that I think he would be nearer the mark if he were to recognize that persons holding representative positions, such as the lieutenant governors of the several provinces hold, such as the premiers hold, such as the hon. Speaker of this House holds, represent in a broad way, all classes. They are not chosen from any one particular class, they are chosen because they happen to fill representative positions that are broad enough to include all groups. My hon. friend says that no recognition has been given to the agricultural class. As I understand it, the Premier of Manitoba is a graduate of an agricultural college and a well-known agriculturist, and I am sure that so far as agriculture might need special representation he is splendidly fitted to give it. The Premier of Alberta, although a lawyer, is the head of a government which is recognized as a farmers government.

Mr. STEVENS: John Oliver.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, and the Premier of Saskatchewan. I did draw particular attention to the fact that the government had placed among these names, the name of the hon. member for Southeast Grey. I think if anyone in this House has given attention to agricultural problems the hon. member for Southeast Grey is entitled to special recognition in that regard. As I have already said, the committee is a provisional committee. Undoubtedly when it comes to determining the executive there will be included many persons whose names would come within special groups. As a matter of fact, in considering the subject, a number of names were suggested, for example, the name of Mr. Tom Moore, president of the Trades and Labour Council, was proposed. It was pointed out that if Mr. Moore was to be on the committee then representation ought to be given also to the manufacturers' association, and if the manufacturers' association then the chambers of commerce; then some other organizations would be entitled to representation. And so it would run on; any number of organizations might be included. If it were the intention to embrace every organization that may wish to take part in this celebration, I am afraid we would have a committee incapable of functioning.

This much said, may I add that I think my hon. friend has been quite right in directing the attention of the committee to the importance of seeing that all classes are represented, and I shall be very much astonished if, when this provisional committee meets, any class that desires to have special recognition in connection with the program is not given every opportunity of having its voice heard and its interests considered.

Mr. BRADY: With respect to the committee that has been mentioned by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), I still feel that an omission of great importance is noticed. I do feel that the diamond jubilee of confederation is of such far-reaching importance that the educational aspect of it should be given great prominence. It will be a wonderful time among the youth of Canada and I consider that the chancellor or the president or the representative direct of the educational system of Canada should receive recognition. I know myself what it will mean if we enable the youth of Canada to come to a realization of the past history of the Dominion, and to form some idea of its unity in the future. I therefore respectfully request that the university system of Canada, as represented either by a chancellor or by a president, receive special mention in that particular committee which has been referred to this evening.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend will run through the list of names he will find that a large percentage are those of university graduates, and he may, I think, rest absolutely assured that in the hands of that provisional committee, the educational interests of the country will be well taken care of when the executive committee comes to be formed.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Mackenzie King thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 65, to incorporate a national committee for the celebration of the diamond jubilee of Confederation.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

POWERS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved:

That the select standing committees of this House shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House, and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.40 p.m.

Wednesday, February 16, 1927

The House met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

SENATE REFORM

Mr. EVANS:

1. What is the form or wording of the pledge, if any, taken from those who have been appointed senators during the last two years with a view to Senate reform?

2. How many have been thus pledged?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. An assurance of support of such measure of Senate reform, in conformity with the requirements of the constitution, as may be introduced by the Liberal administration.

2. This assurance has been given by all who have accepted appointment to the Senate within the time mentioned.

BRITISH COLUMBIA FISHERIES COMMISSION

Mr. NEILL:

1. Was a royal commission appointed to investigate British Columbia fisheries in the year 1922?

2. Did it make a report containing some twenty-eight recommendations?

3. Was recommendation No. 11 recommending that the regulations be amended so as to prohibit the use of both drag and purse seines in Departure bay?

4. Was this recommendation carried out?

5. Was an order in council published recently allowing purse seines at Departure bay from January 26th to February 5th? If so, what was the date of such order in council and in what issue of the "Gazette," if any, did it appear?

6. On whose recommendation was this done?

7. Was any public notice given of the intention to make this change and was any attempt made to advise those who would be prejudicially affected, and was any opportunity given them or their representatives to be heard in the matter?

Hon. Mr. CARDIN:

1. Yes.
2. Yes.
3. Yes.
4. Yes.
5. Yes. Date of order in council is January 27th, 1927. It is appearing in this week's Gazette.
6. Minister of Marine and Fisheries.
7. As is usual in such cases, notice of intention to make the change was not given. The time involved would make the desired change useless. The Nanaimo board of trade which originally favoured closing the bay to seining wired that there was a serious shortage in the catch of fish, that gill-netters were not availing themselves of their opportunities, that the main body of fish was in the bay, and recommending strongly that seining be allowed in the bay for the few days of the balance of this season. Only three gill-netters operated there this season. The change was favoured by the provincial Department of Fisheries, as well as the federal chief inspector.

ENFORCEMENT OF VOLSTEAD ACT

Mr. POWER:

1. Have the attorneys representing the government of Canada in the Customs inquiry Commission received any instructions which would enable them to obtain information of considerable value to the government of United States of America in its enforcement of the Volstead Act?
2. If so, will His Majesty's Canadian government instruct the Hon. Vincent Massey, the Canadian Ambassador at Washington, to make such representations to the government of the United States of America through the proper diplomatic channels as will induce the said government of the United States of America to reimburse His Majesty's Canadian government a proportion of the funds expended by its attorneys in the above mentioned enquiry?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. No instructions to the end mentioned have been given to the attorneys representing the government of Canada in the customs inquiry.
2. Answered by answer to No. 1.

DUTY ON USED PIANOS ENTERING CANADA

Mr. MILLAR:

1. Is a duty being levied under the anti-dumping act on used pianos entering Canada?
2. If so, under what section of the act is such duty levied?

[Mr. Neill.]

3. Since there can be no uniform value of imported used pianos, how is the selling price in the country of origin determined?

Hon. Mr. EULER:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Second-hand or used articles of all kinds are appraised on the basis of the replacement value when new with an allowance for depreciation in accordance with the actual condition of the imported article.

RELIEF OF HOME BANK DEPOSITORS

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS:

1. When did the Home Bank open for business and when did it close its doors?
2. What amount was on deposit or in current account when the bank failed?
3. What percentage of such amount did the creditors receive through the liquidator?
4. What further percentage was voted by parliament and what was the amount voted?
5. How much of the amount voted by parliament is still unpaid and why?
6. Did parliament vote money for the relief of Home Bank depositors in recognition of any legal or moral claim of such depositors on the government?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1. Opened January 2, 1906; suspended August 17, 1923.
2. Savings and current deposits, $15,030,678.
3. Dividend paid to date, 25 per cent.
4. The Home Bank Creditors' Relief Act provided for payments to certain creditors, not to exceed in any case 35 per cent of the amount of claim; $3,000,000 was appropriated.
5. $222,233.59; certain claims have not yet been dealt with by the commissioners.
6. The act stands on the statutes as a relief measure. It will be recalled that the House adopted a report of the banking and commerce committee to the effect that it considered the investigation established "a moral claim in equity for compensation."

PERSECUTION OF UKRAINIANS IN POLAND

Mr. MALONEY:

1. Have any representations been made to the Prime Minister on behalf of the Ukrainian population in Canada, that their relatives and fellow countrymen in Galicia and Volinia, now occupied by Poland, are imprisoned and persecuted by Polish authorities in their own country?
2. Has the Prime Minister taken any action in respect of any such representations?
3. If so, what action has been taken?
4. Is it the intention of the Prime Minister to take action in respect of this matter?

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. A number of copies have been received of a printed resolution signed on behalf of groups of citizens and residents of Canada of Ukrainian descent, protesting against what are represented to be acts of persecution and oppression of the Ukrainian population of Poland by the government of that country, and notably the condemnation to death of Mychailo Bilyj. The resolution asks the Canadian government to take up the matter with the Polish authorities. It also requests action by the government of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics. On the other hand, representations have been received from other quarters to the effect that Mychailo Bilyj was sentenced by a regular criminal court with a regular jury, and that an appeal against his sentence is now pending before the court of appeals.

2-4. The Canadian government does not consider that adequate grounds exist for the intervention which it is proposed should be taken through diplomatic channels in the affairs of a European country, on behalf of one section of its inhabitants.

It may also be pointed out that Poland, in common with other states of eastern Europe, has undertaken by treaty to ensure equal treatment of all Polish nationals, whether or not members of minorities, and to regard these stipulations as obligations of international concern placed under the guarantee of the League of Nations. Procedure has been established by the treaty of Versailles of June 28, 1919, and by the council of the league, for consideration of complaint from such minority, alleging violation of these obligations, and submitted in due form.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

ARMOURY BUILDINGS IN CANADA

Mr. HAY:

1. In how many towns in Canada of 3,000 population and under is there an armoury building?
2. What is the name of each such town, its population, and the cost of such building?
3. What is the salary of the caretaker in each case, and the cost of the fuel for upkeep?
4. What is the total cost for the dominion?

COST OF PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE ON CUSTOMS

Mr. POWER:

1. What was the total cost of the parliamentary committee on customs which sat during the session of 1926?
2. How much was paid in witness fees?
3. How much was paid to accountants?
4. How much was paid in counsel fees; (a) to Mr. Calder; (b) to any other attorneys?

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

APPOINTMENT OF POSTMASTER AT STOUFFVILLE, ONT.

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, reports and all other correspondence or communications between the government of Canada or any member thereof or their deputies or the Civil Service Commission or the officials thereof or any other person or persons or political organizations relating to the appointment of a postmaster at Stouffville, Ontario.

OTTAWA RIVER—POWER AND NAVIGATION RIGHTS

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all applications, letters, reports, orders in council, correspondence and all other communications between the government and any other person or persons as to the renewal of charters or agreements. or extension of the same, regarding the Ottawa, Montreal and Georgian Bay Canal Company for power and navigation rights on the Ottawa river.

MAJOR-GENERAL J. H. MACBRIEN

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all correspondence, reports and other documents regarding the proposed retirement of Major-General J. H. MacBrien as chief of staff of the Militia department.

MR. G. T. HAMELIN

Mr. POWER:

For a copy of all reports on file in the Department of Marine and Fisheries with reference to the examination of eyesight and hearing of Mr. G. T. Hamelin, ex-pilot of the Quebec district, made by; (a) examiners appointed by the Department of Marine and Fisheries; (b) other medical practitioners. Also a return showing a description of the machine and method used by the examiners appointed by the department.

CALGARY LIVE STOCK EXCHANGE

Mr. KENNEDY:

For a copy of the regulations approved by the Minister of Agriculture or the Department of Agriculture of the Calgary live stock exchange the Edmonton live stock exchange, the Winnipeg live stock exchange, and the Moose Jaw live stock exchange.

UNITED LIVE STOCK GROWERS LIMITED

Mr. KENNEDY:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, reports and all other correspondence or communications between the Minister of Agriculture and the Calgary live stock exchange, and the United Live Stock Growers Limited, relating to violations of the Live Stock Act and the regulations of the Calgary live stock exchange.

CHINESE SITUATION

Mr. CHURCH moved:

For a copy of all correspondence including letters, telegrams, reports, cables and all other documents between the government of Great Britain and Canada regarding the present trouble in China, showing what steps are or have been taken by the government to protect Canadians now in China and Canadian Trade and Commerce, and Canadian interest there.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The communications of the British government on the situation in China are of a confidential nature, and certainly could not be brought down without the consent of the British government. I feel perfectly sure that the British government would not wish to have made public at this stage the correspondence, such as has passed between the home government and our own government on this matter, and I think I shall have to ask the hon. member not to press this motion, because the government would not be in a position to comply with it. I think the statement I gave the House the other day as to the position of the government in the matter ought to be sufficient for the purposes of the hon. member.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): I do not think the answer of the minister is fair to the House or the public. There are many Canadian subjects in China, many people from my own city, missionaries, and their families do not know where they are. Considering the large trade which Canada carries on with China, I think it is the duty of the Prime Minister to inform the House as to the steps the government is taking to protect the lives of the subjects and the property of Canadians in that country, and of trade and commerce. If a Canadian missionary, for instance, loses his life, surely this country is very much interested in conditions in China. The new status of Canada will save no lives in China.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): Suppose the motion were amended and a clause inserted to the effect that documents which were not of an official character should be produced. Would that satisfy my right hon. friend?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Entirely. I have no objection to bringing down any correspondence not confidential, but this relates to correspondence between the British government and the Canadian government, and I am perfectly sure the government of Great Britain would not desire at the present time to have made public to the world the correspondence relating to the Chinese situation.

[Mr. Kennedy.]

Mr. SPEAKER: This motion is not debatable. It had better stand until it is amended.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, drop it. It cannot be carried.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: I declare the motion lost.

Motion negatived.

IMPERIAL CONFERENCE, 1926

Mr. CHURCH moved:

For a return containing the agenda and all reports, letters, agreement, orders in council, telegrams and all other correspondence and communications including complete record of proceedings of the Imperial conference, 1926, and all correspondence between the government of Great Britain and Canada or other oversea Dominion in relation to the said conference.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, here again I must draw the attention of my hon. friend to the fact that there has already been laid on the table the published report of the conference proceedings. True, it is an abbreviated report, and I moved an order the other day to have printed several appendices which contain additional data on the proceedings. I have laid on the table already as much of the proceedings of the conference as the British government has seen well to lay on the table of the British House. I am quite prepared to give to parliament all the data which the British government is prepared to give to the British parliament; but there are parts of the conference proceedings which, as hon. gentlemen know, are confidential, they have never been published heretofore, and I think as to the proceedings of the last conference we must follow the rule which has been adopted respecting all the preceding conferences. As to any correspondence relating to the agenda or other features of the conference, the government will gladly bring down whatever communications are available that the British government may not wish to have regarded as confidential.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Speaker, the correspondence laid on the table of the British House is another matter. All the documents have not been brought down, for instance, a brief prepared by Canada House relating to economic questions concerning this country, and surely parliament is entitled to that information.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I might make the position of the government clear by saying to my hon. friend that so far as we are concerned everything can be brought down, but wherever the correspondence has been between our government and another government, whether the British government or the government of any self-governing Dominion, the consent of the other government must be obtained before the correspondence is made public. With that understanding, I am prepared to put on the table everything the hon. member could think of suggesting.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROPOSED HOTEL IN TORONTO

Mr. CHURCH moved:

For a copy of all letters, correspondence, reports or agreements between the Canadian National Railways, Sir Henry Thornton, or the government, and any other person, or persons, regarding the erection of a new Canadian National railway hotel in Toronto, and the terms of such arrangement.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to object to the passage of the motion calling for correspondence between the Canadian National Railways or the government and any other person or persons relating to the erection of a new Canadian National railway hotel in Toronto and the terms of such arrangement; but I deem it proper to point out to the House that it will embarrass the business of the Canadian National Railways if during any possible negotiations of any character hon. members move for the production of documents. The subject has been discussed at previous sessions, and I think it was generally agreed that it could not injure the business interests of the Canadian National Railways to call for information and documents with respect to any completed transaction, but that it would be unwise to force the management to expose through the medium of the House documents connected with any matter which may be in process of negotiation, as the resultant publicity might embarrass the Canadian National Railways. As I say, I shall not oppose the order now under discussion. I merely mention this general principle, that it is rather unfair to the management, which is conducting the Canadian National Railways along the ordinary lines of business, to ask for the production of papers and documents in connection with matters which are still under negotiation.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion is lost.

Mr. MANION: I understood the minister to accept the motion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The responsibility is on the House.

Mr. DUNNING: I have no personal objection to the motion. I merely point out the responsibility of the House in calling for documents in connection with any matter relating to the Canadian National railways which is still under negotiation. For my hon. friend's information I may say that I have no knowledge personally of any such negotiations.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not produce the papers?

Mr. SPEAKER: The motion is lost.

Mr. CHURCH: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I appeal to the House. I was on my feet to answer the minister and I was not given an opportunity. With all due deference to Your Honour, I think there is too much haste. The Minister of Railways is very fond of making plausible excuses—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. This motion is not debatable.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. It is all very well for the minister to talk about embarrassing the management of the Canadian National railways by asking for the production of documents relating to matters still under negotiation, but my resolution asks for specific information in regard to a matter that has already been announced in six Toronto papers, and what they have published is just the opposite of what the minister has now told us, a statement of Sir Henry Thornton. It is quite true the government is not putting up any money, but the Canadian National railway management announced to the Board of Trade and other public bodies in the constituency from which I come that they will give their help to a lot of people to build a hotel and all the Canadian National Railways patronage.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. There is no question of privilege. The motion of the hon. gentleman is not debatable. If I have allowed him to proceed, it is out of regard for his inability to hear distinctly what was said. I repeat, the motion is not debatable.

Motion negatived.

NATURAL RESOURCES—PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is in the general interest of this Dominion that their natural resources should be transferred to the prairie provinces at the earliest possible moment and that such transfer should not interfere with, restrict or modify the right of the said provinces to complete control of their educational or other local affairs.

Mr. SPEAKER: In putting this motion to the House I may state that I have examined the question during the past few days and while I have come to a decision as to its right to be on the order paper, I should like to have an expression of opinion from the House on that point. In my judgment the motion is out of order, inasmuch as the question at issue is sub judice; it is a matter which at present is pending before the courts. However, as I say, I should like to be enlightened by the House as to the general feeling regarding the regularity of the motion before pronouncing upon it.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Regarding the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I beg to direct the attention of the House to the fact that the reference to the courts is of a specific character conveyed in the following words:

Is section 17 of the Alberta Act in whole or in part ultra vires of the parliament of Canada, and if so in what particular or particulars?

Now, my resolution is general in its bearing. The reference to the courts, as I say, is specific, referring solely to Alberta in relation to section 17 of the Alberta Act. The present motion is general in its application in that it relates to the three prairie provinces, and that makes a decided difference.

I might call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that Premier Brownlee of Alberta has expressed himself on this question—and this, I submit, might be taken as an opinion bearing on the point of order—that the reference to the courts is entirely different from the question of the transfer of resources. That is the opinion which he has given and which was quoted in this House last session. Last year there was a government motion on the order paper with regard to this matter. On June 1 the government announced that they did not intend to proceed with the legislation promised in the speech from the throne at the opening of the session, but they kept that motion on the order paper and thereby prevented any discussion of the matter. So long as the government's motion remained on the order paper private members were precluded from introducing the subject. I repeat, my motion is general in its character, and it strikes me as subversive of democratic principles and of the liberties of members of the House that we should not be permitted to place on record our views on this important question.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I am sorry I had no intimation that this matter would come up this afternoon, because I have not prepared for it. I would however refer you, Mr. Speaker, to May, thirteenth edition, at page 323:

Matters awaiting the adjudication of a court of law should not be brought forward in debate.

The same view is stated in Bourinot and of course in Beauchesne. All I have to say is that this question cannot be debated, at least in so far as the second part of it is concerned. As regards the first part of the resolution, as to the desirability of transferring Alberta's natural resources to the province. I think every one agrees on that point, because after all an agreement had been reached in the matter. That agreement, however, is subject to the qualification that it shall not interfere with, restrict or modify the right of the province to the complete control of its educational or other local affairs. That is where the disagreement comes in. I may add that an agreement has been entered into in that respect.

Had I known the matter would come up this afternoon I would have been prepared to refer the House to the statement I made last year, and which is in Hansard. However, I cannot debate the subject without referring to the very question which is submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada at the present time, and even if no rule existed to govern us in the matter I would not consider it proper, nor indeed would it be dignified on my part or on the part of any member of the House, to discuss a question which is actually pending before the Supreme Court of Canada. I think the motion is clearly out of order.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St George): There is, I think, a clear distinction between the issue now before the Supreme Court of Canada and the issue raised in this resolution. This resolution proposes that it is in the general interest of this Dominion that their natural resources should be transferred to the prairie provinces. That has nothing to do with the question before the Supreme Court of Canada as to whether section 17 of the Alberta Constitutional Act of 1905 is intra vires or ultra vires. The resolution then proceeds:

And that such transfer should not interfere with, restrict or modify the right of the said provinces to complete control of their educational or other local affairs.

The transfer itself will not interfere with the control of education. The contention underlying the reference to the Supreme Court of Canada is that the Constitutional Act of Alberta of 1905 and the similar Saskatchewan Act, 1905, affect the question of the use by these provinces of certain educational funds and educational grants, I may simply state that I think there is a clear distinction. Every person knows my view on this; I state frankly that I cannot support this resolution in the terms in which it is expressed; but I do think that, unless Your Honour regards it as clearly out of order, it is inexpedient and not in the public interest that questions which were discussed on every platform in my province during the last election and questions which are being discussed daily in the public press should not be debated in this House, in order that the public may be fully informed as to their general merits. As I have said, my views are well known and I am prepared to stand in this House or in any other place and vindicate them, but I think it prejudicial to the interest of Canada and to the interests of this parliament that we should now prevent a discussion on a question which is of such general interest to the whole Dominion. I am sure that if ample discussion were allowed it would eliminate many misunderstandings which now exist with regard to the merits of the question.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does not my hon. friend think that the decision of the court as to the constitutionality of the act will clear things up better than a discussion in this House?

Mr. CAHAN: If my hon. friend will allow me to give him a frank answer, I will admit at once that a final decision on the issue placed before the court will decide as to whether or not, apart from this proposed transfer, certain restrictions placed upon the provinces with regard to the use of school funds are valid or not. To my mind, however, there is a clear distinction between a general term such as the transfer of natural resources to these several provinces and the transfer of the school funds and school lands. The term "natural resources", in its proper application, is a transfer to each of these provinces of those natural resources such as lands, mines and so on, which have not been appropriated under existing statutes. In regard to that transfer there is a subject for discussion, in respect of which the maritime provinces and others have their own peculiar views.

Then with regard to these Dominion lands which have been set aside for school purposes in those provinces now comprising what were formerly the Northwest Territories, those lands have already been appropriated for the certain specific purposes, and already from the sale of those lands some $27,000,000 has accumulated, which amount is now held by the federal government in trust for educational purposes. Personally I do not think these school funds can be included, by any proper use of the words, in the natural resources of Alberta and Saskatchewan; I think that has been decided by parliament, and in respect of these school funds and school lands parliament is bound in honour to comply with the terms of the trust and to continue to administer it in accordance with those terms. Whether parliament shall decide that the crown in the right of the province or the crown in the right of the Dominion shall still continue to be trustee for these funds, my opinion is that the terms of the trust, whatever they may be, should be conserved.

What are the terms of the trust? It is true that a decision that section 17 of the Constitutional Acts of 1905 is ultra vires of parliament may, to a certain extent, modify the terms under which these funds are now held, and may affect to the same extent the terms by which they shall be held by the crown in the right of the province, in case that transfer is made. But apart from that one single issue there are broad questions which I am convinced, if discussed thoroughly in this House, would tend to remove many popular prejudices, sweep away a mass of misinformation now existing, and prove to be of great advantage not only to the government but to the whole of Canada.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But does not my hon. friend admit that all the trouble has arisen over the constitutionality of clause 17 of the Alberta act? If everyone admits that it is constitutional no one can object to the terms of the agreement or the terms of the resolution introduced last year. All the trouble is based on that, and it is in the interests of all parties to the discussion that this point should be made clear.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I rise to a point of order. If this is sub judice so far as I am concerned, I am going to insist that it be sub judice as far as others are concerned.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is perfectly right; all remarks must be addressed to the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): I am not prepared to deal at length with this point of order, and especially am I unable to quote the authorities against the point of order raised by Mr. Speaker, which some constitutional students may be able to do. However, I want to say that in my opinion it would be stretching a point to rule this out even though there may be technical reasons why that should be done. I believe the matter should be discussed and I think it is a far cry from the technical point of law which is before the courts to the general principle involved in this resolution.

There was one point in the argument of the Minister of Justice, however, which drew my attention; if I misunderstood him I have no doubt he will correct me. I understood him to say that the first part of the resolution which states the general principle that Alberta should be given her natural resources was all right and that there was no objection to it, but when we come to the second part of the resolution which states that there shall be no restrictions as to the control of schools that does not seem to be the case. Are we going to understand then that the court has been asked to decide as to whether or not Alberta has the right to take control of its educational facilities?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman must confine himself to the point of order. If I should decide that the motion is in order the hon. gentleman may then discuss the matter fully, but just now I have to decide whether or not the motion of the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards), is in order, and all remarks must be confined to that point.

Mr. IRVINE: If I am out of order I shall be glad to cease dealing with the point, but I am afraid I did not make myself clear. I think perhaps Mr. Speaker misunderstood me. I am not arguing the case which is before the courts at all. I took my point from the remarks of the Minister of Justice, and if what he said was true, my inference must be equally so. I do not think that the point of the Minister of Justice was well taken. That is to say the court is not asked to decide whether Alberta has that right or not, but rather it is deciding as to whether or not a certain clause in a particular law is ultra vires.

[Mr. J. W. Edwards.]

Mr. KAISER: Would Mr. Speaker kindly read the rule which he thinks is applicable in this case, and as to the application of which he appears to have some doubt?

Mr. SPEAKER: Do any other gentlemen desire to speak upon the point of order?

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (Toronto West Centre): Mr. Speaker, this resolution is identical in substance with the agreement that was laid on the table by the government at the beginning of last session. Of course they amended it afterward and to escape a rather embarrassing situation created by my hon. friend the member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). The question submitted to the court was as to whether clause 17 of the Alberta Act was valid. Now the only question before the court is the validity of section 17 of the Alberta Act. This resolution does not refer to that section; it says simply that the three prairie provinces should have their natural resources given to them, that those resources should come under their control without any restriction of their local autonomy. Therefore I cannot for the life of me see how the question that is before the court at the present time has any special bearing upon this resolution. If the Supreme court holds that section 17 of the Alberta Act is intra vires, then I presume the government would hand over to Alberta and the other provinces their natural resources without any restrictions whatever—at least there would be no reason arising out of the judicial decision why they should not. Now I submit, Mr. Speaker, that in that case the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and the two former particularly, would be in exactly the same position as they would be if this resolution carried. If the resolution carried to-day, and were acted upon, the Autonomy Act of 1905 would still stand. If it is intra vires the situation as it exists would be quite satisfactory to the hon. member for Labelle. If it is ultra vires, we should not prevent these provinces from enjoying their full provincial status the same as Ontario and Quebec. I am at a loss to see why this resolution is not in order in view of the circumstances surrounding it, and I submit that we ought to go on with the discussion.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): I should like to bring just one or two points to the attention of Your Honour and the attention of the House. In the first place, I would remind Your Honour that there is no rule of the House governing this point; it is a question of practice, a question which is cited largely in May, also in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules in the following terms:

Besides the prohibitions contained in this rule, it has been sanctioned by usage both in England and in Canada, that a member, while speaking must not:

(c) refer to any matter on which a judicial decision is pending.

Mr. SPEAKER: From what page is the hon. member quoting?

Mr. STEVENS: I am quoting from page 62 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, rule 19, sub-section (c). Behind these rules there is always some reason, and I think it is clear to all of us that the intention of this practice, which has now taken on the nature of a rule, was to prevent any person's case that might be before a court from being prejudiced because of a discussion in this House under the privileges of parliament. That is undoubtedly the case. Therefore I submit to Your Honour that in applying the rule or invoking the precedent there ought first to be inquiry whether any interest is to be prejudiced by the discussion of the matter proposed.

Now I wish to call Your Honour's attention and the attention of the House to the nature of the reference. The reference is, whether clause 17 of the Alberta Act is intra vires or ultra vires of this parliament. I notice that in a report which emanated from the Supreme court a few days ago their lordships expressed the desire to have the matter discussed before them. I think there is no doubt that it will be necessary to do that. It is not a matter of dispute between some individuals in the country whereby a discussion here would prejudice the right of a citizen in the court. That is not involved in this case. It is, I might say, a hypothetical question, it is a constitutional question being submitted to the Supreme court for their consideration. In order that their lordships may give due and proper consideration, there must be discussion before the court. Now I submit to this House that a discussion, even on the point itself, directly entered into, whether by the Minister of Justice, the Solicitor General, and other able lawyers on that side of the House, or by my hon. leader (Mr. Guthrie), the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) and other eminent lawyers and counsel on this side, would form very interesting matter that their lordships might profitably and properly peruse in order to arrive at a decision, together with the discussion before the court itself. But as a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, the point at issue before the court need not necessarily be discussed here at all, and we can very properly trust Your Honour to bring any speaker here to order when he trespasses upon the rule. I can apprehend that this resolution could be discussed here from almost every angle without trespassing upon the rule.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I could not.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, Your Honour would be quite competent, I think, to bring to order any member trespassing the rule or practice.

But what I want to point out further is this: This matter is being discussed in the legislature of Saskatchewan, it is being discussed all over the country on many political platforms and in other places, and surely this great forum of the people ought to have the right to discuss an important question of this kind just so long as no interest is placed in jeopardy, and the right of no man or citizen before the court is interfered with.

Hon. Mr. BENNETT (West Calgary): Before Your Honour renders judgment I should like to direct attention to a matter that has a direct bearing upon the question whether or not the resolution is in order. The rule that my hon. friend (Mr. Stevens) has just referred to is of universal application. No high court of parliament should discuss a question that might prejudicially or otherwise, affect the interests of a litigant. That is the general rule. It therefore becomes necessary to inquire whether the reference to the Supreme Court of Canada is or is not litigation within the sense of the correct use of that word. In the Privy Council in 1912, in the case of the Attorney General for Ontario versus the Attorney General for Canada, it became necessary to determine whether or not the courts were bound to answer hypothetical questions thus submitted to them by the executive, and after a very full argument Lord Chancellor Earl Loreburn, in the course of his judgment, speaking for the commitee said this:

But the answers are only advisory and will have no more effect than the opinions of the law officers. Perhaps another reason is that the act has resulted in asking a series of searching questions very difficult to answer exhaustively and accurately without so many qualifications and reservations as to make the answers of little value. The Supreme court itself can, however, either point out in its answer these or other considerations of a like kind, or can make the necessary representations to the Governor General in Council when it thinks right so to treat any question that may be put.

Then these significant words appear at the close of the sentence:

And the parliament of Canada can control the action of the executive.

If that be so, it appears to me to be a very grave question whether or not this reference to the Supreme Court of Canada can be said to be litigation. That is the first difficulty which I have in this matter. The second difficulty which I have is this, that the Privy Council has said that the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in answer to the questions submitted will be of no more importance than the opinion of the law officers of the crown, and inasmuch as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) signed the first agreement for the transfer of the resources, we must take it that his opinion was that there was no violation of fundamental rights under the constitution by reason of the agreement being made effective.

The matter now having been submitted by the executive to the court and the opinion of the court being no more valuable than that of the Minister of Justice, whose opinion has been already delivered inasmuch as he has signed the agreement, it seems to me to be somewhat difficult to say that this matter is now sub judice. If it were I would have no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that it was out of order. But my difficulty at the moment is whether or not this can be said to be litigation or sub judice in the sense in which those words have been used in the various rules of parliament dating from the earliest days down to the present. If it is sub judice in the sense in which those words are used, I have no doubt that Your Honour should rule it out of order. But the significant words to which I have directed the attention of hon. members—

> And the parliament of Canada can control the action of the executive.

—would make it quite possible for the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) to drop this resolution and move a resolution deprecating the reference of this question to the courts. Such a resolution would place at large the whole issue that is now being or about to be considered by the Supreme Court of Canada, inasmuch as the Privy Council has declared in the very terms I have used the right of this parliament to control the action of the executive.

I have the misfortune perhaps to differ from some of my colleagues with respect to one matter. I have no doubt the reference to the Supreme Court of Canada directly affects the question of the transfer of the resources for a reason that, I think, need only be stated to carry conviction. In the original agreement the transfer of the resources was of course subject to the provisions of the Alberta act, and if the provisions of the Alberta act were intra vires, then obviously no further restrictions were necessary to preserve the rights of those who claim rights under its provisions on the school fund. But if on the other hand the provisions of the autonomy act, to which the transfer of the resources would be made subject, were ultra vires, it would follow that without restrictions or reservations the rights of minorities or majorities would be all the same and there would be no question with respect to the moneys under the school fund.

It is for that reason, I apprehend, that the matter has been referred to the Supreme Court of Canada; for, as the Minister of Justice has very properly said, if section 17 of the Alberta act is intra vires, by common consent, it seems to me, there is no further matter for its consideration or decision. But if on the other hand that section should be ultra vires, then clearly the question to be considered is what action, if any, should be taken by this parliament with respect to the matter that is mentioned in section 17. That is the whole question in a nutshell as I appreciate it at this moment.

I am one of those who perhaps differ again from some of my colleagues. I do not think it is desirable that we should discuss the question in parliament if it is sub judice in the sense that the question of the merits or demerits of special claims are to be considered. But if on the other hand we are merely to discuss the action of the executive in referring this matter to the courts instead of accepting the responsibility which the law imposes upon them, then another set of considerations should prevail.

I am free to say, Mr. Speaker, that my opinion is so hesitant with respect to this matter that I cannot render any assistance to you other than merely to point out the observations that were made with respect to what would result if the question were put to the Supreme Court of Canada, particularly having regard to the fact that the province of Alberta has indicated its intention not to be represented before the court at that hearing. That being the case, the observations of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) would seem to be very pertinent, namely, that a discussion in this parliament would be quite as important as a discussion in the Supreme Court of Canada if the opinion of the Supreme court was of no more value than that of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think the province of Alberta is being represented by counsel, but counsel is authorized not to take any part. He has merely a watching brief.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And counsel for that province has even suggested to the court that the court should appoint counsel to represent the other side of the question.

Mr. BENNETT: I had intended to refer to the newspaper reports as to the court itself appointing counsel. What I should have said perhaps, to make the matter clear, was that counsel for Alberta had indicated that he had no intention of discussing the merits or demerits of the question referred, but was merely observing what was taking place in the court, and that it was competent for the court, if it so desired, without any complaint on his part, to appoint counsel to represent the other side.

That is the only difficulty I have in the matter, and I have no doubt if the matter can be said to be sub judice in this sense, it is a matter that should not be considered by this parliament. But if on the other hand the discussion would, as the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) said, elucidate or simplify the complexity of the problem that has otherwise to be dealt with, then a discussion in this parliament without the province of Alberta being represented by counsel, as is the case in the Supreme court, would be quite as relevant, helpful and illuminating as a discussion in that court, when, as I say, its opinion in answer to the question would have no more value than that of the Minister of Justice, who may one day adorn the Supreme Court of Canada itself.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Thank you.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I have just this to say. My resolution asks for the transfer of their resources to the provinces at the earliest moment without any modifications or restrictions. I am quite confident I am in line in that resolution with the Premier of Alberta. Whatever restrictions may be placed or modifications may occur after the Supreme court renders its judgment, is another matter. In other words I maintain that the transfer should take place without restrictions or modifications, no matter what restrictions or modifications the Supreme court may subsequently impose.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Inasmuch as the agreement for the transfer provides that the school lands and school land funds shall constitute part of the transfer from the federal government to the province, and inasmuch as there is a question involved as to the jurisdiction in the Autonomy Act of 1905, and particularly section 17, how can my hon. friend say that question is not involved in a discussion of this resolution?

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto): As I understand Your Honour's ruling, you are dealing with an objection taken to the notice of motion as being out of order because the motion deals with a subject that is before the court for adjudication—that is, pending for decision before some court. I know of no parliamentary rule that refers to this case at all, but I believe, by analogy with the civil courts, parliament has refused to discuss as being out of order a matter which was before the Supreme court for judgment at the same time. But that was only in a case I think, if Your Honour will look at the proceedings, where justice might be prejudiced somewhat by a discussion taking place in parliament. Where the publication does not tend to interfere with the courts of justice, then there is no such thing as a rule preventing this discussion because the matter is sub judice. There is no magic in the word, and there is no rule which says, except for good reason, that you cannot discuss here or anywhere else a matter that is before the courts. It may not be discussed, however, when it will tend to interfere with the course of justice. For instance, if you allowed discussion of an election before the time limited for bringing in a protest against that election, you might prejudice the courts of justice in regard to that election; you might intimidate witnesses, and might make it impossible to get a jury; or you might, for one reason or other, put it out of the reach of the courts to do common justice in the matter. But here there is no such case as that. There is no plaintiff or defendant. There is an academic question being decided by the Supreme Court of Canada.

My hon. friend says that counsel for Alberta is not taking active part in the discussion. The case will be presented by the learned Solicitor General, who has with him, I believe, equally eminent counsel from the city of Montreal. Right will be done, irrespective of what this House may say, or what decision the House may come to, and I suggest to Your Honour that where the matter is brought up under such a vague and general proposal as this, or an objection so vague and general as this one of sub judice, it should be only in the clearest case that Your Honour would give effect to such an objection; because if Your Honour lets it run too far there is a means ready to hand for the government or the opposition to put any matter out of the realm of discussion by referring it to the courts. I would suggest, in all deference, that it is a matter in which great care should be taken, because if you support the objection the effect of the ruling will be that it will remove a very live question from the realm of free discussion in this House, whereas it is now discussed in every legislature that wants to discuss it, in the press, and wherever two or three are gathered together in this whole Dominion. That we in this House should be permitted to discuss the matter is very important, and I know you will give that phase of the situation very serious consideration before acceding to the objection.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): You were here, Mr. Speaker, and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) the leader of the opposition (Mr. Guthrie) and the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) were here, when the Autonomy Act was passed twenty-two years ago, and I am sure it makes us all feel much younger to hear the same discussion over again. The French translation of the word "sub judice" means, under the judgment of the court or under the court. One point only is involved here and that point is whether section 17 was ultra vires or intra vires. That question was discussed in 1905 and parliament decided that it was intra vires. My hon. friend from Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) should have proceeded in the same way in which we proceed with judicial matters when we refer to the conduct of courts or judges. The hon. member from Frontenac should have brought in a motion condemning the action of the Minister of Justice or of the government in referring the matter to the court. That is the way in which we should proceed. Now that it is before the court it should be left there until a decision is obtained in the court, because I for one feel that until I have the decision of the court I am not in a position to say whether we should transfer these natural resources, independent of the provisions laid down in the statute of 1905.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): On the point of order, and the point raised by the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary) it seems to me the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) and the hon. member from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) have struck the right key. If the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards), or any other member of the House, is not satisfied with the action taken by the government in referring the matter to the court, let him proceed in the proper way and bring a motion of censure against the government for the action taken in their capacity as the executive of this country. But as regards the question whether we can discuss this motion without referring to the matter before the Supreme Court of Canada, perhaps because of the dulness of my intellect I do not see how we can deal with one without trenching on the other. The hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary) has insisted that the rule, or the parliamentary practice, which has for its object the protection of the rights of the people should not be so applied as to curtail the rights of parliament. I think that is absolutely right. I should be the last member of this House to sustain any procedure taken by any cabinet to take away from parliament the right to discuss any question by referring it to a court of justice. I also agree with the hon. member for St. Lawrence and St. George (Mr. Cahan) that from a broad point of view it might be just as well to have the whole matter discussed now. But taking the situation as it stands, the hon. member for Frontenac wants the House to declare that the natural resources of the province of Alberta should be handed over to the government without any restriction whatever in regard to school matters. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George expressed the opinion that this parliament created some years ago a trust which must be respected by the government of Canada or by the government of the provinces, but this is precisely the place where it is impossible to discuss this question without discussing the reference to the Supreme court.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I ask Your Honour's judgment as to whether the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) is properly discussing the point of order, or is trying to get in some of his views in regard to the merits of the question.

Mr. BOURASSA: That point was raised by my hon. friend, and to clear the ground, I might say I am not raising at all the merits of the question, but simply taking the arguments made by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, the Minister of Justice and the other members who have spoken already, wherein they admit that it is impossible to discuss the general question—and a fair one—raised by the hon. member for Frontenac, without discussing at the same time the question before the Supreme court. That is my argument. I am not at all discussing the merits of the question either as raised by the hon. member or as submitted to the Supreme court.

But the other point I want to insist upon, and I do not think it has been touched yet, is the right of members of parliament to be enlightened. I do not take it for granted that we know all things, I do not take it for granted that we are prepared to discuss all questions without being enlightened by opinions of the highest tribunals. I do not believe in parliament abdicating its rights in favour of any tribunal, whether it be the Supreme Court or the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council; and I entirely agree with the opinion expressed by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) and the quotation he gave us of Lord Loreburn's opinion. Of course, no decision of the Supreme court nor of the Privy Council could abridge the right of this parliament to do justice or injustice, to maintain its engagements or to violate them. Parliament is supreme. But rightly or wrongly after the discussion of last year, or rather after the divergence of view which developed around this question, the government decided to consult the Supreme court. For what purpose? For the enlightenment of parliament in order to make it clear whether a certain section of a certain act of this parliament is intra or ultra vires. We could decide right at once that it is intra or ultra vires, but that would not prevent any individual or group of individuals in the future challenging its validity. Just as we are supreme in deciding what we should do, the courts are also supreme in deciding whether we have acted constitutionally or not. Therefore the question before the Supreme court is, first, one that may affect the rights of all citizens, present and future, who may be interested in the question at issue; and, second, it is one which affects, I think, the right of this parliament to receive the benefit of that opinion of the Supreme court. If the member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) thinks the government was wrong in making that reference to the court, of course he has a way open to him in the suggestion of the hon. member for West Calgary; let him bring a motion of censure against the government. But there I disagree with the member from Toronto who last spoke.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): May I ask a question?

Mr. BOURASSA: Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Suppose I did that, the question being still before the Supreme court, would I not be precluded from referring to or arguing the point?

Mr. BOURASSA: As far as I am concerned I do not know, but the hon. member would certainly not be embarrassed in anything he might say blaming the government for its attitude upon that question. It would again be for the Speaker to decide whether the debate might not infringe upon the rule or the practice. But, I repeat, I think the application of that rule or of that practice is of advantage to parliament. Of course, it can be abused by a government—everything can be abused—but the right exists. Nobody challenges the right of a government to refer a question for enlightenment to the highest tribunals of the land. No one questions the right of this parliament to ask for opinions. Every day in committees of this House we ask for expert opinion. When we call upon engineers to come before committees, when we refer a question to a committee in order to get expert advice, we do not abandon our sovereign authority—

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but may I have your ruling? The hon. gentleman is indulging himself, as he always does, in a speech that, I submit, has not any reference to the point of order before the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: On the contrary, for a layman, I think the hon. member for Labelle is making a very good argument and one bearing on the question of order. In my view his remarks are distinctly on the point of order.

Mr. BOURASSA: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to be diverted by any personal argument. I disdain that. I have not received the kind of education that has been given my hon. friend and I will not follow him. I was making the comparison to demonstrate by analogy that when parliament refers any question, which beyond any doubt is under its jurisdiction, to get expert advice, it owes it to itself to wait until it has received that expert advice before forming its judgment. You refer certain questions to a body of engineers in order to enlighten yourselves as to certain public works; you refer certain other questions to accountants in order to find out what are the merits of a certain contract involving a large expenditure of money; would you be abdicating your right as a sovereign parliament if you waited until you had received that expert advice before you passed any legislation? Or do you want to put yourselves in the position of saying: We are not only supreme, we are infallible?

But at the same time we have to admit that the tribunals exist to decide whether or not our legislation is within our jurisdiction. We all have to admit that. Many pieces of federal or provincial legislation have been set aside by decisions of various tribunals. Did that mean that this parliament or that provincial legislature had abdicated its jurisdiction? I do not think so. I think that is the point, and the most interesting point from the parliamentary point of view. Of course, with regard to litigants I quite admit that this question cannot be compared with the intervention of parliament in a question which may affect the immediate right of one or more individuals before the courts to have certain things adjudicated.

But I think it is still more important whether or not we shall oppose the decision of the government to submit this question to the Supreme court in order to receive the enlightenment that we may be in need of not to commit an injustice or not to pass any legislation which may be in its turn ultra vires. It may be that with the intention of doing the right thing either by the province or by the minority we would again pass legislation that might be challenged. Now that the question is before the Supreme court in order to decide whether or not what we did twenty-two years ago is intra vires, I think before we do something else connected with this we should clear the decks with regard to that basic question at issue. After that it will be for the House to take its full responsibility to accept or reject the opinion of the Supreme court in so far as we can deal with those natural resources. That is an entirely different question from that raised before the Supreme court. In that I agree with the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), but the way in which the motion is before us, I think, clearly puts us in this position, that we pronounce ourselves upon a question intimately connected with one now before the Supreme court.

Mr. HOCKEN: May I put a question to my hon. friend before he sits down?

Mr. BOURASSA: Certainly.

Mr. HOCKEN: He and some other hon. members have advised the hon member for Frontenac as an alternative to the motion now before the House to introduce a motion censuring the government for submitting this question to the Supreme court. Now, the cabinet when in doubt surely has a right to ask the court for its interpretation of a statute. So that if my hon. friend put his motion in that form he would have no ground to debate the question in the House, inasmuch as he would be attacking the government for doing something which he would have to admit they have a perfect right to do.

[Mr. Bourassa.]

Mr. BOURASSA: Then if the government was right in referring the question to the Supreme court, the House would be wrong in not awaiting the outcome of the proceeding.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Leader of the Opposition): I have just a word to add, strictly in regard to the point of order. I doubt very much whether this question is now before the Supreme court in such a way as to preclude discussion of it in this House on the present motion. I doubt the right or the propriety of any government to refer a hypothetical question for the adjudication or the opinion of the court for the purpose of preventing discussion, or with that end in view. The rule in regard to the discussion in parliament of matters which are pending in the courts was established for the protection of litigants in order that their rights might not be prejudiced in any way. So far as I can ascertain, there is no other reason for the rule, and it was never intended to apply to hypothetical questions. If the government can submit of its own motion such a question for the opinion of the court and thereby preclude its discussion in parliament, as it seeks to do in this instance, why can it not, on the question of maritime rights for example, submit a question for the opinion of the court and thus avoid discussion of it in the House for the remainder of the session? No one is asking the government to do so. There is no litigation on the subject. There are no litigants involved in the matter, and such a reference would be on a purely hypothetical question on motion of the government. But if the discussion of this subject is out of order by reason of the reference to the court of a hypothetical question, so would the discussion of the Duncan report be out of order and the session would conclude without any word upon that subject having been spoken. If any awkward or embarrassing question came up in the House at any time, the government of its own motion would need only to frame a hypothetical question and submit it to the court and parliament's hands would be tied. We could not discuss the subject. I am satisfied that our common sense will convince us that these rules must have reasonable application; indeed, they were founded in common sense. And this particular rule was intended to benefit and protect litigants whose causes might be pending in the courts. What application has it to a case of this kind? I must say that at first I had some doubt on the subject. I consulted the authorities in so far as I was able to find any. But applying our own common sense to the situation, I submit that the reference of this question in the form in which it is referred, where the rights of the individuals are not involved and where the judgment, no matter what it may be, cannot be binding on this parliament—for we can act not withstanding it—should not preclude us from a full discussion of the motion as presented to-day. I cannot come to any other conclusion on the point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Prior to the introduction of the motion this afternoon I had an opportunity of carefully examining this matter, and I am glad to have had the benefit of the opinion of the House on both sides. The question, I admit, is somewhat involved; yet taking, as I generally do, the English language as it is written and spoken I find it perfectly clear and simple. And I think it is a great compliment to the English language to say that it is simple. Now I consult the best British authorities on a subject of this nature, and I govern myself accordingly. One hon. gentleman, the genial member for South Ontario, asked a very pertinent question: "Under what rule, Mr. Speaker, would you declare this motion out of order?" There is no rule in the Canadian House by which we may be governed in the matter, but if the hon. member will refer to rule 1, citing the "procedure in unprovided cases", he will find the following:

In all cases not provided for hereinafter or by sessional or other orders, the rules, usages and forms of proceeding of the House of Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in force on the first day of July, 1867, shall be followed.

When, therefore, we have no rule applicable to a case arising in the course of debate in the Canadian House of Commons we govern ourselves by the British practice. And it has happened many times during my term of office as Speaker that I have had recourse to the practice in the British parliament.

Before ruling on this point of order I may perhaps make this prefatory statement. A resolution was introduced last year by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and later on a reference was ordered by the government to the Supreme Court of Canada of the question involved in that resolution. There is a statute authorizing the government to refer particular cases to the Supreme Court for adjudication or for the purpose of clearing any doubts that may exist as to the interpretation of any act of parliament. The reference, as I say, was made to the Supreme Court of Canada in the present instance, and parliament thereafter was dissolved. Some time ago, a question was put by an hon. member asking for a copy of that reference, the text of which was later on laid upon the table by the Minister of Justice. I shall read it and the House, listening to its terms, will realize just how the question stands at the present moment:

The Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report, dated 24th June, 1926, from the Minister of Justice, stating that as the result of certain negotiations looking to the transfer to the province of Alberta of the public lands within that province, now vested in the crown and administered by the government of Canada for the purposes of Canada, an agreement was entered into on the 9th January, 1926, between the governments of the Dominion of Canada and of the province of Alberta, respectively, whereby it was agreed that certain provisions of the Alberta Act should be modified to the intent that all crown lands, mines, minerals and royalties within the province, and sums due or payable for such lands, mines, minerals or royalties should, from and after the coming into force of the said agreement, belong to the province, subject to any trusts existing in respect thereof and to the several other terms and conditions particularly set forth in said agreement. Subsequently the two governments agreed upon certain additional provisions to be inserted in the said agreement relative to the transfer and administration of the school lands fund and certain specified school lands, to parks and forest reserves affected by the agreement, and to the rights and properties of the Hudson's Bay Company. Notice was given by a resolution that a bill would be introduced into parliament, at its present session, to approve and give effect to the said agreement as so modified, but a question having been raised as to the constitutional validity of section 17 of the Alberta Act, relative to the subject of education and schools within the said province, it was decided not to proceed with the proposed legislation as drafted until this question of doubt could be authoritatively settled.

The minister, therefore, recommends that the following question be referred by Your Excellency in Council to the Supreme Court of Canada for hearing and consideration, pursuant to section 60 of the Supreme Court Act:—

Is section 17 of the Alberta act, in whole or in part, ultra vires of the parliament of Canada, and, if so, in what particular or particulars?

The committee concur in the foregoing recommendation and submit the same for approval.

That is the question referred to the Privy Council. Then the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is in the general interest of this Dominion that their natural resources should be transferred to the prairie provinces at the earliest possible moment and that such transfer should not interfere with, restrict or modify the right of the said provinces to complete control of their educational or other local affairs.

There again are two questions, the question of the transfer of lands and the question of control of education. The hon. member stated a moment ago that his motion as drafted was general in its terms, and concluded from that that as the other motion only affected one province and his motion dealt with the three prairie provinces, there was no analogy between the two cases. There is a good old rule of logic which says that the general includes the particular; there are only three prairie provinces, so what affects one with regard to the transfer of natural resources and educational powers affects the others unless there are special statutes governing the other provinces.

What do we find in Bourinot? At page 301 we have the following:

> A matter which is under adjudication by a court of law cannot be brought before the House by motion or otherwise.

Bourinot does not state, as the leader of the opposition said a moment ago, that the matter before the court must be one which would affect an individual, in connection which any discussion might abridge or prejudice any rights he might have.

Bourinot makes no such distinction. Whether an individual or a collectivity of individuals is before the court, the case is not altered. The rule is that when a matter is under adjudication by a court of law, whether it affects an individual or a collectivity of individuals, whether it affects one man or one province, it cannot be brought before the House by motion or otherwise. In this connection May says, at page 323:

> Matters awaiting the adjudication of a court of law should not be brought forward in debate. This rule was observed by Sir Robert Peel and Lord John Russell, both by the wording of the speech from the throne and by their procedure in the House regarding Mr. O'Connell's case, and has been maintained by rulings from the chair.

Redlich, at page 59 of volume 3, says:

> Nothing has been done to weaken the force of another rule of a similar kind, that no reference must be made in debate to matters before the courts of law in some pending litigation.

And Beauchesne says, in par. 234 under rule 19:

> Besides the prohibitions contained in this rule, it has been sanctioned by usage both in England and in Canada, that a member, while speaking, must not refer to any matter on which a judicial decision is pending.

The hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) referred a moment ago to past parliamentary experience. I remember a case in point which I am sure will be recalled by the leader of the opposition as well. Some years ago, after a Dominion census, the representation of the maritime provinces as well as that of Ontario was reduced, affecting the maritime provinces to a greater extent. That result raised a storm in the maritime provinces, because they felt rather aggrieved in view of that reduction. The matter was brought up in the House, and as a doubt was expressed with regard to the terms of the compact at the time of confederation, since which time the boundaries of Ontario and Quebec were enlarged and the other new provinces of the west came into existence, the government of the day decided to refer the matter to the Supreme court from where it went to the Privy Council. I had the honour to represent the Department of Justice in a minor capacity as Solicitor General and had with me as counsel Mr. Justice Newcombe and Mr. Edward Blake. If I remember well, during the session of parliament, while the case was pending, a member representing one of the counties in the maritimes brought up the question in order to give vent to the grievances of his province. The point was raised that the matter was then pending before the courts, and that point of order was sustained. I cannot cite the exact dates, but the occurrence is quite within my memory, and that is a case in point.

Under these circumstances I must declare the present motion out of order, because it refers to a matter which is sub judice, awaiting adjudication before the courts of the land, and I so rule.

NATURAL RESOURCES—ALBERTA

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest) moved:

> That, in the opinion of this House, in the best interest of confederation, the time has now arrived in view of the proper economic development of western Canada, when the province of Alberta should be given its natural resources free of restrictions.

Mr. SPEAKER: The same ruling applies in the present case. The ruling is not debatable, but the hon. gentleman has the privilege of discussing the point of order.

Mr. CHURCH: With all due deference to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out that this resolution is not the same as the one just disposed of. My resolution contains a declaration of policy; it does not deal with matters of law at all. This is supposed to be a free parliament under the British constitution, and we should be perfectly free to discuss such public questions as these. This is a British country and one of the cardinal principles of the British constitution is that the courts are subservient to the legislature. May I point out that the subject matter of my resolution was introduced in the speech from the throne at the last session of parliament when it was declared that its natural resources would be handed back to Alberta. There has never been any doubt as to the validity of either the Alberta or the Saskatchewan Acts of 1905, at present neither the province of Alberta nor the government of Canada question the validity of the Alberta Act of 1905 or of clause 17. While litigation was pending before the Privy Council re the Industrial Disputes Act in 1924, an act was passed amending it and signed by the Governor General. At that very time litigation was in progress between the hydro-electric commission and the federal government and an appeal was argued before the Privy Council after this parliament had prorogued. I think every member owes a duty to his constituents which is paramount, and therefore is entitled to bring forward questions of this character, if this is a free parliament. I have great respect for the ruling of the Chair, but if the ruling in this instance was sound it would be open to the government of the day to refer to the courts any question which it did not wish to have discussed by parliament. Every member has an inherent right to discuss public questions on the floor of parliament, and in contesting your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I think I am asserting a great principle of provincial rights. It has been admitted here, as well as by the Department of Justice, that the validity of clause 17 of the Alberta Act is not in dispute. The Minister of the Interior also informed the House that neither the federal nor the provincial authorities were contesting its validity. The Autonomy Acts of 1905 have stood the test of time. They were passed after six months' discussion in parliament, and there were no less than twenty divisions. Some of these divisions related to litigation and to rulings given by the courts of this country and by the Privy Council. Each of the western provinces when it entered confederation had a school system of its own manufacture, and clause 17 which was made applicable to them was taken from the old Northwest Territories Act. The act has been on the statute books for over twenty years and the validity until recently was never disputed until some implied doubts were expressed by some unknown persons to the Minister of Justice.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think the hon. gentleman has raised any new point. I have already ruled that his resolution is substantially the same as the one which has already been pronounced out of order. Therefore the hon. member may not proceed; he is not in order.

Mr. CHURCH: The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) was permitted to debate for half an hour all phases of the subject to-day and the policy involved.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order. A ruling of the chair is not debatable.

Mr. CHURCH: Then I will appeal from your ruling to the House, Mr. Speaker, with all due deference. I think that in doing so I am asserting a great principle and asserting the rights and privileges of a member and a duty to my constituents.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Mr. Church moves, seconded by—who seconds the motion?

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. McGregor will second it.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is moved by Mr. Church, seconded by Mr. McGregor—

Mr. McGREGOR: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has no seconder.

Mr. CHURCH: My seconder Mr. Garland went out, I can give the name of an hon. member in a minute. You allowed, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Labelle last session, a few moments to find a seconder and to redraft his motion. I ask any of the Toronto members present to second my motion. I ask Mr. Matthews or Mr. Anderson or Mr. Geary or Mr. Spence to second it. It is only a matter of courtesy to second it.

Mr. SPEAKER: There being no seconder to the motion, and the motion itself having been declared out of order, the House will proceed to the next item of business.

NATIONAL COAL POLICY

PROPOSALS AS TO SUPPLY, TARIFF AND TOLLS

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the time has arrived for Canada to have a national policy in relation to its coal supply and that no part of Canada should be left dependent on United States for such supply.

That, the government should immediately consider the initiation of an all British and Canadian coal supply, and that such a policy is both a social and economic necessity and in the best interests of the future of Canada.

That, the government should consider the advisability of placing a duty on coal from the United States to insure an all British supply for Canada and thus afford adequate protection to coal mined and coked under the British flag.

That, whereas coal is a necessity in effect equal to that of food, the government should consider the advisability of having it carried on a preferential toll basis by the railways on the same basis as grain and flour, and of granting subsidies and subventions to this industry.

Mr. DUNNING: As you read the motion, Mr. Speaker, it was not as it appears on the order paper.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the sitting opened I made some representations to the hon. gentleman to the effect that his motion was against the rules in so far as it committed the House, to begin with, to a tariff policy, and in the second place to certain freight rates. In consequence the hon. member agreed to amend his motion. It is quite customary to amend resolutions of which hon. members have given notice so as to conform with the rules of the House.

Mr. DUNNING: Could we be supplied with copies of the amended resolution?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes. I may say that the change made was to the effect that the government should consider the advisability of carrying out the policy recommended. This had the effect of imparting to the resolution an abstract character.

Mr. CHURCH: The subject of this resolution has been before the House now for six sessions. It urges the adoption of a national coal policy. It has never been possible to make any headway with the matter because we are so hemmed in by rules and regulations derived from the middle ages that it is practically impossible to make any headway in solving the economic problems of this country. What we want at the present time is a Mussolini to try and solve some of these problems.

In my opinion we have the most impractical form of government of any country in the civilized world. It is impossible to make any headway in Canada to solve economic problems and give relief. We have spent $2,000,000,000 on a national railway and a merchant marine, and to-day we are absolutely at the mercy of a foreign country for our fuel supplies. When every pound of coal we use can be mined and coked under the British flag, whether it be from Wales or the maritime provinces or Alberta, we have a ready market for United States coal foisted upon the people of this country by the directors of the Canadian National Railways who are entirely responsible for their failure to solve this problem.

I do not see the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) in the chamber to-day. He is the understudy, I might say, of the head of this system. After all is said and done, the coal question is 95 per cent a transportation problem, and after all these expenditures on a national railway and a merchant marine we find that we might just as well own nothing when the question comes to solving any of the economic problems of the country.

The first clause of the resolution reads:

That, in the opinion of this House, the time has arrived for Canada to have a national policy in relation to its coal supply and that no part of Canada should be left dependent on United States for such supply.

This principle has been adopted for six sessions by this House and nothing has been done by the government to give effect to it. The second clause reads:

That the government should immediately consider the initiation of an all British and Canadian coal supply, and that such a policy is both a social and economic necessity and in the best interests of the future of Canada.

This clause has been adopted now five or six times for this House and never carried out. The third clause reads:

That, the government should consider the advisability of placing a duty on coal from the United States to insure an all British supply for Canada and thus afford adequate protection to coal mined and coked under the British flag.

This clause of the resolution was adopted but never carried out. The only way in which this question can be solved is by adequate protection for coal mined in Alberta, the maritime provinces and Wales. The four native industries of Canada are the mining industry, the fisheries, agriculture and lumber, and they can be placed on their feet in this country only by a proper application of the gospel of protection, namely subsidies or subventions and bonuses. Although I come from the protectionist province of Ontario which votes Conservative, every time a resolution of this importance comes before the House we find that a large number of the members from that province absent themselves from the chamber. It is all very well to get up and support our national coal policy in the cities and towns of the province when the elections are on; but when they come to Ottawa—oh! what a difference to try and get action.

What is suggested in this resolution is that the principle of protection, subsidies, bonuses and subventions, should be applied to solve the problem of the coal industry in the maritime provinces and Alberta. The fourth clause of the resolution reads:

That, whereas coal is a necessity in effect equal to that of food, the government should consider the advisability of having it carried on a preferential toll basis by the railways on the same basis as grain and flour, and of granting subsidies and subventions to this industry.

This has been approved by two premiers, the premiers of Alberta and Ontario, and the problem will never be solved in any other way than by the gospel of protection. The United States could starve this country out of fuel in one winter. During a coal strike we are absolutely at the mercy of the people of the United States for a pound of coal. During one of the coal strikes in that country, Canada was exhibited to the people of the United States as a Lazarus sitting around the coal sidings of the United States railways begging for a few lumps of coal. That was a humiliating position for the people of this country to be in, and after we have spent $2,000,000,000 on railways we find the directors of the Canadian National Railways to-day folding their arms and saying that they will have practically nothing to do with the matter. If there were anything to test the size and ability of the Minister of Railways to administer his department it would be his ability to solve this matter which has been made a political football of by the directors of the national railways, by the railway commission, by the Minister of Railways and the government generally. This question has been referred to the railway commission. I am surprised that Your Honour has not ruled this motion out of order also on the ground that the question is before the judiciary. Any matter is not to be discussed here if sub judice before a police magistrate, a judge or court of record. The courts might as well take parliament's duties over. Is this a free parliament or is it not? Are we to sit here like a lot of rubber stamps for the directors of the national railways and have our front benchers run out of the chamber whenever an economic question like this comes up for solution? What are we sitting here for? Why are we elected? Do the people or the courts or the railway commission rule in this country? A year ago the minister said in this House that he would refer this question to the railway commission. What happened to the application? They made a political football out of it. They killed a whole year's time. They declined to give a hearing until a week ago. The Premier of Ontario had lawyers before the commission for the past year, and the Premier of Alberta also had lawyers before the commission. A proper application had been made but the railway commission fell down. The government of this country should reorganize that commission in the public interest, so that whenever a reference is made by the high court of parliament a special sitting of that commission should be held a week after the reference is received and it should take precedence over all other business. They should have heard the application of Ontario and Alberta and given a decision.

The national railways should agree to carry coal for $7 a ton. I am not criticising Sir Henry Thornton personally, but his action in coming over here and practically telling the people that, as regards the coal problem, they can stew in their own juice and that, so far as he is concerned, we can continue to buy coal in Alberta and pay the freight rate of $9 a ton. He might as well have said $22 a ton, because it would be just as prohibitive. The directors of the national railways are content that we should depend upon the United States and American coal barons for our coal supply. They are willing to see Canada continue in the future as it has done in the past to be virtually a Lazarus sitting at the feet of the Pennsylvania railways and coal barons waiting for a few lumps of coal. You will never get this question solved as long as the present board of directors are in office, as long as the present Minister of Railways is in office or as long as the present railway commission is in office. The Minister of Railways to-day has all his powers taken away from him by legislation. He has practically no functions, no duties to perform except to act as an understudy for Sir Henry Thornton and the directors of the Canadian National Railways, to introduce what bills they hand to him and to administer the affairs of the Newmarket canal and the Trent canal. The great powers that were in the hands of the Minister of Railways in the past have been transferred to the railway commission. The administration of the Intercolonial, the Grand Trunk, the Grand Trunk Pacific, and the other railways, has been taken from him and handed over to Sir Henry Thornton, and the board of directors of the national railways. The portfolio of railways, so far as any active functions are concerned might just as well be abolished.

What did Mr. Carvell, the late chairman of the railway commission say? He said practically that he did not believe the railway commission had any jurisdiction in view of the new Canadian National Railways acts, over the component parts of the Canadian National Railways or over that system. It is no wonder that even some of the good Liberals and Liberal papers are getting tired. The Globe, George Brown's own paper, is a good Liberal paper and it has not deserted the Liberal party. It is the Liberal party that has deserted the principles of George Brown and the Globe. The Globe, which for years was and is the backbone of the Liberal party in Ontario, had this to say last Saturday:

Trifling with the Coal Rates

It is a year since the order in council was passed calling for a hearing by the Dominion railway board on the question of freight rates on coal from Alberta to central Canada. When at last the case came up on Thursday it developed that the parties interested did not have necessary statistics prepared. Adjournment had to be taken until June 7. If at that time a favorable rate is granted, coal from the western mines cannot be moved east before February of next year, which means two years from the date of the order in council. Thus the ponderous machinery of rate investigation drags itself along.

Possibly it has not been forgotten that an insistent demand for Alberta coal arose in Ontario during the course of the United States anthracite strike, when a temporary rate of nine dollars a ton was allowed. This, the railway experts contended at the time, was an irreducible minimum. There was no doubt in their minds about it. Presumably they were speaking from knowledge of statistics. Both Alberta and Ontario disputed the figures, but the railwaymen stood pat. Yet on Thursday representatives of both the C.P.R. and C.N.R. revealed the fact that they had no data available from which to present arguments, and that the necessary information could not be compiled in less than two months.

Did hon. members ever hear of such a thing, that in two years they were not able to compile the figures?

This looks pretty much like trifling with the whole question. Granted that the general freight rates question occupied much time, could not the railways have been prepared to meet the provincial representatives on Thursday if they were really anxious to do so? Are they of the opinion that delays and adjournments will push the coal question into the background until another strike brigs it to the fore? There seems no good reason for this, nor is there any reason for believing that the interested provinces are going to let the matter drop until they know what it should cost to lay western coal down in this province. The consumers here want to know, and the dealers want to know. If the cost is satisfactory it will be good business for the country to have this outlet for the Alberta product. Would it not be equally good business for the railways?

I say, Mr. Speaker, that the railway commission has allowed the two railways to trifle with the situation. For the past five or six years we have had a select committee of the House endeavouring to deal with the situation. They took the evidence of experts, and made their report to the high court of parliament, which showed that the seven dollar rate or less was a fair one, and practically no objection was raised to it. Now here we have a railway on which two billion dollars were spent, and we have special trains and private cars running all over the country, and thousands of cars sometimes empty at the head of the lakes in the slack season and we have very few cars operating between Alberta and Ontario to carry coal. Now, what is the position in Canada? The people of this country are looking for a Mussolini to arise in Canada and to solve some of our economic problems. I will read to the House what Mussolini has said:

[Mr. Church.]

My colleagues in the cabinet and the under-secretaries of states know that the government business must be handled with enthusiasm and promptitude. Our work must be intensive and productive. They know my requirements in this regard. They know that they cannot approach me unless their mission is one of government business. There is no time to joke. Everything must be to the point and must be worth discussing. Each usually has his business well-defined, and when he sees me, need stay but a few minutes. They have acquired skill in condensation which enables me to go quickly to the matter in hand and to settle it.

I am fortunately blessed with a faculty for quick decision which permits me to accomplish an immense amount of work. I cannot stand vacillating and procrastinating executives. Ministers of a professional type are useless as administrators. They take so much time for decision that the whole business of their department is delayed. This cannot be tolerated in any branch of my government. Ministers, before we came into power, deliberated and vacillated for years before putting into operation. We have created an aptitude for quick decision in our public affairs which, coupled with our intensive efforts, has achieved things not dreamed of before our advent to power.

Another paragraph in his remarks reads as follows:

We have settled our debts with England and America, stiffened Italian finance, strengthened the lira and now have consolidated the public debt by the launching of the Lictoral loan. For our sea commerce we built the Roma, the biggest ship in the Mediterranean service, and will build two new liners, Rex and Dux, the fastest in the world, 40 knots an hour, taking only four to five days from Italy to New York and seven to Buenos Aires.

Fascism constructed in two years the Rome-Ostia electric line, a project planned for twenty years, designed to give the people of Rome access to their own seashore. Fascism constructed the Apulia aqueduct to supply forty communes with an aggregate population of 3,000,000 with water; is building the longest tunnel in the world between Florence and Bologna—15 miles long—is completing the Rome to Naples direct line to reduce the running time by one-half, and undertaking numerous projects to be brought to successful consummation under Fascist initiative and drive.

He goes on to point out:

Government, to be good, must be efficient. It must achieve the greatest net result with the minimum of lost effort. If there be wastage of labour, duplication, overlapping or lack of co-ordination, then there are serious defects in the government machinery. There must be unity of policy, unity of responsibility and unity of direction. Without these, government becomes a slipshod, haphazard, hit-or-miss business, able to continue only because it can demand tribute from the entire nation.

A private business must be efficient or die. It has no reserve on which to call unless it has created that reserve itself. It must sustain itself by its own merits. Its manager must avoid wastage, duplication, overlapping and must co-ordinate all the parts of his organization in a smooth-running machine. He is responsible and held to strict account for its success. He directs it with a single aim and single policy, his policy.

That is what this country wants to-day—a modern Mussolini. We require efficient men to manage our railways. People have put their money into the country and into the railways, and we want a board of directors who will not build up Canada for Americans, but will build up the country for Canadians. I have criticised the board of directors of that railway and the Minister of Railways in regard to the management of the concern and their failure to carry out parliament's orders to initiate a national coal supply.

Then we have had a committee of this hon. House which took hundreds of pages of evidence on the coal question every session, and what have they done? Have the railway commission carried out the orders of parliament? Parliament has adopted a resolution on four or five different occasions for a national coal supply. Has the board of directors of the railway given effect to it? Has the railway commission carried it out? Have they done anything to put in the seven dollar rate? No. They have carried grain and flour at a few cents a bushel, under the Crowsnest pass tolls, but when it comes to giving a rate for coal they decline to give it, and they make this question a political football. A day of reckoning to the railway commission is coming and also a day of reckoning for the board of directors of the Canadian National Railway.

I have here a letter from William Buchanan, a coal merchant of London. He has been reading statements in the press about the movement to establish coking plants for Canadian coal. He says that there are several coking plants in Canada, but very few of them are using their own coal. He also states that he is willing to put up a bond of $30,000 to guarantee the payment of all freight charges and the cost of all coal ordered from the province of Alberta. He says:

> This coal would be bought and sold by me and I would guarantee the quality of same and also the service to be the very best.

He sold 5,000 tons of Alberta coal in the London district and says it is good material.

I observe my hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland) is present. He has taken an active part in this matter and I want to thank him and the representatives from Alberta for their assistance in this matter. I do not say it is the fault of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart). He had tried to do his part, but he has been handicapped, and by whom? By the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways. Sir Henry Thornton and his directors are content to have the people of this country hewers of wood and drawers of water for the Pennsylvania coal barons. The Canadian National Railways might as well have fixed twenty dollars a ton instead of nine, because nothing has been carried at the nine dollar rate lately.

I do not expect the government of to-day will do anything. They will do nothing. I have brought up this matter several times, and as long as I am in this chamber I will present the matter to parliament. The province of Ontario's application has been made a football of by the government. The Canadian National Railways have sold our merchant marine ships which cost a million and a half for a few thousand dollars. Many of these ships could be utilized for five months of the year. They could be converted into lake and ocean carriers. They could have brought coal from Wales as they brought it from the maritimes. They have brought 560,000 tons of coal from Wales and the maritimes this past season into the port of Montreal to save that port from a coal famine. I contend that if the board of directors of the National railways had any conception of their duty they would utilize those ships to bring coal past Montreal up to the head of the lakes. The national railways, in its turn, should have done its part to help the people of Alberta send their coal to Ontario and central Canada. The people of Ontario want Alberta coal. A united effort would result in mutual benefit to the people of both provinces. The Ontario government has had its representatives before the railway commission in an attempt to get the commission to deal with the subject for a year. I think it is the duty of the Minister of Railways to instruct the chairman of that commission that they hold sittings forthwith from day to day to hear the evidence which has been taken before the coal committee of this House and find a solution for this particular problem.

I have almost given up hope of getting anything practical accomplished in this country. Notwithstanding our various legislatures we are not a practical people. I believe the Canadian people are the most impractical in the world—except in time of war. You can mobilize the transportation system of the country in time of war. Why cannot you do it in time of peace? Simply because this parliament seems to have no jurisdiction over the president and management of the Canadian National Railways, who are in law and fact beyond our control evidently.

In solving this problem I think we can apply the principle of protection as did Mr. Stanley Baldwin to put the native industry of the old country on its feet. He applied there the principle of bonuses and subventions. I think a transportation rate of from $6 to $6.50 a ton in trainload lots should be given by the Canadian National railways. This should not be charged, or any part of it, to the provincial governments of Ontario and Alberta. This House very readily voted $35,000,000 to bondholders of the Grand Trunk Pacific without requiring them to prove their claims in the Exchequer court; we ignored the Exchequer court and the railway commission; but when it comes to giving a subvention of a few thousand dollars, oh my, what a difference!

This is the case in a nutshell. Are the people of Canada after all these expenditures on railways and on our government merchant marine to be hewers of wood and drawers of water for the coal millionaires of Pennsylvania? You will never solve this problem until you take it out of the hands of the railway commission and Sir Henry Thornton and have parliament compel the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways to give a proper rate for the transportation of this particular commodity. Parliament should amend the Railway Act. There should be special rates granted for the movement of coal just as there are for the movement of grain and flour. I am glad that I have a new supporter for my views of the past six years in the person of the Premier of Ontario, Mr. Ferguson. I am very glad to have his support for the policy of protecting our four great basic industries—mining, lumbering, agriculture and fishing—and that they should be given preferential rates on our railways. This is not the first time that the railways have given preferential treatment to certain commodities. Notwithstanding what the Minister of Railways said the other night, I can prove every statement I have made. I proved everything last June before Sir Henry Thornton in the committee on railways and shipping.

The minister made statements the other night here which he cannot back up. I never referred to the Chateau; I did to the Vancouver hotel. I referred to special tolls and special rates on certain basic products. I challenge a searching inquiry into this whole railway. When the railway commission has fallen down it should be reorganized, and if the board of directors of the national railways cannot solve this problem, the sooner we have a new board of directors the better.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me say that I am very much disappointed that nothing has been done in the past twelve months. Notwithstanding that this is the most important problem before us to-day we are just in the same position as we were two or three years ago.

Mr. HAY: Might I ask the hon. gentleman a question for information? He has dealt with the matter largely as applying to the Canadian National Railways. I wonder if he has any figures of the tonnage drawn by the competitive transcontinental line, the Canadian Pacific? It would be interesting to the House to know the relative tonnage of coal drawn by these two roads from eastern and western Canada to Ontario.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): Mr. Speaker, this is a hardy annual, and we are indebted to the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) for its periodical introduction. I think his resolution would have been better worded had he made it apply to the railway commission. A national coal policy is a very vital question, and I may point out to the House that the government has given it a great deal of thought and in 1922 appointed a board to study it. That board has been doing so almost continuously since that time with a view frankly to avoid the imposition of a duty, as suggested by my hon. friend. I may say that he did not hold that opinion at one time, as quotations from Hansard will show. It was felt, just as my hon. friend has stated, that as coal was as important as bread to the consumers of this country, no undue disability should be placed upon it to enhance its price. Not only that, but the most earnest advocates of the bringing of coal from Alberta have never asked that any subvention be applied towards the cost of its haulage, but rather that the real cost of the transportation of this commodity be ascertained and that a rate based on that cost be applied over the two railway systems, the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National.

Now, as I say, we have made some study of the question, and my further remarks will diverge somewhat from the clear definition of the motion itself, nevertheless I think it important that they should be put on Hansard for the information of every member of the House of Commons who is interested in this question. For that purpose I have prepared the following statement:

In dealing with the question raised by the hon. member for Toronto Northwest, it is necessary that consideration be given to certain fundamental facts which more or less control the situation as it exists in Canada to-day. It is evident to all who have studied the political and economic geography of the world that nature has not distributed her resources in raw materials in such a way as to meet the needs of all the nations of the earth or to fully meet their economic requirements. That condition prevails in regard to food supplies, forest resources, mineral resources and all other raw materials. In other words, no nation is so bountifully provided by nature with all raw materials to the extent that she is entirely self-supporting and independent of all other nations.

The political boundaries of most countries were defined long ago; long before the demand for raw materials became as acute as it is to-day. These boundaries were defined to conform to physical features and on account of consideration of national defence rather than with the object of embracing supplies of those raw materials that have now become so essential to the economic life of a people. And when you get this more or less accidental location of international boundaries combined with the extremely sporadic distribution of raw materials you get a condition which is the cause of uneasiness and even alarm among those nations lacking certain essential resources.

We see this condition very well exemplified in the case of minerals. In all cases the distribution of mineral resources over the face of the earth is extremely erratic. In some cases the occurrence of important mineral supplies is so limited as to constitute natural national monopolies of that mineral.

Take the case of nickel—a highly important industrial metal. We find nickel only in Canada and in New Caledonia, but such a large share of the nickel resources lies in Canada that we practically have a national monopoly of that mineral. Chile had a monopoly on nitrate supplies until the discovery was made that nitrogen could be obtained from the air. Potash, another important mineral used as a fertilizer, occurs mainly in Germany and Alsace; asbestos in Canada and Rhodesia; mercury only in Spain, and so on.

When we come to coal supplies we find the conditions somewhat better, for nature has been more generous in distributing her coal resources over the face of the earth. Even in this resource—one which is perhaps the most important of all mineral resources—we find this condition, namely, the United States with fifty per cent of the world supply, China with about thirteen per cent, Canada with about seventeen per cent and the whole of the rest of the world with the small balance remaining. We find also many countries, some of them highly developed industrially, with little or no coal resources at all. Norway, Sweden, Finland, several of the African and most of the South American countries have no coal resources at all and such countries as Italy, Spain and other European countries are largely dependent upon outside sources of supply.

The result of this condition is that no country, with the exception of Great Britain and possibly Germany is wholly independent of foreign sources of coal supply. Even the United States with fifty per cent of the world supply imports a considerable quantity of coal from Canada into the northwestern states, and Australian coal is marketed in California. This condition, namely, the erratic distribution of coal fields is the root of the coal problem of Canada.

The question of how to overcome the irregular distribution of raw materials has been considered by the economists of many nations and has been raised and discussed by the League of Nations in Geneva. A committee of the league, after giving careful consideration to the various aspects of this situation, has come to the conclusion that the most feasible means of overcoming the disabilities under which various nations labour through lack of supplies of essential raw materials is by the adoption of complete free trade in all these materials. They recognize, however, the difficulties in the way of persuading all nations to adopt this policy, particularly those nations most favoured by nature with an abundance of these materials.

If we look at the coal situation of the world we find that three countries dominate the coal trade, namely, United States, Great Britain and Germany, because the great producing coalfields of the world are situated within their boundaries. They produce normally over 80 per cent of the total world production and, in addition to being the chief consuming countries, they are the countries having the largest exportable surplus. The chief deficit countries, on the other hand, are France, Italy, Holland, Switzerland, Austria, Spain and the Scandinivian countries on the east of the Atlantic; and Canada, Brazil, Argentine and other South American states on the other side. Of the exporting countries

Germany normally dominated the land trade of central Europe, while British coal controlled the maritime trade of the Atlantic, providing fuel for the countries bordering the North Sea, Baltic, Mediterranean and the Atlantic coasts of Spain and France. A small trade is done with the South American countries. United States sends the major portion of her exportable surplus to Canada and the remainder goes to Central and South America and only a small portion crosses the Atlantic, mainly to Italy.

Such are the broad features of coal production and movement in the world. If we were to go into the question of the zones controlled by the different producing fields we would find that the controlling factors for each field are:

(1) Geographical location,
(2) Cost of production, and
(3) Quality of coal.

Governed by these factors each field under normal conditions of trade has its own recognized and fairly well defined market and this market is determined not by proximity to the coal field, but primarily by the cost of transportation, and only to a minor extent by political boundaries. For example, under present freight rates, it costs no more to carry coal three thousand miles across the Atlantic than it does to transport it two hundred miles by rail over here. This is what gives Great Britain, whose coalfields are only a few miles from the sea, so much wider range for her coals than the United States whose coalfields are two hundred to four hundred miles from the sea. Fluctuation in costs of production, changes in transportation rates, or industrial disturbances, will cause some shifting of the zones controlled by each field, as was the case when American coal went to Great Britain during the strike of 1921 and again during the recent strike in 1926; and when British coal came to the United States in 1922. But unless substantial tariffs are applied against certain coals, political boundaries do not affect the shifting of the market zones.

A study of the coal trade of the world indicates clearly that except as it may be affected to a limited degree by tariff barriers, coal from each field moves freely into definite markets which are determined primarily by the cost of transportation, to some extent by cost of mining and the quality of coal, but only slightly by political boundaries.

An appreciation of this fact makes it easy to understand why we are importing coal from a foreign country when we have an abundance of our own. It is one of the consequences of the uneven distribution of the natural resources of the earth and of laying out political boundaries in defiance of natural conditions.

An inspection of the tariffs of the three largest coal-producing countries of the world shows that they place coal in the duty-free list. In the case of Great Britain and Germany there is no import duty on coal, and in the United States coal is in the duty-free list. but with a proviso that on coal coming from any country which levies a duty on United States coal an equal duty will be levied on coal imported into the United States from such country. For example, United States duty on Canadian coal is determined by the duty which Canada imposes on United States coal.

Although France is a deficit country as regards coal requirements there are in that country important coal mining industries. The French tariff of 1910, which is the basic tariff still in force, imposed a duty of 12 centimes per hundred kilogrammes on coal. With the exchange value of the franc at 19.3 cents Canadian money. which was its value in 1910, this was equivalent to about 25 cents Canadian money per metric ton of 2,240 pounds. The original rate of 12 centimes is now increased by a co-efficient of 1.7 making 20.4 centimes. With the franc at its present exchange value of four cents this is the equivalent of about eight cents per metric ton.

An instance of a high tariff on coal is found in Spain, a country whose coal requirements are not large. In the Spanish first tariff—higher tariff—there is a duty of 22.50 pesetas per metric ton on all grades of coal. The corresponding rate under the second tariff is 7.50 pesetas. These are gold pesetas. The equivalent in Canadian money per metric ton would be about $4.35 first tariff. and $1.45 second tariff. There is a conventional rate to England of four pesetas per metric ton on pit coal. that is, about 73 cents.

Italy, a fairly large importer of coal, imposes no duty. In Canada we admit anthracite, lignite and coke free of duty. The general tariff on bituminous coal. all grades, imposes an import duty of 50 cents per net ton. On bituminous coal imported for the manufacture of coke by operators of by-product coke ovens. a rebate of 99 per cent of the duty is allowed. Under the provisions of the British preferential tariff bituminous coal coming to Canada direct from those British countries or possessions admitted to the benefit of the British preferential tariff in Canada, is subject to an import duty of 35 cents per net ton. The intermediate tariff. which is a conventional tariff, provides for a duty of 45 cents per net ton on bituminous coal coming from countries to which the benefits of such intermediate tariff shall have been extended. Very little, if any, coal enters Canada under the provisions of this tariff.

A study of the underlying fundamentals of Canada's fuel problem takes us back a considerable number of years to the time when American anthracite was in the initial stages of being established as a staple household fuel in certain parts of Canada. As far back as 1880 we find that Canada was importing half a million tons a year of this coal. Although it was probably not recognized at that time that the seeds of an acute fuel problem had been sown, subsequent events prove that such was the case. As our population increased, importations of American anthracite into the cities and towns of central Canada had corresponding growth. The furnace equipment installed in the homes was adapted to the use of this coal, and considering the high degree of efficiency of anthracite as a household fuel, particularly when a better quality was coming into Canada than is the case to-day, it was only natural that the people using it became prejudiced in its favour. A large percentage of the population did so to the extent of believing it to be the only suitable fuel available for warming the home. The situation developed into one of dependency upon a single source of supply, and to accentuate the position this was a monopolistic source in a foreign country, although a very friendly one.

The coal strike in the United States coal fields in 1902-03 when supplies to Canada were interrupted was a serious warning to us of the precariousness of our fuel position. Then there were intermittent interruptions, though lesse serious, owing to freight embargoes and other transportation tie-ups in the United States, but it was the strike in the anthracite fields in 1922, synchronizing as it did with the railway shopmen's strike, that was the event that brought us to a true realization of our position. As an additional incentive for us to seek fuels that would replace American anthracite, unofficial intimation had been received from the United States Bureau of Mines that owing to the limited life of the Pennsylvania anthracite fields, Canada would have to work out her own solution for replacing the anthracite now imported from the United States. In recent years several bills have been introduced before the United States congress advocating an embargo on the export of anthracite to Canada. These did not pass, but they were an indication of growing uneasiness over the anthracite supplies in the United States.

Those were the events, in summary, which aroused public attention to the extent of making the subject one of national interest and which prompted the government to institute action leading to a sustained effort to satisfactorily solve this fuel problem.

We have also, in connection with our own coal mining industry, a number of problems relating to the industrial situation and to the distribution of Canadian coal. Some of these, however, are of local importance while others must be met and solved by the industry itself.

The coal industry of Vancouver island, for example, is faced with a problem brought about by the competition of cheap fuel oil from California, Mexico and Peru.

Alberta's problem is to extend her markets to absorb the production she is capable of making and so permit of more uniform production throughout the year. The capacity of her mines is estimated to be from ten to twelve million tons per year, while her present markets will absorb only about six million tons. It appears as if Alberta will have this problem with her always because of her enormous resources and the ease with which new mines can be opened. She will be constantly striving to secure new markets for the production she is capable of making unless steps are taken to prevent the opening up of new mines that are not necessary to supply existing demand. This is a problem arising out of a superabundance of coal resources. The provincial government has already met, with distinct success in extending the markets for Alberta coal.

In Saskatchewan there is the problem of the utilization of the great lignite beds.

In New Brunswick the industry is faced with a problem of how best to mine their thin seams and make the greatest possible recovery.

In Nova Scotia there are problems of markets, of submarine mining and of adjusting production to meet present and potential demands of our eastern provinces. These are some of the internal problems with which we are faced, and in striving for a solution we naturally look first to the underlying causes.

As a part of the process generally termed fluctuation in the realms of trade there is a constant succession of action and reaction. Periods of prosperity, with business expansion and rising prices, are followed by periods of depression with falling prices and deflation of business. Abnormal demands for all sorts of manufactured goods arise at times, and manufacturing plants are enlarged to meet these peak conditions. Consequently when a reaction sets in and the demand falls off we have to face conditions of over production and the resultant unemployment in industrial areas.

The coal mining industry, as well as industries having to do with manufactured commodities, does not escape the penalties following conditions of over-production. In the case of our coal mining industries in Canada, however, over-development of the mines and capacity to produce far in excess of normal market requirements cannot in all respects be attributed to the rise and fall of the trade barometer.

In the case of Alberta the ease with which new mines can be opened has been one of the chief causes of over-development. An inspection of figures relating to the number of mines opened, and abandonments, will show that nearly two-thirds of the mines have been abandoned.

In the bituminous field over-development as regards number of mines is not so great, but the aggregate present capacity is about double the maximum output yet achieved. In this field there seems less danger in opening new mines because of the great expense involved.

In the sub-bituminous mines the number of operating units is likewise not great, and the rated capacity of these mines on the basis of 150 days operation per year does not show a very great excess over the output achieved, but on a full year of 300 days operation the output would, like that of the bituminous mines, be more than double.

In the lignite field, the over capacity of the present mines on a full year basis is between two and two and a half times the market requirements. It is in the lignite field that the over-development in numbers rather than in capacity is such a marked feature. Under the present system of marketing the lignite mines supplying the domestic trade are subject to sharp peaks of demand, and for a few weeks during the winter season work to capacity. This condition seems to be caused by the dealer and consumer buying only for immediate needs. Although such a system as this obviates the necessity for stocking coal and may be in itself an economical method of distribution, the apparent advantages are offset by too many disadvantages to the coal mining industry of the province.

In the case of Nova Scotia, over-capacity of the mines as relates to present market requirements is largely attributable to a set of unusual circumstances arising in connection with the Great war. In the years 1912 and 1913 before the extra demands of the war had appeared Nova Scotia coal mines were producing from seven and three-quarter million to eight million tons of coal per annum. But in 1917 when there was a greatly increased demand for coal throughout the world, production in Nova Scotia had fallen off to about six and a half million tons. This was mainly due to labour shortage occasioned by the absence of so many miners who had enlisted for overseas service. Among these men were many skilled miners who occupied key positions in the mines and whose positions could not be filled. As a consequence of this and on account of ships being requisitioned for transatlantic service, a large part of the St. Lawrence trade was lost.

I wish to pass on now to what is the apparent cost of replacing United States coal, if I may do so without tiring the House. Over the years 1923-24-25 the average annual importations of American anthracite into the maritime provinces, the Quebec city district and Montreal district aggregated 1,276,425 tons. It is estimated that this imported coal could be replaced by British anthracite and coke manufactured from maritime province coals, provided that a market could be found for the surplus gas which is the most important by-product of the coking process. This replacement would absorb the surplus British anthracite accruing from our estimated importation of 600,000 tons, and would draw on maritime province coal production to the extent of 1,465,000 tons of coal.

Having regard to the normal consumption of maritime province coal, this extra tonnage for coking purposes would be applied to the surplus coming from the estimated 10,000,000 ton production. On this basis, therefore, and after dealing with the domestic requirements of the maritime provinces, Quebec city and Montreal districts, there would still be a surplus of 2,700,000 tons of maritime coal to be applied elsewhere.

Coking plants already in existence in Ontario and Quebec are importing about 1,500,000 tons annually of coking coal from the United States, and supplies to these plants would have to be allocated from the surplus of 2,700,000 tons of maritime coal, leaving 1,200,000 tons as a remainder.

Giving consideration to the fact that the extra production from the maritime province mines must necessarily be nearly all suitable for the manufacture of domestic coke, this remainder of 1,200,000 tons will be applied against replacement of some 200,000 tons of United States industrial coal imported into the maritime provinces, 227,000 tons imported into the Quebec district and about 2,000,000 tons imported into the Montreal district. Together with 1,000,000 tons of British bituminous coal, the balance from the maritime provinces would fall short of filling these requirements by about 280,000 tons, which means that the discrepancy would have to be made up by bringing that amount of Alberta industrial coal to Montreal.

Now, the significance of this distribution of supplies is that, apart from the maritime province coals allocated to coking plants in Ontario, there would be no supplies of maritime coal available for the districts west of Montreal. It may be taken, therefore, that Alberta coal would be required for both domestic and industrial requirements in the area from Ottawa to the head of the lakes. In arriving at figures showing the cost of this replacement scheme. the calculation has been based upon a selling price of coke as $2 per ton less than that of anthracite, and also that notwithstanding an increase in the tariff to the point of excluding United States coals, the prices of Canadian coals in eastern Canada would not rise above normal market levels. Provided that such would be the case. the replacement of United States coal in the maritime provinces, the Quebec city district and Montreal district would effect a saving to the public of $1.300.000.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Whose report is this?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is a report from the Fuel board.

Mr. GEARY: Are copies of the report available?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I will have copies of the report placed on the table for the information of members. I am not reading the report in its entirety because it is somewhat lengthy.

Mr. GEARY: I thought you were reading it all.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The whole report will be made available to members; I will table it.

The Toronto district, on the other hand. which would require 2,348,000 tons of Alberta domestic coal. and 4,176,000 tons of Alberta industrial coal, would show an extra cost to the public of $25,300,000. Extra cost to the public would likewise result in the other districts comprised of Ottawa, Kingston, North Bay, Windsor, Sault Ste. Marie and head of the lakes the aggregate of the extra cost amounting to $32,000,000. Summing up the total cost of replacement, the net result is an annual extra cost to the public of $56,000,000. There would also be an annual loss in customs revenue amounting to $7,000,000. While this would be a high price indeed to levy on the coal-consuming public, let us consider what would be the advantages by way of compensation.

It is easy to appreciate the advantages that would be derived from a complete rehabilitation of the coal mining industry in the maritime provinces. The greatly increased production which would probably result in the mines working to capacity throughout the year would be of utmost importance to the industry, and indeed to the other lines of trade in those provinces. Increased demands of the St. Lawrence markets, particularly for coking coals, would remove many of the contentious issues that are now connected with banking and disposal of slack coal. A plan which would make it practicable to mine and bank coal in the winter for transportation by water during the season of navigation would be the means of overcoming the problem of unemployment during the winter months, and a difficulty in the Nova Scotia fields is to keep winter employment regular.

The advantages to the coal mining industry in the maritimes could be summed up under the statement that there would not only be a complete rehabilitation of the industry in those provinces, but it would probably enjoy a prosperity greater than has been the case in its history. The coal mining industry in Alberta would likewise benefit. The mines producing domestic coal would send down to Ontario nearly three and a half million tons annually, which would represent an increase of about one hundred per cent in the present combined production of the lignite and sub-bituminous mines. The bituminous coal fields would send down about ten million tons which would represent an output nearly three times that of the highest yearly total yet achieved. As the rated capacity of the Alberta bituminous mines is about double the present output, this greatly increased demand would probably necessitate the opening of new bituminous mines.

Unemployment periods in Alberta coal fields are perhaps subject to as much if not more frequency than is the case in the maritimes. The great number of mines in operation and peak demands for coal are the very essence of unemployment periods, as well as tending to high cost of production. While it is recognized that there would be difficulties connected with the steady transportation of coal over the long haul to Ontario throughout all seasons of the year, the stimulus to conditions in Alberta should put the industry on a well sustained basis.

Then there is consideration of the advantage to be derived from the annual diversion of some $75,000,000 or $80,000,000 from United States to Canadian channels of trade, the advantage being in connection with keeping this money in circulation within our own country rather than sending it abroad. Also, we have frequently heard expression of advantages that would accrue from the transfer of the source of supply of a large part of our coal requirements, from the United States to our own coal resources within the Dominion. The contention has been that such a procedure would remove our dependency upon neighbourly goodwill and the uncertainty of industrial peace in the United States coal fields. While in itself this would appear to be a desirable condition, another view can be taken of the situation; one that has to do with the conservation of our natural resources. Even allowing for the immensity of our coal resources, we are perhaps a little prone to measure the value of such things in terms of our own lifetime. Recent developments in low temperature carbonization processes indicate immense possibilities for the utilization of coal in the recovery of motor fuels and oils. In the face of the enormous and increasing consumption of petroleum products together with the rapid exploitation of the world's known oil reserves, the day when we shall turn to coal to supply our oil requirements may be nearer at hand than is readily appreciated. In the meanwhile Canada is not dependent upon the United States nor upon any other country as regards actual coal supplies. Our importations of coal are for economic reasons.

Probably the greatest disadvantage that would result from the institution of this replacement policy would be the annual levy of some fifty-six million dollars owing to increased price of coal to the consuming areas in central Canada. First of all we must consider what amount the tariff must be raised in order to exclude United States coal. It has been demonstrated that Ontario would have to bring coal from Alberta, and that the cost of industrial coal from Alberta would be $10.75 or $11 per ton laid down in Ontario, as against $5 to $7 American coal, and the bulk of the sales of American coal are closer to the $5 figure. The import duty on industrial coal, therefore, would have to be raised to approximately $6 per ton. The lowest effective duty on foreign anthracite and coke would probably have to be finally determined by experiment stages. Based on the freight rate mentioned, I may say that I did not include that freight rate. This calculation is based on a $7 freight rate from Alberta. The information will, however, appear in the report; I was unable to take the time to incorporate it in my statement to-day.

Mr. ADSHEAD: I suppose you are coming to the end of the report.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. ADSHEAD: Are the possibilities of peat available for supplying the needs of the central provinces taken into consideration?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The report takes into consideration all sources of supplies.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): How much is available for sale in Ontario?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not more than 25,000 tons at any time.

Mr. GARDINER: Is there anything in the report to show the importations of coal from the maritime provinces by the central provinces?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think all such matters are dealt with in the report, as well as the exportations to the United States. Based on the freight rate mentioned—and the price mentioned was $7 a ton—Alberta domestic coals could be laid down in Ontario at a cost lower than that of American anthracite, but taking the factors of heating efficiency of the two fuels into account, as well as those of storage, the price at which the Alberta product would permanently hold the market could only be determined by actual demonstration. In the case of coals for coking purposes, there are also various factors to consider. The situation is complicated owing to the varying distances of our Ontario coke plants from the Nova Scotia coal fields and the requisites necessary in coals for the manufacture of domestic coke. To exclude American coals for this purpose, the duty would probably amount to at least $2.50 per ton. Take the effect of this increase of duty on industrial coal. It would immediately place the maritime province coal operators in a monopolistic position and enable them to fix a price, practically double the present price, which they would be in a position to demand and which the consumers in central Canada would have no alternative but to pay. They could also adjust their prices in the maritimes to the new market conditions and thus impose an increase in the annual fuel bill to the people of those provinces.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I suggest there is a contradiction in the report. In a previous part of the report it was stated quite clearly the price would not be raised by virtue of the imposition of a protective tariff. Now it is alleged that there is a provision by which the price would be doubled.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There must be some mistake. I did not so read the report. The fact that if a duty was imposed the price would be increased has, I think, been made apparent throughout the whole report.

The major portion of the burden of the price increase on industrial coal would fall on the railways. The Canadian National and Canadian Pacific railways are together using about 3,800,000 tons of United States coal per year, most of which is consumed on locomotives operating in central Canada.

The steel industry in Canada has to meet severe competition from other countries. A higher cost of coal or its derivative coke, would tend to increase the difficulties of meeting this competition in the case of steel companies who are not proprietors of coal supplies.

Generally, the increased cost of industrial coal would increase cost of production of manufactured goods wherein coal is used in the manufacturing process. This would probably be productive of a movement for more protection for the manufacturing industries, and hence a cycle of tariff revision.

In seeking remedial measures for the domestic fuel situation, the Dominion fuel board has encouraged the introduction of a variety of competitive fuels for supplying the needs of central Canada, the object being to secure a surety of supply at reasonable prices. In these coalless areas of central Canada, the only natural fuel, apart from the wood fuel resources, is found in the peat bogs. These peat areas are very extensive and although the use of peat has not achieved much commercial success up to the present time, the fuel board is convinced of the future importance of this fuel as a substitute for coal during the fall and spring months, but the board does not recommend it as a substitute for coal during the severe winter months.

With the permission of the House I will lay on the table a copy of this report, which is very comprehensive, covering the fuel situation in Canada. It does not advocate the imposition of a duty. It does not advocate the payment of bounties or subsidies to the railways. It recommends simply the development of a reasonably national policy. The report goes on to show that we have in a very large way reduced importations from outside and foreign fields for our coal supply. For example, in 1923 we were importing 5,000,000 tons of anthracite. In 1925 we imported just about 3,000,000 tons or a reduction of 2,000,000 tons. Therefore I say that we are in a very large way rapidly developing a national coal policy in Canada.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, February 17, 1927

The House met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR PRESENTATION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That whereas petitions for private bills could not be received nor private bills presented between December 15, 1926, and February 8, 1927, owing to adjournment of the House during that period, resolved that the period of time limited by the rules for such purposes be so extended as to give such petitions and bills the same period of time for presentation as if the adjournment had not taken place.

Mr. LEON J. LADNER (Vancouver South): May I ask the Prime Minister if this motion will likewise afford us days on which private bills may be brought forward?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My motion applies to all private bills.

Mr. SPEAKER: This motion is based on the report of the chief clerk of the Committees and Private Bills branch as follows:

If some such motion is not made private bills legislation will be entirely held up this session as,—

Time for filing private bills expired December 1;

Time for receiving petitions for private bills expired January 19;

Time for presenting private bills expired February 3.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL COAL POLICY

MEMORANDUM PREPARED BY DOMINION FUEL BOARD

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior) moved:

That five hundred copies in the English language and four hundred copies in the French language of the memorandum from the Dominion Fuel Board in connection with an all Canadian and British fuel supply laid on the table of the House on February 16, be printed forthwith, and that rule 74 in relation thereto be suspended.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

GOVERNMENT TELEGRAPH LINES—NORTHERN ALBERTA

Mr. KENNEDY:

1. Has a survey been made of a proposed telegraph line from, (a) Athabaska to Fort Vermilion, (b) Grouard to Fort Vermilion, (c) Peace River to Fort Vermilion?
2. If so, what is the estimated cost and mileage of each of these lines?

Hon. Mr. ELLIOTT:

1. (a), (b) and (c)—Yes.
2.

Estimated cost	Mileage
(a) $200,000	389 miles
(b) 135,300	316 miles
(c) 125,000	295 miles

POSTMASTER AT RATHBURN

Mr. McGIBBON:

1. Was one J. J. Morris, postmaster at Rathburn, dismissed by the present government?
2. If so, who recommended dismissal, and on what charge?
3. Were there any charges against the said Mr. Morris, (a) of business incompetence; (b) political activities?
4. If so, by whom were they made?
5. What was the salary of said postmaster?

Hon. Mr. VENIOT:

1. Yes.
2. Government candidate for constituency. (a) Political partisanship. (b) Unfavourable site.
3. (a) No. (b) Yes.
4. Government candidate for constituency.
5. Salary $85.—Allowance $20.

THE CHINESE SITUATION

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

1. Is Canada contributing to the expense of protecting Canadians in China during the present disturbances?
2. If so, how is Canada so contributing and to whom is the contribution made?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Yukon asked a very similar question to this a day or two ago, and I replied to it in a careful statement which appears in Hansard of February 10, 1927. That statement contains the only answer that I think I should make to his present question.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): The answer to which the Prime Minister refers is in no sense of the word an answer to the question now on the order paper. That statement was general in its nature, covering Canadian policy on certain foreign affairs, but there was nothing in it that could be considered a reply to numbers one and two of question 12, which seem to be perfectly reasonable questions capable of being answered.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Both questions relate to the present situation in China. I have given to the House the answer, which in the opinion of the government, should be made to all such questions, and I intend to adhere to that answer in respect to this particular question or any other of a similar character which may be asked regarding the Chinese situation.

Mr. GUTHRIE: These are questions which are very definite and distinct in regard to a matter of the gravest importance. The first question can be answered simply yes or no; while the second is dependent upon the answer given to the first. Surely my right hon. friend will see the reasonableness of the request. The statement which he read to the House a day or two ago does not cover either of these questions. If for any special reason the Prime Minister desires not to be interrogated upon these points he should inform the House what that reason is, but the questions are so pertinent and so easy of answer that I cannot understand why the government should hesitate.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have made the answer which I desire to have recorded in reply to this question.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

HUDSON BAY COMPANY'S LANDS

Mr. KENNEDY:

1. Has the Hudson Bay Company acquired land from the Dominion of Canada in the Peace River or Grande Prairie land districts?
2. If so, (a) what lands; (b) under what authority or right have such lands been acquired; (c) what was the date or dates of the transaction or transactions?

GOVERNMENT SALES TAX—ARREARS

Mr. ROWE:

1. How many individuals or companies are in arrears of more than one month in the payment of sales tax to the government?

2. What is the largest amount owing to the government by any of these firms?
3. How long has this amount or a portion of this amount been overdue?
4. In how many cases has the government accepted less than the amount owing in settlement of claims for sales tax, through the winding up, financial difficulties or disappearance of firms and individuals in arrears in their sales tax payments?
5. What is the largest amount of such loss to the government, and what is the total amount of revenue so lost?

ONIONS FROM HOLLAND

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. J. GOTT (South Essex): I desire to ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) certain questions in reference to a telegram I have received from Leamington under date February 17:

You are probably aware that there was a fair amount of onions carried over from last year in storage here in a warehouse erected by the present government. You may also, be interested to know that there is a shipment of onions on the way to Montreal from Holland which is supposed to arrive some time the end of this week. Will you please give us some detail relative to this or any other shipment en route or contemplated in the near future of which parliament is aware.

I want to ask the Minister of Agriculture the following questions: 1. Is there a shipment of onions on the way to Montreal or any other part of Canada from Holland, Bermuda, Spain or elsewhere, and which is expected to arrive in the near future? 2. What amount of onions was carried over from last year in storage at the new government warehouse at Leamington, erected under the administration of the present Minister of Agriculture? 3. Was it not the intention of the Department of Agriculture in erecting this warehouse to protect the onion growers from such importations?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should put his question on the order paper.

NATIONAL COAL POLICY

STATEMENT BY FUEL BOARD AS TO COST OF INCREASED DUTY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): I wish to direct the attention of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) to a heading in the Ottawa Journal with reference to the address he gave in the House yesterday in the course of which he read the report of the fuel board. In that report there occurred the following words:

Summing up, the total cost of replacement—of coal industrial as well as domestic in the central provinces, would mean——an annual extra cost to the public of $56,000,000.

The heading in the newspaper reads:

Would involve extra expense of 56 millions.

Is there any suggestion that the movement of Alberta domestic coal would cost this sum, or is it not true to say that the figures given by the fuel board refer to the increase in price of the fuel as a result of an increased duty in order to keep out importations of all coal?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Edmonton, Minister of the Interior): The report refers distinctly to the prohibition of the entry into Canada of coal of all kinds.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): And has no reference whatever to the shipping of Alberta coal?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No.

MANITOBA PAPER COMPANY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto): Has the government made a contract with the Manitoba Paper Company for the sale of pulpwood in the province of Manitoba and, if so, does the contract contain a clause with regard to the selecting of wood? Further, if such a contract has been made, will the papers be tabled?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Edmonton, Minister of the Interior): I can answer the first question by saying yes. As regards the other request I would advise my hon. friend to ask for a return in order to have the contract laid on the table. Full particulars could then be given.

THE CHINESE SITUATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): A despatch from Geneva reads:

Geneva, Feb. 16.—The Chinese delegation announced to-night that it had sent a note to Secretary General Sir Eric Drummond, of the League of Nations on instructions from the Peking foreign office, demanding withdrawal of the British order to send troops to China.

The note included a copy of Peking's earlier protest to Great Britain against the despatch of the British defence force as a violation of the Washington agreement and of article 10 of the covenant of the league, binding members of the league to protect the territorial integrity and political independence of fellow members.

The note insisted that the Chinese forces were capable of maintaining order in Shanghai, and asserted that the presence of troops would lead to complications.

Under article 11 of the treaty of Peace has the government of Canada made any representations to the assembly or to the council of the League of Nations with regard to the despatch of British troops to China?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): No representations of the character my hon. friend mentions have been made by the government.

NATURAL RESOURCES—ALBERTA

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): Can the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) give the House any information as to when we may expect the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada with respect to section 17 of the Alberta Act, and whether, in the event of that judgment being handed down in the near future, it is the intention of the government to introduce legislation in relation thereto this year?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): All I can say to my hon. friend is that I have been informed that the argument will take place on March 7. So far as the judgment of the court is concerned, I am afraid it is beyond my knowledge when the judges will have made up their minds.

REFERENCE TO ALBERTA LEGISLATOR

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Edmonton, Minister of the Interior): In the course of a debate in the House a statement was made reflecting on the action of a member of the Alberta legislature who has wired me asking that I correct the impression. I will read the telegram—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. STEVENS: This is out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I fear the minister is out of order.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is a citizen to have a reflection cast upon him in this House without his having any means of obtaining redress? This happened, not in the legislature of Alberta, but in this House.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have not before me the debate in question, but it is not in order for an outsider to get any member of the House to rise to a question of privilege in his behalf. The privilege is reserved to members of this House; otherwise many persons outside might seek to make this chamber a forum in which to settle their difficulties.

CANADIAN MINISTER AT WASHINGTON

Mr. F. W. HAY (North Perth): Can the Prime Minister tell us whether the office of the Canadian minister at Washington is or is not yet open for business; and if not, why not? I am prompted to ask this question by reason of a telegram I have received from a business concern in Stratford in the county of Perth where the people are always active. They naturally want to be able to get in touch with our minister there without any undue delay.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I might tell my hon. friend that the Canadian minister arrived in Washington on Tuesday of this week and called upon the Secretary of State yesterday. I understand that to-morrow he presents the letter of credence from His Majesty the King to the President of the United States, and when these formalities are concluded I think it may be understood that the office has been duly opened. The premises have been obtained and the staff will be located in a building within a block or two of the British embassy.

EXTENSION OF FISHING SEASON

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. L. P. BANCROFT (Selkirk): I would like to ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if it is the intention of his department to grant an extension of the fishing season in Manitoba?

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): The government have received requests both for and against the granting of an extension of the fishing season in Manitoba, and after careful consideration we have decided not to grant an extension. The reason is that the fishing season has been good from the beginning; it is true that an extension has been requested because of the low prices, and it may be true that the prices will be higher in March, but if the market is flooded as a result of extending the season, prices might decrease at the same time. I have taken the advice of the technical advisers of the department, and we have decided that in order to preserve these fisheries it is preferable not to grant an extension this year.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF HON. J. A. ROBB, MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into committee of ways and means.

He said: In presenting to parliament my fourth annual budget to-day, may I recall that when in April, 1924, I had the honour of first delivering a budget, the post war depression so evident in 1920 and in 1921, was then moderating. Each succeeding year the annual budget has indicated gradual improvements in our trade and in our national finances.

The Dominion enters its diamond jubilee year with a happy outlook. Our farmers have, in general, enjoyed bountiful harvests; our industries are active and working well up to capacity, many indeed are working overtime; employment is at a high level and our transportation companies report a large volume of business; retail trade is brisk, money is plentiful and a buoyant spirit prevails. As individuals, Canadians have much to be thankful for, and as government financing is easier when times are good, the report I present to-day will, I am sure, be a source of gratification and satisfaction to the country at large.

The large increases of debt registered in each of the fiscal years from 1913-14 to 1922-23 inclusive, are in striking contrast with the gradual and substantial reductions, aggregating some $64,000,000, made during the fiscal years 1923-24 to 1925-26. We are again in the happy position of being able to report a continued story of progress for the current fiscal year which closes on the 31st of the coming month.

We estimate that at the close of this year there will be a further reduction of some $31,000,000, in our net debt. Thus, in four years whilst we have been reducing taxation we will also have reduced our net debt by some $95,000,000.

Public Accounts 1925-26

The public accounts for the financial year 1925-26 were tabled on the 10th December last. In presenting the budget speech on the 15th of April, last, the outcome for the fiscal year 1925-26 was necessarily based on estimates of our revenues and expenditures for the year. It was estimated that the reduction in our net debt would be $22,353,000. The final results for the year show that this estimate was more than justified in that the actual reduction in our net debt was $27,706,586.

Fiscal Year 1926-27

Revenue

Coming now to the fiscal year 1926-27, we estimate that our ordinary revenue for the current fiscal year will be $393,100,000 which, with special receipts from reparations payments of $1,700,000, will give a total revenue for the year of about $394,800,000. This is an increase of some $11,900,000 over the revenues for the year 1925-26.

Certain revenue services will show increases as follows: Customs duties $14,100,000; excise duties $4,500,000; excise taxes—that is, sales, stamps, etc.—$5,900,000; interest on investments $600,000, and from miscellaneous sources $500,000, making a total increase from these sources of some $25,600,000.

Other sources of revenue will show decreases as follows: Income tax $8,600,000; delayed business profits tax $500,000; post office receipts $3,300,000; and from miscellaneous sources $1,300,000; making total decreases from these sources of over $13,700,000. The net increase in revenues will therefore be some $11,900,000.

Expenditures

The estimated expenditures for the year are: Ordinary expenditures $324,500,000; special expenditures $5,300,000; capital expenditures $20,100,000; loans to Canadian National Railways $10,000,000 and loans to the Quebec Harbour Commission $700,000; a total of $360,600,000; being an increase of $5,400,000 over expenditures for the previous year.

Our estimated total expenditures of $360,600,000 deducted from our estimated revenues of $394,800,000 will leave a surplus of $34,200,000 of revenues over expenditures. To arrive, however, at the probable reduction of over $31,000,000 in our net debt it will be necessary to deduct from this surplus $2,900,000 representing a reduction in the value of soldier settlement loans which at the close of our previous year appeared in the balance sheet as a live asset.

Chapter 53 of the statutes of 1925 amended the Soldier Settlement Act of 1919 and provided for the revaluation of live stock purchased for settlers by the Soldier Settlement Board. The act provided that a reduction of 40 per cent on the purchase price be allowed to soldier settlers for whom live stock was purchased prior to October 1, 1920 and a reduction of 20 per cent to soldier settlers for whom purchases were made between October 1, 1920 and October 1, 1921. Calculations have now been made which will reduce our assets, subject to minor amendments, by some $2,900,000.

With the permission of the House I shall place on Hansard a comparative summary setting out the actual revenues and expenditures by services for 1925-26 and the corresponding estimated revenues and expenditures for the present fiscal year.

There are other statements which, with the approval of the House, I shall also place on Hansard:—

First.—Statement of our estimated ordinary revenues, by services, amounting to $393,150,000, together with the percentages of such services to the total of the ordinary revenues as estimated.

Second.—Statement of the estimated expenditures by services for the present fiscal year showing the various amounts and their percentages to the total expenditures.

Redemption of Debt

On the 1st of October and the 15th November, 1926, the two-year 4 per cent notes amounting to $35,000,000 and $8,000,000 respectively, or a total of $43,000,000, matured and were redeemed. The withdrawal of this $43,000,000 of interest bearing bonds in the hands of the public will result in the saving to Canada of an annual interest charge of $1,720,000.

Hon. members who were in the last parliament will recall that on the 7th of June last when the bill giving borrowing powers to meet loans maturing in 1926-27 was before the House, in reply to a question asked in this connection, I stated that we hoped out of current cash resources to take care of the loans maturing during 1926, amounting to $43,000,000. I made this statement knowing that at the close of the fiscal year 1925-26 we had on hand assets in cash of $27,068,121.38, which with accruing surpluses would enable us to retire these maturities.

Maturities 1927

On the 15th November, 1927, the three-year 4 per cent notes amounting to $8,000,000 will mature. We hope to be able to redeem this loan in cash, thereby making a further saving in annual interest of $320,000.

On the 1st November, 1927, the 5½ per cent renewal loan of 1922, amounting to $29,068,400, will also mature. If our finances permit we will redeem at least a portion of this loan in cash, the balance, if any, will be redeemed by the flotation of a new loan at a reduced rate of interest.

On the 1st December, 1927, a portion of the 1917 Victory loan, 5½ per cent tax-free, amounting to $63,437,250, will mature. This loan will be redeemed by the flotation of a new loan at a reduced rate of interest. Such refinancing will result in a further annual saving in our interest charges of approximately $1,000,000.

Expenditures by means of Governor General's Warrants

May I now say a few words on the method employed to carry on financial obligations by way of expenditures during the present year. There seems to be a general belief that owing to the method of obtaining supply by governor general's warrants, considerable saving in our usual expenditures was effected. Examination of the expenditures during this period does not show such a result.

On the 28th June last the then Prime Minister resigned. The following day the leader of the opposition took office. On the 2nd July the members on arriving for the purpose of attending the sitting of the House found that dissolution had taken place. The Right Hon. Mr. Meighen was faced with the problem of insufficient supply until a duly elected House could assemble. Before dissolution one-quarter of the main estimates, or supply sufficient for the months of April, May and June, had been authorized by interim supply. The new government had recourse to the issue of governor general's warrants. Warrants were obtained during the months of July, August and September, amounting to $48,708,473.11. Examination of the records shows that for the most part these warrants were issued for services contained in the main estimates, one-quarter of which had been voted by parliament by way of interim supply.

In addition these warrants covered a number of services set out in the supplementary estimates which were tabled but no portion of which had been voted. As stated, the total amount of governor general's warrants issued under the brief administration of the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen was $48,708,473.11.

Expenditures for the corresponding period of the previous year were $49,000,000, practically the same amount as covered by the warrants issued by the Meighen administration. It will thus be seen that practically no savings in expenditures under governor general's warrants were made in that period.

The present Prime Minister resumed office on September 25, 1926. The duly elected members of the new House were summoned for the 9th of December. In the meantime, pending the meeting of the House, it was necessary for the present administration to supplement the previous governor general's warrants by amounts necessary to meet requirements for the months of October and November for the salaries of public officials and for the financing of contracts, works, and so forth, which it found the country obligated to carry on. To meet such expenditures warrants were issued in October for $15,612,796.74, and in November for $16,350,712.97, or a total of $31,963,509.71. Expenditures for the corresponding months of the previous year were $30,497,921.52. Thus, the total amount of governor general's warrants issued during the year amounted to $80,671,982.82, while the total expenditures for similar services—as covered by the governor general's warrants—for the corresponding period of the year before was $79,500,000, or a million less than the total warrants.

Probable Revenues and Expenditures for the coming Fiscal Year

The revenues which we will receive during the financial year 1927-28 may be lessened as compared with the estimated revenues for the present fiscal year by the amount of $27,000,000, representing the remission to the public of taxes which we intend in this budget to submit for the approval of parliament. But there is every prospect of increasing business activities. I, therefore, anticipate that our revenues, notwithstanding our further reductions in taxation, will be equal to the revenue we will receive during the present year, and I hope that we may have a slight increase.

On the expenditure side we have obligations slightly in excess of those for the present fiscal year. Having due regard to the maintenance of efficiency in the public services we will endeavour to keep our actual expenditures to the lowest possible amount. I believe that we should bend all our energies towards reducing burdensome taxation as rapidly as our revenues will permit; but we should also continue the practice of the present and preceding year of retiring in part, or in whole, at maturing dates, outstanding bonded indebtedness in the hands of the public. In other words, the refinancing of any maturing loans should be for a reduced amount.

Trade

I am sure the House and the country will be interested in a statement of our trade. The fiscal year does not end until the 31st March, so the trade statement is limited to the nine months period ending December 31. In that period our imports increased over those of the same nine months in 1925 by $81,000,000, while our exports decreased $44,000,000. Our international trade for the nine months totalled $1,762,000,000, of which our imports represented $766,763,000, and our exports $995,286,000, leaving a favourable balance of trade for the nine months of $228,523,000. Preliminary calculations for the month of January increase this favourable balance and it is anticipated that at the close of the fiscal year the favourable trade balance may approximate $250,000,000.

But when we are comparing trade statistics, quotations in dollars are not always conclusive tests. Exports of farm products form an important portion of our exports, the production and marketing of these products are affected in various ways: sometimes crops fail, the prices of commodities fluctuate, conditions in other lands entirely beyond our control expand or restrict the purchasing capacity of our customers. For example, in the period under review we exported oats to the value of $8,000,000, which, owing to a small crop in Canada, ocean transportation difficulties and the British strike troubles, was $14,000,000 less than in the same period of the previous year. Canadian climatic conditions in the month of December interfered with the export of wheat, there being a decrease in that month alone of $26,000,000 of wheat exports. A third item showing a pronounced decrease in the export columns is gold bullion and quartz. In the nine months period of 1925 we exported $23,600,000 of this precious metal; in 1926 we exported but $5,000,000 worth. This was not in consequence of any curtailment in the production, but simply because the gold was refined and held in Canada.

The products of Canadian factories continue to go farther afield and in increasing quantities. The export of rubber goods, chiefly tires for vehicles, increased from $13,800,000 to $19,000,000. We exported 7,596,000 barrels of flour as compared with 7,224,000 barrels in the period of the year before. Another increase is in newsprint, our exports for nine months increasing to $85,700,000, thus exceeding the nine months of 1925 by over $12,000,000.

A detailed classification of the imports is published in the monthly reports of the Department of Trade and Commerce, but, broadly speaking, it may be said that commodities imported for further manufacture show the most pronounced increases. The following table gives the quantities imported of certain goods, classified for statistical purposes as goods imported for further manufacture:

The nine months' imports thus classified had a value of $128,000,000 in 1921 and $224,000,000 in 1926. A prosperous and busy Canada permits its citizens to be more generous in their purchases, thus taking more of the products of our factories, and Canadian factories working full time require larger supplies of raw and semi-manufactured materials, part of which is necessarily imported from other lands.

The policy of the government has been to promote friendly trade relations with other countries, and particularly to strengthen our trade ties within the empire. Canada introduced the policy of preferential tariffs within the British Empire and the extent of our empire trade fully justifies the expectations of those who originated the British preference. Bearing in mind the industrial difficulties of the mother country during the past year, our trade with the empire during the period under review was satisfactory.

The following summary divides the trade into three classes: trade with the United Kingdom, trade with other parts of the empire, and trade with foreign countries:

Trade with the United Kingdom

Of special interest to every citizen is the amount of taxation that he is called upon to pay. The flourishing condition of our finances again enables us to substantially reduce taxation. This we promised the electors we would do, and to-day we implement that promise.

It is proposed to make a reduction of 10 per cent in all rates of the income tax.

It is proposed that a general cut of 20 per cent be made in the sales tax.

The excise tax on matches will be cut 25 per cent.

It is proposed that a flat rate of two cents, irrespective of the value involved, be set on all cheques, bills of exchange, promissory notes and similar documents exceeding ten dollars in value, thus substantially reducing the tax and at the same time removing the complications of a graduated scale. The stamp tax on overdrafts and advances will be abolished. The exemption from stamp tax on cheques, bills, etc., is increased from five dollars to ten dollars. These reductions amount to practically seventy per cent of the stamp taxation and so practically abolish what the man in the street terms the "nuisance taxes."

Representations have been made seeking total or partial exemption from taxation of money gifts to hospitals and higher educational institutions, but difficulties of administration thus involved might prove insurmountable. It is felt that the same worthy end is attained by the general reduction now being made in the amount of income tax payable.

The proposed reductions in the income tax will be applicable to assessments falling due shortly.

The reductions in the sales tax become effective to-morrow.

The proposed reductions in the tax on matches and in the stamp taxes will become effective on the diamond jubilee of confederation.

In April last an advisory board on tariff and taxation was created. Since then the board has been instructed to investigate and report on 52 applications for tariff changes. Of these applications, one was sent by my immediate predecessor in office, the balance by myself. The board has proven to be a popular tribunal, but has only been operating a few months. The holding of numerous public hearings and the making of intensive investigations have taken much time, and, as certain of the applications are inter-locking, inquiries are not yet completed. Everything considered, it has appeared to my colleagues and myself the part of wisdom to propose no changes in the customs tariff at the present session of parliament.

To-day, as already mentioned, it has been my privilege to present my fourth annual statement of the Dominion of Canada. Each year the expenditures have been less than our revenues, enabling us to make reductions in most of the taxation rates. Readjustments and reduction of customs duty resulted, as predicted, in greater and more profitable production to manufacturers, and users of implements so essential to all engaged in the basic industries of our country. From a long and varied list of articles the sales tax has been materially reduced. Each year we have been able to lighten the burden and relieve Canadians from some of the war or "nuisance" taxes. From year to year income tax exemptions were made; last year increased exemptions and substantial reductions in rates were announced. Penny postage was restored and the receipt tax abolished. The estimated combined decreases in revenues totalled many millions of dollars, yet the financial condition of the treasury was never better than it is to-day—proof conclusive of the solid prosperity of Canada and of the Canadian people, and may I be permitted to add, of economical and prudent administration of their affairs.

The reductions in our sources of revenue this year are equally substantial and will lighten taxation, it is estimated, to the extent of $27,000,000. In arriving at the nature of these reductions, this year, as in those which lie behind, the aim has been to lighten the burden of every taxpayer, rather than to afford relief to special groups, provinces or sections of the country. Thus, moneys which otherwise would come into the public coffers are released for the use of the individual; the development of the country is encouraged; the cost of production in our industries is reduced and avenues for an increase of business are created. As an example, may the transportation facilities of the Dominion be cited. In a country so vast as Canada the charges for the carrying of goods are of primary importance both in the development of our natural resources and in the cost of living; consequently, appeals are frequently made for reductions in the freight rates. Yet we must not forget that the credit of Canada, as well as the successful operation of the railways, whether private or public-owned, depends upon the companies being able to show a margin of profit over expenditures. A reduction of taxation means a saving in the operating expenses to them; a relief of taxation encourages the producer to increase his yield of supplies to be carried, and enables the consumer to increase his purchasing power; thus, side by side, we have a saving in operating charges and at the same time a larger volume of business, bringing closer the natural solution of our transportation problem.

Four years ago when I presented my first budget, Canada was still suffering from the effects of the post-war depression. To-day all traces of that depression have disappeared; a spirit of optimism is general and our domestic and international trade is flourishing. Let us continue to build solidly; let us shun extravagance and waste; let us have faith in our future. We can have no higher resolve in this the diamond jubilee year of our confederation than as Canadians to remain forever united, and work for the lasting prosperity and progress of this our glorious land—Canada.

I beg to give notice that when the House resolves itself into committee, I shall move the following resolutions:

Resolved, That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend The Special War Revenue Act, 1915, and to provide:—

1. (i) That the stamp tax on cheques, bills and notes, receipts for money paid by a bank, bills of exchange drawn upon persons outside of Canada according to the tenor of the bills, money orders and travellers' cheques, and post office money orders, shall on and after the first day of July, 1927, be two cents in respect of each such instrument for an amount in excess of ten dollars.

(ii) That on and after the first day of July, 1927, the stamp tax on matches shall be as follows:—

On each package of matches manufactured or sold: three-fourths of one cent for each one hundred matches or fraction of one hundred matches;

On each package containing not more than sixty and not less than thirty matches: three-eighths of one per cent package;

On each package containing less than thirty matches: three sixteenths of one cent per package.

(iii) That from and after the sixth day of July, 1927, the following stamp taxes be abolished, namely,

On advances made by a bank as imposed by paragraphs (c), (d) and (e) of subsection three of section twelve of the said Act;

On overdrafts, as imposed by paragraphs (f) and (g) of said subsection three;

On advances by any person not being a bank, as imposed by subsection 19 of said section twelve.

2. That the rate of consumption or sales tax be reduced to four per cent and that any enactment which may be founded on this resolution number two shall be deemed to have come into force on the eighteenth day of Frebruary, 1927, and to have applied to goods imported or taken out of warehouse on and after that date, and to have applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that date.

3. That said section nineteen BBB be further amended by providing that, for the purposes of the said section, printers, publishers, lithographers and engravers shall be regarded as producers or manufacturers, and that any enactment which may be founded on this resolution number three shall be deemed to have come into force on the eighteenth day of February, 1927.

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend The Income War Tax Act, 1917, to provide that the rates of tax be reduced by ten per centum.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (West Calgary): I confess, Sir, that I approach the task of replying to the hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) with some diffidence. I have not in a busy life been able to give that measure of attention to the business of the country during the last few weeks that its importance demands. But my first words must be words of compliment to the minister upon the excellent presentation of the statement that he has made. It is a statement made with great clearness, with great fairness, and if now and then he lapsed into purely party laudation, one must expect that from the very nature of the circumstances in which he finds himself. I am sure that I voice the opinion of all those on this side of the House when I hope that if the budget statement is to be presented in the future as it has been during the last few years by the Liberal party, that the hon. the present Minister of Finance may be the gentleman to present it.

The hon. gentleman at once proceeded to point out the amazing prosperity of this country. I am sure that no one rejoices more in the continued prosperity of Canada than those who sit to the Speaker's left. But when we analyse the causes that have brought about prosperity, I think perhaps we might differ. The real truth is that the prosperity of this country depends upon the fortunate circumstance that we have had amazing crops during the last few years. The crop last year was the third largest in the history of Canada, and it amounted to such a volume as made possible the exportation of many millions of bushels of wheat and grain, thereby increasing the purchasing power of the people, and that is reflected in the prosperity to which the minister has referred.

It might be important to observe that we have during the last few years been exporting very largely from this country our natural resources, and the money that has come back from the sale of these resources has increased the purchasing power of the country. For instance, we produce enormous quantities of grain and grain products, and their export from this country constitutes a very substantial item in our trade balance. The same may be said with respect to mineral production. During the last year, for instance, we had the highest figure that we have ever had in mineral production in Canada, the total reaching in round figures, $242,800,00. That is an enormous sum of money which cannot be replaced. That is the exhaustion of a capital asset; that means that the minerals thus taken from the ground and shipped out of this country in large quantities will not be replaced by any effort that may be made by the sons of men. For instance, with respect to asbestos, with respect to nickel, with respect to gold and gold quartz, to which the minister referred, it is impossible, Sir, that at any time these capital assets so taken from the country can be replaced. It means the exhaustion of our national wealth to that extent. With respect to the quantities of grain taken from our soil, it is only fair to point out that to some extent we are exhausting our soil. With respect to the vast quantities of pulpwood and pulp shipped abroad, and with respect to newsprint, these can only be replaced in the lifetime of two or three generations, certainly not in the lifetime of the present generation. To that extent—and the figures are interesting—we are exhausting capital assets of this country which cannot in the very nature of things be replaced by any means that can be devised by the wit of man. It is therefore important to realize that a very large proportion of the money that is now available for the purchasing power of our people comes by reason of the exhaustion of our capital assets, and it seems to me that it is a matter worthy of very serious consideration by this House and by the country. I point this out because when my hon. friend the minister draws attention to the fact that we have produced very large quantities of new wealth in this land, it is well to remember that that new wealth has been produced under the circumstances to which I have referred.

Now, increased purchasing power means increased trade, and yet if that trade be hampered or restricted by excessive taxation, it follows that the measure of profit which may accrue to those engaged in it is correspondingly less, and that the cost of living to the individual becomes correspondingly more. I ventured to send to-day for the report of the Department of Labour with respect to the cost of living represented by the weekly budget of a family of five. That budget covers the staple foods, fuel and lighting and rent, in terms of the average retail prices in sixty cities in Canada. I find that with the exception of January, February, March and April, a higher figure was reached in 1926, namely $21.41 per week for the month of December, than had been reached at any time since the month of January, 1922. If there had been this great reduction in taxation to which the minister has referred, if there had been a cheapening of the services under which men live, then why was it that the cost of living was higher in December, 1926, than it had been, with the exception of the months I have mentioned, since January, 1922? That, I think is worthy of consideration, for it is the inevitable reaction of the circumstances to which I have drawn attention.

But let us go a step further, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Finance referred to the tax reductions in his last budget, and he said, that he promised the people of this country on the election platform that if his party was returned to power he would make another substantial reduction in taxation. Let us analyze these figures, and see whether or not there has been any substantial reduction in taxation as he mentioned—whether a single dollar in taxation has been taken off. In 1925 the government of this country extracted from the people by taxation, as shown by the reports issued by the Department of Finance, a sum of $327,575,000; during the year ending March 31, 1927, the sum extracted from the pockets of the people was $343,000,000—an increase of $15,425,000, which is equivalent, Mr. Speaker, on the figures supplied by the statistical bureau of this country, to an average of $1.64 more per head taken from the taxpayers during the year just ending than was taken during the preceding year. That is reduction in taxation! It means that every fmaily of five in Canada paid last year $8.20 more taxes than they paid during the preceding year. That is the position.

But that is not all. Let us take the figures and consider them in the light of the statements made by the minister himself. In 1925-26, the Department of Finance shows that there was taken in customs duties as taxes from the people of this country the sum of $127,355,000 in round figures; this year the amount is $141,500,000—an increase of $14,144,000, or $1.50 for every man, woman and child in this country, which represents, Mr. Speaker, an average of $7.50 for every Canadian family. That is the reduction in taxation enunciated by the hon. Minister of Finance!

But that is not all. With respect to excise duties as distinguished from excise taxes, we find that for the year ended March 31 last there was taken from the Canadian people for these duties $42,923,549.03, and this year there has been taken from them $47,500,000—an increase of $4,576,450.97, equivalent to practically 48 cents a head for every man, woman and child in Canada. That is reduction in taxation!

Then let us go a step further to the so-called war taxes, the excise war taxes—revenue, sales and stamp taxes. These were accountable for $98,097,105.81 last year; this year the sum total is $104,000,000—an increase of $5,902,894, equivalent to 62 cents for every man, woman and child in Canada, or a total of $3.10 per family. And that sales tax is the poor man's income tax—the tax upon his clothes, the tax upon the commodities that enter into his everyday life—and notwithstanding the statements made by the minister on platform after platform, the fact is that he took in the form of sales tax and other taxes from the people of this country last year 62 cents more from every man, woman and child than he did during the preceding year. All I can say is that it reminds me of the victory of that great general, Pyrrhus, and paraphrasing what was said of him I may well exclaim, Another such reduction of taxation and indeed we are undone! Another such victory for the reduction of taxation, and the taxes imposed upon the poor man will be indeed very much higher than they were before.

I shall come presently to the minister's proposals, but with respect to the income tax, it is true there was a reduction of some $8,000,000, equivalent to 92 cents per head or $4.60 for every family of five in Canada. Setting this against the increase leaves, as I have said, $1.64 as the amount of taxation taken from every man, woman and child in Canada during the year ending March 31, 1927, more than was extracted from them for the year ending March 31, 1926. Let there be no misunderstanding Mr. Speaker, with respect to that. Whether you say the people are better able to pay, or whether they have more money to pay is not the problem, for the same number of people paid these respective amounts of taxation. It means that in the ultimate analysis, $1.64 more was taken by this government from every man, woman and child of this country in "reducing" our taxation than was extracted during the preceding year. There is the record, Mr. Speaker, and it speaks for itself.

But my friend the hon. Minister of Finance did more, he referred to the magnificent achievements in the Post Office Department. Let us look at what he did there in reducing the taxation, or postage, by one cent—not on drop letters. In the year ending March 31, 1926, we had a revenue in the Post Office Department of $30,334,575.02, and we had an expenditure of $30,499,685.74. This year we have a revenue of $27,000,000 and we have expended $30,820,000, a deficit of $3,820,000 in the Post Office Department as a result of having reduced the postal rate by one cent from July 1 last. And who received the benefit of it? How much does that amount to? Does the Minister of Finance realize that in the matter of taxation it means for every man, woman and child substantially thirty cents per annum, or $1.50 per family? Does the government appreciate the fact that the effect of reducing the postage—something which was not asked for, and which was paid largely by the business institutions of the country—was to place upon the people of Canada a burden of $3,200,000 in the way of extra taxation, an increase to the extent of $1.50 per family?

So much for the Post Office Department. Nothing is clearer than that the net result of last year's budget was to extract from the people more money than they paid the year before, to the extent of $55,000,000 or $8.20 for every family. Nothing is clearer still than that the effect of reducing the postage from three to two cents from the first day of July last—and we have a record of only six months—was to place on the people of Canada a per capita burden of thirty cents in order that relief might be afforded to the large business institutions.

Now I proceed to show that last year's budget, which was widely heralded as promising a great remission of taxation, as the minister described it, did not mean so considerable a reduction for the reasons I have explained. It is so clear as to require no argument. If ten people in one year paid $10, they paid a dollar a head, and if the next year they paid $12, they paid $1.20 each. That is the real fact with relation to the so-called Robb prosperity budget of 1926. It is quite easy to brush the matter aside, but after all we cannot afford to treat it so lightly. The government cannot smile and allege that it is disposed of merely by asserting that what I now say is not so. There are the figures which the minister himself read this afternoon; and I took the trouble to get the population figures from the statistical department. Let us for a moment look at the question of trade which is wrapped up in the matter of taxation. The party on this side of the Speaker, that is to say, the Conservative party, believe that the development of the domestic market is of first importance to the Dominion of Canada. They believe that for two very certain reasons. One is that the domestic market is assured and cannot be destroyed by the caprice of an economic or commercial competitor. They understand that. In the second place, we over here realize that the development of the domestic market is the only means by which we can give employment to those people coming to the country who are not seeking employment in agriculture. Further, it is the only means by which we are able to build up the industrial life of Canada and bring to our shores a consuming population for our own products.

Let us see what has occurred in this country. The Liberal party has endeavoured by a system of treaties to extend the foreign trade of Canada. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that this is highly desirable. We on the other hand regard it as desirable, first, by every means in our power, to develop our domestic trade. Let us analyse these two propositions. A series of treaties were entered into providing for favoured treatment in our markets of the products of the foreigner, who in turn is supposed to afford some more favoured treatment to us than he gives to other countries. If that arrangement worked out satisfactorily it might well indeed be said that it was worthy of consideration. But what are the facts? We must be guided by the facts and not by fancies with respect to this matter. I shall therefore read to the House a few figures that bear upon the question.

Take Australia. Last year we purchased from Australia 155 per cent more goods than we did the preceding year, but we sold them only 30 per cent more than we did the year before. Take the British West Indies.

Mr. DUNNING: What about the values?

Mr. BENNETT: Values are not the factors of comparison, but the increase in the percentage of trade. I hope the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) does not conduct his business in that way. If he does, he shows how unfit he is to discharge the obligations and responsibilities of his office. Volume of business is not the factor that makes for the determination of the question whether there has been an increase or a decrease in a country's trade; what determines that question is the comparison of percentages as between this year and the preceding year. Last year, as I have pointed out, we bought from Australia 155 per cent more than we did the year before, and we sold them only 30 per cent more than we did before the treaty.

Mr. DUNNING: I merely asked my hon. friend for the values.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not keep the figures after preparing the percentages. Apparently the minister has them. However, they are here and can be referred to. They are issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce and I commend the report to the intellectual curiosity of my hon. friend. Let me proceed. From the British West Indies we purchased last year 23 per cent more than we did the year before while we sold to them 20 per cent more. These are favoured treaty countries, mark you, Mr. Speaker. From British South Africa last year we purchased 884 per cent more than we did the year before and lost in sales to them, compared with the preceding year, 2 per cent. That is to say, we sold to that country less goods by over 2 per cent during the last year than we did the year before. Take Belgium: I find that we purchased this year, compared with last year, over 38 per cent more goods while we sold to Belgium only 4 per cent more goods than we did the preceding year. And this is a community with which the hon. gentleman's predecessor contracted a trade treaty.

Mr. ROBB: I take the responsibility for it.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the Minister of Finance realize that the immediate effect of this was destructive to one glass industry in Canada?

Now I come to France. This year we increased our purchases from France by over 21 per cent as compared with the preceding year and we sold them nearly 30 per cent more goods than we did the year before. We made a treaty with them. Take Italy next. From that country we purchased last year 33 per cent more goods than we did in the preceding year, and sold them 62 per cent more. In that case the balance was on the right side. Next, Holland or the Netherlands. From them we purchased nearly 20 per cent more goods than in the preceding year, while we sold them less than 13 per cent more.

Now compare these countries with Germany, with which we have no treaty. Last year we purchased from Germany nearly 55 per cent more goods than we did in the preceding year while we decreased the amount of goods we sold them by nearly one per cent. So Germany bought one per cent less from us this year and we bought 55 per cent more from Germany than during the preceding year. In dealing with Japan we find the balance on the right side; from Japan we purchased 31 per cent more than during the preceding year, and we increased our sales to Japan by over 47 per cent. We bought nearly 80 per cent more goods from China than during the preceding year, but only sold 11 per cent more. Now we come to the United States. From that community we purchased last year 15 per cent more goods than during the preceding year but sold them 3 per cent less goods than during the twelve months previous. What does that mean? It means that the busy hives of industry in the United States were able to work 15 per cent more to sell goods to the Dominion of Canada while we sold to them 3 per cent less of our natural and other products; that is what it means in cold figures. Let there be no misunderstanding in that respect, because that is the actual situation.

Now let us consider the whole of the British Empire. According to the figures supplied by the Minister of Trade and Commerce for the nine months ending December 31, we bought from the whole of the British Empire including Great Britain goods amounting to $213,940,249, while we sold goods worth $554,936,999, leaving a balance in our favour of $340,996,750. But let us take our foreign trade which shows that we bought goods to the value of $749,401,662, and sold goods worth $713,644,977, leaving an adverse balance of $80,756,685. It must also be borne in mind that the whole of this favourable balance over which the minister rejoices so much constitutes largely the purchases made by the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and the Free State of over $300,000,000 worth of goods; the purchases of Australia, with a balance in our favour of $13,000,000 and of Newfoundland with a balance of over $10,000,000; that constitutes nearly the whole of the favourable balance with respect to this so-called international trade. The truth is that the United Kingdom and the Free State purchased from us very large quantities of our natural products such as meat, butter and grain, and the money which we obtained from the sale of those goods went to the United States to purchase goods made by American artisans for consumption by Canadian families. That is the story shown by the trade returns; whether or not those returns are correct is not for me to say, but those are the figures gleaned from them as they are issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Now let us go one step further. The government is reported to be negotiating a trade treaty with Cuba, another with Germany and another with Czecho-Slovakia. These questions have been discussed from time to time but, Sir, why is it that when we negotiate treaties with these communities, it always happens that the balance is against us as soon as they are completed? It is because we have nothing with which to trade; it is because the Minister of Finance was right when a few years ago, in negotiating with Australia, the first thing he did was to endeavour to increase the general tariff in order to have something to trade with. As it was, he was compelled to make a bargain, and it was a bargain as to which Mr. Bruce said he was wholly indifferent whether or not it was continued because, as he said, Canada would have to buy more and more goods in order to continue the benefits of that treaty. The point is that under existing tariff conditions and under our present fiscal policy, unrevised as it has been for so many years, this country is without any adequate weapon with which to enforce a trade treaty or carry out a bargain. No man knows that better than the minister himself, because he experienced it in Australia, and I think he is now finding it in Germany and in Czecho-Slovakia; I know that in other communities the same conditions prevail. If this country desires to bargain for trade on a business basis with foreign countries, it must have some economic weapon with which to enforce any position it may take with respect to their goods; until we are able to do that we will not be able to make bargains favourable to ourselves. In every case, with the exception of the two countries I have referred to, these bargains have been directly beneficial to those other countries but not to Canada. I observe further that even in connection with the negotiation of a treaty with Cuba, a despatch bearing date February 3, which was printed in the New York Times and also in the Montreal Gazette, said that the boards of trade of the British West Indies had met and stated that if any such preference were given Cuba, the British West Indies would have to alter their own position. I only mention that because it must have some bearing upon the empire trade to which the minister was referring. Hardly is it in his mouth to say that he is doing much for empire trade when the citizens of the British West Indies are gathering together to protest against this preferential treatment which is suggested for the island of Cuba. This would not seem to fit into the observations the minister was making a few minutes ago.

But, Sir, there is something more fundamental than these detailed figures dealing with this situation; there is at stake a principle of the utmost importance, and one that cannot be easily disregarded without serious results to the body politic. That principle is that we should never establish a channel of trade which may be destroyed at the caprice of a commercial enemy. Every time we open a channel of trade; every time we seek for our commerce an outlet; every time we develop for ourselves a means to send our trade and commerce to foreign lands, we place ourselves in a position where it may be possible for a foreign legislature to destroy that channel over night, with untold injury to the Canadian people. One example of that arose in western Canada a few short years ago. Everyone remembers when we had free access to the United States markets with our cattle, our wheat and our flour, under the Wilson tariff. When the Republican party came into power, however, at one stroke of the pen they destroyed that free access of our raw products to their markets and brought ruin and disaster to the Canadian rancher and stockman. I assert with certainty that any trade treaty which is subject to destruction at the caprice of a commercial enemy is fraught with grave danger to this Dominion. I ask hon. gentlemen to consider that, and I ask if they do not find it so. Can we afford to disregard the call of our domestic markets; can we afford to increase our imports from the United States and decrease our domestic production in order to establish a channel of trade say between Switzerland and Canada? Have hon. gentlemen looked at the figure with respect to little Switzerland, up in the mountains? I was very much amazed when I considered them the other day; I found that from Switzerland alone we imported last year goods amounting to $9,170,000, while we sold that country goods amounting to only $1,310,000. Can we afford to establish a channel of trade with that community? One may say that they run the risk of being shut out by us, but can we afford to establish any great channels of trade and commerce between the countries of the world and our own under treaties that may be destroyed in a single moment by a stroke of a pen, which will result in the dislocation of the whole commercial fabric of the country? That is the whole problem. We on this side of the House, rightly or wrongly, believe that every legislative weapon available to the hands of parliament should be utilized at all times for the preservation of the Canadian market for the Canadian people.

Furthermore, and it is on that point that there is an essential difference between us: My hon. friends opposite are more concerned with foreign trade; we are more concerned about domestic trade. They are concerned about developing channels of trade that take our ships, they say, to the seven seas; we are concerned with bringing people to Canada and giving them work to do in the development of our country and at a proper living standard of wages. These are the problems that concern this country, and on an analysis of the budget submitted together with the figures prepared by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) it must be apparent that every effort is being made to send our products to foreign lands and buy products produced by cheaper labour under less decent conditions from other countries in the world. Mr. Speaker, nothing is clearer than what that means to this democracy, nothing is clearer than what it means to this Dominion in the end. How can the Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Forke) invite people to these shores if they cannot find employment? The hon. member for Comox Alberni (Mr. Neill) the other day rose in his place and read from a paper that $3,330 had been spent in twelve days by Vancouver. For what? For food for the starving and unemployed. Why? Because there is no industrial life and there is no work for them to do, and there being no work for them to do the municipality had to expend $3,330 in twelve days, or about $300 a day, in providing food for the unemployed. And what is so in Vancouver is so in other communities, and yet the Minister of Finance talks about busy Canada. About busy Canada! He thinks of busy Canada importing manufactured products made in Switzerland and the United States of America.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): What would my hon. friend do with our surplus products in Canada while he was filling up the home market?

Mr. BENNETT: Sell them.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Where?

Mr. BENNETT: And what is more, speaking for myself personally, I would develop the markets that are imposed upon the country by the necessity of those who have to buy, as distinct from those who do it from choice. For those who seek Canada as a market from which to buy by choice are men who buy because they think they will get more favourable terms here than elsewhere, and the moment they do not they will go elsewhere. But I desire, in the future as in the past, to develop those markets with countries that seek our products from necessity, and Great Britain at the moment is one of them. Great Britain has to buy our wheat from necessity. She buys from the Argentine from necessity; she buys from India from necessity. Germany is buying to-day from us from necessity, but the day will come when Germany will have the choice between Russia and Canada and then the market that has been established for our goods will be destroyed with dire results to this country. That is the answer which I make to my hon. friend. I say further that there is such a thing as making haste too quickly. I admit that we are living side by side with the most powerful republic in the world, side by side with a people who are the richest in the world for the moment, and the great influence that they exercise upon our economic and commercial life is apparent to every thinking man. We all know that. But, sir, we have survived. Hostile tariffs we have met, hostile legislation we have met, and we have continued a free people making a name for ourselves among the nations of the world; and when they speak here about our status as a nation, I should like to think of our economic status as well. I should like to think it is possible—and this is a digression—that the combined wisdom and the genius for statecraft of the eminent men who guide the destinies of the British Empire are equal to the task of bringing about an economic union of the states of the British Empire that will more than compare with the United States of America. Such a policy may be premature at the moment, but I have had the idea in my mind for generations—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course not generations, but many years. At any rate I do think that the development of our home market and the building up of this country is a matter that we well may consider to be the work, not of a moment or a day, not of a month or a year, but the work of a generation or two if need be. Why, I remember—

Mr. ROBB: Before the hon. member passes from that subject. I agree with him to a great extent regarding empire trade but how would his present argument harmonize with his previous argument with respect to trade with Australia?

Mr. BENNETT: I am pointing out that the difficulty of our situation in the case of Australia was that there was nothing to trade with, and my hon. friend understood that better than anybody else. He desired to trade with them and they would not have it. That is the position with respect to that matter. When I speak with relation to the empire I realize at once the magnitude of the difficulties that have to be encountered, just as the Prime Minister pointed out the difficulties that had to be met in dealing with our constitutional status. So that with relation to the economic status of this Dominion and other parts of the empire, it is not a matter that can be solved in a single day, by this legislature or that of any other part of the empire. It is a matter that can only be solved by the common consent of all the parties affected and that would be brought about by a conference such as I suggested. I remember that the late Lord Long gave the better part of the last years of his life to dealing with that problem. He had gone into the detail of every article that was manufactured or produced in every part of the British Empire, and he had dreamed that there might one day be a self-contained empire between the different units of which there might be preferences and defy hostile foreign tariffs. But it is not a matter that can be realized, as I say, in a single day or in a year. It is a matter which must be considered by men of thought, vision and wisdom from every standpoint. Because, as I have said before, this country may endeavour to make progress too quickly. We have much to learn from the old land, much to learn from Great Britain, much to learn from the early pioneers. They did not make the British Empire in a day, and we cannot make this country a self-contained country in a single hour. I answer my hon. friend's question with respect to Australia in that sense. These matters must be dealt with as a whole and not as an isolated question, and the argument I made was the best argument in the world. Because if the British Empire had a tariff with which to deal with other nations then we could make a self-contained unit of it, and found a United States within the British Empire, even as the United States of America has been founded.

I have endeavoured with respect to trade to point out the real, essential difference between us but I want to go a step further and point out the conditions under which we are now trading. Do hon. gentlemen observe that the trade figures indicate the falling off in our exports? Do they realize that the figures for the last fiscal year showed that our exports had diminished as compared with the preceding year, and the trade figures brought down the day before yesterday by the Minister of Trade and Commerce indicate still further shrinkage in our exports to the world? That, I think, is important, it is signficant. The export trade of the United States has been falling. The export trade of Canada is falling. Why? Because the nations of Europe, the war-battered nations of Europe, are getting back to normal conditions, and as they get back to normal conditions and cultivate their soil, they are going to grow more and more of their food requirements and buy less and less from us, and we all know, whether we like it or not, that they are endeavouring at this moment to do it by every means in their power. Russia is once more coming back as a producing country with respect to grains and cereals. For that reason I view with the greatest apprehension, as a danger very serious in its consequences to this country, the diminution in our export trade. Let us look at the figures for January as submitted by the minister a few minutes ago. Those figures indicate a still further shrinkage in our export trade, and with a still further shrinkage in our export trade taking place as it is with the United States, what must be the result? We find the grand total of the export trade of this country for last January was $84,094,694 as against $84,718,819 in January, 1926. For the ten months ended in January the diminution is not a very large amount, it is true, but it is important. For that period our total export trade diminished from $1,115,416,734 to $1,106,018,792. What happens? If these nations in Europe that are buying our goods and those of other countries, find themselves in a position to supply their food and other requirements by their own efforts, it follows beyond all question that that will be a serious interference with the business of this country, and to the extent to which that trade is diminished, to that extent does it work a hardship upon the Canadian people. That hardship can be overcome only by the means which I have suggested, and I know of no other. None other has been suggested. That is the position with respect to the matter.

The minister next dealt with the question of reductions in taxation and I compliment him upon endeavouring to reduce taxation. A 10 per cent reduction in the income tax will undoubtedly effect some benefit, but I ask him whether the 10 per cent is applicable to the total tax the individual pays on the total schedule, or whether each percentage is to be reduced by 10 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: The total.

Mr. BENNETT: Then the benefit will not be as great as it would otherwise be, because the schedule varies with the extent of the income. A 10 per cent reduction on the different percentages would effect a greater benefit than a 10 per cent reduction on the total.

Mr. ROBB: My understanding is that when the statement is made out, the amount of the tax is calculated and then 10 per cent is taken off.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure that that will bring some measure of satisfaction to all the people of this country. I hope the income tax will be entirely abolished for reasons which I will presently give.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. BENNETT: I understand, because I have seen the resolutions of bodies of agriculturists in western Canada, and I propose to refer to those resolutions later, but for the moment I desire to congratulate the government on having made this reduction in the income tax.

With respect to the sales tax I can only point out that it has been a very difficult tax to administer, in the sense that it requires expert assistance and help for the purpose of determining in many instances what the tax should be. For example, I think nothing could be worse than to have goods brought in from England with a case containing them, upon which a duty is imposed, and then to have sales tax added to the value of the goods and case and the duty computed upon the total of the sales tax and the value of the goods and case. It is not sound to tax a tax, and under the present tariff regulations the sales tax is added to the cost of the article and the duty computed upon the sales tax and that cost. That is the present position. It would be in the interest of trade and the development of commerce that that should be removed if at all possible.

I regret the minister has not seen fit to afford any relief to those people who desire to make large contributions to deserving charitable objects. Mr. Gladstone in one of his great budgets discussed the question of freeing the income of charities from income tax, but that is not the situation here. In this new country where hospitals have to depend largely upon benefactions obtained from well-minded people, where, in cities like Montreal or Toronto, they maintain efficient hospitals, not at the expense of the public, but by reason of contributions made by their public-spirited citizens, this government might have well considered the idea of freeing from income tax contributions made for that purpose. I had hoped that the minister would do so, because after all the hospital deals with the poor, with the indigent, with the man unable to care for himself, and as regards these facilities that are now seeking millions of dollars in Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and other places, how are men going to make contributions if it costs $3,000 to give $10,000? That position is one of great seriousness, and while it may be too late now, I had hoped the minister would give it his favourable consideration. It is important in this country that men of wealth be philanthropic, but how can they be philanthropic if to give away $100,000 it costs them $35,000 or $40,000? The minister might have placed restrictions upon it, made it subject to his approval, or the approval of the government.

The same in the case with respect to education. There are men taking their place in this House to-day who have been able to get their education through the benefaction of one of the greatest and most illustrious statesmen of his age. What would have happened if his benefactions had been subject to an enormous imposition of income tax in South Africa? The subject is one of such a serious character that it might well have been given favourable consideration by the minister.

I leave that; but I now desire to proceed to a discussion of the general problem of taxation as I see it, because it is of the utmost importance that we should arrive at a clear understanding of the matter. This is only my personal view. Had I been differently situated I should have endeavoured to induce my colleagues to consider favourably the views which I now present to the House. The problem of taxation has been a difficult one in all ages and among all peoples. In the early days when votes were limited to men who had property, property only was taxed. The franchise was not held by all the people; it was held only by men of large incomes and of large estates. In some instances the landed people only had votes, and they only, you might say, paid taxes, their property paid taxes. But since the Great war there has been a tendency to increase taxation and to select everything possible for the purpose of imposing taxation upon it. No longer are we taxing thrift as we used to do; we are taxing what is to be. We are taxing turn-over and sales; we are imposing taxes upon business which we expect to come to us.

More than a century ago Adam Smith laid down certain principles with respect to taxation. At that time the franchise was held by a limited number of people. It is now held by all men of twenty-one years of age and women too of that age in Canada and the United States, and therefore the four principles he laid down are no longer entirely applicable to our condition, but they must be added to. He laid down four principles:

1. Equality of taxation.
2. Certainty of taxation.
3. Convenience of taxation.
4. Economy of taxation.

Those are the four principles which Adam Smith declared should be considered by all tax-levying bodies. But it seems to me that the time has come when a new principle must be added. I have followed with some interest in the days that are past the arguments advanced by leading tax experts in this country with respect to this matter, and I think the suggestion that has been made that universality is another principle to be applied, is a correct and proper one. In other words, if every man or woman has a right to vote in this country, we should if possible provide, as they did in the days of Adam Smith, that every person who votes to determine what form of government we shall have should also pay some tax. I do not care how little it is, they should make some contribution to the maintenance of our country's institutions.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Do I understand that the hon. gentleman is suggesting that everyone over twenty-one years of age under our present system of taxation does not pay a tax?

Mr. BENNETT: I am coming to that in just one moment. If my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) will hear the rest of it, he will realize what I have in mind. Not only should they be taxed, but, if possible, it should be a visible tax. The next principle is visibility. Universality and visibility.

Are there any hon. members in this House who do not realize that there are thousands of their constituents who have no realization of the taxation problem. How many men and women realize that they are paying taxes? How many elections have been run in this country on the question of taxation pure and simple? It is true that in England that is the case, but how many times in this country have the electors been asked to deal with the problem of taxation pure and simple? If you have a tax that is felt and known as a tax by every man and woman over twenty-one, a tax that is universal in its application, I am certain that it would do much to improve conditions in this democracy, and to improve the conditions under which we labour.

My idea is this. It is not original at all. You may have seen it presented by the late Sir Edmund Walker in addresses he made to the shareholders of his bank from time to time. He believed in a universal turn-over tax, a tax by which every man who buys something will be able to make some contribution, a known contribution, a percentage levy. It is simple, it is universal, it is convenient, it is equal, it is easily collected —it has all the qualifications that were mentioned by the late Adam Smith, and in addition to that it meets with modern conditions, and will help solve many of the difficulties that we have in this country today. Until men and women have a realization of the money that the state is spending, and where the money comes from, there will not be that intelligent appreciation of the difficulties and responsibilities of government that is so essential for the maintenance of this Dominion, and I do suggest that the Minister of Finance would be well advised to consider whether or not—there is still time—he could not devise some tax along those lines that would not have the objectionable features that attach to the so-called nuisance taxes or to the sales tax as such. As between the sales tax and a tax upon turn-over, which includes a tax upon everything that men buy, you would be able to get revenue more readily by a turn-over tax, and in larger quantities, and you would be able to make a decrease in the income tax without any difficulty in the world, because it is all a mistake, I say to my friends from the west, to think for a single moment when politicians go about the country and tell the people that taxation is all imposed on the rich man and none on the poor, that such is the case. It is not so. Every man makes a contribution to the state; everyone knows that is so. But if we impose a tax based upon the expenditures of the people, then, as the poor man has less to spend than the rich man, his contribution will be correspondingly less, but because he exercises the franchise he will make some contribution to the life of the state in the form of taxation.

I do say that it is a wholly erroneous proposition to say to the people of this country that the poor man should pay no taxes, and then say that he should vote. No man should vote who does not pay taxes, and every man who votes should pay taxes, and, as a corollary, every man who pays taxes should vote. I make that suggestion to my hon. friend, because it seems to me that this sixtieth anniversary of our confederation might be a reasonable time to consider the whole problem of taxation. Sir Edmund Walker urged it on the people of this country until he grew weary of so doing. We were more concerned in taxing people by methods and means that they could not see, than in providing taxation that they could see and understand, and to the extent to which the people are self-deceived in this matter, it is injurious to the country. I am certain of that. While it might seem to work a hardship with respect to some individuals, I am sure that in the end it would be found attractive, and would solve many of the difficulties that now confront us.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the hon. gentleman suggest that the extent of such a tax as he proposes would be visible?

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure my friend from Winnipeg North Centre will realize the soundness of the observation of the late Mr. Gladstone—"I cannot prescribe till I am called in." That is the only answer that I can make. I cannot say to what extent it would be made, because that would depend upon the necessities of the occasion. The revenue requirements of the country, with expenditures cut down to the limit, would determine what percentage of turn-over taxation should be imposed.

Let me proceed to the other question, one that is wrapped up in this whole problem, the question of our national debt. I wonder if the Minister of Finance could not devise a better means than he has suggested of dealing with this problem. I am going to offer to the House a suggestion as to the solution of the problem of our national debt, and I will ask the Minister of Finance to give it his most careful, I cannot say necessarily favourable, consideration.

We have in this country coming due this year, in 1927, a total debt of $100,505,650. Here let me say that the observations made by the Minister of Finance with respect to reduction in the national debt are hardly correct statements. They have been made by successive ministers of finance; they are found in the official gazette, but the truth is that the deadweight debt of this country was reduced last year by $43,000,000. The deadweight debt was reduced to the extent of $8,000,000 in treasury notes, and $35,000,000 of bonds, which were retired out of surplus earnings of the country—a total of $43,000,000. That $43,000,000 was a reduction in the deadweight debt of the country, but in the report that appears in the Canada Gazette, and in the statements made from time to time, we have reduction in debt, and increase in debt, that takes into account not only the deadweight debt of the country, but also the bank balances and the adjustments that take place from time to time in the department. Except as to the retirement of the $43,000,000, there has been no reduction in the deadweight debt of the country, because none of it came due, and the department has purchased none of the debentures or bonds in anticipation of their maturity. So I think it might be desirable in the future to show in the Canada Gazette the changes in the deadweight debt of the country. Every chancellor of the exchequer in England differentiates between deadweight debt and other obligations, and if we placed in the Canada Gazette a statement showing that the deadweight debt is the same to-day as it was on the 1st of January, that would be a correct statement because the deadweight debt has been reduced only by the retirement of $35,000,000 of bonds on November 1st, and a further $8,000,000 of treasury notes, making a total of $43,000,000.

I have an observation to offer to the House. I have given this matter considerable attention, but perhaps my solution will not commend itself at all to the House. We have $100,000,000 coming due this year. How are you going to meet that? Some we will pay out of surplus. How is the rest to be paid, and what rate of interest are the new obligations to carry? I propose, first, that the Minister of Finance should submit to parliament a bill to create a consolidated four per cent security of the Dominion of Canada, and I propose that the Canadian people should pay off that debt without being conscious of so doing.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What about visibility?

Mr. BENNETT: It is going to be very visible to the people who pay it, but the Canadian people themselves at the moment will not have to pay it. The visibility will come in, in a moment. First, has this House considered who are the great custodians of the wealth of this country? There are two great custodians—the chartered banks and the life insurance companies. The chartered banks to-day have money assets of approximately $2,900,000,000. The insurance companies doing business in Canada are custodians of assets of the Canadian people to the extent of $1,250,000,000. Do you realize, Sir, that the Canadian people have outstanding at this moment insurance on their lives aggregating $5,000,000,000? Do you realize that the revenue derived from the insurance on the lives of Canadians in Canadian companies will this year amount roughly to $215,000,000, and that the income of British and foreign companies operating in this country will amount approximately to $70,000,000; that the disbursements to be made by the Canadian companies will amount roughly to $130,000,000 and by the other companies, British and foreign, to approximately $40,000,000? So that this year we may say that the surplus money derived by the insurance companies from premiums upon the lives of Canadian citizens will amount to over $110,000,000. Those insurance companies really hold this money as trustees for their policyholders, because the law imposes upon the insurance companies the obligations of management and investment under such conditions as will ensure the return of between three and three and a half per cent.

Therefore I propose that the Minister of Finance should, after creating his four cent consolidated Canadian securities, provide by legislation that a percentage, to be hereafter determined, of the revenue of the insurance companies, amounting to a net total of over $110,000,000 this year, and from the deposits of the Canadian people in our savings banks, amounting approximately to at least another billion and three quarters, should be utilized for the purpose of paying off this $100,000,000. This four per cent security I would maintain at all times at par—a very simple process. Under our Finance Act, our Department of Finance operates practically as a federal reserve board and all that the insurance companies would have to do if they required additional money would be to deposit, either through their banks or with the Minister of Finance, the four per cent consolidated securities and receive the money from the federal reserve board. All that the banks would have to do would be what they have already been doing, as you will observe from the returns brought down by the Minister of Finance, deposit these securities with the Minister of Finance and obtain for them the money which enables them to carry on their business.

Now, Sir, if we adopted some such plan as this by which the savings of the people would be made available to take care of the obligations that mature this year, we will have done two things; first of all, we will have provided for those who have policies of insurance an unquestioned and stable security; secondly, we will have enabled the banks, who pay three per cent on their deposits, by purchasing a small quantity more in addition to the securities they now hold to add a measure of stability to their own assets. In addition to all that we will have provided that the interest upon that part of our loan which is not met out of surplus will be paid to Canadian people and not to foreigners. That I consider to be a matter of vast importance at this time. Lastly, we will have saved, not a million dollars as my hon. friend the Minister of Finance asserts, but by adopting such a plan we will have saved for the people of this country next year and the years following not less than $1,700,000.

I submit, Sir, that the time has come, for this parliament in the exercise of its unquestioned authority and power, to say that these deposits of the people should be utilized to the extent necessary to provide for the maturing obligations not met out of surplus. At the same time we would have created a security that would rank with the consols of England, a consolidated four per cent Canadian security that could be issued from time to time. Mark you, we have over a billion dollars of the national debt maturing before the end of 1937. If we took care of these maturing obligations in the manner I have suggested we would save to the Canadian people $15,000,000 per annum, which saving if utilized as an amortization fund would, within the period that England has fixed for the payment of her debt to the United States, retire the national debt of this country and leave us a country free of obligations.

Now, mark you, Mr. Speaker, I submit this not as embodying the views of my colleagues behind me, but merely as representing the views that I have arrived at after giving the matter some consideration and attention over a period of years, believing that if I had an opportunity I might be able to convince my colleagues of the soundness of such a measure, which, properly worked out, would assure, as I have said, stability to the savings of the people of this country, placing their security upon an unquestioned level of safety, and at the same time giving to the people the opportunity of having their resources utilized in reducing our national obligations incurred by reason of the war and its after effects.

Mr. DUNNING: Would my hon. friend permit a question before he leaves that subject? The percentage figure would, I take it, be rather vital in any such scheme. He has given a great deal of thought to the question, and I should like to have his view as to what percentage it would be necessary to levy.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the turnover tax?

Mr. DUNNING: No, this security. My hon. friend mentioned a percentage.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend the Minister of Railways has asked a very pertinent question. I say the life insurance companies have to make deposits, and those deposits are increased from year to year by reason of the increased business they transact, as my hon. friend knows. There is in force in Canada at the moment life insurance of not less than $5,000,000,000, and the assets of the life insurance companies amount to not less than a billion and a quarter dollars, and the surplus premiums available for investment by the life insurance companies during the year amount to not less than $110,000,000. The banks have not less than a billion and three-quarter dollars saving deposits, probably more, and if you take the loan companies and the provincial savings banks the total deposits probably amount to at least $2,000,000,000. Now, the only problem is the problem of an adjustment. I propose that each of the insurance companies and each of the banks should make up the balance of the hundred million dollars to be provided for this year after taking into account the surplus which I understand the Minister of Finance hopes will amount to about twenty million dollars. That would leave $75,000,000 to $80,000,000 to be distributed between the banks and insurance companies in consolidated four per cent securities. The banks and the insurance companies would suffer no loss, except a possible interest-earning power, because my friend the Minister of Railways must have observed from the last return of the Finance department with respect to the banks the vast unemployed sums of savings that they have in their hands. These would be available for that purpose. I would not deprive the banks of their earning power because they are paying three per cent on their deposits and would be getting four from this security. If they require more money to maintain the equilibrium between demand loans and demand deposits and between time loans and time deposits the federal reserve board—the Finance department—would provide for their requirements. It would be a continually revolving credit scheme. That is the conclusion at which I have arrived.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does the scheme involve setting up something of the nature of a federal reserve bank?

Mr. BENNETT: No, Mr. Speaker, because we already have it—the Finance department to-day is a federal reserve bank. I suppose my friend studies the bank returns in the Canada Gazette. If so, he will have observed that the banks from time to time are borrowing from the Finance department sums of money on deposit of bonds of the Dominion of Canada and other securities.

Mr. MANION: Under the Finance Act.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. That information was contained in an answer by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance to a question asked the other day by the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Irvine).

Mr. ROBB: I wonder if I understood my hon. friend clearly. Under his plan would we pass legislation to compel insurance companies to loan a certain amount of money at four per cent?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. ROBB: And if so, to that extent would it not reduce the profits to the policy holders?

Mr. BENNETT: I have endeavoured to point out that the object is not to compel the lending of money but to do in amplified form what we have now done, to make it compulsory that part of their investments shall be made in four per cent consolidated bonds of Canada. Undoubtedly, to the extent to which they utilized these four per cent securities, there would be a diminution in the interest rate, because the average rate earned by Canadian companies to-day is roughly over six per cent while that earned by American companies is approximately over five per cent. But we should select the form of investment.

I did not bring into the chamber with me from my room the insurance returns, but if hon. gentlemen are interested enough to examine the investments of the insurance companies they will find that they have a large number of just such securities—guaranteed Canadian Northern, guaranteed Grand Trunk Pacific, and some of our own securities. If we deal with the matter in the manner I have indicated it would only be doing what we did during the war; it would compel them to make investments of certain kinds. The government has already proposed in this session to increase the deposits made by these insurance companies. If my suggestion were carried out there would be some diminution in interest profits, but in view of the fact that there are such vast profits earned over and above the money necessary to take care of reserves at three and three and a half per cent, no hardship would be imposed upon the Canadian people, who would realize that their savings, although the profits of the life insurance companies might be affected—and as my hon. friend knows, life insurance is intended for protection rather than for profit—would be available for the whole of the people, while the trusteeship obligation imposed on the companies would be better discharged by reason of the stability and certainty of the securities.

Mr. MILLAR: Many of these insurance companies are also large mortgage loan companies. If I rightly understand the hon. member's suggestion, it would open up another field of investment. Would that not leave a shortage of money for business in other directions?

Mr. BENNETT: It would work no hardship on anyone with respect to this year, because we have only $100,000,000 coming due this year. Does my hon. friend realize that it cost us $3,000,000 for the flotation of loans last year? That amounts to three per cent on $100,000,000.

Mr. DUNNING: Merely for purposes of clarification, and summarizing my hon. friend's scheme, is it not really compelling the insurance companies and the banks to loan money to the government at four per cent regardless of the current rate?

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend has not correctly stated it.

Mr. DUNNING: I just want to have it put correctly; I am not indulging in any captious criticism.

Mr. BENNETT: By putting a question you think you expose a fallacy. I know you well enough.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. BENNETT: I was making an observation to the Minister of Railways which he quite understood; it was not necessary for the rest of the House to hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not compelling the banks nor the life insurance companies to lend their money; it is merely providing a trustee security that would prevent the occurrence of another Home Bank failure, for instance, or the breaking up of an insurance company as happened many years ago, because the rate reserved for interest on life insurance investments in this country is fixed by statute at less than four per cent, and it would leave a substantial profit, both to life insurance companies and to the banks, if my proposal were put into effect. I repeat, it is not compelling them to lend, but merely providing a compulsory trustee investment, which is but an amplification of the present provisions of the Life Insurance Act.

Mr. DUNNING: But a controlled rate of interest.

Mr. BENNETT: Just as Goschen carried through his great conversion scheme, and just as two chancellors prior to him were compelled to convert securities in England, so this country in the present moment of stress and strain should utilize the savings of the people in the interests of the whole population.

Mr. BROWN: I understood the hon. member to say that one effect would be to reduce the profits of the companies.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. BROWN: Is a further effect not likely to be an increase in the premium charged policy holders?

Mr. BENNETT: I am, of course, only elaborating a plan that has grown in my mind after some consideration, and it does not follow that the plan is at all sound in detail, for I have not worked out the details. However, replying to my hon. friend, let me point out that the premium rates now charged, with the present rate of interest reservation as provided by statute, yield an ample surplus which results in large profits; and the effect of the diminution of profits could not possibly work a hardship upon anybody while it would be to the advantage of the Canadian people. We did it during the war. We imposed that restriction then with respect to deposits of life insurance companies and their investments.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have trespassed a considerable time on the attention of the House, and while I have covered a good deal of ground there are many matters to which, in detail, I shall find it necessary to devote some attention when the resolutions are before us in committee. May I before concluding point out that although there have been fifty-two references to the tariff advisory board there are no recommendations from that board before the House for consideration. A year has gone by and no provision of any kind is forthcoming with respect to the deliberations and the findings of the board. Why was the budget introduced nine days after the reassembling of parliament? I will tell you why, Mr. Speaker. Pressure on the part of those people who are vitally interested in the tariff was so strong that the Minister of Finance had either to yield or to deliver his budget and get away from the agony. He chose to deliver his budget and so obtain some relief, as of course he had a right to do. Now, while budget speeches in days gone by have been delivered early in the session—a reference to the dates will show this—I can recall no session in which the budget has been delivered virtually nine days after parliament has met. And the only reason the minister can have for bringing down his statement so hastily this year must be his desire to escape embarrassment in relation to the tariff advisory board. The board can, of course, take no action; it can but state the facts, and when the facts are made known it is for the minister to act. And the minister, with his high regard for Canadian industry, with busy Canada ever in his mind, thought it better to avoid dealing with those complex problems that have been submitted, fifty-two in number, for the consideration of the board, of which references, I learned this morning, thirteen had been disposed of. Returns have been made in respect of thirteen of the fifty-two, but of these we have none before the House now for study. In the absence of any information on the subject we are now told that the tariff continues.

How rests it with the Minister of Immigration? I wonder whether in the dark recesses of his mind he ever reflects upon those halcyon days gone by, when from this side of the House he unburdened his logic and free trade sentiments upon an admiring House? I wonder how my well known protectionist friend, the Minister of Finance, is able now to induce the Minister of Immigration to believe that, after all, all is well in Israel. There are no changes; the status quo must continue. Where then are the tales of that ancient past, that long ago when vituperation and the thunderings of the Minister of Immigration and some of his friends reverberated through this chamber? What has become of it all? Gone, forgotten, remembered no more. And why? Because the hon. gentleman has been taken into camp and all is well in Israel. At any rate, it does occur to me that we see therein an excellent reason why this budget is being introduced at this early stage. I congratulate the Minister of Finance upon his decision to make no further attacks upon Canadian industry. I congratulate him upon the courage he has shown in retaining the one legislative weapon whereby he may protect the Canadian workman and see to it that he gets something to do. I congratulate him upon his desire to see that Canadians shall be occupied instead of being idle. But I say, Mr. Speaker, that this country must have more people; otherwise it cannot continue to function as a nation. You can only get more people in this country by making it more desirable for men to live in, and you can only make it more desirable to live in by providing work for the men who come to live here. Why do not my hon. friends cheer now?

Mr. DUNNING: I did. It is your method I do not like.

Mr. BENNETT: My friends emulate it so often that they must indeed admire it. But in all seriousness let me ask how we can hope to get people into Canada; how does the minister hope to get additional people into Canada?

Mr. FORKE: They are coming.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, and in a consul's office the other day I saw a list of those who desired to leave; when my hon. friend says they are coming, they are coming to go. We are becoming a community where these people seek an abiding place until they may find a home to our south. That, Sir, we must stop, and we can only stop it by giving employment to our people, and we can only give employment to them if industry is profitable and productive. I fully respect the opinions of others in this matter, but I do know that the reading of those figures during the last two days has convinced me that we are buying millions and millions of dollars worth of goods, in fact hundreds of millions of dollars worth, from foreign countries, giving employment to foreigners and in many instances to Canadians who have left this country when we should be giving employment to our own industrial workers.

I am satisfied that the minister will not be able to keep people in this country unless we make a determined effort to develop our great natural resources rather than export them in the raw state. Rather than do that we must manufacture and fabricate them ourselves and so give employment to our citizens so that they will be able to become Canadians and make their homes here. I know the difficulty of that problem; I have not lived in western Canada for all these years for nothing. I have heard the farmer declare time after time that he has to sell his wheat in the open market and he should buy his goods there. But we must realize now that we must so adjust our commercial and financial system as to meet successfully the competition of the world in our markets, unless we are to become hewers of wood and drawers of water and send our raw material out of this country to give employment to the workmen of other lands.

The fact remains, Sir, that this country has made progress under just such a system, and to the extent that we have interfered with it the country has gone back, as the population shows. The greatest indictment that can be brought against the Canadian people and Canadian governments is that we have not been able to retain the people we have brought here, let alone take care of our own natural increase. But in my judgment we have made the greatest contribution to history, in one sense, that the world has ever known. There has never been a people so few in number, inhabiting a country so vast, who have accomplished so much. We have provided facilities by railways and canals for 25,000,000 people; we have envisioned a future of hope and faith, yet the fact remains that the great years of our struggle are now upon us.

The courage, the enterprise, the resourcefulness and fortitude of the Canadian people have made possible this Dominion. For sixty years we have grown in stature, in power and in position in the world, but reading the figures of to-day in the light of world history we must determine one of two things. We must decide whether from choice we will permit our resources to be diverted into foreign channels or whether, with courage and fortitude, we will continue to plough our furrow and go our appointed way, building slowly but surely, knowing—aye, knowing—that the day is not far distant when the very people whose high tariffs and offensive legislation have kept us out of their markets will have to come to us for the raw materials on which to subsist. That is one great vision before the Canadian people.

I congratulate my friend the Minister of Finance to-day; he has yielded to no importunities and to no pressure; he has at least maintained his faith in the fiscal system under which this country has grown great, and on the maintenance of which its future integrity depends.

On motion of Mr. Coote the debate was adjourned.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): I desire now to move that on and after Monday, February 21, the order for the consideration of the motion for Mr. Speaker to leave the chair for the House to go again into committee of ways and means have precedence over all other business except the introduction of bills, government orders, questions and notices of motion for the production of papers, until disposed of.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Do I understand now that the debate is adjourned until Monday?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

DIAMOND JUBILEE OF CONFEDERATION

PROPOSED NATIONAL COMMITTEE

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 65, to incorporate a national committee for the celebration of the diamond jubilee of confederation.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—incorporation:

Mr. WOODSWORTH: When the motion on which this bill is based was before the House I took some exception to the activities as outlined of this proposed committee, as well as with its personnel. It seems to me in the first place that this is an excessively large amount for a celebration which, as far as we can determine, will consist very largely of flag-waving, especially when we do not have, as at the present moment, a distinctly Canadian flag to wave. It seems to me that if the people of Canada wish to celebrate a great event such as this, a considerable number of voluntary contributions might be available, and then all the money would not be taken directly out of the pockets of the people. I am quite well aware that in the budget speech a good deal has been said, as usual, about the prosperity of the country, but I also remember that we have at present absolutely no provision for the very considerable number of people unemployed at this particular time in Canada, and whenever we introduce a measure calling for social legislation to meet needs of this character we are told that the finances of Canada are not in a position to stand the strain. I submit that as long as there is a single person in need in this country we ought not to go into an extravagant expenditure of this character. We have just passed through the Christmas season, when the most pathetic appeals were made in almost every city of this country by charitable institutions of all kinds for the relief of the poor and the distressed. I take it, Mr. Chairman, that these considerations ought to be in our minds before we accede to the suggestion that has been made by the government in regard to this matter.

We read that in the olden days when the Jews wanted to celebrate a jubilee, they allowed the debtors and the slaves to go free. I would suggest that something of that kind might very well mark a celebration of nature. We have an enormous national debt. If we could in some way get rid of a proportion of that debt it would permit of a great deal more rejoicing than we would have under a scheme of this character. In the days of feudalism when there was a great celebration we are informed that they roasted a whole ox and allowed everybody to come to the feast. In this instance we are preparing for very elaborate and somewhat exclusive celebrations. It is something like asking a few people to a turkey dinner who quite habitually dine on chicken. As I read the long list of dignitaries and functionaries, with the exception of the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) of course, I notice there are a very large number who occupy official positions, and I submit that the great majority of the people of Canada will have very small opportunity to participate in these festivities. We are inviting outside visitors, accustomed to very frequent celebrations, and will provide very elaborate entertainment for them, but what about the mass of the people across the country who will pay the bills? The Prime Minister told us the other day that the committee was generally representative. I observe that there is a long list of names, but I am not sure that the committee is representative of the rank and file of the people. The Prime Minister also told us that it would not do to put any representative of labour, for example, on the committee as that would amount to class representation. I note, however, that the names of the president of the Canadian National railway and the president of the Canadian Pacific railway appear in the list. Mr. E. W. Beatty, the president of the latter organization, said the other day in a pamphlet which was published by the Canadian Pacific Company that the Canadian Pacific was Canada's first citizen. If that statement goes unchallenged —and I had rather thought the Prime Minister himself might be considered Canada's first citizen—and if the Canadian Pacific is Canada's first citizen it is quite fitting that the president should be on this committee. But if the president of a private corporation is to be on this board there is no reason why the president or other officials of leading public organizations should not be there also. If the celebration is to be truly educational in its character, and I have gathered from the public announcement that such is to be the intention, it is quite fitting that there should be representatives of the organized teachers on the committee. I observe that there is to be a representative of the Canadian Battlefields Memorial Association. Looking to the future of the Canadian people I fancy that the presence on the board of some of the teachers of the country would be of immensely greater importance than that of the president of the Canadian Battlefields Memorial Association. On the committee there are also to be representatives of several women's organizations, among them the Imperial Order of Daughters of the Empire. I have no particular objection to this society being represented, but I would submit that whilst this organization numbers a membership of a few thousand, there are other groups of people in this country who number hundreds of thousands. I think of some of our newer citizens, hundreds of thousands of whom have located in this country—for example the Ukrainians. Perhaps eastern people hardly realize the extent to which our immigration policy has brought to this country, for good or bad, a large alien population. These people are now located in Canada and playing the part of good citizens. I am glad to note that we have one representative of the Ukrainians sitting in this very corner of the House. He is simply the forerunner of scores of others who will be here very soon, and other nationalities will have their representatives. What about these people in connection with such a celebration as this? I submit that if it is right to have a representative of the Imperial Order of Daughters of the Empire, we might also, looking to the future unification of the peoples of this country, have a representative from the newer Canadians who are locating in such great numbers in western Canada.

I do not want to labour the matter, but if we are to have a celebration I would urge that it be made distinctly educational in character, and instead of consisting largely in the glorification of what our forefathers did sixty years ago it might be made a means for binding together the different parts of this Dominion and for remedying some of the weaknesses and evils which exist even under the system of confederation.

Miss MACPHAIL: I had not the slightest idea that labour had been refused a place on this committee. Nor did I know, until one of the hon. members in this corner mentioned the fact to me, that my name is on the committee. I love Canada. There is nothing odd about that because it is my native land. I have never lived in any other country, and I do not intend to, I would like very much to have Canada happy and merry at this diamond jubilee, but I would also wish it to take stock of itself. If we could have a celebration free from these crazy military parades I should like it very much. The visitors who are coming to us for the celebration should be impressed with the importance of the work we are doing—I do not mean the people here but the people back home; and if the visitors are in a position to learn something of our industries, something about the fine work our people have done, something of our possibilities for the future, I should be very glad indeed to be identified with such a celebration. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Woodsworth) was quite right when he said that we are asking people to a banquet who have too many banquets, whereas those who, possibly, have not even enough food, certainly not enough of beauty or culture or the more delectable things of life, will not have any part in this celebration. I want to protest against the using of my name without my consent because I am the representative of a class group. I represent agriculture. If I do not, I represent nothing at all, and if I cannot go on the committee as the representative of a class, I will not go on at all, because that is the whole philosophy of my political life. If labour has no place on the committee, then I say agriculture will have no place either, and I ask that my name be withdrawn.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Might I say to my hon. friend (Miss Macphail) that in proposing that her name be inserted as one of the national committee, I did so because she holds a distinguished and historic place in this country as the first woman to be a member of the parliament of Canada, and it is as a member of the parliament of Canada, which represents all classes, all creeds, and all the people of this Dominion, that I hope she will allow her name to remain. I did not ask her permission; I have not asked the permission of any one whose name is on this list. I refer to myself because I have a certain special responsibility in presenting the names of the national committee. Some beginning has to be made with the organization of a celebration if there is to be a national one. The government might have taken the matter in hand and dealt with it departmentally. The Department of Trade and Commerce or my own office—that of Prime Minister—might have undertaken, so far as the government was concerned, the carrying out of the celebration. We felt, however, that it would be more in accord with the wishes of the people of Canada generally if the matter were treated, not as a departmental or party matter, but as broadly national in character and we therefore are seeking to have a national committee organized.

As I explained the other night, to get a representative committee of any size organized, some group of individuals have to be brought together to undertake the preliminary work of organization. The government was faced with the alternative of having a committee that would be chosen because of the representative character of the persons who are on it, having regard to what we refer to as an official list, or of seeking to embrace in one committee all the societies and organizations that might wish to have representation on a body of the kind. When one began to go over the lists of the different organizations, one was confronted immediately with a variety of considerations. Education, for example, comes under the jurisdiction of the provinces; if the educational institutions of one province were to be put on the provisional committee then we would have to have on the committee representation from the educational organizations of every province.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Why not?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Because all that kind of representation will be worked out by the executive committee that will have the actual celebration in hand. I am coming to that phase. I am seeking now to explain that the purpose of the government in putting the names it did on the list is simply to form an incorporated body that will have authority to form an executive, which executive will be charged with the duty of carrying out whatever arrangements may be thought best to make the celebration all that my hon. friends opposite would wish it to be.

Let me come to the next consideration, the matter of religious organizations. I assume that religious organizations will wish to take part in the celebration of the diamond jubilee. If we begin on a provisional committee to include one religious organization, then we shall have to include the others. I have at the moment before me a letter received from the Catholic Women's League of Canada, a very important organization, requesting that the name of the president of that organization should be added. I have no objection; in fact I would like very much to see the name of that lady added to the list. But if her name is added, immediately there will be some Protestant organization that will feel that it should be represented, and the name of its president will have to be included. All denominations will be demanding representation on religious grounds. If we take the patriotic societies, there are the St. Andrew's society, the St. Patrick's society, the St. George's society, the St. Jean Baptiste society, and other organizations that will undoubtedly be participating when the week of celebration arrives. If we are to have the heads of all these organizations on a provisional committee to form an executive, one can see in a moment that the numbers will be unwieldy. What the government has done is to take for the personnel of the national committee those whom the citizens of this Dominion themselves have so to speak decided should be, in this particular year, the representative citizens of the Dominion. Their Excellencies the Governor General and Lady Willingdon are here in a representative capacity. The lieutenant governors who are at present in office happen to be the lieutenant governors of this year and their names have been included without regard to who they are or from what party they may have come. The premiers of the different provinces are included, not because they belong to any particular party or are interested in any political group, but because they happen in this year, 1927, to be the premiers of the different provinces. A certain number of members have been chosen who are privy councillors, in some cases because they are members of the present government; in others because of membership in previous administrations. In two or three cases in particular names have been inserted because they are those of the oldest members of the Canadian parliament. The names are chosen from different political parties so that no one party will be in a position to control the situation. The presidents of the railways have been chosen for the reason that in the matter of preliminary organization probably no advice will be more helpful to a committee than that which can be given by the executives of our great railway organizations. Moreover, we may have occasion during this celebration to expect a good deal of the two great railway systems, and I think the recognition of their presidents on this provisional committee is one that will commend itself pretty generally to the country.

May I make it perfectly clear that there has been no desire to exclude anyone? The idea as regards names has been simply to find a representative group which will comend itself to the country at large because of its representative character as a group that can be entrusted with the duty of selecting an executive. The executive will then begin to discover all of the organizations in Canada that wish to participate in the celebration and will seek to make the celebration what public opinion undoubtedly will expect it to be. There is no question that the educational side of the celebration will be the first and main feature of it, and that every effort will be made by the executive committee to link up every Canadian organization that should be included. But that is a task which an executive committee is much better able to carry out than a very large committee. I repeat that it would be extremely difficult to suggest any committee from which a very large number of most appropriate names would not be excluded. I wish to emphasize to the committee the fact that the only purpose of the government is to secure a representative body that can be entrusted with the expenditure of whatever money there may be in connection with the national celebration of the diamond jubilee of confederation in a manner that will be likely to accord with the desires and wishes of the people of Canada as a whole.

Miss MACPHAIL: Is it true that no person who really represents the ranks of labour is on this committee?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has just told us that she does, and her name is on.

Miss MACPHAIL: I represent agriculture.

An hon. MEMBER: Is that not labour?

Miss MACPHAIL: I mean industrial labour. I represent agriculture. I understood the Prime Minister to say that it was not because of that I was on the committee but because I was the first woman member in the House of Commons. While parliament does represent all classes of the people, I am here as a result of organized agriculture and I must represent them on the committee or not represent anything. If it is true that the ranks of industrial labour, indeed all classes of labour, are not represented on the committee in any official capacity, I do not feel that I can allow my name to remain. I do not like to say that, but the great difficulty of the labour classes, including agriculture, has been that too many of the people who represent them, on the first agreeable opportunity, get out of their class into a more comfortable one, and so, even at the expense of seeming foolish to the House of Commons, I would not appear to do so. Looking over the names here, I see they do not belong to my class, and unless I can go in as one of my own people I would not care to go in at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Might I suggest to the hon. member, as it is now nearly six o'clock, that perhaps between six and eight she would have a word with some of those who are associated with her at the moment in discussing this matter, and give me the names of two or three persons who would be representative of the classes they would wish to have represented. I shall then be happy to move in committee that those names be added.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose at six o'clock it was considering a bill to incorporate a national committee for the celebration of the diamond jubilee of confederation, to cost $250,000. I fail to see that there is any demand from the people of Canada for a celebration of the sixtieth anniversary of confederation. Why should we spend $250,000 of the taxpayers' money for such a celebration when several hundred thousands of our citizens over in the United States will celebrate the anniversary of the Declaration of Independence on the fourth of July? Probably the Liberal party feel the need of celebrating their great victory of last September. We on this side of the House have not much to celebrate, but we hope to have in the years to come. We are not a practical people.

We cannot solve our most common economic problems. Talk about spending $250,000 on a diamond jubilee celebration! Mr. Chairman, let me tell you that there are over 160,000 returned men in the United States to-day who fought for their country on the battlefields of France and Flanders—a country that they have had to get out of. More than 50,000 of those gallant men lie buried where they fell fighting for France. Six thousand men from Toronto, many of them Orangemen, lie dead there. They fought for France and the French language, a land that expelled the Huguenots, and as I say, many of them were from Tory and Orange Toronto.

The only demand for this celebration is from a lot of Canadian clubs that are no more Canadian than Empire clubs are imperial. If this $250,000 is intended to celebrate the brilliant dream of empire under the principle of separatism, to emphasize our new status, all very well and good, let the Prime Minister put it in the preamble of the bill. But why celebrate the sixtieth anniversary of confederation? Confederation has not been such a shining success that we should desire to spend $250,000 on its celebration. With the economic problems now confronting this country I see no occasion to shout from the housetops about our status and our diamond jubilee.

I hold in my hand, Mr. Chairman, a book containing an attack on Sir John Macdonald, one of the pillars and founders of confederation, written by W. Stewart Wallace, librarian of the university of Toronto. This is the kind of textbook that is used in the university of Toronto, a textbook attacking the great founder of confederation. Perhaps to be fair to the professor I should read his actual words:

> There are few figures in Canadian history on whom the historian finds it more difficult to pass judgment than on Sir John Macdonald. In his lifetime he was either loved or execrated; and to this day opinion is divided with regard to him.
> Those who contend that his was a pernicious influence in Canadian history are not without reasons for their belief. He had some grave faults. He was for many years addicted to the heavy drinking habits of his day and generation, and his behaviour was not always such as befitted the prime minister of a great dominion. He did very little to raise the moral tone of political life in Canada during his lifetime, or afterwards. He studied human nature, as Goldwin Smith said, "perhaps too much on the weak side". If he was a past master in the management of men, it was by playing on their foibles and weaknesses, rather than by appealing to their better natures. Though himself above the acceptance of a bribe, he was not above the indirect bribery of other men. There was, indeed, in the rough-and-tumble of political warfare, hardly a weapon in his armoury which he would not use. The "Pacific Scandal", the gerrymander of 1882, the Dominion Franchise Act of 1885—these are only illustrations of the lengths to which he was prepared to go.

That is a straight libel on the great founder of confederation, the man who made this country what it is to-day, the man who put protection on the statute books. And we are asked to pay $250,000 of the people's money on a celebration of the diamond jubilee of confederation when one of its principal founders is thus libelled by an employee of the Ontario government, a professor in the university of Toronto! If the Canadian clubs and the Empire clubs want to have such a celebration let them pay for it. As I say, we on this side have not much cause to indulge in a celebration. And I admit that our United Farmers of Ontario friends are pretty much in the same position in view of the two last general elections in the province of Ontario; they have nothing to celebrate. But if they do wish to celebrate, let them hold forth banners with such inscriptions as, "Platforms are to get in on, not to stand on." "Free trade for Canada." Free trade for Canada, Mr. Chairman, has driven hundred of thousands of our men to the United States where on the next fourth of July they will help celebrate the Declaration of Independence.

I am not a bigoted Conservative; I am a very moderate party man, because there is a lot of good on the other side of the House as well as here. Our friends opposite secured a majority at the last election, and we have to be good enough sports to congratulate them on their victory, we have to be good enough sports to admit that they are a pretty good looking body of men, from the young Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice —a handsome young man—to their humblest member. We admit over here that we have not much to celebrate. We put our party in the cemetery last September, and once you get in a cemetery, whether you are an individual or a political party, nothing but a miracle will get you out.

[Mr. Church.]

Here is another textbook which is put into the hands of the school children of the province. Let us see what it has to say:

After the election of 1887, Mr. Blake retired from the leadership of the Liberals, and then they chose a man destined to play a part in Canada second only to that of Macdonald. Perhaps the most striking characteristic of Wilfrid Laurier was his courtly manners. Politics in Canada had lacked the graces of life. Such terms as "trickster", "imbecile", "traitor", were too often heard; Macdonald himself once called an opponent in parliament a pup and threatened to "slap his chops." Laurier, however, bore himself with stately dignity. He was never off his guard, and his sternest denunciations were always on a high level of refinement. Men were, indeed, tempted to think him a dreamy scholar, while, in fact, he could, as need arose, be stern and strong. It was something that, at a time when racial and religious feeling was acute over the Riel question, a French-Canadian and a Roman Catholic should be chosen as sole leader of the Liberal party. In earlier days a French leader like Cartier had had to share authority with an English-speaking colleague; but national unity in Canada had grown, and now, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, the Liberals followed Laurier and in the end carried him into power.

I have nothing whatever to say against the Liberal party. They will be welcomed in Toronto at any time, and I may tell hon. gentlemen that that city has no bigotry. Sir Wilfrid Laurier was popular in Ontario among the Conservatives as well as the Liberals and he gave the country what he thought was good government. But it will be seen from this quotation what sort of literature is put into the hands of the school children.

Now, I fail to see what we have to celebrate. We are not practical people. Here we are proposing to celebrate confederation and the government apparently fails to consider the situation of the returned men. What room is there for rejoicing when you think of the position of these men and when you reflect upon the hundreds of thousands of our Canadians who have been driven across the border into the United States to look for jobs as a result of the free trade policy of the government? About the only people who are getting any really good jobs are the members of the committee of ambassadors which this government has appointed, ambassadors to all the countries in the seven seas, one of whom has just gone to Washington. I say, there is nothing for us to celebrate, and the Canadian people are not given to that sort of thing. The only occasion on which you can get a decent parade in Toronto is the twelfth of July, not the first. Then you can muster from twelve to fifteen thousand people in the parade. Strange as it may seem, many of those who view the great walkout and attend the picnic at Exhibition park are Catholics. But apart from that, parades generally are a flat failure. And in any case the first of July is not by any means an ideal time for any great demonstration. The weather is too hot.

I have nothing to say against the men and women who are selected for this committee. But there are thousands of our citizens in the United States who will look with mixed feelings upon this celebration. It seems to me that we ought to make some attempt to settle our economic problems with a view to preventing the further exodus of Canadians to the United States, and let those who want to celebrate pay for it. The money could be spent to far better purpose in giving employment to needy men generally, and particularly to our returned soldiers. Many of our returned men sacrificed all they had in the interests of the country and now they are getting a raw deal. The Canadian clubs which are behind this movement are no more Canadian than the imperial clubs are imperial. This $250,000 will be spent on a few banquets, the playing of a few party tunes, and generally the raising of a great hullaballoo, and everybody will be saying what a huge success confederation has been. That is all very well; but has confederation been such a success when you come to think of it? Does the Duncan report lead us to think so? Are all these various problems which are pressing for a solution likely to be settled in such a way as they would be if confederation were so successful as to warrant the celebration contemplated? I know a lot of people who will celebrate the confederation of Canada. They are the American millionaires who have come over here and seized our waterpowers to exploit the products of our forests, mines, and other resources. Canada is the happy hunting ground of such people and these American millionaires will certainly shout loud hurrahs, for they have reason to do so. I do not blame the Dominion government for having given away the resources of the country which we Canadians ought to develop for ourselves. The provincial premiers are in many instances to blame. In Ontario, at any rate, various premiers have surrendered to the American millionaires more territory than was given away to favoured people in the time of George III.

I have said before, and I repeat it on this occasion; what this country needs is a Mussolini who will stand up firmly for the rights of the people and protect our interests in various directions, in lumbering, fishing, mining, agriculture and so forth against encroachment from outside. What has Mussolini done for his country? Let me quote one very significant statement of his: "We have translated into action what we promised in words." Have we ever heard of any prime minister here translating into action what he promised in words? Mussolini says:

> A recent example of how the spirit of silent work has thoroughly saturated our people is shown in the construction of the new railroad along the Ionian sea in Calabra. The work of constructing this railroad has gone on silently and laboriously for many months. Thirteen new and extensive bridges have been built, and yet not in a single case was there a speech delivered, whereas formerly such events were accompanied by orations and the blare of trumpets, the clapping of hands and great shouts of joy. The joy was there and the events popular, but no speeches overdid it with useless words.

Mr. SMITH (Stormont): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. Just what bearing has this discussion?

Mr. CHURCH: They don't celebrate in Italy. They do things. I am referring to the way they do things in Italy. Even if there were a constituency of Long Lake there, they would not spend money in it for a celebration like this. Actions speak louder than words.

The CHAIRMAN: I was just going to ask my friend to address his remarks a little more closely to the matter before the committee.

Mr. CHURCH: I think I am quite in order, Mr. Chairman, and if necessary I can cite the authorities. When we come to that particular section I would like to make a motion that the amount to be spent be reduced to $1,000, because the people are opposed to such extravagance by the government. We are spending $250,000 on a celebration when we have nothing to celebrate. Are we to celebrate the exodus or our new status, this new dream of empire under which we are a separate country and can make our own treaties, under which we have an ambassador going down to Washington? Are we to spend $250,000 of the taxpayers' money to celebrate our becoming the Mexico of the north?

I could go on almost indefinitely, but I would suggest to the Prime Minister that during the celebration a portrait of the board of strategy, accompanied by a portrait of the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Forke) should be unveiled and would probably be suitable for presentation to the museum. I might also suggest that a portrait of Sir Henry Thornton, who, according to the subsidized press of this country, was the real discoverer of this country instead of Christopher Columbus, should be unveiled at the same time. With the rate of taxation in Canada going up by leaps and bounds, with the income tax and sales tax as high as they are, we should postpone the celebration until such time as we can solve our own problems and prevent this country from becoming the happy hunting ground of a lot of American millionaires who are picking up timber limits, water power, mines and pulpwood areas, and in doing so driving hundreds of thousands of men from Canada to another country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: At six o'clock I mentioned to the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) that if she and the hon. members who sit around her would give me the names of two or three representative personages to be added to the committee I would be pleased to do so provided they were of a character which would make the committee more acceptable to all parties in the House. The names handed me were those of Mr. Tom Moore, President of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada; Mr. M. J. Coldwell, President of the Canadian Teachers' Association; Mr. Henry Wise Wood, President of the United Farmers of Alberta and Mr. Michael Luchkovich, one of the hon. members of this House. I might say that Mr. Luchkovich is one of the first members to come into the House representing a large number of citizens from foreign lands who have become naturalized Canadians, and it was thought that his name on the committee would appeal to many of our naturalized citizens. To those names I would suggest that we add the names of Mr. George F. Edwards, President of the Canadian Council of Agriculture and Hon. Cyrille F. Delage, President of the Council of Public Instruction of the province of Quebec. Those names will make the committee more representative and I hope hon. members will feel that with these additions the committee will be sufficiently representative to commend itself to the House generally. I therefore beg to make the following motion:

That the following words be inserted in clause 2 after the word "Canada" in the fortieth line of page 2 of the bill:

Tom Moore, Esquire, President of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada;

Michael Luchkovich, Esquire, M.P.

Mr. J. Coldwell, Esquire, President of the Canadian Teachers' Federation.

Hon. Cyrille F. Delage, President of the Council of Public Instruction of the province of Quebec.

Henry Wise Wood, Esquire, President of the United Farmers of Alberta.

George F. Edwards, Esquire, President of the Canadian Council of Agriculture.

[Mr. Church.]

Mr. McGIBBON: I have not the least objection to the motion nor have I any objection to the names mentioned, but I do think the Prime Minister has demeaned himself and his position after the statement he made before six o'clock, when he said that it was not his intention to have on this committee the representative of any class; now he comes into the House and moves for such representation. I might point out to him, if I so desired, that on this list there are no names representing the men who served overseas. I am not suggesting that such names should be added; I think the Prime Minister was right in his contention that this should be a committee representative of Canadians, not of class, and I much deprecate the change in his attitude.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As far as demeaning myself is concerned, I may say to the hon. member who has just spoken that I am quite prepared to do that again if I can help to bring about unanimity in this House in a matter that seems simple justice. Hon. members looking over the names originally presented will recognize the fact that the two old political parties, so-called, are very largely and in fact almost exclusively represented therein. In this House are others belonging to a group representing a considerable portion of this country, and from that group I have received certain of these names not as representatives of class but as the representatives of many of those of our fellow citizens who, in the opinion of that particular group, will thereby be given an added interest in the work of the committee. With regard to the returned soldiers, I think if the hon. member will read over the names he would find among them that of Lieutenant General Sir Percy Lake, K.C.B., K.C.M.G., President of the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League. This organization, I understand, embraces the various returned soldiers' organizations and it is in that representative capacity that the name of Sir Percy Lake has been inserted. There are also the names of Major General Mewburn, and one or two others who will be quickly recognized as representative of the men who served overseas. In addition my hon. friend will find among those who are named a very considerable number who were quite as active in the war as we all know he himself was. I think, therefore, the interests of all have been carefully taken care of.

Mr. McGIBBON: These appointees were asked for as class representatives. That is what I object to.

Miss MACPHAIL: May I voice my appreciation of the kindness of the Prime Minister? When I said, possibly quite shortly, this afternoon that I did not know who had used my name without asking my consent, I may have appeared somewhat unkind but I had no such intention. However, so much was said in the budget as to the whole prosperity of Canada depending upon agriculture and industry that one could not help thinking that a committee to be representative of the whole Dominion must include some of these people. I appreciate very much what has been done, which I think is only fair, and if we use this opportunity to help other people in other parts of the world to understand Canada and at the same time use this movement to arouse in Canadians a pride in their own country and a national spirit—a spirit that will help us to go on and meet the troubles or the problems of the future—we surely can do much for our country. I hope that as one of the committee I may be of some slight assistance.

Motion agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Objects.

Mr. ADSHEAD: May I point out to the Prime Minister that among the objects of the corporation is the administration and distribution of the grant mentioned and any further grant or grants hereafter made. Clause 14 provides that a sum not exceeding $250,000 is to be paid towards defraying the expenses of the corporation. Does the reference to grants hereafter made contemplate grants to be made by this parliament?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The last clause to which my hon. friend referred indicates the amount that parliament is appropriating by this bill. It is possible that at some future date parliament may appropriate an additional amount.

Mr. ADSHEAD: It will be parliament that will do that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. As far as public moneys are concerned, no addition will be made to the amount named except with the consent of parliament.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Even should parliament not be sitting when the requisition is made? Supposing parliament has adjourned and the committee believes it requires more money—it may not really need the money but believes it does—will there be an order in council authorizing an additional expenditure?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The committee will be given to understand that the wish of parliament is that it should keep the expenditure within the amount appropriated. If the committee when it meets finds that the amount is not going to be sufficient it will be its duty so to advise parliament at a very early date.

Section 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Executive committee.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: It does not seem quite advisable that the expenditure of $250,000 should be left to an executive committee of six persons, yet that is what we are doing. This number out of a membership of sixty-nine can go ahead, make the necessary arrangements, and expend this money. Such a quorum seems unusually small out of a total membership of sixty-nine. Seeing that quite a number of members are within easy reach of the capital, it seems only reasonable that the quorum of six should be larger.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I point out to my hon. friend that the clause to which he refers reads:

> Until otherwise provided by by-law or regulation made by the executive committee, six members of the executive committee shall be a quorum.

If, when this large body assembles, it has any reason to feel that this particular clause does not provide the necessary number it can pass a by-law immediately requiring a larger number to be present when certain expenditures are being authorized. The Canadian patriotic fund, as I recall it, ran into an expenditure of millions of dollars. The original committee was a large one, but it was found necessary to have a small executive to administer the fund. I think the language here is taken from the act that established the Canadian patriotic fund. I think my hon. friend will find that is the way most large corporations find it advisable to transact their business.
