Mrs. McDougall: Mr. Speaker, after a newspaper report concerning the bidders we had a confidentiality agreement which was recommended by the CDIC as part of normal commercial practice when confidentiality is important in a bidding process. That agreement in no way impaired the company's ability or that of its officers to live up to other obligations with respect to telling the securities commission what they were doing. This case is before the courts. The QSC has laid charges. The information which comes before the courts will be very important. I suggest the Hon. Member be a little more restrained when that is the case.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CENTRAL AMERICA—ARIAS PEACE PLAN

Mr. Reginald Stackhouse (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The President of Costa Rica issued a widely welcomed peace plan that will hopefully bind up the running sore of Central America. He announced on radio that he would welcome Canadian leadership in implementing this plan.

Has the Minister received any official communication from President Arias? If so, what will the Government's response be?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I asked for and have seen a transcript of the interview with President Arias. We have not received a formal request from either President Arias or others of the Governments of Central America. I think that is partly because they are still pursuing their own processes to see whether they will be seeking support from Canada, the Nordic countries, and others.

Last week in New York I had the opportunity to meet with Foreign Ministers of the Rio group who are acutely interested in this question. We discussed at some length what Canada and other countries might do to move forward the peace process in Central America. I will be visiting the region myself the week of November 23. While the exact arrangements have not been made, I expect to be visiting Honduras, Costa Rica, and Nicaragua.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FINANCE

IMPORTANCE OF FLOW THROUGH SHARES FOR REGIONAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT AND SMALL BUSINESSES

Mr. Robert Toupin (Terrebonne): Mr Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Finance. In their so-called tax reform of June 18, the Minister of Finance and the Conservative Government attacked the tax breaks for flow-through shares, which will have a harmful impact on regional economic development and small businesses and will be disastrous for the economic development of northern regions such as the Abitibi-Temiscamingue and the Yukon.

My question is this: Are the Minister and the Conservative Government ready to admit their mistake and to recognize the importance of flow-through shares for the economic development of our northern regions such as the Abitibi-Temiscamingue and the Yukon?

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I am astonished by the question. First, the Government made it clear in the White Paper that it is going to save all flow-through shares. Second, the Hon. Member's colleagues have been attacking flow-through shares for the past six months.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Robert Toupin (Terrebonne): The Minister would be well advised to learn more about our regional economic development programs.

My second question is this: Is the Minister not aware of the importance of these tax breaks, first, for the regional economic development of the Abitibi-Temiscamingue and the Yukon, and second, for the financing of small businesses? If he is aware of this, will the Government admit its mistake and make the appropriate changes?

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I cannot count how many times the Minister of Finance met with the Prospectors' Association. I have, as well. We are very aware of their position. That is why we have taken the position we have on flow-through shares. As for small business, it, too, is helped through tax reform.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER—DUMPING OF PCBS BY GENERAL MOTORS FOUNDRY AT MASSENA, N. Y.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The other night Canadians were shown on The Journal a major corporation in Massena, New York, namely General Motors, dumping substantial quantities of PCBs into the St. Lawrence River. Has the Government of Canada made strong representations in New York protesting this action? Has it also sought the co-operation of the U.S. Government in cleaning up this situation which is affecting the health of millions of people in that basin?

• (1500)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member will know that my colleague, the Minister of the Environment, has taken not only a very active role but has played, in the achievement of the ozone agreement, a highly successful role in advancing Canada's environmental interests, both in this country and internationally. The important question he raises is one that would fall in the first instance in the jurisdiction of my colleague, and on his behalf I will take note of it.

MINISTER'S POSITION

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): The Secretary of State knows that the Minister of the Environment's record is one of inaction on transboundary pollution matters. My question has to do with dumping PCBs in the St. Lawrence River and I would like the Secretary of State to answer the question. Has he himself made strong representations in Washington? Has he protested the action of General Motors? Has he sought the co-operation of the U.S. Government in cleaning up this mess which is affecting the health of millions of people?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as is the well understood custom in this House, I took notice on behalf of my colleague and I will ensure that the question is brought to his direct attention.

I should go on to say, since it has been raised this way, that if we want to make effective representations regarding environmental problems, it is not enough to quote a television program. We also have to conduct investigations to find out, from the point of view of our scientists, what is the exact nature of the damage that is alleged or might be occurring. That is being carried out now by the Department of the Environment on the instruction of the Minister. We will, as we have in the past, take whatever action is appropriate after that evidence has been accumulated.

Mr. Speaker: I want to advise Hon. Members that this will be the last question and I recognize the Hon. Member for Humboldt—Lake Centre.

AGRICULTURE

REPORTED INTENTION OF BRITISH COLUMBIA TO WITHDRAW FROM SUPPLY MANAGEMENT PROGRAMS

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question concerning our federal-provincial relations with the provinces that I wish to direct to the Minister of Agriculture. I will deal with British Columbia today and its unhappiness with the national approach to marketing agencies which has now arisen to the political level with the Premier's announcement yesterday that the province intends to pull out of the supply management schemes and is prepared to stop cheese and industrial milk products from entering B.C. What is the federal Government proposing to do about that?

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, because of our interest in the maintenance of supply management systems in Canada, we feel that any involvement other than another statement at this time from the federal Minister of Agriculture could well be less than helpful. I have expressed disappointment and also indicated that I was not surprised because I am aware of some unrest that has existed in the supply managed commodities sector in British Columbia.

Again I have indicated in conversation with the leadership of the producers of those supply managed commodities in the province that their first choice is to remain within the system. I do not think we want to over-react. We do not want to ignore the problem. I hope it would be possible to find a solution to this problem within the supply management system.

HORTICULTURE

HONEY-RESIDUE TOLERANCE LEVEL

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, since another province, Quebec, has effectively disallowed honey shipments from the rest of the country, by establishing its own very stringent sulfathiazole levels, a very effective non-tariff trade barrier which the U.S. subsequently copied, can the Government tell us what progress if any is being made toward the arrival of one national residue tolerance level for honey in Canada?

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we recognize that the Province of Quebec has the provincial authorization and authority to do this, so we have to respond. At that point, of course, we had no tolerance levels. The action by that particular province necessitated that we make a request to Health and Welfare to establish tolerance levels. Those tolerance levels were established by the appropriate federal authority, National Health and Welfare, and we are carrying that out.

We must recognize that if we are to have a market within Canada for Canadian honey, then we have to meet those tolerance standards established by the province. If we are to have a market for honey outside Canada, not only in the United States but also in Japan, then of course we have to meet the tolerance levels established by those countries.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Minister of State to state the business the Government intends to call for the coming week.

Hon. Doug Lewis Minister of State and Minister of State (Treasury Board)): Mr. Speaker, I wish to advise the House that tomorrow and Monday we will be continuing the debate on the Meech Lake Accord. For the remainder of next week we intend to proceed with and hopefully complete that debate and also deal with Bill C-55, the amendments to the Immigration Act, which is at third reading stage, and Bill C-74, the Environmental Protection Act, which is at second reading stage, but not necessarily in that order, in order that we may complete the business and accommodate all Parties in the House.

(2) An agreement that has the force of law under subsection (1) shall have effect only so long and so far as it is not repugnant to any provision of an Act of the Parliament of Canada that sets national standards and objectives relating to immigration or aliens, including any provision that establishes general classes of immigrants or relates to levels of immigration for Canada or that prescribes classes of individuals who are inadmissible into Canada.

95E. An amendment to sections 95A to 95D or this section may be made in accordance with the procedure set out in subsection 38(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, but only if the amendment is authorized by resolutions of the legislative assemblies of all the provinces that are, at the time of the amendment, parties to an agreement that has the force of law under subsection 95B(1)."

CITATION

17. This amendment may be cited as the Constitution Amendment, 1987.

Mr. Speaker: When the House rose at one o'clock, the Hon. Member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper) had the floor.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, when I finished at one o'clock, I had just given a brief overview of the Accord from the perspective of an Albertan and tried to relate some of the concerns that I thought Albertans might have with the Accord and to address some of the concerns we may have as to the impact it would have on our particular province. In the few minutes that I have left, I want to talk a bit about the process and I want to touch finally on the future of the constitutional process.

It was not uncommon, as we went through the constitutional hearings, to hear criticisms of the method used to bring about the Meech Lake Accord. People were critical of this so-called marathon negotiation, these in camera meetings. The implications of that, of course, were that Canadians were shut out of the negotiation process, did not know what was going on and therefore were not legitimately represented at the table.

I want to speak to that criticism because I think it is important that Canadians understand that this process is probably the only process that would have allowed us to get this agreement. It is very simple. The reason the agreement came together was that in marathon negotiations, people do not have an opportunity to walk out. They do not have an opportunity to change their minds, to go off and think about all sorts of things that might distract them from the issues before them. They are also under a lot of pressure to sit at the table, work out a compromise, work out a deal with which everyone can live. I feel it is absolutely essential that that type of marathon negotiation be used in all sorts of difficult consultations such as that which we had at Meech Lake Accord.

The other thing I want to talk about very quickly is this problem of in camera meetings. I find it really difficult to understand why the Prime Minister particularly would be criticized for holding these meetings in camera. We do this in all parts of our lives. We do it in business, we do it in day-to-day existence, we do it in all sorts of negotiations. The reason we do it in camera is that we do not want people playing to the audience, playing to the cameras. We want them to disucss seriously the issues before them. I think that was a major factor in bringing about this unanimous accord on the Meech Lake that no one thought was possible.

I feel that that process was the right one and it is one that should not be criticized. In fact, I would go even further. I would say that if more of this type of approach had been used in the aboriginal conferences on Indian self-government, we would then have had a better chance for a deal. I would advocate that in future negotiations this type of process be considered and, where possible, utilized.

The last point I want to touch on is the future process for constitutional reform. As you are aware, after hearing all of the evidence and studying the past process and that which we anticipate for the future, the committee recommended that there be established a joint Senate and House of Commons committee, the mandate of which would be to hold public hearings on constitutional issues. It would examine the evidence arising from the various issues before it and would have an opportunity to study the implications of each of these issues. It would, of course, allow public participation, public debate, and public input into the constitutional matter which is on the agenda of the First Ministers. The committee would do the ground work for the First Ministers in a very public way before the First Ministers met for final negotiations.

I obviously support this proposal. However, Mr. John Holtby appeared before the committee and made a proposal which I think is the father of the committee's recommendation. He recommended a committee process and went one step further. He recommended that the committee be made up of members of the various legislatures across Canada, federal as well as provincial and territorial.

It was a radical approach and I am sure it caused some concerns because of its newness. Even though the committee has recommended a joint House of Commons and Senate committee, I think the Holtby proposal deserves future consideration. The advantage of it would be that we would draw in all levels of Government and give them the opportunity to discuss the issues. In that way we would get a national perspective rather than a provincial or territorial approach to the issues.

There are a number of issues which will have to be dealt with in the future. I do not have much time so I will merely outline them. One issue which I spent a lot of time discussing in my remarks prior to one o'clock is that of Senate reform. The concerns which were demonstrated by the women's groups which appeared before the committee must be addressed at a First Ministers' conference. Aboriginal rights and the issue of self-government must be addressed. Effort must be put into the definition of self-government. Effort must be made to reach a compromise in order to bring about agreement in that important constitutional area.

In conclusion, I really do believe that the evidence which was put before the committee studying the Meech Lake Accord showed that the Accord is in fact a seamless web. It is a very delicate fabric. Due to that there is, at this time, no room for amendment. That does not preclude future discussions, nor does it preclude First Ministers making important decisions on important issues. However, it does mean that the Meech Lake Accord must proceed in the form in which it exists today.

I think this agreement is good for my Province of Alberta. It is good for Canada. It is a document which Canadians can be very proud of. It will serve as a fundamental document for the future of constitutional amendments and process in this nation.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, I listened to the Member's remarks with great interest. I thank him for the solicitous manner in which he addressed the situation of Quebec in the Constitution. He said that it was important to reach this agreement because with Quebec outside, Ontario had a sole veto. The argument put to Canadians was that we had to do everything necessary to get Quebec to sign this agreement.

This ignores the fact that although the Quebec Government did not sign the agreement in 1981, Quebec was not outside the agreement. There were probably 70 Members of Parliament from Quebec who voted for the agreement. In order to get the agreement of the Quebec Government we did not have to agree to anything. Every single item in the Meech Lake Accord was not necessary to get the agreement of the present Government of Quebec.

I want to ask the Member about Senate reform. Does he think that Senate reform is realistic with the requirement of unanimity now that the provincial Premiers will be proposing lists from which Senators will be named?

The Member said that Albertans now have a veto on Senate reform. That was the proposition put to Israel Asper in the constitutional committee by the Member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan). Mr. Asper said:

> Yes, that is true. Meech gives Manitoba a veto. It is a veto we do not want. We want an amending formula that is truly workable. Seven provinces representing 50 per cent of the population is——truly workable, he suggested. He went on to argue that we have years of history in this country which suggest that we will not get unanimity, that we are putting ourselves into a constitutional straitjacket, and that Senate reform will be a dead issue. Would the Member care to respond to these concerns?

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the Member's comments and questions. First, with regard to Quebec being involved in the Constitution at the moment, I was careful in my remarks to say that Quebec is legally and technically part of the Constitution of Canada right now. That is not disputed.

The problem, which I think is well accepted by Canadians, is that by the spirit of the Constitution Quebec has not considered itself a participant. The best example of that of which I know is the most recent round of constitutional negotiations on aboriginal rights. Quebec sat in on them but did not view itself as having a vote or being a participant. As a result of that Quebec has not been a participant in the spirit of the Constitution. I think that is what the Meech Lake Accord is trying to achieve. It wants not only the legal and technical participation of Quebec but wants to bring Quebec in, in a spiritual sense, which I think is much needed in Canada.

On the issue of Senate reform the Member asked whether Senate reform is realistic after the Meech Lake Accord. He asked whether it is possible to get a compromise and what kind of impact will result from the Premiers having the opportunity to name Senators.

I believe with all my heart that Senate reform is still a realistic option. Not only is it a realistic option, I think it is a necessary option for the maturing of our country and the healing of some of the wounds which exist between the different regions in the nation. I think it is rightly placed as an item of high priority for the First Ministers.

Mr. Asper, when appearing before the committee, responded to the issue of a veto. As I said earlier, a number of witnesses appeared who had different perspectives on different things. The beauty of the veto which Alberta and Manitoba now have on issues such as Senate reform is that when every player at the table has a veto they also have a lever with which they can apply pressure for a compromise. That is a lever that Manitoba and Alberta never had before. I think that is essential and one of the things that gives us a better chance for Senate reform.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the Hon. Member that he is ignoring at least 50 years of constitutional history in this country, because it was felt for at least that period of time that we could not patriate our Constitution if we did not have the agreement of the provinces and the federal Government.

Certainly that was the assumption under which people were working for a long time, until the previous Government decided in 1980 to put forward a proposal, with the support of only two of the provinces. It was impossible to get the agreement of all the provinces on an amending formula and charter of rights. For years we struggled over the question of an amending formula.

I suggest that the Premiers at that time had that kind of practical veto. They could have compromised but did not, and 50 years went by when we were unable to make progress and get unanimous agreement on an amending formula.

It is fine for the Member to say that because of some perceived good will we will get unanimous agreement in the future, but is that the kind of situation we should leave for the future of this country and its Constitution? Is that the kind of straitjacket we should put on ourselves?

Let us face it, none of the provinces gave up anything in this agreement. There was no give and take between the provinces. All of the provinces received something and only the federal Government gave something up in this particular agreement. There was no power that was transferred to the federal Government from the provinces and there was no exchange of powers between the provinces.

In order to get an equal elected Senate, some of the provinces will have to give up something. I suggest to the Member that it is the height of irresponsibility to put a formula in our Constitution that will require unanimous agreement. Perhaps it could be nine out of ten provinces so that we can ensure that at least the country will proceed even if one province objects.

I respect the Hon. Member's opinion, but I think he is living in a dream world to suggest that we need the agreement of all 10 provinces when there will have to be give and take between the provinces.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, the Member makes some rather strong assertions. He accuses me of ignoring 50 years of Canadian history. My response to him is that he is ignoring immediate history.

It was thought that it was impossible to bring about a Meech Lake Accord because we could not get the unanimous consent of the provinces on such a fundamental issue. The fact is that we have managed, through the work of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and his efforts with the First Ministers, to bring about unanimous agreement. I think that speaks very well of the constitutional future of Canada.

We are in a new atmosphere which is not based on confrontation, as was the case under former Prime Minister Trudeau when, rather than compromise, negotiations and discussions with the provinces, there was confrontation and the heavy hand of the federal Government. No one felt it more than those who live in Alberta and the rest of western Canada. I believe the Meech Lake Accord is the very demonstration of the kind of attitude that can and should exist in a mature nation.

I believe this Accord speaks to the great steps Canada has made in the last few months toward maturity of a people who are united by a common vision and goal.

I know the Hon. Member's position on this issue. I think the unravelling of the Meech Lake Accord will be more destructive to Canada as we see it now and in the future than almost any other issue that exists for parliamentarians today.

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in this very important debate on proposed changes to the Canadian Constitution, and to speak in support of New Democratic Party amendments which will be proposed to provide fairness to northern Canadians, open up the constitutional process for Canada's aboriginal peoples, and provide constitutional assurance that sexual equality will be protected under the new Accord.

It is easy to find a number of flaws in the Accord, but we do not want to do that. We believe that this Accord represents a very important step in Canadian constitutional history, so we have not been so much interested in looking at flaws as in looking at the important things that the Constitution does.

At the same time, the three areas I just mentioned are ones where we believe the Government can make changes without jeopardizing the Accord. We urge the Government to consider them, and we enter into this debate in good faith trusting that the Government will do so, in spite of some of the statements it has made in the past.

The Meech Lake Accord tackles the unfinished work from 1982 when we patriated the Canadian Constitution. Two major problems remained unsolved: first, bringing Quebec fully into the Constitution; second, adequately defining the rights of aboriginal people.

The question that we face today is how we say yes to Quebec without saying no to aboriginal people. I want to look at both of these issues separately.

First, let us consider the question of Quebec. It has been pointed out that legally, Quebec has been a member of the Canadian federation all along and that the 1982 Constitution included Quebec whether or not it signed. However, the report draws a distinction between legality and legitimacy.

Perhaps it is best stated by Mr. Yves Fortier, former President of the Canadian Bar Association, who said:

> From a strictly legal point of view, of course, the 1982 Constitution Act applies to Quebec. But in this area, as in many others, lawyers must show some modesty. The fact is that politically, and even morally, the 1982 Constitution Act does not apply to Quebec. Those who claim it does are guilty of constitutional heresy.

With the patriation process, many people within Quebec felt that the promises of a renewed federalism that had been made at the time of the referendum debate in Quebec had been betrayed. Perhaps no one stated that more eloquently than Solange Chaput-Rolland who testified before the committee. I want to read at length from her testimony. She said:

> I think none outside Quebec knew the reality of the referendum. I travelled throughout Canada, about a few months after. It was all over, eh? Good. It was not exactly all over. Families against families, towns against towns, father and mothers not speaking to their children.
> (During the Referendum) we spoke with thousands of Quebeckers. Women wanted to leave their children a country as big as the one they had received from their father. That was mainly the article that reached the heart, because you are right: in this country if we put a little more heart into what we are doing, maybe we would be aware of the hurt we inflict on others.
> And then we came home. We went back to the National Assembly, back to our villages, back to our houses, back to the friends that were no more friends; they were on the "yes", we were on the "no". It was not a picnic, it was not a social gathering, it was not a think-tank. It was a battle between brothers, a dangerous divisive battle, and we still feel it. It was not 100 years ago, it was seven years ago that we lived that referendum.
> English Canada could not care less one month after, and it stung me and it stung all of us who fought so hard to remain in Canada and to find ourselves outside of Canada.
> You know, it was a very dramatic gesture when Mr. Levesque put the flag of Quebec at half mast on the day you were all celebrating here. But our hearts were at half mast too that day, because we were out of a country we had chosen to remain.

It was that sense of betrayal that has kept Quebec out of the Constitution from that time until this. All the time that René Levesque was the Premier of Quebec, it was impossible to make any progress. When Robert Bourassa became Premier, he put out the five points he said were necessary as conditions for Quebec to come into Confederation; first, recognition of Quebec as a distinct society, second, a greater provincial role in immigration, third, a provincial role in appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada, fourth, limitations on the federal spending power and, fifth, a veto for Quebec on constitutional amendments.

These conditions were agreed to as agenda items by the Premiers at Edmonton in August of 1986. They formed the basis for the Meech Lake Accord. The demands of Quebec were well known and they formed the basis for debate by a number of organizations, including the New Democratic Party when it met at its convention in Montreal in March of this year.

Again, it is hard for Canadians from other parts of Canada to understand the joy that was felt by most of the people of Quebec when the Premier signed the Meech Lake Accord. I can remember the sense of elation that Members of Parliament from Quebec tried to share with the rest of us, both publicly and privately, on the day that Accord was signed. "Now I am a Canadian again", I remember one of them saying to me.

In 1945 when Hugh MacLellan wrote his classic novel about Quebec, he called it Two Solitudes. Since that time the phrase has become somewhat of a cliché when talking about Canadian-Quebec relations or relations within Quebec. MacLellan took his title from the words of Rilke who said:

> "Love consists in this,
> that two solitudes protect
> and touch and greet each other".

With Meech Lake it seems as though Quebec and the rest of Canada can protect and touch and greet each other in a new way. All Canadians should be able to rejoice in that fact.

Perhaps the most important idea in Rilke's statement is that the two solitudes would remain solitudes, the one would not seek to absorb or assimilate the other. Two solitudes protect and touch and greet each other, and is that not what we are attempting to do when we enshrine in our Constitution "the recognition that Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society"?

As so many witnesses testified before the joint committee, this is not creating a new situation but only recognizing a historical and sociological fact.

If MacLellan's Two Solitudes is an Anglophone account of English and French in Quebec, perhaps it should be looked at next to Felix-Antoine Savard's Menaud: Maitre-draveur which looks at the relationship from a strong Quebec nationalist perspective. Both novels are set in the context of a Quebec where English-speaking capital has moved in to exploit Quebec's resources and its people. Savard's novel begins with Menaud hearing and meditating on the words from Hemon's Maria Chapdelaine:

. . . Maria Chapdelaine:

> Nous sommes venus il y a trois cents ans > et nous sommes restés . . .
> Nous avions apporté d'outre-mer nos prières et nos chansons;
> elles sont toujours les mêmes.

Nous avions apporté dans nos poitrines le coeur des hommes de notre pays, vaillant et vif, aussi prompt à la pitié qu'au rire, le coeur le plus humain de tous les coeurs humains:

il n'a pas changé.

Nous avons marqué un plan du continent nouveau, de Gaspé à Montréal, de Saint-Jean-d'Iverville à l'Ungava, en disant:

Ici toutes les choses que nous avons apportées avec nous, notre culte, notre langue, nos vertus et jusqu'à nos faiblesses deviennent de choses sacrées, intangibles et qui devront demeurer jusqu'à la fin.

[English]

Of course, some things have changed, but at the heart of Quebec is a people who know themselves to be distinct and, together with the English speaking minority in Quebec, they constitute a distinct society.

In the referendum of 1980, the majority indicated they wanted to remain within Canada but as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner) pointed out, the balance in favour of Canada was only achieved after the then Prime Minister, Pierre Elliott Trudeau, had promised a renewed federalism. A very high percentage, particularly of young francophones, voted for some form of sovereignty association. So we ignored the legitimate demands of the people and Government of Quebec at our country's peril.

Indeed, as the Hon. Member for New Westminster—Coquitlam (Ms. Jewett) pointed out to former Prime Minister Trudeau, this recognition of Quebec as a distinct society is not a sop the rest of Canada is giving to make Quebec feel good, it is something we have always known, a fact in which we have always taken pride.

It was something important to me when I was growing up in western Canada, even when I did not understand it, and, of course, I do not pretend to understand all of its ramifications even today. But Quebec is a distinct society, is an essential part of what makes Canada Canada, and not part of the United States. Rilke says "love consists in this, that two solitudes protect and touch and greet each other".

As Zebedee Nungak, co-chairman of the Inuit Committee on National Issues told the committee, there is a third solitude in Canada, the aboriginal solitude, and aboriginal peoples feel more isolated than ever before by the Meech Lake Accord. They do not feel protected. They do not feel touched by it nor do they feel greeted by it. They feel isolated. Zebedee Nungak said:

We know what it is to be on the outside looking in, so Quebec being made part of the Constitutional fabric of Canada was to us a necessity that was better dealt with sooner than later. However, in saying that, we object quite strongly to what we see as being shut out of any future process in constitutional discussions.

In their struggle to achieve even the most basic recognition in the Canadian Constitution, aboriginal people faced a very difficult time in 1980 and 1981 when we were patriating the Constitution. They appeared before the committee and made their case, pointing to the nature of their treaties, or pointing to unextinguished aboriginal rights in the case of those who had no treaties. They had support from church and solidarity groups. I remember the many questions that we as New Democrats asked the then Prime Minister, Mr. Trudeau, and the difficult bargaining the Hon. Member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) went through to get aboriginal rights included in the Constitution.

I still remember the day, January 30, 1981, when the big breakthrough was made and Jean Chrétien, the Minister in charge at the time, said: "Lets do it". So wording was put in recognizing aboriginal and treaty rights and defining the aboriginal peoples as Indians, Métis and Inuit.

Even then an amending formula was proposed that would have meant that Parliament could have unilaterally changed those rights for aboriginal peoples living in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, or that Parliament and the legislature of one province could affect the rights of aboriginal people in that province.

Then, on November 5, 1981, the nine provinces agreed on a constitutional package that left Quebec out. It also left out any reference to aboriginal rights or to the rights of women. Only after weeks of bitter struggle were sexual equality rights put back in, along with a very much weaker version of aboriginal rights. Aboriginal people were told not to worry about this weaker wording because they had the guarantee of a First Ministers' conference in which they would be invited to further define those rights.

A conference was held in 1983. But all that came out of it was a decision to hold three more conferences. These were also held with a great deal of rhetoric and fanfare in 1984, 1985, and the last one just this past spring.

What have the aboriginal people got out of all this work and all these conferences? A big fat nothing. These conferences have dominated their agenda for the past five years. They have absorbed the time and effort of the aboriginal leadership. After all the conferences are over, what do they have to show for them? Nothing, Mr. Speaker.

Poverty and powerlessness continue to characterize the lives of most aboriginal people. In all but one case land claims settlements have been stalled. As more aboriginal young people see the value of education and want to move on to university and college, the Government has capped the amount of money that is available for higher education. Only the prisons seem to be able to expand to meet the challenge.

Can we blame aboriginal people if they become bitter after all this struggle when they see the First Ministers reach a quick settlement with Quebec? They feel that the provinces lack the political will to deal with aboriginal rights. They feel that the Prime Minister has not given the kind of leadership and commitment to their cause that he did to getting Quebec back into the Constitution.

The aboriginal people are very worried that this new Accord promises further constitutional conferences on such items as fisheries, which are absolutely essential to aboriginal people, but the aboriginal people and their leaders will not have a place at the table when fisheries are being dicussed. So they feel that this Accord leaves them further behind than ever.

The Special Joint Committee suggests that they do not need to worry about this. If I have one complaint with the report, and I have a few, this is perhaps the major one. It says that the joint committee takes the view that for these purposes aboriginal people, like other Canadians, are appropriately represented by the leaders of the federal and provincial Governments that aboriginal peoples helped to elect.

Aboriginal people have seen how their interests have been sold out. They were sold out on November 5, 1981, by the provinces and the federal Government when they wanted to cobble together a deal. They know how easy it is for their issues to be pushed to one side. This statement in this report is not something that aboriginal peoples can put any credence in whatsoever. How can we expect them to have any confidence in the federal and provincial Governments when they remember such days as November 5 when they were pushed aside? When push comes to shove in the fisheries, do any of us seriously believe that this Government will stand up for aboriginal rights if it were to jeopardize its relationships with the provinces?

The Prime Minister has continued to use rhetoric about his support for aboriginal self-government. But, last week when he was asked, he would not give a commitment to place aboriginal self-government on the agenda at this specific time. He would not give a commitment to restore constitutional funding so that aboriginal organizations could do the necessary preparation. This is in spite of the kind of recommendations that the committee made.

I would just like to read some of these items from the conclusion of the report. It affirmed the view that the First Ministers and representatives of aboriginal people must continue to work toward a satisfactory resolution of the constitutional issues brought forward by the aboriginal peoples, especially the issue of aboriginal self-government. It recommends that the federal Government restore funding to aboriginal organizations at an appropriate level to enable them to continue to participate in the preparatory work. It recommends that a timetable and serious work plan be established by the federal Government in consultation with the provinces and the aboriginal organizations to prepare for a further constitutional conference or conferences on aboriginal self-government. It recommends that consideration be given to holding these conferences in closed sessions, and that the first such conference take place no later than April 17, 1990.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I welcome this Accord insofar as it enables Quebec to come back into Confederation, not only as a full partner but also with recognition of its distinct character. But I urge the Government to accept New Democratic Party amendments that would not damage the Accord but would prevent the Accord from doing an injustice to aboriginal people, prevent it from doing an injustice to the people of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories and that would assure the women of Canada that their rights are protected.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Are there questions or comments?

Mr. Berger: I would like to compliment the Hon. Member on his contribution to this debate, although I take issue with his way of describing the reality of the Accord and the reality of what I believe is Quebec and Canadian society today. I would like to ask him this.

He referred to the quotation from Rilke, I believe, "two solitudes which protect and greet each other". I would like to ask him: Why not promote? Of course that was not in her quotation. She did not say "promote" the linguistic minorities around the country. If we are so caring about the French fact and the English fact, and if there is such goodwill, which he seems to believe there is, why would we not out of the goodness of our hearts, then, take the step of stating in our Constitution that we are prepared not only to preserve the status quo, to preserve the linguistic minorities wherever they may be in the country, but that we would be willing to promote these minorities? Is that not a very clear indication that the language of the Accord does not indicate the kind of goodwill which he seems to believe prevails?

Mr. Manly: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member for his question. As I indicated, I think it is easy enough to see areas in which this Accord could be improved. Personally, I have no objection to seeing the word "promote" included. I think that might be a helpful inclusion.

What I am saying is that it is important for Canada at this particular stage of our history to say yes to Quebec. I weigh a number of factors about the Accord which I do not particularly care for, but I place those in the balance. I also place the question of saying yes to Quebec in the balance, and that weighs very heavily.

I also want to remind the Government that these other three issues which we have raised of justice to Canada's northern citizens, opening the door to constitutional participation by the aboriginal peoples of Canada, and giving an assurance to Canadian women that the Accord will not affect sexual equality in Canada, are weighing very heavily in the balance, not only for Members of Parliament but for the Canadian people. I urge the Government to take those issues very seriously.

Mr. Berger: Again, I wish to return to my question to the Hon. Member. He states that this agreement meets with the approval of the Government of Quebec. That is true. I would suggest to him that the Government of Quebec has the responsibility for its own prerogatives and concerns for the territory of the Province of Quebec, but I would suggest that the Hon. Member and his Party, and the Members of the House, have a responsibility to the entire country.

The Province of Quebec may feel that it is satisfactory to state that we will recognize the existence of minorities, which in a grudging fashion are described as being present but not necessarily a whole or integral part of Quebec society. It may very well suit the Governments of Alberta and Manitoba to say that minorities are only present in that part of the country, but again we have a responsibility for the national perspective.

The head of the Fédération des Francophones Hors Québec appeared before the constitutional committee and certainly was not happy with the status quo. Only last week the head of the Franco-Albertan Association stated that to them the Meech Lake Agreement meant assimilation. Is the Hon. Member happy to support an agreement which will probably mean the assimilation of the French minority outside Quebec, and God only knows what it means for the English minority in Quebec.

Mr. Manly: I have heard Members in the House who belong to francophone minorities outside Quebec state that they are concerned about the continuation of their language outside Quebec, and indicate to the House that they did not feel that this Accord threatened the continuation of the French language outside Quebec. I believe that they are much closer to the situation than I am, and even closer to the situation than the Hon. Member. On that basis, I am prepared to accept their assurance that the Accord does not threaten the continuation.

I note that the colleague of the Hon. Member, the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de Grâce—Lachine East who is an Anglophone from within Quebec, will support the Accord. I have some trust in his concern for the anglophone minority in Quebec, and some of the concerns raised by other Members from Quebec, even though the Hon. Member disagrees with his colleagues from Quebec.

In conclusion, I do not claim that I am an expert on the question of language within Quebec, or the rights of francophones outside Quebec. But at this time I am prepared to take the assurance of Members who represent those groups that they are protected, even though I recognize within the anglophone minority in Quebec there is some division on this question.

Mr. Malépart: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Hon. Member who is not from Quebec whether he made his decision to support the Meech Lake Accord as a Canadian Member of this House, as a Member of the Parliament of Canada, to ensure that all the component parts of Canada are indeed a part of Canada? This is not strictly a Quebec decision. I think the decision is one to be made by all Canadian Members of Parliament who must ensure that Quebec is part of Confederation.

My next question is as follows. In 1982 we had an imperfect accord. If I remember correctly, the Hon. Member supported the 1982 Accord. He knew perfectly well that Quebec was not in Confederation, and despite warnings by prophets of doom and gloom, similar to what we have heard today, Quebec has now become a member of Confederation. Is the Honourable Member—I want to congratulate him on his decision—confident that the next generation, tomorrow's generation, will be as generous in dealing with the proposals and groups that have been left out as the people who were left out in 1982?

[English]

Mr. Manly: Certainly, if I was going to look at the Accord from the narrow point of view of a British Columbian, I would have a lot of trouble with it. For one thing, it does not deal with the Senate which, as a British Columbian, I feel very strongly about. With a population of 2.8 million, British Columbia has six members in the Senate, whereas Provinces such as Nova Scotia or New Brunswick have 10 Members in the Senate, so there is a great imbalance. If I was looking at this issue strictly from a parochial point of view, I would have a lot of difficulty with the Accord. I am not denying that I have some difficulty with it even so.

The question of including Quebec is absolutely crucial. Equally crucial is the question of providing justice to aboriginal people. The aboriginal people were the original inhabitants of Canada, and for us to ignore them and to continue ignoring them in our Constitution, is unconscionable. It is on that basis that I voted against the 1982 Constitution on the basis that it did not give adequate recognition to the rights of Canada's aboriginal peoples.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, many of us are in a catch-22 situation with respect to this important constitutional resolution.

In 1980 we in the Liberal Party fought hard and in great numbers against the sovereignty association proposal at the time of the Quebec referendum. That was a pseudo-separatist proposal that was put before us in Quebec. We fought hard and won; a majority of francophone Quebecers voted against that proposal, and a majority of anglophone Quebecers voted against that proposal.

At the time of the referendum, the people of Quebec stated that they wanted to be fully part of Canada, and they rejected any type of quasi-separation. Unfortunately, in the constitutional talks that followed in 1981 and 1982 when we patriated the Constitution and added an amending formula and a Charter of Rights, the Quebec Government of the day, which was the Parti Québécois separatist Government, did not agree to it. They voted against it. We may have expected them to do that because we know that the Parti Québécois had no great interest in the unity of Canada, in a new Constitution, or in an amending formula. We expected that from them, but I should remind the House that the Liberal Party in Quebec, which is a moderate federalist Party, also voted with the Parti Québécois in the National Assembly against the Constitutional Accord of 1982.

Since that time, Quebec has not been a full participant in constitutional discussions in Canada. Many of us regret that. We want Quebec fully participating in the Canadian constitutional process. We need Quebec, we love Quebec, and we want them with us 100 per cent.

In 1985 with the election of the Bourassa Liberals, this federalist Party made a new attempt to adhere to the Constitution of 1982, and to the full constitutional process.

Mr. Bourassa laid down five proposals for adherence to the Constitution: Quebec should be recognized as a distinct society; Quebec should have increased power in immigration; there should be a limitation of the federal spending power in areas of provincial jurisdiction; there should be a revision of the amending formula to recognize Quebec's long standing veto power; Quebec should be allowed to participate in the appointment of judges to the Supreme Court of Canada. Those were the five conditions or proposals that the Quebec Government laid down for rejoining the constitutional family in Canada. The federal Liberal Party was the first to respond in a positive manner to those five proposals.

In the summer of 1986, in an interview in Le Devoir, our Leader responded in a positive way to the five proposals. In November, 1986, the Liberal Party of Canada, at its national convention, passed a resolution which responded in a positive way to the five proposals. A little later the NDP passed similar resolutions which responded in a positive way to them.

Finally, on May 1, 1987, all the provinces and the federal Government agreed unanimously to the Meech Lake Accord which contained the five proposals. It was an historic moment, a moment of great national reconciliation. What was interesting was that we had nine provinces with a majority of anglophones saying "yes" to Quebec after Quebec had said "yes" to Canada in the 1980 referendum.

Among those nine provinces we had three with Liberal Governments, one with an NDP Government, one with a Social Credit Government, and five with Conservative Governments. Some of those provinces were rich. Some were poor. Some were large. Some were small. It was amazing that the 10 provinces and the federal Government should respond in a positive way to the overtures which Quebec had been making.

However, it was unfortunate in a way that not only did the Meech Lake Accord and the follow-up Langevin agreement respond to the five proposals laid down by Mr. Bourassa, but they went beyond that. They included other matters which were not originally raised by Mr. Bourassa. In addition, there were certain ambiguities and unclear parts. It was not sure whether or not, in agreeing to what Mr. Bourassa had requested, we were touching in a negative way on the rights of others in the Constitution.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks, some of us are in a bit of a dilemma. We want to say "yes" to Quebec. We want to say "yes" to this agreement. We think it is extremely important to do so. However, we do not want to do anything which would diminish already existing rights in the Constitution or to block the development of other rights in the Constitution. It is a bit of a dilemma.

We in the Liberal Party say—and the joint committee on the Constitution said it as well—that there are certain flaws in the agreement. Everybody recognizes that. However, the joint committee, having recognized that there were certain flaws, said that we should not try to amend it, that we should pass it as it is, and that in the next round we should try to correct the flaws. We say that that is not the way to go. There are certain flaws which can be corrected without denying, in any way, the five conditions laid down by Mr. Bourassa. We are not suggesting for a moment that we should introduce or pass any amendment which would fly in the face of the five original proposals of Mr. Bourassa.

We have formulated nine amendments to correct serious flaws which we think need to be corrected. We do not believe that correcting any one of the flaws by way of any one of our nine amendments will in any way take away from the five conditions of Mr. Bourassa.

One amendment is already before the House. It concerns the fact that the aboriginal peoples of Canada make up part of the fundamental characteristic of Canada and that the multicultural heritage and make-up of Canada must be considered. It is a misconception to think that the fundamental characteristic of Canada is simply a question of anglophone and francophone. That may have been the case in 1867, but if we look at Canada today, we see that it consists of anglophones, francophones, aboriginals, and a large number of people who have come from many other countries and cultures. In our amendment we wanted the interpretive clause which defines the fundamental characteristic of Canada reworded in that way.

Another amendment would have the federal Government and the provinces not only preserving minority language groups but also promoting minority language groups, such as francophones outside Quebec and anglophones in Quebec.

In a third amendment we want to extend the non-derogation provisions of Section 16 to the whole Charter, not simply to the questions of aboriginal rights and multicultural rights.

We have also proposed in a further amendment that when there are vacancies in the Senate they should be filled by an election in the province where the vacancy occurs, not by an appointment by the provincial Premier. We think that is a good interim measure on the way to a fully elected Senate.

In a further proposal we are suggesting that the territories should have a say in the nomination of candidates for judgeships to the Supreme Court of Canada. I do not know whether when the provinces sat down with the federal Government to work this out they completely ignored that, but it is an oversight which should be corrected.

I do not know who would object to it. What province would object to it? Why would giving the right to the territories to nominate Senators and judges to be appointed by the federal Government take anything away from the proposals put forward by Quebec for adhering to the Constitution?

We also put forward a method for breaking a deadlock when nominees for the Supreme Court of Canada are made by the provinces and not agreed to by the federal Government. We suggested that on an interim basis the Chief Justice of the Court could break the deadlock by appointing someone from the Federal Court or Superior Court for one year.

In another amendment we clarified shared-cost programs in areas of provincial jurisdiction. Also, in another amendment we provided that the entry of new provinces or the creation of new provinces out of the territories should not be a question of unanimous agreement by all provinces, but that it should be a question between the federal Government and the territory, as it always was in the past without any difficulty.

When the Provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta were formed in 1905 out of the Northwest Territories, it was a question between the federal Government and the territories. When Newfoundland came into Confederation, it was a question between Newfoundland and the federal Government. It was not a question of unanimous agreement by all provinces.

The amendments which the Liberal Party is putting forward are based upon a consensus that came out of the intensive hearings during this past summer. There is a broad consensus supporting these amendments. It is not only that; they are right in principle. As I said before, none of them strike at the five conditions or proposals laid down by Mr. Bourassa after he was elected and when he sought a method of adhering to the constitutional process.

If that is the case, why is the Government opposite responding in such a negative way? Why is it saying to us and to Canadians that we must either take the whole package as it is or nothing at all? The Government is suggesting that the whole thing will unravel if we make a little amendment here or a little amendment there. That is an arrogant approach.

In 1981-82, when the repatriation legislation was before the House with the amending formula and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the Liberal Government of the day accepted amendments. They were put before the House on individual clauses and they were voted upon. Some were accepted. Some were turned down. In committee changes were made. Even after certain things were taken out in respect of aboriginal peoples and women, they were put back in later because of lobbying and large demonstrations on Parliament Hill.

It can be done and still be successful. It is nonsense to suggest that if we accept any kind of amendment, no matter how good it is or to correct how bad a flaw, the whole thing will fall apart. We amend legislation in this House all the time, especially legislation that sometimes comes from federal-provincial agreements.

I want to say a few words about the procedure. It is completely unacceptable that we should deal with a resolution to change the Constitution of Canada in a manner which gives us less right to put amendments and speak than we have on an ordinary Bill. In that case we have first reading, second reading, the Bill goes to committee, comes back, we have report stage where any Member can table amendments, and then third reading. Here we are dealing with the Constitution of this country and we cannot do that. Our House Leader proposed that we be allowed to do so and was turned down by the Government House Leader. The Government wants us to put all our amendments in a package and vote on them all at one time. That was agreed to this morning because we have no other alternative. We would not accept that on any other Bill, even a minor Bill like amendments to the Freshwater Fish Marketing Act. I suggest that is a bad precedent. There will be yearly constitutional conferences under this Accord and many amendments will come to this House. If we deal with them in what I call summary fashion, we will not be giving them the attention they deserve. I would like everyone to reconsider this procedure. It is not a good way of doing it.

It is particularly hard to understand because the Conservatives, when they were in opposition, insisted that we divide Bills. We had the famous bell-ringing episode over that which went on for days. They would not accept voting for or against a certain Bill because they said there was too much in it. They wanted to divide it so they could vote against different parts. That was all right when they were in opposition, but today they want us to vote for this package without having the right to deal with each part individually.

I now want to deal with what is perhaps the most controversial provision in the Accord, the distinct society clause. Let me say that I do not believe there is anything really new in recognizing Quebec as a distinct society. There have been distinct provisions dealing with Quebec in constitutional documents going back to 1774. In the Quebec Act the British Government, because we were still a colony, recognized that Quebec should have the right to the French language. That was an exception for British-ruled territories and colonies. Quebec should have the right to the Catholic religion. That again was an exception considering the law in force in Britain at that time. By the way, no such exception was made for the Irish. The British also gave Quebec the right to French civil law.

That was repeated to a certain extent in the Constitutional Act of 1791, although it was withdrawn in the Act of Union in 1840. As a matter of fact, in 1791 the British divided Canada into Upper and Lower Canada so that they could recognize the distinctiveness of Quebec. Again in 1867 there were specific provisions for Quebec in recognition of its distinctiveness. Therefore this distinct society clause is not new, except in its expression.

Some people feel this part could be used to remove existing language rights. It has been suggested in my own province that in some way or other, by recognizing the distinctiveness of Quebec society and giving the Government the right to promote that distinctiveness, it could remove the rights of the Anglophone minority. I see nothing in the Accord that will do that. To the contrary. If you read the document, it very clearly states:

> —and English-speaking Canadians, concentrated outside Quebec but also present in Quebec, constitutes a fundamental characteristic of Canada—

It goes on to say:

> (2) The role of the Parliament of Canada and the provincial legislatures to preserve the fundamental characteristic of Canada referred to in paragraph (1)(a) is affirmed.

In other words, in signing this document Quebec pledged itself to preserve the English-speaking fact in Quebec, and there is nothing in the document anywhere which takes away any of the other entrenched rights which are found in our constitutional documents, Section 133 of the BNA in 1867, or Section 23 of the Constitution Act, 1982. Nothing. I challenge those people who say there is a derogation of anglophone rights in Quebec to show me the clauses that will do that.

What they are doing in many cases is drawing a scenario and exaggerating it in the extreme. It is mainly speculation. We have had attacks on anglophone rights in Quebec for a long time, especially under the Parti Québécois. There was no Meech Lake Accord then. Whether we have one or not, there will be individuals and political Parties in Quebec who want to attack minority rights. I agree with this Accord but I must remind Mr. Bourassa that he made a promise to anglophones in Quebec to amend the sign legislation to bring about justice with respect to bilingual signs. We expect him to deliver on that promise.

As I say, there is nothing in this Accord that will derogate from the rights of minorities in Canada. To the contrary, I think there is a small but meaningful contribution to the entrenchment of minority language rights. My colleague from Saint Henri—Westmount was in the Cabinet in 1982. So was my colleague from Davenport. My colleague sitting behind me from Laurier was in the caucus. It was at that time I voted against that document because there was a reduction of anglophone rights in Quebec. I must remind Canadians of that fact. I voted against that document because there was a very specific reduction in Section 59, and my colleagues agreed to it. I do not know where the great spirit they have shown today in defending minority rights was at that time. They were in the Cabinet but they did not resign in protest, that is for sure.

You are giving me the sign that my time is up, Mr. Speaker. Yet there is so much in the document to discuss. Let me say that if anyone can point out to me one clause in this document that leads to the reduction of minority language rights, I will vote against it. I challenge them to show me one clause that does that. They cannot.

On balance, despite its flaws which I would like the Government to correct by accepting some of these amendments, it is an historic document of reconciliation. After nine provinces have said yes to Quebec, it is very difficult for us in this House to say no to the reconciliation which brings all Canadians and all provinces together.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Questions and comments.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, I would like to humbly try and respond to the Hon. Member's challenge. He is very well aware of the distinct society provision in the clause and I suggest that if any clause could affect the rights of Quebecers and minorities in Quebec, it certainly would be that clause. I suppose by his reasoning he believes that clause has no legal significance. Is that his conclusion, that it means nothing? I suppose if that is the case, we are talking about nothing. Yet it clearly has to mean something, or it must mean nothing. I put it to him that it does mean something.

He is a lawyer. I also had a bit of legal training. I think one of the first things we learn in law school is that the—

[English]

Therefore, I would suggest to him that the clause must have some significance. I would refer him to the comments of the Premier of Quebec, Mr. Bourassa.

—who had this to say to the National Assembly last June 18: "Henceforth the Constitution of the country will have to be interpreted in accordance with this recognition". He was referring to the recognition of Quebec as a distinct society. He said, and I quote: "It must be emphasized that the whole Constitution, including the Charter, will be interpreted and applied in light of this distinct society section. This relates to the exercise of legislative powers and will enable us to consolidate acquired rights and make progress."

So I respectfully suggest to the Hon. Member that Mr. Bourassa should know what he is talking about, and that the words of this provision should normally mean something.

Does he believe that Mr. Bourassa is right or wrong, and that in the end this does not mean anything?

[English]

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I never suggested for one minute that this clause means nothing. The Hon. Member should not put words in my mouth. Of course it means something. It is an interpretive clause. It starts off by saying that the Constitution of Canada shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the fundamental characteristic of Canada and the recognition that Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society.

Of course the clause means something. It is similar to Section 27 of the Constitutional Act of 1982 which says that the Charter shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians. The opening words of the distinct society clause are almost exactly the same as those of Section 27.

What does it mean to recognize Quebec as a distinct society within Canada and that Quebec has the right to promote that? I think it means exactly what the Quebec Court of Appeal ruled in the signs case. In the signs case, the Quebec Court of Appeal, in a unanimous decision, ruled that Bill 101 was unconstitutional when it said other languages could not be used on signs. It ruled that it was unconstitutional to forbid other languages but it said that if Quebec wanted to pass a law requiring the use of French on signs, that was its right.

What was proposed by Mr. Bourassa in the election was a new option whereby Quebec would require French on all commercial signs but not forbid the use of any other language, whether it be English, Polish, Chinese, Italian or whatever. There they are promoting the distinct society but not taking away rights from others, because in my opinion, they cannot do that.

The previous clause says there is an English fact in Quebec and it says it is the role of the Government of Canada, the Parliament of Canada and the provincial Legislatures to preserve that fundamental characteristic. Quebec has committed itself to preserving the anglophone minority in Quebec, not just in 133 or in Section 23 but also by virtue of the Meech Accord.

Sure the clause means something. When I promote my own distinctiveness, my own career or my own family, I do not need to do it at the expense of others. I do it to further my own causes. I think that is what that clause is saying. Unfortunately, some people in Quebec and across Canada think that in order to promote one's own causes, one must take away from others. That is not the case.

I can build and improve my own home without stealing lumber and bricks from my neighbour next door. I can make it the best home on the block, but I do not have to detract from anybody else. Promoting one's distinctiveness does not take anything away from anybody else, including the minorities in Quebec.

Mr. Caldwell: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments of my colleague across the floor. I think I personally as an Ontario anglophone have a better understanding of what the distinct society means to a person who lives in Quebec, such as the Hon. Member.

Going back into history and bringing us up to date, it would seem Quebec has always been a distinct society, but that has only been recognized at this particular time. The Hon. Member did not discuss, though I know he has some familiarity with it, immigration and how it affects Quebec. My understanding is that Quebec has always had a say in immigration. There will be some changes under the Accord regarding immigration. Does he have any trouble with that particular clause?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, as Hon. Members know, the responsibility for immigration under our Constitution has been a joint federal-provincial responsibility since 1867, although the provinces did not exercise any legislative power under that right for many, many years. I think Quebec was probably the first province to want to exercise that power.

It is a joint power. Unlike some other powers, it gives both the provinces and the federal Government the right to pass legislation with respect to immigration. However, it also says that the federal power will prevail over the provincial power. By the way, so does this document.

Clause 3(2) says about immigration that an agreement that has the force of law under this subsection shall have effect only so long and so far as it is not repugnant to any provision of an Act of the Parliament of Canada that sets national standards and objectives. The Province of Quebec and other provinces can pass legislation in the area of immigration as long as it is not repugnant to the federal legislation. It has been that way in more general terms since 1867 but never spelled out this way.

When the Liberals were in power, we made an agreement with Quebec which has been followed since that time, and it has not caused any great harm. As a matter of fact, I think it has helped Quebec and Canada in selecting immigrants for that province. To put it in the Constitution would not cause any great harm. Not only would it not cause any great harm, if it settles old wars, all the better.

[Translation]

Mr. Malépart: First, Mr. Speaker, I should like to commend the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East (Mr. Allmand) for his remarks. From a legal standpoint I think he showed clearly that the question of distinct character in facts has always existed, but that at last Canada agrees to put that in the Constitution and protect the future.

Those who are opposed to the distinct character provision of the Meech Lake Accord accuse others who endorse it to be provincially oriented Members, narrow-minded people who stand up only for the interests of Quebec. The Hon. Member has been in this House for a good many years—and I share all his views concerning the amendments, I can blame the federal Government and all provincial administrations for failing to add other things—he is not afraid to stand up and, as an anglophone, he agrees with the distinct character provision. That being the case, does he feel like a provincially oriented Member here in the House of Commons, or does he feel he is on the same wavelength as all other Members because he agrees with that, because he is a Member who stands up for the rights of all Canadians?

[English]

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I defend that provision because I think it serves the unity of all Canada. It is good for all of Canada. As I said, Quebec said yes to Canada in the referendum of 1980, but we had to wait until this Accord with the nine other provinces of many political backgrounds and the federal Government saying yes to Quebec. To me, that was a great act of national reconciliation because we need and want Quebec at the constitutional table. Something was missing without Quebec, and it is fantastic to have it back.

I think it is for the good of all the country. When I support this, it is not because I am from Quebec or because I am a provincialist. If the Hon. Member supports it or somebody on the other side supports it, I think it is because they are very concerned with the unity of Canada and the épanouissement of Canada. It is for the good of all of Canada that this be done.

CITATION

17. This amendment may be cited as the Constitution Amendment, 1987.

Mr. Thomas Suluk (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, I am particularly happy to take part in this debate today, not because of the simple fact that I am a native and come from one of the Territories but because I was elected largely on a constitutional platform.

In my area, the Inuit homeland of the Northwest Territories which we call Nunavut for the time being, constitutional rights such as land claims, regional councils, regional boards of all kinds, et cetera, et cetera, dominate our discussions. Our people have always searched for a way in which our territory can become part of Canada and enjoy the full rights of the Constitution.

I wish to make it very clear that while we are seeking our own constitutional goals we do not deny others their rights. The Meech Lake Accord was a remarkable achievement by governments among which any agreement is usually remarkable. It provides protections which have enabled the population of Quebec to re-enter the national life. I can only applaud that and I can only hope that all northerners will also applaud that.

We are in a very dangerous situation in Canada if the victory of one group becomes the envy and resentment of others. Sharing is perhaps the most sacred value in Inuit society. Our people wish to achieve certain things and that does not mean we begrudge the good fortune of others. On the other hand, the achievement of this Meech Lake agreement shows the way. It provides a demonstration of how agreements can be reached when there is political will. In the North we need a lot of political will now. Part of that agreement is to hold further conferences, which I support.

In those fora we cannot doubt that items of concern to northerners will be discussed. I have no fears about us being left out as some people in the North have been saying recently.

The report of the special joint committee makes some specific recommendations. On aboriginal rights the report recommends a process and funds for work which I support. The following chapter on the impact of Meech Lake on the northern Territories highlights the question which must concern us all—how the aboriginal homelands of northern Canada and the Métis, Indian and Inuit people who live in them can be reconciled with provincial-type structures. I will have more to say about that, too.

The Meech Lake Accord is a piece of nation building. There are other pieces of our nation which must be completed. In the Northwest Territories and the Yukon we have 40 per cent of the land area of Canada but not the political and economic rights taken for granted in the south. For example, northerners have no control over their lands and resources. Northerners have no control over what goes on in our inland seas even though Canada's Inuit provide the national argument our lawyers take to world bodies to claim those ocean waters.

Inuit use of the seas and sea ice are the basis of that claim. I noticed that before the Venice Economic Summit President Reagan spoke of our unique Inuit claim. He said that he thought it could provide a basis for agreement between Canada and the United States about those waters.

Of course the North is larger than just the Territories. Northern Quebec and Labrador have vast Arctic areas inhabited by Inuit. Five other provinces also have large sub-Arctic areas. Outside of a few boom-towns like Tuktoyaktuk on the Beaufort Sea or Iqaluit on South Baffin Island, the permanent residents are aboriginal in nature.

There are two approaches to constitutional development in the North today. Members of this House have heard submissions by Governments of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon which, by the way, I sympathize with. The problem, as they see it, is a conventional one. For example, by being promised provincehood in the future they say they can deal with the social and political problems. As a Member representing a predominantly native riding, specifically an Inuit riding, this is where I part company with the political views of my fellow territorial residents in the Mackenzie area. That is, of course, with all due respect to the views of my colleague, the Hon. Member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson). As a result, I have been accused of not supporting the position of the Territories by both the Government of the Northwest Territories and by the media in the North.

The Inuit approach to our social and political problems has always been a complete overhaul of the political system in the North. Specifically, one has been the settlement of aboriginal claims to the land and resources and the right to govern ourselves by the modification of a territorial form of government, the creation of a Nunavut territory out of the existing one. Unfortunately, this view is opposed by our present colonial masters, the settlers of Canada residing in the Northwest Territories.

Consequently, and in view of the situation in the North, I can only envy the two so-called founding nations—the English and francophone nations, who have resolved their co-existence through the Meech Lake Accord. As a result I will support this Accord because it paves the way for other peoples of Canada with different political and social goals to one day resolve their own differences.

I do not know a great deal of constitutional law, but I was working on constitutional matters for many years before my election. Constitutions are social documents written in legal fora by lawyers. However, first, a constitution must express a social truth.

I headed the Nunavut land claims project at one time. For those people who do not yet understand, land claims is really the aboriginal peoples' constitutional approach. Our people know that the land and waters which provide our life are the basis of everything so it is natural for us to identify ourselves with them. We build our ideas of society up from there. We have ways of life carefully suited to the land we live in. That land, the Arctic, is a very special place. I am glad that many southern people have the chance, through television and photography books, to learn about it now. However, ultimately, we Inuit believe that we have a special responsibility for our land. We wish to exercise that responsibility through management systems and self-government.

Therefore, we continue to negotiate land claims and at the same time we work to create a Nunavut government. Ottawa, in its wisdom, long ago decided that these two processes must be separate, although to Inuit they are one. Therefore, we have two sets of offices and two sets of staff, but they work closely together. Sometimes we think that the southern negotiators like the two processes so that they can play one off against the other. However, we Inuit are very clear about what we want.

If I have a criticism of the Special Joint Committee report it is that the northern chapter thinks strictly in terms of provincial status. It is very conventional. Gordon Robertson, among other experts on northern policy, has written a book about the fact that more flexible arrangements would be more workable. He, like we, wants arrangements which do not force Inuit into a southern mould. Nunavut is our answer.

I do not understand why the special joint committee does not mention Nunavut. Perhaps they did not listen to the Inuit. Certainly they did not understand us. Indian groups also have ideas for self-government but the special joint committee has not spoken for native northerners; the Métis, Indian, and Inuit people who are the permanent residents of the North, when it discusses the future purely in terms of the provincial path.

That section is too conventional, too rigid. It totally ignores the fact, for instance, that in the Northwest Territories two constitutional fora have been working for the past five years and in fact reached an accord last winter. This northern accord has yet to be put to a referendum.

Those forums, the western constitutional forum and the Nunavut constitutional forum are bringing aboriginal and white legislative members and aboriginal association leaders to a social and political census on new governments. Nunavut is the Inuit proposal.

I must raise this subject because there is some evidence that people in Ottawa and in the south generally do not understand the issue. The modern history of the Northwest Territories is not a happy one. The feelings among the regions and peoples have not always been friendly. If federal policy ignores the regional reality, the cultural reality, and the long stated demands of Inuit through land claims, through talks on a Nunavut Government, through the national constitutional talks, then there can be no progress. The northern chapter of the report briskly assumes northerners can be quickly marched into a southern parade. I would suggest that policy-makers not be quite so certain of that.

Just as I support the spirit of commitment and creativity which led to the Meech Lake Accord, so I look forward to another such process to deal with Inuit and other northern and aboriginal issues.

If almost half of Canada—the North—is in limbo as some people have said, that is serious. We need a more active commitment in Ottawa to assisting northern people sort out the remaining problems in creating new territorial governments. Nunavut is an opportunity for Canada. It is the best answer to anyone in the world who thinks that Canadians treat aboriginal people like South Africans treat blacks.

I want to take this opportunity to elaborate on the concerns raised by the two territorial Governments relating to provincial status. If the two Territories are so concerned about this issue of provincehood, there is a practical way to resolve it even though it would involve a major constitutional conference involving all the First Ministers of this country, with the two Territories involved this time.

Given that both the non-native and aboriginal residents are similar in political and cultural persuasion, why not merge the territory of the Yukon and the western part of Northwest Territories to make one territory and, consequently, an eleventh province? They would then have the appropriate political maturity, including the raw numbers to warrant it. We could then have only one Territory left in the Canadian Confederation, a native territory which could then become Canada's showcase to the world.

I urge all Hon. Members, as well as the First Ministers, to study this alternative as a viable way of satisfying everyone's political aspirations, including the two territorial Governments which have felt left out so far.

The reason there has been a move for the creation of two territories is that there are two almost equally divided groups of people. One group wants to work toward provincial status while the other wishes to safeguard its culture, its land and its people through the creation of their own territory. This is where I said I have parted company with the views expressed by the Government of the Northwest Territories.

The northern political constitutional question is not a provincial question. It is largely an aboriginal question. Inuit have always made clear that our proposals for Nunavut welcome the white people who live among us. We have no desire to discriminate against anyone.

While Ottawa is turning over powers and budgets to the Yellowknife Government, territorial officials, including the politicians in Yellowknife, are delighted but will not admit it. They believe that this will kill Nunavut, but it will not. Nunavut will not go away because it is the way we Inuit think of our land. Nunavut means "our land". We will not be happy living in a Yellowknife-dominated territory.

This summer, Nick Sibbeston, the NWT government leader, said that having more power in Yellowknife means that Nunavut is no longer needed. That could not be farther from the truth. He certainly does not understand Inuit or the eastern half of the territory over which he is territorial premier.

Inuit need a government which speaks our own language. We need a government that takes on the hard issues of resource management and development, and which helps us restore peace and stability in some of our villages which have grown too fast. That government is Nunavut.

In conclusion, we can identify with the people of Quebec to full political participation in Canada through the Meech Lake Accord. We know what it feels like to be left out. It is these problems which aboriginal and northern people bring to Ottawa in the hope of justice. I call upon the House and Canadian people to complete the infrastructure of nationhood. I call on you all to work to make the North part of Canada.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, first let me congratulate my hon. colleague from the North for stating a very important point that I believe was not made well during the discussions at Meech Lake. It concerns the diversity within Canada both of the traditional concepts of government and the aboriginal concept related to self-government, aboriginal rights and meeting the needs of those areas such as the one represented by my colleague, which is largely made up of aboriginal people. Those views are of great benefit to this discussion because I believe Canadians are not aware of them.

On the other hand, I disagree with some of the positions taken by my colleague. Originally I thought the boundary extension clause in the Constitution may have referred to the south, but then I was told that the States may not like that. I then had to assume that the boundary extension clause referred to the North, but now the Member says that it means east and west, with the Yukon becoming part of the Northwest Territories or vice versa.

It is an interesting concept and probably one of the best original thoughts we have heard in this debate. While the Member receives high points for originality, I do not believe that concept will be welcomed with great rejoicing in the Yukon.

The Hon. Member mentioned the aspirations of the Inuit. Those of us who live in the North, while not Inuit, hopefully understand some of the issues and empathize with those aspirations.

I am concerned about how the Member believes the Meech Lake Accord contributes to the advancement of Nunavut, for instance. Upon review of the process to date, does the Hon. Member know if the Inuit were consulted before, during or after the First Ministers' conference that resulted in the Meech Lake Accord?

Mr. Suluk: Mr. Speaker, to be quite frank, the short answer would probably be no, considering that the two territorial Governments were not consulted.

On the other hand, I believe that we in the North, especially the Inuit and the Inuit Committee on National Issues, do not oppose the two major founding peoples, the francophones and anglophones, settling their differences first. Like it or not, the Inuit is a very small minority within those two systems, and to be quite frank, in order to be successful in our aspirations, we have to co-operate more with those nations than perhaps some of the other aboriginal peoples in Canada.

The short answer is that, as an aboriginal Member, I certainly was not consulted, but I think that is beside the point now. I had earlier mentioned that I was elected on the issue of resolving some major questions which affect all of us. I think the Meech Lake Agreement required something very strong, and that is the only answer I can provide at this time.

Ms. McLaughlin: I thank the Hon. Member for that answer. I think that has clarified some of my question. I very much agree that the concept of self-government for aboriginal people is absolutely essential to the development of this country, that there needs to be a much greater understanding of that concept within our society, that it will not undermine provincial status or territorial legislatures, that it is the right thing to do and that it is something that will work. We have to deal with what is being done here. How does my colleague see the Meech Lake Accord resolutions helping to further aboriginal self-government and the creation in the Eastern Arctic of Nunavut? How does he see the Accord facilitating that? My concern is that I see it detracting from that.

Mr. Suluk: Mr. Speaker, I will answer the question in two ways. First, according to the summary of the joint committee on the Senate and House of Commons, the Accord itself would require future First Ministers' conferences on constitutional change to deal with any other outstanding concerns, and I would have to rely on that. The other part of the answer would be that up until now the federal Government has allowed the NWT, in particular, to be able to resolve its political differences on its own at the very outset. We are getting very close to that.

I mentioned earlier that there is in fact a political accord which, unfortunately, has not yet been put to a plebiscite or referendum, but we expect that after next Monday's territorial elections, our representatives are going to make sure that this issue of resolving the boundary dispute will be put to a referendum. That is my second answer.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member in his comments referred to the question of provincial status. He suggested that there may be a practical way to resolve this. I think he referred to a constitutional conference in which the Governments of the Territories would participate. I would like him, though, to perhaps add a word or two about the question of unanimity. How does he feel about this particular provision of the Meech Lake Agreement that will require the unanimous agreement of the provinces, and the federal Government, in order to create new provinces?

As the Hon. Member knows, the western provinces were created by an agreement between the Governments of those provinces, the Territories that were to become provinces, and the federal Government. There is probably something to say for giving the provinces a greater say in creating new provinces because it will affect the amending formula. So the two questions are certainly linked.

However, does the Hon. Member not feel that by requiring the unanimous agreement of the provinces it is really condemning the Territories to territorial status forever because it will be unlikely we will be able to obtain the agreement of all the provinces?

Mr. Suluk: I think, Mr. Speaker, there has to come a time when we stop talking in conjecture and speculation and really put some of the things to the test. Considering the fact that there has been a lot of criticism coming from the two Territorial Governments, and from the residents of the North, and that there has been a lot of sympathy from the press and so on, we have to see if in fact this will be really so. The only way to find out whether there would in fact be unanimity or whether one province might not agree, is to not wait and speculate but to go ahead and try it.

I think that many of the provincial premiers, perhaps even the federal Government, are now ready to take into consideration the concerns of the two Territories and the residents of the two Territories in general. So I would wish to have the First Ministers, including the federal Government, look very seriously into what I have suggested, and that is to merge the two, one half of the other territory and the Yukon together. I think that is a very novel thing. I cannot think of why any of the First Ministers would really wish to stop the aspirations of the rest of the population of Canada. If they do, then I would say they deserve all the criticism that has been heaped upon them.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The period for questions and comments is over. May I call it five o'clock?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—PUBLIC BILLS

FRESHWATER FISH MARKETING ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic) moved that Bill C-211, an Act to amend the Freshwater Fish Marketing Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the objective of Bill C-211 is very simple, it is to remove the monopoly presently enjoyed by the Crown corporation, the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation, and allow it to act as a normal fish marketing company would, without the benefit, if that is the right word, of the monopoly. This is not a new idea. It is something I have been pursuing for 15 years, both in the Legislative Assembly of the Northwest Territories and in the House of Commons. Other people were pursuing it long before that, in fact, ever since the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation was set up by statute in Canada in 1969.

The last time this Bill came before Parliament, it was numbered Bill C-235. It was dealt with in June or July, 1985, at which time it was referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Oceans and apparently died on the Order Paper of that committee when that session of Parliament came to a close.

In order to understand what we are trying to do here, one has to know a little bit about the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation, how it came into being, where its operations are, and how it conducts its business. It is a federal Crown corporation and operates within the prairie provinces, within the Northwest Territories, and within a small part of Ontario just west of Thunder Bay. It has a head office and principal plant in Transcona, which is just outside the City of Winnipeg.

In 1986, there were total landings of about 45 million pounds of fish, which in general is not a great deal of fish when compared with the East Coast or the West Coast of Canada. The value of that catch, the sales of the corporation in that year, were some $48 million. This information puts it in a kind of context.

When the corporation was established in 1969 it fitted in with the ideology of the day. Shortly after the election of Pierre Elliott Trudeau as Prime Minister of Canada—in the days of the so-called just society—the idea behing it, I guess, was good. It wanted to give the fishermen a better deal. The idea was that instead of having a number of small fish companies trying to sell their fish to American buyers in Chicago and New York, which at that time, and even today, were some of the biggest principal markets for freshwater fish, there would be one organization that would set the terms of trade. However, it did not really work out. The commercial clout that was supposed to have been given to FFMC never really materialized in fact. Things have gone from bad to worse in the freshwater fish marketing business.

The industry, unfortunately in western Canada, continues to decline, although, and I will get to this later in my presentation, in Ontario where there is a private marketing system, the industry is on the up-and-up. Before FFMC came into existence there were a number of relatively small firms in the business, or relatively small, privately-owned firms. There were fishermen, co-operatives, and generally speaking there had been an increase in the amount of fish produced and sold over a number of years until FFMC came into business.

The industry today is hardly what you would call self-sufficient. A number of people describe it as a social industry. I know in the area that I represent, were it not for something like a 10 cent or 15 cent a pound subsidy given by the territorial Government the industry would virtually collapse. That ought not be the case. I am sure it can be a viable industry. It does not have to be looked at as a form of social welfare. It can be a thriving industry that can stand on its own feet.

We have a series of plant closings. That was not suppressed to happen with FFMC, but it does. Over the last few years, on an almost annual or biannual, there are amendments to the FFMC Act which come before Parliament asking for authority to borrow yet more money from the Government of Canada. So it is not really a financially viable operation.

The problem is with sales. The fishermen know how to catch fish, but what we apparently do not have is somebody who knows how to sell the fish. FFMC has been unable to fulfil its mandate of selling fish. It just does not seem to be able to do it. The last annual report of the company refers to continuing high inventories and the inability to place that fish on the markets. It has resorted to all kinds of techniques to get rid of this supply that is overhanging the market. Sometimes it sells it off at cut-rate prices. It even enters into what I quite frankly think are unlawful agreements to cut down on the supply.

In return for the monopoly the FFMC is supposed to undertake to buy all the fish delivered to it by the fishermen. That was tit for tat. But it is not working out that way. It is putting pressure on fishermen to sign agreements, which I do not think would stand up in a court of law, to restrict the amount of fish to be delivered to the Corporation. Or it can reduce the prices to such a low level that it is just not worthwhile fishing. Or it can close down receiving stations, as it did with the Wool Bay receiving station in my area this summer. There is no place for the fishermen to take their fish, so it can get around the responsabilities that were put onto it by virtue of the Act.

Because of the trouble in the industry a number of studies have been undertaken. I do not know if anybody has any good ideas as to how to make FFMC as it stands work. I do not think they have.

The best study, and one of the most recent, on the marketing of freshwater fish in Canada, was the one done by the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries under the chairmanship of the Hon. Jack Marshall. I would highly recommend it to anyone who wants to know anything about the freshwater fish industry, particularly the marketing aspects thereof, in Canada. It is an excellent document. It makes some good but timorous recommendations. It will not go all the way that is really necessary.

It did recommend, however, a certain degree of private initiative being allowed in the market. Recommendation 13B, which is a rather lengthy one, and I will not read it all into the record, suggest that certain private buyers be licensed and allowed to operate in competition with the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation. That is a good recommendation, one that ought to be put into effect immediately. But in my opinion it does not solve the whole problem. It does not go far enough.

It is interesting to note, Sir, that there is a duplicate freshwater fish marketing system in Canada. We have in the West, including the North, a Crown corporation holding a monopoly where the industry is in decline. On the other hand, in Ontario, which is the other major freshwater fish producing area, we have private enterprise. Anyone is allowed to get into the business of buying and selling fish. There is a free market. This situation would make a wonderful study for professors of economics because here there are two areas in one country. On the one hand there is a socialist system of marketing. On the other hand is a free enterprise system. It is like night and day between them.

In Ontario, the fish business is booming. It cannot keep up with the demand for it. The problem in Ontario is that they are up against the total allowable catch in all these different areas. They cannot get that stuff to market quick enough and in big enough quantities, whereas in the west there are a great number of fish. We never take out the total allowable catch on Great Slave Lake but the problem is that no one can move that fish. They cannot sell it. So it is a wonderful demonstration before our very eyes of the two marketing systems. What I want to do is not to get rid of the FFMC but to revoke that monopoly so that some of those good things that are happening on the Great Lakes of Ontario can also take place in western and northern Canada.

In my opinion, if this Bill is passed into law we will liberate the market, and liberate marketing initiative. FFMC, as I have said before, will continue to exist. But it will have to be competitive. It will have to go out and sell that fish. Fishermen will no longer be at the beck and call of this Crown corporation. They will be able to look around and see if there is somebody else who is willing to pay them a higher price for their product. I do not see that there is anything wrong with that. The fishermen ought to be able to sell the fish that they catch to the people who are prepared to give them the highest price for it.

Although it is not proposed in my Bill, it is quite possible that at some time the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation will be a candidate for privatization. It is bad enough having a Crown corporation with a monopoly. But it is absolutely unthinkable that a private corporation should have a monopoly. If it is to be privatized in the same manner as Pêcheries Canada Incorporated and Fishery Products International Ltd., then the passage of this Bill and the revocation of a monopoly is a required first step.

What type of people are likely to get into the marketing of fish and into competition with FFMC if the business is opened up? Initially, it will not mean direct competition with FFMC. We will see people who are interested in specialty products. One that comes to mind is burbot. That fish is excellent and it makes the best fish and chips that anyone could possibly want to eat. FFMC cannot handle that fish because of Jewish dietary law. If a plant is processing whitefish for the Jewish market, it cannot process burbot, which is a scaleless species, in the same plant. Each year, thousands of pounds of burbot are thrown overboard because FFMC are unable to process that fish. If that market was opened up, private entrepreneurs would be able to handle that particular species in a specialized market.

In my constituency there are certain areas, for example, Great Slave Lake, which produces a high quality product that previously was sold for premium prices, and now it is rolled in with all the other product from Lake Winnipeg and other prairie lakes that FFMC deal with. If the product from Great Slave Lake was dealt with on its own and marketed separately, quite properly a higher price would be received for that particular type of high quality fish. People would initially enter into specialities in species and products, and specialities in areas.

It is likely that fishermen's co-operatives would be revived. They existed in the past, but no longer do. I know a number of fishermen have thought it would be a good idea to get together and form co-operatives to sell their fish. Certain large retailers would also like to be able to buy directly. Lapointe Fish Ltd., a company that has been in Ottawa for many decades, and is a highly reputable fish dealer, would like to be able to buy char directly from fishermen and get it into the stores in Ottawa. Those retailers could pay the fishermen a better price than they are presently receiving from FFMC. In law they are prohibited from doing that. That fish has to go from Baffin Island, to be sold to FFMC in Winnipeg, return to Ottawa, and bear that extra expense. Of course, then the product cannot be sold in Ottawa for a reasonable price. Those are a few of the areas where new people would enter the business.

Efficiency and effectiveness of marketing operations would definitely be increased. There would be much greater over-all marketing effort. As a result, we would end up with larger over-all markets. The Senate study points to vast untapped markets for freshwater fish, particularly in the United States. Markets exist that are much more than we could ever fill. But because of the very limited marketing effort, we are not able to take advantage of that. So there are huge untapped markets out there. With this new marketing effort we could take advantage of them.

In my opinion, the end result is that both the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation and the new private or co-operative entrepreneurs would both do better. In that manner, the people who work for FFMC in the plant in Transcona would not be put out of business. There will be an increase in the over-all business and everybody will benefit from that.

In the final analysis, the fishermen, the people that we are worried about, would benefit from higher prices and better returns for their effort.

My final point is why should Canadian citizens be forbidden by law to engage in the honourable profession of fish merchant? Why is that the case? By what right does the Government of Canada prevent anyone from offering a fisherman $2 a pound for his product instead of forcing him to sell it to a government Crown corporation for 20 cents a pound?

I urge all Members to support this Bill, and thereby do justice to the hard-working fishermen of Canada's west and north.

Mr. George Henderson (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure for me to speak on fisheries issues. It is a pleasure that I have had almost yearly during my seven and a half years as a Member of Parliament to speak on the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation.

The Bill that is presented in the name of the Hon. Member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson), Bill C-211, could be entitled "an act to really gut the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation". This is the second time that the Hon. Member for Western Arctic has raised this specific item in Parliament. I refer to his former Bill, Bill C-235, which was debated in the House on June 7, 1985. As the Hon. Member mentioned, it was then referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Oceans. The present Bill is no different. The Hon. Member is once again seeking to remove the monopoly provision of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation.

I must say that I give the Hon. Member much credit for consistency. He has been consistent with his position on this issue since I became a Member of Parliament in 1980. Of course, I cannot say that for all Members of Parliament of the Conservative Party. Certainly, when they became the government that consistency failed.

I am tempted to recall a debate in the House on Private Members' Motions once again on the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation as reported in Hansard on July 10, 1980 at page 2762. I wish to quote from the debate of an Hon. Member who was then in the Opposition and is now on the government side. He stated:

> That original concept was recommended by the McIvor commission in the late sixties and advocated by the Conservative Government of Duff Roblin in the Province of Manitoba. What that concept of a marketing board has become is, as I said a moment ago, a monopolistic, vertically integrated Crown corporation, like so many of our Crown corporations, which handles the product from the lakeside all the way to the consumer, whether the consumer be in the fish buying markets of New York State or Poland.

He went on to say:

> I suggest what we have now is a system of monopolistic dominance in the fish marketing industry, in the prairie provinces in particular, which is a far cry from what I understand to be the principle of democratic socialism where free enterprise and the private sector can operate in competition with one another. What we have is virtual communism in all of its forms in the example and illustration of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation.

Perhaps some Hon. Members will remember who made those comments and may realize what position that particular Member now holds in the House. He now happens to be the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Siddon), so he has all the powers today to do something about it.

I never forgot the debate which occurred in the House on July 10, 1980, because I participated in it. I had never heard such nonsense or such ideological stupidity from a Member of Parliament. I wonder what the Minister has done to reconcile his past convictions with his current responsibility for the corporation.

As I said earlier, the Hon. Member for Western Arctic has been consistent in past debates. I certainly give him credit for that. In a few years from now I suppose writers will be calling the "Mulroney" Government the gang who could not shoot straight. Although the Hon. Member may be a good shot himself, I believe he is shooting at the wrong target today. Very little has happened in the last two years since the Hon. Member spoke on a Bill which, in my opinion, would justify gutting the corporation.

The Hon. Member suggested that the removal of the export monopoly could inject some competition in the prices paid to freshwater fishermen. I am sure all Hon. Members support higher prices for our primary products, but history tells us that the Hon. Member's proposal could do more harm than good.

I certainly support private enterprise in every way possible. In my own riding there is a number of co-operatives which operate very effectively and efficiently. They are owned by the producers and are subject to good management, but when the market is in a downturn, co-operatives suffer as does any other corporation.

I want to comment on the statement of the Hon. Member when he said that there were different species and specialty products for private enterprise. On the surface that is very true, but I would like to refer to what happened when some of my co-operatives were in competition with small private fish buyers in tough times. If we take lobster as an example, it could be shipped in frozen or raw form to a special market in Toronto, Winnipeg, Vancouver, Montreal, or the United States. They were able to pay fishermen a higher price because they did not have the overhead. However, when fishermen tried to sell smelts, mackerel, or some other species, the co-operative could not pay anywhere near the price and of course did not have the facilities to process the product.

The Hon. Member is absolutely correct that certain private enterprises can win on a particular specie or product by having a special market for a special quantity and obtaining a higher price. However, larger co-operatives or companies must sell all fish, all species, or all products produced by fishermen and, therefore, it is an averaging situation.

In the past we have seen, in my province for instance, where some of the fishermen went for the higher price, only to be caught at the end of the day with a specie which they could not sell. Over all they were not better off.

Once again I praise the Hon. Member for his consistency in bringing the matter forward, but he did not comment upon the Senate report on marketing freshwater fish in Canada. It is an excellent report with which I agree.

It is not an easy problem. I know there are isolated areas of the Hon. Member's riding in which some very small plants are located, and that it is very difficult to get fish to the major processing plant and then on to major markets. However, we must average over all for the good of all.

I would ask the Hon. Member to think very seriously about those situations. I know what he wants to do and I appreciate that his will is good. However, I ask him to think seriously before proceeding much further with this Bill, before doing more harm to fishermen than good.

We in the Official Opposition cannot support the Bill in its present form for those reasons.

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to make a few remarks about Bill C-211. The Hon. Member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson), who is sponsoring this piece of legislation, has a number of fishermen in his riding who must deal with the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation.

A minority of the freshwater fishermen in the Northwest Territories, specifically those who are fishing for whitefish, northern pike, and lake trout on Great Slave Lake, are very unhappy about the way in which the corporation operates and markets its fish.

However, we must remember that fishermen in Manitoba, particularly those in northern Manitoba, as well as those in Ontario, Saskatchewan, and Alberta, see the need for the existence of the corporation even though they are not completely satisfied with the way in which it operates at all times. The explanatory note to the Bill indicates that its purpose is to revoke the monopoly which the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation presently has in respect of interprovincial and international sales of such fish. In effect this would eliminate the main function of the corporation. I hope that the Bill was not introduced solely from some ideological desire to dismantle the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation in favour of some form of private enterprise. The Hon. Member said that that was not his intention, but that certainly seems to be the total effect of the Bill.

We need to remember the reason the corporation was established in the first place. It was established because of the failure of private enterprise to sell the catch of freshwater fishermen and because some of these fishermen were in fact being ripped off by some private buyers. These workers needed the support of a marketing agency which was able to expand into alternative markets and to ensure orderly marketing.

The corporation was established in 1969 by the Freshwater Fish Marketing Act for the purpose of marketing and trading in fish and fish products. In the Northwest Territories today more than 300,000 pounds of fish are produced. The corporation has licensed fishermen to sell within the Territories to local businesses, but obviously the market is too small and there is a need to bring the product to outside markets, whether they are provincial ones in Canada or international ones.

Alberta and Saskatchewan have changed their legislation to allow fishermen to sell to other than the final consumer. There is no doubt but that the work of the corporation could be and should be improved. However, most provincial Governments support the concept of a single selling desk operation and would be very leery of any changes which would harm the future incomes of fishermen.

These are some of the changes which need to be looked at. There is a need for more processing to take place in the home community. Fishermen themselves should be given the opportunity to play a more active role and have more control in the running of the corporation. This could be accomplished by having a board of directors with fishermen in the majority. The Senate committee interim report on the freshwater fishery made a number of recommendations for improvements to the marketing board and I would like to highlight some of them.

First, recommendation number five. Because of the high cost of storage, when a surge of fish comes in at a particular time the committee recommends variable pricing be implemented on a large scale to control surges in delivery as well as quality levels. That is already being practised to a limited extent. The fishermen affected should be fully informed of the pricing changes as well as the reason for implementing them.

Recommendation number seven says that a permanent interprovincial freshwater fishery committee composed of provincial and territorial government representatives, corporation representatives, fishermen's elected representatives, and DFO personnel be formed for the purpose of co-ordinating interprovincial fishery policies, sharing information on matters of provincial domain, and taking the responsibility for matters of common concern and common potential benefits. In other words, let us have more territorial and provincial involvement in the operation and a little more co-ordination.

Recommendation 13(b), which I think perhaps begins to meet some of the desires of the Hon. Member opposite, suggests that the territorial Government, in co-operation with the federal Government, license a few carefully selected individuals or groups to purchase species from the territorial harvest to be sold in international markets. This would be a pilot project designed to assess whether private enterprise is capable of participating actively in revitalizing the declining fishery of the Territories. The participants must be prepared to market all of their catch. Recommendation 15 is that the corporation and provincial and territorial Governments jointly pursue concerted efforts to stimulate the expansion of the domestic market for freshwater fish.

We recognize that some individuals may not be satisfied with the activities of the corporation. We recognize that some changes are needed. However, what concrete change does this legislation suggest? I am not convinced that the corporation should be stripped of its powers before other mechanisms are put in place. The best interests of all freshwater fishermen must be served, not just a select few of his constituents, so we are unable to give our support to this Bill.

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Selkirk—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I would like to express a point of view as a Member from Manitoba. This Bill brought forward by my colleague from Western Arctic once again highlights freshwater fishing activities in Canada and some of the problems the corporation has faced from its inception. There is no better forum than this to discuss his proposals and the importance of the industry to Canada. I would like to add my comments to the discussion and perhaps express some difference of opinion.

First, a good portion of the freshwater fish caught on the Prairies is caught in my riding. As much as 60 per cent of all the freshwater fish going to the Transcona plant is caught in Manitoba lakes. In fact, you might say the fishing capital of the west is Gimli, Manitoba, to which Icelandic settlers brought their fishing trade. They adapted very well. In fact, they made substantial economic gains for themselves, their families and their communities because of the tremendous quantities of whitefish in Lake Winnipeg.

At the time the federal Government looked at this situation of freshwater fish marketing, because a lot of the lakes involved were Crown property, there was quite a mishmash of selling agencies involved. That might be argued by some, yet the Government in its wisdom decided to put together a Freshwater Fish Marketing Board. It may sound somewhat strange but I am not a great follower of marketing boards. I have had a lot of experience with them in agriculture. We all know we have a Wheat Board which has been fairly successful, but despite that you will always find some people opposed to boards in general, as well as others with other ideas.

With respect to this board and the idea of opening up processing and sales to other areas as suggested by my colleague, I would suggest that before I support this Bill I would go back to my 1,400 commercial fishermen and ask them what they think of this idea. This will affect them. My colleague suggested it will affect them for the better. He says it will be more efficient and prices will go higher. We have heard these wonderful stories about how prices will go higher. We have heard how Members of this House can do wonderful things with different Bills. Yet we are not necessarily the experts. It is only an idea and it would have to be tested before I can support it.

If the Hon. Member looks at the statistics for the last five years, prices have risen. Fishermen tell me they are getting quite a good run for their product and I think the facts bear that out.

Mr. Nickerson: Maybe in Manitoba.

Mr. Holtmann: All the fish sold through Manitoba. The question I would like to put to the Member is if someone in the Yukon or the Northwest Territories started processing fish and bypassed the marketing board, I suppose he would go to the same customer that the board has in Chicago. I suppose a good portion of his catch would be whitefish, although it might be some others. What would he do? Offer it at a price higher than the board does? I suppose he would get sales at a higher price. However, that kind of idea requires second thought because if I was the fish buyer, I would go to the lowest price.

It is a big market down there and it needs a continuity of supply as well as continuity in quality. Certainly if someone else entered that market they might have to cut the price just to get their foot in the door. Is that going to bring higher prices? I think the logic needs to be re-examined.

A new slaughterhouse in Manitoba thought it could enter the market at a higher price. In fact, it undercut everyone to get into the market. Consequently, it has almost gone bankrupt. If one looks at the problem very deeply, it might not be the answer.

I would also like to add that I think the Freshwater Fish Marketing Board does need to be examined and that new ways ought to be found to assist those production sectors my colleague represents. Maybe we should give them mandates to process, but we should find totally new markets for that product, without going into competition with a large corporation that represents a good number of fishermen in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and northern Alberta. One must really examine that potential.

The Hon. Member made a statement with which I tend to agree. He said that the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation, possibly because it has had a monopoly, is not the most aggressive sales agency in the world. It does not necessarily have to be when it has the entire production at its fingertips. Perhaps we should allow it or make it become more accountable or take a portion of that sale activity and let somebody broker that product out on behalf of the fishermen.

To suggest that now we can allow a co-operative to be established in the Northwest Territories and possibly bypass all the activities of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation and end up with a higher price is something about which I have reservations. Would such activity in fact generate the kinds of dividends and revenues the Hon. Member suggests? I would like him to show me the statistics that show that this would in fact happen. I think we also ought to consider the expansion of processing rough fish. In my area, all of it gets discarded at the source, which does not help the polluting of the lake and further expansion of the fish stock. Hundreds of tonnes of this could be processed. I think we as a Government ought to support some of those initiatives because in fact a good amount of this material is being brought into the Prairies as animal feed from other areas. One would wonder why we would not make a real concerted effort to do further processing of rough fish product. I support that and I am sure the Hon. Member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson) would support it.

I do not at this time fully support my colleague's way of handling a problem which I will admit exists. I have to first consider what impact this might have on the people I represent. Certainly, before I make a decision, I will have to visit with my constituents who are quite large in number and great contributors to the freshwater fish industry, and they do complain.

The former Hon. Member for Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands indicated we ought to put more fishermen representatives on the—

Mr. Manly: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think the Hon. Member is speaking about the present Member for Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands, not the former Member.

Mr. Holtmann: Mr. Speaker, I know that I am a bit of a soothsayer and can predict what might happen in the future, but I do apologize.

If the Hon. Member would check with the annual report on the advisory committee, the likes of Ed Isfeld, Helge Jones and William Cordel and people like this are in fact all fishermen and have had a great history of fishing on the Prairies. Just to correct his concern, we do have people who have some experience in the area on the board. Maybe we should add more, and I think that is a very good point.

I am still out on this one. I would certainly like the Hon. Member, after my time is is up, to show me how he can get a far greater return bypassing the board and in fact increasing the price of fish on the board. If he does, perhaps I could support this motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Clément M. Côté (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I too am interested in speaking to Bill C-221 introduced by my colleague from Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson). However I should like to address the House in the context of the new federal-provincial co-operation era which now prevails in Canada and praise the positive commitment and the spirit of initiative of the provinces and the Northwest Territories, in co-operation with the federal Government, with respect to the establishment of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Office.

I would express the view that the current market success of the office can be traced back to the federal, provincial and territorial association which led to its establishment.

It has to be a unique association in the history of freshwater fish and, in my estimation, it simply cannot be ignored. I will discuss this historic association in my speech. I intend to support my comments on the unique and dynamic character of this form of co-operation between the federal Government and the provinces with references to an interim report of the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries, tabled in September 1986.

One of the report's conclusions was that one should not support the centralized marketing system that is the very foundation of the Corporation. The Corporation cannot be considered as an organization that merely carries out the initiatives and objectives of the federal Government. In fact, the history of the Corporation has shown that we have here a model of consultation, co-operation, co-ordination among the six Governments that have an interest in our fresh water fisheries.

As a result of a decision unprecedented in the history of Canada's fisheries, the provincial Governments and the Government of the Northwest Territories decided to concentrate on the problems that were making life terribly difficult for the individual fisherman, and in a show of unity and co-operation, they passed additional legislation to provide for the subsequent establishing of a centralized marketing corporation.

Obviously, unilateral action at a time that has seen significant progress in federal-provincial relations would not only run counter to the very clear signs of co-operation that we are seeing across this country but might also seriously debilitate the fisheries and jeopardize the well-being of our fishermen.

When we say that the Corporation is the result of co-operation by four provinces, the Northwest Territories and the federal Government, it should be added that even before the five Governments passed legislation recognizing that fisheries constitute a specific area that required specific measures, the Government of Manitoba, in a presentation made at a national fisheries conference, stressed that fishermen received only a meager share of constantly fluctuating prices, and that processing and packaging facilities were notorious for poor equipment and poor quality control.

The Manitoba Government added at the time that it knew of no better solution than to create a regional marketing corporation to solve the marketing problems of the industry.

It is thanks to such creative leadership on the part of the Governments involved that the Corporation was created. Such an attitude reflects the spirit of federal-provincial co-operation which resulted in a new level of profitability for the freshwater fishing industry and an unprecedented income for the fishermen.

I also wish to underline, Mr. Speaker, that many of the problems, the solving of which was one of the major objectives in setting up the Board and many of which had been identified by the provinces or in the course of the exhaustive study carried out jointly by the provinces and the federal Government, were to a very large extent solved because of the centralized marketing system used by the Corporation.

The problems which had been mentioned by various Members of this House and which had also been the subject of an exhaustive study by the provinces were described after extended consultation with the provinces by Mr. George McIver in his 1965 report.

He summarized the situation of Canadian fishermen in these terms: They are neither happy nor satisfied, they are very discouraged.

The situation has changed for the better, Mr. Speaker. This remarkable co-operation between the provinces and the federal Government, which is probably still not perfect, has enabled the fishermen to have more influence and to make a profit on the market. The Corporation is a financial success. This success is due partly to the links between six Governments which are at the very source of the sustained and unprecedented record of profitability of the Corporation and the increased income of the fishermen themselves.

The Corporation also succeeded in solving the problems in the industry which had been identified by the provinces. The Corporation has a very good record of taking action to meet the concerns of the provinces and the federal Government. I also believe, Mr. Speaker, that we are fortunate to have such a Corporation at this time and that it will be able to meet the new challenges of the future. Especially since these new and complex challenges were defined by the provinces and more accurately and specifically described by the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries in September 1986, in its interim report on fresh water fisheries.

These issues are in addition to those concerning pricing and proper marketing procedures previously described by the six Governments.

The very existence of these issues which were dealt with in considerable detail in the report is further proof of the need to continue and refine the work done by the Corporation.

The new situation is self-explanatory, Mr. Speaker. The Corporation is now a financial success and appears to remain so, bringing prosperity to communities where the fresh water fisheries are a way of life.

The Corporation has just finished the best year it ever had. Last year, total payments to fishermen increased from $28.1 million to $36.6 million, and in an industry that has always been seasonal, it has been possible to maintain sustained growth over the last five years. The provisional report on freshwater fisheries, tabled in September, 1986, by the Senate Standing Committee, despite the apparent success of the Corporation in stabilizing the marketing of Canadian freshwater fish, raises a series of shortcomings that threaten the future of freshwater fisheries. Those dangers relate partly to the forthcoming advent of high techonology in the area of fisheries. Those challenges are just as real as those of an inordinate marketing and the unduly weak share of profits going to fishermen, whose existence has been acknowledged through federal-provincial co-operation.

The new challenges to say the least are more complex than the former ones. They relate to the arrival of capital-intensive technologies and the economic aggravations of product replacement by consumers, as well as the availability of proteinated substitutes on the international market.

I do not believe fishermen should be the only ones to take up those challenges. That view is shared by the authors of the interim report. They deal especially with the problems, concerns and opportunities in the area of freshwater fisheries, and conclude that it would be more valuable to improve the present system than to replace it outright.

That conclusion is clear. Canadian freshwater fishermen should not be deprived of a protector that has proved to be effective on rapidly changing markets.

In conclusion, I believe that with our provincial counterparts we have forged new ties and written a new page in the history of freshwater fisheries in Canada. Our approach, involving six Governments, and the courage shown by Canadian fishermen have meant success for us on the markets. Therefore, the time is ill-chosen to change the ties that bind us together and to perhaps threaten that co-operation and success in exchange for the uncertain future of a weakened corporation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hour provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 36(2), the Order is dropped to the bottom of the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 66 deemed to have been moved.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—NICARAGUA—FUNDING OF CONTRA FORCES BY UNITED STATES/MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands): Mr. Speaker, on September 17 I asked the Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) if he would speak up on behalf of Canada clearly and explicitly and indicate Canadian opposition to any further funding by the United States of America of Contra forces in Nicaragua.

In the past Canada, including the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), has indicated general opposition to foreign intervention in that area and to military funding and so on. However, we have not been specific, we have not specified that the major culprit in that area is the United States which has funded its so-called freedom fighters in Nicaragua who, in fact, are waging a war on development.

When the Prime Minister spoke to a gathering of newspaper people in Vancouver a year ago and indicated this, it received almost no attention in the United States. We spoke too softly. Teddy Roosevelt used to say that America had to speak softly and carry a big stick. Canada does not have a big stick so we should speak up a little more loudly.

That is particularly important at the present time when the five nations of Central America are desperately trying to achieve peace. On August 7 the five nations met in Guatemala and reached a peace accord which calls for such things as an amnesty, a cease fire, the removal of all foreign troops, and the cessation of foreign funding for guerilla movements. When I, along with other people from Canada, including the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy), visited Nicaragua in the early part of September as part of the Mission for Peace, we met with a wide variety of people, from Campasinos and co-operatives, up to Vice-President Sergio Ramirez.

Everywhere we went we found that people were tremendously concerned. They wanted peace and were concerned that Nicaragua should meet the conditions of the Guatemala accord. For example, they have appointed the reconciliation commission, at the head of which they placed Cardinal Obando y Bravo who has been one of the most outspoken opponents of the Nicaraguan Government, the Sandinistas. This indicates a real desire to try to bring together the different elements within Nicaragua and meet the peace conditions.

Everywhere we went, people were discussing the question of amnesty for Contras. For example, people in co-operatives were engaged in this debate. We also talked to a group of mothers who had lost their children in the war. One of them said: "As Christians and as revolutionaries we believe that it is necessary for us to forgive these people and welcome them back into our communities". We heard the same kind of answer at all levels in society.

We saw the re-opening of La Prensa, the newspaper, even at great cost to national security, in accordance with the idea of freedom of the press. Canada would never accept the idea of printing material that could endanger the country's Armed Forces if we were at war.

The major obstacle to achieving peace in Central America is very clear, and has been made clear by everyone to whom we talked. It is the continued funding of the Contras by the United States. We are dealing with an obsession on the part of President Ronald Reagan. He is carrying on a vendetta against the people of Nicaragua and is doing it by funding a group of mercenaries who are not interested in any kind of military encounter with the Army of Nicaragua but in attacking co-operatives, health centres and educational facilities. A school that was built by a group of Canadian volunteers was burned down. A farm funded by "Farmers For Peace" from Alberta was destroyed by these Contras who were funded by the United States. It is time that Canada speak up along with other countries and indicate that no decent country in the world approves of what President Ronald Reagan is doing and that he is completely isolated in world opinion.

Canada has indicated that it is willing to support the peace process by verification support and perhaps by some help in terms of finances. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has indicated today that he will be going to Central America. That is good and we welcome that kind of initiative. Most important, Canada must speak up and make very clear that the fundamental obstacle to peace in Central America is continued funding of the Contras by the United States and the Reagan administration.

I urge the Government to find the courage to stand up and state that clearly and explicitly.

Mr. Pat Binns (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond to the Hon. Member for Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands (Mr. Manly) on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark). I know that the Minister shares many of the concerns that have been raised by the Hon. Member and his colleagues, as well as members of the Official Opposition.

When this matter was dealt with in Question Period, the Minister said that he genuinely welcomed the active initiative taken by the Hon. Member, his colleague, and others and this is the reason why he is trying to do whatever will turn out to be practical.

The Hon. Member suggested that the Government of Canada take strong action in this area. I can assure the Hon. Member, through the Secretary of State for External Affairs, that the Government in fact has been doing just that. The Canadian Government's position on Central America has been made very clear on innumerable occasions in the House, in public statements and speeches, to the media and to the various governments involved in the Central American conflicts. We oppose third-party intervention in the region no matter what the source. That includes support for the Contras in Nicaragua.

I would like to point out that the Secretary of State for External Affairs made the Canadian position very clear in his address to the forty-second session of the United Nations General Assembly on September 22. He said:

> Canadian aid to the region has been steadily increasing, as has our funding and acceptance of refugees. We have expressed our view that the root problem in Central America is poverty, not ideology; that the real need is development assistance, not military activity; and that intervention by outside powers will only aggravate the tensions. We have supported the Contadora process, and have made available to Contadora the expertise Canadians have acquired in the techniques of peacekeeping.

He went on to say:

> Canada supports the initiatives of the Central American Presidents. We are prepared to provide our expertise mechanisms which, once peace is possible, can help it endure.
> The disputes must be resolved by those actually involved in the conflict, but Canada is prepared to contribute to that process in any direct and practical way open to us.

The Government of Canada shares the kinds of concerns the Hon. Member has, has taken a strong position on this issue and, I can assure the Hon. Member, will continue to do so.

IMMIGRATION—ARRIVAL OF HONDURANS AT VANCOUVER INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mrs. Mary Collins (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to make some further comments on the question I raised in the House on September 1. At that time I asked the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Bouchard) if he would consider imposing visa requirements on Hondurans. I was very pleased that in his response he indicated the Government would be prepared to look at this issue and, indeed, on September 18, when I asked if he had a chance to review this matter and had made a decision, he was then able to announce that as of September 18, visa requirements would be in place for Hondurans coming to Canada.

I wanted the chance to make a couple of comments about the story behind this. There has been some misunderstanding about it. Over the past number of months there have been about 1,000 Hondurans come to Canada, the majority of whom have claimed refugee status. Prior to September 18 there had been an increasing number coming to Vancouver on a flight pattern that brought them from Honduras to Mexico City and from Mexico City to Vancouver. Each Thursday a group of approximately 22 Hondurans arrived at Vancouver Airport and indicated they wished to claim refugee status.

It appears that possibly there was a bit of an organized arrangement involved in all this and that a travel agency in the Honduras had been either aiding or suggesting to people that this would be a way in which they could come to Canada and perhaps gain certain benefits such as being able to work here and resettle here merely by arriving and claiming refugee status. Indeed, it may have been the case that some of these people paid an amount of money to agents to enable them to come to Canada in this manner.

I think it is important, first, that there is no reflection at all on the Hondurans involved. I am sure they are hard working, genuine people who were seeking a better way of life and improved economic conditions. However, it comes back to the basic issue, can we allow our laws to be abused? We are now, fortunately, finally putting in place new laws dealing with refugees to address this kind of situation.

Certainly in my mind and in the mind of my constituents—in fact, in the minds of all Canadians—what we have heard is that they do not want to deny the opportunity to genuine refugees who are fleeing persecution to come to Canada. But they get very angry when they feel that the system is being abused, people are coming here using the guise of the refugee system to gain entry to the country when they should be properly using the regular immigration stream. There are many people who wish to come to Canada. They have to apply, meet the criteria and qualifications. They have to wait in line for that opportunity. So it is not fair that people are using a different way, commonly known as queue-jumping, to get ahead of the line.

I am pleased that the Minister has responded by imposing visa requirements. We all know that visas are not a long-term answer to dealing with this problem. We recognize that they do impose some difficulties for genuine business travellers and tourists who have to go through the extra time and, perhaps, expense of getting a visa before being able to come to Canada. Often that leads to the imposition of visas on Canadians travelling back to the country in question.

Given that Bill C-84 and Bill C-55 have not been completed and given, indeed, the frustration that I think we are all still feeling that Bill C-84, which has been dealt with appropriately in this place, is now going at a very slow pace through the Senate, those tough, new, fair laws are not yet in place. We needed a measure—hopefully only an interim measure—to control the flow of persons from Honduras coming into Canada in an inappropriate manner.

In this respect I am very pleased that the question I asked on September 1 was responded to favourably. The Government took action to address this problem, not only in the specific case of the Hondurans, but it is taking action to address the larger problem of illegal refugees who are trying to come to this country. When we see Bill C-84 and Bill C-55 receive Royal Assent and proclaimed into law, I think many of us will feel easier, more comfortable. At that point we will be able to get back to addressing the larger and vital issues of immigration policy for Canada, for now and in the future.

Mr. Pat Binns (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond to the Hon. Member for Capilano (Mrs. Collins) on behalf of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Bouchard). When the Hon. Member raised the question a short while ago in Question Period she pointed out, as she has again today, that these Hondurans should be applying through the regular immigration process. Of course, the Minister responded at that time by saying that he was seriously considering imposing a visa requirement in the near future. He went on to say that if the number of arrivals does not decline he will certainly consider the possibility of imposing visa requirements on Hondurans.

The Hon. Member has recognized in her remarks that the Minister has already taken direct action to deal with the concerns which she has raised on behalf of her constituents and on behalf of many, many Canadians. I can only confirm and report the action the Minister has taken. In fact, following consultations with the Department of External Affairs, a visitor visa requirement was imposed on citizens of Honduras effective September 18, 1987.

I would like to emphasize, too, that neither this requirement nor visa requirements in general are implemented for the purpose of preventing genuine refugees from coming to Canada but, rather, to provide the Immigration Commission with the means of deterring bogus refugee claimants from reaching Canadians ports of entry. Of course, this matter of queue-jumping is something which the Government has said it wants to alleviate so that those who go through the regular channels and follow the regular process will have a fair determination, in turn, following their initial application.

The present refugee determination system permits anyone coming to Canada to make a refugee claim. In fact, we saw that between January 1 and August 30, 1987, 973 Hondurans were reported at Canadian ports of entry as being inadmissible to Canada. As their cases proceed through the immigration system, these persons are likely to make refugee claims.

The inability of the system to quickly distinguish between persons with a potentially valid refugee claim and dispose of those who are in reality economic migrants, coupled with universal access provided by law, has caused our system to be overwhelmed. Increasing numbers of people have recognized that coming to Canada and making a refugee claim can result in an indefinite stay in Canada.

While the number of countries whose citizens require visitor and transit visas has increased, additional problem groups have emerged. Therefore, it has become necessary to impose additional visitor and transit visa requirements in order to prevent the development of a further large backlog of refugee claimants.

In conclusion, I am pleased to report and to confirm that the Minister has taken action, as he indicated to the House he would, in response to the Hon. Member. I am sure that the imposing of visas will accomplish the objective intended by the Minister and the Government.

(2) Until an amendment to the Constitution of Canada is made in relation to the Senate pursuant to section 41 of the Constitution Act, 1982, the person summoned to fill a vacancy in the Senate shall be chosen from among persons whose names have been submitted under subsection (1) by the government of the province to which the vacancy relates and must be acceptable to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada."

3. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 95 thereof, the following heading and sections:

"Agreements on Immigration and Aliens

(2) An agreement that has the force of law under subsection (1) shall have effect only so long and so far as it is not repugnant to any provision of an Act of the Parliament of Canada that sets national standards and objectives relating to immigration or aliens, including any provision that establishes general classes of immigrants or relates to levels of immigration for Canada or that prescribes classes of individuals who are inadmissible into Canada.

(3) The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms applies in respect of any agreement that has the force of law under subsection (1) and in respect of anything done by the Parliament or Government of Canada, or the legislature or government of a province, pursuant to any such agreement.

Mr. Bill Tupper (Nepean—Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased this morning to have the opportunity to share some thoughts with my colleagues in the House on the resolution before us, which is commonly known as the Meech Lake Accord, and on the amendments thereto.

I had the privilege during the past two months to attend about 90 per cent of the hearings of the joint committee on the Accord. Participating in those hearings was an educational process without parallel.

I was startled at times during the hearings at the enormous contrast in the appreciation of the Accord by different Canadians.

Perhaps I could summarize the hearings as follows: witnesses almost universally welcomed Quebec into the constitutional Canadian family. Second, witnesses generally endorsed the Accord but some were partisan to a particular view as to how the Accord affected them or their view of the shape of Canada's social and political make-up.

When learning that an Accord had been agreed on by the First Ministers in the evening of April 30, I recall being overwhelmed by a flood of emotion and pride that a pathway had been found to allow Quebec willingly to take its place in our constitutional confederation. It was a precious moment, long to be cherished and long to be remembered.

June 2 and June 3, 1987, were equally dramatic but to some extent anticlimactic. Looking back, I was never troubled by the distinct society clause in the Accord. I always felt that Quebec was a distinct society and that view was reinforced by Jack Pickersgill when he related to the committee some of the history of the evolution of the Quebec society in North America, pointing out to us that certain things were granted to the French community in Canada back in 1760s, 1770s and through the 1790s, that related to their ability to practice the Catholic religion and other things relating to their language and civil law.

I could accept as well those procedures in the Accord which related to appointments of Senators and Supreme Court judges. If I had concerns after the Accord was signed, they related to the spending powers that were identified there and, to some extent, about the amending formula. I will return to the spending powers formula in a few moments, but before doing so, I would like to comment on some of the broader issues.

In a nutshell, the constitutional Accord, properly known as the Meech Lake agreement, is a three-prong consensus by Canada's First Ministers, to bring about Quebec's full and active participation in Canada's constitutional evolution, to foster greater harmony among Governments through new arrangements, and to hold annual constitutional conferences. In reviewing its finding and conclusions, the joint committee emphasized the nearly unanimous view of witnesses before it that Quebec rejoining the Canadian constitutional family is an important and desirable goal.

The question at hand, then, is whether the reform package negotiated by the First Ministers ultimately contributes to an improved Confederation for all Canadians. In passing judgment on the advisability of the agreement, the joint committee drew upon the wisdom of one of its testifying constitutional experts who argued that, given the importance of the success of the Accord as a package of constitutional reforms, any deficiencies it may contain must be seen to be serious and likely. While conceding that the Accord is a compromise, the joint committee's report asserts:

> Nothing has been said to lead us to believe that the basic principles of the Canadian Federation would be compromised.

That is, by the terms of the Accord. At the same time, the joint committee indicated that it heard a great body of opinion relating to matters which largely addressed constitutional problems outside the immediate confines of the Meech Lake agreement. In this vein, concerns with the operational issues of the Charter of Rights such as unsettled aboriginal matters and a lack of an institutional framework for constitutional discussions by First Ministers, figure prominently as problems which future constitutional conferences will have to, and must, address and resolve.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to return to my earlier concern about the spending power clause and how my thoughts and analysis evolved during the hearings. However, before doing so I would like to back up to the period of May and June of this year. I was concerned, perhaps, that the spending powers would have some effect in balkanizing this tremendous Confederation of which we are privileged to be part. I recall the importance, going back to Confederation and the Confederation forefathers who put so much thought into our Confederation, of a strong central government. As we look at the report, the committee reminds us that innovation by provinces has historically been an important source of advances in social policy. Medicare is perhaps the most notable example. It became a national goal only after Saskatchewan showed that it could be done.

I do not, nor did the committee, discount the dangers of checkerboarding that goes beyond details and reaches fundamental objectives of social programs. If Canadians could not count on public services everywhere, it would inhibit provincial mobility and sap our sense of belonging to one nation, to one country and to one federation. I believe these concerns are nothing but phantoms. The Accord includes its own bulwarks against checkerboarding. One is clearly written into Section 106(a), so that it need not detain me long. It is the proviso that reasonable compensation is available only when provincial programs and initiatives are compatible with national objectives. I repeat "national objectives". It is this House that will always set the national objectives for Canada.

No compatibility, no money from the federal Treasury. That alone powerfully incites provinces to ensure compatibility if they do opt out of shared-cost programs. Nothing in that Constitutional Accord takes away from the power of this House to define its programs and to decide when it wants to spend money on matters of national importance.

A second bulwark, one that works in favour of co-operation, is the Accord's guarantee of First Ministers' conferences on the economy and other matters once a year. This provision has not attracted much attention during public and parliamentary discussion of the Accord. Perhaps we have become too blasé and too easily take for granted the co-ordinating work done by First Ministers and the Prime Minister. The First Ministers' conference is a forum where the provinces can make their special concerns known so that federal programs are framed in ways that work for all Canadians wherever they live and whatever their social and economic setting. There is nothing in the Accord that compromises the authority of the federal Government to establish new national joint programs.

The Accord is intended to civilize the use of the spending power, and clarify that it cannot be used to oblige the provinces to take action in areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction. The Accord also recognizes that it is constitutionally acceptable for Parliament to establish new shared-cost programs in areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction, and provides that reasonable compensation will be granted to provincial Governments which establish a program or programs of initiative that are compatible with the national objective.

As I understand it, the reason the Accord addressed the federal spending power and the establishment of national programs was to improve the bargaining relationship that results from the virtually unlimited federal spending power on the one hand and, on the other hand, the fact that its use in areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction has sometimes led to federal provincial disagreements.

This question did not suddenly spring up in 1987. I would point out that the spending power was thoroughly examined by Governments in two previous exercises over the past many years, in 1968-1971, in the mid-1970s, and again in the period 1978-1979. I felt at times rebuffed by the intrusion of former Prime Minister Trudeau into the debate. However, in looking back, I found it was helpful because it did cause Canadians to focus in on some of the more important issues confronting us. But there was some dichotomy in what Mr. Trudeau said, not only in the public press but before the joint committee. It was a Government led by him in 1977 that gave up more constitutional power of spending in the block granting process to the provinces for health care and education than any Government in the history of this country since Confederation.

Where spending takes place over which this central Government has no control, at this point in our history and evolution, we have no guarantee, and have never had any, that funds that were to be directed for post-secondary education across this country would be spent for just that purpose.

The spending power clause found in the Accord is much simpler and more conducive to the establishment of new national social programs than the proposals the federal Government supported during those earlier exercises. It contains no consent mechanism, nor does it provide for unconditional compensation. Rather, it will encourage a healthier bargaining process between the two orders of Government and recognition that it is legitimate for Parliament to pursue joint economic and social programs on behalf of all Canadians.

Creative federalism was an idea that came up more than once at the committee's hearings. The group of 12 scholars, including Professors William Lederman, Peter Leslie, Richard Simeon and Donald Smiley, who submitted a joint brief, described the spending power provision as "the clearest embodiment of our view of creative federalism in the Accord". May I repeat that—the clearest embodiment of our view of creative federalism in the Accord.

We heard something very similar from J. W. Pickersgill, a veteran practitioner of government and a long-time Member of this House, when he met with the committee. Most Canadians want creative co-operation, Mr. Pickersgill said, and the acceptance of the Meech Lake Accord will make that possible. "I regard the Meech Lake Accord as the gate to greater unity and harmony in Canada," said Mr. Pickersgill. I agree with him. Negotiation is inseparable from federalism and creativity. It is essential to the harmonization of federal and provincial activity in a way that will translate into better policies for all.

So I agree with Mr. Pickersgill when he said, "Let us not shut the gate".

There were many touching moments during the presentations by the witnesses before the joint committee. I recall that very clever and enormously sharp advice that the committee received from many constitutional experts, some of whom had been involved with constitutional reform since the late 1930s and who brought an enormous amount of skill and advice—and good advice—to the committee about the value of the Accord.

I recall as well the very touching testimony by Madame Solange Chaput-Rolland, who appeared before the committee and who reviewed in considerable detail her historical perspective about the role the citizens of Quebec played in Confederation over the last 15 or 20 years. She spoke about the enormous emotion that was involved in the debate in 1979 and in 1980 as to whether or not Quebecers should stay within the constitutional framework of Canada. She spoke about the dichotomy between father and son, between mother and daughter, between neighbours, between communities. It was heart-wrenching. At those moments she had the committee in the palm of her hand, or at least she had me and I think most of my colleagues in the palm of her hand.

She spoke about the enormously gratifying feeling when Quebecers voted, not by an overwhelming but by a substantive majority, to stay within Confederation. She spoke as well with sincerity about the promises that were made to Quebecers by those who sat in this federal institution at that time, the promise that they would be brought into the greater Canadian constitutional family.

Then, she went on to review the process of 1980 and 1981, when a formula was put together to amend our Constitution and to bring it home, as it were, and to develop a framework, that the people from the Province of Quebec, Canadians with a great deal of generosity, talent and skill, were unable to support, that no political Party in the Province of Quebec was able to support. We heard her again say how enormously disappointed she was that she and her fellow citizens still had to sit outside, albeit morally, the Canadian Constitution. She reminded us, with tremendous emotion, of how she felt when the First Ministers came to an agreement about the Meech Lake Accord and its enormous importance to Canadians.

The joint committee not only gave its recommendation for adoption but it also stated, "It is neither necessary nor wise to recommend changes to the Accord at this time". As an alternate member of the joint committee, on September 9 I had the privilege of signing the report.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Are there questions or comments? The Hon. Member for Ottawa West (Mr. Daubney).

Mr. Daubney: Mr. Speaker, I would like simply to congratulate my colleague on his excellent speech and on his important contribution to the work of the committee.

It was my pleasure to work with him just about every day during those long, hot days of August when we had the honour of reviewing the testimony and listening to the evidence that came before us from Canadians from all parts of this great country. I think the Hon. Member's survey of that evidence was very well done today. In fact, I think it has been one of the better contributions to this debate so far this week. It was an excellent, fair-minded survey, but also a very heartfelt one. I felt it expressed adequately the emotion he felt, the emotion we all felt, about the work that we were about.

I think it also served to underline a disappointment that we shared as members of the committee in hearing this excellent testimony, this positive testimony for the most part, from the constitutional experts and others from whom we heard, from right across Canada. He pointed out how badly we were served, I think quite frankly, by journalism in this country in the inadequate and, in some cases, distorted representation of that evidence in the press.

My friend from Nepean—Carleton dealt at some length, and very well, with the spending power. But I want him perhaps to comment, if he wishes, on some of the other evidence we had from people such as Gordon Robertson, who I believe he referred to in his remarks, the former Clerk of the Privy Council who, since the early 1950s, was the key constitutional adviser to federal Governments in this country. In fact the Trudeau Government was prepared to go much further than the Meech Lake Accord did, and in fact, as Mr. Robertson pointed out, there was no transfer of powers in this constitutional Accord of 1987, but the previous Liberal Government was prepared on several occasions to transfer federal power to the provinces.

I believe my hon. friend from Nepean—Carleton was sitting next to me when we had Mr. Trudeau before us that memorable night last August. When I asked Mr. Trudeau that question, I do not think he responded to it at all. But the record is clear, historically, that he was prepared, in fact, to transfer powers from the federal authority to the provincial authorities, something that is not done despite the misleading and shallow criticism which has been made about the Meech Lake constitutional Accord that is before the House at the present time. I would be glad if he would be prepared to comment on that.

Mr. Tupper: I am very pleased to do so. By coincidence, I am happy that my colleague from Ottawa West (Mr. Daubney) actually focused in on the comments and advice of Gordon Robertson. I do so on that account with particular pleasure. For a long time Mr. Gordon Robertson was indirectly my boss in the sense that for a number of years he served as Chancellor of Carleton University where I had the privilege to be a professor.

One of the interesting things about Mr. Robertson's testimony was that he reminded the committee of his long experience in constitutional matters wherein at times he had been the Government's chief adviser on constitutional reform, and at other times he had served as a consultant. As he reviewed the process of constitutional reform, particularly over the last 12 or 14 years, he was quick to point out to the committee that most of the items and the points of principle that are incorporated in the Accord had earlier been offered to the provinces by the Trudeau administration. Interestingly, that has never been denied, as I recall.

As we review our history, we find that the fact that one is prepared to place so much politics on something that is so lasting and fundamental to the peoples of Canada as its Constitution adds to the terrible dichotomy. We must work on the Constitution collectively to develop, refine and, in the course of time, make it more compatible to the needs of the great Confederation of which we are part.

In his presentation, Gordon Robertson clearly indicated to the committee that there was nothing in the Accord, as he saw it, that took away from the spending power of the central Government.

Let me say in closing, it is interesting to note that Mr. Robertson gave the joint committee the very strong advice that the Accord was indeed a dramatic and historic achievement that perhaps no other Government could have had the capability of putting together. It was his advice that the committee and Parliament endorse it.

Mr. Gustafson: Mr. Speaker, I also wish to compliment the Hon. Member for Nepean—Carleton (Mr. Tupper) on the excellent speech that he delivered today on the Constitution and the steps forward that have been taken in terms of the Meech Lake Accord.

I represent one of the western regions, a different part of the country than those mentioned in the discussions that have been going on here this morning. One of the difficulties that we have always faced in the West was that we felt alienated. The process itself seemed to be somewhat alienating going back in the history of the constitutional talks and former leadership.

The very positive aspect that has taken place under the leadership of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) is the change in terms of looking at the region. I was very pleased this morning to hear that in many ways I shared the thoughts of the Hon. Member for Ottawa West (Mr. Daubney) and the Hon. Member for Nepean—Carleton in terms of the uniting of this country. We feel in the region I represent that we have been alienated for years, and my own personal opinion is that this alienation has not been good for the uniting of Canada. Real steps have been taken under the leadership of the Prime Minister in bringing this country together, which is an absolutely outstanding achievement. I would like to hear the Member's comments from a central Canada point of view, as opposed to the region I represent in the West.

Mr. Tupper: It is a treat for me to respond to my colleague from the Province of Saskatchewan. It is not often that I want to give out a bouquet, or feel the need to do so to a colleague who may sit in the seats immediately to my right. For some time I felt that I wanted to compliment publicly the Hon. Member for Yorkton—Melville (Mr. Nystrom). During the time that he sat on the joint committee he showed an enormous amount of good judgment and a perspective on Canadian politics and Canadian problems, as well as practicality when attempting to point out to witnesses the strengths and weaknesses of the arguments that they were making at the particular point in time. This morning I wish to reinforce that compliment and say to the Hon. Member that I thought westerners were well represented in that dialogue.

Many Members in the House will know that my heritage is in Atlantic Canada. The Ottawa Valley has been my adopted home now for over a quarter of a century. I am one of those who historically has his roots in what one may refer to as Lower Canada. In fact my family was indirectly involved during 1863, 1864, and 1865 when my home province and Atlantic Canada struggled with the enormous debate on the pros and cons of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick joining Confederation with the Upper Canada provinces. In those days Nova Scotia was an enormously prosperous community. As time has moved forward economic disparities and political differences have developed. When one thinks about the tremendous nation we have in Atlantic Canada, Quebec and Ontario and the richness in so many ways of western Canada, there is absolutely no way that we can progress economically, socially, or constitutionally unless we are content with the way we will govern ourselves.

In this mechanism of 1987 we have taken a dramatic step forward in the construction of a truly Canadian family.

Mr. John Parry (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to rise today and address the Meech Lake Accord, the constitutional agreement of 1987. I believe that there are few processes which highlight or better illustrate the difficulty of constitutional negotiations, and the difficulty of integrating negotiations of this nature between related parties into a democratic or quasi-democratic process of public approval.

Those of us who have participated in negotiations, be they commercial or labour-management, know that behind each negotiator lies a constituency. In many cases, the constituency does not approve or does not want the specific heads of negotiation that the negotiator may in time be impelled to accept. Indeed, there are times when negotiators accept things that they know will be unpopular in the cause of reaching an agreement which it is believed will hold wider implications for the good of the parties to the agreement.

It is also said somewhat tritely that a camel is a horse designed by a committee. Thus we see the shortcomings of the committee process. I believe that most of us in Canada are somewhat individualistic and are somewhat committed to pursuing our own goals to a degree which sometimes impacts negatively on society but which nevertheless is a reflection of today's contemporary Canadian reality.

The flaws of the Meech Lake process unfortunately reflect not only the individualist orientation of our society but also the tendency within parliamentary government to invest full powers in the Government of the day, with only very limited consideration given to the views of an opposition at any level. Those flaws have been evidenced by some of the difficulties which the process of the Meech Lake Accord has encountered.

There was not the organized forum or public consultation before the signing of the agreement. We have, on the Prime Minister's authority in his televised speech announcing the Accord, the length, detail, and gravity of the constitutional consultations which preceded it. Nevertheless, I think it is fair to say that the Accord represents an agreement framed by, marketed to, and approved by the elected leadership of the country and the provinces, rather than something which arises from a nation-wide surge of public feeling and sentiment.

In the framing of the Meech Lake Accord there has obviously been difficulty and incompleteness in the identification of the potential problems, just as in 1982 the framers of that constitutional agreement failed to recognize the difficulties which the freedom of association clauses would cause for the organized labour movement, difficulties which must be resolved and which I believe strike by the exercise of one freedom against the exercise of another freedom in society.

The failure to identify the problems is not in any way a criticism of the work of the special joint committee. I should like to add briefly my thanks to that special joint committee for the excellent and indeed very hard work it put into its report. I think it is a document of considerable merit which illuminates the Meech Lake Accord for the benefit of all Canadians.

As has been said by many other speakers, the Constitution, after all, is a fundamental law. It underpins and bears up all other laws, yet it must be more than something chiselled in stone and exercised without exception or deviation. A successful Constitution can only be a living document or a living spirit, indeed, and in order to be successful it must be a people's document which is accessible and understandable by the people and which commands their broad loyalty and support.

As I said in the debate on June 11, it must be a document that reflects the inspirations from which our society springs and that reflects the aspirations of the people of our society. It is in this regard that written Constitutions encounter some difficulties. The complexity of the terminology of the Constitution is something that I would certainly recommend to the attention of future Governments, and, I suspect sadly, future generations.

The written Constitution is something that has been somewhat in vogue since the Constitution of the Haudenosanee of the 17th century in the country. Indeed it is something of an irony that Great Britain, having itself no written constitution, imposed through the British North America Act a written Constitution on the Dominion of Canada.

There is much to be said in favour of the Meech Lake Accord; first and foremost, of course, the adhesion of the Province of Quebec.

So, Mr. Speaker, when I arrived in Canada as an immigrant I spent my first two years in Montreal, in the Province of Quebec, where I believe I was able to appreciate to some extent the constitutional, spiritual and emotional situation in which the people of Quebec found themselves. At the time certain Quebecers were motivated by a strong separatist leaning. There were obvious signs of tension within Quebec's society, as evidenced by acts of violence and the public debate which was carried on with an enthusiasm and a dedication the likes of which I never saw either before or after.

Mr. Speaker, to those who are against the Meech Lake Accord I can only say that perhaps they did not fully appreciate the nature of the very struggle of all segments of Quebec's society which went on during recent decades.

[English]

I would commend to those who have spoken against the Accord a profound study of the recent constitutional history of the Province of Quebec, because I think it is essential to an understanding of the importance of the agreement at which we are looking today.

The entrenchment of the Supreme Court in the Constitution is appropriate. The constitutionalization of the federal spending powers in areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction is a necessary recognition in order to resolve a situation that has seen considerable tensions over the past few decades in which the federal Government has spent in areas in which the provinces, frankly, were not satisfied to see the federal Government intervening.

We have a minor reduction in the powers of the Senate concerning its ability to obstruct certain amendments for only 180 days, though there is much to be said against it so far as the Senate is concerned.

We have the freedom—and I believe it is not a threat to any part of the Canadian society—for provinces to make immigration agreements with the federal Government, not on a compulsory basis, not saying that agreements must be reached, but providing that opportunity. We have—and I think it was said by earlier speakers but bears repeating—the significance of an agreement among the 11 Premiers. I think the Hon. Member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Suluk) characterized it as an agreement between those who have not established a reputation for agreeing on very much, and I think he was perfectly right. The agreement itself represents a telling argument for the Accord, yet I must acknowledge that I also find fault with many aspects of the Meech Lake agreement.

I see the terminology or the framing of the agreement as a tragic and profound insult to the constitutional aspirations of our native people. It was not mentioned in the Meech Lake Accord that the talks on aboriginal self-government would be revived. There is no specific commitment to restarting those talks. Aboriginal peoples' legitimate and seriously held constitutional concerns were reduced to the level of other matters. I feel that that was a demeaning way in which to acknowledge the existence of those concerns.

Turning to the accolade of the distinct society, while I understand very well the necessity for stating that concept explictly with regard to the Province of Quebec, it was not conferred upon the equally and obviously distinct societies of our aboriginal nations. However, we must bear in mind and we must acknowledge that the entrenchment of self-government rights was not possible at Meech Lake because the participation of the aboriginal people was not invited and not foreseen in that type of discussion. While the aboriginal people of Canada have seen their sensibilities trampled on by the Meech Lake agreement, I believe they have not had any doors closed to them in their constitutional evolution. I will return later to the ways in which it can be clearly demonstrated that those doors remain open.

I should mention with pride the entrenchment of the aboriginal rights amendment in the 1982 agreement and my Party's pride in having participated in that.

Another obvious objection of mine to the Meech Lake Accord is the way in which it entrenches the role of the Senate. We first started on this slippery slide of giving constitutional legitimacy to a non-democratic, indeed an anti-democratic, institution in 1982. It has since been pointed out by learned constitutional scholars, including at least one in the Senate itself, that essentially the advent of the written Constitution by the 1982 Constitution Act gave the Senate powers that had not been envisaged as pertaining to that institution for a century or more. That was the gravest mistake of 1982.

Any agreement that envisages this non-democratic institution continuing to play a part within the democratic institutions of the Parliament and Government of Canada has got to have a great deal going for it before I can be persuaded to swallow the indignity of allowing 100 appointed Party faithful reaping their political reward to have a say in the legislation of this country.

With regard to the creation of provinces, I believe that the objections which my hon. colleague, the Member for Yukon (Ms. McLaughlin), has brought to this argument are very valid and well founded. Let us not forget that in 1905, Saskatchewan was inducted into the Confederation on the authority of the federal Government. The same happened in Newfoundland in 1949. However, from now on it will require an absolute majority of the provinces for any change in the structure to be made.

I beseech Hon. Members to think of the implications that that might bring with the change in demography of this country. Our country supports approximately 26 million people, but has the economic capacity to support 400 million to 700 million in the fullness of time. Yet we will, by this agreement, be binding ourselves to an arrangement which will enable the smallest province, whatever that might be 100 years from now, to unalterably obstruct the redivision, subdivision, or amalgamation of provinces which might seem appropriate to future generations.

It is also not clear under the Meech Lake agreement who controls the constitutional agenda. I believe the annual constitutional conference written into the Constitution itself is a serious mistake and almost a contradiction in terms because it implies that there will forever be constitutional business to regulate.

I wish to address the danger of alienating the excluded. We know very well the dangers that this country was placed in with the exclusion of the people of Quebec from full participation in the Constitution. Yet we must forever be vigilant against the possibility, indeed the probability, of excluding other groups by the operation of future constitutional amendments, including this Meech Lake Accord. There is very legitimate and deeply felt uncertainty as to the status of women's rights and the ability of native band Governments to deliver federal programs under the operation of the Meech Lake Accord. I have every confidence that they will be favourably resolved by the courts, but that, after all, is only one person's prediction.

The confusion and difficulty which the distinct identity clause has caused is also something which we must bear in mind in considering the Accord. There are other objections which have been brought by some which I do not believe have great force and effect but are worth mentioning.

I believe that the right of the provincial Governments to nominate to the Senate and the Supreme Court is not something which undermines federal institutions. In fact, it shows the confusion which exists in some minds with regard to what are national institutions and what are institutions of the Canadian federation. Let us not, after all, forget the paymaster factor. Let us not downgrade the intelligence, integrity or judgment of those who accept Supreme Court or even Senate appointments. Let us not accuse them of an inability to expand their presumed provincial perspective to the Canadian and national perspective.

One of the most telling factors in my assessment of the Meech Lake Accord has been the nature of the arguments put forward by those who oppose it. I must, with regret, say that I find them generally to be very deficient and in some cases deriving from an inspiration which I believe is not appropriate for the consideration of constitutional business in this country. Doubts have been raised about immigration. It has been said that there will be a general balkanization of the country. I do not see this happening. I endorse what the Leader of the Official Opposition has said. "I do not fear confrontation with the provinces. That is the inevitable nature of things in a federation."

Let us also note that, despite the imprecations of the former Prime Minister in what I can only consider to be a disgusting display of personalization of issues before the committee, the constitutional Accord is not simply addressing Quebec's asideness from the Constitution up until now. It is also addressing the phenomenon of western alienation, which has existed in this country and is addressed by the Meech Lake Accord.

It is not a question of there being a strong federal Government and a weak provincial Government, as Mr. Trudeau would have it. It is not a question, as critics would say, of there being strong provincial Governments and a weak federal Government under the Meech Lake Accord. We must remember that the adversarial model that this presupposes has never held sway in Canadian society. This shows a lack of appreciation of the degree of willingness and, frankly, the degree of skill at fashioning and implementing compromises, which I believe is inherent in the Canadian character.

The opposition to the Meech Lake Accord shows an imperfect understanding of the constitutional and historical perspective. None has effectively refuted the most telling evidence of Madam Chaput-Rolland. Until I hear that evidence refuted I cannot believe that a case has been made for the rejection of the Accord.

Those of us who came to this country as immigrants have experienced on a daily basis the generosity and openness of Canadian society to those whose origins are outside the country. We do not need a constitutional amendment to recognize that. We have that ongoing affirmation on a daily basis as do the aboriginal people of the country.

I believe that I may have a couple of minutes left when debate resumes. In deference to Question Period I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and all my colleagues for your consideration.

WAYS AND MEANS

TABLING OF NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I ask for unanimous consent to move a Ways and Means motion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to allow the Minister to move his motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hockin: Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 84(1), I have the honour to lay upon the Table copies of a Ways and Means motion to amend the customs tariff to implement the harmonized commodity description and coding system. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 84(2), I ask that an order of the day be designated for the consideration of the said motion.

This motion is based on multilateral agreements with our trading partners. All our major trading partners have either passed legislation or are in the process of doing so. A host of other countries are also implementing the harmonized tariff system.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS

EFFECTS OF CHILD POVERTY

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, the extent of child poverty, its destructiveness to the families involved, and the subsequent cost to society are not generally recognized in Canada. Nearly 30 per cent of Canadians living in poverty are under 16 years of age.

Members of Parliament have been invited to meet with a number of support groups next Tuesday to discuss the pressing problem of child poverty.

Approximately one in five children lives in poverty; many are homeless and are forced to go to food banks. In recent years there has been a tremendous increase in single-parent families, a very high percentage of whom live in poverty.

The effects of poverty have been well documented by organizations concerned with its destructiveness on the lives of the poor. The stresses of poverty perpetuate more misery and contribute to the waste of human potential. Federal budgets since 1984 and proposals in the White Paper on Tax Reform, if implemented, will see child benefits reduced by $1.5 billion by 1991.

I call upon the Government to recognize the issue of child poverty now as changes are being contemplated to the tax and social security system, and to correct this socially unacceptable crisis which the Government has helped to create.

INDUSTRY

FUTURE OF FIRESTONE PLANT IN HAMILTON

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the witching hour is upon us. It is about time the federal Government did something to bring the two parties together to facilitate the sale of Firestone to Cooper Tire. The Minister should know, though he probably will not because he has done absolutely nothing on the dossier, that the two parties are only $5 million apart, but the word is if they do not come together very shortly, Firestone may pick up its machinery and equipment and silently steal off into the United States.

I call upon the Minister, again, as I have done in the past, as I have called upon the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), to show some leadership, to save those 1,400 jobs in the riding of Hamilton East, by going to Firestone in Akron, Ohio, directly. He knows that is where the decisions are being made.

Do not send civil servants. Show some political leadership, go to Akron and help save those jobs. Make Firestone realize that for $2 million we cannot afford to sacrifice 1,400 workers in Hamilton East.

SENIOR CITIZENS

APPOINTMENT OF MINISTER OF STATE FOR SENIOR CITIZENS

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-East): Mr. Speaker, last August 27 the Prime Minister once again showed leadership by appointing the Minister of State (Seniors) (Mr. Hees), an appointment which was warmly welcomed, as evidenced by the applause and ovation given the Minister by all Parties in the House.

Quebec senior citizens were also very enthusiastic about the appointment. Among others, the Fédération des aînés dynamiques du Québec issued a press release commending the Prime Minister for this historic initiative. They consider the Minister of State (Seniors) as, and I quote: An excellent choice as a Minister with whom we are quite prepared to co-operate.

Besides reacting enthusiastically to this appointment, the Fédération des aînés dynamiques du Québec has expressed the hope that the provinces will draw inspiration from the Prime Minister's leadership and create similar ministries at the provincial level.

Mr. Speaker, that is yet another telling example of the importance this Government gives senior citizens, people who have generously contributed to the progress of our society. Our Government is aware that demographic evolution will translate into an ever aging population, and this is why we are moving with firmness and determination to give older Canadians the priority which they deserve.

Mr. Speaker, I am confident that under the leadership of the Minister of State (Seniors) older Canadians will be served with respect and understanding.

INCREASE IN INSPECTION FEES

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, the federal Government has added another notch to its plan to recover costs for most of its services at the expense of farmers and ultimately of consumers. We have seen this new user-pay philosophy put into place with farm improvement loans and small business loans. Now it is being extended to horticultural produce.

Previously, growers paid $5 per inspection to ensure that any fruits or vegetables shipped interprovincially met the designated grades so that consumers knew what they were buying and that they were getting good produce. Now the charge is being upped to three cents per hundredweight. The plan is to double it before next harvest and ultimately to quintuple it by 1990.

Potato producers in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick receiving a meagre six cents a pound now for their produce are particularly affected by this massive increase because they ship most of their spuds to other Canadian provinces. I call upon the Government to reconsider this new fee proposal.

CANADIAN FAMILY NATIONAL WEEK

ALLEGED NEGLIGENCE OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, next week will be Canadian Family National Week. Unfortunately, in the last three years, families have been the group most neglected by the Conservative Government.

Everyone will recall the deindexing of family allowances. Everyone will recall the lowering of the maximum amount for the child tax credit. Everyone will recall the promise made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), a hand over his heart, swearing that there would be a child-care system for families, which are the corner stone of Canadian society. We have nothing yet.

Yesterday, we learned that the tax system is harder on large families. I invite all Canadian families to remember the three years of neglect of this Conservative Government and to do what it takes to defeat all Conservative Members of Parliament in Canada. These are the people who have neglected them.

LIBERAL PARTY

PRESENT STATUS

Mr. Clément M. Côté (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, in an article in yesterday's Le Devoir, we learned from the eloquent pen of Michel Vastel that the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Turner) had mounted a campaign to attract some of the provincial Liberals to federal politics, and we can now see why.

Mr. Speaker, I was astounded to read that article. The Liberals, with only 40 Members in this House, cannot agree on a single issue. Everything becomes a source of dissension among the Liberals. And what about their Leader, whose leadership is constantly being threatened? I believe that he should learn to lead his present followers before adding to his problems.

Mr. Speaker, the Liberals got Canadians used to confusion and incoherence, but they are now overdoing themselves and their leader is at the bottom of it.

HOUSING

SHORTAGE OF HOUSES IN NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Mrs. Thérèse Killens (Saint-Michel—Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, there is presently a shortage of 2,400 houses in the Northwest Territories. Each year the need increases by approximately 150 houses just due to population growth.

According to a recent study, the population of the Northwest Territories grew by 14 per cent between 1981 and 1986 compared to 4 per cent for the entire country. At this rate of population growth, the housing shortage in the Northwest Territories will not be alleviated for at least 16 years.

The lack of funding for the application of Bill C-31, the legislation to reintegrate the native population to the Indian reserves, has amplified the problem of housing in the North. Sixty thousand claims for returns to the reserve, are still waiting to be processed.

The situation in the North will get worse. I urge the Government to increase immediately the number of units constructed through CMHC programs.

MINES AND MINING

NEW TIMMINS GOLD MINE—FINANCING RAISED BY FLOW-THROUGH SHARES

Mr. Bill Tupper (Nepean—Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I had the pleasure on Wednesday to attend the opening of a new gold mine north of Timmins, Ontario. That mine, known as the Bell Creek Mine, owned by Canamex, is by world standards not a big mine. It will employ about 100 people, but 100 new jobs in Timmins are dramatically important.

In reality, those 100 jobs will translate into perhaps 300 or 400 jobs. Indeed, it was a proud moment for my colleague from Timmins—Chapleau.

A most significant highlight of this mine is that it was the first one in Canada to be discovered, developed and brought into production by financing raised by flow-through shares.

Normally at mine openings, the president of the company or the chairman of the board is praising the financiers for their help in bringing a new unit into production, but the situation was much different in Bell Creek on Wednesday. The president was praising the federal Government for its responsible and creative fiscal and tax policies that allowed the creation of this particular new wealth.

In the next year, this same company, Canamex, will be bringing three additional mines into production, all financed and created by this particular financing mechanism. It is a demonstration of what good fiscal policy can do.

BUSINESS EXCELLENCE AWARDS

AWARD WON BY EMPLOYEE-OWNED COMPANY

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands): Mr. Speaker, on September 22, Lamford Forest Products of Sooke, British Columbia, was presented with a Canada Award for Business Excellence in the labour/management category. The award is well deserved and highlights what can be accomplished through co-operative effort. In this instance, however, labour/management relations were simplified because at Lamford labour is management.

Two years ago Sooke Forest Products closed its lumber operation because the company was unable to operate financially. Rather than accept the end of their livelihood, the 270 I.W.A. members in Sooke established the employee-owned Lamford Forest Products. Today that operation is one of the most efficient high-recovery mills in North America, employing 275 shareholders.

Rather than succumb to the corporate doomsayers, the employees took a chance with their collective future and, with last week's award, have proven to themselves and all of Canada that co-operation beats confrontation hands down.

TRADE

SUPPORT FOR CANADA-UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, the export sale of commodities such as wheat, lumber, coal, uranium and potash is the backbone of the western Canadian economy. This reality is brought home each time a foreign Government adopts protectionist measures which inhibit the flow of Canadian goods.

Most recently, short-sighted American duties paralyzed the Saskatchewan potash industry. This is but one example of the damage that can be inflicted on our economy when there is no effective trade dispute settlement mechanism in place. If there exists the possibility of Canada and the United States agreeing to establish such a mechanism, if there is a way to ensure that Canadians will no longer be subject to the protectionist whims of the U.S. Congress, then the pursuit of such an agreement is worthy of a determined and committed effort on behalf of all Canadians.

I congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) on his initiative and encourage him in pursuing every possible avenue to conclude a trade agreement with the U.S. that is both free and fair.

AIRPORTS

CRITICISM OF SECURITY MEASURES

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, over the last three years the Conservative Government has shown a reckless disregard for the security and safety of Canadian air travellers.

On June 25, 1985, two days after the Air-India tragedy, the then Minister of Transport, now the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Mazankowski), said: "Since these tragedies occurred the Government has moved quickly to ensure the security of Canadian air travellers." This week we learned from a Southam news story that airport guards missed 25 per cent of fake weapons carried through airport screening checks by federal Transport inspectors during a 15-month period. In effect this means our airports are only 75 per cent secure.

In April, 1986, again the Conservative Government of Canada announced plans to make our airports more secure. Notwithstanding those promises we find today that our airports are still not secure. Security is substandard. The Government's credibility on this issue is in tatters. Indeed, it appears as though it does not know who is responsible for airport security.

On June 25, 1985, the Minister of Transport said: "Ultimate responsibility for flight security rests with the carriers." A document prepared for the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) dated September, 1985, says: "Airport and airline security in Canada is the responsibility of the Minister of Transport and is governed by regulations issued under the Aeronautics Act." That says that the Government does not understand who is responsible for airport security. Is it any wonder that Canadians feel so insecure when they travel on airlines in Canada?

ARCTIC PEACE ZONE—SOVIET LEADER'S APPEAL

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, yesterday's call by Soviet Leader Mikhail Gorbachev for an Arctic zone of peace has much to recommend it and ought to be responded to by Canada. However, it is somewhat ironic that the appeal was made from Murmansk in the Kola Peninsula, one of the most heavily militarized areas in the world. This is the home base for the Delta IV and Typhoon Class Soviet submarines carrying SSN 20 and SSN 23 intercontinental nuclear missiles. These bases are of course heavily protected by naval and air defences.

If Gorbachev is really serious he could start the process by stopping the flights of AS 15 nuclear warhead-equipped Cruise missile-carrying Bear H strategic bombers over the Canadian Arctic. Canada can hardly be blamed for taking defensive measures against this blatant Soviet threat.

AUDITOR GENERAL

INTERMITTENT REPORTING PROCESS ADVOCATED

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, every Standing Committee on Public Accounts of which I have been a member for the last eight years has recommended or supported intermittent reporting by the Auditor General as well as the single annual report presently required by law. Such a change in the Auditor General Act would allow much more current reporting to Parliament and increase the accountability of government, something we all desire.

Even as we have had all-Party agreement on the proposed change, the Government has consistently refused to allow Private Members' Bills on the subject to pass. Since that channel seems blocked, I call upon the Government to achieve the desired accountability by taking action itself on this important issue.

QUEBEC AS DISTINCT SOCIETY—POSITION OF LIBERAL PARTY

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, Canada as a country is unique because of its bilingualism and its multiculturalism. Canadians take great pride in the fact that this tremendous diversity does not prevent them from seeing themselves, first of all and above all, as profoundly Canadian.

However, refusing to admit that Quebec constitutes a distinct society, different from the rest of Canada, shows a complete lack of historical knowledge and a lack of respect for the Francophone population of Quebec. Unfortunately, that is what seems to be happening today the Liberal Caucus, where, according to one Caucus member, some fellow members are anti-Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I am very disappointed in the narrow-minded attitude of those members of the Liberal Caucus who refuse to recognize the fact that Quebec is a distinct society. I am sad to hear that anti-Quebec forces are at work in the Liberal Party and in the Liberal Caucus in this House, forces that are casting doubts on the specific character of Quebec society.

THIRTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF PATRO D'OTTAWA

TRIBUTE TO ALL WHO PARTICIPATED IN DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, Ottawa's Patro, one of Lowertown's most important Francophone institutions, will be celebrating its thirtieth anniversary tomorrow. As one of seven centres of this kind that exist in Eastern Canada, the Patro has, over the years, opened its doors to many children, teenagers and senior citizens, providing them with a place to play, to talk to friends or to go swimming. Throughout its history the Patro has made an admirable contribution to community development and it continues to do so today. Several times its very survival was in jeopardy. However, with the help of the people in the community, the leaders of Patro managed to meet the challenges facing them.

Thanks to the hard work and perseverance of members who have had to cope with all kinds of financial and other problems, tomorrow Patro will be celebrating its thirtieth anniversary. Those who take part in this great celebration will remember happy times spent in the pool, at fairs, festivals, day camps and summer camps, and the plays and many other activities that have been a source of entertainment for Ottawa's Lowertown, in my riding.

Today I wish to pay tribute to all those who, with Father David Lachance, the founder of the Saint-Vincent-Patro in Ottawa, have made this institution prosper. To all those who worked so hard, sincere thanks!

SUPPORT FOR CANADA-UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Jim Caldwell (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, the news that the bilateral trade negotiations may be back on the rails is good news for Canadians. It is time those who have opposed this historic negotiation got onside. The time for political rhetoric is over.

For the sake of Canada and the future of our young people and the new jobs a new deal would bring, opposition Members should stop trying to undermine the negotiations. Those opposite would have had us pull out months ago and subject us to further protectionist policies by our neighbour to the south. They have no solution to the problem, only selfish political posturing.

In the final hours it is time to end the scare tactics which have made some Canadians uneasy over the last several months, despite assurances from the Government that our social programs, the Auto Pact, agricultural marketing boards, and our cultural industries are not and have not been part of the bilateral negotiations. Those opposed have used these tactics to make cheap political gains.

As the talks enter the final stage let us pull together, and not give the U.S. the advantage of being divided. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) has repeated from the beginning that if it is not in the interest of Canada there will be no deal. That is good enough for me and I am sure it is good enough for all Canadians.

FREE TRADE WITH UNITED STATES—REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT ADHERE TO CONDITIONS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister. During the discussions on free trade held during the past week, in this House, two crucial points for Canada have been raised. First, Canada's need for a binding and universal dispute settlement mechanism, a mechanism which would allow Canada to be exempted from American trade duties. And, second, protection for the Canadian cultural industry and Canada's right to grant regional industrial development subsidies. Will the Deputy Prime Minister assure us today that those requirements will not be set aside during the current negotiations in Washington?

The Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there has been no basic change in the Canadian position, and we do not intend changing it.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT AND CULTURAL PROGRAMS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in the House the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that while there was some movement on the question of a tribunal, there has been no agreement on rules that would guide such a tribunal. These are rules that would apply to regional development, cultural industries and a number of other very essential ingredients to the Canadian domestic political and social fabric.

Does this mean that there has now been a fundamental change in the American position and they have abandoned any demands that Canada limit its ability to provide regional development programs, and limit its right to determine for itself its cultural programs? Has there been a total abandonment of that position?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I just indicated in French that there has been no change in the fundamental positions Canada has put forward for some time.

Mr. Axworthy: The American position.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): No fundamental change in the position we have put forward for some time. I think that is all that is appropriate for me to discuss at this stage.

However, I want to bring the House up to date with what happened since Question Period yesterday until today. During a meeting to consider the discussions that had been held yesterday in Washington, a telephone call was received from Secretary Baker, who is the Chairman of the U.S. Cabinet Committee directing their side of the discussions. On the basis of that telephone conversation, it became evident to us that we had reason to resume the negotiations. For that reason, the Minister of Finance and the Minister for International Trade, Ambassador Reisman and other of our technical experts are in Washington today.

The House will understand that I cannot go into details of the matters under discussion in Washington today. We have to see if they yield a positive result.

UNITED STATES DEADLINE FOR NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is based upon that telephone conversation. As the Minister well understands, the deadline for the decision by the United States is Sunday night. We are now entering into negotiations in a two and one-half day period, for one of the most complex, difficult agreements ever arrived at between two countries.

Is it the position of both the Canadian and American Governments that in the two and one-half days they will have fully negotiated that agreement, or will the President of the United States announce on Sunday night simply some kind of vague agreement in principle which will, in effect, require Canada to make an agreement to a blank cheque without having had the opportunity to review its contents or whether in fact we agree with it?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have three observations that I hope will be germane. First, we have no intention of signing, accepting, or being party to a blank cheque. Second, I cannot predict what will happen with these negotiations. They are in a more hopeful phase today then they have been at other times this week.

Third, with regard to the very valid point the Hon. Member makes about the complexity of the negotiations, he should bear in mind that precisely these issues have been under detailed consideration by the expert negotiators on both sides for a long number of months. We are not starting as though there were no past. There has been extensive preparation on the detail of these matters.

We will see if it will be possible, before the American deadline expires, to get the kinds of agreements on principle and on detail that would be necessary to serve Canada's interests. If we do, we will bring forward an agreement. If they do not serve Canada's interests, there will be no agreement.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

STRIKE BY INSIDE WORKERS—OPPORTUNITY TO APPOINT MEDIATOR

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour.

Negotiations at Canada Post have come to a deadlock. Tempers are starting to boil on the picket lines, and Canada Post admits that mail delivery is disorganized.

Moreover, this morning, Canada Post decided to issue a lock-out order aimed at five Canadian Post Offices, including Ottawa, which can hardly result in getting the parties any closer together.

In order to prevent the worst, does the Minister not believe he should immediately appoint a mediator with a very specific mandate, in order to end that dispute?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated yesterday, a mediator is to be appointed when the parties are ready to reach an agreement, and if Mr. Parrot is to be believed, the parties are not.

INQUIRY WHY GOVERNMENT DOES NOT APPOINT MEDIATOR

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada are fed up with this Minister's answers.

Is he waiting—as he did in the letter carrier dispute—for violence to increase on the picket lines and for the people to stir him up before he will appoint a mediator to solve the dispute? He knows he made a goof, a gigantic mistake the last time, why does he want to goof again? Is it because this Tory Government wants to resort to violence to solve disputes, rather than having him assume his responsibility as Minister of Labour and appoint a mediator to prevent disputes?

Hon. Pierre Cadieux (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in the article from which I quoted a few sentences yesterday, Mr. Parrot felt that this was not the time to appoint a mediator. And I will quote him once more, in case the Hon. Member was not here yesterday.

"The presence of a mediator is useful when both parties involved seriously want to come to an agreement". And it is not my opinion at this point, Mr. Speaker, that the parties "seriously want to come to an agreement"!

REGIONAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT PROGRAMS—AMERICANS' INTENTIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

According to reports in the United States, the Americans want to reduce the powers of the Canadian Government to establish, as a sovereign country, regulations for regional development programs here, in Canada.

Will the Minister assure Canadians that the Canadian Government will not accept such conditions?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I read a similar statement several weeks ago, and I am sure that the Leader of the New Democratic Party will recall the statement of the negotiator, Ambassador Reisman, to the effect that Canada had to break off negotiations and that Canada found some of the proposals as concerns regional development and other issues unacceptable. That was the Canadian position and it still is.

AMERICAN PROPOSAL

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, we take that assurance in a positive way. I hope the Government stands by that.

My supplementary question concerns the timetabling of the American proposal. According to news reports confirmed by the Minister today, it was very late last night that, what has been described by a spokesperson for the Prime Minister as a significant proposal, was made by the Americans, literally at the last hour before the termination date this weekend. Does the Minister not believe that the Americans really have us boxed in an interesting corner? They have waited until the very last moment to make a significant proposal and we are now forced to meet their deadline on their terms, in their capital. Is this any way to conduct negotiations that will lead to a good settlement for the people of Canada?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there would have been no good settlement for the people of Canada if we had walked away from the negotiations and simply let Canada stand exposed to the protectionist pressures that have already taken their toll in Canada and could take a much more serious toll. I am sure all Members of the House are genuine and serious in wanting to have some system that protects the security of existing Canadian jobs and might lead us to a substantial expansion of jobs, opportunities, and markets in this country.

My interpretation of events is the exact opposite of that of the Leader of the New Democratic Party. I suppose that is because I have been closely privy to the negotiations. He could have been, had he accepted our offer for a confidential briefing—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): —but he declined that offer.

Mr. Nystrom: After the election he will be, Joe.

CANADIAN POSITION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, considering that I asked the Prime Minister a week ago, following all the concessions Canada has made in the last 18 months, if he could name a single concession the Americans had made—and he could not at that time—I want to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs today if he does not think the Americans have done it again. The very clever bargainers they are, they have forced Canada to meet their deadline, on their turf, in their capital, during the last 48 hours, and we are saying: "Oh, gee! Wasn't it great? At the last minute they finally made perhaps one concession". Is that a way to get a good deal for Canada?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, that would not be a good way to get a good deal for Canada, and that is not what happened. Look. We know the Americans are tough negotiators. We have known that from the beginning. The question we had to decide was whether or not Canada was going to be afraid of the Americans and run away from a deal that might be good for Canada.

The New Democratic Party is either afraid of the Americans or it does not like them, one or the other.

Some Hon. Members: Both.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Or both. Their policy on this trade negotiation, as it was their policy on the Auto Pact, has been to run away from a deal. I believe that history will prove them as wrong with regard to this arrangement as it has proved them wrong with regard to the Auto Pact. They did not like the Auto Pact. We think the Auto Pact was good for Canada.

UNITED STATES DEADLINE FOR NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The Minister just told the House of Commons that there can be no good deal for Canada if we walk away from the negotiating table and leave Canada exposed. That would lead one to the conclusion that the Minister and the Government are determined now that they are going to have a deal. We are interested in the timetable that is now in place.

The fact is that the U.S. President is required by U.S. law to give notice no later than Sunday of the intention to present a deal to both Houses of the U.S. Congress, signed between Canada and the United States. Is the Minister telling Canadians that in the next two and one-half days, a complicated trade arrangement is going to be initialled with all the t's crossed and i's dotted? Or is he telling us that the President will merely give notice on Sunday of the intention to present a deal to Congress at a later date and that in fact these negotiations may continue beyond Sunday, in effect on Congress's time?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, just so the record is clear on part of the preamble, this Government will sign a trade deal if it is a good deal for Canada, and we will not sign a trade deal if it is not a good deal for Canada. That has been the case consistently and that remains the case.

The United States deadlines are the affair of the United States. We expect that we will have the proposal brought forward on the so-called fast-track basis. What the Americans might say, what the Americans might sign, how the Americans might authoritatively interpret their system, is in their hands. So far as we are concerned, there has been a development that makes us believe that it is worth while resuming negotiations and we are doing that. We hope that might yield a good result. If the negotiations turn out not to be fruitful, there will be no deal.

UNITED STATES TIMETABLE

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, let me repeat my question—

Some Hon. Members: No, no.

An Hon. Member: Spare us.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member, of course, can repeat the question. The Chair cannot guarantee there will be any different answer, but the Hon. Member has the floor.

Mr. McCurdy: Slowly this time.

Mr. Tobin: Yes, he may understand if I speak slower. What I am asking the Secretary of State, to be perfectly clear, is this: Can he assure us that any notice given by the President of the United States on Sunday will be notice of a deal completed versus merely notice by the U.S. President to present a deal within a week, two weeks, or three weeks?

What we want to know is whether or not Canada is going to participate in a process where in effect 585 Members of Congress are looking over the negotiators' shoulders as we commit ourselves to a deal in the absence of having completed the negotiations. If that is the case, our position will be dramatically weakened by a Government that obviously appears to want to have a deal at any cost.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has repeated his question, so let me repeat my answer.

Mr. Tobin: No answer, in other words.

FREEDOM OF INVESTMENT

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the same Minister. In the first two years of what Canada has already given the United States in new investment freedom, Investment Canada allowed 1,192 takeovers of Canadian firms. Will the Minister confirm what Mr. Yeutter told U.S. Congressmen in his briefing yesterday morning, that Canada is willing to give even more investment freedom to the United States? Is it giveaways like this that have really started these talks up again?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we really are going over a lot of old ground, but let me very quickly make two points which are well known to the House. As I said before, the positions of Canada that are known are the same positions we are carrying into the negotiations today, and we intend to respect Canadian interests. The second point, and I know there is an ideological obstacle to foreign investment on the part of the New Democratic Party, one of the reasons this Government has been so remarkably successful in job creation, creating over 900,000 new jobs since our election—

Mr. Tobin: Tell that to Peckford now.

Mr. Broadbent: Tell that to Getty.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): —is because we have changed the rules regarding investment. We have changed that old hostile anti-foreign attitude that has become such an unhappy characteristic of the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Crosbie: Right on!

Mr. Langdon: Of course those were takeovers I was talking about which do not lead to new jobs but often to shutdowns and loss of jobs.

Mr. McCurdy: We can tell you about that in Windsor.

POSITION OF UNITED STATES CONGRESS

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Given the almost completely negative comments which have come from U.S. Senators and representatives yesterday and today, why does the Government think, even if it gets a deal with Mr. Baker and the administration, even in those circumstances, why does it think that Congress is likely to approve anything that comes out of that?

Mr. Crosbie: Nothing ventured, nothing gained.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the Minister of Transport has as usual put his finger on it precisely. Nothing ventured, nothing gained.

Mr. Broadbent: He has put his finger in it very often.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Now, wait—

An Hon. Member: That's an original thought.

An Hon. Member: At least we try.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Someone suggests it is an original thought. It is not a thought that has guided the policies of either the Liberals or the New Democratic Party on this issue. In both cases they have looked at the toughness of the Americans or they have looked at the complexity of the American system and they have said: "That is too much for poor little us". That is not what Canada is saying.

Mr. Broadbent: Poor little you, that's right.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): What Canada is saying, and what this Government is saying, is that this country was built by people who were prepared to take bold measures, who were prepared to take on tough challenges.

Mr. Broadbent: See what Sir John A. had to say about that.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): It was not built by people who run out of NATO, who run out of NORAD, who run away from the trade negotiations.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, Oh!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): You don't get anywhere that way, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Broadbent: This is a recorded announcement.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

STOCKPILING OF COAL—MINISTERIAL DIRECTIVE

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion. On Wednesday the Minister said he had given a directive to the Cape Breton Development Corporation to stop the stockpiling of coal in the Whitney Pier area of Sydney. Yet the President of the corporation, Mr. Derek Rance, says the stockpiling is going to go ahead, and if he has to stop the stockpiling, he may have to close some mines. The Government appointed Mr. Rance as Chairman, and he is now ignoring the directives of the Government.

Is the Minister going to allow Mr. Rance to continue to ignore these directives? Or can he assure us, and the people of Cape Breton, that the stockpiling will be stopped until proper pollution controls are put in place that are agreeable to the people of the area?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. colleague knows, I have been following the developments of Devco very closely. I had to take a step which I guess no Minister ever really enjoys taking, that is, a ministerial directive to the Board of Directors to stop immediately the stockpiling of coal at Whitney Pier. I also asked in that letter for the Board of Directors to report back to me on how that would be done and within what delays.

I also very clearly mentioned that all environmental concerns that were raised at both the federal and provincial levels would have to be dealt with before any further resumption, if that should be required, occurred.

REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF PRESIDENT

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the Minister for that reply. Yesterday the Premier of Nova Scotia mentioned that a letter had been sent by the Board of Directors to the Minister. I would like to ask the Minister this. Does that letter contain a request from the Board of Directors that he remove Mr. Rance from his position as President of the Cape Breton Development Corporation? If so, what action is he going to take on that request?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I have had a number of communications with Dr. MacNeil, the Chairman of the Board. I think that the content of those communications either in oral form or in written form are best kept confidential for the moment. I will inform the House of whatever further action we intend to take on the Devco issue as soon as possible.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY LABOUR DISPUTES—EFFECT ON WHEAT EXPORTS

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport who will know that western grain farmers are watching anxiously the three labour disputes which have the potential to tie up the St. Lawrence Seaway and thereby disrupt the flow of grain from western Canada to export markets. My question for the Minister is this. Since Canada's reputation as a supplier of high quality wheat is again at stake, can the Minister advise the House as to whether the continued flow of that prairie wheat to export can be assured?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, with reference to the situation, there is a strike at the moment, as the Hon. Member knows. It is occurring between the Canadian Marine Officers' Union, which is the marine engineers, and the Canadian Great Lakes shipowners. I am assured that to date there has been no interruption at all in the delivery of grain through the system. That is the present position. We are watching it very closely. The Minister of Labour is watching the situation.

There are two other potential disputes, and both are in the conciliation process. As at the present time, grain is moving in the normal manner without disruption. However, if there are any serious disruptions, the Hon. Member can be assured that we will take action to protect the Canadian farmer.

APARTHEID

SOUTH AFRICA—VISIT BY BRITISH TRADE MISSION

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It was reported this morning that a British trade mission is on its way to South Africa with British government support. My question to the Secretary of State is this. What action does the Government intend to take in response to this act of utter contempt for the will of the Commonwealth and the already weak sanctions imposed by it, largely as a result of the involvement of the British in weakening its resolve? Does the Government intend to protest this action as it should be protested?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, no, I do not intend to protest the action because it is an action that is within the sovereign discretion of Great Britain. I have had extensive discussions, and the Hon. Member in his relations has had extensive discussions, with representatives of the British Parliament, and some members of the British Government. There is a different view on the effect of sanctions, and that difference is well known. They have a policy that differs from Canada's.

I guess what is most germane is how we can work together to ensure that the Commonwealth Conference, which opens in a couple of weeks in Vancouver, is a conference whose result will be to increase the pressures for change upon the Government of South Africa. That is what I am dedicated to doing.

Frankly, I do not think that we would advance our ability to do that by launching a condemnation of one of the principal members of the Commonwealth two weeks before the conference convenes.

REQUEST FOR COMMONWEALTH ACTION

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): My question to the Secretary of State is this. Is it not about time that we stopped kowtowing to the British inclination to collusion with South Africa and go to the Commonwealth, exercising leadership to get from the Commonwealth, even if without the British, the kind of action in response to that apartheid-type regime that that civilized country and a civilized Commonwealth ought to be providing?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, what is most important is for us to exert the maximum possible world pressure upon the South African regime to change the system of apartheid. That is what we have been doing consistently before the Nassau declaration, and with some effect.

The Hon. Member suggests that the Commonwealth should throw its weight absent Great Britain against South Africa. He knows that the Commonwealth economic weight absent Great Britain is absent a great deal. What would be most productive for us to do would be to find ways in which we can continue to work on the British to change their views about sanctions, but can also continue to work with them in areas where there is agreement to increase both the pressure for change on the South African Government and to increase the stability and security of the front-line states.

It is also, I think, possible for us to look at ways, with Britain and with other industrial countries that are not members of the Commonwealth, in which we can continue to add to pressures upon South Africa. That is the purpose of the policy of this Government.

GRAIN FARMERS—DEFICIENCY PAYMENT

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. The Minister knows that farmers are facing the lowest grain prices in constant dollars since the 1930s and the Great Depression. In late August the Minister agreed in principle to a $3 billion deficiency payment to Canadian farmers. Can the Minister give a commitment today as to when that payment will be made? When will the cheques be sent out so that farmers facing great uncertainty with world prices will know that this Government is going to follow through on that commitment which he apparently made to Canadian grain farmers in late August in Winnipeg?

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the Hon. Member's question. Part of it is right and part is wrong. Of course the Hon. Member did not attend the farm leaders' meeting in Winnipeg on August 27.

Mr. Foster: I was not invited.

Mr. Wise: I am sure that if he checked with any of the 50 farm leaders who attended that meeting he would find that no commitment whatsoever was given with respect to the $3 billion.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wise: Mr. Speaker, it was the third meeting of series two with reference to Special Canadian Grains No. 2. What happened at that meeting, as I have reported in this House numerous times, was that farm leaders almost unanimously agreed on a method of distribution. What is happening now is that officials of my Department are putting the numbers to that particular distribution formula. In fact, they are consulting on a day-to-day basis with the farm leadership seeking additional information.

The commitment that I gave was that if it met the fairness and equity test, then it would form part of the submission that I would make to the Government. But there was no commitment. Indeed, a year ago at this time there was no commitment on the dollars attached to the Special Canadian Grains Program. Today, of course, there is no commitment to the dollars attached—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wise: Hon. Members want the information, and I am trying to be forthcoming. As of today there is no commitment as to a price-tag on the program.

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE TALKS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, this is the same type of stonewalling that we heard last October—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Foster: —until Premier Devine screamed for a political bail-out in the Saskatchewan election. There is no Saskatchewan election this year. Grain is at the lowest prices since the 1930s, the engineers on the Seaway are on strike, in the next week or so the lock-men on the Seaway will go on strike. Surely there is enough uncertainty that the Government can stop stonewalling—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As all Hon. Members know, this is an important matter. I would ask that the Hon. Member to put his question and I ask the Hon. Minister to answer it, succinctly.

Mr. Nystrom: Both of you.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I was just getting to the question.

Is the hold-up because of the free trade negotiation that is going on with the United States? Is there uncertainty as to whether the agreement that is being hammered out in Washington, and in the Langevin Building today, whether or not this type of payment is permitted—

Mr. Speaker: I am sure that the Hon. Member can put his question.

Mr. Foster: Is the payment of $3 billion which the Minister promised to the farmers on the free trade negotiation table, and is there uncertainty as to whether or not that will be permitted by the American agreement with Canada? Will the Minister clarify if that is the hold-up?

Mr. Gauthier: Now goes the truth.

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): The only stone wall must be between the Hon. Member's ears.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Cheap shot.

Mr. Wise: There is no stonewalling on the part of this Government whatsoever. The design and the program to consult with the Canadian farmers have nothing to do with the bilateral trade arrangements between Canada and the United States.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

STRIKE BY INSIDE WORKERS—FRANCHISING ISSUE

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, it is nice finally to have the opportunity to ask a question.

Earlier in Question Period in response to a question, the Minister of Labour said that it is not yet time to appoint a mediator. In view of the fact that the postal workers have offered to negotiate on the issue of franchising, and have made an offer in this area, is it the Government's policy that Canada Post will negotiate on the issue of franchising? Where, when, and how will that occur?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister responsible for the Post Office, I think that he made it fairly clear to the House yesterday as reported in Hansard at page 9550 where he stated, "Mr. Dunstan . . . " on behalf of Canada Post, "has made a commitment to negotiate, along the lines suggested by Mr. Foisey, . . . " the conciliator, "to ensure that no employees would be adversely affected by this decision, which is most properly a management decision".

Of course, the federal Government is hopeful that Canada Post and CUPW can return to the bargaining table to negotiate a settlement, and that is obviously the preferred course of action.

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Why is it the position of the federal Government that we should take jobs which are basically filled by women who are earning a good salary, and make sure that those jobs go to women, probably on a part-time basis, who will be earning the minimum wage? Why is that a good policy for this country?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member's question is somewhat slanted.

An Hon. Member: Just a little bit.

Mr. Crosbie: As usual.

Mr. Mazankowski: There is a conciliator's report which we believe could form the basis for a negotiated settlement. Yesterday the Minister responsible for the Post Office indicated that the Post Office is ready and willing to sit down and work—

Mr. Murphy: How about women's salaries?

Mr. Mazankowski: —and negotiate a settlement. That is the preferred course of action.

STRIKE BY INSIDE WORKERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour.

I had the feeling during the interview shown yesterday evening on Canadian television with the heads of the Canada Post Corporation and the union that they were playing cat and mouse instead of trying to come to an agreement and settling the postal strike.

Can the Minister assure the Canadian population that the Government is doing everything in its power to settle this strike as quickly as possible to minimize the cost to the Canadian economy?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of Labour): I believe that we all agree that the best collective agreement is one that is negotiated by both parties at the bargaining table. This is why I encourage both parties to return to the bargaining table.

Having said that, I can advise both parties that the Government will not tolerate a disruptive work stoppage at the Canada Post Corporation.

NATIONAL PAROLE BOARD

SUPERVISION OF PAROLEES IN METROPOLITAN TORONTO

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. It concerns the serious and potentially explosive situation with parole supervision in Metropolitan Toronto.

In a memorandum from the senior board member of the National Parole Board to Mr. O. Ingstrup, the Chairman of the National Parole Board, he stated:

> It is becoming very apparent that major problems exist in the area of supervision in Toronto and vicinity. We continue—to see evidence of very shoddy work and to see signs of impending major problems.

Mr. Speaker, for more than a year the Solicitor General has been aware of this very serious problem. I would like to ask why the Conservative Government has not committed the necessary resources to ensure proper and adequate supervision for parolees in Metropolitan Toronto?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): On behalf of the Solicitor General, who is out of Ottawa today on official business, I am informed with respect to the allegations made by the Hon. Member that indeed there has been action taken with respect to improving the capacity of the Parole Board in the Toronto area. There has been a significant increase in the personnel operating out of the district of York in Toronto. The situation is well in hand.

The Solicitor General has responded quickly and effectively with respect to the workload that is facing the board in this part of the country.

REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF SITUATION

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Well, Mr. Speaker, that does not appear to be the case. The senior member of the National Parole Board had some very serious concerns with regard to parole supervision.

The Solicitor General will know that it is a powder keg ready to explode. There are situations where dangerous inmates are not being properly supervised on the streets, and the public is at risk in Metropolitan Toronto.

The National Parole Board in Ontario has recommended a full review and audit to be made of the processes being followed, the staff problems, and reporting procedures.

I wish to ask the Government whether it is prepared to initiate that full review and audit, as recommended by the Senior Board Member of the National Parole Board in Ontario.

Ms. Copps: Good question.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take issue with the inflammatory language used by the Hon. Member. It does not serve the system well to make that type of categorical catastrophic allegation. All of us are interested in ensuring that the system operates effectively on behalf of those it serves, and on behalf of the Canadian public.

I have indicated that I am informed that the administration of the Parole Board in the Toronto area has been addressed by the Solicitor General when it has been brought to his attention. He is taking action to ensure that the best interests of our system of justice are addressed. I would simply counsel the Hon. Member not to make these statements, otherwise he will have his picture in the Toronto Sun.

HORTICULTURE

EXPORTS OF HONEY—SULFATHIAZOLE CERTIFICATE

Mr. Jack Scowen (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. Would the Minister advise honey producers in Canada if a sulfathiazole certificate is necessary for shipments of honey to Japan and to European countries?

When will the Government certify more labs for testing honey?

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I believe that I answered part of that question yesterday. My hon. colleague should realize that product cannot move interprovincially unless it carries an export certificate issued by Agriculture Canada, and meets the standards established by the Department of National Health and Welfare. The same holds true for export product from Canada to the United States, and more recently to Japan.

• (1200)

What we are attempting to do is to negotiate with these two receiving countries an agreement that this product would be acceptable, providing that it carries with it an export certificate.

In order for us to issue the export certificate, it must meet the standards established by Health and Welfare.

MARINE SAFETY

DESTAFFING OF WEST COAST LIGHTHOUSES—POSITION OF B.C. CONSERVATIVE CAUCUS

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Have members of the B.C. Conservative caucus met with the Minister in order to request a moratorium on the destaffing of West Coast lighthouses?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter which has been under way for some time. The Hon. Member will remember that the Government appointed, or that I appointed, a completely objective and independent evaluator of the proposals in connection with light stations in Canada.

He made a report and recommendations, and I believe he found that the course upon which we are embarked is a proper, sensible, and reasonable one.

Nevertheless, I am discussing these matters with members of the B.C. caucus who might not be as reasonable and rational in their judgment as the independent person we appointed to look into the matter.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: We certainly agree with that.

Mr. Crosbie: I am naturally going to heed what they have to say.

Mr. Skelly: I must say that I agree entirely with the Minister about the irrationality of his colleagues.

Mr. Speaker: If the Hon. Member would put the question, it would be helpful.

REQUEST FOR MORATORIUM ON DESTAFFING

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister aware that B.C. Tory Members made a public commitment to urge the Government to abandon the plan to destaff the lighthouses?

Will he impose a moratorium on the Coast Guard while his consultation with his colleagues is going on?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I can only report to the hon. gentleman that I read the papers as well.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I am from a marine area myself. I hate to see the closure of lighthouses, but the world changes and the world moves on, and this is a program in effect in all parts of Canada. British Columbia is a province of particular sensibilities, and I am certainly going to be very sensitive to those sensibilities.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FIJI—REPRESENTATION AT COMMONWEALTH MEETING

Mrs. Mary Collins (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Given the confusing and unsettling situation in Fiji where a second coup took place this week, can the Minister advise the House who Canada now recognizes as the Head of Government in Fiji?

Given that the Commonwealth Conference in Vancouver is fast approaching, will Fiji still be considered as a participant in the meeting and, indeed, has the Minister received any representations that Fiji will be represented at the meeting?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question. Naturally it is of interest to British Columbia Members and to those across the country, and I know that the Hon. Member for Capilano has followed questions in the Pacific area with particular interest.

The Government recognizes the Governor General of Fiji as being the sole legitimate source of executive authority in that country. As Canada recognizes the Governor General as the Head of Government, the Governor General or his representative would be welcome at the Vancouver meeting of the Commonwealth Heads of Government.

As far as we are concerned, Fiji is and remains a full member of the Commonwealth.

REFUGEES

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON LEGISLATION

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Immigration. It concerns part of a secret and very disturbing cabinet document which I received that was approved by the Planning and Priorities Committee of Cabinet.

The document is entitled "Sweeteners" and suggests increasing future refugee levels simply, and I quote, "to improve the public perception of the Government's commitment to the refugee issue . . . which would neutralize criticism that this Government does not care about refugee protection".

How can the Minister justify such a cynical strategy which attempts to artificially sweeten refugee legislation which the Government recognizes is seriously flawed?

Rather than playing with the lives of refugees through its public relations gimmickry, why does the Government not implement legislation which is truly designed to stop human suffering and to protect human lives?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of State (Immigration)): Mr. Speaker, this Government need not apologize for our refugee policy.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Weiner: Our generosity has been demonstrated. We do more for the real refugees of the world on a per capita basis than any other nation. This year we will be bringing in almost 20,000 people under refugee and humanitarian programs. We are getting to those in the most desperate need.

In addition, we contribute tens of millions of dollars to international humanitarian agencies, to food aid, et cetera. Anybody who comes to our door and seeks protection, those in need of protection, will never be turned away. If a person does not have a safe haven, we will make sure that he is given a haven.

VISA REQUIREMENTS

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, in the same "Sweeteners" document, Cabinet states that after Bill C-55 is law "visas would not be required to deter claimants from countries with no significant human rights problems", yet "visas will remain a necessity to control arrivals from countries where human rights problems do exist".

Therefore I would like to ask the Minister, particularly after his answer, how can the Government decide that people who are fleeing countries where serious human rights violations have been recognized by Canada, are to be systematically restricted by the use of visas?

Are they not the real victims who should be addressed by a true refugee policy? Why does the Government not put an end to this Machiavellian strategy which does nothing but bring dishonour to the country—

Mr. Speaker: I think the Hon. Member has put his question.

Tabling of Documents

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of State (Immigration)): Mr. Speaker, we saw clearly the increasing abuse of our laws, of the integrity and credibility of those laws. This year, to date, over 21,000 people have come to make a refugee claim here. By the advice we are given, more than 70 per cent are not real refugees.

We have found a way to bring forward a process which is almost complete now. We are well advanced in that process to identify and determine the real refugees, to welcome them, and to make sure that they are provided a haven here. However, those who are abusers will be kept out. We are saying "no" to illegal aliens and "yes" to real refugees.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

NORTHERN ONTARIO—APPOINTMENT OF BOARD

Mr. John Parry (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister who will recall having been on his feet seven times between November and May to tell us that "soon" there would be an economic recovery program announced for northwestern Ontario.

He will also recall that on July 13 it was stated in the press release finally announcing the program that within four weeks to six weeks the program would be operational.

Since it is now 12 weeks later and the board has not even been appointed, will the Deputy Prime Minister tell the House and the people of northern Ontario what he intends to do to rectify this scandalous situation?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that we are very much committed to the economic development of northern Ontario. We are working actively with the Minister who will be responsible for the initiative—between him and my officials and between the two of us—to finalize the plans.

The announcement should be made on the advisory committee on or about October 9. The official opening of the office in Sault Ste. Marie is scheduled for the very near future, before the end of October.

The acronym for the program will be FEDNOR, and the proposals are presently being compiled by interim staff.

COMPOSITION OF CONSULTATIVE COUNCIL

Mr. John Parry (Kenora—Rainy River): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. The President of the Treasury Board must be aware of the fact that the applications have been submitted, that the composition of the consultative council will reflect the francophone reality, the aboriginal reality and the geographic diversity of Northern Ontario. Is he prepared to assure the House and Northern Ontario residents that the composition of this committee will reflect these realities?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to confirm to my colleague that the composition of the advisory committee will be representative of the local population. Having in mind the establishment of both the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency and the Western Economic Diversification Office, the aim of the Government in such initiatives, as in the Northern Ontario initiative, is precisely to forge a link between local forces and interest groups and Government programs. So this is in keeping with our projections: to have an advisory committee to represent local interests groups.

Mr. Speaker: I know some Hon. Members will be very disappointed that the Question Period has come to an end but I have been very generous. I know other Hon. Members will not be disappointed at all. In any event, we must move on.

CHANGE IN MEMBERSHIP OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Speaker: Are there any other Hon. Members rising with regard to that statement? Is that agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Does the Hon. Member have unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 29

SUSPENSION OF FREE TRADE TALKS

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I sent notice that I would ask the Chair to allow an emergency debate under the provisions of Standing Order 29. In fact, the Official Opposition has been asking for such a debate nearly every day for almost a week. We feel that Canadians should be informed about the trade talks and be correctly informed about what is happening between the U.S. and Canada with respect to free trade.

Mr. Speaker, you suggested several times that the Government could use another approach, such as an Opposition day or a motion. That has not been done. Your advice was ignored. We sincerely believe that a debate is necessary and that a debate on this matter is urgently needed since this is the last sitting day we will have to do so. Considering the importance of the subject and the timely and urgent aspect of the trade talks, I thought that today you would perhaps be willing to recognize the urgency of this matter and give permission for a special debate under Standing Order 29.

Mr. Speaker: I want to thank the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) for his comments. As I said on previous days, this is of course a very important subject but, considering the present circumstances, the Chair is reluctant to agree that a debate is urgently needed this afternoon.

I know the Hon. Member will understand that the Chair's decision does not in any way overlook the importance of the issue, but perhaps Monday or some other day, there will be another opportunity when a debate would be appropriate. Today, however, the Chair does not feel that is the case.

AND WHEREAS the amendment proposed in the schedule hereto also recognizes the principle of the equality of all the provinces, provides new arrangements to foster greater harmony and cooperation between the Government of Canada and the governments of the provinces and requires that conferences be convened to consider important constitutional, economic and other issues;

AND WHEREAS certain portions of the amendment proposed in the schedule hereto relate to matters referred to in section 41 of the Constitution Act, 1982;

NOW THEREFORE the House of Commons resolves that an amendment to the Constitution of Canada be authorized to be made by proclamation issued by Her Excellency the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada in accordance with the schedule hereto.

SCHEDULE

1. The Constitution Act, 1867 is amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 1 thereof, the following section:

"2. (1) The Constitution of Canada shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with

(a) the recognition that the existence of French-speaking Canadians, centred in Quebec but also present elsewhere in Canada, and English-speaking Canadians, concentrated outside Quebec but also present in Quebec, constitutes a fundamental characteristic of Canada; and

(b) the recognition that Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society.

(2) The role of the Parliament of Canada and the provincial legislatures to preserve the fundamental characteristic of Canada referred to in paragraph (1)(a) is affirmed.

(3) The role of the legislature and Government of Quebec to preserve and promote the distinct identity of Quebec referred to in paragraph (1)(b) is affirmed.

(4) Nothing in this section derogates from the powers, rights or privileges of Parliament or the Government of Canada, or of the legislatures or governments of the provinces, including any powers, rights or privileges relating to language."

2. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 24 thereof, the following section:

"25. (1) Where a vacancy occurs in the Senate, the government of the province to which the vacancy relates may, in relation to that vacancy, submit to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada the names of persons who may be summoned to the Senate.

(2) Until an amendment to the Constitution of Canada is made in relation to the Senate pursuant to section 41 of the Constitution Act, 1982, the person summoned to fill a vacancy in the Senate shall be chosen from among persons whose names have been submitted under subsection (1) by the government of the province to which the vacancy relates and must be acceptable to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada."

3. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 95 thereof, the following heading and sections:

"Agreements on Immigration and Aliens

95A. The Government of Canada shall, at the request of the government of any province, negotiate with the government of that province for the purpose of concluding an agreement relating to immigration or the temporary admission of aliens into that province that is appropriate to the needs and circumstances of that province.

95B. (1) Any agreement concluded between Canada and a province in relation to immigration or the temporary admission of aliens into that province has the force of law from the time it is declared to do so in accordance with subsection 95C(1) and shall from that time have effect notwithstanding class 25 of section 91 or section 95.

(2) An agreement that has the force of law under subsection (1) shall have effect only so long and so far as it is not repugnant to any provision of an Act of the Parliament of Canada that sets national standards and objectives relating to immigration or aliens, including any provision that establishes general classes of immigrants or relates to levels of immigration for Canada or that prescribes classes of individuals who are inadmissible into Canada.

(3) The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms applies in respect of any agreement that has the force of law under subsection (1) and in respect of anything done by the Parliament or Government of Canada, or the legislature or government of a province, pursuant to any such agreement.

95C. (1) A declaration that an agreement referred to in subsection 95B(1) has the force of law may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada only where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of the province that is a party to the agreement.

(2) An amendment to an agreement referred to in subsection 95B(1) may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada only where so authorized

(a) by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of the province that is a party to the agreement; or

(b) in such other manner as is set out in the agreement.

95D. Sections 46 to 48 of the Constitution Act, 1982 apply, with such modifications as the circumstances require, in respect of any declaration made pursuant to subsection 95C(1), any amendment to an agreement made pursuant to subsection 95C(2) or any amendment made pursuant to section 95E.

95E. An amendment to sections 95A to 95D or this section may be made in accordance with the procedure set out in subsection 38(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, but only if the amendment is authorized by resolutions of the legislative assemblies of all the provinces that are, at the time of the amendment, parties to an agreement that has the force of law under subsection 95B(1)."

4. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately preceding section 96 thereof, the following heading:

"General"

5. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately preceding section 101 thereof, the following heading:

"Courts Established by the Parliament of Canada"

"Supreme Court of Canada

(2) The Supreme Court of Canada shall consist of a chief justice to be called the Chief Justice of Canada and eight other judges, who shall be appointed by the Governor General in Council by letters patent under the Great Seal.

101B. (1) Any person may be appointed a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada who, after having been admitted to the bar of any province or territory, has, for a total of at least ten years, been a judge of any court in Canada or a member of the bar of any province or territory.

(2) At least three judges of the Supreme Court of Canada shall be appointed from among persons who, after having been admitted to the bar of Quebec, have, for a total of at least ten years, been judges of any court of Quebec or of any court established by the Parliament of Canada, or members of the bar of Quebec.

101C. (1) Where a vacancy occurs in the Supreme Court of Canada, the government of each province may, in relation to that vacancy, submit to the Minister of Justice of Canada the names of any of the persons who have been admitted to the bar of that province and are qualified under section 101B for appointment to that court.

(2) Where an appointment is made to the Supreme Court of Canada, the Governor General in Council shall, except where the Chief Justice is appointed from among members of the Court, appoint a person whose name has been submitted under subsection (1) and who is acceptable to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada.

101D. Sections 99 and 100 apply in respect of the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada.

101E. (1) Sections 101A to 101D shall not be construed as abrogating or derogating from the powers of the Parliament of Canada to make laws under section 101 except to the extent that such laws are inconsistent with those sections.

(2) For greater certainty, section 101A shall not be construed as abrogating or derogating from the powers of the Parliament of Canada to make laws relating to the reference of questions of law or fact, or any other matters, to the Supreme Court of Canada."

7. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 106 thereof, the following section:

"106A. (1) The Government of Canada shall provide reasonable compensation to the government of a province that chooses not to participate in a national shared-cost program that is established by the Government of Canada after the coming into force of this section in an area of exclusive provincial jurisdiction, if the province carries on a program or initiative that is compatible with the national objectives.

(2) Nothing in this section extends the legislative powers of the Parliament of Canada or of the legislatures of the provinces."

8. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto the following heading and sections:

"XII—CONFERENCES ON THE ECONOMY AND OTHER MATTERS

148. A conference composed of the Prime Minister of Canada and the first ministers of the provinces shall be convened by the Prime Minister of Canada at least once each year to discuss the state of the Canadian economy and such other matters as may be appropriate.

XIII—REFERENCES

41. An amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to the following matters may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada only where authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province:

CONSTITUTIONAL CONFERENCES

50. (1) A constitutional conference composed of the Prime Minister of Canada and the first ministers of the provinces shall be convened by the Prime Minister of Canada at least once each year, commencing in 1988.

(2) The conferences convened under subsection (1) shall have included on their agenda the following matters:

(a) Senate reform, including the role and functions of the Senate, its powers, the method of selecting Senators and representation in the Senate;

(b) roles and responsibilities in relation to fisheries; and

(c) such other matters as are agreed upon."

14. Subsection 52(2) of the said Act is amended by striking out the word "and" at the end of paragraph (b) thereof, by adding the word "and" at the end of paragraph (c) thereof and by adding thereto the following paragraph:

"(d) any other amendment to the Constitution of Canada."

15. Section 61 of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

16. Nothing in section 2 of the Constitution Act, 1867 affects section 25 or 27 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 or class 24 of section 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

CITATION

17. This amendment may be cited as the Constitution Amendment, 1987.

And the amendments of Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra) (p. 9585) and Mr. Broadbent (p. 9586).

Mr. Speaker: I understand we were on questions and comments on the speech of the Hon. Member for Kenora—Rainy River (Mr. Parry). Are there any questions or comments?

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, at the close of debate before Question Period the Hon. Member for Kenora—Rainy River (Mr. Parry) was elucidating for the House some of the weaknesses of the arguments which have been presented against the adoption of the Meech Lake Accord, other than those contained in the amendment proposed by the New Democratic Party. I was quite interested in his comments. I wonder if he could expound a little further on them as I would be very interested in hearing further comment on that.

Mr. Parry: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the Hon. Member for St. John's East (Mr. Harris) for his question. I was indeed expanding on what I saw as the weaknesses of the arguments which have been presented against the Meech Lake Accord.

I believe that immigrants such as myself and the Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) do not require the inclusion of a distinct society clause such as is envisaged to address the needs of the Province of Quebec. I also believe that the prime identifier in constitutional terms for the aboriginal people is the existence of treaties and the existence of a process to resolve areas which are not yet under treaty such that the constitutional entrenchment is secondary to the existence of the treaties.

There is, after all, also the experience of the unfortunately unsuccessful discussions toward self-government. They were, however, constitutionally entrenched discussions, and similarly with multiculturalism. For those of us who come from other cultures, other than the mainstream ones,whether we were born in Canada or outside Canada, this is a daily affirmation. After all, we have not undergone the internal divisions, the rifts and the travails, that rent the Province of Quebec over this very question of membership within the Canadian Confederation.

[Translation]

So, Mr. Speaker, the words "distinct society" will be entrenched in the present Constitution to allay the deep and legitimate fears of Quebecers regarding their status in North America. On the North American continent inhabited by 250 million mostly English-speaking people, Quebecers have always been afraid, with reason, of being isolated or assimilated by the English world. While the English fact inside Quebec can be manipulated from outside the province in order to downgrade the French fact that is alive within the Province of Quebec and which we should all recognize in this debate, I stand in solidarity with Quebecers who need to have these words, "distinct society", included in the Constitution.

[English]

Other arguments have been equally weak. The Hon. Member for St. Henri—Westmount (Mr. Johnston) talked of the dream of a bilingual Canada. That dream has never been there. It is the dream of the availability of services in both languages across the country that has existed. Consequently, the destruction of that straw man was of course easy.

The perspective of my hon. colleague from Cochrane—Superior frankly seemed to eliminate any acknowledgment that he was a representative of a region of Canada as well as, of course, a Canadian and a federalist. It seemed to ignore the diversity of our own roots that are spread right across the country and indeed from outside the country but which lead to the diversity and differences that exist within Canada today and which we must not only recognize but indeed celebrate.

The bard of Scotland, Robert Burns, said: "Oh wad some power the giftie gie us, To see oursels as others see us!" Let us believe that many who oppose this Accord will be seen by others as over-emphasizing their personal perspective to the detriment of their public responsibility. If we oppose, we can be seen legitimately as individualists, always wanting our own way.

It was the Austrian statesman Metternich who said that politics is the art of the possible. In voting on the Meech Lake Accord, we must set aside what seems to be the demonology of the view of provincial politicians. We have to remember that there are those at every other level of Government whose commitment to Canada is as strong as ours, whose faith in Canada is as strong as ours.

Obviously, I have a deep desire to see the amendments proposed by my Party or those by the Liberal Party largely incorporated in a changed and improved Meech Lake Accord. There does come a point however at which we have to look at what is before us. I will conclude then by saying that the process of discussion in this House must surely have raised in the minds, not only of the Government but of all other Governments in Canada, the need for some form of codicil or addendum to the Meech Lake Accord which will recognize the very serious and legitimate concerns that have been raised.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I have a brief question to put to the Hon. Member. One of the amendments brought forward by the Liberal Party would require, in subsection 2.(2), that the federal Government not only preserve but promote the fundamental characteristic of the country, our two official languages, and that it do so actively. I wonder if the Hon. Member will support and vote for including the requirement, at least for the federal level, of not only preserving but particularly promoting the linguistic duality.

Mr. Parry: I should thank the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier for his question. Mr. Speaker, if you read the amendments proposed by his Party you will note that they are more detailed than the ones proposed by my colleagues from Yorkton—Melville (Mr. Nystrom) and New Westminster—Coquitlam (Mrs. Jewett).

I think we recognize, Mr. Speaker, that the present Government cannot accept, word for word, an amendment proposed by the Liberal Party. I believe it would be more realistic for the opposition parties to propose amendments of a general nature which would allow the Government to incorporate their substance in its own document.

On the particular question, however, I agree, Mr. Speaker, that the federal Government has the responsibility not only to promote our two official languages, but also to support and promote the survival, continued existence, and use of native languages which were used on this continent before English and French.

[English]

Mr. O'Neil: Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the Hon. Member for many of his comments on this historic document which offers Canada and all Canadians an opportunity to move into the 20th century as a country that is willingly united.

I would say by way of comment that unlike many Hon. Members who have spoken and those who will speak, I do not view the referendum of 1980 as a great success for Canadians. I believe that the results of the 1980 referendum indicate that we had failed as a country to deal with the legitimate aspirations of the people of Quebec.

In 1980, fully 40 per cent of the population of Quebec voted to leave Confederation, and about 50 per cent of the French-speaking people of Quebec voted to leave Canada as we know it. That was an alarming result; hardly a victory, simply a sad result.

We as a country gave a commitment during the referendum debate of 1980 to do something to make that 40 per cent of Quebecers more comfortable within Confederation. That is what the ensuing debate was about, and it was a great miscarriage of justice and a breach of promise when in 1982, the Government of Canada, in concert with the provinces, proceeded to effect major constitutional change without the consent of the very people it was supposed to benefit.

It was in an effort to right this wrong that in 1987, the First Ministers of Canada reached a constitutional Accord which brings Quebec willingly into our constitutional family. It is an imperfect document, of that there can be no doubt. But so have all constitutional documents been imperfect.

The 1982 constitutional agreement was grossly imperfect in that it excluded Quebec. It was grossly imperfect in the manner in which it put the Charter of Rights in the Constitution, permitting provinces to opt out of the protections of the Charter. The 1867 Act itself was imperfect. Every constitutional amendment, one could argue, has been imperfect in one way or another.

But what we must balance is the need to correct an historical wrong, a wrong that could form and probably would form the basis for a separatist movement in the future. The René Lévesque of 1995, in the absence of constitutional reconciliation, would have a far stronger case to make than the René Lévesque of 1976 and 1981.

I urge all Hon. Members to take the opportunity presented in this Accord to unite our country and make it stronger so we can face the challenges collectively and in a united fashion.

Mr. Parry: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my friend for his serious and scholarly contribution. I must say that I do not really share what I see as a pessimistic interpretation of the results of the Quebec referendum. I have to observe that the use of referendums to manipulate public opinion has seldom been better demonstrated than in the phrasing of the text of the question on which the people of Quebec were asked to vote. I believe it was phrased in order to catch the maximum number of people who might have any doubt about the form of Quebec's association and involvement within Canada. It succeeded in doing so and the number of people voting for it came to about 40 per cent.

However, I take very much to heart his criticisms of the 1982 agreement, and I think his criticism of past agreements reflect my own concern about the way in which written constitutions can be used and misused by those with motive to do so.

I understand the Hon. Member perhaps does not share all the reservations and criticisms I have about the Meech Lake Accord. Perhaps the question of consideration of analyses from outside the milieu of those actively involved in the negotiations is one where he has more optimism than I. Yet I think we tend towards the same conclusion, that the Accord is a fully necessary response to the outreach of the Province of Quebec towards integration within our great Canadian Confederation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate. The Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie, who will be followed by the Minister of State (Youth) (Mr. Charest).

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in this historic debate and in a constitutional accord which, to my mind, is incomplete and imperfect. However, when we look at Canada's history, we realize that what we had in 1982 was an imperfect and incomplete constitutional accord. Since Canada was founded in 1867, and even under the Fathers of Confederation, we had an incomplete and imperfect accord. At the time, we are told, there were always pessimists telling the Fathers of Confederation that Canada would never be able to function without an amending formula, that it would be anarchy, that it was impossible and that we would never be able to patriate the Constitution. The impossible happened in 1982. Actually, between 1927 and 1982, fifteen constitutional conferences were held in an attempt to patriate the Constitution and agree on an amending formula, and every time everybody wanted a perfect constitution which, unfortunately, did not reflect reality and did not allow for change, and every time it fell through. In Victoria, we still had pessimists who were saying . . . I call them prophets of gloom and doom; in Victoria we came closest to a perfect accord. Unfortunately, it fell through. There would be no going back.

The pessimists who said that were wrong again. In 1982, we had an accord that once again was incomplete and imperfect. Quebec and our native people were left out of this Constitutional Accord. Today, we are discussing the Meech Lake Accord which is still imperfect and incomplete. It leaves out native people and multiculturalism is not sufficiently protected, but this time it is Quebec's turn to ratify the Canadian Constitution. Today, again, there are pessimists who say that because native people were left out, because of the unanimity rule and because of the distinct society aspect, the Accord is unacceptable and it will be impossible to change anything in Canada. Come on, you prophets of gloom and doom!

The history of Canada, although there is no amendment formula, although it was simply a legislative measure in London, there is the Supreme Court, the federal and provincial governments had co-operated to provide health insurance, hospital insurance, social programs, old age security pensions, pension plans. All that was done as a result of the good will of people in those days. The pessimists who claim such initiatives could not be taken after the Accord should know better. Your children will be as intelligent and as brilliant as those of earlier generations. If something does not work out in five or ten years they will not be any more stupid than people are today or were before. They will fix it. People who are against the Accord are insulting younger Canadians. These people think there is nothing after them. Prime Ministers and Hon. Members are all here for a finite time. Before Malépart, there was someone else in Sainte-Marie, and someone else before him. The prime Ministers have also changed. Whether we are speaking about Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Pierre Elliot Trudeau, Joe Clark, or anyone else, we are all here for a while to represent the population, and every one of us in his time has done a very good job of defending our own generation. I am convinced that the next generation will succeed even better than we have in protecting the interests of the population.

It is sad to see those who object to the distinct identity of Quebec. We do not find them only in the Liberal Party, but there is also one in the New Democratic Party who has just announced his position and a couple in the Conservative Party. It is sad to see that they still have the same old attitudes and do not understand Quebec. When I say that they are anti-Quebec, it is not because they are racists or because they object to the linguistic concept. Perhaps I am not using the right terms, but I simply want to show that these people do not understand today's Quebec. When they say that they want the status quo with the distinct identity, they are wrong. Those who do not want the distinct identity want to maintain the status quo of 30 years ago, when Quebec was dominated by the English-speaking minority. Francophones in East Montreal had to speak English when they shopped at Eaton's. The situation has changed today. French is increasingly present. However, something else has changed. Twenty years ago, when someone who spoke neither French nor English arrived in Quebec, he had to become assimilated with the anglophones. Then, the francophones took action to assimilate newcomers in their own community. We must congratulate the Parti Quebecois for that. I did not agree with their option, but today, it is different. We have Italians in Quebec, such as the Hon. Member for Bourassa (Mr. Rossi), who is a Quebecer like the Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart), but he is an Italian Quebecer while the Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie is of French background.

The Italians, Greeks, Portuguese and Asians all have their own culture and do not want to be identified with either francophones or anglophones. They want to keep their independence. This is what makes Quebec different. What makes it different is the francophone majority which is increasingly asserting its position. It is not taking the place of anyone else, but assuming its own rightful place.

As for the Italian community, we can look at what is happening in Saint-Léonard. A Quebec television station has a program which shows how the francophone and Italian communities live in the same regions in harmony which keeping their own identity.

When I see my colleague from Saint-Henri—Westmount (Mr. Johnston) say that federal Members from Quebec will be less important, I tell him that in hockey when one realizes that the game gets too fast, it is time to hang one's skates, because development and progress are increasingly quicker. And whoever is unable to follow the pace should not try to stop the others but drop out and leave his place to someone younger. Such is evolution!

Mr. Speaker, I think that with this kind of Constitution . . . and when he wants us to believe that a Quebec Member, if ever the distinct society concept is accepted and Quebec is given jurisdiction over communications, will never be able to become Minister of Communications. If we draw up the Constitution to see what job we can have in Ottawa, we might as well not have a Constitution at all.

Once again his argument is at fault. As far as the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan are concerned, Quebec has autonomy in its field. We have had Mrs. Monique Bégin as Minister of National Health and Welfare as well as Mr. Marc Lalonde, but even while Quebec was exclusively responsible for the Quebec Pension Board, the others were responsible for the Canada Pension Plan. Medicare and hospital insurance are administered by the provinces. We have had someone from Quebec. Let us assume that the Member for Saint-Henri—Westmount (Mr. Johnston) or the Member for Mount-Royal (Mrs. Finestone) are right, then the Quebec Members in Ottawa would have to do their best because their provincial colleagues would have some of the powers. This is all very well, then we will have better representatives in Ottawa and the French-speaking Members from Quebec have never been afraid of competition. We have never feared competition, because we always have had to fight and I know that my children will have to fight in that Parliament.

However, do not try to delude me. I congratulate all Canadians for having thought out the concept of the distinct society. The last election has clearly shown that people want to be rid of those who decide or want to undermine the French culture. In Ontario, they put Grossman out. People no longer want that kind of representatives.

I hope that those who are against the distinct society will change their mind; however, I respect the views of my other colleagues from all parties who would like to have protection for the native people. I understand them. However, I do not approve the Tory, NDP or Liberal Members who say that the concept of the distinct society would maintain the status quo. And they suggest we here in this House are adopting an incomplete agreement, well in 1982 it was just as incomplete. Even with Prime Minister Trudeau it was incomplete. He himself recognized the distinct nature when we had him include the so-called Canada clause with respect to the teaching language in Quebec. In the other provinces, it is the universal clause. That did not please the Prime Minister of Canada. As a constitutional amending formula, he preferred the Victoria formula but he yielded. Canada is a consensus, and such is the reality of the time. It is not the nature of a provincialist Member to support the Meech Lake Agreement, but of a federal Member, of a Member seeking the good of all Canadians. And it is my view that my colleagues, both in the NDP and the Conservative Party, who suggest that because we support the Meech Lake position that allows Quebec to concur in the Canadian Constitution we are taking a provincialist decision, are making a tremendous error, because as long as Quebec is left aside, the Canadian Federation is wobbly. It is like a four-wheel car that has lost a wheel. Quebec is an important wheel in the process.

Mr. Speaker, I support the amendments put forward by my Party, and I also blame the federal Government for not accepting a few improvements, for not showing the leadership needed to contact the other provincial Governments. That was done in 1982. Mrs. Judy Erola—unfortunately she is no longer here, but were she here—Concerning women who had the will to fight despite the fact that the nine provinces with the then Prime Minister had signed an agreement . . . Mrs. Erola, along with women groups from all across the country, forced the First Ministers and the House of Commons to bring in other amendments. Like the request by Mr. Claude Ryan, for Quebec once again—to meet Quebec's claims—like the Canada clause I referred to earlier concerning the teaching language. Here again the provincial Governments accepted.

To all those men and women who steadfastly want to add something, I say it can be done in my view. Is there one Canadian Prime Minister who can publicly tell his cultural communities: No, I cannot include you in that agreement? Is there one provincial Premier who can tell his cultural communities who call on him: No, I cannot include you? I am sure of that, and I strongly urge the Prime Minister to show leadership in that regard.

As far as the native people are concerned, I understand that the situation is much more difficult, but it is to be hoped that their turn will come too eventually.

But this time, Quebecers have accepted to adhere to the Constitution. They could have refused. I suggest we should commend Mr. Robert Bourassa, Quebec's Premier, for performing this miracle. It is Robert Bourassa who managed to convince the other Premiers— The Minister of State (Youth)(Mr. Charest) would like me to believe that it is the Prime Minister of Canada who did it. Unfortunately, I must tell him that he is wrong again, and that it was Mr. Rémillard, the Minister of Cultural Affairs—because the Prime Minister of Canada did not have the guts to do it—who had to go and see each and every provincial Premier. Robert Bourassa met with them and convinced them to return to the table and deal with his five conditions. And it was the Prime Minister of Canada, as usual, who presided over this meeting.

On the other hand, where I can blame the Prime Minister of Canada for his weakness, it is concerning Senate reform. To have given up federal patronage in exchange for provincial patronage is not the discovery of the century. This is typical of what comes out of his little head. But notwithstanding his mistakes which, I am sure, will be corrected, tomorrow or the day after tomorrow there will be another Government which will make right his wrongs and correct his mistakes concerning Senate reform. I suggest the Prime Minister could have found for the Senate a formula or a scheme providing for half the Senators being appointed and half being elected, or even devise a system to limit the powers of the Senate. He had a once in a lifetime opportunity to do so. Unfortunately, he chose to let it pass. Yet, he could correct his mistakes, there is still time. If he could show leadership, the Prime Minister of Canada would be able to protect our cultural communities. As the Minister of State (Youth) said, the Prime Minister of Canada should prove to us that he was the one to do it. The Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and Quebec's distinct society are Robert Bourassa's achievements.

If the Prime Minister of Canada wants to be awarded a medal or a trophy for this Constitutional Accord, he should stand up and call up a meeting of Provincial Premiers. He is going to see them about the free trade negotiations. He could take ten minutes to tell them: Listen, we made a mistake when we forgot the cultural communities in Canada. There are cultural communities in each province, so it is important to add them to the text. Do you agree? That would be a fine opportunity to show leadership, and that would be normal. In 1982, even after having signed the Accord, the Provincial Premiers agreed to change four or five points to address women's and Quebec's concerns. It was not the Canada clause which had been agreed upon at first with regard to the language of teaching, it was the universal clause all across Canada. But it was as a result of the meetings of the provincial premiers and the agreement with the federal government, that those changes could be made. In that respect I call once again upon the Conservative Members to put pressure on their Prime Minister to show at least some leadership so that we can argue with credibility when congratulating the Prime Minister of Canada on the success of the Meech Lake Accord.

I very seldom feel inclined to congratulate this Prime Minister, but in this instance I believe he did well. Since I was waiting at the door that night, I know that as the meeting's chairman he did not do too bad. He may have been a little too generous in order to get his deal on the Senate. Even Robert Bourassa exclaimed: "That is more than I was hoping for!" So it does not look too good when you have to give in. This is my concern with the Americans.

But coming back to the distinct society issue and the Conservative Members, I would like to single them out by name, for there are two or three who are starting to break rank themselves. On the NDP side, there is the Hon. Member for Vancouver—Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) who declared himself against it because he too is afraid of that. On the Conservative side, there is the Hon. Member for Annapolis Valley—Hants (Mr. Nowlan) and the Hon. Member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson), both anti-Quebecers who do not understand the nature of today's Quebec. They can be found everywhere, in the Conservative Party and in the New Democratic Party as well as in the Liberal Party. You have on the one hand two members who oppose the distinct society—

An Hon. Member: Two out of 200!

Mr. Malépart: I can understand the position of the Conservative Member and that of the New Democratic Member who comes from Yukon. She has nothing against the distinct characteristic, but she does not accept the Accord because it does not provide any protection for the people of that Territory. I can understand someone for making his own case. The Minister of State for Youth (Mr. Charest) does not see the difference in positions, but he should have respect for those who have convictions and know how to defend them. However, Mr. Speaker, I do not approve of the Hon. Members I mentioned who oppose the recognition of Quebec's distinctiveness. You can be assured that the affirmation of the distinct characteristic in the Constitutional Accord means something when it comes to communications. Some years ago, there were more English than French radio stations. That was unacceptable and that is why Quebec wanted someone to defend its interests because we are different from the rest of the country. Would my colleague the Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) accept the situation if there were more French than English radio stations in Toronto and Ontario? He would say that that does not make sense, that the licences must be revoked because people will not understand. It is the same with us, in Quebec. That is why we want to be represented, and I do not blame anyone from the Maritimes for protecting his interest. That is what Canada is all about: each region is represented here in the House of Commons, and also in the Senate where, it is sad to say, it would be better represented by elected rather than appointed senators.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I dare hope the Government, the Prime Minister will show leadership at least towards the cultural communities, because we have to admit, as I said earlier, that in Quebec as much as anywhere else, the Italian, Greek and Portuguese communities have contributed a lot to progress. The face of Quebec has changed, not only because it is French, but because it has become more and more European. We know that the Greeks in Quebec have taught us about the restaurant business. Many Italians are engaged in construction and have brought us new ideas. Quebec has progressed, it has changed with the French majority, with the English minority, but to those were added—an important feature that must be protected—cultural communities.

Mr. Speaker, I conclude by saying that even if the Prime Minister does not take his responsibilities and the amendments moved by the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party are defeated, I will vote for the Meech Lake Accord.

Hon. Jean C. Charest (Minister of State (Youth)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart) on his truly splendid intellectual tour de force. He actually managed to rise in the House and say all of the following: First of all, I support the amendments my party is proposing which would, for all practical purposes, make the Meech Lake Accord null and void, but on the other hand, I am going to vote for the Meech Lake Accord. He says: It is your Government's fault and your Prime Minister's fault if Quebec enters the Federation. We want it to enter Confederation, but it will be your fault if it does. That takes some doing, Mr. Speaker. I think he managed to criticize just about everyone except, of course, you yourself, Mr. Speaker. He did not criticize Robert Bourassa, but he will later on because he mentionned free trade. Mr. Bourassa supports free trade, and the Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart) is against free trade. Since our Government's position is that of Mr. Bourassa, who has praised our Prime Minister's position, the Hon. Member will have a chance to criticize him later on.

Personally, I would like to remind the Hon. Member of a few historical facts. He feels Mr. Bourassa has a great deal of merit. I can't say I disagree. In fact, I think he has quite considerable merit. Does the Hon. Member remember that during the 1984 election campaign . . . Funny, I remember a speech made in Sept-Îles by the then Leader of the Opposition, today the Prime Minister of Canada, in which it was made quite clear that bringing Quebec into the Constitution was part of our election platform. Funny, I remember a visit by the Hon. Member's present Leader or his tentative or interim Leader, a visit to Quebec in the riding of Rimouski, where he criticized people who voted yes in the referendum. He said they had no right to run for office. I did not hear any criticism from the Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart) at the time. And that is the team that today is going to vote yes, no and maybe on whatever issue is tabled. I would like him to respond, I have a few questions to ask him. First, does he support his Party's abstentions concerning the report of the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons—indeed the position of his Party until now with respect to the Meech Lake Accord is abstention. Unless I am mistaken you are now defending and representing the position of abstentions, probably those who are absent because you are also the people whose absence in Quebec right now is most obvious.

As a matter of fact, not only will 13 of your colleagues not endorse the Party position, which is to abstain, because that is the official position, but now they will vote against, 13 out of 40, yet he refers to the fact that we have two in our Party, two out of 200, including one who also comes from northern Canada and who, for the same reason as the present Member for Yukon, has chosen to vote against the Meech Lake Accord. So I am curious to know whether he too is abstaining. I am also curious to know whether, during the next election campaign, he intends to advocate the Meech Lake Accord amendments now proposed by his Party and which will obviously be defeated. So the Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie should tell us right now, yes or no, if he intends to be, if he can be frank during the next election campaign. His answer will now give us an idea of his frankness. If he does not respond we will know exactly where he stands, particularly if his answer is evasive. Yes or no, during the next election campaign will the Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie speak in favour of the Meech Lake Accord amendments he is proposing today?

Mr. Malépart: Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the Minister of State (Youth) (Mr. Charest) has reminded me about the promises of his leader during the electoral campaign. He lied to the population and misled senior citizens and families. All the parties said about the commitment to a Constitutional Accord that Quebec had to rejoin the constitutional family. Have you ever heard a Canadian stupid enough to say that he did not want Quebec in the Constitution, except for the Hon. Member for Sherbrooke? Mr. Speaker, this clearly shows his stupidity. The Prime Minister lied to the population during the electoral campaign. Senior citizens have said so. Moreover, 71 p. cent of the population disagree with him.

Mrs. Mailly: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Gatineau (Mrs. Mailly) on a point of order.

Mrs. Mailly: I think that it is obvious, Mr. Speaker. I am asking myself certain questions. The Hon. Member speaks about liars and so on. He did not reply to the question. He acccuses everyone of lying, including the Prime Minister. I therefore ask for your guidance, Mr. Speaker. Is it proper in this House to use such language in a debate of this importance on the Constitution and the rights of Quebec?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is not unparliamentary language. I do not believe that the Hon. Member for Montréal—Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart) meant that the Prime Minister had lied deliberately. I shall therefore give him the benefit of the doubt. The Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie.

Mr. Malépart: Mr. Speaker, can the Hon. Member who just rose on a question of privilege deny that her Prime Minister had said he would restore full indexation of Old Age Security pensions? Did the Prime Minister not say that during the election campaign? Is it not true that he did just the opposite? I answered the Minister of State for Youth regarding the commitment made during the campaign. All parties said that. The Liberal and Conservative Leaders expressed their views in Ontario; the NDP never said that they were against Quebec signing the Constitution. As to his second question about who worked to bring Quebec in the Canadian fold: it is Robert Bourassa. Who should we congratulate? The Premiers of the other provinces who understood Quebec when the time came. Regarding the amendments, could the Minister of State for Youth who is about to speak tell us who protected the cultural communities and what he has against his colleague for Dollard des Ormeaux? Why is he against protection for the Italians in the Constitution? Why is he against protection for the natives?

I campaigned for protection of cultural communities in Canada. I campaigned for protection of native rights. But you, who are the Minister of State for Youth, you are against natives, you are against cultural communities. Ask your colleague for Dollard (Mr. Weiner) whether he shares your views, whether or not he thinks they should be protected by the Constitution?

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker, it might be important to immediately recognize that the Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart) has probably lost his self-control and is quite ready to cast aspersions on all Members of this House, as he does regarding his colleagues in his own Party when he calls them anti-Quebecers. The Hon. Member for Saint-Henri—Westmount (Mr. Johnston) has been called a "Westmount Rhodesian" by the Hon. Member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet). A Member of his own Party has accused the Hon. Member of behaving like a saleslady from Eaton's. The Hon. Members of his own Party that they behave like Montreal "manglophones" of the 19th century.

To place things in perspective, I think no one will take very seriously the accusations brought against me because, in the final analysis, the Hon. Member had accusations to make against everybody. But if you want to be honest, you ought to say, as well namely to Mr. Bourassa for whom you seem to have great respect, that during the next elections, according to what your leader has publicly admitted on television, you intend to campaign against the Meech Lake Accord. During the next election campaign, you had better go and tell exactly that to Quebecers, to French-speaking Quebecers, because if you do not, there is one thing you can count on us, to let them know.

Mr. Malépart: Mr. Speaker, during the next negotiations on matters like the Senate reform and multiculturalism protection, phase II would destroy the Meech Lake Accord, just like the Meech Lake Accord destroyed what had been achieved in the 1982 Accord. Wake up, Mr. Minister, you are going the wrong way! There will always be constitutional negotiations. We must now proceed to the reform of institutions like the Senate. Your Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) said that he wanted to change the Senate. So, if in the next election campaign, he does not take position for Senate reform, it will prove that he misled the people of Canada. If protection of multiculturalism and sharing of jurisdictions between the federal and the provinces are not issues dealt with in the next election campaign, it will mean that the process has been stopped. But Canada will still be there, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Minister of State (Youth) (Mr. Charest) on a point of order.

Mr. Charest: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think that had the member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie made an effort and read the Meech Lake Accord, he would know that the Senate reform is on the agenda of each and every constitutional conference in the years to come. I would add for his guidance that if he read the Accord he could spare us this completely useless argumentation. Just stick to real questions.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie (M. Malépart) on a point of order.

Mr. Malépart: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Does this mean that your party only wants to discuss Senate reform and refuses to protect the Canadian cultural communities? If the Hon. Member wants to run on that issue in Dollard, I am game. If he wants to come to the western part of Montreal, and tell the people in Saint-Léonard that his party never wants to go back to the bargaining table to protect cultural communities, to protect native people, it's his privilege, Mr. Speaker, not mine. As far as we are concerned, the Constitution remains a permanent concern.

I must also tell the Minister of State (Youth) that the Constitution is like a huge collective agreement. Year after year to meet the needs people will make changes to the Constitution with a view of improving it.

As to the protection of native people, even the Pope when he came here, asked the Canadian people to protect our aboriginal people and be generous towards them. Now the Minister of State (Youth) says no to this request made by the Pope. The people of Sherbrooke will remember.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Since there are two points of order, I shall entertain another question from the Hon. Member for Yorkton—Melville (M. Nystrom). Afterwards, debate will resume with the Hon. Member for Windsor—Walkerville (Mr. McCurdy).

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for giving me the opportunity to ask a question. As an informed member I agree with the distinct society clause for Quebec and I have signed the special committee's report, and so on.

Something else I want to mention is the fact the province of Saskatchewan was the first English-speaking province to adopt the resolution, and I am proud of that.

Some Hon. Members: Hear! Hear!

Mrs. Mailly: The Conservatives.

Mr. Nystrom: Not only the Conservatives. Three parties we represented in the Saskatchewan legislative assembly and except for three members, everyone supported the resolution, including the Liberal member Mr. Ralph Goodale and the NDP opposition. However, I have a serious question for the Hon. Member. If the Liberal amendments in the name of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner) were accepted, I am afraid this would be the end of the Meech Lake Accord because I think that many amendments are not go conducive to a distinct society and duality, as they talk about the supremacy of the Charter of Rights and so on.

I would like to know if the Hon. Member is in favour of the amendments of his Party; does he think that the package of amendments of his Party will in fact mean the end of the Lake Meech Accord, if they were accepted in this House?

Mr. Malépart: No, Mr. Speaker. If the proposed amendments are accepted by Mr. Robert Bourassa, I am convinced there will be no change because I know that at the negotiation table, Mr. Bourassa will protect Quebecers very well. Are the Hon. members . . . When we added something in 1982 to protect women, it did not harm the Accord; can the Hon. Member tell me whether or not it would jeopardize the concept of distinct society if we added something to protect native people, and if the provincial First Ministers agreed? I do not think this is what he means. If the Hon. Member tells me that if he provinces accepted the recommendation of the Leader to add to the Charter the protection for cultural communities, this would not be an impediment. I do not think that Mr. Robert Bourassa of Quebec would oppose vigourously protection for cultural communities, because he is one of those who protect cultural communities in Quebec, which the Prime Minister of Canada does not do.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate with the Hon. Member for Windsor—Walkerville (Mr. McCurdy).

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, that exchange occurred rather abruptly, and caught me just momentarily off guard.

I think it is important that the debate on the Meech Lake Accord occur on the highest plane. I must say that I hope that my contribution will shed rather more light than the heat that moments ago was being shed upon the debate.

I am not a historian and I am not a constitutional expert. But I do know this: It is not possible to have a perfect Constitution. It is no more possible to have a perfect Constitution than it is to have a country that does not experience evolution in terms of its sociological, political and demographic characteristics. Constitutions must reflect that. They cannot be perfect. The Accord that we debate today and the Constitution that it seeks to amend are not perfect. Both are deficient. But both must be judged on what they intend to accomplish.

The Accord must be judged on what it is supposed to do and what in fact it does. The Constitution must be judged, in its newly amended form, on whether or not it reflects the Canada of now, and whether it is capable of reflecting the evolution of Canada as it will be.

First, I will address the Accord, what it intends to accomplish, whether it in fact accomplishes its purpose, and I will consider in what respects it is flawed. Most particularly, after looking at whether it indeed fulfils its role, I will consider what message it sends out to the people of this country. It will be my suggestion that no matter whether the Accord fulfils what it intends to fulfil or not, the Constitution that it amends remains as a consequence flawed and the message that it sends to one-third of the people of this country is seriously flawed.

It is perhaps, I think, appropriate that I review what it is in my experience that shapes my view of this country. I was born in London, Ontario, and initially I was brought up there. At that time the vision that I had of Canada was entirely English; indeed, it was imperial. I sang "Rule Britannia", celebrating the empire that subjugated my own people in other lands, while at the same time not treated as an equal in my own land.

Subsequently I moved to Amherstburg, Ontario, next to the American border. As a consequence of that, the view of Canada that I learned in London became somewhat deluded and rather more coloured by our proximity to the United States. Increasingly, I was not very conscious of the differences that existed between Canada and our close-by neighbour.

It is during my first visit in Quebec that I recognized that this country is different. It is during my first visit that I felt I was equal in my own country.

[English]

Let me repeat that, because however I may value the two languages of this country, I sometimes speak in a fashion that devalues French.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa—Carleton): You are doing fine, Howard.

Mr. McCurdy: Let me make it perfectly clear what I am saying. During my first visit to the Province of Quebec I realized there was something different and unique about this country. In my experience at that time, what was different about this country was the French fact. It was in Quebec that for the first time in my own country that I was treated as an equal. From that point my notion of this country began to evolve into what it is now. Since that time this country has changed; it has changed so much that I stand in this Chamber.

In the debate on the Meech Lake Accord there has been some discussion of the place of the aboriginal peoples. Perhaps we can communicate what it was like to be a black Canadian at that time in Amherstburg. Some Hon. Members will know that there was a great deal of intermarriage between the black population and the Indian population. Many of the black community were eligible to have Indian papers. No matter how bad the situation of aboriginal peoples was at that time, and no matter how bad conditions remain for aboriginal peoples, in the Canada of my childhood it was better to be an Indian than a black.

I love this country. I have loved this country, as many have within it, as a result of a test of that love. In some measure, our faith has been fulfilled. I have come to a greater understanding of it. Canada is not Canada without Quebec. There can be no doubt about that. That is not to say that other portions of Canada are indispensable. But clearly Canada is unique in large measure because of its unique history and the existence of two cultures and two languages as the basis for its ultimate origin.

In 1980 when the referendum issue arose in Quebec, like other Canadians I met it with some fear, consternation, and puzzlement. Would our country be divided as a result? Like many in the country, I celebrated the outcome. During that debate certain promises were made, and certain assurances were provided to meet the concerns of Quebec and make Canada whole.

In 1982 we had the Constitution Act of that year. Essentially two things were accomplished, the patriation of the Constitution and the Charter of Rights. But Quebec was left out of it. Perhaps the time was not right, perhaps we had achieved the level of evolution appropriate only to what was actually accomplished in 1982. Changes occur when history makes change possible. That Charter of Rights was extremely important. There are those who even now have great concern about the relationship of the Charter of Rights to the powers of Parliament and the legislatures.

I can recall having been engaged with a colleague of mine in government in another province over the question of the view held by many that Parliament is supreme and should remain supreme, and the view which I advocated that there was a necessity for a Charter of Rights. Parliament as the supreme governing body, unimpeded by Charters of Rights, are appropriate to countries with homogeneous populations ruled by a majority. In Canada in part that fact was recognized in the distribution of powers between the Province of Quebec and the peculiar and necessary concessions made in recognition of the character of that province. But now this country has become increasingly diverse. By virtue of the will of the majority, Parliament cannot protect the minorities that are unable by their numbers to elect majorities in Parliament.

Of course, a classic example is in the United States where, if the black people of that country had waited until Congress had eliminated segregation, segregation would exist in the United States until this day. It was only because there existed a constitution, which was ultimately interpreted by the courts, that led to the elimination of segregation there. That is the lesson of history of the need for the protection of the rights of minorities which can only be provided by a Charter of Rights, as we have in the Constitution, although, it will be my submission that the Charter is inadequate.

While the 1982 Constitution Act was necessary, it was inadequate. It excluded Quebec, not legally, because it is bound by the Constitution as adopted then, but in terms of its spiritual participation and the extent to which the allegiance of the people of Quebec is won to it.

As time has passed and Governments have changed, Quebec imposed five conditions in order to join the constitutional compact. I am sure we all know what those are. The recognition of Quebec as a distinct society, a greater role in immigration, a provincial role in the appointments to the Supreme Court, limitations on federal spending power, and a veto for Quebec in constitutional matters.

The Meech Lake Accord must be looked at both in terms of process and results. There can be no doubt that the process was flawed. Never again should 11 First Ministers and their associate bureaucrats engage in this kind of process. The future must ensure that there will be full participation of Canadian citizens in any future constitutional change, so that it is fully reviewed and full support across the country is won.

Let us look at what has happened as a result of the Meech Lake Accord. There is a great deal of concern about what is perceived as a decentralizing thrust of the Meech Lake Accord, that increasing power is being accorded to the provinces. It must be said that one problem with the country is that it has been too centralized in too many respects. The land is vast and its people are diverse. In order for people to feel that they are a part of this vast land, they cannot be subject to the rule that all decisions must emanate from the centre of the country. If they are, the regions at the periphery will never feel a part and will lack control and if they lack control, they will feel alienated as persons and as regions.

The Meech Lake Accord and the constitutional changes which it advocates propose that there should be consultations on appointments to the Senate. This has been much criticized as according provincial control over the Senate, but the Meech Lake Accord says that there must be agreement between the federal level and the provincial level and that there should be consultation. What could be more appropriate? It does not suggest that only the provinces shall appoint or that they will overrule the federal Government.

In respect of the Supreme Court, similar conditions are imposed. We recognize that similar conditions are involved in the appointment of members of the Supreme Court of the United States which have not resulted in a situation of paralysis. It ought to be possible for people of reasonable mind to agree on such relatively simple matters as who are appropriate for the Senate and who are appropriate for the Supreme Court.

The Accord also accords the provinces an increased involvement in immigration. There are some concerns in this regard, but I think they are largely met by the requirement that these agreements must be enacted in law by the Parliament of Canada and that these agreements are ruled by the Charter of Rights.

Further, there has been a great deal of concern over spending power. There is a provision in the Accord that if the federal Government enacts legislation in an exclusively provincial jurisdiction, the provinces will have the option of opting out or having funds provided to them so long as the programs enacted are consistent with national objectives. I would interpret that as a step forward because we are talking about provincial jurisdiction. For the first time a recognition of the right of the federal Government to be involved under certain conditions in areas of provincial concern is being inserted in the Constitution. Those who fear that we will be unable to have day care and so on should be assured.

Of course there are problems with the amending formula. Surely it is clear that the amending formula, as it provides for unanimity among First Ministers and all Governments in respect of the recognition of new provinces from the territories and in respect of the changes in the Senate, imposes an unnecessary rigidity on the Constitution. I would suggest that the Accord be amended in respect of the application of the amending formula to the admission of new provinces, because it is an insult to the North and deprives the North of rights which it should share with the rest of Canadians.

While the Senate may remain unchanged, at best it will become even more irrelevant, and its very irrelevancy may compel various Governments to propose changes in a unanimous fashion to make it more in accord with a democracy.

Of course the core of the Accord is the recognition of the distinctive character of Quebec and the dual linguistic character of Canada. This is where the trouble begins. There are considerable doubts about the impact on the Charter of Rights. Among these rights are the rights of sexual equality.

I would plead for time to say a few more words, because I think it is important that I have the opportunity to do so.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that the Hon. Member have a few more minutes within which to complete his speech?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, there has been a great deal of concern about the recognition of two singular aspects of Quebec society—the recognition of the responsibility of the Government of Quebec both to preserve and to promote the French language, and the recognition of the responsibility of Parliament to preserve the French character and French minority outside Quebec. They are important but they raise considerable fears. Among them are the fears of women that sexual equality will be compromised, particularly with specific reference in the non-abrogation clause to aboriginal peoples and to the multicultural nature of the country.

I do not believe that sexual equality rights are abrogated or affected in any significant way, nor do I believe that there is any material change of the rights of minorities as a result of the distinctive character clause. Nothing has changed—nothing has been made better; nothing has been made worse.

It must be said, in respect of the real character of the country, that the failure to make firm provision for providing self-government to the aboriginal people is a serious oversight that must be corrected.

The main concern which must be addressed is not what the Accord does now but what must be done in the future. Earlier I talked about the message, the message in the Accord to a third of the population—the blacks, the Ukrainians, the Poles, the Italians, the Chinese, the Pakistanis, the Czechoslovakians, and the variety of other people who compose my riding—that they are not really an inherent part of the country. There is still the recognition inherent in all that has happened that there is some primacy to the two founding people. As long as that message is maintained, the country cannot be whole. As long as it is not recognized that the multicultural character of the country is as fundamental as anything else, the country cannot be whole. As long as the rights of the minorities guaranteed in Section 15 of the Charter of Rights are subject to an override, to the whim of Governments, it is in complete contradiction to the function of the Charter. It cannot be accepted as long as it exists because it implies that those of us who are neither English nor French are not really a part. Just as there was unfinished business after 1982, there is unfinished business now. It is unacceptable to me and all others, whether of French or English extraction, that we should in any way be considered as second class citizens.

You can say that Quebec was a part of the Constitution even after 1982 just as you can say that the minorities are part of the Constitution after 1987. However, just as the Constitution of 1982 was over the heads of the people of Quebec, an accord that recognizes Quebec as it has to, as it must, and as we approve of it, leaves unanswered the pleadings of the third portion of this country. The first priority must be to ensure that just as Quebec was welcomed into the Constitution so should those of us who are neither French nor English be welcomed into the Constitution.

Hon. Jean Charest (Minister of State (Youth)): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I must admit that not so long ago, in fact it was three years ago, not many of us expected to have the opportunity and the privilege to debate a motion in the House of Commons that for all practical purposes would bring Quebec within the Canadian constitutional fold. In 1984, we campaigned on this issue, and our statements and our commitment were realistic and sincere. We must also realize it was an enormous task, to which our Government and the ten other Governments across Canada would have to bring the political will to take action and to deal with a problem that was an extremely important one for this country. From the outset, we see both the importance and the delicate nature of this commitment, if only because of the number of governments involved in the process. We therefore had every reason to believe and to hope that someday we would be able to debate a resolution in this House whose ultimate effect would be to bring Quebec into the Constitution. However, as so many other Canadians today, I admit I am somewhat surprised to be standing here before you.

I would like to take a few moments, Mr. Speaker, to recall the historical context that brings us before the House today. Without going back too far, I think we can, at least, with a degree of nostalgia for some, go back to the 1980 Referendum, when Quebec, after several years of debate, finally made its decision to keep the province within the Canadian federation. Mr. Speaker, you will recall the various statements made during the 1980 Referendum, including statements made by the then Prime Minister of Canada, who told Quebecers: We Canadians from all over Canada want you in Canada. If you vote no, you will be saying yes to Canada. It will be a solemn affirmation of the fact that you intend to remain within Canada, and we Canadians promise to help you remain within our Canadian federation.

We then had the 1981 negotiations, Mr. Speaker, followed by unilateral patriation in 1982.

We also recall the sad period when the Quebec National Assembly, including the provincial Liberals led at the time by Mr. Ryan, the same provincial Liberals who are now led by Mr. Bourassa, unanimously adopted a resolution denouncing the 1982 repatriation of our Constitution, which they described as a reprehensible action, an act of betrayal against Quebec, while the Premiers of certain provinces, with the support of the federal Liberals, had decided to ignore the wishes of Quebec and everything they had said during the 1980 referendum to repatriate the Constitution unilaterally.

The 1984 elections were a turning point for Canada in many ways, but for the purposes of today's debate, Mr. Speaker, let me simply remind the House that the then Leader of the Official Opposition, the Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada, made his famous speech in Sept-Iles and said: As a Government, if we are elected, we shall make every effort to have Quebec join the Constitution and to bring about unity and reconciliation in the country.

At the same time, we had the sad spectacle of the Leader of the Opposition, who was then Prime Minister and newly chosen Leader of the Liberal Party of Canada, campaigning in Quebec and denouncing those who had voted "yes" in the referendum, apparently because such people did not have or should not have the same rights as those who had voted "no", and saying that such people should not be candidates in a general election and should perhaps not even vote.

Such was the argument used by the federal Liberals in 1984. Strangely enough, some of the federal Liberals rose today, some to speak for, and others to speak against the Meech Lake Accord. However, in no case has anyone said that he stood up for the interests of Quebec in 1984.

In any case perhaps it was not necessary because Quebecers did come to grips with the situation. They decided they would settle the issue themselves at the appropriate level. In 1984 they said: We will make a clean-up. They may not have understood, but we sure did and we will turf them out. We will vote for people who for once can appreciate the legitimate aspirations of Quebec, so today, as a result of all those efforts, we have the honour and privilege to be here in the House.

There have been major changes after the 1984 election. First, as Hon. Members may recall—and some may have forgotten—in the months after the 1984 election even the PQ Government led by Premier Lévesque presented a series of demands as being the minimum demands of Quebec before it would join the Canadian federation.

Then there was a government change and this time the Government of Mr. Bourassa came to us with five demands, at least five demands prior to endorsing the Canadian Constitution. First the recognition of Quebec as a distinct society and, second, a limit on federal spending powers. There was also more power or more influence for the Quebec Government with respect to the appointment of Supreme Court of Canada judges. An increased and more important power. And recognition of Quebec's real power concerning immigration. There was also the question of veto.

Mr. Speaker, I confess that at the time I think we were all surprised to see that Quebec had cut down the number—from 20-odd demands the first time under the PQ Government—to a minimum of five, and we felt that was evidence of courage and frankness on the part of the Quebec Government which was saying: Well, here is our position. We will not give ourselves too much leeway to negotiate. But if you are sincere, and we think you are, we too will be sincere, we will be frank, set our minimum demands and begin the negotiations.

Meanwhile, Mr. Speaker, Canadians saw some spectacular about-turns. On the political scene, I think everybody was amused, but first we were quite puzzled to see the sudden reversals within two major political Opposition Parties in Canada.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, the unusual sight of the Liberal Members from Quebec gathered for a convention, I think, in Saint-Hyacinthe with Serge Joyal, André Ouellet, Mr. Garneau all finally seeing the light after having rejected Quebecers for 20 years, suddenly feeling somewhat like a charismatic event in Saint-Hyacinthe, and finally understanding that Quebec had legitimate yearnings and that the necessary efforts had to be made to have them join the Canadian federation. Then Mr. Joyal and the whole group finally woke up and opened their arms to Quebec and said to the federal Government: "Those minimum conditions must be met." For our part anyway, we wondered for a long time what had happened, if there had been a special event or some kind of miracle in Saint-Hyacinthe during that weekend. We have to admit that fundamentally after short reflection, we thought there was some lack of credibility, an incredible about-turn in such a short time. Actually, are we going to complain today? I do not think so. At that time anyhow, we were not going to complain but we said: "They have finally understood,it took them 20 years, but they have finally understood and they will try to have Quebec join the Canadian federation so that the country may begin to build together instead of tearing one another to pieces and trying to reign by dividing. Afterwards as is often the case, the New Democratic Party held its own general convention in Montreal and Mr. Howard Pawley who is the Manitoba Premier was there. As a parody, they had square dances throughout the weekend and discovered they had deep roots in Quebec. They also said to themselves: "We have to be open to Quebec." It was a turn-about just as dramatic as that of the federal Liberal Party except that in their case, they were not in government but in the opposition. They also suddenly discovered the legitimate yearnings of Quebec 20 years after sharing the views of the federal Liberal Party.

Again, Mr. Speaker, we were not going to complain about that as a Party, as a Government. After all we were the ones in 1984 who made that commitment, not them—not Mr. Broadbent, nor Mr. Turner because he had done the opposite in 1984. At that point in their history, they came to join us, they acknowledged, they told us: You were right in 1984, you were right in stating what you stated, Canadian voters recognized it, and because we are reasonable people, we also will recognize the wisdom of Canadian voters.

An Hon. Member: Brian Mulroney's leadership!

Mr. Charest: Yes, Mr. Mulroney's leadership actually which made sure we got there at that point. So the Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart) and everyone joined the group. Interestingly, as I am trying to remember, the Hon. Member for Saint-Henri—Westmount (Mr. Johnston) had said nothing up to that point. Quite intriguing anyway. They said nothing then. It was perfect solidarity, plain love, everyone was agreeing. Perhaps they were hoping. You will see that one of these days both groups will play tricks on each other, and they will set out on great missions.

Finally, there is another event which we must recall, that is the meeting of the provincial Premiers in August 1986—if I am not mistaken because I do not have the exact dates—the meeting in Edmonton, Alberta, where I recall the formula for the Senate and Senate representation were discussed. That was a turning point in the negotiations and the evolution of the constitutional matter for the following reason: First, Mr. Bourassa and the Prime Minister had agreed on the following. They had agreed that they should contact provincial Premiers and settle a couple of things. First, they would tell them: Look, the next round of negotiations should concentrate on the following matter, the following theme: Quebec's acceptance of the Constitution. This is what the Prime Minister and Mr. Bourassa at the time told the provincial Premiers. They told them: Look, let us try to concentrate on that matter for the time being, otherwise we will never reach any agreement. Never!

Also, the Quebec Premier, who was playing an important game, told them this: Here are the five conditions which we propose for adhering to the Canadian Constitution. At this Conference of the provincial Premiers which was held in Edmonton, the provincial Premiers found that they could live with these five conditions. In other words, Mr. Speaker, on that historical date which, unfortunately, very few people appreciate, the provincial Premiers accepted for the first time to say: None of these conditions is so offensive to us that we could not, as provincial Premiers, negotiate on the basis of these five conditions. Well, I say: Bravo! That was a major step which was taken thanks to the efforts made by the Prime Minister of Canada and Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party (Mr. Mulroney) and those of Mr. Bourassa at the time.

There were then the historical Meech Lake meetings. I do not intend to deal at length with them, nor with the final meeting in the Langevin Block. Nevertheless, I should like to pause a few seconds to make an essential comment which I can summarize this way: As both a Quebecer and Canadian, I was quite surprised to hear the comments made by those who said: Constitutional negotiations should not be carried out with only the provincial Premiers and the Prime Minister of Canada holed up in one room for eight or ten hours, until they reach an agreement. That is not the way it should be done. It should be done in the open, I do not know where. Perhaps these people felt that it should have taken place in a shopping center! We feel it should not have been done that way. Let us not expose ourselves to ridicule, Mr. Speaker. You know, Quebec has seen about sixty years of constitutional negotiations. What happened during the talks at Meech Lake and here across the street in the Langevin Building is certainly no big secret. I do not think any earth-shaking discoveries were made during those talks. After sixty years I think it was only normal to be able to sit down together for a few hours and finally reach an agreement.

I do not intend to waste much time refuting the arguments of those people, but I merely want to say their line of reasoning is ridiculous, and that personally, I think it is all rather ridiculous and redundant.

The result of the two meetings was a unanimous accord signed by the ten provincial First Ministers and the Prime Minister of Canada. That they were able to do so unanimously was a historic event. The Accord recognized the fact that Quebec is a distinct society, and that is not to everyone's liking. Today there are still people who have trouble with this concept. We on this side of the House do not think anything new was added, aside from official recognition. Mr. Speaker, it is a fact, and everybody recognizes it, that Quebec is a distinct society. Is anyone going to deny that today? Quebec has been a distinct society from its earliest days. One obvious example is that Quebec has a civil code. It is governed by a civil code, based on the Napoleonic Code, unlike all other Canadian provinces which are governed by common law, an entirely different legal principle. Everybody knows that. And what is the Civil Code and what is Common Law? It is the social fabric. It is part of the social fabric. These are rules which govern relations between individuals within a given society. The fact that Quebec has had a civil code based on the Napoleonic Code since it became a province, and ever since it existed as a territory, means ultimately that Quebec is a distinct society.

This fact has been recognized in the Meech Lake Accord. In addition, Quebec is a province where the majority of the population speaks french. However, this did not stop us, quite the opposite, from recognizing the linguistic duality of Canada and the fact, which is new, that each province should also recognize this linguistic duality.

The distinct society clause is an interpretation clause. It is a clause which, in case of any doubt, because when there is a doubt, this is interpreted as a principle of law, can be used to say that Constitution should be interpreted as recognizing Quebec as a distinct society, if ever the question is raised in that context. I do not think that we should go beyond what already existed. We have to be very careful in interpreting such a clause. Its effect is not to reduce existing powers, rights and privileges, and this is stated explicitely in the Meech Lake Accord and other sections of the Charter.

Mr. Speaker, other parts of the Meech Lake Accord also recognize the legitimate claims of Quebec as concerns the appointment of the members of the Superior Court and Senators. Once more, we have to put these matters in the proper perspective. For instance, as concerns the appointment of Senators, what had to be done was to put in a transitional clause which would take into account the political will of the provinces and the federal Government to reform the Canadian Senate. This is what had to be done. I know that some people object to the provinces having a say in the appointment of Senators. However, there is also a provision to have this matter discussed between the premiers and the Prime Minister of Canada at their annual meetings. This transitional clause forces everyone involved, and especially the federal Government, to be open to a major and very needed change as concerns the Senate.

The federal power to spend is probably the issue which distinguishes us most from certain other groups. What was done basically, Mr. Speaker, was to recognize that we have a constitutional agreement and that, at any given moment, the federal Government can sit down with the provinces and say: You will deal with such and such a thing, and we, the federal Government, will deal with such and such areas of jurisdiction. The only thing that was done as concerns the power to spend was to civilize these relations. I never understood why some people would object to the fact that, after agreeing with the provinces and telling them that certain matters would come under their jurisdiction, the federal Government would no longer be able to invade brutally that area of jurisdiction and take it away from the provinces. Yet, some people really object to that. In addition to that, it was not enough, five conditions were imposed for opting out. Here are the five conditions: First, the federal program must apply on a national basis, not only at the regional level. Second, if ever a province wants to opt out, it must also be a shared cost program, that is a program which requires the financial participation of the provinces. Third, it must not be a program which already exists. Fourth, the federal program must relate to a sector which falls under exclusive provincial jurisdiction. Fifth, the province must set up a program or take an initiative whose aims are compatible with the national objectives of the federal program. Well, Mr. Speaker, if some people are offended because we have to respect the Canadian Constitution, I simply cannot understand because, in the end, it is nothing more than that.

My remarks about immigration will not be long, for in fact we are only acknowledging what was already included in the Constitution since 1867 on the first hand and, on the other, an agreement with the provinces which has been there all along for 16 years already, among others the Cullen-Couture agreement with the Province of Quebec, in force since 1977, I believe. The amendment formula, admittedly difficult particularly for certain territories, is compatible with the way a federation must operate, and it can always be reviewed by future constitutional conferences.

The implications of the Meech Lake Accord are that Canada, the federal Government along with the provinces will have to look at the following issues: the Senate, the fisheries, for instance, the Natives who today, by the way, are left out of the Constitution because they did not get the self-government they were asking for, and since we must tell the truth at some point, that was because indeed Quebec refused to take an active part in federal-provincial conferences.

If the whole truth is to be told, Mr. Speaker, today is the day. That is the reason why our native people did not get what they wanted at that point.

I know that my time is running out, Mr. Speaker, I only need a few minutes and I would ask the House for leave to use a few extra minutes in other to conclude my comments.

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Charest: In conclusion, I would like simply to comment on the way this debate has taken place. I am referring for instance to my friends from the Liberal Party of Canada, and it is my view that they will have to make up their minds today and in the coming days, yes, they will have to decide what kind of country they want exactly. Because, all in all, that is the question.

For us those debates are not easy ones. No one would claim this is an easy debate. I am sitting here on this side of the House with 200 other Members, and for us in our party, those were not always easy matters. We will be frank, since this is the time to be frank.

Moreover, I know that in the New Democratic Party it has not always been an easy debate either. But in politics, there are things that are acceptable and others that are not. I will tell you one thing that is not acceptable, and that is refusing to take a position. Mr. Speaker, we were elected to make decisions, good or bad, and we must take positions. And each one of us has a basic obligation to the Canadian voters at large and to our own constituents. It is an obligation to speak out and say, as elected representatives, on which side of the fence we stand. If you vote for me, I will do this or that, or I will certainly not do this or that. That is the minimum obligation for all politicians whatever their political stripes. Mr. Speaker, there is nothing so cowardly for a political party or a Leader to say: I abstain. That is acting cowardly indeed. And the most glaring act of cowardice I have ever witnessed since I became involved in politics was the behaviour of the Federal Liberal Party of Canada within the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons when it declared itself in favour of abstaining. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, it would be difficult to forgive a political party for behaving in such a reprehensible way.

As you know, it is possible to make mistakes. But for a political party to say that it is abstaining for reasons of expediency is outright unacceptable.

Moreover, they said: We are going to move amendments the effect of which will be to cancel the Meech Lake Accord; then we will vote in favour of the Meech Lake Accord. Then, they turn around and say that, when the time comes for the next federal election, their party platform will include the amendments they are suggesting today, the effect of which would be to cancel the Meech Lake Accord. Well, we will see. That is what you are saying. I should like to see the Members of the Liberal Party of Canada generally, and especially those from Quebec, stand up and confess that openly, as their Leader did on The Journal television program. Because that is exactly what he said!

Well, you had an opportunity to declare yourself in favour of Quebec joining Confederation and you let it pass. Now, Mr. Speaker, we will be able to see who are those among that party who will have the individual fortitude to stand up for Quebec and Canada!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will give the Hon. Member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson) 30 seconds and the same to the Minister. Debate must end at two o'clock.

Miss Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I was rising in debate, not to ask a question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being two o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

Mr. Cassidy: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. When I agreed to the extension requested by the Minister, I did not realize my colleague from St. John's East had been seeking to make a short comment on his speech. Perhaps the House would agree to that before we call it two o'clock.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

PARLIAMENT HILL

PROPOSED ERECTION OF STATUE OF QUEEN ELIZABETH II

Mr. Bill Tupper (Nepean—Carleton) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of commissioning the structure of a statue of Her Majesty, Queen Elizabeth II, to be placed on Parliament Hill in commemoration of the thirty-fifth anniversary of Her ascension to the Throne.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted this afternoon to rise in the House and speak in support of the motion. I hope that in the time available to me I will be able to persuade you and my colleagues on the merit of this motion.

Before attempting to make the case for the motion before us, I want to express my appreciation for advice, encouragement and material which I have received from William A. Smy, a constituent in Nepean—Carleton, from Albert Bousfield, editor of Monarchy Canada, the Monarchist League of Canada, the Royal Canadian Legion, the United Empire Loyalists, the endorsement of a very significant number of municipalities and the encouragement of many members of this and the other place who have written to me in support of this motion. I welcome that. I acknowledge that I incorporate many of their comments into my presentation this afternoon.

In particular, I welcome the support of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. McInnes) who has indicated that Members might wish to consider marking this event. He stated in a letter which he sent to a fellow Cabinet colleague on July 24, 1987: "Support for this initiative is welcomed."

Some Members might have a question about the protocol of raising a statue to a living monarch. This is dealt with rather explicitly in the report on commemorative statutes to Canadian Prime Ministers and other commemoratives to other eminent Canadians, issued by the Minister of Public Works to Parliament. Section 6 of that report, entitled "The Monarchy", states:

> 1992 will mark the 40th Anniversary of Her Majesty's reign. No other monarch has served as long since the country came into being in 1867. The practice of raising commemoratives only to deceased people has not applied to monarchs. Hon. Members might wish to consider marking this event.

Canadians have a special attachment to the monarchy and especially to Queen Elizabeth II. No monarch since Victoria has engendered such respect and affection, and very special bonds have developed and exist between Elizabeth II and Canadians. It is because of this remarkably special relationship that I hope I and others can persuade the House on the merits of the motion under consideration.

On February 6, 1952, Elizabeth II became sovereign. One year later, this House, through the Canadian Royal Style and Titles Act, named Elizabeth II as Queen of Canada. Her proper title now is "Elizabeth II, by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom, Canada and her other realms and territories, Queen, Head of the Commonwealth and Defender of the Faith".

The Queen's main occupation and the one for which she was rigorously trained, is to be constitutional head of state for Britain, Canada and 16 other countries. On April 31, 1985, the Queen became the monarch who has reigned longest over Canada since Confederation.

Queen Elizabeth II has been enormously successful as an institution of government and as a working official. Our system of government, put in place in 1867, and involving the monarch as head of state, together with the House of Commons and the Senate, is one of the most stable, most democratic and least costly in political history. And it works.

Elizabeth II has a reputation among senior statesmen as one of the best informed and most sensible public servants at that level in the world. Many regard her as the most effective statesman of our time in Europe.

Elizabeth II is a very charming person, who inspires affection along with respect. Why has she been so successful? Why do Canadians and others have so much respect for her? What has she done to earn that respect?

One of the principal reasons for her popularity and the respect people have for her is because her interests reflect those of her subjects. She is an acknowledged expert on art, history, politics, and on animals, particularly horses. Before attending a conference, or visiting a country, she studies intensively the history and interests of those whom she will meet. She frequently invites people for luncheon meetings, including artists, scientists, and politicians, in order to discuss contemporary issues and their work.

The Queen has fostered the growth of Canadianism. By assuming the separate title "Queen of Canada" in 1953, she allowed Canadians to realize the dream the Fathers of Confederation had for the Dominion of Canada. In 1962, at her own initiative and wish, she adopted a distinctive personal Canadian flag. In 1965 she proclaimed the national flag of Canada. In 1967, the Order of Canada was established by her authority and with her personal approval. Her presence at the proclamation of the revised Constitution in 1982 turned the event from a politically controversial one into a national celebration.

The Queen has been a great unifier of a diverse Canada. Long before the Official Languages Act was thought of, the Queen spoke in both English and French in all parts of this country. I was particularly touched by a speech which she gave in the Province of Quebec during her visit to Canada at the time of the Olympics. I want to quote what she said:

> How Canada resolves her political and constitutional differences is her own affair; but how she resolves her linguistic and cultural problems matters to thoughtful people everywhere. The world, all too familiar with the tragic price of conflict between people of different race, language, religion and culture, can look to Canada for a better example, and for a renewal of the human spirit. It can look to her for a practical demonstration of how two strong communities can live together in peace, drawing from each other's strengths, respecting each other's differences.

Her 15 tours and stays in Canada were in 1951 as Princess, 1957, 1959, 1964, 1967, 1970, 1971, twice in 1973, 1976, 1977, 1978, 1982, 1983 and 1984, as well as four stop-overs. As a result of those visits she has brought hundreds of small Canadian communities and groups which ordinarily go unnoticed to national and often international attention.

As the personification of our history, she has presided over and endured the success of numerous Canadian anniversaries and national occasions. They include the centenary of the Confederation Conference in 1964, the centenary of Confederation in 1967, the provincial centenaries of Manitoba in 1970, British Columbia in 1971, and Prince Edward Island in 1973, and the bicentenaries of Ontario and New Brunswick in 1984. She opened the St. Lawrence Seaway in 1959 and the Montreal Olympics in 1976. In 1983, from Vancouver, she invited the people of the world to visit Expo 86. That was a proud moment. She opened Parliament in 1957, the first monarch to do so, and again in 1977. In 1967 she addressed both Houses.

The Queen's personal qualities have continued to inspire Canadians individually and nationally. This has been an immeasurable contribution to Canadian life over nearly 36 years. The Queen's example encourages many, many people to emulate her virtues in their own lives and in their work. Duty and service have been pre-eminent among her personal qualities. She has always put her country ahead of herself. Her constitutional behaviour has been impeccably correct. Because of this she has brought prestige and credibility to our system of government which, as democratic systems tend to do from time to time, commonly creak. She has been a stable person during a long voyage.

The Commander in Chief of the Canadian Forces is vested in the Queen, and her Majesty has performed three vital services for Canada in this area. First, the Queen has been the focus of loyalty for the Armed Forces, ensuring the military is an agent for and not a master of the state. Second, the Queen has brought proper attention to the forces as a link between them and the people. For instance, in 1984 her Majesty presented a guidon to the historic Queens York Rangers, the first American regiment, in a moving ceremony in Toronto. The Queen's presence drew 50,000 people to the event. These people, frankly, would not have otherwise paid tribute to and learned about that great Canadian regiment.

Finally, as Captain General or Colonel in Chief of the Royal Canadian Artillery, the Canadian Guards Regiment and numerous other regiments and branches, the Queen has always taken an active interest in the lives and concerns of the men and women responsible for defending this country.

As the fountain of all honour, the Queen has played a major role in bringing national and international attention to deserving Canadians. Throughout the 1970s and 1980s, the Queen approved the establishment of distinctly Canadian bravery and service distinctions. The Queen thus fostered and brought recognition to public and voluntary service in Canada, making Canada a better place in the process.

The Queen has fostered the genuine multicultural character of Canada. She herself is a living testimony to the value of multiculturalism. She herself has in her immediate or distant background nearly 30 different ethnic strains and she is the personification of what Canada is as a country.

Her visits to many different ethnic groups in Canada for festivities and celebrations have helped both to enhance the culture of these groups and to integrate them more fully into the Canadian context. Among the more memorable of such visits were those to the Acadians in Prince Edward Island in 1973, the Ukrainian-Canadians in 1978, the Chinese-Canadians in 1983 and the Italian-Canadians in 1984. The Queen's involvement in the 1984 Loyalists celebrations also had a multicultural dimension because the Loyalists of the 18th Century were white, Indian and black.

The Queen's contribution in this area of Canadian life is nowhere better seen than with the native peoples. In 1970 at The Pas Indian Reserve, she created an opportunity for the Indian people there to gain a public hearing for the injustice they feel they have suffered at the hands of the Government. In 1976 the Queen received a much publicized delegation of Alberta Indian Chiefs representing Treaty Area 6 and Treaty Area 7 at Buckingham Palace. Most moving of all was her 1970 visit to the Inuit at Resolute Village. "Thank you", she said to those too shy to approach her, "for being just the way you are". The Queen has seen genuine Canadian multiculturalism as a pattern for other countries.

Perhaps the Queen's greatest contribution has been to provide the Canadian Government with a human face, allowing Canadians to be truly a national family. No one can doubt her personal commitment to Canada and to its people. When she proclaimed the revised Constitution in 1982, she declared:

> There could be no better moment for me, as Queen of Canada, to declare again my unbounded confidence in the future of this wonderful country.

In short, the Queen has succeeded in raising the Canadian Monarchy to heights undreamed of by Queen Victoria.

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member for Ottawa Centre, I thought I should speak in this debate because, among other things, my constituency includes the precinct of Parliament Hill. I congratulate my colleague and neighbour, in political terms, the Hon. Member for Nepean—Carleton (Mr. Tupper), for his intervention and his advice to the House.

The motion calls for the Government to consider the advisability of commissioning a structure of a statue of Her Majesty, Queen Elizabeth II, to be placed somewhere on Parliament Hill. I would like to discuss, not to take issue with the comments made by the Hon. Member with respect to the Queen's accomplishments. I would give her credit now for having been prepared to speak out as boldly as she has with respect to the deplorable situation in Fiji, giving her support, for the Governor General, as the only constitutional authority in that country.

The parliamentary system we have is an unusual one. I know the Queen has in fact been very conscious of her responsibilities to the Commonwealth and I believe she has played a great role as a rallying force within the British Commonwealth, something that no one could really have anticipated developing the way it has over the course of the last 30 or 40 years.

When the Queen came to office in the early 1950s as a young woman, almost all of what is now the Commonwealth, apart from the old Dominions, were in colonies of the United Kingdom. Now we have a situation where that is completely reversed. There are only a handful of colonies left and, for the most part, these are all independent countries which find a common bond together in British institutions and in the Queen as the symbolic head of the Commonwealth.

The question is does this contribution justify making an exception and having the statue of someone who is alive commissioned now for placement on Parliament Hill? Our country acknowledges our membership in the Commonwealth, but acts as an independent country. In fact, the British link, although it has been fond and strong in the past, is diminishing. Do we in fact want to embark on a tradition that we should continually have statues of our Monarchs in various places on Parliament Hill?

We have a statue of Victoria just over to the west of the Chamber, and I think it is appropriate because Victoria is the Monarch who was in office at the time Canada achieved its independence. It may be that in a few years time, sometime in the next century, perhaps, it will be deemed appropriate to put a statue of Elizabeth on Parliament Hill, as she was the Monarch who was in power at the time Canada acquired its own Constitution and severed the last remaining legal link with Great Britain, given the fact that we appoint our own Governor General and we are otherwise independent. That is a possibility. But should we do this now? If we should do it now, on what basis should we make the decision?

I was concerned the other day when Conservative Members of the House discouraged or blocked the efforts of the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria) to have the Government erect a statue of Lester B. Pearson, a Prime Minister of this country, a Nobel Prize winner, an eminent under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, a man with a distinguished diplomatic and political career in Canada, around the precincts of Parliament Hill to accompany the statue of John Diefenbaker which is now sitting between the West Block and the Centre Block.

But the fact is that that is a kind of an ad hoc approach. The parliamentarians of the day may lean to have a Pearson one day or a Diefenbaker another day. They may lean to have an M. J. Coldwell or a J. S. Woodsworth as people who were eminent leaders of the New Democratic Party. But I am not sure if I am very happy with that creation of ad hocery. I suggest that it might make sense to think through exactly how we do this in order to ensure that Parliament Hill is not, on the one hand, overwhelmed with statuary and, on the other hand, that what statuary we put up here makes sense for an area which has enormous symbolic significance for Canadians from coast to coast.

I want to say that Parliament Hill is an historic and symbolic site for all Canadian men and women. That is why we must stop, Mr. Speaker. Instead of simply making ad hoc decisions on the statue issue, perhaps we could consider setting up a Parliament Hill Commission to decide such issues. I suggest that we should insist that no more than one or two statues are erected on the Hill every decade. I do not feel we should adopt a tradition whereby all Canadian Prime Ministers should be "commemorated" on Parliament Hill.

[English]

I would ask my colleague this, even though he is a good Conservative. Would he agree with me that if it is appropriate to have a statue of John Diefenbaker on Parliament Hill, do we also, after his death, and I do not wish it to come soon, anticipate having a statue erected of the present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark). If the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) only lasts one term in office, and it is a possibility, and if he then leads his Party to a devastating defeat, which is a possibility, would we then anticipate that there should nonetheless be a statue erected of the present Prime Minister, the Hon. Member for Manicouagan, because he did at one time lead the largest parliamentary majority in Canadian history? Again, I would have some doubts about that.

At what time will Canadians be able to reconcile their feelings about the man to come to the point of accepting the possibility of a statue of the former Prime Minister, Pierre Trudeau, that it might at some point live on Parliament Hill? I see some of my Conservative friends are chuntering a bit in expressing certain reservations.

In other words, these decisions are difficult to make. It is not good to make them while people are still alive. I think that we should have some more orderly way of making these decisions rather than making them on the kind of ad hoc basis that is being considered here.

I would also suggest that it may well be that other Canadians should be commemorated and not just people who are monarchs or people who are Prime Ministers. We have one or two examples of that already in different places on Parliament Hill, including the statue commissioned by Mackenzie King of the boy who is just outside of the parliamentary precinct on Wellington Street.

I mention J. S. Woodsworth, that great Canadian and the founder of my Party, and a Member of this House for many, many years. I mention the name of Norman Bethune, a national hero in China although he is a Canadian, but a hero of enormous repute in the People's Republic of China, a country which will grow of increasing importance to this country.

I would mention Georges Vanier, a distinguished soldier, distinguished diplomat, distinguished Governor General of our country, a man who embodies all of the finest traditions of French Canada. After seeing the games of a couple of weeks ago, I mention Wayne Gretzky, probably the finest hockey player that we have seen in this country for this entire century. Perhaps in a few years Jeanne Sauvé as the first woman Governor General of Canada since she became Governor General of Canada will have a statue erected in her honour, before a woman becomes Prime Minister of Canada.

In other words, we should not confine ourselves to only monarchs and Prime Ministers. I think we should beware of an ad hoc approach that says, well, because a person has been distinguished in her role as monarch we should therefore automatically feel that now that she is alive there should be a statue of her here. In fact, Mr. Speaker, if one asked the Queen, "Do you want a statue of you erected on Parliament Hill?" She might well say, "Perhaps there are other ways in which my interests, which are genuine, can be commemorated and marked". I am not sure if that is true. But that is certainly also a possibility.

I believe that statues are decorative and that they enliven and embellish any community, particularly a capital. I think that the National Capital Commission should be asked to give more attention perhaps to the municipal authorities here to statuary that would go not just on the parliamentary precinct but elsewhere in the community. I think that some of the people whose names I have mentioned might in fact find statues of themselves elsewhere, such as we have done for example with the Terry Fox statue which is located near the Conference Centre.

Those are a few thoughts on this particular motion. I would ask my hon. friend and his supporters in the Monarchist League to recognize the context in which I give these remarks. It is not by any means at all to diminish the service that Queen Elizabeth has given but to suggest that we as Canadians who are responsible for leaving a parliamentary precinct which is symbolic of Canada should be very careful about how we seek to decorate that, whether it is with statues of Prime Ministers, of monarchs or of anybody else.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): I want to say a few words about the motion before us today to commission a statue on Parliament Hill for Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II. I want to say that as a person who grew up in Victoria County, Ontario, a county that was named after Queen Victoria, I lived in a community that related very closely to royalty and monarchy and all those institutions that preceded a growth of Canadian national spirit in Canada after World War I and particularly more so after World War II.

I wonder how many statues we really can put on Parliament Hill over a period of time. The reason why I think Queen Elizabeth II is a very important part of that growth or development of our historical background on Parliament Hill is that Canada has been a nation that has related broadly to the peoples of the world. We have a tremendous image as a nation in the eyes of other nations of the world. Queen Elizabeth II has, without exception, related to those many national interests and the cultural development and reality not only of the nations of the Commonwealth but, indeed, she was broadly read on many other cultures and nationalities throughout the world.

I can recall very well teaching school in a small community back in 1952 when she became our new Queen. During the course of that year it was requested that schools put on special events to commemorate the new monarch. I can remember as principal of the elementary school at Harlowe, in the northern part of Frontenac County, in that particular year we got together with other communities on the Highway 41 corridor, such as Kaladar, Cloyne, North Brook, Flinton, and I believe we had some discussions as far north as Denbigh, and we had a big field day. That was tremendously well attended in commemoration of the ascension to the Throne of Queen Elizabeth II.

We know that there are areas in Canada today where the monarchy is not as popular as others. We recognize it as part of our background history. Indeed, Queen Victoria was consulted on the location of these very Parliament Buildings. It was through her that Ottawa was chosen. Therefore, rightly so, she has a very prominent place on Parliament Hill.

It is important to note that Queen Elizabeth holds a position that is respected by history. She is respected because of the person that she is. In the future there may well be another individual who does not play the role as courteously and effectively. The reason why the monarchy has declined somewhat over the years is because of monarchs coming to the Throne who did not have those personal qualities to relate to the people whom he or she represented. To illustrate that point we can go back to the reign of James I, Charles I, and Charles II.

On a six day visit to London, England, with the NATO parliamentarians, the Queen had a reception at Buckingham Palace for all the delegates and the staff of the delegations at Buckingham Palace. That day the Queen and Prince Philip came over and stood in the middle of the Canadian delegation and spoke with us at some length in common everyday discussion. That is the type of thing that gives a real insight into the person. The Queen and Prince Phillip are people who have the capacity to relate to all the members of the Commonwealth, and indeed to many other people in the world.

She was here for the signing of the 1982 Constitution Act. She has visited Canada on many occasions. Indeed, she opened this Parliament.

The fact that she has been on the Throne for a long time, as Queen of Canada and the Commonwealth, she has indeed earned her a role in the history of our nation.

I want to say a word to the Hon. Member who has proposed this motion. At this time it must be brought to the attention of the House and to the people of Canada that while we relate very well to Queen Elizabeth II and the tremendous role that she has played as a mediator in disputes in the Commonwealth, and taken very strong stands, as she recently did on Fiji, our thoughts go back to the debate in the House when the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria) brought in a Bill to commemorate the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson, and have a monument to him on Parliament Hill. I would remind the Conservative Member who has proposed this motion, and others in the House, that when the Bill went to committee, the Conservative Members on that committee referred that Bill to the National Capital Commission for further study for sites of and on the Hill. Imagine that type of partisan politics coming into the commissioning of a statue on Parliament Hill for a former Prime Minister of Canada? Not only was Mr. Pearson a former Prime Minister of Canada, but he was a man who probably had the greatest record as a Secretary of State for External Affairs in the history of this country.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa—Carleton): After Joe Clark.

Mr. Hopkins: In that debate on the Private Member's Bill to erect a statue on Parliament Hill for Lester B. Pearson, the Conservative Members referred it to the National Capital Commission for further study to decide whether the site would be off the Hill or on the Hill. I take great exception to that. There should be no partisanship in this type of role at all.

Queen Elizabeth has brought a great attitude of responsibility and great dignity to the office she holds. We have no objection to having a statue on Parliament Hill when she has played such a role in Canadian affairs for such a long period of time.

I do not think it was properly mentioned today, but someone did mention that Queen Victoria was in office from 1837 to 1901. She came through some pretty horrendous periods. In 1837 there was a rebellion in Upper Canada, and a rebellion in Lower Canada. In the 1850s there was the Crimean War. Every time there is an international war we have internal problems in Canada. In 1885 there was the western Canada rebellion. In 1899 to 1901 there was the South African war. That created another internal problem in Canada. Monarchs have helped along the way to smooth these things out, and it important to recognize that.

In conclusion, I wish to say that in expressing our admiration for the tremendous role that Queen Elizabeth II has played, we certainly have no objection to having a statue of her on Parliament Hill. At the same time, I will not agree to having a site for a Canadian Prime Minister off Parliament Hill. I do not care from what Party they come.

Mr. Daubney: You already have one off Parliament Hill, Louis St. Laurent, and you put it off Parliament Hill.

Mr. Hopkins: Any statues to be commissioned in the future should be located here where the centre and the pulse of the nation is.

Mr. Daubney: You set the precedent.

Mr. Hopkins: Let us not play politics with these things. Perhaps there should be a special commission to advise Cabinet on these matters rather than throwing them out for partisan debate on the floor of the House of Commons. With us in the case of Queen Elizabeth II there is no partisan debate. I want to make that very clear.

An Hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hopkins: There certainly is when Members opposite attempt to kill a Bill for a former Prime Minister of Canada, at a time when the Liberal Party of Canada totally agreed that the statue should be erected on Parliament Hill in honour of the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker. I knew that man well, and I agree that he belongs there. But I also wish to put forward in the strongest terms that any statue of a Canadian Prime Minister should likewise be here on Parliament Hill. We should not have partisan politics about that.

Mr. Daubney: Did you tell Trudeau?

Mr. Hopkins: The Hon. Member for Ottawa West (Mr. Daubney) is shouting across. I wish to say to him that is not unusual at times.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Member for Erie.

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to rise and speak in support of the motion introduced by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Nepean—Carleton (Mr. Tupper) to erect a statue of Queen Elizabeth II on Parliament Hill in commemoration of the thirty-fifth anniversary of her ascension to the Throne.

My appreciation for the monarchy springs from my family's love for our kings and our queens. In the early 1700s German farmers were offered free land in Pennsylvania and thousands took up the offer. Thus it was that my roots were transferred from Germany to Pennsylvania and then to Ontario.

In doing so, these new immigrants signed an oath of allegiance to the monarch of the day. After the American revolution this allegiance caused many of them to uproot themselves and to come to our shores. My history book informs me that my forefathers crossed the Niagara River in the year 1800, with the aid of friendly Indians, and settled along the shores of Lake Erie.

I believe our Queen is someone very special to Canadians. To us she is more than our ceremonial head of state, a responsibility in itself, for as we all know she is the guardian of our democratic Constitution that ensures the rights of liberty and of self-government for all Canadians.

I can remember the day of her coronation on February 6, 1952, when she succeeded to the throne as Queen Elizabeth on the death of her father, King George VI. Still young, with poise and confidence, she assumed the mantle of her responsibilities wholly and willingly.

I remember with pride, in the year 1939, as a boy of 12 years of age belonging to a bugle band and going to Niagara Falls, Ontario because King George VI and his Queen were to be there. I was privileged to be with that small bugle band from my town, to line the street, and to play as our Queen's mother and father went by.

As I speak today, Canadians have not been disappointed in their Queen. Rather, they have watched her with pride and admiration fulfil her role and duties with dedication and with diligence.

I suppose for a monarch, especially for the Queen, it has not been easy, balancing a fine line of preserving historic traditions and keeping pace with the mores of the present. Too many times we have let traditions in our country slide. Too many times we have erased or removed them. The Queen has adapted her role of a constitutional monarch to suit the needs of the Commonwealth citizens she serves so capably. Constantly she and her royal family remain in the public eye, but, while accessible, she retains the aura of dignity and statesmanship that her office must uphold.

Of the Queen's interest and commitment to serve Canada and its people, it is absolute. In 1957, she was the first reigning monarch to open Parliament in Ottawa. No previous monarch has been in Canada so often or in so many parts of it. No previous monarch has had anything like her knowledge of our country and its affairs.

As early as 1951, when we knew her as Princess Elizabeth, her attachment to Canada was clearly stated:

> From the moment when I first set foot on Canadian soil the feeling of strangeness went, for I knew myself to be not only amongst friends, but amongst fellow countrymen.

Her feelings strengthened when as Queen in 1957, in the first solo television broadcast of her life, she said:

> Industry and commerce may bring wealth to a country but the character of a nation is formed by other factors. Race, language, religion, culture and tradition all have some contributions to make, and when I think of the diversity of these factors in Canada today and the achievements that have grown from their union, I feel proud and happy to be Queen of such a nation.

We are proud to have her as the Queen of our nation. She has proven over and over again how valuable her counsel and her experience can be. She has done much not only to foster unity within the Commonwealth family but in her role as our Queen to assist in assuaging and bringing together the diverse factors and elements within Canada.

In her address to the Quebec Legislature in 1964, she recognized the turmoil which the Province of Quebec was undergoing. She stated in French:

> A dynamic state should not fear to assess its political philosophy.

Clearly to my mind that statement relieved a great deal of pressure.

To cite another example, it was Her Majesty who did as much as anyone by touring our Canadian North in 1970, thereby attracting the recognition of our claim and sovereignty to the world.

On Canada's ninety-second birthday, in a broadcast from Government House she said:

> If I helped you to feel proud of being Canadian, if I have reminded you of the strength which comes from unity and if I have helped to draw your attention to the bright vision of the years ahead, I shall feel well satisfied because I believe with all conviction that this country can look to a glorious future.

How often have Canadians made her Christmas broadcasts a major part of that very special day? Her comments she can make to us as a part-time player and observer and to remind and encourage us to remain steadfast to our Canadian ideals and Canadian values.

I have mentioned her desire to be accessible to those whom she serves. She is no doubt the consummate public servant. She has made her walkabouts a very special feature of her Canadian tours whenever she visits our country. She has set the standard for her family, equally willing and popular in their own right, to follow in her lead.

Moreover, she is as well the patron of various associations such as the Canadian Red Cross Society and many others too numerous to list. In this way I believe she has attempted and succeeded in instilling a link with Canadians, to show that the Crown is not merely an abstract symbol of our unity but a personal and living bond between her and her subjects.

Outside her immediate obligations to Canada, she has been a statesman acting for Canadian interests at the international level. As head of the Commonwealth, her position is a vital link with other nations within the Commonwealth family. She takes on this responsibility seriously, for she realizes the importance of human relationships in world affairs and how membership in the Commonwealth has a subtle influence on the relationship between its leaders.

How often has she been relied on to act as the mediator between conflicting schools of thought? How often, with skill and diplomacy, has she been able to resolve differences or to allow time for a breathing space for such controversies to be aired?

Unlike the changing faces of government, she remains constant. For 35 years, because of her interest and dedication to international affairs, she has become a repository of unique knowledge, advice, and encouragement to all who seek her confidence.

When I speak of our Queen, Queen Elizabeth II, I speak of a strong, courageous, and charming individual who has delighted and honoured Canadians by her love and attention to our needs. We are indeed fortunate to have her as our Queen.

Therefore I would encourage the House to give its unanimous approval to the motion of my colleague.

Mr. Lawrence I. O'Neil (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the Hon. Member for Nepean—Carleton (Mr. Tupper) for moving this important motion and for giving Members of Parliament an opportunity to speak on an issue which is close to the hearts of all of us, to the hearts of all Canadians.

We live in a country which is known as a constitutional monarchy. We live in a country which has as its head of state, Queen Elizabeth II. She has been Queen for more than three decades and has led the Commonwealth through many difficult periods and has led Canada through very difficult times.

My understanding of a constitutional monarchy is a country in which democratic principles, including freedom of speech and the right to elect people to legislative assemblies, are widely accepted. That principle has been defended in successive world wars by citizens of Canada.

We owe much of what we value to the evolution of democracy in the United Kingdom. The Magna Carta of 1215 is one of the documents on which the western world bases its concept of democracy. The United Kingdom evolved into a democracy over centuries. We, as a young country, have benefited from the evolution of democracy. We borrowed it at a mature stage. The United Kingdom evolved from a feudal system to its present totally democratic system.

The United States has also benefited from this evolution. It borrowed from the United Kingdom the basis for its democratic system which is a great contrast to the evolution which has taken place in many other countries. In communist countries evolution took place to the point of semidemocracy but then regressed. Communist regimes suppress the liberties and freedoms of their citizens. Certain other countries are not beneficiaries of the British democratic traditions. Some of the so-called developing countries of Africa are controlled by military dictatorships. That situation will probably exist until a revolution or other types of civil disobedience takes place.

We saw the toppling of the Marcos Government in the Philippines. We see the struggle taking place in Central America today, particularly in Nicaragua. The Somoza Government was overthrown several years ago only to be replaced by another dictatorial and undemocratic government. Popular movements do not always result in democracy and it is not uncommon for governments in these developing countries, once in power, to regress to a unilateral type of government system. We have not had that experience in Canada. For successive generations Canadians have enjoyed a democratic system.

When I think of placing on Parliament Hill a statue of Queen Elizabeth II to commemorate the thirty-fifth anniversary of her ascension to the Throne, I think not only of her role in preserving our democratic traditions, our constitutional system of government, but also of the way in which the monarchy has adapted, changed, and responded to the political realities of the United Kingdom. I think of such a statue as a symbol of our democratic traditions, as a reminder to us all that in the United Kingdom and in Canada we have had a peaceful evolution of democracy.

In that regard we stand apart from many countries of the world whose histories and/or present-day life are marred by civil war. In many ways we are light years ahead of some of our sister countries in which the thought of a Chamber such as this to which elected officials can go to express their opinions and those of their constituents is only a dream.

That is what I think of when I think of a statue to honour Queen Elizabeth II. I am sure that the Queen represents those values to people throughout the Commonwealth. Her constituency is far broader than only Canada. The Queen has performed her duties at all times with great sensitivity and responsibility. She has endeared herself to all of her constituents throughout the Commonwealth.

In conclusion, I once again congratulate the Hon. Member for Nepean—Carleton for this important initiative. I look forward to the day when a statue of Queen Elizabeth II will be unveiled here on Parliament Hill.

Mr. Barry Turner (Ottawa—Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my colleague and political neighbour across the Rideau River, the Hon. Member for Nepean—Carleton (Mr. Tupper), has suggested that a statue of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II should be erected in the near future on Parliament Hill. My colleague referred to the tremendous support he has received from the Monarchist League of Canada and other provincial, national, and, I would think, international organizations.

It is very appropriate that we should discuss this motion today as we also debated today, as we have all week, the future of our Constitution. It is appropriate that we should discuss the foundations and fabric of our country on the same day that we debate this motion to erect a statue of Her Majesty.

I have a very vague memory of Princess Elizabeth that day when she was in Kenya and her father died and she became the Queen of the Commonwealth, the Queen of the United Kingdom, and the Queen of Canada. I was only six years of age at the time but my memory has been refreshed many times over the years by newsclips. That young princess went on to become a great monarch.

I have travelled throughout most of the Commonwealth and have recognized, not only the importance of Canada's role within that community of nations but the Queen's role as well. Whether in Africa, Asia, or the Caribbean she has shown and continues to show tremendous leadership, as has our Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney). We are all very proud of our past, our traditions, and our ties with the United Kingdom.

I realize that the time for debate has come to a close for today and I respectfully request to continue my remarks when the motion next comes before the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hour provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 36(2), the order is dropped to the bottom of the list of the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

It being 3 p.m., the House stands adjourned until Monday next at 11 o'clock pursuant to Standing Order 3(1).

At 3 p.m. the House adjourned.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES COMPREHENSIVE TRADE AGREEMENT—STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I rise to report to the House on the outcome of the Canada-U.S. trade negotiations. I am pleased to inform the House that we have concluded an agreement in principle for a comprehensive trade agreement between Canada and the United States of America.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, this is good news for our country, and good news for our people. The agreement responds to our needs and conforms to our requirements. It meets the objectives we set for Canada when we entered into these negotiations.

On September 26, 1985, Mr. Speaker, now more than two years ago, when we formally undertook this initiative I told the House that, and if I may quote from Hansard:

> Our political sovereignty, our system of social programs, our commitment to fight regional disparities, our unique cultural identity, our special linguistic character—these are the essence of Canada. They are not at issue in these negotiations.

That is what I said two years ago and, Mr. Speaker, this agreement delivers on that pledge exactly.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: These vital questions were not and are not affected by the negotiations.

[Translation]

On the same occasion, Mr. Speaker, I also said:

> "Economics, geography, common sense and the national interest dictate that we try to secure and expand our trade with our closest and largest trading partner".

Mr. Speaker, we now have this tool that is so essential to our prosperity.

This Agreement reflects respect for the integrity of the Canadian people and a determination to give Canadians a more prosperous future.

We embarked on this initiative with a number of important goals in mind. Our main objective was to conclude a mutually beneficial and binding agreement that would guarantee and expand access to U.S. markets for Canadian exporters and would also have the effect of eliminating trade barriers between our two countries. That is exactly what we have done.

We wanted to make our trading relationship with the United States more secure and more predictable, and the Agreement does that. We wanted a gradual phase-out of tariffs between our two countries, and the Agreement does that. We wanted rules that would regulate the important areas of government services and procurement, and the Agreement does that.

[English]

We wanted an agreement that guaranteed fair and impartial application of U.S. trade remedy laws, and this agreement does all of those things.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Experts in the area of international trade have been commenting since yesterday that this is the largest trading agreement ever entered into between two sovereign nations. We have agreed to the following measures that will expand opportunities for Canadian exporters and secure access in the world's largest two-way trading relationship: a phase-out of all tariffs between the two countries by the end of 10 years; creation of a unique dispute settlement mechanism with binding powers, one that guarantees predictable and impartial rules of the trade relationship—this is something that Canada has needed, this is something that Canada has achieved—freer trade in agriculture, wine and spirits, and energy products; enhancement of the Auto Pact; expanded access to purchases by Governments; an unprecedented code to set rules of the game for trade by the services industries; and greater access for each other's investors. Culture and social programs are exempted.

Mr. Speaker, while not perfect, the trade agreement meets our requirements and meets all of the fundamental objectives of Canada. It meets our bottom line. This agreement will open and secure our access to each other's markets. It improves prospects for Canadian manufacturers to produce larger quantities of goods in Canada to ship to the entire American market. It creates a code unlike any other yet in existence which will govern the rules of the road for our service industries. It phases in reduction of trade barriers to ensure that our workers and our firms have all the time required to gear up for the opportunities in the changed environment and to protect workers against dislocation that inevitably occurs as society changes.

It is an agreement that gives new assurance to our resource producers in the Maritimes and western Canada, and increases opportunities for business in central Canada.

This agreement, Mr. Speaker, will lead to lower prices for consumers and higher real wages for Canadian workers.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: As the Economic Council of Canada and other authoritative bodies have predicted, the agreement will also lead to a significant number of new and durable jobs. The council, in its most recent report, referred to some 350,000 new jobs in Canada resulting from such an agreement.

This is something, Mr. Speaker, which promises such benefit and such hope to the youth of Canada and to our regions of Canada. If Canada is to remain united and to prosper, equality must be the hallmark; there must be fairness and growth from Newfoundland to British Columbia, and this provides our regions with a unique opportunity to share in the growing wealth of Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: The challenge from the Canadian perspective is what it always is and always has been, to reconcile regional interests and sectoral concerns with the national interest.

The trade initiative was launched by this Government with no guarantees, no indications that success was guaranteed, not by a long shot. We indicated that to the House before we began. Such an undertaking was recommended in 1985, following great study and reflection, as a vital national concern by a royal commission chaired by a distinguished Canadian, the Hon. Donald S. Macdonald. In the process, and pursuant to a splendid report by Mr. Macdonald and his colleagues, we reached out to Canadians from every walk of life, from every corner of our country.

I have met with the Premiers no less than eight times, meetings that have extended up to seven, eight, and nine hours. I will again meet with them later this week to brief them on the outcome of the negotiations and to seek their views.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, last Friday, when we were starting the final and crucial round of negotiations, Canada's Premiers informed us directly of their confidence in our approach and our strategy since the beginning of our trade negotiations with the United States.

The First Ministers' Conference, formerly an occasion for sterile confrontation, has become a forum for effective co-operation, conducted with the interest of all Canadians in mind.

I want to thank all the Premiers for their solidarity and support throughout this difficult process.

From start to finish, Canada has maintained a united front. We closed ranks on all crucial issues and settled our differences privately, although there were the usual mishaps and communications problems.

Mr. Speaker, I shall table the complete text of the Agreement as soon as the wording is finalized. It will then be referred to the appropriate committee of the House for analysis, study and debate.

[English]

Meanwhile, today, I am tabling the "Elements of the Agreement" concluded and signed by representatives of both Governments. I am advised that there may be a minor typographical error in this document, but that the document itself represents the fundamentals of the agreement arrived at by the parties.

These elements are the agreed basis for the agreement and will be translated into a legal document, as agreed, in appropriate time frames by the negotiating teams.

The Ministers and the members of the Canadian negotiating team will be glad to help the standing committee in its work. They will appear before the parliamentary committee, and Members will, of course, have every opportunity to consider the contents of the Agreement in the House. In the House of Commons there will be a special debate on this question that is of major importance to us all.

Mr. Speaker, we have put in place a host of mechanisms for consultation between the Government and the private sector, and it seems to me that the latter is becoming an important factor in the conduct of public affairs.

[English]

We created, for example, the International Trade Advisory Committee, calling on the acknowledged expertise of leading Canadians in fields of important national endeavour. We created 15 sectoral advisory groups, to assure ourselves that the concerns of all Canadians in all of the vital areas of our national life were reflected at all times, to the best extent humanly possible, in the negotiating process.

Literally hundreds of Canadians, under the brilliant over-all chairmanship of Walter Light, participated directly in this worthy endeavour. This represents another indication of a fundamental approach to the manner in which public policy is developed and articulated in Canada. I think it is a beneficial change, because it brings Canadians into the decision-making process on decisions that affect their lives.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: The talks were not easy, but nothing that is worth while ever is.

The initiative was not undertaken from dusk of one day to dawn of the next. While the final elements of the agreement came together only at the eleventh hour, the general framework of the agreement is the result of three years of very hard work.

We have been at this since November, 1984, when my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) presented the Government's strategy paper entitled A New Direction for Canada; since January, 1985, when we put out a Green Paper on securing and enhancing export markets; since March, 1985, at the Quebec Summit, where President Reagan and I made our declaration on trade in goods and services; since September 26, 1985, when I informed this House of the parameters and the philosophy of our initiative. Since November, 1985, Canada's most experienced international negotiator, Ambassador Simon Reisman, has been heading the Canadian effort.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Since June, 1986, Ambassador Reisman and his colleagues have been at the table with their American counterparts. This has been a most demanding and challenging experience.

Mr. Reisman has once again rendered great service to his country. He and his colleagues in the trade negotiations, including Ambassador Ritchie, who is in the House today with Ambassador Reisman, and their colleagues, have all lent a new and impressive dimension to the expression of public service. I know that all Members of the House of Commons, irrespective of Party, will wish to convey warm congratulations to Ambassador Reisman and his colleagues.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: I want very much, and in a very special way, to underline the principle and indispensable role played in these successful negotiations by the Minister for International Trade (Miss Carney).

• (1120)

Mr. Mulroney: May I point out as well, with the indulgence of my colleagues in the House who have witnessed this for the last two years, the most significant contributions of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark), the Minister of Finance, and my own chief of staff, Derek Burney, in bringing these arduous negotiations to a very successful conclusion.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: With challenge, attack, criticism, and the uncertainty that great initiatives bring, for 16 months our team stayed with it. They left no avenue unexplored in their efforts to obtain a good deal for Canada. At all times they were mindful of the firm but direct instructions of this Government and of this Prime Minister—it had to be a good deal or there would be no deal.

This is a good deal, a good deal for Canada and a deal that is good for all Canadians. It is also a fair deal, which means that it brings benefits and progress to our partner, the United States of America. When both countries prosper, our democracies are strengthened and leadership has been provided to our trading partners around the world. I think this initiative represents enlightened leadership to the trading partners about what can be accomplished when we determine that we are going to strike down protectionism, move toward liberalized trade, and generate new prosperity for all our people.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, this Agreement will expand our access to the world's largest, richest and most dynamic markets. The result will be an increase in productivity, research and development, a significant improvement in our competitive position and enhanced product quality. The result will be lasting jobs and sustained prosperity. I believe certain components of the Agreement will set an important example for the multilateral negotiations being conducted in Geneva, where Canada and the other 91 GATT members are trying to lower barriers to international trade and enter a new phase in the liberalization of international trade.

[English]

Canada and the United States will apply the same vision to the MTN Round. This new arrangement will bring us to a new decade and a new century, on the leading edge of the world's trade and commerce. So this nation, founded by explorers and developed by traders, begins another phase in our national evolution.

Several hurdles remain before implementation, including of course the approval of Congress, but this is a major step toward implementation of an accord that will be fair and beneficial for all regions of Canada.

We go forward with confidence in our future, confidence in our country, and, most of all, confidence in the youth of Canada. We have set a course for a stronger, a more united, and a more prosperous Canada. It is not a path—it never was and it never will be—for the faint of heart, but this country was not built by timid souls. This is a path for the daring, the innovative, and the nation-builders who are now called upon to make a firm decision on behalf of a strong, united, and prosperous Canada.

For those who follow this path, we share the intrepid spirit of the pioneer generations, and hopefully it will be said of all of us, as it was of them, that we left this Canada, this beloved country, a better place.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, one of the first things our Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) did when he was sworn in as Leader of the country was to go down to the United States and tell our American friends: "Canada is open for business again". Today, the Prime Minister has put Canada up for sale.

All we have seen so far is a statement of principles, and we ask him: Where is the document? Indeed I received a copy of his remarks this morning as I was coming down to the House. All we have so far in this beautiful package put together by the Government is: "Canada-U.S. Trade Negotiations, A Chronology"; "Canada-U.S. Trade Negotiations, Glossary"; "Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement, Elements of the Agreement"; and a synopsis.

Where is the document, or is it still being drafted, and is that why the Prime Minister has not been able to deliver anything but a vague series of generalities, stuffed with rhetoric, but no details for the Canadian people?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): We want to tell him and the Government that Canadians will want to see the fine print. Canadians will want to examine this agreement, as well the House of Commons, clause by clause. We expect that to be done because we have a mystery here. We do not have a document. We do not have the agreement. Neither Parliament nor the Congress of the United States has anything officially before it.

[Translation]

All we have, Mr. Speaker, are summaries from both parties. We do not even have an official text. Most of our information—as was the case throughout these negotiations—comes from Washington, not from this Government. Where is the document? When do we get an opportunity to study the document? The Prime Minister did sign something, so where is the document? The Prime Minister wrote a blank cheque and I can assure him that we on this side of the House do not endorse this cheque.

Mr. Speaker, how can we be expected to debate a mystery in the House? How can we debate a document which may not even exist right now but which is being drafted? We must see the fine print. We must scrutinize it clause by clause.

[English]

Already we have major differences in interpretation on either side of the border as to what is in the agreement. We have differing interpretations from Washington and those emanating from the Government as to what the agreement actually means.

The Senate and the House of Representatives apparently do not have details. Naturally enough they will look at it in terms of their American interest and in terms of the United States Constitution.

We have an opportunity and an obligation, when we finally see the document, to look at it in terms of the Canadian interest and the Canadian future and, in particular, in terms of our sovereignty and independence as a nation.

The Government operated throughout these negotiations on the naive assumption that the very fact of an agreement with the United States would somehow magically exempt us from U.S. protectionist sentiment, particularly from the protectionist sentiment in the Congress and that somehow we would automatically be exempted from the United States Trade Law, 1974, and particularly from the omnibus Bill already passed by the Senate, passed by the House of Representatives, and now in conference between the two Houses.

That naive assumption would only have been borne out if two conditions had been met. First, if there has been a meaningful exemption from U.S. trade law and unilateral remedies that the Americans so effectively, from their point of view, exercised and imposed against us. But there was not. Second, what about a mechanism to enforce that exemption in terms of a dispute mechanism between the two countries? What about a binding mechanism to withstand the nature of the United States Constitution? But we are far from sure there is a mechanism. What we have is a dispute mechanism, not that will regulate disputes between Canada and the United States on an agreed definition of subsidy, on an agreed definition of countervail and anti-dumping, but a dispute mechanism, so far as we can read it in these vague generalities, these principles of agreement, which will apply national law on either side of the border. In other words, all this dispute mechanism will do is to apply American trade law against Canada. We have substituted an American tribunal for an international tribunal. American law will still apply to Canadian exports into the U.S. market. What the Prime Minister has given us today is an absolute fraud. There is no exemption from American trade law.

Take the case we all know negotiated so pitifully by the Minister of International Trade (Miss Carney), the softwood lumber case. There was final offer after final offer. We can remember that. Even though we suggested that the law and the facts had not changed, she yielded. That case, were it decided today, would be decided under the same legal principles. But instead of those principles being decided by the American administrative system, they will be decided by an international tribunal between Canada and the United States—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): —but applying American law. The law has not changed.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Our Government got suckered in. Our Government got taken, and we are not yet sure, because certain remarks were raised this morning in Washington. It may be, under the American Constitution, that that tribunal cannot be binding against the American court system. There may still be appeals through the federal court system to the Supreme Court of the United States on anything decided by the tribunal. In other words, we are not sure about the binding nature of it. One thing we are certain of it is not arbitrating any mutually agreed definitions between Canada and the United States. It will be applying American trade law against Canada.

We do not know yet whether this tribunal and the arrangements beneath it excludes Canada's remedies to the GATT. Under GATT where we have, over the past seven years, won eight of the nine cases brought before that international tribunal, GATT has the right to challenge the relevance in international terms of national law. This tribunal set up and agreed to by the Government does not challenge American law; it applies American law. We do not know whether we have lost our right to go, as we have in a sovereign way, to the international tribunal of GATT. Our only purpose, according to the Government and those who support a comprehensive free trade agreement with the United States, was to gain exemption from American protectionist sentiment. We have not gained that execution. We are still bound by American law and we have agreed to a tribunal which may or may not be binding that will apply American law against Canadian lumber, potash, steel and fish. That is what we have, and that is less than an achievement, it is an absolute insult to the intelligence of the Canadian market.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, many of the aspects of what little documentation we do have are a source of concern. What in fact the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) is telling us is that ever more economic barriers are being raised between Canada and the United States. From here on the Americans are quite free to invade us: all our investment markets, all our financial institutions, our insurance companies, our advertising firms, our transport companies are now wide open.

The Americans also have ready access to our natural resources, our agriculture, our car industry and the Auto Pact.

[English]

The principles we have before us—and that is all we have, we do not have the document—are a minefield for Canada. Let us look at some of the items. Let us take a look at investment. Let us call it "takeover unlimited". All of Canada is now open to American proprietorship. Takeover fever will go northward. This country will be a satellite of the United States. We will become the number one takeover target of American business. The Americans already own too much of us. Now it is "Open Sesame". It is "Open doors. Come on, we are ready. Come and take us". That is what the Government has done.

We ought to look at the nature of what has happened to the sovereignty of this House of Commons. In the Yeutter document—we get most of our information traditionally from the American side—here is what Mr. Yeutter says: "Under this agreement, Canada commits to make permanent its recent policy of not screening new business investments". In other words, it will be a permanent deal. There is no way a future Parliament can play around with it, modify it or amend it. No, Mr. Speaker. We have yielded on the floor of this House of Commons the sovereignty of our nation to control investment.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): We have known for some time that the Americans want to exercise their empire over services world-wide, and particularly in an avaricious way to Canada. Services are now wide open, financial institutions, banks, trust companies, insurance companies, advertising and investment banks. But what reciprocal rights do we get? Transportation. All the advantages that we may have in terms of investment grants, subsidy or tax incentives to new high technology industries may be out of the window. How will we be able to assist new industry to compete with the United States?

Let us take a look at the Auto Pact. It is hard to read from the statement of principles what is done to the Auto Pact. The statement is deliberately vague. On a first reading it appears that the Auto Pact may have been gutted.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): At best it has been phased out. As the tariffs affecting automobiles and auto parts are reduced to zero, the whole basis of an Auto Pact disappears or is put in jeopardy. Where are the production guarantees? Where are the employment guarantees? All those hundreds of thousands of jobs are at stake, yet we do not have details. The Prime Minister said all along, his Ministers said all along, in response to repeated questions in the House of Commons about the Auto Pact being on the table, they said to your Honour, "No, Sir, it is not". The Prime Minister mislead us again. The Auto Pact is on the table. It has been gutted and diluted by this agreement.

One of the first responsibilities I had in this House several years ago under the late Arthur Laing was to defend a Canadian water policy and Canadian water from the thirsty glances of our American friends. I always believed that there was no such thing as a North American water policy, a North American resources policy, or a North American energy policy. There is a Canadian energy policy and an American energy policy. We should never yield our sovereignty on those. This Government has, and so we have now become a storehouse of the United States.

• (1140)

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): The Americans are already gleefully saying: "We have secured our resources forever. We have Canada up there, do not worry about the Middle East any more, do not worry about these problems, we have our good friends sewed up forever. We have made Canada a hinterland, a storehouse for our resources. We have turned Canada into a satellite of resources".

We have always tried to resist being seen as hewers of wood and drawers of water, and the Government has returned us to the status of hewers of wood and drawers of water.

Some Hon. Members: Shame, shame!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, let us turn to agriculture. We have not much time but you will give me the time, I am sure. Agriculture and marketing boards, this Government said they would not be touched. The Prime Minister said they would not be touched. He said that agriculture was sacrosanct, that no changes would be made.

The Wheat Board is in jeopardy. Two-price wheat may be gone. The inability of the Wheat Board to manage import licensing strikes at the very powers of the Wheat Board. Tariffs moving to zero in agriculture means that supply management could be out of the window.

So here we have the family farm in jeopardy. The family farm is struggling under the lowest commodity prices in recent times, and this Government sacrifices the Canadian farmer to make itself look good.

This Government has also accepted the principle of the Western Grain Transportation Act being an export-related subsidy. We are now open to challenge on the movement of grain to our ports and to American ports. Every other country will now challenge the basis of our freight rates.

Culture was another area the Government said it would not touch, but it has made changes. Again, Mr. Yeutter says Canada has agreed that the cultural measures it takes will not impair the benefits the United States would otherwise expect from the provisions of this agreement. What does that mean? It looks like a Mack truck clause to me, you can drive anything through that.

What are we giving away besides differential postal rates favouring Canadian periodicals, tariffs on print and recording and publishing? What else have we given away? How about our film industry? It is clear that Time Incorporated is back taking over Canadian culture.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, this agreement in principle is bound to play havoc with Canada's employment market. We simply must provide adjustment programs designed for the workers who will be affected. Where are the adjustment programs to protect underprivileged regions or workers who will be shifted right out of their jobs as a result of this agreement?

[English]

We have yielded too much. The concessions are too deep. Our economic independence has been threatened. Our sovereignty as Canadians has been diminished. We have lost the ability to control and manage our own economy. Why? Because the Prime Minister and the Government were too anxious for the deal. They went into this deal unprepared. They had no plan. They had no agenda.

Before the negotiations, the Government gave away the Foreign Investment Review Act. It really did a job on that one. The National Energy Program, softwood lumber, drug prices, publishing, all this was given away in the course of the agreement in the final coup de grâce to the economic independence of this country.

We have already made a good many concessions, Mr. Speaker, enough to jeopardize our economic independence. We have already dropped the Foreign Investment Review Agency, our national energy policy, lumber, drugs.

Mr. Speaker, we do not want Canada to become a satellite of the United States. We want a full parliamentary debate as soon as we lay our hands on the official documents. We want a committee to travel from coast to coast and listen to what Canadians have to say. We want to study the substance and form, the principles and the fine print, clause by clause, of this deal with the Americans.

[English]

The Prime Minister had no mandate for a comprehensive free trade agreement with the United States. Indeed, all his past pronouncements, particularly those made when he was running for the leadership of his Party, were against the free trade arrangement because he was worried about Canadian sovereignty. He was right then. He should have stuck with his instincts and intuition. He has now become the architect of the yielding in the most massive way possible of our sovereignty as an independent nation.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Canadians will want us to look closely at this arrangement. We want a parliamentary committee to study it carefully. We want Canadians consulted from one end of Canada to another. We want a thorough clause-by-clause analysis.

This process will not be hurried because Canadians have no idea yet, after just a preliminary glance, what they have really lost as a nation. What is the regional impact of this Accord? What is the future impact of this Accord? We will want to know what jobs, what companies, what regions will be hurt in this arrangement, because throughout this debate, throughout these negotiations, the Government has talked about benefits and has not been clear with Canadians as to what the costs will be.

Where are the adjustment programs? Where are the adjustments for those men and women who may be laid off as a result of this agreement? Where are the adjustment programs to protect the regions less able to stand up to this agreement? Canadian sovereignty is on the line. From what we have seen so far, we cannot accept an agreement which sells out Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, in the history of Canada, every Prime Minister from the beginning to the present has asked and answered, either quietly in the dead of night of himself or frequently in public in serious debates affecting the future of the nation, these questions. What kind of Canada do we want and whose Canada is it to be?

Every significant Prime Minister of Canada from Sir John A. Macdonald through John Diefenbaker to Pierre Elliott Trudeau has well understood that in answering those questions in the Canadian interests, it was absolutely essential for Canada to have the maximum degree of economic sovereignty. They understood that.

Each in his own way, from Sir John A. at the outset, understood that a tough set of laws emanating from the Parliament of Canada, in the interests of that sovereignty so that we could build the kind of nation we desired, was absolutely essential, and keeping in place a framework of all-encompassing laws was necessary for us as a people to be able to achieve that mandate.

Having read the American reports on the document that has been agreed to—regrettably, once again, they were the first ones we had access to—and the summaries of the documents provided by Canadian officials up to this point, I can tell you that for the first time in the history of Canada, we have a man who is Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) who has, without even being asked, volunteered Canada to be the 51st state in the United States. We reject that perspective of this country.

I want to spell out what I mean. The Prime Minister said before the last election that he was opposed to free trade because he thought of the implications then of the relative economic strengths of these two countries of ours on this part of the continent. He said in Sherbrooke, Quebec, during the election campaign, that it would be a mistake for us to enter into this kind of an agreement, presumably because he was then thinking somewhat about the long-range future of this nation. Yet in the last 48 hours his Government entered into an agreement with the U.S. for which it had no mandate. The long-range implications are that Canada, an independent nation able to set its own priorities, would go down the drain. I say to the Prime Minister of Canada that if he had any integrity on this point he would go to the people of Canada today and wave the election banner on this issue.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: The Tories sit there laughing as Canada dribbles away.

Mr. McDermid: We are laughing because you are silly.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I want to put the case for what I have just said in some detail. What we have seen from the Government in the last 48 hours, the people of Canada have seen incrementally over the last three years, and it has led to this final negative decision.

Just after the Tories came to power, they proudly boasted they were going to get rid of FIRA, and they did.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: They are still clapping.

Mr. McDermid: You told us we would lose 100,000 jobs.

Mr. Broadbent: They do not know that every other industrialized country in the modern world has the equivalent of FIRA. In their ignorance they got rid of it and they are still boasting.

Since the Tories came to office there have been more than 2,000 takeovers of Canadian firms by American firms. Once again the Conservatives, who have forgotten the legacy of Sir John A. Macdonald, think that is a good sign.

Miss Carney: Any investment in Oshawa, Ed?

Mr. Broadbent: In their first move on FIRA we saw the forerunner of what was to come.

Mr. Mazankowski: What about Oshawa, Ed?

Mr. Broadbent: I listened to your Prime Minister, I say to the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Mazankowski), and perhaps you will have the courtesy to listen to what is said on this side.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Tell us about Oshawa, Ed.

Mr. Broadbent: You will have your opportunity later on. We have had virtually wiped out any provisions which would ensure greater protection against takeovers of our industry by U.S. firms which are invariably much larger and have greater capital resources. They have been gobbling up companies in takeovers in the U.S. over the last few years. Just watch that expand north of the border now.

The Tories said that not only did they want to get rid of FIRA and expand the whole range of investment opportunities, as they described them, they are increasing the threshold where takeovers are reviewed from that of companies with assets of at least $5 million, all the way up to $150 million. Goodbye all small and medium-sized Canadian businesses which are doing well. They are now open to takeover bids from the U.S.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): The voice of fear.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, another sign of what was to come was the takeover of Dome Petroleum.

Some Hon. Members: A bankrupt company.

Mr. Broadbent: Dome Petroleum was the largest Canadian-controlled firm in the energy sector. The Americans said, "Do not move to stop that takeover", and of course the Government did not move. Once again we see in the document we are asked to consider an extension of that policy to the whole energy field. I was in Montreal yesterday and I watched an American television program with Mr. Yeutter saying they got their continental energy deal. That is what the Americans wanted, that is what they got, and that is what the Government sold out.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: We see something else in the U.S. document. Ever since the Prime Minister sat down with the President of the U.S., not once but twice, and when Mr. Bush, the Vice-President, visited Ottawa and talked with the Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner) and myself, what did they have on their agenda? Changes in our pharmaceutical legislation. What do we see in the American document? With great pride they say they got the change in the pharmaceutical industry regulations that they wanted. Another capitulation which we saw in draft form a few months ago is now being consummated in an international agreement. A shameful act.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Côté (Langelier): Sit down, Ed.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Try the truth, Ed.

Mr. Broadbent: The U.S. has indicated for some time that it wanted greater access to our cultural industries. People in this field in Toronto and Montreal, and to a lesser but real extent nevertheless on the West Coast, have long known about the American desire to move in on them. We see once again, not just in this agreement but in the Prentice-Hall decision some time ago, that the Government is moving clearly in the direction of giving greater American access and control in this field. Once again it is being consummated in the document agreed upon this weekend.

Miss MacDonald: Read the document, Ed.

Mr. Broadbent: Then we have the softwood decision. In that particular instance the U.S. had the nerve to say to our provinces that they did not have the sovereign right to decide at what level they were to impose a royalty. That is at the root of that decision. Forget the economics of whether a high level or low level of royalty was desirable. What is beyond question, or was until this Government came into power, was that it was the sovereign right of our provinces to decide what level of price they were to charge. It was not up to the U.S., the Japanese, the Europeans or anyone else to tell us what price we were to charge for our resources until the Conservatives came along and said, "Right on, United States, you can tell us what price to set for our products". We reject that outright. Once again you see the reasoning of the Conservative Government in that decision consummated in this agreement.

Running through the agreement, for the resource sector as well as every other sector, is the idea that the pricing policy we decide on in Canada ought not to be related to some long-range regional development strategy for a given province, which may cause it to have very low prices for a given period of time, or to some long-range national strategy which may cause us to decide what we want to charge for our resources.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Or even to the market.

Mr. Broadbent: Or even to the market. What is accepted by the Government is the idea that market principles as the U.S. defines them, are to apply even to the sale of Canadian resources. We reject that out of hand.

Similarly, you will find in the approach to deregulation in transportation and service sectors of this agreement a major American agenda item for some time, especially since the Reagan administration came to power. We have seen it in laws proposed in this Parliament dealing with transportation and other services. We see it once again in the document before us.

The point I want to make is that in all these matters of national policy what we are seeing from the Government in this agreement is not something new. What we are seeing is something the Tories set under way the moment they took office, whether we are talking about FIRA in particular, foreign investment in general—

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): National Energy Program.

Mr. Broadbent: —energy programs, publishing, or the selling of our natural resources.

Some Hon. Members: Nine hundred thousand jobs.

• (1200)

Mr. Broadbent: The conclusion of the Conservative Government was specifically rejected in the House of Commons by John Diefenbaker who had the same view of nationhood as had the founding Prime Minister, John A. Macdonald. The gang of Tories that has now taken over the Government of Canada sees this country as nothing but one large cash register which should be part of the United States, and that is a betrayal of Canadian history.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): That's a lie. The statement is a lie.

Mr. Broadbent: The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) is, as usual, getting carried away by his own rhetoric. He has always been a master of rhetoric if not substance. He may indulge the House with a thoughtful speech on the subject later on.

Mr. McDermid: It will be a lot more interesting than this one.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. Members will have noted that when the Right Hon. Prime Minister was speaking there was great courtesy extended. While I know that the debate which is taking place is one of great importance and strong feelings, I ask all Members to give the appropriate courtesies to the Hon. Member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent).

Mr. Broadbent: Thank you. I now want to touch upon some of the very specific aspects of the agreement. I hope the Government will reply. Instead of indulging in generalities I hope the Government will explain the agreement sector by sector and show us where we are wrong.

With regard to agriculture, the concessions have been made overwhelmingly by Canada. A range of agricultural tariff and import licences will be eliminated on wheat, barley, oats and grain. I am sure that everyone on the Prairies will read the news of this agreement with absolute horror. The Government has abandoned a 50-year tradition central to agriculture, not only on the Prairies but in the Okanagan Valley, many parts of Ontario, Quebec, and the Annapolis Valley in Nova Scotia. Agriculture in all these areas and more will be negatively affected. This is a Canadian concession of considerable proportions in agriculture.

With regard to the automotive industry, the language is by no means clear but it looks as though the tariffs in the Auto Pact will be phased out completely. No one has denied that yet. If the tariffs are phased out completely we will lose the stick which played an effective role in getting investment decisions in Canada.

This is not abstract talk. Had it not been pointed out to the Chrysler Corporation that it was not living up to its investment commitments under the Auto Pact and told that if it did not live up to them it would have to start paying a duty on products imported into Canada, there would not be a new van plant in the City of Windsor. The Government was intellectually dishonest when it said that the Auto Pact was not on the table. Without the tariffs and enforcement mechanisms the pact is absolutely destroyed and the Government should have the honesty to say that to the House of Commons.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: If I understand the information which we have so far with regard to this agreement, in addition to dealings with the North American car makers, our sovereignty has been restricted in terms of making deals in our interests with non-North American producers. As I understand it, we can no longer have an independent automotive policy which would apply to Datsun, Volkswagen or Honda. They will now come within the framework of a new North American policy. If North American content provisions are applied as opposed to Canadian, instead of being located to meet Canadian conditions of production these companies will no longer come into Canada but will more likely be located in the larger market in the United States and will export their products into Canada.

Mr. McDermid: You have an inferiority complex.

Mr. Broadbent: Not at all, my friend.

Mr. McDermid: Sure you do.

Mr. Broadbent: I will not cite Tommy Douglas or David Lewis, I will just indicate to my Conservative friend that Sir John A. Macdonald would think he is talking through his hat right now.

The Auto Pact is in total jeopardy and our ability to control other automotive decisions independently has been thrown out of the window by this agreement as I understand it.

With regard to the service industry, the rule is that any law which we apply here to Canadian firms will have to be exactly the same as those which would apply to American firms.

Miss Carney: Not true.

Mr. Broadbent: I read the document that was produced by the United States which the Americans say is the official document.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: We now hear some of the cabinet Ministers laughing about this. Let them get to their feet later in this discussion and correct these observations if they are wrong. This happens to be what the Americans think they have got from this deal. In bargaining between this Government and the Americans, the Americans have come out on top without exception in recent history, as I am sure they did this time.

Mr. McDermid: Inferiority complex again.

Mr. Broadbent: We'll leave the noise-makers down there.

Not in my worst nightmares did I think that the Government would betray us completely on the protection of our cultural industries. Since we have not yet received a text from the Canadian Government I will quote from the U.S. document on this subject. It says:

> —The United States wants to ensure that Canadian cultural policies do not constitute a discriminatory and unnecessary barrier to U.S. trade.

The document goes on to say:

> For its part, Canada has agreed that cultural measures it takes will not impair the benefits the United States would otherwise expect—

In other words, if anything we do to ensure the growth and vitality of Canadian culture flies in the face of U.S. practice at home and their commercial expectations, it will not be accepted. We reject that approach to the protection of Canadian culture.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Straw man.

Mr. Broadbent: With regard to investment policy, to use an old phrase, one can only say that there has been a total sell-out of Canadian interests. As I mentioned earlier, there has been a change in the threshold for screening purposes. It has been raised to $150 million. A company has to have a minimum of that amount of value before it will be covered by any review process whatsoever. This opens the door completely to takeovers from St. John's, Newfoundland, to Victoria, British Columbia.

• (1210)

Another area of policy that I want to touch on, because it has been of particular importance to our provinces and our territories, deals with procurement policies. Governments at the provincial and the territorial level have sensibly used, for their economic development purposes, in a way duplicating what we did as a nation as a whole since 1867, government procurement policies as a means of enhancing employment growth for their own people and their own regions. That, too, will be seriously jeopardized by this agreement that has been entered into, in principle, between our Government and the Government of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words about the particular impact of this agreement on Quebec.

Many components of this agreement are extremely important for Quebecers. First, in the farming sector, the elimination or reduction of tariffs on poultry and eggs will mean disaster for Quebec producers.

As concerns culture, we have made major concessions which will prevent Canada from guaranteeing the promotion of our cultural industries.

According to the Americans, "Canada has agreed that the cultural measures it takes will not impair the benefits the United States would otherwise expect" from this trade agreement. This is what the Americans have said.

As for the Auto Pact, the recent decision of General Motors in Sainte-Thérèse was a positive decision for the residents of that region, but as everyone knows, until quite recently, this plant had many problems on the North American market. In my opinion, if the Government supports a decision to abolish tariffs in this sector, any future decision for new investments could be negative for a small plant such as the one in Sainte-Thérèse.

As concerns regional development subsidies and policies, I simply want to point out that the so-called dispute settlement mechanism proposed in the agreement poses a very serious threat to our regional development policies.

The agreement states that over the next three to five years, the American Government plans to discuss with the Canadian Government certain changes to our regional development policies. This could be very dangerous for development in Northern Quebec, other regions of Quebec, and even in other provinces.

[English]

I want to conclude with one particular item, that is, the dispute settlement mechanism. It has been said by the Prime Minister and by the Minister who is responsible for international trade at various times that the number one goal in these free trade talks was to get a dispute settlement mechanism that would be fair, take into consideration the interests of both countries and be binding, they said, on both countries. What has been produced in this agreement is a dispute settlement mechanism that will not necessarily be fair, and not take into account the interests or rules of subsidies developed jointly by both countries.

What has been produced is an agreement adhered to by the Government of Canada that will see this new mechanism making judgments in a negative way only if they contravene American law. They did not even get their minimum demand, which was an impartial, fair binding dispute settlement mechanism. That is the reality.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I conclude with this comment. The future of Canada, like that of any other nation, cannot be reduced to its commercial relations. A people have a deep interest in developing its own cultural policies, its own social policies, and its own regional development policies. In short, it has an interest in making all those decisions that are central to what ought to be called a civilized life. Among those decisions are commercial, economic decisions, that is true. Commercial and economic decisions are important. But we in this Party say that a nation cannot be reduced to commercial and economic decision-making.

In particular, we say that if we turn over ultimate authority for economic decision-making to the North American market forces, our capacity to develop a healthy, creative, humane, and just Canada will be severely impaired. We say that this decision reached by the Government of Canada is a bad decision now, a bad decision for the future. We believe the Government has a moral obligation to go now to the people of Canada for a confirmation or rejection of this betrayal of Canadian history.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I am not part of that standing ovation.

I indicated in my speech some moments ago, Mr. Speaker, my intention to table the elements of the agreement which have been included and signed by representatives of both Governments. I am honoured to be able to do so.

I table with you, Mr. Speaker, the document that constitutes the essential elements of a free trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which document was signed on behalf of Canada by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson), the Minister for International Trade (Miss Carney), Derek Burney and Simon Reisman.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The Chair felt that under the circumstances it probably would be acceptable to the House if the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) tabled those documents, having made reference to an intention to do so in his original remarks. Perhaps I should put this question to the House: Is it agreed that the documents be tabled?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

PETITIONS

SUPPORT FOR BILL C-55

Mr. Paul Gagnon (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have both the duty and honour to present a petition signed by residents of Calgary, Langdon, and Slave Lake, Alberta, and of Ottawa, which calls upon Parliament to act upon the problems with refugee determination in Canada, and to restore to the system fairness, justice and expediency by supporting Bill C-55. As in duty bound, your petitioners will ever pray.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of State and Minister of State (Treasury Board)): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that all questions on the Order Paper be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTIONS TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 29

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Speaker: I should advise the House that I have received from the Hon. Member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) an application under Standing Order 29 for an emergency debate tonight. I have also received, in order of receipt, a similar application on behalf of the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy).

I will hear the Hon. Member for Oshawa.

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, as you indicated, earlier today I gave you notice of my intention of rising under the provisions of Standing Order 29 to seek leave to adjourn the House for the purpose of discussing what is an issue of vital national importance.

The issue is that of the agreement in principle that has been entered into between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States in the broad area of free trade. In our view, this agreement goes to the root of the question about what a nation is all about.

For this reason, Mr. Speaker, if you should rule in my favour, at the appropriate time I will be prepared to move the appropriate motion.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, in making application under Standing Order 29 for an emergency debate, first we were motivated by the important substance of the issue. Perhaps there has been no more important issue brought forward to the House in decades.

For the past week we have not had an opportunity to have a debate in the House concerning this issue.

I also wish to draw to the attention of the Chair that the announcement and the documents tabled today by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) are called, "Elements of the Agreement". Many of the important consequences and details surrounding that are missing. We presume that that can only be achieved or attained by the opportunity to have a full exchange and dialogue in the House. The impact upon agriculture, the Auto Pact, and others are such that there are many interest groups and major constituencies in the country which, this morning, are in deep concern and uncertainty as to the meaning of this agreement. They will only be able to achieve understanding if the House has an opportunity to debate the issues at the first and earliest opportunity.

Mr. Speaker: I wish to assure the Hon. Member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy), and other Hon. Members that the Chair, of course, takes the matter as one of great importance, as has been indicated in the House, as do all Hon. Members, although there may be some division on the support for the measure or opposition to it.

However, I note that we have now had an extensive debate. There will be Question Period following this afternoon. The Government has indicated that the documents which record the understanding are going in front of a committee.

An Hon. Member: When?

Mr. Speaker: I hear an Hon. Member ask, "When?". Perhaps the Hon. Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Mazankowski) and the House Leaders could discuss that. At least for today, we should probably let the usual course proceed. Of course, I would imagine there will be extensive discussion during Question Period on some of the matters to which both Hon. Members have referred.

I would ask that the Hon. Deputy Prime Minister assist the Chair in making it clear to both the House Leader of the Official Opposition, and the House Leader of the New Democratic Party when these documents will be in front of the committee and, of course, which committee will be hearing them.

At this time the Deputy Prime Minister may not be prepared to do that, but I hope it will be done at the very earliest convenience.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may respond for the interim. My response will be fully consistent with that which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) has indicated all along. This issue will be subjected to full parliamentary debate. He came to the House as soon as physically possible to make a statement on the issue. The documents have now been tabled with the Clerk. This matter will be referred to a parliamentary committee. My colleague, the Deputy House Leader, will be meeting with the House Leaders early this week to attempt to work out the logistics. We hope that that could be proceeded with forthwith, with the very minimum of delay.

3. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 95 thereof, the following heading and sections:

95A. (2) An agreement that has the force of law under subsection (1) shall have effect only so long and so far as it is not repugnant to any provision of an Act of the Parliament of Canada that sets national standards and objectives relating to immigration or aliens, including any provision that establishes general classes of immigrants or relates to levels of immigration for Canada or that prescribes classes of individuals who are inadmissible into Canada.

95D. Sections 46 to 48 of the Constitution Act, 1982 apply, with such modifications as the circumstances require, in respect of any declaration made pursuant to subsection 95C(1), any amendment to an agreement made pursuant to subsection 95C(2) or any amendment made pursuant to section 95E.

95E. An amendment to sections 95A to 95D or this section may be made in accordance with the procedure set out in subsection 38(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, but only if the amendment is authorized by resolutions of the legislative assemblies of all the provinces that are, at the time of the amendment, parties to an agreement that has the force of law under subsection 95B(1)."

101A. (1) The court existing under the name of the Supreme Court of Canada is hereby continued as the general court of appeal for Canada, and as an additional court for the better administration of the laws of Canada, and shall continue to be a superior court of record.

(2) The Supreme Court of Canada shall consist of a chief justice to be called the Chief Justice of Canada and eight other judges, who shall be appointed by the Governor General in Council by letters patent under the Great Seal.

101B. (1) Any person may be appointed a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada who, after having been admitted to the bar of any province or territory, has, for a total of at least ten years, been a judge of any court in Canada or a member of the bar of any province or territory.

(2) At least three judges of the Supreme Court of Canada shall be appointed from among persons who, after having been admitted to the bar of Quebec, have, for a total of at least ten years, been judges of any court of Quebec or of any court established by the Parliament of Canada, or members of the bar of Quebec.

101C. (1) Where a vacancy occurs in the Supreme Court of Canada, the government of each province may, in relation to that vacancy, submit to the Minister of Justice of Canada the names of any of the persons who have been admitted to the bar of that province and are qualified under section 101B for appointment to that court.

(2) Where an appointment is made to the Supreme Court of Canada, the Governor General in Council shall, except where the Chief Justice is appointed from among members of the Court, appoint a person whose name has been submitted under subsection (1) and who is acceptable to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada.

(4) Where an appointment is made in accordance with subsection (2) otherwise than as required under subsection (3), the Governor General in Council shall appoint a person whose name has been submitted by the government of a province other than Quebec.

101E. (1) Sections 101A to 101D shall not be construed as abrogating or derogating from the powers of the Parliament of Canada to make laws under section 101 except to the extent that such laws are inconsistent with those sections.

(2) For greater certainty, section 101A shall not be construed as abrogating or derogating from the powers of the Parliament of Canada to make laws relating to the reference of questions of law or fact, or any other matters, to the Supreme Court of Canada."

7. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 106 thereof, the following section:

"106A. (1) The Government of Canada shall provide reasonable compensation to the government of a province that chooses not to participate in a national shared-cost program that is established by the Government of Canada after the coming into force of this section in an area of exclusive provincial jurisdiction, if the province carries on a program or initiative that is compatible with the national objectives.

(2) Nothing in this section extends the legislative powers of the Parliament of Canada or of the legislatures of the provinces."

8. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto the following heading and sections:

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I rise to take part in this debate because I am among those who believe that, if we want to maintain and promote Canadian unity, it is essential to make Quebec an integral part of the Constitution Act, 1982.

[English]

Under Prime Ministers Laurier, King, St. Laurent, Pearson, Trudeau, and Turner, the Liberal Party, when in power, has always stood for constitutional policies to affirm Canada's sovereignty and political independence, to protect the basic rights and freedoms of Canadians, to recognize the French fact throughout Canada, and to respect the federal system of Canada.

In 1971, after long and delicate constitutional negotiations, the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner), then Minister of Justice, had achieved a consensus in Victoria. However, because of the political climate in Quebec, Mr. Bourassa was unable to ratify the agreement.

I well remember the evening of November 15, 1976, when a separatist Government was elected in Quebec. There was sadness on Parliament Hill and we had a lot of fears about the future of our country, which fears lasted until the 1980 referendum, and finally, the election of a Liberal Government in Quebec.

While we celebrated the patriation of the Constitution in 1982, our joy was somewhat tarnished by the fact that the separatist Government in Quebec had not signed the agreement.

[English]

In November, 1986, the Liberal Party of Canada at its biennial policy convention adopted, by an overwhelming majority, Resolution No. 8 which reads as follows:

• (1230)

Be it resolved that:

(a) a preamble be added to the Constitution of Canada to recognize:

(i) the commitment of Canadians to maintain and reinforce across Canada the linguistic duality of the Canadian federation,

(ii) the distinctive character of Quebec as the principal but not the exclusive source of the French language and culture in Canada,

(iii) the multicultural nature of Canadian society, and in particular respect for the many origins, creeds and cultures as well as the differing regional identities that help shape Canadian society;

(iv) the contribution of Canada's aboriginal peoples,

(v) the advantage of developing the Canadian economic union;

If a Liberal Government had been negotiating constitutional change with the provinces, that resolution would have been our basic negotiating position. In contrast, the arrangement negotiated by the Conservative Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) has a number of flaws which, in my view, should be corrected before the resolution is adopted.

The Government has refused to accept any amendments, allegedly because of fear the agreement will unravel. This attitude shows a great lack of faith in the Members of this House, in the provincial Premiers, and, indeed, in the people of Canada.

A full and open debate can only strengthen the Accord. The joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons which sat prior to the patriation of the Constitution in 1982 held public hearings for a year. This Government allowed only a matter of weeks for the joint committee to hold hearings and refused to allow any hearings outside Ottawa.

Referring to the amendments which my Party proposes now, first we want to include as fundamental characteristics of Canada the recognition of our aboriginal peoples, the recognition of the multicultural mosaic of Canada, the recognition of the regional identities, and the advantages of lower trade barriers between provinces.

We want to offer more protection for official language minorities by ensuring that Parliament is responsible for promoting, as well as maintaining, official minority language rights.

We would also like to see a firm commitment that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms takes precedence, in order that the basic rights and freedoms of Canadians are not diminished in any way by possible conflicts with other clauses in the Accord.

We believe in an elected Senate, and our proposal would accelerate the move from an appointed Senate to an elected Senate by electing Senators now when vacancies occur rather than appointing them based on provincial lists.

Also, our amendment concerning the Senate would recognize the right of the citizens of Yukon and Northwest Territories to senatorial election, because the current Accord before us leaves a gap in that Canadians living north of the 60th parallel would not be entitled to any future representation or appointment to the Senate.

These are responsible and reasonable amendments which meet the concerns of women, of aboriginal peoples, and of Canadians whose first language is neither English nor French. Representatives of these interests all made very moving presentations before the joint committee, but unfortunately their words fell on deaf ears, as the Conservative majority refused to consider any amendments.

If the Government had been prepared to accept these amendments, the resolution before us would have been strengthened, and the joy we all feel at Quebec's accession would not have been marred by our awareness that many thoughtful Canadians are uneasy about the unseemly haste and the undemocratic manner in which the issue has been handled.

Prior to the 1980 referendum, Liberals undertook to the people of Quebec that their vote for Canada would be followed by a commitment on our part to renew federalism. The motion before us today goes part way to meeting that commitment, and therefore I must vote for it. However, I wish the Government had been prepared to take the time and trouble to get it right now, instead of leaving it to future Governments to bring about a real consensus.

Hon. David Crombie (Secretary of State): Madam Speaker, I suppose today is a day of historic debate and historic happenings. I am very pleased to be able to participate in the debate in respect of the so-called Meech Lake Accord, in particular the debate on the report of the Special Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the 1987 Constitutional Accord.

I, like a number of Members of the House, have had an opportunity to read the report. For those people who have not yet had an opportunity to read it, I commend it to them. It is very well written in an extremely balanced manner. The co-chairmen of the committee, Senator Arthur Tremblay and the Hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer), did an outstanding job both in terms of the conduct of the committee and the report.

The report itself carries with it an uncommon amount of agreement and support, because not only was there a process where people came before the committee and offered their views and their briefs, but, most important, standing behind the process of the committee was an historic event, that is, a continuation of the understanding of the role of Quebec in Canada. That is what the Accord is about, I might say.

Much of the public discussion has dealt with other important matters, but sometimes we have forgotten in the debate that the Accord is about the role of Quebec. There is no issue in Canadian politics over 200 years which has occupied our time more than this. Indeed, there is no chapter in Canadian history which does not include in it, as it turns the page, a new understanding or a refined understanding of the role of Quebec in the Canadian family.

From 1760 to 1763, to the Quebec Act of 1774, to the constitutional Act of 1791, to the implementation of the Durham report in 1840, and to the British North America Act of 1867, each one of those parts of Canadian history carried with it an understanding of the role of Quebec. I do not want us to misunderstand, therefore, the purpose of the Accord. It is to deal specifically with the role of Quebec in the 21st century in Canada.

In our own time that debate began with the so-called Quiet Revolution of 1960. We were treated in the 1960s and 1970s to new phrases to try to capture the question of the day—what does Quebec want? We were treated to the following new phrases: mâitre chez nous, equality or independence, sovereignty association, and the referendum debate. Those of us who listened to the radio, read the newspapers, and watched our television screens were involved in a fairly tumultuous event, that is, a country redefining itself as the Quebec society in the Province of Quebec began to redefine itself in the latter part of the 20th century.

Events began to pick up by 1976 with the historic election of the Péquistes in the Province of Quebec. By 1980, Quebecers found themselves involved in an historic debate, an internal struggle between opposing views within regions, cities, towns and families. During the debate in the referendum it was clear that those of us who supported the federalist side were promising Quebecers that there would be a renewed federalism. This was not simply saying no or yes to sovereignty association. This was a positive thing, and it also said to Quebecers that we would engage in a process and at the end of it we would have a renewed federalism. By 1982, part of that was delivered in the 1982 constitution amendment, much of which was taken up by the patriation, the question of the amendment and the question of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. But while the rest of Canada said yes to the 1982 constitutional amendment, all political Parties and the National Assembly in the Province of Quebec said no because the 1982 constitutional amendment did not deal with the historic question of the role of Quebec in Confederation. There the matter sat. We had in a sense gone part way, with the Charter, the patriation, the amendment, but responsible leadership and the majority of the people in the Province of Quebec said no.

In 1984, the newly elected Leader of the Conservative Party who became Prime Minister in 1984 said that he was willing to step forward and engage a process which would bring Quebec into the constitutional family with full heart and mind, and I quote: "with honour and enthusiasm". That was followed in June, 1985 by the Quebec Liberal Party coming forward with a document called Maîtriser l'avenir describing what in its view Quebec wanted in terms of a definition of its relationship to the rest of Canada. The Party was elected on the basis of that document. That document became the official position of the new Government in Quebec City. In August, 1986 the Premiers of all the provinces and the federal Government agreed that the first constitutional priority would be the five proposals made by the Province of Quebec. Those five proposals are worth noting.

First, recognition of Quebec as a distinct society. Second, the guarantee of increased responsibility for immigration. Third, participation in appointing the justices of the Supreme Court of Canada. Fourth, restrictions on the federal Government's spending power. Fifth and last, recognition of veto rights for Quebec on amendments to the Constitution.

[English]

Those five proposals became the basis for the constitutional initiative beginning in August, 1986. By April 30, 1987 the historic Meech Lake Accord was established, with the federal Government and the provinces agreeing in principle to those five proposals, the basis upon which Quebec could see its new role in Canada.

On May 11, 1987 an historic resolution was brought into this House by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) indicating that the provinces and the federal Government reached a constitutional Accord fully on those five proposals. On June 17, the joint committee of the House and the Senate was established, and on August 4 until September 1 that joint committee began to hold public hearings. On June 23, 1987 the National Assembly of the Province of Quebec voted yes to Canada on the basis of those five proposals.

The reason I dwell on the timeframe, Madam Speaker, is not because I simply like to quote dates, but it is important to understand that this is not something that came out of the blue or was thought up in a morning. The role of Quebec in Canada is fundamental to the understanding that the country has of itself. Any discussion in any debate of substance on it must constantly recognize the historic context and certainly the events of the last 10 years. It is on the important understanding of making sure that the measure and level of support for this Accord is maintained.

It is not easy to get agreement in this diverse country. When you have three political Parties and 10 provinces willing to support conditions which allow Quebec to play its full role in Canada, we have an historic Accord worth defending. That is why our Government, and I am happy to say other political parties and ten provinces support it.

It is also important, when we go through such an historic event when we change the Constitution in that way, to understand its impact, certainly in two ways. First, what is the impact of the Meech Lake Accord in relation to the Canadian institution, Canadian values and Canadian unity? Second, what is its impact on Canada and on the other partners within the Canadian constitutional family?

Let me deal with the first question, Madam Speaker. What is the impact of the Meech Lake Accord on Canada? Imagine if we did not have this Accord. Imagine where we would be in the 1990s and in the 21st century with a new generation of Canadians without Quebec with heart and mind within the constitutional structure. As the Prime Minister has said on a previous occasion, without Quebec adhering to the Constitution of 1982 through these five proposals we would have the growth of two Canadas; one that followed the 1982 Accord, and one that did not. We would also have a growing disenchantment on the part of the people in the Province of Quebec because we failed to match with our words and action what we put into the referendum debate, because we said there would be a renewed federalism and that we would talk about the role of Quebec in Canada. The 1982 Accord failed to do that.

Some people who came before the committee talked about that sense of disenchantment. They told us they had fought hard within their own towns, villages, neighbourhoods and within their own families and had hung on to the promise of a previous Prime Minister and a previous Government that there would be a renewed federalism.

That is why the first point to make with respect to the Accord's impact is to understand that without it we would be in great trouble and increasingly that trouble would grow and grow.

Does the Accord strengthen or weaken Canada? Let me say at the outset that in my judgment it strengthens Canada. Considerable debate by many groups as to whether or not there has been a strengthening or a weakening as a consequence of the Accord has taken place but part of it depends on one's perspective of what this country actually is. Many good people came before the committee offering their views as to whether Canada is strengthened or weakened by the Meech Lake Accord. Let me offer the views of two. Mr. Gordon Robertson, former Clerk of the Privy Council, came before the committee and said—

Another question is whether the agreement weakens the federal government in any significant and important way. Here one has to note that the accord does not change the distribution of powers in any way; nothing is changed in Sections 91, 92 and 93.

During the constitutional negotiations in 1968 to 1971 and later up to 1979, it was fully expected that there would be changes in the distribution of powers. Quebec sought a number of changes in the distribution of powers. This accord does not change that distribution in any way.

• (1250)

Indeed, it is important to note that because Sections 91, 92 and 93 provide the fundamental divisions of power in Canada and, as a consequence, as Mr. Robertson pointed out, the Accord does not affect the powers in Sections 91, 92 and 93.

Eric Kierans spoke on the matter. You may recall, Madam Speaker, that he was a Liberal cabinet Minister, an economist and former president of the Montreal Stock Exchange. I thought he offered considerable wisdom when he talked about the Accord in light of the original spirit of 1867. He said:

Meech Lake is not new. It is simply the closest thing we have come to following the original intent and meaning of the British North America Act since Confederation itself. It reflects more accurately the view of what the original Fathers of Confederation thought they were agreeing to in a Confederation. They lived with each other, quarrelled and wrangled in debates, assemblies and conferences for years. They knew what was possible and what the different colonies would accept. They never intended that the provinces should be as dependent as they, in fact became. Above all else, they knew that a centralized Canada would not work.

I know that all of us want Canada to be strong, but some people confuse a powerful central Government with a strong Canada. That has not been my experience, and I do not think it has been the historical experience of this country. If we do not have strong sides, we cannot have a strong centre. If there are not strong regions, there will not be a strong country.

The key thing to understand about the Meech Lake Accord, as Mr. Kierans points out, is the re-establishment of a balance in Canada, a balance that says that all provinces and all regions, along with the federal Government, make up the strength of this country. That is why, when I ask if the Accord has maintained a strong Canada, I have no doubt that it has maintained a strong Canada.

I want to deal in the remainder of my time with those groups that came forward to deal with another impact of the Meech Lake Accord. They were concerned about the impact of the Accord on their particular situation as members of the Canadian constitutional family. I am referring particularly to aboriginal people and those groups concerned with multiculturalism.

Let me make a general point. I said to those people, some of whom I have known for many years, that anything that contributes to the understanding of the importance of cultural and linguistic diversity contributes to the goals of those people who see Canada as contributing to their diversity. Aboriginal people, people concerned with multiculturalism and any group of people who depend on the concept of diversity should support the Meech Lake Accord because the Meech Lake Accord is the historic, the current and the future understanding of Quebec's role in Canada which speaks first to the tolerance required with respect to differences of culture and language. I think that aboriginal people would understand that first of all.

Those of us who participated in the constitutional debate involving aboriginal people in 1985 well remember the impact of Quebec's absence. We well remember the importance of Quebec to those talks and, indeed, the absence of Quebec helped contribute to the lack of success.

Mary Simon, a Quebec Inuit leader and past president of the National Committee on Inuit Issues, spoke eloquently on that matter. She said that it was important to understand that constitutional amendment would not benefit aboriginal peoples of Quebec as long as Quebec was not part of the Constitution. It was difficult, she said, to achieve enough provincial support to meet the requirements of the amending formula, seven provinces and half the population.

She, along with Robert Stanfield and many professors, came before the committee to outline the importance to the aboriginal communities that they be involved in a process of constitutional change, and this Government has always supported that. Now that Quebec is part of the constitutional family in a full way, aboriginal people will benefit as a consequence because they will have a constitutional process involving 10 provinces and not nine.

Finally, let me say that many members of multicultural groups came forward. Multiculturalism is the oldest reality in Canada. It gained constitutional recognition in 1982 with Section 27. Section 27 says that this Charter, the law of the land, will be interpreted in a manner consistent with the enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians. In that spirit, we have adopted programs and policies which support integration, retention of cultures and languages, race relations and community relations. In that spirit, we established in 1985 a Standing Committee of the House on Multiculturalism. In that spirit, we will be bringing forward the Multicultural Act this fall, Canada's first.

It is also in that spirit that the Accord brought in through Section 16 a protection for multicultural rights contained in the Constitution. Section 16 says that Section 27 of the Constitution dealing with multicultural rights will have equal legal status as the courts interpret the Constitution. In short, Section 16 shelters Section 27.

The committee recommended that there be a standing joint committee that would allow those groups who want further constitutional change beyond that which the 1982 amendment gave them to seek it in the second round. That should be a good opportunity for those groups to come forward.

I have tried to point out to the House that the role of Quebec through this process has been put in train for the next decade and the next century. It is an historic achievement. Second, its impact has been to strengthen Canada. Third, it supports all of those other members of the constitutional family who so much depend on this country's continued recognition of the importance of diversity and tolerance.

When we say that we support the joint committee's report, we say yes to Quebec. When we say yes to Quebec, we say yes to Canada.

Mr. Berger: Madam Speaker, the Secretary of State (Mr. Crombie) is to be commended for his speech, although I do not entirely agree with everything he said. Since I was not in the House throughout his speech, I wonder whether he referred to the concerns of groups such as the Fédération des Francophones hors Québec, the Société franco-manitobaine or Canadian Parents for French, who, I found, were very eloquent in expressing their concern that, in the Meech Lake Accord or as a result of that Accord, the Governments do not undertake to promote the cause of language minorities. The Accord merely maintains or protects minorities, which, according to the groups I mentioned, merely means maintaining the status quo, something they find unacceptable. The Fédération des Francophones hors Québec said that the wording of the Meech Lake Accord was entirely inadequate to put a stop to the ravages of assimilation. That is what they said when they appeared before the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons.

I therefore wonder how the Secretary of State, who, if I am not mistaken, has a responsibility for language minorities, responds to the concerns of these groups.

Mr. Crombie: Madam Speaker, I did meet many groups from outside Quebec and especially the Fédération des Francophones hors Québec.

• (1300)

[English]

When they raised questions with me regarding their concern about Meech Lake I said, as indeed I have said on other occasions, that it seems to me the important thing to understand about the Accord is the first part. It speaks for the first time about the importance of the relationship of dual languages and a distinct Quebec within the whole of Canada. It makes clear—the role of Quebec and the role of both official languages and that it is an important one which lies at the very heart of Canada. And the Accord reflects that reality.

[English]

Mr. Berger: I would like to refer the Minister to the speech made by the Quebec Minister for Intergovernmental Affairs on May 9, 1986. He said that one of the three principal objectives of the Government of Quebec was to improve the situation of French-speaking Canadians outside Quebec. He referred to the need to change Section 23 of the Charter to provide for management, if you will, of their schools by French-speaking Canadians. He also referred to removing perhaps the criteria of "where numbers warrant" prior to availing oneself of the right to minority language education under Section 23 of the Charter.

Quebec says that this was their objective. Presumably it was an objective of the federal Government. Therefore, why did the federal Government not insist that these changes be made to the Charter in order to improve the situation of French-speaking minorities outside Quebec?

Mr. Crombie: Madam Speaker, I do not think it makes much sense to go behind the agreement. It was made by Quebec, the Government of Canada, and all the other provinces. It may well be in the give and take of negotiations that there were some things a particular province may not have been looking for, or they were unable to obtain something that they were looking for. That could apply to the federal Government as well. All that has to do with the essential way in which we go about Constitution-making. It does not involve some kind of ideological purity. It is not some kind of academic event flowing only from legal classrooms. It has to do with the blood and guts of the country. It has to do with compromise. That is why I spoke about the historic role of Quebec. It has always been part of the give and take over the nature of this country.

The Hon. Member asks why something did not happen. In my judgment it is part of the realism and magic of federalism. It is a product of compromise, not some kind of ideological event.

The second point I would make with respect to the question of French outside Quebec is that this Government, and I might add this Minister along with two others, brought to this House for first reading the first changes to the Official Languages Act in 17 years. Included in those changes were the promotion of French outside the Province of Quebec, and this involves a strong role for the Secretary of State. It therefore seems to me that the Government understood that plea and responded in a very impressive way. In that respect I do not think this Government needs to make any apology. We brought forward changes to the Act which would allow us to expand the opportunities for French outside the Province of Quebec.

Mr. Berger: Madam Speaker, the Minister has specific responsibility for minority language rights. He talks about amendments to the Official Languages Act. Why does the Minister not put the obligation to promote minority language rights into the Constitution and not just preserve the status quo?

He talked about the give and take of negotiations. We are all well aware of that and of the so-called negotiating prowess of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney). Yet when we are drafting the Constitution, is it not fundamental that the federal Government should take its responsibilities to heart, not compromise, and insist that at least its obligation in this area is put into the clear language of the Constitution?

Mr. Mantha: What did you do when you were in power?

Mr. Crombie: Madam Speaker, with respect to the responsibilities for the promotion of French outside the Province of Quebec, the Government is not promising to do it. It is doing it! That is the difference between this Government and the Government of which he was a Member. That is why I mentioned that for 17 years there was no change. We brought in changes to the Act, and those changes will expand the opportunities for the use of French beyond Quebec. It is an excellent Bill. Indeed, the Commissioner of Official Languages recently wrote an essay commending the Government for it. It is the delivery of those programs which is needed, and that is what we are doing through the Official Languages Act.

• (1310)

Second, I think it lies idle in the mouth of the Hon. Member to suggest that the Prime Minister was not up to the mark with regard to negotiating skills. I remind him that when it was his turn in 1982 he was quite capable of supporting a resolution which did not even include the Province of Quebec. Many of us did that in order to support the Charter, but to use this now as a political tool to say that the Prime Minister did not negotiate well is unfounded. This negotiation was inspired by the Prime Minister and has the support of all three Parties and the 10 provinces. That is why it is historic.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The period for questions and comments has now expired. Resuming debate.

[English]

Ms. Marion Dewar (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, it is a great privilege to rise today to speak on the Meech Lake Accord which is an historic agreement. I believe that we have had a period of great injury in this country and that a healing process is now taking place. That process is very important. I do recognize, however, that there are compromises in this Accord. I believe that Canadians have the ability to bridge some of the difficulties and will do so in the future.

So often we lose track of our historical roots. This country has the great benefit and privilege of having been conceived, not out of civil war, but out of partnership and compromise. People said that they could respect our different cultures and different religious backgrounds and were willing to protect them so that we could join hands and come together as a country.

I noted with sadness that some of the previous debate in this House weakened that resolve to form a strong country different from the country south of the border. It is sad to realize that the agreement put forward earlier this morning may weaken the union that we formed.

Some of the things which happened in the Meech Lake Accord are not dissimilar to things which happened in 1867. A group of people came together and said that it was very important that we respect the differences of others. As in the preliminary Charter, women were forgotten in the Meech Lake Accord, and I believe that that happened in 1867 as well. Through the Persons case, that was amended in the Supreme Court in London. However, the New Democrats believe that the rights of women are not eroded in the Accord. We would like women to be included in the abundance of caution which Senator Murray identified for aboriginal and multicultural people.

The Meech Lake Accord celebrates the fact that our country is becoming whole, and that is very important. We do recommend some very minor amendments. We believe that the major amendments which are being put forward are irresponsible because they can unravel the Accord. We believe that the Accord is precious and must be nurtured. We must look forward to the future with it.

Whether through oversight or not, Yukon and the Territories were ignored with regard to appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada and to the Senate. We believe that must be corrected.

The amending formula which ignores the right of the Northwest Territories and Yukon to become provinces must also be amended. No other province in this country had to have the unanimous support of all other provinces for that. There may be some flexibility there. Perhaps the political will of the people will convince the First Ministers that this slight amendment can be made without unravelling the Accord. These are the kinds of things that are very important.

As a feminist and a woman I have been very concerned about the rights of women in the Accord. I have become satisfied in my own mind that the rights of women will not be weakened by it. National women's organizations, including the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, have suggested that in some circumstances the Accord's recognition of Quebec as a distinct society might lead to court judgments which adversely affect the Charter of Rights. The Quebec Charter of Rights has set an example for us all in the way that it has addressed equality rights for women.

As a New Democrat I do not believe that sexual equality will be adversely affected. We know that the charter guarantee of sexual equality was an important achievement for Canadian women. I am very proud to say that I was active in organizing women across Canada in that regard.

We support the compromise that has been arrived at between the National Action Committee and the Féderation des femmes du Québec, the leading Quebec women's organization. The same abundance of caution that prompted guarantees that the Accord would not affect aboriginal rights or multiculturalism should be applied to sexual equality. That is one of the amendments that we are urging the First Ministers to support.

We would certainly like to see an agenda put forward for a national conference on aboriginal rights. It seems ludicrous that we would make an agenda for the First Ministers without including a specific time for a conference on aboriginal rights. Such a conference would put our aboriginal people in a better position than they have ever been in before. With Quebec at the table it will be more feasible to get seven provinces and 50 per cent of the population to support that amendment. Those are some of the reasons for which we think it is very important to recognize that becoming a family is more important than studying every detail.

We must recognize that the nomination of Supreme Court judges by the provinces has taken place in name in the past anyway. We are really legitimatizing some things which are already taking place. We must recognize that a strong federal Government without strength in the regions is not really a strong federal Government. The heart is really what the roots are all about. If that is recognized it will be a good thing for Canada. In many aspects the Meech Lake Accord represents the coming of age of our country.

Those things are important, but we must not erode other things which are equally as important. I speak, of course, about equality rights, the rights of the aboriginal people, and of the North which is so precious to all of us. The very small amendments put forward by the New Democratic Party are not meant to unravel the agreement. We wanted our amendments to be recognized as intending to help the Accord and strengthen the Canadian Constitution.

The Meech Lake Accord was long overdue. The fact that we repatriated the Constitution while leaving out a very strong element of the country always seemed to me to be in contradiction to what Canada was all about. It was certainly not the way that Canada came into being in the first place. It seems to me that the time for that healing has taken place. I certainly think that we are in a position in which we can certainly support that.

I urge the Government, however, to think seriously about the amendments that have been put forward by the New Democratic Party. They have been put forward thoughtfully, looking at the fact that, historically, the women of this country have been ignored many times over in the legislative process. What they are really asking for is to have the same concern, the same abundance of caution taken as far as their rights are concerned, as are taken with the aboriginal people and members of the multicultural community.

I also feel that most of the attributes of the Accord and the changes that are taking place are positive. They legitimatize some of the things that I have mentioned that have already taken place. But if we also look toward the future of the country we will recognize that with the Accord, if we are going to have regular constitutional conferences, if we are going to have all the provinces at the table on an ongoing basis so that we can look at the process, the Canadian people will become familiar with what their Constitution is all about.

There is a recommendation that a parliamentary committee be set up so that Canadians can have constant input into what the constitutional amendments are all about. One of the saddest things is that we do not as a people understand our history well enough. That is why some of the debates have taken place in the past in our communities, when there has not been a respect for each other, our cultures and our rights. I think that more and more as we understand our history, the possibility of understanding and having ownership of our Constitution, there will be an ongoing committee that can handle that matter.

Too often constitutional amendments have been seen as something that take place in the back room or, may I be so bold as to say, in a kitchen of a restaurant. It is not really the dignified way that Canadian people want to participate in the process of amending their Constitution. Certainly, we can set up a committee that will have ongoing jurisdiction for constitutional amendments, in which Canadians are encouraged to participate. The young Canadians that we heard about earlier today would be able to participate in the process instead of looking where their jobs will come from south of the border. They can participate in amending their Constitution so that they have ownership of it. They can have pride in that. They will have the ability to develop their own economy and their own jobs and sovereignty. That is the kind of thing we are really talking about when we talk about the Meech Lake Accord.

The Meech Lake Accord is bringing us up to 1987 legitimately in terms of what we can do in a legalistic way, but I like to think that out of this debate and out of these discussions will come a true vision of the future in which we Canadians can amend our Constitution, own our Constitution, and really have a vision about what our country is all about. I think that is why it is so important that the Meech Lake Accord be supported.

I would certainly ask the Government to take seriously the very small amendments that have been put forward just to give the Canadian population, the aboriginal people, the northern people and the women of this country that sense of security that they long for so dearly. I do not think it would unravel the Accord at all. I think it is really important that the priority be there, that we become a family as a whole, that Quebec be at the table with us, and that, once again, as in 1867, we can say: "Yes, we do respect each other. We understand how we were built. We know what our foundations are all about. We want to be strong and make sure that our true North strong and free is also participating in the whole debate".

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Are there questions or comments? The Hon. Member for Laurier (Mr. Berger).

Mr. Berger: Madam Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Hon. Member, recognizing that she is a new parliamentarian, of recent vintage if I may say. I listened to her comments about the need for participation by the citizenry, by the average citizen, in the process of constitutional reform, which, as she said, would, hopefully, take some of these decisions out of the back room. Does she not feel, though, that the Meech Lake agreement will make inevitable decisions in the back room?

I say that looking at the fact that, first, there are to be annual First Ministers' conferences, and the First Ministers will be sitting down at a table. Mr. Trudeau has called this a Diréctoire which will be deciding things for our country.

When we look at the appointments to the Supreme Court and to the Senate, these decisions will be made by the executive branches of Government, by the Cabinet, by the Prime Minister and the provincial Premiers, presumably. There is no say whatsoever for the legislative branch, for Parliament, in this process of appointments. This is a far cry, I am sure the Hon. Member will recognize, from what is happening in the United States at the present time. In that country Congress, or the Senate at least, and perhaps both Houses, but the Senate certainly has the right of veto of appointments to the Supreme Court of the United States. We can see the magnificence of that kind of process. I am not suggesting that we have to go that far. But the Meech Lake agreement, I would suggest to the Hon. Member, rules out any meaningful input by parliamentarians, let alone citizens, the ordinary citizens of this land. I ask for her thoughts on this subject, which is a very disquieting one to me.

Ms. Dewar: Madam Speaker, I think that if one looks at the recommendation that deals with a parliamentary committee that will travel across the country before the First Ministers' Conference, that will certainly give more input and more legitimate participation to Canadians than has ever happened before. I hope that the Hon. Member's question does not suggest that there has been a more open process in the past. I was very much a part as an ordinary citizen of trying to get input after 1980-81 when the women of this country were trying to organize and say: "Do not ignore us again". Certainly, when the Meech Lake Accord took place, it took place with the First Ministers and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) without there having been a lot of previous discussion across the country. And the Accord is now in front of us.

I think the positive part of the Accord is that now the committee report is recommending a procedure that can include Canadians before First Ministers' conferences. What we are talking about with the First Ministers and the Prime Minister is people who are duly elected by the people in the provinces, which is a democratic process. We are not in the form of a republic. We have to recognize that our Charter is a Charter that is in the context of a parliamentary system.

In that process the methodology that is recommended by the committee is a very good one because it allows for Canadians to participate. It will finally put an end to the boys having their little conferences and then, all of a sudden, things being brought forward and our reacting to them. I think the potential to have that procedure in place is very much there in the committee report.

I think the committee report is a very comprehensive one and a very good one. It was done in a very short time, I must say. I was quite pleased when I looked at it because I had thought that maybe it would be just a rush job. I do not think it is. I think it is thoughtful. The recommendations in it are very good. I think that the potential for building a stronger and better country is there, if we listen to those recommendations.

Mr. Berger: Madam Speaker, I would like to direct a question in another area to the Hon. Member. It is in the area of the spending power. The Hon. Member, who is a former Mayor of Ottawa, over the years has demonstrated a concern for social problems. She is probably familiar with some of the recommendations that have been made in recent years for reform of our social programs, notably the recommendations of the Macdonald Commission to establish a comprehensive income security program.

In French, I believe it is called a "régime universel de sécurité du revenu".

• (1330)

I wonder if the Hon. Member listened to the testimony of Professor Al Johnson before the joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons. Professor Johnson is knowledgeable in this area, he has been a Deputy Minister in Saskatchewan and in the federal area, and he reminded the committee members and parliamentarians that a long, hard battle had to be fought to establish medicare. Some of the provinces fought this tooth and nail, particularly the Province of Ontario. Professor Johnson suggests that giving the provinces the right to opt out of shared cost programs, and receive full compensation without having to meet any national standards, will ensure that it will be all but impossible to reform our social programs, to institute a guaranteed annual income, or to undertake many of the other social reforms that are badly needed in this country.

Will the Hon. Member comment on Professor Johnson's ideas?

Ms. Dewar: Certainly, one of my concerns was the spending powers. For the first time we may even have strengthened our federal spending powers. In the Meech Lake Accord we are setting national objectives and not standards. Anybody who has evaluated programs in a variety of places, and I am sure that the Hon. Minister would recognize the same thing in looking at what happens in an urban setting versus what happens in a rural setting, when the Government becomes the instrument of delivery of programs the standards become very different. The objectives can be the same. We now have the ability to be able to set national objectives instead of standards.

That is exceptionally important for the simple reason that Canadians will begin to understand what values are being put forward when there is a national objective for a program.

For instance, if a child care program is to be accessible and delivered by a non-profit co-operative, or by a Government, there can be a variety of standards. But the objectives are that it is accessible and not profit making. Therefore, that national objective can be there. It could be very different in northern Canada, in southwestern Ontario, and on the Prairies, but the objective is there for the children. If a national Government wishes to privatize all service deliveries and it does not wish them to be accessible to everybody, it may wish to have a test for those people who are deserving, and those objectives must be stated. Therefore, there will not be that national program.

Certainly, in regard to the medicare system, Al Johnson validly stated that it was the Liberals in Saskatchewan who fought it to no end at that time. The Conservatives in Ontario were talking about the erosion of any type of health care delivery to people in Canada. It had to be negotiated by the federal Government and the provinces to be able to be implemented. At that time there was no ability in the Constitution to be able to set a national objective and to go in and do the spending.

It was the political will of the people that eventually brought it to bear. In that manner we achieved the health care system that we have today. It may have all types of warts and problems in it, but I challenge anyone because I think it is second to none in the world.

That was done in our funny Canadian way. We look at things, compromise, and negotiate. Now we are looking at it and we have matured to the point where we are stating in our Constitution that the federal Government should have the ability to set national objectives. When it sets national objectives, the provinces must come along. If they do not come along, they do not become part of that program. Therefore, they do not receive the moneys for it. As a municipal politician, I certainly recognize that those are the levers that really work.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle—Moose Mountain): Madam Speaker, it is very pleasant for me to be able to enter this debate following the speech of the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Ms. Dewar).

As one old-timer to another, we recognize experience and the necessity to be moderate and lucid. The speech of the Hon. Member today delighted me to no end. For those who have been around for a good many decades in the field of government, it is very clear to us that there is no such thing as a perfect law. There is no such thing as a perfect agreement, whether it is called Meech Lake or anything else. We can only do our best and hope that it is general enough to cover all the points. The Hon. Member clearly made the point that when one gets down into details, one gets lost and into all types of extraneous fights.

There is the feeling in the House that the new Member for Hamilton Mountain deserves the congratulations of those of us who are listening today. It is a good example of Parliament at its best.

I am ashamed to say that I am going to do what is called a "school teacher operation". In the question of Constitution-making, I belong to a generation that heard nothing else but. In the 1930s all we heard is how are we going to solve this terrible disaster that is upon us. There was not only a Canadian recession, and bad weather in areas of the west for 10 years, but across the whole country we heard about how we could cope with this problem. We had the tremendous royal commission report, the Rowell-Sirois report, after 10 years of study.

In the university class that I belonged to was a person who has been mentioned today, one of the ex-senior civil servants, Mr. Gordon Robertson. I have engaged in debates with him for 50 years. We both came to the conclusion that a long road is before us. He went through the Civil Service, and I went up through the political ladder. I was defeated seven times in my political career before I was elected, and you learn the hard way that you have to get along with people.

I wish to throw into the debate today a few observations that may help the people who may be watching this debate understand what is going on in their language. As parliamentarians talking about things we know quite a bit about we go into great details, and tend to forget that the great majority of the people of Canada keep asking, "What does all this mean?" There is nothing new in the Meech Lake Accord. It has all been said by the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain. It is simply putting into written form what we have been practising for decades, more so at some periods of time than at others.

One of the first things that confronted me as a then young National Resource Minister was a problem that had been before the Governments of the United States and Canada for 10 or 15 years. That was how could we develop the waters of the Columbia which are shared by the two countries? Finally, after four years we reached an agreement. Then the academics, particularly in western Canada but also all across Canada to a degree, began to write article after article with all the facts and figures delineated in great detail in order to prove that Canada had sold out to the United States. Across the line equal numbers of academics—and my personal word is "nitwits"—began to write articles proving that the Americans had sold out to the Canadians. This went on for about eight years or nine years, each one copying the other fellow's paper and making it stronger.

Finally, a professor from Simon Fraser came to me and said: "You were in charge of this operation for three years at the beginning". I said: "Yes, there were three of us on the committee". Then he said that he could not understand how these fellows could say that it was no good but for opposite reasons.

We set up a series of meetings, called "Academics Together", and brought in the people who had actually negotiated the agreement or treaty. In a few weeks everything died down. I am guilty of having said, when I first mentioned it in the House, that we would never know for 50 years who got the best in that deal.

Ten years afterward I had it reviewed quantitatively, and it showed that Canada was a little ahead in dollars and cents, $100 million or so. The treaty was to last for 60 years and, if that trend continued, we would probably be ahead by half a billion or a billion at the end of the 60 years. In the meantime, large areas of both our countries were to have tremendous increases in power and a much lower rate than they could have got if they worked separately. It was good to both sides, but the interesting thing was that all these people quit writing about the thing. They never uttered a peep since.

I think—and we are half way through the deal now—that in another 20 years or 30 years they will want it renewed. The agreement was arrived at after careful consideration, and we worked under the International Joint Commission, which was set up in 1909 to ensure fair play in terms of the water which flows over our borders, and now air.

When we reach a major agreement or understanding such as this one, I would like to think that the same will prove true if we do not get caught up in the details and in trying to settle every problem in a single agreement. I think the Meech Lake Accord, 1987, may well become one of the steps along the way to running a federal system and co-operating with other countries which have federal systems. There are a few federal systems in the world. The Americans were the first. I think Australia and Canada were second. However, that is not the point. It is a very unique form of governing large countries with many diverse interests.

All we have to do when we hear the words "Meech Lake Accord, 1987" is simply say that it is a political agreement among the provinces and the federal Government in general terms which are aiming in the same direction. We will quarrel a little back and forth on the division of powers, but if we work co-operatively it will work. In other words, the main significance of the Meech Lake Accord is for it to be a written document as opposed to the traditional way in countries with British background of simply going by custom and precedent and letting the courts move us forward slowly.

I repeat that the agreement is simply a written document on what we have been doing for the last 20 years or 30 years with various forms of success.

Turning to the argument that we can never have a perfect Constitution or agreement, I should like to indicate that 1987 is the two hundredth anniversary of the American Constitution. I know something about that Constitution in that I spent a whole year of my life working on a thesis on it.

Two hundred years ago they took leading intellectuals and politicians representing the 13 states in the Confederacy and put them in a little village several days or hours away by horse and carriage from the big centres. The village was Philadelphia. In fact, it took three days or four days to get to New York where the action was. They were isolated. In the five months or better which the politicians spent in daily discussion with the greatest collection of intellectuals, which certainly the United States and maybe the world had ever seen, they came up with what is now known as the American Constitution. These men were highly educated in the classical school of government particularly Confederations, over 3,000 or 4,000 years and, mixed in with some politicians who were practical, they finally came up with the Constitution. They tried desperately to make it perfect, but at the end of that time, Madam Speaker, you should have heard the howlings by participants warning of all the dangers.

However, the fact remains that 200 years later the Constitution is still in place, even though there has been over a score of amendments. It was set in general terms. All I can say today—and I know that they had to make amendments approximately 30 times—is that the Canadian British North America Act, which followed the American Constitution 100 years later, tried to be more centralist in control, but we too have survived over the years.

If we look carefully at the American Constitution and at where the power lies, we see that there was more power in the hands of their states than in the hands of their central Government. However, over the years they spread across the continent, and nowadays we hardly even know at the national level if the states exist. They are always there with their powers, but the great spending power of the central Government has brought it into the field of state jurisdiction, yet their Constitution goes on.

I should like to refer to the winter 1987 issue of The Public Interest magazine. It is entitled The Constitutional Order, 1787-1987. I think one library in town gets this book, and I think I have the other one. However, it contains nine articles by some of the leading intellectuals in the United States. They criticize and praise their own Constitution. I think the House will recognize the name of one of the writers, Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan. He talked about it being an intellectual Constitution, all for the individual, and so on. However, part way through the article he wrote:

> —the great object of the constitutional arrangements we thereupon put in place was that the government should leave the citizen alone... Thus the thundering prohibitions of the Bill of Rights: "Congress shall make no law"; "No soldiers shall"; "no Warrant shall".

These were mandatory commands that no army or Congress could do anything to hurt individual rights. He continued:

> Fair enough. That was the problem then. The problem now is that citizens won't leave government alone. They now plunder the State as the State was once thought to plunder them.

That was the conclusion of an experienced thinker and politician. He was not running down the Constitution. He was simply suggesting that for the next 200 years we will slowly have to find some way to keep the special interests, or these small groups which get everybody stirred up, off the back of government because we are destroying the right of the group to proceed in the best way.

I put those comments before the House for consideration, but I must repeat that we are simply enshrining in written form what has already been happening. In my day and in the Diefenbaker administration we called it co-operative federalism, as opposed to confrontational federalism. In my own case as Minister of National Resources and Minister of Agriculture I made over 80 agreements with the provinces. I found that I could achieve success by making each deal different with each province as long as it fitted into the federal objective. That was the main point which I think the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain was making. If you have a direction, why should each province not do the thing that best fits its needs and wants?

Those agreements still stand—some of them have expired—in spirit today. I am rather proud of the fact that people still remember my Roads to Resources, my Pine Point Railway—which everyone said was crazy—and still remember bringing in education into the new areas of the North, for example, the Northwest Territories. Sure we failed in the curriculum that we set up which was based on the provincial background and not on the native background, but at least there was progress. I would like to think that in pioneering this concept of co-operative federalism, not only my name is there but also that of the Hon. Mike Starr who got the provinces to co-operate on education. How as Minister of Labour he did it, I do not know, but he was very persuasive in a small room. One day a few months ago we honoured him here by mentioning his name in the House. He was one of the few fellows who taught me how to get along with Quebec. He said, "Never put anything in writing".

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hamilton: It was a beautiful lesson and everybody laughed. But when you have people sensitive about their sovereignty, do not stick them with written documents. We did co-operate to the benefit of Quebec and to the benefit of the whole of Canada.

The public should understand that all Members here are trying to put forward their clear-cut description of this Accord, but they will fail if they do not realize that all the public wants to know is whether it is better or worse than what we had before. It is the same as we had before, but in written form. I would think that is the simplest way to describe the Meech Lake Accord.

A lot of issues have been brought up, for example, the power of the provinces. Forget it, Madam Speaker. The provinces know how to use their power and they do not have any more power now than they had before—witness the United States.

Concerning women, as the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain pointed out, they are doing all right. If people continue to be normal at the government level, they will continue to do all right. God help them if they do not. It will be a long, hard struggle for the aboriginal groups to get what they want, namely, some form of sovereignty within the overall sovereignty of the provinces, the Territories and the federal Government. As for the question of the Territories not being mentioned, I think it is fair business, but at the same time nothing detrimental will happen to the Territories if we can get them into a financial position where it pays them to become a province. I do not think any province, unless in a fit of pique, would suggest they should not come in. We just want to get them to having enough of a financial base that they have some chance to run their own affairs.

We heard minority language discussed today. Putting into general written form the practice of co-operative federalism is just a step up from the previous practice of confrontation as a technique. I recall when the Pearson administration came in in 1963 and announced it was all for co-operative federalism something that we had been following. The first thing that that administration did was to call all the provinces together and put them on one side of the table and the Prime Minister on the other. When you have a murderers row of all the provincial Premiers sitting opposite a new Prime Minister, it is not a fair fight, so it ended up as a confrontation. It all depends on the individuals concerned. If an individual wants to work co-operatively, I think you can succeed. People are tired of this fighting because of different political Parties with one belonging to this provincial Government or that and the federal Government. People want an end to the old fights and arguments. That is why I say, let us go forward in the common interest.

Mr. Berger: Madam Speaker, I do not have the experience that the Hon. Member has in this House of Commons. I was quite astounded when the Member said that there was nothing new in this agreement and that this is what we have been doing for the past 20 years. The Member also said that the provinces are getting no new powers in this agreement. When I say I do not have the Member's experience, and if the Hon. Member for Qu'Appelle—Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) does not believe me, I could say I could refer to somebody like former Senator Eugene Forsey who has a bit more experience than I do and who matches the Member's experience in some areas. I was looking at one of Eugene Forsey's comments while the Member was speaking. He talks about admitting new provinces.

Would the Hon. Member for Qu'Appelle—Moose Mountain not agree that there has been a dramatic change when it comes to admitting new provinces? For many years it was the federal Government alone with the concurrence of the provinces to be, that decided whether there would be a new province. In 1982, under the amending formula it became seven out of 10 provinces that had to agree with the decision of the federal Government. Now we are talking about requiring the unanimous agreement of all the provinces and the federal Government. I would suggest to the Hon. Member that this, indeed, is something new.

Mr. Hamilton: Madam Speaker, the Hon. Member is quite right. This is something new. It is just putting into practice what we have always done. Former Senator Forsey is quite right. This is quite new. Ex-Senator Forsey is very experienced. His love of law and writing is well known. What I am trying to say, not just to the Members of Parliament but through you, Madam Speaker, to the whole country is that this is no time for lawyers. This is a time for honest-speaking politicians to tell these intellectuals—what shall I call them—the rationalists who believe that science and common sense will conquer all. There is such a thing as instinct and civility that makes a government, a country and a family work. Yes, ex-Senator Forsey is absolutely technically correct. But we are not talking about technicalities here, we are talking about building a nation in a spirit of compromise and co-operation and, quite frankly, we have a long history ahead of us in this form of attitude.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Since it is now two o'clock p.m. and pursuant to the Standing Orders, the House must proceed to other business. The remaining 12 minutes of extension resulting from the ministerial statements will be added to Government Orders later on this day.

FAMILY WEEK

ASSISTANCE FOR FAMILIES—URGENCY FOR GOVERNMENT TO IMPLEMENT PROMISED POLICY

Mrs. Lucie Pépin (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, today marks the opening of Family Week. When talking about the family in the years 1990s, we are referring to the traditional family, the single-parent family, the reconstituted family, and the single mother. We know that one child out of five is poor. We also have a draft tax reform which was tabled in the House in June and which does not seem to give full consideration to the needs of low and middle income families. The gap between rich and poor families grows wider, to the extent that on the occasion of Family Week I again urge the Government to reconsider its approach to the tax field, to let families survive, and especially to give support services to young couples anxious to bear children. I think that ever since this Government took office we have been told that it has a policy to help families. Perhaps time has come indeed for the Government to implement the measures it has been telling us about for three years.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

HIRING OF STRIKE-BREAKERS—OPPORTUNITY TO CHANGE CANADA LABOUR CODE

Mr. Guy St. Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, Canada Post should not be hiring scabs during the current series of rotating strikes in Canada.

When Canada Post management hire scabs they create a climate of violence, and we must all keep in mind how Bill 45 has made labour relations in Quebec more civilized.

Sooner or later Canada will have to find a solution to avoid such violent incidents.

Quebec's experience is rather unique: labour conflicts in recent years have been practically devoid of violence because Bill 45 has introduced better balance between forces.

On June 23, 1987, Mr. Speaker, I had an opportunity to rise in this House and suggest that Canada Post officials ought to draw inspiration from the Quebec legislation.

If our Government feels that postal services are essential, it should amend the Canada Labour Code so that henceforth any strike be nothing more than a symbolic gesture.

NATIONAL FAMILY WEEK

COMPREHENSIVE FAMILY POLICY ADVOCATED

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I challenge the federal Government during National Family Week to announce positive programs that will benefit families year-round. Despite Throne Speech promises, there is no comprehensive family policy in Canada. Instead, Tory tax policies have added an extra $500 annual burden on families.

National policies must recognize that more parents of young children are working, more single parents are raising children alone, and one in five children still grows up in poverty. A comprehensive family policy must provide tax measures to improve family incomes, reindex the family allowance and increase the child tax credit. The long delayed national Child Care Program must be implemented and we must have maternity and parental leave benefits that are extended and enriched.

The first objective during Family Week should be to establish an active program to eliminate poverty so that every child in Canada can grow in health and with equal opportunities.

INDUSTRY

ASSISTANCE OFFERED TO NEW INDUSTRIES BY STATE OF MISSISSIPPI

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, bearing in mind the fact that U.S. claims of unfair Canadian trading practices through subsidies to business have prompted numerous American countervail tariffs and anti-dumping measures against Canada, one can imagine the feelings of one of my constituents, Mr. Louis Borsook, the Chairman of Dorothea Knitting Mills, who received the following letter from the Mississippi Power & Light Company:

> Dear Mr. Borsook:
> In 1986, 506 new and expanding industries invested more than $1.2 billion in Mississippi. These industries took advantage of many programs currently available to manufacturers, such as Tax-Exempt Financing, State Income Tax Credits, Ad Valorem Tax Exemptions, and Free Start-Up Training—
> During the week of October 19-23, I will be in Ontario meeting with industries considering expansion. I would appreciate the opportunity to briefly meet with you to discuss the many advantages Mississippi has to offer. Indal, MacMillan Bloedel, Ivaco, and other Canadian companies are aware of these advantages and have made substantial investments in Mississippi.

It appears that the new Canadian-U.S. trade dispute mechanism will soon have its first claim of unfair trading to settle, and it will not be a claim against Canada.

FISHERIES

SCALLOP LICENCES—CALL FOR CHANGE IN POLICY

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express once again my disappointment at the decision of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and particularly of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Siddon) to withhold the renewal of licences for scallop fishermen.

In order to qualify for new licences, fishermen must have landed scallops valued at $350 during any of the last five years. However, this ignores the fact that many fishermen in Atlantic Canada simply do not sell their catch. Many fishermen keep the scallops for their own consumption, thereby significantly augmenting their over-all income which is very limited at best.

I call upon the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to reconsider this policy and to change this unfair decision affecting the inshore fishermen of Nova Scotia and the Atlantic region. Many fishermen like those from a community called Main à Dieu find this decision to be particularly upsetting. I urge the Minister to reconsider this policy.

SUPPORT FOR CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Bill Gottselig (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, the free trade pact between Canada and the United States is good news for all Canadians. Not only does this pact protect Canadian sovereignty but it recognizes our unique Canadian culture and maintains the safety net of our social programs.

Despite what Bob White, Vice-President of the New Democratic Party, and his minions, both in this Chamber and in the provincial Legislatures, are saying, the end result will be lower prices for Canadian consumers and higher wages for Canadian workers.

This is a mutually advantageous economic agreement for both countries. With the dispute settling mechanism firmly in place, many of the obstacles that now hinder trade are removed.

This agreement will take us into the next century and beyond and will build a better Canada, not only for us today but for future generations as Canadians take their rightful place in the world community.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

POSTAL RATE SUBSIDIES—EFFECT OF CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that it will come as a surprise to most Canadians to learn that Canada Post is a part of the free trade agreement. This will not be welcomed by Canadians. We are not giving away Canada Post, but we are giving away postal rate subsidies used to support Canadian magazines and periodicals. These include small professional journals, Canadian specialty magazines, and even magazines with mass circulations like Maclean's.

Canadians have found with this free trade agreement that it is illegitimate for them to use the Post Office to support Canadian culture. From now on, Canadian magazines will have to play to a North American market. They will have to forget about their Canadian roots and their Canadian audience. What the Mulroney Government has done has been to sell out Canadian culture just after it had said it would protect Canadian culture.

SUPPORT FOR CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Ted Schellenberg (Nanaimo—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, British Columbians are ecstatic about the Government's free trade deal. They know that it means jobs. They know what the addition of 250 million customers will mean to the Canadian market-place. They know that more trade means more opportunity to expand economic horizons.

What western Canadians do not know is why the NDP and the Liberal naysayers are nattering negativity. Members of the Opposition are not consistent. They were negative when we began negotiations, they were negative when we broke them off, and now they are negative because we have a deal.

Three-quarters of what we produce in the West is sold to the Americans. Unfettered access to the huge U.S. market-place means that we have opened the window on the world. We are good traders now; we will be even better traders tomorrow because of this agreement.

British Columbians, and indeed all Canadians, now know who leads and who follows. Progressive Conservative Government means strong initiatives and concrete results.

I say to my colleagues in the Liberal Party and the NDP that we are leading Canada into the 21st century; they are not. We are improving the Canadian economy; they are not. We will be governing this country for a long, long time, and they will not.

CRITICISM OF CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) went to Washington to tell the Americans that Canada was open for business and up for sale. The midnight madness sale is over and Canada has been sold out to the United States. We learned today that in spite of the free trade deal the softwood lumber tax is to remain in place, the duties placed on shakes and shingles, steel, fish and other commodities will also remain in place, and that duties on our products will be allowed in future.

Not only will the duties and softwood tax remain on British Columbia products, but the Okanagan tree fruit industry will be wiped out, cottage wineries will be destroyed, vineyards will go, and the struggling family farm has been skewered. B.C. farmers will be overwhelmed by heavily subsidized U.S. agricultural products.

Now that the federal Government has agreed to purchase its goods and services from American suppliers, western Canadian companies which looked forward to participating in government procurement programs have been abandoned.

Sir John A. Macdonald and John Diefenbaker, if they were with us today, would be calling out in despair. They, like most Canadians, believed the federal Government should work in Canada's interests, not those of the U.S.

FREE TRADE—CANADA-UNITED STATES AGREEMENT—IMPACT

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, last weekend, this Government achieved a historic agreement between Canada and the United States. We had promised Canadians access to the American market of 240 million consumers, and we kept our promise.

Canadian manufacturers are now assured that they will keep their present export market of $95 billion a year and increase it thanks to their creativity and dynamism.

This gigantic success for our two countries will result in the creation of 350,000 new jobs in Canada. Because our plants will produce on a larger scale, consumer prices will decrease by nearly 6 per cent according to the Economic Council of Canada. Our farm product marketing system will not be affected by the agreement, and neither will Canadian culture, contrary to what the socialists are saying today.

Today, we pay tribute to our negotiators, to our Conservative Parliamentarians, to our Ministers for International Trade and External Affairs and to the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney). This marks the beginning of a new Canada under a Conservatives Government.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT—DIFFERENCES IN SUMMARIES

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, a few observations on the so-called free trade agreement are in order today. The summary published in Ottawa by the Office of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) says one thing, while the summary published by the office of the U.S. Trade Representative, Executive Office of the President, in Washington, says another. For example, the Americans say Canada agreed to change postal rates for U.S. periodicals. The Canadian summary is silent on that. The Americans say we have agreed to the elimination of tariffs on printed material and recordings. The Canadian summary is silent on that. The Americans claim we have agreed to allow the U.S. non-discriminatory access to Canadian energy supplies. The Canadian summary is silent on that.

For page after page the summary released by the Office of the Prime Minister differs in content from that of the summary issued in Washington. We would like to believe the Prime Minister's interpretation of the agreement but, as we have learned on acid rain, what Washington says is what Washington does. With this agreement, unfortunately, what the Prime Minister tells us is not what Washington says. Canada is therefore in great peril.

SUPPORT FOR CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

Mrs. Mary Collins (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, on September 26, 1985, our Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) embarked on a bold, creative and risk-taking initiative—negotiation of a comprehensive trade agreement between Canada and the U.S. Last Saturday such an agreement was reached. It will create new opportunities and new jobs for the young people of our country. It is historic in its scope and will launch Canada into the 21st century, assured of secure markets for our goods and services.

Over the past few years we have heard the wailing of the Opposition and the fear-mongering of the labour unions whose views of the future of this country and its potential are so narrow that they would turn their backs on prosperity and languish in nationalistic jingoism. Yet 50 years from now, when my great grandchildren are studying the history of Canada in the 20th century, they will remember October 3, 1987, as a key date in Canada's development, and our Prime Minister, indeed, Brian and Joe and Pat and Mike will join the Fathers of Confederation as great Canadian statesmen who had the vision and courage to make a deal and ensure a bright and prosperous future for all Canadians.

SUPPORT FOR CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. John Oostrom (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, October 3, 1987, history was made in Canada. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), in a bold and far-sighted move, ensured that present and future generations of Canadians can look forward to prosperous economic conditions well into the 21st century.

The business community has solidly endorsed the agreement for it will bring economic stability to Canada. The most bizarre reaction is that of the President of the Canadian Auto Workers. Mr. White called the Canada-U.S. agreement "ludicrous". How can this be when the agreement enhances the very industry he represents? The Auto Pact has been strengthened, thus ensuring economic security for Canadian auto workers.

I strongly urge the President of the CAW to stick to the job of representing and protecting his members' interests, for his political pronouncements are contrary to the interests of the Canadian auto worker.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister gave up Canadian sovereignty without a single shot being fired.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): He sold out our farmers, textile workers, auto workers, cultural industries, natural resources, economic independence and sovereignty. What did he get in return? Did he get an exemption from American trade law or U.S. protectionism? All he got was a statement from the Executive Office of the President of the U.S. which says:

> The U.S. anti-dumping law . . . will remain intact and unchanged. Hence, U.S. petitioners will retain all their rights under existing U.S. law.

In other words, Canada will get the same rotten deal in the future that we got on softwood lumber, potash, fish, and even raspberries. Why did the Prime Minister give away the store and get nothing worth-while in return?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, obviously the premise of the right hon. gentleman's statement is inaccurate and very misleading. With reference to the dispute settlement mechanism he refers to something from the Executive Office of the President. I refer him to a document I tabled this morning which says that the decision of the panel shall be binding on the parties. That is an important step forward, one of many.

Since he concerns himself specifically with that point and raises the question of softwood lumber and potash, to illustrate what has been achieved I can tell him that in future softwood lumber and potash would not be subject to arbitrary U.S. action. The issues would now go to a binding dispute mechanism for resolution, and that is a very important gain for Canada.

BINDING DISPUTE SETTLEMENT MECHANISM

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister confirm that according to the summary provided by the U.S. trade representative, the dispute settlement panel will apply American law and rules and leave us in the same weak position as we were when we were so badly treated on those issues I have mentioned? To quote the American summary:

> —the decision of the American Commerce Department and the ITC can be overturned only if they are not supported by substantial evidence or otherwise not in accordance with U.S. law.

Is it not true that United States law has not changed, that it is still applicable to Canadian exports, and that we have received no exemption from it? Will he not admit, therefore, that he has not achieved the key element which he sought to achieve and promised to achieve, an exemption from American protectionism?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it should be noted that my right hon. friend chooses to quote, as he calls it, the American summary. Why does he not start quoting the Canadian summary?

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Because you didn't give us one.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Stand up for Canada.

Mr. Mulroney: Why does someone who dislikes the Americans so much not stand up for Canada for once?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Shame, shame!

Mr. Mulroney: Rather than quote an American summary, why does the Hon. Member not quote a document which was tabled on the floor of the House of Commons this morning which says:

> The decision of a panel shall be binding on the Parties and their investigating authorities. The panel may uphold or remand the decision to the relevant investigating authority for action not inconsistent with such decision.

The application of the arrangement represents a major departure from existing traditions and a substantial gain for Canada in terms of security of access to the great American market that we have been seeking.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the dispute mechanism may be binding if it is in accord with the U.S. Constitution. Whether it is binding or not, it applies American law and American rules. That's what kind of deal this is.

INQUIRY WHAT GOVERNMENT HAS OBTAINED

Righ Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, have the Americans changed the rules on subsidies? No. Have they amended their foreign trade laws? No. Have they made Canada exempt from their countervail measures? No. Have they made us exempt from their antidumping law? No. What, then, has the Prime Minister obtained in return for sacrificing our automobile and textile workers, our cultural industries, our natural resources, our economic independence and our Canadian sovereignty? What did he get in return?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition asks what this document contains and what Canada got out of it. Here is one answer. According to the Hon. Robert Bourassa, the free trade agreement is excellent economic news for Canada, will significantly restrict the growth of American protectionism and is in the best interests of Canada and Quebec. That is what the Canadian Government has accomplished for Canada and Quebec.

COUNTERVAIL DUTIES—CONTENT OF AGREEMENT

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. On March 15 of this year the Minister for International Trade said in an interview, of which I have the transcript, that the result of having a trade dispute mechanism in place would be the elimination of countervail by both countries.

Is it not true that the power of countervail still exists, that the power of anti-dumping still exists, that those laws will still be applied, and that the only function of the mechanism that has been put in place is to provide a review similar to that provided by the U.S. courts? Is that not the basic essence?

The position of the Minister for International Trade has been overturned, the promise has not been fulfilled, and the Government has given up major concessions on investment, energy, automotive trade, and agriculture to get nothing but a Trojan horse.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, apart from the exaggerations and excessive language, there is absolutely nothing to sustain the enthusiasm of the hon. gentleman for his own point. On the contrary, my hon. friend may want to give some consideration to this serious matter. The statement was made today that "all considered, the free trade pact between Canada and the United States is the beginning of a golden era for Canadian business and workers", by the Hon. Donald Macdonald.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Come on. Get real.

Mr. Broadbent: Grant Devine will be quoted next.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I do not know if the heckling from the Liberal side means that they hold Mr. Macdonald's opinion in low regard, but I can assure you that he is held in very high regard by the Government and the people of Canada.

With regard to the point raised by my hon. friend, this represents a substantial gain for Canada and in no way represents anything other than a major advance in this area.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, it is not that we hold Mr. Macdonald in regard or disregard, it is that we hold in contempt the Prime Minister who will not answer questions directly but simply quotes from newspapers to defend something which is so essential to this country.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

TRANSITIONAL COSTS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): I prefer to quote from a cabinet document which the Government put together when it started the free trade negotiations. It says that whatever transitional cushioning devices are built into the agreement, the adjustment process would be costly in both financial and social terms and these costs will be higher in Canada than in the United States. Hundreds of thousands of workers will be losing their jobs as a result of this agreement.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: The Government has no adjustment procedure, nothing to deal with the costs. When is the Prime Minister going to start showing some concern for the hundreds of thousands who will be victims of his agreement?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Economic Council of Canada has addressed the effects of an international trade agreement on—

Mr. Axworthy: What do they say about countervail?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member asked a question but cannot wait for the answer before wanting to put another question. Surely he should be interested in the answer to the question he just asked.

The Economic Council points out that five million jobs are changed from one company to another each year. We have a vast number of programs—I think it is $3 billion in total—that apply to this. However, the Hon. Member should understand that adjustment in a growing economy is much easier than in a stagnating economy.

The Economic Council also tells us that a trade agreement will create 350,000 more jobs than exist today. The adjustment process will be much easier in a growing economy than it would be if we do not enter a trade agreement and find that we are in a stagnating economy.

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER CALL ELECTION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The Government promised the people of Canada that it would pursue a binding dispute settlement mechanism. The people of Canada will be surprised to learn that the Prime Minister had in mind a mechanism which would bind Canadians to countervailing laws passed in the United States. Canadians will be upset by that.

This proposed agreement, the biggest in world economic history as I believe the Prime Minister modestly described it, affects wood producers in British Columbia, farmers on the Prairies and elsewhere, auto workers, cultural industries and investment levels in this country. As it was not discussed in a single speech in the last election campaign, would the Prime Minister do the proper, democratic thing and go to the people of Canada to seek a mandate for this before he signs it?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Riis: How confident are you now?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to call an election—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Now, now!

Mr. Mulroney: —but it might inconvenience some people in the House.

Mr. Broadbent: Look behind you.

Mr. Riis: There are some pretty glum faces behind you. You scared those people behind you.

Mr. Mulroney: The enthusiasm for my hon. friend's proposition should be considered by all Members of the House.

• (1430)

We campaigned on a program of economic renewal. That program mentioned very specifically enhancement of trade, bilaterally and multinationally. That program has created over 900,000 new jobs, and we plan to create hundreds of thousands more. Then we will have an election.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST FOR GENERAL ELECTION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, we believe this agreement is a bad one for farmers, for remote areas, for our culture and for investment control. If the Prime Minister wants to be really democratic, why doesn't he call an election right away?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the agreement reflects—in fact, it deals with the issue to which the Hon. Member was referring, with problems specific to Quebec, for instance. The Premier of Quebec, Mr. Bourassa, has declared that according to him, the proposed agreement means significant gains for Quebec, for Canadian unity and for Canada's integrity. That is the opinion of the Premier of Quebec, who is as concerned about Quebec and Canadian issues as my hon. friend. The Hon. Member is calling for an election. We shall see what happens between now and later today.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: I can inform him that the Canadian Government, as the Minister of Finance just mentioned, has already created more than 900,000 jobs. The proposed free trade treaty provides for several hundred thousand new jobs, and I believe that finalizing these negotiations is truly in the interests of Canadians and Quebecers.

REQUEST FOR GENERAL ELECTION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, we believe that if this agreement is acted upon by the Government of Canada in conjunction with the United States it will have absolutely disastrous consequences for the future of Canada.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): That is what you said about the Auto Pact. Have you ever been right, Ed?

Mr. Broadbent: Considering that the Prime Minister himself has said that this is one of the largest deals in Canadian history—indeed in world history—and considering it does fly in the face, in our judgment, of everything Sir John A. Macdonald, John Diefenbaker, and other Canadian Prime Ministers who were interested in the sovereignty of this nation stood for, I repeat: will the Prime Minister do the proper and democratic thing and go to the people of Canada and defend what he says he believes in?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I noted with interest that my hon. friend referred to the free trade agreement as "absolutely disastrous". That is exactly what the NDP said about the Auto Pact 22 years ago.

Mr. Broadbent: No, it is not.

Mr. Mulroney: Inasmuch as my hon. friend is engaging his credibility as a prophet, I would remind my hon. colleagues in the House that when the Minister of Finance brought in his first Budget my hon. friend predicted that it would result in the loss of between 50,000 and 100,000 jobs. It created hundreds of thousands of new jobs.

Mr. Broadbent: What are you afraid of? Go to the people.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend asks me to call an election. I can assure my hon. friend that when I do he will wish I hadn't.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTO PACT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister speaks of the Auto Pact. It is clear from looking at the document he tabled in the House this morning that the Government has broken its promise not to allow the Auto Pact to be part of the free trade negotiations. This document shows, Mr. Speaker, that the present requirement for 60 per cent Canadian content on cars and parts sold in Canada by United States-based companies will be changed to only 50 per cent North American content.

I want to ask the Prime Minister: Does this not mean that not one car—in fact not one part in one car—sold in Canada by a U.S. based company has to be made in Canada by a Canadian worker? If this is the case, as it is, I ask him why he sold out Canadian workers and Canadian jobs in the auto industry in this shameful way?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think that the rhetoric of the Hon. Member is getting a little overblown. What he should realize is that there is no change in the Auto Pact.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): There is a statement here that the provisions of the free trade agreement will provide for, in relation to third countries, a requirement for 50 per cent of direct cost of manufacturing. In other words, what we will be doing as a result of this will be creating jobs for Canadians by asking those companies that have established here, which are owned by companies with head offices outside North America, for a 50 per cent value added requirement. Surely my hon. friend would realize that that is a good step forward.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PROVISIONS OF AGREEMENT—CANADIAN CONTENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I ask the Minister of Finance to read the document tabled in the House this morning by the Prime Minister and not the Government's propaganda. The document headed "Automotive Trade" has this statement:

> The Parties have agreed to apply a new rule of origin for vehicles traded under the provisions of the FTA agreement based on 50 per cent of direct cost of manufacturing.

Mr. Speaker, this agreement is between, if it goes through, the United States and Canada and not between Canada and third countries. If that is the case, it means that not one part in any car sold in Canada by a U.S. based company and not one car sold in Canada by a U.S. based company has to have any Canadian manufacturing by any Canadian worker at all. I ask the Minister and the Prime Minister this again. Why has the Government so shamelessly sold out Canadian workers and Canadian jobs in this way?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this question comes from a man who represents a number of auto workers. Surely this country should have more confidence than the Hon. Member has just expressed in the ability of Canadian automobile workers to attract business to this country and create the employment that is so important to his riding.

Mr. Broadbent: You're out to lunch.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The Leader of the New Democratic Party is sounding off again. Let me direct the second half of my answer to him.

About two years ago, General Motors announced, I think it was, a $2.5 billion expansion—

Mr. Broadbent: $2.4 billion.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): —without any pressure from the Auto Pact, without any need to meet the Auto Pact rules. The reason why is because the workers in his constituency are good workers. They are able to build a car in a very competitive way in competition with their counterparts in the United States. The result of that $2.5 billion investment by General Motors will create the largest single automotive manufacturing facility in North America.

Mr. Broadbent: Right on, in Oshawa. What about the Chrysler decision in Windsor?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): That demonstrates clearly that we should have and can have confidence in our automobile workers to win business away from the United States.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

IMPORTATION OF AMERICAN MANUFACTURED AUTOMOBILES

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I would like to follow up that question on the Auto Pact by pointing out very strongly to the Government that if it had not been for the Auto Pact provisions some plants in my constituency would never have been established. Why has the Government backed off the provisions which existed and operated successfully so that we have reached a situation now where a U.S. based plant, such as Mazda in Detroit, will be able to export to Canada without a single bit of Canadian content? Why this sell out of the auto industry in this country?

• (1440)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the New Democratic Party is the Party of yester-year.

Mr. Broadbent: You are reading history wrong, Mike.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Here is an example of the New Democratic Party not being able to get their minds out of the 1960s. In 1965, Tommy Douglas, the New Democratic Party Leader— I might remind my hon. friend—in an article entitled, "Douglas Raps Canada-U.S. Auto Pact", stated that the Government should not be moving ahead without certain assurances.

Mr. Broadbent: Right, improvements!

Mr. Riis: We are saying the same thing today.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Just relax.

Those assurances were put in the Auto Pact in the 1960s because we were not confident then—

Mr. Broadbent: Now you are taking them out.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): We were not confident then of our capacity to win business in this country in competition with other countries.

In the 1980s we on this side of the House have that confidence in the people of Canada to win business against the Americans, against other parties, and that is why we can move into this agreement with confidence that we are moving into the future, not resting in the past.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ELIMINATION OF TARIFFS

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): There is a certain sense of sanctimonious idiocy—

An Hon. Member: Yes, indeed.

Mr. Langdon: —about a Government that has just sold this country out and comes to us to talk about confidence.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Speaking of confidence, who has confidence in you guys?

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has been fairly patient. Hon. Members will know that a preamble is setting facts upon which to ask a question; it is not only assertions. I would also ask Hon. Ministers when they are answering to direct their minds to the question and not reply by assertions.

Mr. Langdon: I wish to direct my question to the Prime Minister, since he is responsible for this deal. Why is it that he has accepted the elimination of tariffs which will have the effect of stripping away the safeguards which protected and extended the jobs of thousands of auto workers right across Ontario and Quebec? Why that sell-out? Why was it done?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member referred to me as being "sanctimonious".

An Hon. Member: We want Carney.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I do not think that I have ever been sanctimonious.

I was trying to demonstrate to the Hon. Member that this Government has the courage, the conviction, the vision, and the understanding of where this country can be—

Mr. Riis: That's the problem.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): —looking into the future and not into the past.

Mr. de Jong: It's a nightmare.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The Leader of the New Democratic Party asked a question this morning in his remarks, and I listened carefully.

He stated that there is a major question that must be answered—what type of country do we want to have? I think the line was drawn this morning. We have indicated the type of country that we want to have is looking forward into the future—

Mr. Riis: The fifty-first State it's called.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): —and not being mired in the past and all the shibboleths of the past.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—ALLEGED CONTRADICTIONS

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Any Parliament worthy of the name will not tolerate agreements that would put restrictions on the sovereignty it is supposed to maintain. My question is specifically concerned with one major aspect and that is investment. In the documents we received, the section on investment contains some glaring contradictions. For instance, at page 7 of the document— in English— published by the Prime Minister, we read the following:

[English]

"Canada retains the right to review the acquisition of firms in Canada by U.S. investors".

In the document published by the United States, we see the following:

[English]

"Under this agreement Canada commits to make permanent the present policy of not screening new business investment".

According to the Americans, after the agreement Canada undertakes to maintain its policy not to review American investment. My question to the Prime Minister is: Since this is an agreement signed by two countries, and we seem to have two contradictory versions, who is telling the truth?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the Hon. Member not go to the Americans—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gauthier: You went there, Mike.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): You don't trust them?

Mr. Riis: Look whose talking.

Ms. Copps: You signed the agreement.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Yes, I signed the agreement. I say to the Hon. Member from Hamilton that I did sign the agreement. That is what I wish to quote from rather than from what the Americans may have said, or from what we have said. Let's go to the truth. Let us go to the agreement.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Who has got the real agreement?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The agreement states that we will continue to screen, and we set out the thresholds of screening. We also say that the parties agree that all existing laws, regulations, and published policies and practices not in conformity with any of the obligations described in the agreement shall be grandfathered. The protections that we have had in the banking system, in transportation, in energy, in culture, all of these will continue to be protected by the agreement, not by anybody's interpretation.

INQUIRY WHY GOVERNMENT PERMITTED PUBLICATION OF A DOCUMENT PRESUMED FALSE

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, if we look at the document to which the Minister is referring it becomes clear who is telling the truth . . . I would very strongly suggest that the United States is telling the truth in this case because, on page 24 of his document, it is clearly indicated that after the third year following the signature of this agreement there will no longer be any kind of investment review concerning what they call the review of an indirect acquisition.

Mr. Speaker, I am asking the Minister of Finance why he allowed the Prime Minister's Office to publish a false document.

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I agree with what the Hon. Member states that for indirect acquisitions after the third year there will be no review. For direct acquisitions there will be review. This illustrates a fundamental difference.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): What value?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The Hon. Member for Windsor West will never understand the response that I am going to give now, so I will direct it to the Hon. Member for Laval-des-Rapides.

Mr. Foster: Don't be sanctimonious.

Mr. Axworthy: That is because you are never very clear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): What this does is demonstrate the difference between his Party and this Government.

Mr. Tobin: The difference between your statement and the American agreement.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): We are saying that this country must become more outward looking, more forward looking, and not look inward and into the past.

There is a significant amount of Canadian investment going to the United States these days because people do not have the confidence that we have the access to the U.S. market. For that reason, investments are being made in the United States rather than in Canada.

This agreement will give them that confidence, they will invest their money in Canada, creating a stronger Canadian economy and moving forward.

AGRICULTURE—ELIMINATION OF SUBSIDIES

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, the document tabled by the Prime Minister today states that the parties have agreed "to achieve, on a global basis, the elimination of all subsidies which distort agricultural trade and agree to work together to achieve this goal".

Have the Americans now agreed to cease selling their grain into world markets, and into the Canadian market, at less than half the cost of production? If so, how soon, and what assurances do we have with respect to this?

• (1450)

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, this is one of the many achievements which will benefit Canadian agriculture in the bilateral trade arrangement.

I am sure the Hon. Member knows that our most urgent and pressing problem in Canadian agriculture is the state of Canadian grains and oilseeds as a result of the continuing high level of support by the U.S. and the EEC, and the trade war continuing between the two.

This is a commitment to consult with us prior to extending the Export Enhancement Program into our traditional markets. It is also a commitment to work with us to bring about some common sense and some sanity in the international market-place through working together in the multinational trade negotiations.

Mr. Althouse: An agreement to talk.

WESTERN GRAIN TRANSPORTATION SUBSIDIES

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, as well, the agreement tabled today talks about Canada agreeing to eliminate its Western Grain Transportation Act subsidies on agricultural products shipped to the U.S. through western Canadian ports.

Why did Canada give up this last vestige of the Crow rate? Does this mean the end of a subsidy and the end of a program which have existed in this country for nearly 90 years?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, it does not mean anything of the sort. It means that because of the quality of Canadian product, particularly canola, we will have a chance—and the Americans have said that by agreeing that they will not invoke Section 22 of their Agricultural Securities Act—at a multibillion dollar market in the United States.

The Hon. Member should know, because he comes from an area which produces very high quality oilseed, that Canada presently has less than half of one per cent of that market.

We have the capacity, the knowledge, the people, and the product. We have everything that is needed to increase our market there, except we have not had to date an assuredness that the market will be open.

This agreement gives us that assuredness, and it gives us very much of a future for our oilseed industry on the Prairies.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

POWERS OF CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade, although she does not seem to be answering many questions today.

Canadians know that the Government has sold out farmers by removing all tariffs, by reducing quotas, and by removing transportation subsidies. Why has the Government taken away the power of the Canadian Wheat Board to restrict imports of wheat, oats, and barley?

Could the Minister explain why this power of the Canadian Wheat Board, which is essential to it continuing its invaluable role to Canadian farmers, has been taken away by this agreement?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member should know that this agreement does absolutely nothing of the sort. It preserves our import permitting responsibilities. It maintains the integrity of the Canadian Wheat Board for exports. It keeps the ability of the Canada Grain Commission to preserve our licensing agreement and our varietal distinctions, which are second to none around the world.

It gives the Canadian Wheat Board a chance to be truly competitive in the American market with our wheat.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mayer: They laugh at the quality of Canadian wheat. They should talk to some of our American customers. They like the quality of our spring wheat. They like the quality of our Durum wheat for pasture products. This agreement will give the Canadian Wheat Board a chance to sell unfettered in that market, which is good news for western farmers.

DOMESTIC PRICE FOR WHEAT

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the Minister knows that if we take away the power of the Canadian Wheat Board to limit imports of wheat, oats, and barley from the United States, we destroy the power of the Canadian Government to have a domestic price for wheat.

The domestic price for wheat has provided some $300 million per year in benefits to Canadian farmers. Why has the Government taken away the power to provide that much benefit to Canadian western farmers?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member should know that this agreement does absolutely nothing of the sort.

Mr. Axworthy: Oh, yes it does.

Mr. Foster: Read Yeutter's statement.

Mr. Mayer: They laugh, but they should listen to what it does. It provides that when support levels across the border equalize, import permit restrictions will be eliminated, which makes entirely good sense.

If Canada had the opportunity right now, we would sell in the American market where their support prices are higher. The Americans are preventing us from doing that.

Just to say it again, so that the Hon. Member understands, the agreement provides that the Americans will not reintroduce Section 22 of their Agricultural Adjustment Act which, up to now, has been like a lever over our heads so that we cannot sell into that market unfettered.

The Hon. Member should know that the Canadian Wheat Board is a very good sales agency. With the elimination of Section 22, as I said, it gives the Wheat Board a better chance to sell additional quantities of our high quality wheat in their market, which American consumers would very much like to get.

FILM DISTRIBUTION INDUSTRY—FILM IMPORT LICENSING

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I should like to focus on the cultural area where the giveaways have been particularly devastating to Canadians—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member is laying the groundwork for a question. However, while these assertions are interesting, may very well be the subject of debate, and, may well be the tactics of debate, this is Question Period.

I would ask Hon. Members to respect the long-standing approach to questions in this place, that is, that the preamble should set the facts upon which the question is asked, not just be an assertion. As I said, I expect that Ministers when responding will exercise the same good sense.

Ms. McDonald: Mr. Speaker, is Canadian ownership in the film distribution industry an objective of the Government and, if so, will the Prime Minister say so?

If outright ownership is not an objective, is film import licensing at least an objective of the Government and, if so, will the Government prove it by bringing in a Bill on film import licensing, a Bill which is ready, or must we believe that the Government has reneged on this policy?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, from the outset the Prime Minister, the Minister for International Trade, and the Government have stated that our cultural industries would be protected in any trade negotiation, and indeed they have been.

I thought the Hon. Member would be congratulating us on the fact that Bill C-58 has remained intact, that our Canadian content regulations have remained intact, and that our simultaneous substitution has remained intact. All these things have stayed intact as we said they would.

The Government has indicated that it is prepared to create a Canadian market for film distribution rights and that Canadian independent distributors should have access to those rights. There is nothing in this agreement that prevents the implementation of that policy.

BOOK PUBLISHING INDUSTRY

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is on book publishing. Would the Minister tell us if the so-called Baie Comeau declaration is still operative, including the ban on indirect takeovers? If it still is operative, is all cultural investment to be exempted, without any exception, in takeovers of Canadian corporations?

If so, would the Government show some good faith on this issue by implementing that Baie Comeau declaration in the cases presently under study of American takeovers which have been sitting there and have not yet been turned down?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, once again I thought the Hon. Member would be moving to congratulate the Government—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss MacDonald: —and I mean that quite seriously.

The document says that the parties agree that cultural industries are exempted, excluded, from the investment chapter. However, it goes on to say with regard to indirect acquisitions in the cultural field that the Canadian Government will, at a fair market value, buy those industries and then resell them to a Canadian purchaser. That is a big step forward. It really is.

UNITED STATES ANTI-DUMPING LAW

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, Members are witnessing the strange spectacle today of seeing the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the Minister responsible for the Wheat Board disavowing and disowning the American interpretation of what was arrived at Sunday night. That causes Members to worry a great deal.

The U.S. trade representative in his document released today says:

> The U.S. anti-dumping law—defined as U.S. statutes, legislative history, regulations, administrative practice and court decisions—will remain intact and unchanged. Hence, U.S. petitioners will retain all their rights under existing U.S. law—

Does the Prime Minister agree with that interpretation of what was signed on Sunday night?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I have not read the U.S. interpretation of our agreement.

Some Hon. Members: You better.

Miss Carney: I prefer to read our interpretation of the agreement, and I prefer to read our agreement itself.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Carney: Members have waited 45 minutes for me to speak, Mr. Speaker. Possibly they would like to hear me at this time.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has heard some whispered desire by some Members to hear the Hon. Minister. The Hon. Minister is answering a question and I think the usual courtesies should be extended. The Hon. Minister.

Miss Carney: Mr. Speaker, the point of the dispute settlement mechanism is that any decision, in the area of countervail and any decision in the area of anti-dumping and also in safeguards, can be taken to an impartial and binding hearing. That is what is important.

Earlier a question was raised in the Question Period about a statement of mine on March 16 saying that we would seek to eliminate these laws. That is where the negotiations broke down because neither side could develop the new laws in time to be effective for us.

What we have done in this case is to agree to give both countries time to develop this new law that is historic, that is unique, and that has never been done. In the meantime in the seven years—five years with a two year extension—each country will use its own law. Our problem is not in the law. We have good Canadians laws in this area. The Americans have good American laws in this area.

Mr. Riis: Remember the softwood deal.

Miss Carney: Our problem is when we believe that they are unfairly applied. Canada wins more anti-dumping cases against the U.S. than the U.S. does. We want to preserve that right. What we have done is to agree that during the period we develop this new law—that has never been done anywhere—we will each use our own laws and we will have binding impartial review to ensure that the application of the trade laws in both countries is fair.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I hope the Minister will not mistake the applause of her colleagues for the approval of the people of Canada. I can't say she was worth waiting for because she has just now formally admitted in the House of Commons that Canada, quoting her own criteria and the Prime Minister's, did not get a binding dispute resolution mechanism.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Tobin: In fact Canada continues to be subject to U.S. trade law.

SCREENING OF BUSINESS INVESTMENTS

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I ask another direct question. The U.S. trade representative said in his briefing document this morning with respect to investment:

> —Canada commits to make permanent its recent policy of not screening new business investments and it agrees to reduce screening of direct acquisitions"—

Does the Prime Minister intend to make permanent his Government's investment policy when in so doing he will deny the right of future administrations and future Parliaments to exercise, in a sovereign manner, any Government's right to make investment policy? How does he intend to do that?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the reasoning behind this is not to discourage new investment. This country likes new investment. Trade needs new investment. One of the things that we have agreed to do is to phase up the thresholds for monitoring direct investment over time. Those levels will increase.

An Hon. Member: After three years there will be no review.

Miss Carney: It is our hope that billions of dollars of new investment will come into Canada. The fear of the Americans, that driving fear of the Americans, is that a future Government will reimpose those terrible investment controls that led to the outflow of investment money in this country.

Mr. Axworthy: Right.

Miss Carney: Should any future Parliament wish to get away from this, it can break the treaty.

Mr. Axworthy: Tell us how you can bind us.

Mr. Speaker: I regret to advise the House that we are now well over the time for Question Period. I hope that the Hon. Member who is rising will be able to rise tomorrow, and I will be very pleased to recognize her during Question Period.

(2) An agreement that has the force of law under subsection (1) shall have effect only so long and so far as it is not repugnant to any provision of an Act of the Parliament of Canada that sets national standards and objectives relating to immigration or aliens, including any provision that establishes general classes of immigrants or relates to levels of immigration for Canada or that prescribes classes of individuals who are inadmissible into Canada.

(3) The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms applies in respect of any agreement that has the force of law under subsection (1) and in respect of anything done by the Parliament or Government of Canada, or the legislature or government of a province, pursuant to any such agreement.

95D. Sections 46 to 48 of the Constitution Act, 1982 apply, with such modifications as the circumstances require, in respect of any declaration made pursuant to subsection 95C(1), any amendment to an agreement made pursuant to subsection 95C(2) or any amendment made pursuant to section 95E.

95E. An amendment to sections 95A to 95D or this section may be made in accordance with the procedure set out in subsection 38(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, but only if the amendment is authorized by resolutions of the legislative assemblies of all the provinces that are, at the time of the amendment, parties to an agreement that has the force of law under subsection 95B(1)."

101A. (1) The court existing under the name of the Supreme Court of Canada is hereby continued as the general court of appeal for Canada, and as an additional court for the better administration of the laws of Canada, and shall continue to be a superior court of record.

(2) The Supreme Court of Canada shall consist of a chief justice to be called the Chief Justice of Canada and eight other judges, who shall be appointed by the Governor General in Council by letters patent under the Great Seal.

101B. (1) Any person may be appointed a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada who, after having been admitted to the bar of any province or territory, has, for a total of at least ten years, been a judge of any court in Canada or a member of the bar of any province or territory.

(2) At least three judges of the Supreme Court of Canada shall be appointed from among persons who, after having been admitted to the bar of Quebec, have, for a total of at least ten years, been judges of any court of Quebec or of any court established by the Parliament of Canada, or members of the bar of Quebec.

101C. (1) Where a vacancy occurs in the Supreme Court of Canada, the government of each province may, in relation to that vacancy, submit to the Minister of Justice of Canada the names of any of the persons who have been admitted to the bar of that province and are qualified under section 101B for appointment to that court.

(2) For greater certainty, section 101A shall not be construed as abrogating or derogating from the powers of the Parliament of Canada to make laws relating to the reference of questions of law or fact, or any other matters, to the Supreme Court of Canada."

7. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 106 thereof, the following section:

"106A. (1) The Government of Canada shall provide reasonable compensation to the government of a province that chooses not to participate in a national shared-cost program that is established by the Government of Canada after the coming into force of this section in an area of exclusive provincial jurisdiction, if the province carries on a program or initiative that is compatible with the national objectives.

(2) Nothing in this section extends the legislative powers of the Parliament of Canada or of the legislatures of the provinces."

8. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto the following heading and sections:

"XII—CONFERENCES ON THE ECONOMY AND OTHER MATTERS

(2) The conferences convened under subsection (1) shall have included on their agenda the following matters:

14. Subsection 52(2) of the said Act is amended by striking out the word "and" at the end of paragraph (b) thereof, by adding the word "and" at the end of paragraph (c) thereof and by adding thereto the following paragraph:

15. Section 61 of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"61. A reference to the Constitution Act 1982, or a reference to the Constitution Acts 1867 to 1982, shall be deemed to include a reference to any amendments thereto."

16. Nothing in section 2 of the Constitution Act, 1867 affects section 25 or 27 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 or class 24 of section 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

CITATION

17. This amendment may be cited as the Constitution Amendment, 1987.

And the amendments of Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra) (p. 9585), Mr. Broadbent (p. 9586), Mr. Caccia (p. 9644), and Mr. Allmand (p. 9644).

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): As each Member of this House rises to speak to this Meech Lake Accord we, the federal legislators, are not addressing an ordinary Bill. We are not examining credits or settling the social or business issues of the day. That is why the process of this statute is so important and should be subject to the most open and democratic process, but it is not being so treated by this Government, amendments are being lumped together and there is no real debate for the Government. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) have said that it is irrelevant what Members have to say. Their minds are made up. We cannot strike or add one word or change a comma. The fragile web could fall apart, say they. It is my profound belief that this is wrong for we are talking about our vision of this country, Canada, and Quebec did not ask for all that. The Constitution is a reflection of our heart and soul as a people. It is what distinguishes us as a sovereign nation.

I would suggest to you, Madam Speaker, that what we are concerned about are rights, and rights are rights for all Canadians across this land. No individual Canadian should be placed in a situation of doubt as to his or her rights and freedoms in our Constitution under our Canadian Charter. This is why we cannot be silent. We are not indifferent, and so call upon the Government of Canada to honour its obligations to all legislators. Its lack of openness to amendments diminishes it in the eyes of all fair-minded Canadians and its actions deny justice and reasoned truths.

I have followed with close interest the Meech Lake proceedings. I very much feel that Canada wanted to say yes to Quebec and that we need Quebec as a full participating partner. I feel that way profoundly. Quebec is the key dimension to this bilingual, multicultural, unique country of Canada.

At first blush, I was absolutely delighted at the very significant accomplishments of the Government. I felt that all the political and personal heart and soul that I had invested as an Yvette along with billions of other Quebecers in May of 1980 during the emotional referendum period would finally bear fruit.

I was very proud of our Liberal Leader and our Party for the preparatory groundwork we had laid out as the first federal political Party to propose positive answers to the five conditions for signature laid down by Quebec. Our resolutions seemed logical and fair for all Canadians. Meech Lake was flawed, but I felt sure that reasoned improvements through amendments would be considered, that logic and fairness would prevail, and that Quebec would then become a full partner, which I wanted as much as anyone in Canada.

I make no pretense at being a constitutional expert. Nonetheless, I followed these discussions closely. There is great ambiguity and division of opinion. I am not so naive as to suggest that the Constitution of Canada attempted to spell out in detail each and every item within it. To do that would make it as lengthy and incomprehensible to read as our Income Tax Act. I am suggesting that the Constitution must be clear on basic structural matters and clear as to its intent on the fundamental principles and values, and Meech Lake fails that test.

After reviewing the testimony given before our joint committee and that of the Quebec National Assembly, after listening to and reading the comments of those intimately involved in the negotiations like Mr. Gilles Remillard, Senator Lowell Murray, Premier Robert Bourassa and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), one thing became clear. Either they have not agreed on certain basic principles and have resorted to ambiguity in order to achieve a so-called historic agreement, or they have agreed on certain principles but, fearing public reaction, have chosen to obscure these principles, or worse still, both.

As to structural matters, the spending power concerns me, as does what would happen if there was a deadlock in Senate and Supreme Court appointments because we are effectively making it almost impossible to change. As my time is limited and I want to make some very important points, I would like to move to the next level of my concern outside of the structural ones, the level of values. Let me raise four issues.

First, with respect to economic values, it is astonishing that while the Government views free trade with the United States as fundamental to the future welfare of Canada, Meech Lake is totally silent on the strengthening of the Canadian economic union. I find that unusual and unacceptable.

Second, with respect to aboriginal people, the 1982 constitutional amendments called for a series of conferences to deal with the status and rights of aboriginal people. The conferences ended in failure. Why would Meech Lake, which sets forward an agenda, not include aboriginal rights on that agenda? I think that needs to be reviewed.

Third, with respect to the status of our official languages, Meech Lake stipulates in Article 2(1)(a) that the Constitution of Canada should be interpreted in a manner consistent with the recognition that the existence of French-speaking Canadians centred in Quebec but also present elsewhere in Canada, and English-speaking Canadians concentrated outside Quebec but also present in Quebec, constitutes a fundamental characteristic of Canada. The Government has explained that this embodies its commitment to so-called linguistic duality and it describes this characteristic as fundamental to Canada and that Meech Lake then defines the role of the federal Government and all the provincial Governments in Section 2.2 as being to preserve this fundamental characteristic.

It is essential to note that the choice of the word regarding a fundamental characteristic is mere "preservation", not "promotion". Meech Lake is therefore saying with respect to a fundamental characteristic of our country, that is, linguistic duality, that we can agree on nothing more than its preservation, not its promotion. I say that that is for pickles and jams, not for people.

One need only read the annual reports of the Commissioner of Official Languages of Canada. Our linguistic minorities, be they French-speaking or English-speaking, are under serious pressure. In some instances, certain communities face challenges to their very survival. Others face challenges as to their vitality or ability to remain stable, to say nothing of growth.

Over and over again, I heard un cri d'alarme pour les francophones hors Quebec. These groups, and it is well documented, are under-served and undernourished. It is also well documented that the English-speaking community of Quebec over the last 10 years, has suffered an over all population decline in excess of 150,000 people. That is more than the population of Prince Edward Island.

If our 11 First Ministers could agree that linguistic duality is a so-called fundamental characteristic, how is it that they could not agree to promote that which is fundamental to Canada? Does national unity not depend on our will to support, encourage and promote those qualities which are fundamental to our identity and make this country so special? The answer to that question is, obviously yes. It is our responsibility as Members of the national Parliament to do just that. If Meech Lake is adopted as is, we will have failed in this responsibility.

Why would the role of promoting our fundamental characteristic not be enshrined in Meech Lake? It is possible, in fact probable, that there are certain provinces that are less than enthusiastic about bilingualism. This political reality may have caused the Prime Minister in negotiating the Accord to decide that he was not prepared to risk losing the agreement by forcing the issue of promotion. Perhaps that was not so wrong, but why does the Accord not at least recognize the role of the federal Government in promoting this fundamental linguistic duality?

In the wake of the tabling of a very progressive reform of the Official Languages Act, this question becomes all the more acute. Undoubtedly, this must and should be one of the federal Government's roles if linguistic duality is really a fundamental reality in Canada. On the face of it, therefore, it would appear illogical for the Prime Minister to resist amending Meech Lake to recognize this role.

The answer to this mystery lies in a closer analysis of the effect of the proposed amendment. It would mean that the provinces would be agreeing to the role of the national Government to promote linguistic duality across this land, including not just the preservation but the promotion of linguistic minorities within the various provinces.

Did the provinces refuse to recognize the role of the federal Government in promoting official language minorities? This is truly unacceptable. As Members of the national Parliament, it is our role to promote the fundamental characteristic of this country. In the current context, the silence of the Meech Lake Accord puts into question the legitimacy of this role, and that is unacceptable.

Finally, there is this question of fundamental rights. Here I reach my absolute bottom line. The litmus test of a democratic society is how it treats its minorities. The balancing of the democratic principle of majority rule with the protection of the rights of the individual is always a sensitive issue. Once you have a society that agrees to govern itself by the democratic vote of the majority, what safeguards have been provided for the rights of the individual? As I see it, the primacy of individual rights is fundamental to democracy. Individuals may choose to exercise their rights with others to address collective concerns. This is legitimate so long as these collective concerns are not then invoked to justify the withdrawal of fundamental individual rights. The right of individuals lie at the roots of collective action. Undermining individual rights undermines the ability of a free society to respond to the changing needs of its constituents. Believe me, I heard plenty about that as I travelled across this land in committee when we dealt with Section 15 of the Charter of Rights.

In 1982 we chose to counterbalance majority rule by enshrining a Charter of Rights which protects basic freedoms such as expression, religion, association, mobility, equality and non-discrimination. We gave the individual redress to the courts when Governments representing the majority interests infringed upon those rights.

It is true that the Charter is not perfect. I have noted in this House Section 33, the notwithstanding section, which allows the Government to override the Charter. That is an aberration and should be repealed. Mr. Eric Maldoff, to whom I am indebted for his help, put it so succinctly:

> That is precisely when those rights are most needed.

Downgrading of rights is rarely justifiable and we have the protection of Section 1 of the Charter for just such a situation. There have been many significant decisions in this respect and I would be pleased to list some of them if a Member asks me to.

Meech Lake undermines the whole principle of equality rights. Clause 1 stipulates that the entire Constitution, including the Charter of Rights, is to be interpreted in light of Meech Lake. Clause 16 provides that only multicultural and aboriginal rights under the Charter shall not be affected by Meech Lake. These specific exemptions lead to the clear conclusion that the remainder of the rights under the Charter may be affected by Meech Lake.

Senator Murray and other witnesses argued that the courts already take Quebec's distinctiveness into consideration in interpreting the Charter. Yet it is a well-known principle of constitutional interpretation that the legislators are deemed to have meant something when they speak. Consequently, if it is true that the Charter was already being interpreted in light of the distinctiveness of Quebec, then Clause 16 must have meant something else. It is because of this that virtually every minority group who appeared before the committee expressed grave concern. The experts who appeared were divided. I find it unacceptable that an amendment to our Constitution should render basic rights more uncertain rather than clearer and stronger. In Clause 1 the amendment says:

> (4) Nothing in this section derogates from the powers, rights or privileges of Parliament or the Government of Canada, or of the legislatures or governments of the provinces—

Unlike Clause 16, the operative word is "derogate", not "affects". In other words, the Governments have gone out of their way to ensure no diminution of their prerogatives but they have not done the same for ordinary Canadians. Yet a Constitution is for the people. That was also why women's groups, visible minorities and unions were worried, and rightly so. Neither Meech Lake, nor the Government, nor the process, has provided any tangible assurances.

Senator Murray stated in his testimony that neither the Charter nor the duality distinctiveness provisions would be paramount one over the other. Unfortunately, if that is true, there is an egregious error. The amendment in Clause 1 clearly states that the entire Constitution, which of course includes the Charter, is to be interpreted in a manner consistent with this part. If neither is to be paramount, as the Senator says, then this motion should be amended according to the proposals tabled by my Leader.

Furthermore, we must either amend Clause 16 to make it clear that the Charter and the amended Section 2 are on an equal footing and are to be interpreted one in light of the other, or amend the amendment to Section 2 to state that the Constitution shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the recognition of the commitment of Canadian society to the fundamental rights and freedoms and equality of all Canadians.

To those who argue that Meech Lake does not diminish the rights of Canadians, I refer them to the report of the joint committee, page 51, paragraph 91, which says that Meech Lake is unlikely to erode in any significant way the existing entrenched constitutional rights of the English-speaking minority in Quebec. The committee says "unlikely". It does not say "does not erode". It does not say "unlikely to erode any rights". It says "significantly" erode any rights. Shall we debate the meaning of the word "significantly"? Absolutely not. The price of Canadian unity must not be the erosion of the rights of any Canadian.

That finding by the committee is all the more shocking in light of the proposed Section 2(1)(a) which says:

> (a) the recognition that the existence of French-speaking Canadians, centred in Quebec but also present elsewhere in Canada, and English-speaking Canadians, concentrated outside Quebec but also present in Quebec, constitutes a fundamental characteristic of Canada;

The Constitution is to be interpreted in this light. How is it possible for the document to recognize duality as constituting a fundamental characteristic of Canada on the one hand, while on the other, as found by the joint committee, permitting the erosion of the rights of English-speaking Quebecers? It is totally illogical. If this is not an egregious error, then perhaps the word is devoid of meaning and should be striken from the Canadian vocabulary. One could also conclude, however, that perhaps it was intended. If that is the case, it is unacceptable to me.

If the proposed Section 2(1)(a) does not have the meaning the Government tells us it has, that it does not really stand for the equality of our two official languages and the right of English and French-speaking Canadians to feel fully at home and secure across Canada, then that, too, is unacceptable.

There are those who have attempted to stifle debate by branding all those who question the Accord as being anti-Quebec. I resent this tactic. I am a Quebecer as much as any other person who lives in my province. I have fought for my province and my country. The linguistic community of which I am a member is as integral to our province, its social, cultural and economic fabric, and well-being, as any other individual or community.

It may not be popular these days to speak to the concerns of my English-speaking community, but when dealing with the Constitution and individual rights it is principal which must take precedence. It seems many are unaware of the evolution of my province. They still believe English-speaking Quebecers are a privileged and pampered minority whose rights may be sacrificed on the altar of so-called political imperatives. Is this the spirit of Meech Lake?

The past is past. Let us deal with the future. It is time this myth was put behind us. You must understand that English-speaking Quebecers are in rapid decline. It is inconceivable to me that in my province, my language, one of Canada's two official languages, is prohibited for use on public signs even when accompanied by the French equivalent. In a country that prides itself on multiculturalism, the use of languages other than the two official languages is also prohibited, with few exceptions. It is totally inconsistent and unacceptable to entrench linguistic duality and at the same time to permit the erosion of rights of the official language minorities in Quebec.

There are those who have argued that Quebec should be as French as Ontario is English. Look at the facts. Ontario is becoming increasingly bilingual in its courts, legislators, school system, government and health services. This is no time to consider the possibility of erosion of minority language rights in Quebec. Furthermore, if our goal is the achievement of linguistic equality throughout Canada, let there be no misunderstanding—the erosion of minority language rights in Quebec will do nothing to advance French language outside Quebec. On the contrary, it will undermine the efforts to improve linguistic rights outside of Quebec.

In conclusion, Quebec is strong, Quebec's society is strong, Quebec's culture is strong. It has provided Canada with outstanding social, political, and economic leadership. While the challenges to the French language in North America are great, Quebec society is not so weak as to require resorting to the erosion of basic rights to meet that challenge. We must not encourage the use of such measures by amending the Constitution so as to permit them.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, I agree with the Hon. Member for Mount Royal (Mrs. Finestone) in that those who are opposing the Meech Lake Accord, as I am, are not anti-Quebec. Indeed, we all think that we need a strong Quebec. I, personally, think that we need a distinct society clause for Quebec. We just have to be careful that we do not overrule the Charter of Rights and the rights of minorities which are protected in that Charter, including the English-speaking people of Quebec.

Is the Member voting for the Accord? I think there is a little hypocrisy going on in the House, although I am not accusing the Hon. Member of that. People are putting forward amendments, as tokens. In fact, they are not prepared to follow them up with real jam, if I can use that term, that is, to vote against the constitutional proposal because it is flawed. Instead they are moving amendments knowing that they will not be accepted because the Government said from the beginning that it would not accept any amendments.

Would the Hon. Member tell me whether she agrees with my latter analysis? Would she tell us which way she will be voting on this motion?

Mrs. Finestone: Madam Speaker, I pointed out that I hoped we would accomplish the goal of nation building and making Quebec a signator at the constitutional table without in any way reducing the rights of any Canadians. Although I am aware of the narrow-mindedness and mean-spiritedness with which this debate was brought to the House, it remains my hope that the amendments moved by my Party, particularly the first amendment moved by my Leader, will be given serious consideration and will be voted on in the affirmative. If it is not and if the minority rights of English-speaking persons in Quebec are in jeopardy, I, as their spokesman, will vote no.

Mr. Berger: Madam Speaker, the Hon. Member for Mount Royal (Mrs. Finestone) is probably familiar with the speech made by Gil Remillard, the Minister for Intergovernmental Affairs in Quebec, at Mont Gabriel in the spring of 1986. In that speech he set forward Quebec's conditions for signing the Constitution.

He stated that the Government of Quebec had three objectives, one of which was to try to improve the situation of French-speaking minorities outside Quebec. In particular, he referred to Section 23 of the Constitution and expressed the hope that it would be possible to remove the qualifying provision which says that minority language education rights would only be provided where numbers warrant.

He also expressed the hope that it would be possible to strengthen that section additionally by giving minorities the right to manage their own schools in addition to having the right to an education. English Quebecers have this right, notably through the Protestant School Board system.

I am astounded that the Quebec Government was presumably, therefore, willing to promote the rights of minorities. I imagine this would also have been the position of the federal Government. Given this position of the Quebec Government, how is it that the Government of Canada was able to accept an agreement which did not provide for a strengthening of French-language minority rights?

Mrs. Finestone: Madam Speaker, there was a sense within the document that it was the first time that French-language minority rights were being accepted as a right by the other provinces. The best that the Prime Minister could do was to preserve the status quo and, I presume, use the official languages and a little bit of encouragement and coercion so that it would be improved.

I see across the floor my hon. colleague who was at that time co-chairman of the official languages commission. He was with me in Saskatchewan where we spent two and one-half days talking about francophone rights outside of Quebec.

We have all heard cries of alarm, and cries for help for francophones who have no services at all.

[English]

In response to the question of my hon. colleague, I suggest that giving minorities the right to manage their schools is an absolutely fundamental procedure. We in Quebec remember Camille Laurin and Bill C-40 through which, less than 10 years ago, Quebec tried to unify the school system and remove English rights to it. I recall to this moment Section 23(1) which says that English-speaking children from anywhere in Canada who come to Quebec may not attend English-language schools. I believe that is a matter which could have been negotiated and which a government of good will in Quebec should adopt because it is waiting to be adopted.

It is vitally important that while we rejoice in nation-building, it cannot be predicated on linguistic duality being suppressed anywhere. No official minority can accept the price of the reduction of its rights at any time. If Mr. Gil Remillard is prepared to promote that I am equal as an English-speaking Canadian in Quebec and that I contribute to the fabric of that society along with the Greeks, Italians, Vietnamese, Hondurans and El Salvadorans who live in my riding, I am all the more comforted. However, let them say it and let them put the Charter into the Constitution.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Hon. Member for Charlevoix (Mr. Hamelin), for questions or comments.

Mr. Hamelin: I have a question and, of course, a comment.

The Hon. Member has stressed, and I think she is one of the Members of this House who has taken a very broad view of Canada's linguistic duality and the need to promote—not just protect but promote—that duality. In the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, we put the same question to various witnesses, and some of them felt that this Accord was the most we could obtain at the present time, considering the state of mind of the provinces.

We must not forget, in fact, that is the question I wanted to ask the Hon. Member: Isn't it true that considering the present situation in Canada, it would have been almost impossible to require our provincial partners to be realistic and promote Canada's linguistic duality on equal terms?

Mrs. Finestone: Madam Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member from the bottom of my heart for asking this question. In my view, the rights of Canadians are the same for each and everyone of us across Canada. It makes no difference where we happen to be, and that is what I was driving at. You were on the committee. Look at page 52, item 91, and read it carefully It says:

> "The Joint Committee accepts the advice that the "linguistic duality" clause is a constitutional step in the right direction for French-speaking minorities outside Quebec and that in law the "distinct society" clause is unlikely to erode in any significant way the existing entrenched constitutional rights of the English-speaking minority within Quebec."

I don't want to be eroded at all.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Resuming debate. The Hon. Member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis).

• (1540)

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is a real delight to have an opportunity to participate in this historic debate. I remember vividly the debate of 1981-82 when we patriated the Canadian Constitution, which included the entrenchment of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Seven years ago we participated in a very positive way with the political Parties of the House of Commons co-operating to a large extent. We rose above, in a sense, partisan political differences to address the needs before us at the time. Of course, that was with respect to the patriation of the Constitution.

I recall from the joint committee hearings into the Meech Lake Accord, and certainly from studying the transcripts of the hearings, that what became very evident, in pointing out the very positive nature of the committee work was, again, the non-partisan nature of the discussions and of the work. The committee members, on balance, set aside petty, and perhaps not so petty, political differences to ensure that a thorough hearing was conducted and an excellent set of recommendations was provided.

I must say it was with a somewhat heavy heart that I listened to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) make his opening speech on behalf of the Government. Essentially, he ignored the thoughtful recommendations put forward by the joint committee. He gave us the impression that perhaps he had not even read the text of the very thoughtful committee report. That was a bit disappointing. The first speaker for the Government failed to react to the recommendations. Perhaps we can look forward to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) when he makes his speech to indicate just what action the Government plans to take in terms of those thoughtful recommendations.

I believe that when one sees something that results in a consensus on behalf of the three political Parties and the fact that the 10 Premiers unanimously agreed to the Meech Lake Accord, that really says something. While we all have concerns about what it does not include, or what it did not include, or what it overlooked, and perhaps even some flaws within the existing Constitution, that is the reality. This is not a perfect document. I do not think constitutions are ever perfect documents. They are fluid documents, ongoing documents. They are alive and everchanging.

I think that what we must do now is to identify those areas within the Accord and the Constitution that are still lacking and that require further work in the future. Of course, that is the primary reason why we put forward some amendments. We did so in the hope that the Government would accept them and include them. But if that does not take place, if the Government decides not to do that, it should at least see these areas of amendment as flags for the First Ministers to consider at the earliest opportunity.

Again, some have indicated that the process could have been better. Indeed, it could have been. But I think we are now in a position where we must make the best of it, which is what we are attempting to do.

It is important that we see the Meech Lake Accord as not the final decision, that there will be other opportunities. This is only the second opportunity we have really had to consider the Constitution of Canada. I think that what has been accomplished here will be recognized by historians as providing a major building block in the building of our Constitution.

You will recall, Madam Speaker, in 1982 when we finally agreed, at that time there was a major flaw in the agreement. There was a major gap in the agreement. Quebec did not sign it. Here was a fundamental part of the Canadian family not part of the constitutional signatures that went on to the final document. That has now changed. Quebec has now indicated that it is willing and prepared, and perhaps even enthusiastic, to become part of the Canadian family, both constitutionally as well as politically. I suppose as an ongoing result it will also be emotionally and psychologically.

I must say that when I look through the debates, and while I was not there physically on that particular day, I think one of the most moving witnesses was Madame Solange Chaput-Rolland. She said the following about the Meech Lake Accord:

> I think none outside Quebec knew the reality of the referendum. I travelled throughout Canada, about a few months after. It was all over, eh? Good. It was not exactly all over. Families against families, towns against towns, fathers and mothers not speaking to their children.
> (During the Referendum) we spoke with thousands of Quebecers. Women wanted to leave their children a country as big as the one they had received from their father. That was mainly the article that reached the heart, because you are right: In this country if we put a little more heart into what we are doing, maybe we would be aware of the hurt we inflict on others.
> And then we came home. We went back to the National Assembly, back to our villages, back to our houses, back to the friends that were no more friends; they were on the "yes" and we were on the "no". It was not a picnic, it was not a social gathering, it was not a think-tank, it was a battle between brothers, a dangerous, divisive battle, and we still feel it. It was not 100 years ago, it was seven years ago that we lived that referendum.
> English Canada could not care less one month after, and it stung me and it stung all of us who fought so hard to remain in Canada and to find ourselves outside of Canada. You know, it was a very dramatic gesture when Mr. Levesque put the flag of Quebec at half-mast on the day you were all celebrating here.
> But our hearts were at half-mast too that day, because we were out of a country we had chosen to remain.
> So the Accord of Meech Lake brought us something incroyable as a gesture of friendship—
> And I would really like people to know that for us Quebecers, as for all the others here and everyone else, the Meech Lake accords are not an end, but the beginning of a grand process, I think. But I must tell you that for me it is really the first time that I have felt, YES, I won that referendum.
> But surely by now, surely, you all know that if Meech is to fail for whatever reason, there can be no more negotiations, no more justifications.
> If Quebec is once again to realize that it is more difficult to opt in Canada than to stay out of Canada, then surely, you know that the roads of tomorrow can only lead to another form of independence, but this time not chosen by any political party in Quebec, maybe chosen and imposed on Quebec outside Quebec.

This testimony was very moving. It explains the situation that existed during the period of the referendum. At that time, as we all recall, on May 20, 1980, the people of Quebec, as others have said, said "yes" to Canada. We now have the opportunity to say "yes" to Quebec.

• (1550)

On May 22, 1980, two days after the referendum, the New Democratic Party placed the following motion before the House of Commons:

> That this House welcomes the result of the referendum in Quebec and pledges itself to interpret that vote as a clear call for constitutional change.

In my estimation, the Meech Lake Accord provides an opportunity for that constitutional change that was promised back in 1980.

We welcome Quebec's return to the constitutional family. Since its very beginning, our Party has always recognized Quebec as a distinct society. We have always recognized and acknowledged the linguistic duality of Canada, and the fact that Quebec plays a key and vital role in our country. We believe that not only does the Accord reunite Canada, but it does so in a spirit of co-operative federalism both in the manner in which the Accord was reached, and in its provisions.

As a geographer by profession, I am always cognizant of the difficulties of governing a country as large as Canada. In many ways we are fortunate to live in the second largest country in the world geographically. As a result, we live in a country that is extremely complex, complicated, diverse, and consequently requires the type of genuine federal system that we have in Canada.

To make a federal system work requires federal and provincial level governments to be able to work together in a spirit of consultation, negotiation, and of course, compromise. Compromise is almost inevitable in a country as complex as ours when it comes to reaching national objectives. It is for that reason that, on balance, we believe that the decision that was obtained that became the Meech Lake Accord not only reflects the reality of Canada, but reflects a major building block in the development of the Constitution.

My support for the Accord is not only because we have now closed the gap and are happy that Quebec is part of the constitutional family, but because of other positive aspects. With Quebec now being part of the constitutional family, the log jam that has held up so many decisions in the last little while is no longer there. This blockage has been broken, and enables us to address in a very serious manner a whole number of related issues for which we have concern, not the least of which would be the concerns of the aboriginal peoples and their advancement of self-government. This now enables us to address these other issues in terms of constitutional change, and that again has to be seen as a major and positive step forward.

I am also pleased to see that the spending powers are now enshrined in the Constitution. There are no changes in the relative powers of the federal Government, and there are no changes in the authority of the federal Government to spend in areas of mixed jurisdiction. Now for the first time in our Constitution the federal Government is able to spend in areas of provincial jurisdiction.

Our Party feels that now is the time to initiate and launch a comprehensive child care policy across Canada. This particular aspect of the Accord provides us with that opportunity.

If a province wishes to opt out, it will only receive federal financing if it develops a program that is "compatible with national objectives". That means that if the provincial program is as good as that proposed by the federal Government in terms of objectives, the province would then receive the appropriate funding. In some cases, we can assume it may even be better. As an example, we may look at the Canadian Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan. The Quebec Pension Plan has better provisions for Quebecers than the Canada Pension Plan. Rather than being gloomy or pessimistic, we ought to see it as a real positive step in enabling the federal Government to take national initiatives.

However, there are problems. In something as complicated as this is, when a consensus is built by the First Ministers, and there is the general support of all three political Parties, we do not wish to suggest that are no problems that must be faced. Indeed, there are a number.

At the top of the list is the whole matter of equality rights for women. Interestingly, Section 28 of the Charter follows Sections 25 and 27 that are included in Section 16 of the Accord. It is fair to say that during the discussions on the Accord, the First Ministers forgot about women. We recognize the sexual equality rights as transcending language rights and cultural rights. Why were they not mentioned in the Accord? Why were they not placed in the Accord? Of course, we have been asked to have trust and faith in the Ministers. We heard that in 1981 and 1982 when we were told that collective bargaining would be protected under the freedom of association clauses. In retrospect we find out that that was not the case, and that those rights were not protected.

At the top of the list there are some serious improvements to be made in terms of ensuring sexual equality in our country. It is certainly clear that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms is not totally paramount when it comes to rights because of Clause 1 of the Charter which allows for reasonable limits on those rights.

We suggest that Section 28, the equality of rights section of the Charter, should be restructured in Section 60 of the Accord. This was recommended by both the National Advisory Committee on the Status of Women, and la Fédération des Femmes du Québec. It is something that we feel ought to be a top priority when the First Ministers meet again.

We also support the fairness for aboriginal peoples. There was a deep disappointment felt by many when we put forward the recommendation that a conference on self-government ought to be enshrined in Section 50 of the Accord. A major shortcoming of the agreement is that there is no real commitment or statement that is included in the Accord to guarantee to aboriginal peoples an obvious advancement of their concerns, especially in terms of self-government.

There is a also a lack of fairness for northern Canadians. Canadians who live north of 60° have been left out of the process. They were left out of the discussions, and it is certainly not fair that it now requires unanimity to create a new province north of 60°. A number of people or groups, such as the aboriginal people, have suggested changes for the territories, and perhaps we ought to retain the present amending formula since these issues ought not to require the necessity of unanimity.

We also must flush out the fact that 30 per cent of Canadians are not of Anglo-Saxon, Francophone, or native heritage. In fact, 30 per cent come from other countries and they reflect the ethnocultural reality of Canada. There have been some major oversights when it comes to the area of the ethnocultural reality as a fundamental characteristic of Canada. I reflect that with a heritage from Norway. Yet we have the feeling that while we recognize the advances made by the Accord and the Constitution in terms of reflecting the various fundamental characteristics of our country, the ethnocultural reality has yet to be addressed.

We must address the future of the overriding part of the Charter. Section 33 certainly ought to be reviewed, especially when it comes to minority rights. We all feel that any discrimination on the basis of sex, colour, or ethnicity ought not to be the subject of an override. Again, much work must be done in this area.

Finally, in terms of identifying concerns, we certainly must identify the process as a major concern. We have been rushed in terms of dealing with this matter. Canadians feel that they have been left out. I would only hope that future changes to the Constitution will not be left only to First Ministers, Members of Parliament, MLAs, MNAs, and MPPs, but in fact to the people of Canada as well. It is for that reason the committee suggested that a joint House of Commons and Senate committee should exist on an ongoing basis to hold hearings across the country so that suggestions could be made on constitutional changes in the future, including changes to the Senate, changes to the rights of aboriginal peoples, changes to the equality rights of all groups, and so on. Someone must do it in an ongoing way which involves more people than were involved in the last round.

We all feel uncomfortable with the process, but it is history now. We must get on with dealing with the future. While we have concerns about some of the shortcomings of the Meech Lake Accord, on balance we believe that it is a major step forward. We want a commitment to constitutional change in the future which involves all Canadians.

I believe that a very important page in the constitutional history book of Canada is about to be turned.

Mrs. Finestone: Madam Speaker, I have a question for my hon. colleague and friend. He is prepared to say "let Quebec sign on now and we will fix it later", if I heard him correctly. I also heard a series of real concerns in his comments in respect of the Northwest Territories and aboriginal peoples. He also talked about equality.

We are talking about nation-building, and it is predicated upon linguistic duality as a fundamental aspect of Canada. I am sure the Hon. Member is well aware of the article in which it is indicated that the rights of English-speaking Quebecers may be eroded in some significant fashion.

As the Hon. Member does not live in Quebec and is not an English-speaking Quebecer, I wonder whether he gave some thought to how, where, and in what way he might be able to define "significant", "may", or "erode".

It may be too late to fix that if we do not do something about having a sense that this is a true, egregious error. One cannot have an imbalance on one scale. If one is part of a linguistic duality of a country, and there is a potential for erosion of rights, then there is not fairness across the land, according to the analysis of the committee.

Turning to whether we can fix it later—and my hon. colleague says that we should sign them on right now—is he aware that point nine amends Section 40? Section 40 allowed for compensation of provincial legislative powers when they related to educational and cultural matters. Now, with the amendment, it will allow such compensation for any transfer of legislative powers. Is the Hon. Member not concerned about the implications of that transfer of legislative powers and compensation?

Does the Hon. Member believe that it is important for English Quebecers to have the same rights and for minorities to have the same rights, and that they can be protected adequately without the total Charter being alluded to as on an equal footing with Clause 2?

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, those are very thoughtful questions. I suspect that I will not respond as thoroughly as the Hon. Member would like. However, let me do my best to say a few things at least.

Regarding the matter of fixing the Constitution and fixing the Accord, it is important that we view this process as a major step forward in terms of the recognition of Quebec and the role of Quebec and the recognition of our linguistic duality. It is not so much that we "fix" things but that we recognize some of the shortcomings with which we must deal in the future.

I notice that the committee placed a great deal of emphasis upon recommending how this would be accomplished in the future in terms of the process to ensure that some of the concerns the Hon. Member has raised would be addressed.

I recall the committee recommended that one of the first items the First Ministers might address when they come together again is not only to preserve the linguistic duality, which is part of the Accord, but to promote it.

According to my recollection, the transcripts of the hearings included a number of points that people made regarding the fact that it was important that it be promoted, not only preserved in terms of the status quo.

While I am not from Quebec, one of the surprising elements of the process—quite frankly, it amazed me and gave me a great deal of encouragement in terms of supporting the Accord—was the position of the Premier of British Columbia. Some of us might recall some of the views he held not long ago in terms of complaining about the fact that there was some French on his corn flakes boxes in the morning which aggravated him. He was involved in some editorial cartoons which were uncomplimentary to the French-speaking people of Canada. This individual sat at the table and agreed to the Accord to preserve—

Ms. Jewett: French on corn flakes boxes.

Mr. Riis: —French everywhere. I think it is an amazing step forward.

Mr. Berger: Doesn't it make you suspicious, Nelson?

Mr. Riis: No, it does not make me suspicious. It gives me a great deal of encouragement because here was an individual, whom I had given up on in a whole variety of areas, who had been moved considerably to join with his fellow Premiers to preserve linguistic duality in the Accord.

I am encouraged, but it does not mean that it is the end. This is why I am encouraged by the recommendations in the joint committee which say that the next step is to promote linguistic duality. Certainly I am a strong advocate of that, as I suspect all of us are.

I think I forget the other questions, but I hope I have at least made a reasonable effort to answer the points raised by the Hon. Member.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, I rise with some trepidation because the Hon. Member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis) and I are close friends—

An Hon. Member: Were.

Mr. Waddell: No, we are close friends. We have been in the House of Commons together and have agreed on everything so far. However, we disagree on this issue. We come at it from different aspects.

I think we both believe in recognizing the five conditions or demands of Quebec and the distinct society. However, quite frankly I think the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) gave away the store. He went far beyond recognizing the five demands of Quebec and made it so fundamentally flawed in my view that it is not worth supporting. I know my friend has a different view which he enunciated today, and I respect it.

However, I should like to ask him about something related to that. He is a westerner, and I am wondering whether he is familiar with the argument made by Don Braid, a western journalist, when he talked about the serious erosion of federal authority and how it would affect the West.

What Mr. Braid said was very interesting. He said that if we in fact give too much power to the provincial Governments and take some of the power which the federal Government is exercising to kind of equalize things for weaker provinces, it would affect the West. He even went so far as to say that in fact the West could suffer as a result, and he gave some examples. I quote:

> Westerners need to think very carefully about that message . . . If federal authority wanes and the provinces take on the full authority offered by the new agreement, they will sooner or later be left to fight each other directly when problems arise. There will be no federal mediator powerful enough to intervene.
> Imagine what would happen in a direct fight between Ontario and Alberta over oil prices . . .
> Imagine, for instance, that Ontario decided it didn't like a new program to aid grain farmers . . . It could simply withdraw, set up its own policy to help Ontario farmers, and demand full compensation from Ottawa.
> Westerners would face competition funded with their own tax dollars.
> Imagine too the fate of a federal policy meant to distribute industry evenly across the country. Quebec and Ontario would opt out in an instant and use federal money to maintain their advantage.

• (1610)

What Mr. Braid goes on to say is that westerners have objected to federal power because it has been exercised by this Government capriciously by patronage and so on. In fact, federal power is needed for western Canada if the federal Government is to act as a mediator because some of the strong provinces like Quebec and Ontario could damage some of the weaker western provinces. It is a novel and a very interesting argument. The Hon. Member is very thoughtful about western Canada. What is his response to that question?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis). Unfortunately there is only a short period of time left.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I am glad there is a short period left because I must admit that I did not totally comprehend the question. When I look at the Accord I certainly appreciate that no legislative powers have been given away. In terms of setting national objectives for various programs, it is clear that provinces will have to be meeting them to receive funding.

Somewhere there was probably a good question but I think I missed it, with all due respect to my hon. friend. No doubt questions are posed. However, having read most of the journalistic views from western Canada on the Meech Lake Accord, on balance they come out in support of it. While Mr. Braid and others point out what could be problems—I suppose what he says is possible—

An Hon. Member: Hypothetical.

Mr. Riis: And as my friend says, very hypothetical, we should to be cognizant of that. Again, this is not a perfect document. Constitutions never are. We have to see it in that light and be committed now to identifying ways and means of improving the Constitution over time. The committee has recommended a procedure to accomplish just that.

CITATION

17. This amendment may be cited as the Constitution Amendment, 1987.

And the amendments of Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra) (p. 9585), Mr. Broadbent (p. 9586), Mr. Caccia (p. 9644), and Mr. Allmand (p. 9644).

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Madam Speaker, I cannot say that I am overly happy to participate in this debate because in view of what I am going to say, about which many of my colleagues in caucus know, I am taking a position which does not find favour with my Leader or my Party. Listening today and following the debate in part last week, I appreciate the different comments of various Members. As has been said here in the House this afternoon already, the debate has basically not been partisanly political.

I have not felt so exercised about an issue, I do not think, since I have been a Member of this august Chamber as this one. If there was ever an issue where all Members, regardless of political stripe should have their input, it is on the Constitution of the land. While I know I cause distress and some embarrassment and frankly feel uncomfortable myself with colleagues with whom I have worked for many years and many other colleagues in my caucus whom I have met in the last three years and who perhaps find it even more difficult for a veteran Member to speak out on something, I do not apologize in any sad sense. I must say that I am not happy but I feel very committed in what I am going to say about the Constitution.

This morning I heard the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) on the fundamentally historic trade arrangement and new agreement with the United States. I, too, with other Members will be interested to see the agreement's fine print. The Prime Minister made a tremendous contribution here.

We heard, I thought, one of the better speeches from the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner) which I think so flummoxed the Leader of the New Democratic Party that he did not get on track on the free trade debate in the way he has been doing this last little while. I was glad for the interest in the free trade issue and I hope that interest will continue.

While the free trade issue is fundamental to the economic fibre of the land and affects the pocketbook of taxpayers, the constituents and Canadians from coast to coast, the Meech Lake Accord affects the constitutional framework of the land and is not quite as exciting. I am the first to admit that because of all the factors that have been combined—I will not say there has been deliberate collusion—in a most interesting way that they almost prevent meaningful debate on something which to me is even more important than the economic trade arrangements with the United States.

It is somewhat ironic that we have these two parallel pieces of legislation or resolutions before the House at the same time, one affecting the Constitution forever and a day. Without casting stones—I will not get political—I respect my colleagues who worked hard during the slumber of summer on the joint committee, but I really believe that many who have spoken and many who participated on the constitutional committee have forgotten that what we are proposing here is not a law or a statute that can be changed by another Parliament. We are, however, already talking about changing a free trade arrangement by breaking a treaty. You can do that in another Parliament relatively simply with a vote but you cannot change the Constitution easily because it is in constitutional stone.

For instance, the Meech Lake Accord has a unanimity rule, something which has been the plague of constitutions all over the world. Again, it is ironic 200 years after what the Americans did at Philadelphia with their Constitution. One of the reasons the 13 colonies came together at Philadelphia, having tried something before and after the Revolution, called the articles of Confederation, was the rule of unanimity. A big state and a little state completely boxed themselves in because they could not move to the changing times.

Quite frankly, I listened to what I thought was a very considered address this afternoon by the Hon. Member for Mount Royal (Mrs. Finestone). Then came the more political, in the best sense of that word, but thoughtful address by the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr Riis). He reasoned that he would support the Accord. Some of us used to think NDP meant no damn principles but I will not get political on that, but now NDP means "No one disturbs polls. Nothing disturbs polls". The House Leader for the NDP from Kamloops—Shuswap in a most even way—I will not get partisan here because I am more against my own people than anyone else in this House—gave the generalities of what was good about the Accord. Constitutions are not perfect. We know that. They are supposed to be living documents. That is what the BNA Act has been. That is what Lord Sankey said in the Person's case of 1931 when he compared the BNA Act to a living tree.

Members have talked about the rights problem, be it women, the aboriginals or the multicultural people who have made this country into the country it is to help complement the two founding races. I have fought battles on that and supported every bilingual Bill that has ever been in this House. We have all that. Yet we have the Constitutional amnesia of the Person's case which went through the Supreme Court to the judicial committee of the Privy Council as to whether a woman was a person to be appointed to the Senate of Canada under the BNA Act. That was just 1931, I believe. That was a pretty definite word. Yet in the Meech Lake Accord, my friend from Kamloops—Shuswap and others take their generalities and try to hide their inner selves with naivety, to put it kindly, or for other political reasons.

They can pretend that in the justified afterglow of Meech Lake, there was a miracle. There was a mild miracle, and I give full credit to the Prime Minister for bringing together 11 First Ministers and coming up with a unanimous agreement on principle. However, they are getting away from the principles of Meech Lake.

Yes, groundwork had been done and had been done well by Senator Murray, Senator Tremblay and officials who went across Canada talking to Premier Bourassa and other premiers. The groundwork was done and perhaps that is why there were not the expectations for the Meech Lake Agreement.

There was agreement on principles and that is a mild miracle. I am prepared to call it that because there is not usually unanimous agreement. How contradictory are we, though? If we think it is a mild miracle to have 11 agree at Meech Lake when there had been years of preparation, how can we stumble into the strait-jacket of a rule of unanimity that will affect federal institutions and sterilize them?

Oh, yes, provinces are equal because they all have a vote. Without trying to cast any aspersions on the Chair, Madam Speaker, eunuchs in a harem are equal too but they really cannot produce very well. I suggest that there will be the same sterility in any meaningful constitutional amendments under the rule of unanimity.

Any premier worth his political salt who thinks there will be meaningful Senate reform under a rule of unanimity is whistling Dixie and had better get on his horse and head for the Rockies. There will be no such reform.

I know that my time is limited. I have so much to say and there is so little time in which to say it. I would like to point out to the House, though, that we are not talking about a law or a statute that can be changed by Parliament. Three of my friends from the committee spoke to me during the hearings as though we were discussing a labour contract. They said that they knew it was not perfect now but that they could change it next year. They meant that. I told them that this is not a labour contract or a statute and that we cannot change it that easily.

I have a fundamental problem with the Accord. I have mentioned the problems with aboriginal rights and with new Canadians who have made this country the way it is, thank God, but I suppose there is one fundamental aspect of the Accord over which I go the other way from my Party and my leader. It is not about protecting the distinct society or preserving the distinct society. I am all for that and have voted in this House for Bills that do that. However, what I cannot do and am not prepared to do because I think it inadvertently sows the seeds of separatism is to promote a distinct society.

As far as I can see, aside from what professors, academics, Senators and Members have said, one never knows what the Accord will do. In Philadelphia, 55 founding fathers met for over three months, not for 20 hours in the Langevin Block in the locker-room camaraderie of that intense, incestuous atmosphere. They were not exhausted and did not come up with decisions they thought and believed would be good for the country but perhaps did not quite have the crystal light of purity, fresh air and time to digest what they had done in principle.

How many Members appreciate that the words "We the people," the first three words in the United States Constitution, took three weeks to debate? Before Hon. Members vote on this Accord, I would ask all Hon. Members to read the book written by Catherine Drinker Bowen entitled Miracle at Philadelphia, a narrative history of what the founders wrestled with.

I have heard in committee and in debate well-intentioned academics speak. Professor Bill Lederman taught me constitutional law many years ago. I got 98 per cent in it. It was the best course I ever took. He is still teaching constitutional law because in some ways Constitutions do not change.

Bill Lederman has never been on the Supreme Court. Would he have thought that the founders of the American Constitution would have had the Supreme Court of the United States interpret the commerce clause which has fundamentally changed the American economy? Would he have thought in terms of rights of people and women, that the right of privacy of papers would be extended to the right of the privacy of the body so there could be qualified or restricted abortions? Would he or any other professor, academic, Senator or lawyer have thought that what the American founders said 200 years ago about due process is the fundamental tenet for the gender-equality rights that are slowly coming in the United States?

I have the highest of respect for Eric Kierans who appeared before the committee, but the mythology he put before the committee really bothered me. We all know of the great clause in the American Constitution, "all men are created equal". However, for over 100 years, there was legal segregation in the United States. People were equal but were separate. We all know that. That is sad history, but do not blame the United States.

Mr. Kierans has said that Meech Lake puts things back the way they are supposed to be. Only one columnist is following this debate, Mr. Johnson of The Gazette. He has analysed this in a most logical way. He has analysed the comments of Eric Kierans. I read them earlier and could not believe it.

This has nothing to do with the original concept of the BNA Act. I am not saying that there should not be changes to the BNA Act. We do live in a different world today, but do not let reputable people come before the committee and buffalo the committee with statements they should know better than to make.

Certainly Mr. Kierans of all people should have known that the fundamental premise of the BNA Act, fortunately changed by law, was that Sir John A. Macdonald wanted a strong central authority. One of the reasons the regions came together was to ensure that the perfidious Americans south of the border could be contained and/or restricted. That is why the four colonies got together in the first place.

One of the great clauses that was supposed to provide the supreme federal power was the "peace, order and good government" clause. Who at that table in Charlottetown would have thought that Viscount Haldane would have restricted that clause, perhaps correctly, so that it was meaningless except in emergencies?

I have already mentioned the case of Edwards vs. the Attorney General of Canada of 1931, an appeal case in which Lord Sankey talked about the living tree.

Then there was my friend and colleague, the former premier on whom everyone relied. Initially we all relied on ex-Senator Forsey. The Prime Minister used his name when referring to the euphoria we all wanted when Quebec got into confederation. Will Quebec be out at the next conference when some suggestion it places on the table is not approved?

My friend, Mr. Stanfield, referred before the committee to the slippery slope of deux nations, a concept in which he had never believed and never followed, or words to that effect. Yet some of us in the Chamber were there in Montmorency when the Conservative Party adopted that because Marcel Faribeau was Quebec's lieutenant then. We adopted that and then it became a factor in the leadership campaign of 1967.

All Conservative Members should recall the speech of John Diefenbaker about one Canada and about not using the deux nations concept. Mr. Diefenbaker's idea about one Canada may have been different from Mr. Pierre Elliott Trudeau's but they both talked against deux nations. Then the election of 1968 was held.

There has been a lot of hocus-pocus. I am concerned about the promotion of a distinct society. It really bothers me that it sows potential seeds of separatism. If one promotes a society well enough and is successful in that promotion, does it not then become a more definite society? If it becomes a more definite society, is not the most definite society a separate society, particularly when that distinct society is given the tools to do the job? Because of the question of rights, people have almost overlooked this.

In 1983, I said in this Chamber that every candidate for the leadership of the Tory Party except the Right Hon. Member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark) was totally against what the PQ wanted then, fiscal compensation when opting out of a program. I do not know how many Members have read René Lévesque's book Memoirs but it is a darn interesting book for any political person to read, given his inimitable style. I want to quote from that book with respect to fiscal compensation and opting out. René Lévesque, the expert on how to have two societies or two nations or sovereignty association, said he was not really bothered by the amending formula requiring unanimity. He was like Bill Davis who said that Ontario does not need a veto power. Lévesque said he did not need to have a veto power. At page 325 of his book he said:

> But Quebec would be deprived of its right of veto. I should perhaps admit that this old obsession has never turned me on. A veto can be an obstacle to development as much as an instrument of defence. If Quebec have it, Ontario and perhaps other provinces would surely ask for it, too. And, as in Victoria in 1971, it would be possible to block change and in protecting oneself paralyze others, leaving everyone way ahead—or behind.

Then we have this footnote:

> On this subject, as everyone remembers, the Supreme Court ruled in December, 1982, that in its opinion the right of veto did not exist and had never been more than a fiction.
> But no matter how hard one might try to revive it politically, I can't see the Anglophone provinces, and even less the federal government, renouncing this judgment, which is right down their alley. At all events, going down this path does not appear to me to be the most promising direction for our political future.

He is talking there about Quebec and the PQ. The main objection he had to any amending formula was the omission of financial compensation where a province wanted to opt out. On that same page he said:

> For Quebec, which in all likelihood would have to use it more often than the others, the exercise of the opting out provision should be made as easy as possible. This way, I speculated, might we not, little by little, be able to build the associate state we had been refused?

He says on page 326:

> On the other hand, the right to opt out, which we had learned to use in the sixties—the best example being the creation of the Caisse de Dépôt—is in my view a much superior weapon, at one and the same time more flexible and more dynamic. "You wish to take this or that path we are not ready to follow? Very well, my friends, go ahead. But without us." From stage to stage, I repeat, we could create something very like a country in that fashion.

You are indicating that I am running out of time, Madam Speaker. That is unfortunate because I have not gone into all the things I wanted to. There are so many things I could say about the "seamless web", that great architecture of the Senator. You cannot touch anything because it is a seamless web, he says. The only webs I have seen belong to spiders or caterpillars in trees. This is not a living constitutional document. It smothers debate and discussion. That is the sad part about Meech Lake. The principle of agreement among the 11 First Ministers was there to start with. It should have then percolated through the political process so that legitimate concerns could be illuminated and responded to. Unfortunately that has not happened.

In conclusion, I want to point out that Lévesque himself says we have the worst of both worlds now. We have a unanimity formula which will be a great sterility. We have a fiscal compensation for opting out clause which will allow the incremental construction of separate programs.

The irony of Meech Lake is that we are left with the 1982 Constitution with a Charter of Rights about which there are many questions, and a Supreme Court which will in effect legislate as it works its way through that Pandora's box.

On the other side we have annualized constitutional conferences where everyone will end up fatigued or the public will be turned off because those conferences will fail from time to time. All they will amount to is a showboat photo opportunity. Those are built in to the Constitution. At the same time Parliament will in effect be mute in so far as contributing anything to the processes concerned before the First Ministers sign on the dotted line. I am saddened by that. I want Quebec in but, quite frankly, I am looking at it in the same way that Premier Bourassa did in 1971. He was not anti-Quebec when he walked away from the Quebec formula. He was pro-Quebec. I want Quebec in but I want it in a new Confederation that will be able to meet the challenges of this world, not a federation emasculated by all these other things in the Meech Lake Accord, some of which I have not touched upon.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Questions or comments.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, I congratulate the Hon. Member on his speech. He and I share opposition to this Accord and we are in a small minority.

If Canadians really understood this debate, does the Hon. Member think they would favour a Senate controlled by the provinces, one which will be able to veto the laws of this House? Do Canadians favour a Supreme Court chosen by the provinces when it will be the referee between the federal Government and the provinces? Does he think Canadians favour this veto power which puts us in a constitutional straitjacket? Does he think Canadians favour the notion that future federal spending programs may be limited, as witnesses such as Professor Jack London of the Law School of Western Ontario said in committee? We may not have a national daycare program but a series of checkerboard programs or none at all. Does he think Canadians favour an immigration policy checkerboarded across the country with the provinces controlling it? Does he think Canadians favour leaving native people out, or women, who fought so hard for their rights in 1982? Does he think they favour leaving the multicultural reality out? I do not think so.

When Canada was playing the Soviet Union, it was not Team Alberta with Gretzky or Team Quebec with Mario Lemieux. It was Team Canada. Does he not think Canadians share a greater vision of Canada where the central Government plays a greater role, not just one of 11 equal Governments? That is the true vision of Canada that Sir John A. Macdonald, Laurier, Mackenzie King, Diefenbaker, Pearson and Trudeau had. That view is the view of the majority. That is why we have a country, not a bunch of provincial dictators trying to run the country through these conferences, which amount to another level of Government. How do we get that message out? I think they are on our side.

I agree with the Hon. Member, we want Quebec in. I am prepared to recognize the distinct society. I would go further than he and accept the five suggestions of Premier Bourassa. However, this goes way beyond that. Add that to free trade and you have a double whammy.

I think we are losing this country and I would like to know how we are going to get the message out to Canadians.

Mr. Nowlan: Madam Speaker, I will be very brief because I obviously agree with almost everything the Hon. Member said. I could go along with the five conditions as well, more or less the way one Party did. Former Prime Minister Trudeau gave evidence before a committee and he was asked about who in Quebec really cares. He said other than some professors and politicians about 95 per cent of the people really are not aware or do not care. Quite frankly, as a Tory wondering about our standing in Quebec, because we are all so conscious of polls, I am amazed that if this great concern has filtered down to the people why is it not reflected in our position in that province?

I am afraid that the Canadian public, anglophone and francophone, are bored to tears with the Constitution. The message has not gone out. I do not think they really appreciate the way this process has come about. It has happened so quickly without public debate. Yes, it went to committee but that was in the summer. Our summers are so short that no one really pays attention to politics then.

The Member spoke out. I saw a little blurb in the paper while I was flying back to Ottawa on Sunday. I did not know that he was going to do what he did. I have received responses on the very strong position that I have taken. I think that people do not yet care because the message has not got out.

The Editor of The Globe and Mail who appears on The National every so often is such a pontificator as to make the infallibility of the Pope pale by comparison. Yet that paper has not led the debate. If I was from Quebec I would be all for this. If I was a francophone outside of Quebec I would be very concerned. I am concerned for Canada.

Mr. Berger: Madam Speaker, I want to compliment the Member on his magnificent speech. I hope other Members of Parliament will take the opportunity to read his speech or, even better, watch a videotape of it. You will agree with me, Madam Speaker, that very few were present for the Member's speech.

With regard to the interest of Canadians, Jean Marchand, who used to represent a riding in Quebec City, used to tell the story about the marine worker in his constituency who came home at the end of the day. When his wife asked him what kind of day he had he said that he had had an awful day, that he had a headache and could not concentrate on his work all day because he was worrying. When she asked what he was worrying about, he said he was worrying about the Constitution.

The fact is that the Constitution is not the kind of thing about which the average person worries. It is the responsibility of legislators to interest themselves in this question, particularly Members of this Chamber who have responsibility not only for the interests of their particular province but for the interests of the nation as a whole.

With regard to the national interest, the Member mentioned that the three words "We the people" in the U.S. Constitution were argued about for three weeks. After the referendum at the end of May, 1980, the Liberal Government proposed a declaration of principles to be included in the preamble of the new declaration. It starts off with the words "We the people of Canada" and that—

And this provoked the ire and rage of Quebec Nationalists who objected to the use of the words "the people of Canada" because, as they said, it was a negation of their Quebec nationality.

[English]

Mr. Trudeau replied to that in a rather famous open letter to Quebecers.

We all say that we want Quebec in the Constitution. I was one of the Members from Quebec who voted for the constitutional resolution in 1981.

Seventy Quebec Members voted for the constitutional resolution in 1981 because it was in the interests of Quebecers and Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: The two questions of the Member for Laurier (Mr. Berger) really prompted the answer to the first question. I will throw out, not in a pejorative way, that there really has not been a debate in the House of Commons. When all three Leaders and Parties are together on principle and have a hearing during the summer there is not time for it to percolate out from coast to coast. It is very politically astute to get the measure through, but that is not the way to have a meaningful debate and a better Constitution.

Mr. Waddell: Madam Speaker, I want to point out that the Hon. Member is from Nova Scotia, that the Member for Laurier (Mr. Berger) is from Quebec, that I am from Vancouver, and that we all share the same views. There is a feeling stretching across 8,000 kilometres that this is wrong. Since I took my stand, support for it has been running at about 98 per cent. Aside from some bureaucrats who do not like it, the people like the stand. There is that feeling for Canada.

The Member is absolutely right. Due to the process the story is not getting out to the public for debate. I hope to God that somehow, in some way, it will get out and we can fix up the Meech Lake Accord and have a decent Constitution for Canada.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I, too, want to congratulate my colleague from Nova Scotia on his remarks made here this afternoon. I want to begin my remarks with regard to the Meech Lake Accord by stating very clearly and unequivocally that I have great respect and admiration for all those Members who have spoken out in favour of the Accord. I have great respect for the enthusiasm with which they have launched their views. I would hope that in turn and in kind, although my views may be very different from the views of those individuals, they would have the common courtesy and the decency to respect my views which are shared by some Members, albeit not by the majority.

In the short time that I have I will make a few comments about process and about substance. With regard to process, it is difficult to accept that in 1987 11 men would meet into the early morning hours and consummate an agreement and consensus with regard to the most important and fundamental statute affecting our nation.

I have some difficulty with that. I believe, not that that process is inherently wrong, but that it has major omissions. This is not the consummation of a collective agreement. This is a fundamental tool of nation building. I emphasize that it was 11 men who gathered to consummate that agreement. Even more important were the comments made by the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) in July. He said to Members of Parliament and Canadians at large that those 11 had come together to consider the Constitution and that there would be no amendments and no improvements allowed to this particular agreement.

I think by any standard, particularly the objective standard, that one would have to agree that the process of debate, the process of challenging, expanding, exploring, and defining the substance of that most important document has taken a major step backward because Ministers, the Prime Minister, and others have come to the conclusion that, no matter what, these 11 men have made an agreement which can in no way be reformed, improved or amended. Madam Speaker, objectively speaking, that is a wrong process for us to be following in Canada in 1987.

I would now like to talk about the substance of the Accord. We have heard a great deal about it. I have heard the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations say the following, and I do not wish to quote him, but I think I am paraphrasing him correctly. If I am not, then I am sure Hon. Members will jump to their feet to correct me. He has led us to believe that the provisions within the constitutional Accord of 1987, particularly as they relate to the phrase "distinct society", do not really mean anything. That is one thing. Fortunately, or unfortunately, Members and individuals of the Province of Quebec have put a different interpretation on it.

Let me come to another area, and I will come back to the previous one. Let me come to the area of the Accord which stipulates that Canada must provide reasonable compensation to any province which rather than participate in a future national shared-cost program chooses to establish its own program "compatible" with national objectives. I have had great difficulty in trying to define and to distinguish as to what "initiative" means, what "compatible" means, what "national objectives" mean.

Who is to set the national objectives? Like all Members of this Chamber, I thought that the Parliament of Canada was the place where national objectives would be debated and discussed. That does not preclude consultations with provincial Governments—not at all. But what are we doing with regard to this particular amendment to the Constitution? Why have we not as a nation spelled out as to who will set the national objectives?

One may say, "Well, we understand that it will be the Parliament of Canada". Well, if one understands it to be the Parliament of Canada, then it should state that. I quote to you, Madam Speaker, some words which were used by a provincial colleague of mine in June of 1984. I refer to the words of the former Minister of Education who is now the Attorney General of Nova Scotia. This is what he had to say about national objectives. At that time he was the Chairman of the Council of Ministers of Education. He said this: "Given that provincial jurisdiction in the field of education, provincial Ministers of Education would contend that national purposes can only be understood in terms of provincial purposes".

Where is the role for national objectives? Where is the role for Parliament to set those national objectives? Some, if they wish to be politically mischievous would say: "Oh, you are just bashing the provinces". I am not bashing the provinces at all. This is a democratic institution which covers the geographical mass of our country. This is the rock of democracy in Canada. Surely, this rock of democracy ought to have in its Constitution that the national objectives affecting nationhood should be decided by the Parliament of Canada. As you know, Madam Speaker, there is a major omission within the Accord that does not stipulate that.

I have grave difficulties, some historical in their context, when someone tries to weaken a national Government and give more powers to provincial Governments. That is not to suggest in any suspicious way that they will do evil things. That is not my intention. But history will tell us, at least in my province, and for those provinces on the peripheral regions of this country, that the biggest ace was a strong national central Government. Our history tells us that. For those who argue that because Parliament has given up more duties and responsibilities to the provincial Governments that there will not be any effect, I think that is being somewhat, maybe, intellectually dishonest, but certainly naive at best, because we need a strong central Government. The poorer regions of the country more so than others need a strong central Government.

I made reference to the phrase "distinct society". The Minister of Federal-Provincial Relations said it does not mean anything. The Premier of Quebec has a different view, a very different view. He said this in the National Assembly on June 18, "First of all, we note that with the recognition of a distinct society we are achieving a major gain, and one that is not merely symbolic, because the country's entire Constitution will from now on have to be interpreted to reflect this recognition. The French language constitutes one fundamental characteristic of our uniqueness but it has other aspects such as our cultural, our political, economic and legal institutions. As we have so often said, we did not want to define all these aspects, precisely because we wanted to avoid reducing the National Assembly's role in promoting Quebec's uniqueness". It goes on for several other sentences, which I am sure most Members have read.

So we have the federal Government saying it does not mean anything but yet we have, and rightly so, legitimate, admirable men and women in different parts of Canada saying that it does mean something. I take offence, great offence, that the federal Government will not stand in its place and spell out what it believes distinct society means. If it does not mean anything, then come out and say that, be honest with the people of the Province of Quebec, never mind playing these games.

The Minister of Federal-Provincial Relations said, and quite rightly, that on the distribution of powers there is no change in the listing of those powers from provinces to the federal Government. But what he did not say is what effect that will have on the peace, order and good government clause, which is not in the Constitution per se but is done through the common law, through judicial interpretation. That is where it is done. Many constitutional lawyers will tell us that it does have an effect.

I would have hoped that the Government of Canada would have been a little bit clearer for me, and for Canadians generally speaking, on that particular point. If it means something, then spell it out as to what it means, never mind trying to camouflage it. In my view it is not symbolic; it is a substantive phrase. It is no longer in the preamble of the Constitution; it is in the body of the Constitution. That is a major distinction in itself. People can argue against it saying that it does not really mean anything; it is just the acknowledgement of an historical fact.

Who is any more distinctive than the people of Newfoundland? Who is any more distinctive than the people of Cape Breton Island, in terms of their history? This has the potential, I believe, if not spelled out clearly by the Government as to what it means, to be very confusing and very frustrating. In the years to come the judicial interpretation may go well beyond the good intentions of those individuals who consummated what they thought, in good conscience, was a good deal for Canada. But there are other major concerns that I have.

In the time remaining, let me talk about the fact that now we will have institutionalized First Ministers' conferences. On the agenda of the First Ministers' conferences we will have the discussion about the jurisdiction of fish. I do not know, Madam Speaker, if you have ever gone fishing, but when the fish come to the borders of Nova Scotia, they do not stop and look for a red light. They do not stop and look for a green light. Now we will have on the agenda, not next year, but the year after, the year after, and the year after, the jurisdiction of fish. What could be worse than that? Where is the stability that that will provide to the industry and the inshore fishermen, if every year at the constitutional conferences will be debated the jurisdiction of fish? If it were not so serious, it would be funny. I represent a constituency in Atlantic Canada, and what we are saying to the fishermen of that region in particular is that we will allow instability and uncertainty to prevail in the fishing industry by putting this item as a permanent agenda item at the First Ministers' conferences on the Constitution.

What about the concept itself of First Ministers' conferences being constitutionalized? Is that not now a new form of government in Canada? We have seen what happened here. Eleven men come together and agree on a particular constitutional Accord. Now they are reluctant and have stated that they will not accept any amendments. That is not good for Canada. I say sincerely to Hon. Members who support the Accord that that is not to suggest in any way that we do not consult with, talk to, or listen to our provincial legislators. I am not suggesting that. But to institutionalize another form of government called the First Ministers on the Constitution every year from now on seems to me to be usurping the role that Parliament, and Parliament alone would be doing in that regard.

The amending formula was rigid before the Meech Lake Accord, and most people have attested to that. Now there must be unanimity. People say, is that not great for the provinces, they can now say yes or no. But what about the people of Canada? Is it right for one province to be able to say no to something that is in the best interests of Canadians? Imagine the leverage that allows provincial Governments. If Newfoundland wishes funding for the Come-by-Chance oil refinery, it just withholds its support. We are institutionalizing a structure that will come back to haunt us. I sincerely believe that it is not in the best interests of Canadians that we follow that route.

My comments on the Charter will be very brief. We have heard a lot of discussion on the Charter. Although there are sections within the Meech Lake Accord that make specific reference to two sections of the Charter, it omits reference to other sections of the Charter. Any lawyer will tell you that the rule of interpretation by the courts has been laid out very clearly. If reference is made to something, as has been done in the Meech Lake Accord, and is does not make reference to the others, they will interpret that it is not to have an effect. In my view, and in my judgment, as subjective as it may be, but I have attempted to be objective, that is wrong because it will have negative effects with regard to the equality of men and women in the Constitution. It throws our Charter into question, which I do not think any Canadian wishes to see. We wish to have something which is clear and unequivocal.

Finally, I believe that we have done a great disservice in the Meech Lake Accord by abandoning our aboriginal people. We have abandoned the concept of a multicultural Canada, without even a reference within the Meech Lake Accord.

I wish to close with the words of Tennyson, "I am a part of all that I have met". I have met Canadians in Quebec, in Nova Scotia, in western Canada, and in Ontario. I have met young people, senior citizens, and veterans. They have all aspired to a strong national Government. I sincerely believe that in the short term and in the long term that this Accord will affect that dream of a strong, united Canada from coast to coast. For those reasons, I must say that if the amendments of our Party are not accepted, I will have to vote against the Meech Lake Accord.

Mr. Kindy: I wish to congratulate the Hon. Member for his excellent speech and analysis of the Meech Lake agreement.

In today's La Presse there is a Gallup Poll on whether Canadians would favour an elected Senate. The majority of Canadians say that they wish an elected Senate.

What is the feeling of the Hon. Member? Does he believe that with the Meech Lake Accord it will be possible to bring amendments to the Constitution and have the agreement of all the Premiers of Canada to have an elected Senate? Or will the Premiers have a vested interest in maintaining the status quo because they will more or less name the Senators? What is the feeling of the Hon. Member?

Mr. Dingwall: I have two points in response to the question of the Hon. Member.

Historically we ought to recall that the number of Senators that the federal Government is allowed to appoint in the peripheral regions of western Canada and Atlantic Canada is quite different from the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario.

In my thesis, I say that we are giving additional powers to Provinces like Ontario. The question then becomes where is the incentive in the Meech Lake Accord for the Government of Ontario to relinquish 26 Senators that they will now be able to appoint, as opposed to down to a Triple E Senate which is advocated by the Premier in the Province of Alberta to say 10 per province or region on an equality basis? What is the incentive? There is no incentive. If the Government is going to appoint 26, why would it only appoint 10? There is no incentive in the Meech Lake Accord.

The third point is the rigidity of the amending formula. If Peckford does not get his fish, do you think he will agree to Senate reform?

We have institutionalized a structure or a set-up which will be virtually impossible. I say "virtually impossible", but they may come down from the heavens to get agreement. That is the problem with the Meech Lake Accord. I do not think, under the auspices of the Meech Lake Accord that the objectives which the Hon. Member is espousing and which I am espousing in terms of an elected Senate will be achieved. In fact, I think it will be a step backward and that it will be even more difficult.

Mr. Kindy: Madam Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member for Cape Breton—East Richmond (Mr. Dingwall) for his excellent analysis of the situation as far as the Triple E Senate is concerned. However, what does he think about a system wherein we must approve the Meech Lake agreement which has been cast in stone, and Parliament cannot even debate it, or, if it debates it, it cannot amend it because it has been said that it must remain the way it is?

What does he think about this process? Does he think that powers are being taken away from us because it has been said that it cannot be amended, that it must be as it is?

Mr. Dingwall: Madam Speaker, the Hon. Member should have no doubt whatsoever that the institution which we now know as Parliament and the role we play as Members of Parliament will be lessened and lessened substantially. That role will be usurped by the Conference of First Ministers which will be convened yearly with regard to constitutional and other matters. They will be the ones, and we will not have the effective voice we ought to have as national parliamentarians.

The brief answer to the Hon. Member's question is that I do not believe it is very appropriate or in Canada's best interest for 11 men to come together to consummate a deal in the darkness of night and without a very lengthy, exhaustive, and detailed process to examine every issue affecting the Meech Lake Accord.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): It being 5.14 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS--PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved that Bill C-237, an Act to amend the Canada Elections Act (leave of absence), be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Madam Speaker, the purpose of my Bill is to amend the Canada Elections Act in respect of leaves of absence. One must understand that the Act now applies to all employers who fall under the jurisdiction of Part III of the Canada Labour Code. The Act allows an employer to permit an employee to have a leave of absence to seek a nomination to represent a political Party or to be a candidate in a federal election. That is where it begins, and that is where it ends.

It does not deal with what happens if a candidate is successful and serves two years or four years in the House of Commons.

Mr. Angus: Or nine months.

Mr. Rodriguez: It could be nine months, as in the case of 1979. The law is silent. When an employee presents himself, the employer can therefore say that he is sorry but that there is no longer a job in the corporation or operation.

What I simply want to do in my Bill is to amend the Canada Elections Act for all employers who come under the jurisdiction of Part III of the Canada Labour Code to make it law that if an employee is successful in a federal election he has the right to a leave of absence. Therefore, when he is no longer in public office, he has a right to come back to his employment.

Why have I considered this issue so important as to present a Private Member's Bill on the matter? In my 12 years in the House of Commons I have observed—and I think it is important—that the House of Commons is an expression of what it is that makes our system different from other systems. The fact is that in this House sits those who have been chosen by the citizens of Canada to represent them. This is the very essence and heart of the democratic process. If this is the essence of the democratic process and the expression of the democratic will of the people of Canada, Parliament must be representative of the people who make up its citizenry. It must be representative of the diverse nature and characteristic of the nation, ethnically, gender-wise, regionally, and occupationally.

I am sad to say that Parliament has historically been open to an elite. Those composing the House of Commons in the past have usually been white, Anglo-Saxon protestant men of relatively high incomes. Research will confirm that. Statistics indicate that most Members of Parliament come from the professions, particularly the legal profession.

Mr. Angus: Really, lawyers?

Mr. Rodriguez: Yes, absolutely. According to two Canadian political scientists, Michael Whittington and Richard Van Loon, 20 per cent of the Members of Parliament elected in 1984 came from the legal profession.

Mr. Gauthier: How many?

Mr. Rodriguez: Twenty per cent, while 60 per cent came from other professions.

To put this in some perspective, one must keep in mind that, as a percentage of the whole population lawyers represent less than 1 per cent. Yet, as a result of the 1984 election, 24 per cent of the House of Commons comes from the legal profession.

Why is Parliament not more representative? I have asked myself that question, and I think the reason lawyers are over-represented in the House is that it is very easy for them to leave their practices and, after serving their term in politics, whether they are defeated or they leave voluntarily, it is relatively easy for them to move back into practice. Politicians from other forms of employment or other professions would not find it so easy. Working class people just cannot leave their jobs and expect to return and pick up where they left off. That sort of easy to and fro is not available to working class people.

Similarly those Members of Parliament who are very wealthy can step into lucrative patronage positions or corporate directorships once they have left this House or have been defeated. There are myriad examples of that around. Indeed, many who have served on the Government front benches after they have been defeated are welcomed into the corporate lawyer boardrooms of the nation because it is very important for law firms to have prominent ex-politician representation. There are many examples. The former Prime Minister for one. I hardly think he goes into a courtroom to practice law. I read of him leading a delegation of corporate representatives to China so that they could make entrées regarding trade with China.

A former Minister of Finance who came out today in support of free trade sat on the front benches of a former government and was welcomed into boardrooms. Those positions are not available to working-class people. Again, to quote Van Loon and Whittington: "Not the least amount of disincentives of political life in Canada is the difficulty many MPs find in returning to private life. Stories of MPs requiring two years to find employment are not uncommon. This problem suggests another reason for the heavy concentration of professionals not only in Canada but presumably in the U.S. and British legislatures as well".

In short, the lack of job and financial security in politics discourages average Canadians from getting involved. That has been my concern, Madam Speaker. I have sat in this House for 12 years and I have seen it. I have experienced the difficulty of being able to return to a job once one has served one's nation and it may be that your representatives, Madam Speaker, feel that they need someone else.

What can we do to help other average Canadians get involved in the political process? That is what my Bill speaks to. It goes in some small way to complete the Canada Elections Act. It completes the process. It is not just to get a leave of absence to seek a nomination and to campaign for election to office. The process must be complete. But what happens after? That has been the disincentive for many excellent candidates who might have otherwise been elected to this House.

We have other Acts of Parliament which deal with our electoral process and which provide fairness. For example, we have an Election Expenses Act which tries to even out and to make politics in Canada fairer and less dependent upon one's pocketbook, making things more accessible and more democratic. It is an attempt to get away from the old practice of people attempting to buy a seat in the House of Commons. Before we had an Election Expenses Act I recall candidates for office to this House who spent $95,000 and lost. There were candidates who spent $150,000 to win office. This place was a hiding place for the wealthy. That is why we brought in the Election Expenses Act. It was an attempt to provide a level playing field so that it was not one's pocketbook that determined whether one got here or not.

We have also a Freedom of Information Act, an Act which ensures access to information. The Government has proposed legislation for a lobby registry Act. We have heard of and we are waiting for the conflict of interest legislation. All of these Acts tend to make our system more open, accessible and democratic.

My little Bill is one page long, but I appeal to Members in this House not to talk out this Bill because I think it is a small opening in the right direction. Not all the employers in Canada will be covered by this Bill, just those under Part III of the Canada Labour Code. It is a beginning and it is a leadership role which the federal Government would give if the Bill were approved. There are concerns by some who would say it would be open-ended, that a person could be here 15 years. I think if you look at the statistics, Madam Speaker,—and I know my hon. colleague from the Liberal Party knows that very few Members are here 15 years or beyond—then it is a question of negotiation between the employer and the employee. It may be that some arrangement would have to be made for retirement or placement in a position within the operation more commensurate with the skills and experiences as a Member of Parliament.

Surely the skills one learns in the House of Commons are skills that can be accommodated in any enterprise. Surely the reward for having served one's country—and I consider this to be a part of that, a commitment to serve our fellow citizens in the House of Commons—ought not to be a kick in the butt after six or three years. Many of us who are affiliated and identified with the particular ideology of a particular party would find it very difficult to be hired in the workforce. There is often a tendency that one is too closely identified with a particular political Party, that one is too hot to handle, that we cannot touch you.

I appeal to Members not to do the traditional thing which has been done around here with Private Members' Bills of talking them out. I do not mind that, but for God's sake if Members think this is a good idea and a step in the right direction, then they ought not to. I make that appeal to all Members on all sides of the House. Give democracy a chance. This is a small opening, a step in the right direction and I ask Members to support my Bill.

Mr. Moe Mantha (Nipissing): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to join in the debate on Bill C-237, an Act to amend the Canada Elections Act, which deals with the terms of leave of absence which certain employers grant their employees who run for election to the House of Commons. As all Members of Parliament are aware, Subsection 23(14) of the Canada Elections Act is the existing rule. It provides that employers to whom Part III of the Canada Labour Code applies, which section does not apply to the Public Service, must grant a leave of absence with or without pay to any employee who requests such a leave in order to seek a nomination and to be a candidate for election to the House of Commons. Under the terms of leave of absence, if a candidate is not elected, he or she can return to his or her job. If elected, the individual must resign from his or her job with the previous employer. What the Hon. Member for Sudbury is now proposing in this Bill is that those employers should be—

• (1730)

Mr. Rodriguez: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. The Hon. Member has referred to me as the Hon. Member for Sudbury. I am the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt.

Mr. Mantha: I apologize.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am sure the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) also occasionally, and it does happen to the Speaker too, makes a mistake on the correct appellation of a riding. I am sure the Hon. Member for Nipissing (Mr. Mantha) stands corrected.

Mr. Mantha: I did not know he was the Member from Nickel Belt. I will say the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) is now proposing in this Bill that employers should be requested to continue leaves of absence, albeit without pay, for those candidates successfully elected as Members of Parliament for the duration of their careers as Members of this House.

When Members resign or are defeated, they would have a guaranteed right to return to their previous job. While I am sure that all Members of the House and indeed all Canadians would appreciate such a guarantee when they take up new positions during their careers, this proposal is not one which I feel is appropriate or desirable.

I am against this proposal in principle. We in this House have a privileged role in contributing to the Government of this country. Our experience should stand us in good stead when we need to seek new employment. Members of this House are provided for in salaries and benefits. We should not need or want the kind of guarantee which the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt is proposing if and when our careers in this House come to an end.

I am also against this proposal because of its implications. The impact on employees, for example, would be significant. Under Part III of the Labour Code, a wide range of businesses, both large and small which are within the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada would be affected. These would include businesses in shipping, the railway, the airlines, the banks, radio broadcasting and any other business which does not fall within the exclusive legislative authority of the provincial legislatures.

In all, some of the 10 per cent to 15 per cent of Canadian businesses would be required to keep a job open for any employee who was elected as a Member of Parliament for as long as he or she remains as a Member of Parliament. Under the Government's conflict of interest guidelines, a Member of Parliament who is a Minister could not return immediately after an election to work at a company involved in activities related to his or her ministerial responsibilities.

I would argue that even from the point of view of Members of Parliament, the extended leave of absence would have its disadvantages. It would certainly apply unevenly to some MPs. I am sure that our constituents would agree that this proposal is going too far. There is room, however, for reasonable reform related to the election procedures and the political rights of Canadians. That is what the Government is proposing.

In one of the major initiatives of this Government, the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Mazankowski) introduced Bill C-79, an Act to amend the Canada Elections Act, on June 30 of this year. In this Bill, the Government is proposing among other reforms to improve the fairness of the election process by permitting previously excluded individuals to run as candidates for election. These include people who are involved with certain contracts with or for the Government of Canada; members of provincial and territorial legislatures; individuals who hold the office of sheriff, clerk of the peace, county or district Crown attorneys; paid government-appointed individuals who work in the services of the Government of Canada and others who have in the past been excluded from running for Parliament. All these individuals will now be eligible to run.

In addition, the Government is presently reviewing how it can expand the political rights of the Public Service within the limits necessary to maintain a politically neutral Public Service. This Government is taking strong and progressive interest in the reform of the election process and the expansion of political rights. This is the kind of reform which we encourage.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in the debate on Bill C-237. I believe this is the first time the House is considering this question, and I think the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) is to be commended for presenting a Bill that would enable individuals to obtain from their employer a degree of job security in the event that they participate in the election process.

Madam Speaker, if we are prepared to pay the price of democracy, we must be willing to let those people who wish to take an active part in the democratic process have certain guarantees. After listening very carefully to what the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt was saying earlier, I must say I agree with him on most counts—I don't very often—but I mostly agree when he says that Canadians who offer their services should be given some measure of security. However, I think the Bill should be amended. I think it may be necessary to add a provision—

[English]

—A sunset clause, Madam Speaker. I cannot think of the translation so I will use my second language. I really think this is an interesting proposal put to us by the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt. As I said, I would like to address it very briefly, and if it is going to committee, to bring in an amendment at that stage to put in a sunset clause.

The Bill contains a clause which enlarges upon the existing paragraph, Section 23(14) which states that every employer or employees to whom Part III of the Canada Labour Code applies shall upon application to him by any such employee grant to the employee leave of absence with or without pay to seek nomination as a candidate and to be a candidate for election for such period during election as may be requested by the employee. My friend for Nickel Belt wants to amend the Section and add the following: (b), upon application to him by any employee who is elected to the House of Commons, grant a leave of absence without pay to the employee for the duration of his term of the House of Commons.

I could return to my personal experience and state that seeking public office has been a difficult and frustrating experience for many public servants. I can remember when the former Member for Ottawa Centre, John Evans, stood for election, he had to forgo his job in the Public Service and ask for leave even to be a candidate in the election. At that time, he was refused because he was a middle management person, a senior public servant, who did not obtain the required permission.

The Public Service Employment Act is very clear. Upon election to the House of Commons, Subsection 5 of Section 32 states that an employee who is declared elected as a Member described in paragraph 1(a) thereupon ceases to be an employee. He is immediately struck from the list and cannot be considered for any future employment unless he starts from the bottom. That has caused some difficulty over the years for many public servants.

I say to my hon. friend from Nickel Belt, hoping the Bill will go to committee, that I may want to present an amendment which would include an amendment to the Public Service Employment Act so that we would strike this section from the present legislation. That would make sure that public servants, if they stand for and are elected to the House of Commons can, within reasonable limits, go back to the Commission following their leaving this place for whatever reason and have the right to be considered for employment on a continuing basis by their former employer.

An argument can also be made concerning the effect of Part III of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms which says that every citizen has the right to vote in an election of Members of this House or a legislative assembly and to be qualified for membership therein. That gives all Canadians the opportunity to present their candidacy. I think it would be appropriate for us to see to it that the Canada Labour Code be amended so that people working for federal undertakings would be eligible for continuing employment once they leave an elected position here.

As I said, I see two possible amendments. One concerns the restrictive section in the Act which should be removed, and secondly, possibly a sunset clause where the member could go back to his employer but not necessarily ask to be reinstated in the position he left. For example, I think of teachers or professionals in the health care field, nurses, doctors, chiropractors, osteopaths and so on. Possibly they would not be able to keep up with the state of the art and would have to go back for a retraining course. These are all things that could be worked out by the employee and employer. They could even be negotiated in a contract.

I would like to enlarge upon the scope of the Bill and include all people, whether they come under the Labour Code or under the Public Service Employment Act. That would include many hundreds or thousands of Canadians who at this time have to take very serious risks with their future and that of their families if they give themselves up to elected office.

I commend the Hon. Member for his Bill. I will sit down now and hope that it passes through second reading and goes to committee. I think we should look at this very closely with the hope of improving upon it because I think it is a good idea.

Mr. Charles Hamelin (Charlevoix): Madam Speaker, I rise to comment on the Bill introduced by the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez). As Hon. Members would know, it is basically aimed at giving any federal employee in Canada an opportunity to run and be a candidate in a national election. It brings in an amendment, because this provision already exists in the Canada Labour Code. Indeed any employee may run and be a candidate in an election, but the existsing statute provides that as soon as the individual is elected or defeated, if elected he is no longer employed by the Public Service of Canada, but if he is defeated he can of course resume his duties immediately.

Not only would Bill C-237 sponsored by our colleague maintain this practice, but it would add a new provision: upon application to the employer by any employee who is elected to the House of Commons the employer would grant a leave of absence, without pay, to the employee for the duration of his term at the House of Commons. In other words, if ever this Member of Parliament were defeated, he would automatically return to his job at the same level.

At first blush this proposition appears to be quite generous and acceptable. My colleague from Ottawa Centre, I think, suggested introducing a sunset clause, in other words a temporary provision which would apply for a limited time and enable an employee to return to his job, but this option would be open to him only during a certain period of time.

Let me give an example. Let us suppose that, after being elected to Parliament, because of various circumstances, a former postal worker is defeated a year or two later and that there is, as suggested by my colleague, some provision saying that if you are a Member of Parliament for four years, you are unfortunately no longer considered an employee of the Public Service and you cannot get your old job back.

The problem with such a proposal is that it would affect only a very small group in Canadian society, namely federal employees. It would create a distortion. Why them and nobody else? This is an argument which should be considered.

My colleague said: Give a chance to democracy. Would applying this legislation only to federal Government and Crown corporation employees not be less than democratic? I know that when he asks us to give a chance to democracy, it is because he would like the federal Government to play a leadership role in this regard. However, I believe that this proposal could cause distortions, and there are already many of them in our system.

It is true, as he said, that there are too many lawyers and professionals who, because of their social standing and the guarantees provided by their profession, can return to this profession if they are defeated. They acquire a prestige which they then, rather generously, offer usually to other businesses, and so on.

It should be noted however that the possibility of conflict of interests is there. We know that under the law Ministers or former Ministers are prohibited from returning immediately to their own business or to a previous employer to avoid a situation where they might divulge information to which they had exclusive access. So the law does contain a kind of ethical code to prevent such situations.

To my colleagues I would also suggest the case of a CBC employee, for instance, a political writer and commentator who would be known under a given label for two, three or four years, be elected and become a Minister, and who on the day after his defeat would stick a microphone in the face of his opponent, availing himself of the provisions of this private Member's Bill. I do not know whether Canadians would appreciate my immediate return as a Radio-Canada reporter where I would interview and comment on the political activities of somebody who would have just defeated me. There are some particular consequences that would require special provisions.

One could consider the extreme case that someone from within the expanded federal Public Service and its agencies would be elected for a specific purpose, to defend special interests. For instance, a person supported by certain interests could get elected to defend proposals or policies concerning transportation or shipping. In any case, without wishing to prejudge a person's intentions, I maintain there might be a conflict of interests due to the unconditional guarantee that one goes back to one's previous job. The Bill does have its merits. Its purpose is to broaden the pool of candidates and to create a situation where we have what is referred to in the United States as the President concept, which means that anyone can become president of the United States, and so forth. I agree that, whatever people may say, and despite our laws by which we may run for election and eventually become ministers, it isn't easy and it is not exactly reassuring. Today, at least for young MPs, there is nothing that provides us with any security, considering that the mandate we receive from the people is only temporary, since many of us may be faced with possible defeat. Eventually, if this Bill is passed, we might see some rather extreme situations where someone who has been elected for 10 or 12 years finds that his job has disappeared. The labour market changes and situations change.

So if the Bill is adopted or is referred to committee, Madam Speaker, I would certainly add a sunset clause, a time limitation, as the Hon. Member said. That would certainly be one of the amendments we would have to add. Furthermore, we would have to look into all possible causes of conflicts of interest. We would also have to consider the somewhat elitist and anti-democratic aspect of a measure that would use taxpayers' money to help only a small segment of the population.

For these reasons, Madam Speaker, I am not sure at this time that the House should devote its energies to considering Bill C-237, unless it is prepared to make an exhaustive study of all the consequences.

• (1750)

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I was pleased to have the opportunity to second the motion of my colleague, the Member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez), whose riding, incidentally, is 700 miles away from mine. Despite that I know the name of his riding, unlike the Hon. Member for Nipissing (Mr. Mantha) who lives next door.

Before I begin my comments I would like to respond briefly to the remarks made by two of the government Members. I think they really missed the boat. The Hon. Member for Nipissing is probably a good spokesman against this Bill as he has a private sector involvement to return to when he is defeated in the next election. It is obvious why he does not want protection for others.

There is an inference that the Bill is aimed at federal government employees. In fact, it is aimed at employees who are covered under federal labour law. That includes private as well as public corporations throughout the country.

This Bill is important to me as someone who has been elected twice to a legislature or parliament, has been defeated once in a legislature, and knows the reality of both systems, that is, having and not having a leave of absence. When I was elected to the Ontario Legislature in 1975 a minority government was in power. I ran with the permission of the City Council of Thunder Bay. After I became the MPP for Fort William I had to apply to City Council and endure a two-hour public debate on whether or not I should be given an unpaid leave of absence for the term of that legislature. Council decided to be fair and allow me a leave of absence for that term.

While I was a member of the legislature the city developed a policy to deal with future situations of this type. The policy was that leaves of absence would not be granted other than for people to seek nomination and run for office. Once elected they would not be granted a further leave of absence. Luckily for me, after my defeat in 1977 or, as I refer to it, my forced early retirement, I returned to a position at the same level with the City of Thunder Bay parks and recreation department. For a variety of reasons, none of which are now important, I became a union member and was, therefore, covered under the collective agreement of the Canadian Union of Public Employees Local 87.

That agreement was very good in terms of electoral prospects. It allowed me a leave of absence in order to stand for election while protected by the collective agreement. There was also a provision which allowed me an unpaid leave of absence to serve in either the Parliament of Canada or the Legislature of Ontario.

In the 1979 and 1980 election campaigns I ran knowing that I and my family—and I emphasize "my family"—would have income security despite my decision to continue to play a part in governing the Province of Ontario and this country. It is one thing for a single person with no dependent family to take a chance and run for public office with the chance of later being defeated, but it is quite another for a person with a family, particularly in the situation of a minority government. Many politicians in Ontario this fall found themselves out of a job, wondering what to do next.

That protection exists for those who have a collective agreement, but what about those who are not covered by such an agreement? I found myself in that position once again because prior to the 1984 election I was arbitrarily promoted out of the bargaining unit and was, therefore, no longer covered by the collective agreement. I was subject to the city council policy that I could have an unpaid leave of absence to run but if and when elected had to resign.

If I was defeated or decided to leave the House of Commons or the legislature, wherever it may have been, I could come back and for a year apply as an interim applicant. It really sounds great, except I do not know of any organization that has such a thing as interim applicants for non-union positions. There is no seniority list. There is no provision to provide protections. In effect, I am here without a leave of absence.

I recognize that my colleagues' Bill does not deal with a municipality which, in this case, is covered by Ontario labour law. But the principle is extremely important. As my colleague said, when we provide the leadership at the federal level then the provinces will follow suit. In this regard I refer to the Election Expenses Act. The federal Parliament led and the provinces followed suit. Some were slower than others, but they certainly did follow.

In addition to ensuring equality of access between the various employment sectors, shall we say, whether it is the professions or people who work for other people I believe, although I do not have statistics to back me up, that one of the reasons we do not have as many women seeking public office at the federal level, or at the provincial level for that matter, is because of security. Let us consider, for example, a single parent. If a single parent knew that whatever job she had at the moment would be protected in the event that she got caught in a minority government situation, then there might be a better chance that she would take the chance to go public, as they say, and stand for public office. There is that added incentive to accept my colleague's Bill and to refer it to a legislative committee. In this way we can deal with some of these real questions about what its impact will be on employers.

My colleague from the Liberal Party raised a good point with respect to the federal Public Service and automatically being terminated. I know what that is like. I walked into my office the day after the election thinking that I would negotiate the completion of my employment, the transition. I was informed that I had been terminated three hours before. I can appreciate what federal public servants go through. They have to go home and say, "Dear, I don't have anything to go back to. All my eggs are in the parliamentary basket". I do not think that that is good for the country.

We want as broad a cross-section as possible represented in the House of Commons. This is done regionally where it is a conscious decision. We consciously do it to ensure that the larger, less-populated areas have the type of representation that allows for communication. Let us now take the next step to ensure that those in all walks of life who desire can have the opportunity to run for office, to take the chance to represent the people of Canada in this great institution.

I encourage my colleagues to get this matter into a legislative committee so that we can have a thorough examination of the issue and bring in legislation that is deemed acceptable to all sides of the House.

Mr. John Oostrom (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, the Bill before us today addresses a very serious aspect of our democratic system. I thank the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) for bringing it to the attention of the House.

Democratic governments are governments of the people and for the people. If a government is to remain strong and vibrant with a solid vision of the future, then it must have among its decision-makers the brightest and the ablest individuals in the country. There can be no higher calling except that in the service of one's country. The Bill we have before us today proposes to extend the leave of absence provisions respecting a candidate in a federal election to a candidate who is successfully elected as a Member of the House of Commons. The Bill will ensure that they can return to their previous employer after they leave the House of Commons.

By ensuring that an individual can return to his previous employer, the Government of Canada increases the talent pool from which people can seek public office. Seeking public office is a very serious undertaking. When making such a decision you must consider your family, the time, your economic future, and your commitment. Once you commit to seeking public office and become elected you belong to the people. Your decisions and actions will be geared to making Canada a better place in which to live. Your personal life, due to the time commitments, becomes neglected because the greater good of the people will be the priority. You are put under a microscope with millions of eyes observing and analysing your every move and action. Your statements will be analysed. You will receive criticism and praise. Yet, when you make a commitment to seek public office, you are expected to be able to perform under pressure. With everything that an individual has to contend with once elected to office, there should not be the added worry of having to think about the economic well-being of the family once the elected term is over.

If one is a wealthy individual, there are no economic concerns once the elected term is over. However, if you come from the segment of the population which is accountable to an employer then concerns are of major importance. The employer is not obligated to take you back after your term as a Member of Parliament is over. I wonder if this is right.

There are two schools of thought in this area. There are those who say that the employer should not be responsible for an individual once elected to public office and to give an extended leave of absence. Once the individual leaves a company, that person is no longer contributing to the economic health of that corporation. In many instances, the company has to go out and hire one, perhaps two individuals to staff the vacated position. The employer may have spent a great deal of funds and time to train you, and now the company feels that their investment has not yielded any benefits. The company may not find anyone with the skills or knowledge to fill the vacant position, and consequently that affects the well-being of the company and also the other employees which are dependent on it. Technology may have made these individuals redundant, then the company has a non-productive person on staff to hinder its operations.

There is another major consideration and that is conflict of interest. Individuals who hold public office could be seriously compromised should decisions have to be made which would affect the company from which they have an extended leave of absence. For example, what type of pressure would be applied to an individual whose career is in the banking industry if Parliament had before it a Bill affecting that industry? That individual could face some very serious choices. He could declare conflict of interest, much the same as municipal politicians do whenever they vote on an issue which they, their families, or business could profit from. However, municipal affairs have a very narrow spectrum of issues. A piece of legislation in the House of Commons will affect millions of Canadians.

If an individual refrains from participating in a piece of legislation because of a conflict, is that individual being fair to the constituents who elected him? The legislation may have a major impact on their lives. Members of Parliament are expected to make very tough decisions, decisions which will be fair to all. Yet if the elected Member declares conflict of interest and does not participate in the process, then the people lose their voice and interests in the decision-making process. I wonder if that is fair or right. Certainly, in this instance, there is a major dilemma for the elected Member. Should the elected Member participate in debate? How could he ensure that the involvement will be non-partisan? How can the employer be prevented from applying subtle pressure on this individual? Certainly, the conflict of interest possibilities leave many areas which need to be addressed for Bill C-237 to be effective.

With all the legislation the Government and the committees discuss, individuals will have the very difficult task in many instances of being able to identify a potential conflict of interest. There is the possibility that elected individuals would always be looking over their shoulders for accusations of potential conflicts of interest.

This brings us to another disadvantage. With possible conflicts of interest always being present, the effectiveness of elected individuals as legislators could be impaired. They may become timid and non-committal, thus leaving the Government in the hands of the bureaucrats and the electorate, without a voice in Parliament. Democracy would not be served if this occurred.

The opposite point of view is that by an employer guaranteeing an elected Member his position once he ceased to be a Member of Parliament, the House of Commons would naturally attract individuals from a larger cross-section of society. The Hon. Member for Nickel Belt has ably pointed out that individuals, who are leaders in their field but cannot pursue elected office due to financial restraints, could now seek it, for their future would be secure. Thus, the electoral process would be fairer and the brightest individuals would seek public office, which would ensure that innovative ideas could be brought to the forefront. In addition, ensuring that an individual has something to go back to allow Canada to have a better across-the-board representation, since it would free up more individuals to seek office.

As I stated before, serving one's country is the highest honour for an individual to attain. By ensuring that their financial future is secure, more people can make a contribution to Canada. However, before we proceed the implications must be more thoroughly examined, for both positions I have discussed are valued and deserve merit.

Certainly Bill C-237 makes an attempt to address an issue with which all democratic countries have constantly wrestled. There is no doubt that Bill C-237 needs further discussion but its thrust is logical, for it would indeed make elected office more accessible to more people. That is what democracy is all about.

I commend the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt for bringing the matter to our attention today. There are some very good points in the piece of legislation. In fact, I was faced with making such a decision myself. I had been employed by a company for 23 years, and I cannot go back to it. However, I think the individual must make the decision.

I thank the Hon. Member for bringing the matter before us today. I think we should talk more about it and look at it from more angles, and perhaps the Bill will eventually go forward and result in a system which is open to many more Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hour provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 42(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 66 deemed to have been moved.

AGRICULTURE—LOSS OF MEAT INSPECTION STAMP AT KITCHENER PLANT/REDUCED NUMBER OF INSPECTORS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, on September 28, I raised an issue concerning the integrity of the Canadian meat packing and meat inspection system of the Government of Canada. This was brought on by two concerns. First was that in late August or early September a meat inspection stamp was lost at the J. M. Schneider plant in Kitchener. There does not seem to be any clear answer from the Government on whether or not the stamp has been found.

There are reports that there is a very slipshod and loose mechanism for maintaining the security of stamps in that plant, but I was seeking reassurance from the Government that action was being taken to recover the lost stamp, to ensure that it was not being used in a fraudulent and counterfeit way, and to ensure that necessary security steps were being taken. The matter has been reported in the press, and there was general public concern about the integrity and security of the entire system. I did not receive anything very specific as to whether the stamp was found, whether it had been replaced, used fraudulently or whether a police investigation was carried out or what had happened. He only responded in a general way.

The second area and my supplementary question concerned the Government's program of cutting back the number of meat inspectors across the country. On October 1, just two days after my question, the Government implemented a new program in the Province of Ontario which will cut back the number of inspectors in poultry plants, at least in two pilot plants, to 85 per cent of what we had in the past. In one very large plant the number of inspectors is being reduced from around 35 to around 30 and turning over that inspection to plant personnel who do not have the same objectivity or responsibility that a government inspector has. The more concerning aspect is that the program is being implemented in two plants and will ultimately be implemented across the entire country, as I understand it, on January 1. I am seeking reassurance that this system of rapid or streamlined inspection of broilers and poultry meat will pass the test of quality.

In the United States the system has been highly discredited. The subject has been raised on popular programs like 60 Minutes on several occasions showing it is totally inadequate. When we are adopting a program of that nature in Canada we should have the reassurance from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) that the system will meet the high standards set in the past and will not become a mirror image of the highly discredited American system which is being copied by the Minister of Agriculture and the Government of Canada.

I hope the Parliamentary Secretary in responding tonight can provide some reassurance not only to me and to this House of Commons but to Canadians that the system is intact, that there are adequate controls in place, that the integrity of the system is being maintained both in the inspection of poultry-killing plants and in the case of the lost stamp which is an important instrument for insuring the integrity of our meat inspection system in Canada.

Mr. Claude Lanthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the inspection legend on the Department of Agriculture's meat inspection stamps gives Canadian consumers the assurance that meat products have been declared fit for human consumption by a federal Government inspector. That is why stamps bearing the inspection legend are kept under secure conditions at all times.

There have been no changes in the regulations for the use and maintenance of these stamps in recent years.

The use of federal inspection stamps is subject to very strict surveillance. They are kept in a locked cabinet, and the key is always carefully guarded by a Government of Canada inspector.

It seldom happens that one of the stamps is lost, but when it does happen, the situation is taken very seriously and an investigation is started immediately, with the help, if necessary, of the local police force.

At Establishment 35 of J.M. Schneider's Inc., a stamp was reported missing on September 3 this year. Following a short investigation conducted by the veterinarian in charge and the Establishment's management, the stamp was quickly found but was, unfortunately, ruined beyond repair.

On September 10, 1987, another stamp was reported missing in the same location. It has not yet been found.

However, federal employees are now conducting an investigation, and according to their initial findings, it seems the stamp was accidently dropped on a grinder used to grind non-edible food products.

The possibility that the stamp was used by unauthorized persons was ruled out by the investigators, whose findings showed that control of inspection stamps in this particular establishment was very satisfactory and conformed to standards that are judged to be very strict in Canada.

The Kitchener-Waterloo police and the OPP were informed and asked to intervene in the course of the investigation, but the Minister of Agriculture has not yet received the official report. As soon as we have this information, we shall be glad to forward the findings to the Hon. Member.

VISIBLE MINORITIES—ACKNOWLEDGEMENT OF INJUSTICES—AMENDMENT OF WAR MEASURES ACT

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Madam Speaker, I hope you are aware that on April 27 of this year, Masumi Mitsui was buried in Hamilton, Ontario, at the age of 99. Masumi Mitsui was a Canadian of Japanese origin who was born in Tokyo in the last century. He came to Canada in 1908 and volunteered for service in the First World War. He served in the Canadian army and at the Battle of Vimy Ridge, was awarded the Military Medal for bravery.

The Battle of Vimy Ridge was the battle which many considered to be the birthplace of real Canadian nationhood. Masumi Mitsui was there and won the Military Cross for his bravery on that occasion.

After the First World War, Mr. Mitsui served as President of a branch of the Royal Canadian Legion. At the beginning of World War II when Canada declared war on Japan, he again volunteered for active service again against Japan.

In spite of that, after Pearl Harbour, Mr. Mitsui was interned, deported from British Columbia and all of his property in Port Coquitlam was seized. All of his possessions, his home and his 17-acre poultry farm were seized and he was compensated for all of that by being paid $2,291 less legal costs.

Masumi Mitsui was only one of 184 Canadians of Japanese origin who served in the Canadian Armed Forces in World War I. Fifty-three of those Canadians of Japanese origin were killed in action and 91 were wounded. In spite of that sacrifice they made for their country in World War I, in spite of the bravery of Masumi Mitsui, he and his family and all of those surviving veterans and their families and some 22,000 Canadians of Japanese origin were interned, deported from the West Coast of Canada and had their property seized.

All this occurred in spite of the fact that no Japanese Canadian was ever charged with aiding or abetting the Japanese during World War II. No Canadian of Japanese origin was ever convicted of aiding and abetting the Japanese nation during World War II or after it for that matter.

How did Canadians of Japanese origin feel about that situation? My wife's doctor, Dr. Toguri, has described to me her feelings as a teenage girl in a letter she wrote recently. She wrote:

> The methods used in confiscating the assets of the Canadian Japanese were scandalous. For example:
> (a) Farms on Saltspring Island, Main Island, Delta Island, Surrey and Richmond were rich lands that supplied vegetables and fruit to Vancouver and other cities. These were boarded up and sold for a song, without consent of the owners.
> (b) Fishing boats—Diesel powered Seine boats were brought down from Prince Rupert with the Canadian Japanese fishermen still on them. They were not allowed to get in touch with their families, were not given any food and had to hand over their ownership registrations to the Custodians and were never able to see their boats again.
> These were also sold at auctions for very little, also without consent of the owners.
> (c) Individual businesses were lost without recompense.
> (d) Homes—Some families were given 24 hours' notice to vacate and to take two suitcases per person. Most just boarded their windows and placed padlocks on their doors. These houses were either sold for the taxes or for very nominal amounts, again without consent of the owners.
> 3. Losses of incalculable value:
> (a) Loss of friends, especially school friends. The great psychological damage done to a great number of bright children who felt isolated and deserted, like prisoners in a land they were born into.
> (b) Loss of education. Many, including a brother of mine taking premedicine at UBC, were asked to leave and turn in their COTC uniforms. Can you imagine the psychological trauma to a young boy of 20. Curiously > enough, another brother of mine was in a medical school in Tokyo at the same time as a Canadian student and was allowed to finish his course.

> (c) Loss of earnings for the years in the camp.
> (d) Loss of self-worth, being treated like prisoners, having to carry photographs and ID cards with fingerprints and the necessity to get permission slips to move anywhere in the city.
> (e) Loss of dignity and being forcibly ghettoized in tarpaper shacks.
> The blatant truth and the bottom line of this so-called "black mark" against the government is that many people, including politicians and relatives of politicians and custodians, profited from this mass wholesale evacuation by being able to buy many of the lands and the houses at sidewalk sale prices—to buy boats and businesses for pittance, and all in the name of "Emergency War Measures Act". Shame!
> This is supposed to be a land of oppo. unities. We will never become prosperous unless our mentality progresses to the point where we are all treated equally.
> It is not easy to put myself back to those bewildering, painful years of my burgeoning adolescence, when morality and justice taught to me by my church was in full conflict to what Canada was doing to me as a Canadian of Japanese origin!

• (1825)

What are we going to do about this? The Minister of Multiculturalism indicated in the House that the Government was prepared to offer an apology to Canadians of Japanese origin and make changes to the War Measures Act so that this sort of thing would never happen again. However, the question remains: What about compensation? Is the Government prepared to pay compensation in this case?

Before the election campaign, in May of 1984, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) was quoted in The Globe and Mail as saying:

> I feel very strongly that Canadian citizens whose rights were abused and violated and trampled upon indeed should be compensated.
> If there was a Conservative Government I can assure you we would be compensating Japanese Canadians.

You are aware that just recently the U.S. House of Representatives passed a Bill not only offering an apology to Americans of Japanese origin but also providing for $1.2 billion in compensation to those same Americans of Japanese origin.

We know what the Prime Minister said before the election. We know what the American House of Representatives is prepared to do. Tonight I want to know from the Parliamentary Secretary what Canada is prepared to do for Canadians of Japanese origin.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Madam Speaker, I rise to respond to the three basic questions which the distinguished Member has just laid before the House. The first concerns an apology to those very seriously affected; the second concerns the intention of the Government with respect to the War Measures Act; the third concerns the question of compensation.

The Secretary of State (Mr. Crombie) already indicated very clearly in this House some months ago, as indeed had his predecessor, that this Government indicated to the National Association of Japanese-Canadians its willingness to acknowledge publicly the injustices suffered by Japanese Canadians, meeting the first demand of the NJAC. At this time, however, the association has asked us not to proceed with an official apology.

• (1830)

The question of changes to the War Measures Act is much more clear-cut. When the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Beatty) tabled his White Paper on defence policy he spoke very clearly on this matter. He said in part:

> We will replace the War Measures Act with new emergencies legislation which will both better protect civil liberties and provide greater flexibility in dealing with emergencies.

As Hon. Members are aware, this has now been done with the tabling in the House on June 26 of two separate Bills, C-76 and C-77, designed to provide for the continuing security of Canadians in a changing world and to create a regime to deal with emergency situations. Bill C-76 fully meets the second demand of the NAJC taking an historic step to try to ensure that what happened, repugnant as it was to all Canadians, will never happen again.

The new defence legislation has benefited from considerable input from the several ministries which have responsibilities in this particular area. The input has been part of a thorough review of our defence policy which the Government promised the Canadian people in the Speech from the Throne opening the first session of this Parliament. We are not a militaristic nation and as the White Paper clearly states:

> The legislation will include adequate safeguards to protect fundamental rights and freedoms and to limit both the duration and the substance of exceptional measures to no more than is needed.

The sole remaining issue is compensation. The Government has offered a $12 million compensation package to be administered by representatives of the various Japanese-Canadian communities across Canada. The NAJC has rejected this offer, demanding instead individual per capita grants to people irrespective of loss or need. This would, as has been indicated to the House in the past, collectively exceed $400 million. The Government does not consider this position equitable for reasons fully explained to the NAJC.

It is indeed regretted by all Canadians, not only those here in the House, that this important matter remains unresolved. The instances cited by my hon. colleague are important. I know the Secretary of State still stands ready to conclude satisfactorily this important question.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES—PRESENCE OF DIOXIN IN PAPER PRODUCTS—DEPARTMENTAL RESPONSIBILITY

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I recently raised a question with the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Andre) with regard to leaked documents which have come to our attention about the presence of dioxin in very small quantities in ordinary paper products. These documents come from the United States. Very small quantities of dioxins have been found in paper products there.

It so happens that the processes in Canada for manufacturing pulp and paper are the same as in the United States. Therefore, we have reason to believe that if dioxins result from the use of chlorine in the production process in the United States our own ordinary paper products such as disposable diapers, coffee filters, bathroom tissue and writing paper must also contain dioxin.

I do not want to be alarmist about this. It is possible that the contamination of this part of our environment by dioxin may be the least of our problems. We know that there are dioxins in other parts of the system. We know they are in the Great Lakes and have been found as a result of other processes on the West Coast. We know that the eggs in herring colonies do not hatch and that very minute quantities of the most deadly dioxins have been found there. While I am raising this particular question regarding dioxins, I do not want to exaggerate it. It is a global problem and there are, of course, cumulative effects from exposure to dioxins. Very, very small quantities can be deadly. We have to be extremely careful about this matter.

We have no reason to believe that there is any safe exposure level in the case of the deadliest of the dioxins. While I do not want to be alarmist about it, I think given the seriousness of the problem this was a reasonable question to ask. In this particular case we are not talking about the general environmental question, the question about drinking water and waste products in the water system, but about paper products, a product which would come under the auspices of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

I asked this question of the Minister and the response I received was quite unsatisfactory. It was to the effect that he could not act, that the law did not allow him to act. Indeed, he suggested that somehow I wanted him to disobey the law and that the New Democratic Party was not interested in obeying the law.

If one looks very carefully at the legislation, one will see that it clearly shows that he can act. He can order inquiries. He is responsible for hazardous products. If there is dioxin in paper products, then the products themselves become hazardous products. He can act. So also can the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp).

We have reason to believe that the Minister of National Health and Welfare now has some kind of inquiry going, yet we do not have any details with respect to it. I hope he will provide some details as to what sort of a study is being conducted and when we might have some results. If the results do confirm that there is a danger, what kind of protection will the public be getting? One way or another, we ought to be getting some action on this. So far we have simply got escapism from the Minister who does not want to take his responsibilities seriously.

I think there is a moral in this story. I think it goes to show that we need more serious environmental protection, and we need it in a comprehensive way. Paper products are only part of the problem. If dioxins are present in the process, then they will show up in the products. But if dioxins are present in the process, then they will also be in the effluent. They will get into the drinking water and into the fish and the wildlife.

We need to be dealing with all of these problems, not just the products' one. That is why we need a stronger Ministry of the Environment. That is why we need environmental protection legislation. That is why we need active co-operation among the different Ministers for their particular responsibilities: the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, in the case of actual consumer products.

I am sorry to see that we have not so far had this kind of action. The environmental protection Bill before the House at present is a very, very weak rendition of environmental protection. We do not have it there. What we need is a much more global approach to what is clearly a global problem.

Mr. Claude Lanthier (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Investigations by the United States Environmental Protection Agency and the American Paper Institute have revealed the presence of low levels of dioxin in effluents from some bleach and kraft mills and in certain paper products. Press releases have been issued on these findings by both organizations.

Dioxin was present in low concentration for some products but not in others. For example, it was present at a concentration of 13 parts per trillion in writing paper, four parts per trillion in paper towels, and six to eight parts per trillion in paper plates. Its presence was not detected at all in baby diapers.

Dioxin has also been shown to be present in the effluent and pulp produced by some bleached kraft pulp mills but not in others. Average concentrations of 0.16 parts per trillion were measured in the untreated effluents, 0.04—that is 400 parts per trillion, which is very small incidentally—in the treated effluent, and 13 parts per trillion in the finished pulp.

The federal Government is concerned about the presence of dioxin in these materials, however small they are, as we regard dioxin as a particularly toxic chemical and believe that every attempt should be made to reduce its entry into the environment. I would emphasize that the concentrations measured are extremely low. Nevertheless, the risks they pose need to be properly assessed.

Our competent Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) has already requested that officials in his Department conduct a health risk assessment. Results of the assessment will be provided shortly to the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the Department of the Environment. National programs to address product exposure and environmental concerns will be developed, as required for this inquiry.

The dioxin problem is national and international in scope. Actions to limit its presence are ongoing in the United States, Sweden, and Ontario. The federal Government is fully aware of this work. The experience of others will be considered in the development of future federal programs.

In Canada, work to reduce dioxin releases into the environment has been underway since 1983, following recommendations made by an expert advisory committee on dioxins established by the then Ministers of National Health and Welfare and the Environment.

A departmental task force has been established recently, and it is reviewing results obtained to date on dioxin levels in pulp and paper mill effluents. This group of experts will recommend appropriate programs to address this problem. As required, programs will be initiated by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to address product exposure concerns.

We hope to give the results of these inquiries in a very short time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-267, an Act to amend the House of Commons Act (estimates).

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that the Hon. Member shall have leave to introduce the Bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gauthier: Explain.

• (1110)

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the Bill is to add the Administrator to those offices of the House of Commons that are responsible for preparing the estimates of the sums required for the House. The Board of Internal Economy and the House have now been organized with an Administrator who is doing an excellent job, and we felt that this would be an appropriate person to be responsible for preparing the estimates for the House of Commons.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-268, an Act to amend the Canada Elections Act.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the Hon. Member have leave to introduce the said Bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Riis: The purpose of this Bill is to allow urban voters to be sworn in and vote on election day when their names fail to appear on the voters' list for urban polling divisions. It is the same procedure that is presently available for rural voters.

The Bill would also attempt to remedy the situation where candidates and their canvassers have been denied entry to apartment buildings, hotels, and the like, which have no soliciting policies in place.

It would also allow travellers and students, who are temporarily resident outside of Canada, to vote in general elections in a manner similar to the Canadian Armed Forces and the Public Service electors who are presently posted outside of Canada.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

OPPOSITION TO TAX ON FOOD

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty today to present a petition which meets the requirements of Standing Order 106 and which bears the signatures of your petitioners, most of them constituents of Ottawa—Vanier. The petition reads as follows:

Whereas since September 1984 the federal Government has imposed on Canadian taxpayers 25 new taxes or tax increases, in particular on medical and dental supplies, snack foods, candies and soft drinks;

Whereas the federal Government in its tax reform proposal is studying the possibility of imposing on Canadians a general tax on goods and services, including food;

Whereas food constitutes a vital element in day-to-day life, and whereas the imposition of this tax would have the effect of seriously penalizing certain categories of taxpayers such as the aged, families, the unemployed, low-income taxpayers, youth, and so on;

Wherefore, your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject all measures that would have the effect of imposing a sales tax on food products.

CANADA POST—OPPOSITION TO PROPOSED CLOSURE OF POST OFFICE—BLOOMFIELD, N.B.

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty under Standing Order 106 to present a petition on behalf of the residents of Bloomfield in my riding of Fundy—Royal. They are extremely distressed at the intention of Canada Post to close their post office. This post office has been in existence for approximately 80 years. The petitioners feel that, under the new postal Corporate plan as approved by all three political Parties, if this comes to pass, they will indeed lose their postal identity, and a very important part of their lives as residents of this small rural community.

The petitioners ask that the House provide all possible assistance to ensure that this unfortunate event does not take place.

(2) At least three judges of the Supreme Court of Canada shall be appointed from among persons who, after having been admitted to the bar of Quebec, have, for a total of at least ten years, been judges of any court of Quebec or of any court established by the Parliament of Canada, or members of the bar of Quebec.

101C. (1) Where a vacancy occurs in the Supreme Court of Canada, the government of each province may, in relation to that vacancy, submit to the Minister of Justice of Canada the names of any of the persons who have been admitted to the bar of that province and are qualified under section 101B for appointment to that court.

(2) Where an appointment is made to the Supreme Court of Canada, the Governor General in Council shall, except where the Chief Justice is appointed from among members of the Court, appoint a person whose name has been submitted under subsection (1) and who is acceptable to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The projected order of business today indicates that Bill C-55 was to be called at this time. I can understand the Government wishing to change the agenda. However, I wish to once again state that it is difficult for the Official Opposition to organize its work around the committees that are sitting at this time, and the House sitting at eleven o'clock, if we do not have sufficient notice of what is to be called at a specific time. While I understand the strategy of the Government in attempting to debate the Meech Lake Accord in the House and dispose of it, I hardly think it is fair to the Official Opposition to have its speakers on Bill C-55 called into the House, wait here to speak, and then told at the last minute that there has been a change and we are now debating Meech Lake.

The problem is one of logistics and mechanics. I am not complaining about the fact that the Government may wish to call the Meech Lake Accord today, or anything else. All I am saying is that it is very difficult, with a restricted number of Members of Parliament in Official Opposition, to maintain positions in committees, as we are at this time, and to have the same people pulled out of committee to come into the House and speak on specific items for which they have responsibility.

On the Meech Lake Accord, our Member, the Hon. Member for Cape Breton—East Richmond (Mr. Dingwall) was the last Member to speak. I take it that the Government has a speaker to follow up, as does the NDP. This is the type of situation where if the Government would not put up a speaker, the Official Opposition would be caught in the position of having to continue debate—

Mr. Lewis: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gauthier: Well, it has been done before. I would request that the Government House Leader give us fair advance notice in order that we can plan our work accordingly.

Indeed, it is the privilege of all Members of Parliament to know exactly what the business of the House will be and to deal with that accordingly.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments of my hon. colleague. I simply wish to say that I realize that these are turbulent times. I presume the Government is under a lot of pressure on free trade, and perhaps it is thrown a bit off balance.

However, I did appreciate receiving a call at approximately 10.30 this morning to advise that the Government had decided to change the order, which gave us three-quarters of an hour to attempt to make the necessary arrangements. It was a little tight, but I appreciate the notice. I checked with the Government Deputy House Leader and he indicated that the Government did have a speaker to begin, the Hon. Member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson). In that manner we will be able to get underway, and by that time we will have our speakers in place.

It is a fluid, dynamic situation, but I do wish to say that I appreciate receiving a call from the Deputy House Leader indicating that there had been a change at the last minute.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments of my colleague, the Whip for the Official Opposition (Mr. Gauthier). I also appreciate his difficulties. But as my colleague, the House Leader for the New Democrats indicated, it is a fluid situation these days. The House has been debating almost concurrently Bill C-55 and the Meech Lake Accord. In fact, there have been informal discussions that we may consider sitting tonight in order to accommodate extra speakers.

• (1120)

I would also say that the Government has been agreeing to a rotation which has allowed as many opposition Members as possible to speak almost on a one, one, one basis, although the numbers in the House would dictate a different speaker rotation basis.

We have been trying to co-operate. I appreciate that this has been a bit of a glitch in everyone's schedule, but we are ready for the Hon. Member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson) to make his speech.

Mr. Speaker: It might be helpful, especially to the public which is listening and watching, if I commented on the intervention of the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier), which I think was quite appropriate.

As Hon. Members know, sometimes the press reports the fact that during ordinary debate something less than all Members of the House of Commons are in their seats. There is a reason for that. Hon. Members cannot spend all their time in this Chamber during debate. They have innumerable obligations to meet, especially in respect of their own constituents and also especially in respect of the nearly 40 committees which can be sitting at one time or another putting in the work dispatched to them by the Chamber.

The comments of the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier were appropriate. I also appreciate the comments of the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis). In a sense he enforced the comments made earlier by his colleague. I know they have both made efforts to adjust to a change in the schedule here.

However, I think it is especially important that the public understand that a great deal of the work of this place goes on outside the Chamber. It is not always easy to change the commitments of Members suddenly and bring them into the Chamber.

The Hon. Minister of State (Mr. Lewis) in speaking for the Government recognized this, but again it is important for the public to understand that it is the Government's position to set the order each day, as it has done in this case. The Hon. Minister of State has indicated that he would have wished that perhaps more notice could have been given. In any event, that was the decision of Government, and that has always been the way governments run this place.

I think it is very important that the public understand that a great deal of the work which is being done on behalf of the public is not done in this Chamber. It is done in other places and, as a consequence, when there is a change here it puts pressure not only on members of the Opposition but on members on the government side, because it requires a change in plans and a change in schedules. It is important that this is properly recorded and, if I might say so, emphasized from time to time.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, it might be interesting to note that this caught me as much unawares as it did members of the Opposition.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps unawares but not by surprise.

Mr. Nickerson: When the First Ministers gathered at Meech Lake on April 30, and then again on June 3 at the Langevin Block, they had before them a glorious opportunity to make Canada one, or an opportunity to bring into the Constitution those parts of Canada that had hitherto been without. This opportunity they blew.

They were successful in bringing the Province of Quebec into the Constitution. I do not think anyone could be more appreciative of that or more sympathetic to the wishes of the people of Quebec than the people of northern Canada, because they too were without. They brought in Quebec, but they left out the Northwest Territories and Yukon.

Some 75,000 Canadians would dearly love to be full Canadians the same as anyone else but, because they live north of the 60th parallel, they were excluded completely. Was it necessary not only to injure those 75,000 Canadians but to insult them as well? They said that the circle of Confederation was completed, but 75,000 people were left on the outside, beyond the pale. Meech Lake will be remembered in the North as one of the most shameful events in Canadian history, one from which they were totally excluded, one in which they had no say. It was an event where only representatives of southern Canadians got together in what I have described before as a cozy little club and decided to blackball the people of the North.

My constituents cannot accept this, nor can I. When the time comes I will vote in accordance with my conscience and their wishes. I, Sir, will not desert them. I will vote against the resolution that we have before us.

Even the Government, which is advancing this resolution, knows in its heart that it is wrong. Let us consider the words of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) when he introduced the resolution for debate on September 29. He said:

> To impose constitutional reform on any province and its citizens is to deny their rightful participation in Confederation—

That is precisely what has happened to the people of the North. This imposition has been made on them. He continued:

> —and runs contrary to the spirit and history of constitutional development in this country.

Again, that is what has happened in northern Canada. We have had a process of constitution-making in Canada where things have been done generally by consent. This has not been the case at Meech Lake. He also said:

> Canada is a partnership of its peoples and provinces, a partnership which can be willingly embraced but not imposed.

The people of the North were not there. They were not even asked. Their opinion was not considered. Again we have that imposition on 75,000 people who want to be Canadians the same as the remaining 25 million. He went on to say:

> This concept is understood and accepted by Canadians from coast to coast.

It is quite apparent that that concept was not understood and was not accepted by the 11 gentlemen who gathered at Meech Lake.

What are the objections of northern Canadians to the Meech Lake agreement? These have been listed and debated many times. I have spoken on this subject in the House, so I will just give a brief synopsis now. First, it was total exclusion from the process despite repeated requests to the contrary. Everything was done behind our backs. We were unable to protect our rights that were bartered away at Meech Lake. We were treated as expendable pawns in the constitution game.

As objectionable as this might be, if the results had been good, fair, and reasonable, we could have put it behind us and gone on from there. However, that was not to be the case.

Let us look at what we in the North have lost at Meech Lake. Before, we had the same rights with respect to immigration as any other province in Canada. Now we find that we are in an inferior position, although immigration in the Territories is as important as it is anywhere else, probably even more so because of the small existing population base which could easily be swamped by a large wave of immigration.

• (1130)

Before, our Senators were appointed exactly, precisely, as provincial Senators. Now this also is not to be the case. The very wording of the resolution is ambiguous on this point, yet the Government will not even accept a small technical amendment clarifying whether or not Senators in the North can be appointed by the system currently existing. It is crazy to say that Territorial Senators can be appointed only on the recommendation of a province somewhere else. Why is it that that small technical amendment cannot be accepted?

Everyone in the Territories has been denied the right ever to become a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada. Again, we have lost ground. Prior to Meech Lake, a member of the Territorial Bar Association, a member of the Supreme Court of the Northwest Territories could aspire to be seated on the bench of the Supreme Court of Canada. That is now denied us and it is, I understand, one of the points in a lawsuit that has been brought about by the Government of the Northwest Territories. A similar lawsuit has been brought forward by the Government of the Yukon.

With respect to the creation of new provinces, something that is dear to our hearts, prior to the changes in 1982 the creation of a new province was solely a matter between the Government of Canada and the territory or colony involved. That is how Manitoba, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Newfoundland came into Canada. In 1982 the process was changed. At Meech Lake it was changed to make it much more difficult for a territory to ever become a province. Any province in Canada has the right of veto over whether the Yukon, the Northwest Territories, a part or parts thereof should fully enter Confederation. Every province has been given a veto over that, and that, Sir, is wrong. It is not in keeping with the constitutional history of Canada, not one little bit.

I have heard of someone whose birthright was sold for a mess of pottage. What we have here is our birthright being sold for a kettle of fish or whatever else might be on the agenda of the First Ministers' meeting.

I would like to compliment the Members and Senators who served on the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the 1987 Constitutional Accord. They listened carefully and sympathetically to the representations made by northerners who appeared before them. It was too much to expect that they would recommend in their report the necessary amendments to the resolution. I do not think that we expected them to do that because the law had been laid down in advance. But they were kind enough to point out the errors that had been made and the necessity that these items to which I have referred previously be placed on an early agenda for meetings of the First Ministers pursuant to the Meech Lake Accord to discuss constitutional matters further.

Apparently we have lost this first battle, we have lost the Meech Lake battle. But we have not lost the war, not by a long shot. The battle will continue until northern Canadians are treated the same as southern Canadians. By working hard now, and hopefully with the support of Members of this House and provincial legislatures across the country, we must make sure the necessary changes are placed on the agenda of the first First Ministers' meeting to be held on the Constitution. It must be there as a continuing agenda item until the grievances have been properly redressed.

The Territories, because of this resolution, will not have an automatic seat at that conference and those conferences which follow, but there is no prohibition to them being invited. The precedent had been established previously that the Territories would be invited to First Ministers' conferences at which agenda items of direct interest to them would be discussed. This was done in the case of the meetings held to discuss aboriginal affairs. This too was something developing over a period of time but which has been taken back by virtue of Meech Lake. But there is no prohibition against First Ministers inviting the Government leaders from the Territories and the Yukon to be there. That should and must happen at that first meeting.

At Meech Lake, northerners suffered mightily at the hands of an unthinking and unfeeling group of men who were blinded by their narrow perception of Canada. We had no one there to speak on our behalf. But this I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, whether it takes five years, 10 years or 50 years, the Territories will at some time, despite all the obstacles being placed before them, become equal partners in this great Confederation, and they will become full provinces in their own right. This I swear.

Mrs. Blais-Grenier: Mr. Speaker, I would like express some comments and then ask a question of my hon. colleague. I do understand the concerns he has expressed and the feelings that he mentioned and described so vigorously about his part of the country, the region he represents, being left out of the Accord.

I remember that we as Members of the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons listened with much sympathy to the representative of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. At that point I had the feeling that neither of those parts of Canada were ready to become provinces, let us say tomorrow. They still have many things to work out. It was expressed that the views of those parts of Canada and their feelings had not been taken into account as fully as that of Quebec returning to the constitutional family. We pointed out to them that indeed it was really a Quebec round, that it was to make Canada a complete country again. We felt that would help discussions about other constitutional problems in the future.

I would like to ask my colleague if he would not think that, having placed the situation of Quebec in its proper context, having a country that is more united would act as an asset at the time of future discussions, and we would hope they would be undertaken without delay, concerning the status of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories?

Mr. Nickerson: Mr. Speaker, I certainly would like to compliment the Hon. Member on her part on the special joint committee. I know she was a regular attender and her voice is properly reflected in the report we have before us.

The question of whether or not the Yukon, for example, would want to become a province tomorrow, if that was offered to it, is really immaterial to the debate that is going on today. What the the people do not want is for obstacles to be placed in their path to make that eventuality which everybody wants much more difficult.

With respect to this being looked at as a Quebec round, so to speak, and that any other problems with the Constitution or other constitutional changes that other people might want to see being set aside, I could understand that except for the fact that what has happened with respect to the Territories is that things have been taken away from them. Constitutional rights that they enjoyed before Meech Lake they will no longer enjoy. I have mentioned a number of these in my presentation. Just to go through them very briefly, they include invitations to First Ministers' Conferences when agenda items affected them, the question of Supreme Court and Senatorial appointments, the way in which a territory becomes a province—all that has been taken away from them.

If someone had been arguing in favour of enhanced multicultural rights as a number of people have, nothing was given and nothing was taken away at Meech Lake. However, with respect to the Territories, a great number of things were taken away. We were net losers in the Accord by a large margin. One cannot look upon an area of jurisdiction, an existing Government in Canada, doing most of the things a provincial Government would do , as being some kind of special interest group that has to wait in line. That is the wrong way of approaching that question.

As to the final question, whether or not it would be to the advantage of the Territories to have Quebec present as a willing partner in confederation when that matter was ever discussed, I do not know if I can answer that yes or no. It might depend upon the circumstances that will exist when that debate eventually takes place. I do not think people would want to hazard a guess now as to whether that would be advantageous or disadvantageous.

People in the Territories firmly believe that there should not be a provincial veto, it should be strictly a matter between the federal Government and the territory involved, just as it was for every other province of Canada that came in after the initial Confederation.

Just as an aside, an election was held yesterday in the Northwest Territories, a territorial general election. There were 24 seats and 68 candidates. Every single one of those candidates took a position the same as that which I am taking, which is that Meech Lake is not good for the Territories, that it ought to be amended and that it is unacceptable. That surely represents the voice of the people of the North.

Mr. Holtmann: Mr. Speaker, I too would like to express a short observation on my colleague's presentation on the Accord that Canada and the Government has signed with the provinces and the concerns the Member brings from the North. I too would like to pose a question to the Hon. Member who states that by the 1986 Census, he has ascertained there are some 50,900 people in the Northwest Territories and 22,800 people in the Yukon. Does he base the desire for provincehood in the North on population?

Certainly he could not ask the Canadian public to consider allowing 22,000 people to form a province. We have cities with 22,000 people, though surrounded by not quite as vast an area. But what really is important, is it not, is the number of people who should play an important part in deciding whether a part of Canada that is now a territory becomes a province?

Seriously, what will the Northwest Territories lose? We have a Member here who represents maybe 25,000 people. By the standards of the rest of Canada, they are over-represented. I think I represent some 79,000 people.

The Territories certainly are not losing in that regard. A Deputy Prime Minister was from the Territories. Senators have been from the Territories. I do not think any of this will be discontinued. The Hon. Member could become the Deputy Prime Minister, he could become the Prime Minister, representing only 25,000 people. Certainly it does not look like those people will be worse off because we brought Quebec into the fold.

My question is, quite frankly, does the Hon. Member think that the rest of Canada views the possibility of a province without any increase in population as even a distinct possibility, or should we not consider that? Does he think, if the time came that the population might possibly double in the next 50 years, that the rest of Canada would not give the North a fair hearing? It gave Manitoba one when it joined. And, of course, as recently as 1949 when Newfoundland joined as a province, it was given a fair hearing.

Certainly I think the Hon. Member has to see that the rest of the provinces, when they joined, were treated fairly and squarely and with a great deal of thought. I pose this question to my colleague and wonder if he would like to respond.

Mr. Nickerson: Mr. Speaker, it is a very interesting hypothesis, tying democratic and human rights to the numbers of population. Let me answer it very quickly and very simply. When Manitoba became a province, it had a population of 12,000 people.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time for questions and comments has now expired. Debate. The Hon. Member for Saint-Léonard—Anjou (Mr. Gagliano).

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard—Anjou): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to take part in this very important debate this morning. First I should like to say that on June 3, 1987 the Prime Minister and the ten provincial premiers reached agreement on the amendment to the Constitution. All this, Mr. Speaker, based on the five conditions set by the Government of Quebec for ratifying a Constitution it did not sign in 1982, although legally it was still part of it.

• (1150)

First of all, for the benefit of the House and all those listening to us now, I would like to read the five demands made by Quebec, because we must not forget that the most important aspect of this Accord was to bring Quebec within the constitutional family. The five conditions the Quebec Liberal Party put before Quebec voters in 1985, and on which it was elected, were the same as these demands, which are as follows: explicit recognition of Quebec as a distinct society; a guarantee to extend Quebec's powers with respect to immigration; revision of the constitutional amending formula, so as to recognize veto rights for Quebec; Quebec's participation in appointing judges to the Supreme Court of Canada and restrictions on the federal Government's spending powers.

Mr. Speaker, the first item, which I think received most of the criticism from those opposed to the Accord, deals with Quebec as a distinct society. Although I admit I am not a constitutional expert—I am only an accountant and not a lawyer, and lawyers with respect, seem to be the experts in this field,—I must inform the House that to me, the fact that the Accord says Quebec is a distinct society adds nothing to what Quebec already is. We are merely acknowledging a fact. We often hear people say: I did not come to Quebec or to Ontario, I came to Canada. That is quite true. In 1958, I came to Canada. Perhaps it is Canada's fault for not explaining to the people who come to this country about its geography, its history and its Constitution. I admit, Mr. Speaker, that it would be a very difficult task. However, the fact remains that those who come to Canada for the first time arrive in Canada and not in the provinces. Once they are in Canada, Mr. Speaker, they settle in one of the provinces, in towns and villages. They stay, and they are free to move wherever they want.

A person arriving in Quebec might go on to Ontario, British Columbia. However, the majority, and I would say the vast majority, stayed in Quebec, and we are now part of this distinct society. I stayed in Quebec, and I grew up in Quebec. I started a family in Quebec, I feel comfortable there, and I like living in Quebec. Mr. Speaker, I could also say that as a Canadian Quebecer, I feel different, and I do not see why my Canadian colleagues across this country should feel frustrated because we are recognizing this difference in Quebec.

First of all, Quebec is the only province where more than 80 percent of the population speaks French. They have a French culture. No other province in Canada has those characteristics. Second, Quebec is still the only province that has the Civil Code. Even for the appointment of Senators, Quebec does things somewhat differently from what other provinces do. A Senator must not only reside in the province where he is appointed, but he must also own some property there.

Mr. Speaker, we must recognize that the way of life in Quebec is certainly different from what it is like in other provinces. However, this does not mean that we are not good Canadians and that we cannot be good citizens together and continue to work to build this country.

Mr. Speaker, some have gone as far as saying that recognizing a distinct society in Quebec could reduce the participation of other cultural groups. I would like to reassure the House and say that it is certainly not the case. I believe that Quebec is one of the provinces, but certainly not the only one, which has made the most progress in recognizing cultural communities.

In how many Canadian provinces is the language of the country of origin taught in primary schools, Mr. Speaker? I am not speaking only about English or French as a second language depending on whether the school is French or English, but in Quebec schools, the language of the country of origin is also taught in primary schools from the first grade. In how many Canadian provinces is this possible?

Naturally, there are rather emotional debates in Quebec on the linguistic issue. We only have to look at the newspapers to see all the linguistic debates now going on in Quebec, especially about unilingual signs. There have always been such debates, and even if they can be very emotional, they often help us to understand each other better and they ensure that Quebec is always in the forefront.

At the time of the 1980 referendum, I did not have to stay at home and watch television or read the newspapers to know what was going on, as I was on the front line fighting for a united Canada.

Mr. Speaker, we might read tomorrow in the newspapers that such or such a party supports the Accord or not, but I would like to tell Canadians that, at the time of the referendum in 1980, when the vital issue was whether or not you were for Canada, there were no political parties, but only two sides: yes for Canada and no for Canada.

For my part, Mr. Speaker, I join this constitutional debate in the same spirit. I believe in a strong and united Canada. I am glad that, after a number of years and lengthy discussions, Quebec was finally able to say yes to the Constitution and that we have finally become a united constitutional family. I am proud to have a strong and united Canada and I would also like to have a strong Quebec which will be able to keep its identity.

Mr. Speaker, Canada without Quebec, Canada without a distinct society in Quebec, would not be the Canada we know and love and of which we are all proud. I am sure that we shall continue to improve our country together. It is certainly not the best Accord possible. There were negotiations, and there had to be some give and take as in any other negotiations. The Accord is not perfect.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to pay hommage to the former Prime Minister, Mr. Trudeau. And he knew very well, when he proposed to patriate the Constitution, that even that agreement would not be perfect, and this is why he proposed the Charter of Rights and Freedoms at the same time. Having rights across Canada gives us a foundation to protect us. And from thereon we can—of course with the passage of time people will change—have negotiations. We can do some give and take—take a right that belongs to a province and give it to the federal level, or vice versa. But the important thing is that our Charter of Rights and Freedoms remains there, so that because of that Charter we may all be equal as Canadians and feel very well protected at home.

That is what is important, Mr. Speaker, and I think it must now be acknowledged that without Mr. Trudeau's determination, courage and devotion, we never would have had the Charter of Rights and Freedoms nor patriation, and then we could not refer to the Meech Lake Accord because indeed our Constitution would still be in England.

Therefore, our Canadian Constitution is following a process that does not stop here. I am sure this will move on. The corrections that have to be made, we will make them in due time. With the same or other people, but some day that will be done, Mr. Speaker. Of course I am also concerned, just as my colleagues, about minority rights. And this is why, Mr. Speaker, we for instance on this side of the House have put forward certain amendments. It would be too long to list the amendments, there are two pages of them. But I would just the same like to stress those of great interest to me, those that affect my community, and I believe they are very important—the recognition of native people as a distinctive and basic feature of Canada. That cannot be denied. It must be enshrined, and during the next negotiations we must reach an agreement . . . The recognition of the multicultural nature of Canadian society—today, we can say that in Canada there is neither a majority nor a minority. We are about one-third Anglophones, one-third Francophones, and one-third from the other communities. But it is time that we recognize that fact. And I am sure we will get there.

Let us refer also to the importance, Mr. Speaker, of developing Canada's economic union. Right now, the issue is free trade. It is important that together with free trade with the United States, we achieve in Canada an economic union; we should start to talk about free trade between the provinces and within Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I am delighted that Quebec has elected to adhere to the Canadian Constitution. In 1980, Quebec had said yes to Canada. In 1985, on the basis of Mr. Bourassa's five constitutional demands, Quebec again said yes to the rest of Canada. I think it is time for the rest of Canada to say yes to Quebec.

Mr. Malépart: Mr. Speaker, I wish to congragulate the Hon. Member for Saint-Léonard—Anjou for his remarks. He was right to mention that a number of people are opposed to this Accord because it recognizes Quebec as a distinct society on historical and sociological grounds, but as an Italian-speaking Canadian very much involved in the Saint-Léonard area better known as "La Petite Italie", does my colleague from Saint-Léonard—Anjou think that his constituents feel threatened by this distinct society? Together with his community, does he feel that the French speaking majority will take unfair advantage of its new status, or will life in Quebec continue to progress as now, through a greater affirmation of the French-speaking community along with other communities, whether Italian, Greek or Portuguese, and will the English community be able to continue attending to its business as before?

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for Montreal—Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart) for giving me this opportunity to speak about something which I had not mentioned in my short intervention.

The answer to his question is definitely no. In my opinion, all Canadians will have questions to ask about any agreement of this type. However, on the whole, the fact that Quebec will finally sign the Constitutional Act which it had not ratified in 1982 is so positive that nothing else matters. We believe that some of the weakenesses in this Accord can be corrected in due time since this is just a summary and certain points may have been omitted and the interpretation given to certain words or phrases could create unforeseen problems.

I believe that these will come out in due course and that the necessary adjustments can be made.

I come from an area in East Montreal, Saint-Léonard, which is well-known for its linguistic conflicts. These certainly had positive results. We wanted linguistic rights and we won a partial victory. However, another thing that should be recognized about this conflict is that the Francophones were also able to express their views and their wish to have their own language protected. Everytime I speak to my Italian-speaking fellow citizens, I point out that it is important to keep more than two languages in Quebec and important that our children continue to learn Italian. This is why, Mr. Speaker, I support the distinct society clause, and I would like to tell my colleagues who might feel threatened by this provision that Francophones are a minority in Canada, and that if we want to protect our minorities, we must also protect the French-speaking minority. I believe that it is because of this that we have succeeded in Canada, and I think that Quebec is a good example of what can be achieved, if not a perfect example since nothing is perfect in this world. But it is a telling example of the fact that, notwithstanding our numerous linguistic skirmishes, current relations between francophone Quebecers and multicultural communities are perfectly and unbelievably harmonious, that in the end we will continue to prosper as long as people remain objective and ever intent on seeking to do better, but with the understanding that every individual has the right to exist and to protect both his language and his culture.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, in his answer to my colleague from Montreal—Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart) the Hon. Member again referred to this harmony which appears to exist or in which some people would have us believe. He too seems to believe that a new harmony, a new openmindedness prevails in this country. He is not the first Member to refer to this openmindedness. In fact all those who endorse the Accord, practically all of them, mention this openmindedness. But then we ask them this question: Why did the governments not want to commit themselves to promote linguistic minorities instead of simply protecting them? Their answer is that we must appreciate that there are still a few pockets of resistance in this country, and then the governments simply cannot forge too far ahead of the Canadian population.

Well, here is my question to the Hon. Member: Does he believe that indeed harmony prevails, or is this answer . . . Does this harmony upon which the Accord is supposed to rest not make him wonder a little bit? If the openmindedness is genuine, why would they not commit themselves not only to protect but also to promote the cause of linguistic minorities as advocated by the Fédération des francophones hors Quebec, the Franco-Manitoban Society, Canadian Parents for French, and others?

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the Hon. Member was not in the House or was not listening carefully. In my speech I said that this Accord was not a perfect one, and that we in the Liberal Party had proposed a number of amendments to correct any inadequacies it might contain. I also said that negotiations were started on the Accord because Quebec had not signed the 1982 constitutional Accord, and that the basis for these negotiations was the five constitutional demands made by Quebec, the first being its recognition as a distinct society. I said that nothing was perfect in this world, including this Accord, but the fact remains that it was instrumental in getting Quebec to sign the constitutional Accord and in achieving the recognition of Quebec as a distinct society. I say recognition, because nothing new has been added, no additional powers given. We recognized what Quebec has been, is and will be; a distinct society, different from the other provinces.

As far as harmony is concerned, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest the Hon. Member take a walk down the streets of Saint-Léonard, and he will see for himself. The people of Saint-Léonard do not feel threatened by the constitutional Accord. They may feel threatened by the economy, because many young people are unemployed, but they are certainly not threatened by the constitutional Accord. And when I say harmony, because I live in that area . . . Only yesterday, I was walking down the street, and I can inform the Hon. Member that not a single constituent asked me whether he should feel threatened.

It is not a perfect Accord, I agree, but I think we are making progress by improving our Constitution and by trying, in a society as complex as ours . . . Canada is not the easiest country in the world to govern. After all, we are a federation, Mr. Speaker. I think that we have at last managed to reunite this confederate family, and I think that is a positive side and that we should persevere in this direction. I am sure we will continue in this vein, and I am thinking of the Francophones outside Quebec, the protection of multicultural groups, and so forth. If we take Quebec's example, as I said earlier, Quebec is the only province that teaches the language of origin in elementary schools. How many provinces in Canada do that? I think we still have a long way to go.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The period for questions and comments has expired. Resuming debate. The Hon. Member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo).

• (1210)

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I was a Member of this Parliament between 1981 and 1983 when the Trudeau Government made a successful effort to repatriate the Constitution. The original package would have centralized the power of the federal Government to a greater extent than had existed in the past and would have left the provinces with even more residual powers than before. I was one of many Canadians who objected to such a proposal.

Many of those who were here at the time will know that the final agreement that was signed more closely reflected what some of the provinces had wanted all along. It gave the provinces much more power to make their own economic decisions and determine the destiny of their citizens without having to always appeal to the federal Government for permission to do so.

I give this background for a couple of reasons. First, the federal Government does not corner the market on good economic and social programs. Much of our best legislation came from provincial legislatures, sometimes in spite of opposition from the federal Government.

For example, medicare and hospitalization were the products of the Saskatchewan Legislature. The federal Government did its best to smother those programs but eventually accepted them and emulated them, to make them part of the Canadian fabric today. In recent years Quebec has made many economic decisions which would have required the consent of the federal Government in previous years. I relate these facts because they show the value of lengthy, extensive and involved consultation and negotiation.

The earlier constitutional negotiations were long and involved. Those who were part of the process will recall how the native rights amendment was included, then excluded, then included again. As we negotiated in Parliament and throughout the country, we began to move closer to an acceptable solution until we finally signed an agreement which most provinces found acceptable. However, there was a flaw in the agreement because unfortunately Quebec decided not to be part of it.

Had we taken more time, we could have arrived at a solution that would have included Quebec. However, as we have seen recently with the midnight accord that was hastily put together, the 1982 agreement was flawed and in need of amendment.

The Meech Lake Accord is the attempt to eliminate that flaw. While I compliment the aim and even the results of the Meech Lake Accord, I must say that I abhor the process. I am disappointed that we have a new document which, although it solves the flaw in the original agreement, is itself flawed.

The Meech Lake Accord is also a hurried document, born out of back rooms at midnight. It is flawed because of that haste, and the lack of consultation and negotiation. It is flawed because it did not have the benefit of the wisdom of Canadians.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and the Premiers did not have enough time to consult, review or speculate on what they were planning. Furthermore, part of Canada was left out of the negotiations at all levels.

While it may be possible to settle a labour dispute by locking the doors and demanding a solution, it is no way to decide the fate of a country. This brings to mind another midnight document that was signed recently, and I hope it is not as flawed as the two I speak of here.

This Accord accomplishes what is needed as far as Quebec is concerned, but it may take years before the mistakes in this document are amended in the way most Canadians want. Those requirements need not have been left out of the Accord and even now can still be included. Why is it necessary to force Canadians to have many more years of constitutional negotiations as a result of an amending mechanism that is cumbersome and incredibly unrealistic? The answer is, of course, that we do not have to go through these negotiations. We do not have to go through several more years of negotiations. All we have to do is accept either the Liberal or the New Democratic amendments, or a combination of the two, and we will have corrected the most obvious shortcomings of the document which we have before us.

I would have no difficulty at all in supporting an Accord which has the kind of amendments which could be adopted by this House. These amendments are straightforward and simple. They would protect the original peoples' access to their rights and recognition to self-government; protect the rights of the territories to become provinces with the same, or somewhat the same, alacrity as other provinces had in joining Confederation in the past; give the territories the right to participate as Canadians in the Senate and the Supreme Court of Canada; and guarantee the Charter of Rights in such a way that no group in Canada is endangered. These amendments would come close to mending that which is most glaring in this document.

It seems that the Government has decided not to allow any amendments and that what we are doing here is playing games in seeming to try to improve the Accord. The reason given for not accepting any amendments is that the Accord may come unravelled if it is opened up in any way. I cannot help but think, and many Canadians agree, that if such an important step in the development of our nation is based on a document that is so fragile that it cannot be opened up, because it cannot stand the light of day, maybe it should not survive. Maybe it needs more negotiation.

So let us be reasonable. Let us be courageous. Open up the agreement by passing one, both, or a combination, of these amendments. Then let us go forward with a constitutional amendment that is strong and secure, and which does not leave out some of the people of Canada who have as much right to be heard as any of us.

The Government has decided to close down the possibility of making changes to this document because of the fear that we will lose this Accord if we open it up for further negotiations. I fear that we may lose this Accord because we are afraid to open it up to improve it. We need more courage and more certainty that what we do in this Parliament is right for Canada. We can only help to build the kind of nation we all want if what we do in this Parliament regarding this Accord is good for Canada. I am sorry that we do not seem to have that kind of courage.

The least we can do is make a specific commitment for this House, this Parliament, this Government—today or before we pass the Accord—that the flaws be righted within two years at the first constitutional conference to be called with the territories and the native representatives there at that time. We also need to make sure that all Canadians have an opportunity to contribute to such a new constitutional development.

Only as we accept the idea that all Canadians are part of Canada and all Canadians should have a say in what Canada becomes can we accept the idea that this particular Accord, which does what it was supposed to do but which leaves out some people, should be followed very quickly by constitutional negotiations which will eliminate the kind of flaws that are in this Accord.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to the Hon. Member's speech. I could not help but be struck by the references that he made to the flaws in the Accord and the need to improve it, to change it, and to bring in the people who are being left out of the Accord. If he feels that way how can he support the Accord?

Surely, we are talking here about the fundamental law of the country. We are talking about the Constitution of Canada. If the Accord has so many problems with it, if people feel left out of it, if it does not properly define what our country is all about, then surely our duty is to vote against it.

I would say, to quote what another Member said here yesterday, that he is whistling Dixie if he thinks we will get rid of the imperfections, that we will remove the flaws at some future point in time with this horrible rule of unanimity that we are putting into the Accord.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, I did my best, to point out what I consider to be the flaws in this Accord. I also attempted to put before the House methods by which the flaws could be dealt with in the future. I suggest a commitment by the House to deal with those flaws within a certain length of time. I feel strongly that the time has come for us to recognize that the Constitution needs to be something that we can deal with in the House and in the provincial legislatures in a fashion which is always in the best interests of Canada.

I also have the same kind of doubts as does the Hon. Member that the Accord makes it a little more difficult to do what we would like to see done. I would like to see those amendments accepted now so that we can solve those problems much more quickly than having to go to another series of constitutional meetings.

As the Hon. Member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson) indicated in his speech, I have faith. The Northwest Territories and the Yukon will some day become provinces in spite of the Accord. I also have faith that the aboriginal people will get their self-government, their rights recognized by the rest of Canada. I also feel the need to ensure that we are dealing with a country that has at least 10 provinces, and that maybe an eleventh and twelfth is important at this time.

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): As I said earlier this morning, Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the speeches made during the past few days, and I noticed the large number of Members who supported the Accord and referred to the new openness being seen in this country. However, every time we ask them why the governments refused to undertake both to protect and promote language minorities, the answer is that we should remember there are some pockets of resistance in the country and that governments cannot move faster than their constituents. In fact, this should be a reason for us to take a closer look at the Accord and think about the so-called openness on which it is based. You have known for some time now that I object to the Accord. I shall vote against the Accord, Mr. Speaker, because I believe it does not serve the interests of this country or of Quebec, my own province. I shall vote against the Accord because I do not believe it serves the interests of my constituents in the riding of Laurier. I shall vote against the Accord as a Canadian whose origins are not Anglophone, or French. The values I acquired as a result of my origins include the passionate defence of individual rights, and especially equality rights for all Canadians across Canada.

I will try to explain in my speech some of the reasons that led me to take this position. The honorary president of the Canadian Human Rights Foundation, Professor John Humphrey, gave me the following definition of a charter of rights: "A charter of rights is, or should be, the legal and concrete embodiment of a national consensus on the minimum of rights every man and woman has as a human being, that is, the rights they have because they are human beings and for no other reason. That is why they are called human rights. And since those rights are essential to human dignity, they should be the same for all Canadians, in whatever region of this country they happen to live".

Today, I intend to address language rights which are among those rights that are essential to human dignity. Since 1963, when Mr. Pearson ordered a report on bilingualism, we have been trying in Canada to define the minimum language rights that should prevail across this country.

As far as our official languages, French and English are concerned, we set up a system of linguistic equality. This does not necessarily mean the number of bilingual individuals but concerns our institutions. We defended the right of every citizen to sent his children to school in the language of his choice, English or French. We defended the rights of each citizen to communicate with his governments in his own language, and we also defended the rights of each citizen to work in his own language, at least, within the federal government and the governments of provinces that provide services in both official languages.

Mr. Speaker, if at all possible, we wanted these language rights to apply everywhere in Canada, across this country, because Canada belongs not only to those who speak English but also to those who speak French. French-speaking Canadians were not to be restricted to the territory of the province of Quebec. They were the first to settle this country and to make their home here in Canada. And there are sizeable French-speaking communities everywhere in Canada.

On the other hand, English-speaking Canadians have been an integral part of Quebec's society for quite some time. That was the rationale behind the official languages policy, and that was the rationale behind Charter of Rights and Freedoms Sections 16 to 23. Mr. Speaker, we must keep in mind that these linguistic rights are just as essential to human dignity as the other rights defined in the Charter of Rights. Any Canadian should enjoy such rights.

Normally all Canadians and all governments in Canada, including those which do not claim to be bilingual, should acknowledge these responsibilities in the face of the very nature of this country, for not only are our two official languages a source of enrichment for Canada, Mr. Speaker, they are the very essence of this country. That is the unique heritage which makes us different from other countries, and more particularly from the United States now that we are seeking a free trade agreement.

All Canadians therefore have the moral responsibility to promote our two official languages. That being so, Mr. Speaker, the Meech Lake Accord is an abdication, an unbelievable abdication on the part of the Conservative Government with respect to the basic values which Canadians had developed over the years, namely that the French fact is a fundamental element of the heritage of all Canadians. I am saying it is abdication because Canadians did live up to the challenge. They acknowledge that the two official languages are the business of all Canadians and of all their governments. As evidence, the poll taken in 1985 by the Commissioner of Official Languages shows that the great majority of Canadians willingly accept Canada's linguistic duality; for instance, they support the concept of providing services in the language of the minority, and this applies not only to federal services, but also to provincial services and to the private sector. Moreover, the response in the survey was even more favourable for specific services such as post offices, hospitals and department stores.

Mr. Speaker, something which should be especially emphasized is the attitude of young people in the 15 to 24 age group who proportionately are much more in favour than their seniors of linguistic duality in Canada and of providing services in the language of the minority.

It is not only in the surveys that Canadians support linguistic duality. An increasing number of them live it personally by sending their children to a French school.

As incredible as it may seem, during the last school year, nearly 200,000 English-speaking students were enrolled in French immersion courses throughout Canada. This is five times as many as in 1977-78, only nine years ago.

When I said that, with the Meech Lake Accord, this Government goes against reality of Canada, it is because the Government refuses to recognize in the Constitution what Canadians themselves recognize daily in the choices they make. The Meech Lake Accord is a step backward. At the very moment when we are making progress and when attitudes and behaviours are changing radically in Canada, the Government moves backward. It is a shame to see how far apart are the perception Canadians have of their country and the narrow vision those who signed the Meech Lake Accord share. The Accord promotes French in Quebec, and English in the rest of Canada. The Quebec National Assembly and Government will have the role of promoting the distinct society. What will they promote? Its French identity, naturally, as though the Quebec Government did not have the power to do so already. According to the terms of the Accord, the federal Government and the provinces will protect linguistic minorities, but they have not made a commitment to promote these minorities. I want to remind the House that the President of the Federation of Francophones outside Quebec, when he appeared before the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution, blamed the Tory Government for its lack of courage and said, I quote: "This Accord is just not good enough to stop the progress of assimilation".

It is necessary to realize that, in spite of their consitutional commitments, a number of provinces put off developing their own French-speaking education System. In its last annual report, the Official Languages Commissioner said: "This apparent deafness (on the part of some provincial Governments) is becoming a major blot on Canada's concept of herself as a decent, forward-looking country that can give lessons to the world in ethnolinguistic tolerance and political self-respect. Self-respecting Canadians should tell their provincial leaders that they are letting us down."

Instead of improving this situation, the Meech Lake Accord has condoned the attitude of the most refractory provinces. With the Accord's blessings, they only have to preserve the status quo.

I want my Quebec fellow citizens to understand that the Accord will result in a lack of commitment on their part for national unity. I need only to remind the House of the statement made by Quebec Premier Bourassa when he went to Manitoba in July to meet the French-speaking community. He said that he could not interfere in the internal affairs of Manitoba, for fear the other provinces might interfere in Quebec's own affairs. I understand Mr. Bourassa's position quite well. He must defend the rights and privileges of his province. But does his position serve the interest of Canada as a whole? Is it in the interest of Quebecers when we leave our province? The future of our country is at stake, Mr. Speaker. The interests of French speaking Canadians outside Quebec are our own interests. And inasmuch as the rights of Francophones outside Quebec are lessened, our own rights are lessened.

Remember the heyday of the oil industry, Mr. Speaker. Thousands of Quebecers went west to Alberta, and many stayed there. Under normal circumstances, those former Quebecers would have liked their children not only to be educated in French, but to preserve their French culture. This means not only the schools but also television, radio, theatre, cultural centres, opportunities to speak French in their everyday life. What about the Quebecer who would be called upon to move because of his job responsibilities or economic needs? You will agree that one is not very mobile when one has to sacrifice his family, his language. I say it is unacceptable to put a Canadian before that phoney choice, forcing him to choose between his cultural values, his family and the need to provide for his family.

The Meech Lake Accord does nothing to improve that situation. The Meech Lake Accord, Mr. Speaker, is an anachronism that reflects the lack of vision and leadership of this Tory Government. Our vitality as Quebecers is self-evident. It is there to be seen in every area, be it economic, social, cultural or political. Whether it is the role played by the provincial Government or in the private sector, with the establishment of Quebec multinationals and the young Quebecers' craze for business. Let me remind you that no less than 10,000 students year in and year out attend the University of Montreal's Institut des Hautes Études commerciales. From that viewpoint, the Accord ignores those facts about Quebec and is trying to have us believe that we need additional protection.

Believe it or not, Mr. Speaker, at the very moment when Quebecers are assuming their rightful place in Canada, when Quebec companies are extending their activities throughout the world, the Government is proposing that we create a French ghetto in an English-speaking unilingual Canada. The Accord explicitly mentions French-speaking Canadians and English-speaking Canadians. There is no mention of the new generation of bilingual Canadians, nor of those whose speak many languages, nor of the native people who speak only the language of their ancestors. Moreover, there is nothing about those who consider themselves neither French nor English Canadians, but quite simply Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, tomorrow's Canadian citizen will be a man or woman who speaks both languages well and who recognizes that he or she is part of a remarkable family, the family of all Canadians.

I have represented the Laurier constituency for eight years in this House. I have tried to show why I believe that this Accord represents a step backward as concerns linguistic duality. Other aspects should also be of concern to us, such as the option for provinces to withdraw from cost shared programs with full financial compensation.

My constituency, which is going through a complete transformation, includes a great many senior citizens, but as it is located near the Université du Québec à Montréal and McGill University, it also includes many students. The constituency has a large artistic population. We also have a large number of single parent families, twice the national average. Two thirds of the population are of French Canadian origins and the other third is made up to a large extent of Portuguese, Greek, Italian, Latin-American, Chinese and Vietnamese Canadians. It has been said that Laurier is a crossroads of ideas. I think it is an appropriate description because there are people from many different countries, from all walks of life.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, so many live in difficult circumstances, and they include artists, young people and mothers who are single parents. Often they do not have regular employment. They are given ten to twenty weeks employment in job creation programs. After that, they go on unemployment insurance and fifty weeks later on welfare, if they fail to get a new job under another government program.

I am convinced that the only solution is a thorough reform of our social programs, which would include, for instance, the creation of a universal income security plan, as recommended by the Macdonald Commission. These issues are very important to my constituents, but the only way to get any results, Mr. Speaker, is through a shared-cost program, and I am afraid that, under the Meech Lake Accord, this will be impossible.

I would like to refer to the testimony of Professor Al Johnson before the joint committee on the Constitutional Accord. Professor Johnson is an expert on the subject, as a former deputy-minister in the provincial Government in Saskatchewan and with the federal Government. He recalled that it took a long battle to get medicare. At the national level, it was a long hard struggle, especially since the Premier of Ontario launched a full-fledged crusade against medicare. Professor Johnson explained that it was always a risky undertaking for the federal Government to initiate a new national, shared-cost program because of the two jurisdictions involved. It is a fact that any initiative of this sort would meet only opposition on the part of the provinces. Under these circumstances, making it possible for provincial governments to opt out with full compensation, without being compelled to meet national criteria, would frustrate any initiative aimed at setting up new or revised social programs, thereby creating enormous difficulties.

Mr. Speaker, I dare hope that my comments will cause some of my fellow citizens to ponder the impact of the Meech Lake Accord. I dare hope that my Laurier constituents in particular will think over these issues and my comments, and later on advise me of their opinion concerning this vital issue for the future of our country, because this is not an ordinary legislation we are dealing with here today, but the Constitution which is the fundamental law of the land. I, for one, feel that this debate is far from being over.

Mr. Orlikow: I have two questions for the Hon. Member, Mr. Speaker. First, when Premier Bourassa visited Manitoba and talked to the Francophone community he told them that he could not interfere and help them with their problems.

I want the Hon. Member for Laurier (Mr. Berger) to know that in the Province of Manitoba there has been a tremendous growth and increase in the number of students who are getting their entire education in the French language, not only the Francophone students whose parents naturally want them to maintain their language and culture, but Anglophone students who are getting their entire education in French immersion classes. I know something about that because my 11 year old granddaughter who has just moved into grade six is now in her seventh year of school and her entire education has been in the French language. That program is expanding in every part of Manitoba every year. The Meech Lake Agreement will not have injured what is going on in Manitoba and in other provinces.

When the Hon. Member suggests that because of the Meech Lake Agreement it will be difficult for the federal Government to sponsor new social programs, I say to him that there are just as many constitutional experts who reject that argument as there are who support it.

I want to tell the Member also that I resent a member of the Liberal Party lecturing Members of this House and the people of Canada about the dangers of the diminution of the authority of the federal Government and the federal Parliament to initiate programs. In my 26 years in Parliament there was no decision by any government which did so much to reduce the power and the authority of the federal Government in the initiation and expansion of social programs than the decision of the Trudeau Liberal Government to do away with the way in which the share-cost programs for hospitalization, medical insurance and post-secondary education were put into effect.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Orlikow: These were programs which had been developed mostly by Liberal Governments under which the federal Government encouraged provinces to get into them. It promised the provinces that the federal Government would pay a minimum of 50 per cent of the cost of the programs and it would pay more to the have-not provinces. When the Liberal Government under Mr. Trudeau decided it could not afford to continue, that Government told the provinces it was going to change the law and the rules and bring in established programs financing. What did that mean? It meant that the federal Government in any year would not increase its funding by more than the increase in the cost of living. Not only that, Mr. Speaker, it said to the provinces that it would give them this money in a lump sum; they did not have to spend it on post-secondary education, hospitalization or medicare, but could do anything they wanted, even use it to build roads.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Orlikow: The Liberals, having done that, should not lecture us about the diminution of federal authority and federal power.

Mr. Berger: The Hon. Member talked about French immersion. This was the exact point that I made. I said that Canadians in their everyday lives are way ahead of our Governments.

Mr. Orlikow: With or without Meech Lake.

Mr. Berger: Why do our governments not have the courage to catch up to where Canadians are and put into our Constitution that we will not only preserve the status quo, protect language minorities, but that we will promote language minorities? The Member helped me, as far as I can see, in making my point.

On the question of social programs, Mr. Speaker, I notice the Member is wearing a rose-coloured tie. Obviously his version of history is probably through rose-coloured glasses.

An Hon. Member: This comes from a guy in a red tie.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, the previous Liberal Government got out of block funding and gave the provinces money with no strings attached because it was responding to the will of the provinces which did not want the federal Government messing around in their affairs. Therefore we said "We will give it a try. Yes, we will give you the money and we will see what you do". Now we have seen what has happened. The provinces have taken money that was supposed to go into education and it is being spent on roads, sidewalks and other things. It is time that a national government stood up for national priorities.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, just for the record I want to tell the Hon. Member—I see the Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) s here and he will know that what I am saying is correct—that the only party in Parliament which opposed that mistaken, terrible decision of the then Liberal Government to change the way things were done was the New Democratic Party and its members. When the Liberal Government brought forward that proposal, it got the support and the votes of the Conservatives.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that I was not here at the time that that decision was made. I take the Hon. Member at his word that the New Democratic Party opposed the move at that time. I wish that the New Democratic Party today would have the same principles which it had seven, eight or nine years ago.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to ask a question in the last minute remaining before lunch. I would like to congratulate the Hon. Member for Laurier (Mr. Berger) for his speech. The people of Laurier and the people of Canada are well served by the Hon. Member.

There were two points on which the Hon. Member did not touch during his comments; first, regarding appointments to the Senate of Canada and second, regarding appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada. In the 30 seconds remaining, would the Hon. Member for Laurier comment on those two points?

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, in the brief time that I have, I can simply say that there is certainly a case to be made for formalizing the consultation process that has existed for sometime with respect to Supreme Court appointments. With respect to Quebec, which has a different legal tradition than the rest of the country, something had to be done to provide the Quebec Government in a formal manner with input into those appointments.

With respect to the Senate, I feel that there is a need also to ensure provincial input into appointments to the Senate, but the formula that we have come up with in the Meech Lake Agreement really hands over the whole matter to the provinces and leaves no room whatsoever—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that the Hon. Member's time has expired. The period for questions and comments has expired.

S. O. 21

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the Chair until two o'clock this day.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT
CATEGORIES OF AFFECTED WORKERS

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, given the Free Trade Agreement signed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and the statements he made yesterday, when he admitted there were losers and winners in that Accord, he unfortunately did not name the losers. I would have liked the Prime Minister to name a few categories of Canadian workers he traded off to sign that Agreement. Are they men and women working in the textile industry? Are they workers in the footwear industry? In the knitting industry? In the leather industry? In agriculture? In rail transportation? In shipping, in shipbuilding?

Mr. Speaker, I will conclude with this and I would like to know—the East end of Montreal issue, the Comité de la Relance is requesting a special grants committee to modernize Montreal's industrial East end, to designate the East end of Montreal . . . Now with free trade, the East end of Montreal goes down the drain the way that agreement was signed by the Prime Minister.

DECENTRALIZATION

LABORATORY CENTRE FOR DISEASE CONTROL—OPPOSITION TO RELOCATION

Mr. Barry Turner (Ottawa—Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in this great city of Ottawa the rumour mill is a stable industry and one of its recent products is news of the potential relocation of part of the Laboratory Centre for Disease Control to Winnipeg.

Ottawa has been the grab bag, to quote Regional Chairman Andy Haydon, often enough in the last few years. Ottawa Mayor Jim Durrell has written to me saying that any potential gain for Winnipeg will be a loss for Ottawa. They are both right.

Ottawa has recently experienced Public Service cuts, project cuts, language training cuts, discretionary spending cuts, total spending freezes, procurement decentralization, National Research Council reallocations, and over the last 10 years part of Employment and Immigration has been moved to Bathurst, DVA has been moved to Charlottetown, parts of DSS have been moved to Shediac and Matane, and the list goes on.

The Child Poverty Action Group on the Hill this morning stressed that the increase in child poverty in the region is alarming. Ottawa is not immune to tough times. We have bread lines and soup kitchens like many other Canadian cities. I therefore ask the Government to reconsider this potential move in the best interests of maintaining the total integrity of the LCDC.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS

CALL FOR ELIMINATION OF CHILD POVERTY

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, why are people not enraged that one-fifth of Canada's children are poor? Why can we alleviate poverty for the elderly but not for children? Why is child poverty not a political priority?

"Although we say we love children, the only children we love are our own, and I do not mean Canadian children, I mean our very own, the ones in our individual families. Those children we are prepared to do a lot for, but not the children of the poor." Those are the words of Dorothy O'Connell speaking today at the Child Poverty Action Group.

• (1405)

Conservative MPs presently place the blame on parents, moral breakdown, divorce and alcoholism. These are not the causes of poverty. It is the lack of money and other resources to deal with the same problems that middle and upper-income families have. Poor children will not have the same opportunities in life. We must develop the political will to end the senseless waste of all these children who are condemned to repeat the poverty cycle.

If we love our children we must put child poverty on the top of the political agenda now. I call on the Government to make solutions to child poverty the topic of a First Ministers' meeting and the subject of an all-Party committee.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS

EFFECTS OF POVERTY ON CHILDREN

Mr. David Daubney (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, child poverty remains a concern in Canada. This is so despite the fact that the economy continues to grow at a rate of over 3 per cent a year, unemployment has dropped to 8.8 per cent, and 260,000 Canadians have risen above the poverty line in the last three years. Our Government has worked hard to raise the standard of living for all Canadians. However, our task remains far from complete.

Poverty is debilitating, especially so when it hits our children. They are the citizens, workers and parents of tomorrow. Poverty robs them of hope for the future and deprives them of the opportunity to develop fully and express themselves as Canadians. In practical terms, child poverty means a higher incidence of mental illness and a higher rate of law-breaking in adolescence. We must pay particular attention to the problem of child poverty in single-parent families.

The Government has begun to act in these areas, helping to drop youth unemployment from 18.3 per cent to 13.8 per cent, decreasing the rate of unemployed women from 12 per cent to 9.4 per cent, and increasing the child tax credit. We must build upon these efforts and those of groups such as the Child Poverty Action Group and the Ottawa Council for Low-Income Support Services. Together we can give all young Canadians a real stake in the future.

ROAD SAFETY

MANDATORY USE OF CAR SEATBELTS AND OTHER APPROPRIATE MEASURES

Mrs. Thérèse Killens (Saint-Michel—Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the police forces of the Regional Municipality of Ottawa—Carleton which have launched their annual safety belt promotion campaign. Their objective is to encourage 90 per cent of car passengers to buckle up.

You have noted, Mr. Speaker, that during the past year I have been presenting petitions and making statements on car safety, because present regulations do not meet the needs of car passengers.

To that effect, a doctor from the Lower St. Lawrence region, Dr. Robert Maguire, has helped me by distributing his own petition asking the Government among other things to pass preventive measures providing for such things as inflatable bags, three point safety belts and the around-the-clock use of headlights. The purpose of such a drive is to reduce by 50 per 100 the number of casualties caused by car accidents.

I have here, Mr. Speaker, petitions signed by over 30,000 people from the Lower St. Lawrence area and the Gaspé Peninsula who are asking for greater road security. I wish to congratulate Dr. Maguire for his initiative and to thank the people from the Lower St. Lawrence area and the Gaspé Pensinsula for having helped me in this campaign to promote road security.

Before I resume my seat, I wish a tremendous success to the police forces of the Regional Municipality of Ottawa—Carleton in their campaign to buckle up safety belts during the forthcoming two weeks.

TAXATION

ELIMINATION OF LOOPHOLES

Mr. Guy St. Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the former Liberal Government instigated the worst tax fraud in the history of this country with the tax credit to stimulate research in 1983-84. Marc Lalonde, John Turner, Pierre Elliott Trudeau and the Liberals made Canadian taxpayers lose billions of dollars.

At the beginning of 1984, the Liberal Government, through the Department of Finance, came to know that the tax deduction plan for scientific research was giving rise to problems and Marc Lalonde had expected that the plan would only cost $200 million. It did cost $3.5 billion and up to $1.9 billion were lost as a result of frauds.

In Victoria, a 28-year old mechanic registered in a computer course for beginners, launched a research business in data processing and obtained $5 million under the program. According to the last reports, he was in Hong Kong promoting a book on break dancing.

In Calgary, a businessman was granted $30 million. He bought two office buildings, a Jaguar and a 106-acre ranch before he also disappeared.

Mr. Speaker, Michael Wilson was clever and wise enough to axe the program shortly after the Conservative Party came into power in 1984, but the Canadians should be better informed about that Liberal flop.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT—WATER RESOURCES

Mr. Ernie Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I rise to protest the sell-out of Canadian water through the Government's trade agreement with the United States. In return for an utterly inadequate trade dispute tribunal U.S. negotiators have obtained the right to future use of Canadian resources as if they were U.S. resources.

The Grand Canal concept of transferring massive quantities of fresh water from the Canadian Shield to the southwestern U.S. has suddenly become likely.

Robert Bourassa, who advocated this idea before the last Quebec election, and Simon Reisman, who lobbied for it before he became the Government's trade negotiator, are understandably pleased. However, the needs of aboriginal peoples, the ecology of the James Bay region, and the weather of central Canada are all to be sacrificed to the greed of U.S. water wasters.

Why did the Government not protest the flagrant subsidy of U.S. vegetable and fruit growers who pay $13 for water worth $350? Why were countervailing duties not used against this subsidy to discourage U.S. interests from lusting after Canadian resources? In the future will Canadians buy more U.S. vegetables and fruits grown with water from the Canadian Shield?

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

CHILDREN'S NIGHTCLOTHES—INTRODUCTION OF FLAMMABILITY STANDARDS

Mr. W. Paul McCrossan (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, over the last nine years I have regularly raised the fact that each year an average of 20 children under the age of 10 have been severely burned when their pyjamas caught fire and that one or two deaths have resulted annually from these burns. Last May I tabled a Private Member's Motion to require the Government to bring in new standards for flame retardant children's nightclothes.

It is with a great deal of personal satisfaction that I report to the House that effective this week night-gowns, night-shirts, dressing gowns, bathrobes, housecoats, robes, pyjamas, and baby-doll pyjamas up to and including size 14X are subject to stringent flammability standards.

In my view the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Andre) deserves the thanks of Canadian parents for stopping another 20 children a year from being seriously burned and for saving one or two children's lives annually in future.

PLIGHT OF EARLY RETIREES

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to offer my support to those individuals who took pre-retirement leave from the Cape Breton Development Corporation as long ago as 1974-75. The purpose of that plan at that time was to continue to employ the workers affected under a contract of service to the Cape Breton Development Corporation in order that they might be eligible to continue to earn entitlement to various benefits.

The fact is that these individuals will never be rehired by the Corporation but must continue to have unemployment insurance premiums deducted from their income. In addition, these UIC deductions, which in some cases date back 13 or 14 years, are taking much needed income from those Canadians who need it most. Conversely, other individuals under different and new pre-retirement plans do not have this deduction from their income.

I ask the Government to reconsider this unfair situation and treat these needy citizens with compassion and dignity. In other words, stop deducting unemployment insurance premiums from their income and reimburse them for the money they have lost.

YOUTH

CHALLENGE PRESENTED BY FREE TRADE

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, the challenge presented by free will have to be taken up by our youth. We accepted the previous challenges. Our generation and the previous ones have transformed this country into an industrialized, rich and modern nation. Are we going to ask your youth to rest on our accomplishments! It would suicidal. There is a market to conquer, a country to build. This is a challenge for our young people. They are just as intelligent, willing and eager to challenge the world as we were. We must give them that opportunity, the chance to think and act in terms of a continent and the world. Why limit ourselves to our neighbourhood, when our skills, qualifications and values are in demand on every continent, Mr. Speaker. Free trade is the future and the prosperity of a people, our people.

Experts from the Quebec Department of Agriculture have said yesterday, Mr. Speaker, that our family farm will not suffer extensive changes. I suggest to union leaders that they should not interpret the agreement in their usual negative way as, in fact, our marketing boards and other programs have been protected.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, Canadian grain farmers are beginning to worry about whether they will receive any government assistance by way of deficiency payments this year. Farmers have good reason to be worried.

After meeting with farm leaders in Winnipeg in August, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) strongly supported the CFA proposal for a 1987-88 deficiency payment. However, last Friday in the House the Minister backed away from this strong support. He said he might mention the CFA proposal if and when he takes the deficiency payment proposal to Cabinet.

The Minister says that he might have a deficiency payment this year. Why does the Government not act? Why is it stalling? After all, the Government knows the views of farmers. It has consulted them. The Government has some experience in putting together a deficiency program.

With each new day of delay on this issue, farmers begin to wonder if the part of the free trade deal which says unsubsidized grain will be able to move freely between Canada and the U.S. means an end to deficiency payments for the current crop year.

SUPPORT FOR CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. John Gormley (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to commend the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and the Canadian negotiators on their successful negotiations for a free trade arrangement with the United States.

Free trade is good news, particularly for western Canada. It will improve the market in the oil and energy sector. Free trade will reduce input costs for agriculture while strengthening farm markets.

Free trade will also mean the creation of some 350,000 new jobs for Canadians over the next eight years, from which all provinces will benefit. It will boost real wages, increase production, stimulate business investment and revitalize industry.

The free trade agreement is one of which we can be proud for more reasons than the obvious economic benefits. Canada's cultural sovereignty remains protected, social and regional development policies remain intact, marketing boards are not affected, and a binding dispute settlement mechanism has been created.

The Prime Minister has been committed to securing a free trade arrangement with the United States if it is a good deal for Canada. This free trade agreement is a good deal for all Canadians and yet another example of this Government's vision for the future of this country.

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT—EFFECT ON WINE INDUSTRY

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, American wine interests have won a major free trade victory over the Canadian wine industry in the Niagara Peninsula, Quebec, and British Columbia's Okanagan Valley. Free trade has California's wine interests laughing all the way to the bank, and the rest of the time they are laughing at the Conservative Government in Canada.

The Americans sell about 15.7 million litres of wine to Canada now. Under the free trade agreement they hope to sell about 54 million litres to Canadians. It will mean a loss of over 4,000 jobs in Ontario alone.

On January 1, 1989, 25 per cent of the protection on Canadian wines will disappear. On January 1, 1990, another 25 per cent will disappear and the remainder will be phased out over the following five years.

The Gallo Wine Company in California alone produces in 12 days what it takes Canada to produce in six months. Under the free trade arrangement of the Conservative Government and the Reagan administration, there will be no timeframe to upgrade the Canadian industry.

The economies of the ridings of Lincoln, Niagara Falls, Erie, Welland, and St. Catharines, the Okanagans, and parts of Quebec will be adversely affected by this proposal.

There is nothing quite like cutting the economic feet out from under the areas of Canada that are represented totally by Conservative Members of Parliament. It is no doubt part of the loyalty that the Prime Minister feels toward those Conservative MPs in his caucus and the constituency voters who supported them in those ridings which are affected by this terrible measure.

FREE TRADE

APPARENTLY AMBIGUOUS POSITION OF LEADER OF NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, as was to be expected, the socialist leader cannot find anything good in our free trade agreement with the United States: an agreement negotiated and concluded to maintain one out of five jobs in Canada, to create 350,000 new jobs and to preserve an existing $95 billion market.

The socialist leader hides the real reason for his opposition. The one against the agreement is not the socialist leader but the Hon. Member for Oshawa. That is the riding where Canadian workers enjoy the best working conditions. Why? Because of free trade in the automobile sector since 1965. The Hon. Member for Oshawa does not want to protect anybody else but the workers in his riding. He does not want to hear about better living conditions for Canadians outside Oshawa. If the socialist leader's concerns are confined to Oshawa, let him keep his seat as a Member of Parliament but resign as national leader. All he has to do, Mr. Speaker, is notify his boss, Bob White.

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is nice to see the Canada Cup team wearing the right colour uniform.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister arising out of the Government's sell-out to the United States.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): In November, 1986, a document issued by the office of the President of the United States stated clearly and publicly the concessions the Americans wanted from Canada. We have recited this document before in the House of Commons. They wanted to open up our wine industry—they got it. They wanted changes in the way we sell and transport wheat—they got it. They wanted to change and open up the Auto Pact—they got it. They wanted to change our drug laws—they got it. They wanted changes in our postal rates—they got it. The list goes on and on.

Why is it that the Americans got every major item they wanted on this 1986 presidential list? Why is that we got nothing worth-while in return?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, for the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition to say that Canada having protection against the growing force of protectionism in the United States is nothing at all, and for the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition to say that the very substantial advantages in both access and security of access we have to the massive market of the United States are nothing at all, simply indicates that the Leader of the Opposition is so blinded by his own internal problems that he does not want to see the benefits to Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1425)

BINDING DISPUTE SETTLEMENT MECHANISM

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the assumption of the right hon. gentleman might be correct if we had got any meaningful exemption from U.S. trade law, which we did not, or if we had got a binding dispute mechanism that would apply a neutral law, which we did not. The exemption from U.S. protectionism does not exist.

Why is that the rules of the game have not been changed at all as they affect American law which applies to Canadian exports? Why is it, for instance, that the Atlantic fishermen get no advantage at all?

Is it not true that in return for selling out to the Americans—I will say this to the Minister of Finance—lock, stock, and barrel, Canada ended up with a dispute mechanism that continues to apply American law and rules, that there is no binding element to that dispute mechanism, that it is not enforceable on the Americans, and is it not about as binding as the Prime Minister's commitment given to the leadership convention of the Conservative Party when he undertook to Canadians and to his own Party that there would never be a free trade arrangement with the United States?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the mechanism that is in place in the agreement is a binding mechanism. I think the Leader of the Opposition knows that.

Mr. Broadbent: Binding in U.S. law.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): The question is raised as to whether it should be U.S. law or Canadian law.

Mr. Rodriguez: What do we get to keep, Joe?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): The House knows, and people who are seriously interested in the issue and are looking at the documents know that the laws of both countries, Canadian and American law, apply.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): So far, so good.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): They understand me so far, Mr. Speaker. Let me be venturesome and try the third element.

If the Leader of the Opposition is suggesting that we should have Canadian law apply to circumstances now governed by American law, he must perforce be suggesting that American law would apply to us. That would be a tremendous abandoning of the sovereignty of this country.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Riis: Look who is talking about sovereignty. You are really gutsy to say that.

Mr. Axworthy: No wonder you lost in 1983.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, the two Parties in opposition may believe that it is laughable to protect and to assert Canada's sovereignty. We do not believe that that is laughable. We believe that Canadian sovereignty is asserted by acting with confidence in the world. We have done this in the agreement. We have secured protection for Canadian industries and Canadian interests against the protectionist influences in the United States. Any honest reading of the arrangements that have been put in place will make that abundantly clear.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, we will have to hold up that labyrinthine answer to the light and see what we can make of it when we have a little spare time.

DEMAND THAT GOVERNMENT ANNOUNCE ITS PROGRAMS

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if, as the Prime Minister states, there are no losers in the Canadian free trade agreement, then why did he say last night that massive programs would have to be undertaken to protect Canadians who will lose their jobs as a result of the agreement with the United States? Where are these programs? Can the Minister unveil and describe them right now? And why should our automobile workers, our farm producers, and our textile workers not keep their jobs? Why not leave things as they are now instead of putting many thousands of jobs on the line?

[English]

Mr. Gauthier: Is this the pinch-hitter, Mike?

Mr. Rodriguez: Where's Patsy?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as all Members of the House know, at this moment the Prime Minister and the Minister for International Trade are meeting with the Premiers.

• (1430)

Let me take the opportunity to answer the question of the Leader of the Opposition and say that we do not expect there will be a need for any significant programs of adjustment. We have a number of programs in place right now. The Prime Minister has said that if there is a need for those programs, those programs are in place and those programs will be augmented to the extent that is necessary to deal with the problem. That is very clear.

Let me point also out to the Leader of the Opposition that when the European Community was formed, trade increased within the community by 347 per cent over a 10-year period and at the same time in the United States it increased only about 124 per cent and in the United Kingdom by about 77 per cent. It is clear that as a trade arrangement is agreed on between two countries the economic growth and the trade between those two countries increase substantially, and that is the best type of adjustment that we can expect.

FINANCING OF ADJUSTMENT PROGRAMS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In the aftermath of the documents tabled yesterday, reports like the following are coming in: "Trade pact seen costing 20,000 jobs in the auto-parts "industry". "Wine industry 10,000 jobs will be lost."

Some Hon. Members: That is the Toronto Star.

Mr. Axworthy: Here is a report from the Quebec Government saying "131,000 jobs at risk in the Province of Quebec." DRIE's own study shows 50,000 jobs at risk in the manufacturing industry of Ontario, yet the Minister of Finance has the nerve to stand up in this House and say that this Government cannot see any jobs at risk. How blind can one Minister and one Government be?

Mr. Speaker: I ask the Hon. Member to put his question.

Mr. Axworthy: Is the Government prepared to live up presumably to another commitment made last night by the Prime Minister of a massive undertaking of necessary money to make sure that there will not be hundreds of thousands of victims in this country due to the ill-begotten, and ill thought out trade agreement which the Government wants to negotiate?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think I said yesterday that the country has a choice to make. We either live in the past with a small Canada as the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry would like us to do, or we look forward to the future and the the opportunities that are there.

The Hon. Member has commented on some people. A non-partisan Ottawa based think tank says that this will usher in higher employment levels, greater productivity, and an improved standard of living for Canadians. The Canadian Federation of Independent Business representing small businesses around the country says—I think the Hon. Member should listen to this because this is the essence of the approach which the Government is taking— "Canadian entrepreneurs feel that they can compete well and effectively in both markets".

What we are trying to do is open up both markets, open up a market of 260 million people to Canadians so they can compete, create jobs here in Canada and encourage the growth that all Canadians want to have.

DISPUTE SETTLEMENT MECHANISM—WALL STREET JOURNAL REPORT

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, let me ask a supplementary question. We now know that there will be many job losses in Canada totalling in the tens of thousands.

I want to recite briefly to the Minister a report that appeared in this morning's Wall Street Journal. It said that the Reagan administration, which will brief the Senate finance committee today, argues privately that even if Canada were to win arbitration rulings against future U.S. law, the U.S. could still refuse to change that law. In that event they say Canada's only recourse would be take its own retaliatory action or terminate the trade agreement, action already available to Ottawa under world trade pacts.

Why have we given up our sovereignty? Why are we putting jobs at risk for something we already have under international agreements?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is simply false for the Opposition to suggest that this country has failed to make a major gain with regard to the dispute settlement mechanism that is in place.

Mr. Axworthy: The U.S. administration.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Of course. The Member is reading the Wall Street Journal. That may be a reflection upon the Wall Street Journal to be read by the Hon. Member but I suppose in his case any American publication will do.

Mr. Axworthy: At least I can read.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): The point that has to be made that is germane here is that our major problem has not been with the nature of American law in trade questions; our major problem has been with the interpretation of American law.

Mr. Axworthy: No binding mechanism there.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): The interpretation has been, prior to this agreement, by American tribunals subject to political influence particularly in times when protectionist pressure was mounting. That vulnerability that existed in the past would obviously become more acute given the protectionist pressures and climates in the United States right now. What we have is an agreement by both sides in effect to change the judge, to have an impartial judge, a bi-national judge, with Canadians, to interpret the rules in place.

Mr. Axworthy: You surrender the international one.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): To put this into perspective, if a regime like that had been in place in the softwood dispute, there would have been no danger of Canada losing. Indeed, if there had been an arrangement like that, the softwood issue—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: You gave it away. You didn't even go to court.

Some Hon. Members: Hear hear!

Mr. Axworthy: A pitiful answer.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Oshawa.

ENERGY RESOURCES AND SECURITY OF SUPPLY—ECONOMY OF ALBERTA

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The Minister just a minute ago called for an honest reading of the agreement. I suggest that an honest reading of the agreement will show for the first time in Canadian history that a Canadian Government has been prepared to give up Canadian sovereignty—the question is serious and I hope it will be taken seriously—over the price of our energy resources and also over the question of security of supply.

An Hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Broadbent: The present Government in Alberta currently sells natural gas to petro-chemical companies in the Province of Alberta at a lower price than it sells to Americans for the sensible reason that it wants to use this tool for diversifying its own economy. Will the Minister confirm under this agreement, which his Government has negotiated, that this tool for development will no longer be available to the Government of Alberta?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, nothing in this treaty which is being mentioned here in the House would prevent the Canadian Government from setting up a surplus monitoring system concerning its future energy requirements. Nothing in this agreement prevents the Canadian Government from doing that.

On the contrary, this agreement does not change anything to others we now have within the OECD international energy system to which Canada belongs, nothing in this agreement or in the other prevents us as a country from operating as we see fit.

[English]

EXPORTS OF GAS AND OIL

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the Minister was tuned into Radio Peking or what, but the question I asked had absolutely nothing to do with the answer.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, Oh!

Mr. Broadbent: The Minister knows that what I said is absolutely true. The Government of Alberta and all our resource producing provinces have lost the right to diversify their economies by selling gas to their own citizens at a price lower than to the Americans. That is shameful and the Canadian Government ought never to have done that.

I have another question on the important matter of security of supply and energy to which I would like the right hon. gentleman, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, to reply. When he was Prime Minister the then Conservative Government introduced a Bill in the Parliament of Canada that would have given us the right to curtail exports of gas or oil to the United States in an energy crisis on the grounds that when there is a crisis Canadian needs ought to be met first with Canadian resources. Will the Secretary of State for External Affairs now confirm that the Government wants to enter into the kind of an agreement with the United States which would stop it from ensuring that gas and oil when in crisis supply ought to be left to Canadians? Will he admit that?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I will say as clearly as I can to the leader of the socialist party that there is nothing in this agreement with respect to sharing our resources, even with the United States, nothing in this agreement differs from the agreements signed by the previous Liberal administration pursuant to FIRA guidelines. That is clear and precise!

[English]

CURTAILMENT OF EXPORTS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I listened with care.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I heard the Minister's answer. I would sincerely suggest to him that he read the document carefully because what I said this afternoon is in the document, and his colleagues are the ones who negotiated this agreement with the Americans.

• (1440)

I want to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who as the senior Minister is responsible for these negotiations, if he is in agreement with what his colleague, the Minister, has just said.

Is the Minister right when he says that Canada still has the right to curtail completely exports of gas and oil to the United States under the terms of the proposed agreement?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member should read the agreement. He should also bear in mind that for years one of the major problems we faced in western Canada was to achieve the capacity for economic diversification. We now have as a result of this agreement a great opportunity to achieve diversification in that region. If the Hon. Member wants to debate that on any election platform in western Canada or anywhere else, I would be delighted to take him on.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF FORMER SPEAKER FRANCIS

Mr. Speaker: I will exercise a certain prerogative here and do something a little unusual. We have with us to my right a distinguished colleague and long time friend and former Speaker of the House of Commons, the Hon. Lloyd Francis.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I want all Hon. Members to know that I have some help.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT—OIL EXPORTS

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, following up what the Hon. Member for Oshawa has said. There is a change and the change is for the worse.

Last year in Canada we sold an average of 807,000 barrels a day of oil to the United States. Now there is no limit on what we can sell to the United States. Even if we are short of oil ourselves, we have to sell a portion of that oil to the United States, in exchange for which the Americans only have to sell us 50,000 barrels of Alaska crude oil.

Why, when we are running short of very necessary light and medium crude and do not have enough for our own needs, do we have to give away our precious oil to the United States in exchange for a pittance?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the tentative agreement with the United States will be a boon to the energy sector, and all those who are responsible for this sector see it that way, be it Premier Getty who has been saying that free trade is very beneficial to Alberta oil and gas producers, be it Premier Robert Bourassa who is saying that, in the energy sector among others, the agreement will benefit both countries, be it the Saskatchewan region where even the producers . . . Mr. Speaker, this agreement favours energy producers and consumers alike, on both sides of the border.

[English]

REGULATIONS GOVERNING OIL SHIPMENTS

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, what the Minister of Energy says is not correct because we will not have any light or medium crude, we will only have the more expensive heavy oil, tarsands and offshore oil. Who will pay the extra price to bring this oil to production, the Americans? In the United States, there is the Jones Act which regulates the shipping from port to port.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member will put his question, please.

Mr. MacLellan: Now, shipping of oil from Alaska to Canada has to be in United States vessels. Why has the Government brought the Jones Act to apply to Canada under this very, very harsh agreement?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is repeating the same questions and obviously, he will get the same answers. There is nothing in this Accord——that will prevent us from instituting a surplus test if we foresee a potential shortage in Canadian supply. This notion of sharing available supply the Hon. Member mentioned is no different from the agreement already signed by the previous Liberal Government with the IEA countries on this question of sharing oil supply.

[English]

ECONOMY OF ALBERTA

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs who will recall as an Albertan that Peter "Low-heed" fought for many years to establish—

Some Hon. Members: Its Lougheed!

Mr. Riis: Peter Lougheed, the Premier.

Some Hon. Members: Nelson "Rice".

Mr. Speaker: I just want to remind Hon. Members that the matter which is being discussed is of course a very important one but the time that is taken by the Chair to restore order will be lost at the end of Question Period. Hon. Members would keep that in mind.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, an Albertan who would be well aware that the previous Premier of Alberta, Premier "Low-heed", worked for many, many years to establish a two-price system on petrochemical feed stocks and he was successful. That resulting secondary industry led to a diversification of the economy of Alberta and other western provinces. This particular accord that has been signed does away with that.

I want the Secretary of State to have the courage to say yes, the Government has signed away the ability of the provincial Government to have a two-price system to diversify the economy, a multi-billion-dollar initiative as opposed to the wimpy Western Development Fund.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, "Low-heed" is the way they say it in the Canadian Labour Congress.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An Hon. Member: That's the way they say it in British Columbia.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I am told that is the way they say it in British Columbia. The question was asked of me as an Albertan by a former Albertan. In Alberta we call him Lougheed, and in Alberta, when we are interested in the views of the former Premier of the province, we ask those views. The former Premier of the Province of Alberta has expressed his views on this trade arrangement. He, like the rest of us who have the interests of western Canada and this country at heart, knows that this trade agreement provides an opportunity we have never before had in that region to achieve the kind of economic diversification that will allow western Canada to be equal with the rest of the country.

• (1450)

Mr. Riis: The record will show that the former Prime Minister refused to respond to that question about Alberta.

CRUDE OIL EXPORTS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, when the Minister was Prime Minister of Canada, Bill C-42 was introduced by the then Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who said: "I have taken steps to reduce general exports in terms of crude to the United States to supply our domestic needs, particularly in times of crisis."

Will the former Prime Minister, now Secretary of State for External Affairs, now admit that this particular agreement does away with that? In a sense it gives up the control of pricing and security of supply. In other words, he sold out once again. Not even that, because when you sell out you get something in return, he gave it away.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the question asked by the House Leader for the "Old Democratic Party" was answered by my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. However, I find it quite interesting that yesterday the Leader of the NDP wanted us to believe that Canada had not evolved since 1867. Now the NDP spokesman is suggesting we are in the conditions of 1979. They are a backward-looking Party in a forward-looking country.

What is at issue here is that this Government recognizes that, just as Team Canada can compete in the world and win, so can this country compete in the world and win.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: More!

Mr. Jelinek: Ask a supplementary, Riis.

REQUEST FOR DETAILS ON NUMBER OF JOB LOSSES RESULTING FROM CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. In an internal report, the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion indicated that 228,000 jobs in seventeen industries would be lost as a result of free trade. Informetrica, a private company, predicted the loss of 300,000 jobs, and the Canadian Labour Congress predicted that one million jobs would be lost. Last night, the Prime Minister himself acknowledged the loss of jobs would be tremendous when he admitted to the existence of a major retraining program for these workers. In the circumstances, is the Government now prepared to give us its official forecast of the number of jobs lost and the sectors concerned, and does it intend to publish its studies and forecasts regarding loss of jobs as a result of free trade?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, obviously that work has not been completed at this stage because the precise elements of the agreement were known only very late on Saturday night. However, I would draw the Hon. Member's attention to the fact that many of these reports have indicated that there will be a substantial over-all increase in jobs created in Canada. That is on top of the 900,000 jobs created since September, 1984.

We are in a growing economy. I draw to his attention what has happened with the Australia and New Zealand trade arrangement, as well as the arrangements in Europe. In a growing economy adjustment comes easier. We have seen over the past number of years that a considerable amount of adjustment has been necessary because four to five million people do change jobs, moving from one company to another, each year. We have a lot of adjustment going on and we have the programs in place to meet these needs.

Mr. Allmand: This Government is very good at announcing new job creation.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: It can do the same with the loss of jobs.

POSSIBLE JOB LOSSES—REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION OF STUDIES

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister was ready to announce a massive program of retraining for workers who will lose their jobs as a result of free trade, he must have had some forecasts or background studies and I am asking the Government to make them public so we can prepare for these job losses. What is the Government trying to hide?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we are not trying to hide anything. The Prime Minister said if there is a need to augment the—

Mr. Allmand: He said a massive program!

Mr. McKnight: Easy, Warren.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has indicated that if we are to get on with the business of Question Period, there will have to be a little bit more constraint. I have given an indication to the Government side and I make that indication quite clear to the Opposition side. I will move on if there are going to be interruptions. We are already late in the day and there are a number of Members who still want to ask questions.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, what I was saying before I was interrupted was that we do have massive programs in place right now, involving at least $3 billion, to deal with the needs of adjustment in the economy.

I point out to the Hon. Member that over the last number of years two and a half million people were laid off at one time or another. A million people will quit their jobs at some time during the year. Another million will leave their jobs for other reasons such as fixed term contract, casual labour, fired, business closures. Whatever the reason, there are massive programs in place to deal with the considerable amount of adjustment that takes place. As I said earlier, those programs will be augmented if it is appropriate to do so in the context of the trade agreement.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

SHORTAGE OF AFFORDABLE HOUSING IN TORONTO

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation and concerns the severe shortage of affordable housing in Metropolitan Toronto as indicated by the fact that the vacancy rate there is virtually nil, whereas in other cities such as Calgary it is in excess of 5 per cent.

In view of all that will the Minister immediately direct his officials at CMHC to alter its programs with a view to creating substantially more units of affordable housing in Metropolitan Toronto? Or does he agree with those who say that the only solution to this problem is to live in Calgary and commute to Toronto for work?

Hon. Stewart McInnes (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the housing situation in Toronto is not an easy one. Yesterday I attended the opening of a special project involving people in special purpose housing in the core. Over the last 18 months we have built some 4,800 new units in Toronto. Last year we were involved in the construction or renovation of some 55,000 homes across Canada.

All of the funds in this portfolio are being directed towards those most in need. We are still awaiting the recommendations of the conference which took place in Ottawa one month ago during the International Year of the Homeless about what solutions might be appropriate for Toronto and the rest of Canada.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT—AUTO PARTS INDUSTRY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. On June 23, 1987, the Minister for International Trade said clearly that "We do not intend to alter the Auto Pact".

Mr. Shields: Here is Bob White!

Mr. Langdon: Yet the head of the Auto Parts Association has now said that this free trade deal fundamentally weakens and severely injures the Pact.

Some Hon. Members: Wrong!

Mr. Langdon: Why has the Government broken its promise and altered the Auto Pact in ways so clear to industry spokesmen?

• (1500)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to draw fine points here, but auto parts are not a part of the Auto Pact. Let us address the specific question. The Member said that this will damage that industry. I say it will not damage that industry because there will be an incentive for more parts to be produced in Canada as a result of the arrangements that were agreed on because of the new value-added requirement. That will encourage the non-North American companies which have established in Canada to increase the degree of content in Canada. That will create jobs for people in that industry.

AUTO PACT QUERY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the Minister shows his ignorance by saying that the Auto Pact does not deal with auto parts.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Hon. Member may or may not be right, but would he put the question please?

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, Mr. Lonmo, the head of the auto parts industry, predicts the loss of 20,000 jobs in the auto parts industry thanks to this agreement. How does the Minister explain the contradiction between past promises and the sell-out of Canadian jobs in this agreement? Why this gutting of the Auto Pact?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there is no gutting of the Auto Pact. The safeguards are still in place. The Canadian value-added is still in place. The sales-to-production ratios are still in place.

The Hon. Member talks about contradictions. On May 10, 1965, the Leader of the NDP at that time tabled a motion of non-confidence in the Government for entering into the Auto Pact. We have seen a nice little flip-flop and somersault. The NDP is now totally on the other side of this issue. Surely the Hon. Member should try one more time to get his head around the issue.

NORTHWEST PASSAGE—CANADIAN JURISDICTION

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, can the Secretary of State for External Affairs confirm that negotiations are presently being conducted with the United States with regard to its support for Canadian jurisdiction over the Northwest Passage? How are these negotiations progressing? When will the Canadian Laws Offshore Application Bill, which has been on the Order Paper month after month, be introduced for first reading?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that those discussions which began several months ago are continuing. We have not yet reached a resolution.

I do not think it is a breach of my cabinet responsibilities to say that from time to time it is welcome to receive from private Members of the House of Commons a little public help to speed some of my colleagues along with the introduction of important pieces of legislation such as the Canadian Laws Offshore Application Bill. I hope we may have it before the House very soon.

Mr. Speaker: There will be two more questions. The Hon. Member for Windsor West.

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT—AUTO PACT—AUTO PARTS INDUSTRY

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. I heard the Minister say, in responding to the question of the Member for Essex—Windsor, that auto parts are not part of the Auto Pact.

Does the Minister realize that he has made not only an outrageous statement but one that is totally inaccurate? Auto parts which are put into cars assembled in Canada are as much a part of the Auto Pact as are those cars. They have been from the beginning.

Will the Minister admit he has made a terrible error which in part explains why he has made such a bungle of the free trade agreement, particularly the sell-out of the Auto Pact?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Member for Windsor West knows that the safeguards to which he attaches such high value are related to new car assembly. That is precisely what I meant by my previous answer.

MINISTER'S POSITION

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I take it the Minister is admitting he was wrong in his first answer. The parts going into new car assembly are as much subject to the Auto Pact as are the new cars themselves. If that were not the case, there would be no meaning for the 60 per cent Canadian content requirement, which the Minister has given up for a meaningless 50 per cent North American content which means that not one car part made in Canada has to be put into cars assembled in this country.

Will the Minister admit that? He has made mistakes before. Will he admit that he has made a terrible one today? I repeat that that is why he has bungled and sold out the Auto Pact.

Mr. Axworthy: You don't even know what you are giving away.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not admit for a minute that the House Leader of the Liberal Party is correct on that. He is drawing a very fine and delicate point which is not—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): If he had listened to my answer he would have understood exactly what I meant.

I want to make a fundamental point here. The Member for Windsor West has no confidence in the people he represents.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): They have no confidence in you.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): He has no confidence in their ability to compete. He has no confidence in their ability to win business from the United States. We on this side of the House do have that confidence. I think that the people he represents have demonstrated that capacity to compete.

Mr. Speaker: There will be a single question from the Hon. Member for Yorkton—Melville.

Point of Order—Mr. Langdon

ENERGY—SECURITY OF SUPPLY

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

[Translation]

I would like to ask the Minister whether he now denies that, according to page 17 of the Free Trade Agreement between Canada and the United States, we have lost control over security of energy supply. Does he deny that, yes or no?

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No, that is entirely untrue!

PRIVILEGE

LOSS OF JOBS IN HAMILTON EAST—TRADE NEGOTIATIONS

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising from Question Period. During Question Period we heard the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) say that he could not tell the public whether there would be any job loss as a result of the free trade agreement. I would like to let him know that in Hamilton East today 1,300 jobs at Firestone were lost as a direct result of the free trade negotiation.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Ms. Copps: If that is the treatment we are going to get from the Americans, then I want to raise it in this House. I think it is a privilege to speak out for the workers—

Some Hon. Members: Sit down!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: No one in this Chamber would ever doubt that the Hon. Member speaks vigorously and appropriately on behalf of the people she represents. However, I must advise her that while that may be a very important point, it is not a question of privilege.

POINT OF ORDER

THE AUTO PACT—AUTO PARTS AND PRODUCTION

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In his answer to me during Question Period the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) suggested that the Auto Pact did not deal with auto parts. I want to point out to the House and to you, Mr. Speaker, that auto parts and auto production are both part of the Pact and he should know it.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure Hon. Members would agree that the Hon. Member for Essex—Windsor (Mr. Langdon) is very quick to rise in this House to put forward positions which are important to his own constituents and his own region. However, I again have to say, as I had to say to another Member on another issue just a moment ago, that that is a matter of debate rather than a point of order. I do understand the Hon. Member's concern about the issue.

(b) the recognition that Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society.

(2) The role of the Parliament of Canada and the provincial legislatures to preserve the fundamental characteristic of Canada referred to in paragraph (1)(a) is affirmed.

(3) The role of the legislature and Government of Quebec to preserve and promote the distinct identity of Quebec referred to in paragraph (1)(b) is affirmed.

(2) Until an amendment to the Constitution of Canada is made in relation to the Senate pursuant to section 41 of the Constitution Act, 1982, the person summoned to fill a vacancy in the Senate shall be chosen from among persons whose names have been submitted under subsection (1) by the government of the province to which the vacancy relates and must be acceptable to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada."

95B. (1) Any agreement concluded between Canada and a province in relation to immigration or the temporary admission of aliens into that province has the force of law from the time it is declared to do so in accordance with subsection 95C(1) and shall from that time have effect notwithstanding class 25 of section 91 or section 95.

(2) An agreement that has the force of law under subsection (1) shall have effect only so long and so far as it is not repugnant to any provision of an Act of the Parliament of Canada that sets national standards and objectives relating to immigration or aliens, including any provision that establishes general classes of immigrants or relates to levels of immigration for Canada or that prescribes classes of individuals who are inadmissible into Canada.

(3) The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms applies in respect of any agreement that has the force of law under subsection (1) and in respect of anything done by the Parliament or Government of Canada, or the legislature or government of a province, pursuant to any such agreement.

95C. (1) A declaration that an agreement referred to in subsection 95B(1) has the force of law may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada only where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of the province that is a party to the agreement.

(2) An amendment to an agreement referred to in subsection 95B(1) may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada only where so authorized

(a) by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of the province that is a party to the agreement; or

(b) in such other manner as is set out in the agreement.

95D. Sections 46 to 48 of the Constitution Act, 1982 apply, with such modifications as the circumstances require, in respect of any declaration made pursuant to subsection 95C(1), any amendment to an agreement made pursuant to subsection 95C(2) or any amendment made pursuant to section 95E.

95E. An amendment to sections 95A to 95D or this section may be made in accordance with the procedure set out in subsection 38(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, but only if the amendment is authorized by resolutions of the legislative assemblies of all the provinces that are, at the time of the amendment, parties to an agreement that has the force of law under subsection 95B(1)."

and on the amendments of Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra) (p.9585), Mr. Broadbent (p.9586), Mr. Caccia (p.9644) and Mr. Allmand (p.9644).

Mr. George Henderson (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of emotion that I participate in this debate on the constitutional Accord, 1987. The Constitution is the most important document in our country. Our Constitution, the basic framework of our nation, is the business of all Canadians.

I am upset by the process that surrounded the 1987 Accord. The 11 First Ministers met in two marathon sessions and their agreement was presented for this Parliament to pass. Changes would only be made if egregious errors were uncovered.

The joint committee of the House of Commons and Senate held its hearings in the summer, when public interest is low. The committee should have travelled in order to hear Canadians from coast to coast. Instead, it stayed in Ottawa and only those groups that could travel to Ottawa were here to discuss the Constitution and the Meech Lake Accord. In my view, that was an extremely bad decision. The committee should have reached out to hear Canadians and generate more interest.

I, together with others in the House, had the opportunity to participate in the constitutional process in 1982. It was an historic occasion. Our Constitution was brought home from Great Britain and Canadians finally got a Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

I believe that the 1987 Accord is also historic. Quebec's signature on the Canadian Constitution is definitely a significant achievement. However, I do not believe that one should be branded as anti-Quebec just because he or she suggests that the 1987 Accord should be improved.

In a nutshell, the constitutional Accord of 1987 is not a "seamless web" as some have described it. It is not a miracle. In my opinion, it is a bad piece of work that must be fixed.

I believe that improvements must be made to this Accord and that the amendments proposed by the Liberal Party will not unravel the Accord. I do not blame the Premiers for this Accord. In fact, given the feast offered by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), the Premiers could not turn it down. I am sure they never expected such a bountiful harvest and I suppose that the day after Meech Lake the Premiers must have felt as though they had won a lottery.

In my opinion, the Accord is tantamount to a dark cloud which will hang forever over the federal Government. I believe the Accord puts us on a fast track to becoming "a community of communities" or a "nation of shopping centres". I, and I believe many other Canadians, do not share such a vision for this great country of Canada.

Of course, some wording of the Accord needs clarification. For instance, what does "distinct society" mean? Is it limited only to Quebec? According to my interpretation, there are hundreds of distinct societies in Canada and that all Canadians are distinctive. Therefore, if the term "distinct society" means anything, then it should be spelled out.

Some may say that Quebec is not a distinct society, but Premier Bourassa thinks it is a distinct society and has said so on many occasions. The federal Government has a responsibility to explain what "distinct society" means.

Let me refer to a clipping from The Summerside Journal Pioneer which states:

> If the people of Quebec can be accepted as a distinct society, then this should also apply to the aboriginal people of Canada, says a recent news release from the Aboriginal People of P.E.I., The Lennox Island Band.
> "As aboriginal people of Canada, we are even more distinct than people whose culture and language comes from Europe," spokesman John Joe Sark said in the release.

This refers not only to French-speaking Quebecers but to Anglophones as well. It refers to us all. Our native people were here long before Europeans arrived in North America.

I also have serious concerns with the clause which obliges the federal and provincial Governments to preserve but not promote the French-speaking fact outside Quebec. My riding has a large Acadian community which is very proud of its language, culture and heritage. How will the word "preserve" be interpreted by future provincial and federal Governments? I believe, as others have said on this side of the House, that the word "promote" should have been applied to all provinces. These people have as much right and are just as distinct as everyone else in the country.

According to the Minister responsible for the Accord, only "egregious" errors would be enough to move the Government to consider amendments. It would be interesting to know who decides what constitutes an egregious error. I know over 13.5 million Canadians who have considered the failure to recognize their equality rights an egregious error. I am speaking about the women of Canada who had struggled with courage and determination in 1981 and 1982 to see equality rights enshrined in the Constitution of this nation. The Meech Lake Accord, specifically the Langevin amendments, places equality rights in a precarious position.

In 1981, after their long battle, Canadian women witnessed two legislative moves unprecedented in our history. One was the strengthening of Section 15 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms which protects all Canadians from discrimination. Second, at the end of the process, Section 28 was included in the Charter, which explicitly states the equality rights of men and women.

Now in 1987, it appears that Canadian women are back to where they started. There is a possibility that their equality rights are not guaranteed. By excluding women's equality rights from Section 16, the Accord renders the constitutional history of Canadian women virtually invisible. It is a rule of law that what is not included is excluded. This suggests a hierarchy of equality rights. Why are multicultural heritage and aboriginal rights singled out for extra protection when sexual equality rights are not? I believe they all should be singled out.

The 11 First Ministers contend they did not intend to exclude women, that it was a mere oversight. We all know how well good intentions stand up in the courts. I refer to a recent Supreme Court ruling with respect to collective bargaining and the right to strike. In 1982, when asked if the freedom of association clause would allow for collective bargaining and the right to strike, the Minister responsible at that time said yes. Although not put down in words, this was his intent at that time. The Supreme Court of Canada decided that this was not the case, that the freedom of association clause did not mean the right to bargain collectively or the right to strike. The intent of the 11 First Ministers regarding women's equality rights risks sharing the same fate. They are too important to risk that fate. I contend, as have others, that this clause should have a reference to the Supreme Court.

There are pros and cons in respect of this issue. I have heard many constitutional lawyers say that the Meech Lake Accord does not overrule the Charter of Rights. However, an equal number have said the reverse. Why not make a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada so that a clarification can be made before this Accord is etched in stone?

I am sure all Members have received telexes from women's organizations across the country. I have received telexes from a number of women's groups, including the P.E.I. Advisory Council on the Status of Women, the P.E.I. caucus of the National Association of Women and the Law, the University of P.E.I. Women's Study Group and the P.E.I. Women's Education Bridge, as well as many others. All of them demand clear written recognition of women's equality rights in the Meech Lake Accord.

In short, these women are simply asking that they be put back to the point they reached in 1982. Those who strongly believe that this Accord does not overrule women's equality rights should not be afraid of making a reference to the Supreme Court in order to get a specific ruling before it is etched in stone. This Constitution is the very heart of our country.

According to the 1982 Constitution, the establishment of new provinces required the consent of seven out of ten provinces, comprising at least 50 per cent of the population. This made the goal of provincehood very difficult even in 1982. Now with this Accord, every province has a veto. I certainly feel badly for the people of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, the people in our northern communities who might want to join our country as provinces. The veto will make it extremely difficult for this to ever happen.

I know that back in 1873, when my province became the seventh to join Confederation, had that provision been in the BNA Act of 1867 my constituents could very well be American today, and maybe the Hon. Member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan) and I would be representing them in Congress. I do not think Prince Edward Islanders would have wanted that.

I can even come closer in time by dealing with the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador. In 1949, there was a tremendous amount of debate at that time among the people of Newfoundland and Labrador with respect to whether they wanted to be part of the Canadian fabric, the Canadian Confederation. There was a very close vote on the matter. I wonder what would have happened then if the situation were what it is today. There were those who supported Newfoundland joining Canada. At that time Premier Smallwood supported the idea very viciously, very adamantly in the famous debates of Newfoundland. What would have happened if he knew at the end of the day that nine other provinces would have had to agree to such a proposal, and probably for some reason or by some quirk of fate, Newfoundland would not have been accepted? I think they, too, probably would have been part of another country.

Under section 2 of this Accord "appointments to the Senate shall be chosen from among persons whose names have been submitted by the Government of the province to which vacancies relate". Under the British North America Act of 1867, our first made-in-Canada constitutional document, the Fathers of Confederation saw the Senate as a forum of regional representation at the federal level. It is important that vacancies should be filled as soon as possible. This new arrangement could become an imposing obstacle.

Let me explain by giving a current example. With the recent retirement of Senator Fred Rowe, Newfoundland now has a vacancy. However, according to the Premier of Newfoundland, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) refuses to return his telephone calls. So much for national reconciliation. Should this confrontation over the fisheries agreement with France continue for a lengthy period it is unlikely that both levels of Government could agree on a new appointee. Under this impasse Newfoundland could be without its proper representation in the Senate. I believe those who think that Senate reform is going to be easy from here on in, and those who advocate the Triple E Senate, are whistling in the dark. They are whistling Dixie to even think that Senate reform is now possible.

I do not believe any of the things that I have dicussed have anything directly to do with Quebec signing the Constitution. I cannot see them as being great problems for the Province of Quebec. We want Quebec in our Constitution. I think the amendments that the Liberal Party put forth in the House of Commons would accommodate that. It would be easy for the Prime Minister and the 10 Premiers to sit down and say, "This is not quite right, let us do it right now, because if not we are liable to be in a strait-jacket".

For the first time in the history of this country, it is written that there shall be at least one First Ministers' conference each year. No one worries too much about having these conferences. We have had them annually for the last number of years, and sometimes three and four times a year. What I do take exception to is the agenda of future conferences which will include Senate reform, fisheries and "such other matters as are agreed upon". I fear that under such an open-ended arrangement the Canadian Parliament will become more and more irrelevant. We know the attention and the high expectations that surrounds these conferences, those photo opportunities. They will be a regular feature, and practically any issue can be brought to the table. It is quite conceivable that the House of Commons will no longer be able to act on issues of national importance. In an era of consensual politics, these issues may be reserved for First Ministers' conferences.

I have already briefly dicussed the matter of Senate reform. It will be a number one topic on the agenda at every First Ministers' conference. But, as I already said, I expect that those discussions will be rather short.

I also wonder what happened to our aboriginal people when the First Ministers were drawing up their agenda. As I mentioned earlier, the first inhabitants of the land known as Canada again got the short end of the stick. They should have been at the head of the list. Our party has proposed an amendment. My colleague from Cochrane—Superior talked very passionately on that subject. He feels very strongly about that one issue, and I support him on it. It will put the interests of our aboriginal people where they belong on the list.

The second item on the constitutional agenda, includes roles and responsibilities in relation to fisheries". This is one topic that I have special interest in since I am the fisheries critic of the Liberal Party. This has caused much anxiety in the Atlantic fishing industry. Several groups appeared before the joint committee to state their case.

According to the Seafood Producers' Association of Nova Scotia:

> There is already more than enough uncertainty in the fishing industry without adding a major political element that would recur annually, as proposed in this Accord.

I agree with that.

The New Brunswick Fish Packers' Association put it this way:

> The very threat posed by the requirement to debate fisheries jurisdiction each and every year would create further economic uncertainty for this resource-based industry which already must contend with the uncertainties of large fluctuations in fish stocks caused by biological and environmental factors.

What was the response of Senator Lowell Murray to these legitimate concerns when he appeared before the committee? He said and I quote:

> First of all, fisheries jurisdiction is not on the agenda of the future constitutional rounds. I think it is important to note that 11 First Ministers deliberately did not put fisheries jurisdiction on the agenda. What they put on the agenda was the subject of fisheries roles and responsibilities which is a much, much larger and wider subject.

Well, Mr. Speaker, what an exercise in hair-splitting. We do not have to refer to Webster's dictionary to find that the words "jurisdictions" and "roles and responsibilities" are practically the same. Therefore, I was somewhat amused to read the final report of the joint committee, and I quote from a passage on fisheries. It states:

> However, simply to place an issue on the agenda is not tantamount to having it actually discussed nor does it presuppose reaching any agreement. The agenda item is not "jurisdiction over fisheries" but rather "roles and responsibilities with regard to fisheries" which is a much larger and wider subject.

Senator Lowell Murray could not have said it any better. I could even accuse the committee of a little bit of plagiarism. Obviously the members of the committee should have travelled to Atlantic Canada before they made those statements. No doubt, of course, Premier Peckford naturally wanted shared jurisdiction. I suppose when we look at a province with high unemployment, we can see how it is very tempting to take over the jurisdiction or try to get the jurisdiction of fisheries, especially when we are fishing alongside the French, and in light of the way that this Government has been dealing with France's overfishing in 3PS and some of the foreign overfishing elsewhere.

We should look at fisheries a little more carefully. We all know that these fish do not fly provincial flags. We know that they swim from province to province. I am not as concerned right now with the present Premiers in place. But we have to look at a Constitution which is there probably for eternity, with very few changes that can be made, if any, under this new amending formula. But this is one issue that seven out of ten provinces can decide; whether jurisdiction would flow at some point in time to the provinces and whether it would remain in the hands of the federal Government. It is seven out of ten. Why not the unanimity clause there so that if any province is being hurt, is not satisfied and does not come to an agreement, it could back out and it could scuttle the agreement? It is ten out of ten to accept new provinces, but only seven out of ten when it comes to the basic resource we have in Atlantic Canada—the fishery, the lifeblood of our people.

One can develop all kinds of scenarios as to how an agreement could take place. I am a former provincial Minister. I know how bargaining takes place at First Ministers' conferences, how the trade-offs are made, and how one gains support from one province, by supporting one's cause in another. It is very, very important. I do not want to underestimate, and I hope that no one underestimates how dangerous that one clause is for the future to our fishery. As fisheries critic, I cannot support the Meech Lake Accord for that reason.

Former Prime Minister Trudeau repeatedly stated, "Fish swim and thus do not respect provincial boundaries". At that time, the federal Government kept its powers. I live in Prince Edward Island, the smallest province in Canada. To a large extent, we depend on our inshore fishery. We fish next to New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, and Quebec. Who is going to be at the sluice when these fish come into Sydney Bight and say to a P.E.I. fish, "You swim that way, fishy", and say to the other little fishy, "You go to New Brunswick, you swim that way", and say to the still other little fishy, "You go to Nova Scotia", and then say to the other little fishy, "You go to Quebec"? That is how ludicrous this debate and the Meech Lake Accord are on this subject and on others.

We have made a number of recommendations and amendments. If these are supported by the House and accepted by the Government, I will support the Meech Lake Accord, and I will vote for those amendments. If those amendments are turned down, I cannot support the Meech Lake Accord.

Mrs. Finestone: First, I wish to compliment my colleague on a very carefully thought-through analysis of an Accord that obviously has more than one structural problem. I noted the concern of my colleague with respect to the fishing industry. Does he agree that the premise that is presented in the House is that first Quebec signs on, because if that is not done then we are anti-Quebec, or that Quebec is signed on and only then we will worry about the other problems. Does my colleague have a comment in that regard?

Mr. Henderson: I wish to thank my colleague from Mount Royal for that question.

When we are discussing the Meech Lake Accord and whether or not things should have happened before Quebec signed on or after it signed on, I feel that they could have happened in harmony. The fishery was obviously put on the agenda to appease Premier Peckford because he had a long dispute with Ottawa regarding the Canada-France agreement. He wanted some way to get back in the good graces of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney).

I cannot see that as having an effect in the Province of Quebec. I would think that the Province of Quebec would be equally interested in having the over-all jurisdiction of the fisheries left in the hands of the federal Government rather than attempt to compete with its counterparts in the Atlantic Provinces of Newfoundland, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island. Fish could be all caught up before they reach Quebec, if the jurisdiction were handed carte blanche—which I hope it would never be—to the provinces to divide up among themselves. In my opinion, they could never reach an agreement on how that division would take place. Even if an agreement were reached, it could be something like the agreement reached with the European Economic Community outside Canada's 200 mile zone. As was discussed two weeks ago in Banff, the EEC was having great problems in attempting to control some of its member nations with the quotas that were allocated under the Northwest Atlantic Fishery Organization NAFO.

I cannot believe that the Province of Quebec, or any other province, has to have a veto over whether the Yukon and the Northwest Territories could become future provinces. I do not know about the Senate, perhaps that is a little tricky. I also do not know about the equality rights, and no one else knows. Half of the people on the one side will say yes, Meech Lake does not overrule the Charter of Rights and Freedoms of 1982. Equally, I hear the same number saying the other thing.

I am glad the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) is here. All I am saying is that the Prime Minister and the Premiers should have that matter referred to the Supreme Court of Canada and have that ruling landed down once and for all. I know that my colleague, the Hon.Member for Hillsborough (Mr. McMillan), wishes to ask a question, so I will sit down.

Mr. McMillan: I have two questions. In the early part of this decade, when the Hon. Member was on the government side, the then Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau, proposed a variation of the Victoria formula for amending the Constitution whereby there would have been three classes of provinces. In the first class, Quebec and Ontario would have been given a veto; in the second class, each of the other provinces would have to combine with other provinces constituting some proportion of the total population to be part of any approval process; and in the third class was Prince Edward Island because only it could not join with any combination of provinces to have an implact for or against a proposed constitutional amendment.

I do not recall that the Hon. Member for Egmont (Mr. Henderson) stood up and expressed himself as eloquently as he did today to take issue with the Government of the day, and to refuse to support something constitutional because it flew in the face of the interests of the people whom he was elected to represent. Why the double standard? That is my first question.

My second question is as follows. Am I to understand, and is the House to understand from the Hon. Member's comments today, that if the House does not acquiesce in the amendments that the Official Opposition is proposing to the Meech Lake Accord, he will not support the Meech Lake Accord and his Party on the floor of the House of Commons when that vote comes?

Mr. Henderson: That is exactly what I said. If these amendments that are put forward by my Party are not accepted, I will not support the Meech Lake Accord. I think too much of my fishermen, and I had hoped that the Hon. Member from Hillsborough would have stuck up a little bit for them too.

On the first question of the Hon. Member in regard to Prince Edward Island, to be honest, I did not agree with that. I have always agreed with the proposal for seven out of ten. When it comes to new territories becoming a province, or getting provincial status, I had real reservations on the seven out of ten proposal in 1982 when I was on the special joint committee. If we are going to discuss new provincehood, for example, for the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, my personal view is that it should be a bilateral agreement between the federal Government and the party that wants to become a new province. That is the only fair way, and that is the way in which most other provinces joined Confederation. I feel that should be carried over in the future.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I have great respect for the Hon. Member, his sincerity, and his point of view. I was interested in his response to my colleague, the Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan), because as the Hon. Member will know, his Leader has stated the position on behalf of the Official Opposition and the Liberal Party of Canada.

In the sense of a constructive suggestion, I am going to attempt to make a proposition to the Hon. Member. It is one thing for the Hon. Member to castigate the government side with respect to the position it has taken. I do not agree with the Hon. Member. But I say, in the interests of his own Party unity, that what he is saying is that his own Leader does not understand the issues because, regardless of whether the amendments are not supported or are accepted by the House, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner) on behalf of the Party which the Hon. Member represents will support the Accord.

Is the Hon. Member stating that his Leader is mistaken and does not have an adequate appreciation of the fishermen whom the Hon. Member represents? Is the Hon. Member saying that the Leader of the Opposition is incorrect and mistaken on the position that he has taken?

Mr. Henderson: I have always called a spade a spade. What I am saying on the fishery and some of those issues is that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) is mistaken, the Leader of the New Democratic Party is mistaken, and the Leader of our Party is mistaken.

I can tell the Hon. Member for Annapolis Valley-Hants (Mr. Nowlan) that I do not agree with either of those Leaders on this one issue. That is not to say that I do not support my Leader in every other way possible. He is a good Leader, and he will be the next Prime Minister of Canada, and I hope to be there with him. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, and all Members of the House that I have a conscience. I do not believe that it is a good agreement. I am asking everybody in this House to take another look at it. Let us make it right and as perfect as we can so that Quebec can join and we will all be happy. We do not want to be selling our fish or bartering this and that. That is exactly what we will be doing in the future. We may not realize it today or in two years' time. I guarantee that time will tell. Years down the road we will be sorry for that one mistake.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Debate. The Hon. Minister of State for Immigration (Mr. Weiner).

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Minister of State (Immigration)): Mr. Speaker, it is with enormous pride and no small emotion that I take part in this historic debate, pride as a Canadian, pride as a Quebecer and pride as an Anglophone within Quebec, and pride as a Member of the federal Government of Canada which has had the courage, the vision and the will to make this great act of national reconciliation possible. There can be no question that the Meech Lake Accord will take its place henceforth side by side with the most important documents in our laws and Constitution. But it is more than the negotiation of principles, more than a legal agreement between Governments. It is a matter, above all, of the heart and from the heart. Like a heart it beats with the essential truths of what this great country is, strong and undeniable, irresistible in what it says and what it promises. We are a nation. We are united. Canada is one.

In coming generations Canadians will look back and realize, as some unfortunately today do not, just what an active statesmanship the First Ministers have accomplished. In particular, they will see the singular efforts of our Prime Minister and the Premier of Quebec. What they have contributed transcends mere responsibility. Theirs has been an active moral, social and political leadership of the highest order. One day Canadians will know it and recognize that this Accord could not have been reached with faint heart or equivocation. They will see that it took a complete conviction and a profound belief, belief in a shared future which is now possible; belief in a basic trust and goodwill between the peoples of this country with which the enmities and the bitterness of the past can once and for all be put behind us; belief in the decency and integrity of those who have led us to this new beginning. I share without reservations those beliefs, and as one Canadian I accept with confidence and with gratitude this precious gift.

I am a Canadian, and I am from Quebec. Yes, I am also a member of the English-speaking minority in Quebec. To some that might connote a difference, another point of view or experience from the majority. Perhaps. In mother language, obviously. But I am no less proud in my heritage of La Belle Province. I was born there. I was raised there. It is the home of my children. It is my home. I share in the understanding that Quebec is, indeed, a distinct society. We of the English-speaking minority are part of what gives it that distinction. But for our presence Quebec would not be distinct. It would be homogeneous and perhaps a separate entity.

In our long presence and relationship within Quebec we, the English-speaking minority, have contributed to the character of our French-speaking brothers and sisters as they have to ours. We are all Quebecers and we share in our distinction. So it is that I understand here in my heart the terrible emotions so passionately expressed before the joint committee by Solange Chaput-Rolland when she spoke of her feelings in the aftermath of the 1980 referendum.

> We voted for Canada. Canada through its central government totally absorbed in its will to patriate the British North America Act of 1867, cared very little about those who had openly stated their will to remain linked to this country. Promises and dreams were shattered.

As Madam Chaput-Rolland has said, it was a deeply troubled time for all Quebecers, a time of battle and of conflict. Afterwards when the battle had been won, when all that was asked was the warmth of reconciliation, the embrace and welcome of partnership, there was nothing; a void; irresolution; if not indifference. Quebec remained in a very real way outside and alone.

[Translation]

The Meech Lake Accord gives us to chance to change all that. It gives us a new start as a family and as a nation. A beginning, not an end. All of us in this House and Canadians across this country know that the Accord is not a perfect one. The provision in the Accord for an annual First Ministers meeting means that the Accord is a first step towards a United Canada.

The fact that the Accord has raised a certain amount of protest, the fact that Opposition Members do not support it and that some people are concerned about its implementation, all this does not mean that the Accord as such is bad, unfair and useless. It is quite normal to be wary when one walks where one has never walked before. The path may not be a familiar one but if we do not move ahead, we regress.

[English]

Fortunately we have a comprehensive and thorough navigational aid to help us. I refer, of course, to the report of the joint committee. This committee, under the co-chairmanship of the Hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer) and the Hon. Senator Arthur Tremblay, has performed for the Parliament of Canada an invaluable service. The testimony they have amassed, drawn as it is from many of our country's wisest and most learned constitutional experts, jurists and senior statesmen, points broadly and, in my opinion, conclusively that most of the fears expressed about Meech Lake are either unfounded or unjustified.

I wish to address myself to some of those issues, in particular, to those concerns expressed by the English-speaking minority of Quebec, to which, I have said I myself belong. I know that this community does have considerable anxiety over the implications of Meech Lake. I know also that in some instances those concerns have been quite expertly—and wholly irresponsibly—fanned to the extent that they have become embers, if not flames, of alarm. The fact that those political opportunists who seek benefit by playing upon such fear will ultimately fail is of little comfort. In the short term their damage is done. Or it would be done, were the English-speaking community of Quebec less aware than it actually is of what really is at stake here. But it is aware and it will not be sold a false bill of goods. The community knows exactly what rides on this agreement. The community knows that this may very well be our only and last chance to effect national reconciliation. And, as Quebecers and Canadians, they are not going to throw that chance away. The precise text of the Accord states:

> The Constitution of Canada shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the recognition that the existence of French-speaking Canadians, centred in Quebec but also present elsewhere in Canada, and English-speaking Canadians, concentrated outside Quebec but also present in Quebec, constitutes a fundamental characteristic of Canada.

Three paragraphs later the text continues:

> Nothing in this section derogates from the powers, rights or privileges of Parliament or the Government of Canada, or of the legislatures or Governments of the provinces, including any powers, rights or privileges relating to language.

As the joint committee has pointed out, the language and educational rights of English-speaking Quebecers are already entrenched in clear and explicit terms both in the 1867 Constitution Act and in the Charter of Rights. The courts of Canada have ruled extensively on this issue, and a majority of constitutional experts agree that there is nothing in the recognition of Quebec as a distinct society which will in any way diminish or dilute the constitutional guarantees already in place. In fact, the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations says quite the contrary. He said:

> It would be difficult to see how this declaration, this interpretive clause, does anything but enhance—the status of those minorities.

The English-speaking minority of Quebec numbers over 800,000 people, or 20 per cent of Quebec's total. As others have pointed out, it has a population larger than that of Newfoundland, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, or Saskatchewan.

It is inconceivable that the minority rights of these Quebecers who have contributed so greatly to their province and their country would ever be jeopardized by this or any other constitutional agreement. The very fact, through Meech Lake, that Quebec has at last found its rightful place in Confederation means that there is no reason, no desire, or no logic for the majority even to try to erode those rights. However, if they did, if tomorrow morning against all odds those rights were ever placed in doubt, and if the indignation of English-speaking Canada did not overflow, if the courts did not at once strike down the motion, if every institution and constitutional safeguard either stood by idly or broke down, I know that one individual would not. The Prime Minister, our Prime Minister, would not. He will defend with every ounce of his being the rights of English-speaking Quebecers, just as he did the rights of the minority in Manitoba or just as he will the rights of the minority anywhere in the country, and so will the Government. However, there is no need for that ever to happen.

The Government of Quebec will not discriminate or act prejudicially toward its English-speaking minority, not now, not when, after these last seven years of roller-coaster passions and emotions, she has so happily and joyously re-entered the family of Canada.

There comes a time in the life of all countries, and for Canada that time is now, when we must stop everything else and accept simply but profoundly to trust one another. That is the maturity of nationhood and the measure of citizenship. We cannot speak of Canada as a country in which to be proud unless we can also speak of it as a country of fundamental fairness, respect, and justice, and we cannot have those without trust.

Quebec has shown trust toward Canada. Quebec has accepted the basic decency and the sense of egality of the Canadian majority. The minority within Quebec can and must do no less.

What I have tried to say to and on behalf of my brothers and sisters of both the minority and the majority in Quebec, I also say to those who have somehow sensed a diminution through Meech Lake of Canada's commitment to being a multicultural nation. This is not so. As a member of a community which has for generations kept its faith and traditions alive in places where there were no rights, when the exact opposite occurred, systematic suppression, I know that no law or mere interpretation of law can ever destroy or diminish that culture. The experience of the Jewish people is not unique. If not outright prejudice and oppression, most minority ethnic cultures have at one time or another felt the persuasive force of the majority to conform to that majority. Yes, at times in our history that has happened in Canada as well. We have only to look around us to see the hopeless failures of such pressure.

[Translation]

And today, all of us, whatever our ethnic group, our religion, our colour, whether we are part of the minority or the majority, realize the unique vigor which multiculturalism imparts to Canada. We can feel it. We neither hide nor deny our differences, we celebrate them. We rejoyce in them. Our understanding and compassion are improved because of them.

The true guarantee of multiculturalism is the importance we give it. Since it is so important, the Premiers accepted to include multiculturalism in Section 16 of the Accord. While the Premiers could now go even further, there is no doubt as to the intent of this provision.

Linguistic duality and recognition of the distinct character of Quebec will not compromise our multicultural heritage. No other right or privilege of Canadians will be compromised.

Mr. Speaker, the adversaries of the Accord, and these include a few famous Canadians, have tried to oppose adoption of this Accord for various reasons. They have tried to find in its contents implicit threats against our institutions and ideals, even though these will become stronger rather than weaker thanks to a united Canada.

[English]

Is it weakening Canada to give the provinces an interim role in the appointment of the Upper Chamber of this Parliament? I could only think that it will improve the calibre of that august membership. Is it a threat to national authority to confirm the principle of opting out? That principle has been present, if largely unused, in federal-provincial relations since 1965. Is it a surrender on the part of the federal Government to confirm in the Constitution the right of provinces to participate in the formation of immigration policy? In essence, this does no more than confirm the relationship which has existed for most of the past decade under the Cullen-Couture agreement.

There is no loss. There is no surrender. Perhaps there is some measure of devolution of central power. Is this inherently bad? We know only too well the obsession of the previous Government and its leaders with their authority and what it did to our country both economically and socially. As one witness characterized such centralization, "anemia in the extremities and apoplexy at the centre".

Some three years after the election of this Government, Canada is once again a thriving and optimistic nation. Now Meech Lake has brought about an act of reconciliation many of us had begun to doubt would ever be possible. We are restored. We are rejuvenated. We are complete. That is why the Accord is so incredibly important and why we must willingly embrace it. We may never have another chance.

Professor John Whyte, before the joint committee, put it precisely when he said:

> Those who continue to oppose the 1987 Accord after it has been accepted and approved by Quebec, must realize that they argue not simply against the adoption of certain terms for reconciliation, they argue to undo the historical act of reconciliation.

Madame Chaput-Rolland, speaking as always from the heart, left no doubt in any who heard her when she said:

> Surely you know that if Meech Lake is to fail for whatever reason, there can be no more negotiations, no more justifications. If Quebec is once again to realize that it is more difficult to opt in Canada than to stay out of Canada, then surely, you know that the roads of tomorrow can only lead to another form of independence, but this time not chosen by any political Party in Quebec, maybe chosen and imposed on Quebec outside Quebec.

For once I take no satisfaction from the discord within the Official Opposition. It serves none of us. It benefits none of us.

As Members of the House at this extraordinary time, our task is not to dwell upon what has not been accomplished but to accept all that has, against such odds, been quite remarkably achieved, and to go on from this moment, for it is not an end to the journey; it is our point of departure. It is why we in this Chamber, irrespective of Party or ideology and notwithstanding our differences in other matters, should seek in this regard to stand together united and to seize the opportunity to build upon the Accord a stronger Canada, a better Canada. Thanks to Meech Lake, the people of Canada—British Columbians, Albertans, New Brunswickers, Nova Scotians, and Quebecers, whatever language they speak—will once more stand united together. Thanks to the Accord, they and their children can look in expectation and hope toward a new and more promising future for themselves and for their country, secure in the knowledge that Canada will not only survive but will flourish. We, their deputies, should do no less.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to join in this debate. Shortly after I was first elected as a Member of Parliament in 1962, we had a tremendous extension of the rights of French-speaking people in Quebec to the use of their language and to the protection of their culture through a whole series of studies, a number of important pieces of legislation being enacted, and the bringing back of the Constitution. This helped make clear the role of the Province of Quebec. In all those debates and discussions, members of the New Democratic Party supported the expansion and the extension of the rights of the people of Quebec because we recognized, beginning at our founding convention in 1961, that the accommodation of Quebec in a federal Canadian state was a necessity if Canada was to continue to grow and to develop.

• (1600)

At our founding convention in 1961, we recognized the linguistic duality of Canada. Indeed, our resolution passed in 1961 foreshadowed the Official Languages Act which was finally passed in 1969.

I would like Hon. Members to remember that in those years when we gave this support to the Province of Quebec and particularly to the French-speaking people of Quebec, we did it because we knew that it was necessary. We did it because we knew that it was right. There were no political gains for us in taking that position. In those days, and indeed until very recently, we had very little support in the Province of Quebec or in Francophone communities outside Quebec.

While we were taking that position, we were subjected to a great deal of criticism and opposition from English-speaking Canada and indeed from many people who supported us for our views on social and economic matters. What we did was not done for political gain then, and what we are doing now, I submit, is not being done for political gain now.

I remember in the debates during the 1960s the attacks and criticisms which our Party faced from all across the country and to which I had to respond. I represent one of the most ethnic constituencies in Canada. In my constituency, there are people from every ethnic group residing in Canada, although there are very few Francophones. They were worried, and some are still worried, about what we have done in our desire to accommodate and make more comfortable and supportive of Canada the people of Quebec.

When the Liberal Government under Mr. Pearson established the Bilingualism and Biculturalism Commission, we supported it. When that commission brought down its report and made recommendations, we supported those recommendations. Indeed, the minority report submitted by Dr. Rudnyckyj, a Ukrainian member of the commission, urged support for the language and culture of the one third of the Canadian people who are neither Anglophones nor Francophones. The first Member of Parliament to support the suggestions made by Dr. Rudnyckyj was my friend, a former colleague in the House, Mr. Edward Schreyer. That is our record.

In 1981, when the then Prime Minister proposed that we bring the Constitution back to Canada, we supported him. We did more than support him, we joined with all the groups, the native groups, the women's groups, the ethnic groups, the handicapped groups, and forced the then Government to make major improvements in the Charter of Rights which we now have.

I look on our support for Meech Lake, though I have some reservations about it with which I will try to deal, as a natural outgrowth of everything we have done up until now. I resent—and I will put on the record why—the charge that somehow, by supporting Meech Lake, we are supporting a diminution in the ability of the federal Government to bring forward necessary social and economic programs.

There is no Member of Parliament who would be more opposed to any suggestion that we do anything to diminish the power of the federal Government than I. After all, we have a proud history in Winnipeg. It was the then Member of Parliament for Winnipeg North Centre, Mr. Woodsworth, supported by the then Member of Parliament for Winnipeg North, the constituency I now represent, Mr. Heaps, who forced in 1926 the then Leader of the Liberal Party, Mr. Mackenzie King, into bringing in the first old age security pension legislation. Mr. King had promised it for years but did nothing about it until he needed the support of the Members from Winnipeg to become Prime Minister.

It was New Democratic Members of Parliament, I among them, who, in the minority Parliament of 1972-73, forced the then Liberal Government to bring in legislation which provided for regular adjustments upward to the Old Age Pension and the Canada Pension Plans so that benefits would rise every three months as the cost of living rises. No longer are these improvements to the programs which are so important to millions of Canadians brought in only at the whim of some Government when it thinks it will get some political credit for it. I could not support any proposal which would reduce the ability of the federal Government to deal with social and economic needs.

It has been charged that the Meech Lake agreement as it is now will hinder the federal Government, restrict its power to spend and lead to the end of national cost-shared programs. We do not believe that and many of the witnesses, including many of the constitutional lawyers who appeared before the committee which held hearings on the Meech Lake Accord, did not agree with that. They said in fact that the spending power of the federal Government is now stronger than ever.

Their views were also, incidentally and significantly, the views of the members of the Parti Québécois in the National Assembly of Quebec when that Assembly debated this question.

The federal spending power means that Ottawa has the ability to set up programs in areas that the Constitution says are the exclusive field of provincial Governments. We believe it is a very powerful extension of the federal Government's power. The Accord, we believe, gives this power explicit constitutional status for the first time. It would allow Parliament to create a new child care program, for example, and set out specific national objectives for that program. The provinces would have to take part in and share the costs of such a program or set up their own such program. However, they would only receive federal funds if the provincial program was "compatible with the national objectives set by Parliament."

That view has been attacked by many people. One of the most vociferous opponents of the Meech Lake Accord, using the argument that the federal Government's power will be greatly diminished, is former Prime Minister Trudeau. He asked whether Canada would have the capacity in its national Government to mount new national programs. We say: Just a minute, who is this expert to ask that question? After all, before Mr. Trudeau became Prime Minister Canada had established joint programs which gave universal coverage for hospital care to all Canadians, medical care, and provided a greatly expanded post-secondary education program in our universities, community colleges and technical schools. These came about because federal Governments, Liberal and Conservative, said to the provinces, "If you will join with us in establishing and maintaining these programs, we are prepared to pay 50 per cent of the cost as a minimum. For those have-not provinces like the Atlantic provinces, Manitoba and Saskatchewan, we will pay even more." Some of the provinces came in to these programs kicking and screaming. I remember how the then Premier of Ontario, Mr. Robarts, fought hard not to join the medical insurance plan. However, the provinces came in and the programs were a great success. All Canadians are proud of them.

What happened when this supposed great defender of federal powers, Mr. Trudeau, was the Prime Minister? There came a time when the federal Government was facing deficits and they were growing. The cost of the shared-cost programs I have mentioned were increasing rapidly. Mr. Trudeau's Government then brought forward legislation which changed the way in which these programs were funded. It said to the provinces, "We are going to put a cap on the money we will pay for these programs. We will not increase our contribution each year by an amount more than the increase in the cost of living. It does not matter that the cost of these programs is rising much faster than that, we are going to limit the amount we pay".

His Government also said to the provinces that they no longer had to match federal funds for these programs. "We are going to give you this money for health care, hospital insurance and post-secondary education in a lump sum and you can do with it what you want".

What happened when that proposal was debated in the House? Of course, every Liberal voted for it. If I remember correctly, and I think I do, every Conservative voted for it. The only Members who spoke against it, the only Members who voted against it, the only Members who warned the Government that the provinces might very well decide there was more political mileage in building roads than in funding hospitals, were members of our Party, the New Democrats. Yet our advice was ignored, we were voted down, and what we predicted happened.

We do not need advice from a Prime Minister responsible for the biggest diminution of federal government power in the 25 years I have been here, and perhaps in the last 100 years. What his Government did at that time you cannot blame on Meech Lake. The blame lies squarely, as I have indicated, at the door of the then Liberal Government and the support it got from the then Conservative Opposition.

Yet this same former Prime Minister who is now so concerned about the diminution of federal power and jurisdiction, before he came to Ottawa as a Member of Parliament, before he became the Prime Minister, in his role as a constitutional lawyer, was very clear about what he thought about the division of powersbetween our Governments. He put it very clearly in his book entitled Federalism and French Canadians. That book was a collection of essays by Mr. Trudeau and he writes there approvingly that education is a provincial responsibility only and draws the following conclusion:

> Consequently, if there is federal legislation to grant taxation money for provincial purposes, this legislation is illegal for the excellent reason that the federal government cannot by law have money in its coffers which it then claims should be used for provincial purposes.

So much for Mr. Trudeau's supposedly principled opposition to this Accord and the opposition expressed by a number of Liberal Members in this debate.

As a New Democrat I believe that Meech Lake continues the process of accommodating Quebec in a dynamic Canada. This agreement will bring Quebec to sign the new Constitution, and that is for me a very powerful argument in its favour.

We do not give unanimous approval to this agreement. We believe that it has a number of omissions and a number of faults. We certainly believe it was a major error to require the agreement of all 10 provinces and the federal Government in order for either the Yukon or the Northwest Territories to become a province at some time in the future. We believe the rights of the aboriginal people should be spelled out much more clearly than they are, including the right to a form of self-government. We believe the equality rights for women should be much more specifically spelled out.

We have concerns, yet these concerns about our ethnic communities, and others can be addressed in the future when discussions will take place between the federal Government, the provinces and many of the groups who believe their rights have not been dealt with in the Meech Lake Accord. However, despite those omissions, despite these feelings, we believe on the whole that the Meech Lake Agreement follows logically on the process which began in the early 1960s, and we intend to support it.

Mr. Caldwell: Mr. Speaker, I appreciated the comments of the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). He has served a long term in the House of Commons and recalls personally some of the historical things that have happened here.

I was somewhat concerned when he was referring to Prime Ministers. I lost track from time to time of which Prime Minister he was referring to. Some of the comments he made were not very complimentary, but I do not think those were meant for the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney).

The Member did not say how he feels about the consultation process with the provinces with regard to the appointment of Senators and Supreme Court judges. Does he believe that this is a downgrading or weakening of the central Government? Does he not think that the provinces should have the right to recommend people who should be appointed to the Senate or as Supreme Court judges?

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I have been puzzled about the criticisms made of the idea contained in the Meech Lake Accord that the provinces should have some say on the appointment of Senators and Supreme Court judges. I make it very clear that I am not a lawyer, but I understand that until now the appointment of Senators and Supreme Court judges has been the sole prerogative of the Prime Minister in office when vacancies arise. To be very candid, I have often wondered why certain appointments were made.

Let us assume that a vacancy will come open in the Province of Manitoba in the next month or so. The Government of the Province of Manitoba would submit two, three, or four names to fill that vacancy. I presume that if the federal Government were not willing to appoint any of those on the list, it would tell the province that and ask for other suggestions. First, I do not think that the power of the federal Government and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) is diminished. Second, I think consultation is a good idea.

I take the same view with regard to the Supreme Court. One need only look at the U.S. Supreme Court to see how opposed judges can be on many issues. I am not at all convinced that all the common sense and brains reside in whoever is Prime Minister or Minister of Justice.

I foresee real benefits resulting from the provinces making suggestions. I can think of a recent appointment to a court in Manitoba which I am sure would not have been made had the Government of Manitoba had any say in the matter.

(2) An agreement that has the force of law under subsection (1) shall have effect only so long and so far as it is not repugnant to any provision of an Act of the Parliament of Canada that sets national standards and objectives relating to immigration or aliens, including any provision that establishes general classes of immigrants or relates to levels of immigration for Canada or that prescribes classes of individuals who are inadmissible into Canada.

CITATION

17. This amendment may be cited as the Constitution Amendment, 1987.

And the amendments of Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra) (p.9585), Mr. Broadbent (p.9586), Mr. Caccia (p.9644), and Mr. Allmand (p.9644).

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, this debate on the Constitution ranks for me as the most important issue with which I have had to grapple in my first three years as the Member of Parliament for York West. I say that because this resolution will drastically reshape the way in which our country will be governed and severely impact upon our major federal institutions. Moreover, the Accord serves to define who we are as Canadians. This debates is indeed about our nationhood and about what constitutes a federation. This debate, in the end, is about Canada, its people, and our collective future.

Constitutional reform is no easy feat. Our history is dotted with efforts to change our Constitution, some of those efforts successful, others less successful. However, all were difficult and all were emotionally charged. Yet, the measure of any constitutional reform is not merely in its introduction but in the success and favour it enjoys among the population at large, in the affirmation that it embodies the spirit and aspirations of its citizens.

Toward this end, I am troubled by Meech Lake. After considerable examination and discussion I believe that Meech Lake does not enjoy the support and confidence of the wide spectrum of Canadians, nor does it inspire an enthusiastic and patriotic approval for the vision that it articulates. It is my belief that Meech Lake places Canada in more precarious waters.

While I am troubled with several substantial elements contained in Meech Lake, I am also uncomfortable with and ashamed of the process, which gave birth to this document. I would like to address my opening comments first to the process and follow that with commentary on the substantive elements of the Accord.

The absence of any true public input in the development of this resolution is a national tragedy. The package was not only assembled and hastily ratified in secret by the First Ministers, it was accomplished by marathon talks which continued into the early hours of the morning—two characteristics which are certainly not conducive to drafting the most essential piece of legislation governing Canada which is expected to meet the aspirations of all Canadians and the tests of time and circumstance.

To further aggravate the situation, the public hearings before the joint parliamentary committee were held during the summer months, the worst possible time of the year for any Government to encourage the participation, involvement and attention of Canadians. In addition, before the first witness had a chance to appear before the committee, government spokespersons made it painfully clear that the government-dominated committee would not be in any mood to accept any changes or consider any amendments. For once, unfortunately, the Government kept its word.

We saw the spectacle of individual Canadians and an impressive spectrum of organizations representing various constituencies travelling to the nation's capital to provide Members of Parliament and Senators with very moving and passionate presentations of their vision of Canada and of their dreams. All of these efforts counted for absolutely nothing.

Canadians did not have a meaningful opportunity to share their dreams and their wishes for their country. This is a staggering and remarkable shortcoming because this stage in our constitutional evolution as a nation excluded the very people whom our Constitution is to serve and protect. There was no partnership. There was no give and take. The process was secret and dictatorial. It was a take-it-or-leave-it proposition from start to finish.

This approach, unfortunately, also gripped the elected Chamber. It was regrettable that many Members of Parliament of all stripes responded to those seeking changes and improvements by alleging that they were anti-Quebec or by promoting the concept that the inclusion of a new clause or the amendment of a current clause would scuttle the entire deal. The language and strategy used assumed that if the Accord could not convince Members on its own merit there was a need to intimidate individuals into accepting the Accord's version of Canada. This tack was not only unfortunate and misleading, it also depicted an air of desperation and insecurity as well as an attitude which was prepared to tolerate glaring and recognizable shortcomings in the Accord.

I am fully committed to having Quebec's signature on our Constitution. I appreciate the desires of Quebecers to enjoy the pride that comes with that signature. I understand the emotion of wanting to be an integral part of the constitutional family. Yet am I and others to be faulted for having passionate feelings about Canada? Am I to be faulted for having concerns about the type of country we are to become? Am I to be faulted for wanting our Parliament to respond to the voices of concern or the wants of Canadians to improve and build upon our strengths and foundation? Am I to be faulted for feeling that a constitutional package which is insecure and weak in the face of criticism and which would unravel because of some amendments should not be allowed to proceed until it is properly fortified?

We are talking about the Constitution of Canada. In my opinion, we, as a proud and dynamic nation, should not be content with a mediocre Constitution, one that is left unprotected from the attacks of unfulfilled expectations on the part of Canadians.

While I recognize that perfection is clearly for another world, we should fully utilize the unique window in time that this moment offers us toward ensuring that we follow our best instincts, that we seek to protect the rights of all citizens, and that we make all Canadians constitutionally relevant.

The time to bridge the gaps of our society through our constitutional framework is now. Let us not in a cowardly way dispose of difficult decisions involving, for instance, our multicultural character, our aboriginal character, the rights facing women or the rights facing Francophones outside the Province of Quebec, to future constitutional talks. If we detect wrongs today, it is equally unjust for us to say as a Parliament that we will right those wrongs tomorrow, particularly if one considers the proposed unanimity provisions in the current Accord. That is why I fully support and endorse the eleven Liberal amendments that were proposed at the committee stage and during this debate by my Leader and my colleagues. Without these modifications the Meech Lake Accord will be a weak and insecure document. Without these modifications I cannot and will not vote for the present Meech Lake Accord.

I must say also that in face of perhaps irresponsible allegations that may come my way in terms of being branded anti-Quebec, or those who will interpret my vote as a non-confidence vote against my Leader, of which both are clearly untrue, this position is neither enjoyable nor easy.

I remain fully convinced, however, that these amendments are worth fighting for right to the very end. I believe Canada and, in fact, Quebec would be the better for it and these amendments would clearly articulate on behalf of what I believe to be a majority of Canadians a vision for a strong and united Canada, cemented by a central Government that would not be compromised or paralyzed in acting for or defending the national interest.

With regard to the specific elements of the Accord, while I endorse and view my Party's 11 amendments as essential, I am particularly disturbed by two overriding flaws. One could be categorized as the human element of the Accord. It is the exclusion of our multicultural and aboriginal realities and heritages. Second are the elements of our nationhood as a consequence of implementing a concept of a distinct society for Quebec and a more aggressive decentralization of federal powers.

In relation to the human element, I believe the Accord fails to adopt and promote a full definition of the term "Canadian". Quite frankly, not all the people of this country have been dealt the same constitutional card, nor have they been equally credited with being a dignified and contributing part of this country.

The opening clause of this Accord only recognizes the French-English linguistic duality as a fundamental characteristic of the country. This is absolutely true but it is also very much incomplete.

I fully recognize the historical facet of our two founding peoples and how this country came to be. I value my country's history and respect those sacrifices and the courage which made it possible for me to live in such a privileged society. Yet the definition advocated by Meech Lake is not only outdated, it is primarily satisfied with only depicting our people's past and our country's history.

In my opinion, the Constitution must also address the present and future realities of our people and our country, without denying anyone their proper place. It must express the complete fabric of Canadian society and, toward this end, the Accord fails fundamentally and adequately to recognize those Canadians whose origins are neither English nor French.

At the very outset of the resolution it fails to acknowledge our multicultural and aboriginal heritages. I am indeed puzzled at the reason for which the aspirations and pride of close to one-third of our Canadian population were ignored and so clearly undervalued. I cannot understand the Government's stubborn refusal to accept an amendment put forward by our Party which would permit the opening clause to define accurately the term "Canadian", for it is only by recognizing the four cornerstones of our country's living heritage—the French, the English, the multicultural and the aboriginal facts—that we will capture the complete and rich essence that gives life to the term "Canadianism". Falling short of that definition is paramount to denying the reality which is Canada.

If the Government does not want to express that definition, then what is it to say to those Canadians whose origins are neither English nor French, and who feel the isolation of being left out? I am one of those Canadians, and I do not feel, according to Section 1, that I am as constitutionally relevant as my French Canadian or English Canadian colleagues in this House of Commons, for instance. I do not accept that while they can be recognized in Section 1 I must accept to be in Section 16 at the very end of the Accord, and that I must be thankful and patient because before the Langevin round of discussions the reference to multiculturalism was totally absent from the first Meech Lake draft.

In defence, the Government has responded that multicultural and aboriginal rights are adequately protected by Section 16 and that their specific place in the resolution is not significant. However, would the Government accept a reversal in the order of Section 1 and Section 16? If the order is in fact insignificant, would the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) agree to open the Meech Lake Accord with the contents of Section 16 and place at the very end of the Accord the reality of our linguistic duality? I do not believe so, nor should he, because a separate reference to our multicultural and aboriginal heritage apart from that of the English-French duality categorizes and fuels the sentiments of second class citizenship in many quarters of this country.

When many Canadians look at this Accord and see that they are not provided with a dignified place to stand, how can we as legislators be pleased with such a fundamental flaw regarding the people of this country?

If we were to take the steps to rectify this shortcoming, what is the price we would have to pay? Would it cause the collapse of the Accord? Would Premiers who actively promote and defend multiculturalism within their own provinces object to such an amendment? Would Premier Bourassa walk away when the dilemma facing ethnocultural Canadians is perhaps the greatest in his province, where much of the debate concerning culture and linguistic identify is primarily focused between the Anglophone and Francophone communities, leaving those who are members of neither community in total confusion?

No, I am not prepared to rationalize the opening clause of the Accord as an accurate definition of Canadians. No Canadian citizen should be treated as a tenant in his or her own country. We are all owners of this land. We all love Canada and are prepared to defend it. Therefore, let our Constitution reciprocate to its people by profoundly and fiercely confirming our bilingual and multicultural characteristics in the opening section of the Accord.

In regard to the second aspect, the element of nationhood, I remain uncomfortable with legislating the concept of a distinct society for the Province of Quebec within the Canadian federation. That Quebec and its people are of different and distinct character, there can be no doubt. That Quebec has a unique culture which is and should be a matter of great affection, I do not question. That they cherish and wish to promote that uniqueness, I do not wish to deny anyone. But to realize all these things, by stipulating through the basic fundamental Constitution of the country that the province constitutes a distinct society, I believe is wrong and dangerous for Canada.

For me, it sets up two kinds of Canada. If Quebec is a distinct society, what does that make the rest of Canada? It is wrong because it places in question the priority of the term "Canadian" versus the term "Quebecer" for citizens living in the Province of Quebec. It is wrong for it legislates that distinctiveness at the expense of the other nine provinces and the two territories whose people also may feel, perhaps for different but nonetheless for legitimate reasons, that unique historical forces have led to a different brand of Canadianism in that part of our country.

I am troubled by the resulting transfer of that legal and symbolic power, and because the energies and actions spent in achieving that newly acquired status will be drained from the whole, from our country, from Canada. This transaction could perhaps show a credit for Quebec's political bank account, but it would leave a very large and looming debit in Canada's bank account which would only weaken and diminish the national fabric.

I also fear the consequences facing future generations of new Canadians who will be coming to this country for they will possibly be introduced to a greater provincial patriotism, stronger than that for the nation. In the proposed immigration sections the federal Government will withdraw from its reception and integration services for immigrants and pass this responsibility on to the provinces. Thus the Accord rather than integrating our immigrants as new Canadians will, first and foremost, create new Ontarians and new Albertans and would undermine the full value of citizenship which formulates emotional ties to the nation and the newcomer, and kindles a patriotic love of Canada and of country.

In terms of nationhood, I also question the spending power provisions that would permit provinces to withdraw with compensation from national shared-cost programs. Under such a constitutional scheme, would we have enjoyed a national unemployment insurance program, or a national medicare plan? Will we as a country be able to consider implementing and launching a national day care program or a national guaranteed annual income under these current provisions?

I believe that if we have to err, if we have to side with either a strong national Government or greater independence for provinces on the major programs and services that we as Canadians deem essential and very much part of our social and economic contract with our country, then the option clearly should be in favour of the former. If we want economic, social, educational, and health-related programs to work equally for all Canadians; if we demand that a federal Government meet the domestic and international developments that come our way; if we are to address the homeless, the food banks, the ill and the challengess facing our youth and our older members of society, then we cannot afford provisions in a Constitution that compromise the ability of a national Government to create national-based programs which are rooted in quality and equality regardless of where those Canadians live.

In conclusion, whether one considers the great nation-building moments of our history, whether those moments were the patriation of our Constitution, the establishment of our Charter of Rights and Freedoms, or the creation of our own flag and our own anthem, those moments were made possible by men and women who not only exhibited a great breath of vision but also demonstrated the political courage to follow, and while accepting changes and genuinely involving Canadians in their dreams and their aspirations, pursued that vision to its successful ends.

Would there have been these great moments if our political forefathers, in the face of difficult decisions, had accepted a mediocre version of their vision by passing on the more difficult and unresolved challenges to future elected representatives and future Parliaments? It is obvious that if that were the prevailing attitude of the time, then these great moments would have been lost to the entire country. Therefore, let us not, as the thirty-third Parliament, lose this moment to put in place a Constitution which truly speaks to the best instincts and expectations of our people.

Also, as our sovereignty as a nation is under attack by such external forces as free trade with all its implications, let us not at the very same time threaten from within the sovereignty entrusted in a strong, national Government that is capable of rising above parochial, regional and provincial demands to speak up on behalf of all regions of the country and of all Canadians. While we should not and cannot allow Ronald Reagan to speak for Canada on the international stage, it is equally true that we should not and cannot allow ten, seven or six Premiers to set the national agenda for Canada. It makes one wonder who was speaking for Canada at the Meech Lake table. What powers did all the people gain through an enhanced federal Government acting on their behalf?

Finally, if Quebec is the principal concern, as is legitimate, how are we really encouraging Quebec to be a signatory to our Canadian Constitution? It seems to me, when I analyse a distinct society from the national perspective, that it forces the withdrawal of Francophones deeper into Quebec, the Anglophones into the depths of the nine other provinces, and leaves those who are neither Anglophone nor Francophone still striving to find their place. The result not only cheapens a true and full definition of bilingualism and a real involvement by Quebecers in the national life of Canada, but it also encourages and inspires the growth of a rival and competing nationalism.

I cannot therefore place my vote of confidence in Meech Lake. My vote in opposition is a vote in favour of a Constitution which would have our nation's unwavering support and confidence and a vote in favour of a citizenry that is all equal, living in a country that is united, strong, able and capable to withstand any forces tthat may want to undermine it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Are there questions or comments?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has listed several reasons for his unwillingness to support the Meech Lake Accord. I wonder if he would indicate to the House what is his principal objection.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure if the Minister was in the Chamber for my entire speech, but I mentioned three essential elements that I am troubled with and, in fact, with which my own constituents are troubled. I do not think the process that gave birth to the Meech Lake Accord included a partnership and a spirit of trying to work with the dreams and aspirations of all Canadians in a genuine way. I then proceeded to suggest that two overriding concerns troubled me. They are, first, the question of leaving out in the very first section the human elements that define what it means to be a Canadian. If we are to have an opening clause which sets the groundwork for defining what is Canada and what are Canadians, in terms of fundamental characteristics, then I believe as a Canadian, and not necessarily as a Member of Parliament, that there are four cornerstones that give life to the meaning of the word "Canadian". Those cornerstones are defined by four facts: the English, the French, the multicultural, and the aboriginal. For me to suggest that the opening section should define the fundamental characteristics of Canada as a linguistic duality, which is true and undeniable, is inaccurate and incomplete.

• (1650)

I urged the Government in Question Period and in debate, and I do so now, to move the extra mile and include those other two cornerstones in order that we may have a proper, full, and vibrant definition of what it means to be Canadian. In that manner, we will not allow a Canadian who is perhaps of Greek origin, or an individual from the aboriginal communities, to pass on to future generations the perception within himself that somehow he is on the outside, that there is a separate category or distinction between citizens in Canada. That is my first objection, the question of the human flaw in defining the word "Canadian".

Second—and the Minister was in the House for the latter part of my speech—I am most uncomfortable and have trouble with legislating the question of a distinct society. I do not deny the uniqueness of the linguistic, cultural, historical, and sociological perspective that Quebecers bring to Canada, that Albertans bring to Canada, and that other Canadians from other regions of the country bring to Canada. But to legislate in our Constitution a distinct society leads me to worry about what the rest of the country is in relation to that distinctiveness. I believe that that distinctiveness is arrived at to the detriment of other provinces. I believe that we would be able to achieve what Quebecers long for in terms of being a whole and an integral part of our Constitution without submitting to the distinct society section. The strain on the entire Canadian federation is too great to withstand.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I have a brief question which will allow a brief answer.

Does the Hon. Member believe that Quebec is a distinct society within Canada?

Mr. Marchi: No, I do not believe that it constitutes a distinct society.

I stated very clearly that it has a distinct character and identity, as do Albertans when one crosses the Rockies, or as do Maritimers when one visits them in their communities. In our country there have been forces which have led to different brands of Canadianism. I accept that, and I am prepared to promote that. As a Member of Parliament I am not prepared to suggest that Canadians in the Province in Quebec should be legislated as a distinct society when no other Canadians will be able to or would wish to have a distinct society for themselves within this country. The bigger question then becomes, if you favour a distinct society for Quebec, what does that make the rest of Canada? Therefore, are we not talking about two Canadas, two communities that gave rise to the community of communities which was rejected by most Canadians?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Not by most.

Mr. McMillan: I listened to the speech of the Hon. Member very carefully. He began his remarks by saying that the Meech Lake debate in the House is the most important one in which he has been engaged in the three years since he has been a Member of Parliament. The Hon. Member went on to say that the subject matter defines fundamentally one's perspective of the country as a whole.

In light of the fact that he is at odds with his Leader and his Party on the subject, is that not more than just a difference of opinion on one issue, but rather a fundamental rupture between himself, his Leader, and his Party?

Mr. Gormley: A huge rupture.

Mr. Marchi: When I stated that this debate is the most fundamental one that I have faced, I meant it. I do not think we have ever had before us an issue, a piece of legislation, or a resolution that served to define who we are as a people, and what we are as a nation. There have been suggestions by a certain number of individuals that stated that if one cannot accept voting in favour of an unamended Meech Lake Accord, perhaps one would be able to abstain or not be present in the House during the vote. I am not prepared to do that. I would rather respect an individual who, despite my beliefs, votes in favour of the current Meech Lake Accord for his or her principles, rather than an individual who, as a federal politician addressing the Constitution of his or her country, walks away from that debate.

The manner in which I look at and approach this debate is not whether I am in concert with my Leader or with my Party, because ultimately the only difference that separates the two is essentially that I am prepared to stand with our amendments to the very end. I believe that those amendments are fundamentally correct and essential, if we are to improve the Meech Lake document. I believe that they are worth fighting for.

In light of those circumstances, I will not allow a Member to suggest that somehow I cannot feel passionate about my country and about fellow Canadians when I have been elected to do that very thing. I do not view it as a question of partisanship against my Leader or against some of my colleagues who will vote in a different manner. I believe that I have to live with my community and my conscience. I have to listen to the aspirations that I come into contact with. At the end of the day, I have to live with myself and make sure within myself that my position will be on the right side of history.

I respect that there are deep emotional divisions on all sides of the House. I am sure that there are members of the Government who are on the Hon. Member's side. I do not believe that the Hon. Member would rise and ask his colleagues why they are voting against the Prime Minister, the Cabinet, and the entire Government. I think that he will respect that those Members who will stand up against Meech Lake are not standing up against the Prime Minister, instead they are standing up for a different vision of this country. They should be allowed to stand up and speak up for that vision, and I make no apology for doing so.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, there are only a few seconds left. I wonder if I may be considered to have begun my remarks, and call it five o'clock? I would have the floor when debate resumes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 5 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

THE ADMINISTRATION

ADVISABILITY OF ESTABLISHING PARLIAMENTARY REVIEW OF GOVERNOR IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENTS

Mr. Ernie Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of establishing a mechanism for the parliamentary review and approval of appointments proposed by the Governor in Council.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to debate Motion M-39. I appreciate the opportunity that it gives me to consider the principle of review by Members of the House of Commons in committee of order in council appointments made by this Government and succeeding Governments.

The Standing Orders of the House have been revised to make provision for something in the direction of the action that this motion calls for. The change in the Standing Orders that was made in 1986 is sufficiently limited that it is important for us to consider the question further.

I regret that this was not chosen to become a votable motion. I think it would be very useful to the present Government, Parliament, and to the people of Canada if it had been possible for Members of the House individually in their own understanding of the manner in which the Government of Canada should be conducted to have the opportunity to express themselves on the question. The principle is a very simple one. The principle is that order in council appointments occur in large numbers. Appointments to offices as diverse as judicial appointments, appointments of Deputy Ministers who do so much to direct the affairs of the Government of Canada, appointments of officers of Parliament, appointments of persons to such offices as the Chairman of the Canadian Human Rights Commission and the official languages commissionership, and so on, are of enormous importance to the good government of the country. These appointments are made with very little scrutiny and all too often end up under the cloud, or certainly under the umbrella which can cast a cloud upon the appointments, of the system of political patronage which has been basic to the Government of Canada and to parliamentary government. I will say more about it later, indicating why I think the principle is important and why I believe the Government should give serious consideration to the principle which has been put forward in Motion M-39.

• (1700)

Since the present context is important to the discussion, I note that two of the Standing Orders of the House of Commons dating from February 24, 1986 provide for, as is indicated in the headline, "Review of Order in Council Appointments". Standing Order 103 provides for the laying upon the Table of a certified copy of an Order in Council indicating the appointment of persons to certain non-judicial posts. I also note that both paragraphs of Standing Order 103 provide for non-judicial appointments to be made subject to some review by having the Minister lay upon the Table a copy of the appointment order.

Standing Order 104 reads in part:

The committee specified pursuant to Standing Orders 67(5) and 103, during the period of thirty sitting days provided pursuant to Standing Order 103, shall if it deems it appropriate, call the so named appointee or nominee to appear before it during a period not exceeding ten sitting days.

It continues:

The committee, if it should call an appointment or nominee to appear pursuant to section (1) of this Standing Order, shall examine the qualifications and competence of the appointee or nominee to perform the duties of the post to which he or she has been appointed or nominated.

The third paragraph restricts the time during which this consideration takes place to the end of the 10-day sitting period provided in the first paragraph.

It is quite a constrained review which is provided for in Standing Orders 103 and 104. Of course the vital point is that there is not any opportunity for members of the committee to provide not only advice but their consent to the appointment being proposed or the appointment that has been made. In effect it is a review without any power to reverse the decision or any opportunity for Members of Parliament to veto an appointment which could conceivably be a flagrant case of political patronage, such as appointing someone without any real qualification to a position. Yet, committee members, having looked at the person, have to say that they do not think it is a proper appointment but they cannot do anything about it. That is the present situation under Standing Orders 103 and 104.

These particular Standing Orders do not follow the recommendations of the so-called McGrath committee on the reform of Parliament which considered a great variety of matters that have been implemented in changing the governance of the House, the operations of the committees, and so on. A variety of changes have been made to the better functioning of the Parliament of Canada and to the better conduct of the business of the Government of Canada.

The committee, in chapter five of its third report on the scrutiny of order in council appointments, looked to a more significant review than the Standing Orders have provided. The special committee's consideration of these matters reached a diversity of offices—to Deputy Ministers, to Crown corporations, and to regulatory agencies.

The committee was guided by a number of principles which I want to cite. The first one is that the primary purpose of the nomination procedure is to seek out and facilitate appointment of the best possible people. The second principle is that it is vital to the health of a political system that the public look upon public appointments as more than political patronage. However, the committee felt, as the third principle suggests, that there were good reasons for excluding some appointments from any political scrutiny process. It suggested in the fourth principle that some appointments required different degrees of scrutiny from others, so it suggested a diversity of procedures which should be applied to the various offices.

The recommendations of the special committee which looked at parliamentary institutions and considered reform of them, these proposals to extend the power of Private Members of the House of Commons to make the House of Commons work more effectively, are the kinds of principles I am pressing in this particular debate. To say that I am pressing them is to say that I think we should look a good deal further than the Standing Orders have provided and perhaps even than the McGrath committee recommended.

I am encouraged in such thoughts by the words of the Chairman of the committee who, in speaking to the Canadian Regional Conference of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, something over a month after the third report was tabled in June, 1985, had some observations on this particular concern. At one point in his speech in Quebec City he said that the movement to scrutinize appointments was symptomatic of the frustration felt by many Private Members with regard to their power vis-à-vis the power of the executive. He went on to say that while their recommendations represented a fundamental change in our system, they determined that they could not tamper to any great extent with the principle of the Government being responsible and accountable to Parliament. He went on to say: "Above all the Government must be allowed to govern".

I suggest, with great respect to this past Hon. Member of the House who now of course is the Hon. Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Newfoundland, that the principle here should not have been that the Government must be allowed to govern, but that the Government should be required to govern in the public interest.

If that were to be the guiding principle, let me expand on what I mean by applying a modification to the situation before us of order in council appointments. We have an historical development to appreciate. We have the reality that government by the monarch or government of the Crown in Great Britain and in the colonies where self-government was achieved—and in Canada we talk about responsible government as the term for it—was a government in which the power of the monarch or the Crown was taken over by the Leader of the Party which succeeded in winning the most seats in an election. What happened behind the façade of the Crown—and this is still in fact carried on behind that façade as a symbol of the Government of Canada, of the Governments of the provinces, and of other government units of the Commonwealth—is that the Leader of the majority Party who has been successful in persuading the electors of the country or a province to elect his or her fellow candidates in an election achieves as far-reaching a power as the Crown is capable of exercising.

The responsible government reality is that these Members gather in the House of Commons. The majority forms the Government. The Leader chooses the Members to form Cabinet, but of course they are subject to our scrutiny and questioning in the House of Commons every sitting day. We are profoundly grateful to the parliamentary evolution of which we are now the heirs, that Members who become Ministers are here and are subject to our questioning day by day.

• (1710)

The Canadian House of Commons particularly expresses this practice in a vigorous way, sometimes in a way that the Speaker finds it difficult to control. Ministers do not have any idea who will be asking questions and what they may be about other than that they are sensitive to the issues of the day. They are, however, briefed on issues of the day. We have here a vigorous process of questioning of Ministers as to conduct of the Government of Canada. Though Members have their own opinions as to the adequacy of the answers given or, I suppose, to the insight that characterizes the questions being asked, Canadians—as our news broadcasts, particularly our television broadcasts, demonstrate night after night when the House is sitting—have a vigorous scrutiny of the Government of Canada.

Yet the Hon. James McGrath in his speech said that Private Members feel a frustration when they contemplate the executive, the Deputy Ministers, the Crown agencies at further reach, Crown corporations, commissioners and so on who are responsible to Ministers in the House, when we think of the various persons who are responsible for the implementation of the country's legislation, for ensuring that the Government of Canada is well conducted. When Private Members try to scrutinize these actions, they find themselves quite frustrated.

Here I want to recognize one very important reality. Though the Ministers themselves are here in the House subject to questioning and expected to respond to questions from other Members of the House, the Deputy Ministers, who are their subordinates, ostensibly in the nature of things may very well feel themselves even more subject to the Privy Council office, conceivably to Treasury Board. They may feel themselves subject to very few, persons in the conduct of government.

In the practice of our Government, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) has become the uncrowned monarch. The Prime Minister, choosing a Clerk of the Privy Council and choosing with advice the Deputy Ministers of government and having a leading role in choosing others who receive order in council appointments, exercises his authority under a system that may not be very far removed from the reality of 200 years ago. King George III was active 200 years ago in Great Britain working to create a parliamentary coalition to produce enough votes to back up his Ministers and his Government. When we have the Prime Minister as uncrowned king making appointments which are in his power through the Cabinet, which he controls so largely, we have a system of government which may not be very far removed from the autocratic government, a government unchecked by parliamentary institution, which once prevailed in England before the parliamentary evolution of the 19th century.

Because we have persons who are responsible primarily to the Prime Minister or to the Clerk of the Privy Council—in the case of Deputy Ministers and other people who issue reports who occasionally may appear in the public eye but do not experience very much in the way of scrutiny by way of Members of Parliament—these are realities that have moved me to suggest that we look far beyond Standing Orders 103 and 104 and even beyond the McGrath committee and its recommendations for scrutiny. We should recognize the advisability of having scrutiny in committee that opens a genuine advise and consent possibility in which members of the committee can consider rejecting an appointment or advising against it or, in short, vetoing the appointment.

That suggestion will arouse concern in some minds because of the American situation. Members of Congress have far-reaching powers of review of potential appointees. These days they are considering a nominee to the Supreme Court of the United States, an appointee who may well not be appointed, though the President of the United States would will it if he possibly could. In those cases we see a most rigorous process of review.

The argument that I have been making on the basis of British constitutional principles applied in Canada and in other units of the Commonwealth is the development of parliamentary government. We can make an argument for this further development of responsibility and power, if you will, of Members of Parliament as individuals in committee. Committees will still be constructed according to the composition of Parliament. In the present Parliament that means they would be overwhelmingly made up of Conservative Members. That provides some safeguard immediately against any fear among Canadians and Members of this House that the worst abuses of the American process might occur. If we are going to have the principle of a genuinely responsible government applied to the appointees of government, as I think should be the case, then we need to take this one step further. Let me say very firmly that this a direction that I think should be taken. Our parliamentary democracy requires that Crown prerogatives genuinely be limited by responsible government. That means accountability of the Government to the people through their elected representatives of Parliament. I want to urge in the very strongest terms for consideration of these matters the question of how many of the order in council appointments should be so reviewed and exactly where they should occur, whether in a single committee or in standing committees which have expertise in various areas. It involves detail. Questions would have to be be answered. I hesitate more because I fear the possibility of its role being extended too far. I do believe that many of the appointments made are of eminently qualified persons. In those cases there would not be very much in the way of a review process to be gone through.

While hesitating to single out any of the persons who have been appointed by previous Governments or by this one, we all realize that there have been times when persons have been appointed whose main qualification was their membership in a political Party. In those cases where a person may actually confess to very limited qualification for the office to which he or she is being appointed, surely we have the strongest of arguments for having a process which may very well serve as a deterrent. Prime Ministers would be more careful in making appointments. If not, if they were unmindful of the necessity of the best qualified persons for these positions, let the principle of responsible government extend to those appointments. Let us have the power to turn them back and have people who are qualified appointed to offices.

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Selkirk—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to join the debate on the motion introduced by the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon (Mr. Epp) with respect to parliamentary reform in a review of governor in council appointments.

• (1720)

As all Hon. Members know very well, it was this Government that initiated at the beginning of its mandate three years ago what was perhaps the most sweeping action to reform the House of Commons in Canadian history. One would wonder why it took so long for this action to take place.

Certainly that reform brought this place that governed our country for so many years up to date, brought to it a change that would give each and every Member of Parliament more ability to reflect the views of those in the area he represents. I take pride in the fact that it was the present Government that took this initiative.

The fact is that the Hon. Member who introduced this motion could now take it to a committee which he may have done to see if he could get a five-hour debate on it and to see if it could be votable. That is a dynamic change from what has ever happened before. That is a tremendous change and one that I am sure the Hon. Member himself has reflected upon and is enthusiastic about. Certainly I welcome his views on how he might improve on it.

In December of 1984, the Government established the special committee on reform to which the Hon. Member alluded under the distinguished leadership of the former Hon. Member for Saint John's East, now the Lieutenant-Governor of Newfoundland and Labrador. Under that inspired leadership, and with the diligent and non-partisan work of all members of the committee representing all Parties, the Hon. Member's Party included, the McGrath committee produced three unanimous reports between December of 1984 and June of 1985. These reports recommended a comprehensive package of reforms to the House and its rules. The principal purpose of these reforms, of course, was to strengthen the role of the Private Member, as I indicated earlier, and to give us a more influential role in reviewing the actions of the Government and proposing policy amendments and new initiatives.

What we have witnessed here today is of course another new initiative, albeit one brought on by a Private Member from the opposition Party. I think that is democracy in action, open debate for those in the House and those who may be sitting in their offices watching us on television or those who may read Hansard tomorrow. So be it. It is a point of view and the Hon. Member expressed it well.

These changes to the Standing Orders were tested for one year, as the Hon. Member may recall. I think one could fairly say that they passed the test with some modifications and were adopted on a permanent basis by the House, again with all-Party support, in June of this year.

There are many examples of these reforms, including legislative committee approval given to Bills after House approval at second reading, and expanded powers granted to smaller and reorganized standing committees to review the activities of government Departments and the very rules we are operating under in Private Members' Business.

In addition, the Government and the House agreed to provide an opportunity to standing committees to meet with the broad spectrum of people which the Government appoints or, under the new House rules, may nominate to important positions in the service of Canada. I chair a committee. Before that very committee appeared the likes of Mr. Dalton Camp and Mr. Ian Deans, a former Member of the House. Quite frankly, those kinds of scrutinies of people to be appointed had never previously occurred.

Certainly that openness in which the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon participated is certainly an idea which I think has shed a new light on appointments in general. I have yet to see a motion before these committees reviewing appointments to recommend that the appointees not be accepted or that the Government change its mind. I do not think, quite frankly, that it has even happened so far. However, that device is available to opposition Members of these committees.

The Hon. Member shakes his head. Such a motion may not be passed but it can be made. This device, to my knowledge, has never been exercised. I stand to be corrected. I only chair one committee and appointments have gone before other committees as well.

This reform is of course the basic focus of our discussion today. The mechanisms called for in the motion before us really are now in place. They permit standing committees to review the qualifications and competence of appointments and nominations made by the Government. They are unprecedented in any parliamentary system of government.

The Hon. Member may watch on Channel 50 the U.S. Senate review committees. That is not a parliamentary system. That is a totally different system which maybe he thinks we ought to use. We have a little trouble with that.

On one hand, we are worried about our sovereignty, as we know if we listen to Question Period, yet the Hon. Member purports to move to a U.S. system of Government. One must be very careful and concerned about why he would like to change a system that is very uniquely Canadian, a proposal of the Government to which all Parties agreed. Now he wants to move us into a system like that which we see in the United States where they challenge the nominees and recommend, as we are witnessing right now, if the candidate should be allowed to be appointed. That is a very grave concern to me.

We would like to maintain our sovereignty and certainly not move right away into a U.S. system. The Hon. Member brought forth no argument to show what other parliamentary system of government is in fact going further than in Canada. He has no examples because we have taken such a tremendous stride in bringing forth a new concept and a new power for the Member of Parliament.

The election of the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker is a new idea, and we are still actually living and testing the system. There may come a time when we would like to modify it, but to move immediately from this reform into an expanded reform could, I respectfully submit, bring forth other grave problems. One would want to be very careful, especially when we consider what is important and unique to Canadians. The Hon. Member's Party was very much a part of the process.

Once again I want to illustrate that the Hon. Member's ability to bring a new idea forward is one we are debating right now. Maybe before the hour is out, some new merit or light may be shed upon the idea, but certainly one wants to deal with an extreme amount of caution when making another radical change or one that has not been thoroughly thought out to the process of appointments.

I know I have only a short time left, but I would just like to say that, in my view, this new process of the House committee review of appointments and nominations has already provided an important and an unparalleled opportunity for Members of the House to get acquainted with people whom the Government appoints or nominates to many very important jobs in the service of Canada. As the chairman of a committee, I feel that this process seems to be working fairly well at this time. I do not think at this point in time that another change would be in order.

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend from Thunder Bay—Nipigon has today made a useful contribution to what I regard as the need for a continuing debate on parliamentary reform. The motion allows us to examine the efficacy of past reforms. We can also debate the need for further changes in our Standing Orders.

• (1730)

Today, Sir, we are turning our attention to Chapter 17 of our Standing Orders which deals with the review of order in council appointments. I note from the very outset that the Hon. Member's motion, as he emphasized, goes well beyond Standing Order 103 and Standing Order 104. It calls for a mechanism whereby parliamentarians could not only review but also approve some order in council appointments. Chapter 17 deals only with a review. The Hon. Member for Selkirk—Interlake (Mr. Holtmann) tried to make much of the reforms, but this, I submit, is a very modest reform, and those two Standing Orders are not functioning very effectively right now.

Mr. Redway: Revolutionary change.

Mr. Penner: It is hardly revolutionary. It is a mild, modest, cautious beginning.

The Hon. Member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon (Mr. Epp) would have this House introduce a system somewhat parallel to the U.S. model. Of course he is not in any way suggesting that we should have a congressional system or anything of the kind. He is saying that we should look at the U.S. model where certain nominations are sent to a Senate committee. I would point out that the House of Representatives has no part to play at all in this process.

The committee examining the appointment has jurisdiction in the area to which the appointment belongs. The committee considers the matter either in a public forum or, by a majority vote, in camera. It then reports back to the Senate, and the question is: Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination?

The McGrath committee, in looking at that system, noted that statistically there are very few direct refusals of appointments by the Senate. However, it also went on to note that it is not uncommon for nominations to be withdrawn or not to be confirmed at all. Why do you suppose that is? I think we know that in the course of the hearings the would-be appointee sometimes becomes something of an embarrassment to the administration. He or she has been unable to answer certain questions truthfully, with clarity or knowledge. In other words, their competence has been challenged.

The Hon. Member wants a review and approval process to be put in place in Canada. I fully agree with him. There is a need for just such a system. I believe, and I wonder if there are not many other Members of Parliament who share this belief, that political patronage in this country has really gotten out of hand. In certain cases it has actually gone wild. In saying this I want it to be clear that what is under attack here are not appointments themselves. There may be too many boards and commissions and the like to which the Prime Minister and the Government may make appointments. Yet some of them are useful, and some are essential. However, I believe all of them ought to be reviewed from time to time by Parliament to see if they perform any useful, democratic, social or economic function in our society.

Some appointments are obviously necessary because the will of Parliament in the form of legislation has to be carried out. However, there must absolutely be a requirement for competence in the job. The person must meet the qualifications. That is what the McGrath report said. It referred to:

> —the appointment of the best people possible, and that means appointments must be more than political patronage.

I agree. Collecting a few bucks for a political Party does not qualify you for just any government job. Soothing the Prime Minister's ego from time to time when he is feeling a bit insecure does not make you fit for any task the Government may have at hand. Serving a Minister for a little while as an adviser, speech writer or "gofer" does not provide you with the wherewithal for just any government assignment.

I do not know if I have time for an illustration but one comes readily to mind. There was a university professor who had a part-time position on a commission. He was highly qualified in that area. It was a part-time position but he could spend as much time as he liked on it, so he gave more and more of his time to it and served extremely well. He was promised by the Minister of the day that when a full-time position came open he would get it. So he reduced his teaching load, served more and more time on the commission, and what happened? An election came along and a Member of Parliament who did not have a hope of winning his seat but had a few brownie points with the Prime Minister got the job. To the best of my knowledge he did not have the faintest idea about the area in which he was now going to be serving the Government for an extended period of time.

I recall rather more recently that an individual from my constituency was called before a committee because he was being appointed to a human rights tribunal. It was an embarrassment, a joke. He did not even understand the basic tenets or underlying principles of human rights, or the legislation we put in place, or his job at the Human Rights Commission. He did not have a clue. Yet the Government brought that man forward and wasted the time of the committee. I might tell my hon. friend from Thunder Bay that even though it was a joke and this person's responses were ludicrous, he got the job.

Mr. Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Shameful.

Mr. Penner: Of course it is shameful. That is the kind of thing that goes on.

My friend from Selkirk—Interlake would like us to believe we have made great strides in parliamentary reform. We know we have not because the basis of parliamentary reform is the question: How do we begin to exercise some degree of control over the executive branch of Government? That is what parliamentary reform is all about. How do we begin to restrict the almost unlimited power of a Prime Minister regardless of which political Party he leads? A democracy needs its checks and balances. Under the Constitution Act, 1982 we gave some powers to the Supreme Court. We created a Charter of Rights and Freedoms. We moved in the direction of limiting the powers of the executive.

The McGrath report wanted to do the very same thing for Members of Parliament. It wanted to make them more effective. However, those recommendations have earned a very limited amount of success. I know that government Members want to make much of it, but I think they know in their heart of hearts that making much of how that report was implemented is more propaganda than reality.

We know that the will of the Prime Minister, when he has a majority, virtually becomes law. We have seen that in recent days. For example, when the Meech Lake Accord was brought to this House it was described as a seamless web into which you could not introduce the smallest amendment. The process involving the Constitution committee was meaningless because nothing could be changed. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and his Senate spokesman laid down the law, and this was to remain intact, as it has. Of course we have the same thing in the free trade agreement. We cannot modify it in any way at all. It will go forward as it is.

I will conclude by asking: Why does Parliament exist? We exist mainly to make government accountable for all of its actions; its expenditures, its policies, its programs, and its appointments which we are debating today. This must be real rather than only an illusion. I believe that this national forum will lose the respect of the citizenry unless we carry out this very important function. Has this institution already lost the respect of our citizenry? Lord Acton's dictum, known by most first-year university history students, is: Power corrupts and if that power is absolute it corrupts absolutely.

There must be accountability in every respect. I do not believe, as the Member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon would have us believe, that Question Period is accountability. You and I, Sir, know that that is political theatre. Real accountability could take place in committee. However, it will only take place when we actually start making amendments to legislation based on the public hearing process, when we actually turn down some expenditures and make recommendations for other expenditures, and when we say that we will not accept certain appointments because the people are not the best candidates and are not competent.

I support that which the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon has done. The job of parliamentary reform has only just begun.

[Translation]

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil—Papineau): Mr. Speaker, as a former member of the Special Committee on Reform of the House of Commons, it gives me pleasure today to speak on motion M-39 standing in the name of the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon (Mr. Epp).

I believe that the Hon. Member should have decided today simply to withdraw his motion since the Government has responded favourably to the recommendations of the Committee about the review of Order in Council appointments.

For the benefit of those who will read the proceedings on this motion in Hansard, I would like to quote Standing Order 104(2), which states the following:

> The committee—

—that is the Standing Committee of the House having the authority to review an appointment made, for instance, in the area of employment and immigration—

> —if it should call an appointee or nominee to appear pursuant to section (1) of this Standing Order, shall examine the qualifications and competence of the appointee or nominee to perform the duties of the post to which he or she—

—and the word "elle" should have been added in the French version—

> —has been appointed or nominated.

Mr. Speaker, as Parliamentarians, whatever side of the House we may sit on, I believe that we must admit that the Progressive Conservative Government has made a tremondous step in reforming our institution, precisely in this area of review of Order in Council appointments.

We could say that it is not enough. We could say that we should do even more. However, we must also avoid excess. We have to remember that it is not easy for the members of a Standing Committee to judge totally the qualifications and competence of a person appointed by the Prime Minister of Canada.

It must also be said that this Standing Order prevents those who make appointments from making bad ones.

Mr. Speaker, knowing quite well that I, as a Canadian, could be appointed to a management position with a Crown Corporation and that I have no special qualifications in that area, I think I would be very uncomfortable about accepting this kind of appointment, because I might be called before a standing committee of the House to explain to committee members what my qualifications are. Mr. Speaker, I think this prevents a lot of bad appointments, and I think we must recognize here the leadership of the Prime Minister who has been very much involved in this parliamentary reform.

Mr. Speaker, I remember when the Hon. Member for St. John's East spoke to the House about the committee's report. The Prime Minister came to the House especially to listen to what the Hon. Member for St. John's East had to say, because the appointment issue was of particular interest to him.

Mr. Speaker, I was listening earlier to the Hon. Member for Cochrane—Superior (Mr. Penner). He was also involved, though indirectly, because of his particular interest in parliamentary reform. He came before the committee two or three times, and he is well aware the issue of Order in Council appointments was very important and was given thorough consideration. We looked at all the options in this respect.

Obviously, we had to make some concessions. Mr. Speaker, when I heard the Hon. Member who presented his motion today say: Mr. Speaker, partisan appointments are being made here in Canada and this is terrible, and so forth, I felt the Hon. Member was speaking on behalf of a political party that will never sit on the Government side, because after all, one has to be realistic in a democratic party system. When a Progressive Conservative Government is in power, it practically has an obligation to appoint people who support its policies.

The Hon. Member for the New Democratic Party would be in trouble if some day they were to form the Government. Can you imagine New Democrats appointing a known Conservative as head of a Crown Corporation or chairman of a committee? Mr. Speaker, I think it would be rather funny to see how that would work out. After all, one must be realistic.

So I think we can say that Members of this House should constantly, on an annual basis, reflect on the rules by which we are guided, and also on other areas that concern a Member's daily life. I think we can also say that since the reform of our Standing Orders, there has been considerable improvement. Nothing is perfect, of course. Often, everything has to be reviewed every five, ten, fifteen or 20 years. This is a changing world with changing concepts, and I would say that perhaps we would have to review everything on an annual basis.

As Members from all sides of this House, we should ask questions and re-evaluate ourselves and our rules. I quite agree with the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon (Mr. Epp) and the Hon. Member for Cochrane—Superior that as Members we are in a position to review these issues.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to point out that the right to veto an appointment suggested by the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon seems to be a bit arbitrary. After all, veto rights or the right to appoint... Mr. Speaker, quite frankly, after my work on the standing committee and after hearing witnesses address the issue of reviewing Order in Council appointments, I have no hesitation in saying that I would not like to be in a position where, as a Member, I would have to select two or three people out of a pool of 1,000 in my riding with the ability, intelligence and qualifications to sit on Government commissions.

I would rather have these appointments made by the Prime Minister so as to avoid finding myself in an embarrassing situation in the eyes of my own constituents. In fact, Mr. Speaker, I am sure my colleague would agree that House of Commons Standing Orders 103 and 104 answer these questions and meet all expectations. If he agrees with me he will admit that our Government has covered a lot of ground in that respect and that, for the time being, his motion is not justified and should simply be dropped from the Order Paper because the Government did respond to this question of order in council appointments.

[English]

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, I only intend to speak for five minutes in order to allow the Hon. Member for London East (Mr. Jepson) to speak. I want to deal with what has happened with respect to the whole question of reviewing appointments.

The House will recall that early in the term of this Government there was a great controversy about appointments and the perception and reality of patronage in those appointments. The response of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) was that this was a matter with which the Special Committee on the Reform of the House of Commons would deal. That committee was sometimes referred to as the McGrath committee. For some six months, the Prime Minister, in what I believe was a rather politically deft move, was able to say, when asked about patronage, that this matter was referred to the committee headed by the former Member for St. John's East. He would go on to say that he was looking forward to the recommendations of the committee and so on.

When the report of the Special Committee on the Reform of the House of Commons finally came forward, it recommended neither what the Prime Minister eventually instituted nor a procedure as wide ranging as that proposed by the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon (Mr. Epp) in his motion. It recommended that there be a review and veto power only with respect to positions on quasi-judicial bodies, such as the CRTC, the CTC, the NEB and officers of the House of Commons, and that there be a review procedure but no veto power with respect to the rest of the appointments.

I still believe that this was a nice compromise because, pursuant to some of the remarks made by the Prime Minister, it would have been an opportunity for parliamentarians to exercise some real but nevertheless limited power over appointments.

Again, I think the Prime Minister made another politically deft move by saying that all appointments will be open to review, without being open to veto. This has resulted in the same situation as exists in the American system, even though they have more veto power. Since everything is open to review, nothing is open to review. There are so many appointments that no one can possibly review them all. Therefore, the only appointments that are reviewed are those which have a certain political notoriety.

That is not what the committee intended. It wanted to involve Members of Parliament in some meaningful consideration of appointments.

I am not saying this for politically partisan purposes, because I believe that an objective analysis shows that we have ended up with nothing. There is a review process that is never exercised except in a highly political context, which presumably is something no one had in mind.

I return to the original recommendations of the committee. I would like the Government to reconsider providing for a review and veto power on a limited number of appointments, which we believe would not call into question the basic constitutional notion of the Crown's ability to appoint because of the nature of these bodies, and to leave the review possibility in place for all other appointments. In that way there could be a real test of the role parliamentarians could play in appointments. We have not had that test and will not see one under the current rules.

I thank the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon for raising the matter and giving me an opportunity as a member of that committee to comment on the progress of that recommendation. I do not think it has progressed very well.

Mr. Jim Jepson (London East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to add my own comments to this debate on the motion proposed by the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon (Mr. Epp) concerning the process of House committee review of governor In council appointments.

Under this process, which has been in place for roughly a year and a half now, the Government is required to table in the House the Orders in Council of almost all individuals whom it appoints. There are some exceptions, such as judges, and these exceptions are completely justifiable.

According to the Standing Orders on this process, specifically Standing Order 103(2), a Minister of the Crown on behalf of the Government may also, from time to time, table a certificate stating that a specified individual has been nominated for appointment to a specified non-judicial post.

The Government has two ways to bring people forward for consideration by House committees. They are: as appointees who have been appointed; and for three regulatory agencies, the CRTC, the CTC and the NEB, as nominees whom it has not yet appointed.

The Government has tabled hundreds of appointments in this House, and a number of certificates of nominations. Let me give some recent examples. There are appointments to boards established under federal legislation such as the Farm Debt Review Board, boards of referees of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, National Parole Board, and Atomic Energy Control Board. There are appointments to the boards of Crown corporations, such as VIA Rail, the Canadian Commercial Corporation, and Telesat Canada. There are appointments to agencies such as the Medical Research Council, the Science Council, and the Advisory Council on the Status of Women. Recently, a new director of the National Gallery of Canada was appointed. There are citizenship judges, because these, in fact, do not have judicial powers. The names of senior public servants such as ambassadorial appointments, and of the new Deputy Superintendent of Financial Institutions have recently been tabled. There was a recent nomination to the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission.

The names of all the above individuals and many others appointed or nominated are tabled in the House and referred to an appropriate standing committee, which then has the opportunity within 30 sitting days to call that individual to appear.

As Members know, a hearing is not mandatory. Standing committees do not call many of the individuals which the Government appoints or nominates for a committee hearing. However, a number of people have been invited to appear by various committees, including appointees to the Bank of Canada, who were the first to be called, and others including a number of senior public servants.

In no case to date, however, has a House committee reported to the House that a government appointee or nominee was not qualified or competent to perform the duties of the post to which he or she was appointed or nominated.

The record indicates that the people appointed by the Government are not unqualified recipients of political reward. We are not talking here about patronage. Rather, we are seeing proof of the Government's record in appointing qualified, competent individuals seriously interested and prepared to serve Canada in the many positions which it is the Government's responsibility to fill.

This review process is a good reform which I am sure all Members will continue to support. While all of us would agree that the new reform is not perfect, it is a giant step forward when one reflects on what has existed in the past. The Government has received criticism for not being open and honest with the people, yet the reforms we have undertaken are clearly a breath of fresh air compared to what we faced in the past.

As a member of the Justice Committee, I know nominees have appeared before the committees with their resumés. There has been opportunity for the committee to call these people should it wish to interview them. It is obvious that the people whom we have put forward are very competent individuals for these posts and the committee has clearly not seen fit to bring them forward for specific interviews.

I believe we are encouraged by this reform. We admit that it is not perfect, but it is a giant step forward from what we experienced in the past.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—CONSULTANTS' REPORT ON MANAGEMENT OF MANITOBA REGION/DEPARTMENT'S SERVICE TO INDIAN PEOPLE

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, there is a serious problem in the Province of Manitoba regarding the Department of Indian Affairs. This unresolved problem is having some very drastic consequences for the lives of Indian people and the communities in which they live.

First, let me be very clear to you, Mr. Speaker, about the nature of the problem. It is not one of fraud, nor one of dishonesty, per se, nor of gross negligence. It is one of serious mismanagement.

Second, it is my firm conviction, and this is supported by concerns expressed by the previous Minister, the Hon. Member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie), that the Manitoba problem of serious mismanagement in the Department of Indian Affairs is widespread.

Third, it is not my intention to disparage or to lash out against officials in the Department in Manitoba, or in any other region of the Department of Indian Affairs. I believe they are caught in an intolerable and unacceptable position. They are being squeezed like lemons.

The real problem is the Minister himself and the senior bureaucrats who direct and pull him around, plus all of the excess and the overlay and the paraphernalia of the headquarters of the Department of Indian Affairs here in Ottawa. To put it simply and bluntly, the mentality toward Indian people by the Minister and his senior bureaucrats is that they are no more than wards of the state; they cannot be trusted nor relied upon to control, regulate or manage their own affairs. I know that in public fora, in conferences and the like the Minister and senior bureaucrats may talk about aboriginal self-government, but they do not really believe it at all. What they believe in, is doing what has to be done under the Indian Act, and doing it their way.

The Coopers & Lybrand report about the Manitoba situation put it very well, and I quote, "The fact is that most existing instructions were issued at a time when the Department was seeking to strengthen controls in responding to criticisms of the Auditor General". I believe that the senior bureaucrats in the Department really took pleasure and delight in the Auditor General's criticisms because it meant that they could tighten down the screws, that they could run a tight ship, that they could put those Indians in their place.

But, on the other side, there was something else which they had to take into account. That was the demand and the pressure for self-government. It was becoming too much to keep the lid on, and they had to do something.

So we have a problem, Sir, that in addition to those financial instructions that were issued by the Department there also went out laterally some vague and weak directives regarding, first, contribution agreements, and, second, something called alternative funding arrangements. So we now have it. The stage is now set for serious mismanagement. What a dark and tragic theatre it is. I say that because people's lives are involved, as is their education, the care of their children, their housing, social services, and so on.

So, first, we have the Treasury Board terms and conditions of 1979. This leads to continuous monitoring of Indian use of funds by Department officials to ensure compliance that all the terms and conditions are met. This is why in Manitoba, where most services are actually carried out by Indian people, there are now more civil servants than there were in the past. What are they doing? They are busy monitoring, keeping a watchful eye over the entire process.

Second, and following up on this monitoring, we have the control accounting system which fully satisfies the region's needs for financial control but which completely fails to analyse expenditures of benefit to Indians or tribal councils. Now, to further complicate the situation in Manitoba, there are program managers. They are closer to the Indian people themselves, to the bands and the tribal councils. In the interests of Indian people with whom they relate directly, these program managers sometimes, according to Coopers &

Lybrand, circumvent financial controls to make the best and maximum use of financial funds. In other words, Sir, they bend financial rules in order to satisfy what they believe to be the legitimate needs of the Indian people whom they are called upon to help.

• (1805)

The financial staff of the Department enter the picture much later, that is after these decisions have been made, and so many of their precious instructions have already been broken.

What is the result? The result is a mess. It is serious mismanagement. If time allows me, I will tell you what the answer is as quickly as I can.

Number one, we need a new Government. If we wish to down size the Department, do it here in Ottawa, not out in the field where they are actually trying to serve people. We need a clear policy on aboriginal self-government. It is an inherent and inalienable right and it should be exercised. We need the recommendation of the special committee to be accepted; that, in terms of financing, we need block funding agreements on a multi-year basis. Finally, we need to purge from our system the notion that Indian people are incapable and unable to govern themselves. Of course they are, and they will do it much better than many of the forms of self-government that we see around this country, whether they be municipalities, certain provinces, or do I need to look any further than right across the floor.

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the concerns raised by the Hon. Member, it was the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development who, in October, 1986, required the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to investigate the allegations of wrongdoing. Further, he requested that the President of the Treasury Board undertake a comprehensive review of the financial operations of the Department's regional office in Manitoba. Those actions were taken because he was committed to ensuring that sound financial practices were in place throughout the Department.

The comprehensive review of financial operations of the Manitoba region was undertaken by the Office of the Comptroller General with the assistance of Coopers & Lybrand Consulting Group. That review examined the region's financial management practices, including resource allocation, administration, monitoring and reporting, with specific attention to the administration of contribution agreements and contracts. The Minister released the findings of the report in September, 1987.

After careful review of the report, I am pleased to note that it did not uncover a single case of wilful wrongdoing on the part of the Department's employees. Furthermore, as the Minister indicated to the House on September 22, the report concluded that, "Although the region satisfactorily complies with most parliamentary and government policies and requirements where it delivers services directly to Indians, it fails to fully comply with these policies and requirements where administrative responsibilities have been devolved to Indian bands, tribal councils or their representatives".

In the consultant's opinion this situation has arisen, "Because the Department's clientele do not believe that these policies and practices are appropriate where they have assumed delivery or administrative responsibilities and the region is unwilling to enforce compliance by withholding funding to which the Indian bands are entitled".

Departmental officials are currently doing a detailed analysis of the findings of the report and will be working with the Comptroller General to complete, within two or three months, an action plan that addresses all the deficiencies identified in the report.

I can assure you that the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs is in the process of introducing a financial management regime that is consistent with and supportive of the Government's thrust to transfer the administration of programs and the associated funding to Indian Governments.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—POLITICAL RESPONSIBILITY—MINISTER'S POSITION/RESPONSIBILITY FOR ACTIONS OF RCMP

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, for a few weeks now, the Hon. Member for York South—Weston (Mr. Nunziata) and I have been asking questions designed to demonstrate—and I think we have demonstrated it—that the Government is not accountable for the way in which the national security operations of the country are being handled.

We are very critical of a number of things which have visibly gone wrong. We have no sense, in the answers which we are getting from across the floor, that the Solicitor General (Mr. Kelleher) in particular has any recognition of how serious the problems are or, indeed, that he has come to grips with them and is planning to do anything about them.

Three years ago, when this Government took office, it was exactly the moment of the launching of the new Canadian Security Intelligence Service, which was created by legislation and passed in the last weeks of the life of the former Government. This Government took over the tremendous responsibility of organizing the launch of CSIS, which was responsible for providing intelligence to the Government about threats to the national security as defined in that Act.

We know from all the evidence we have that a great number of things have gone wrong within the operations of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service in terms of its relationship with the RCMP and in terms of defining what is its mandate.

I put it to the Minister that he should take responsibility for that service as the statute requires him to do, recognize the problems, and take on the first fundamental responsibility of telling the Canadian Security Intelligence Service what is the product the Government wants it to produce and how the responsibility in the area is to be shared with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

I feel that time after time the problems which are surfacing are the result of a Government that is standing back and asking the RCMP and the new agency, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, to settle their own differences through liaison and through co-operation. That is no way for the Minister to take responsibility for the Department.

The RCMP is so well established, is so large, has such a large budget, and has such a clear level of support among the Canadian people that getting the Canadian Security Intelligence Service launched requires the Minister to be present, to be giving directions, and to be making decisions. When matters are left to the two agencies to settle, I fear that in every case the decision will go to the RCMP just because of its greater ascendency, so the Canadian Security Intelligence Service is not being properly launched and properly supported to do the very important work that it must do.

There was evidence of that last week when Doug Roche, who has some responsibility for awarding public money to peace groups, said that, yes, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service occasionally gives them some advice about which peace groups have been targeted, supported, and manipulated by, for example, foreign Governments or subversive elements. However, Mr. Roche said: "We didn't ask for that advice and we don't take that into consideration".

What kind of signal is that to give to the CSIS about its work? Either the Government wants it to be doing that job, or the Government should tell it not to do it. It should not allow it to do it and then dump on it, through the lips of Doug Roche, one of Canada's Ambassadors, and say that what it does is not wanted and no account is taken of it.

Last week we on this side of the House, in both Parties, pressed the Minister for taking some responsibility for the infiltration which may have occurred by members of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service into the peace movement and the union movement to see whether he supported it. He said, and I am quoting him exactly: "I have no evidence that the Canadian Security Intelligence Service has exceeded its mandate".

That is not a good enough answer. The Minister should have been in a position to say "I am satisfied that they are not exceeding their mandate", or he should have said "there is a problem here and this is what I am doing to try to solve it".

For him to say "I have no evidence" and then to tell any Members of the House or indeed any Canadians who have evidence that the Canadian Security Intelligence Service is exceeding its mandate, targeting people who are not threats to the security of Canada, that they should take that information to the Service is a total dereliction of his duty. The irony is that the Canadian Security Intelligence Service was examined by the Security Intelligence Review Committee.

This Security Intelligence Review Committee has expressed concern that the service is exceeding its mandate. For the Minister to tell us to take our complaints to the SIRC, which is already concerned about the service exceeding its mandate, simply shows that the Minister is not responsible, that he is not taking the fundamental responsibility for his agency, giving it the necessary directions and finding out what it is doing.

I want to express the total lack of confidence of the Official Opposition in the way this Minister has been passing the buck and sending us to SIRC. In one other circumstance, the Minister told us that the Director of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service is responsible for the agency and, because things were going wrong in the agency, the Director offered his resignation and the Minister accepted it. That was satisfactory as far as the Minister was concerned. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) indicated as well that the Canadian Security Intelligence Service is an independent agency and that its Director had done the honourable thing because of what had gone wrong and had resigned. That was not at all the proper way for the issue to be handled. The agency is not an independent agency. It is, in fact, by definition and by law a dependant agency. The Minister is accountable 100 per cent for its operations. There is no way in our tradition that a Deputy Minister's resignation should have been asked for, condoned and accepted. If anyone should have resigned, it should have been the Minister.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to point out that the Minister has fully responded to the questions just bootlegged into this debate by my hon. friend.

I would like to respond to the question raised by my colleague on September 22, 1987, which was supposed to be the subject for debate at this time, namely, the RCMP witness/informant protection. Despite the fact that the issue raised by my hon. friend on September 22 is sub judice, I would like to assure the Members of this House that the protection of witnesses and informants has been a particular concern of the Solicitor General (Mr. Kelleher). I would like to take this opportunity to outline the steps that he has taken in this regard. The Solicitor General has had a thorough review conducted of witness/informant protection arrangements, and I would like to describe some of the key features of the RCMP program.

First, investigators are provided detailed and very explicit instructions on how sources are to be handled, particularly with regard to limitations on the commitments that can be given to the informants at the investigation level. Second, informants are compensated on the basis of the value of the their informational services performed to advance the investigation of the offence. Third, the RCMP provides protection to such individuals and their immediate families when there is clear evidence that they have been, or are likely to be, seriously threatened as a result of acting as an RCMP informant. Finally, as an aspect of protection, informants and their families may be provided with a range of services including relocation in another city, change of identity and financial support.

The RCMP has a comprehensive and effective witness/informant protection program which is sensitive to the genuine requirements of these individuals and their families. I can assure the Members of this House that it is both fair and just.

The Hon. Member will appreciate that the use of informants is a necessary, in fact crucial aspect of many police investigations, particularly those which involve organized criminal conspiracies. Given the size of the RCMP and the complexity of the investigations the RCMP are charged to undertake, it is reasonable to conclude that the force deals with many informants on an ongoing basis, otherwise it would not be the very successful police force that it clearly is. In such circumstances, it is not surprising that from time to time, an informant is not satisfied with the treatment he or she is afforded. In such cases, the individual can, of course, under our system of justice, seek remedies through a civil proceeding. The important point here is that such occurrences are extremely rare given the many informants handled by the RCMP.

I would also like to remind the Hon. Member that police work is always very difficult and at times thankless. The RCMP are being asked to respond to a range of infinite social problems in the communities with finite resources. Increasingly, they are being required to undertake complex investigations under extreme pressure. I believe the Members of the House owe a vote of confidence to the loyalty and dedication of these men and women who serve their communities and their country in such an exemplary manner.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT—MINIMUM AGE PROVISION

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, I know that I do not have to remind you that since the Young Offenders Act was introduced into the House and passed into law by the former Liberal Government, it has been a very, very controversial piece of legislation. You know as well as I do, Mr. Speaker, that the Young Offenders Act replaced the former Juvenile Delinquents Act. It became effective law prior to the election of our Government, but it did not actually take effect as law of the land until after the Government was elected in the spring of 1985.

Almost immediately when it went into effect, the law was highly criticized, particularly by police forces, and particularly by police forces in the Province of Ontario. Following that criticism, the then Solicitor General who was at that time in charge of Young Offenders Act legislation, the Hon. Minister of National Defence (Mr. Beatty), commenced consultations with his colleagues right across Canada for the purpose of determining whether or not changes should be made to the Act.

Following those consultations, in fact changes were introduced in the House and passed into law but in spite of those changes, not all of the criticisms have disappeared. I suppose if I could identify one particular criticism that keeps coming up more and more often, it is the issue of those under twelve years of age, the minimum age at which the Young Offenders Act takes effect.

Prior to the introduction and passage of the Young Offenders Act, the age for criminal responsibility was seven years old. In fact, seven-year-olds and those older were subject to the Juvenile Delinquents Act. At the same time as the Young Offenders Act was introduced and passed, the Criminal Code was amended to remove the age of seven as the age of criminal responsibility. In fact, the age became 12, the minimum age dealt with in the Young Offenders Act.

It was anticipated at the time that each one of the provinces of Canada would put in place child welfare legislation which would deal with those young people from seven years of age to 12 years of age and that that would be the effective way of dealing with young people in that age bracket who were offenders. Unfortunately, that has not really come to pass.

While child welfare legislation has been put in place, the controversy continues to rage over whether that should be the effective way of dealing with children under 12 who are involved in criminal offences or if we should not lower the age in the Young Offenders Act.

I have raised in the House on occasion the fact that in Metro Toronto in 1985, 1,855 children under 12 were involved in very serious offences; 41 of them were involved in arson cases, 11 in sexual assaults and 15 in weapons incidents. That has prompted the Attorney General of the Province of Ontario to indicate that despite the existence of the child welfare system, there is a need for a safety net of criminal law. Otherwise, he says, there is no deterrent to criminal behaviour by children under the age of 12.

As you know, the Hon. Ian Scott, Attorney General of the Province of Ontario, has been criticized by Attorneys General in other provinces for that statement. They indicated that what the Province of Ontario really needs is stronger child welfare legislation, not amendments to the Young Offenders Act. It was indicated, for instance, that in the Province of Quebec that is the case and that deals with the problem effectively.

At the end of May of this year our Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn), now charged with the responsibility for this legislation, met with his provincial counterparts and discussed this problem, among many others. In early June of this year I asked that Minister in this House whether he was prepared to make further amendments dealing with the minimum age in the Young Offenders Act, or whether he was going to leave it to child welfare legislation to deal with the problem. The Minister said his officials and provincial officials were going to be meeting to study the problem.

Four months have now passed by and surely it is not unreasonable to expect a response from the Government. Will it tell us tonight one way or another: Is it going to change the Young Offenders Act and reduce the age of responsibility from twelve to seven or perhaps somewhere in between? Or, is it going to do nothing and rely strictly and solely on child welfare legislation to deal with this problem?

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I want to say at the outset that it is a pleasure to share the House this evening at this hour of debate with my hon. colleague from York East. I know he has displayed considerable interest in this distinct problem facing the judicial system and young people.

The minimum age of 12 was established during the process leading to the introduction and passage, in 1982, of the Young Offenders Act. I am sure he is aware of that. There was then a general consensus that the age of seven was simply not reflective of the policies or daily practices of the juvenile justice system. It was decided, as was the case under the Juvenile Delinquents Act, that children who threatened to harm themselves or others are best dealt with through provincial child welfare legislation. This enables authorities to apprehend children and provide special care and treatment for them and their families.

While the very young cannot be dealt with by means of criminal prosecution, it is in society's interest that they and their families be helped through formal family and children's services.

The issue of minimum age was raised during the consultations preceding Bill C-106 when changes were vigorously urged by some observers. The Hon. Member indicated he was one of those vigorous observers. For most participating in those consultations, however, it was not an issue requiring immediate attention and proposals of change also were opposed with vigour.

At the recent meeting of federal and provincial Ministers responsible for juvenile justice, the adequacy of child welfare legislation to deal with offences committed by children under the age of 12 was discussed. As indicated earlier, the Ministers did not reach a consensus on the proposition put forward by the Attorney General of Ontario. However, it was agreed that there was a need to ensure and maintain the capacity to respond effectively to anti-social behaviour of these children.

This issue has been referred to officials to ensure that the appropriate mechanism to respond to the needs of these children and to protect society is available.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TIBET—ANNIVERSARY OF CHINESE OCCUPATION—DALAI LAMA'S PEACE PLAN

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, this is the thirty-seventh anniversary of the illegal and cruel Chinese occupation of Tibet. Yesterday 60 Tibetan monks were arrested in Lhasa by the Chinese army for simply shouting the name of the Dalai Lama. Last week at least 19 Tibetans were killed for pro-independence demonstrations.

This is the worst attack on Tibetan freedom since 1959 when 87,000 Tibetans were killed and the Dalai Lama fled to exile. High ranking Tibetans have appealed for world support. They ask the United Nations to support their cause, to know that they are suffering, and that their human rights have been trampled upon for 37 years. On September 21 in Washington the Dalai Lama proposed a five-point peace plan. I ask the Government and all Hon. Members to give serious consideration to this important cause.

THIRD WORLD

CLEAN WATER SUPPLY—AIM OF WATERCAN ORGANIZATION

Mr. David Daubney (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, Canada's uniqueness is expressed in many ways. One of these is that we are blessed with plentiful supplies of clean water. The same cannot be said of the world's poor countries. Two billion people face the daily challenge of finding clean, uncontaminated water, and 80 per cent of disease in the Third World is caused by dirty water.

Ready and easy access to abundant supplies of clean water is essential if the cycle of poverty is to be broken and economic prosperity is to emerge in these less fortunate countries.

Watercan is a Canadian non-profit voluntary agency, founded by Michael Lubbock, an 81-year old constituent of mine, whose aim is to increase the supply of clean water in the poorer regions of the Third World. Watercan's aims and strategies are simple and effective. It raises donations by including its pamphlets with municipal water bills. Our Government has offered $50,000 for Watercan's operating costs and will contribute $2 for every $1 raised by donations.

Watercan has not wasted any time in providing clean water for those in need. A donation has already been sent to Zambia to provide for a system of wells.

I would like to commend Michael Lubbock's efforts, along with those cities which have included Watercan's pamphlets with their water bills. I call on all Canadian municipalities to follow suit to help Watercan's worthy mission.

NATIONAL FAMILY WEEK

SPECIAL NEEDS FOR FARM FAMILIES

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, since this is Family Week I would like the House to reflect for a moment on some of the special needs of Canada's farm families.

Low incomes, high stress, and lack of safe and affordable child care are all concerns according to the responses to a rural farm women's needs survey conducted in my constituency.

Their basic survival as farmers is a major concern. Low prices and high debt loads are contributing to family stress. With 40 per cent of the families reporting a straight loss or net incomes of less than $5,000, it is small wonder that few of their children are contemplating a career on the farm.

Some 50 per cent of the farm women responding were looking for an off-farm job, and most reported that they could not find one. These women are well educated and have training in a wide variety of fields. However, when the farm economy is badly hurting, jobs are disappearing in all the related fields in rural Canada.

If the Government really had a commitment to Canadian farm families, it would be clear on its farm family assistance policy. It would announce the level of grains income assistance for the coming year and would provide a clearly understood rural day care policy.

HIGH QUALITY OF CANADIAN GRAIN EXPORTS

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, the Tass News Agency reports that more than 40 per cent of the June to September grain shipments from the United States of America to the Soviet Union were infested with live pests and had to be fumigated on arrival.

In Canada, thanks to the excellent work of the Canadian Grain Commission, all our export sales are thoroughly inspected and certified to be of the highest possible quality.

The Entomology Section of the Commission routinely examines over 100,000 samples per year from farms, elevators, and ships and, if any cases of infestation are found, licences can be revoked.

If the Soviet Union or any other buyer wants assured high quality grain, Canada, with our thorough inspection and high standards, remains the logical source of supply.

WOMEN

FREE TRADE—REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT ESTABLISH SPECIAL PROGRAMS FOR WOMEN BEFORE MID-APRIL

Mrs. Lucie Pépin (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, last week I said that women heaved a sigh of relief when they heard that the free trade talks were stalled. This week, we have an agreement, and many women are once again feeling their initial concern.

When we realize that two-thirds of the workers in the industries affected by free trade are women, and 65 percent of the people working in the service industry are women, when we realize that women have a harder time getting access to training and retraining programs than men, and that in the United States, many states have abysmal labour laws and a ridiculously low minimum wage, and that poverty hits women hardest, what has our Government done for more than 52 percent of the population?

It is intolerable that a Government should negotiate an agreement and leave out women.

I am therefore asking the Conservative Government to introduce special programs for women between now and mid-April, so that women can adjust to this new situation and so that half the population of Canada is not left behind when the train leaves the station.

FREE TRADE—ABITIBI—TÉMISCAMINGUE REGION

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, if any region in Quebec can meet the free trade challenge successfully, Abitibi—Témiscamingue can.

Local personalities, including Paul and Robert Arcand, Jean Perron and Guylaine Saucier, have many times expressed their faith in the benefits of free trade for our region. This very morning, Jacques Bibeau, Mayor of Rouyn—Noranda, Paul-Aurèle St-Pierre, Mayor of La Sarre, and Jacques Leblanc, Mayor of Ville-Marie, told me personally that they supported the free trade treaty. In fact, Mr. Perron from La Sarre said recently in Rouyn—Noranda, and I quote: "This is a government initiative that deserves our attention. Free trade is something to look forward to." He went on to say: "As far as I can see, the protectionists, the people who are against free trade, are trying to hide their own inefficiency. It takes a lot of guts to say yes to free trade, and we do say yes to free trade!"

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that thanks to this new dynamism in our region, our farmers, forestry workers and miners will meet this great challenge with enthusiasm and leave future generations a legacy they can be proud of.

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT—STEEL INDUSTRY

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, as Canadians begin to examine the Conservative Government's misguided, hurried and patently unfair trade deal with the United States they are realizing that Canada has been put up for sale. Even formerly staunch supporters of the trade initiative are now telling this Government that the deal is a bad one for Canada and Canadians.

Roger Phillips, president of Ipsco, one of Canada's major steelmakers, told the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) yesterday that he could no longer support the trade pact because it does nothing to guarantee secure access to the U.S. market for Canadian steelmakers. Canadian steelmakers, he warned, will not be able to compete on an equal footing with their rivals across the border as a result of this flawed deal.

It is clear that Mr. Phillips cannot be duped by the Government's empty assurances that this deal is in Canada's interest. The Government should heed the judgment of Canadians like Roger Phillips, before it is too late.

SUPPORT FOR CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, the pathetic performance of the Liberals and the New Democrats during Canada's trade negotiations with the United States cannot pass without comment. First they told Canadians that our social programs would be up for grabs. Were they? Not a single one. Then they claimed that Canada's cultural industries would be sold out. Were they? Not one. Next they even suggested that our unemployment insurance program would be changed. Was it? Absolutely not. Finally they said that the Auto Pact would be dismantled. Was it? No. In fact it was strengthened.

So I ask you, Mr. Speaker, whose credibility is on the line? Certainly not this Government's whose initiative and courage have given us an historic trade deal that will ensure that Canada continues to prosper. Rather, I would suggest that Canadians think long and hard about the misleading and irresponsible disinformation circulated by Canada's not so Loyal Opposition and its socialist allies. Constructive actions speak much louder than deceptive words.

Our Government's record will bear the scrutiny of any honest Canadian. The same cannot be said of the Liberals and the New Democrats.

PUBLIC SALARIES

SALARIES OF REGISTERED NURSES

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I rise to bring to the attention of the House what I believe to be a serious injustice in the way the Government is treating some of its civil servants. The injustice to which I am referring is the salary presently offered to registered nurses working for the federal Government.

At the present time a registered nurse makes three cents an hour more than a registered nurse assistant. I find this situation to be totally unacceptable. Representatives of nurses and the Professional Institute of the Public Service have met with the former Treasury Board President concerning this issue and were promised an answer by September 1. September 1 has long since come and gone and the registered nurses working for the federal Government are still being treated unjustly and are still waiting. There are 900 hospital nurses in the service of the federal Government who need assistance.

I call upon the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Mazankowski) to act now. Any further delay and procrastination will only compound the present injustice.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT—POSITION OF MANITOBA PREMIER

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Selkirk—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, some things never change.

Was it any wonder last night we heard a voice crying alone in the socialist wilderness from Manitoba about free trade? We have come to expect Howard Pawley to take the reactionary socialist position of the rest of the New Democratic Party by protecting the status quo and resisting any positive change to our nation.

• (1415)

Howard Pawley and his group of NDP incompetents have made Manitoba an island of despair in Canada over the past three years. While Conservative policies have led the entire nation into new prosperity, the NDP in Manitoba have resisted at every step.

What is ironic and totally incomprehensible is that Mr. Pawley and his Government wish to seek and expand sales of Manitoba Hydro in the U.S.A., that Mr. Pawley and his Government wish to develop Manitoba potash and find a U.S.A. market, that Mr. Pawley and his Government in late 1984 tried to secure American investment to build a glass plant in his riding, that Mr. Pawley and his Government condemned the U.S.A. action of countervail duty on Canadian hogs, and yet do not favour a free trade pact which would secure these markets for Manitoba. He and his Government should resign.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT—POSITION OF NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, Conservatives want Canadians to believe, falsely, I think, that the New Democrat opposition to free trade is based on a backward vision while they somehow are looking to the future. The contrary in fact is true. It is the Conservatives, with their backward look at the voodoo economics of the 18th and 19th century when free trade was a panacea.

We are looking to the future. We believe in fairness for Canadians and for future generations. We have confidence in Canadians. We believe that Canadians can create jobs in Canada without becoming the 51st State of the United States.

Many Canadians want to see energy policies and conservation of non-renewable resources. This free trade deal would betray that trust. It means unfairness for Canadians in the future.

What about the Liberals? They have renounced the voodoo economics of the past but they have no alternative vision. We have and that is what we will be taking to the people of Canada.

TRADE

FREE TRADE

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the socialist party has announced that he will send his jackals and hyenas throughout the country to fight against free trade. I would like all Canadians, each time they hear one of these doom and gloom prophets criticize free trade, to ask them these questions: Why is free trade good for the Oshawa constituency and has been applied there since 1965? Why are Oshawa workers much better paid than the national average? Why do retired automobile workers have an indexed pension plan?

The answer is that they have benefited from free trade since 1965. Ask any socialist Member why he does not want what has happened in Oshawa and what has been good for that region to apply to the rest of Canada.

We Canadians have to start asking questions to the socialists, to these frustrated members of our society. Let us ask them where they come from. They have always been parasites living off Governments, universities or the money of poor workers.

TRADE

FREE TRADE—INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILLING TO HONOUR COMMITMENT MADE IN HALIFAX

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister. During his November 1985 meeting with the Premiers in Halifax, the Prime Minister stated the following:

> In my opinion, it is obvious that I shall not be able to reach a free trade agreement in a federal system such as we have in Canada without the support and participation of the provinces affected.

We now know that several Premiers disagree with the agreement. We also know that several areas under provincial jurisdiction are affected by the free trade agreement. Is the Government willing to respect the commitment it made in November 1985 or will it forget that promise?

[English]

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think it should be reported that the Premiers at the First Ministers' meeting were very supportive of the Prime Minister's consultation with them. All of the Premiers without exception pointed out how it was not necessary for the Prime Minister to consult with them because, of course, treaties such as the free trade agreement are under federal jurisdiction. They all pointed out how much they supported the idea of this kind of co-operative ambience the Prime Minister has introduced.

• (1420)

I will just repeat that federal treaties are a federal matter. The provinces will be asked to make those changes in their jurisdiction. However, anyone who sees the free trade agreement will see those are very few indeed.

Mr. Axworthy: My question was not about consultation. The Prime Minister clearly committed himself at that meeting that he would not proceed with the free trade deal without the full support and participation of provincial Premiers. As I read it last night, several of them were not in favour of the Accord.

POSITION OF PROVINCES

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, considering the Minister is now being allowed to answer questions, I will direct my question to her. A number of areas under provincial jurisdiction are affected by this agreement, things such as financial services, certification standards, agriculture, energy and resources.

Both U.S. Senators and the administration said they could not agree to any free trade deal that did not have the full and unanimous support of the provinces. Therefore, I ask the Minister if both her Government and the Americans have now retreated from that stand, or are we really facing the fact that the Government will have to withdraw the agreement if it does not have provincial concurrence?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I pointed out it was not the intent of this Government to change the Constitution of Canada in this regard. As the Hon. Member well knows, I attended the First Ministers' meeting, as I attend all of them as Trade Minister, and that is why I was not in the House. I can assure him that only two of the 10 Premiers expressed serious reservations about the agreement, and that was on philosophical grounds. It was not on the merits of the agreement itself. They could pick no holes at all in the agreement itself because it met all their regional interests.

Mr. Axworthy: I think it is fair to say that some provincial leaders will live up to their philosophical beliefs and follow through on their commitments.

FINANCING OF READJUSTMENT PROGRAMS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, perhaps this will be a question the Deputy Prime Minister is prepared to answer seeing as we get non-answers from the Minister.

Two days ago the Prime Minister said in a speech to the Export Association that there will have to be a massive undertaking involving new resources to deal with the problems of dislocation. Yesterday in this House the Minister of Finance said there will be no new massive undertakings and that present programs are fine, thank you very much. He totally contradicted the Prime Minister.

Who speaks for the Government? Is it the Prime Minister? The Minister of Finance? Or is the Government totally unprepared to come to grips with this vital issue and does not really know what it is doing?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do not see any contradiction at all between what the Prime Minister said Monday and what the Minister of Finance said yesterday, in the sense that we already have in Canada what we call massive mechanisms—as my colleague put it—concerning labour adjustment. When we are talking about outlays of $6 billion, I would suggest it is relatively serious. The Minister of Finance did not say that things would not change, but we have to begin somewhere. We will begin by waiting, jobs have not been lost yet, and no final decision has been made. Of course, Mr. Speaker, my colleague would want us to behave like the Liberals—first create programs, then assess the situation. We will analyze and scrutinize the agreement, then we will create programs if necessary.

[English]

RETRAINING AND READJUSTMENT PROGRAMS

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, once again the Prime Minister has resorted to exaggeration and deception.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the Hon. Member has an important question. I know he would want to withdraw the word "deception".

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I will follow your good advice.

On Monday the Prime Minister said there was a need, to use his words, for a massive federal-provincial retraining and readjustment program to compensate for free trade. On Tuesday the Premiers said they had never heard of such a program and the Minister of Finance did contradict the Prime Minister.

• (1425)

The Government has already cut training and employment programs by 32 per cent from $2.2 billion in 1984 to $1.6 billion in 1987. Therefore, where are the massive programs? Will the Minister come clean with the country and tell us how many jobs will be lost and what the Government will do about it?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the massive programs are the Canadian Jobs Strategy and Section 39. The massive programs are the one million jobs created in three years, something that the Hon. Member's Party was never able to do.

[Translation]

FREE TRADE—JOB LOSSES—ADJUSTMENT PROGRAMS

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): On Monday, as a result of the free trade deal, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister promised a major federal-provincial retraining program. On Tuesday, he was contradicted by the provinces and the Minister of Finance. Mr. Speaker, according to several studies between 100,000 and one million jobs will be lost. If the Minister and the Government do not agree with these findings, what are their own official predictions? Is the Minister prepared to admit that many jobs will be lost as a result of the free trade deal and will he say what the retraining programs will consist of?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am now in a position to advise the House that there are programs already in place to trigger the employment adjustment mechanism. Some 5 million Canadians per year have changed jobs, one way or another, and we have the necessary mechanism to relocate and properly help these people. Now, as far as the Canada-United States deal is concerned, both the assessment and review of the mechanism provided for under this deal will take place. No job will be lost before January 1, 1989. Nothing will be done until then. My Department, together with all the others, will carry out a series of analyses and, on the basis of our findings, the necessary measures will be implemented. But what differentiates us from the Liberals is the fact that we study a situation before acting upon it whereas they used to act first, and we have had to face the consequences.

MONITORING OF FOREIGN INVESTMENT

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked questions about why the Government gave up our sovereign control over pricing and security of supply in energy. Today I have a question about the loss of sovereignty in the investment field.

I will direct my question to the Minister for International Trade. According to a study produced by Statistics Canada and released just over an hour ago in Edmonton, for every $1 billion in profits between 1978 and 1985 Canadian companies created 5,700 new jobs. For the same $1 billion of profits during the same period of time U.S. firms created the grand total of 17 jobs.

Given the alarming significance of this data, is this not a time when we should be, if anything, increasing our monitoring of the performance of foreign firms in Canada instead of giving up our sovereignty in this field?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, we are not giving up our sovereignty in this area. We will still be monitoring direct investment. We will still be welcoming direct investment. You will recall that when the Government took office we changed FIRA to Investment Canada and changed the thresholds. There was record investment after that. We are changing the thresholds again.

While I am not aware of the particular study to which the Hon. Member has referred, I can give him a different set of statistics. We have created one million new jobs since we took office and last year we had a record $6 billion worth of investment. Surely the two are connected.

• (1430)

STATISTICS CANADA STUDY

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, if the Minister would look at the data produced by another Minister's Department, she would see that is precisely the point. The Canadian firms that are making the profits are indeed reinvesting, but the foreign firms that are making the profits overwhelmingly are taking the profits out of Canada. That is the point.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An Hon. Member: It is your lack of understanding.

Mr. Gustafson: What about Oshawa?

Mr. Masse: It is all right for Oshawa but nowhere else.

Mr. Crosbie: Bushwah from Oshawa.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Hon. Member for Oshawa.

Mr. Broadbent: Some of our colleagues across the aisle are talking about Oshawa. The point of investment in Oshawa is that we have insisted on performance criteria in the Canada-U.S. automotive agreement.

Mr. Masse: Who is the "we"?

Mr. Broadbent: Is the Minister aware—

Mr. Shields: Bob White pulls the strings.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Siddon: He is distorting statistics.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. Members on the government side will expect Members on the opposition side to extend the appropriate courtesies when Ministers give answers. I would hope that they would extend the proper courtesy to the Leader of the New Democratic Party who is asking a question.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I understand that they are a little sensitive these days.

Is the Minister aware that the same study produced by Statistics Canada shows that during the same seven-year period, from 1978 to 1985, more than 99 per cent of the new jobs created in Canada were created by Canadian firms? If she is aware of that, why is she prepared to sell out existing control levels that we have for foreign firms and their performance? Why does she not increase Canadian sovereignty in this field rather than reduce it?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, possibly the fact that 99 per cent of those jobs were created by Canadian firms is because this is Canada, and Canadian firms, while it does not seem to have occurred to the Hon. Member, are the major employers.

The whole purpose of our free trade agreement with the United States is to make those Canadian firms even stronger, to provide them with greater markets, to provide them with greater security of markets so that they can employ even more Canadians.

CONTROL OVER AMERICAN INVESTMENT IN CANADA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, Statistics Canada figures indicate that over the past seven years Canadian companies, mostly small—and medium-sized businesses, have created 99 per cent of the new jobs, whereas American companies have created less than 1 per cent during the same time.

My question is very simsple. Why did the Conservative Government agree to surrender our sovereign right to control American investments in Canada?

[English]

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, of course the Hon. Member has simply asked the same question. My answer is the same.

INDUSTRY

FUTURE OF FIRESTONE PLANT IN HAMILTON

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I have an urgent question for the Minister of Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology. The Minister will know of a breakdown in negotiations between Firestone Canada and the Ohio-based Cooper Tire and Rubber Company. This could mean the devastating shut-down of the Firestone plant in Hamilton, with a loss of 1,300 jobs, while Cooper wants to move the operation to Tupelo, Texas.

In view of a clear demand by the City of Hamilton to get the parties back to the negotiating table, will the Minister arrange for a high level meeting between himself and the Minister in the Province of Ontario? Can he give me any assurance of financial assistance to make sure that Firestone and its 1,300 employees remain in Hamilton?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, this morning I was in touch with the Mayor of Hamilton, and my provincial colleague. We have agreed on a common strategy. We want to get the parties back to the table and get the negotiations under way in a serious manner.

We are willing to intervene directly. I am communicating with the two companies this afternoon in order to get them back to the table. Hopefully we will be able to come to some satisfactory resolution to this issue that will safeguard as many jobs as possible in the firm.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER INTERVENE DIRECTLY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I welcome the conversion on the road to Damascus because a week ago this self-same Minister said that he could not get involved in this matter because it was a private matter between two parties. I am glad that he is involved.

Will he follow the demand of the Mayor of Hamilton and send a team, including himself—not another civil servant as he has done over the last two years—and members of the Opposition who have been unable even to have meetings with him, to go to Akron to meet with Mr. Nevin to tell him that Firestone better start bargaining in good faith or the Government's hammer will come down on them?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, my short answer is no. The reason is very simple. No cabinet Minister of this Government will go to the United States or any other country and beg for any decent commercial behaviour.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Foster: Tell that to Pat Carney.

An Hon. Member: Get off your knees.

Mr. Speaker: The questions that have been asked by the Hon. Member for Hamilton—Wentworth and the Hon. Member for Hamilton East are serious questions that involve a serious matter that is taking place at this time. The Minister is trying to give a response. I would ask that he be given the courtesy of some silence.

Mr. de Cotret: As I said, Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of going down to the United States to negotiate with the firms. As I indicated, I have talked to both the provincial Minister and the mayor. We have a strategy in place.

I will be happy to talk to the firms if need be. That meeting would be in Ottawa. This is a step that would be taken only if further negotiations break down.

I would only add in response to the Hon. Member's question that my statement last week, that I was not willing to intervene, was because the commercial negotiations were still under way. Now that there are signs that they have broken off, I think it is the appropriate time for the Government to take action.

TRADE

FREE TRADE—ELIMINATION OF CONTROL BY CANADIANS OVER AMERICAN INVESTMENT—RESQUEST FOR DETAILS

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade and has to do specifically with the figures released today by the Council of Canadians which indicate that, from 1978 to 1985, 99 per cent of new jobs created in Canada came from Canadian companies, less than 1 per cent from American companies.

Can the Minister confirm that under the agreement with the Americans we Canadians will not be allowed to say anything at all about American investments, probably over a 20-year period, despite the fact that Canadian companies, not American companies, are the ones that create jobs in this country?

[English]

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I have answered that question. I believe that Canadian companies employ more Canadians than American companies because this is Canada and Canadian firms are the major employers.

I do not understand the NDP obsession with American firms. The American firms that we are talking about will still be subject to monitoring by Investment Canada. We insist that we have sold out nothing. We have given away nothing. We have protected our right to invest in America. More Canadians firms are investing in America, in percentage terms, than are investing here. We think this is a good agreement, and that it will create new investment.

• (1440)

The Government has welcomed foreign investment. Foreign investment creates jobs. The Government has grandfathered the provisions in certain sensitive industries. We have grandfathered provisions in the communications and cultural industry. We have grandfathered provisions in the energy industry. We have also changed Investment Canada to welcome foreign investment. That foreign investment has brought new Canadian jobs.

CONTROL OVER AMERICAN INVESTMENT

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same Minister who may not have seen the charts that we received today showing that 99 per cent of the jobs created in those seven years in Canada came from Canadian companies. While American-controlled companies had one-third of the profits they created less than 1 per cent of the jobs.

My question to the Minister is the following. Is it not true that Canada is binding itself to have no control over American investment for 10 or 20 years coming into this country? Therefore we have been able to do nothing about situations like what exists at Firestone in Hamilton. The Government is giving up our right to protect Canadian jobs.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member's allegations are absolutely false, without foundation, and do not deserve a further answer.

GOVERNMENT PROCUREMENT—EFFECT OF AGREEMENT ON ATLANTIC CANADA

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. The Prime Minister stated that regional development programs will not be affected by the free trade agreement. Of course that simply is not true.

On February 28, 1986, the Minister of Supply and Services announced that the federal Government's Department of Supply and Services under the Atlantic Opportunities Program would spend an additional $600 million in federal purchases over four years in Atlantic Canada. The Minister said in that release that this new expenditure of $600 million would create "an average of 5,000 jobs a year in Atlantic Canada".

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister to acknowledge that the national treatment provisions for government procurement contained in the free trade agreement will eliminate the Atlantic Opportunities Program and, according to the Government's own estimates, will cost Atlantic Canada an average of 5,000 jobs a year.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think that that question is typical of the Opposition's attack—

Mr. Axworthy: Answer it then!

Miss Carney: —trying to stir up fear in the hearts of Canadians.

What he has said on procurement is not true. It is not true that our Atlantic program is affected by this. The procurement package that we negotiated in the free trade agreement would not impinge in any way on the Atlantic program that this Government introduced.

READJUSTMENT PROGRAM

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, the only thing we are trying to stir up from the murky waters of that Minister's answer is a shred of truth.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Tobin: The reality is that the Government of Canada has now given American companies access to Canadian procurement. The Government can no longer guarantee a certain amount of procurement for regions like Atlantic Canada or, for that matter, for western Canadians under the Western Diversification Program.

I ask the Minister again to tell the House of Commons how the Government of Canada under the Prime Minister's so-called massive assistance program is going to replace the 5,000 jobs lost in Atlantic Canada, and replace the initiative promised under the Western Diversification Program which is now no longer available as a result of the free trade agreement.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, again I say that the Hon. Member's complaint is not true. There is nothing in this agreement that affects those firms—

Mr. Tobin: Stewart McInnes confirmed it yesterday.

Miss Carney: —that would be covered by the Atlantic and Western Diversification Programs. I again repeat what I have said in this House. A free trade agreement is not a licence to poach—

Mr. Tobin: The Minister sitting behind you confirmed it yesterday.

Miss Carney: I am sorry the Hon. Member does not want to hear my answer.

EXPORTS OF BRITISH COLUMBIA RED CEDAR

Mr. Gerry St. Germain (Mission—Port Moody): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. It is for the same Minister.

Under the elements of the agreement that was signed covering shakes and shingles the Americans, under the ITC 201, have agreed to eliminate and not to take further action.

I would like to ask the Minister if she will guarantee that—

Some Hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. St. Germain: —the restriction on exports of red cedar logs, bolts, blanks and blocks will remain in effect.

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): I am happy to give the Hon. Member that assurance, Mr. Speaker. It was something very important to British Columbians. In return for a few restrictions that the Americans placed we did protect our log exports in British Columbia. We also won assurance that the Americans cannot again place the kind of tariff they did place on cedar shakes and shingles—

Mr. Axworthy: Oh yes, they did.

Mr. Riis: What about softwood?

Miss Carney: —and that no new tariffs in that area will be applied in the future. We will have much better safeguards against that kind of action under the free trade agreement than we have now.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SERVICE INDUSTRY JOBS

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade. The Stats Canada study which was revealed today in Edmonton points out clearly that between 1978 and 1985 the Canadian service sector created 10 times more jobs than American firms in this sector in Canada. The Government has now opened up this sector to American takeovers thereby risking thousands of Canadian jobs.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: My question to the Minister is this. Why has the Government given up Canada's sovereignty in the area of screening foreign takeovers? Why?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, this just shows how the NDP is living in the last century. One of the most wonderful features of the FTA in world terms is that it is the first major free trade agreement that covers services. This means that Canadians will have the right to work on both sides of the border. Canadian companies in the service industry will have access to the U.S. market. That is very important because more jobs are being created in the service industries today than in the goods-producing industries. That is where the jobs of the future are, and this Government has secured access to the U.S. market for people in those jobs.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SCREENING OF AMERICAN INVESTMENT

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the same Minister. I want to tell her that the people in the Sudbury Basin will be delighted to know that they can now go down to Texas to work in the service sector.

Mr. Cassidy: For four bucks an hour.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I wish that the Government would pay attention to the facts as revealed by its own agency, Stats Canada. Between 1978 and 1985 new jobs created by American controlled companies in Canada were 1,400, while Canadian controlled firms created 876,000 jobs.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: I am glad that they applaud, Mr. Speaker, because my question to the Minister and to the Government is this. Why are they placing in jeopardy the sovereignty of Canada to screen investment in this country and to putting at risk the jobs that our companies in this country can create? Why are they doing that?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I have just done some hasty arithmetic, and while it may be wrong all his figures show me is that under previous administrations it took them seven years to create the same number of jobs that this administration created in three.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ASSURED SUPPLY OF ENERGY

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The National Energy Board which was previously safeguarding our energy supplies is now nothing more than a monitoring agency. There is no assurance now that Canadians have an assured supply of energy to meet their needs before energy is sold to the United States. What assurance can the Government give to Canadians that there will be an assured supply of energy to meet Canadian needs in the future?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the obvious answer to that, and I am sure the Hon. Member knows it, is that by securing our energy markets in the U.S. for all the energy-producing provinces we have been able to ensure the investment in Canada needed to create new supplies of energy. The Hon. Member knows that as well as anyone in this House.

• (1450)

PRICE OF OIL

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, there are no assurances that there will be investment to replace the light and medium crude when it is gone.

Can the Government give us its assurance that it will put up the funding to bring on projects like Syncrude and Hibernia?

Perhaps now that the Americans feel that they have a continental energy policy, they will pay a continental price, a price above the world oil price in order that we can bring on projects like Syncrude and Hibernia after they milk us of our medium and light crude.

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the history of energy development in this country has shown that investment follows secure markets, creates new jobs, and creates new sources of supply.

In this agreement we have secured markets for British Columbia's hydro, we have secured markets for the Prairies' oil and gas, we have secured markets for Ontario's nuclear potential, and we have secured markets for Quebec's hydro potential.

I certainly concede that investment of billions and billions of dollars will flow into the country because of the work that we have done in the free trade agreement.

FREE TRADE—SITUATION OF QUEBEC FARMERS

Mr. Robert Toupin (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for International Trade. The Free Trade Agreement provides for removing tariffs on processed food products, which means that Quebec farmers will lose a substantial part of their chicken and milk markets. At the same time, the Agreement will increase import quotas for chicken and eggs, and this means that Quebec producers will lose part of the Quebec market to American imports.

Mr. Speaker, my question is as follows: Could the Minister perhaps inform the House how many Quebec farmers will be forced to stop their operations and close down as a result of the measures contained in this Free Trade Agreement?

[English]

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, again the Hon. Member is raising unnecessary fears. There is nothing in this agreement—

Mr. Nystrom: Aren't you nice.

Miss Carney: Would Hon. Members allow me to answer their own Member's question?

Mr. Nystrom: Miss Congeniality!

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Minister.

Miss Carney: I believe that the question related to food processors.

I can assure the Hon. Member that we have taken measures in our agreement that will look after the concerns of the food processors. We have secured our supply management systems, and the fears that he raises are unjustified.

QUERY WHETHER STUDIES MADE OF FREE TRADE CONSEQUENCES FOR FARMERS

Mr. Robert Toupin (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, could the Minister inform the House whether her Government has carried out the requisite studies to determine the consequences and the cost of free trade for our farmers? If so, will she publish them? If not, does the Minister realize how dangerously her Government has been improvising in these negotiations?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I think that if the Hon. Member looks at the details of the Agreement with respect to marketing boards, he will find that the Canadian Government has kept its word, which was to maintain the marketing boards. We have done what we said we would do.

As far as reducing tariffs is concerned, there will be a reduction over a period of ten years, and if certain measures should lead to increased imports, we still have the GATT measures we can use to protect the Canadian market. You may be sure that the rights of Canadian producers will be respected and protected, Mr. Speaker. You can count on that!

EFFECT OF AGREEMENT ON GRAPE PRODUCERS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade.

Farmers across the country know that they have been sold out by the Government in the Canada-U.S. free trade agreement.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An Hon. Member: Right on!

Mr. Foster: Last April the President of the United States toasted the Prime Minister of Canada, and stated that he would be happy when all Canadians were drinking Californian wines. Last Sunday night he got his wish.

Ms. Copps: That's right.

Mr. Foster: I want to ask the Minister for International Trade why the Government in the free trade negotiations has totally sold out the grape producers in British Columbia and Ontario, and the wine industry? Why have they been totally abandoned and left out of this agreement? Is there any reason why the Government should completely destroy this industry and give it over to the Napa Valley in California?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, one of the objectives of a free trade agreement is to reduce tariff barriers between the two countries, and to reduce discriminatory price mark-ups and other barriers to trade.

Mr. Caccia: How about the jobs?

Miss Carney: If the Hon. Member is saying that under no circumstances can Canadian wine growers compete with Californian wine growers, then the doom and gloom that he portrays will be something which he will create himself.

We feel that the Canadian wine industry, and all Canadian industry, will be able to compete with American industry.

ELIMINATION OF SEASONAL TARIFFS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is the following. Surely all that the wine industry is receiving from this Government is the grapes of wrath.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Foster: That industry has been completely abandoned by this Government.

I wish to ask on behalf of those same producers of fruit and vegetables why the seasonal tariffs have been given away in these negotiations?

The United States has kept its dumping duties, and its countervail duties. Why were the seasonal tariffs given away, threatening thousands of jobs of Canadians?

Mr. Axworthy: Here is an answer from the sour grape herself.

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): The Opposition is yelling "sour grapes". I think that applies to their own question.

May I point out that the grape industry price mark-ups are discriminatory. Those discriminatory price mark-ups are in the order of 69 per cent and 65 per cent. They are considered a barrier to trade. There are cases before the GATT on this issue. This industry was facing a 301 trade action from the United States.

In terms of the vegetable growers, we were successful in negotiating a special 20-year protection clause for that industry. The head of the Horticultural Council was consulted, and was very pleased with what we had negotiated.

EFFECT OF TRADE AGREEMENT FOR CONSUMERS

Mrs. Mary Collins (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Over the past few days British Columbians have been exhilarated by the new trade deal and the opportunities that it provides for the resource and manufacturing sectors.

What about the consumers? Can the Minister assure this House that this trade deal will be good for ordinary Canadians when they go shopping for clothes, appliances, and furniture?

Can he tell us that a good trade deal for Canada is a good trade deal for the pocket-books of Canadians?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Finally, Mr. Speaker, a question of concern to ordinary Canadians.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, there is no question but that a real winner in this trade deal is the consumer.

The Economic Council estimates that on the Consumer Price Index there will be savings between 5.7 and 7.5 per cent. That will mean that every Canadian consumer, which means every Canadian, will now have a wider variety of goods, better quality, and cheaper prices.

If the NDP do not like that, they should go out and tell Canadian consumers that they do not want them to have cheaper prices, better quality, and more variety.

Mr. Rodriguez: Where are they going to get the money to buy it?

EFFECT OF AGREEMENT ON HORTICULTURAL INDUSTRY

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade who has just informed the Hon. Member for Algoma that the Government has done a good job of protecting the fruit and vegetable producers by introducing a clause that gives them protection for up to 20 years.

Is the Minister for International Trade not aware that that particular section of the agreement requires that the producers cannot rely on that clause, if acreage in this country goes up for any of those particular fruit or vegetables that they are attempting to put into place?

Why did the Government try to freeze production in this country at their present levels? Why has it no faith in the productive capability of Canadian farmers?

• (1500)

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think that the Hon. Member should wait until we have the full free trade agreement before us, with the level of detail that he is talking about.

We have negotiated special protection for the horticultural section of our agriculture. At the same time we have been able to ensure that we have greater access for meat producers, pork and beef producers. We have negotiated exemptions from meat import laws. We have managed to keep our commitment to maintain our supply-management schemes in Canada.

It is a very good agricultural package. It is the only agricultural package ever negotiated in a free trade agreement, and Canadians can be proud of it.

Mr. Althouse: The Hon. Minister should know that I just had a briefing session with our negotiator on this particular part of the package, and I think that my facts are correct.

PROCESSED FOODS—EFFECT OF AGREEMENT ON FARMERS

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Minister mentioned that we have maintained the marketing boards and the power of the marketing boards, in response to my colleague, the Hon. Member for Terrebonne. She said that the processors were very pleased with this agreement.

Can she tell us how the farmers who supply the processors are being protected under this agreement? It looks very much as if the processors are being guaranteed U.S. product, and Canadian producers of chickens, eggs, and turkeys are going to have to cut back their production to fit into this agreement.

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the NDP cannot attack this agreement on its facts, so they are trying to attack it through falsehoods, because in that area—

Some Hon. Members: Order!

Miss Carney: —we can be very, very clear that all interests have been protected.

Certainly to suggest that poultry producers and other producers are going to be ruined is totally distortive of the facts.

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP OF CHARTERED BANKS

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister for International Trade. Will the Minister explain to the House why the Government made two major concessions to the Americans without getting anything in return—first, scrapping the 25 per cent limit on foreign ownership of Canadian chartered banks and, second, exempting U.S. bank subsidiaries in Canada from the 16 per cent of total domestic assets limitation?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I can tell the Hon. Member that we got a balanced agreement in financial services. It was negotiated under the special attention of our Finance Minister and, very important in the financial services package, we were able to negotiate and preserve our Canadian access to the U.S. financial market.

EFFECT OF TRADE AGREEMENT

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same Minister. It is difficult for me to understand how she can say that it is a balanced agreement.

Canadian law permits one bank to operate many branches. American state law generally requires a separate corporation for each branch. Therefore, it is clearly easier for an American bank to establish a national presence here.

Second, the U.S. Glass-Steagall laws are still in place with the limitation of a Canadian bank on entering into the investment field, whereas Canadian banks here allow that.

It is very difficult to see how the Minister can describe such an unequal situation as a balanced agreement.

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the Hon. Member that in areas of financial services Canada has and will maintain better than national treatment in the U.S.

Our Canadian banks are able to do things in the United States that Americans are not able to do. We preserved that better than national treatment in our financial services package.

Mr. Speaker: This will be the last question of Question Period. The Hon. Member for Ottawa West on a single question.

PUBLIC SERVICE

LIMITATION ON FEES PAID TO FORMER EMPLOYEES

Mr. David Daubney (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Over a year ago the Board directed all agencies and government Departments to limit the amount of money they can pay in fees to former public servants working on contract to the Government.

The fee is limited to the former salary of the public servant, minus whatever pension the individual is in receipt of, and this limitation is in effect for the lifetime of the individual.

In light of the fact that the conflict of interest code contains other limitations on the association which former public servants can have with the Government, would the Minister agree that the lifetime duration of this provision is excessive, and would he consider shortening or eliminating it?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member for his representation. As he is aware, there are some very strict guidelines under the conflict of interest post-employment part of the code. I think he is aware as well that under certain conditions and provisions there can be modifications to that if the conditions warrant.

I will take the Hon. Member's representation to see if there is any flexibility which can be applied to take into consideration the specific point he has raised.

Mr. Speaker: I must advise the House that this is the end of Question Period.

I indicate to the Hon. Member for Prince Albert that I know he has been rising and I would hope that I would be able to take that into account tomorrow.

PRIVILEGE

ALLEGED USE OF UNPARLIAMENTARY LANGUAGE

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, in compliance with the rules of the House that questions of privilege must be raised as soon as possible after Question Period, I would like Your Honour to review the Hansard "blues" of the responses of the Minister for International Trade (Miss Carney).

Sometimes in the heat of argument one does not hear everything that was said but a sound to my ear came perilously close to the Minister accusing me of having been spreading falsehoods.

I think that that is not parliamentary, that it detracts from the opinion of Hon. Members, and that it is a practice that is not generally indulged in in the House.

I think it is particularly bad in this case where it is very difficult for the Government and all of us in Canada, with a procedure and an agreement, that the facts are only becoming known now. As we dig out the facts, even though they are well understood by the negotiator for our side and by the various commodity groups who were involved, it does not help for the Minister to accuse people who bring those facts forward, or to accuse me, of spreading falsehoods. They are very well known facts in the industry, in spite of the fact that she may not be fully aware of them yet.

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think I am as fully aware as anyone in the House of the details of an agreement which I helped to negotiate.

I can say very clearly that the allegation which is being made about poultry production is not true.

Mr. Keeper: Are you going to withdraw it?

Miss Carney: If Your Honour so decides that my language was unparliamentary, I know that you will direct me to withdraw it.

Mr. Speaker: I have listened to the comments of the Hon. Member for Humboldt—Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse) and of the Minister. I will examine Hansard and report back to the House.

SOCIAL SECURITY

DECLARATION OF INTERNATIONAL CO-OPERATION IN SOCIAL SECURITY WEEK—SIXTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF ASSOCIATION

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the week of October 4 to October 10 has been declared by the International Social Security Association to be the week of international co-operation in social security. During this week, which is also the sixtieth anniversary of the association, countries around the world have been asked to reflect on the benefits which each has gained by working with others toward the development of social security systems that more fully meet the needs and hopes of our citizens.

• (1510)

The Canadian member institutions of the International Social Security Association, the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Régie des rentes du Québec, have played a very active role in the work of this vital association, and we will continue to do so.

Canada, as a nation made up of people whose origins can be traced to virtually every country in the world, recognizes the importance of international co-operation in social security. The most concrete and best known form of co-operation is, undoubtedly, the social securities agreements which Canada has concluded in recent years and which bring benefits to thousands of our fellow citizens.

It has been my honour to sign 11 agreements in my term as Minister of National Health and Welfare. These agreements were concluded with Austria, Barbados, Denmark, Finland, the Federal Republic of Germany, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, Saint Lucia, Spain and Sweden. I look forward in the ensuing months to signing more.

I know that all Members of this House join me in congratulating the International Social Security Association for its accomplishments in its first 60 years and in wishing it well in the years to come.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, during this week of international social security, I applaud the Minister for his achievement of 11 social security agreements with various governments. I know they will be of particular benefit to Canadians who have come from other countries.

I want to raise a related matter of great importance to the future social security of Canadian citizens. Since this week also is National Family Week, I remind the Minister that Canada is a signatory to the International Covenant for Economic, Social and Cultural Rights. Article II of this covenant states that governments are required to provide for the basic needs of their citizens and to strive for continuous improvement of living conditions.

Under the Canada Assistance Plan, provinces are required to provide financial aid or assistance to any person in need in an amount that takes into account his basic requirements. How then does this Government explain the continuing increase of poverty among Canadian families with young children? How can we tolerate the fact that one out of every five of our children is being raised in poverty?

Consider what it means to be born into poverty, to be raised poor, to bear your children in poverty and to die poor. It means being shortchanged at birth by inadequate pre-natal care, not getting enough to eat, and being sick more often than other kids. It means entering the school system already seriously disadvantaged, being labelled "slow" because your hair does not shine, your eyes do not sparkle and you cannot sit still because you have had no breakfast. For girls it usually means having babies and repeating the cycle. For boys it usually means dropping out of school, heavy drinking, drug abuse and getting into trouble with the law.

In Canada we have condoned a situation of national child neglect. The decreasing incidence of poverty among the elderly proves beyond doubt that Government policy and programs can make the difference. I call upon the Government to turn its attention immediately to developing a comprehensive family policy that will provide some fairness and honesty for Canadian families and particularly for Canadian children who are poor.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, unlike the New Democratic Party I do not believe that the fight against poverty among seniors has been won. In fact, I believe that that Party made the commitment on many occasions to end the kind of discrimination that currently exists with respect to the federal Government in our own social security system dealing with single seniors, and with people who are separated and divorced who are not eligible for a spouse's allowance as a result.

I think for the Minister to make a great week, along with the commitment that he is making to social security internationally it would behoove him to stand up in the House and, rather than make an announcement in very glowing terms about what is happening across the world, say that he is prepared to end the discriminatory practices of the Government toward senior citizens. I do not think the battle against poverty among senior citizens has been won. I do believe that we are also launching a battle to fight the kind of poverty that is facing one child in five in Canada.

This evening I will be presenting a motion in the Standing Committee on National Health and Welfare that we have an in depth study of poverty among children across the country. I do not think we can trade them off one against the other. We have to recognize that as a society we should be protecting our helpless and our defenceless. That includes our elderly and our children. I think the Minister would be far better in this House today were he to make an announcement regarding an end to his discriminatory policy with respect to senior's pensions.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I think my colleague, the Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte Marie (Mr. Malépart), has said many times that as far as allowances and old age security are concerned, the policy is discriminatory, and if the Minister really wants to make this a week when Canadians could rejoice in our social security policy, he should announce in the House today that he will drop a policy that discriminates against the elderly and against persons who are single, divorced or separated, since it does not give them the same benefits as persons who are married or widowed. It is a discriminatory aspect of our social security system and it should stop.

SUPREME COURT ACT

PRESENTATION OF REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE ON BILL C-53

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present in both official languages the report of the Legislative committee on Bill C-53, an Act to amend The Supreme Court Act and to amend various other Acts in consequence thereof

[Editors note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

RESUMPTION AND CONTINUATION OF POSTAL SERVICES ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Jim Jepson (London East) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-269, an Act to provide for the resumption and continuation of postal services.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the Hon. Member have leave to introduce the Bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Jepson: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this Bill is to ensure the continuation of postal service for all Canadians, for seniors, for the disabled, for those receiving family allowance cheques and for businesses to function. The essential aspect of this Bill will be to take away the right to strike of CUPW and declare the Post Office an essential service.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

RAILWAY ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-270, an Act to amend the Railway Act.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the Hon. Member have leave to introduce the Bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate my colleague's co-operation. I was caught a little bit off guard.

The intention of this Private Member's Bill is to require the national railways to adhere to environmental laws which provincial governments have introduced. There are some serious problems on a provincial basis in this regard.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

AUDITOR GENERAL ACT

The report would then be submitted to the Speaker of the House of Commons and then laid before the House forthwith.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the Hon. Member have leave to introduce the Bill?

PETITIONS

FERMI II NUCLEAR REACTOR—REVIEW PROCESS

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have once again a petition, one of a large series, which comes from towns in my constituency from Windsor south to La Salle, Anderton, Amherstberg, Malton and includes people from further into the constituency in McGregor, Essex and other parts of Essex—Windsor. All of them protest very vigorously against the very dangerous safety record of Fermi II, the American nuclear reactor, which is so close to the borders of Canada and of my constituency specifically.

They call on us, the Parliament of Canada, to make sure that immediate negotiations take place with the United States to see to it that there is a neutral review conducted both by Canadians and Americans to see to it that this reactor is reviewed before it is allowed to go into full capacity operation at any stage in the future.

OPPOSITION TO BILL C-55

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure and the obligation under Standing Order 106 to present to the House some petitions. The first concerns the Governments refugee legislation, Bill C-55 and it is signed by residents of the Cities of Scarborough, Weston and Bramalea in the Metro Toronto area. The other comes from residents of Vancouver, Port Alberni, Victoria and Kelowna.

Essentially, the petitioners are asking the Government to drastically alter and reform Bill C-55 by eliminating the prescreening stage, deleting the safe third country concept and improving the refugee appeal system by removing it to the Federal Court and ensuring that there is a proper, fair and expedient appeal system and to discourage those who wish to abuse the system by making it speedier.

Order Paper Questions

CONSTITUTIONAL ACCORD—RECOGNITION OF MULTICULTURALISM

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): The second petition comes from residents of the City of Edmonton, and others from residents of the Cities of Montreal, St. Leonard and Toronto. Essentially, these petitioners are concerned with the Meech Lake Accord as it affects the multicultural heritage of nearly one-third of Canadian citizens and are asking that Clause 1 be amended so that when we define what it means to be a Canadian, we also include the reference to the multicultural and aboriginal heritages that join with linguistic duality to give a full and meaningful definition of Canadianism.

POINT OF ORDER

REFERENCE TO FORMER PREMIER OF ALBERTA

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I will simply to refer the House to page 9724 of Hansard where, in an exchange with the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark), I was referring to the past Premier of Alberta, a man with whom philosophically I disagree, but on a personal basis, a man with whom I have been friends for many years. I referred to him as Peter Lougheed and that is how I have always referred to Peter Lougheed. When I talk to him personally, I call him that, and they have written here "Low-heed".

I just do not want Hansard to reflect in any way negatively against the past Premier of Alberta. As a fellow Albertan, I particularly feel slighted that Hansard would have done this. However it is partly my fault because I did not read the "blues". If I had looked at them, I would have picked that up. In British Columbia, when we refer to Lougheed Place or Lougheed Mall or Lougheed Highway, that is the way we pronounce it, and if they spell it "Low-heed", it is intended as no slight against the past Premier of Alberta.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the Hon. Member for his intervention and I think that will meet the sensibilities of all Hon. Members and any others outside of this House.

PRIVILEGE

CRTC—ALLEGED ERRONEOUS INFORMATION—CLOSING DATE—MR. SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I now have a ruling to bring to the Chamber. On September 23, the Hon. Member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco) raised a complaint with the chair alleging that certain actions and/or lack of action by the Canadian Radio Television Commission amounted to a breach of the privileges of the Hon. Member.

After hearing the case put forward, I said in part that the Hon. Member may not have a question of privilege, but I added, and I quote what I said on that day: "It most certainly is a complaint." Regretfully, I have to repeat that I am still of that mind. I think there is a complaint and a very real one.

While I will not comment on the Hon. Member's words when he talked about the "cavalier and inneficient manner of the operations of CRTC", on the facts presented, the Hon. Member for Kootenay West has a valid complaint and reason to be upset and angry.

[Translation]

As was said when the subject was raised, some simple changes in the regulations governing applications for rate changes would be sufficient to prevent this kind of frustration.

• (1530)

[English]

I do not think I need go into the various definitions of privilege found in the authorities May, Bourinot and Beauchesne, but this type of problem is not covered by them. I will, however, refer Hon. Members to Citation 16 and Citation 17 of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition.

[Translation]

I must therefore conclude, with all due respect, that the Hon. Member does not have a question of privilege.

[English]

I would add that this does not leave the Hon. Member without recourse. This fact needs to be emphasized. The recent reforms adopted by the House allow Members to pursue such matters vigorously, not only in one of the several standing committees but also under Private Members' Business. The Hon. Member for Kootenay West has made his point forcefully but, I repeat, it is with regret that the Chair cannot take any further action and the matter raised cannot go forward under a finding of prima facie privilege.

I want to thank the Hon. Member for his co-operation and patience in waiting for this ruling. I would like to be able to help him with his particular problem but, regretfully, I cannot under the concept of privilege. However, I hope the frank comments of the Chair might be helpful to the Hon. Member.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CHANGE IN ORDER OF PRECEDENCE OF PRIVATE MEMBERS' BILL C-214 AND C-262

Mr. Speaker: I have received written notice from the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) and the Hon. It has not been possible to arrange an exchange of positions in the order of precedence pursuant to Standing Order 39(3)(a). Accordingly, I am directing the Table to drop both items of business to the bottom of the order of precedence. There will be no Private Members' Business on the days scheduled for those items, namely Thursday, October 8, and Friday, October 9. NOW THEREFORE the House of Commons resolves that an amendment to the Constitution of Canada be authorized to be made by proclamation issued by Her Excellency the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada in accordance with the schedule hereto.

SCHEDULE

Constitution Act, 1867

1. The Constitution Act, 1867 is amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 1 thereof, the following section:

"2. (1) The Constitution of Canada shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with

(a) the recognition that the existence of French-speaking Canadians, centred in Quebec but also present elsewhere in Canada, and English-speaking Canadians, concentrated outside Quebec but also present in Quebec, constitutes a fundamental characteristic of Canada; and

95E. An amendment to sections 95A to 95D or this section may be made in accordance with the procedure set out in subsection 38(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, but only if the amendment is authorized by resolutions of the legislative assemblies of all the provinces that are, at the time of the amendment, parties to an agreement that has the force of law under subsection 95B(1)."

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, I begin my remarks on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord by recalling that the last two times I had an opportunity to speak on the Constitution was, first, in the fall of 1980, and again in 1981 at the time of the last constitutional upheaval, you might say.

I recall, and I say this not by way of excuse but by way of illustrating something, I hope, profound, that I was much more concerned to have a prepared text at that time than I am now. What I mean to illustrate by that is that over the years since 1980-81 I feel that what Members of Parliament have to say about constitutional matters has become less and less important. I want to illustrate that, if I might, by talking about some of the developments since then.

First, some would argue that the effect of the Charter of Rights we passed at that time has been to take decisions away from Parliament, which might otherwise have been made there, and placed them in the courts. Of course many people feel that is a good thing rather than a bad thing. However, the fact of the matter is, no matter how you feel about it, there are things being decided elsewhere which at one time would have been decided here in Parliament.

Second, if the free trade agreement comes to be a fact of Canadian life, many things that would have been open to Parliament to decide will, of necessity, be decided in the continental market-place and no longer by Parliament.

Miss Carney: That is wrong.

Mr. Blaikie: So I feel as a Member of Parliament that my role, and that of Parliament itself, and the Canadian Government for that matter, will have been diminished.

Third, I also feel that the process surrounding the Meech Lake Accord has diminished the role of Members of Parliament. I want to preface my remarks by saying it is my intention to vote for the Meech Lake Accord. Let there be no confusion on that account. However, I feel that the process which has attended the Accord has set some very dangerous precedents with respect to the role of Members of Parliament in constitutional change.

It has been called executive federalism. Whatever you want to call it, the fact is that 11 people, the provincial Premiers and the Prime Minister, can arrive at agreements which profoundly affect the future of the country and then have Parliament put in the position, as we have been put, of not being able to amend what was decided by those 11 persons.

My support for the Accord was much more comfortable support in the early days when I thought Parliament might have an opportunity to amend the Accord. I thought the committee process might be a place where some of the obvious flaws in the Accord might be remedied.

The first flaw, of course, that comes to mind is the obvious injustice done to northern Canada by virtue of the requirement that there be unanimity with respect to the admission of new provinces. For the life of me I cannot understand why that was incorporated in the agreement and why, when there is almost universal agreement on the injustice of that provision, the agreement could not have been opened up to provide for that particular amendment. I suppose it has something to do with the politics of it, I do not know. I suppose there are perhaps some Premiers who feel they did not get all they wanted and that if somehow the agreement were to be opened up, then new political pressures would be put on them to open up the agreement to get what they are being criticized for not getting. I understand that, but surely to God, when it comes to so obvious an injustice as that done to northern Canada, we should have been able to do it.

With respect to my support for the Accord, I want to say that I am going to be voting for it because at the end of the day, having heard all the arguments, certainly having been convinced of the imperfection of what is before us, I still think a Canada which accepts this Accord and goes beyond it to new constitutional evolution will be better than the Canada which would exist if this agreement were to fall apart.

That is an over-all judgment which every Member of this place has to make for himself or herself, and which political Parties also have to make. I emphasize that it is an over-all judgment. It is not a question of how and to what degree various Members are committed to the rights of aboriginal peoples or the multicultural nature of Canada or the equality rights in the Constitution or the importance of federal leadership in social policy, or whatever is on the great long list of concerns people have about this Accord. It is a question of people having to make an over-all judgment about what would be best. It would be easy for Members of Parliament, except perhaps those in Government, to say that we can vote against it on these grounds and therefore be absolved of any responsibility for the consequences of the imperfections of the agreement which become known in the future.

However, I think we have the responsibility to ask ourselves what we would do if our vote made the difference. Would we prefer the Canada which would result from the breakdown of this agreement or the Canada which would result from this agreement? My judgment at this time is that I would prefer the Canada which would result from the agreement. I hope that history proves me right. It is in the nature of constitutional debate that everyone has the responsibility to make his or her own decision.

I spoke earlier of my fears as a Member of Parliament about the growth of executive federalism. The current Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) organizes First Ministers' conferences by putting the Premiers into a room without their advisers or any backup, and there is no record kept. The Prime Minister is the only one who has any say about what the draft statement will look like. The Prime Minister goes out before the Premiers and has his little show with the media. The Premiers are not allowed to comment until some time after. From what I have heard from some who have participated, the whole process is quite orchestrated. This is no way to run a country. I hope this is peculiar to the style of the current Prime Minister and will not be endemic to First Ministers' conferences which will be institutionalized.

I would like more parliamentary participation to be institutionalized in constitutional negotiation and debate. I know the committee made some recommendations in that regard. I would like to call attention, as I know others have, to the proposal made by John Holtby for a more comprehensive parliamentary and legislative exercise which would include members of the legislatures of Canada on a umbrella-like committee. I recommend that proposal to Members who are interested in thinking about how parliamentarians and legislators can be more involved.

I want to speak a bit about the business of unanimity, and point out some of the ironies which attend constitutional policies and debates. I recall the debate in 1980-81 about the amending formula. It sometimes happens that people, by virtue of their vehemence against something, end up with a situation which is actually worse than that which they were attacking and which actually conforms more to what they were attacking than to that with which they started out.

For instance, I recall that people in the Prairie provinces in 1980-81 were very concerned about the amending formula proposed by the then Liberal Government which would have given Quebec a veto. By the way, the veto power which Quebec has under the Meech Lake Accord is much less than that previously proposed veto power. It has a veto only with regard to federal institutions rather than with regard to everything. That should be kept in mind by people who may be concerned about the veto of Quebec, as well as the veto of other provinces on federal institutions.

The people of the Prairie provinces were very concerned about Quebec having a veto. That same amending formula provided that any two western provinces could prevent something by not agreeing to the original veto which was provided for in that amending formula. As a result of objections to that particular formula we ended up with another formula which provided that two-thirds of the provinces comprising 50 per cent of the population could veto something. Under that formula something could be done in Canada without the consent of any of the Prairie provinces. That has always struck me as ironic.

It is also ironic that, thanks to two very significant political figures in our history, Mr. Trudeau and Mr. Diefenbaker, the "one Canada" heroes, the notion of any special veto for Quebec was made so anathema that when the Premiers went to Meech Lake many of them knew that for domestic political reasons if Quebec was to get any kind of veto over anything they had to have it too.

The tremendous political irony is that by creating the political context which they did, one could argue that Mr. Trudeau and Mr. Diefenbaker set the stage for the very kind of Canada which they claimed to be so much against. In fact, that is not the kind of Canada which they were either for or against because somewhere along the line the proposition got sort of transmogrified into a situation in which all the provinces now have a veto with regard to certain matters. That is an incredible irony which should not go unremarked upon.

There is another thing which amazes me with regard to the principle of unanimity. We are about to enter into a constitutional situation in which unanimity will be required with regard to federal institutions. Yet, through the free trade agreement, the Government proposes to change the very economic constitution of this country without unanimity, without the approval of at least five of the ten provinces, and without even the requirement of a vote in Parliament. There may be a vote, but there is no requirement for one. It is a shortcoming of our system that something as important as the economic constitution of the country can be changed in the way in which the Government proposes to change it without a shred of unanimity, without even a consensus.

I know that other Members of Parliament, particularly some of the Conservative persuasion, will disagree with me, but I hope they will hear me out. I feel as though my country was sentenced to a slow death on Sunday morning. I believe that in time we will see the erosion of everything that I value about Canada as it is and as I thought it could become through the political process and the building up of an independent Canada on the northern half of North America.

I feel as though Meech Lake has all of a sudden become irrelevant. I have the sickening feeling in the pit of my stomach that it will not really matter any more, if the Government gets away with what it has in mind. In the offing is a process whereby Canada as we know it will come not to exist in any event, and, for example, whether the provinces or the federal Government appoints Senators is trivial in the long run. That about which I speak will not, of course, happen over night and that is what makes this debate on free trade so difficult. Again, it is a question of judgment as to what will arise out of any particular decision.

When I spoke on the Constitution in 1980 and 1981, I did not talk only about the need to patriate the Constitution but the need to patriate our economy. While the Liberals made some effort to patriate our economy through the National Energy Program in the following years, we are seeing the complete opposite now, where our economy is being exported by integrating it so profoundly into the American economy and North American market.

I want to deal with aboriginal rights. I was one of those in 1980 who was warning my Leader and others that I would not vote for the package as it was until it included aboriginal rights. I feel very good about that aspect of my political life, that we were able to achieve that recognition. While it was not as full and complete as we wanted, nevertheless I recall being part of the process whereby the Government of the day had to bend in order to get the kind of approval it wanted for that patriation package.

In my opinion, aboriginal rights are not endangered in any way by this particular Accord. I believe that we will only achieve a truly just relationship with native people when we, as a society, truly repent for the way we have treated native people. Constitutions will not achieve that, nor will the courts or many other mechanisms that are used. It will be a matter of political will, public opinion, and a change in the consciousness of Canadians. Quite frankly, I despair whether that change will ever happen, but that change in consciousness and political will is necessary in order to meet the wishes of the native leadership in this country.

I want to deal with one other issue in the minute I have remaining, and would hope that Hon. Members would indulge me for a few more minutes. It concerns the cynicism of the observations made about the various political parties with respect to Meech Lake. I speak particularly of the cynicism which has attended the NDP position on this matter.

Those who are seriously concerned about our position should review the history of NDP policy with respect to Quebec. They will see, as pointed out by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) yesterday, that the New Democratic Party's position now with respect to Quebec and the constitutional discussions has its roots in the very formation of the Party back in 1961. It is very cynical and wrong for journalists or others, including the general public, to say that the NDP is agreeing to the Meech Lake Accord because we are high in the polls or want support in Quebec.

This reflects a certain psychology that takes over political commentary. I have seen it happen with respect to other things since we began to do very well in the polls. For instance, some journalists have commented about the new suits I am wearing, when they are exactly the same suits I have been wearing for the last two years. Another example was when people thought that the reason my Leader was angry about the behaviour of one of my colleagues when President Reagan was here was that we were high in the polls. I can tell you that when I wore a black arm band when President Reagan was here in 1981 I was chewed out by the Leader, and we were low in the polls at that time.

There are principles which we hold whether or not we are high in the polls. Our high standing in the polls did not stop the New Democratic Party from taking what was perceived as an unpopular position with respect to refugee legislation. Our standing in the polls did not affect our position with respect to amendments to the drug patent laws even though they were popular in Quebec. That did not change our position, because we have principles.

One of our principles has been to recognize Quebec as a distinct society. It is a principle that goes back far into the history of the Party. Anyone who believes that what we are doing is a reflection of political opportunism is dead wrong.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member found it necessary to conclude his remarks by trying to explain away the so-called public cynicism. He appears to be concerned about the public perception that the New Democratic Party somehow has sold out the ship in order to garner more support in Quebec.

He indicated during his remarks that in the previous constitutional debate in 1980 and 1981 he was about to vote against that particular Constitution because aboriginal rights were not recognized. He went on to say that the Liberal Government of the day finally gave some recognition to the aboriginal people. He said further that in his view aboriginal rights are not endangered by the Meech Lake Accord.

According to a great number of submissions and representations made by aboriginal people to the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, they feel that their rights are endangered because they are not recognized in the first part of the Meech Lake Accord which speaks of the fundamental characteristics of Canada. Will he explain why he believes aboriginal rights are not endangered when the aboriginal people of Canada, the ones most directly affected by the Meech Lake Accord, say that their rights are adversely affected? Is he presuming to understand the situation better than the aboriginal people of Canada?

I suggest to the Hon. Member that it is because of statements like that that Canadians really wonder about the NDP position and perhaps about the Hon. Member's position. A few short years ago he was prepared to vote against the Constitution because aboriginal rights were not recognized. Today, when aboriginal people of Canada are saying that this Meech Lake Accord is not in their best interests, the Hon. Member decides that he knows better than the aboriginal peoples and will vote contrary to their wishes. Will he explain the obvious inconsistency in his position?

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is either obvious or inconsistent. At the time of the last constitutional change I was concerned, as were many others, that aboriginal people were in a particularly dangerous situation because of the nature of what was happening vis-à-vis patriation, given the relationship between the claims of aboriginal people and the Crown. At the time of patriation, if certain language was not built into the Constitution, it would be of grave danger, indeed, to their rights.

I believe that this particular constitutional change neither advances nor retards the possibility that aboriginal peoples will get the justice which they seek within Canadian society. It is my understanding of the position they put before the committee that they were legitimately concerned that they would somehow be taken off the constitutional agenda by not having built into this Accord the provision for more constitutional conferences.

• (1600)

I certainly do not think that we have seen the last of constitutional conferences on aboriginal rights, even if there is no such provision in the Accord. That is not something which is prohibited by the Accord. That is, pursuant to what I said earlier, something that will be created by the political process and by the political will to deal with those problems, whether it be through conferences or whatever the process may be.

I do not feel badly about the position that I have taken in this respect. I have had many opportunities, both prior to being here when I worked in the church with Project North and with other groups and with native leaders, many of whom came before the committee, to discuss this issue with native people. I do not think the Hon. Member should presume to lecture me or anyone else on this matter.

Ms. Jewett: Mr. Speaker, I want to pursue this matter for a minute or two and ask the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) a question. I expect the Hon. Member has read the report of the joint committee, in particular Chapter 15 which contains the recommendations of the joint committee. I hope that all Hon. Members will read it, if they believe in the committee system of this House.

In fact, on the question of putting aboriginal rights and, in particular, the rights to self-government back onto the constitutional agenda, the committee makes some very explicit, very strong recommendations, beginning with the resumption of funding, which was cut off in June of this year at the end of that round of constitutional conferences on aboriginal rights. Indeed, a whole sort of work plan is laid out in the final chapter of the joint committee's report on the constitutional Accord.

My first question to this Hon. Member who is a member of the reform committee of the House of Commons is whether in his judgment that kind of accepted recommendation, that is, accepted by all Parties, will have an impact on the Government, particularly in view of the fact that they have recommended what George Erasmus asked for, namely, a constitutional conference beginning in 1990.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, just on that point, I think that there are two questions to deal with, of course. The recommendations of the committee with respect to aboriginal claims, and also with respect to funding, ought to be followed by the Government. But I am beginning to be concerned that a Government which has made so much of parliamentary reform since its coming into office in 1984, and for that matter a Prime Minister who has made so much of parliamentary reform, is starting to develop a very bad record with respect to paying attention to the unanimous recommendations of committees. I would think that in their heart of hearts this should concern some of the Tory back-benchers, even though they might not want to admit it. There were the unanimous recommendations of the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs with respect to food irradiation which have been completely ignored by the Government. There are the recommendations of the committee with respect to the matter under discussion, but also with respect to other amendments. There are other examples as well which dim the hope of those who were involved in parliamentary reform, that a renewed committee system, and renewed political life in the committee system of this House, that this would happen through the Government actually paying heed to the recommendations of committees. That hope has begun to weaken as a result of actions taken by the Government or, more appropriately, as a result of actions not taken by the Government, actions that have been urged on it by committees and recommendations that have been made by committees which have been simply ignored by the Government.

Mr. Lawrence I. O'Neil (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I want to say, first, that it is with a great deal of honour that I participate in this debate on what is an historic constitutional Accord, perhaps a milestone of governments in the last number of decades. It is an important debate because it focuses on the unity of our country. It focuses on the vision that we have as Canadians of our country and where we would like it to go.

We have heard a great deal in the course of this debate about the Accord, what it should say, what it does not say, and what are its strengths. Before we But to make look at the terms of the Accord we must understand what is the issue. We must understand the political, legal and constitutional context in which we as a country find ourselves in 1987.

What is the issue? Surely, the issue that faces all Members of this House and all Canadians is whether or not we as a country can accommodate Quebec within our constitutional family. We must ask ourselves whether we have the flexibility, the understanding, the commitment and the political will to reach out to the people of Quebec as we promised to do. In the 1980 referendum, Quebecers voted to stay within this country. They voted by a narrow margin to stay within this country. Fully 40 per cent of the people of Quebec voted to leave Canada as we know it today. Approximately 50 per cent of the French-speaking Members from Quebec voted to leave.

That is hardly a recommendation for the manner in which this country has been governed. It is hardly a recommendation for previous governments that have attempted to reconcile the national interests with the legitimate aspirations of the people of the Province of Quebec.

There are those who have said and will say that the question of 1980 was somehow not truly known to the people of Quebec when they voted, that it was a slanted question. But those who make that argument considerably underestimate the intelligence and awareness of the people of Quebec.

How could the people of Quebec participate in debate for months and years about the future of their province and not know what the question was when they went into the voting booths to vote yes or no? That is an argument which I cannot accept, and which somehow implies a certain degree of inferiority on the part of the people of Quebec. In fact, if anything, the people of Quebec have superior instincts in the political field.

The 1980 referendum was a request from the people of Quebec for Canada to adapt the Constitution, to allow the province to evolve within the Canadian family. But what happened? What followed was a series of actions by the national Government, and finally in concert with the provinces, which excluded Quebec, decisions were made about the fundamental nature of this country, about the future of the country, without the consent of the Province of Quebec.

There are those who will say, We would never have gotten the consent of Premier René Lévesque and his separatist government that ruled the Quebec of the day. What they seem to ignore is that the National Assembly of Quebec voted unanimously to reject the terms of that Accord. The terms of 1981 and 1982 were not acceptable to any member of the National Assembly of Quebec, not just to the separatists that sat in the National Assembly. That is the situation that faced this country, that was part of this country until 1984.

In 1984, our present Prime Minister outlined to the people of Canada that he was committed to reconciling Quebec but reconciling Canada to Quebec as well. He said he was interested in national reconciliation, constitutional reform, and making the evolution of this country a top priority of the Government. What followed then were discussions, after his election as Prime Minister, with the Premiers.

Finally, in August of 1986, the 10 provincial Premiers and the Government of Canada decided that the Quebec issue was the primary issue that had to be addressed at First Ministers' constitutional meetings. That is why earlier this year the Premiers came together and were able to reach an accord. What followed August of 1986 were months of preparation by the Ministers in the respective provinces. This deal was not a rush deal. There are those who say that it was reached in two days. Those people who make that criticism are acknowledging only their ignorance of political and constitutional affairs. If they knew nothing about the negotiations that preceded the meetings of the spring that resulted in this Accord, they are simply admitting that they did not take the trouble to be informed.

The Accord of 1982 was imperfect in that it left Quebec out. The Accord of 1987 brings Quebec in. In my opinion, criticism of the process is unfounded. What about the deal? That is what truly interests Canadians. They are pleased to have Quebec within the constitutional family, but they will also ask, "Just what did it cost us?" In my view, it did not cost Canadians. Canadians only win as a result of the Meech Lake Accord. They win a united country.

Let us look at some of the terms of the Accord itself. In the Accord there are two new rules of interpretation. One is the recognition of Quebec within Canada as a distinct society. Some will say that that confers upon Quebec the right to pass laws, and say that it is a distinct society, therefore, it can do a, b, or c. But the legal opinions are quite to the contrary. This is merely a rule of interpretation.

It states in the agreement that "the Constitution of Canada shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with . . . "; in other words, these are rules of interpretation. These are not grants of legislative powers. The Charter of Rights today provides that the Charter of Rights shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the reality of this country; that certain things can be done consistent with the rules of a democratic system. The reference to a distinct society is merely read in collateral and in conjunction with that reference.

What about the English minority in Quebec? The Accord also provides that Canada has dualism. In Canada there are English-speaking Canadians in a minority in Quebec, and French-speaking Canadians in a minority in many other provinces. To this point in time provinces that had rejected the concept of official bilingualism and a commitment to accepting and preserving the bilingual nature of the provinces have accepted in this Accord that as a fundamental characteristic of this country they will preserve its dualistic nature.

What about the powers of the legislatures and the Government of Canada? Again, the Accord states that nothing shall derogate from the powers, rights, or privileges of Parliament, the Government of Canada, or the legislatures or Governments of the provinces, including any powers, rights, or privileges relating to language. That is a very clear indication of the agreement that was reached by the Premiers.

What are some of the other terms? There is a reference and a decision made that the provinces may nominate persons to the Senate, and that the Government of Canada then will make a selection based on those nominations. There are those who say that we are giving away the shop; we are giving to the provinces control of the Senate. The appointment rests with the Government of Canada, but more basic than that is the reality that the Senate belongs to no government. It does not and should not belong to the Government of Canada. It is a national institution that belongs to all Canadians and is designed to reflect the co-operative and federal nature of this country. What a better way than to have joint appointments to the Senate to reflect this reality. Why should the Government of Canada be the sole appointing body to the Senate? In addition, there is a commitment to effect reform of the Senate.

In my view those who argue that somehow the Government of Canada is weakened, do not understand the federal nature of this country. They do not understand the agreement that was reached in 1867, or the agreements that followed that brought in other provinces. Those provinces agreed that this was a federal system of government; that the provinces had roles to play, but that these roles were protected by the Constitution and that no attempt would be made by the national Government to undermine that commitment in our constitutional documents.

A lot is also heard about the immigration agreement, that Quebec can somehow have a say in the nature of immigration into that province. This is not new ground. For a number of years the Province of Quebec has been a party to an agreement with the Government of Canada under which both Governments agree that the Province of Quebec has a role to play and a say in the nature of the immigration as it affects that province. That is not new.

It is also not new that there are amendments to the Supreme Court of Canada. In this regard, I hear and read some amazing comments. Because the provinces have a right to make nominations to the Supreme Court of Canada, we hear some people state that the Supreme Court of Canada will be an instrument of the provincial Governments, and that we will have pro-provincial decisions from the Supreme Court of Canada. If we accept that, we must also accept that until this point in our history the Supreme Court of Canada has been a political instrument of the Government of Canada, the national Government, undermining the legitimate role of the provinces as laid out in our Constitution.

Until this point in our history, the Supreme Court of Canada has been appointed by the national Government. In truth, the Supreme Court of Canada belongs to neither level of government. It belongs to the people. It is a national institution, and it should not be nor will it be an instrument of manipulation for either level of government. That is very basic to our understanding of the constitutional principles upon which our country is based. The Supreme Court of Canada is now entrenched in our Constitution. In my opinion, the institution of the Supreme Court of Canada is a big winner.

There is also discussion about shared-cost programs and that the national Government has lost its ability to instigate, participate, and promote new national shared-cost programs. In fact, quite the contrary is true. For the first time there is a constitutional recognition that the Government of Canada has a role to play in initiating programs in areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction. We are not talking about programs in areas of national jurisdiction. We are talking about a role for the Government of Canada implementing programs in areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction. In other words, in areas where traditionally the Government of Canada has had no right to be. This enhances and legitimizes the role of the Government of Canada to put forward programs that are in the national interest. At the same time, it allows the Government of Canada the flexibility to institute those programs in order that the needs of the provinces and the people are addressed.

Of course, there are national objectives established by the national Government. If any provinces does not meet these objectives, the money for the program can be withheld from that province. That is a tremendous lever in negotiations. We cannot ignore the realities of federal-provincial negotiation and communication that must take place.

What about the yearly conferences on the economy, and on other issues? There are those who say that we are creating a third level of government. In reality we are simply putting into the Constitution a role for the provinces and the Government of Canada to play in concert with the important issues of the economy and constitutional reform. This is the ongoing reality. There is nothing to fear. All the people who will attend these conferences representing the Government of Canada and the provinces are elected officials. We are all accountable every four or five years. Accountability, which is so much a part of the democratic system, is the greatest guarantee for Canadians. If Canadians do not like the decisions which are being made, they will change their representatives.

A wide range of issues comes to mind when we talk about the Accord. As we in the joint committee on the Constitution identified, there are weaknesses in the Accord. On that there is no debate. Nor is there any serious debate that the other constitutional documents which are the basis of our country had their weaknesses. There is no such thing as a perfect constitutional document, not in 1987, 1982, or 1867.

In 1982 there was a constitutional document involving repatriation and acceptance of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms which excluded the Province of Quebec. What could be a more glaring deficiency than excluding a full third of the people of the country? It was not unanimous in 1982. That was a glaring defect, but that document was pushed forward by some of the same people in the House today who say that the Accord must be stopped because it is imperfect. That is the hypocrisy of those who oppose this document, in my view, for what they may see to be short-term political gain. However, that is a short-term view of Canada which should not be a part of this debate.

What is at issue is the future of the country. We are all being called upon to rise above the temptation to score small political points at a great price to Canada. Today we are talking about a document which is not perfect, but we are talking about a document which is very good for Canada. Those who want a detailed commentary on the Accord itself should read the 1987 report of the special joint committee.

For five weeks I had the opportunity to raise questions and to hear witnesses respond to those questions, and in my opinion all the issues are addressed with great satisfaction in the report.

There are imperfections, but we cannot achieve a perfect document. No Government, no peoples, can achieve a perfect document. However, we can achieve a good document, and we have achieved a good document in this Accord.

It would be very dangerous for us to set about the task now of renegotiating or unravelling the Accord. To those who think that the questions which were put to the committee were not discussed by the First Ministers, I say that they have a great deal of naivete. The First Ministers were well advised. All these questions are not new, and in fact all of them were addressed. Some of the very basic questions at which the committee looked were described to us by some of the participants at the First Ministers' Conference as deal breakers. In other words, they went through the debate and a deal was reached, the first unanimous deal of its kind in 120 years.

It is hard to achieve unanimous agreements. It is not time now to look for the perfect solution. It is time to take what we have, which is a good Accord, to move forward, and to make it perfect over time.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, in conclusion the Hon. Member said that it is hard to achieve a unanimous decision, referring to the Meech Lake Accord, and I suppose applauding the fact that the 10 First Ministers and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) were able to come to an agreement. His words were that it is hard to achieve a unanimous agreement or position.

However, at the beginning of his speech the Hon. Member talked about Senate reform and addressed some of the concerns of the people of Canada with regard to Senate reform. He said that it was possible to reform the Senate. He summarily dismissed those of us who are concerned about this particular provision which requires unanimity in order to secure Senate reform.

He says that it is hard to achieve unanimous consent. How then can he explain the facility by which Senate reform might be possible? The Hon. Member knows that as a result of the Meech Lake Accord it will be impossible to achieve Senate reform because of the very fact that unanimity is required. At some point in the future there will be those who will want reform of the Senate. The Hon. Member is from Atlantic Canada. He knows that a lot of people from Atlantic Canada would like to see Senate reform.

Does he really believe that the Province of Ontario, for example, or that the Province of Quebec will at some time in the future agree to giving the Province of Prince Edward Island or the Province of Nova Scotia the exact, same power in the Senate; in other words, equal representation? Does he really believe that the Province of Ontario will agree to giving the Province of Nova Scotia the same power or clout in a new reformed Senate?

The Hon. Member quickly dismisses those who have concerns with regard to this provision as being naive. However, I suggest to the Hon. Member that it is naive of him to believe for a moment that at any point in the future there will be unanimous consent to reform the Senate and to ensure that every province has equal representation in the Senate of Canada. It is impossible because of the very fact that unanimity is required to achieve Senate reform. As some commentators have pointed out, the Meech Lake Accord has put the country in a type of constitutional strait-jacket.

With regard to appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada, the Hon. Member criticized the present process. He suggested that for the last 120-odd years the Supreme Court of Canada was an instrument of the national Government. Surely the Hon. Member, who I understand was trained in law, is not suggesting for a moment that over the last 120 years the Supreme Court of Canada has been a puppet of the political party in office. He referred to the Supreme Court of Canada as a national institution. Surely the Hon. Member will agree that if it is in fact a national institution, then the national Government should be ultimately responsible for appointments to that national institution.

He also said that it was important for provincial Governments to appoint members to the Supreme Court of Canada. I ask the following question in conclusion. Why is it so important for the provinces of Canada to have that particular power, if not for the fact that the provinces want to appoint judges to the Supreme Court of Canada, because they believe if they appoint judges, that over a period of time the judges on the Supreme Court of Canada appointed by these particular provinces will in effect be rendered puppets of these provinces?

Mr. O'Neil: Mr. Speaker, first of all I invite the Hon. Member to read the "blues" or to listen more closely when he is in the House. If he had been listening closely he would have understood that my comments on the Supreme Court of Canada were simply that I rejected that the Supreme Court of Canada was an instrument of the federal Government over the last 120 years.

What I said was that if we accept the logic that it will be an instrument of the provinces in the future, we must accept the logic that it was an instrument of the federal Government in the past. That is the point, Mr. Speaker. I am glad to hear that the Hon. Member agrees with my logic.

• (1630)

I would also say that when the Member talks about the Supreme Court of Canada as a national institution he reveals what I understand to be his view of Canada, namely that national institutions are controlled by the Government that sits in Ottawa. But that is not what I understand about this nation. I understand that national institutions are institutions in which all of us, the provinces and the Government of Canada, have a part. That is a federal nation we live in and that is the view of this country that I accept. I know that perhaps there are people in his Party who reject that notion, and that is precisely why we as a political Party have replaced national confrontation by national reconciliation.

Finally, when the Member asked questions about the Senate and whether or not reform is possible, he makes my point. Just a few months ago it was possible to reach unanimous agreement on perhaps the most difficult of all issues facing our country, an issue that has faced us for a number of decades, that is, bringing Quebec back into the fold by reaching agreement on the wide-ranging Accord.

The Member asked whether Ontario would agree to Nova Scotia having as much clout in the Senate as Ontario does. With or without Meech Lake that question is equally valid, for as things stand today with Quebec not at the table, Ontario has a veto over reform of the Senate. In either case Ontario has great influence over whether or not we have reform. In the absence of Quebec—with Quebec not at the table—meaningful constitutional reform is almost impossible because you have to get a certain number of the nine provinces that are at the table to agree, Mr. Speaker. When Quebec is at the table, some provinces, like my own, have a natural ally. We have an ally with whom we can forge agreements that can result in good constitutional change for Nova Scotia, notwithstanding that the Province of Ontario may be opposed to these changes.

My friend speaks and reveals a vision of this country. It is the paranoid view of the Liberal Party when it comes to doing things in a co-operative and federal way.

Mr. Parry: Mr. Speaker, early on in his discourse, my hon. colleague referred to the Quebec referendum campaign. He characterized the 40 per cent vote for the referendum proposition in that campaign as being a rejection of Canada, saying moreover that it represented half of the Francophone Quebecois rejecting the concept of Canada.

In view of the fact that the adhesion of Quebec to the Constitution is, of course, the prima mobile of the Meech Lake Accord, would my colleague defend or expand on that assertion? Would he rather not agree that the phrasing of the Quebec referendum was such as to catch anyone off guard who had any form of doubt about the nature of the relationship of Quebec within Canada? Does he really cling to the assertion that it was a rejection of Canada?

Mr. O'Neil: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member, who made a similar point the other day in the House, raises a question with which I have no difficulty. The logic of what he is proposing is that somehow the people of Quebec after all of this debate did not really know the question being asked.

I do not accept, after such an emotional debate, that the political people of Quebec—they are people who have keen interest in politics—did not fully understand the nature of the question being put to them. That to me, put bluntly, is an insult to the intelligence of the people. I just do not accept that people would vote on such a fundamental issue and not know what the question was after listening to debate for a period of months, debate that literally tore the province apart.

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, thank you for giving me this opportunity to take part in an important debate that affects the lives of all Canadians and that, I think, goes to the very heart of our concept of Canada as a country. The responsibility we have here today cannot be taken lightly, and I know that when we vote, we will all be conscious of the fact that we are helping to build our country.

The debate we are continuing today is perhaps above all a collective scrutiny of what we are. When our descendants, our children and our grandchildren study this chapter in the history of their country, of Canada, they will ask whether we, the Members who sat in the House of Commons in 1987, did what had to be done, whether our speeches rallied everyone to the cause, and whether we set aside partisan considerations to make this what I would call one of the finest moments in Canadian history.

When I spoke in the House on May 11 during the debate on the Meech Lake Accord, I said that I intended to support the general thrust of the Meech Lake Accord as endorsed by the provincial Premiers and the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mulroney). Mr. Speaker, my position remains the same today in this historic debate, and I will vote for the Accord, now referred to as the Meech-Langevin Accord.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, I was a Member of the Quebec Legislature for more than eight years, and subsequently spent six years in the private sector. I then decided to return to active politics, this time at the federal level. My main reason for doing so was that I wanted to make a modest contribution towards seeking a satisfactory settlement for Quebec, so that Quebec could finally sign the 1982 Constitutional Agreement.

Mr. Speaker, at the time of the 1980 Referendum, Quebec voters were promised that if they voted no, it would not mean a vote for the status quo. We were told that a no to independence meant yes to a renewed federalism in which Quebec and its French-speaking citizens would be comfortable, confident in the future of their country and the role they would have to play. Mr. Speaker, in the 1980 Referendum very few Quebecers thought the status quo was acceptable, and in fact, it was not.

We should also remember that the Constitution Act, 1982, did not receive the support of the Quebec National Assembly, including the Péquistes on the Government side and the provincial Liberals, who were then the Official Opposition. All these people, duly elected in their respective electoral districts, felt that Quebec had been ignored, and some would say excluded from the 1982 Agreement.

Today, this Parliament has a chance to keep a promise made seven years ago, namely to complete what I would call the first phase of constitutional renewal, and to respond to the expectations of the vast majority of Quebecers as to their future within Confederation. We may not have this chance again in the foreseeable future, and I submit, with respect, that we should take advantage of this opportunity and do so now.

I referred to a seven-year-old promise. In fact, we have to go back 200 years, to the eighteenth century, to understand the issues, the crux of the problem and the essence of the Meech Lake Accord, which is the recognition of Quebec's distinct identity. As was recalled by so many Members who spoke in this debate in the House and at the sittings of the Special Committee, the concepts of linguistic duality and distinct society are older than Canada as we know it today, older than Confederation or Canadian federalism. Some mentioned the Treaty of Utrecht in 1713, where, under section 14, Francophones were given the freedom to practise the Catholic religion. My point is that we have here the official recognition of two religious communities, and also that, at the time, religion and language in North America were intertwined.

Others have emphasized the 1763 Treaty of Paris and the judiciary decrees issued by various British governors in the years following the treaty. People were gradually allowed to practice the Catholic religion, and recognition was extended to language rights before the courts and to the seigniorial system, different from the British system.

From that perspective, Mr. Speaker, yesterday's British generosities—others would say respect for basic rights—gradually made up the foundation of Quebec's distinct character. But let us get back to the present. I suggest that the Meech-Langevin Accord reflects the spirit of the Liberal position concerning our constitutional future. What I have in mind here, Mr. Speaker, is the November 1986 resolution acknowledging the distinct character of Quebec, as well as several points which can be found in the Constitutional Accord now under consideration.

I will add this. As a Quebecer, the fervour with which I will defend Canadian unity will be all that much stronger to the extent that the particular role Quebec must play within Canada will be acknowledged and understood. It is obvious to me that a Canada without Quebec, fully aware of its distinct character and recognized as such by the rest of the country, would fly in the face of its own political, cultural, sociological and historic reality.

• (1640)

[English]

Let me state my case for my English-speaking colleagues. The Meech-Langevin Accord, with all its potential imperfections and oversights, is still an important step in the right direction because it seeks to achieve the fundamental objective of bringing Quebec into the Constitution and of ensuring its continued presence. As politicians we must deal with the practical and the possible. We must be guided by realism, if at the end of the day we want to be remembered for more than yellowing copies of Hansard. That is a simple fact of political life. I think Sir Wilfrid Laurier's words are appropriate in this regard. He said:

> We are divided into provinces, we are divided into races, and out of these confused elements it is not always the ideal policies from the point of view of pure idealism which ought to prevail, but the policy which can appeal on the whole to all sections of the community.

Realistically, as political leaders in this exercise, our efforts must first be concentrated on maintaining the essential and distinct character of the Province of Quebec on the one hand, and on the other on ensuring the continued presence of Quebec within Confederation. I say as a Quebecer that that is the necessary and sufficient condition for any future constitution-making.

I understand the concerns some of my colleagues have raised over other very valid issues and I answer them this way: be patient. Recognize that there are priorities which must be addressed first. Quebec, in a political sense, had been left in constitutional isolation in 1981-82. This problem cannot and should not last forever. Are we going to have to wait for the eve of a second referendum to find an acceptable solution? I say to this House and to my colleagues: we have this opportunity now, let's grab it.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in his September 29, 1987 address to the House, the Right Hon. the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner) explained why he is in favour of the Accord. As he said, we support the Accord because it brings Quebec into the Canadian constitutional family politically, emotionally, and psychologically.

Mr. Speaker, the Accord only seeks to bridge—some would say correct—a historic gap. I would indicate the problem quite simply. This Accord is the outcome of an essential corrective measure after the 1982 Constitutional Agreement. It confirms the reality of a Quebec which has managed to maintain its language, its culture, its traditions, its religion, its institutions—hence its distinct character—against forces which logically should have swamped it.

This Accord pays tribute to the dedication, the effort and the courage of a nation which, although it remembers its past, can look to the future with confidence. The Accord states loud and clear what many Quebecers think deep down. In this connection, I find quite moving the remarks made by Mr. Eric Kierans, a former Member of Parliament, who related this personal anecdote to the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons which was dealing with the proposed constitutional accord. Here is what Mr. Kierans said:

"The very first time I visited Quebec's Legislative Assembly at Mr. Lesage's request, I looked at the paintings on the walls while walking through the corridors. I could not help feeling that, My God, this is a tradition totally different from mine, this is a different culture and a different language".

If I mention the awakening of Mr. Eric Kierans, an English-speaking Montrealer, to my English speaking colleagues, it is to urge them to recognize the historical fact of the Quebec reality, the French fact in Canada which can be found mainly in Quebec but which is also alive in other parts of the country.

Mr. Speaker, I think it might be useful to look at some of the other testimonies which were heard by the Special Committee on the Constitutional Accord.

I should like to emphasize in particular the comments made by Mr. Gordon Robertson, a Former Secretary of the Federal Cabinet, who had the opportunity to attend Constitutional conferences over several decades: He knows what he is talking about for having been involved in them on a number of occasions. With his usual clear thinking and common sense, and after having accepted the Accord's main political objective, which is "to ensure the presence and participation of Quebec in our Constitutional Accord", and after having found it praiseworthy, Mr. Robertson asked several questions. I will quote only one: "Could the agreement weaken the federal government in any significant and important way? To which he replied, and I quote:

"In my judgment, the Constitutional Accord of 1987 meets the present priorities. It will produce a fair and reasonable arrangement. I do not think it will have any seriously adverse effects as far as federal Governments of the future are concerned."

Another witness, Professor William Lederman, had this to say in analyzing the concept of a distinct society: "It has been true since 1867 that the courts have known that Quebec society is, in certain important ways, a distinct society. That has always weighed with them in settling constitutional issues that touched closely on Quebec. This has been implicit. I believe it is worth making that which has been implicit explicit because it is one of the fundamental realities of the Canadian free and democratic society, and has been from the beginning."

Finally, Professor Gérald Beaudoin, also during the hearings of the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, explained the legal implications of the distinct society clause in these words: "In my opinion, as in the opinion of a good number of lawyers, the recognition of the distinct society is an explicit and important interpretative clause, but it does not change the distribution of powers or the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms."

I wanted to quote these comments because they correspond to my own thoughts on the Meech-Langevin Accord: a moderate and natural step in our constitutional development.

Mr. Speaker, what can we do about the special identity of Quebec? We could try to avoid it, but this would not change the facts. Even those who refuse to recognize the distinct character of Quebec are so well aware of it that their refusal is due to their fear that, by promoting this distinct identity, they will make separation easier. To them, Mr. Speaker, I would say that they have very little confidence in the attachment of Quebec to Canada.

Today's debate is the result of history. History will also judge what has been said about the Accord in this House. I have every confidence that the way shown by the Meech-Langevin Accord, which, we must remember, has the support of all party leaders in this House and all provincial Premiers, is the right one because, in the best Canadian tradition, it is acceptable to Quebec and also to the other provinces. Of course, the Accord is a compromise. No one will deny that. Of course the Accord changes some of the rules for appointing judges to the Supreme Court, for Senate appointments and for the role played by the legislatures in immigration. Some of the rigging has been changed, but the fact remains that the Meech-Langevin Accord is a compromise, a Canadian compromise that was reached in the way Canadians have always been able to reach a compromise in the past. It may not be perfect, but those who seek perfection run the risk of losing a consensus and then, it is back to square one. To those who want perfection at all costs and who are not prepared to agree to a consensus with warts and all, I want to repeat what I said earlier, in quoting what a former Prime Minister, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, said about this country:

[English]

We are divided into provinces, we are divided into races, and out of these confused elements it is not always the ideal policies from the point of view of pure idealism which ought to prevail, but the policy which can appeal on the whole to all sections of the community.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the Meech Lake Accord has received the support of every section of our Canadian community, of the governments of each province, and the party leaders sitting in this House. And that is why I say that the Meech-Langevin Accord is a compromise made in Canada for Canadians, in the best traditions of this country.

I am a supporter of the federal character of this country which has managed to uphold the diversity of our regions and preserve the distinct identity of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, to be a Canadian or to define the essence of being a Canadian is not always easy, and in some cases downright difficult. It is not always an easy to reconcile our differences. That diversity and those differences have sometimes provoked controversy, even within political parties. You are of course aware of the split in my own caucus on an issue of fundamental importance to our country. Diversity may have led to controversy and disputes in some cases, but it has also, more often than not, been a tremendous source of strength, freedom and incredible generosity.

Mr. Speaker, the Belgians have a saying that unity is strength. I would say that Canada's strength is its diversity, and that our unity stems from the recognition of our diversity. Mr. Speaker, I believe that the Meech-Langevin Accord reflects my vision of Canada: a union of citizens sharing the same ideals and the same goals, whose strength lies in the strength of its components and in respect for their diversity. The Meech-Langevin Accord reflects and projects into the future this concept I have of Canada. And that is why, Mr. Speaker, I will vote for the Accord when the question is put.

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to congratulate the Hon. Member for Laval-des-Rapides (Mr. Garneau) on his speech on the Meech Lake Accord. I would like to ask him a question about the distinct society of Quebec, recognized as such in this Accord. I know he talked about it in his speech, but I would like to know whether he would care to comment, and I know that we Canadians who live in Quebec have no problem with Quebec's special identity as a distinct society, because we believe and we know it is a distinct society and that it wants to remain in Canada, and I think that in 1980, during the referendum, Quebecers responded to this appeal and confirmed their desire to be both Canadians and Quebecers.

But I wish the Hon. Member would elaborate with a view to assuring our anglophone colleagues or others outside Quebec that the distinct society provision does not mean additional powers for Quebec. In fact people know what Quebec is and what it has been in the past, and you even recalled historic events . . . Would he elaborate on this?

Mr. Garneau: Mr. Speaker, like all other North American democratic societies, Canada is a society in evolution. Naturally, significant changes have occurred in Quebec in the last 50, 25 or 10 years. One of these significant changes relates to the link which once existed between language and religion, now quite devoid of that complicity which was at the root of Quebec's cultural and linguistic development.

Over the past 25 or 30 years, since the quiet revolution, this phenomenon or this acknowledgment which was made or developed—language being the guardian of faith, faith being the guardian of language—is a cultural factor which is vanishing in Quebec. As a result, the state—and this is what Quebec citizens sought in successive elections—has gradually taken over the role of the Church with respect to protecting the language. Faith used to be the guardian of language, but since we now live in a pluralistic society where a number of cultural communities have swelled our ranks, we are asking the state to maintain and promote this distinct character, whereas before we would ask the Church to do that.

What was once private action has now become collective action. Never through this collective action—first taken a number of years ago, and certainly more vigourous since the onset of the quiet revolution—did we seek to question or jeopardize the rights of minorities in Quebec.

And I wish, Mr. Speaker, that all linguistic minorities throughout the country, official language minorities living everywhere from coast to coast, will be treated in every province the way the English-speaking minority is treated in Quebec. That is the wish I express, and I hope that Canada's constitutional evolution will one day lead to the recognition of the linguistic duality, not only in federal institutions but in provincial institutions as well.

When I say that the Church-to-state transfer of responsibilities for promoting the French fact never did affect the basic rights of Quebec's official language minority, the English-speaking minority in this case, I would remind Hon. Members that I once belonged to a government which, even before the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms was proclaimed, had the Quebec legislature adopt the Quebec Charter of Rights guaranteeing the basic rights of all Quebec residents, whether they belong to the majority or the minority.

So I do not see why, today, by acknowledging the distinct character of Quebec, by allowing Quebec to play a greater role in immigration, by defining more precisely the role of the provinces in the appointment of Supreme Court judges, by letting the provinces have a say in Senate appointments, I do not see why this Canadian fabric which is getting tighter, I believe in its unity, I do not see why this evolution would cast a shadow of doubt on and change the conception Quebecers have always had concerning the rights of their minority.

[English]

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the constitutional accord arising from the so-called Meech Lake agreement has transfixed perhaps not nearly as much of the country as should be the case. However, it certainly has motivated a considerable number of people to look very closely at their conception of the country and at the future which they hope to see for it. That is the context in which I want to make my contribution to what is an historic debate.

First, I want to discuss some myths about this agreement which have been presented to many of us by constituents who are worried about the direction in which they have been told this Accord is likely to take Canada.

The first myth concerns one of the least controversial areas. It is that the changes with respect to appointments to the Supreme Court will somehow weaken the federal Government and cause an erosion of power at the centre of Canada, especially with reference to our justice system. I believe that this is a very strong myth because there does not seem to be any truth in that assertion.

Indeed, if one considers the changes suggested for the Supreme Court, I believe they are essentially quite sensible and would have the effect, among others, of taking appointments of Supreme Court justices out of the present patronage-dominated system which has been so suspect to many people throughout the country.

I believe it makes very good sense in a federal system to have a combination by which provinces suggest names for Supreme Court judges and the federal Government makes the final appointments. The myth that this somehow gives provinces the right to appoint the Supreme Court is simply not true. It is a combination that is appropriate and sensible in a federal state.

A second myth concerns the question of compensation to provinces which establish programs that are compatible with national programs though not themselves part of those national programs. Again, there is a myth that this will somehow reduce the power of the federal Government to initiate new changes in social legislation and ensure that those changes are brought throughout the country. On the contrary, I suggest that setting forth in our Constitution a very precise and clear mechanism for how Canada can initiate new social or economic programs in areas of provincial jurisdiction, with the consent of seven provinces as has been the case for many years, makes considerable sense. If other provinces decide to implement basically the same programs, it makes equal sense for the federal Government to have a responsibility to provide financing, just as it would to other provinces which are part of the federal program.

The third and perhaps most important myth to discuss is that making Quebec a distinct society somehow detracts from the power of the federal Government to shape the future of this country. Again, we have heard a great deal of nonsense in the House about how that notion of a distinct society undercuts or destroys the power of Ottawa to take leadership in this country in areas like industrial policy, trade policy or other economic fields, which are certainly important to my constituents. If one carefully examines the Meech Lake Accord as outlined in our Order Paper, it is absolutely clear on this issue. It states:

> Nothing in this section derogates from the powers, rights or privileges of Parliament or the Government of Canada, or of the legislatures or governments of the provinces—

In short, this will not shift power in any significant way. Instead, it is a very crucial psychological recognition of something which anyone who has worked in Quebec or has worked with Quebecers and knows something of that province simply must accept as a reality. Quebec is a distinct society.

I tell Canadians who are concerned about this, including people in my constituency, that I very much wish they could visit Quebec to see its various sections so they could come away with a sense of the great distinctiveness of such things as the civil code in that province, the majority dominance of the French language, and the different economic structure of that province. We should not be concerned about the myth of the distinct society being a danger to us.

Fourth, I want to talk about the unanimity clause because it is also an area about which a great deal of mythology has been suggested. The myth is that somehow every future decision associated with our Constitution will require unanimous support of the provinces. This is simply not true. The vast areas which make up our Constitution will not require any changes that are different from the present constitutional arrangement for changes. It is only federal institutions will require this unanimous consent in the future. That has to be stressed to people, too. I do not like that. I think that it is a mistake. I think that it is a step backward with respect to federal institutions. I do not think that it is something that needed to be done. However, I do not think that it is a major and significant change about which people across the country should be concerned.

• (1710)

After talking about these myths I want now to talk about what I do see as serious problems within this Accord. There are three of which we as a Parliament have to be very aware. First, the role given to the Territories of the country is virtually nil within this Accord. That is a serious mistake for the future of the country. There have just been elections in the Northwest Territories. At present, there is a New Democratic Party Government in the Yukon which is doing interesting and exciting things. It is important to the future of these Territories that they, too, should be able to join the constitutional family without having to run this gauntlet, in a sense, which they have to run of all the other provinces before the approval process can be completed.

I think that this is something which the Hon. Member for the Yukon (Ms. McLaughlin) has made very clear to the House. It is something which Conservatives, such as the Hon. Member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson), have spoken out on very clearly. I think that it would be a serious mistake for the House of Commons not to listen to those voices from the Territories and make changes as suggested in the amendments proposed by my Party which would bring the Territories into a fuller potential future in Canada.

Second, there are some very serious problems with respect to aboriginal rights. We, as a country, forget far too often the traditions, the people, the tremendous sacrifices which the aboriginal people of Canada made in helping to build this land. I can tell Members of the House that in my constituency great battles were fought in which the aboriginal people, under the leadership of the Iroquois, helped us to make sure that this country stayed independent in the War of 1812. Had it not been for the powerful alliance which existed at that point, this country could well have been conquered by the United States. We could be in a position today in which our independence has already been surrendered, rather than facing at least the last fight in the free trade talks over whether or not that independence will have to go.

These aboriginal Canadians have said to us very clearly that this agreement is not satisfactory. I quote from the words of the Chief of the Assembly of First Nations, George Erasmus, who has said to us that the circle of Canada "will only be complete when the rights of aboriginal peoples in Canada are unequivocally expressed and protected in the Constitution, and when that relationship between the First Nations and the rest of Canada is respected". He went on to tell the special committee that the amendment which was made to the constitutional Accord "fails to give explicit constitutional recognition to the existence of First Nations as distinct societies that also form a fundamental characteristic of Canada. If anyone is more distinct, surely it is the peoples of the First Nations".

He went on from that point to state very clearly that there should be changes to this Accord which would recognize this fact and which would, as he put it, establish a renewed constitutional process specifically dealing with treaty and aboriginal rights. Our agenda, as he put it, is unfinished; the process should continue until the agenda is complete. I want to suggest that that agenda of the aboriginal peoples cannot simply be forgotten by the House of Commons. It is just not right for us to forget what we owe to the aboriginal people of Canada.

I would like now to talk about the third serious problem which I see. It is that the women of Canada fought a very serious and important fight to have Section 28 of the Charter established, which section gave to Canadian women equality with Canadian men. It was a hard fight. It took a great deal of pressure. It took a great deal of mobilization. It is not a fight which should be reversed by this constitutional Accord.

Yet women's groups across the country have said to us that that threat exists in this Accord. We have heard this from the President of NAC. We have heard this from the President of the Advisory Council on the Status of Women. The New Democratic Party has also moved an amendment in this area.

It is an amendment which reflects the statements of our members of the special committee who said the following. They said that Senator Lowell Murray defended inclusion of the non-derogation clause guaranteeing that neither Canada's multicultural heritage nor aboriginal rights would be affected by the linguistic duality-distinct society interpretive clause on the grounds of an abundance of caution. They said, "We want that same caution applied to Section 28 of the Charter, sexual equality". I believe very strongly that this House should accept that amendment as a constructive addition to this constitutional Accord.

My final point is simply to say that the Government has so far adopted a position, which I must describe as pigheaded, that it will not shift this Accord in any respect. With a document as serious as this is and as crucial to the future of our country, we should not be prepared to do that. Therefore, I urge the Government, and plead with it, to look at the amendments which we have put forward, which do not detract at all from the Accord, and to accept them. In that manner, we will have for our children and for our country in the future a better constitutional arrangement with which to move forward.

Mr. Nunziata: The Hon. Member who just spoke referred to the Government's position as "pigheaded". He also referred to the Meech Lake Accord as crucial to the future of our country. The Hon. Member spoke about three serious problems in the Constitution. The Hon. Member used the word "serious" on a number of occasions, first with regard to the role of the Territories, then with regard to aboriginal rights, and finally with regard to equality vis-à-vis Section 28 in the Constitution.

Having said all that, the Hon. Member still intends to vote for the Accord. He cannot have it both ways. He cannot talk about the objections as being myths—and he spoke about a number of myths—and then speak about serious problems in the Constitution. The Hon. Member talked about aboriginal rights, the role of the Territories, and women's rights. If the problems are as serious as the Hon. Member states they are, I ask, why is he voting for the Accord?

Mr. Crosbie: Because he is inconsistent, and proud of it.

Mr. Nunziata: Why, pray tell, has he decided that the Government's position is pigheaded because it will not accept amendments? I happen to agree with the Hon. Member that the Government's position is pigheaded.

An Hon. Member: No, no, it is not.

Mr. Nunziata: The Hon. Member refers to the Government's position as pigheaded. How would he refer to his own position? If the Government's position is pigheaded because it will not accept amendments from the New Democratic Party, how can one explain the position of the NDP when it states that it has serious problems that the Government will not accept, and it is pigheaded for not accepting them—

Mr. Orlikow: Why don't you ask your Leader?

Mr. Nunziata: —but, on the other hand, we intend to vote for the Meech Lake Accord.

Ms. Jewett: What about John Turner? Tell us about John Turner.

Mr. Nunziata: It is typical NDP. Approximately an hour and a half ago his colleague, the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie), stated that aboriginal rights are not endangered by the Accord. Those were the words of his colleague, that aboriginal rights were not endangered by the Accord. An hour and a half later, a member of the same political Party stated, and I quote, "very serious problems with aboriginal rights". My friends, you cannot have it both ways.

In closing, I wish to ask the Hon. Member, who is a member of a political Party which prides itself on being committed and the Party of conscience and principle, is it any wonder that Canadians really think that members of the NDP are a bunch of hypocrites for the position that they have taken?

Mr. Langdon: I appreciate the question from my colleague, the Hon. Member for York South—Weston (Mr. Nunziata).

I wish to say two or three things, because I think it is a serious question, even if it comes from the Hon. Member for York South—Weston. First, I wish to say that perhaps I am an eternal optimist. Perhaps I think it is possible that the Conservative Party, with its abysmal showing in the public opinion polls, will somehow come to its senses on this issue before the amendments that I spoke to have to be voted on, and that it will accept the obvious clarity and logic of my colleague and former professor, the Hon. Member for New Westminster—Coquitlam (Ms. Jewett).

I very much hope that each of our amendments will be accepted, because we would not have moved such amendments if they were not serious problems. For instance, with respect to the question of aboriginal rights, I am afraid that I have to tell the Hon. Member that I am prepared to take the words of the head of the Assembly of First Nations as representative of what aboriginal people in this country think about this Accord. If he states that in his view aboriginal people are badly treated, I take that very seriously. It is I who has to do the judgment, not anybody else.

I also wish to say that the Member's question fails to reflect the fact that his own Leader is taking a position which has called for vast changes in this constitutional Accord. Yet the Hon. Member is prepared to vote for the Accord.

My analysis of the myths which have been perpetrated, among others by the Hon. Member for York South—Weston about this Accord, is that they themselves are wrong-headed. We have the pigheaded Tories, and we have some wrong-headed Liberals.

Mr. Mayer: And we have empty-headed New Democrats.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I distinctly heard a member of the Conservative Party opposite call the Hon. Member empty-headed. I would like you to rule, Mr. Speaker, on whether that is unparliamentary.

Mr. McDermid: That is not what he said.

Mr. Nunziata: Did he mean that New Democrats in general are empty-headed?

Mr. McDermid: That is what he said.

Mr. Nunziata: If that is the case, I withdraw my point of order.

Mr. Mayer: His voice wavers so much because he is empty-headed.

Mr. Langdon: That is an interesting comment coming from a distinguished Minister of the Government. I must say that there will be a time when that Minister will deeply, deeply regret that particularly nasty comment.

An Hon. Member: That sounded quite threatening.

Mr. McDermid: You called us pigheaded. We can call you empty-headed.

Mr. Langdon: I will say to the Minister right now that he will discover at some stage just exactly how ridiculous and how inconsistent his statement is with everything that anybody in his Government has ever stated.

Mr. McDermid: Here comes the threat.

Mr. Mayer: You can dish it out but you can't take it.

Mr. Langdon: No, no. I have no comment with respect to empty-headedness. That is up to the Minister's usual level of political rhetoric. But his other comment was something which has to do with medical issues—

• (1730)

Mr. Jepson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Another Hon. Member wanted to ask a question of the Hon. Member for Essex—Windsor (Mr. Langdon), the Hon. Member for New Westminster—Coquitlam (Ms. Jewett).

Ms. Jewett: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid, with all this "brilliant" repartee going on around here, that we have left my hon. friend very little time to respond to my question.

Because he is an economist and as a former student, I know a brilliant one, I wonder whether he has time to elaborate a little on the point he was making about the mythology of the spending power having somehow been eroded.

Mr. Langdon: Very briefly, Mr. Speaker—and I will try not to enter further into this debate with the ignoramus opposite—

Mr. McDermid: That is parliamentary?

Mr. Langdon: —I say to the Hon. Member for New Westminster—Coquitlam (Ms. Jewett) that the spending power issue is something that gives to the Government of Canada much more capacity to act in the future than it has had in the past in respect of new programs and in respect of initiatives. It also gives it the possibility of undertaking equivalent activity with other parts of the country which do not want to be part of a federal-provincial agreement in itself. That is a major point.

Perhaps I could just make one last point. I want to make absolutely clear that, despite the strong hope or sense of optimism which I have in respect of our amendments, I think nobody should be unaware of the fact that when one weighs the reservations against the myths which are untrue, one still has a document for which one has to vote because of its steps forward, despite the fact that it also includes some unfortunate backward steps.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, when most Members of Parliament rise they always indicate what an honour it is to participate in a debate. I am sure this one has special meaning for all those who have had an opportunity to speak. This is a very important constitutional document, one of the most important in Canadian history. I think it is a privilege for all Members of Parliament to have an opportunity to give their comments on this very important process.

Let me say something about constitutional development within Canada. I think the Meech Lake Accord and everything which has preceded it must be looked at as an evolutionary process. I remember reading a foreign publication at one time in which they were trying to fix a date for Canadian independence. To try to do that is like imposing another society's concept of constitutional development or nation-building, because it would probably be very difficult to pin down to one particular date the time when Canada became an independent country.

There has been a series of very important constitutional dates throughout Canadian history since 1867, and I would suggest that the passage of the Meech Lake Accord will add another important date to the process.

As well, I think Canadians should understand that not all parts of the Canadian Constitution are written. Indeed, many important parts of the Constitution are unwritten, and they, too, make up what is collectively known as the Constitution of Canada.

The Charter of 1982 is a constitutional document; it is not the Constitution. The British North America Act is a constitutional document. However, for those who have studied this area, such an ancient document as the Constitution of 1689 is a Canadian constitutional document as well.

I am very pleased to direct my comments to the 1987 constitutional Accord, and later I should like to make comments in respect of some of the proposed amendments. The 1987 constitutional Accord is about bringing Quebec back into the constitutional family. I speak not as a Quebecer but as an English Canadian from Niagara Falls, Ontario, who is very proud to have been born in that area. As a Canadian I feel it incumbent upon me to involve myself in this discussion and to give my comments on what I perceive to be the future of the country.

As I grew up, as a child in Niagara Falls during the 1960s and as a young adult during the 1970s, one of the most troubling things for Canadians was the problem—and I believe it started at the beginning of the 1960s—referred to as separatism. At least, some of us who lived in the part of the country from which I came viewed it as a problem.

What was most troubling about it was not that there were people questioning the existence of the Canadian Confederation, which in itself was troubling, but that there was an indication that this movement was growing and seemed to have widespread support according to media reports. What bothered me most about it was that some sociological studies showed that many young people had embraced the idea of separatism. We had been given indications—and certainly I remember discussing it at university—that it would be only a matter of time, with so many young people growing up and calling into question the Canadian Confederation, that a separate state in the Province of Quebec would become a reality. For those of us inside and outside the Province of Quebec it was a very heart-breaking concept to try to grasp. All of us know of the intertwined history between French-speaking Canadians and English-speaking Canadians, going back two centuries. We know of the hundreds of thousands of Canadians who have fought and died for the entity known as Canada because they believed in it. That prospect for those of us growing up in Niagara Falls at that time—and I am sure it was the same in other communities across the country—was a very heart-breaking one indeed.

I have been a supporter of the Progressive Conservative Party since I was a child. When Mr. Trudeau was sworn in as Prime Minister of Canada in 1968, it was my sincere hope that he could reconcile the different areas of Canada and that he could put an end to the continual questioning of the Confederation.

It is one of my great disappointments in his administration—and I would suggest that it must be one of his own personal disappointments—that he was not able to do that. I would suggest that on many different issues—and if we had time I would like to recount them, but I do not believe we have time—Mr. Trudeau exacerbated the situation or the tensions which existed between French-speaking Canadians and English-speaking Canadians.

A hopeful sign for all of us was the 1980 referendum. All Canada watched that debate as it progressed. I believe the whole country was tuned in the night that the results of the referendum were delivered. As one English-speaking Canadian at that time, I would have done anything to ensure the survival of Canada, the unity of our country. I was very pleased that after the successful conclusion, in my mind, of that referendum debate in 1980, Prime Minister Trudeau said: "All conditions are off. Everything is on the table to be negotiated. We will usher in a new era of co-operative federalism with the provinces. We will sit down, make a deal and get Quebec into the constitutional family". You know that was not done, Mr. Speaker. I believe, as most Canadians believed, that that very unfortunate indeed.

Another unfortunate aspect of the 1980 referendum debate was how quickly it faded from the minds of most Canadians. When it was finished, I believe there was a collective sigh of relief. Many Canadians consciously or unconsciously said, "Let us move on to other things". I believe that need to recognize some of the strains within the Canadian Confederation was still there.

I was very interested in the special committee on the constitutional Accord, and the comments of one individual, Madame Solange Chaput—Rolland who said, among other things, in referring to the 1980 referendum and time subsequent:

> Inside Quebec, seven years ago, we decided that Canada was our country. We have yet to find out whether our loyalty was well placed. Frankly, in 1982 I wondered if the agonies, the pains, the quarrels, the bitterness following the referendum had been necessary. We voted for Canada; Canada through its central Government totally absorbed in its will to patriate the British North America Act of 1867, cared very little about those who had openly stated their will to remain linked to this country. Promises and dreams were shattered; not a single Quebecois will want to go through such emotions again. You English-speaking Canadians have asked during years; what does Quebec want. Now you know. It has been described in five proposals not written by constitutionalists, jurists or nationalists; but by men duly elected by "we the people"—

That is a very emotional appeal and a very poignant one which cries out for the necessity of passing this agreement by the House of Commons.

In putting together this agreement, I would like to pay tribute to our Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney). It was his vision, his leadership and his determination more than that of any other individual that made the 1987 constitutional Accord possible. Coupled with this war the co-operation of the 10 provincial Premiers who put aside their differences and showed that co-operation is still possible in the federal-provincial context.

It was very important and significant as well that the Leaders of the New Democratic and Liberal Parties on the day after the agreement was struck gave their endorsement to it. It is unfortunate that we are now dealing with a number of amendments. I will indicate why I believe that it is unfortunate. It seems to me that after the initial support of this document by the Leaders of both Opposition Parties it would appear that they, or at least some of the members of their Parties, would like to have it all ways. Some of the Members would like to support the Accord and some do not. Some would like to support the Accord with a number of amendments. I do not think that has been productive.

When I first had a look at the report of the special committee on the Constitution, the first thing that struck me was the opposition addenda to the report. There was a very pious declaration of support by Members from both opposition Parties. Right in the opening sentence, for instance, the Liberal Party said that its members:

> —once again confirm their support for the—Accord as a positive step forward in Canada's constitutional evolution.

The New Democratic Party Members in their first sentence said that they "fully support" the committee's report.

That is great and good news, Mr. Speaker. I presume that would include the recommendation from the committee that Parliament adopt the Accord in its present form. It would seem to me that, having given that support, it is inconsistent, as has been done, to tag on a number of amendments, which it has been said time and time again could lead to the unravelling of the agreement itself. I do not believe a lot of amendments will work.

At the hearings we were warned repeatedly that reopening the Accord for renegotiation would be fatal. A number of individuals appeared before the committee and made that point. From Queen's University, Peter Leslie and Richard Simeon; from McGill, Laurent Picard; as well as Gordon Robertson, Peter Meekison, and a long-time member of the Liberal Party, Jack Pickersgill, all of whom made the same point. If members of the New Democratic Party and the Liberal Party were frank, they would admit that even one amendment could destroy this Accord, that one amendment could bring irresistible pressure for a second and a third amendment, until at some point some Premiers would say that the whole deal is off.

I know that members of the opposition Parties will say, "Don't be so worried." I see that the NDP claims that its amendments could be accepted by First Ministers without in any way putting the Accord in jeopardy. That is good to hear. The Liberals say that their amendments should be acceptable to the First Ministers. "Should" is not the same as "are" or "would be" acceptable. What strikes me about this whole discussion is the problems we have had in constitutional debates.

I notice in the opening chapter of the report of the special joint committee what a long, difficult and arduous task it has been to arrive at the position we are at, which is to be able to solve the crucial question concerning Canadian unity. Constitutional development has been very difficult and it has been very easy to unravel the agreements of the past. The special committee outlines the problems with the Fulton formula in the early 1960s and in the mid-1960s the Fulton-Favreau formula, the agreement at the Victoria Conference. It took one Premier after all that work to say, "No, I do not like this", or, for whatever reasons, to back out, and so the whole thing became unravelled.

If history teaches us anything, it should teach us how delicate the Accord is that we have before us. It should be respected. Complicating the thing as well, if we did want to accept amendments from the Opposition, is that the Province of Quebec and the Province of Saskatchewan have already ratified the agreement in its present form. We would be in a position where we would have to change the agreement and have it go back before those Legislatures, ask for their approval of the amended version as well as get all the other Premiers on board. It is not worth risking everything that we have achieved at this time to do that.

Our choice is between this accord and no Accord at all. I believe it is between this Accord which Parliament has before it right now or Quebec's continued isolation. I do not believe there are any other choices. Members of the Opposition must know in their hearts that that is the decision we are facing.

Let me say something about some of the specific points raised in the debates over the last few days, and with specific reference to some of the amendments. A subject that has been raised a number of times is the subject of equality rights. I believe we have ample evidence that the linguistic duality, the distinct society provisions, will not override, supersede or take away the sexual equality rights set out in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I would not mention this but I see the the Hon. Member for New Westminster—Coquitlam (Ms. Jewett) is in the House. She said on September 29:

> We do not think that our equality rights are jeopardized by Meech Lake. They are not.

I agree with her. I realize she had other reservations, but I think that point is well taken and I think it was a point agreed to by many of the individuals who appeared before the committee. the New Democratic Party admits the concerns, I believe, in that particular quote that I have just read, that the equality provisions are not ruined, are not overruled by what has taken place in the Meech Lake Accord.

• (1750)

We read in the addendum to the report, for example, that:

> The NDP Members of the joint committee do not believe the linguistic duality-distinct society interpretation clause abrogates, supersedes or overrides any other rights guaranteed by the Charter.

Ms. Jewett: Read on.

Mr. Nicholson (Niagara Falls): Yet at the same time they are proposing expressly to restate the same thing. Why? I suggest there is a considerable risk of having all this unravel by opening the Meech Lake Accord.

Ms. Jewett: It started in the Langevin Block with Section 16.

Mr. Crosbie: Calm down, Rambo.

Mr. Nicholson (Niagara Falls): The Liberals would like to exempt the entire Charter from interpretation in light of the linguistic duality-distinctive society clause. I suggest that if this proposal is accepted it will, among other things, make the clause meaningless. If we bought the Liberal amendments, the Charter would be interpreted in light of our multicultural heritage, which is very important, and aboriginal rights, as it should be, but not in light of our linguistic duality and Quebec's distinct identity. It would have the effect of ranking Quebec behind multiculturalism.

I suggest as well that by continuously saying that somehow equality rights are going to be taken away, they are raising groundless fears in the hearts and minds of the many people who are worried about this sort of thing. They have to live with those fears. Yves Fortier, a very respected legal mind, appeared before the committee and said on this very subject:

> I believe that those fears are totally groundless. And if it were not for the seriousness of those organizations that expressed those views, I would simply say we were dealing with a smokescreen.

I suggest to the opposition Parties that they have lost sight of the distinction between the Quebec round, which is what we are dealing with here, and the next round. No one is saying that Senate reform and the other issues are not important. We will get on with them because we believe they are important.

Let me sum up by saying that when the BNA was implemented it was generally conceded at the time that no single individual was more responsible for it than Sir John A. Macdonald. Our present Prime Minister should take a great deal of satisfaction in knowing that on this important constitutional document he, more than any other individual, is responsible. He is responsible for its creation and, I believe, its success. When the history of these times is written, I am sure Canadians, as many do today, will recognize his great contribution. He can take great comfort in knowing that he has done much to unify this country and made it a better place in which to live.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, in closing the Hon. Member talked about the great contribution the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) has made to Canada. Might I remind him of the public opinion polls which show that about 23 per cent of Canadians still have some confidence in the Prime Minister?

The rest have totally and absolutely lost confidence in his ability to govern.

Mr. Crosbie: You should talk.

Ms. Jewett: Only Ed is on top.

Mr. Nunziata: If the heckling across the way will stop, perhaps I can continue. I know Members opposite are awfully sensitive when it comes to public opinion polls and the reputation of the Prime Minister, but this is not the time nor the place to be critical of him.

Mr. Crosbie: This is not a place for politics.

Mr. Nunziata: This is the time and the place to ask questions of the previous speaker. He should be fuming about free trade because he knows his constituents, the wine growers in Niagara Falls, are absolutely furious about the so-called free trade agreement. Yet this is not the time or the place to talk about free trade and the Hon. Member's political future.

Mr. McDermid: What have you got against Canadian wine?

Mr. Nunziata: Nothing at all. What does the Prime Minister—

Mr. McDermid: Why would you stop drinking it, then, because of free trade?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Can we please get back to the debate at hand?

Mr. Nunziata: At one point the Hon. Member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Nicholson) said it was unfortunate that we were dealing with amendments. He said they were not productive. Those were his words. That reflects his Government's attitude about the future of our country. On a spring night several months ago the Prime Minister decided to act like a blackjack dealer and deal away the future of our country. He started a process which, I submit, was an absolute farce. A committee was put together, and I would like to commend it for the effort it put in, but even at the beginning it was obvious that the Prime Minister was not prepared to accept amendments. The Meech Lake Accord signed by the First Ministers was in effect the final document.

The Hon. Member talked about the fragility of the Accord. If it is so fragile that it cannot withstand an amendment that would guarantee the women of Canada the rights they fought for not so many years ago, then I suggest it is an unmitigated disaster not worthy of the effort we are putting into it. If it is so fragile that it cannot accept an amendment to recognize the rights of the aboriginal people of Canada, then it is not worthy of passage by the House of Commons. Surely he would agree that the women of Canada and the aboriginal people of Canada can be recognized in the Constitution without affecting the basic principles of the Accord, the primary one being the inclusion of Quebec in the Constitution.

Mr. Nicholson (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member raised the question of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney). I suppose the Prime Minister can take a certain satisfaction and comfort in knowing that he will be Prime Minister for many years to come and the Right Hon. Leader of the Liberal Party (Mr. Turner) will never be Prime Minister again. I will tell the Hon. Member why.

This debate is as good an example as any. Some members of the Liberal Party say they agree with the Meech Lake Accord. Other Liberals say they agree with it but would like to see all these amendments made. Then we have other members of the Liberal Party who say they do not like the Meech Lake Accord and they are voting against it. That is why his Party is not going to govern the country and why ours is. We have our act together on this issue as on others and his Party, unfortunately for him but fortunately for the people of Canada—

Mr. Nunziata: Point of order. The Hon. Member seems to forget that the Liberal Party is first in public opinion.

Mr. Crosbie: That will not last very long.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Champlain (Mr. Champagne) on a point of order.

Mr. Champagne (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order raised by my colleague from Toronto. It may be true that the Liberal Party ranks first in public opinion, but its leader comes last in the polls.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Can we please get back to the debate?

Mr. Nicholson (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, earlier in my speech I was talking about the long, sad history of the Liberal Party with respect to constitutional change and English-French relations. As an observer of Canadian politics in the past and a participant now, you will know just how much the previous Government under Mr. Trudeau did to exacerbate relations between English-speaking and French-speaking Canadians. He used every opportunity to pit English against French. The arrogance with which he conducted the negotiations after the referendum debate in 1980 is ample evidence.

• (1800)

I suppose it is entirely consistent with Canadian history that the political Party which did more than any other to create Canada in 1867 would be the Party to bring in now the very significant constitutional changes which will, I believe, ensure Canadian unity for generations to come. That will be to the credit of the Prime Minister, the Progressive Conservative Party, the present Government, and all those individuals who have supported it.

I suggest that the Hon. Member for York South—Weston (Mr. Nunziata) should get back to worrying about the principles for which his Party stands and quit worrying about public opinion polls because they will not get him anywhere.

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for my colleague. He mentioned that if even one Premier were to start questioning the Meech Lake Accord it would scuttle the whole thing, it would be game over. We are in fact to have a new Premier around the table very soon. There may be a New Democratic Premier, but there certainly will be a new Premier who will raise questions about why aboriginal rights and women's rights are not in the Accord. The Government will have to deal with questions on how to improve the Accord. It is not enough to say that we cannot touch this because it is too fragile. If it is meant to last for one hundred years or more, it must be strong.

The Member is afraid of the pressure of one modest amendment. Surely he can distinguish between frivolous amendments and worth-while amendments, amendments that deal with women's rights, aboriginal rights, and the North. Surely those selected amendments would improve the Accord. Surely the Government is not just a collection of 211 marshmallows that have to bend to every pressure brought to bear. The Government should use some judgment and improve the Accord rather than saying that it can do nothing because the Accord will fall apart, or that it can do nothing because then someone else will force it to do too much.

Mr. Nicholson (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, the Member says that we will soon have a new Premier. We have just had an election in Ontario and it will be five years before the people of Ontario get a chance to change Premiers. He need not worry about that for a long time.

Mr. Keeper: In New Brunswick.

Mr. Nicholson (Niagara Falls): With regard to the fragility of this agreement, I refer to the historical analysis of constitutional development. On two or three occasions in our lifetime the federal Government and the Premiers thought they had come to a deal on an amending formula for the Constitution, an agreement to patriate the Constitution. Those agreements did in fact become unraveled because one Premier decided he did not like all the provisions.

By their very nature these things are fragile. They are very important. The subjects addressed in the amendments are important as well. However, I think members of the Opposition have missed the fact that while to conclude anything in this agreement will take unanimous consent, many issues will be decided on the seven provinces-fifty per cent of the population basis. In the next round of constitutional discussions they will be discussed as they should be because they are important.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six minutes after six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow morning at 11 o'clock a.m.

POSTAL SERVICES CONTINUATION ACT, 1987

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Pierre Cadieux (Minister of Labour) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-86, an Act to provide for the resumption and continuation of postal services.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the Minister have leave to introduce the Bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the Bill be read a second time? At the next sitting of the House?

[English]

Mr. Cadieux: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. May I suggest that the House Leaders meet and discuss the possibility of dealing with this Bill today at all stages as of three o'clock.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I appreciate the Minister's invitation. I will transfer that message to my House Leader. We will meet as soon as possible.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, we wish to indicate that we will not be making any arrangements to start the debate today.

We believe that the person who seconded the motion indicates that this is a management Bill. We do not believe that all other methods of resolving the dispute have been looked at.

I myself wrote to the Minister asking that he appoint a mediator. He has not done so. We will start debate on this Bill in the normal manner.

Mr. Cadieux: Mr. Speaker, may I suggest to the Hon. Member—and this is a friendly suggestion—that he wait until he has looked at the Bill before making his decision, in that part of this request may have been satisfied in the particular legislation.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I think the Hon. Minister has made a helpful suggestion. I will be in a position to meet with the other House Leaders and perhaps, after everyone has had an opportunity to read the Bill, we will all be in a better position to advise the House on when we might go forward.

Also, and not to belabour the point, the Bill could have been seconded by anybody. It is obviously a matter of cabinet solidarity that anybody can second it.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to realize, if there is a Bill here, that this is one of the few times we have had back to work legislation when there has been no attempt ahead of time to speak to the opposition critics and to the House Leaders of the opposition Parties. If the normal courtesies had been extended, some phone calls, arrangements could have been made first thing this morning. Those things were not done, but should have been.

• (1110)

Mr. Speaker: Are there any other Members rising?

I have consulted with the Table on the procedure and I think, given the position taken by the Hon. Member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy), that the Chair really has no choice in the matter except to put the usual question to the House.

When shall the Bill be read a second time? At the next sitting of the House?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

PETITIONS

CONSTITUTIONAL ACCORD—UNANIMITY CLAUSE AND ABORIGINAL RIGHTS

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present petitions from the residents of the Yukon Territory in relation to the Meech Lake Accord. These petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to seek agreement to change the Constitutional amendment both in respect to the unanimity clause for the admission of new provinces and to include aboriginal rights in future First Ministers' conferences.

SCHEDULE

Constitution Act, 1867

1. The Constitution Act, 1867 is amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 1 thereof, the following section:

"2. (1) The Constitution of Canada shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with

(a) the recognition that the existence of French-speaking Canadians, centred in Quebec but also present elsewhere in Canada, and English-speaking Canadians, concentrated outside Quebec but also present in Quebec, constitutes a fundamental characteristic of Canada; and

(b) the recognition that Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society.

(2) The role of the Parliament of Canada and the provincial legislatures to preserve the fundamental characteristic of Canada referred to in paragraph (1)(a) is affirmed.

(3) The role of the legislature and Government of Quebec to preserve and promote the distinct identity of Quebec referred to in paragraph (1)(b) is affirmed.

(4) Nothing in this section derogates from the powers, rights or privileges of Parliament or the Government of Canada, or of the legislatures or governments of the provinces, including any powers, rights or privileges relating to language."

2. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 24 thereof, the following section:

"25. (1) Where a vacancy occurs in the Senate, the government of the province to which the vacancy relates may, in relation to that vacancy, submit to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada the names of persons who may be summoned to the Senate.

(2) Until an amendment to the Constitution of Canada is made in relation to the Senate pursuant to section 41 of the Constitution Act, 1982, the person summoned to fill a vacancy in the Senate shall be chosen from among persons whose names have been submitted under subsection (1) by the government of the province to which the vacancy relates and must be acceptable to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada."

3. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 95 thereof, the following heading and sections:

(2) An agreement that has the force of law under subsection (1) shall have effect only so long and so far as it is not repugnant to any provision of an Act of the Parliament of Canada that sets national standards and objectives relating to immigration or aliens, including any provision that establishes general classes of immigrants or relates to levels of immigration for Canada or that prescribes classes of individuals who are inadmissible into Canada.

(3) The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms applies in respect of any agreement that has the force of law under subsection (1) and in respect of anything done by the Parliament or Government of Canada, or the legislature or government of a province, pursuant to any such agreement.

95C. (1) A declaration that an agreement referred to in subsection 95B(1) has the force of law may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada only where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of the province that is a party to the agreement.

(2) An amendment to an agreement referred to in subsection 95B(1) may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada only where so authorized

(a) by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of the province that is a party to the agreement; or

(b) in such other manner as is set out in the agreement.

95D. Sections 46 to 48 of the Constitution Act, 1982 apply, with such modifications as the circumstances require, in respect of any declaration made pursuant to subsection 95C(1), any amendment to an agreement made pursuant to subsection 95C(2) or any amendment made pursuant to section 95E.

95E. An amendment to sections 95A to 95D or this section may be made in accordance with the procedure set out in subsection 38(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, but only if the amendment is authorized by resolutions of the legislative assemblies of all the provinces that are, at the time of the amendment, parties to an agreement that has the force of law under subsection 95B(1)."

4. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately preceding section 96 thereof, the following heading:

101B. (1) Any person may be appointed a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada who, after having been admitted to the bar of any province or territory, has, for a total of at least ten years, been a judge of any court in Canada or a member of the bar of any province or territory.

(2) At least three judges of the Supreme Court of Canada shall be appointed from among persons who, after having been admitted to the bar of Quebec, have, for a total of at least ten years, been judges of any court of Quebec or of any court established by the Parliament of Canada, or members of the bar of Quebec.

101C. (1) Where a vacancy occurs in the Supreme Court of Canada, the government of each province may, in relation to that vacancy, submit to the Minister of Justice of Canada the names of any of the persons who have been admitted to the bar of that province and are qualified under section 101B for appointment to that court.

101E. (1) Sections 101A to 101D shall not be construed as abrogating or derogating from the powers of the Parliament of Canada to make laws under section 101 except to the extent that such laws are inconsistent with those sections.

(2) For greater certainty, section 101A shall not be construed as abrogating or derogating from the powers of the Parliament of Canada to make laws relating to the reference of questions of law or fact, or any other matters, to the Supreme Court of Canada."

7. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 106 thereof, the following section:

"106A. (1) The Government of Canada shall provide reasonable compensation to the government of a province that chooses not to participate in a national shared-cost program that is established by the Government of Canada after the coming into force of this section in an area of exclusive provincial jurisdiction, if the province carries on a program or initiative that is compatible with the national objectives.

(2) Nothing in this section extends the legislative powers of the Parliament of Canada or of the legislatures of the provinces."

8. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto the following heading and sections:

"XII—Conferences on the Economy and Other Matters

148. A conference composed of the Prime Minister of Canada and the first ministers of the provinces shall be convened by the Prime Minister of Canada at least once each year to discuss the state of the Canadian economy and such other matters as may be appropriate.

XIII—References

149. A reference to this Act shall be deemed to include a reference to any amendments thereto."

Constitution Act, 1982

9. Sections 40 to 42 of the Constitution Act, 1982 are repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"40. Where an amendment is made under subsection 38(1) that transfers legislative powers from provincial legislatures to Parliament, Canada shall provide reasonable compensation to any province to which the amendment does not apply.

41. An amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to the following matters may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada only where authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province:

(a) the office of the Queen, the Governor General and the Lieutenant Governor of a province;

(b) the powers of the Senate and the method of selecting Senators;

(c) the number of members by which a province is entitled to be represented in the Senate and the residence qualifications of Senators;

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to make submissions on this issue. I would like to begin by making some general observations and then proceed to indicate my specific concerns on the Meech Lake Accord.

A constitution is a body of fundamental principles according to which a state is governed. Changes to a state's constitution, as Machiavelli once advised, must be made with the utmost care.

In my view the Constitutional Accord signed by the First Ministers is not in the best interests of Canada or Canadians. It does not accurately reflect what Canada is or what it ought to be. It does not reflect in my view what I consider to be the views and aspirations of a majority of Canadians. The Accord, if enacted with its present provisions, will result in a weaker federal Government. It will set in motion a series of changes which, over time, will render the federal Government irrelevant.

Quebec's participation in the Constitution is essential. Nevertheless at some point we have to ask ourselves whether the price of obtaining Quebec's unconditional approval of the Constitution is too high for the Confederation as a whole. In my view, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and the Premiers went too far in order to gain Quebec's participation. In the "real politik" of federal-provincial negotiations, Premiers cannot be faulted for negotiating on their own particular agendas. They have electorates to satisfy, constituencies to placate and political objectives to obtain.

It is the role of the Prime Minister in this process to ensure that, while every reasonable effort is made to accommodate provincial aspirations, the federal Parliament retains the power to enact and act in the national interest. The Prime Minister must ensure that Parliament has the power to set national standards and objectives for important social and economic programs, to assist smaller less advantaged provinces and to speak clearly for Canada in foreign affairs.

Of course, in a vast and diverse country such as Canada, a certain amount of decentralization is both healthy and inevitable. Federalism was and is the only system of government able to accommodate the distinct character of each province and the rich diversity which makes Canada unique among nations. The Fathers of Confederation recognized this fact in drafting the British North America Act and it is as true now as it was then. Canadian federalism has always been characterized by a healthy tension, a fine balancing act between central and provincial power.

In some respects, the debate over the recent constitutional Accord has become obscured by the simplistic notion that somehow we are debating a polarized vision of whether Canada should be a highly centralized or decentralized federal structure. In fact, Canada is already a highly decentralized federation.

The debate on the Accord, if it is to reflect reality, must centre on whether or not we wish to tip the delicate balance considerably further with respect to an even more decentralized federalism with fewer constitutional powers for the central Government and weaker national institutions. To appreciate how decentralized our federation has become, one only need examine the trends with respect to who spends the money.

Between 1968 and fiscal year 1987-88, the total amount of transfer payments made to the provinces by the federal Government rose from $2.8 billion to $29.8 billion. This represents a real increase of well over 100 per cent even if one takes into account inflation.

In addition, the federal Government's share of public revenues in Canada decreased from 47 per cent to 37 per cent between 1962 and 1986. In the same period the provinces, and municipalities, share rose from 53 per cent to 63 per cent, from just over one-half to almost two-thirds of all public revenue.

From a fiscal standpoint, Canada ranks with Switzerland as one of the most decentralized federations in the world. Given, the ascendancy of provincial power over the last 25 years, it is now time for Canadians to ask themselves whether we wish first, to push the pendulum even further toward more provincial authority and even greater decentralization, second, to maintain the status quo; or third, to seek to reassert federal authority. The constitutional debate will afford Canadians an opportunity to articulate their vision, their view and their dream of what Canada should be.

We already know the views of one prominent Canadian who has spoken out many times on the subject of Canadian federalism. In 1984, former Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau warned Canadians that:

With too much decentralization in the name of cultural security and provincial autonomy, the country risks fragmentation and disorderly competition in a world where, to an increasing extent, only the strongest and most disciplined can survive and prosper.

This is the crux of the issue. At the very least, federal power must be maintained to allow the federal Government to pursue national, social and economic objectives. Living in today's world economy has become in a very real sense survival of the fittest. The Japanese, the South Koreans and the West Germans, with their integrated and disciplined economies, have achieved a competitive edge in world trade based on cohesive national strategies. Their economic success which can be measured in their huge trade surpluses has been marked by a national unity of purpose and a commitment to foster economic excellence in certain sectors of world markets. Important political decisions have been made in these countries not to support industries which cannot compete.

How does all this relate to the present constitutional Accord? I see the Accord as the thin edge of a large wedge with which the provinces can and will acquire more power to pursue their own economic, social and even political objectives, irrespective of any larger national purpose. The dangers of fragmentation and disorderly competition against which Mr. Trudeau warned three years ago are now coming to pass, albeit gradually. Like some constitutional Trojan horse that has been pushed inside our gates by the Prime Minister and the Premiers, the Accord looks good but its contents will cause no end of trouble in the years ahead.

Traditionally, the Liberal Party has always stood for a strong Canada in which Parliament has the necessary powers and jurisdiction to formulate public policy. Indeed, the Liberal Party in the 20th century has been one of the greatest nation-building institutions in Canada. We have consistently rejected concepts of special status, deux nations and the community of communities or any other doctrine which would weaken Canada.

At this juncture, I sincerely believe that it is the role of the Liberal Party to lead the way in ensuring that everything for which we have stood and fought over the years is not signed away with the stroke of a pen. Those Liberals who do not support the Accord have an obligation and indeed a duty to make their views known.

I have a number of specific concerns. Over the last number of months, prominent Canadians have expressed concerns with respect to particular provisions in the constitutional Accord. My concerns particularly relate to the clause dealing with a distinct society, the effect the constitutional Accord will have on the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the clause which deals with Senate appointments, the clause which deals with appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada, the clause dealing with spending power, the amending formula which would require unanimity on certain matters in the Constitution, and finally, my main concern deals with immigration.

Regarding my first concern, I have asked myself, as have many Canadians, why it is necessary to give special status to Quebec. There are those who argue that Clause 2(1)(a) of the constitutional Accord is simply an articulation of today's reality, the status quo in Quebec. If that is the case, why is it necessary to recognize that in the Constitution?

There are those who argue that this particular clause will give some special constitutional power to Quebec. I suppose if this Accord is ratified by the federal Parliament and the by the provincial legislatures, ultimately it will be left up to the Supreme Court of Canada to decide what is meant by the distinct society clause.

Even though I fail to understand why it is necessary to have recognition of Quebec as a distinct society in the Accord, my concern is over what is excluded by this clause which reads as follows:

> (a) the recognition that the existence of French-speaking Canadians, centred in Quebec but also present elsewhere in Canada, and English-speaking Canadians, concentrated outside Quebec but also present in Quebec, constitutes a fundamental characteristic of Canada;—

My mother, an immigrant to Canada, does not speak fluent French, nor does she speak fluent English. Under this clause, the characteristics of my mother are not fundamental characteristics of Canada. By implication, those who are not English speaking or French speaking do not possess fundamental characteristics of Canada. In my view, this clause is a betrayal of my mother and of the millions of others who have come to Canada from other countries.

The distinct society clause does not adequately recognize the multicultural community in Canada, the eight million or nine million Canadians whose origins are neither French nor English. If the purpose of the first clause in the Constitution of Canada is to articulate what Canada is all about today and what we want Canada to be in the future, then surely a fundamental characteristic of our country today is the multicultural heritage of our communities. However, that characteristic is not present in Clause 1 of the Constitution; nor is the recognition of aboriginal peoples.

Surely when trying to describe what Canada is all about, one would have to recognize the aboriginal peoples as a fundamental characteristic of Canada. Therefore, it seems to me that on the basis of Clause 1 alone, the constitutional Accord cannot be supported.

That clause goes on to say that it is the role of the Parliament of Canada and the provincial legislatures to preserve the fundamental characteristic of Canada referred to in the first paragraph. However, it goes on to say that it is the role of the Legislature and Government of Quebec to preserve and promote the distinct identity of Quebec referred to in the distinct society clause. Canadians are asking themselves what that means. Why is Quebec required under the constitutional Accord to preserve and promote the fundamental characteristic, while on the other hand it is a duty of the Government of Canada and the other legislatures to simply preserve it? Is it any wonder that some of those right-wing Premiers from western Canada chose to support this provision? They do not want to promote in any way the fundamental characteristics of Canada, they simply want to accept what exists which is very little and not be required by the Constitution of Canada to do anything more.

My next concern is over the effect this particular Accord will have on the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. In my view, the Charter must, and I emphasize, must be supreme.

No law from the Parliament of Canada or from any of the legislatures should in any way affect the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. If we truly believe that there are certain rights and freedoms that exist for all Canadians, then surely we must all agree that the Parliament of Canada and the legislatures cannot in any way abrogate those very basic and fundamental rights.

In the last number of months, experts have indicated that the constitutional Accord threatens the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. In particular, the women of Canada have made a very persuasive case indicating that the Accord will turn back the clock over that for which the people of Canada fought seven or eight years ago. As a result of this Accord, which was signed in a 10-hour or 15-hour period, those rights for which the women of Canada fought will go out the window. It is possible that sometime in the future the Supreme Court will decide that the distinct society clause, for example, might be used to take away rights for which the women of Canada fought. That ought to be of concern to each and every Member of the House.

My next concern deals with appointments to the Senate of Canada. It is obvious that Senate reform will be impossible as a result of the constitutional Accord because of the amending formula that exists in the Accord. Unanimity will be required to reform the Senate. It does not take a brilliant mind to conclude that Senate reform will be impossible in the future.

• (1130)

Premier Getty indicated at the time the Accord was signed that somehow Alberta and western Canada were winners because of the provision dealing with Senate appointments. All that has happened is that the patronage, if you will, has been transferred from the federal level to the provincial level. A Triple-E Senate will be a dream for centuries to come because of the unanimity requirement in the Accord.

Right now the power to appoint Senators rests with the Parliament of Canada. The Senate of Canada is a national institution. There are safeguards to ensure that Senators reflect the views and aspirations of the different regions. Over a period of time, it seems to me, when we have a Senate completely dominated by provincial appointees, it is obvious their first concern will be for the provinces who appointed them. They will in effect lose track of the national interest.

We have serious concerns over this provision in the Accord. The Liberal Party has called for an elected Senate and I truly believe that if the regions of Canada want equal representation, that is the route to take.

Regarding Supreme Court of Canada appointments, in my view the court is a national institution. The Government of Canada must retain the ultimate authority to make appointments to that court. I ask myself why it was necessary to transfer that authority from the Government of Canada to the provincial Governments. It is obvious the provinces wanted that power because they believed if they had it, over a period of time provincial appointees would be more concerned with provincial interests rather than the national interest. It seems to me the Supreme Court of a country must reflect the national interest. Therefore the national Government must retain the ultimate authority to make appointments.

Much has been said about the spending power provision in the Accord. I agree with those who argue that that provision is ambiguous. Very little is known about how a future Government or future Supreme Court will choose to define what "reasonable compensation" means; what "program" or "initiative" means; what the word "compatible" or the words "national objectives" mean. I agree with those who argue that in future it may be impossible for the Government of Canada to implement a national program such as daycare when one or more of the provinces might decide to opt out and receive compensation.

As to the amending formula, it is obvious, as I indicated earlier, that Senate reform will be impossible. However, there are other concerns flowing from the unanimity requirement. Others have argued in a very persuasive fashion that the unanimity requirement would make it impossible to create provinces from the Territories in future because one or more of the existing provinces might decide to vote against that and the dilution of whatever authority they might have. I believe that is a serious concern.

I note that you are indicating my time has expired, Mr. Speaker. Let me say in closing that this Accord in my view is not in the best interests of Canadians. It cannot be supported and I do not intend to support it unless the Government in its wisdom decides to adopt the amendments presented by the Liberal Party of Canada.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt that the Hon. Member for York South—Weston (Mr. Nunziata) spoke with very strong convictions about his view of Canada. The debate over this matter is one in which the Members will hold different views and hold those views strongly. However, as a westerner, I believe the kind of Canada he proposes in his notion of a different Constitution would serve to rip this nation in half.

He fails to understand the geography of this land, the second largest nation in the world. There are more Members of Parliament from Toronto and Montreal than there are from Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, the Yukon, Northwest Territories, and all of British Columbia except for the lower mainland. Two cities have more votes than those people who live on 70 per cent of the land. Yet the Hon. Member says that is just fine. He supports a centralist notion of governing Canada. That concept would work well in England, Belgium or some other geographically small nation like Switzerland, but it defies reality in a country of some four and a half thousand miles from ocean to ocean.

It is a fact that it is our history that makes westerners and Atlantic Canadians and others feel deeply and strongly about regional strength. The Hon. Member should know that when the first four provinces of this country, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario, were formed, they were granted the right to govern their resources. When Prince Edward Island joined one year later it was given the same right. When British Columbia came into Confederation it, too, was given the same right. Yet when the three prairie provinces became part of Canada, they were denied the right to their resources. That was not under their jurisdiction. I remember the old-timers in my province who had fought for 25 years from 1905 to 1930 to obtain the right to their resources. Not in one of those years were they able to raise enough money to pay for provincial needs such as roads, hospitals and schools. The best they ever got was about 30 per cent, this because of a centralist view which believed their resources belonged to Canada.

More recently a Liberal Government put in place the National Energy Program, ignoring the fact that Ontario sold its iron and steel at world prices. It ignored the fact that Quebec and Ontario sold their hydro power at world prices. Every product in every province was able to be sold at world price. However, the Liberal view, and I presume the view of the Hon. Member for York South—Weston, is that a centralist government can impose, irrespective of jurisdictional consideration, a centralist view.

I wanted to make some comments on the Senate but, unfortunately, will not be able to. In conclusion, if we had a Canada such as the Hon. Member proposes we would have no Canada at all because that would tear the map to pieces.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I am a westerner. The Member laughs, but British Columbia is the province of my birth. I grew up there. I understand the problems in western Canada and Atlantic Canada. It is precisely for that reason that we need a strong central government to protect the regions.

The Hon. Member seems to indicate that a strong federal Government is synonymous with Quebec and Ontario, that when we talk about a strong federal Government we are talking about a Government which is more concerned about Quebec and Ontario. That is not the case. The Parliament of Canada exists to represent all 10 provinces and the territories. If the goal is to have equal recognition of the regions, surely we must reform the Senate. With regard to this Chamber we all believe, to a certain degree, in representation by population. Therefore, the Province of Ontario and the Province of Quebec will have, perforce, greater representation in the House of Commons.

That is not to say that a reformed Senate cannot create a better balance in representation in the two Houses of Parliament by giving more equal representation to the regions. That is only possible if we reform the Senate. Under the Meech Lake Accord it will be impossible to reform the Senate because of the unanimity requirement. If we are truly concerned about equal representation and, as the Member put it, regional strength, the route to go is to reform the Senate by moving toward an elected Senate in order to give it more power.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, the Member and I do not separate on the need for changes in Senate reform. We separate on the Member's notion that the unanimity clause absolutely guarantees that the Senate cannot be reformed. It may make it more challenging but there are examples of very major decisions, including Meech Lake itself, being brought about because of unanimity.

To make the presumption that Canada could never reach a compromised and all-inclusive conclusion among the provinces and the federal Government is to presume that there is a Government of the past in Ottawa which views the provinces as someone to fight against. If you are looking for reconciliation and a federal Government which can work with other Governments, you will see that unanimity is not only possible but has been demonstrated.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I believe that unanimity was achieved with the Meech Lake Accord because the Prime Minister gave everything away. Is it any wonder that the Premiers accepted what was given to them? I do not blame the Premiers for signing the Meech Lake Accord because they received so much in return for so little.

On the subject of Senate reform and unanimity, surely the Hon. Member will agree that the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec alone will never agree to giving Prince Edward Island equal power in the Senate of Canada. Let us not be naive. There is no way a stronger or more populous province will give equal representation in the Senate of Canada to a less populous province. That will never happen. There is more likelihood of reforming the Senate under the present amending formula which requires the agreement of seven provinces and 50 per cent of the population.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, many of the people who have spoken in this debate on the Constitution have said that there was bad process involved and that the document itself is flawed. I agree with both of those comments, but must also say that every other time we dealt with constitutional amendments, whether in 1981 or earlier, the process was bad and the resulting document was flawed.

It is ironic that many of the amendments being proposed by Liberal Members of Parliament, many of whom were here in 1981, ask for things for which they did not ask when they formed the Government. For that matter, many of their amendments are counter to the very spirit of what the Liberal Government of 1981 was trying to accomplish.

When I look at the list of amendments presented by the Liberal Party I wonder where those Members were in 1981 when a joint committee studied the document of the then Prime Minister, Mr. Trudeau. A number of amendments were moved, some of which were passed and some of which were defeated. These Liberal Members did not move those amendments in 1981, nor did they argue for them. It is somewhat hypocritical for them to say that these amendments are essential in 1987. Having said that, I agree with the content of many of those amendments because they ask for some of the things we were calling for in 1981.

The document with which we are presently dealing is flawed. The Yukon and the Northwest Territories have been hurt by the Meech Lake Accord. It does no good for Conservative Members to say that when the time comes all 10 provinces will be on side. We do not know when that time will come, but we do know that the Yukon and Northwest Territories will have to go through a process which no other province has ever had to go through in the history of our nation. That process will be most difficult.

The provisions which the Liberal Government introduced in 1981 required the consent of the federal Government and seven provinces with 50 per cent of the population before a new province could be created. Now all 10 provinces must agree with the federal Government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. If Members wish to have conversations I would appreciate if they would go into the lobby or behind the curtains. The Hon. Member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy) has the floor.

Mr. Murphy: The process for the Yukon or one of the territories to become a province will be very difficult. From the history of constitutional changes I know that Premiers, provinces, and the federal Government have their own agenda when they come to First Ministers' Conferences. If a majority of provinces are willing to allow the Yukon in as a new province, it is likely that one, two or perhaps three of the provinces will have other items they want included in the Constitution. Perhaps they will use oil, property rights or another particular cause which genuinely might be important to them as a bargaining chip in supporting the entry of the Yukon. That has been the history of our country in terms of constitutional amendments.

No Prime Minister and no Premier has gained everything they sought. In the future, the Premier of Nova Scotia may have some concerns that she wants addressed in the Constitution and may use the Yukon as a bargaining chip. That is not acceptable.

The other group about which I am concerned with regard to the Constitution is the aboriginal people of Canada. I stated during the special debate on the Meech Lake Accord in June that we have again forgotten the native people of this country. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) stated that with the Meech Lake Accord, we have completed the circle of Confederation. He was again neglecting the native people of Canada because that circle is not completed as far as they are concerned. There is no process in this Constitution guaranteeing that their rights will be on the agenda of future First Ministers' meetings. The Government has been unwilling to even guarantee that there will be a meeting in the future to deal with aboriginal rights.

We have asked for this guarantee in questions during Question Period and have suggested amendments to that effect. However, the Prime Minister has not even been concerned enough to write a letter to native leaders or the Premiers indicating that he will put this item on the agenda of a future meeting.

The Prime Minister said in answer to questions in the House that with Quebec as a full-fledged member of the Constitution as a result of Meech Lake we would be in a better position to expand the definition of aboriginal rights in the Constitution to reflect more than the very narrow present definition. The Prime Minister has used that as a reason why we should support the Meech Lake Accord. Yet he will not even guarantee that there will be a meeting on aboriginal issues next year, the year after, or even three years from now.

I consider that to be a failure of the Prime Minister and not of the Premiers, even though the Premiers of British Columbia, Alberta, and Saskatchewan were reluctant to move on this important matter of aboriginal rights during the final rounds of negotiations. They are not the ones primarily at fault because it is the federal Government's obligation to represent native people according to the present Constitution and the Indian Act.

The Prime Minister was the chairman of the Meech Lake meetings and should have been representing the native people of this country. The Prime Minister could have at least guaranteed that aboriginal rights would be included on the agenda of the next meeting of First Ministers if they could not have been dealt with at the Meech Lake meeting itself. He should have at least made that effort on behalf of the native people.

My colleague, the Member for New Westminster—Coquitlam (Ms. Jewett), reminds me that the joint committee which studied the Constitution during the summer and into the fall recommended that aboriginal rights should be on the agenda, and that it would not breech the spirit of Meech Lake. It would not create any division among the provinces that would result in the elements of the Meech Lake Accord being broken.

The Prime Minister is always willing to go to Washington or attend international conferences. I might say that he speaks with some eloquence on the rights of the oppressed majority in South Africa. Yet he is not even taking a small step on behalf of the native people of this land. He could do so without upsetting the Meech Lake Accord or causing resentment within the population of Quebec. Yet he will not take that step.

I believe his reluctance to do so will hurt him in the next election, because native people have a strong sense of trust in a Prime Minister. They strongly believe in the relationship between the federal Government and native people. When I visit the many reserves and other native communities in my riding and talk to native people, especially the elders, they talk of John George Diefenbaker and all the subsequent Prime Ministers as the people who were responsible for making sure that the Government looked after the interests of native people. I am sure the Member for Yukon (Ms. McLaughlin) has the same experience when she visits native people in her riding. Native communities have always had much respect for Prime Ministers. They are among the last to become involved in snide politics and personal contests when it comes to the Prime Minister.

When I have occasionally made nasty remarks about one of our Prime Ministers, they have told me they were offended because such remarks are inappropriate.

Native people feel especially grieved by what has happened. They see that the Prime Minister, the chairman of the Meech Lake meeting, is not willing to make any effort to guarantee that the next First Ministers meeting or even the one after will deal with aboriginal issues.

Mr. McDermid: He answered that in the House fully.

Mr. Murphy: One of the Conservative Members says that the Prime Minister has answered that fully. He only said that he will get around to it. What does that mean? It does not take much to write a letter. The Prime Minister writes letters to the Premiers constantly It does not take much to stand up for the native people of this land and guarantee that native rights will be on the agenda of the next First Ministers meeting or the one after. He has not done that.

Mr. McDermid: He explained why.

Mr. Murphy: I challenge the Conservative Member to read Hansard to see if there is such a guarantee.

Mr. McDermid: He explained why.

Mr. Murphy: You will have a chance to speak in a few minutes when I sit down. Start looking.

I am concerned about a number of other issues in the Meech Lake Accord. I have said that I will support the Accord because I believe it is important that the people of Quebec become partners in Confederation and share in the process of amending the Constitution in the future. I think it is even more important that they know that there is the willingness, on the part of those of us who are from outside of Quebec, to bring them in, to work with them, to accept the flawed package. I say that because we realize the value of having the mood in Quebec pro-Canada. We recognize the value of that. We are very happy to see that Quebec also agrees that this is an acceptable process.

• (1200)

We are willing, I guess, to swallow some of the things we do not like in the Accord, just as we swallowed things we did not like in 1981. It is a flawed document. There are concerns on the part of women's groups, natives, and people in the Territories. There are concerns on the part of people who want to guarantee that the national Government has the ability to act on issues of national concern. But, after having looked at the report of the committee, which represented members from all Parties, I believe that the flaws, and they are there, are not so drastic that we cannot support this constitutional Accord.

We recognize the problems. We have some constructive amendments. We hope that the Government will give due consideration to those amendments. We hope that in the future, when these issues are before the House and when the First Ministers sit down each and every year, we will have a better process, that we do not have the First Ministers, when they have their yearly meeting on the Constitution, sitting until six or seven in the morning and coming up with another amendment to the Constitution, one which the House of Commons has to accept.

It is time that when we deal with the Constitution we have a better process, a process by which people can feel that they are actually in a position to make amendments, in which people who are left out of the process, like the people of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, the aboriginal people of this land, will have a chance not only to have their voices heard but to have a chance to make the type of amendments that are necessary.

My time is up. I want to say that for someone who has been interested in the Constitution for many years, and as someone who took a course, I guess it is over 20 years ago now, on Canada and French Canadians and the history and all the problems that we have had, it is very important, and I am very glad to see that we have a document, although flawed, that does bring Quebec into the family.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Are there questions or comments?

Mr. McDermid: I cannot let this moment pass without commenting on my hon. friend's remarks regarding the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and the native peoples of this country. As he knows, I was Indian Affairs and Northern Development spokesman for our Party for a year and I became very involved and very interested in the entire scope of problems facing the native peoples. I think what the Prime Minister said in the House should be repeated because to me it made abundant sense. It is fine to schedule meetings. It is fine to say that we will have a meeting next month on it, and another the next month, and so on and so forth. But if nothing is accomplished at those meetings, if they are held just for the television cameras and for everybody to state their positions, they do not achieve anything.

What the Prime Minister said very clearly in his explanation is that the next time they have a meeting—and the sooner the better as far as he is concerned—he wants something accomplished. There is a great deal of work going on now behind the scenes with the native groups and the provinces, who play an integral part in our Constitution, to assure that when we do bring the native situation to the Constitution in a meaningful way that it can be accomplished and that it will be good for everyone involved, especially the native peoples.

The Prime Minister said that there is no sense in calling a meeting just for the sake of having a meeting. We should have successful meetings, and we should accomplish something. That is exactly what is being worked on now, toward that end, for the native peoples of Canada.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, what the Conservative Member has said is fine, to a point. We have guaranteed that the subject of fish will be on the agenda at the next First Ministers' meeting. We have guaranteed that the topic of the Senate will be on the agenda of the next First Ministers' meeting. We have no guarantee that we will resolve fishing issues at the next meeting. We have no guarantee that we will resolve the problem of the Senate at the next First Ministers's meeting, unless we bring some big shovels.

Ms. Jewett: So we can bury it.

Mr. Murphy: Yes, so we can bury it. But why not at least have the native issue raised as a guaranteed item at that meeting? Native people will feel there is at least that much commitment. Now they know that they will not be considered at that meeting. It is fine to say that there is work going on behind the scenes, but the Hon. Member also knows that because there is no guarantee of a meeting of the First Ministers on aboriginal rights the funding for native groups has not been increased. For that matter it has been cut. So it is fine to say that there will be meetings of officials but the funding has been cut. It has been made more difficult for native people to prepare their case so that they can get on the agenda of some future meeting. That is the truth.

It is not good enough to say that the Prime Minister has good intentions, that he does want to see it work in the future. He has to do more than that. There has to be some guarantee that that will happen. That is not there, and it is regrettable. But the Prime Minister has not taken the leadership in that area, which is very obvious to the native people in my riding and right across the country.

Mr. McDermid: I have a short supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I will just take a moment because I want to follow up on what my friend said. The native people have had three meetings. They were disappointed at each one. Should the Prime Minister schedule another meeting and disappoint them again without having anything accomplished? Let us make sure that at the next meeting we can accomplish something. That is why he is doing it.

The Hon. Member talks about the scheduled meetings ahead. That is right, there are scheduled meetings on certain topics. Those have not been scheduled before in the constitutional conferences. The native people have met three times. I sat through those meetings and I sat through the native peoples' conferences on the Constitution. The NDP are going around saying the funding has been cut. That is very unfair. The funding ran out on—

Mr. Heap: It is unfair.

Mr. McDermid: It is unfair for the NDP to say it has been cut. What happened is that the program ended and the Government is now looking at a new funding program. It is examining a new way to fund the natives on the constitutional matter. To say it has been cut is untrue. The program ended; that is not cutting the funding.

Mr. Heap: Will they guarantee to renew it?

Ms. McDonald: Did they have any funding?

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I suppose there are many ways of looking at programs being cut or programs ending, but the net effect, expressed in the Hon. Member's own words, is that there is nothing happening at the present time—

Mr. McDermid: Wrong.

Mr. Murphy: —because the program has ended. It means that native groups are down to a very skeleton staff in terms of trying to develop constitutional positions. It is very hard for them to have meetings in order to discuss these matters with each other. The research cannot be done. Here we are, over six months since the last meeting of the First Ministers on aboriginal rights, and there is still no funding program in place. To say that because there have been three meetings on native issues in the past and they were not successful is not quite true, because they were successful. They brought native issues to national television. There was a population of native people and white people who got to hear for the first time about aboriginal self-government. They got to hear about the problems on the reserves. They got to hear about the concerns of native people. That was a success in itself.

I can tell Hon. Members that in my riding people in native communities were glued to the television sets for each and every one of those meetings because it was so important to them.

• (1210)

It was important for them to hear their national spokesmen speaking articulately to the Prime Minister and to the Premiers. That was very important, and I do not think the Hon. Member argues that point. However, to say that because it has been done three times without success we should not guarantee a fourth meeting at this time is wrong, because it takes away the attention native leaders deserve.

Also, there have been many more than three meetings on the Senate in the House of Commons and in the Senate itself. I think former Prime Minister Trudeau had about 15,000 different proposals on the Senate at which the House looked. We sent committees on the Senate across the land time after time and, God help us, it is not any better now. It is guaranteed as a topic at the next meeting, and it is certainly not for any lack of attention. It has had too much attention; it does not deserve any. It is a guaranteed topic.

Yes, the aboriginal people have had three attempts, but they are not being guaranteed a fourth attempt because they might be disappointed. I think the native people are willing to risk that disappointment. They want a chance to be heard. They want a chance to be able to negotiate their position. It is being denied them, and that is worse than a disappointment.

Ms. Jewett: Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary may not have read the concluding chapter of the joint committee report. I doubt if he has read it because, if he had done so, he would know that, unlike the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and unlike himself, his colleagues on the joint committee recommended a reinstitution of funding. He did not do that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would hope that the Hon. Member would direct her questions to the Hon. Member who just spoke. I am really not too concerned about what the Parliamentary Secretary said. Her questions should be directed to the Member who just finished his speech.

Ms. Jewett: Also the joint committee recommended a planning process, leading up to the renewal of meetings on aboriginal rights, particularly self-government.

Does the Hon. Member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy) realize that there was a unanimous recommendation concerning the meetings of First Ministers, a work plan, and a refunding process? Does he know that the joint committee recommended that a new parliamentary joint committee should be established on a permanent basis to conduct hearings on these and others matters before the First Ministers met?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy) has a minute or so in which to answer.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member for her question. She asked whether I was aware of the document. Yes, I am. The reason I am aware of it is because she gave a very detailed report to our caucus and explained that process.

I believe it was her intention to make sure that it was on the record yet again.

[Translation]

Mrs. Claudy Mailly (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I was profoundly shaken by the constitutional crisis, and that is why I am delighted to see a peaceful solution to this problem, a solution that respects the values we hold most dear.

[English]

I ran for office because I was hoping that I could do directly what I had failed to do indirectly by being involved with citizens' groups. I wanted to find a peaceful solution to the problem we had in terms of the aspirations of the French-speaking people of Quebec who wanted to find their place in the sun, their place in the country, and to be able to live as first-class citizens in their own country, speaking their own language and enjoying their own culture. I could not do it through citizens' groups because too many counter-currents were stopping us from really focusing on what was our purpose.

I also felt that the solutions which were being made available through the political process at that time were going to lead to violence. I believe that the use of violence is not acceptable under any circumstance, in any cause whatsoever. Contrary to what some Members of the House might say, that it could be used to help certain causes, I do not believe so.

I think the saddest day for peaceful persons is when they must defend their lives against an aggressor and perhaps kill the aggressor in the process. To me that is a use of violence which is essential but is a very sad one.

Having rejected violence, we had to find an accommodation. Of course accommodations are not as spectacular as the use of violence or the use of aggressive political ways to impose one's vision of the country on other people. However, it would lead to a solution which would be acceptable to me and would be one that would last.

[Translation]

I attended primary school in my native city of Montreal during the 50's. In school, nationalism, our culture and our language all seemed to be wrapped up in the Catholic religion. We were subjected to a type of parochialism which gave us a certain poverty of spirit and a narrow vision of our social, religious and even economic life. I rejected this parochialism because of this vision. In the dictations that we were given to practice our linguistic skills, for instance, we were told that the federal Government was the enemy because it was trying to interfere with our school system, that, because the federal Government was Protestant and Anglosaxon, we might lose both our religion and our language, and that we should therefore not allow the federal Government to interfere with education in Quebec.

This vision robbed us young Quebecers of a modern education system which would have prepared us for the future in a modern country where we had to compete against very sophisticated businesses. By rejecting this parochialism, I also rejected the leadership role which the Catholic church had assumed in the nationalist movement. I therefore had to look elsewhere for a means to achieve my goals, which were to develop as a French-speaking Quebecer, and also as a modern woman in North America who would be able to choose a career either in business, in science or in the arts if I wished, instead of being restricted to certain fields judged appropriate for francophones. In my opinion, the fight of the clergy was too narrow and too focused on their own personal interests. We had to look elsewhere.

By rejecting this parochialism and this narrow vision, I also rejected the vision of the Trudeaus, the Chrétiens, the Johnstons, and even, I regret to say, the Sheila Finestones. I wanted a country where we could show generosity to all members of our society and to our two cultures. I wanted a wide-open country. I therefore accepted the English fact from a very early date. It might seem strange that I would speak about the English fact because we mostly hear about the French fact. However, for us, in Quebec, the English fact represented the minority. I welcomed this concept with pleasure and I also welcomed the American fact as part of the reality and the vision I had of my own identity as so deeply rooted in my language and culture that it could recognize the beauties of other cultures.

Mr. Speaker, I fear neither the Americans nor the English-speaking Canadians. I feel quite confident, but I am always prepared to fight against threats to my language and my culture.

Throughout the 1950s there was something else threatening our language and our culture besides this Jansenism which advocated a much too limited universe for us: economic poverty, or the fact that francophone Quebecers made up most of society's poorer segments. So we had to find a way to fulfill our economic expectations while preserving our language and our culture. With the 1960s came the quiet revolution, and I stress the word "quiet" because it was not marked by violence, and the purpose of this quiet revolution was to make us a strong economic people. Then a member of the Lesage government, Mr. Lévesque was among those who believed in economic nationalism. Hydro-Québec was a telling case. I might point out that Mr. Lévesque never condoned violence, but he was convinced that we would be able to fulfill our aspirations through the economy. So the quiet revolution yielded an economic lever to remove the obstacle to our development as francophones of French culture in Quebec.

As PQ leader Mr. Lévesque also paved much of the road to Meech Lake. Some people are concerned over the weakening of Bill 101 precisely because, in our efforts towards nationalism, both economic and political, because language of work became an issue, that is where we made great progress, but in terms of economic nationalism people also had in mind the question of commercial signs which was part and parcel of the environment in Quebec's society. And today we are concerned that Bill 101 might be weakened because we do not want to lose what we managed to gain during the 1960s and 1970s and the few years after, which is to secure a truly francophone environment in Quebec. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that an honourable solution will be found to protect in Quebec our English-speaking minority, while maintaining the benefits obtained through Bill 101.

The very first explosion of violence occurred in the 1960s. I was still living in Montreal at the time. The first bomb was placed in front of the U.S. Consulate. At the time, there was a connection with the extreme Left which was very active because of the Americans' involvement in the Vietnam War. There was a leftist infiltration of the nationalist movement which resulted in violence in Quebec. Later on, unfortunately, there was a lot of blood shed by our best young people, because this ideological violence was continued to further nationalism. For us, it was the greatest tragedy. That is when I felt deeply the sadness of living in a violence-prone society: bombs which exploded in residential letterboxes; children who had to remain inside their schools because there was a bomb in a letterbox outside; bombs in department stores or supermarkets. Those were really the darkest pages in our history.

What solution were our politicians suggesting at the time? They were suggesting, it is sad to say, confrontation. They would say: "Let us beat the hell out of these people. Let us smash this nationalistic movement which has gone berserk and become violent", instead of asking why violence had spread among us and was so much a part of our lives.

In my view, Mr. Speaker, the Meech Lake Accord is the right way to deal with this pervasive climate that owed its existence to the fact that we let violence and aggressive politics become part of our lives.

As for the economic poverty that prevented us, French-speaking Quebecers, from becoming a modern and prosperous society, the Quiet Revolution changed all that in the 60s. Many of us in the Conservative Party are nationalists who fought during the 50s and the 60s for recognition of the French fact in Canada, and we are now in a party that still believes in economic change that will help francophone Quebecers prosper in this country.

I do not agree with the Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte Marie (Mr. Malépart), who gives Mr. Bourassa all the credit because, according to the Hon. Member, he formulated the conditions that lead to the Meech Lake Accord. In fact, the way that was paved by Mr. Lévesque was finished by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) who worked so hard to bring us to Meech Lake where, if we had not had the negotiating process, Mr. Bourassa's conditions would have made no difference at all. People must communicate, negotiate, and consult. They have to talk about what they want to implement.

All the nationalists who decided to run under the PC flag in 1984 met again in Ottawa, where they have worked in their Party under a leader who had the courage, the vision and the power to gain acceptance for his vision of this country, which is very similar to mine, Mr. Speaker, and to do so calmly and peacefully.

And that is why I am very proud to be part of this Government and to serve under a Leader who has had the courage to go on, despite the many pitfalls. There were times when he was asked to consider specific interests that would have made his ratings rise in the polls, suggestions which he refused to entertain. For instance, he took part in a very fair and very generous debate on the demands of franco-Manitobans. He refused to take the easy way out, to heed the advice of those who told him: Don't get involved, the subject is too controversial, and you will get into all kinds of trouble. Ignore these issues and go on to other things. Just ignore the franco-Manitoban demands. However, he did not take this advice, and he put the experience acquired with the Manitoba question and franco-Manitoban demands to good use when considering the rights of francophones in Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, people who accuse the Prime Minister of being lacking in generosity, vision and courage are grossly unfair. I had the same experience as Brian Mulroney who started out with a party that was looked upon as the pariah of Canadian politics because 100 years ago, when Louis Riel was hanged, the Conservatives were in power. Mr. Chapleau told his leader, Sir John Macdonald: If you do that, French Canadians will never vote Conservative again. There was a century of history and tradition to overcome. The Prime Minister, who believed in the economic drive of Canadians, who knew that without a strong economy, a people cannot nurture its language, its religion and its culture, the Prime Minister continued his struggle within the Party.

He could have taken the easy way out and become a Liberal. My riding was Liberal ever since Confederation. The same was true in his riding. He could have decided to become a Liberal like Mr. Trudeau, who left the CCF and the Socialists when he decided the Liberal Party could bring him to power. He changed his stand, but Mr. Mulroney did not. He stayed with the Conservatives, he kept his vision and he led us to the Meech Lake Accord. He has given all of us pages in history which are certainly an improvement over those of the 70s, and he brought to me personally the realization of his dream and the results I had hoped for when I became involved in politics. We found a peaceful solution, a solution respectful of our most cherished values, and I am proud today to speak in this debate which, like the debate on the death penalty, will contribute to our self-actualization.

In conclusion, I would like to tell my Quebec colleagues, and especially my friends such as Don Johnston and Sheila Finestone whom I have known a very long time—I knew him when he was my Member of Parliament in Westmount: Good luck, I respect your ideas, but please remember that we now have a more generous vision of Canada thanks to the Meech Lake Accord.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I will allow the Hon. Member to complete her speech, but I would hope that she would refer to Hon. Members by their riding when speaking about them. It is something of which new Hon. Members should be aware.

Questions or comments?

[Translation]

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, the Meech Lake Accord provides for the protection and promotion of minority rights in Quebec, but not in the other provinces. Why is the Conservative Party not willing to protect and promote the rights of minorities outside Quebec?

Mrs. Mailly: Mr. Speaker, it is not because the Conservative Party is not ready, but rather because discussions leading to the Meech Lake Accord were aimed at integrating Quebec into the Canadian Constitution. That was the goal of the discussions. At that point, the purpose was not to look at other details and other matters, whose time certainly will come. Among other things, the rights of francophones outside Quebec is a matter of major importance. So are aboriginal rights, the rights of individuals such as the right to own property. There are a lot of things still to be done. The rights of the provinces, the Northern Territories. We still have major matters to look at, but the aim of the negotiations that led to the Meech Lake Accord was to integrate Quebec into the Canadian constitutional family. That was the root of all the violence during the 60s and 70s. So that is what we discussed.

But we did not close the door—to the contrary, the door is now open. If Quebec had not been integrated, we could not have pursued the constitutional process because without the presence of Quebec it was not decent even to sit down and discuss the country, because to me at least the core of the country was absent from those discussions.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, one of the basic features of this country is linguistic duality. But I would like to ask the Hon. Member for Gatineau (Mrs. Mailly) whether she has a definition of the concept of a distinct society. Certainly she must be aware of my interpretation. And I know that many Quebecers have a definition of what a distinct society is all about that is different from mine.

I wonder whether she, as a Quebecer, could give us today her definition in a few words. In order to refresh her memory, I personally will suggest to her that Quebec is different from other provinces because it is the province with a French-speaking majority. But it also has an important English-speaking minority and a native component, or anyway a native people that is equally important. That in my view makes it distinctive, that is what Quebec is all about—a French-speaking majority, a very large English-speaking minority and a large native minority. Is her definition different from that?

Mrs. Mailly: The distinct society clause in the Meech Lake Accord is quite clear. Its purpose is to enshrine the special character of Quebec and its francophone majority which until now had to be protected by all kinds of legislation because otherwise it could not maintain and enhance its position. As I see it, the Meech Lake Accord is quite clear in that it refers to the francophone majority and the Anglophone minority which is already protected by our institutions and has its own schools, and in fact has a lot more rights than francophone minorities elsewhere in this country. Those are well-known facts, Mr. Speaker. I am not afraid of the terms: "Distinct society", the way some Liberals are, and I fail to see how they restrict the rights of the anglophone minority. In fact, as I said earlier, I am delighted with the diversity of my society. I am delighted by the fact that we are part of North America. I do not feel threatened. I feel strong in the knowledge that I have my own culture and my own language.

I agree that we have a distinct society because we have a francophone majority. We also have an anglophone minority, and we have our native people, who I think are better treated by the provincial government than by the federal Government, for many reasons, because since the provinces each have their own particular problems and priorities, it has been difficult to harmonize the federal policy for our Native Peoples across this country. In Quebec, I think our native people are treated very well.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time allowed for questions and comments has expired. Resuming debate. The Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria).

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in the debate on the Constitution Amendment, 1987.

Mr. Speaker, I come to this debate with a background that has, I think, bestowed on me a very special privilege. First of all, I belong to the franco-Ontarian minority. I was not born franco-Ontarian. I was born in Quebec, and one of my parents was a franco-Ontarian and one was a French-speaking Quebecer.

Mr. Speaker, at a very early age I moved to Ontario with my family, and from then on, we always lived in this province which I call my own. The name Boudria in Quebec goes back to at least 1689, and so I feel my roots are there, although I have no personal memory of having lived there myself.

The question I imagine all Canadians are asking today is, which Members are going to vote for or against the Meech Lake Accord. Before I go any further, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that I intend to vote for the Constitution Amendment, 1987. I am not doing so because it is the best agreement that could be made. In fact, I think there are still a number of shortcomings, and I would say major ones. The fact is not whether the agreement is the best possible one. It is not. But the question we ask is this: Is it better to have an agreement or not to have one? I think that as Canadians, we are better off with the Constitution amendment, 1987, imperfect as it is, than without one altogether.

Mr. Speaker, it would be even better if Parliament were to adopt the amendments proposed by my Liberal colleagues. I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Hon. Member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) and all my Liberal colleagues who took part in the debate in committee and who drafted the amendments.

[English]

The amendments our Party is proposing to the 1987 constitutional Accord would make the document better, in my opinion. The amendments would make it better because they would include in the Accord as a fundamental characteristic of Canada the aboriginal people, the multicultural and regional identities and the advantages of developing the Canadian economic union. They would also make the agreement better by offering more protection to official language minorities in Canada outside Quebec. It would also again improve the agreement by ensuring that all provisions of the Charter, not just Section 25 and Section 27, have been included with regard to certain clauses. It would make the agreement better because it better addresses the issue of Senate reform. It would allow for the appointment of Senators from the Territories.

• (1240)

Our amendments would also provide for a deadlock resolution mechanism in the event of disputes. They would ensure greater national consistency in programs available to Canadians. Not least, the Liberal amendments would provide for bilateral agreements between Canada and a potential new province. I am referring of course to the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. My colleagues have also indicated we want an amendment to restore aboriginal rights to the constitutional agenda.

Needless to say, I am of the opinion that these amendments would make the constitutional Accord better. I do not believe any of them are offensive to any of the provincial Governments. We have not heard any provincial Government say they would be offensive. I therefore conclude they would not be. In any event, I ask what would be wrong in proposing these amendments to the provinces?

Unfortunately, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) decided we were not to entertain amendments and therefore I am led to the conclusion that the committee process we went through was certainly not as useful as it could have been. Granted there was some benefit in the fact that we received positive input from a number of Canadians, but it would have been that much better had we been able to fully utilize the information provided to us and which we, the Liberal Party, have used in our proposed amendments.

I want to speak briefly to the unanimity issue. In certain respects I am not quite as frightened of are some people. What we are trying to achieve is a means by which our Constitution can be amended in future. The process cannot be so flexible that one group can have almost free access to changing the Constitution. If that happens it is really not a Constitution, it is just like any other Bill. On the other hand, if it is totally inflexible then it is no longer a living document. We have to try and achieve a balance between the two. That is what makes a good Constitution.

How do we achieve that? The 1982 document with the requirement for agreement by seven of 10 provinces was a good compromise. However, there are perhaps issues on which we would want unanimity. Certainly the admittance of new provinces should not be one of those, in my opinion. That should remain bilateral. Neither am I of the opinion that unanimity is impossible. The fact we have a Meech Lake Accord certainly disproves that theory.

Whether we like it or not, we had a form of unanimity clause even before the constitutional Accord was signed. I say that for the following reason. Only one province did not sign the 1982 Accord. We all recognize that although that province was legally bound by the Accord, there was a certain moral authority missing in our Constitution because Quebec had not signed it. Therefore, we can say in retrospect that, although it was not legally there before, there was still a moral requirement for unanimity. Otherwise, why would we all agree that it was necessary for Quebec to sign the Accord? All the interventions I have heard so far, some against and some in favour, have agreed it was necessary to have Quebec sign. Therefore, I conclude that unanimity on that issue was at least a prerequisite to making our country whole again.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, there was a long debate as to whether Quebec was a distinct society, as to what a so-called distinct society was. As a Canadian born in Quebec but who has spent most of his life outside Quebec, I can readily see that it is indeed somewhat different from the other provinces. Whether it is the fact that Quebec's linguistic majority is not the same as the linguistic majority in the rest of Canada, whether it is the fact that Quebec has its own particular legislation, and I am referring specifically to Quebec's Civil Code, whether it is the fact that Quebec has Senate designations—this is peculiar to that province for, as we know, Senators in the rest of Canada represent their province, whereas Quebec Senators represent a specific region—whether it be for a number of other reasons, we all know that Quebec is a society which differs from the rest of the country to a certain extent. Quebec is neither better nor worse for that, but the fact remains that Quebec is a different province. I might single out the fact that traditionally Quebec has had three judges on the Supreme Court of Canada, another element which is certainly distinct or, if you will, peculiar to Quebec as a province.

[English]

However, having said that, I think the document would have been improved if we had said that the minority language outside Quebec has an equal status with the minority language inside Quebec. In other words, the document we have now refers to the distinct society of Quebec as having a role of promoting and protecting itself, one of its components being the minority language. The role of this House and the provinces is to protect the minority language and not to promote it. At least the word "promote" is not there. That leads me to believe there is a difference there which is certainly not justified. If that difference in the document were corrected by one of the Liberal amendments, it would take nothing away from Quebec but it would make many other Canadians feel much better.

[Translation]

Being a franco-Ontarian I feel that the document might be improved along the lines I have just described without taking anything at all away from francophones in Quebec or from the anglophone majority in that province.

Mr. Speaker, in the past some people said in other speeches that Canada was a country with decentralized powers, and so it is. It has been said that Canada comes second only to Switzerland as far as decentralization of the taxation power is concerned. I find such a statement rather strange since Switzerland is one of the most stable democracies and one of the countries with the highest standard of living in the world, and this comment would seem to suggest that a country which has something in common with Switzerland is deficient in some way. Naturally, this is not be the case, Mr. Speaker.

It is also important to remember the origins of this country. At the Constitutional conferences during the 1860's and even before, at the time of the Union in 1840, the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada joined together under the name of the United Province of Canada. At the time, a majority from both regions was necessary to ensure that the voice of the two components of this United Province would always be heard. We all know that this formula was not practical and it was amended by the British North America Act in 1867.

We must also remember, Mr. Speaker, that Canada is a union of provinces and not a country divided into provinces. Sometimes, my constituents ask me why education comes under provincial jurisdiction. Why did the federal Government give the provinces jurisdiction over education? To such a question, I reply: You have the right question, but you are not asking it properly. The fact is that, when the provinces united, they delegated certain powers, including residual powers, naturally, to the federal Government, and kept those which were appropriate for them or which they believed necessary to govern their affairs. Mr. Speaker, the answer to the question I asked earlier is this. We cannot change the fact that the provinces have large powers in our system. They had these powers before and they will still have them after the Lake Meech Accord.

What is also important is to emphasize that, without the Meech Lake Accord, repatriation of our Constitution was incomplete, as I have already pointed out. As a Canadian, I want my country to be complete, I do not want it to be divided as it has been historically on several occasions. I do not want my country to remain under the threat of separation; I want it to be a cohesive and powerful entity. I therefore ask myself this question: Was such a thing possible without the agreement of Quebec, without its joining the Constitution? The answer is no.

A second question which some people ask me is this: Have we paid too much for this agreement? But have we paid too much compared to what? How can we make such a comparison? I was not at the bargaining table. The agreement was not negotiated by myself or by the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition. I am therefore unable to say whether or not something better could have been achieved during the negotiations. I trust that the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition would always be able to negotiate better than the Prime Minister. This is probably true. However, I have to congragulate the Prime Minister for having succeeded in signing this agreement with the Canadian provinces to achieve unanimity and make our country a cohesive and united entity.

• (1250)

[English]

Unlike those of many countries, our Constitution is not comprised of only one document. We are sometimes quick to point out that it took us a long time to repatriate our Constitution, from 1931, with the Statute of Westminster, to 1982. However, we should not believe that we have not evolved constitutionally over that time. Our Constitution is made up of 24 documents; 13 Acts of the British Parliament, seven Acts of the Canadian Parliament and four British Orders in Council. The combination of all those documents has gradually amended our Constitution to its present form.

I hope that that process will not come to an end, that we will continue to evolve and change the document through a slow and gradual process which will ensure that our country is made stronger. Our country will not be made stronger only because more power is given to the central government. It will not necessarily be made weaker because less power is given to the federal Government. Our country will be made stronger if we all work together to keep it the great country that it is. Granted, if we reach a stage where the federal Government has no power and the provinces have it all, that would effectively mean the end of our country. I do not believe that we are doing that with this constitutional Accord.

I would like to speak briefly about Senate reform, something which the Fathers of Confederation probably wanted since the day after the British North America Act was enacted. We have tried to reform the Senate for a long time but have had only very modest success so far. However, that does not mean that the task has ended.

For instance, I do not think it is necessarily wrong that Senators should be nominated by the Premiers. There are those who say that the people nominated by the Premiers will be accountable only to the Premiers. That is not true because Senators are appointed for the rest of their lives. That would be the same as saying that Senators appointed by federal leaders are accountable only to them. We know that that institution has maintained a certain independence in any case.

I know that the time for this debate is drawing to an end. I am happy to have had the opportunity to participate. This is one of the most fundamental issues we will ever discuss. I am of the opinion that the document is not the best one that could have been signed, but it is certainly better than the status quo. It would be even better with the amendments which our Party has proposed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The next speaker will be the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Keeper). I will call it one o'clock.

It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

THE CONSTITUTION

MEECH LAKE ACCORD—LIBERAL PARTY AMENDMENTS

Mr. Roland de Corneille (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, like most Canadians I very enthusiastically welcome Quebec's inclusion in our Constitution which is of primary importance. However, I am shocked and appalled by the Government's failure to provide adequate opportunity for debate and voting on proposed amendments to the Meech Lake Accord. I believe the amendments put forward by Liberals are both sound and vitally important.

These amendments relate to the following: first, the recognition of aboriginal peoples, multicultural and regional identities and the advantages of lower trade barriers between the provinces; second, more protection to official language minorities; third, ensuring that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms is paramount and that the basic rights and freedoms of Canadians are not diminished by potential conflicts with any section of the Accord, including equality rights of the sexes; fourth, accelerating the move toward an elected Senate; fifth, that Supreme Court appointments must be made via a mechanism ensuring a full complement of Supreme Court justices at all times and protecting the basic rights of northern Canadians by giving their Governments the same rights as the provinces to propose candidates for the courts; sixth, clarifying the opting out clause where the provinces may opt out of national shared-cost programs, thus ensuring greater national uniformity in programs available; seventh, eliminating the rigid unanimity provision for Senate reform and returning to the seven provinces and 50 per cent of the population formula.

It is absurd that the federal Government will not give these amendments the proper consideration they deserve and take steps to implement them in the Meech Lake Accord.

GENEOLOGY

IMPORTANCE OF KNOWING ONE'S ORIGINS

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec Est): Mr. Speaker, I would like to seize the opportunity I am given today to draw attention to an important event for the 180,000 people on this continent who proudly bear the Tremblay surname.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, on October 17 and 18 next, more than 2,000 Tremblays will assemble in Charlevoix to celebrate the three hundred and fortieth anniversary of their ancestors' arrival in Nouvelle-France: Pierre Tremblay and Ozanne Achon.

Pierre Tremblay came to Quebec City on August 6, 1647 and settled in 1659 at l'Ange-Gardien where he had four sons. A statue was unveiled in his honour, in 1974, by the mayor of L'Ange-Gardien, Mr. Lionel Tremblay, my father.

Like some other families, the Tremblays came to Canada to settle in the regions of Quebec, Toronto, Vancouver and the Maritimes, and from there populated the rest of the country and part of the United States.

It has been said that more than 20 million people living in Canada and in the United States originate from Quebec and that more than 15 million people living in the United States have Canadian origins.

It would therefore be a good idea, Mr. Speaker, so people could learn about their origin and their roots, to set up information centres that would be better located in the Cities where came the majority of those newcomers, such as Halifax, Quebec City, Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver.

Besides being used as an information instrument, those centres would be an excellent historical and cultural tourism instrument for ethnic groups who came and populated Canada, and from here, the United States.

What do the Tremblays think about that? The matter is open for debate, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL FAMILY WEEK

STRATEGY TO FIGHT FAMILY POVERTY URGED

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, this is National Family Week. While this symbolic recognition is important, it is not enough.

Today's families face tremendous social and financial pressures, and we must provide people who comprise Canadian families with more than one week of recognition a year.

We need a cohesive, comprehensive policy for Canadian families. Instead of inadequate piecemeal programs, we need a strategy for fair taxes for our families, for affordable housing, for accessible child care, for education, training and work opportunities for our young people.

Most important, we need a strategy to fight family poverty. One-fifth of Canada's poor are children. The lack of such a strategy to fight poverty has resulted in food banks becoming one of Canada's fastest growing industries. This is coupled with a disgraceful number of homeless families in Canada.

As an important step I appeal to the Government to announce today that it will drop plans to impose a tax on food. Canadian families have it hard enough without worrying about this possible added burden. I make a special request for those living in the North, where food costs are already between 30 per cent and 50 per cent higher than those in southern Canada.

Northerners in particular, and Canadians in general, do not need and certainly do not deserve a Draconian food tax. Let us help families where it really counts, in the pocketbook.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT—ENERGY INDUSTRY BENEFITS

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, last year Canada exported over $1 billion worth of electricity to the United States. The Americans have unwisely boxed themselves into a corner. Excessive environmental zeal and over-regulation in that country have prevented the necessary construction of new power stations to fill any new demand or even replace aging plants. They will be virtually at our mercy.

The free trade agreement assures the freest possible bilateral trade in energy, and ensures non-discriminatory access to the U.S. market for our electricity. These developments, together with the Minister of Energy's instructions to the National Energy Board to reduce regulation of electricity exports, will ensure a growing and prosperous trade in electricity between the two countries, one which should prove to be very much to Canada's advantage.

FUTURE OF FIRESTONE PLANT IN HAMILTON—MINISTER'S ROLE

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in the House we saw the spectacle of the Minister responsible for the Firestone situation respond to a set-up question from one of the Hamilton-area Conservatives by saying that he was personally going to involve himself in the dossier of the 1,300 workers who are about to lose their jobs at Firestone. However, when cornered outside the House, the selfsame Minister actually refused to say that he would even pick up the phone to talk to either of the two companies involved. Instead, he promised that he would send a letter—send a letter, Mr. Speaker, when we are in the middle of a national postal dispute.

The Minister knows that 1,300 jobs are involved. How can he stand in the House with the kind of hypocrisy that I have not seen in many years and claim that he is going to fight for workers, jobs, buttress the point made by the other Conservative Member in the House, and then turn around and say he will not pick up the phone, contact the parties involved and get them back to the negotiating table?

If the Minister wants to have a shred of credibility left tell him do not use the mails, get the parties together and save those jobs. Otherwise he has misled the House, he has misled the people and, in particular, he has misled the people of Hamilton.

THE LATE WILLIAM SKOREYKO

Mr. William G. Lesick (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I regret to inform the House, particularly those Members who have served for a considerable period, of the recent passing of former Edmonton East Member of Parliament, Mr. Bill Skoreyko.

Mr. Skoreyko came to this place for the first time in 1958 and, overall, won election seven times, serving the people of Edmonton East for the next 21 years. He was able to do so because of a deep commitment to the people of his riding; a commitment which superseded the pursuit of personal, more prestigious goals. He was, in short, a constituency man who knew how to get things done for his constituents.

I know that I can speak for all Members of the House when, in expressing condolences to Mr. Skoreyko's wife and children, I say that an elected representative can have no finer example to emulate than Bill Skoreyko.

DISARMAMENT

CALL FOR AGREEMENT ON BANNING CHEMICAL WEAPONS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, Ottawa is currently host to an International Conference on Implementing a Global Chemical Weapons Convention. The conference is co-sponsored by the Canadian Centre for Arms Control and Disarmment and the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. The work of this conference is occasion for us in the House to take note of how important it is to conclude a comprehensive and verifiable ban on chemical weapons production and the destruction of all existing stocks of chemical weapons.

Canada has a particular reason to be as interested in this issue as we are. It was Canadian troops at Ypres who were the first to suffer from the use of chemical weapons in the form of mustard gas.

I urge the Government to spare no effort in doing what it can to secure an agreement on chemical weapons and, in so doing, make a truly historic contribution to international security and disarmament.

SUPPORT FOR CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Jim Jepson (London East): Mr. Speaker, I believe we have just witnessed the signing of a truly historic free trade agreement, one that history will reveal was a giant step forward for the economic prosperity of Canadians. While the agreement, I believe, was historic, what I hear from the Liberals and the "Old Democratic Party" is hysterical and purely partisan politics, rather than looking at the agreement in the best interests of Canadians.

Let us see what the public is saying about this agreement.

> Congratulations on the signature of the free trade agreement. We're really glad now that we have often spoken out publicly in favour of such a pact. We are truly optimistic that 3M Canada's 2,000 employees across the country will benefit from its promise of increased exports and lowered import costs.
> On behalf of all these employees and all Canadians from coast to coast we say: great that you pulled it off. And again, congratulations.
> John Myser,

The telegram says it all. I say to my friends in the Liberal Party and in the "Old Democratic Party": get with it and join with us in moving boldly and with vision into the 21st century.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT—EFFECT ON NORTHERN ONTARIO

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, people in northern Ontario are very disappointed in the free trade deal which has been signed between Canada and the United States.

In the steel industry we have not gained guaranteed access to the United States market. Even the anti-dumping duties which have been imposed on Algoma Steel are still in place. We are still subject to countervailing duty and dumping duty. There is no dispute handling mechanism in place, only an appeal procedure.

The softwood lumber deal is costing northern Ontario $40 million per year in export tax. It has been enshrined in the agreement, and we are still subject to countervail duties should the Americans decide to impose them.

Most of all, in terms of the uranium mining industry and refining industry, the policy of further upgrading of uranium within Canada before sale to the United States has been abandoned. This policy will return us to being hewers of wood and drawers of water.

I point out to the Government that I think it has made a very bad deal for northern Ontario.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT—ATLANTIC COAST FISHERY BENEFITS

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, one of the big winners in a free trade arrangement between Canada and the United States is the Atlantic coast fishery. Enhanced access to the eastern United States market will assure full sales and top prices for Canadian fish and fish products, already a billion dollar industry.

This very year, fish plant workers were demanding government action to remove United States import barriers to restore jobs and employment to Nova Scotians.

Now those barriers will be removed and the fishing industry will benefit, so what does the new guardian angel of East Coast fishermen, Bob White, say? He says that the trade pact will destroy our economy and produce a "dog-eat-dog" society.

Mr. White and the Canadian Auto Workers Union promise to improve the employment conditions of fishermen and plant workers, but they want to destroy and defeat the very initiative which will assure that employment—free trade.

There will be a plethora of disinformation on the Canada-United States trade pact from its opponents, but Bob White better come clean with Nova Scotia fishermen and workers if he wants to retain his credibility as a labour leader. He should leave disinformation about free trade to his friends in the NDP.

DECENTRALIZATION

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to express serious concern over today's announcement in Winnipeg that 85 jobs and a major portion of Canada's National Disease Control Research Centre are to be transferred from Ottawa to Winnipeg.

As the Member of Parliament for Ottawa Centre I want to say that there is a great deal of concern among people in my community that closed door decisions to transfer existing federal facilities and jobs to other parts of Canada are not fair. Their basic objection and mine is that this decision was made with no opportunity for public review of the impact on Ottawa, nor of the costs or benefits of this transfer.

I have written to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) to express my objections and to ask for such a public process that would end this secret bidding game between communities. I am particularly perturbed that this transfer to Winnipeg may substantially increase the operating costs for the Disease Control Centre, because that only can mean reduction in other areas of research at a time of federal spending cut-backs.

It is not good enough just to move a few political plums across the landscape and call that economic development. What we need is a real commitment to jobs in which every Canadian community can be a winner.

PAN-CANADIAN CRUSADE OF ROBERT BOURASSA

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I should like personally to congratulate the Quebec Premier, the Hon. Robert Bourassa.

His offer to travel throughout the country to promote the free trade agreement shows that he can rise above partisanship. Mr. Bourassa has said that he is willing to fight within Quebec and outside Quebec to help the passage of the agreement.

After all, Mr. Speaker, we have to choose between a strong and open Canada willing to compete with the other nations of the world during the forthcoming decades, or a Canada which keeps a more traditional, closed and protectionnist approach.

Also the Quebec Premier has chosen the open approach, the one chosen by the Government of Canada. What a difference, Mr. Speaker, with the traditional, protectionist and closed approach formerly taken in Quebec. Well done, Mr. Bourassa!

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT—EFFECT ON WATER RESOURCES

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, after reading the energy section in what actually is an economic union rather than a free trade agreement, I have to conclude with great reluctance that energy in the long term could mean water. Electricity is generated using water. Therefore, it is not inconceivable that 20 or more years from now Canadians could be asked by the United States to ship our water south by way of diversions as the inevitable extension of the continental energy policy the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) is committing Canada to through the proposed free trade agreement.

This section looks like the Trojan horse of the agreement, disguising demands for water by the United States in the next century, a possibility that cannot be discounted.

I invite Canadians to let their parliamentarians know their views. The question is this: Is the Government of Canada ultimately committing us, under the disguise of a continental energy policy, to share Canadian waters so as to meet future needs south of the border? If so, is this what Canadians want? And if not, does the Prime Minister of Canada have a mandate to proceed?

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT—WINNIPEG FREE PRESS SUPPORT

Mr. Bill Attewell (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I just returned from Winnipeg late last night. I would like to put a few quotes on the record from an editorial entitled "Free Trade Hysteria" which appeared in yesterday's Winnipeg Free Press. For example:

> John Turner's fears for the future are scarcely worth dealing with because they consist of little more than the ritual recital of almost every protectionist cliché ever devised by man.
> Mr. Broadbent's argument is more serious, more subtle and every bit as wrong.
> The NDP Leader is forced now to concede that all of his fears about Canada agreeing to destroy its social programs, wipe out regional development policies and crush its cultural industries were unfounded. Instead he argues that greater trade with the United States will lead to the erosion of the Canadian view of society that led to development of medicare, old age pensions, et cetera.

The editorial continues:

> In fact, all these Canadian social, political, economic and cultural innovations were being developed at the very time when trade with the U.S. and investment from the U.S. were increasing rapidly.

In closing, the editorial states:

> The real danger to social programs and cultural industries is not free trade but a stagnant or declining economy. Clinging to the status quo in a dangerously protectionist world would have risked economic stagnation or decline.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

FREE TRADE

IMPORTANCE OF THE PROVINCES' APPROVAL

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister for International Trade. In November 1985, the Prime Minister promised to the provinces that he would not sign a free trade agreement without their approval if it included matters under their jurisdiction. Last night, the United States Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. James Baker, said to some American Senators that there would be no agreement without the approval of the Canadian provinces.

Considering this statement from the Secretary of the Treasury, is the Minister still claiming that she does need the approval of the provinces to go ahead with free trade?

[English]

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I explained in the House that the Prime Minister has consulted widely with the provinces. He has addressed their concerns in the negotiation of the free trade agreement. He has made it explicitly clear that this is a federal treaty which is within federal jurisdiction, and consent of the provinces is not required.

APPROVAL OF PROVINCES

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, the Minister is making a very serious and grave error of judgment. The United States Secretary of the Treasury has now declared in front of the American Senate that Americans will not go along with the Accord unless there is full approval of the provinces. The Minister well knows that in the agreement there are a number of areas that touch directly upon matters under provincial jurisdiction, including the licensing of professionals in the service areas, the regulation of the wine industry, the pricing and allocation of supplies of energy, and the list goes on.

● (1420)

The fact is that the agreement does touch the provinces. The Americans have said that they will not sign an agreement without provincial concurrence. Why does the Minister, standing before that evidence, reject that reality? Is it not required that the provinces give unanimous approbation and approval to this agreement if it is to go ahead?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I have explained that the provinces have been taken though every element of this agreement. Their concerns have been taken into the negotiations. I see no reason why they would not proceed with an agreement which is in their interests and which they acknowledge is in their interests. I would put the onus on the Hon. Member: deliver us a Premier who will not sign, before he makes those allegations.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, when we become the Government, we will be glad to carry out all negotiations with the provinces.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: Until that time, it is the responsibility of the Minister.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: We are hearing comments from those who are worried about their pension plans.

RESPONSIBILITIES OF PROVINCES

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister. Mr. Dick Self, the chief U.S. negotiator in the area of services, said today in Washington that the Canadian Government had assured the U.S. during negotiations that the provinces would implement the free trade agreement.

A November study done by the Government of Ontario showed that in the area of services alone there would have to be 16 different provincial statutes amended to provide for the kind of access included under this agreement. That clearly means that the provinces have a responsibility, and in effect have a virtual veto right. We want to know when the Government will clearly define and establish the responsibilities and the role of the provinces under this agreement before we go any further down this misbegotten path.

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think the Prime Minister has indicated what the role of the provinces is, and the provinces have acknowledged that there is the need to be fully consulted and to have their needs taken into account.

It is very interesting that that kind of allegation would come from a member of a former Government which never consulted the provinces on the Auto Pact.

POSSIBLE JOB LOSSES—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT ESTIMATES

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In the past two days when I asked the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Minister of Finance to give us their official estimates of jobs to be lost to free trade, they did not answer. Yesterday, outside the House, the Minister of Employment and Immigration said that there was a possibility of losing more than 500,000 jobs to free trade, a much greater number than the 350,000 jobs to be created as predicted by the Economic Council.

The Government owes it to business, to unions and to individuals, to make these official forecasts available so that we can all plan for the future. If the Government can make known to the public its estimates for job creation, surely it can make known its official estimates for job losses. Will the Minister do that today?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am going to explain exactly to my colleague what I meant, and what I mean when I speak of free trade in relation to employment. I think that the agreement with the United States will translate in outstanding opportunities for Canada and, in the months ahead, we will see tens of thousands of jobs being created. I will go even further than that. Contrary to what you might think, without the mechanisms contained in this agreement, we would be losing thousands of jobs. Consequently, the situation is very clear for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The free trade agreement is a wonderful opportunity to continue the magnificient job already done by the Government in terms of employment. There is no question of jobs being lost because of this free trade agreement.

[English]

READJUSTMENT AND RETRAINING PROGRAMS

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, the Minister is continually contradicting himself as are other Ministers. Yesterday he said outside the House that there was the possibility of 500,000 jobs being lost, and many people heard him. If that possibility exists, how can the Minister say nothing should be done about it until January 1, 1989, as he did yesterday? We already have 1.2 million unemployed, 4.5 million functionally illiterate, and at the same time a shortage of skilled workers. It takes five years to train an engineer and three years to train an electronics technician.

• (1425)

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Allmand: Would the Minister make some decisions today and put on the table his readjustment and retraining plans for the many workers who will lose their jobs as a result of this agreement?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I just told my friend what I think about a free trade agreement and the jobs created in the future. Canadians are tired of hearing the Liberals for three years complaining about the fact we do not create jobs. We have had close to one million jobs created in this country. You can cry and cry and cry, but you have never been able to create so many jobs in 20 years.

EFFECT OF AGREEMENT ON HYDRO RATES

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade. In the last few days we learned that Canada lost sovereign control over the price and security of supply of petroleum. Today I want to ask a question pertinent to our loss of control over our hydroelectric resources.

The Minister will know that in the agreement the Government produced there is a clause which says there is agreement to assure the freest possible bilateral trade in energy, including non-discriminatory access for the United States to Canadian energy supplies.

Will the Minister confirm for the House that what this means is that no province will have the right as a matter of policy to charge hydro rates to the citizens or industries of that province lower than the export price to the U.S?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I should make it very clear that what we did in the energy negotiations in the free trade agreement was to enshrine our energy policy, not the NEP. The Hon. Member is suggesting we go back and leave the door open to that kind of program.

As to electricity, I am not sure of the thrust of the Hon. Member's question but I can assure him that the powers of the NEB remain in place and the pricing policies of Quebec and other hydro-producing provinces remain in place.

RIGHT TO DECIDE ENERGY PRICES

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I hope the Minister has read the agreement. It is her responsibility to answer to the House of Commons about an agreement her Government has signed. She should know what is in it.

Hydro resources are of profound importance to many provinces. Therefore, will she tell us if the provinces will continue to have the right to decide as a matter of policy that citizens in those provinces can have lower energy prices than U.S. citizens will pay for that same energy? Yes or no, answer the question.

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, it might be possible to answer the Hon. Member if he asked the question in a way one can respond to. Shrieking across the floor of the House is not conducive to answers.

I can only repeat that in our energy negotiations we secured access for all forms of energy which this Government has put in place. I can also assure him that any rights the provinces had before this agreement concerning their own policies, they will have after this agreement.

• (1430)

Mr. Broadbent: In that case, Mr. Speaker, the United States officials who have been saying something to the contrary have been profoundly misled.

PROVINCIAL RIGHTS TO DECIDE RATES

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I want to get this clear from the Minister. Is she now saying, not only to the people of Canada but to the United States officials who were involved in these negotiations, that the Province of Manitoba or the Province of Quebec, for example, can charge a lower rate for hydro electric energy to the citizens of their provinces after this agreement goes into effect than they will be charging the United States? Will she answer that yes or no?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I repeat that any rights the provinces had in this area before this agreement was initialled, they have now.

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister and it concerns the free trade agreement with the United States.

On Monday, the Prime Minister stated in a speech before the Canadian Exporters Association that massive programs will be needed to protect Canadians who will lose their jobs because of the free trade agreement. On Tuesday, the Minister of Finance stated in this House that there would be no need for such programs after all and that he did not expect massive adjustment programs to become necessary. Wednesday, the Minister of Employment and Immigration stated outside the House, according to a report in this morning's issue of Le Journal de Montréal: "The most pessimistic scenario on free trade is that 500,000 Canadians will lose their jobs during the 10-year period when tariffs between the United States and Canada are being phased out".

Mr. Deputy Prime Minister, I would like to ask you which of these three contradictory statements is the right one, that of the Prime Minister, that of the Minister of Finance or that of the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Who speaks for the Government?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I gave the same reply earlier to the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East. This is not so far from Laval for the Hon. Member not to understand what I said. I believe that it is quite clear that the agreement with the United States represents an extraordinary opportunity for Canada to create tens of thousands of jobs. I believe that this is very obvious and the Hon. Member recognizes this fact as well as I do. The Prime Minister simply said that if there are adjustments to be made, and we shall find out in due time if there are, the Government will act accordingly. As for the Minister of Finance, he simply confirmed that Canada is now spending $6 billion for employment adjustment programs. We shall assess the situation and take action based on the results of the agreement with the United States when these results come into effect, that is beginning in January, 1989.

REMARKS OF MINISTER OF EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, labour training programs have been slashed by 32 per cent since this Government took office. The Prime Minister mentioned massive programs. Obviously he was referring to something new. Mr. Speaker, I should like to get back to the loss of 500,000 jobs. I would like to ask the Minister whether he denies this morning's report in Le Journal de Montréal to the effect that 500,000 Canadians would lose their jobs? If we look at press clippings concerning the survey made by the City of Montreal, or the car parts industry, or textile workers, those are the thousands of jobs which correspond exactly to the Minister's remarks. Will the Minister be telling us now that what he said yesterday to Le Journal de Montréal and to other newspapermen is a lie and that people in the press gallery reported falsehoods?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have two things to say to my colleague. First, I too read Quebec papers: yesterday's La Presse, yesterday's Le Devoir, yesterday's editorial by Alain Dubuc. Second, Mr. Speaker, once again I gave him the answer a moment ago. I told him a moment ago: I am telling you that the agreement with the United States will create tens of thousands of jobs. The Economic Council of Canada puts it at 350,000. I can quote major sources. Once again, Mr. Speaker, things are clear. Annoyingly enough for my friends opposite, the Government is saying that the agreement with the United States will give Canadians the unbelievable opportunity to find tens of thousands of jobs. And, once again, you were never able to do something concrete to put Canadians to work!

[English]

STATEMENT ATTRIBUTED TO MINISTER ON POSSIBLE JOB LOSSES

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the same Minister. Would he try to come to terms with the statements which he made yesterday and on which he has still not provided the House with a straight answer? Does the Minister in fact deny that he said yesterday that up to 500,000 jobs could be lost? Does he deny that report? Does he deny that studies have been done by his Department on this issue?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, suffice it to say that tens of thousands and even hundreds of thousands of jobs will be created as a result of the agreement with the United States.

INQUIRY IF REPORTS CONCERNING JOB LOSSES ARE FALSE

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, we cannot let the matter rest.

Could the Minister state quite simply and frankly whether reports that many jobs will be lost are falso? Are those reports false? Could you just answer the question, please?

[English]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, for the third time, Canadians want to know how many jobs will be created by this agreement with the United States. I have said that thousands and thousands of jobs will be created.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER EXPORT TAX

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade. On August 24 in this House the Prime Minister stated, in response to a question about the 15 per cent export tax on softwood lumber and about free trade, as follows:

> If we are successful, as a necessary follow-up we would want to try to deal with each one of these irritants to make the situation even better than it can be under a trade arrangement.

The free trade agreement does nothing at all for softwood lumber producers. In fact, the agreement locks in that 15 per cent export tax. Therefore, how can the Minister for International Trade honour the Prime Minister's commitment to make things even better for softwood lumber producers?

While she is on her feet will she tell us how she is going to be able to rescind this punitive tax, especially in those regions of Canada where stumpage fees are already sufficiently high, such as northern Ontario and the Province of New Brunswick?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I remind the House that when we brought in the softwood lumber tax the Opposition said that we would lose thousands of jobs and devastate the industry. In fact the industry has enjoyed record production and record profits. The industry's shipments are up in a wide variety of markets and provincial treasuries have gained hundreds of millions of dollars.

With regard to the memorandum on softwood lumber, we are working within the terms of it. We have given the provinces room to increase their stumpage as they desired. We are working to conclude that MOU arrangement.

Mr. Penner: Mr. Speaker, I advise the Minister that in my constituency five sawmills were closed down because of the 15 per cent export tax.

Some Hon. Members: Shame!

EFFECT OF AGREEMENT ON PULP AND PAPER INDUSTRY

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, why did the Government do nothing at all in the free trade agreement to help softwood lumber producers? Since the Americans still have the freedom to bring countervail action against Canadian products going into the United States, what can the Minister now say to the pulp and paper industry to assure it that it will not be a target of U.S. protectionism in the near future?

• (1440)

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, we can say to the pulp and paper industry and to the softwood lumber industry that if there are any future actions of that kind, any countervail actions, or anything in that whole area which we perceive to be unfair, we can take it to binding dispute settlement and have a fair hearing.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT—EFFECT ON SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade. After she imposed this punitive 15 per cent tax on the Canadian forest industry, she said that as soon as a free trade deal was arranged the Government would deal with this 15 per cent tax. We did not think that she meant entrenching it in the agreement so that it is there forever.

Will the Minister explain why she not only betrayed the industry once, but has betrayed it a second time now by entrenching this punitive 15 per cent tax in this agreement in perpetuity?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think that the only betrayal is on the part of the New Democratic Party which is betraying the union that supported this tax on the basis of saving jobs, which is betraying the provincial New Democratic Party in British Columbia which supported this on the basis of saving jobs. The only betrayal has been the misinformation that that Party has put forward on this issue.

INCREASED STUMPAGE RATES—RETENTION OF EXPORT TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, on a number of occasions the Minister stood in her place and indicated that as the Provinces of New Brunswick, Ontario and others, particularly British Columbia, increased their stumpage rates this tax would be phased out. That is what she told every Member of the House, particularly those Members from the wood-producing areas of the country.

Stumpage rates are being increased and some are up to the appropriate levels. The Province of British Columbia is increasing its. Not only are the stumpage rates up, this punitive tax remains in place. If that is not betraying the forest industry, what is? Why did the Minister agree to an agreement that entrenches this 15 per cent tax on exports?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I should point out to the House that the objectives we had in mind in dealing with softwood lumber in the face of a U.S. countervail are being met. The provinces have had an opportunity to increase their stumpage as they planned to do. The revenues have been returned to the provinces as they so desired, and officials are now having discussions on the replacement measures required to terminate the MOU.

FREE TRADE—AGRICULTURE—MANAGEMENT AGENCIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of State for Agriculture tried to be reassuring about supply management and the marketing boards. The Minister of State (Agriculture) forgot to mention that with the Free Trade Agreement, his Government is gradually going to dismantle every marketing board, and the most obvious example is the removal of tariffs on TV dinners, breaded chicken shipped in bulk, yogourt and ice cream. All these products will now enter the country duty free.

I want to ask the Minister how he can claim that marketing boards will have no problems, when their markets and products will be directly affected by this agreement?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, in recent years, the processing industry has always had to purchase certain products outside the country every year, because Canadian production was not adequate. There were quotas. Those quotas have been maintained at the same levels, so that producers are protected. They are in the same situation they were before.

As for tariffs, if products were to invade our market, as you said, we would still have the option of putting those products on the protected list, so that Canadian production would not be disrupted. I do not think producers have anything to worry about. We have met our commitments in this respect.

SALE OF DAIRY PRODUCTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, dairy producers have no reason to feel reassured, because the Government had told them agriculture was not on the table and would not even be mentioned in the Agreement, however there are whole sections dealing with it. Nobody, therefore, will accept any reassurance from this Minister. Mr. Speaker, the Minister said "if there are increases"; yet, according to page 11 of the Agreement, increases of up to 10 per cent will be allowed. This means, therefore, in the case of yoghurt and ice cream, the import levels may be increased by 9.9 per cent, without any action being taken by the Government. I therefore ask the Minister: how does he think he can reassure dairy producers who must absolutely sell their production on the domestic market?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of State (Agriculture)): If my hon. friend had taken the trouble to contact the president of the Canadian Federation of Dairy Producers as I did, he would know that the president has made no untimely statement. Quite the contrary! As a matter of fact, I am meeting him again tonight. He has made no statement. He was quite pleased to see that as our Canadian dairy products are of top quality and often of better quality than American products, he will have access to the American market. He was quite unconcerned about a possible tariff reduction, because if subsidized American products were to flood our market, we would still be protected under the GATT. The Hon. Member should do his homework before raising such questions.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER EXPORT TAX

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade. The Minister and the Government promised that there would be the removal of a softwood lumber tax with a free trade agreement. Why has this tax not been removed?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Clearly, Mr. Speaker, because we have not signed that free trade agreement. It was initialled just on the weekend. As I have told the House, we are working on replacement measures now.

REMOVAL OF EXPORT TAX

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister be very precise in indicating to the House and to the people whose lives depend on the harvesting and processing of softwood lumber in this country exactly when this tax will be removed from this industry?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Hopefully soon, Mr. Speaker.

EFFECT OF TRADE AGREEMENT ON PURCHASE OF FIRST HOMES

Mr. Bob Hicks (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Far be it for me to change the subject, so I will remain on the question of free trade.

Young couples in my riding are apprehensive about some of the ramifications of free trade, especially young couples who have not yet purchased their first home.

Will the Minister clarify for Canadians and Members of the House what effect this free trade deal might have on a young couple purchasing their first home?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the Economic Council said, a free trade deal could result in Consumer Price Index savings of 5.7 per cent to 7.5 per cent. When one considers the low end of the scale, 5.7 per cent, it means an additional $1,000 in spending power for the average worker in Canada. If one considers the 5.7 per cent in terms of setting up a new household in Canada, the potential savings are approximately $8,000. That is an enormous saving to ordinary Canadians who can see in this free trade pact a real opportunity to raise their standard of living, and perhaps the opportunity to set up that household.

PUBLIC WORKS

REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF PROPERTY SALE AT MIRABEL

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of Public Works deals with the sale of lots in the Mirabel Industrial Park. Could the Minister explain to the House—

Some Hon. Members: Not again!

[English]

There is nervousness already, Mr. Speaker, and I have not started.

[Translation]

Mr. Boudria: Could the Minister explain to the House why, according to a CBC documentary, the Canadian Mortgage and Housing Corporation has sold for two cents a square foot to some friends of the Progressive Conservative Party property in the Mirabel Industrial Park? And why did the Government give a $750,000 subsidy to these same friends of the Progressive Conservative Party?

[English]

Hon. Stewart McInnes (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, before I respond to the question, would the Hon. Member be good enough to clarify if he is referring to the park where the previous Government spent $15 million in the 1970s and $2 million in advertising for tenants? When this Government came to power the only tenants we found were cows grazing on the grass. Could he clarify that situation?

• (1450)

INQUIRY CONCERNING PURCHASE OF LANDS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, yes, I am referring to the $15 million property that was given to Tories for $160,000. That is true, Mr. Speaker. That is exactly the question that I am asking.

Is it not also true that one of the principals buying this property is Mr. Gervais Desrochers? Is this the same Gervais Desrochers who benefited from the Met Life sweetheart deal? Is this the same Mr. Gervais Desrochers who benefited from the Joliette Airport? Is this the same person? Is this kind of deal being made to benefit the Tories at the expense of every single Canadian taxpayer? Is that what is going on?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Way to go, Adolf.

Hon. Stewart McInnes (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the Government gave $1.2 million in grants to two companies—

Ms. Copps: Adolf, is that what you said, Joe?

Mr. McInnes: —which in turn brought an investment of $8 million and 42 jobs. That is the activity that we were able to generate, compared to nothing when we came to office.

FREE TRADE

AGRICULTURE—POSITION OF UNION OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCERS

Mr. Barry Moore (Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I have a serious question for the Minister of State for Agriculture. The comments made this week by the President of UAP in Quebec are of concern to me and to farmers in my constituency. The President stated on television this week that the signing of the Free Trade Agreement would endanger the joint programs, that is the existing marketing boards. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know if those comments are warranted?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I for one was very disappointed that the President of such an important group as UAP should make such devastating comments. I feel that UAP's President, who himself sat on the Sub-Committee on Agriculture, during the negotiations, ought to have been more cautious, taking the time to sit down and examine the facts before making such a statement. I much prefer the statement made last night by Premier Bourassa of Quebec, who was very reassuring to farm producers, and I think people know that marketing boards are here to stay and we will continue supporting them, Mr. Speaker.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER EXPORT TAX

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade. We want to give her one more opportunity to make clear what the Government's view of the position of the softwood tax is vis-à-vis the free trade agreement. In the early part of the Question Period the Minister refused to answer the question. She then implied that if the agreement were to be signed that the tax would somehow be removed; and then when she was asked for a time on that she said "hopefully soon".

Is the Minister now saying, because the rest of the world is under the impression that that tax is entrenched in the agreement, that this agreement is amendable? That would be another change in the interpretation that the Government is giving to the House with respect to the agreement. Is the agreement amendable? If not, how can she stand in her place and maintain that the softwood tax will somehow be removed when the agreement is signed, when it is entrenched by that very agreement?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, because if the Hon. Member were as familiar with the softwood agreement as he should be, he would find that it provides for replacement measures to be put in place. We made sure that it was in the free trade agreement so that it could not be reopened and new countervails put in place to attack the industry.

I have said that the provinces have been able to increase their stumpage as they planned. We have returned $230 million worth of revenues to the provinces, as they desired. Production is at very healthy levels. Prices are high. Profits for many companies are at high levels.

Discussions are now taking place with the officials of the provinces, which own the resource, to see whether or not replacement measures can now be enacted. That is what the softwood lumber MOU provides. That is what we are trying to do. We are trying to retain, and have successfully retained, the right of the provinces to maintain a resource they own and manage without American interference. That is why it is in the free trade agreement.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

LEVEL OF STUMPAGE FEES

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Minister could tell the House whether she is now backing away from the claim she made just a while ago that as soon as the agreement was signed this tax would be lifted and/or is she telling the House that New Brunswick, for example, will have to raise its stumpage fees even higher to have the burden of this tax lifted?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is misrepresenting my position. I have said very clearly that the discussions are taking place. I have pointed out that the agreement, in fact, has not yet been signed. It will not be signed until January. The provinces are continuing to work on their resource in the manner that they desire, very well. All the proper steps are being taken.

UNITED STATES DEFENCE CONTRACT MARKET

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. Under "National Security" the free trade agreement states:

> Nothing in this Agreement shall be construed—to prevent any Party from taking any action which it considers necessary for the protection of its essential security interests—relating—to such traffic in other goods and materials as is carried on directly or indirectly for the purpose of supplying a military establishment—

This means that Canada has not gained free access to bid on the billions of dollars of defence-oriented small business contracts in the United States. If this free trade agreement is such a great deal, why did the Government not convince the Americans to remove their protectionist Small Business Set-Aside Program which would have opened up the American defence contract market to Canadian small business to supply non-lethal defence-oriented material and equipment made in Canada, particularly at a time when Canada has a $2 billion deficit in military purchases from the United States?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I should remind the House that the Canadian negotiators put on the table a full procurement package covering all procurement in federal, provincial and civil fields. It was the Americans who took it off the table. In the final negotiations a modest procurement package was put back in the agreement. It is one, as the agreement states, we can build on in the future.

ACCESS TO U. S. DEFENCE CONTRACTS

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, the Minister knows very well that that kind of answer will not wash. In view of the fact that this Government has given away our energy resources, it has negotiated away our—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In view of the hour I would ask the Hon. Member to put his question directly.

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, why would the Canadian Government not insist that the huge defence contract market for non-lethal military equipment be opened up for Canadian small business? I repeat, particularly when we have a $2 billion deficit in defence trade with the United States, why would the Government not do that?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I note that the Liberal Party is against free trade. This Hon. Member wants more free trade. I will certainly take his suggestion under consideration.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HORTICULTURE

ACCREDITATION OF LABORATORIES TO TEST HONEY

Mr. Jack Scowen (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. It is almost a year now since the first anniversary of the problem in honey caused by the Quebec Government. This anniversary is not exactly cause for dancing in the streets by myself or the honey producers of Canada. Will the Minister inform the honey producers of Canada when the laboratories will be accredited to test honey so that the pressure on producers who want to sell their product will be lessened?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I would like first to commend the Hon. Member for Mackenzie for his work in this regard. And I know how important it is to him. I can assure him that normally, today, there are five new laboratories across Canada that will be licensed to test honey. Those five new laboratories, located across Canada—in Moncton, Saskatoon, Grande-Prairie, and Chatham—will be accredited and will complement the existing ones. This should, at least in my view, help expedite inspection and testing operations.

LABOUR RELATIONS

EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. Why is it the Government's position that we should be taking women's jobs with good salaries and making them part-time jobs for women at minimum wage? Why is that government policy?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of Labour): It is not government policy, Mr. Speaker.

POSTAL STRIKE QUERY

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, if it is not government policy, why do they insist upon doing it time after time after time, and why are they doing it in the postal strike?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that is not happening in the postal strike. There is no such issue on the table.

The postal strike is kind of ironical because the Post Office would like to negotiate job security, treatment of its workers, and so on. The union, on the other hand, wants to negotiate management matters—how the Post Office shall be organized. It would be useful if there were a reversal of roles.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT—EFFECT ON ATLANTIC FISH PRODUCTS

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. The people of Newfoundland came to know the Prime Minister when he was president of an American subsidiary called the Iron Ore Company of Canada, in Labrador. They now greatly fear that he is attempting to become the Prime Minister of an American subsidiary called Canada.

This morning all three political Parties in Newfoundland and their leaders, including the Conservative Premier of Newfoundland, formally condemned the free trade agreement, because of no guarantees for access of Atlantic products to U.S. markets, because of its impact upon regional development, and because of its impact upon procurement policy for Atlantic businesses to access federal government work.

Given that the Government could hardly fail to understand, in view of the controversy over the Canada-France fish talks, the importance of Atlantic Canada's fishery to our region, why did the Government sign a free trade deal which does not guarantee in any way, shape, or form the access of Atlantic Canadian fish products to the U.S. market? In fact, we are left as exposed as we ever were, under this free trade agreement.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the people of Newfoundland are and will be supporting this agreement, because for a hundred years they have been waiting for a free trade arrangement between Newfoundland and the United States and now they will have one between Canada and the United States of which they are a part.

One of the great advantages of the free trade arrangement is that Newfoundland fish products can be processed to their final, fully value-added form, because tariffs will be removed on fish products sold into the United States.

It is a magnificent deal for Newfoundland, and one which will be supported by the people of Newfoundland, believe me.

Mr. Tobin: The only thing the people of Newfoundland trade freely in these days are anecdotes about the Minister's tomfoolery in the House of Commons. There is no guaranteed access for Atlantic Canadian fish products, specifically Newfoundland fish products, under the free trade deal.

MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, in face of the declaration by all three political Parties in Newfoundland, including the Minister's colleague, Conservative Premier Brian Peckford, how can he stand in the House and support a free trade agreement which is not in Newfoundland's interest and will in fact damage Newfoundland and all other Atlantic provinces?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman can try to cod the people of Newfoundland, but they will not be codded by him or anyone else who opposes the free trade arrangements which we are entering into hopefully with the United States that will be approved both by the House and by Congress.

In addition, the hon. gentleman is incorrect. This does not interfere with procurement matters. It does not interfere with the policy that was brought in by this Government to encourage procurement in Atlantic Canada. It does not interfere with regional development assistance to Atlantic Canada. It does not interfere with subsidies to Atlantic Canada. It does not interfere with any of the things the hon. gentlemen opposite said would be interfered with.

Now they are looking for something else to carp and crab about.

EFFECT OF AGREEMENT ON MAGAZINES AND PERIODICALS

Mr. Bill Attewell (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications. The Canadian publishing industry is concerned about how the free trade proposals might affect Canadian magazines and periodicals because of the lower postal rate they now enjoy.

Could the Minister please clarify what impact these proposals might have on Canadian magazines and periodicals?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the subsidized postal rates on foreign magazines that are printed in Canada are, on average, about 1.5 cents more than on Canadian magazines. What is proposed is that that 1.5 cent differential will be phased out over a period of 10 years.

What I want to make very clear is that we have not agreed to phase out the 35-cent differential which exists between magazines printed in Canada and magazines, which are unsubsidized, printed in the United States. That 35-cent differential will remain to the benefit of Canadian magazines.

I know, Sir, that there has been a great deal of concern about this, and I am very pleased to be able to have the opportunity to clarify it.

PRIVILEGE

MEMBER'S STATEMENT ON MEDICAL CONDITION

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in the House during debate, the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds (Mr. Mayer) referred to my wavering voice. I would like to make a short statement about my medical situation in this context. I have a condition that is termed "familial tremor" which accounts for this wavering. That condition is inherited from one's family and is most often restricted to a trembling in one's hands.

In about 50 per cent of cases, my doctor tells me, at some stage this transfers to one's voice as well, which happened in my case close to four years ago. It is possible to take medication for the condition, and that is what I have been doing for two years. The medication improves but does not completely solve the voice problem. Speaking more slowly also assists the problem.

This condition is not something which has been easy to accept, even though it is stable and permits me to serve my constituents, I hope well. I hope, however, that by accepting and coping with this physical disability as a Member of Parliament it will help others in our society who have physical disabilities and wish to serve their communities.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member and I spoke yesterday in the House after the exchange. He knows full well that as a result of the private conversation between the two of us that there was absolutely nothing personal intended in the remark which took place in the heat of an exchange in the House.

I apologized to him then personally and I have absolutely no hesitation in doing so now publicly. I meant nothing by the remark of a personal nature in any way. I certainly apologize and would be prepared to withdraw whatever the Hon. Member took as being offensive, because there was absolutely nothing on my part that was meant to be so.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: As your Speaker and with your support we have been emphasizing the whole question of opportunities for those who are disabled in one way or other. I want to thank the Hon. Member for Essex—Windsor (Mr. Langdon) for his courage in making the statement he did and for the great restraint with which that statement was made. I also want to thank the Minister who has responded in the best tradition of this place.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PRIVILEGE

MINISTER'S COMMENT DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, it is with some regret that I rise on this question of privilege, particularly after the issue which was raised only moments ago. It is not that I want to seize in any way that opportunity to raise another issue which I consider serious.

• (1510)

During the course of Question Period and in the heat of debate, as it is sometimes understandable, we sometimes make references that we should not. I overheard a member on the government side, namely, the Right Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) refer to me on at least three different occasions as "Adolf". I do not know the reference that was made but I do know what the name "Adolf" means to me, to many of my colleagues on all sides of the House, and I would ask through you, Mr. Speaker, that the Right Hon. Secretary of State seizes the occasion to perhaps correct the record.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that everyone in the House would understand that I was thinking of Adolphe Fontaine who I last saw in Cumberland in the Hon. Member's constituency.

Mr. Riis: That is sick.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): The New Democratic Party's House Leader who tried to leave his Party to join another when he thought things were getting difficult is shouting from his seat.

If that remark led to any other interpretation in the House that gave offence, I naturally withdraw it.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I have to rise on this very, especially bad occasion when the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark), the Minister responsible for Human Rights for Canada, yells "Adolf" across the floor at a person and continues to laugh at the suggestion—

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): At you.

Mr. Riis: I think this is a very sad day.

Mr. Shields: You are sanctimonious.

Mr. Riis: It has nothing to do with being sanctimonious.

Beauchesne's Fifth Edition identifies a number of words as being unparliamentary.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the complaint of the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria). The Hon. Minister has unequivocally withdrawn what he has said. That being the case, perhaps I should have recognized the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr.

Riis) before recognizing the Minister. I apologize to the Hon. Member for that because I know he had a contribution to make. I think we have the point of the Hon. Member. In view of the complete withdrawal by the Minister, that closes the matter.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, this being Thursday, I ask the Minister of State (Mr. Lewis), the Government House Leader, to give us a statement of the business which the Government intends to call for the coming week.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of State and Minister of State (Treasury Board)): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon we will continue debate on the Meech Lake Accord.

We have suggested to the opposition Parties that if they find themselves in a position to commence debate on Bill C-86, an Act to provide for the resumption and continuation of postal services, at any time up to 6 p.m., we would be prepared to adjourn the Meech Lake Accord debate and commence debate on Bill C-86 and continue through this afternoon and into the evening, if necessary, in order to pass this important legislation at all three stages. If that is not possible, then we would call Bill C-86 tomorrow with the same point of view in mind, namely, that we would complete debate at all stages on Bill C-86 tomorrow. We would, however, prefer to do that this afternoon.

On Tuesday we shall either continue to debate Bill C-86 or recommence debate on Bill C-55, the refugee determination legislation, and Bill C-74, the environmental protection legislation. We are also considering the possibility of an opposition day once we have Bill C-55 completed.

The House will know that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and other Ministers are involved in the Commonwealth Conference in Vancouver which will bring great credit to our country. For that reason we will recommence the debate on the Meech Lake Accord during the week of October 19.

POINTS OF ORDER

ALLEGED MISLEADING STATEMENT

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, yesterday during Question Period the Leader of the New Democratic Party in a question to the Minister for International Trade (Miss Carney) advertently or inadvertently mislead this House.

I refer you, Sir, to page 9764 of Hansard at the top of the page, second line:

> According to a study produced by Statistics Canada and released just over an hour ago in Edmonton—

That statement is totally and absolutely false. The study referred to was prepared and released by Mr. Mel Hurtig on behalf of the Council of Canadians. To my knowledge, Mr. Hurtig never has been or is he now an employee of Statistics Canada.

Misleading statements of that nature which include misuse of material obtained from Statistics Canada reflect on the credibility of Stats Canada and cannot be tolerated by this House of Commons.

I am sick and tired of the self-righteous, sanctimonious, deceitful use of Question Period by the Leader of the NDP—

Mr. Speaker: As Hon. Members and as the public knows sometimes the Chair has to wait a few minutes to determine where an intervention is going and whether it is a point of order or a question of privilege. Perhaps the Chair should have risen a moment or two before it did so. The Hon. Member has made a point. It is not a point of order, it is a matter of debate.

Mr. Shields: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I must ask the Hon. Member if it is the same point of order.

Mr. Shields: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I must ask the Hon. Member to co-operate with the Chair.

ALLEGED USE AT UNPARLIAMENTARY LANGUAGE

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order arising out of the remarks of the Member who has just spoken. I thought I heard him say that the Leader of the New Democratic Party had advertently or inadvertently mislead the House by the question he asked yesterday. I also heard him use the word "deceitful", apparently making reference to the Leader of the New Democratic Party.

It is my understanding of the rules and practices of this House that you cannot say that a Member of this House deliberately, that is advertently, mislead the House. Also, Mr. Speaker, if you look at Beauchesne's rules of order at page 106 you will see that Beauchesne states that the words "deceived" and "deliberately deceived" have been ruled on a number of occasions to be unparliamentary. If the word "deceive" is unparliamentary then I respectfully submit that "deceitful" obviously must fall within the same ruling or the same context. I respectfully ask you, Sir, to call upon the Hon. Member to withdraw his remarks with respect to the charge that the Leader of the NDP advertently mislead the House and further that the Leader of the NDP was deceitful in his remarks.

There may be many things on which I take issue with the Leader of the NDP, but I think he is entitled to the same protection from you, Mr. Speaker, with respect to unparliamentary language as is any Member of this House.

Mr. Speaker: As I indicated to the House, perhaps the Chair rose just a moment or two too late on the intervention of the Hon. Member for Athabaska (Mr. Shields).

There are two aspects to what the Hon. Member said. First, he said that things said by the Leader of the New Democratic Party yesterday concerning a certain report were—let me put it this way—inaccurate. They may or may not be, that is a matter of debate. Second, he went on to say, at which time Hon. Members will know that the Chair did rise to interrupt the Hon. Member, that the Leader of the New Democratic Party had advertently or inadvertently mislead the House. That in itself one might let go. However, I regret to have to ask the Hon. Member to recall that he also used the word "deceitful". The word "deceitful" is certainly a word that is improper in this place as it denotes a deliberate attempt to do something that is less than honourable. I know that the Hon. Member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields) would want to withdraw that part of his remarks.

• (1520)

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could clarify exactly what I meant. I do believe that the Leader of the NDP reflected very badly on Statistics Canada by announcing in the House that he was quoting from a study that was released by Statistics Canada in Edmonton an hour previously. I believe that is the way it appears in Hansard.

Statistics Canada has a reputation worldwide, and particularly in Canada, for the accuracy of its statements and figures. When an institution like Mel Hurtig's Council of Canadians—

Mr. Speaker: The difficulty the Chair is in is that the Hon. Member is bringing a complaint to the Chair, and it may very well be a very proper one, by way of a point of order. I have indicated that it is not a point of order and that it is a matter of debate and can be dealt with in another place and in another way.

I have also, as is my obligation, responded to the Hon. Member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) who has pointed out, correctly as I have indicated, that at least one part of the intervention of the Hon. Member for Athabasca crosses the fine line between what is appropriate in this place and what is unparliamentary. I am afraid that procedurally I am in the position where the proper thing for the Chair to do is to ask the Hon. Member to withdraw that particular word "deceitful", because in the view of the Chair it is unparliamentary in the context in which it was used. I know that the Hon. Member would want to co-operate with the Chair.

I say to the Hon. Member that there are other ways and other places in which to raise the question that he has raised, and it could be done tomorrow or another day. Of course, if the Hon. Member or other Hon. Members need any assistance in understanding where and under what circumstances these matters can be raised, Table Officers and the Chair are always prepared to co-operate.

I would ask that the Hon. Member indicate to the Chair that he withdraws that particular word, and I would hope that the matter would be closed.

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, it has just been drawn to my attention that a question of privilege has been raised about what—

Mr. Shields: A point of order.

Mr. Broadbent: A point of order, rather, has been raised—

Mr. Speaker: I am very sorry, but it is not a question of privilege. A complaint has been made as to what the Hon. Member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) said or intended to say yesterday. It is not a point of order, it is a matter of debate. This could go on for quite a long time if the Chair does not move to bring it to an end.

The Hon. Member for Oshawa, however, having had many years of experience in this place, wants to say just a little short something.

Mr. Broadbent: Your Honour, I appreciate your consideration and it will be short indeed. What I said in the House as reported at page 9764 of Hansard was that the study was produced by Statistics Canada, which indeed it was. It was produced by Statistics Canada. Statistics Canada was hired to do it and it produced the study—

Mr. Shields: Not true.

Mr. Broadbent: I stand by the words that were used. If the Hon. Member wants to dispute them, he may do so here, he may do so outside the House, he may do so next week and he may do so forever, but he will be wrong.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair takes the position that neither Hon. Member will dispute it any longer this afternoon. I would hope that the Hon. Member for Athabasca would indicate to the Chair that he withdraws the word "deceitful".

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, at your direction and in deference to you, although I find it difficult to do, particularly after the last statement, I will withdraw the word "deceitful".

Mr. Speaker: I thank the Hon. Member and I want to say to all Hon. Members, and also to the public, as I have had occasion to say at other times, this place is not a tea-party and feelings can run high. It is my task to ensure that the rules are followed. I think Hon. Members will say of their colleagues and of this incident that the Chair has been supported and the rules have been followed. I thank all Hon. Members for their forbearance and co-operation.

Royal Assent

MINISTER'S COMMENT DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I rose to withdraw remarks made earlier in the House. On reflection, I believe that the nature of my withdrawal was more equivocal than it should have been. I think we are at a stage in the deliberations of this House where all of us are showing some signs of weariness and fatigue.

I certainly accept that those of us who have the privilege of ministerial responsibility and who have had long service in the House have upon us a particular obligation to try to respect the rules of the House. Therefore, I want to make clear that I withdraw categorically and absolutely and that I regret the implications of the remark uttered in the heat of Question Period.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I speak for all Hon. Members when I thank the right hon. gentleman for his gesture which again is in the best tradition of this place.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL ACT, 1867

CONSTITUTION AMENDMENT, 1987

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Hnatyshyn on the 1987 Constitutional Amendment (p. 9422) and the amendments thereto of Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra) (p. 9585), Mr. Broadbent (p. 9586), Mr. Caccia (p. 9644) and Mr. Allmand (p. 9644).

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before the House took recess at one o'clock, the Chair had recognized the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Keeper).

[English]

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I am glad that I can finally rise to my feet and that we can return to the ordinary business of the House. After the little to and fro that has just occurred, I feel the need to take a large breath of fresh air and relax a bit so that we may focus our attention on the national issues of the day.

The question we are now focused on is that of the Canadian Constitution, the rules by which this country is governed, as well as the Meech Lake Accord and the efforts made by the First Ministers to amend the Constitution. Like most Canadians, I have heard a great deal about the Meech Lake Accord. I have heard many different things about it. It is often confusing when listening to the debate on this question and reading about it in the newspapers because the people that one would consider authoritative have very different views on this matter.

For me, it was important to boil the question down, to try to get at the essence of the matter. For me as a Member of Parliament, it really boils down to whether the Meech Lake Accord is worth supporting, whether or not it has value and whether it is good for Canada. Along with that, I must ask whether the Accord can be improved. Is there any possibility of amending the document? Can the document be further improved? Those are the essential questions for me.

I want to say straight out that I answer in the affirmative to both questions. Is the Meech Lake Accord worth supporting? Yes. Is it possible to improve it? Yes. Of course, I want to elaborate a bit upon how I came to those conclusions and share with other Members, Canadians generally, and my constituents in particular, some of my views on this Accord.

There are a couple of important points which I think need to be dealt with. First is the distinct society clause and second is the spending power clause. The distinct society clause is the gold nugget of this Accord. It has made it possible for the First Ministers of this country to welcome Quebec back into the Canadian family. There are those who have said that from a legal point of view Quebec is a part of the Constitution. It has never been outside the Constitution. In a strict legal sense that is true. Quebec is a part of the Constitution and functions within that framework. The problem is that if you extend that analysis to its logical conclusion, then we do not need to do anything about the fact that Quebec did not sign the 1982 constitutional package. Yet if you do that, you miss the whole point. You look at the Constitution strictly from a legal perspective and forget the question of national identity and whether people feel a part of Canada.

If we are about anything in this House and this country, we are about continuing the process of building a Canadian identity. One unique aspect of that identity is the existence of the Province of Quebec. It gives a special flavour to Canada. One reason we have a level of tolerance for different cultures is because of Quebec. That province, the majority of which is Francophone, has, over the course of Canadian history, had to fight for its rights, its culture, its language. Because the people of Quebec are such a significant part of our country, roughly one-third of our population, although I do not know the exact statistics, they have not only been able to fight on the basis of moral justice but also on the basis of political power.

Let us face the fact that political power makes a difference. If you have political power then you can put into practice your principles and beliefs and bring about good results. It is therefore my fundamental belief that one of the reasons Canada is a mosaic which respects its native peoples and is committed to the preservation of the culture of all ethnic groups is because there is a province called Quebec. The French fact is the reality. Should we ever lose the Province of Quebec then Canada will be that much poorer and we will have a tendency to drift in the direction the U.S. has taken. There is nothing fundamentally wrong with the vision of nationhood carved out in the United States. It is simply not the approach we have taken. It is not the Canadian vision. We have not adopted the melting pot approach. We have formed a cultural mosaic. In large part we can thank the Province of Quebec for that.

What this Accord means to me is that Canadians have opened their arms to Quebec. Canadians have said we want a country tolerant of different cultures and one that respects distinct groups. At the same time I want to say that while I respect cultural differences, while I respect my own heritage as an aboriginal person, while I respect the native groups who live in my riding and throughout Canada, and while I respect the francophone people of this country, that respect does not exist in a vacuum. It comes from the things we share as Canadians. Some may choose to attack the vision of Pierre Trudeau and John Diefenbaker of a one Canada. However, I say that there was an element of truth in what those men said about this country. Their vision has truth in it. Not the entire truth but it has truth. That is why it had the ability to move people. While we respect the cultural differences in this country, and that is important, it is crucial that it be seen in light of the things we share in common. We share a common citizenship. We share a common political structure in which we can live and grow and fulfil our potential. A necessary part of that is the capacity to respect the cultural differences which exist among us.

We can say that it is fundamentally important to this country that it has decided to move forward by saying to Quebec: Welcome back to the Canadian family. We want you to be a part of this country. We are willing to stand up and articulate that desire and put it in this country's laws.

Again, when I ask myself the question "Is this Constitutional Accord worth supporting?" I say yes because it deals with the fundamental nature of this country. It deals with what it means to be a Canadian.

I now want to go to another aspect of the Accord, as I said earlier, which deals with federal spending power. That needs comment because so many people have said that the opting out provision scuttles the capacity of the federal Government to establish national programs. If this Accord had been in place, they say, we could not have had medicare. We could not have pensions. We could not have the fundamental social programs that the Party of which I am a part, the NDP, and before it the CCF, fought for. We could not have those programs which Canadians have adopted not only because they are good but because they express fundamental values that we share as Canadians.

I have taken those criticisms and comments very seriously. I have talked to people who have that point of view and considered what they had to say. When you listen to expert advice from people who have negotiated at the highest levels of government and from constitutional experts who have profound knowledge in this area, you hear a variety of opinions. You must finally make your own judgment, as I have done.

My understanding of the opting-out provision is that if the federal Government wishes to establish a new national program, it will consult with the provinces and if the provinces do not want to buy into the national program, they can opt out and be financially compensated as long as they establish a parallel program. After considering that I have concluded that the opting-out provision does not impair our capacity to govern the country. It does not weaken the central authority or weaken the ability of good, strong political leadership to establish new national programs to meet the needs of Canadians.

This is an area in which I fundamentally disagree with the former Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Pierre Elliott Trudeau. There are some aspects of his vision of Canada which I share, one being our common citizenship from coast to coast. However, I think he is wrong in his judgment on the Accord.

I will explain why I believe that the federal spending power is still intact. Before the Accord when the federal Government and the provinces sat down to establish a national program, each party had something in its pocket. The federal Government had federal spending power and the provinces had constitutional jurisdiction. They each had something to bargain with and when they made a deal, we had a national program for all Canadians. It happened that way because Canadians wanted those programs and there was the political leadership to bring it about. There were the Tommy Douglases of this world who wanted to move in that direction.

I do not believe that the Accord has fundamentally changed that situation. When we want to establish new national programs, whether for day care, the environment, the elimination of poverty, or the development of a strong Canadian economy in which all people can work, in addition to its unchanneled spending power, the federal Government will have the capacity to establish national objectives. On the other hand, provinces will have jurisdiction and the ability to opt out if they so choose.

Therefore, we still have two parties with something in their pocket and they will negotiate. If the people want a program and the political leadership exists to establish it, a deal will be made and Canadians will have a new national program. Therefore, let us not say that this Accord scuttles the capacity of political leadership. Political leadership is scuttled by cowardice and a lack of commitment to human need.

This Accord will assist us in addressing the fundamental needs of Canadians. The Accord requires that a strong Prime Minister with a set of objectives and ready to act consults with the provinces in areas of provincial jurisdiction. He would use all of his political muscle, but he would seek co-operation. We will, therefore, create new national programs in a way more sensitive to the regional and local needs of the country. Therefore, I believe that this Accord is worth supporting.

The second question which I asked myself about the Meech Lake Accord is whether it can be improved. I have spoken with some conviction about how I see the document. However, I do not want to mislead anyone. This is by no chance a perfect document. We have not arrived at the final objective. The document is not complete. I challenge those who say that we must accept this package without making any changes. There are several specific areas in which this document can be improved. They include the areas of women's rights, the North and aboriginal people.

Not only can the Accord be improved by way of constitutional conferences after it becomes law, it can be improved before. Why wait until it becomes law before improving it? Why not make specific improvements now? The perfect opportunity is fast approaching. A provincial election is soon to take place in the province of New Brunswick. We should take advantage of that occasion to bring to the table items which will improve the constitutional Accord.

I choose the word "improve" because I want to make it clear that I am not speaking of things which would scuttle the Accord. I am not speaking of things which are simply a mask or excuse to try to destroy the Accord. This Accord is valuable and can be made even more valuable.

Eleven political leaders sat in a room together until late at night because they were committed to bring something about. They can do that again. If it means they have to stay there all night, so be it. However, let them improve the Accord so that when we bring Quebec back into the Canadian family other people do not feel left out and resentful, so they do not feel that the only time the political leaders of this country act is when it concerns Quebec while ignoring women, the North, and aboriginal people.

In spite of the value of this Accord it is folly to risk the allegiance of Canadians to this new constitutional arrangement by refusing to improve it. If we can bring Quebec into the Canadian family now we can also bring in aboriginal people, women, and the North.

I believe that fundamentally this Accord is a sound document and that it is good for Canada. We are taking an historic step in nation-building. The step is not complete. If we are not to stumble we must make some changes in the Accord in order to improve it. Let us be clear that we are trying to improve it and not scuttle it.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in concluding, I want to say that I think it is very important the Meech Lake Accord has given Canadians a chance to open the door to Quebec and to French Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, it is important for all Canadians to be part of our Constitution. And today we are very happy that the political leaders of our country are willing to say to Quebec: Welcome to Canada! We are on your side!

• (1550)

[English]

Mr. Berger: I want to congratulate the Hon. Member for his strong speech. There is no doubt that he stated his views with a great deal of conviction for which the House should commend him.

I want to ask him about the so-called generosity with respect to Quebec that he feels lies at the base of this Accord. When we talk about what constitutes Canada, surely he would agree that it is not only because Quebec, a French-speaking province, is part of Canada but that there are French-speaking Canadians throughout the country as there is an English-speaking minority in Quebec.

In my opinion, the Meech Lake Accord does not go far enough in recognizing the fundamental characteristic of Canada because the federal Government and provincial Governments are only willing to preserve this characteristic of Canada rather than promote it.

The Hon. Member is from Winnipeg, Manitoba. He knows that there is a substantial French-speaking minority in his province and his city. I am sure he heard the testimony of the President of la Fédération des francophones hors Québec before the Joint Committee on the Constitution when he said that mere protection is insufficient to prevent or stop the ravages of assimilation.

I would like the Hon. Member to address that particular point. Does he not believe that when we are talking about recognizing this fundamental characteristic of Canada we must go beyond what I consider to be platitudes and undertake to promote this fundamental characteristic?

[Translation]

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, that is a very important question and I want to give it the attention it deserves.

First of all, as far as the Meech Lake Accord is concerned, I do not think we have finished working on the Constitution in this country. We are about to enter a new stage. I think the Hon. Member is very sincere and has made some very important points, and that it is really up to him to support amendments that will improve the Accord.

Personally, I think it is very important, for instance, for the French fact in Manitoba to be strong and flourishing. I remember that when I was a child in Manitoba, when the school inspector came to visit a school, the Catholic students, teachers and sisters had to hide the French books and put English books on their desks. That happened when I was a child in Manitoba, which is not so long ago. However, we have come a long way since that time, and there have been some difficult moments. For instance, we had a very serious debate in Manitoba on how bilingualism in the province should be allowed to develop. A debate that was lost by people like me who were in favour of bilingualism. We were beaten because of a fierce attack by the Conservative Leader at the time, and I can inform the Hon. Member that it is not always easy to progress as fast as we should wish. And when we can make some progress, I think it is very important for us to do just that.

Perhaps I should point out that the Government of Manitoba has just appointed a minister responsible for promoting services in French. I think this is something we can build on for the future. I hope that in the future, we will see greater respect for the French fact in Manitoba. Like the Hon. Member, I am doing what I can in this respect. But quite frankly, this Accord is incomplete where it concerns protecting, promoting or establishing the presence of the French fact outside Quebec.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Since there are no more questions or comments, before I recognize the next speaker it is my duty to announce the questions for the adjournment debate.

THE CONSTITUTION ACT, 1867

CONSTITUTION AMENDMENT, 1987

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Hnatyshyn on the Constitution Amendment, 1987 (p.9422).

And the amendments of Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra) (p.9585), Mr. Broadbent (p. 9586), Mr. Caccia (p.9644), and Mr. Allmand (p.9644).

Mr. Roland de Corneille (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege, as a Member of Parliament, to be able to speak on a subject of as great importance to our national future as that which is before the House today. The whole question of how we will amend our Constitution is a subject which is at the very heart of our nation.

In commenting on this Accord, I think one must first stress the importance of the effort which has been made to bring about an accord that would seek to accommodate the full participation of the Province of Quebec in the mainstream of the life of our country. I believe all Canadians felt that the country was incomplete without the ability of Quebec to fully participate at the table when constitutional matters were being discussed. There was a great loss to the country as a whole while Quebec remained outside the Canadian community.

Quebec is indeed a distinct community in many ways. It has not only played a unique role in Canada's history, it plays a unique role in the life of Canada today. Therefore, I and I believe all Canadians are pleased that an accord has been struck whereby the Province of Quebec can take its full part in the life of this country.

When we gave approval to the Constitution, it was not possible to have the participation of Quebec because the Premier of Quebec at that time, René Lévesque, led the separatist party that was in fact seeking to separate Quebec from this country rather than join it. It would have been a total anomaly for that Government to have allowed Quebec to become part of Canadian constitutional life, and the full life of this country. It was therefore not possible at that time for Quebec to become part of the entire process of the country and its constitutional making.

• (1600)

We felt this loss and now, since there is a Government in Quebec that can in fact accept and in fact participate fully on behalf of the people of Quebec in the life of the country, we want to grab that opportunity. We do not know, as we have not known in the past, when a Government might again come into power in Quebec, a Government which might detain or defer that possibility of Quebec having its full role. In fact, it might then be argued by successive Quebec Governments that, "Look, no progress has been made. Canada does not care whether we are part of it or not". They could appeal to the very fact that Quebec was not able to take its full part as an excuse for why Quebec should feel that it had no future in Canada. That is one of the great reasons why I think Canadians are relieved and rejoice that now Quebec and its Government have passed a resolution through its Legislature giving their support to this Accord.

We know that when a proposal was made to the people of Quebec that they should begin to consider separating from Canada, they were appealed to by Mr. Trudeau and by Jean Chrétien at that time and asked not to vote in the referendum for the move to separate Quebec from Canada, but rather to vote against such a separation. When Mr. Trudeau and Mr. Chrétien implored the people of Quebec, as Quebecers themselves, they said, and promised, that there would be a renewal of federalism. That promise was solemnly made. I think there is now an opportunity for us to show to the people of Quebec that that promise was not made in vain. That promise was made on behalf of those of us who were members of the Liberal caucus at that time. Mr. Trudeau spoke on behalf of our caucus, on behalf of our Party, stating that that effort would be made. So I rejoice with other Canadians that now through this Accord the Province of Quebec can play its full role.

Having said that, and with all my sincerity and all my ability to express how delighted I am about that facet of it, I do think that one has to say that no Constitution is ever perfect. It certainly means, too, that when we start making changes to the Constitution we are dealing with the most fundamental law of the land. It is the most important law. It is the basis of all the rest of the laws of our country. Therefore it is a law which should receive the most careful scrutiny, and the most thorough debate and the greatest opportunity for people throughout the country to make their views known and to express their encouragement of it, or their misgivings.

I also want to say with all the powers at my command, and I only wish that I had the tongue of an orator to persuade my colleagues on the Conservative side of the House that the way that they have approached this matter of looking at and discussing this very important resolution on the amendment of our Constitution, known by some as the Meech Lake agreement but which also was the Langevin Accord of June 3, 1987, deserves far more attention, far more serious thought, and far more debate than the Government is allowing to the Parliament of Canada, or for that matter to the rest of the people of Canada.

The motion which is before us has not much more importance in the parliamentary procedure than would a Bill put forward by a Private Member. It is appalling to think that a motion is being put before us in the House which affects the very foundation of our country, the Constitution, but that the way in which it is being treated in Parliament is no better, or hardly better at all, than that which can be accorded to a serious Bill that is put forward in Private Members' Hour.

I think Canadians realize that a Bill that has to do with St. Lawrence Seaway funding, a Bill that has to do with the protection of wildlife, or whatever Bill may be put before this House goes through a whole series of complicated processes to ensure that the democratic process takes place. With almost all Bills in the House of Commons there is first a debate in principle. That debate can go on and, usually, unless some kind of time allocation is brought in, every Member of the House has a chance to talk about it in principle. Then it normally goes to a committee. It goes either to a standing committee or to a legislative committee where the Bill is looked at, discussed and talked through. Amendments are proposed at committee. Then, having had a vote first of all in the House on principle, having been before the committee, it comes back to the House for another debate. There, in that debate, is an opportunity in the House itself, to put forward amendments and for each one to be considered and voted upon. Then, after those votes are over and that stage is passed then still another debate is held. In that third stage there is still an opportunity for more discussion and further thought before a final vote is taken and the Bill is passed.

I think that shows that in our democratic process we want to make very sure that in Parliament anything we decide has been given deep and due consideration, in fairness to all concerned. It shows that we have given an opportunity to the people of Canada to make their positions known through the committees, to give them an opportunity, in time, to write to their Members or communicate with their Members as to their views so we do not make any mistakes.

That is what happens with any normal Bill, a Bill that deals with perhaps some of the less important matters of the country in the House, at least less important than we would say is the Constitution of Canada. Yet the Constitution of Canada is being amended. It is being put before us with a time span and a way to deal with it far, far less democratic and far less thoughtful than would even an ordinary Bill in this House of Commons receive, or a Private Member's Bill for that matter.

We have placed before us one total package. We are able to give one kind of amendment, as a Party, to this Bill. In short, we have but one debate on it. It went of course, to a committee over the summer, and then one debate. Then, when it is passed that is it. That is what the House of Commons can do with the Constitution of Canada, with the amendment of the most fundamental law of all, the Constitution of this country. It is amazing. It is bewildering that this is the only way in which we can proceed.

I think that if we look back at how the constitutional debate was carried on in the past, we would realize that a great deal of thought and a great deal of time was given to that debate—months and months and months. There were discussions among the provinces. The matter was referred to the Supreme Court of Canada for its opinion, to test out whether what we were doing was the right way to proceed. The views of the Supreme Court were taken into account, and changes were made.

I would like to point out further that when people or groups came to Ottawa, or sent their views to Ottawa about changing that constitutional Accord, their voices were finally heard. We saw that when the voices were lifted on behalf of the women of this country, in terms of their misgivings about the language or what was being taken out or what was in the Constitution, their views were listened to, perforce. That is the way it should be.

• (1610)

Changes were made again, with the provincial Ministers giving consideration to those proposals. Meetings were held, bringing them back again to see if further changes could be made. I remember very well the indignation of members of the Conservative Party who were in opposition at that time at the thought that they were not being given enough time to discuss such an important issue as the Constitution of Canada. Day after day they rose in their places and extolled the virtues of democracy, the importance of openness in Government, the importance of full participation, and the importance of opportunity to debate. I think many of us listened to their concerns with some sympathy.

In this particular debate we find amendments being made to the Meech Lake agreement which in fact might greatly hobble future changes in the Constitution.

It is true that the Constitution is and will evolve. However, because of the Meech Lake agreement or Langevin agreement in some cases the Government of Canada has made such evolution practically impossible in that the formula for amendments requires unanimity. It can be said that sometimes it is possible to obtain unanimity from the provinces. When we consider the fact that it will be possible for a province, because of someone like we had in Quebec, to prevent the approbation of what is reasonable and good for the country, to stand in the way interminably of progress which may be needed immediately in terms of changes to the Constitution as a result of some unforeseen problems.

This is why we in the Liberal Party feel that the Government should be open and should be listening not only to us as a Party but to the people of Canada who also have grave misgivings about this formula and about other matters. This is why the Liberal caucus has come forward, through the motion of our Leader and through the Hon. Member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan), to indicate that the Meech Lake Accord should be amended to deal with some serious matters.

In my view one of the most serious matters concerns a return to a formula whereby we have seven provinces and 50 per cent of the population voting for an amendment to the Constitution rather than total unanimity of the provinces as the Meech Lake document suggests.

Time after time the Tory Government has proven its unfortunate proclivity to talk in very fine and glowing terms about democracy and about parliamentary reform. However, on the most important issue upon which we could possibly be focusing, it provides for us and for Canadians little opportunity to give proper thought to and debate on these matters. We cannot move each amendment one at a time as we should be able to do. We should be able to look at it, discuss it, and honestly reflect upon it because it is so important.

Since the Government has a tremendous majority in the House of Commons, I do not deny its right in the end, after debate, to decide that there will be no amendments. I would not deny that the Government has that right, but it should not deny us the right to make amendments and to have each one of them carefully considered by the House and by the people of Canada. We should be able to go through first, second, and third readings, to vote on each section, to look at the amendments carefully, and to give the most important law of the country clause by clause consideration.

There is not enough time for me to deal with all the amendments which have been put forward by my Party as very positive suggestions. Large segments of our population, such as women, who represent over 50 per cent of the population, aboriginal peoples, multicultural people, and those concerned about the future of the territories, have expressed misgivings about the present text of the Accord. They wish it to be improved or amended so that there will be no doubt about the matters which concern them. While I cannot deal with each of the amendments we have proposed to deal with the concerns expressed by these people, I call the attention of the House to some of them.

One concerns the future of the Senate, which I believe would be strengthened and made more meaningful if it were an elected Senate. Clearly this is the position of our Party.

Rather than continuing with a formula which entrenches the future of the Senate as an appointed body and provides a situation wherein the provinces may feel that they have some kind of investment in keeping the formula as it is in the Meech Lake Accord, let there be freedom, let there be breath, let there be life; let us breathe a new life into the Senate rather than stultify it along the lines of the Meech Lake Accord. Let there be a move at this time to have future Members of the Senate elected. Then the process can be worked out in further conferences between the provinces and the federal Government. Further consideration could be given by the House and the Senate so that the Senate would play an even more dynamic and more important role than it does now.

Another of my concerns is in the area dealing with equality of the sexes, the rights of men and women being guaranteed and protected. We want to ensure that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms is paramount, and that the basic rights and freedoms of Canadians are not diminished by potential conflicts with any sections of the Accord, including sexual equality rights.

It would be wise if the Conservative Government would wake up to the realities which exist. There has been an example of this before. When the women of the country expressed concern, the Government of Canada under the last administration paid attention by making changes to the Constitution which took into account the solemn and sincere concerns expressed by them. Why does the Government minimize the importance of the concern expressed by women and their representatives, as well as by men concerned about the rights of women? They wonder whether the Meech Lake Accord perhaps puts into jeopardy the rights which were presumably obtained in the last go-around on the Constitution.

Those are some of the matters I wanted to bring to the attention of the Government. I ask it to consider them as being not only the views of my Party but the concerns expressed by the people of Canada. Will it not listen? Will it not open its ears to the concerns of Canadians who are happy to see Quebec being involved and being brought into the full life of the country?

They do not want to be accused of being unhappy about this, ungrateful or lacking a sense of patriotism because they want to bring up matters and points which they feel are very important for the future life of Canada, points which concern them and therefore life in this country as well. It is not an act of treason. It is not an act of lack of patriotism to be concerned about other issues in this Accord. Just because one expresses a concern about it, that does not mean one is not happy about the fact that Quebec is now brought into the full life of Canada.

Let us try and, in a spirit of understanding, move toward the possibility that the Government may still consider going to the provinces in the light of these proposed amendments which we have made with full sincerity and let them respond to the people of Canada and, in the same spirit, discuss with the provinces the way in which we can amend this Accord without trashing the Accord in its entirety. I do not think we need to throw out the baby with the bath water. I think we can try to amend, improve and repair what could be a much more perfect document so that future generations will say that we gave them something which they could change in the light of their future, that we did not deliver something that was a fait accompli which closed out any future evolution of the Canadian Constitution.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, the Member for Eglinton—Lawrence (Mr. de Corneille) was in this House in 1981 when we voted on the patriation of the Constitution which included a Charter of Rights. That Charter of Rights in Articles XVI to XXIII provided citizens with services in the official language of their choice. It dealt with minority language education rights. What we did in 1981 was to put in the Constitution in some respects the official languages policy which had prevailed for a period of 10 or 12 years prior to 1981.

As I understand it, those policies were based on the principle of linguistic equality, namely, that we were trying to achieve an equal status for the English and French languages for persons who speak English and French as much as possible throughout the country. In my opinion, the Meech Lake agreement goes against this principle of language equality because rather than having the same rights in Quebec as we have in Ontario or British Columbia, the possibility arises that rights may be different in one part of the country to the other.

Does the Member not agree with my interpretation that we are really retreating from the principle of linguistic equality with the Meech Lake agreement?

Mr. de Corneille: Mr. Speaker, I believe the subject which my colleague has brought forward is most important. The fact that he is concerned about it, as all Canadians should be, is clear that we are putting into language in the Meech Lake Accord matters of concern to people regarding their right and their children's right to be able to function fully in one of the two official languages of their choice and thus function fully throughout all of Canada.

I believe the intention on the part of those who signed the Accord was to achieve that. The question is, have they? That, first, is a matter which involves a great deal of legal expertise and interpretation. I am not going to propose that I have that constitutional expertise to give a wise opinion on the matter. If there is some doubt, it would not be a bad idea for us to incorporate in the language of the Accord that kind of reassurance. I have been pleading with my Government colleagues in this House for the Accord be made that much clearer so that people who have anxieties about it, not just for themselves but for the country and future generations, can understand it. We could then have legal experts conclude that yes, this is what it says. Unfortunately, we heard a wide variety of opinions in the committee. Therefore, that gave us reason to look at the proposed amendments made by our Party. We should talk about them, not just have concerns. We should be promoting the protection of languages in the provinces. Governments have a responsibility to promote and protect them as well as to acknowledge their existence.

Mr. Jardine: Mr. Speaker, I have a brief comment which will be followed by a question to the Hon. Member for Eglinton—Lawrence (Mr. de Corneille)

My colleague mentioned his support for an elected Senate. I recall reading a statistic which pointed out that something like 99 per cent of all Canadians would never run for elected office. If that is true, one would have to question whether, in fact, not only federally but provincially, the country is being well governed.

In that sense I have always felt the Senate does have a good role to play. Very talented, experienced and dedicated Canadians have a chance to serve their country by being appointed to that august body. Would the Hon. Member give me his views? An appointed Senate could be devoid of partisanship but it would not if we had an elected Senate.

Mr. de Corneille: Mr. Speaker, there may be some people in this august Chamber who are looking for an appointment to that other place. I do not want to be facetious, but I had to make that remark. There are probably a fair number of people who might look at that other place as being a good place to which to be appointed.

When my colleague said that 99 per cent of the people of Canada would not run for office, while they may not want to in the sense that it might be difficult because of leaving families—which many of us have to do to come to Ottawa or to go to some other place if one were a provincial Member—when the time comes and people are approached by fellow citizens and asked to run for office, even though they may have said no, that they would never run, they do respond. This reluctance to serve occurs with jury duty. I do not think anyone pounds on doors to get on a jury panel. But people serve because they feel it is genuinely important to make that contribution for their country.

• (1630)

As for the other small point, I do not have the time to enter into a debate about an elected as against an appointed Senate. I have expressed my views, and I think it is an important point. In general, the people of Canada feel that it would be a good thing if a chamber with such powers as the Senate presently has were also elected. They would then know that these people are there because they were elected by the people of Canada and not because they were appointed into a political position.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec Est): If I were to give my remarks a title, Mr. Speaker, I would call it the legitimacy of the Constitution. First of all, I should like to set the constitutional Accord in its proper context by saying that, together with a great many Quebecers, including Mrs. Chaput-Rolland who appeared before the Parliamentary Committee, I felt deeply hurt when in 1982 the Constitution was patriated without Quebec's consent.

I was certainly for the patriation of the Constitution combined with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. But I deeply regretted and even objected to the fact that these political decisions were forced upon Quebec; as much as I objected to the decision of the Imperial Parliament in 1840 to impose the Union Act and to ban the use of the French language.

Although, as Hon. Jack Pickersgill reminded the Committee, the Parliament of Canada with its English-speaking majority insisted in 1867 on re-establishing the linguistic rights of French-speaking Canadians, the latter will always remember the attempt made in 1840 at depriving them of their rights and they are looking for assurances that such an experience will never happen again. Together with a great many others, I feel that it did happen again in 1982. Once again, Quebec was ignored.

In a speech he made on April 15 of this year, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) clearly indicated what was at stake at the Meech Lake meeting, and I quote:

"With the Constitutional Act of 1982, we have now a fundamental law governing our country, a social contract which is binding upon Quebec without the consent of its National Assembly.

It is unacceptable that recent wounds have not yet healed. Quebec, as a distinct society which enhances Canada, has to join the constitutional family.

For that purpose, we have to find a fair balance between the concept of equality among all provinces and the need to protect and strengthen the unique character which Quebec gives to Canada.

The isolation of Quebec was a problem we had to assume when we came to power. We cannot bequeath it to another generation which would perhaps have to resolve it under more difficult circumstances and in less propitious times.

The Prime Minister knew that the problem had to be solved quickly. He knew that the country, that Quebec could not go on living with a constitution which had not been accepted by all the partners in Confederation. He knew more particularly that values could not be imposed to a community and that a document as important as the Charter of Rights and Freedoms to gain its true worth had to be freely accepted by Quebec. This Charter of Rights and Freedoms represents common values shared by the people, it is a definition of its collective will. The real strength of a charter is based on the intensity of feelings for it shared by the citizens.

Therefore, as long as Quebec will not freely adhere to the Canadian Charter, it will remain weakened.

The Parti Québécois Government was ready to negotiate a constitutional agreement in May, 1985, provided that the greater part of the Charter did not apply to Quebec. It was an unacceptable condition for those who believe that Canadians can share the same ideals of justice and equality.

Finally, a federalist Government in power in Quebec since 1985 is getting ready to adhere to the Charter of its own free will and to acknowledge its legitimacy.

And now Canada, through its First Ministers, says it is ready to welcome Quebec under conditions that are good for Quebec and for Canada. Parliamentarians and citizens across the land are asked to join together for that purpose.

I am pleased with the consensus of the three leaders—including our Liberal colleagues—who view Quebec's return to the great constitutional family as a significant national goal. This clearly shows that the First Ministers' appeal has been heard by our parliamentarians.

The Parliament Committee has also shown that the appeal was equally heard by politicians, former civil servants and well-known English-speaking academics. The Committee Report suggests that nearly all the witnesses who appeared at the hearings unanimously recognized the importance for Quebec to resume its place of its own accord within the Canadian constitutional family. Those Canadians who appeared before the committee also insisted that it was most important to solve the dispute between Quebec and the rest of the country; the Accord struck a remarkable balance between Quebec's own interests, the principle of equality between provinces and the national interest; the Accord in no way infringed upon the rights of Canadians, and this opportunity should be taken to adopt the resolution that will open the second round.

That was the view voiced by Gordon Robertson, who was Cabinet Secretary from 1963 to 1975 and Cabinet Secretary on Federal-Provincial Relations from 1975 to 1979—he is one of the most experienced negotiators on constitutional affairs in Canada.

That also was the view of Robert Stanfield, who led our fellow-citizens in Nova Scotia before coming over to the federal scene.

This is also the opinion of Peter Meekison, former Deputy Minister of Federal and Intergovernmental Affairs of Alberta.

Moreover, it is the opinion of the Hon. Jack Pickersgill, who served with distinction under four Prime Ministers of Canada as a Minister and as a public servant.

It is also the view of Professor William Lederman, one of our most eminent constitutional law professors. It is the opinion of Peter Leslie, Richard Simeon and others, who have a very open minded and sensitive attitude toward Quebec.

I have every confidence that the appeal of the Premiers, who have the support of Quebecers and of many Canadians, will be heard by the Parliamentarians. Moreover, by repairing past mistakes, the 1987 Constitutional Accord will open the door to a new era in Canada by recognizing a fundamental characteristic of our federation.

By entrenching linguistic rights in the Constitution in 1982, we legislated to put behind us once and for all past attempts, such as in the Union Act of 1840, to make French disappear from Canada.

With the 1987 Constitutional amendment, all Canadians are giving their enthusiastic support to the concept of linguistic duality as a basic characteristic of Canada, the role of all legislative assemblies and of Parliament to protect this characteristic is being confirmed and the distinct society of Quebec joins the Canadian family.

Finally, our linguistic rights find new grounds for existence in our Constitution, Canada finds its soul and Canadians rejoice in their diverse character.

I believe that we cannot be indifferent to the fact that the Constitution was imposed on Quebecers, that they rejected its legitimacy and that Canadians do not at this time share freely accepted common values. The First Ministers did not remain indifferent to these facts this year, and neither did the distinguished Canadians I mentioned earlier.

A country is more than a series of abstract and rational concepts. To develop, it needs a soul. I believe that by voluntarily joining the Constitution and the Charter of Rights, Quebec is giving back this soul to Quebecers and Canadians. Quebec is finally telling Canada that it is willing to share in the dreams and aspirations of our great country and that it also shares its values in its own way.

This is why I believe that the signing of the Meech Lake Accord was an event of great moment for Canada and why I ask the House not to make it necessary for us to go back on this Accord.

In conclusion, I would recall the words of the committee and urge people who refuse to listen to the First Ministers' appeal to reconsider their position. To them the committee is saying:

> If one is to maintain that the terms of the 1987 Contitutional Accord should not be accepted because they exact too high a price in terms of their vision of Canada, then one must be prepared to accept that at least in the foreseeable future Quebec will remain officially estranged from the Constitution and that a Constitution without Quebec will continue to limp along without the willing participation of one of the key parties to Confederation.

That is the kind of future the opponents of the Accord envision for Canada. That is what most Canadians want to avoid by supporting the Constitutional Accord of 1987.

• (1640)

[English]

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise and speak in support of the agreement commonly known as the Meech Lake Accord. I want to point out some very serious concerns which I think many of our colleagues have been expressing.

It seems to me that Constitutions of countries are very much like those of organizations which reflect the basic beliefs of, and establish over-all objectives as well as legal requirements for, its Members. They are rarely perfect but must be tested against experience and continuously adapted to reflect the concerns of the entire organization as well as its component parts. Therefore, in a country as complex as Canada we must entrench national concerns and obligations as well as our historic concerns while responding to the very diverse needs of different regions and ensuring through our Charter of Rights that the rights of all our citizens are adequately protected.

It is interesting and significant to note that the Canadian Constitution is only about five years old. A very immature Constitution it is. I am sure all of us who have gained from this current review and analysis—those who were on the committee, of course, are now experts—would agree that there are very serious flaws, particularly in the Charter, which must be redressed. Some Members have felt that it is perhaps flaws in the Charter rather than flaws in the Accord which need further attention.

There are amendments that we want to see to the Accord itself. We all agree that the overriding flaw in the 1982 agreement was the fact that Quebec was not part of the Constitution of Canada. That was the primary objective of this round of negotiations toward constitutional review and amendment provided that it did not diminish any other rights.

This Accord brings Quebec to full and active participation in the patriated Constitution for the first time. We in the NDP are very pleased that this is the case. In our view it acknowledges that Quebec is a distinct linguistic and cultural society within Canada. It reflects resolutions which the NDP adopted as a priority at our 1987 convention in Montreal. We acknowledge, however, that there are a number of flaws in the Accord and we strongly urge the Government and the First Ministers to correct those flaws before it is passed into law.

It is important to recall that the process involved in this round of constitutional reform leaves very much to be desired. In my view it did not reflect the democratic process. We should remember that in the decisions made behind closed doors at Meech Lake there were no natives, northerners, women or the disabled represented. These decisions were made by 11 men, all white, who drafted a Constitutional Accord to be applied to all of us in Canada. There is no question that they did a remarkable job as far as they went, but after further study and consideration, particularly by the groups I just referred to, there are indications that serious flaws exist. We believe those flaws can be corrected with three simple amendments without jeopardizing the Accord itself.

I want to concentrate my remarks on two areas of particular concern, but before doing that I would like to quickly review the amendments we have put forward and which were expressed in a letter from our Leader to the First Ministers.

There are three essential amendments and they are consistent with the objectives of the 1987 Constitutional Accord. Our first amendment concerns fairness for Canada's northern citizens. We believe First Ministers should immediately remove the anomaly of Canadians living in the territories being denied the opportunity available to other Canadians of serving on the Supreme Court of Canada and possibly in the Senate as well. Of course, we as a Party are not as concerned about the Senate. As well, First Ministers should address the injustice of requiring unanimous provincial approval for the creation of new provinces, a degree of concurrence not required for any of the existing provinces.

Second, we believe the Accord should include a commitment to hold a First Ministers' conference to discuss aboriginal rights, in particular self-government. It should be amended to ensure that representatives of aboriginal peoples and the territorial Governments can participate fully in these discussions.

Third, we do not believe the linguistic duality-distinct society interpretative clause abrogates, supersedes or overrides sexual equality rights, or any other rights guaranteed in the Charter. This is the conclusion which our representatives on the committee came to after very thoughtful analysis of the expert testimony. However, there is doubt across the country and therefore we say the same abundance of caution reflected in Section 16 when it was added can be applied to sexual equality rights without jeopardizing the Accord. Therefore, we urge First Ministers to amend the Accord by adding Section 28 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms which, as we all know, would reaffirm the equality of men and women.

We also recommend a complete Charter review, particularly regarding minorities, including visible minorities and disabled persons, in the very immediate future. We should give greater consideration to recognizing ethnocultural realities. We do not agree with the process that took place and we are very strongly recommending that any future process must be much more democratic with an opportunity for public input. This should be done through a standing committee of the House of Commons.

I want to concentrate my remarks on two areas of concern, particularly from the point of view of social policy. Those two areas deal with federal spending powers and the protection of equality rights. Both areas have been raised as concerns by social policy advocates and many women's organizations. In fact, women's organizations continue to raise these issues.

As to spending power, the Accord specifies that provinces will have the right to opt out of national programs but may still have costs shared by the federal Government provided the programs are compatible with national objectives. I must confess that as a strong advocate of federal leadership in social programs and with a very major concern about a national child care program, I was very concerned about this question.

• (1650)

Would it weaken the impetus for a national child care program which is urgently needed in Canada? Would it have prevented medicare from being established as a national program with enforcement of the five national principles which are implicit in medicare? Would it allow provinces to do what they wish with federal dollars as they have in the past with federal moneys which have been transferred for post-secondary education?

There is no more urgent need in Canada today than the need for a comprehensive national child care program which will ensure the availability of a range of quality, affordable, flexible child care services in both rural and urban communities. The child care situation is a crisis. This has been documented repeatedly.

A national child care program was promised in very strong terms by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), but it is obvious that no action is being taken on this. I cannot help but wonder whether the delays are in any way related to the process of this Accord. Under the new Accord the federal Government has the right, in our view, to establish a national program of child care with clearly defined objectives which must be the criteria for provinces if they are to receive federal funding for child care.

The Canadian Day Care Advocacy Association, the National Anti-Poverty Group and others spoke strongly of the need for the Government to establish right now these national objectives and to outline the requirements for any national child care program which will receive federal funding. These organizations expressed fear that there would not be clear objectives established.

I share these fears, but I have concluded, as have my colleagues, that these fears are not related to the Accord so much as to what the Conservative Government will or will not do with regard to child care. We see it as a very important political issue. The Accord definitely obligates the Government to state national objectives which reflect its philosophy and will establish clear principles for provincial programs which receive federal funding.

We conclude that the problem is political rather than constitutional. A New Democratic Government will make child care a top priority and will establish clear, progressive objectives as a requirement for any provincial programs which enter into cost-sharing arrangements.

Medicare was started as a provincial program by Tommy Douglas in Saskatchewan and became a national program. We strongly agree with the revisions to the health Act which were brought in by the past Minister, Monique Bégin, which enforced the five principles of medicare with penalties. Such provisions should be included in all programs which receive federal funding. We are convinced that this kind of federal authority over spending powers remains under the new Accord. In fact, experts believe that the Accord strengthens the use of federal moneys provided that the federal Government defines these national objectives.

A national child care program will be the test of this section of the Accord. It will be the test of the Government as well. I have repeatedly asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) to establish national child care objectives which will designate quality, affordable, accessible child care services as a base for any federal financing arrangements.

Finally I come to the aspect of the Accord which continues to be a very major concern to women's organizations across Canada. This concern, rather than diminishing, is escalating. We cannot ignore it. I implore all Members of the House, the Government, and First Ministers to give it major consideration. After major analysis, including analysis by legal experts, women's organizations still have a fear that sexual equality rights may be at risk under the new Accord.

I do not want to refer again to the many presentations which were made to the committee. I would like to pay tribute to my colleague, the Member for New Westminster—Coquitlam (Ms. Jewett), who contributed a tremendous amount of energy and expertise to that committee and our caucus. There is no one more concerned about equality rights for women as her history and record show.

I think I reflect her opinion when I say that we may not have the same concern about this as far as the Accord is concerned. However, we do agree that the concerns of women across the country must be dealt with. They must have the opportunity to express their concerns and have them reviewed as they have been requesting.

In summary, I would like to refer to two very recent letters which implore the Government of Canada and the First Ministers to consider their appeals. The first letter is an open letter of October 4 to Members of Parliament from the Ad Hoc Committee of Women on the Constitution. I will read an excerpt from that letter. They state:

> —governments want women to accept their assurances that the Accord's risks to gender equality are minimal; women are adamant that any risk is unacceptable, no matter how small.

Accordingly, they ask us to support recommendations made by the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women on September 23. The letter continues:

> Specifically we seek your support for:
> funding through the federal Secretary of State for a women's national constitutional conference.
> It is hoped that this conference would find a way to amend the Constitution without re-opening the discussions on the Meech Lake Accord in a way which endangers Quebec's recognition in the Constitution.

No women, and I am sure no Canadians, want to jeopardize that aspect of the Accord.

They further state:

> —that an urgent federal reference to the Supreme Court of Canada on whether the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms is detrimentally affected by the Meech Lake Accord—

—be undertaken.

> The federal government must undertake to consult the CACSW on the question and should guarantee that the CACSW—attends at the hearing.

Subsequent to that we today received, as I imagine other Members have, a very urgent letter from the National Association of Women and the Law dated October 6. This is a very reputable group comprised of outstanding women lawyers who have expertise in constitutional matters. The letter reads in part as follows:

> We urge you to consider our concerns. In our brief submitted to the Special Joint Committee of the House of Commons and the Senate on the 1987 Constitution Accord on August 4th, 1987, we raised a number of concerns relating to the status of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and in particular women's equality rights.
> We continue to be concerned that by enumerating some rights in Section 16 and in specifically mentioning the Charter in other sections, the courts may interpret this as excluding or giving less scrutiny to other rights, including women's equality rights. This may create a hierarchy of rights.
> In addition, the Supreme Court of Canada decision concerning Ontario's Bill 30, pronounced on June 25th, 1987, would seem to create a hierarchy of constitutional documents, by making some sections of the 1867 Constitution Act immune from Charter review. The Department of Justice has used these arguments in the challenge from the Yukon Territories.
> In order to ensure that this is not the effect of this set of constitutional amendments, we believe that the Accord must be amended to clarify the relationship of the Charter to these clauses, in particular to the new s.2 of the 1867 Constitution Act dealing with language duality and Quebec as a distinct society.

• (1700)

It is important to note for the record that they advocate a women's national constitutional conference with the objective of developing an amendment to the Accord which would not endanger the Accord or Quebec's recognition in the Constitution but would protect charter equality rights. Our Party strongly believes that this would be helpful. We advocated the inclusion of Section 28, but we would certainly support an improvement on that.

They also ask that the resolution in the House be deferred until this convention can take place. That might be very difficult. They go on to say: "We ask you to support a Reference to the Supreme Court of Canada from the federal Government. In this way, we can all receive a judicial interpretation of the impact of the Accord on the Charter of Rights and Freedoms". They go on to ask for the assurance that an intent not to harm the Charter is clear in the words of this historic Accord. Surely the First Ministers, the Government, and all Members of the House would agree that we do not know that this will happen, but we must deal with the concern that it may affect 52 per cent of the population.

My colleague who sat on the constitutional committee requested both the Prime Minister and the Minister responsible for the status of women that funding be made available from the federal Government, and that all possible support be given by the provinces and the federal Government to the proposed women's constitutional conference. It would present another opportunity for experts to consider all sides of the question.

It has been very difficult for groups to achieve a consensus in the form of one conclusive amendment. While we have proposed the inclusion of Section 28 of the Charter as an amendment, this would help reaffirm equality rights beyond a doubt.

There may be further suggestions from such a constitutional conference. I urge the Government and First Ministers to support this request and facilitate it. I also strongly urge the First Ministers not only to consider but to accept and implement the recommendations that were referred to earlier. If any group must not be left out, it is certainly the native people.

We support the primary objective of this Accord, which is to bring Quebec into the Constitution of Canada. While we support that objective strongly and joyfully, we cannot agree that this should be done with any diminution of rights for other people. That is why we believe that a constitutional conference for women should be supported.

I urge First Ministers to agree to amend the Accord as we have recommended and as a women's conference may recommend so that aboriginal people, northerners, minorities and women can have no further doubt that their rights will also be fully protected under our Constitution and Charter of Rights.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member knows that one of her colleagues from Vancouver was stripped of his responsibilities in the New Democratic Party because he is voting against the Accord. Does she agree with her leader on that action?

Ms. Mitchell: I do not know how my colleague from Vancouver will vote on the constitutional Accord. We have not yet voted. I certainly support my leader in almost everything he does. However, I think people have a right to their own opinions.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION ACT, 1867

CONSTITUTION AMENDMENT, 1987

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Hnatyshyn on the Constitution Amendment, 1987 (p. 9422).

And the amendments of Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra) (p. 9585), Mr. Broadbent (p. 9586), Mr. Caccia (p. 9644), and Mr. Allmand (p. 9644).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps) I believe had a question for the Hon. Member for Vancouver East (Ms. Mitchell).

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, given that the NDP has been quite critical in the past of the divisions and different positions in the Liberal caucus with respect to Meech Lake, I would like to ask the Hon. Member how her leader can justify what he calls an exemption, or dispensation, for one Member to vote against the Meech Lake Accord.

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I understand why these questions are being asked, of course. But as far as the Hon. Member for Yukon (Ms. McLaughlin) is concerned I think it is important, as surely the Hon. Member realizes, that the Yukon had no voice at all at the constitutional table. The people of the Yukon had no vote of any kind on the matter. The only vote to express their deep concern about being excluded from deliberations concerning the amending formula, which could perhaps preclude them from becoming a province unless the agreement of all 10 provinces is received, is the vote of the Hon. Member for Yukon. Therefore we feel very strongly that that is a view that should be heard in the House. That is why we support the Hon. Member in expressing her view.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, as far as I am concerned the explanations of the New Democratic Party are at the height of hypocrisy. It is all right for the Hon. Member for Yukon (Ms. McLaughlin) to run an election saying that she will fight the Meech Lake Accord when every other single member of her caucus is forced to vote for it for fear of sanctions by their leader. I would like an explanation as to how members of the New Democratic Party can be so hypocritical.

Ms. Jewett: Don't be so silly! Don't even bother answering that question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): If there are no further questions or comments, resuming debate with the Hon. Member for Hamilton East.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member from Vancouver characterizes me as childish. There is one thing I can say. It is that within the Liberal Party, unlike the jackboot treatment of the NDP, we permit our members and our leaders to express a number of views without necessarily squashing them by stripping them of caucus responsibilities, et cetera.

Frankly, I found it rather astonishing to hear the Leader of the New Democratic Party say that he was issuing a special dispensation to the Hon. Member for Yukon (Ms. McLaughlin) so that she could vote against the Meech Lake Accord when everyone else in his Party is being forced to toe the Party line for fear of being stripped of their responsibilities. Indeed, it has been a difficult struggle for us in the Liberal Party in terms of issues and positions. I know the NDP has been very vociferous in pointing out the divisions that exist in our Party. Those divisions do exist. I think the speeches that have been made in the House are testimony to that.

I believe that there are divisions internally in the Conservative Party, as there are in the New Democratic Party, which have been characterized in recent days by statements by various NDP Members that they will vote against the Accord. I cannot imagine how the Leader of the NDP (Mr. Broadbent) could go across the country and say that he supports the Accord in every single province and the territories, except the Yukon, when he will allow one of his Members to take a postion different from the position of his Party simply to win an election. Either he believes in it or he does not believe in it. Either the Party believes in it or it does not believe in it.

If it is the position of the leader that he is in favour of Meech Lake, then how can he say in the context of the House of Commons that one single Member will have a dispensation? Is a new Member of Parliament in a better position to represent her constituents than is a Member who has been around for a while? Should we start discriminating just because someone happens to win an election?

It was unfathomable to me that the Leader of the NDP would make that type of statement when he knew full well that the intention of the Hon. Member for Yukon was simply to get elected. If she is going to come here and vote against the Meech Lake Accord singly and solely, it is obvious that the Accord will pass. I think it would have been far more honest of the Leader of the New Democratic Party to say, as has the Leader of the Liberal Party (Mr. Turner), that there are divisions in the NDP caucus, divisions based on regional concerns and of ethnicity and based on other concerns as opposed to the approach which he has taken. He has stated, instead, that he will offer dispensation similar, presumably, to what comes from the Pope in Rome. The Leader of the New Democratic Party will offer dispensation to a single Member and everyone else is supposed to fall in line. I think it is about time that the people of Canada started to recognize that.

I have heard, for example, the Hon. Member for Vancouver East (Ms. Mitchell) make a very strong speech today in favour of the inclusion of women.

I know that the NDP will be sending out speeches across the country talking about all the wonderful things it will do to have women included in the Constitution. However, it seems to me that at least in the Liberal Party—and it has been a very tough time for us this last number of weeks—our leader is prepared to say that there is a variance of view, that there is a divergence of view, and that in the context of our Party and our caucus we will allow a full debate of all issues surrounding Meech Lake.

For me as a Liberal and as a Canadian it has been a very difficult experience to explore the number of issues surrounding Meech Lake. I think in particular of the exclusion of our aboriginal peoples. I think in particular of the concerns relating to provincial spending powers and how they might be applied on a national basis. I think in particular of the concerns expressed in my community about the possibility that we are relegating our multicultural groups to a second-class status.

However, I also think that in the context of the Meech Lake Accord the overriding belief of Canadians that when the Government of Quebec and the people of Quebec, in particular, said "Yes" to Canada, they said it because they believed that they were on the start of a new road to federalism. They said "Yes" because they thought they would see a follow-up from the referendum which would include a recognition of the distinct society in the Province of Quebec.

I believe on balance that Meech Lake has actually achieved the objective of the recognition of Quebec as a distinct society, and I embrace that particular recognition. As a Canadian and as a Liberal I am not afraid of the distinct society clause.

I think one of the joys of our country is that we have been able to embrace our differences and to celebrate our differences. We have been able, in the course of our history, to embrace multicultural groups, to embrace francophones and anglophones, and to bring people together.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity to work in the Province of Quebec more than 12 years ago. That was the time when the Parti Québécois was in opposition against the Liberals, a time when the people of Quebec were experiencing what was called the "quiet revolution". And I could see for myself that my Quebec friends, men and women alike, did live in a distinct society which had evolved over a few centuries, a society which was still in evolution despite certain religious standards, despite the legislative standards of the Canadian government, or despite the standards of religious groups in the Province of Quebec. Things have changed since the time when the first francophones came to settle in Canada. And to me it is important, as a country—

I can still vividly remember the night of the referendum when everybody—even in the riding of Hamilton East where there are not many francophones—was watching television, waiting—I was not feeling very well myself as I waited for the referendum results. At that time I was extremely pleased when Quebec, with its distinct society and its distinct character, with its history and its French culture, chose Canada. I was very glad as a Canadian.

But unfortunately, at the time I think a good many anglophones thought: Well, fine, that is the end of the francophonie chapter. Now we can deal with other problems. That is exactly what happened when Quebec refused to sign the Constitution.

Canada was not Canada without Quebec in the Constitution. And I think that the Meech Lake or Langevin Accord, with all the amendments made to try and accomodate changes in financing, jurisdictional issues and what not, means that Canada, for the first time, says yes to Quebecers.

Mr. Speaker, if Canadians are open-minded enough to be able to say yes to the distinct society in Quebec and do it wholeheartedly, I think this Government should be just as open-minded for our native people and for Canadian women who are concerned because, according to certain legal opinions, this Accord may affect their equality rights.

If, as a member of this House, I try and have an open mind and be receptive to this notion of distinct society in Quebec, I suggest that we should have this same attitude toward minority groups in other provinces.

The majority in Quebec managed to survive for 200 or 300 years despite the invasion of foreign media, and of English or American radio and television. You did survive. All we are asking for is that the same opportunity be given to minorities outside Quebec. Unfortunately, if the Liberal amendments are not accepted, especially those concerning the promotion of cultures, and the promotion of minorities outside Quebec . . . You all know that the 10 Premiers, and I know some of them, were willing to recognize the distinctiveness of Quebec and the rights of minorities in Quebec. But they were not all willing to accept the same rights for the minorities outside Quebec.

It is for that reason that no consensus could be found regarding promotion of culture for the minorities outside Quebec. It is sad to see that, as a Parliament, we are willing, even glad, to accept the distinct character of Quebec, but opposed to protection of minority rights in other provinces. Why is it so? Even the Government of Quebec and Mr. Bourassa, I believe, think that accepting amendments would somehow contribute to a reduction of rights. I believe, and that is the way I tried to live my life, that respecting and even promoting the differences between people in no way reduces our own rights. We are not a society like the American one, where everybody should be the same, should drive a car and keep up with the Jones. We are not like that. After the battle of the Plains of Abraham the decision of our soldiers to let the vanquished practise their religion and use their language started a new society. That is in fact the way the distinct society started. After that, we constantly had forces in our country who wished to make French disappear.

I know that even in Hamilton changes over the last 10 years have been tremendous. We can see students lining up till midnight to register their children in schools where they will be able to learn French, a fact which attests to extraordinary changes over the last 10 of 15 years. So I think the people and the mentality have changed, there is greater openness, less fear, due to the fact that anglophones and francophones better understand and know one another, whether that is on account of the quiet revolution or the referendum that forced us in the anglophone community to face a new reality in Quebec. All we in the Liberal Party ask for is that Members of Parliament be prepared not only to ally the fears in Quebec as far as the francophone community is concerned, but similarly outside Quebec. I know the Government will echo the words of its legal advisors and say: "We will look after the aboriginal people at the next conference; as to women, do not worry, there is no problem. There is no problem either with multiculturalism, because we will make appointments to some commissions or other." Unfortunately, to bring Quebec back as an equal partner, we have no choice. We must accept the Meech-Langevin Accord, pass it. At the same time, I think that we missed what could have been a real challenge for the Canadian Parliament because we could not widen our spectrum enough to be able to consider the first inhabitants of our country, our native people. We are not ready to consider the concern of women who really had to fight hard when the Constitution was written to get an equality rights clause that some premiers rejected. We know who they are, and at least one of them was trounced out of power because of his decision to drop the equality rights for women.

We proposed some amendments, on Senate reform for example. It is ironic, Mr. Speaker, because the Prime Minister frequently tells us in this House that the Senate is only a bunch of Liberal bagmen he would rather do away with. Now, the Liberal Party proposed an amendment which says that in the future the Senate will be elected, and that has been our policy since the last Liberal Party Congress in November, 1986. We should also note that it is supposed to be the policy of several Conservative Premiers, in particular the one from Alberta. We now have the opportunity, through some amendments, to start with an elected Senate: Why not agree to that change since the present Senate has often driven Conservative Members and even the Prime Minister himself to talk about its abolition. Unfortunately, because of the decision to reject any kind of amendment, "possibly" because some Premiers might not accept them, the Parliament and the Prime Minister leave us with an agreement which is an improvement over what we presently have, but which is not what we could have had in the circumstances. Even if I admit that some Premiers might "possibly" say that we cannot touch what has been agreed upon, the notwithstanding clause for example, there is nothing in our amendments which would prejudice the rights contained in our Charter. That isn't so hard. Everybody here believes in the Constitution and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. So why not accept an amendment that guarantees, once and for all, that any changes arising from the distinct society concept will not derogate from any of the rights guaranteed by the Charter of Rights and Freedoms? That isn't so difficult.

Unfortunately, the Government did not have the courage to proceed with such amendments, fearing they would be rejected by the provincial Premiers. Mr. Speaker, I think that is why many Members in the Conservative Party have trouble supporting the Accord in its present form, and not because they are against the distinct society concept. In fact, they embrace that concept as I do, as a Canadian. I realize it is an essential point and that whether or not we put it in the Constitution, the fact is there. It is a point that cannot be denied by anyone. However, since the Government has rejected native demands, has refused to consider women's concerns, and will not consider changes to protect the very essence of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, some of us on this side will not vote for the Langevin Accord in its present form. I intend to support the Accord. But in doing so, I make the same mental reservation made by Quebecers who voted for Canada in the referendum. They voted for Canada, that is to say, they said no to sovereignty-association. They said yes to Canada. They said yes "maybe" with some apprehension about what the future would bring, hoping that further measures would be passed by Parliament and the legislatures to protect their distinct society. And if that is done, I hope that all Governments in Canada will understand that to develop and create a society with no fear, we have to enjoy the differences between our multicultural groups, the differences between the sexes, the differences with the first Canadian community, the native people, and that the Government will consider the Langevin Accord whether it is accepted or not as the first step in the right direction. We feel it is not enough to create a Canada where everyone can live knowing that our differences and our common bond are acknowledged. With the Langevin Accord, the Canadian link is a fact but I think that to continue to celebrate our differences, whether we are a minority in Quebec, or a majority outside Quebec, or a majority in Quebec, many more amendments as suggested by our Party should be approved. I should like Messrs. Mulroney, Bourassa and other Premiers who have promised to amend the Constitution to try to attain the purpose put forward by the Liberal Party.

• (1730)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that I have to tell the Hon. Member that her time has expired. Debate. The Hon. Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster)

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have a chance to say a few words on the resolution before the House today concerning the Meech Lake Accord. This issue has been with us for many months now but this debate will be winding up in a few more days.

It seems to me that this is an important and historic debate for the House. Some of us had a chance to be here for the debate back in the early 1980s when we made the historic amendments to the Constitution which patriated the Constitution and installed a Charter of Rights in the it. Those were very historic days. It was a time which a country like Canada could only go through once.

• (1740)

British parliamentary law does not provide for a Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Many of the countries which have adopted the British Commonwealth, Westminster system of government have adopted a Charter of Rights, and it certainly was an historical occasion when we in Canada adopted one.

The Meech Lake Accord builds on that achievement. It provides for the Province of Quebec to join the Constitution. Of course, as long as Quebec is left out of the Constitution, it is not whole. Quebec represents some 28 per cent to 30 per cent of the population of Canada. It has a special position in our country because of its language, its culture and its different laws which were put in place in 1867.

This debate is an important one. It flows from those conditions Premier Bourassa set down in 1986 for Quebec's joining the Constitution. Of course, a great deal of work was done on those conditions in 1986 by members of our Party, by government Members and by Premier Bourassa. There were negotiations across the country.

Premier Bourassa's conditions included the recognition of the distinctive character of Quebec. He wanted to see some input from the provinces in the appointment of Supreme Court judges. That is perhaps to be understood because the Supreme Court governs both provincial and federal law in Canada. Premier Bourassa wanted to see the Cullen-Couture agreement on immigration put into the Constitution and he wanted to retain the traditional veto which Quebec had had up until the 1982 constitutional amendments. As well, he wanted to see some limitation on the spending power in areas of provincial jurisdiction.

The Meech Lake Accord meets most of those requirements. There has been a great deal of debate over whether Quebec should be described as having a distinctive character or as being a distinctive society. What concerns many Canadians is that the Meech Lake Accord as it was presented to Parliament seemed to go way beyond those five provisions which Premier Bourassa had suggested. It seems to deal with areas relating to the Senate and it constitutionalizes the federal-provincial First Ministers' Meetings.

Those of us who have been around here for some time would eventually like to see an elected Senate which represents in a more democratic way the regions. The constitutionalization of federal-provincial conferences seems to make the Premiers the representatives of the regions forever and a day.

There are those in this House, certainly including members of the NDP and perhaps others, who want to see the Senate done away with. I personally do not think that that will ever happen. I do not think it can be done without the consent of the provincial Governments. Clearly the provincial Governments in the Maritimes and in the west are opposed to that. Therefore, I do not understand why the federal-provincial First Ministers' Meetings were constitutionalized. That has been done and, of course, how much they are used depends on the Prime Minister of the day.

There was a great deal of concern over the extension of the veto to the amendment of the Senate. Many provinces do not want to see an elected Senate. It is hard to imagine that we will see total unanimity for an elected Senate in Canada. The extension of the veto power on that issue is especially unfortunate at this time because of the tremendous drive that exists in western Canada for an elected Senate.

Certainly the meetings I have attended in Saskatchewan and Alberta have indicated to me that there is a strong desire there for an elected Senate and our Party, at its policy conference last November, passed a resolution calling for the establishment of an elected Senate. It is part of our Party's policy and we will certainly work toward that.

The rigidity which has been introduced by the Meech Lake Accord with regard to the establishment of new provinces or the extension of existing provinces to the territories was in my view an unnecessary clause. Of course, that has been emphasized by northern Members who are all opposing the Accord because of that unanimity provision.

I think there is always a danger in a federal-provincial meeting of this type which brought in the Meech Lake Accord. There are 10 Premiers, and everything else being equal, they would all just as soon have more power. It is really up to the federal Government to defend federal powers. In this case, it seems that so many things beyond the original conditions of Premier Bourassa have been given away by the federal Government. It is not clear to me exactly why so much was given away.

The Premiers will now nominate people for appointment to the Senate. Although I think many provincial Premiers are just as capable of nominating representatives to the Senate as anyone else, their view tends to be more the provincial view. I personally feel it is better that appointments come from the federal level where there is a national point of view. That is why our Party has put forward an amendment suggesting that on an interim basis until we have a fully elected Senate, we elect new Senators rather than have them nominated by the provincial Governments which tend to nominate people who have provincial points of view rather than the national point of view.

• (1750)

As I said, the Accord goes far beyond the original request of Premier Bourassa. The over-all tendency is toward the decentralization of power. Important changes were made at the second meeting of the First Ministers in that there would be no change in the federal and provincial powers under Section 91 and Section 92 of the Constitution Act. That tends to ensure that the power of those two levels of Government is not changed by the Accord, but the over-all tendency is toward greater decentralization and a greater rigidity in the Constitution. That is why we have moved our amendments.

For example, instead of the unanimity clause we would have the requirement of seven provinces representing 50 per cent of the population for the establishment of new provinces or changes to the Senate.

The other amendment which I feel is quite important is the provision of a national standard for federal spending in areas of provincial jurisdiction. We probably will not have many more new social programs such as the Canada Pension Plan or medicare or the Canada Assistance Program, but who knows. At some time in the future we may have a guaranteed income program. We may have agricultural programs which will meet the new standards of the OECD.

Where provinces opt out of national programs, the Liberal Party believes that not only should that province establish a compatible program, but one with a minimum standard equivalent to that provided by the federal Government. Certainly in the Langevin discussions there seemed to be a provision that those standards would be national standards, but for greater certainty we would like to see the amendment we have put forward adopted by the House.

That brings up the whole question of amendments. Clearly, this is an extremely undemocratic procedure that we are going through. There have been two all-night meetings where the Premiers were locked up with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and a deal was hammered out. That deal was brought to the floor of this House with the Government saying we will have discussions and public hearings but we will not accept amendments. I hope we never have that kind of a constitutional amendment again. It is simply not in keeping with the way you govern a democratic country like ours. It is an extremely backward step. That is why we put forward our amendments. We know the Government will vote them down but that is not the last word. There are provincial Governments which will deal with this, I believe in a more democratic fashion. If they adopt some of the amendments we are putting forward, which we believe are more democratic, less rigid and more desirable, we would welcome it back to this House. In any event, I certainly hope that when constitutional amendments are next adopted it is done on a more democratic basis.

The fact that the Government has not provided constitutional amendments to deal with aboriginal problems is a gross blunder and great disappointment. Not only the native people but the people of the North are severely grieved by this document. Our amendments provide greater certainty that the rights of native people and women will not be overridden by this Accord. We would also like to see an amendment relating to the multicultural nature of our country. I do not for the life of me know why the Government has not adopted that amendment. I hope one of the provincial Governments will, so that the multicultural nature, which you, Mr. Speaker, and so many others represent in this House, will be fully recognized in the Constitution.

Despite all the problems I have outlined with this Accord, we still come down to the basic question of whether we want to adopt it now or wait for another day to see Quebec in the Constitution. My belief is that with all the difficulties, and I hope some of them will be corrected, if not by this Government then by one of the provincial Governments, it is important that this matter be dealt with now. We have a federalist Liberal Premier in Quebec with a Party in a strong position to work out a deal. It is not the deal we want but it will bring Quebec into the Constitution. It means we can go forward as a nation. Therefore I hope the Accord will be adopted, in amended form if possible. However, we should not miss this opportunity to make Canada whole by seeing Quebec become a part of the Constitution.

Mr. Prud'homme: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would like to co-operate with the Chair as usual. It is six o'clock and I just want to make sure that we all understand the point made by the Government House Leader and that the next discussion of Meech Lake will be on Monday, unless of course unpredictable circumstances arise.

• (1800)

I would like to make it clear on the record that that will be the case unless an unpredictable event takes place. I just want to make sure that we will still have the floor for the 10-minute question and comment period.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The next time the Bill is called there will be a 10-minute period for questions and comments.

With regard to the ruling of the House, the Government can give notice at any time.

Mr. Prud'homme: I rise on the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is very important. I know that many Members would like to participate in the debate. We take the House Leader's word that the earliest time will be October 19.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is no problem.

Mr. Clément M. Côté (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, is the House not sitting until 6.06 p.m. tonight?

Mr. Prud'homme: No, that was yesterday.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House is sitting until six o'clock and it is six o'clock right now.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 66 deemed to have been moved.

AIR TRANSPORT—PROPOSED TRANSPORTATION OF PLUTONIUM THROUGH CANADIAN AIRSPACE/TERRITORIAL SOVEREIGNTY

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, on August 21 I asked the Government what it was doing to ensure that reprocessed plutonium would not be flown from Japan to France across Canada's north. I was told to be reassured that the Government would be acting in the best interests of Canadians. I and many other Canadians do not find that reassuring as we watch what the Government is currently doing in some of our other best interests.

I would like to point out that I was not the first to raise this question. On March 24, March 31, August 11, August 13, August 17 and August 28 Hon. Members asked the Government for some answers and received such reassurances as "well, no one has asked us formally and when they do we will respond", "we'll do the right thing", and the most insightful answer from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Crosbie), "relax".

I hope that you, Mr. Speaker, and other Canadians will feel relaxed knowing that, first, according to current information, the plutonium will be in such a fine particle state that one speck inhaled will be carcinogenic. Two, the composition of the particles is such that they would be suspended in the air if they were released. Therefore, in the event of a crash or mid-air explosion it would be absolutely impossible to clean up.

Three, standards for casks capable of withstanding either a mid-air explosion or a crash which are currently set by international standards are set on the basis of impact at 30 miles per hour. I do not think the planes will be flying over Canada at 30 miles an hour.

Five, the plutonium which will be transported will be of such a toxicity that its toxicity will be increased by 60 per cent over several decades. There will be a legacy for our children and our children's children should there be a spill.

Six, the agreement proposed between the U.S. and Japan is for 30 years. The U.S. Nuclear Energy Institute states that it will take one flight every two weeks over a period of 10 years in order to transport this plutonium to Japan from France. On each flight there will be enough plutonium to make 15 to 20 bombs, each the size of the Nagasaki bomb. It is important to note that the plutonium is in such a chemical state that any high school student could easily and readily make a bomb.

• (1805)

Now that you are relaxed after having heard these facts, Mr. Speaker, let me tell you about some people who are not relaxed. Certainly John Polanyi, Nobel prize winner, has expressed his concerns. He said that should there be a spill, the environmental hazards both to persons and the environment will last for thousands of years.

The State of Alaska is also concerned. It is currently suing the United States federal Government over the issue and is calling for a full environmental assessment review.

In addition to those concerns, there have been articles in newspapers throughout the country, including the Vancouver Sun, La Presse, Le Devoir, The Globe and Mail, the Winnipeg Free Press and the Windsor Free Press. Editorials throughout the country have stated that the Government should have dealt with the issue since it was first raised in March.

I want to summarize the three areas of concern. The first is the obvious environmental hazard in the event of a crash or mid-air collision. Second, should we allow these flights when there is a potential contribution to nuclear proliferation in the event of a hijacking. The third issue is sovereignty. Will the Government simply accept this proposal without the appropriate early intervention? Will the Government allow the United States to fly over northern Canada, which, incidentally, has been suggested as a route because it is uninhabited? That will be a big surprise to the people who live there. There is an alternate route across New York and Washington, D.C., but that does not appear to be a route being contemplated.

Other Members of the House have tried to bring these concerns to the Government, but without satisfaction. Daily I receive letters about this issue from my constituents and residents of the Northwest Territories, Ontario and other provinces.

Will the Government finally take some action and state an unequivocal no to this suicidal scheme? Will it take action now before the President and Congress ratify this agreement? Will it undertake the common sense solution and propose that Japan build its own reprocessing facilities?

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in response to the Hon. Member for Yukon (Ms. McLaughlin), I can only reiterate assurances already provided by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Crosbie) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) on numerous occasions in the House.

First and foremost, I would emphasize that while a draft agreement has been negotiated between the United States and Japan, it has not yet been signed. No decisions on the potential routing of these shipments have been made at this time. Indeed, it may all be hypothetical as other routes are certainly possible.

If and when an agreement is signed, however, I again remind Hon. Members that the movement of all dangerous goods by air is subject to both an international convention and domestic legislation.

In the international arena, Canada is a signatory nation of the International Civil Aviation Organization and as such has a number of options available. We can request that pre-notification be given and that approval be received prior to any overflight being undertaken. In this case we would insist that the most stringent requirements for safe packaging be met as well as all safety and inspection requirements. As well, we can deny any overflight by filing a state variance with the International Civil Aviation Organization based on Canada's concern with any inadequate safety measures of such flights.

This Government has made representation to the United States Government in May and August of 1986 and again in April of this year, expressing our deep concerns in this matter. We have also spoken to Japan about the same concern.

This Government is monitoring the situation very closely. The permission of the Canadian Government would be required on a case-by-case basis before any such overflights could take place. I can assure Hon. Members that no such overflights would be carried out without our express approval. Canadian safety standards are among the highest in the world and any proposal would be fully scrutinized to ensure that these high standards are fully complied with, particularly in the area of safe packaging. Any decision taken by this Government would make the safety of Canada and Canadians the most important consideration.

CANADA POST CORPORATION—REQUEST FOR REINSTATEMENT OF CERTAIN POSTAL SERVICES—PROVISION OF SERVICE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard—Anjou): On May 21, 1987, Mr. Speaker, I directed the following question to the Minister responsible for Canada Post: Why is he doing everything he can to stop the postal service?

When the Canada Post Corporation was created by Parliament in 1981, Mr. Speaker, its mandate included the following: Firstly, to improve the postal service; secondly, to improve its industrial relations; and thirdly, to reduce its deficit.

Since then it has lived up to its mandate. It has substantially reduced its deficit. It was improving relations with its employees to the point that we had had no strike since 1981; the first one occurred in May 1987, and now, three months later, we are faced with a second strike. Mr. Speaker, even if Canada Post had been slower to improve its service, slower than with the other two parts of its mandate, it did improve its service.

We should not forget that we had been faced with nearly 20 years of conflicts at the time the Corporation was a department. We could not expect some 20 years of conflicts to be forgotten overnight. It will take a number of years. Therefore, we were making progress.

But in February, 1986, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance clearly indicated in his Budget that effective March 31, 1988, Canada Post would have to become self-financed, meaning that it would have to operate at a profit, for the Federal Government would no longer soak up its deficit.

That is when our problems started, Mr. Speaker, for Canada Post turned around and said: Well, we are going to fulfil our mandate, present a corporate plan which the Government will accept and we are going to balance our books. And that is what happened, Mr. Speaker. This corporate plan provides for two systems of postal delivery in this country: one is home delivery of mail, which had been the general custom in Canada until then, and the other is delivery of mail to superboxes.

Since that plan was tabled, I can assure you that many communities have had neither door-to-door delivery nor temporary green boxes or superboxes, and many thousands of Canadians have to get their mail once a week, because they are away at work and cannot always drop in at the post office.

The current situation is unacceptable, Mr. Speaker. Now, after all those fights, those negotiations, the Government stands behind Canada Post—the Government gave that mandate to balance the books by March 31, 1988—and labour relations have been deteriorating. When Canada Post was established, we even appointed labour representatives to the Board of Directors of Canada Post in order to create a link, a work relation, in order that they might themselves take part in the management of the corporation and become aware of the difficulties—to create a climate of understanding.

However, Mr. Speaker, in-fighting has set-in. The Government has replaced those people. The situation now is that the Government has hired strike-breakers during the strike last May.

In 1987, a government that allows its own corporations . . . We are the shareholders of that corporation, Mr. Speaker. The Government as shareholder allows Canada Post to hire strike-breakers, to provoke violence in the workplace, and last May after many requests to appoint a mediator immediately, to solve that problem, the Government took 10 days, then the mediator needed only two days to solve the problem. This time, Mr. Speaker, we are not solving the problem. The strike has been on for a week, but the Government does not want to appoint a mediator. And now back-to-work legislation has been introduced—so much for our collective agreement settlement procedure.

You are signaling that my time has expired. I should like to conclude by reading two paragraphs of the October 2, Halifax Chronicle-Herald editorial.

• (1815)

[English]

Privatization has brought us to the current strike situation. Neither side is yet prepared to back away from their fixed positions. That is understandable in the sense that what is at issue is the future capability of the Canadian postal system.

We doubt that either a national strike or back-to-work legislation will help much to attain that goal. It might be more helpful, however, if the post office Act is amended to more fully define the nature of the postal service and to blend the many views of what such service is and how it is to be provided.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, time has come for a new debate so we might at last define what kind of postal service we want to offer Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Post Office in Canada has a long and proud history. Canadians were proud to receive mail from Canada Post in its former shape. As well, people were proud to work for Canada Post. However, in recent years there is no doubt that they came upon hard times and problems. As times changed, as management changed, and as unions changed, it led to problems.

A particular problem was that past Governments interfered in the operation of the Post Office. The result was that management could not manage and unions could not work for the workers. We faced the situation of unions actually trying to manage the Post Office. That just cannot work. Managers must manage.

Parliament tried a number of experiments to see what would work. The most recent one when the Hon. Member's Party was in Government was to create a separate Crown corporation. That has worked. Now, under the new President, Mr. Donald Lander, there is a postal corporate plan. I have looked at the plan and I have gone to briefings on it until I have been blue in the face. The plan is clear. Management changes have been made, because not all the faults were union faults. Working place changes have been made. It has clear goals in respect of service and independent auditing and checking of those goals.

I have absolutely no doubt that there is better postal service today than there was six months ago, 12 months ago, or 18 months ago. If we stick with the plan and let management manage and unions do what they are supposed to do in terms of their job, I can tell the Hon. Member opposite that we will be very proud of the result. I have no doubt that within a year or so Canadians can be once again proud of the Post Office, and people who work for the Post Office can be proud to say that they work for Canada Post.

POSTAL SERVICES CONTINUATION ACT, 1987

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of Labour) moved that Bill C-86, an Act to provide for the resumption and continuation of postal services, be read the second time and be referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been discussions at the staff level. I would like to inquire of the opposition Parties, for the record, whether or not it would be possible to complete all stages of this important Bill to provide for the resumption and continuation of postal services today. Government Members are prepared to stay as late as necessary to complete this matter despite the fact that this is Thanksgiving weekend and Members are wanting to return to their ridings.

We have arranged for the Senate to sit at two o'clock this afternoon in order that it can deal with the matter. We might possibly get Royal Assent if we have the co-operation of all Parties.

It is the Government's wish to resolve this matter so there can be as little inconvenience as possible to the public and that any further violence on the picket lines can be restricted.

I inquire once again of the opposition Parties whether it is possible to complete all stages of this Bill today.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the enquiry of the Minister of State (Mr. Lewis). In times past when there has clearly been an emergency before the country, when a very serious situation existed, we were quite prepared to co-operate and move a Bill through all stages, often in a single day. What is very clear is that this is not a national emergency. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, when we look at the legislation presented, it is not only extremely flawed but it is provocative. We feel that the legislation, being so seriously flawed, must be improved. We have amendments we hope to make, and we think it is in the best interest of the country, since this is not an emergency, that we proceed in a thoughtful, positive way to ensure that if the legislation passes at some future date it be the best legislation in terms of it being fair and equitable, as opposed to it being provocative.

[Translation]

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, when the Government wants co-operation from the parties opposite, there is a recognized procedure to be followed that is the Government usually approaches the parties opposite before tabling a bill in the House of Commons and tries to have their co-operation. This was not done in this case, on the contrary, the Minister is rising and trying to negotiate on the floor of the House.

I admit that yesterday we were insulted when the bill was unexpectedly tabled in the House and the Minister who did it asked us from the floor of the House whether negotiations could be held among parties. This is not the usual procedure. I only want to add, Mr. Speaker, that this Bill will follow its normal course. There is no urgency. According to the Government, most of the mail is delivered throughout the country. I do not see why we would get around the normal rules of debate on that Bill.

This being so, the debate will open and will follow its normal course. Several of my colleagues intend to speak on the issue, because they are concerned about some clauses of this piece of legislation. There are several questions we want to ask the Government and if the answers are given clearly, quickly, and frankly, the Bill could be passed more expeditiously.

However for the time being, I cannot promise on behalf of my party to have that Bill go through all the stages today.

Mr. Cadieux: Mr. Speaker, of course I have no intention of debating the theory just expressed by my colleague because I think it is more important to debate the legislation. Still I would only point out that I was prepared to respond to those questions yesterday. I will be prepared to answer them today if necessary, or whenever they have to be answered, as I always do in similar cases.

As to the procedure, Mr. Speaker, there is no need to repeat that it is exactly the same we followed in the case of the railways.

• (1010)

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise to speak on second reading of Bill C-86, the Postal Services Continuation Act, 1987. As the title of the Bill suggests, its prime purpose is to order a resumption of full mail and other postal services across the country.

Hon. Members will be well aware that these services have been disrupted for the second time in less than four months as a result of a labour dispute and work stoppages. On this occasion the labour dispute involves the Canadian Union of Postal Workers representing some 23,000 inside postal workers employed by the Canada Post Corporation.

The spectre of a protracted and damaging test of economic strength between the corporation and the union is now self-evident. Unfortunately, these two combatants have the capacity to inflict more punishment on third parties than on each other. The Government is not prepared to stand idly by and permit a gradual deterioration of postal services through escalating rotating strikes.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cadieux: Members of the House are fully aware of the inherent dangers and the potential for violence in the type of contest in which these two parties are engaged. Our industrial relations system certainly permits a test of economic strength between disputant unions and corporations.

[Translation]

However, Mr. Speaker, when there is a situation, such as we have here, with a potential for disorder on a national scale, government must become the defender of the public interest and know when to say enough is enough. This is particularly true when there is no hope for a settlement through the collective bargaining process.

Mr. Speaker, in the absence of any expectation for an early negotiated settlement, we are therefore acting decisively to terminate what commissioner Foisy apprehensively predicted as the "battle of the titans".

The bill before the House provides for the termination of all work stoppages and established procedures for the settlement of the labour dispute.

[English]

Before dealing in greater detail with the provisions of the Bill, I want to address certain considerations. In this context, I am conscious of the fact that I rose in this House just over a month ago in late August to introduce a similar Bill dealing on that occasion with a crippling national railway strike.

As I believe I indicated to Hon. Members during the debate on that Bill, I take no pleasure in introducing back-to-work legislation. Such legislation represents an abdication by the parties of their responsibility to resolve their own differences.

The Government's general policy is not to intervene in labour negotiations between the parties other than by the well tried and usually effective mechanisms of conciliation and mediation. We are proud of the record in federal jurisdiction where consistently in excess of 90 per cent of collective agreements are renewed without resort to work stoppages. However, the federal labour relations jurisdiction covered by Part V of the Code includes some vital and sensitive industries. Work stoppages in some of these industries are capable of inflicting greater damage more rapidly on innocent third parties than they inflict on either of the parties directly involved.

In these sensitive and vital industries, it is particularly incumbent on the parties that they meet their responsibilities to negotiate their own settlements. It may require considerable skill and flexibility to do so but they owe nothing less to the Canadians they serve.

It is this Government's preference by far not to intervene through special legislation in labour disputes. However, neither employers nor trade unions in the federal labour jurisdiction should be under an illusion as to our determination to act when private disputes are inflicting public damage.

One further word of caution is perhaps necessary. Federal jurisdiction employers and trade unions should not take this express willingness by the Government to act when circumstances so dictate as an invitation to shirk their respective responsibilities and to propel their labour disputes into Parliament. The parties should not seek to monopolize the valuable time of the House or try the patience of Parliament by confronting us with the need to settle one labour dispute after another. If there is any tendency or sign of a trend in this direction, the parties should be warned that they may provoke more far-reaching and unpalatable remedies than they had anticipated.

[Translation]

A second general consideration I would like to touch on, Mr. Speaker, concerns the evolution of the Canada Post Corporation. It is, I am sure, a subject that other Hon. Members will want to address and will no doubt do so at greater length. When the Canada Post Corporation Act was proclaimed in October, 1981, there was a general expectation that the transformation from a government department would give the new corporation the capacity to function in the marketplace in a way that was not previously possible.

Indeed, I believe that these sentiments echo or at least paraphrase the words expressed at the time by those reponsible for introducing the enabling legislation. When this government came into office, it was far from clear that any positive transformation had occurred. Service levels remained poor and deficits continued to bedevil the corporation.

[English]

What the Government did was to insist that the corporation improve its service standards and its financial performance. The message was clear. The umbilical cord was to be cut and the flow of general Government subsidies was to be halted. The corporation had to become viable and to act in very large measure as a commercial enterprise.

Naturally, the approach implied change and change implied, among other things, labour relation issues. It became the responsibility of corporation management and the unions representing its employees to address these issues. It seems in the present case that they have been unable to do so without confrontation and disruption of mail services. That situation is, to say the least, disappointing.

It may be a truism, but organizations that fail to change with the times are left behind the times. The transformation of the Canada Post Corporation into an efficient and viable enterprise calls for flexibility and a willingness to adapt on the the part of both management and labour. With such flexibility and readiness to attack—to adapt, the future of the corporation and its employees—

Mr. Cassidy: The attack syndrome.

Mr. Cadieux: I apologize for my English. At least I try.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cadieux: With such flexibility and readiness to adapt, the future of the corporation and its employees is best assured. Without these qualities, the future for both is bleak.

[Translation]

This brings me, Mr. Speaker, close to the cause of these present proceedings before the House, namely labour relations at the Canada Post Corporation. I could dig back over the past twenty years or more and recite the litany of labour disputes and major confrontations involving the former Post Office Department and now the Corporation. Instead, Mr. Speaker, I will limit myself to two or three more recent assessments of the state of the labour-management relationship.

The review committee on the mandate and productivity of the Canada Post Corporation, known as the Marchment Committee. Indicated that it had never seen labour relations as acrimonious as those that exist between the corporation and its unions.

Mr. Speaker, the committee further characterized the relationship as poisonous to the point of the potential destruction of the enterprise. More recently, Kenneth Swan, the conciliation commissioner in the dispute between the Corporation and the Letter Carriers' Union of Canada, found that the relationships of the representatives of the parties have deteriorated to the point where they are intensely personal and bitter. In the present dispute, conciliation commissioner Claude Foisy observed, at the outset of his report, that the relations between the parties were marked by a profound mutual distrust.

Mr. Speaker, this sorry story would be bad enough, if it only involved the parties themselves. Unfortunately, it does not. It also involves the effectiveness of a service on which Canadians sould be able to rely with greater assurance. That, Mr. Speaker is among the reasons that we find ourselves dealing with Bill C-86 in the House today.

• (1020)

Let me now turn to the specifics of the current dispute between the corporation and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers representing some 23,000 inside workers. The collective agreement between the parties expired just over a year ago, on September 30, 1986. A notice of dispute was received from the union on October 26, 1986, and I responded with the appointment of a staff conciliation officer on October 30. The conciliation officer, Mr. André Drouin, met with the parties on several occasions over the next three months or so. However, the parties were unable to reach agreement despite his assistance.

When the officer reported out of the case it was clear that virtually all key issues remained in dispute. In the circumstances I exercised the discretion granted to me under the Canada Labour Code to provide for a further and more formal level of conciliation. In this regard I appointed Claude H. Foisy, Q.C., of Mount-Royal, Quebec, as conciliation commissioner on February 23, 1987. Mr. Foisy is an experienced labour relations practitioner, a former vice-chairman of the Canada Labour Relations Board, and now a respected labour arbitrator and conciliator in private practice.

Mr. Foisy held a series of meetings with the parties over a period of some five months from early March to mid-August. I gather he was inundated with briefs and position papers. However, as indicated in his report, he found it difficult to engage the parties in a genuine dialogue on the major items in dispute. Eventually he concluded that settlement was not possible in negotiations under his auspices and he withdrew to write his report and recommendations.

I released Mr. Foisy's report to the parties on the morning of September 22, 1987, and released it publicly later the same day. The report is comprehensive if not exhaustive. Covering in excess of 80 pages it deals with the background to the dispute and focuses, at the parties' request, on the key issues in contention. The commissioner endeavoured to assess the competing demands and interests of the parties. He recognized, on the one hand, the legitimate requirements of the corporation to perform as a viable business, but never neglected the need to provide appropriate protection for the corporation's existing employees.

The objective of the report's contents was perhaps best illustrated by the initial reactions expressed by the parties. I understand the corporation's spokesman referred in radio news clips to "this balanced report". The union in its initial press statement indicated that:

> Commissioner Foisy made some recommendations that reflect our demands, some recommendations that reflect the employer's, some other that go half way for both and others which are not addressed.

Turning to Commissioner Foisy's recommendations, he classified them under four headings: job security, demands affecting operations, grievance and arbitration procedures, and health and safety. Under the job security heading the report addresses the high profile franchising issue. The union demand in this area called for a modification of the existing contracting-out provision of the collective agreement so as to prevent the loss of bargaining unit work through the awarding of franchises and the opening of new sub post offices.

Over all, the commissioner's report recognizes the legitimate interests of the union in wanting to negotiate the maintenance of desirable counter jobs but also recognizes the corporation's legitimate interest in wanting to deal with the private sector. In the circumstances, there is no recommendation in favour of modifying the present contracting-out provision. What the report recommends instead is special and comprehensive employment protection and financial compensation for the life of the agreement for members of the bargaining unit who currently work at post office counters.

[Translation]

I have raised this matter, Mr. Speaker, because I believe that the commissioner's examination of the job security issue, as it relates to franchising and private sector sub-post offices, illustrates two important points.

First, I believe that it shows the efforts which have been made to reconcile the competing demands of the parties. Secondly, the recommendation shows that the need to adapt to change does not have to be accomplished at the expense of existing employees.

The same elements are found elsewhere in the report. For example, in the area of part-time work, the corporation would be accorded greater flexibility to use part-timers in meeting its service targets. However, the current ceiling on the part-time employment complement would be maintained.

[English]

Following release of the conciliation commissioner's report, the parties had before them a reasoned and reasonable document which should have served as a basis for negotiations towards settlement. Instead, the negotiations deteriorated. Consequently, on September 29, I asked my Associate Deputy Minister, Bill Kelly, to meet with the parties to assess what progress had been made since the release of Commissioner Foisy's report, how far the parties were apart, their willingness to compromise, and whether in his view this dispute could be resolved through the collective bargaining process short of a protracted strike with all its inherent dangers.

Mr. Kelly advised me that the parties had made no progress on the major issues in this dispute since the release of the conciliation commissioner's report on September 22, 1987. He also provided me with his judgment, resulting from private discussions with both sides, that this dispute could not be resolved through the collective bargaining process short of a lengthy test of economic strength. I have complete confidence in Mr. Kelly's judgment in such matters and I am sure Hon. Members share my opinion of his abilities. He has demonstrated the capacity to get to the root of issues and find avenues for settlement which others thought did not exist. While I found no consolation in the assessment Mr. Kelly gave me, I had no doubt as to its accuracy.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I publicly urged the parties to return to the bargaining table. However, in the light of the assessment I had received, I also gave them notice that the government would not tolerate a protracted and disruptive work stoppage at Canada Post. I had hoped, Mr. Speaker, that the warning would stimulate serious efforts at settlement.

Instead, what appears to have been a somewhat desultory meeting, on lesser issues, took place last Sunday. Then, on Monday, when it was fully expected that more intensive negotiations would commence, the parties could only manage a brief two hour session. They emerged from this meeting indicating how far they were apart and emphasizing how entrenched they were on key issues.

At that point, Mr. Speaker, I gave the parties formal notice that the break off of negotiations last monday, after a mere two hours, was unacceptable to the canadian public. In a telegram to both sides, I warned them that, if they were incapable of resolving the dispute, through collective bargaining, the government would lift the responsibility from their shoulders.

In my telegram, Mr. Speaker, I also indicated my intention to give notice in the House of Commons which would enable the government to introduce legislation to resolve the dispute.

I effectively challenged the parties to remove the need for legislation by showing the will and the capacity to achieve a resolution through collective bargaining. Mr. Speaker, they did not rise to the challenge.

• (1030)

[English]

With no settlement in sight and with Canadians faced with the disruption of mail services for the second time within four months, the Government decided to act. We have tabled legislation which, as I shall explain shortly, offers the parties the opportunity to settle their differences in mediation, but not while they hold up the Canadian public for ransom.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cadieux: In tabling this legislation our message is very clear. The Government will not allow the mail to be disrupted again this year. It will not stand by while the adverse impact builds just because the Canada Post Corporation and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers cannot settle their dispute without inflicting damage on the Canadian public.

I turn now to the provisions of the Bill before the House. In the first instance, and as a first priority, the Bill provides for the immediate termination of the work stoppages and the resumption of postal services. The Bill also provides for the extension of the collective agreement for a period to be determined through arbitration, if necessary, of not less than two and not more than three years. Additionally, the Bill provides for the settlement of the issues in dispute through the appointment of a mediator-arbitrator.

[Translation]

I have already dealt with the rationale for terminating the work stoppage and ordering a resumption of full postal operations. The Canadian economy cannot be subjected to a second postal work stoppage within four months from the previous strike. What I want to emphasize most at this point, Mr. Speaker, is the importance I attach to the provision which the bill makes for the appointment of a mediator-arbitrator.

The parties in this dispute are no strangers to protracted negotiations and work stoppages. In 1981, Mr. Speaker, Canadians were subjected to a lengthy strike of inside postal workers and were without mail for six weeks. Canadians were kept waiting for a total of forty-two days before labour and management could settle their differences through economic sanctions.

[English]

In the present dispute the corporation and the union have been bargaining for more than a year and are well aware of the issues. They have had the benefit of conciliation officer assistance followed by a second stage of conciliation with a conciliation commissioner. This second stage was unsuccessful and led to the report and recommendations of Commissioner Foisy. The report and recommendations should have set the scene for negotiations toward settlement.

[Translation]

After I released Mr. Foisy's report, Mr. Speaker, the onus for settlement rested squarely on the parties' shoulders. I had no intention of transferring this responsibility to a mediator. To have done so would have provided the parties with a sanctuary from public opinion during a protracted mediation process while they continued on the path of mutually assured destruction.

[English]

Against this background the Bill before the House provides for the appointment of a mediator-arbitrator rather than strict arbitration. This is done with the express purpose of affording the parties one last chance to do it for themselves. However, while they are attempting to settle their differences they will not be in a position to pursue their diversionary tactics against each other.

On this occasion the Government does not intend to let matters drag on. The parties are guaranteed the opportunity of mediation, but not at the expense of the economy and public interest. I sincerely hope that they will arrive at their own agreement with the assistance of the mediator-arbitrator. If they have their own best interests at heart they should seize this opportunity to do so. At the same time they just may lay the foundation for a much needed improved future relationship. However, should the parties fail yet again, the mediator-arbitrator will be empowered to make binding decisions.

[Translation]

I will conclude at this point, Mr. Speaker, because as I indicated before I know that several other members will want to speak to this Bill. But before I conclude, allow me to add that there had been some reason to hope that labour relations at the Canada Post Corporation would improve. However, it proved to be a false hope, Mr. Speaker. Confrontation was never far away even when agreements were reached. Each round of bargaining brought its threats to the provision of these important postal services. This past summer an overt and violent conflict occurred. This government will not tolerate yet another disruption of the mail.

[English]

We decided to act firmly and decisively. Let there be no doubt in this House that when a private clash of wills takes precedence over the public interest the Government will not hesitate to intervene.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Shame, shame!

Mr. Murphy: This message brought to you by Canada Post.

Mr. Cassidy: There is no Minister of Labour left in this country.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Mr. Cassidy: There is no Minister of Labour left in this country!

[English]

Mr. Hicks: It looks like you rattled their cage.

[Translation]

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, I rise very reluctantly in the House today, to address, on behalf of my Party, the Bill tabled for our consideration, Bill C-86, whose purpose is to provide for the normal resumption of postal services but whose hidden objective is to break a strike.

[English]

What puzzles me is, first, the disturbing way in which the Government has asked the opposition Parties for co-operation. When the Minister rose in the House to ask for all-Party agreement to pass this Bill through all stages today I made a few remarks explaining that when the Bill was tabled in the House yesterday we had not been consulted. The Government had decided to push aside the normal tradition of a gentlemen's agreement between House Leaders to try to reach agreement on pieces of legislation. This has worked many times recently and over the years. For the Government to table a piece of legislation in the House of Commons and for the Minister to ask us to start negotiating in public is baloney. It means, in my opinion—

Mr. Vincent: In your opinion?

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Yes, in my humble opinion it means that the Minister is not seriously trying to reach an agreement to pass this Bill rapidly.

I am not sure that this Bill has to be passed rapidly anyway, because in my opinion it is an ill-advised piece of legislation. It flies in the face of our Canadian tradition of trying to settle labour disputes through bargaining.

• (1040)

The Minister spent most of the time during his speech explaining to us that bargaining was not working in this case. That is surprising because we saw a similar situation in June when the letter carriers were on strike with the Post Office. The strike was settled by negotiation. The parties came to an agreement after the Government appointed a mediator. While the Government first refused to appoint a mediator and only saw the light a week later, I must give credit to the Government for finally appointing a mediator which resulted in the parties coming to an agreement peacefully and ending the strike.

Why must the Government use the ballistic approach this time to try to bring the parties together? I am simply saying that it will be much more difficult and this action shows the image of the Government.

Not only is this piece of legislation ill advised, it is premature. There is no national emergency. We all remember the rail strike. In that case, grain was not moving, coal was not moving, and other commodities were not moving across the country. A rail strike presented the possibility of severely crippling the Canadian economy. Such is not the case with this strike. There were rotating strikes and the mail, by and large, was moving. There is no national emergency and this Bill is premature.

[Translation]

In fact, what we have seen and what we are still seeing is a series of rotating strikes across this country. We do not have a national strike from sea to sea, bringing mail delivery to a complete standstill. That is not the case. However, since the Minister tabled his Bill and, in doing so, provoked the urath of postal workers, there is a very real threat that the rotating strikes will gradually turn into a full-blown national strike, and if that is what the Government wants, that is probably what it is going to get. However, if this happens, I can inform the Government we will hold it responsible for escalating a strike that was relatively peaceful.

Even according to the Minister responsible for Canada Post, who brags about it daily, mail delivery is proceeding almost normally. I was reading some reports not long ago in which postal officials said that the volume of mail being processed today is 1.8 percent greater than the volume processed by the Canada Post Corporation a year ago. So our postal services are operating, despite the rotating strikes, and the Government had no business bringing in a Bill prematurely, which will only lead to provocation, especially since negotiations were proceeding and representatives for Canada Post employees had decided recently to make a major concession with respect to privatization, which, as we all know, has been the main stumbling block in the negotiations.

The president of the union mentioned recently that he was opening the door to the Corporation's plan to set up postal franchises. Obviously, he was doing so on certain conditions. He wanted to ensure that this would be done mostly in new developments. He didn't want existing post offices to be shut down and replaced by wickets in drugstores and supermarkets, with people being paid the minimum wage, while postal employees earned decent wages.

Certain terms could certainly have been negotiated, and the union representative had seriously opened the door to a resumption of the negotiations by giving ground on the main demands of Canada Post. The Government therefore chose the worst possible moment to introduce such repressive legislation. A negotiated settlement achieved at the bargaining table is always better than an imposed one, just as an out of court settlement is always preferable in civil proceedings. I do not know why the Government cannot understand this principle, even though some of its own members do. Recently, the Hon. Member for Richelieu (Mr. Plamondon) paid more than lip service to this concept by joining the picket line. Let me tell you why, and I would like to quote what he said. According to an article in Le Journal de Montréal, the purpose of his gesture was to denounce the anti-social attitude of his Government. This is what the Conservative Member for Richelieu did.

He stated that he was against the hiring of strikebreakers. He saw this provocation. He also expressed serious reservations about back-to-work legislation, and this was before the Bill was introduced. He had already understood—

An Hon. Member: What he is reading is nonsense.

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): The Hon. Members opposite do not like to hear this. They are always interrupting. I am anxious to see them rise to defend their views as their colleague for Richelieu has had the courage to do.

If we look at the basic arguments of the Hon. Member, who is a Conservative, we find that he said that the workers have the right to strike and that the conflict should be allowed to resolve itself normally as the national interest is not being threatened. I am therefore not the only one to say so. The national interest is not being threatened and the rotating strikes have not caused any real acts of violence, at least until now.

Mr. Speaker, all this goes to show that, as surprising as it may seem, some of the Conservative Members understand reason. Some of them have the courage to rise publicly to express their views. What is at issue here is what is happening to the collective bargaining system in Canada now that we have a Bill which plainly interferes with a strike which is quite legal and which complies with all the rules. Such special legislation seems totally at variance with the principles supposedly supported by the Government, and especially by the Prime Minister who, at other times, and he would not do so in the House now, likes to say that he is on the side of the workers and of collective bargaining.

As recently as July 29, the Prime Minister wrote a letter to Mrs. Shirley Carr, President of the Canadian Labour Congress, in which he said the following. As the letter was in English, I shall change over to the language of Shakespeare:

[English]

"The existing framework for collective bargaining has again proven its capacity to bring employers and bargaining agents to resolve even the most difficult disputes without government interference". I would like the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) to return to the House today and repeat that sentence. However, I know he is busy and that is why I have offered to speak on his behalf and remind Canadians of what he is saying while already campaigning for the next election. I am not saying either that he is wrong in beginning the campaign early.

Let me continue to quote the Prime Minister about bargaining settlements. He said, "Such settlements are better by far than any that would be imposed through legislation". That is what I said earlier, yet I was heckled by my colleagues opposite. I do not know if they will heckle their own leader, but I was repeating exactly what the Prime Minister was thinking when he was speaking. However, the Prime Minister and the Government have the bad habit of saying something to please some people but doing the exact opposite the next day, probably to please another group of people.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the Government is responsible for this strike and, although it might surprise some Canadians who hear me say that, I will explain why. It is the Government, with the last Budget introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson), which has put Canada Post in a straight jacket. In all fairness, we certainly cannot blame the Canada Post Corporation and its negotiators who are doing their best, within of course the limited means available to them.

Under the plan imposed by the Minister of Finance for a balanced budget by next spring Canada Post Corporation finds it very difficult to operate and, under the circumstances, it has no other alternative but to make cuts and more cuts. The Canada Post Corporation is forced to franchise and privatize its operations, to apply the axe to the job security of postal workers, men and women, to meet the financial demands of the Government. That is why I say that the Government is responsible for this strike.

The Government has caused the strike with its postal service privatization plan which these working men and women are opposed to because they see it as a threat to their job security. Nobody likes to lose his or her job or to approve in advance plans which will likely result in job losses. That is why postal working men and women are fighting back, for their livelihood is at stake.

I was looking for instance at our friend Bill Kelly, the Deputy Minister. Earlier, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Cadieux) referred to a certain report he received from Mr. Bill Kelly, who had been asked to call on the parties and see what was going on rather than mediate, because despite our suggestion, the Minister has refused to appoint a mediator.

Recently, we asked the question in this House: What is Mr. Kelly doing? Is he a messenger? Is he an observer? Is he a note-taker?

The Minister answered the Hon. Member had not read his press release, issued that morning, and everything was in there. I had read the press release, but the problem is that in that release it was impossible to determine what Mr. Bill Kelly, the Deputy Minister of Labour, was doing there.

One thing we did understand about the press release, and it was that Mr. Kelly was not there as a mediator. And that was the Government's big mistake.

• (1050)

[English]

I would like to add that the Government is sending the wrong signal with this back-to-work legislation. Canada Post was already strapped for funds because of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) and because of decisions made in Cabinet. Canada Post now has a clear signal that it does not have to negotiate. The back-to-work legislation is there. The employees will have to return to work and do their jobs. Why would the officers of Canada Post bend over backward and start conceding on various fronts around the table? They do not have to do that. The message is loud and clear. It is there; the writing is on the wall.

[Translation]

Why Bill C-86, Mr. Speaker? The Minister claims it is in order to end the strike because it jeopardizes mail delivery, but that is not even true—mail is being distributed. There must be an underlying reason, there is something fishy going on. And I will suggest two possible reasons for this shotgun approach taken by the government.

The first reason in my view is that here is a government whose popularity is on a constant downslide, as indicated by opinion polls, and it must try behind closed doors, in its strategy meetings, to find new methods to beef up its image. A good right-using attitude for a Conservative government is to say: We will look tough with workers. That will work. Then people will say we are in charge.

I, for one, say that holding Canadian workers to ransom is not the right way for a government to enhance its image when it is already very damaged.

Besides, there are other reasons as well. It may not only be a tactic designed to enhance its image, but the government which has taken unusual steps in this strike by hiring scabs, an unprecedented process, is probably innovating, obviously not in the right direction but nevertheless innovating. But the government had probably not properly assessed the cost of those initiatives. I suggest that the government has to introduce legislation in order to stop that strike because of cost pressures. It costs a lot to hire strike-breakers who are not only paid $13.25 per hour but who get paid even if they are on stand-by in front of the postal station or in buses. Those are the facts. It costs a lot to hire scabs who are paid $13.25 per hour, especially when they have been guaranteed a minimum of 12 hours of work a day. What it means is that when a strike-breaker is replacing someone for two or three hours, he is sure to be paid for a twelve hour period. That is why costs are very high. It costs a lot to hire scabs at $13.25 per hour when you know that after forty hours of work, they are paid time and a half, that is close to $20 per hour.

Meanwhile, unemployed people who desperately want to work and are attracted by a chance to earn a few dollars, risk a beating because the Government brings them in past postal workers who are furious to see someone else coming to do their work—

Mrs. Mailly: The union is wasting taxpayers' money.

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): I thank the Hon. Member from Gatineau (Mrs. Mailly) for her suggestions, but I think she should wait until she makes her own speech later on.

Mrs. Mailly: There is room for improvement here.

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, it costs money to have helicopters flying around to watch what is going on below, to watch the picket lines and the strike breakers crossing them. It costs money to have armoured buses bring strike breakers to work at post offices and sortation centres. It costs money to rent empty depots just in case, as we have seen in Toronto and other locations in this country.

But all of a sudden, the Government noticed that using scabs to break the strike was expensive, and it said: We have to find a way to cut costs, and the best way is to table back-to-work legislation.

I would now like to take a look at the Bill and some of the measures it contains, and tell you how foolish I think they are.

First, the Bill provides for the appointment of a mediator-arbitrator whose first responsibility, if we look at the text of the Bill, will be to mediate for a certain time. And that after we have been pressuring the Government for more than a week to appoint a mediator, and the only answer we got was no. It wasn't the right time yesterday or the day before or last week. And now all of a sudden, today is the right time.

This is going to be a strange mediation process, because mediation is supposed to be non-confrontational. A mediator tries to bring both parties closer together. It isn't easy to be non-confrontational with the threat of back-to-work legislation hanging over the union.

The Bill enjoins the mediator to give due cognizance to the report of the conciliation commissioner, which is very convenient for the Government, since the conciliation commissioner's report approved the privatization policy. This means that the mediator-arbitrator is being instructed to take sides with Canada Post, which is going to implement the Government's plan.

I think my time is about up. Is that what you are trying to tell me, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Gauthier: It isn't eleven o'clock yet.

• (1100)

Mr. Speaker: Not necessarily, but it is time for Question Period.

[English]

It being eleven o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 19(4) the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 21.

SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH

REASONS WHY GOVERNMENT WANTS TO LOCATE MICROBIOLOGY LABORATORY IN WINNIPEG RATHER THAN OTTAWA

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): I would like to comment on the Government decision to move the microbiology laboratory to the home province of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp). In my opinion, this is a decision based on partisan political considerations which is not in the national interest and is not in the interest of the 85 affected employees and of their families. Mr. Speaker, the transfer of existing facilities from Ottawa to another city is not good planning but just plain partisanship, and that is why I oppose this decision.

The construction of a new laboratory for desease control at a cost of 93 million dollars had been planned in Ottawa, and it should be built here. By moving the microbiology laboratory to Winnipeg, this Government gives up the potential of this region and the well-being of the 85 affected employees just to get a few votes. Will the Government be as partisan when it decides where the Canadian space agency will be? You can bet it will, for the Conservative Government would rather fill its own petty political needs rather than make sensible decisions in the national interest. I urge the Hon. Members from the Ottawa area, including the Hon. Merber for Ottawa—Carleton (Mr. Turner), to look after this problem and try and do something about it.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

NEED FOR GOVERNMENT TO LISTEN TO ACTION GROUP SUPPORTING MATANE REGION PAPERMILL

Mr. Jean-Luc Joncas (Matapédia—Matane): Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw the attention of my ministerial colleagues on an important decision they will have to make in the next few days. That decision will change for decades the economic environment of one of the poorest regions in our huge country. The Regroupement pour la papeterie régionale, in Matane, is putting all its trust in our Government, but it has great fear of the pulp and paper lobby.

On behalf of my constituents, I am asking my ministerial colleagues to analyze further the needs of that region, rather than listen to the unjustified outcry of the pulp and paper industry. They will still be pocketing millions, even with competition from the Papeterie régionale in Matane. The population has been holding peaceful demontrations recently and it will be holding more of them to show that there is a real solidarity.

My dear colleagues, I ask you to allow the owners of that major project access to the regular regional development programs. It will be one more proof that the Conservative Government is willing to work at eliminating regional disparities. I repeat, the demands from the population must take precedence over the demands from the industry.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

EFFECT OF CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, on June 23 of this year when speaking about the decision of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission in the United States not to allow Canadian producers of natural gas to pass along pipeline carrying charges in Canada to the purchasers of the natural gas in the United States, which the purchasers in the United States had agreed in writing to assume, the Minister of Energy (Mr. Masse) said:

> How can we hammer out solid free trade principles between our two countries when a regulatory agency can make a mockery of mutually-acceptable and freely-negotiated trade arrangements?

Surely, people will say, now that we have a free trade agreement all that has been corrected. No way! What we got was the following: "Parties will consult on energy regulatory actions which could directly result in discrimination inconsistent with the principles of the Agreement". Big deal!

What did we give up? We completely gutted the National Energy Board. We gave up all the regulatory protection we had, and the United States did not give up anything.

LITERACY

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST THE ILLITERATE

Mr. W. R. Bud Jardine (Northumberland—Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, a recent study revealed that an alarming percentage of Canadians are considered to be functionally illiterate—they cannot read or write, or do mental arithmetic either to, or much beyond, a very basic academic level. Their lot in life is not an easy one, and in many ways on a day-to-day basis we not only make it more difficult but we in fact discriminate subtly and not so subtly.

An example, if I may. Every day we are invited to participate in a game of chance—"no purchase necessary—fill out the form, and if you win there is a free trip, free groceries, free gasoline, if you can answer this skill-testing, time-limited question". What is that great test of skill? An arithmetic problem—add, subtract, multiply, divide. For too many of our citizens this is not a test of skill, it is an outright embarrassment.

In this day of lottos, super-lottos and mini-lottos why do we limit the ability of many of our citizens to win a prize by testing their academic level? If it is the law, then let us change the law.

CHILD CARE

DELAY IN INTRODUCING NATIONAL PROGRAM

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Family Week must not pass without noting the Government's refusal to act on its child care promises. In 1984, in the Leaders' debate the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) promised that child care would be a priority of this Government. He repeated his promise to First Ministers in Vancouver stating that substantial resources would be allocated for a national child care program. Three years have passed with no action.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) still has not tabled a government response to the report of the Special Committee on Child Care and has delayed meetings with provincial Ministers. Why has the Government refused to act? Was this just another empty political promise of the Prime Minister because he realizes the public support for child care? Has the cost of this Government's trade deal and nuclear powered submarines been given preference? Why has the Minister refused even to establish objectives for a national child care program although this is required by the constitutional Accord?

The child care crisis has escalated. We need positive government action to develop a national program of quality, affordable, accessible child care services in every region, and we needed it yesterday.

THE ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT'S PERFORMANCE

Mr. Clément M. Côté (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, for months we have been working hard to restore the country's economy. For months, we have seen the economy improve. For months, we have been creating hundreds of thousands jobs. For months, interest rates have been going down. For months, the value of the dollar has been going up. For years, Canadians, and especially Quebecers, have been fed up with the Liberals. And now, for months they have been enjoying an improving economy.

Mr. Speaker, no one has challenged this Government's performance, not even the people of Quebec, who say they are willing to give the Conservatives at least forty seats in the next election, for your information.

Mr. Speaker, the Conservatives were not afraid to introduce unpopular measures, because they were badly needed.

Today, Quebecers have confirmed that they agree and that they don't want the Liberals back to put the country into bankruptcy.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS

NATIONAL NETWORK TO END HUNGER—TRIBUTE TO WORK OF ORGANIZATION

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, one does not have to wander too far from Parliament Hill to encounter the signs of hunger, even in affluent Ottawa. Along Bank and Sparks Streets, the sight of some poor soul eating out of a garbage can is not uncommon. And, less than a mile from Parliament Hill, St. Brigid's Soup Kitchen feeds the hungry 24 hours a day.

The problem of hunger stretches right across this huge country, from east to west and from north to south. It has many manifestations—children going to school without having breakfast, young mothers feeding their infants sugar water because they have no food in the house, and people who have not eaten for days, walking miles to food depots.

• (1110)

Thankfully, someone is doing something about the problem of hunger. The National Network to End Hunger grew out of the National Conference on Hunger in November, 1986. It is sponsored by a number of associations including churches, social workers, and other social development agencies. Their aim is to eliminate the need for food banks by 1992 by advocating policy improvements in areas such as housing, employment, and income security.

I hope I am speaking for all Members of Parliament, Mr. Speaker, when I salute the efforts of the National Network to End Hunger in Canada. Their efforts do not go unnoticed.

ENERGY

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT—POSITION OF LIBERAL PARTY

Mr. Paul Gagnon (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, the Liberals may have some new faces, but it is the same tired old song and certainly the same tired old song sheet. One of the most divisive acts any Parliament anywhere ever perpetrated was the national energy policy. It forced one area to sell its commodity at half price and, if this was not enough, it forced the West to pay exorbitant taxes.

This Government realized it was wrong, and this Government stopped this abuse. On Monday the Leader of the Liberal Party again said that the Government gave away the national energy policy as a sop to the Americans. This was no sop to the Americans. This was stopping an abuse, righting a past wrong, correcting an injustice. The Liberals have learned nothing of history. When the next election is called, the Liberal candidates in western Canada will be assigned to the dustbin of history, as were their predecessors in 1984, 1979, 1974, and in 1972.

PHARMACEUTICAL INDUSTRY

AMENDMENT OF PATENT ACT—CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, on April 14, 1986, the Minister for International Trade (Miss Carney) stated: "Dealing specifically with pharmaceuticals . . . They are not in any way tied to the present discussions as to whether or not there should or should not be trade discussions between Canada and the United States".

On the following days, October 6, 27, November 6, 19, December 1, 8, 1986, and February 2, March 26, April 2, August 11, 13, 14, 19, 1987, questions were put to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), or to one of his Ministers, asking whether the demand by President Reagan to give a pricing monopoly to United States drug companies operating in Canada was tied to the free trade deal. Although the Government caved in to President Reagan's demand for drug pricing, it denied the linkage to the free trade deal. Today we know that the two were inextricably linked. We know that the Government intentionally misled the House and the people of Canada. No wonder the Government is increasingly being held in contempt by the people of this country.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REDUCTION IN UNEMPLOYMENT STATISTICS

Mr. William G. Lesick (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, this morning Statistics Canada released the September unemployment rates. I am afraid that it is more bad news for the Opposition, but good news for Canadians. The seasonally adjusted rate for the country is 8.6 per cent, down from 9.5 per cent one year ago. Albertans will be pleased to know that the provincial seasonally adjusted rate has dipped another two-tenths of a per cent to 9.7 per cent.

The unemployment rate in my home city of Edmonton is 11.2 per cent. That is not the best, but we are getting there. Help is on the way in the form of free trade with the United States. I only hope that Edmontonians remember what Party is speaking for free trade and which Parties oppose it.

Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, you said that this is no tea-party, and you are right as usual. But I wish that the Mad Hatters of the Opposition would give up their wonderland theories and admit once and for all that, "We're late, we're late, for a very important date"—with destiny—a free trade destiny!

MUSIC COMPETITIONS

IMPORTANCE OF GRANTS

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, a few months ago, the federal Minister of Communications (Ms. MacDonald) decided to cut $100,000 from the grant given by her Department and the Government of Canada to Canadian Music Competitions Inc., a grant the Government has been giving for years.

I have before me copies of petitions addressed to the Minister in which nearly 1,000 people ask her to reverse her decision. I would like to join these people in their petition to the Minister.

For more than 30 years, Canadian Music Competitions have been held for the benefit of young Canadians who are musically inclined. There is ample evidence of the importance of this work. I would like to quote the Minister's own words when she said:

[English]

"These competitions constitute one of the happiest facets in Canadian musical activity, and contribute to the economic and cultural development of our country".

[Translation]

I therefore would ask the Minister to be mindful of her own statement in this respect and to guarantee the continued existence of this national institution by restoring the original grant for Canadian Music Competitions.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT—POSITION OF LIBERAL AND NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY LEADERS

Mr. Gerald Comeau (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, when the Government introduced its economic renewal programs, the Opposition predicted the loss of hundreds of thousands of jobs. When the opposite happened, the Opposition resorted to vicious personal attacks on our Leader.

Now that the Government has another winner on its hands, a trading arrangement which will protect our markets, save our jobs, and create hundreds of thousands of new jobs, the reactionaries feel that they must stop the deal at all costs in order to put a stop to our continuing economic success.

Kind souls will sympathize with the Liberal Leader (Mr. Turner), who must be against everything the Government does if he wishes to appease his own Party critics, but the socialist Leader cannot be forgiven. What right does the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) have to deny prosperity to the rest of Canada? What right does the NDP vice-president, Bob White, have to deny other Canadians the same success which resulted from the 20-year old free trade Auto Pact?

Realizing that the deal is a good one, the reactionaries have wrapped the Canadian flag around themselves and are screaming sanctimonious drivel. I call on them to allow other Canadians the prosperity enjoyed by the constituents of the Hon. Member for Oshawa. Remove the flag from your eyes and join us in securing a prosperous future for all Canadians.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT—CALL FOR GENERAL ELECTION

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, today is an occasion to remark upon how ironic it is that at the same time that the Government is defending a constitutional Accord which would require unanimity for changes to federal institutions, the same Progressive Conservative Government proposes to change the economic constitution of this country, not with unanimous consent but without even a consensus in this country on free trade, and without doing what would be the proper and historically rooted thing, which is calling an election to give the people of Canada an opportunity to express themselves on whether or not, as a people, they wish to be locked into this relationship with the United States that the Government proposes to lock us into through the agreement that it has recently arrived at.

There will be a consensus in the country. It might even be unanimous in a very short time. If the Progressive Conservatives have the courage of their Yankee convictions, they should call an election and let the people of Canada make a judgment on the future of Canada. Let the people of Canada give them the mandate, or refuse them the mandate that they refused to seek in 1984 when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) ran on the basis that he would not enter into a free trade agreement with the United States.

EMPLOYMENT

CREATION OF FULL-TIME JOBS

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, in the summer of 1984 the Progressive Conservative Party campaigned on the theme of "jobs, jobs, jobs". Under the previous Government, in four and a half years only 420,000 new jobs had been created, 80 per cent of which were part-time. The national unemployment rate was 11.7 per cent. Among youth it was 18.3 per cent.

Under this Government, in only three years 959,000 new jobs have been created, 87 per cent of which are full-time. They are not six-week, Liberal-type, make-work, paint-the-fence, clean-the-basement type of jobs. These are full-time jobs.

The national unemployment rate is down to 8.6 per cent. Among youth it is down to 12.8 per cent.

In my Province of Saskatchewan, despite disastrous commodity prices, the unemployment rate is down to 6.8 per cent. Across the Prairies over 90,000 new jobs have been created. The help wanted index, the ads placed by employers seeking employees, is at an all-time high.

We did not promise to create jobs. It is not the function of government to hire and employ everyone. What we did do was promise to create the type of environment in which the private initiative and free enterprise of Canadians could flourish. The results of these policies are evident to all Canadians. There are 959,000 proofs out there of the correctness of the policy of the Government to create "jobs, jobs, jobs" for Canadians.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

CRITICISM OF NATIONAL CAPITAL AREA PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE MEMBERS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, it is now obvious that the Tory MPs for the National Capital area have become politically impotent. Nowhere is this lack of virility better demonstrated than in the failure of those Tories to convince the Government that the new $93 million Microbiology Centre should be located here in the nation's capital.

At one time the employment rate in Ottawa was lower than that of most other communities in Canada, but after three years of Tory Government such is no longer the case.

• (1120)

Why are these Tories not sticking up for their constituents? Where are the Tory Members of Parliament for Ottawa Carleton, Ottawa West, Nepean Carleton, Lanark, Renfrew Carleton and Gatineau? They should be picketing the office of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) at the Langevin Building saying that they will not take it any more. Chances are they will not do a thing. That is what impotence is all about, Mr. Speaker.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

PHARMACEUTICAL INDUSTRY

AMENDMENT OF PATENT ACT—CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. On December 8, 1986, in this House, speaking of Bill C-22, the drug patent legislation, he said:

> The fact is that this matter has nothing to do with the free trade talks.

Then on CTV's Question Period on August 30, 1987, he said:

> that it is not tied with the free trade discussions.

On July 7, 1987, in a Senate committee he said:

> —let me say that Bill C-22 is not part of the free trade discussions.

And,

> Senator, it has nothing to do with free trade.

Why after these repeated statements, statements of the same kind by the Minister for International Trade and even by the Prime Minister, do we find that the Government signed a free trade agreement on October 3rd, hours before the announcement that the deal was made, and that agreement contained a clause in which the Government pledged the passage of Bill C-22 as part of the deal? Why was that in the deal despite the denials over and over by Ministers? Let the Government be straight with Canadians as to why it did what it did.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in 1983 the Hon. Member for Papineau, the then Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, introduced a White Paper—

An Hon. Member: Answer the question, Pinocchio.

Mr. Andre: I am. It said in part "To generate further growth in this industry, the Government of Canada has decided to change the Patent Act to rebalance the 1969 policy."

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: That was the previous Government. This Government took up that challenge. The House of Commons dealt with it in May of this year. The Senate sent the Bill back and we dealt with it.

An Hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Andre: In August, the member of the New Democratic Party for Vancouver—Kingsway said: "We believe the Senate should let the Bill pass after the House of Commons has, in fact, reviewed the matter."

On the same day the Leader of the Opposition said: "At the end of the day the elected House of Commons must prevail. That is the clear position of the Liberal Party".

At the end of August the Government was committed to Bill C-22. The New Democratic Party acknowledged that the Bill should be passed and the Leader of the Liberal Party acknowledged that it should be passed. But the Member over there finds it shocking that on October 3, in discussions, there is an admission that we are committed to the Bill.

According to this testimony, everybody in the House is committed to the Bill.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, what I find shocking is that the Government was not telling the Parliament and Canadians the truth.

BILL C-22—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Minister to acknowledge that although he said many times that Bill C-22 was not and is not included in free trade negotiations, that nevertheless, this Government has signed an Agreement in which it undertakes to adopt this Bill.

Why was the Government afraid to tell Canadians the truth?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-22 was not part of the negotiations at the table. The agreement which was initialled by both parties, a copy of which all Members of the House and the public have, does not mention Bill C-22.

Perhaps the mistake we made was in believing the Leader of the Opposition when he said that the Liberal Party recognizes that the will of this House should prevail and that Bill C-22 should pass. On October 3 we had that commitment from the Leader of the Opposition. We had an indication from the New Democratic Party that, in fact, Bill C-22 was going to pass.

Is the Hon. Member saying that we made a mistake in taking the word of his Leader in accepting his statement in the House?

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I asked the Minister whether he was denying the statements he made. If he made those statements, isn't he saying that he and his Government were not straight with Canadians? Isn't it a fact that this Government has been caught red handed in not telling the truth to the Canadian people? Isn't the Government admitting that higher drug prices for Canadians are only one part of the much greater price that Canadians will have to pay for this harmful, damaging, wrong free trade agreement with the United States? Tell the truth.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the question is whether the Leader of the Opposition was telling the truth when he said that the will of the House of Commons will prevail on Bill C-22. The House of Commons has twice said that it is committed to Bill C-22. The Hon. Member is suggesting it is shocking to say publicly that the Government is committed to Bill C-22 when we could not have been more obvious about our commitment over the last 16 months.

We thought that the Leader of the Opposition was telling the truth when he said that the Liberal Party acknowledges the right of the House of Commons to have its will prevail. The House of Commons said that Bill C-22 should be passed. When will the Liberal Party live up to its part of the bargain?

GOVERNMENT STATEMENTS

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same Minister. What the people of Canada want to know is why the Government lied in Parliament, why it lied to the people of Canada when it claimed not once—

An Hon. Member: Here she goes again.

Mr. Speaker: It probably could be argued that the Hon. Member has stayed very closely on the fine line of trespassing because her accusation is toward the Government in general. However, I would ask her to be careful and not go too far.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada want to know why on repeated occasions in this House the Government said, in the other place, on television, through the media to the people of Canada, that the drug bill was not part of the free trade arrangement when, quite clearly, on October 3 it signed a secret hidden agenda which showed that, indeed, it was part and parcel of the sell-out to the Americans.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have said repeatedly that Bill C-22 was not part of the trade negotiations.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An Hon. Member: Say it again.

Mr. Andre: I wonder whether the Opposition will allow me to answer the question. I did not heckle or barrack while the question was being asked.

Repeatedly, every spokesman of the Government talking about Bill C-22 has said that it was not part of the trade agreement, because that is the truth.

October 3, I remind the Hon. Member, is after the House of Commons had passed this Bill several times and after her own Leader said that the "will of the House of Commons will prevail. That is the position of the Liberal Party." It was after the New Democratic Party said that it recognized the Senate must pass the Bill. After all of that happened, we thought we could believe what her Leader was saying. Therefore, it is hardly shocking or surprising that one would say, yes, the Government is committed to passing Bill C-22, in writing or orally. That has been our obvious position for 16 months. It is not part of the trade agreement.

I ask the Member to read again the agreement that was initialled by both sides. She will not see in there Bill C-22 because it is not part of the agreement.

UNITED STATES TRADE OFFICE DOCUMENT

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I will take the word, frankly, of the office of the U.S. trade representative—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Ms. Copps: —who states quite clearly as part of the agreement—Frankly, how can we believe the Government? I would rather believe this document which states:

> The two sides agreed—to make progress towards establishing adequate and defective protection of pharmaceuticals in Canada by liberalizing compulsory licensing provisions.

Quite clearly, the Americans see it as part of the agreement.

• (1130)

I want to ask the Minister again, how can he stand here in the House and not be red-faced when the people of Canada cannot believe a word that comes from his mouth, from the mouth of the Minister for International Trade, or even from the mouth of the Prime Minister? You are an embarrassment to Canada.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will avoid the temptation of getting into a discussion about who is an embarrassment to whom about what.

The Government of Canada is committed to Bill C-22. We have been on record on that. The previous Liberal Government, the one she supports, was committed to changing the Patent Act as shown in this White Paper. More than that, we are committed to getting this Bill passed to increase research and development and have Canadian scientists work. We made that commitment to the Canadian Association of Retired Persons, the Canadian Medical Association, the National Biological Association and in fact to some 60 odd health organizations that are looking for this legislation.

I do not understand the mental processes someone would have to go through to say how shocking it is that on October 3, 1987, 16 months after this Bill was introduced, the Government admits it is committed to Bill C-22. Of course we are committed to Bill C-22, and so is every other thinking Canadian.

SIGNATURE ON DOCUMENT

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. As he will agree, while Canadians may understand that there are important differences between political Parties, they ought to be able to have faith in the integrity of all the Parties and particularly, given time, in the integrity of the Government.

The Minister has just said in an answer that the document of October 3 was a document of October 3 but the Bill was passed in this House well before that. I do not know if he admitted the signature. The question about integrity goes back to the fact that I have, not once but 10 times, received denials from Ministers that there was any connection between the free trade talks and this Bill, including denials made well before the Bill was passed.

Since it is claimed that there is a Canadian signature on the document, initialled by Canadians on October 3, saying as part of the agreement then as signed, that there was a linkage between the adoption of Bill C-22 and free trade, will the Deputy Prime Minister tell us whether there was or was not a Canadian signature on that document?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has pointed out on several occasions, as have other members of the Government, we have proceeded with Bill C-22 because we believe it to be in the national interest. It is good for job creation, it is good for research and development and for the creation of new jobs, and it is good for Canada and the regions. The Hon. Leader of the NDP asks what sort of documents have been signed. On Monday we tabled the documentation that was initialled, and what you see is what you get.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, that is the precise problem with this Government. What you see is what you get and what you see is dishonesty day after day in this Government. That is what you see. I want to say to the Minister that integrity is in the national interest of Canada too, and it is time he learned that.

SIGNING OF DOCUMENT ON OCTOBER 3

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, since the Minister has refused to answer the question and the other Minister has refused to answer it, will he now be front and centre and honest with the people of Canada? Did they or did they not sign that document on October 3?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I do not need a lecture from the Hon. Leader of the NDP.

Mr. Broadbent: You need it from the people of Canada, that is what you need.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: You arrogant sleaze bag.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Sometimes it is wise that the Chair does not hear something and sometimes the Chair does not quite hear something, but I want to say to Hon. Members that I think something was said that offended others. I did not hear it, but I would ask Hon. Members to restrain themselves.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party insists on giving the House of Commons a lecture on honesty. I must say in all sincerity and in all deference to him that I am not sure that he has a monopoly on honesty. I think he is really implying that everyone else in the House is dishonest except him.

Of course I have confidence in the Canadian people and I believe in the principles of democracy. I have been here in the House as long as the Hon. Member has, and I do not have to take any pointers from him about integrity or honesty.

I answered the question. What was agreed to in terms of the Canada-U.S. bilateral trade arrangement was tabled in this House. The documents were tabled in their raw form and they were initialled and that is what was signed.

[Translation]

QUERY IF CANADIAN SIGNATURE IS ON DOCUMENT

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): My last question is addressed to the Minister. I have not one but ten examples of ministers who in the past have denied that there was any connection between the Bill and the Free Trade Agreement. Once again, my question is quite simple. Is there a Canadian signature on this document, yes or no? That is the question.

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how we can be any clearer. We have said repeatedly—

Mr. Broadbent: Did you sign it? Is there a signature or not?

Mr. Andre: I do not know how we can be any clearer. He is right, I have said repeatedly every time I was asked that there was no connection between Bill C-22 and the trade talks. The Minister for International Trade has said that. Almost every spokesman for our Party has said that because that is the truth. Now the Hon. Member—

Mr. Broadbent: Did you sign it?

Mr. Andre: The Hon. Member talks about a signature. The Deputy Prime Minister has just said twice very clearly that the only thing signed by way of an agreement between the United States was the document tabled. Go read it. There is nothing there on Bill C-22.

We have said repeatedly that Bill C-22 was introduced because it is in Canada's interests, something the previous Government agreed with, something that all the health professionals in the country agree with, something that the research community agrees with. Why is the Hon. Member taking this position which he knows is not parliamentary to continue to refuse an absolute statement on our side that we made repeatedly? If he wants to charge us with misleading the House, let him do that and take the consequences.

EXISTENCE OF DOCUMENT—INCLUSION OF REFERENCE TO BILL C-22

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. I say to the Deputy Prime Minister that what is particularly frustrating to Members of the House of Commons, indeed to the people of Canada, is not just that the Government has misled the country over the last six months on Bill C-22, but that when confronted with the facts it continues to deny the truth.

The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs admitted in questions earlier today that what was contained in the document signed on the night of October 3 was changed and that there was no reference to Bill C-22 by the time the public document was issued on October 4. I ask the Deputy Prime Minister a very straightforward question. Is he denying the existence of a document on October 3 with both the signatures of Canada and the United States in which can be found a commitment by Canada as part of the free trade pact to pass Bill C-22? Is he denying that?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I do not know of such a document to which the Hon. Member refers.

Mr. Tobin: Are you denying it? You do not know?

Mr. Mazankowski: Of course, I have told the Hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party that what has been signed in terms of the arrangement between the two countries is that which was tabled in the House of Commons and initialled. Just because the Hon. Member does not like the honest answers that are given, it should not give him a licence to suggest that everything that comes from this side of the House is dishonest. It reflects the frustration of members of the Liberal Party in trying to deal with C-22 because they are caught in a bind. They know certain members of their Party want the Bill and others do not.

• (1140)

Why do they not get on with the job of convincing their friends in the Senate to pass this Bill? It is good for Canada. It is good for research and development. It is good for job creation and for the medical welfare of Canadians.

Mr. Tobin: Even the youngest child, when caught with his hand in the cookie jar, has the good sense to admit that his fist is full of cookies. The Government has not learned that lesson.

REQUEST FOR PROVISION OF DOCUMENT SIGNED ON OCTOBER 3

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, on October 7, four days after the infamous October 3 meeting and document, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, appearing on CTV's Question Period, said with respect to C-22 and the free trade pact:

> They have nothing to do with the trade negotiations and I can state categorically that any action we might be taking is a separate matter.

Nothing to do with the free trade negotiations.

Miss MacDonald: Exactly.

Mr. Mazankowski: You finally got it.

Mr. Tobin: Will the Minister undertake to provide before the end of Question Period, and there are 20 minutes left, this House with a copy of the initial document signed on October 3 so Members of this House and other Canadians can see with their own eyes that indeed the Government of Canada introduced C-22 as part of the free trade pact and Canadians are expected to pay higher drug costs as part of the price of a free trade agreement? Will he do that, or is he going to hide the document because he is afraid of the truth?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the Hon. Member was in the House on Monday when the documents were tabled. I invite him—

Mr. Tobin: The October 3 document.

Mr. Mazankowski: I would invite—

Ms. Copps: The secret agenda.

Mr. Ellis: You can't talk to wooden heads.

Mr. Speaker: The Deputy Prime Minister.

Mr. Mazankowski: I do not have to wait until the end of Question Period to answer that question. I invite the Hon. Member—

Mr. Tobin: The document.

Mr. Mazankowski: If the Hon. Member does not want to listen to my answer then I will just sit down.

REFERENCE TO BILL C-22

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, I will try again with the mendacious Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss MacDonald: Enough of this, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member and others know that in this place that perhaps the most fundamental of any accusation considered unparliamentary is the suggestion or accusation that an Hon. Member is a liar. However erudite the words may be, they still carry the same unfortunate message. I think Hon. Members are prepared to concede that the Hon. Member is erudite and he will know that he has strayed, no matter how elegantly, beyond the line. I know he will want to correct that and put his question.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, in view of what you said I would not have thought the Minister would have noticed.

Some Hon. Members: Come on!

Mr. McCurdy: I will put the question.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Speak to your seat-mate about doing the honourable thing.

Mr. Speaker: I can say to the Hon. Member for Windsor—Walkerville that the Chair was remarking on his own erudition, not the lack of erudition of any other Member. The Hon. Member will put his question—

Some Hon. Members: Withdraw!

Mr. Speaker: —and perhaps make it clear for the record that the word "mendacious" has been dropped from the preamble.

Mr. McCurdy: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I agree with that. "Mendacious" has been withdrawn.

My question is simply this. Earlier he was bragging—

Some Hon. Members: Question!

Mr. McCurdy: —about the inclusion, certainly not denying it, of an undertaking in the October 3 document with respect to Bill C-22. Is it not true that it was at one stage included in the agreement? Is it also not true that it was removed because of the embarrassment it would have caused the Government in view of its repeated statements to the contrary?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, what I know is that what Canada is committed to has been tabled in this House and is there for the Hon. Member to read. With his erudition I am sure he can handle all the words in there. I do not think he will be able to find the words for which he and others search desperately.

As to the statements made by myself and others regarding C-22 over the last 16 months this Bill has been debated while Canadian scientists wait for us to pass it so they can get to work, those statements were true then and they are true now. This Bill was introduced because it is in Canada's interest. It is supported by the Juvenile Diabetes Foundation, the Canadian Infectious Diseases Society, Canadians for Health Research, and virtually everyone in the health field. It is not introduced as part of any trade deal. It is not conditional on any trade deal. I was assured constantly of this by the Minister for International Trade and the chief negotiator. The last time I asked him was in August when specious accusations came up again. "Simon, has it ever been raised at the table?" He said no.

The fact of the matter is the statements made then and now are the truth and I strenuously object to the NDP accusing me of lying, no matter how erudite the language might be.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The Chair has to observe that the Hon. Member for Windsor—Walkerville has made it quite clear that he has withdrawn a word which the Chair felt was not appropriate.

Mr. Holtmann: It took him long enough.

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the Hon. Member to put his supplementary perhaps on the principle that when a word is withdrawn that closes the incident and we can proceed.

AMERICAN PRESSURE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, American spokesmen clearly articulated the pressure they were exerting on Canada over the Patent Act. In view of the repeated denials of that, and that C-22 was included in the October 3 document, is it not true that the inevitable conclusion to be reached by this House and the Canadian people is that there was a clear effort on the part of the Government to mislead?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, again the Hon. Member makes a false statement. He says that we denied there was any pressure from the U.S. There has never been any denial. We have been under pressure from the U.S., Great Britain, France, Germany and Switzerland since 1969 to get our patent laws in step with the rest of the world. There has been no denial of that fact whatsoever.

The Hon. Member then makes the illogical jump and says since they have been pressuring us since 1969, and since the Government brought in the Bill, therefore it has been part of the trade negotiations for the last 14 or 15 months. I make the declarative statement that it has not. My colleagues have done the same.

There is also a tradition in the House that when a statement made it is accepted as truth and those who challenge it ought to provide evidence that it was false.

WESTERN GRAIN STABILIZATION ACT

EXTENSION OF COVERAGE

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds and pertains to the western grain stabilization plan. He will know that some 10 per cent to 15 per cent of western producers remain outside the plan. There may be some apprehension on their part about joining in view of the size of the plan's deficit.

Can the Minister tell this House about any plans for an increase in levies for this crop year under the plan, and whether he plans to make any changes in the conditions of entry into the plan in order to accommodate those producers who remain outside?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, the Western Grain Stabilization Act has been a very helpful plan to grain and oilseed producers in this time of very low prices. We are considering amending the Act to make it easier for people who are not now part of the plan to participate. We are also considering increasing the levy to make the fund closer to being actuarily sound. We are also doing some other things which will make it more beneficial to producers.

• (1150)

I should also say that we are doing our calculations on the final payment for the previous crop year. It looks as though we will have a record amount of money available to producers for a final payment. That is good news which will be welcomed by producers when they see the size of the final payment.

Oral Questions

BILL C-22—CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have another question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The whole point of his answers to my questions at the beginning of Question Period was to construct a case for why it was perfectly acceptable and logical that Bill C-22 be included in a clause in the document which was signed October 3. He said, in effect, "Why shouldn't it be in the document? After all, the Bill was passed. We expect everybody to stick with it". That was the whole point of his reply to me.

Why, 20 minutes later, were both the Deputy Prime Minister and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs turning 180 degrees trying to say that there was no document signed October 3 which contained a clause in which the Government committed to pass Bill C-22 when, in his original answers to me, his whole case was based on trying to demonstrate that it was perfectly acceptable for that Bill to be included? Why the contradiction? Why the lack of a consistent story over the course of 15 or 20 minutes?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, with regard to any trade deal between Canada and the United States—

Mr. Tobin: "Oh, what a tangled web we weave, When first we practise to deceive!"

Mr. Andre: There is the Hon. Member for Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe again. Apparently his ears do not work unless his mouth is moving.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nunziata: Is that original?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps if the Hon. Member for Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe would restrain himself the Hon. Minister could refrain from bringing the Hon. Member into the discussion. The Hon. Minister will answer the question.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I and my colleague, the Deputy Prime Minister, have been saying that the commitments which Canada has made with regard to the trade pact with the U.S. are in the document which was signed by both parties and tabled. There are no other commitments with respect to Bill C-22 of which I am aware. I have told this House repeatedly over the last 16 months that it was not part of the negotiations.

If in fact sometime on October 3 someone somewhere said that Canada is committed to passing Bill C-22, why the outrage? We could not have been more clear about that for the last 16 months if we had tried. Of course we are committed to passing Bill C-22. The question is whether it is part of the pact. The answer is no. Look at the document. It is not part of the pact. As to whether we are committed, of course we are, and I thought his Leader was as well.

MINISTER'S POSITION

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I will ask the Minister again whether he was not replying to a question I asked about an October 3 document and making the case—not very persuasively, but making it all the same—that it was perfectly acceptable and understandable to have a clause on Bill C-22 in that document because the Government expected that the Bill would pass.

Why is the Minister making this contradiction? Will he not check Hansard and then stand up and admit to what he was saying at the beginning? It would not help the Government all that much, but it would help it just a little to appear straightforward in the eyes of Canadians.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how much more straightforward we could be. I repeat that after August 26 the Government was certainly committed to passing Bill C-22. We had the commitment of the Hon. Member's Leader that it be passed. The members of the NDP had said that they thought the Senate should pass the Bill. I thought that was sufficient for us to be able to say to the world, if necessary, that the Government is committed and that Bill C-22 will become law.

I know of no trade document that has been signed other than that which has been tabled in the House. That is what we are committed to.

Mr. Tobin: Give us the document of October 3.

Mr. Andre: We are also committed to Bill C-22. I do not understand why the Opposition can say that it has now discovered the scandal that the Government is committed to Bill C-22. We certainly have not been trying to hide that fact.

REPORTED INITIALLING OF OCTOBER 3 DOCUMENT

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. There is one question which has not been answered in the House yet. The Americans have said that the October 3 document which links Bill C-22 to the free trade talks was initialled by both countries. Will the Deputy Prime Minister say yes or no as to whether our trade representative initialled or signed the October 3 document? Yes or no?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, that which has been initialled has been tabled with the House of Commons and constitutes the agreement which we are trying to pursue.

It is quite obvious what the tactics of the Opposition are. They are trying to obfuscate the good news which has occurred today, that is, a further decline in the unemployment rate in Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: That is a testimony to the economic policies of the Government. For example, in the Province of Newfoundland since the Government was elected unemployment has dropped by 6.3 per cent.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: In Ontario it has dropped by 3.6 per cent, in New Brunswick by 3.3 per cent, and in British Columbia by 3.7 per cent. These fellows across the way do not like good news.

EXISTENCE OF DOCUMENT

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister has refused to answer my question as to whether we initialled or signed that document. The people of Canada want to know now—

Some Hon. Members: What document?

Mr. Nystrom: The October 3 document. Either the Americans are misleading the people of this country or the Government is deliberately misleading the people of the country.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister now get up in the House and deny the existence of the October 3 document which the Americans say was initialled by Canada? Can he get up and deny that in this House?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I regret that the New Democratic Party does not like the truth and does not like the answers. The Member's contention is absolutely false. I have answered the question with clarity—

Mr. Broadbent: You have not. You haven't answered it.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the New Democratic Party says I have not answered the question. I have stood here and answered every question and my answers have been supplemented by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Mr. Broadbent: Does it exist?

Mr. Mazankowski: Just because the Leader of the New Democratic Party does not like the answer he falls into that shameful—

Mr. Nystrom: Answer it.

Mr. Broadbent: Yes or no?

Mr. Mazankowski: —sump hole of calling it dishonest.

INQUIRY WHETHER BILL C-22 WAS INCLUDED IN DOCUMENT SIGNED ON OCTOBER 3

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, in the eight years I have been sitting in this House, I never saw a Minister change his version of the facts within 20 minutes. This is the first time I see a Minister get mixed up in his own lies. I would like to ask the Minister of Consumer—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member will put his question. The observations about what he has seen or not seen over a number of years are interesting, I suppose, but the Chair has been here for many years and has seen many things. The Hon. Member will put his question.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: If you prefer, Mr. Speaker, I can say that the Minister has gotten mixed up in the two versions of the truth he has given, one early in the question period and the other later. What I want to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is this: Was approval of Bill C-22 mentioned in the document signed on October 3? Was what he defended early on in the question period included in that initialed document? Is the legislative program of this Parliament being managed by the Americans or not?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not know who is running the legislative agenda of the House.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cassidy: Nor do we.

• (1200)

Mr. Andre: At least of this Parliament, Mr. Speaker. We have the assurances of the Leader of the Opposition that the will of the House of Commons will prevail, yet we have threats from his caucus colleagues in the other place that they will defeat the Bill.

I do not know how I could be any clearer than the statements I have given before. The pact that was initialled between Canada and the United States is on the table. It does not mention Bill C-22. Bill C-22 was not part of the trade negotiations.

The opening questions by the Member's House Leader referred to the fact that on October 3 apparently people were discussing Bill C-22 and somebody on behalf of the Government might have indicated that in fact this Government is committed to passing Bill C-22.

Mr. Lapierre: Initialled it.

Mr. Andre: And initialled it. You mean someone actually initialled a piece of paper saying that this Government is committed to Bill C-22? Horrors, they have put on paper that which we have been saying publicly as loud as we can for 16 months. What a scandal!

INQUIRY IF UNMENTIONED DOCUMENTS EXIST THAT WOULD COMMIT CANADIANS

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, the Minister has now admitted that there might exist a document with a hidden agenda. What I want to ask the Minister, or rather the Deputy Prime Minister, who was aware of nothing at all at the beginning of the question period, is that he find out the truth of the matter. Apart from the initialed document, could there also be letters containing commitments, for instance, to abolish management agencies such as the Canadian Dairy Commission? Could there be other cosy deals which have not been put on the table, but which commit Canadians to certain things? Have you kept other matters hidden from Canadians? Tell us!

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, surely in a negotiation and transaction of a bilateral arrangement of this magnitude there were a series of exchanges of information, telephone calls, exchanges of memos and perhaps even letters. There is nothing unreasonable about that. Surely that is part and parcel of the negotiating process.

What we are debating here is very clear. It is a bilateral trading arrangement that has been agreed to in principle by the two countries, has been initialled and has been tabled and deposited with the Clerk of the House of Commons for everyone to see.

Mr. Speaker: I will recognize two more Members; the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Birds Hill, followed by the Hon. Member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys.

FISHERIES

CANADA-FRANCE DISPUTE—WITHDRAWAL OF FRANCE FROM TALKS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, apparently France has walked out of the talks which have been going on between Canada and France with respect to fish. Will the Deputy Prime Minister tell us what the Government proposes to do about the continuous overfishing in Canadian waters by France?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I was informed of that decision just prior to Question Period. We regret very much that France has seen fit to take this action.

Canada stands ready and willing to re-enter negotiations at any time. We stand by our stated principles and objectives with respect to conservation and preserving those fish stocks. We particularly stand by the principle of ensuring that any negotiated settlement is in the best interests of the Atlantic fishermen.

OBSERVANCE OF FISHING QUOTAS

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Now that the talks have broken off, does the Prime Minister have any reason to believe that the French will abide by the quotas that have been stipulated by the Government? Will this be a licence for France to overfish in the meantime? What will the Government do to assure fishermen in Atlantic Canada that the French will not overfish and the Government will stand behind the fishermen?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Hon. Member would appreciate the fact that we have not received a full report from our negotiator. I was just apprised of this prior to Question Period. I can assure him that our position remains clear. It is certainly our desire to see a significant decline in the fishing in that zone known as 3PS. Clearly the statements and objectives of the Government remain the same with regard to the principles of conservation of adequate fish stocks. While we still prefer the negotiated settlement route by far, the ultimate and main interest is to ensure that the welfare of Atlantic fishermen will be first and foremost on our minds.

POINTS OF ORDER

MEMBER'S STATEMENT DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, during Question Period I referred to a comment made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) as having been made on October 7, 1987, on CTV's program Question Period. In fact, the date of the Question Period program in question was August 27. I want to correct the record.

MEMBER'S STATEMENT UNDER S. O. 21

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, I also rise on a point of order with respect to correcting the record. In a statement that I made before Question Period today, I referred to the election in which the Prime Minister did not let on to the Canadian people that he would seek a free trade agreement. That was in 1984, not 1974. However, the same thing applies.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, now that a member of the Official Opposition and a member of the New Democratic Party have paved the way, perhaps government Ministers could rise en masse to correct the record after Question Period.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair is always mindful of the helpful suggestions of Members. However, I think we will proceed.

PETITIONS

CANADA POST—OPPOSITION TO CORPORATE PLAN

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from Canadians across the country who indicate that whereas the federal Government proposal to seek financial self-sufficiency by 1988 for the Canada Post Corporation will result in cut-backs, deterioration in service of the Post Office and consequently will be at the expense of service to Canadian consumers; and whereas the proposed measures have already resulted in the closure of many rural Post Offices and the cancellation of rural routes which means drastic reduction in service for many Canadians; and whereas postal rate increases affect all Canadians while basic services are not improved, the federal Government has not enabled Canada Post Corporation to pursue revenue-generating services.

Therefore, the undersigned petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to instruct the Government to make improved service the highest priority of Canada Post Corporation and instruct the Government to abandon this policy of closing rural Post Offices and cancelling rural routes.

CONSTITUTIONAL ACCORD—UNANIMITY CLAUSE AND ABORIGINAL RIGHTS

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present petitions from residents of the Yukon Territory who wish to take the opportunity to express their concern that they were not consulted and were not a signatory to the Meech Lake Accord. Therefore, they request the Government to withdraw the unanimous consent for the admission of new provinces and to ensure specific guarantees that future aboriginal rights conferences will take place.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of State and Minister of State (Treasury Board)): Mr. Speaker, Question No. 186 will be answered today.

GENERAL EXCHANGES AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND U.S.S.R.

Question No. 186—Mr. Friesen:

In the General Exchanges Agreement between Canada and the Union of the Soviet Socialist Republic signed on October 20, 1971, which of the Articles numbered 1 to 20 inclusive, are presently in force?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): All articles of the General Exchanges Agreement between Canada and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republic have been in force since its signature.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I ask that all remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

POINT OF ORDER

ALLEGED USE OF UNPARLIAMENTARY LANGUAGE

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, during Question Period today several Members on this side of the House distinctly heard the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) calling the Leader of the New Democratic Party a sleazebag. I would like Your Honour to review the "blues" when they are available and to determine whether or not the word is unparliamentary.

If so, I would ask Your Honour to have the Minister of Justice withdraw unequivocally that term.

Mr. Speaker: In responding to the Hon. Member for York South—Weston (Mr. Nunziata), I indicated part way through Question Period that while I had not heard what was said I knew something had been said which offended some Hon. Members.

I will check the "blues" and I will report back to the Chamber.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

POSTAL SERVICES CONTINUATION ACT, 1987

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Cadieux that Bill C-86, an Act to provide for the resumption and continuation of postal services, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): When I had to interrupt my remarks because the Oral Question Period was to begin at 11 a.m., Mr. Speaker, I was emphasizing some points in Bill C-86 and I was far from congratulating the Government for the substance of this piece of legislation.

One of the points I was about to make was that some provisions of this Bill are exceptionally harsh. Under these provisions, no individual who is convicted of an offence under the Act,—someone for instance who would oppose the continuation of the postal services—an offence that was committed while the individual was acting in the capacity of an officer or representative of the employer or the union shall be reinstated for a period of five years. Mr. Speaker, I feel that it is an excessive penalty.

There are already in this Bill very high fines for which the postal union, the Canada Post Corporation or even individuals could be liable, but this clause which would prevent an officer of the union or of Canada Post from getting his job back for a period of five years is excessive. I do not think that this clause is consistent with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. And I direct this question to the Government: Has the Government really done its work and obtained appropriate legal opinion to know for sure that this excessive penalty is consistent with the Charter of Rights?

[English]

I am afraid that the 5-year off-the-job penalty which would apply to either a senior officer of Canada Post or a senior officer of the union may contravene the Charter of Rights. I want an answer from the Government on whether this has been checked, because I do not see a person not being able to do his or her job for a period of five years.

If an officer of Canada Post is not able to come back and work in his position for five years, where else will that person be able to work? It is a monopoly. There are no other post offices run in the country by the private sector. It is an extravagant penalty, and I want answers on whether or not it violates the Charter of Rights.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that this Government, by introducing this back to work legislation, destroys our collective bargaining tradition. It simply wants to break the Canadian Union of Postal Workers in order to look tough with unions. It sees this as a means to score political points and halt its constant slipping in opinion polls.

Mr. Speaker, we shall not be party to a scheme whereby postal workers are held to ransom.

[English]

No legislation was needed to appoint the mediator who will be appointed under the provisions of this legislation. We have been calling for a mediator for over a week and the Government refused. What the Government should do now is what it should have done over a week ago, that is, appoint a mediator without the need for this legislation. The legislation should be put aside. It should be shelved. A mediator should be appointed in a climate without a sword of Damocles over both Canada Post and the union, so that the mediator can mediate in a reasonable way and with reasonable chances of success.

In conclusion, I have asked myself the following questions, and I should ask them of the Government. What has happened to democracy in the workplace? What is wrong with democracy in the workplace? What is wrong with the regular, bona fide negotiations which produced good results in the last letter carriers' strike in the month of June? How come the Government suddenly decided that what did work in the postal strike a few weeks ago will not work now?

These are the questions we are asking ourselves, and these are the questions we are asking the Government. These are the questions to which we want answers before we will support this piece of legislation.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, as I listened to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Cadieux) start the debate today, he implied that the legislation was similar to, if not the same as, the legislation introduced in August to order back the people who work on the railways. In fact, this legislation is significantly different. I believe that the Minister is deliberately trying to downplay or deny the aspects of this legislation. The legislation is so completely different that we must wonder why that is so and why the Minister is implying that it is not different.

Also, as I listened to his speech, I was asked by one of my colleagues whether he was still the Minister of Labour or the Minister responsible for Canada Post. That is a significant question, because the speech was a management speech and the legislation is management legislation. There was absolutely no concern, no sympathy, no understanding of the employees affected by the piece of legislation.

Throughout the last number of months we listened to the Minister of Labour and he sounded more and more like the Minister responsible for Canada Post.

A decision of the Canada Labour Relations Board indicated that Canada Post was intimidating its workers and forcing them to do work which was normally done by employees on strike, and that it went against the Canada Labour Code. We asked the Minister to make a statement that that situation would no longer be tolerated, and he refused to do so. He said that the decision of the Canada Labour Relations Board with regard to two unionized workers in Halifax was enough.

I pointed out to him that I had talked with non-unionized employees who wanted some assurance from the Minister of Labour that Canada Post would follow the dictates of the Canada Labour Code. I asked the Minister whether he would rise and say that the Canada Labour Code indicates that workers cannot be intimidated into doing work which is being done by people who are on strike. He did not do that.

It is an impossible situation when we have a Minister of Labour who will not defend the labour legislation that is on the books and that has been on the books for many years. Employees do not expect the Minister of Labour to take their position on each and every occasion. But when it is clear that the employer is not obeying the law of the land, the Minister of Labour has the responsibilities of the Minister of Labour. He has failed in those responsibilities.

He has failed throughout the postal dispute to differentiate between his role as the Minister of Labour and his role as a member of Cabinet. This Cabinet has been Canada Post, one step removed. The answers we have had from the Minister responsible for Canada Post have been the answers of the management of Canada Post. It has been this Government which has refused to let the item that has caused the strike, the issue of franchising out those jobs, be negotiated.

Time after time when we have asked questions of the Minister responsible for Canada Post he has taken the position that this is a management issue. It is not a management issue. It is the issue which caused the strike. It is the issue of those people who are working in the wickets right across the country who want to maintain those jobs saying, "Look, we want to negotiate that point. We want to be in a position to try to secure the jobs that we have at the present time". That is a very legitimate reason for negotiating. To have the Minister responsible for Canada Post get up time after time and say that that is management's right, that that should not be negotiated, that it cannot be negotiated, meant that this strike was going to happen.

It is fine for the Government to say, "Well, the Foisy report basically supported management and therefore the union is wrong". That is not true. Unfortunately, again, one of the very aspects of this legislation that upsets us is that if the mediation does not work then the arbitrator, who is the same person, is instructed to look at the Foisy report. This is a report that is pro-management, a report that states that workers do not have the right to negotiate with management their present jobs. It is a report which obviously denies the whole idea of collective bargaining.

Someone else said that this is a conciliation officer who made the report and it is logical that the Government should say that the mediator or arbitrator should look at that report. If that is the case, why did the Government refuse to do that same thing in the case of the back-to-work legislation with regard to the railways? If one takes a look at Bill C-85, the legislation ordering the railway workers back to work, he will see that it does not tell the arbitrator to look at the conciliation report. Do you know why, Mr. Speaker? It is because the Government in that case did not like the conciliation report.

The unions said that it was the basis for negotiation. They said that there were items, not all of them, but a number of them in the conciliation report which made sense and which would help to resolve the items in dispute. We suggested to the same Minister of Labour that it may not be a bad idea to have a provision in the legislation that the conciliation report be referred directly to the arbitrator. But he would not do that. Now that there is a report that the Government likes, it is right in this legislation that the arbitrator must look at the Foisy report.

The Minister in his speech said that there has been a history of distrust between the employees at Canada Post, the unions involved, and the management. That is quite true. It has been a very difficult labour situation, historically. But what he is doing with this legislation is building up that distrust more and more. He is escalating the level of distrust.

For the first time ever the employees at Canada Post, the members of CUPW, have not had a general strike; they have not preached violence; they have had a rotating strike. They have encouraged their members not to be violent. They have done a very good job for the most part in making sure that that has been the case. They have allowed the mail to go through.

We even read in The Globe and Mail yesterday that this is not the time to order the postal workers back to work. I do not remember The Globe and Mail ever, historically, being a pro-labour, pro-union newspaper. It recognized in its editorial yesterday that this was not 1978. It recognized that this was not some old fight between Canada Post and the postal workers, that there was a different regime and that this was a regime in which CUPW was trying to negotiate items. Its members were having a rotating strike. They were not asking for more. They were not trying to get a rich contract but trying to preserve the jobs that those men, and mainly those women, have at the present time.

As I indicated earlier, these jobs are decent-paying jobs, jobs which are held mainly by women. These are jobs which will, as a result of the Government's plan and Canada Post's proposals, be going out to drug stores, Bible book stores and to other stores across the nation where we know that the people hired will receive minimum wages. Basically, they will be women in part-time jobs with almost no extra benefits, no pension plan. There will be nothing other than the basics required by the law.

I have to ask why the Government believes that in 1987 when we have been talking about affirmative action for so long, when we have been talking about the fact that women are so often ghettoized in their jobs and why we have been so concerned with the fact that part-time workers do not have benefits, security and any sort of pension plan that is worth talking about, that its plan for franchising-out is forcing the creation of another job ghetto in this country. It has been argued that we need more service to the public. Post offices can stay open longer. It is being said that we are better off if we can go to our local store rather than to a post office building.

But take a look at where the franchising-out will be. In my constituency in the City of Thompson there is one post office. They have decided to franchise-out to three other stores. The City of Thompson is only two miles square. One of the post offices that has been set up is across the street from the main post office.

I have had a constituent talk to me already about this new improved service. He received one of those call-back cards telling him he had to go to this new subpost office, the one where minimum wages are paid. He went down to pick up his registered mail, but it was closed for inventory. Fine, so he went back to his car, saw that the post office was across the street, got out of his car, because he did not have to drive anywhere. He was told, "I am sorry, your letter is over at the subpost office, that is where you have to pick it up". It is closed for inventory, he could not do that. He came back the next day, it was open, they had finished their inventory but the woman who looks after the post office wicket was out. She was not there. So, again, the man who has parked his car right in front of the post office, has to leave because he cannot get his registered mail. Twice he has had to leave work, go and get his mail but could not do so because of the privatization plan. That is not an increase in service. It might be an increase in profits for that little book store but it is not an increase in service to the public of Canada.

It is being done deliberately by the Government, knowing full well that it is ruining any chance of labour peace within the Post Office. It knows at the same time that it is forcing women to give up jobs that they have had, which they have had to work many years to get, those so-called preferable jobs at the wickets. Those jobs will now disappear.

The Government says they can take other jobs. It is quite willing to make sure no one is fired as a result of this situation. Yet as you take away those two wicket jobs in one town, three in another, four in the next, because they have all been sent out to sub post offices, those women will have to take evening jobs or jobs in other communities because there is no guarantee we will need more mail sorters in those small towns and cities. Yes, this will not cost anyone their jobs, but it will make it damn difficult for them to keep working. The Government knows that is true but is too blind to admit it.

This strike was provoked by the two Ministers sitting across from me. They are the cause and that is why we cannot expedite passage of this legislation. In other cases of such legislation, even though we have not liked it, even though we thought it was basically unfair, we have worked to see it passed in all stages in two or three days, sometimes even less. We did that because we believe the Government has the right to intervene at some point to re-establish essential services, if that be the case. Even though we have not liked the legislation, and quite often we have been morally offended by what was in it, we have co-operated. Yet today both opposition Parties got up and said that we are not co-operating because the Government is causing an unnecessary dispute. It is causing grief for families right across this country. It is taking jobs away from women, and it is all completely unnecessary.

I believe this is part of a political agenda by a Government which has to prove it can beat someone, somewhere, sometime. It needs this for its psychological make-up, and to keep its right-wing back-benchers happy. No one else really believes we have to take away those wicket jobs. No one else accepts the Government, through Canada Post, saying day after day that this cannot be negotiated. It does not matter that the union has conceded that in such situations these sub post offices can be set up. It does not matter that there has been a willingness to negotiate and recognize that this is going to happen to some degree. The unions recognize the role of management but they want the right to sit down with management and negotiate major items of contention. They are concerned with the security of the jobs of the people they represent. They are concerned with the right of people not to be forced to move to other centres because that is the only way they can work for Canada Post.

I anticipate that some government Members will eventually want to get up and say, well, things change with time. You cannot always live in the 18th century. That is not the issue here. We are not talking about new technology taking away jobs. We are talking about these jobs being done by private enterprise, not by public enterprise. We are talking about the jobs being done at less than decent wages. They cannot be done by women who want regular employment.

I cannot for the life of me understand, apart from its political paranoia, why the Government will not allow this item to be negotiated. Is it so important to the Minister responsible for Canada Post, the Minister of Labour, and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour that these positions be posted out and the jobs become part-time? Is it so important that they cannot negotiate? I cannot understand why they take that attitude.

I would like to get back to some of the other items in this legislation, which is not the same as the back-to-work legislation in the case of the railway workers. That is important because, as I said earlier, the Minister of Labour tried to impress the media with the fact that the legislation is basically the same. I have already pointed out the different way the conciliation report is being handled. Because the Government likes it, the arbitrator has to look at it. In the railway legislation the Government did not like the conciliation report so it was not referred to the arbitrator.

Then the Government says it sent in a mediator. People should not worry about that. Yes, the union called for a mediator. Yes, the two opposition Parties called for a mediator. Yet you look at the legislation and we have a mediator-arbitrator, the same person for both functions. That person will have to act as a mediator for two months and, if things do not work out, will have to switch hats and become an arbitrator. Talk about built-in failure.

The whole concept of a mediator, as anyone involved in collective bargaining knows, is that it is someone both sides can trust as an honest broker. It is someone sitting down in confidence and saying we are willing to move this way if the other side will move here. We will give if they do not take as much. This is a real problem and this is what has to be resolved. A mediator cannot fulfil that function if at the same time he acts as the arbitrator.

The role of an arbitrator is the opposite to that of a mediator. The arbitrator is to listen to formal presentations and then make a decision. Canada Post, the Government in disguise, and the workers through their union are not going to be able to work with that mediator the way they should be able to because, for political gimmickry, we have a mediator who becomes an arbitrator so the Government can go to the public and the media and say we were asked to provide a mediator, we were asked to let negotiations take place, and we have done that. It has not. It has sabotaged them. Not only that, it has increased the amount of distrust the workers have for the Government.

I ask the Minister, why not have a mediator who works for two months and then have someone else go in if the negotiations have not succeeded? Why not allow mediation to work? Why kill it in advance? I have heard so many speeches by the Minister saying it is always best to try and negotiate and that he is giving the two parties one more opportunity to solve the issue at the table before arbitration comes in.

Mr. Cassidy: That is when he was Minister of Labour.

Mr. Murphy: He even said it today when he was the Minister acting for Canada Post. This legislation does exactly the opposite. I negotiated for teachers in Thompson for years and I used mediators. I have gone before arbitrators, and I know the roles are distinctly different. I know that where we used mediators it was because we trusted them as honest brokers and were able to say certain things to them. I suspect management said things to them which made it possible to come to some sort of collective agreement. This legislation will not allow that. Again, this was not proposed in the case of the railway workers. They were given the opportunity to have a true mediator.

• (1240)

The Government said that because it had a fact finder, someone with a lot of experience, Mr. Kelly, it decided that there could not be a settlement. Unfortunately, because this back to work legislation was here and because neither the Minister of Labour nor the Minister responsible for Canada Post have shown any willingness to have the important issue of franchising-out and job security negotiated, the workers felt that they never had fair bargaining.

Canada Post always knew it had the government on its side, giving it direction not to negotiate the very items in contention. How can one say that mediation will work? How can one say that negotiations will work in that scenario? That is why we have called for an independent mediator, someone who is outside the Government service, not tied to the Minister of Labour or to the Minister responsible for Canada Post. If there is a truly independent mediator the issue of franchising and job security will be negotiated. Yet both parties, if the Government will allows, will be able to negotiate that very contentious item. That does not mean there will be an agreement for sure, but it means at least there is an opportunity to sit down and negotiate with the support and facilities a mediator provides.

Another area where this legislation does not reflect the back-to-work legislation used in the railway case, is the penalty clause area. Contained in the Bill are the usual clauses about financial penalties. We know that if someone does not pay the financial penalty he ends up going to jail. That requirement has been included in a lot of back-to-work legislation. However, the clause which says that employees, officials or elected people of the union who disobey the law are automatically barred from their job or elected position for the next five years is unjust. It was not put in the back-to-work legislation for the railway workers. At that time the Minister of Labour said that he did not believe it was a just clause. But now it is a just clause. That clause was used in the longshoreman's strike legislation but it was not used in the case of the railway workers, even though some railway workers were talking about not obeying the back-to-work legislation.

I agree with my Liberal colleague that this clause is against our Constitution. It will do away with the rights of workers to affiliate and to seek elected office. In a Cabinet that has had such legal problems, even if one or two former Ministers were convicted and went to jail or had to pay financial penalties, they still in spite of that retain the right to run for election.

The right that former Cabinet Ministers have to be re-elected is being denied to shop stewards. It is a very unusual, severe and unjust penalty, a penalty which the Minister did not think was necessary in the case of the railway workers.

There is always the question of credibility with the Government. I believe that that is the essence of the problem here. People believe that the Minister of Labour should be acting impartially. He should not be the management representative and he should not, after a certain level, be the representative of the workers. Decisions are supposed to be impartial, but I do not think that that has ever happened here when there have been disputes in the past at the Post Office. In a letter written on July 29, 1987 the P.M. said:

> We all recognize that labour relations at Canada Post have had a turbulent history. A long-term solution to these problems can only be worked out by the corporation and its unions through compromise and a willingness to work toward establishing a mature labour-management relationship. Government intervention has not been the solution to labour disputes in the past and is unlikely to be the panacea of the future.

When you get a letter like that from the Prime Minister you have to believe that he is advocating negotiations, advocating, to use his own word, compromise, and he is saying that the best solution is obviously not back-to-work legislation. The Government will not allow negotiations on the primary item, the issue of franchising out. That has been said time after time by Ministers of the Crown. The Government will not allow compromise and is forcing the situation where we have to have back-to-work legislation, something which the Prime Minister said is not a benefit and will not be a benefit in labour relations of Canada Post.

The situation involves a strike caused by Government, for unjust reasons, affecting families right across the country. Yet the Government expects us in the House to be a rubber stamp for its political agenda.

I was actually quite proud of the way in which the postal workers handled the strike. I was happy and very pleased to see how limited was the violence. I know it is not easy. I come from a town where they have actually built log cabins right on a provincial highway to discourage people from crossing a picket line. Unfortunately the people have taken shots at the helicopters and the union has had to stop them. I know how high emotions can run strong when strike breakers or scabs are brought in. I know how strong those emotions are and how difficult it is to try to keep a tight rein on that type of situation. For the most part we have seen success, but if there is any increase in violence now it will not be as a result of a change in strategy by the union, but as a result of unjust, unfair and unnecessary legislation being forced upon the employees by Government, which is management in this case. How can people feel that they are being treated fairly when their jobs are disappearing, when the Government will not negotiate the item about which they are concerned and when the Government uses its power to order people back to work by legislation that is much more harsh, restrictive and balanced in favour of management than has been other legislation introduced in this House to order people back to work?

If the union and its members know that the Government will use its legislative clout to deny them basic rights, of course violence will increase, even though we all deplore it. It also means that in the future it will be very hard to convince working men and women, not only at Canada Post but in other Crown corporations, that they will be treated fairly. It is a bad sign and a bad signal. It is an indication that when people are negotiating with Air Canada, the Canadian National Railways, or with the federal Government itself, they will not be treated fairly, that their concerns are not concerns that can be dealt with in negotiations because the Government will not allow it. If negotiations are not settled, even though they are not allowed to negotiate items important to them, the Government will in the end introduce legislation, wording it in such a way that it benefits the management side. That has obviously happened here. The penalty clauses are aimed not at management but at the employees.

• (1250)

The reference of the Foisy report is again one which management wanted and the Government wanted. Yet it was not done in the railway legislation when the union wanted the same thing. The request for an independent mediator, something that is allowed under Canadian law, something that the Minister of Labour is allowed to do, was not agreed to despite the fact that union asked for it, despite the fact that the two Opposition Parties asked for it, and despite the fact that a lot of groups in our society believed it was a good idea Because Canada Post did not believe it was a good idea, it was not done, and that is the truth.

This was and remains a strike caused by the Government. It is unjust for the House of Commons to pass this legislation, and it is certainly unjust for the House of Commons to pass it quickly. We will oppose this legislation. Later on, we will seek to amend the legislation.

As long as the Government refuses to change the legislation, and as long as the Government refuses to allow working men and women to negotiate for some semblance of job security, then we will have to oppose the legislation.

[Translation]

Mrs. Carole Jacques (Montreal—Mercier): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to make a few observations relating to Bill C-86, the Postal Services Continuation Act, 1987, and the developments which gave rise to the necessity for a legislated end to the current postal dispute. I want to say most emphatically to all Hon. Members present that I believe that this Bill should be supported for two very important reasons.

The first reason is that, in view of current developments in the dispute and the fact that the parties have failed to resolve their differences since their last agreement expired more than a year ago, the Goverment has little alternative but to restore full postal operations through legislative means. The second reason as to why I feel that the legislation should be supported lies in the merits of the method of dispute settlement provided for in the Bill now before us. The selection of mediation-arbitration as the dispute settlement mechanism is well suited to this particular dispute and I believe that it deserves the endorsement of all Hon. Members.

I think that it would be appropriate to review the background to the current dispute if only to provide some insight into the extensive third-party efforts which have been made over a lengthy period of time in an attempt to bring about a peaceful conclusion. The collective agreement between Canada Post Corporation and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers expired September 30, 1986, and conciliation efforts began one month later with the appointment of conciliation officer André Drouin of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service of Labour Canada. Mr. Drouin held meetings with union and management negotiators over a three-month period but there was little progress made in resolving any of the issues in dispute.

Mr. Claude Foisy was subsequently appointed as conciliation commissioner in the dispute on February 23, 1987, and numerous meetings were held between the commissioner and the parties over the period from March 2nd through August 12th. As we heard the Minister of Labour say earlier in this debate, Mr. Foisy is an experienced labour relations practitioner and a former Vice-Chairman of the Canada Labour Relations Board. Unfortunaly, the parties saw fit not to draw on the knowledge and abilities of the commissioner in achieving a settlement but rather to bury him in position papers and briefing notes. Discussions for the most part were limited to exchanges on principles and rarely came to grips with the specifics relating to the operative sections of the contract. Mr. Foisy went so far as to suggest that if the parties are not happy with the proposed wording of certain recommandations, then "they have only themselves to blame, having had over five months to give me their comments".

One can appreciate the frustration which the conciliation commissioner must have felt in attempting to elicit meaningful dialogue from the parties and instead being faced with two sides more intent on avoiding their responsibilities to make use of the collective bargaining process. The commissioner's report, a comprehensive document comprising some 82 pages, was released to the parties on September 22. Post-conciliation meetings were held between the parties, but again they involved more public posturing than actual bargaining. On September 29th, the Minister of Labour asked his Associate Deputy Minister, Bill Kelly, to meet with the parties to assess the chances of a negotiated settlement, either in direct negotiations or with the assistance of a mediator. By all accounts, this assessment was quite negative as to the prospects for a negotiated settlement short of a protracted work stoppage. In a telegram dated October 6, 1987, the Minister gave the parties one further opportunity to settle their differences. He warned them that whether a Bill would be introduced or not depended on their will and capacity to achieve resolution through the collective bargaining process. However, despite all of these opportunities, the differences between the positions of the parties on several major issues have made any hope of a near term settlement next to impossible.

Mr. Speaker, Hon. Members are only too well aware of the serious consequences which a work stoppage of this nature can have on canadian businesses which are dependent upon the postal service for their economic survival. The citizens of Canada do not deserve to be subjected to a second disruption of their mail sevice. With no hope of a negotiated settlement in sight, this Government has taken its responsibility to the Canadian people to restore full postal service, with provision for the settlement of the issues in dispute through mediation or arbitration.

Mr. Speaker, the Postal Services Continuation Act, 1987, provides for the immediate termination of the current work stoppage and a resumption of full postal operations. The legislation also extends the collective agreement for a period to be determined through arbitration of not less than two and not more than three years. Perhaps, most importantly, Mr. Speaker, is the fact that this legislation provides for the settlement of the parties' differences through the process of mediation-arbitration or "med-arb" as it is more commonly referred to in labour relations terminology.

I think that it is important that Hon. Members appreciate the rationale which the Minister of Labour has used in providing for the appointment of a mediator-arbitrator to deal with the resolution of the issues in dispute between Canada Post Corporation and CUPW. Basically, Mr. Speaker, what this piece of legislation provides is a last opportunity for the two sides to roll up their sleeves and get down to serious bargaining or face the prospect of having a third party make binding decisions which will dictate the details of any new collective agreement. I am sure that Hon. Members would agree that legislative solutions cannot possibly address all of the problems and frustrations which need to be worked out at the bargaining table. This is why it is imperative that the parties seize this opportunity to work with the mediator to arrive at a mutually acceptable agreement.

Under the med-arb procedure provided for in the legislation before us today, the two sides to the dispute, while party to an arbitration proceeding, still have the opportunity to carry out the negotiation process. The mediator-arbitrator combines the skills and functions of the mediator with an ultimate mandate to make a final and binding decision on all issues which cannot be mediated to resolution. The influence of the mediator-arbitrator on the outcome of negotiations is more than that of a conventional mediator because the parties are aware that, if they fail to reach agreement, the same person will be switching roles to that of arbitrator and rendering a binding decision.

The process of mediation-arbitration has been used on a limited basis in the federal jurisdiction before, and has proven its worth as one of the more promising alternatives which exist for the resolution of collective bargaining disputes. In this particular instance, we can only hope that it will prove effective in prompting Canada Post and CUPW into coming to grips with those issues which are preventing the achievement of a new collective agreement. In addition to having the opportunity to meet with the parties and gain a full appreciation for the issues and the distance separating them on specific items, the mediator-arbitrator appointed under this legislation will have the benefit of the extensive evaluation of he dispute already undertaken by conciliation commissioner Claude Foisy and fully documented in his report.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would reiterate my concern that this Bill, the Postal Services Continuation Act, 1987, receive prompt passage by Hon. Members so that the confrontation between Canada Post and CUPW can be terminated as soon as possible. Critics of back to work legislation often suggest that one of the more dangerous consequences of legislative intervention in the collective bargaining process is the potential which is created for disrespect of the rule of law. For any legislation to be respected, it must be perceived as just and fair. While a personally find the requirement to introduce this particular legislation to be unfortunate, I applaud the enlightened approach which the minister of labour has adopted in the Bill with regard to the dispute resolution mechanism. Not only does the proposed legislation provide the parties to the dispute with one last opportunity to resolve their differences themselves, but the appointment of a mediator-arbitrator requires the parties to approach the process in a constructive and responsible manner, to ensure full consideration of their respective contract proposals.

I urge all Hon. Members to support the Postal Services Continuation Act, 1987.

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Hon. Member for Montreal—Mercier who has just concluded her comments. At the end, she mentioned that the Bill provides harsh penalties for those who are guilty of offences under this Act. I would like to ask her a question about clause 11(2) which provides for additional punishment in the case of certain offences. This clause states that no individual who is convicted of an offence under the Act that was committed while the individual was acting in the capacity of an officer or representative of the employer shall be employed in any capacity by, or perform any work for, the employer at any time in the five years immediately after the date of the conviction.

Would the Hon. Member tell the House whether or not she finds such a penalty reasonable? Does she think it is reasonable to impose a further sentence to a Canada Post or a union officer already fined for having violated that legislation—because those five years are a further punishment, are they not? Is she not concerned that might go against the provisions of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms? Would she not have some concerns about that clause of the proposed legislation? Would she not be concerned about the future of a senior employee in Canada Post who could not be permitted to resume his job for a five years period? What will he do then to earn a living? He could not seek any equivalent job within any comparable organisation since Canada Posts holds a monopoly in Canada. What does she have to say about that? Is she in favor of that clause or would she rather have it amended or withdrawn?

• (1310)

Mrs. Jacques: Mr. Speaker, in answer to my colleague, I say that Clause 11 is not contrary to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Of course, if a person is guilty of an offence under the act, I find it reasonable and just to deny that person the right to go back to work, to do the same work, for five years. And I am not worried because, I do not think union leaders and representatives would have any difficulty finding another job in another sector, even if the Corporation is a monopoly as you said earlier. I think that to ensure compliance with this act and with the legislative arrangements a government will make, we must provide for this kind of penalty. If we do not, people will consider that act as frivolous and will not abide by it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Gatineau (Mrs. Mailly) for a question or comment.

Mrs. Mailly: Mr. Speaker, I wish, first of all, to congratulate my colleague who stated very well why she supports that Bill. I would like to ask her a question related to a comment made by the Hon. Member for Saint-Jacques (Mr. Guilbault) in his speech. Considering that he just asked her a question, I think it would be only fair if I could get some clarifications from her. He talked about the remarks made by our colleague, the Hon. Member for Richelieu (Mr. Plamondon), concerning the use of replacement workers during a strike. I would like her to answer my question about the Quebec legislation. There is a provincial statute which prohibits the use of replacement workers. This is why, in Quebec, people tend to think it is illegal to use replacement workers during a strike. However, if

I remember correctly, this is strictly a provincial statute which does not apply to installations under federal jurisdiction. What my colleage for Richelieu is objecting to is not the fact that is is illegal—it is not—but that there is a feeling, an impression in the population that it is illegal, which makes it difficult for the people who must support a law allowing the use of replacement workers.

Mrs. Jacques: Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer the question from my colleague the Hon. Member for Gatineau (Mrs. Mailly). Our collegue the Hon. Member for Richelieu (Mr. Plamondon) probably went picketing to show after all his support for the postal workers.

Of course, Canada has a legislation allowing for the use of replacement workers, the so-called scabs. However, Quebec laws do not allow the hiring of replacement workers. Considering that the present dispute is under federal jurisdiction, the federal law thus applies even in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Keeper) for question or comment.

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for my colleague.

One of the problems in the conflict between the union and Canada Post relates to the franchising out program, the privatization of post offices. My question is the following: What does she think of her Government policy concerning the franchising of post offices which results in salary reduction, particularly for women? For example, in rural areas, some women were ready to accept one fifth of their old salary to take charge of a post office. In urban areas, now people can have a good salary but after franchising, they will earn only minimum wage.

What does she think of that policy which makes women pay for the deficit of the Canada Post Corporation?

Mrs. Jacques: Mr. Speaker, I would answer to my hon. colleague from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Keeper) that the bill we would like to pass today does not deal with the issue of franchising of postal operations. Franchising is an issue that parties should settle during the negociations.

Besides, I simply do not think that franchising will affect women any more than men. And our Government would never let that happen. I do not feel that . . . I would like to have more background on the basis for your question but, as of this moment, I do not think that franchising affects women any more than men. I do not agree with what you said a moment ago.

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, I should like to tell my colleague that I do not doubt that she is sincere. However, does she know that with franchising in rural areas, postmasters' wages will be greatly reduced and that 80 per cent of the workers in those offices are women? The effect of that policy will be to reduce women's salaries and in a specific case of which I am aware, that is the case of Wilno in Ontario, the lady who is the postmistress is being asked to work for a fifth of her former salary. Such is the implication.

Mrs. Jacques: In answer to the supplementary question of my colleague from Winnipeg-North-Centre (Mr. Keeper) I should like to point out that the franchising policy, as you said, is part of the problems being negotiated.

However, this policy is not only aimed at women and will not only affect women's wages but could also affect men's wages. If according to your figures there is a higher percentage of women in rural areas—but the policy is not only aimed at women.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I shall allow a last question to the Hon. Member for Lac Saint-Jean (Mr. Côté).

Mr. Clément M. Côté (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, it is a fact that earlier the Hon. Member for Saint-Jacques (Mr. Guilbault) in a question addressed to the Hon. Member for Montreal—Mercier (Mrs. Jacques) referred to Section 11 of the Bill which deals with additional penalties. The clause refers to additional penalties for both the union and the employer.

If we look at the interpretation clause on page 1, we find that the terms union, employer and employee are clearly defined.

My colleague the Hon. Member for Saint-Jacques made allegations which are altogether wrong when she referred to the rights and freedoms of individual employees who would not be able to find work for five years, as though only the Canada Post Corporation existed. Clause 11(1) refers to the Union:

> No individual who is convicted of an offense under this Act that was committed while the individual was acting in the capacity of an officer or representative of the union shall be employed in any capacity by the union—

If we move down to Clause 11(2), we read the same thing:

> —while the individual was acting in the capacity of an officer or representative of the employer . . .

So, Mr. Speaker, Clause 11 does not mention any additional penalties for the employees.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard—Anjou): Mr. Speaker, speaking in the debate on Bill C-86 this afternoon, my colleage the Hon. Member for Montréal—Saint-Jacques (Mr. Guilbault) clearly described the situation and the dangers which may result from a government which is clearly seeking a confrontation with its employees and whose attitude is responsible for the current postal strike.

I would not want to repeat what he said, but I should like especially to address the following questions: Why is there a strike? How did we get there, Mr. Speaker? After a period of five years with no strike, how is it that we are now faced with a second strike in two months?

First, Mr. Speaker, we should go back a few years. Of course, we all remember and Canadians all remember that the 1960's were not easy years. We went through a period of changes, of automation, and of course at that time we experienced very extensive labour disputes that were very wearisome for everybody. And it was a Liberal Government in 1981 that established the Canada Post Corporation, with three specific mandates, Mr. Speaker—first, to improve employer-employee labour relations; second, to improve services; and third, to reduce the deficit.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, those three mandates have equal priority. There were not one, two or three that had to be met by steps. But the three mandates were an overall mandate for Canada Post Corporation to provide Canadians with better services, reduce its deficit rather than constantly digging into Government coffers, and third, of course, to enjoy labour relations that would allow the Corporation to provide good services.

But, in 1984, there was a changeover in government, Mr. Speaker. And this Government, with a legitimate mandate from the people, decided once again to conduct a study of Canada Post Corporation. Indeed, in June 1985, the former Minister in charge of Canada Post Corporation set up the Review Committee to consider the terms of reference and productivity of Canada Post Corporation, which was to be known as the Marchment Committee.

Here we are in the House today debating a Bill which does away with the right to strike and forces the union membership back to work, yet the issue is not higher wages but job security. Mr. Speaker, the whole matter revolves around the privatization of Canada Post. From the outset, Mr. Speaker, I should like to focus on the danger and the problem which even the Marchment Committee envisioned if the Government were to give serious consideration to the possibility of privatizing Canada Post.

In the report—page 23 in French, page 20 in English—the committee looked at two privatization avenues. The first one was to sell Canada Post lock, stock and barrel, so then the whole thing would have been in the private sector. The committee did consider whether or not this would be practical, and I should like to read a paragraph concerning this option, on page 20 of the report.

"There is, however, one difficulty which the Committee is convinced could not be overcome at this time. The Post Office's continuing history of annual losses makes it an unattractive candidate for sale in its entirety as a going concern. Even if it were given away, the newly established corporation with no history of prior earnings would find it virtually impossible to arrange adequate financing in the private money markets. To turn the Canada Post over to the private sector and then provide the new corporation with Government grants and guarantees would hardly satisfy the objective of reducing the real and potential drain on the Treasury and, hence, on the taxpayer."

As indicated in this paragraph the committee clearly states that selling the whole Canada Post operations to the private sector was unthinkable. And then there is the second option. Here is the following paragraph on page 20, Mr. Speaker.

"The second approach to privatization is to sell it off in parts. No doubt, if the Government decided to withdraw from the postal business on a phased basis, there would be many bids to take over heavily populated areas which generate high postal revenues. However, areas of the country which are thinly populated and lack industrial concentration would be less attractive to business.

These areas do not now generate sufficient postal revenue to cover the cost of mail processing and delivery. Some form of transfer payments would be imperative to make servicing of such areas viable. Indeed, it may well prove necessary to keep a much reduced Canada Post in existence as the mail handler of last resort. Such a Post Office would, of necessity, be an ongoing charge against public funds. The Committee is of the view that so long as universality of postal service is accepted as a tenet of public policy, privatization by parts is not the most desirable solution. Far better to turnaround the present Crown corporation and make it self-sufficient. The Committee is convinced that this can be done.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to put on the record recommendation no. 10 that the Marchment Committee has made on the privatization of Canada Post: "That privatization not be considered at this time. However, if Canada Post fails by 1990 to achieve its objectives of service and financial self-sufficiency, privatization should then be re-considered."

Mr. Speaker, my colleagues may wonder why I just read that recommendation, which is found on page 20 of the Marchment report.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that a strike has been called and we have to debate back-to-work legislation for the postal workers precisely because the Government wants to privatize the Canada Post Corporation. The Government chose the second option discussed by the Marchment Committee, which was to do this progressively. The Canada Post Corporation presented its corporate plan in November 1986 following the instructions it had received from by the Minister of Finance in February 1986. The Minister had said: From now on, you will have to be self-sufficient and you will not receive one cent in subsidies after March 31, 1988, at the beginning of the new fiscal year. This is when the Canada Post Corporation developed an action plan in three specific stages. These are mentioned in the report.

First, Canada Post began with the rural regions. Everyone will remember this, and I am certain that the Conservative Members who represent a rural region will remember it because they travelled throughout the country and there were demonstrations, meetings and petitions. Since there was so much pressure, they went before the Committee which was discussing the corporate plan of Canada Post, and because of the number of Conservative Members from rural regions, the Government had to soften its approach, but it never abandoned its plan of closing as many rural post offices as possible because they are not profitable.

The second option was to install superboxes everywhere so that Canada Post would be able to leave mail delivery to subcontractors, and this resulted in a lettercarrier strike in June. The strike lasted ten days and there were acts of violence. And at the request of all parties, a mediator was appointed and it took him two days to settle the matter.

The third option, Mr. Speaker, is privatization, that is selling postal stations of franchising to the private sector. As indicated in the Marchment Report, that option is not workable, it is not a good idea. But it is being done precisely because it is easier to transfer postal services to the private sector because in urban areas there are many people and businesses and it will therefore be possible to maintain the service. That is why two strikes occurred within the past three months and that is the reason for the present one, Mr. Speaker.

Therefore, when you say that the minister provides in the legislation for the appointment of a mediator and arbitrator afterwards, it should be noted as well, Mr. Speaker, that at the same time the mediator is given the mandate to say: You must pursue bargaining according to the report of the conciliator who at that time agreed with Canada Post Corporation, which was entitled to sell those postal stations. That is not bargaining, that is not mediation designed to get both parties together and settle the matter after assessing all the facts, and to ask the non-partisan mediator to make recommendations, Mr. Speaker. He has practically no power beyond that objective which the government has set to privatize Canada Post Corporation.

If it wants to sell the Post Office to the private sector, the government can do it, but they must hold a debate on this matter in Parliament and also consult the people who have elected them.

Mr. Speaker, we must not forget either that under the Canadian Constitution, the federal government is responsible for postal services throughout Canada.

In Section 5 of the Act establishing Canada Post Corporation, it is clearly indicated that the Corporation is responsible not only for organizing but also for operating a postal service throughout Canada. Therefore the government, which wants to cut services in order to reduce the benefit, as Canadians already know, has enabled labour relations environment and the postal service to deteriorate and be at a standstill. Mr. Speaker, Canadians had regained confidence in their postal system, but they are back to square one, Mr. Speaker, and the fault lies with the Government whose indirect and hidden intention is to privatize the Canada Post Corporation.

Mr. Speaker, one can find confirmation of my assertion that Canadians had regained confidence in the Canadian postal service by referring to the financial report of the Canada Post Corporation which was presented not long ago, in June, I think.

• (1330)

The current revenue sources of Canada Post were clear in its report. Not only has the volume in dollars increased, but the volume of mail has increased. This indicates that Canadians want to use the services of Canada Post.

Since February 1986, and especially since November 1986, when we finally saw the business plan of Canada Post which was dictated and approved by the Government, we have seen a gradual destruction of the Canadian postal system that had been rebuilt in the five years from 1981 to 1986.

For example, its financial report indicates that in 1986-87 mail service generated almost 93 per cent of Canada Post's revenue, with first class mail being responsible for about 59 per cent. Second class mail is composed primarily of publications including newspapers, magazines, and books. The volume of revenue for this category remained relatively constant from previous years. Reserves from this source made up 9.5 per cent of the total in that year.

Third class mail includes both addressed and unaddressed bulk mailings of advertising material, direct marketing offers, and publishers' books. Revenue in this category showed a slight growth in 1986-87 and comprised 10.5 per cent of the total revenue.

Although often cited as a growth area of service, electronic mail has not yet realized its predicted potential. Indications are that it still provides a relatively modest contribution to the corporation's revenue. Why is this? It is because the Government decided to abandon future growth in the electronic mail sector.

Other services made up 7.3 per cent of the sales of philatelic products such as commemorative stamp and souvenir stamp collections. We must also take into consideration the sale of miscellaneous items amounting to $18 million and so on.

Canada Post can be vital and it can balance its books. If the Government would let it follow the mandate which was given to it in 1981, we could have better services and the good labour relations which existed in the five years before 1986.

Canada Post has a means of increasing revenues. For example, it has over 4,000 trucks and post offices in prime downtown locations. Why does it not sell advertising space as is done in other countries? It would bring in millions of dollars of revenue to Canada Post. It would not cost a penny because the advertising company would take care of the operation. Switzerland does it. Why cannot Canada Post do it?

We have asked Canada Post to do that, and it indicated that that would cheapen its corporate image. What kind of corporate image does Canada Post have today? It is not even able to deliver mail.

[Translation]

So, Mr. Speaker, neither I nor my colleagues of the Official Opposition subscribe to the statement that the only way to have a postal service in Canada is to privatize Canada Post Corporation.

I believe Canada Post could indeed be viable, deliver the mail according to its mandate and, finally, maintain better working relations than it does right now. We had evidence of that between 1981 and 1986—Mr. Speaker, you are indicating to me I am running out of time, that I have only one minute left. That is too bad because I had some quotations to make from the 1985 report of the conciliator, the present Deputy Minister of Finance, who had stated what, in his view, would be the future working relations between the Government and Canada Post Corporation and how both of them together could have contributed to improve the service and, as a matter of fact, solve the deficit problems.

[English]

Mrs. Mailly: Mr. Speaker, I am puzzled by the contradictions in the Hon. Member's speech. He mentioned earlier that because the Government was bringing in back-to-work legislation it was a sign that the Government had no faith in the corporation. Also the Hon. Member said that its reputation had been getting better and that our gesture to protect the public interest would ruin it.

A little later he said that when it was proposed to Canada Post that it should use advertising on its trucks, the answer was that it would cheapen the image of the corporation. He went on to say, very sarcastically, that its image was poor because it could not even deliver the mail. Therefore he asked why it would be concerned about its reputation. It is an interesting contradiction.

Also there seemed to be some error in fact in his presentation. I was special assistant to the President of the Canada Post Corporation in 1982, and I recall very vividly that the mandate given to the new corporation in 1981 was to improve service, to improve labour relations, and to arrive at reducing the deficit to zero within five years. That mandate was not changed by our Government. On the contrary, we gave Canada Post an extension of one year so that it could improve its service. Service had deteriorated; it had not improved.

I am puzzled by the facts used by the Hon. Member, and I would like him to answer my question about why there seems to be contradictions in his approach. He seems so convinced of his opinions.

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, I think the only contradiction is in the mind of the Hon. Member.

I said that the mandate of Canada Post was to improve service, to have better management-labour relations, and to reduce the deficit.

The Hon. Member talked about five years, but I also noted that recommendation No. 10 in the management report of Canada Post indicated that it should be given another five years. It talked about privatization in 1990, not in 1986 when the Government decided to go the route of privatization. I do not see any contradiction.

Concerning the image of the Post Office, I was talking about how Canada Post could increase its revenue without going into private hands. There are many things that it could do to have extra revenues and without reducing services, but I referred to the advertising example which has no direct cost.

I do not see any contradiction, but the Hon. Member seems to see one. This is why I said at the beginning that the contradiction was in her mind.

[Translation]

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Speaker, I have been listening to my colleague from Saint-Léonard—Anjou (Mr. Gagliano) and I would like to intervene. I do not often do so in the House but since I am keenly interested in the matter, because there are many post offices and many mail users in my constituency, and since I have received many complaints I wish to say a few words.

Last night, the CBC carried a television report on Great Britain which has already taken a step forward. The privatization was feared by everybody. Today, 36 million letters are delivered daily in Great Britain, six days a week and 24 hours after being posted, first-class mail is received.

I should like to ask my colleague whether Canada is not ready to get an adequate service and if privatization would not be helpful. I say that I do not object to unions and I do not like scabs as I am absolutely against them and I should like that to be shown in the records of this House. I have some experience of labour-management issues, and I never liked the kind of guerilla warfare I saw there, but I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that every time I go to the post office in Canada, I wish I could get service with a smile. I don't know whether anyone here has ever had a smile. They don't seem to like their work, they don't seem motivated. There must be something that could motivate these people to at least give us a smile and be efficient. I would like to ask the Hon. Member, who is very interested in the private sector—so he says—why he keeps saying things that often would not be tolerated on the street, let alone in these venerable surroundings, instead of giving people, in the Government and elsewhere, a chance to provide proper management so that Canadians who pay the same price as Great Britain can get service with a smile?

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Duvernay should do his homework before asking his questions. I know perfectly well that the British Post Office is not privatized. Furthermore, the British Post Office is a success, Mr. Speaker because it is allowed to be a success. I have nothing against the union and nothing against Canada Post. I want decent service for Canadians. You will get that service if we let Canada Post get its act together. We have to be realistic. We pay 36 cents to send a letter from Ottawa to Yellowknife. If we want to give all Canadians the same service, we will have to let Canada Post raise income some other way and get organized to provide a better service, and it should also have the means to finance that service if the Government does not want to pay the cost. As for me, I agree that we have to reduce the deficit, but we should let the Canada Post Corporation manage its own affairs.

In 1984, the Canada Post Corporation took action to increase its revenue by developing a service called Consumer Post. In this case, the Conservative Party went against the private sector. It said: You are in competition with the private sector. On the other hand, in England, the Post Office has a service called Floral Post for sending flowers. Does this service compete against the private sector? You cannot have it both ways, Mr. Speaker. I have nothing against the Canada Post Corporation organizing its own activities, but we should also give it the power to manage the postal service so as to provide essential services and make a profit. In fact, Canada Post has been told that it will not receive one penny after March 31, 1988, and that it will still have to see to it that its books are balanced, whatever happens to the service. This is what is going on now, Mr. Speaker. There have been cutbacks in delivery services, rural post offices are about to be closed, and now, the whole postal service will be split up. I also have small post offices in my constituency. These are all open at different hours. The Minister gave me a list one day showing post offices which stayed open between 9 and midnight. I will not say what I think of this, but it is certainly not true. I called them one after another, and some of them stay open between 9 and 5, other between 9 and 12, and some are open while others stay closed on Saturdays. We must have a credible service of some kind, Mr. Speaker. In my opinion, if we had kept to the mandate which had been given to the Canada Post Corporation in 1981, we would have succeeded. This is what the Marchment Report says in recommendation 10, that Canada Post will succeed if given another five years, and if it does not, a method to privatize the Corporation will be found. I personnally agree with this recommendation of the Marchment Report which was rejected by the Government.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Questions and comments. The Hon. Member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Côté) has the floor.

Mr. Côté (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Saint-Léonard—Anjou (Mr. Gagliano) has the ability to take bits of information and to interpret them as he pleases. First of all, he started by asking how did we come this far? Then he went back to 1981. As a matter of fact, he was well advised to stop in 1981, because if he had gone further in the past, he would have had to mention the whole series of labour disputes the Canada Post Corporation was involved in. And then his was the governing party.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to remind my hon. friend that in 1978, his party did adopt a similar legislation, which also in 1980 landed the president of the inside postal workers in jail. The Canada Post Corporation was established by the Liberals in 1981 and, as any seriously handicapped "creature" from the start, it has a lot of difficulty living a normal life. And he quoted of course the Marchment Report; by the way, I should like to remind him that this is not a report prepared by the Government or a Government agency. Marchment was the name of a committee which had been established to examine the role and productivity of the Canada Post Corporation. Personnally, I would rather deal with the very last report prepared by Kenneth Swan. According to the conciliator appointed in the dispute between the Corporation and the Union of Postal Workers the relations between the party representatives had deteriorated to the point of becoming personal and acrimonious.

Such is your creature. So were the special legislation you adopted then and which resulted in a person going to jail better than this legislation aimed at averting violence on the picket lines?

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has again failed to listen to what I said and, at the beginning, I went further back than in 1981. As you can see, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Côté) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Côté (Lac-Saint-Jean): When the Hon. Member rose a while ago to reply to the Hon. Member for Duvernay (Mr. Della Noce), he said exactly the same thing. He accuded him of not listening. He was, perhaps, the only one listening, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, according to those Members it would seem we are not entitled to have our own views nor to rise in this House. Fortunately, he is not the Speaker, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Côté (Lac Saint-Jean): Answer the question!

Mr. Gagliano: First, I went back before 1981 and I said indeed that in the 1960's—I went back a good many years, he should have listened, I went as far back as the 1960's—and I said we had . . .

Well if you are not listening, look I am not to be blamed, but I said indeed that we had so many conflicts in that area, and for that reason in 1981, in order to put an end to those conflicts and get them out of the Government machinery, we established the Canada Post Corporation, Mr. Speaker. Had he listened, he would have known.

Second, Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member suggested this is not a Government report. If he had taken the time to read the report, he would have seen indeed that it was the former Minister in charge of Canada Post (Mr. Beatty), the now Minister of National Defence, who issued that madate, and then the Marchment Committee submitted its report to the former minister responsible for Canada Post, because it must be emphasized that during those three years we have already had three Ministers responsible for Canada Post in this Conservative Government, Mr. Speaker.

So there was a mandate issued by one Minister. The second Minister received the mandate. And now we have a third Minister who implements part of those reports. Because this Conservative Government picked selectively in that Marchment Report, but then how often do we not have the Minister in charge of Canada Post Corporation falling back in this House on the Marchment Report.

I have learned that there is one cause, privatization, Mr. Speaker. If there is now a dispute, it is because of privatization, because definitely they are not on strike over a salary increase. Of course, Mr. Speaker, employees want job security, but Canada Post Corporation wants to abandon post offices in order to hand them over to the private sector. So they are fighting for their jobs. What grudge are you holding against workers having a job, or is it your philosophy to constantly fight against workers?

• (1350)

Who tried to reduce the pensions of Canadians? The Conservative Government. Who cut Unemployment Insurance benefits to pensioners? The Conservative Government. Would you like a full list of such actions? You are an anti-worker Government, that is what you are.

Mr. Charles Hamelin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, obviously it is never with much pleasure or enthusiasm that one takes part in a debate on a Bill which is meant to tell some people: "Listen, the party is over, now you go back to work". In this particular case, the Bill says to employees of the Canada Post Corporation: "Look, why don't you try to manage this company in the best interest of Canadians". This is never pleasant to do. However, if you are a responsible Government, you have to do it and do it fast, because the situation deteriorates and the risk of violence increases. I have to say to Hon. Members from the opposition that we would like this debate to end quickly, because there really might be useless violence and a protracted debate would only let such actions happen, whereas the Bill is precisely designed to tell everybody: "Now, go back to work, go back to managing" and, as the Minister said, it includes all the mechanisms necessary to try and come to an understanding.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask Canadian men and women what this postal dispute is all about. What is it all about, really? If you read the Foisy report, you realize that we have here 23,000 people, of which 19,000 full-time workers, who have decided to go on strike, albeit a legal strike, and to paralyze the Canadian postal service and give priority to their own rights and concerns over those of 25 million Canadians. We have 25 million Canadians on one side and 23,000 people on the other. Those workers simply do not care about other people's rights and think that their own rights are the most important thing in the world. But we should not forget people on welfare, pensioners, senior citizens waiting for their pension cheque, unemployed workers who wait for their cheque or for a form they have to fill and return. They have rights too, but people on strike do not give a damn.

A few years ago, the New Democratic Party and its former leader used to call big companies, in a different context, corporate welfare bums because they were not good corporate citizens and did not pay any taxes, for example. In my opinion, some unionized workers are also corporate welfare bums. They think that their rights, which I do not deny, are above all legislation, above public interest, above everything. That is the case at Canada Post. There is a tradition of labour disputes with strikes and violence and what not.

An Hon. Member: Remember Lapalme.

Mr. Hamelin: And almost every time successive governments had to come up with special legislation. On the other hand, the Canadian postal system is essential to the country as a whole, to small businesses whose receivables are lost in the system, to the hundreds of men and women of Quebec and Canada who do not work and who depend on their pension cheques. And who are we dealing with? Who are we talking about? Whipped, beaten, brutalized people? No, Mr. Speaker. We are dealing with people whose basic and starting salary is $16.43 an hour, with very decent working conditions. Do you know how much a unionized worker costs Canada Post? It costs $24.89 or $25 an hour to keep him working. That is how much it costs.

That is where the demagogic tactics begin. The world is supposed to come crumbling down if we fail to meet the bottom-line demands of that small group pitted against 25 million Canadians. I find that startling. What about us poor taxpayer devils? You remember the price of a stamp was upped from 17 to 24, 30, 32 and recently 34, then 37 cents, and we are told that it will rise to 38 cents in 1988. When disputes followed one another before 1980, the problem was said to come from the government nature of the service. It was nonsense, too many politicians were mixed up in it. The situation was absurd. The solution was to create a Crown corporation independent from politicians, those idiots who did not know anything about the business. They were no good. They interfered here and there. It did not make sense. Those statements drew the applause of everyone in opposition parties and the private sector. Canada Post Corporation was created on October 16, or thereabouts, 1981. It was bliss, everything would be coming up roses!

We came to power in 1984, following terrible conflicts in 1980: the union leader was sent to jail and it was a real mess, Mr. Speaker. Thus, when elected in 1984, we footed the bill because that independent corporation has only one shareholder: the government, that is, all Canadians. And the bill was a deficit of $384 million. Since we had been mandated to manage public funds in a much more rational way, we said to the management of Canada Post Corporation: Listen, this makes no sense, the price of stamps is going up, the deficit is increasing and the service is rotten anyway. Therefore, we told them: We are going to set specific objectives for you. You should try to improve the quality of service. We have heard it every year. We do not believe in it, but anyway, considering the quality of the service provided, we should not spend too much. therefore, some objectives were set. And after two years, the deficit was reduced from $384 million to about $129 million. The deficit for this year might still reach some $30 million.

Now, we are faced with the second conflict in four months and the government is again forced to intervene. We are obliged to do it. We are repeating our directive to Canada Post Corporation management. Being a para-public Crown Corporation does not mean that you should always charge more than elsewhere, that the service should always be rotten and that in fact, we, as stupid taxpayers, should always foot the bill anyway. This does not make any sense. It is not good enough and that is why the Corporation gave itself some means. In so doing, of course, it resorted to franchising and selling to the private sector. What are we getting in return? Every time that there are unionized employees in those units, 70 per cent of the revenues are raised there in order to ensure . . .

But where the private sector has taken over only 12 or 13 per cent of the same income is spent on that.

As you can see, this approach seems to make sense, and although we agree that the union members and workers of these firms are entitled to decent wages and good working conditions, there comes a time when enough is enough!

Why should their rights take precedence over those of Parliament? Why should their rights be to the detriment of the other needs of the Canadian people? That is what is unacceptable. As a Government, we simply cannot afford to let postal services come to a standstill.

As I see it, the rights of individuals are in conflict, and such rights cannot be exercised when they jeopardize the freedom and rights of others.

Although the situation has improved, I learned this week that men and women did not get their unemployment insurance cheques on time, for a variety of good reasons. Clearly a strike—general and total, or rotating—is a threat against the lives as well as the psychological, social and physical existence of these people. Other than their small pension cheque, their small unemployment insurance cheque, or other government welfare benefits, some people have no other source of income to buy food for the weekend.

I would suggest that a responsible government cannot stand still for long when faced with this kind of situation.

Mr. Speaker, Canada Post has twenty-seven bargaining units. I said: twenty-seven. So if every time one of those units demands—what could be more logical—changes in working conditions that are a threat to the whole system, we have a situation that gets so out of hand there is nothing for it but for the Goverment to react.

It doesn't take a genius to see what has to be done. When people put their personal rights and wellbeing above everybody else's, society can no longer function, especially when it depends on a service as essential as the one we are talking about.

Like my colleagues, I respect the right to strike, and the freedom to negotiate. However, there is a limit. We must consider the common good and the ability of Canadians to pay.

There has to be a place for management rights. Why should the unions dictate to the rest of Canada how Canada Post is supposed to operate? It doesn't make sense.

As for job security, I think that is guaranteed through attrition or some other method under the present system. These are just ploys to scare people. It is an attempt to give union members a taste for power.

Mr. Speaker, this situation cannot be allowed to last.

I want to ask my Opposition colleagues what their position and their philosophy is on the issue whether or not we should privatize the system as much as possible. I believe in this formula. We should adopt this Bill as soon as possible to avoid verbal and physical violence on the picket lines. The sooner we adopt this Bill, the better our chances will be to get back to a more normal situation where, all other things being equal, the normal rights of unionized employees in these bargaining units are not threatened.

We as a Government, and I think we have proved this with determination and perseverance, have a duty to manage the public funds with which we have been entrusted in the best interests of the people of this country. If you are willing for us to sign just about anything, tell us so. It will be the same as before. It will cost us the earth and will change nothing to the existing service.

It seems to me that this is not what we were asked to do when we were elected. People on both sides should be a bit more responsible and help to build this country instead of thinking only about their personal security at the expense of the rest of our society.

I believe that this is the main issue. I often wonder where our society is going. The decision we are making today reflects a choice between responsibility and irresponsibility. It is quite simple.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that Canada can long afford a shaky and deficient postal service. I believe that the objectives we have set for both parties are reasoned and reasonable, and they are already extremely costly. It is the most we have done as a Government. What is the alternative? Probably immediate privatization of the whole service. We shall not have any choice if this goes on, unless you decide to foot the bill yourselves by paying increasingly higher postal rates or taxes.

Mr. Speaker, I respect and congragulate the Minister of Labour for having made this decision so quickly. We are faced with an emergency. The Government had to act very quickly, and history shows that the sanctions provided are necessary because past experience of labour relations in this area proves that there is no other way. Without such sanctions, this legislation would be ridiculous and lack any credibility, as pointed out by my colleague.

I hope that the conflict will be settled responsibly, through conciliation and in harmony, in the interests of all Canadians. This is what we want.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment, if I might, with respect to the comments to which we have just listened. It seems rather strange that in Canada the Post Office has been a constant source of irritation one way or the other, whether it is the fault of management, the inside workers or the carriers whereas countries like the United Kingdom, the United States and Australia, which have gone through similar problems, have been able to address them in what I consider to be a very mature and reasonable way.

In the United Kingdom in the 1960s, the postal system went through a series of labour-management crises, inefficiency, communications breakdowns, you name it, even though the system had a very distinguished history. But instead of privatizing the system, a system which was losing money, and cutting back services which our Government is proposing, the British Government, both Conservative and Labour Governments, expanded the postal service that it sold to the public. As the system became more efficient and brought in more revenue, employees realized that it was to their continuing benefit to make certain that labour relations continued to improve. Today the British postal system is almost free of industrial strife. If I am not mistaken, the postal system in Britain is making money.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa—Carleton): Good for Maggie Thatcher.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Second, in the United States the postal services are unionized. The mail is carried and the workers are making $14 an hour on average. I read in the Globe and Mail just the other day that the American postal workers are among the most popular workers in the United States. The Americans are not privatizing or cutting back on services as this Government wants to do. I would hope that they would look at that as example two.

Example three, Australia, a big country with a lot of remote areas, a lot of uneconomic postal delivery routes, we might call them. Up until 1980, there was chaos. There was one strike after another, management was accused of being rotten, labour was accused of being rotten and it was reaching a point where the mail was really not even moving in some of the remote areas. People were literally not receiving letters or parcels.

The Australian Government, not under Labour but under its so-called combination of rural Liberal and city-oriented Conservative Parties, brought in an expert from the United Kingdom, not a strike breaker, to try to bring the two sides together. He succeeded. The postal workers there are still unionized, they are still making a decent income, but they have improved the postal delivery system. There has not been one strike by any component of the postal service since 1980, and today the system has regained its responsibility and its respectability.

Those are the three examples I wanted to cite. Three different countries, three different Governments of three different political stripes, both right of centre and left of centre, were able to solve the problems of their postal services without Draconian laws such as that proposed this morning by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Cadieux). They did this without doing away with the system, without privatizing it and without busting the unions. They were able to do it, but those guys across the way cannot because they do not have the political will.

• (1410)

Now, I want to ask one question. I want to ask my colleague from Quebec if he thinks it is fair that if a union organizer breaks a law, he can go to jail and thereby forfeit any lawful ability to assume another job as a union organizer, either elected or appointed, for five years, while a cabinet Minister in this House can be accused of a crime, can be sentenced to a year in jail, we will say, and yet can come back into the House and be reelected and reappointed to the Cabinet. Is there any fairness in that?

[Translation]

Mr. Hamelin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer my colleague, first with respect to his opening remarks about Europe, England, and other places. If I may enlighten my colleague, most people know that in England, Europe and elsewhere the labour movement has learned one thing through the ages: a one-day strike is bad enough, it is extraordinary, it does mean something to them, and as a rule they stick to that approach. That is indeed what people of both communities learn when they talk to one another.

Perhaps ours is a land of greater freedom, I would not know, but it seems to me that in those countries people cannot afford to go on strike for weeks, let alone for months. But what I mean is that the climate, the sensitivity and customs are altogether different in certain cases. Over there, taking this kind of action which deprives people of public services for more than 24 hours is unacceptable, it is sociologically unacceptable, or nearly so. Over here, people could not care less. It is altogether different and, sadly, much too frequent.

In response to the second question, the history of labour relations in Canada is precisely what has prompted the Minister to take measures which, we readily agree, can be described as draconian, very harsh. History tells us as well that this kind of measure does not overly bother the unions, history has shown that, particularly in Quebec, sad to say.

As my colleague pointed out, if the workers respect the law and the rules of the game, they will not be penalized.

I think the Bill shows how serious the situation is and we are telling people: "We are not laughing, this is not funny, those who are on welfare, the unemployed, the unemployment insurance claimants will no longer be receiving their cheques. You can longer abuse the situation. Such is the meaning of the Bill even if it is extremely harsh, and since it is easy to make comparisons, you are right.

[English]

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): It is Draconian then, you admit it?

[Translation]

Mr. Hamelin: It is absolutely "very" draconian. However, the situation of the poor woman in my constituency who does not get her cheque to buy food for the weekend is a lot more serious than the situation of a worker earning $16 an hour. It is serious.

[English]

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): How about going to jail in the five years if they cannot be a union member?

[Translation]

Mr. Hamelin: Mr. Speaker is telling me my time is running out. Mr. Speaker, we have to consider the matter very seriously and I readily agree with my colleague that those are draconian and tough measures. We all will agree. However once again I ask you to appeal on behalf of our families, our small businesses threatened by the action of 23,000 against 25 million. Those are peanuts, Mr. Speaker. We have to be tough, we have no choice. Such are the conditions, and the extreme positions of the parties have compelled us in this case to use the necessary force.

[English]

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, this particular legislation was introduced yesterday at 11 a.m. I find it somewhat surprising that the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) has not yet commented publicly about this legislation.

As the Hon. Member will recall, when the outside postal workers were striking, the Leader of the New Democratic Party did not ask any questions in the House of Commons or at least my recollection is that no questions were asked by the Leader of the Party that prides itself on being the Party of labour.

Perhaps the Hon. Member can assist me. Can he indicate why in his view the Leader of the New Democratic Party has chosen to not yet comment on this Draconian piece of legislation, as it has been referred to by members of the New Democratic Party? Why is it that there is silence from the Leader of the Party that prides itself on being the Party of the working class, the Party of labour?

Mr. Keeper: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. That question was obviously directed at our Party.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Keeper: Quite clearly, unless that Hon. Member is just trying a ruse, unless he is trying to mislead the House, that question was directed at us and not at our colleague, so we should have the right to respond to it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Keeper) will also talk about that in his speech in a minute.

[Translation]

Mr. Hamelin: My answer is simple, Mr. Speaker: I fully agree with my honourable colleague of the Liberal Party in this respect. Everybody knows that the NDP Members brag about being the dedicated champions of the workers and the unions. We are aware that the unions contribute very large sums of money to their Party. For them, the notion of common good becomes rather difficult to grasp. It is a fact that they are placed in a situation—and once again it will likely be a matter of choosing a system at the time of the forthcoming election. And your question is to the point. These people will probably keep silent or almost silent during this debate, for they have been told that public interests override individual interests. Unfortunately, these interests are their own friends and associates, theoretically speaking, at least at the level of the establishment, such as some local lobbies. They are placed, therefore, in an unbelievable situation. But you are right, my friend: I am indeed anxious to hear what my colleague the Hon. Member for Yorkton—Melville (Mr. Nystrom) in particular has to say about his position on these negotiations. I want to know—and I conclude on this, Mr. Speaker—about the needs of the Canadian citizens and families compared with those of this little group of 23,000 people which are keeping the whole Canadian population hostages. I am anxious to hear about that, and so is my honourable friend, I am sure.

• (1420)

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before I begin my remarks I want to deal with the accusations coming from my right.

Some Hon. Members: Far right!

Mr. Della Noce: That is the name of the game here.

Mr. Keeper: Let me make it clear that when our critic speaks on these issues, he does so after we have made a caucus decision and he speaks for all of the Party, from the Leader to the back-benchers.

Mr. Daubney: For Bob White.

Mr. Keeper: I want to ask the Hon. Member from the mushy middle, otherwise known as the Liberal Party, how come they stand up here as the defenders of labour when yesterday, when taping a television program, another Liberal Member spoke in favour of the back-to-work legislation? What kind of hypocrisy is that?

Mr. Nystrom: Who was that?

Mr. Keeper: George Baker. When the Liberal Party wants to be the defender of labour it puts up one Member to speak, and when they want to attack labour they put up another Member to speak. How can you trust that Party?

Mr. Nunziata: Where oh where is Ed Broadbent when you need him?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa—Carleton): Get to the Bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Could we please extend some courtesy to the Hon. Member.

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, I want to come to the legislation, but I do not want to forget the Liberal Party entirely.

Mrs. Mailly: Why not?

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Everyone else has.

Mr. Keeper: Because one of the weaknesses in this legislation is that it appoints someone called a mediator/arbitrator. Has that ever been done before?

Mr. Dick: Why not try something new?

Mr. Keeper: It is not new. The Conservatives are not the first ones to create this confusion. Who did it before? It was done once before and it was the Liberal Party who did it.

Mr. Nunziata: Shame on the Liberal Party.

Mr. Keeper: It is the Liberal Party attacking this legislation yet they set the precedent.

Mrs. Mailly: Beautiful!

Mr. Keeper: What kind of hypocrisy is that? The Liberal Party acts one way when it is in opposition and another way when it is in Government!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Mailly: Give the man a cigar.

Mr. Keeper: I must say that when I hear the Liberals speaking out of both sides of their mouths then I get angry. We are much more used to the vision of the Liberal Party as the mushy middle. That is the Party we can forget. That is the Party Canadians are forgetting. That is the Party that will not be a significant force in this country after the next election.

Mr. Caccia: We brought in collective bargaining long before you were born. Calm down.

Mr. Murphy: Yes, you voted in favour of the back-to-work legislation for the railway workers.

Mr. Keeper: One of my Liberal friends in defence of his Party says it is that Party that brought in labour legislation. Let us face it, in the past the Liberal Party has done some good things.

Mr. Riis: Name one.

Mr. Lewis: Name one.

Mr. Keeper: Let my friend tell me why his labour critic can get up in this House and defend labour at the same time another Member of his Party is saying they are going to vote for back-to-work legislation.

Mr. Lewis: They have always operated that way.

Mr. Keeper: How can they do that on the same day?

Mr. Caccia: It is not true.

Mr. Keeper: It is absolutely true and you will hear it on the program which was recorded today. It is on tape!

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would like to ask for your help to try and keep this debate on the rails. I thought what we had before us was legislation which I have my own personal difficulties with but I do not think the Hon. Member who has the floor now is sticking to the subject or is relevant.

An Hon. Member: It is very relevant.

Mr. Heap: Tell the Hon. Member for York South—Weston (Mr. Nunziata).

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): The subject of the debate is not divisions between the Liberal Party and the NDP.

Mr. Lewis: We are prepared to listen to them on that, too.

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): It is Bill C-86. I would like to see the Hon. Member stick to the Bill and I am requesting your help.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair finds that what the Hon. Member is saying is relevant to the Bill.

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Liberal labour critic was not here when I pointed out that one of the weaknesses in this legislation is the confusion of the roles of mediator and arbitrator. He was not here when I pointed out that it was the Liberal Party that introduced that concept to labour legislation.

However, to set aside my concerns about the Liberal Party, because we have more important things to deal with, I will come to the legislation, Bill C-86.

The Government has introduced this back-to-work legislation and I want to know whether there was another way of handling the postal dispute. When the Minister introduced the Bill, he sought to give the impression that the Government's hands were tied and it had no choice but to bring in this legislation if the mails were to be delivered. Did the Government have a choice?

The first aspect of that question deals with the legislation itself. My colleague, the Hon. Member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy), dealt thoroughly with this legislation but I want to make a few key points. Is it good legislation or is it bad?

Mrs. Mailly: It is good.

Mr. Keeper: I want to make the case that this legislation is inadequate and destructive. The first problem is that it imposes the Government's plan for the Post Office. This legislation is supposed to regulate a labour dispute. In fact it imposes the Government's plan on the Post Office. Is that something I just pulled out of my hat or dreamed up? No. The Government makes specific reference in the legislation to the fact that the arbitrator will have to pay attention to the conciliator's report. Clearly one of the distinguishing factors of that report was that it accepts the Government's plan for franchising Post Offices. That is a key element in the dispute we are discussing. That is the legislation's first inadequacy.

The second point I would like to make is that it confuses the role of the mediator and the arbitrator. Clearly this is a conflict in which a mediator would have been welcomed. The mediator could offer some hope of a negotiated settlement so the mails would continue to move and labour relations at the Post Office would be improved. Did the Government take that route? No, it created this mediator/arbitrator. The Government has said that if the person who sits down with management and labour to try to get them to come to a negotiated settlement fails in his task, he will later be required to arbitrate the situation, in other words, to decide who is right and who is wrong and to impose a settlement. That is the second weakness of this legislation.

The third weakness of this legislation is equally fundamental. This legislation undercuts freedom of association which is a fundamental right in a democratic society. We have enjoyed that right throughout Canada's history, having inherited it from the British democratic system.

This legislation undercuts freedom of association by specifically barring any person who is a member of a union who may, for whatever reason, choose to defy this legislation from holding any leadership position in the union. This legislation seeks to determine who will be eligible to hold office in a union, a free collective association. It seeks to determine who a group of people will choose to be their leader. That is a fundamental breach of the principle of freedom of association.

I have asked whether the Government had any alternative in the way it has acted in order to ensure that the mails would be delivered and there would be good labour relations at the Post Office. It is clear that there are many ways in which the Government could approach this dispute without bringing forward legislation which is destructive. The legislation fails because it seeks to impose public policy on a collective bargaining situation. It confuses the role of the mediator and the arbitrator and undercuts the right to freedom of association.

The legislation is wanting. This is not a good piece of legislation which demands the attention of the House and demands to be passed. It is, instead, bad legislation which is fundamentally flawed. It is clear that the Government had other options to pursue.

Let us look at the Government's approach to this labour dispute. The Government adopted a policy of confrontation rather than co-operation. It adopted the clenched fist rather than the open hand. The results were predictable.

The Government has chosen to move back-to-work legislation. If a government is to pursue that option it should at least be able to make the argument that it has exhausted all other available alternatives, that it has used all the tools imaginable to regulate a conflict. One of the most fundamental tools in regulating labour-management conflict is mediation.

The Government set that option aside and chose, instead, to bring forward back-to-work legislation. The Government has not, therefore, exhausted all of the possibilities for regulating this dispute in a peaceful fashion. Since it has not exhausted all options, it has no justification for introducing back-to-work legislation.

We must question the Government's approach with regard to the issues that were on the table. When the conciliator examined the negotiations, he pointed out that the most serious obstacle to a resolution of the dispute was the policy of franchising. He said that management of the Post Office had one idea of what the Post Office was and labour had another idea. Labour saw it as a public service and management saw it as a private business.

Recognizing that the policy of franchising has become a serious obstacle to the resolution of the labour-management conflict, why could the Government not have set that policy aside? If the Government insisted on being obstinate and rigid about it and wanted to continue with the policy of franchising, could it not at least be flexible and willing to negotiate?

We know that the Canadian Union of Postal Workers has a reputation of being very militant and uncompromising. However, in these negotiations it specifically brought forward the issue of franchising and indicated its willingness to negotiate on it. The union said that it would be willing to talk about franchising in areas where there are no post offices now. Therefore, the union started the negotiations on that key issue but management failed to respond.

The Government could avoid confrontation at the Post Office by being more flexible in its policy which is an obstacle to a negotiated settlement If the Government had developed its plan for the Post Office in a public way rather than behind closed doors, it would have avoided confrontation.

In the short time that I have left I would like to speak about the Government's over-all plan for the Post Office. The Government has chosen to treat the Post Office as a private profit-making business rather than the public utility it is. Because of that it has married itself to the policy of privatization and franchising. It has thereby put itself on a collision course with the union because Foisy recognized that that policy is a threat to job security. The Government could have had a different plan for the Post Office. It could have taken a co-operative approach to labor-management negotiations. It could have put aside the faulty legislation it has brought forward to the House. It had an alternative. It has chosen confrontation rather than co-operation, and the public will see through its bluster.

Mr. Côté (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make an opening remark before asking my question to the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Keeper). First I must say it is comforting to see him when he gets his senses back, because I was somewhat concerned a moment ago when he began to speak. I think that the only thing which prevented him from jumping on his colleague from York South—Weston (Mr. Nunziata) was the distance between them. I simply cannot see him on a picket line, violence would flare up. While I am at it, here is a piece of advice for newspapermen: that was a very good example why they should never dare attack the leader (Mr. Broadbent).

Well, Mr. Speaker, postal workers from my riding came to see me yesterday but I was not there. I was expecting them on Wednesday. As a matter of fact I had asked my secretary to make an extra pot of coffee. However, since negotiations had started again, when the mailman came he told me it had been postponed. I was here yesterday, and since they could not come to my office, they sent me a telegram advising me they were against the tabling of special back-to-work legislation and asking me to put pressure on the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Cadieux) to oblige Canada Post to bargain seriously with the unions to conclude a negotiated agreement. Mr. Speaker, I immediately informed the Minister of Labour of their demands.

First of all, I would like to say, as was mentioned earlier by the Hon. Member for Charlevoix (Mr. Hamelin) that governments and ministers are always reluctant to table special legislation. They do it because they have to. However, if we consider the rising tension on the picket lines and the incidents that have already occurred, I think it is preferable, in the circumstances, to adopt this Bill which, like all special legislation, is necessary, instead of waiting until something serious happens, when the Opposition will sorely regret the unwillingness to act of some Members and the unconditional support shown by others.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to the postal workers in my riding and across Canada that the legislation tabled in the House allows for negotiations, and I am convinced and I express the hope in this House that both parties will find the calm and serenity they need to negotiate an agreement as soon as possible. Mr. Speaker, my question will be very brief and to the point: Canadians already known the NDP is in favour of violence, as confirmed by the Hon. Member for New Westminster—Coquitlam (Ms. Jewett) and demonstrated in flamboyant style just now by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Keeper) in his speech. Is he trying to tell Canadians we should wait for some regrettable incidents to occur before taking action and that if the NDP were the governing party, that is what he would do?

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, first of all, I want to respond to the Hon. Member's comments on my Leader (Mr. Broadbent).

The Hon. Member asks what the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) is doing and where he is. He is attending a conference to fight against free trade. I believe that this is essential for the job security of Canadian workers.

The second point raised by the Hon. Member opposite to which I feel I must reply is the charge that the NDP is in favour of violence.

Mr. Speaker, this is not our policy. I know that there are sometimes exagerations in politics, but we seriously have to ask ourselves this question: Who is in favour of violence? Who hired the strike-breakers? Does the Hon. Member not know that, when you hire scabs, there is a good chance that there will be violence? The use of strike-breakers promotes violence, and a Member of Parliament from Quebec should be particularly aware of this fact. Quebec is the only province in Canada with anti-scab laws. Why is this? Because there were violent strikes in Quebec in the past, and Quebecers found this unacceptable and uncivilized. They asked their Government to pass laws to ban the use of strike-breakers.

What I want to ask the Hon. Member is this: Who is in favour of violence? Is it, or is it not, his own Government that hired strike-breakers and that is promoting violence?

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, before I put my question to my hon. friend, I want to put it into context. Part of the Government's program which is expected to be carried out by the postal corporation is to phase out the postal system as we know it in our country. It wants to phase out thousands of employees and replace them with some central depots across the country. It wants to franchise the wickets and install supermailboxes which will essentially do away with the employees.

I would like the Minister to consider this observation. If he was to walk into his office at the end of the day and announce to his staff that he plans to phase out all of their jobs in the next while, what do you think would be the result of that announcement? Of course, the employees in the Minister's office would become very concerned and, I suspect, less than co-operative and perhaps aggravated. It is no wonder, when someone is told their livelihood will be taken away and their ability to provide for their families destroyed, that people are provoked.

The letter carrier who comes to my door is one of the most positive, friendly working people I ever meet. When I mail a letter or parcel, I see fantastic employees who are always courteous and pleasant.

Does the Hon. Member believe that this legislation is provocative? Does he believe that it is provoking employees of the postal system and putting them into an impossible situation? Does he believe that they are being pushed up against the wall so that they will react and the Government can take action for political points and be seen to have done something good, at the expense of thousands of people who are dedicated to delivering our mail?

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, I think my colleague has hit the nail on the head. This piece of legislation will have the result of pushing post office workers against the wall, and obviously they will react.

Until now the strike at the Post Office has been a rotating one. It has been very well managed. There has not been the expected violence.

There have been those who have said that the Government had hoped there would be violence because it would have an excuse to bring in back-to-work legislation. There has not been violence until now. Part of the reason for that is that the union was taking a very responsible approach to the negotiations. Also, the union was very much aware that the Government was looking for an excuse to bring in back-to-work legislation.

With this back-to-work legislation and with the fact that the Government has been threatening it since the strike started, the management of the Post Office has been taken off the hook and been left without the necessity of negotiating. Of course workers at the Post Office will feel enormous frustrations, now that the strike has become general. Peoples' frustrations are starting to show as a result of the provocation of this back-to-work legislation. It means that these people have not had a chance to negotiate the conditions of their employment.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, this is a debate on the right to strike, this is a debate on when we should take it away, and this is a debate on something which is incorporated in the Bill as it applies to the circumstances of this strike. Basically it is a debate on some fundamental principles which have governed up until now our behaviour in Canada on the question of the relationship between workers and their employer.

• (1450)

What is making the debate more complicated is the fact that it takes place against the background of some serious disruptions caused by the practice of the employer using scab workers and against the political background of a statement made only a few months ago by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney). When he wrote to the President of the Canadian Labour Congress, he made the following statement:

> Government intervention has not been the solution to labour disputes in the past and is unlikely to be the panacea of the future.

I suppose almost every Member in the House would endorse that statement. However, it is a contradictory statement and it virtually flies in the face of the measure introduced for debate by the Government yesterday and today.

Let us examine for a moment what we have carefully developed over past decades. At the beginning of the century Mackenzie King introduced the concept of bargaining on a collective basis, namely, a situation whereby the employer and the workers would work out an agreement to regulate their relationship over a period of time. I submit that collective bargaining in Canada is a success story over the decades. If we look at the statistics, we see that the vast majority of collective bargaining sessions were solved in an harmonious manner. However, what has been brought to Parliament for resolution has been the most difficult situations.

This raises the question: Is this the right time for Parliament to be asked to settle this strike? Obviously we must look at the situation and examine it carefully to decide whether we have a situation which warrants the intervention of Parliament.

First, we would want the intervention of Parliament when it is absolutely necessary. What does that mean? It means that the convenience of the Canadian public has been damaged, endangered, or put in an unacceptable situation. In the vast majority of cases the Parliament of Canada has historically intervened when it was felt that the Canadian public was inconvenienced in a serious manner. Therefore I must ask, Mr. Speaker, whether in your judgment the movement and delivery of mail is such that it has seriously inconvenienced the public.

Until now I do not know of anyone who has written a letter to our offices, both in our constituencies as well as here, to bring to our attention that the postal service is in a very bad situation. I should like to hear the views of other Hon. Members on whether they have received such correspondence. So far no one in the House, including those on the government side, have indicated in their speeches today that they have received complaints from their constituents about the effect of the strike. Therefore, it is not unreasonable to conclude that as it stands today the mail service to Canadians at large is functioning in a manner which is not causing discomfort to the public.

If that conclusion is a correct one, then the onus is upon the Government to demonstrate that this legislation is urgent and that this legislation is indispensable. I submit that in the speeches we have heard so far that case has not been made. What is the role of the Government? The role of the Government is one of making this difficult political decision. I admit that the role of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Cadieux) is a particularly difficult one, because he is the object of various pressures from various sectors of society. I do not deny that. In a sense I am sympathetic to his role. However, I should like to draw to his attention that the legislation which has been introduced, because of its strong punitive nature, has caused a lot of unhappiness in the ranks of the union itself. It has not helped to convey a sense of balance or a sense of controlled behaviour in the rotating type of strike which the union had intended to have until now and had intended to have in the future. In other words, it has worked as a destabilizer and, in destabilizing the situation, it has also caused certain difficulties.

I see Mr. Speaker signalling me to conclude. I will do so in a moment. These difficulties have been put to further stress and damage by the fact that the unions and its members have seen the constant use of scabs in the environment in which they work. Of course this calls for a decision on the part of the Government of Canada. It should face once and for all the necessity of legislating on the question of the use of scabs.

It is now three o'clock, so I will leave it for the next session.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being three o'clock, the House stands adjourned until Tuesday next at èleven o'clock pursuant to Standing Order 3(1).

At 3 p.m. the House adjourned.

PETITIONS

OPPOSITION TO TAX ON FOOD

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 106, I have the pleasure of tabling a petition signed by residents of the National Capital Region. They humbly declare that; whereas since September, 1984, the federal Government has imposed on Canadian taxpayers 25 new taxes or tax increases, in particular on medical and dental supplies, snack foods, candy and soft drinks; whereas the federal Government in its tax reform proposal is studying the possibility of imposing on Canadians a general tax on goods and services, including food; whereas food constitutes a vital element in day-to-day life and the imposition of this tax would have the effect of seriously penalizing certain categories of taxpayers such as the aged, families, unemployed, low-income taxpayers, youth, et cetera; wherefore the undersigned petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject all measures that would have the effect of imposing a sales tax on food products.

OPPOSITION TO DESTAFFING WEST COAST LIGHTHOUSES

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and duty to present a petition from residents of Vancouver Island and the coast of British Columbia who humbly request the Parliament of Canada to take action to stop the destaffing of lighthouses on the coast of British Columbia. The petitioners further request that there be a moratorium imposed on this program until such time as a proper study can be done. In addition, they wish the Minister of Transport (Mr. Crosbie) would appear in Campbell River at the first public meeting to account for the program initiated by his department.

REQUEST FOR CHANGE TO TAX LAWS—EXEMPTION FOR SENIOR CITIZENS

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table a certified petition signed by 31 residents of Calgary who humbly pray and call upon Parliament to change the taxation laws of Canada, specifically the taxation of senior citizens. These people have worked and paid taxes all their lives and the undersigned petitioners believe that senior citizens receiving $45,000 or less per year should not pay income tax or any other taxes.

CONSTITUTIONAL ACCORD—UNANIMITY CLAUSE AND ABORIGINAL RIGHTS

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition from the residents of the Yukon territory who wish to take this opportunity to express their concern over the fact that they were not consulted about nor were a signatory to the Meech Lake Accord. They therefore call upon Parliament to withdraw the requirement for unanimous consent for the creation of new provinces and to further ensure that aboriginal rights are entrenched. They call for further aboriginal conferences as well.

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

POSTAL SERVICES CONTINUATION ACT, 1987

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Friday, October 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cadieux that Bill C-86, an Act to provide for the resumption and continuation of postal services, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) continuing debate.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, among the things said on Friday in this debate still ringing in my ears quite clearly was the reference by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Cadieux) to the fact that the relations between Canada Post and the union are venomous. I agree with that observation. However, I have to add that the federal Government has a big responsibility for having allowed this relationship to reach such a stage. I will devote a few minutes to that aspect of my remarks.

What comes to mind first is the role the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Andre) has played in this matter so far. He has certainly not helped. If anything, he has fueled the fire. Second, the introduction of this Bill has provoked the workers to no end. What we are seeing today is a situation where management and labour are virtually at each other's throats and almost waging an all-out war. In the process, the future of the corporation is at stake. That is a very sad state of affairs. Instead of calming the waters and cooling the atmosphere, the Government came forward with this legislation which is comparable to throwing a match into a latent fire.

Until this Bill was introduced we had a type of labour action, a rotating strike, which permitted the movement of mail. Canada Post claimed that 80 per cent of the mail was going through. Evidently the rotating strike permitted the public to be served. However, this Draconian Bill provoked the all-out general strike we are now facing.

The Bill contains measures which force us to conclude it is a bad Bill. The Hon. Member for Saint-Jacques (Mr. Guilbault) eloquently referred to Clause 11 on Friday. That provides for a five-year suspension from union activities which could be interpreted as breaking the spirit if not the substance of the Charter. In addition, the Bill contains a directive to the Canada Post Corporation which leans in favour of the Foisy report. That is something the Bill should not do. If Canada Post has been given the mandate to operate as an independent employer, which it was six years ago, then it should not be told which way to go in subsequent negotiations, mediation and arbitration. In other words, the Government cannot have it both ways. It cannot claim that Canada Post is operating at arm's length from the Government, at the same time through legislation tell Canada Post it should be inspired and directed by a specific document produced prior to the legislation.

It is also a bad Bill because of its timing. It is important to put on record that at this time Canada Post and the unions agree that the operation of the Post Office will break even in 1988. Therefore we must asked, why this push to privatize certain aspects of Canada Post when we are so close to the break even point? It does not seem to make sense to inject such a contentious item when the parties agree that the corporation will reach the break-even point next year.

• (1120)

The issue of jobs touches many people. It is a highly emotional issue and has been mishandled by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The fact is that ideologically the Government favours breaking the backs of unions and making their role in society extremely difficult, if possible at all.

You must have heard, Madam Speaker, about acid being spread on furniture within some of the buildings of Canada Post. That was immediately interpreted as an action by the union. Why would that conclusion be drawn when the workers are locked out of the plants?

It is also worrisome that despite its deficit Canada Post finds it possible to pay the scabs it is hiring to replace the workers $150 plus bonuses. Why does the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs constantly interfere in the proceedings during Question Period? He does that at the expense of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Cadieux) who has to find a solution to this conflict.

If the Government were acting in good faith it would pressure Canada Post to pull out these scabs. It may also introduce legislation to outlaw scabs at the federal level. That move would create an atmosphere at Canada Post tenfold less negative, worrisome and tense than it is now. The union would likely return to rotating strikes which would mean that the home delivery of mail would be almost regular, as it was until last weekend.

By removing the scabs Canada Post would signal to the union its desire to resume negotiations in good faith. The parties are far apart and must resume negotiations to justify the calling in of a mediator-arbitrator. That would fit in with the development, for the long term, of good labour relations.

The employer has a major responsibility to show good faith in this very difficult situation.

The Bill has one positive aspect although it need not be brought in through this legislation. Clause 5 extends the term of the collective agreement to September, 1988, or September, 1989. That extension of the agreement could pave the way for the resumption of negotiations rather than the introduction of this type of legislation which is only adding to the discontent, tension and violence we are witnessing these days.

The Government could announce its intention to extend the collective agreement. A mediator could be appointed. Instead of proceeding with this Bill the employer and the union could return to the table to find a solution without direction from the Government through Parliament on the direction which should be taken.

The Government now has an opportunity to demonstrate that it means what it says, that Canada Post is an independent agency. As this debate is taking place there is a lot of unhappiness across the country. This matter ought to be resolved at the negotiating table and not by the imposition of a decision of Parliament on the collective bargaining system which has served this country and its workers very well.

Mr. Skelly: Madam Speaker, I would like to make a comment and would appreciate a response to it. It astounds me to hear representatives of the Liberal Party who sat in the last Government berate the present Government on this issue. It was the previous Government which poisoned the climate in labour relations in the Post Office so badly that we have the situation which exists today—spying on employees, harassment and intimidation. The operation which the postal corporation has worked into a fine art was started by the Liberal Party when it was in power. It started contracting out and franchising. All of the evils which we see today were started by the Liberal Party. It refused to deal with fair questions of automation raised by the employees. It was unwilling to deal with important job loss issues in a fair manner. Under the Liberal Government we lost delivery of home mail. The whole litany of poor service to the public started under that Government.

How many times did the previous Liberal Government force workers back to work in extremely negative contract situations which I believe were designed to break CUPW and remove the rights of people working in the Post Office? I know that the previous speaker was not guilty of those offences. He often cried out as a lone voice in that Cabinet. However, considering the dirty hands which his administration had, I would like to hear him justify the Liberal Party's criticism of the present Government.

Mr. Caccia: Madam Speaker, it is easy for the NDP to express synthetic indignation on matters like this, having never been in Government and never having had an opportunity to carry the responsibility of governing. That is a typical stance of the NDP.

There is a provision in the Labour Code on automation, introduced by the Liberal Government, to protect workers from dislocation due to the adoption of new technologies in the work place. That measure was hotly contested in the 1970s by employers. Finally, despite the opposition, the measure found its way into the Canada Labour Code. It was put there to protect workers under federal jurisdiction when their job security is at stake.

That is one of a number of measures included in the Labour Code which, I remind the Hon. Member, is not an invention of the New Democratic Party. Canada enjoys a federal labour code which covers a variety of situations because over the years the governing Liberal Party developed a substantial body of measures which are the envy of observers of the labour scene in other parts of the world.

• (1130)

It is true that we have occasionally passed back-to-work legislation through the House. I remember a number of occasions when the service that affected the public came to a complete standstill. This is not the case now with the Post Office. I must say that it is regrettable that mail service today is possible because of scab labour, but until last weekend mail was being delivered because there were rotating strikes and the public was not being inconvenienced.

When we passed legislation in previous years, we did so when it was more than evident that the public was being put at an enormous inconvenience, either because the trains had come to a stop or the harbours were not functioning. Those were real emergency situations which demanded the intervention of Parliament at a certain point.

However, I submit to the Member that we are not facing that situation yet. Therefore, it is perfectly legitimate and consistent for a Liberal to object to this type of legislation and to urge the Government to remove the scabs, give a signal on the part of management that there is goodwill to resume the negotiations and to sit down and find ways of developing a common ground.

I admit that the situation is deteriorating, not because of an attitude by one side but mainly because the Government is introducing Draconian legislation that is fueling the fire rather than taking initiatives that could have a positive effect. I hope that answers the Hon. Member's question. If he wants to ask another question I will be glad to attempt to reply.

Mr. Skelly: Madam Speaker, I think the Hon. Member side-stepped the question. Perhaps he could deal with the specifics.

The legislation before us today is Draconian. Certainly, the Government, with the postal corporation, created a situation in which the employees could not win. The Corporation has poisoned labour relations with the encouragement of the Government.

When the employees went on strike the Government acted on behalf of the Corporation by forcing the employees back to work, with some of the most negative legislation this House has seen. The Liberal Party, when it was in government, played that game with postal workers.

The Hon. Member gave an interesting exposé on the Canada Labour Code. Previous Liberal Governments played this game the Conservatives are playing today, in which they destroyed the opportunity to bargain collectively and obtain a decent contract. They were responsible for poisoning labour relations in the Post Office to the point where it was virtually impossible to obtain an agreement. When the employees were forced back to work, all the cards were in the hands of the Corporation. It was the Liberals who began the process of franchising and it was they who refused to deal with the critical question of job loss as a result of automation in the Post Office.

Will the Hon. Member come directly to the point and deal with the record of past Liberal Governments, which compares almost exactly with the present Conservative attempt to crush the postal unions and violate the rights of workers in the Post Office?

Mr. Caccia: Madam Speaker, the Hon. Member has it all wrong. He is really manufacturing issues.

He wants to create the impression from his own vivid imagination that the Liberal Party was out to destroy unions. If that were so, why have we, beginning with Mackenzie King, introduced a system of collective bargaining that has over the decades managed to resolve almost 99 per cent of the disputes in federal jurisdiction? Laws that were introduced by subsequent Liberal Governments have placed a high value on the important role that labour has to play in society and on the legitimate power labour must have in order to negotiate with the employer. Liberal Governments have developed a body of legislation and a system of resolving disputes which is probably one of the best in the world.

Perhaps the Hon. Member suffers from selective memory. Even those aspects he has put forward are incorrect. We did not shy away from protecting workers from automation. As I stated earlier, we did not shy away from reinforcing labour through labour educational programs to the tune of some $1.5 million a year between 1982 and 1984, in order to allow labour to develop its research and educational programs to perform an effective role in society.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, my remarks will be very brief. I simply want to urge opposition Parties to expedite passage of this Bill because failure to do so on the part of this Parliament would be very irresponsible and could lead to consequences that I do not believe anyone in the House wants to see.

Much of the debate about this Bill has dealt with the question of whether the Post Office is operating reasonably and properly in the circumstances. I suggest that those who review the contemporary history of the Post Office and come to the conclusion that what is happening now is improper, unfair or unreasonable is engaging in selective review.

I commend to the House a recently published book entitled, Post mortem, written by David Stewart Patterson, who is a reporter with The Globe and Mail. In his book, he reviews the contemporary history of the Post Office and talks about the various attempts by the Post Office to deal with its labour-management problems over the years.

Various Postmasters General and Ministers responsible for the Post Office have tried every technique known. The New Democratic Party approach would be to give the unions what they want. That is what the Hon. Member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet) and Bryce Mackasey did when they were Postmasters General.

Today, there is a situation in the Post Office in which independent third-party adjudicators have found that the wage costs with the Post Office are 20 per cent above national norms and productivity is 20 per cent below national norms. The total excess labour cost because of these two factors is between $460 million and $800 million a year in taxpayers' money. This is money that could be spent on day care, economic development or on job creation.

This situation exists not because the workers are lazy but because of acquiescence to militant union demands. The present work rules are impossible.

One of the salutary effects of having replacement workers there now is that management has been made aware that an inexperienced replacement worker, when management is not saddled with these horrible work rules, is much more productive. More mail is being processed by inexperienced replacement workers who are not saddled by these work rules. Something has to be done by a Parliament which feels in some way or other responsible to the taxpayers.

• (1140)

What were the other approaches? The previous speaker, the Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), has left the Chamber but forgets that in 1978 the Liberal Government brought in legislation to end a strike before it began. He was a supporter of that Government yet he stands here and sanctimoniously criticizes us. The approach that that Government took did not work. It did not help to cure the problems of the Post Office, nor did it help labour relations.

In 1981 the Liberal Government used another approach. It said that it would let the workers go on strike. For 42 days the Post Office was shut down and the cost to the small business sector in Canada was $3 billion. The Opposition is saying that the Post Office should not bring in replacement workers and the Government should not legislate an end to the strike. But what are the alternatives? I suggest they are, one, give the union everything it wants; two, shut down the Post Office.

What is the alternative which the Opposition would have us pursue? When one contemplates winning elections, one has to contemplate taking responsible positions. Let us look at four alternatives. First, give the union everything it wants—and everybody knows that many of the problems we have now are as a result of excessive union demands which have been catered to. Second, shut down the Post Office and let the economy bear the cost, which is what the previous Government did in 1981. Third, you can allow the Post Office to operate with replacement workers. I hear the Opposition saying that that is not effective. Fourth, you can legislate an end to the strike. I hear the Opposition saying that we cannot do that either. What is the position of this Opposition which says it should be given the trust of government?

The legislation which my colleague the Minister of Labour (Mr. Cadieux) brought forward is fair and even-handed. The Government is referring the dispute to an independent third party. A fair system is to have an independent third party adjudicate our disputes when we cannot agree, be it our judges in court or arbitrators in labour situations. To suggest that it is more responsible to let economic warfare carry on is wrong.

Let me say in parenthesis that the accusation has been made that the Government is out to break the union. If you are out to break a union you let the strike run for weeks and months with replacement workers so that the pressure builds up on the workers who are no longer working who see that the replacement workers are delivering the mail as effectively or more effectively than they did. Strikers start to argue with the union leadership and demand an end to the strike. That is how you break unions, Madam Speaker. If that were our Government's objective, we would let the strike run.

Mr. Skelly: That is the next step.

Mr. Andre: Because the mail is getting through we would let the strike run until the union's rank and file turn on the leadership and kick them out. That is the way you break a union. That is not what we are trying to do here. We are trying to put an end to a very difficult situation.

In this morning's Ottawa Citizen on the front page there is a quote from Darrell Tingley, the National Vice-President with CUPW, who said "—it is turning into a war zone out there". I have an incident report, as the Post Office calls it, as at six a.m. this morning.

Ms. Copps: Caused by your Government's legislation.

Mr. Andre: There is the mouth from Hamilton again.

In Atlantic Canada on Friday a bomb threat was received at a Saint John's plant. A customer in Moncton who dropped off his mail had his car damaged while attempting to leave. In North Sydney, a bus driver and replacement worker were injured when rocks were thrown through a bus window. In Bathurst, Canada Post vehicles were damaged and a CUPW member was arrested for assaulting a management employee. In Dieppe, New Brunswick, tires of vehicles attempting to enter the facility were slashed. On Saturday in Grand Falls, Newfoundland, replacement workers were assaulted by pickets. In Bathhurst, rocks were thrown at trucks entering facility. In Sydney, windows were broken, locks on external doors were broken and broken bottles and nails were spread throughout the parking lot. On Sunday, a security guard had his car damaged in Kentville. In Fredericton, a picket was charged when she damaged a taxi entering the facility. A pop bottle was thrown through the window at the home of a private sector subpost office operator in Reserve Mines, Nova Scotia. On Monday, a female picket was caught between an incoming transport truck—

Ms. Copps: A point of order, Madam Speaker. A point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I can assure the Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps) that the Speaker is not deaf. The Member has risen on a point of order. The Hon. Member for Hamilton East.

Ms. Copps: Madam Speaker, in reading out the occurrence list which includes a number of allegations of things that have happened in homes and private residences, could the Minister tells us whether there is still a law in this country that people are innocent until proven guilty? How is it—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Order, please.

Mr. Skelly: Madam Speaker, on the same point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): On the same point of order, the Hon. Member for Comox—Powell River (Mr. Skelly).

Mr. Skelly: Madam Speaker, a number of those incidents have been promoted by the postal service and the security and intelligence group. The Minister should be renaming these incidents—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Both Hon. Members, and each and everyone in this House, know that those are not points of order but points that can be raised in debate or during the question period which will follow the Minister's statement. The Hon. Minister has the floor.

Mr. Andre: On Monday, a female picket was caught between an incoming transport truck and a guard rail at the facility. The picket was taken to hospital with a possible broken leg. In Halifax, there was a fire at the main entrance of the postal facility. In Quebec, on Friday, in Sherbrooke, a bus carrying replacement workers had windows broken. On Saturday in St. Thérêse, two management supervisors were shoved while entering the facility.

In Rouyn, a replacement worker was followed by pickets after finishing her shift. Her car was stopped and she was harassed. On Sunday in Quebec City, a replacement worker was hit with a thrown brick. In Sherbrooke, 24 letter boxes were damaged. In Montreal, a street letter box was set on fire.

On Monday in Quebec City, seven pickets were arrested as trucks and replacement workers entered the plant and later four security guards were attacked by pickets. On Friday, in Toronto a police officer who was attempting to remove a picket from the path of a bus was struck by the bus. Buses carrying replacement workers had their windows smashed, a management employee was assaulted by pickets. In Windsor, on Friday night, 50 pickets were throwing rocks. In Sudbury, a customer's car was damaged by pickets. On Saturday, two union members were arrested in Ottawa, one for trespassing and the other for smashing a window. In Toronto, at the east letter processing plant, two replacement workers were injured when bus windows were smashed by rocks. A female supervisor had a picket shove a burning two-by-four at her. Thirteen replacement workers were taken to hospital after sitting in battery acid that had been placed on chairs in various rest areas. At the bulk mail facility, four management employees were chased by pickets. They were badly shaken. A regular Canada Post contractor was offered $1,000 to hitch onto the wrong trailer or to take out his trailer and then dump the mail at the Toronto bulk mail facility. In Windsor on Saturday afternoon, pickets were placing children in front of vehicles to bar entry and exit to facilities. Shortly after, a postal inspector was assaulted by pickets while crossing the line. On Sunday, in Toronto, over 200 replacement workers chose to spend the night in the south central facility rather than cross unruly picket lines. They were available for day shift work on Monday. On the Prairies, on Friday, the Saskatoon facility received a bomb threat.

On Saturday, in Winnipeg, a bomb threat was received. In Edmonton, the windshields of both a Canada Post car and a security employee car were smashed. On Sunday, a Canada Post truck was unable to enter the Calgary facility as no police were at the site. On Monday, in Brandon, a picket brandishing a bat broke a mirror on a bus. On Monday in Windsor, an Ontario replacement worker was assaulted while waiting to board a bus to take him to sort mail. In Kitchener, a replacement worker was injured by a stone thrown through the bus window. On Friday, in Port Alberni, on the West Coast, a post office customer was involved in a fist fight with an picket; a regular highway services contractor was run off the road. In New Westminster pickets were seen pouring sand into the gas tank of a truck. On Sunday, in Port Moody, a replacement worker was assaulted while trying to cross the lines. He was assisted across by the district manager who was knocked to the ground. Picket lines were established at subpost offices; these independent businesses are not involved in the dispute between CUPW and Canada Post. On Sunday, in Victoria, two Canada Post managers were struck with the stick portion of picket signs. On Monday, in Vancouver, a convoy of buses that was carrying replacement workers was blocked from getting into the Vancouver plant by a trolley bus that had its wires cut. In Victoria a replacement worker was assaulted by a picket.

Ms. Copps: I rise on a point of order. I believe if you refer to the Standing Orders, Madam Speaker, you will realize that there is prohibition against reading lists of great length in the House. I wonder if you could exercise that prohibition.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am sure that the Hon. Minister will continue to tell us more after the list is completed. I think it is quite pertinent to the debate, and I have no intention of stopping the debate at the present moment.

Mr. Andre: The point of that list is to make it clear to the House, the public, and the Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps), who has now left the Chamber—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am sure that the Hon. Minister does know of the rule which forbids a Member to mention the presence or absence of Hon. Members in the House. This is the second time during his speech that the Minister has done so. I would appreciate it if he would not do so again.

Mr. Andre: Thank you, Madam Speaker, and I should point out that the Hon. Member has returned.

Ms. Copps: Although the ruling vis-à-vis the reading of the list was that the Minister would be allowed to continue, I am sure that the Minister would wish to comply with the Standing Order that requires him to table documents from which he reads in a lengthy fashion. I would ask the Minister, through the Chair, to table the document.

Mr. Andre: I have read the complete document, but if the Hon. Member does not wish to wait until Hansard, she can have what I have read. I do not mind.

Ms. Copps: I believe that there is a requirement to table the document. I distinctly saw the Minister reading and quoting from a document at great length. Before he takes some of the pages out of the document, which he may not wish to be made public, and I see him removing pages from the stapled version, would the Minister please table the document as per the Standing Orders.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Chair has heard the Minister state that he was quite willing to table the document from which he was reading. The Hon. Minister has the floor.

Mr. Andre: The fact of the matter is that we are getting involved in a point of order regarding whether I need to table my notes or not table my notes, and what is a document. These are notes prepared for me on what has happened. There is no principle in the Standing Orders that requires me to table my notes.

Ms. Copps: Yes, there is.

Mr. Andre: Rather than get involved in this, perhaps the Chair will not allow—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): On the same point of order, the Hon. Member for Comox—Powell River.

Mr. Skelly: Contrary to the statement of the Chair, in my hearing, the Minister did not state that he was prepared to table the document. The Minister stated that he was prepared to give it to the Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps). In order that other Members of the House may have access to the same information, which the Minister purports to be true, I would certainly wish to see the documents, and ask that the Chair request that the Minister table those documents.

Mr. Andre: If I may be permitted to finish my remarks, which I can do quickly, without further interruption from the Opposition, then I will deal with the matter in question.

The purpose of reading this list of incidents and bringing them to the attention of the House is to make Members aware that there are activities which are posing a serious danger—

Ms. Copps: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am pursuing the point of order because I do not believe it is the decision of the Minister whether or not he chooses to table the document. The Standing Orders specifically require that if there is a document from which he quotes at great length then he must table the document. It is part of the Standing Orders. I believe the Chair is aware of the Standing Order.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I do understand and know of the Standing Order to which the Hon. Member for Hamilton East is referring. The Hon. Minister first stated that he was prepared to give his notes, the document, to the Hon. Member. At first the Chair understood that it was an official document. The Hon. Minister has now put the point in a very succinct fashion by stating that they are notes which were prepared for him in order to address the House this morning. A Minister does not have to table personal notes. It will be his decision whether or not to give the Hon. Member a copy of his notes. The Chair cannot make a ruling on this.

I hope that this is the end of this point of order.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I would just like to draw the attention of the House to Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, page 138. In Citation 390 there is a long list of criteria enumerated that are to be applied when determining if government papers or documents should be produced.

I wish to ask the Chair to refer to all the citations in Beauchesne, not only 390, which pertain to the long established practice that, where a Minister reads from a document, as the Minister has done, all Members of the House, not only the Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps), should be given the benefit of that list in order that they can refer to the accuracy of the statements that have been made, and also have the privilege of using those examples to perhaps argue with the Minister in debate of the House.

Mr. Skelly: I rise on the same point of order, Madam Speaker. The question was raised that the Minister stated he was reading from his notes and not from a document. The Minister did mention that he was quoting from the daily occurrence report. I am sure the ears of every Member in the House picked up when the Minister stated that. The document the Minister referred to ought to be tabled in the House; not given informally to one Member but given to every Member of the House.

Mr. Andre: I believe the Hon. Members have simply rehashed a point upon which you have already ruled, Madam Speaker, so there is no need to go any further.

The point I am trying to make which the Opposition does not wish me to make—

Ms. Copps: Is there a ruling?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Chair at this point is referring to Citation 327 where it states:

> 327.(1) A Minister of the Crown is not at liberty to read or quote from a despatch or other state paper not before the House—

From my understanding of what the Minister has stated, what he is quoting from is not a despatch or a state paper. Henceforth, I see no obligation for the Minister to table the document.

On the other hand, I would ask that the Minister consider making it available to the Hon. Member, as the Minister has stated he would.

This point of order has now been ruled upon, and I will not accept any other intervention on it.

Mr. Skelly: Madam Speaker, I rise on a further point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it a separate point of order?

Mr. Skelly: It is a separate point of order.

I made notes on the Minister's statement. The notes indicate that the Minister used the term "a daily occurrence sheet".

• (1200)

It has been fairly clear that we do not have a daily occurrence sheet from which he was quoting. He must have been quoting from some other more informal source, and I think the Minister ought to correct the record rather than smear postal workers.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Hon. Member assured the Chair that this was a different point of order. Obviously it is not, and this point has been ruled upon. The Minister has the floor.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, the point I am trying to make, which the Opposition does not want me to make, is that we know from reports over the long weekend that there is damage and that there have been numerous incidents of violence across the country. People have been injured, fortunately not seriously yet. Well, broken legs or being hit by bricks is pretty serious, but no one has died and no one, so far at least, has required extensive medical treatment, we think.

However, how long will that be the case? If opposition Members say that they are prepared to delay this legislation for as long as they are able to use the rules to do so, then they ought to recognize that in essence they are saying that they are prepared to see this violence continue and are prepared to accept that injuries may occur. That would be very, very irresponsible on the part of any parliamentarian in the House. They have a position to take. They have made their positions known. They have articulated the disputes they have with the Government, as is quite proper in this place. It is quite proper in this place that we then divide on it, that we have the vote and we proceed. The use of delay tactics for the sake of delay tactics when we are talking about the personal safety of Canadian citizens is something I would urge the Opposition to give very careful consideration, before deciding on any position of delay for delay's sake. That was the purpose.

On the question of the point of order and the supposed document, the notes I have been reading from, I am supplied with this information on a regular basis. It is part of my job as a Minister to be up to date and aware. I brought it to the attention of the House fully in debate. I was quite prepared to share documents, but in view of the actions, the attitudes, and the precedent which might be established, I will regrettably say "no" to that action, for to say otherwise would be a note of approval or recognition of the appropriateness of opposition actions in this regard, which I do not think is warranted.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, unfortunately the way the Minister ended off his speech by refusing to table the document indicates the real problem in this dispute, and that has been the attitude of the Minister.

He has quoted from a document. He has used part of a document. He has given not only the House but the public a certain viewpoint because of the document from which he read, but he refuses to give the entire document to the House or to the people of Canada. I think that is a sad reflection of the way the Government has handled the dispute.

I may point out that if we had the entire document we may see other problems which could be associated and directly related to the role of Canada Post.

There have been documents in the past, documents which I have raised in the House, the internal documents of Canada Post, of what happened in the letter carriers' dispute, where they admit that they intimidated workers despite the fact that the Canada Labour Code clearly spelled out that they cannot force a worker to do the work which is normally done by someone who is on strike. The Canada Labour Code points that out very clearly, yet Canada Post broke that law, did it on an ongoing basis, and did it deliberately.

It is not just my opinion or the opinion in the internal document. It was also the opinion of the Canada Labour Relations Board when it found against Canada Post, when it found that Canada Post was not obeying the law of the land.

Obviously the failure by the Government to produce the entire document is an attempt by the Government to leave an impression without giving the public the benefit of the entire picture. I think that is propaganda and I think it is deliberate on the Government's part.

The reason I rose to speak was not to comment upon the document. I wanted to comment on the fact we just heard from the Minister responsible for Canada Post. He spoke for over 20 minutes in the House and did not spend one minute on the issue that has caused the strike. He did not mention franchising-out. He did not mention what has happened to women workers who are getting a decent salary working at wickets across the country and will not be working as a result of the position taken by Canada Post.

What will happen to those jobs? They will be taken by other women who will be working part time and for minimum wages. It is ridiculous to have the Minister rise in the House to do all the fear mongering he can but not deal with the issues which have caused the dispute. That was regrettable. I wish the Minister would at least try to defend his position with regard to franchising-out those jobs and what it will do to the salaries of women workers across the land.

In closing I must say that the attitude of the Minister is the cause of the national strike. It is not just a matter of postal history. It is a matter of what is happening at this time. Certainly there have been disputes in the Post Office in the past, but the problem at the present time is the issue of franchising-out, and it is because the Government refuses to negotiate it that we have a strike at this time.

Before sitting down, I must point out that each and every one of the occurrences which he quoted, from the document he pretends not to have, happened after the Government moved to legislate an end to the strike. They did not happen when it was a rotating strike. They happened after the Government forced the hand of union members across the country, and I think he should admit it. The violence out there, the national strike out there, was caused by the Government. It is interesting to note that editorials in The Edmonton Journal and the Winnipeg Free Press have indicated that this is a strike caused by government.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, very quickly, in terms of the accusation of deliberate intimidation during the LCUC strike, the Hon. Member is wrong in his assertions and is wrong in his claims. There was one incident in Halifax involving a truck of mail and a local supervisor. Mail is handled both by CUPW and LCUC workers; sometimes the divisions are not clear. The local manager asked CUPW workers to help unload the truck.

They refused. He accused them of insubordination, and it turned out that they filed a grievance and the Canada Labour Relations Board said that they did not have to do the work. It was a local manager who made a decision at the point. To translate that into an orchestrated routine of intimidation and law-breaking is extreme at the least.

The Hon. Member invited me to get involved in one of the issues at the table. I have deliberately avoided doing that because I happen to think that it should be negotiated at the table between Canada Post and the letter carriers' union.

I realize that the Hon. Member and his Party have certain obligations to Mr. Parrot and CUPW which require them to get involved in the details of the dispute and the negotiations at the table, but I think that is improper.

Finally, on the question of violence, I hope Hon. Members have not forgotten that the violence started with the rotating strikes before the Government had made any decision about back-to-work legislation. There was violence in Nanaimo prior to that. To suggest somehow that everything was peaceful, that there was no violence, and that the violence only started upon introduction of the Bill is in fact a distortion of history. I reported to the House about incidents over the weekend. It would have been a much longer list if I had reported on incidents all the way back.

• (1210)

The Hon. Member says that this new thing has to do with franchising and so on. I wonder if he is aware that in 1913, there were 14,132 sub post offices, all run by the private sector. The Post Office has never had as many as that. To suggest that the private sector running the sale of stamps is a new phenomenon is simply not true. In fact it has always been that way with the Post Office since it was formed through the Post Office Act of 1968. As I say, we had the maximum number of private sector post outlets in 1913.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, during his speech the Minister did not in my view at any time address the Bill before the House. Not one of his comments was directed to the contents or the principle of the Bill.

Clause 11(2) in my view provides for a serious and a very difficult penalty. What was the Government's rationale for putting forth such severe, such hard and such regressive penalties?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I did not go over that, of course, because my colleague, the Minister of Labour did in his opening remarks and I did not think it was necessary to be repetitious. The rationale, I think, was to ensure, to the extent possible, compliance with the law. It had been used previously in back-to-work legislation.

I know the Hon. Member is not suggesting that it would be acceptable for union leadership in this case, or in any other case, to say they refuse to obey the law of the land. That clearly is an unacceptable situation so the question then is, what form of penalty should be used.

As the Hon. Member knows, the Government he supported brought in back-to-work legislation in 1978. Incidentally, it introduced the legislation before the strike started. It was not passed until the strike was three days old, and the union disobeyed. At that time, Mr. Parrot deliberately disobeyed the law. Eventually, after appeals and so on, he served some 60 days or so in jail. That did not seem to serve any useful purpose, so this Government is saying perhaps we ought to look at some other penalties which will encourage compliance with the law.

I do not understand what is so severe about saying that a person who would deliberately disobey the law would thereby lose the right to serve in a responsible position with the union for five years. We are not taking away their freedom, we are not imposing huge fines on them, we are not throwing them in prison, we are just saying that we expect people in responsible positions to behave responsibly and obey the law, and if they refuse to obey the law and behave responsibly then we cannot allow them to be in a responsible position. I do not consider that too severe.

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox—Powell River): Madam Speaker, it is a severe temptation to comment on the speech of the Minister responsible for the Canada Post Corporation. His speech dealt with the question of violence. There is not a Member in the House who does not abhor violence, but the cause of the violence must be recognized. I would say that that cause lies squarely on the shoulders of the Government and the Canada Post Corporation.

The Conservative Government has done more to precipitate the violence in the letter carriers' strike and the violence in the present situation than any trade unionist involved in this dispute. The Government has created a labour relations climate that is poisoned. The Government has allowed the Canada Post Corporation to execute one of the most vigourous anti-union and anti-employee programs that I have seen in many years.

The kinds of intimidations that are going on in the Post Office today are severe. The objective is clear. It is to break the power of the union in the Post Office and to break the union. We have had very interesting examples of this intimidation raised. One I raised by way of example to the Minister is the case of a woman working in Williams Lake in a Post Office. Her family had been in Norway and they returned to Canada with whooping cough. The woman's doctor ordered her and the family to be quarantined. The local postmaster on the other hand said to her, "If you do not come to work, you will be fired". The woman of course followed the advice of her doctor and did not come in. The harassment goes from there. The woman is phoned at home, contrary to conditions in the contract, and harassed by management. The issue is referred to the postal corporation's doctor who poses as a public health official and phones the woman's doctor, extracts confidential information about her illness and then berates the doctor for quarantining the woman and suggests that she should be going back to work immediately.

That is not the end of the story. Not only is there harassment, but absolutely unethical behavior of one medical practitioner to another. Then the postal administration decides that, even though the woman is home with an illness quarantine and is a hazard to her fellow employees, she can no longer have her pay cheques. Her pay cheques will be withheld. She cannot pay her bills, feed her family or pay her mortgage. Another form of harassment and intimidation. This goes on and on. It is the most amazing litany of anti-labour practices that I have heard in a long time. Finally, the woman broke out with active whooping cough and all was forgiven and forgotten because of course she would be an immediate health threat to everyone else around her, but not for the operation of Canada Post. The local postmaster was quite prepared to override a local doctor and jeopardize the health of other employees.

The question has been raised about the whole matter of incentives that postmasters and management are given for attendance bonuses. If they can get the worker attendance level up, there are premiums which accrue to the local postmasters and management officials. It is an absolute prescription in many cases for intimidation and harassment of employees. That harassment goes on. Those employees do feel the weight of oppression in that operation. This is absolutely unscrupulous labour relations.

The worst of all possible situations is of course euphemistically referred to by the Minister as the use of replacement workers. They are known in much wider circles as scabs. They are unfortunate individuals. The Governments, both right-wing provincial Governments and this right-wing Conservative Government, hold these individuals in absolute contempt. There is no dignity in the minds of the Government in the scabs forced into the job. They are told that they will be off welfare if they do not take scab positions. They will lose their unemployment insurance benefits if they do not become Conservative Government replacement workers to break the postal union. If they do not do that, then they lose their incomes. What is an individual to say when crushed between right-wing provincial Governments and the right-wing Conservative Government which holds them in total contempt?

So the workers are loaded on buses, swooped up in helicopters and held in warehouses, and eventually, the time comes to try to shove them through a picket line. I would point out that most of the people working in many of these post offices are women. In many of the post offices in the communities I represent there are five, six or eight women who operate those wicket positions, sort the mail and do the other things required to keep the community service going. They are not ogres. In many cases they are single parents trying to raise a couple of kids. These are the people out on the picket line who the Minister is talking about. The Post Office hires security guards to crash through these women.

It has been communicated to me by the people on the picket line that the violence started when people from outside approached the picket line and responded violently to those on the picket line and the situation deteriorated. Many of the injured were people on the picket line. For my money, these people were sent in as provocateurs to deliberately create violence.

Why would the Corporation and the Government do that? I suggest it is to give the impression to the public that this was a dangerous and threatening situation and the public would then support this Draconian legislation. That is the scenario many people in those communities believe. We had the letter carriers dispute and now this situation with CUPW, and the responsibility for the violence lies in the hands of the Government. It has created a situation which allows the Corporation to harass, intimidate and exploit not only the Post Office workers but the replacement workers as well.

The replacement workers have a great future; either go out and break through the line and participate in violence or lose your social assistance or unemployment insurance. Once inside, if you find you do not like the situation and you are out the door you cannot collect unemployment insurance. They are in a most disgusting and contemptible situation precipitated by the Government. That is a real fact of life for those caught by this replacement workers scam of which the Minister speaks so proudly. It is a typical program of the Conservative Government assisted by the Unemployment Insurance Commission on one hand and the Corporation on another. It is a truly disgusting act, despised by most Canadians.

Mr. Shields: You are unbelievable.

Mr. Skelly: Relax, Jack. The Minister talked about 1913 being a time of maximum franchising. At that time we had about four million people in the second largest country in the world. You can understand that anyone around then was probably prepared to participate in some way in a national communications system. Under those conditions it made sense to do so. It does not make sense to do so today. This is an attack on postal workers. The Minister responsible indicated that in his speech. He said the surplus labour cost in the Post Office is so high that we must save taxpayers' money and destroy the working conditions and wages of people in the Post Office. We will do it by franchising.

It is an old trick for destroying the union. You simply go to the private sector and say we have a problem. We are paying for about 4,800 wicket positions. We want to reduce their wages from $14 an hour to $4.50 an hour, about the minimum wage. We would like to put the wicket in the drugstore. Of course, the local Shoppers Drug Mart jumps at it and pays a little above minimum wage for a job that used to command a reasonable salary. People in the Post Office have the benefits of a union agreement which the Minister professes to support at the same time as he is quite prepared to destroy it by franchising-out.

I found out the other day that mail coming to me as a Member of Parliament cannot be picked up at a Post Office. We have to go down to the middle of a shopping mall to pick it up. The other day my assistant was complaining that she could not pick up two very large bags of mail at the back door of the Post Office anymore. She has to drag these things through a mall with no security or anything else. That must change. Many citizens are complaining about the fact they cannot use the Post Office and that the facilities in the back of some store or laundry are completely unacceptable.

The key point is that the Government is prepared to deliver postal service on the backs of workers who are paid a minimum rather than a decent wage. Every member of the Conservative caucus ought to be disgusted by this. Imagine the situation of a single parent. I have confronted this situation on the picket line. They are trying to raise a couple of kids on $12 to $14 an hour and if this thing goes through their jobs are gone. They will be lucky to get the job in the local Shoppers Drug Mart and they will be paid $5 an hour. Trying to raise their family on that means they are better off on welfare. That is what the Minister wants. That is what the Conservative Government wants. That is not what we in the NDP want and we will fight it to the end. It is a disgusting situation for most Canadians and I think they despise it.

An Hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Skelly: The true test of that is 24 per cent in the popularity polls. It is hard to conceive of a political Party being able to drop even further, but when the postal carrier strike was over it dropped like a rock. After this strike, given the Draconian legislation we have in front of us, the Government is finished. Its popularity will drop even further.

It is of critical importance that this legislation be withdrawn. The Minister asked what the Opposition would do. He said we would totally cave in to CUPW, give them everything they want, send them all to Bermuda for 12 months. Absolute nonsense. I recognize there has to be a philosophical difference in order to have opposition. Yet what the Conservatives believe is that workers do not have rights.

Mr. McDermid: What a crock.

Mr. Skelly: The right to bargain collectively with your employer, when it interferes with the Government's goals, results in the trashing of the Post Office. The workers are going to lose.

Mr. McDermid: What nonsense.

Mr. Skelly: My friend says "nonsense". Postmasters in many communities who talk to the employees say they will be lucky if they have a job a year from now. They should start looking for other employment because the Post Office is gone with the wind.

Mr. McDermid: Talk about scare tactics.

Mr. Skelly: I am simply repeating what postmasters have told employees.

Mr. McDermid: They are using scare tactics.

Mr. Skelly: They are simply quoting from the management plan which was put in place by the Conservative Government. A beautiful example is the Post Office in Comox, British Columbia.

Mr. McDermid: Try my riding.

Mr. Skelly: If the Hon. Member is not responsible enough to look after the concerns of his constituents and protect the postal service, that does not surprise me one iota. I am concerned about that post office in Comox. It is very clear that the actions of the Canada Post Corporation will put that post office away. The staff has been reduced. The contract entitles it to two positions but Canada Post refuses to fill the other. That means that while preparing for the day the individual worker often cannot open until late in the morning. That post office serves thousands of people in the community of Comox and the surrounding area. The individual worker must close for coffee breaks and lunch. By 3.45 in the afternoon the individual worker must close the post office in order to get the day-end accounting done.

• (1230)

Senior citizens in the community of Comox do not have the benefit of coherent postal service because that post office is closed for a good portion of the day with one individual trying to provide service. The Post Office says that it will fix the problem of inconvenience by franchising out. On either side of that post office, within walking distance for senior citizens, two stores now provide franchise service. They are paying their workers the minimum wage rather than the postal contract rate.

Mr. Shields: Not true.

Mr. Skelly: One of my Conservative colleagues has accused me of lying to the House. He says that is not true. That is absolutely true and there will be a community meeting very soon to deal with that issue in the town of Comox.

If this were the only case of this kind there might be some strange justification for it, but it is not the only case. The Conservative Government has a determined plan to privatize the functions of the Post Office and get rid of its budget and its responsibility for it. Transportation in the Post Office has been contracted out to private companies, as have rural mail service and wicket functions. I have no doubt that if the Government and its agent, the Canada Post Corporation, is allowed to continue, the sorting function will also be franchised out in the future. That will, of course, destroy the union and will put an enormous number of people out of work. They will lose a decent union contract with fair wages and working conditions and will be put into a situation of having no protection, poor working conditions, and earning minimum wage. That is the direction in which the Government will take Canada Post and it is completely unacceptable.

What is the option, Madam Speaker? The option is not Draconian legislation and it is not caving in to the Canada Post Corporation or to CUPW. The option is to create an environment of decent working conditions and accept that union and management should be able to bargain in good faith without the Government and the Corporation poisoning the water hole. This situation was created by deliberate design. The poisoned environment, for which the previous Liberal Government has substantial responsibility, becomes self-justification for privatizing the Post Office and getting it off the backs of Canadians, as the Conservative Government so often puts it.

We must change this by creating a decent environment within the Post Office and encouraging the collective bargaining process to resolve this matter. That was the purpose of passing the law to create the Canada Post Corporation. It was not to permit the Conservatives to do this to the country.

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Member for Comox—Powell River (Mr. Skelly). Clause 7 of the Bill refers the mediator-arbitrator to the conciliation report. In fact, at the top of page 4 of the Bill it says that the mediator-arbitrator should give due cognizance to the conciliation report. We know that the conciliation report is slanted in favour of the franchising out of postal operations. I would like to ask the Member some questions on this subject.

There are various circumstances surrounding franchising. On the one hand, the Government may decide to close a local post office and have the service provided by a franchise in a drug store or a convenience store. In this situation people who were being paid decent salaries of approximately $13 an hour could be replaced by people earning the minimum wage. On the other hand, in the situation of an entire new subdivision being built where no post offices previously existed the Post Office could decide to have the mail delivered by a franchise operation.

What does the Member think of these possibilities? Does he think that the Government should have directed the mediator-arbitrator to give "due cognizance" to the conciliation report?

Mr. Skelly: Madam Speaker, the issue of franchising out is complex. There are two ways in which to serve communities in which there is not sufficient volume to justify a full-time operation. There are many such communities in remote areas. My riding is filled with them. On the other hand, when new communities develop where there is a substantial amount of work to be done, creative means can be used to keep operations within a collective bargaining agreement under the framework of the union. The new outlook postal stations have fallen within the purview of the union agreement and have been very successful. However, the postal corporation is not interested in expanding services. The supermailbox is an example of the corporation's failure to deliver mail to homes in new subdivisions. A chaotic and ridiculous situation has been created.

As the Member well knows, if the Government and the postal corporation wanted to deal in good faith with their employees and the communities they serve we would see solid progress with due and fair cognizance of the situation. The corporation would be trying to keep as many of the positions as possible in the expanded service area within the framework of CUPW and the Post Office. Rather than that, Canada Post has deliberately tried to franchise out in order to get rid of CUPW positions and drop the wage levels from $12 or $14 an hour to $4.50 an hour. I know that my colleague is aware of that and is as concerned about it as we are.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Are there further questions or comments? The Hon. Member for Saint-John's East (Mr. Harris).

Ms. Copps: I rise on debate, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I would like to advise the Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps) that there are still five minutes available for questions and comments and the Hon. Member has asked for the floor. I do hope that she does agree with the Chair for once.

Mr. Harris: Madam Speaker, would the Hon. Member care to comment on the remarks made by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Andre) this morning in debate? He said that if responsible officials of the union violate the Act and are convicted they will not be able to serve in responsible capacities in the union. The legislation, of course, says that if an individual is convicted, that individual may not be an officer or representative of the union and shall not be employed in any capacity by or act as an officer or representative of the union at any time within the next five years. Would the Hon. Member comment on this provision? It seems to be an additional punishment on the individual, who may not be employed in any capacity by another entity for a period of five years.

• (1240)

As a lawyer, this seems to be a reprehensible indication of the Government's intention to control the activities of individuals in the union movment of this country. Will the Hon. Member comment on that?

Mr. Skelly: Madam Speaker, the Hon. Member's point is extremely relevant. When an individual is charged with breaking the law of the land, that person must answer to that charge and, if guilty, the court would impose a fit sentence. Once the sentence is served, the individual should definitely be eligible to resume his or her activities as a citizen of Canada. That is a part of the concept of paying a penalty.

The Hon. Member raises an interesting situation. This is a mechanism to assist in breaking the union. There is no doubt that the people who lead this union enjoy the confidence of the rank and file. If they are prohibited from holding elected office for five years, they are likely to be voted-in anyway, which will lead to a confrontation between the Government and the union. The Government could then move to put the union under trusteeship, thereby excelerating the union-busting procedure.

This is the most blatant example of union-busting I have seen in a long time. It sets the conditions by which the Government can now have more tools to force the destruction of this union.

I am extremely concerned that the Government did not choose the other route and enforce the Corporation to adhere to the principle that it must bargain with its employees in good faith and adhere to the Canada Labour Code.

Once example of that lack of adherence is the grievance procedure. Management regularly violates the contract and dares the employee to take it through the four stages of the grievance procedure. That is a long procedure and the individual who is suspended, deprived or penalized in some way must endure that long period of time. Therefore, an increasing number of workers are reluctant to do anything but submit to oppressive management. The harassment and intimidation as a result of management refusing to adhere to the grievance system helps to break the union by creating fear among the employees.

The point raised by my colleague today is the end result of one of the most Draconian pieces of legislation we have seen in the House. It is the continuation of a policy that begins with shop management on the floor of the Post Office who have been given the direction to harass and intimidate employees, and fail to follow the established practices in labour-management relations that allow grievances to be dealt with quickly and effectively. The practice of the management, assisted by the Government, is one of the worst examples of labour-management relations I have seen.

Mr. Shields: Madam Speaker, the Hon. Member began his speech this morning by saying that there is no one in the House who would condone violence. How does he square this with the Hon. Member for New Westminster—Coquitlam (Ms. Jewett) who said in the House that there are times when violence could be condoned? His Leader also indicated that he supported the statement that there are times when violence would be condoned. Does the Hon. Member, like his Party, condone violence?

Mr. Skelly: Madam Speaker, I have profound respect for my colleague, the Hon. Member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields), who is one of the most thoughtful and diligent people in the House. I think he knows that his remark was made in a mischievous fashion.

I assume he would not have participated in the Second World War conflict to overthrow Hitler. I suppose he is trying to tell us that violence on the part of Canadians in order to re-establish democracy and fight for self-preservation was not condoned.

I believe my colleague, the Hon. Member for New Westminster—Coquitlam (Ms. Jewett), was basically saying that the administration of South Africa has inflicted such terrible violence on black South Africans that there are very few options left to them but to rise up and throw off the yoke of violence that has been flung around their necks.

I would ask my colleague why he was opposed to the use of violence by Canadian Armed Forces to overthrow Hitler's regime in World War II.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, first, I might say that I am surprised that no government Members are rising to speak in defence of this particularly ignominious piece of legislation.

This morning, the Minister reponsible for Canada Post, from what he referred to as his notes, cited a litany of excesses which had apparently prompted this legislation. However, the one element the Minister forgot to mention in his speech was that the litany of excesses that have occurred were not prior to but as a result of his Government's imposition of a proposed back-to-work order on the workers involved in the postal dispute.

Further, the Minister laid his cards on the table for the people of Canada when he claimed on the one hand that he had not taken a position with respect to the matters in negotiation while, on the other, he stated quite clearly that the mail is getting through and talked about excessive union demands.

The Minister's statement that the mail is getting through suggests to me that we do not have a national emergency. Furthermore, his statement about excessive union demands quite clearly demonstrates that the Government has a hidden agenda, together with Canada Post, to break the backs of workers across the country. This intent is demonstrated quite categorically by the Draconian measures which have been embodied in this Bill and particularly by the Government's claim that we should consider the recommendations of the Foisy Report.

The Government is laying out the plan for a settlement before one has been negotiated. I remind the Minister and the Government that it was the union that first called for a mediator and that the union was prepared to go back to the bargaining table.

However, it was not in the interests of Canada Post or the Government to have a negotiated settlement because of its agenda which includes breaking the back of the union. What better way to do so than by knowingly and willfully introducing back-to-work legislation that will have the effect of escalating the difficulties on the picket-lines and, in fact, will involve an increase in violence as we saw over the weekend.

The Government cannot then claim this morning that increasing violence must lead to back-to-work legislation when the fact is that back-to-work legislation has created the violence on the picket-line. The Government introduced this legislation knowing this would happen because it wanted to break the back of the union once and for all. How the Minister can stand here in the House—Madam Speaker, there does not appear to be a quorum in the House.

• (1250)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): There is quorum now. The Hon. Member has the floor.

Ms. Copps: I heard a government Member saying that the Members wanted to hide behind the curtains because they could then adjust the volume. I would like to remind Hon. Members that the volume they will have to deal with is the volume of complaints from constituents who will see through this facade, this feigned national emergency which was created by the Government, aided and abetted by Canada Post. This Government is out to break the backs of working people. I find it passing strange that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) who claims to be the great negotiator stands back and says nothing while he permits his Minister of Labour (Mr. Cadieux) to introduce a piece of legislation that is so Draconian in its influence that it is possibly a violation of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Of course the Government does not care about the Charter of Rights and Freedoms because it does not believe that individuals should have access to a Charter of Rights to protect them. That is clear from the contents of this piece of legislation. Any thinking person in Canada who reviews this Bill will realize that the prohibition laid down, including fines of up to $50,000 against individuals and up to $100,000 against unions for not abiding by the terms of the legislation, is heinous enough in itself, but on top of these very onerous fines the Government is suggesting that if any person for any reason does not comply with the contents of the Bill, he or she will be forced, potentially, out of his or her job for a period of up to five years.

If I were the president of my local and in that capacity did not respect the prohibition against picketing or did not come back to work on the first day I was ordered to, I could lose my job for up to five years. Canadians believe that that is bad and is wrong. I think it is very sad that the Government has attempted to create a climate of violence in an effort to justify to Canadians what is really a very onerous and Draconian piece of legislation.

I am not surprised that we heard the Minister responsible for Canada Post here this morning negotiating the contract on the floor of the House of Commons by suggesting that the union had made excessive demands.

Let us look at the demands, Madam Speaker. Everybody knows that the union involved is not the most popular union in Canada but at the same time it has been quite responsible in the issues it has raised for the attention of the public and for the attention of Canada Post, namely, the issues of franchising and part-time workers.

We recall quite vividly the Prime Minister making a promise before all people in Canada that he was going to deal with the issue of part-time workers, who are primarily women. The union in this case has shown the lead with respect to the treatment of part-time workers. Part-time workers under the collective agreement are protected. They do have access in many respects to similar kinds of benefits that might be available to full-time workers. The union would like to improve that situation for part-time workers.

Instead we have the company, aided and abetted by the Government, which does not want to deal with the question of part-time workers, even though the Prime Minister himself promised that resolving the difficulties facing mostly women, who are working part time—many of whom would like to work full time but jobs are not available—would be a number one priority of the Government. Yet when the opportunity was presented to deal with it in the context of these negotiations, the Government turned its back on the working people.

The Government is asking the opposition Parties to pass a piece of legislation expeditiously which succeeds in discriminating against women and violating potentially the Charter of Rights and Freedoms by denying a worker the right to work for up to five years, if he or she is responsible for an infringement under this Bill. This legislation levies fines of up to $50,000 or $100,000 for individuals and/or unions which might be involved in violations, and the Government is coming down hard because it is trying to create a climate of violence in which it can be justified in breaking the back of the union, in the same way that Ronald Reagan made breaking unions a hallmark of his administration in the United States.

It is shameful for a Prime Minister who claims to be a negotiator, and allegedly built a reputation on his abilities to bring the parties together, to stand silently by while his Minister of Labour and his Minister responsible for Canada Post, siding only with the company in not agreeing to the union's demand for a mediator, are trying to create a situation where violence is likely to occur.

As a Member, I will not take the rap the Government will try to lay on us in Opposition, that it is our fault because we do not move quickly with the legislation. The Government moved first by claiming the possibility of back-to-work legislation as early as October 3. The Minister of Labour had already set the stage. The company had no need to negotiate in good faith because it knew the Government would move in with a heavy hand.

Up until the Government moved in with the back-to-work legislation, according to the company's own spokesman, the mail was moving and there was no problem. Canada Post was even spending hundreds of thousands of dollars telling Canadians "to mail your mail. It is getting through. There is no problem." At the same time that Canada Post was spending hundreds of thousands of dollars to hire scabs at $156 a day, and running advertising campaigns suggesting there were no problems, it was telling its own employees not to use the mails. I refer to a directive which went out to all people working in the Huron District, which includes Hamilton, London and various areas in that neighbourhood even though Canada Post was telling Canadians to use the mail, that there were no problems. This is how much you can believe the word of Canada Post. It was concerned that pay cheques would not get through for its employees and it sent out a directive. A separate mail service was set up where Canada Post's mail was going from one postal area to another by private car. This directive to all employees said that they were not to get their pay cheques through the mail, as is normally the case, because the mail could not be trusted, but through a special service which was established in the same way the special mail service was established only for Canada Post during the previous rotating walkouts.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT—EFFECT ON WESTERN LOW SULPHUR COAL SALES

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, months ago the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Mazankowski) announced an action committee to identify ways to improve the chances of selling western Canada's low sulphur coal in Ontario. If Ontario Hydro alone were to use western Canadian instead of United States coal, there could be up to 13,000 new jobs in western Canada, and significant reductions in acid gas pollution.

At present, American coal is up to $20 per tonne cheaper. In addition, with the Canada-U.S. trade agreement guaranteeing duty-free access to Canada, there will be little incentive for Ontario Hydro, or other industries, to use western Canadian coal. Furthermore, the so-called free trade agreement could prevent us from adopting transportation subsidies that would lower the cost of moving western Canadian coal to markets in eastern Canada.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister speak to western miners, to whom he promised seven months ago to expand the market of western coal, and explain the consequences of the so-called free trade agreement which gives our energy resources away to U.S. industry, restricts Canadian use of Canadian resources, and removes desirable opportunities for future expansion?

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CANADIAN NAVAL AIR GROUP ASSOCIATION—OTTAWA REUNION

Mr. W. R. Bud Jardine (Northumberland—Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, they gathered here in the nation's capital on the weekend by the hundreds. They came from all parts of our country and beyond, former officers and men of the Royal Canadian Navy. They came to pay tribute to one of Canada's great wartime heroes, Lieutenant Hampton Grey, the only Canadian naval officer and naval aviator ever to have been awarded the Victoria Cross, and it was done so posthumously.

They came to reminisce, those men who, in the words of an unknown naval aviator, knew fear and excitement, kinship and challenge, joy and victory, because they shared the carrier experience. They are members of CNAG, the Canadian Naval Air Group Association, which was formed at the demise of the Royal Canadian Navy and Canada's last aircraft carrier, Her Majesty's Canadian Ship Bonaventure. They are all men who served in Canada's flat tops. They belong now to a closed shop, a rare breed, and I salute the contribution they made collectively to Canada's naval history, and to the history of aviation in Canada.

NOBEL PEACE PRIZE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF AWARD TO PRESIDENT ARIAS OF COSTA RICA

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan—Malahat—The Islands): Mr. Speaker, President Oscar Arias of Costa Rica has been awarded the Nobel Prize for his work in developing and forwarding a peace plan for Central America.

Despite economic sabre rattling by President Reagan, and some of the right wing Republicans who hope to succeed him as President, the people of Central America have pushed ahead with the peace agenda which was adopted by the five Central American Presidents on August 7. For the first time in 26 years, Guatemalan guerrillas and Government are talking with each other. Talks are also under way in El Salvador. The Nicaraguan Government has set up reconciliation committees throughout the country. It announced a unilateral cease-fire in one region, and state of emergency regulations have been relaxed.

The violence in Central America has been rooted in political and economic injustice. If the Arias' peace plan succeeds, it will be an important first step in correcting that injustice and helping the people of Central America to rebuild.

Canadians will not only wish to extend congratulations to President Arias, but they will want the Canadian Government to play an important part in helping the peace plan succeed.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ACID RAIN—NOVA SCOTIA URGED TO SIGN FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AGREEMENT

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, environmentalists across Canada are delighted with New Brunswick's recent decision to sign the joint agreement to reduce acid rain. This commitment means six of Canada's seven polluting provinces have signed an agreement with the federal Government to cut back allowable sulphur dioxide emissions.

Unfortunately, one province is preventing this country from showing solidarity in acid rain abatement. I have invited the Premier of Nova Scotia to appear before the Special Committee on Acid Rain to discuss the inclusion of his province in the Canadian agreement. It is imperative that Premier John Buchanan join the other First Ministers in waging war against acid precipitation.

The potent coal lobby in the United States is quick to point a crooked finger at the lack of provincial co-operation in Canada, and it will continue to do so until all provinces have signed. Without the Nova Scotia Premier's signature on the dotted line, we are hamstrung. I urge Nova Scotia to share in the wisdom shown by the other six provinces. It is patently unfair to the people of Canada to be shackled by our own. Canada must be, and appear to be, united in its effort to reduce our own emissions while expecting the United States to respond in kind.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

NEED FOR GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, last night, I witnessed a tragic sight. I saw more than 200 people who had travelled for hours by bus to come and talk some sense into their federal Government. I saw men and women, young and not so young, who had to sleep in the gymnasium at the Polyvalente de l'Île in Hull, because in Ottawa they have a Government that will not listen to reason. These people had to get organized, and they held meetings that were attended by 5,000 people. They are now here to ask the Government, not for hand-outs, but for a chance to have jobs like so many other Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, the people of Matane came here proudly to ask the Government to meet its commitments, to consider the needs of their region and to let them and their children work and prosper in their own region, to which they are very much attached, and to ensure that they will have a sound economy and steady, paying jobs. These people are to be commended, and the Government should be ashamed of letting things get to the point where people have to put on a show of strength.

ETHNIC AFFAIRS

ANNUAL MEETING OF CHINESE CANADIAN NATIONAL COUNCIL

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, this weekend I attended the annual conference of the Chinese Canadian National Council in Toronto. The council, which represents Chinese Canadians in 28 cities across the country, was established in 1980 to protest the inaccuracies and racist overtones of the nationally televised W-5 broadcast called "Campus Giveaway".

Since then the council has focused on many other issues including family reunification, employment equity, women's and minority rights.

A major concern of the council is redress for the head tax and the Chinese Exclusion Act. Between 1885 and 1923 Canada imposed a head tax of up to $500 on all Chinese immigrants. Ironically, during the same period our Government was providing financial assistance and incentives to other immigrants. In 1923 the House passed the Chinese Immigration (Exclusion) Act which prohibited, among others, illiterates, diseased persons, beggars and vagrants, idiots and epileptics, and persons of Chinese origin from entering Canada. No wonder the Chinese Canadian National Council is asking for an apology and compensation.

This is an issue which all of us should bear in mind as Commonwealth leaders meet in Vancouver to discuss human rights.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

TREATMENT OF EMPLOYEE AT WILLIAMS LAKE, B.C.

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw to the attention of the House the outrageous and unacceptable labour relations practised by Canada Post.

In Williams Lake a postal employee, Linda Rowse, was ordered quarantined by her doctor for whooping cough. The postmaster threatened to fire her if she did not return to work forthwith.

In Williams Lake the postmaster was not only prepared to violate Mrs. Rowse's rights but was also prepared to expose the rest of the postal employees to disease and work loss.

Not satisfied with this harassment and intimidation, the postal corporation then asked its doctor, Dr. Bell Irving, to telephone Mrs. Rowse, posing as a public health official, to obtain confidential medical information about Mrs. Rowse.

Dr. Bell Irving then began to harass Mrs. Rowse's doctor saying that she had no right to quarantine the woman.

Not satisfied with these exorbitant violations, the postmaster then refused to give the employee her pay cheque. Mrs. Rowse broke out with active whooping cough, and all was forgiven.

If these unacceptable acts were not widespread, they could be viewed as an isolated incident. The Government must act immediately to clean up the mess within that corporation and to grant employees within the postal corporation basic rights which are expected in Canada.

HUMAN RIGHTS

COMMONWEALTH VIOLATIONS

Mr. Reginald Stackhouse (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, an Amnesty International report indicates that 33 of the 49 countries in the Commonwealth are guilty of serious human rights violations. These include beatings, tortures, and political executions.

The countries cited in the Amnesty report are the Bahamas, Bangladesh, Botswana, Brunei-Darussalam, Dominca, Fiji, Gambia, Ghana, Grenada, Guyana, India, Kenya, Lesotho, Malawi, Malaysia, Malta, Mauritius, Nigeria, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Singapore, Sri Lanka, Swaziland, Tanzania, Uganda, United Kingdom, Zambia, Zimbabwe, Jamaica, St. Christopher and Nevis, and St. Vincent and The Grenadines.

Clearly human rights ought to be on the agenda of the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting in Vancouver, and clearly we need an ongoing program here.

Some of the offending countries receive Canadian development assistance. The Canadian Government will do right to use the leverage of its assistance programs to gain justice for people unable to secure it for themselves.

THE CONSTITUTION

MEECH LAKE ACCORD—POSITION OF CANADIAN COALITION ON THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with Hon. Members a part of a letter sent to me by Deborah Coyne of the Faculty of Law, University of Toronto, written on behalf of the Canadian Coalition on the Constitution. She writes:

> As you have clearly recognized, the Meech Lake Accord involves major irrevocable constitutional changes that will seriously weaken the national Government such as to put in doubt our future existence as a single, sovereign, bilingual and multicultural nation. The Accord also undermines the Charter and our commitment as a people to respect and promote basic rights and freedoms, and to strengthen protections for minorities across the country.
> The coalition believes that the Accord is seriously flawed and does not reflect the views of the majority of Canadians. The First Ministers must therefore reopen the Accord for changes and renegotiation, rather than stifle the legitimate and widespread public concern as was done during the recent Special Joint Committee hearings . . .
> The vote of every Member of Parliament on this issue that will decide the future of this nation is of historical importance. We deeply appreciate your decision to add your voice to the side of those who are committed to ensuring that Canada remains a strong, sovereign and united country with the capacity to build further on the standards of fairness and social justice we have already attained.

FREE TRADE

PROTECTION OF FARMERS

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, farmers and especially dairy producers are concerned because they were misinformed about the Free Trade Agreement with the United States. In all areas, marketing boards have been and will continue to be maintained.

The anti-free-trade coalitions have acted shamelessly by alarming, without reason, both farm producers and their long-term lenders. This is rhetoric that is both unfair and dangerous.

There are federal Members who support the interests of Quebec farmers and there are provincial Members. We have all protected the interests of our farm producers.

The others who are responsible for representing them as a group should retract their previous, unfounded statements and give their members the correct information.

The interests and peace of mind of our farmers are at stake, Mr. Speaker.

BIRTH CONTROL

RESPONSIBILITY FOR ISSUE

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, an article in today's Globe and Mail contains the following indictment of birth control: The most effective means of preventing pregnancy—the pill—is dangerous. Women who take the pill face a four times higher risk of dying from arterial disease.

The next most effective method, intrauterine devices, causes infections, haemorrhaging, and can result in infertility.

Women have turned to sterilization as a method of birth control. The need to terminate unwanted pregnancies arises directly out of the abysmal lack of safe, effective choices.

The responsibility for the development of birth control lies with large profit-making pharmaceutical companies.

Birth control is considered to be the responsibility of women when the repercussions of unsafe and ineffective methods hurt us all.

Fertility is not just a women's issue. It has profound and far-reaching implications for our whole society. I challenge the Government to lay aside its prudish and romanticized notions from the past and to take up the challenge of today's society. Provide research dollars for safe, effective birth control choices. Provide support for responsible educative agencies like Planned Parenthood. Ensure coverage through medicare for reproductive services at the provincial level. Decriminalize abortion.

POLITICAL PARTIES

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT—POSITION OF OPPOSITION PARTIES

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, last week I had a guest with me here in Parliament and I took advantage of the occasion to sit for a few moments in the gallery and watch the House proceed with its business. First, my hat goes off to the people in the gallery who are able to keep silent after listening to some of the questions that are asked and statements that are made in the House of Commons.

The second thing I observed that I want to bring to the attention of this House was that for several months now we have been given the line that the Liberals and the NDP represent western Canada and that they are standing up for the rights of western Canadians.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1415)

Mr. Cooper: I appreciate their applause. Any Member from western Canada who took the time to sit in the galleries for just a few minutes and watch what has been going on would have been treated to a litany of complaints about freer trade and the kinds of things western Canadians have been seeking.

We are now going to be dealing with the elimination of tariffs, those very tariffs which have hurt western Canadians for generation after generation. Those Members across the way do not speak for western Canadians. It is the people pushing for the free trade agreement who do.

QUEBEC FILE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Shefford (Mr. Lapierre) has clearly shown how the Tory government is dragging its feet about the Quebec issue. It is dragging its feet about the Matane paper mill and the development of Montreal Island which the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion (Mr. de Cotret) was supposed to announce following the recommendations made by Mr. Picard. It is also dragging its feet on the East Montreal file.

Mr. Speaker, this morning the citizens of Montreal have stated their position with respect to job creation in East Montreal and an employee of the Angus plant was right when he said: The government does not drag its feet; it has both feet in the same shoe and is helpless.

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE AGREEMENT—AMENDMENT OF PATENT ACT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, last Friday I asked the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs why he and other Ministers had been saying that Bill C-22 was not part of the free trade discussions when there was evidence that on October 3 a document had been signed by Canada and the U.S. in which Canada pledged to see through the passage and adoption of Bill C-22. In answer to that question the Minister once again said that "Bill C-22 was not part of the trade negotiations". Later that very same day the Minister for International Trade issued a statement clearly confirming that C-22 had been discussed and was "part of the natural process of these negotiations."

Why was the Minister saying to this House and the Canadian people that C-22 had not been part of the negotiations when that was clearly not the case? Will he not admit now that the Government has been misleading this House and the Canadian people, and trying to hide the fact of a clear link between C-22 and agreement by the U.S. on to free trade?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as we have been saying since the election campaign of 1984, amendments to the Patent Act with respect to pharmaceuticals are absolutely necessary for research and development and health care in Canada, for our international obligations, and the protection of intellectual property. It is on that basis we have been proceeding. Bill C-22 was introduced, and hopefully will be passed by the other place, because it is needed for Canada.

The agreement between the U.S. and Canada, tabled in this House and signed by all parties, does not deal with C-22 because we introduced it because of its benefit to Canadians. We campaigned on it in the 1984 election. Indeed, the Government of which the Hon. Member was a part in June of 1983 said it was committed to changes in the Patent Act. All these things happened long before the trade talks were even initiated.

BILL C-22—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the Minister has not explained why he said as recently as last Friday that Bill C-22 was not part of the trade negotiations when his colleague, the Minister for International Trade, said in her statement issued later that day that it clearly was. In fact, that was demonstrated to be the case by a document released to the press by the Canadian Embassy.

Why is the Minister trying to evade answering my very clear question as to why he, on behalf of the Government, continues to insist that Bill C-22 was not part of the free trade negotiations when it clearly was part of the negotiations? Why will he not come clean with the Canadian people and, rather than trying to hide that fact, try to explain the link? What is he afraid of? What is he hiding?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not know to which press release the Hon. Member is referring. The one issued by the Minister for International Trade on Friday says that one of the working parties sent forward to negotiators a draft initialled by the working party chiefs recommending a commitment by the Government of Canada with respect to Bill C-22. The Ministers who were there, the Minister of Finance and the Minister for International Trade, said no, and it was not included and is not included as part of the free trade package.

The contents of C-22 were put together by the Government quite separately, starting in September, 1984, and have to do with promoting research and development and better health care in Canada. The Bill reflects our obligations internationally in terms of intellectual property which are not and have never been a part of a free trade agreement. They have nothing to do with the free trade agreement.

DISCUSSION OF LEGISLATION BY WORKING GROUPS

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I will direct my supplementary question to the same Minister. If Bill C-22 was not part of the free trade negotiations, what were the two working parties doing discussing C-22? Were these working parties not there on behalf of their Governments? Is he trying to tell the House that the Canadian working party was there only to send out for fried chicken for the Ministers?

The fact is that the chickens have come home to roost and the Government has been shown to have been misleading the Canadian people. Why will he not admit that? If he did it would be a lot easier for himself and for this stumbling Government.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I would be allowed to answer that question since I was at the table when this event took place. There was some discussion in the working group on this. The members of the working group passed it up to the Ministers and we said, "Absolutely not, this is not a part of the trade agreement".

As the Minister for Consumer and Corporate Affairs has very effectively stated, it has never been a part of the—

Ms. Copps: Why did you sign it?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The question coming from across the floor is "why did I sign it?" The simple fact is that I did not sign it, nor did the Minister for International Trade, the Chief of Staff of the Prime Minister nor the chief negotiator.

Mr. Lapierre: Who did?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I should make it very clear that there were working groups—

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Who were they working for?
